TABLING OF REPORT OF DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to table in the House, in both official languages, the report of the Departmental Committee on Official Languages in the Department of National Defence and the Canadian Armed Forces.

REGISTRATION OF LOBBYISTS

COMPREHENSIVE REVIEW OF ACT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House for the following motion. I move:

> That pursuant to section 14 of an act respecting the registration of lobbyists, chapter 44, fourth supplement, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations be the committee to undertake a comprehensive review of the administration and operation of this act and submit a report to the House no later than one year after the review is undertaken.

• (1010)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am not necessarily in opposition to this request for unanimous consent, but we have not had any consultations on this matter. Therefore I will have to deny the unanimous consent request now. It is not to be interpreted as being in opposition, but further consultation is necessary.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I see that there is no unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

BILL C-91

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of constituents.

They point out that Bill C-91, which is before the House at the moment, will allow brand name drug companies to market their drugs without any competition from the generic drug companies for up to 20 years. They say that this will increase the prices that provincial and private drug plans have to pay.

The petitioners are asking that we not proceed with Bill C-91. As well they suggest we repeal Bill C-22 which was passed in 1987. This would enable Canadians to have full benefit from lower priced generic drugs, allowing substantial savings to occur to provincial drug plans.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present petitions in memory of Rosalynn Dupuis, asking for changes to the Young Offenders Act.

I have received many petitions and it is unfortunate that a tragedy such as this one and many others that have occurred recently are what is driving us all to demand changes to the Young Offenders Act. We hope we can see these changes very quickly.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from the Abitibi-Témiscamingue CEGEP in Val-d'Or. The petitioners declare that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable, because they incite more violence; that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made.

Information on violent acts that is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eliminate violence in our society and thus better protect our children and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from thousands of health care providers, nurses who live on the Sunshine Coast in Powell River, British Columbia.

They ask the government to incorporate the principles of health care into the Canadian Constitution, to reaffirm the shared responsibility for financing the health care system between the provincial and federal governments, to establish a national arm's length monitoring system to ensure the implementation of interprovincial agreements and enforce those agreements where necessary under federal legislation.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to present to this hon. House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition from Canadians concerning Haitians who for more than 50 years have been forced to take part in an illegal trade in Haitian workers between Haiti and the Dominican Republic. Human beings are sold like cattle, confined in bateys and made to cut sugar cane in conditions that violate human rights.

I think this petition is very appropriate today.

[English]

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting a petition from several hundred constituents drawing the House's attention to the fact that the United States has unfairly imposed a duty on our softwood lumber exports to that country and has engaged in numerous other trade practices which amount to harassment to Canadian producers.

They also note that the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States has resulted in lost jobs and the devastation of the Canadian economy while not providing the promised benefits.

Therefore they call upon Parliament to request that the Prime Minister and the minister responsible for international trade take any action necessary to defend the interests of the Canadian softwood lumber industry against unfair duties and also to request that Parliament act immediately to effect the cancellation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to present to Parliament petitions signed by hundreds of constituents. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children.

They want to encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse, provide assistance and support for women reporting assault or abuse, and provide relief and support to women as mothers to protect their children.

We need legislation to emphasize the need for abuser rehabilitation and we must concentrate a special effort on training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present a petition, duly authorized under Standing Order 36, from many of my constituents in Saskatoon. They point out that the Mulroney government, through Bill C–91, seeks to end the licensing of further generic drugs in Canada. Bill C–91 has the potential of eliminating the possibility of generic drug manufacture for up to 20 years.

They point out that with the change from seven years to 10 years in Bill C–22, prices rose inordinately in comparison to the cost of inflation and the cost of manufacture and was a heavy burden on the drug plans of the provinces, of private drug plans, and of private people as well.

They ask the government not to proceed with Bill C–91 and to repeal Bill C–22.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting two petitions this morning.

The first one points out that family class and assisted relative immigrants have historically been an important part of Canadian immigration. It also points out that family class and assisted relatives have relatives in Canada that will assist them in finding employment, housing, and learning Canadian languages and customs, thus speeding their integration into Canadian society.

It also points out that the present proposals by this government are going to make it more difficult for family class and assisted relatives to obtain immigration to Canada. It calls upon the government to change its attitude and give first priority to family class and assisted relatives in looking at immigration.

INDIA

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my second petition points out that 75 per cent of all business in the New Delhi office in India on both immigration and visitors' visas comes from the Punjab. It is very difficult for people to travel from the Punjab to New Delhi, and that the New Delhi office is grossly overworked.

It asks that a new consular office be opened in the Punjab immediately to provide both visitor visa service and immigration services for the people of the Punjab.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions this morning.

I am pleased today to present petitions relating to the northern tax allowance signed by residents of Pierceland, Goodsoil, and the regional municipality of Beaver River, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners note that earlier this summer the Tax Court of Canada ruled that Revenue Canada erred in its interpretation of a section of the northern tax rules, but Revenue Canada policy does not allow all the residents of the area to benefit from that tax court ruling.

The petitioners ask that the Minister of National Revenue take note of this tax court ruling and review all cases where people in northwest Saskatchewan may be eligible for the northern tax benefit but are currently denied that benefit because of existing Revenue Canada policy.

I would like to add that I have already sent a copy of these petitions to the Minister of National Revenue.

BILL C–91

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the opposition to Bill C–91, being debated in Parliament these days, is growing.

Today I have the duty and honour to present petitions signed by hundreds of residents of northwest Saskatchewan. They ask the federal government to withdraw Bill C–91, the act of Parliament that will allow brand name prescription drug companies to market their drugs without competition from generic drugs for up to 20 years.

• (1020)

By withdrawing this damaging piece of legislation, the petitioners claim that Canadians will be able to continue to enjoy the benefits of lower priced generic drugs and the provincial drug plans can better serve Canadians without charging higher fees or providing less coverage.

There are 438 signatures on these petitions and others that I will table in the days ahead will contain more than 1,200 signatures from my constituency.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens from the province of Quebec who deplore the illegal traffic of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic.

They call upon Parliament to encourage the government and the United Nations to do something about the situation, even to the extent of imposing sanctions upon the Dominican Republic because of its treatment of these workers as they cross these borders.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and duty to rise to present a petition that is truly a national petition, from Vancouver Island through to Newfoundland and from every province in the Confederation.

These people are concerned about the present bill before the House of Commons, Bill C-91, which seeks to end the licensing of further no-name generic drugs in Canada.

This petitions is signed by all age groups in Canada as well, from seniors to young people who are concerned with the increased cost of drugs as a result of this particular bill. They are asking the government to not proceed with the bill and to repeal Bill C-22 so that in fact we can continue in Canada with our low-cost drugs for all age groups for all regions of the country.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on behalf of my constituents in Coquitlam, B.C., Port Moody, Port Coquitlam and Belcarra.

It is on the drug legislation, Bill C-91. The petitioners say that Bill C-91 will allow brand name drug companies to market their drugs without competition from generic drugs for periods of up to 20 years. They point out that generics are no-name drugs which are cheaper than brand name drugs.

They are objecting to the government extending this period in which the brand name drugs will have a monopoly and which will mean higher drug costs for my constituents. Both myself and my constituents are dead set against that.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, November 16 consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate, the hon. member for North Island—Powell River had nine minutes remaining in the debate.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the debate continues on Bill C-91, which is legislation the Conservative government proposes to change the Patent Act, to permit international drug companies to maintain patents over their products for up to 20 years.

The New York Times in a recent article indicated that this was a tremendous coup for the drug companies which managed to insert in the North American trade agreement a provision that required Mexico and Canada to change the laws in those countries to prohibit the development of generic drugs in a timely manner. The provision now permits a 20 year patent on a product. In The New York Times article it estimated that by the end of the century it will cost $1 billion out of the pockets of Canadians for international drug companies.

It is ironic that a Conservative government, in its dying days, would produce for its friends a $1 billion gift in the next eight years. That $1 billion gift is going to come out of provincial pharmacare plans, plans which provide reasonably priced pharmaceuticals to senior citizens and low income Canadians. This Conservative government, in the dying days of its mandate, is going to take that $1 billion from Canadians and give it to Americans.

However, this is not the last movement of the international drug companies. The Canadian government health officials who recognize that they have been sold out or stabbed in the back by this Conservative government are going to attempt to set up a national formulary system which provides information on the cheapest possible alternatives on existing generics that can replace these high-priced brand name drugs. At the same time, the next target of the friends of this Conservative government—and I am sure we will see the bill before the House—is to stop the set-up and functioning of a national drug formulary to try and protect senior citizens until this outrageous piece of legislation can be abolished.

The paper quotes Gerald Mossinghoff, president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association in Washington, who states: "Members would like to eliminate Canada's government price controls. The American drug-makers also oppose drug formularies which are increasingly cutting into their profits in the United States as well as Canada". While there certainly is an obligation to move very quickly to set up those formularies to in turn protect Canadian citizens over this short period of time, there is also a critical obligation to get rid of this Conservative government, a government that would steal $1 billion from Canadians in the lowest income brackets and turn it over to the international drug companies.

It is an absolute embarrassment in Canada to watch the former Liberal cabinet minister strut back and forth across the country, Canada's chief dope pedlar if you will, putting in full-page ads selling the international brand name drugs. Take the last Post which was given to every member of Parliament and every physician across Canada. We get an idea of the current situation and how the companies are selling drugs. There is no information provided, just straight promotion and advertising to try to get physicians to prescribe and sell these high-priced products.

We ought to be moving in this House to immediately stop this kind of crap from being put in full-page articles in things like The Medical Post. It is an ironic thing that Maclean Hunter, a very honourable and long-time publishing company in Canada, can send around a rag like this, a rag that would make Lord Thomson smile in disbelief that somebody could exceed him in providing news that is simply there to separate the propaganda and advertising.

We should, through legislation, be abandoning the kind of advertising activity that the drug companies are doing in Canada. This is absolutely outrageous. In the current edition of The Medical Post there are 16 full pages of b.s. in that issue. Every physician in Canada gets it. It does not provide information about new drugs. It creates a dangerous situation where physicians are turned into individuals who simply convey these prescriptions through to people, often dangerous prescriptions. There has been mention of the research done by these drug companies in Canada. A good percentage of that research is simply undertaking testing that is required for marketing in the country. We would be getting that whether or not we passed this outrageous piece of legislation. They are required by law to do most of it.

The suggestion is that we should prohibit any promotional advertising by drug companies in newspapers or medical journals that does not provide absolute, clear, approved information. We are prepared to stop alcohol advertising. We are prepared to stop tobacco advertising. This is as dangerous to our health and it is as important to stop this as it is to stop those other products.

The government has imposed closure on this legislation today. This legislation is part of the North American trade agreement, an outrageous piece of sellout of Canadian people by the Mulroney government, locking us into an agreement, compromising sovereignty and putting us into a situation that is going to gut the Canadian economy.

One provision in there is to steal a billion dollars from senior citizens and low income Canadians through this outrageous piece of legislation that removes generic drugs. It allows these international drug company bandits to steal for 20 years from Canadians and to provide false information. We should be abolishing the right of those individuals to give away free samples to physicians to increase the production and distribution of these drugs, especially when there are cheaper ones available. We should be supporting a program for a national formulary to reduce the number of drugs we are putting on the Canadian market.

There is an excellent book by Michael Rachlis and Carol Kushner entitled Second Opinion. I recommend it to anyone. It basically states that most of the drug company research is not into new drug development that helps Canadians. It is into how to duplicate the effect with a different chemical that can be promoted in Canada. I sincerely recommend that book to everyone in the House and in the country. Second Opinion really gives an extremely good outline on how we are being totally hoodwinked by both the Mulroney government and the international drug companies on this important issue.

I see that time is drawing nigh. In summary, let us abolish the right of these dope pedlars to advertise and promote. Let us get rid of the ability to give away free samples and get rid of the ability to put this outrageous literature in the pseudo-newspapers and professional newspapers that are coming out. Let us get rid of Judy Erola, Canada's top dope pedlar, while we are at it.

Another thing that is absolutely critical is that we should be setting up a national formulary to help Canadians at least prevent some of the haemorrhaging away of the billion of dollars the Mulroney government has given to the international drug companies.

The last thing on the list is to have the Liberals clearly stand up and say they are going to abolish this legislation, along with the NDP. It is an outrageous piece of work.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and a short comment. The member mentioned the Conservative government. He also mentioned the North American free trade deal and tied the drug bill into that potential agreement.

Why does he think the government is persisting in policies rejected by a vast majority of Canadians, both in the drug deal and now with NAFTA?

I want to give him an example. On September 9, the Conservative government flatly rejected, as he knows, the New Democrats demand that the government ask the people of Canada whether or not they supported the new North American free trade deal.

I took the initiative, I will tell the member in the House, and I held a referendum in my own riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam. I asked my constituents: "Do you support Canada's participation in the North American free trade agreement with the U.S. and Mexico?" The response was overwhelming. In all my years as a member of Parliament, now going into my 14th year, I have never seen such a display of outrage. Within two weeks I had received 1,289 replies; 1,163 of my constituents said no to NAFTA while a mere 123 said yes, and 3 constituents wanted more information. That means 90.2 per cent of my constituents oppose Canada's participation in NAFTA and only 9.5 per cent support it.

In this survey my constituents clearly spoke out against NAFTA which is supported by the Conservative government and by the Liberal Party.

Why are the government and the Liberal Party not listening to the views of a vast majority of Canadians?

Mr. Milliken: That is a very silly question.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my Liberal colleague down the way says that is a silly question. The important thing is that we have some documentary evidence before the House on how much Canadian people hate this government. The referendum went into the gutter as much as anything else because of absolute hatred. The proportions were outrageous.

When Canadians find out that this particular item, this business of the pharmaceutical deal between the international drug bandits and the Mulroney government, is in the North American trade agreement they are going to go crazy.

The other day we had the member for Winnipeg South standing up in this House and saying: "They are crying fire in the theatre and terrorizing pensioners". Crap, absolute crap.

Mr. Dick: Watch your language.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Watch my language. I cannot speak strongly enough to describe this heinous deal in the House.

Mr. Dick ought to be standing up here and apologizing to people in Canada. Outrageous.

Mr. Milliken: Watch your blood pressure.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Watch my blood pressure. As a matter of fact in the 24 pages of full–page ads on this garbage in the last Post we certainly see the national drug pedlars, Judy Erola, Canada's chief drug pedlar, out selling stuff, straight advertising promotion, nothing to do with the health of Canadians.

The key thing in this is that as part of the North American trade agreement people the of Canada are going to go crazy when they find out Mr. Mulroney has sold them out to the tune of a billion dollars.

It is acknowledged by health care economists on both sides that the drug companies have scored enormously. I do not know what Mr. Mulroney did with Bush out in the boat, but it certainly has a very serious impact for Canadians.

I want to finish by saying this is outrageous crap. The last Post and other documents that show this kind of propaganda should be got rid of right now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate it if the hon. member would respect the rules of this House.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, that outrageous outburst by the member opposite just goes to show they are not particularly serious about the details of this bill, which is a very good bill for Canada, but instead are trying to score partisan points because they are looking forward to an election. I think the bill is too important for that.

Members of the NDP are always talking about the need for more jobs. They sound a bit like a broken record: jobs, jobs, jobs. This bill will create the kind of investment opportunity that will ensure there are jobs for Canadians.

The member opposite talked a lot about increases in a story in The New York Times. He surprises me because on the one hand he is telling us what a bunch of evil people, what an evil empire we have to the south of us in the United States, and on the other hand he quotes an American journal as if it were the gospel and as if it had all the answers Canadians do not have.

The facts are simple and perhaps the member would like to comment on them. The increase in the cost of purchases by pharmacies and hospitals of all prescription and behind the counter drugs due to the removal of compulsory licensing is predicted to be less than 0 per cent in the first year. This will gradually increase to 2 per cent by the year 2000. Those are the simple facts. Perhaps the hon. member would like to explain why he believes an American journal over what the federal government has to say.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is simple. It is either absolute stupidity or an attempt to carry on the lie that we have any kind of benefit from this. These people would have done it anyway.

Why did they allow this to go into the North American trade agreement? The Americans and the Canadian economists say we are going to lose a billion dollars in the next eight years. When she goes back to Winnipeg South she is going to be politically stoned for this. I think she was stoned when she came in and tried to argue the point of view.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My friend who just sat down has done a number of things during his speech that I think he should be checked up on. First, he referred to "the Mulroney deal", knowing that he is not supposed to refer to the Prime Minister other than as the Prime Minister. Second, he referred to Paul Dick as Mr. Dick, and he knows he is not supposed to do that. Also he just accused an hon. member from this side of the House of being stoned.

I think that he should be taken to task for this kind of activity. It is not appropriate for this House of Commons and it is not appropriate for that gentleman, because I know he does not mean to be that kind of person in this House of Commons. I would ask that he respond and apologize to the House.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I realize there was a slight amount of exuberance in the anger of what happened here and if anyone has taken offence over there—

Mr. Harvard: Hyperbole.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Hyperbole, as the hon. member says.

If they would be prepared to remove this legislation, I would be prepared to recant some of the things I have said.

Mrs. Dobbie: That is not good enough.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman to be an honourable man. I have known him for a number of years. I would just ask that he withdraw the remarks he has made about an hon. member on this side of the House. I think it is only courteous that he do that.

Mr. Fisher: Let the Speaker decide.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): As my colleagues say, it was part of the thrust and parry of debate here. Her remarks were as outrageous.

Mr. Richardson: That is not debate. What do you know about debate, low life?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I understand some of the members here are a bit exercised, but maybe they can understand how exercised we are about the jackboot approach that is being used by the government and the outrageous nature of this legislation.

I would certainly be guided by Your Honour's remarks and coerced into doing what the Chair feels has to be done, but I do not think those remarks are anything as outrageous as what this government has done to the people of Canada. I am outraged by their attempt to stand in this House and justify this outrageous deal.

Mrs. Dobbie: Withdraw your remarks.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Immediately after the speech by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River, I said I would appreciate it if he would be more respectful of the Standing Orders, and I was referring to his tossing the advertisement up in the air and mentioning the Prime Minister by name.

I think both sides of the House are prepared to show a certain amount of good will at this point. The hon. member just said that he may have got carried away in the heat of the debate. I therefore consider the incident closed, and I again wish to ask hon. members on both sides of the House for their co-operation in maintaining the level of parliamentary decorum in this debate that is traditional in the House of Commons of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that you have declared the matter closed. I was on my way into the Chamber to intervene in this exchange when you rose to your feet. I apologize if I—

An hon. member: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): One moment, please. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Edwards: Thank you for your courtesy, Mr. Speaker. I would appreciate the opportunity to complete my point of order as other members have.

I had the opportunity to observe the recent exchange on the television monitor. I believe that what the hon. member opposite has done and has said is unparliamentary and inexcusable and that it must be unconditionally withdrawn.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do in fact respect the rules of this House. If I have offended anyone, I certainly would withdraw the remark. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. member.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the sanctimonious approach of the member for Powell River, I had to go back to what was going on in my own province.

He quoted Dr. Michael Rachlis in Second Opinion in his speech. I happen to be a strong believer and supporter of his. He is a constituent of mine. The members of the New Democratic Party should know that in the province of Ontario right now, the ministry of health has had many of Rachlis' recommendations before it for many months.

The member comes into this House and pretends to be so sanctimonious when in the province of Ontario his New Democratic partners are doing absolutely nothing. They are delisting medical services, they are delisting drugs to seniors, and they are making a sham of the medical system in the province of Ontario. He should make sure that when he is throwing darts across this House, whether it be our way or across that way, that he examines the performance of his own NDP government in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this very important amendment to the Patent Act.

My colleagues on this side of the House have made a very strong case for the balance of Bill C-91. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in his September speech for one has shown how the legislation before us balances the needs of economic development with those of the consumers who require access to reasonably priced drugs.

For a relatively young agency, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has done a great job in keeping price increases for patented drugs below the rate of inflation. As I understand this legislation, the board will be given even tougher powers to better control both existing drug prices and the new drug prices.

I, too, would like to examine the balance of this legislation, but rather than focusing on the needs of producers and consumers, I would like to remind this House that the economic benefits of this legislation have already begun to tip the balance in favour of a broader distribution of research and development activity across our country. One of the first regions to benefit from this new balance will be my province of British Columbia.

The research community in British Columbia is well aware of the importance of this legislation that is before us today. Ever since the government first announced its intention to reform Canada's patent laws, we have received letters of support and encouragement from across the country and from British Columbia in particular.

Dr. Keith Dawson, for example, of the University of British Columbia maintained that patent protection is an essential feature to maintain Canada at the forefront of medical care, and I strongly endorse the extension of patent protection for pharmaceutical products.

His views were echoed by Dr. F. L. Ervin, of Pitt Meadows, B.C.: "I believe that it is essential to preserve the incentive for entrepreneurial development in this area", said Dr. Ervin. He added: "I believe that drug patent legislation which will give us a level playing field compared to other GATT countries will be the best way of ensuring our further growth and development in the research and development field".

Two doctors from New Westminster added their voices to this course of support for the proposed changes to the patent laws. Dr. R. A. Kuritzky wrote: "I am well aware of the enormous costs and efforts involved in the research and development to produce patented drugs, and I believe that your measure will promote the research and development of these drugs in Canada rather than abroad".

Dr. Kuritzky was joined by Dr. John Lien, also of New Westminster, who wrote: "It is high time for Canada to march in step with the rest of the world and afford patent protection that has some meaning for an industry that is prepared to invest in the immediate and future good of this country. Not only will we benefit directly from such a move, but the spin-offs of increased medical research funding and employment should also be recognized".

These British Columbians recognize the importance of patent protection in fostering an investment climate that will promote research and development. Each of them, I would venture to say, hopes that a good deal of that new investment will find its way into the laboratories and research facilities in British Columbia. This House is always aware that in exchange for improved patent protection in 1987, the Canadian pharmaceutical industry set a goal of increasing its investment in research and development from 4.9 per cent of sales revenue in 1987 to 8 per cent of sales by 1991 and 10 per cent by 1996.

When the patent laws were reformed in the last Parliament, the government received commitments from the patented medicine industry to invest $1.4 billion directly in research and development.

We know that the innovative drug companies have not only lived up to their commitments for increased R and D in Canada, but they have exceeded them. This was clear even after just one year. The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board reported that the industry research and development to sales ratio had increased to 6.1 per cent in 1988 from its level of 4.9 per cent just one year earlier. Brand name companies reported a total investment of $165.7 million in 1988.

In other words, these companies were living up to their commitments. They had promised that increased patent protection would mean new investment and new jobs, and it was clear right from the time of the first report of the board that this was an accurate assessment. That trend of increased R and D by the innovative drug companies continues. The fourth report of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board was tabled last June and covers the period ending December 31, 1991.

The report points out that for the 64 firms with patents filed with the board, the ratio of research and development and expenditures to sales reached 9.6 per cent in 1991. In other words, in 1991, after just four years of improved patent protection, these companies were on the verge of reaching the 10 per cent target originally set for 1996.

Total expenditures on R and D for these companies reached $376.4 million in 1991. That is an increase of over 23 per cent from the year before. These figures present an excellent case for the effectiveness of patent protection in encouraging innovative companies to conduct their research and development in Canada.

It is no secret that the majority of pharmaceutical companies is now located in Ontario and Quebec. For many years R and D investment by drug companies has meant new research money for central Canada. Seldom has it meant new research opportunities for the east and the west. That began to change with the introduction of new patent laws in 1987. The amount of R and D spent by innovative companies in western Canada from 1988 to 1991 amounted to some $84 million.

Let me put that into perspective. That amount is more than twice the amount the generic drug sector invested in all of Canada over the same period. What can we expect from this new phase of patent reform? Since the government announced its intention to improve patent protection through the legislation before us today, the innovative companies have announced projects amounting to more that $500 million. Those are investments over and above the previous commitments and of those investments, projects totalling $90 million will be located outside central Canada.

What we are witnessing is a decision by the pharmaceutical industry to expand its base beyond Quebec and Ontario. The new investment outside central Canada has not come by accident. The Government of Canada has conscientiously sought to encourage innovative companies to diversify the location of their activities in Canada.

In fact, Industry, Science and Technology Canada is working with a number of provinces to build investment strategies in the pharmaceutical sector. We will find new ways to encourage more R and D and pharmaceutical manufacturing in all regions of Canada.

Already the innovative pharmaceutical companies are acting upon the prospect of new patent protection that will place Canada more in line with the protection granted by other countries. British Columbia will be one of the first provinces to benefit.

Just last July Bristol–Myers Squibb announced it would invest $500,000 in research and development at the University of British Columbia and another $250,000 in R and D at the University of Alberta.

On September 1, Merck Frosst announced the investment of $15 million over five years in research and development activities to be conducted on the west coast.

In early October of this year, Ayerst announced a $60 million investment for a new plant in Brandon, Manitoba, and Glaxo pledged $15 million for the basic R and D at the University of Alberta.

As you can see, it is not only central Canada that will benefit from this patent protection, but all of Canada. By encouraging the pharmaceutical industry to do its research in Canada, we help build an infrastructure that will attract more investments down the road.

We help attract, train and retain researchers, technologists and technicians who will begin to provide a critical mass of expertise in science and technology.

Merck Frosst has contributed substantially to making the Montreal area a world-class centre of excellence. Now the company would like to do the same thing for British Columbia.

In acknowledging the important role that Merck Frosst will assume in helping to develop a healthy R and D sector in B.C., I would also like to pay tribute to a man whose vision has been instrumental in encouraging the company to invest on the west coast.

David Strangway, president of the University of British Columbia, has been untiring in his efforts to solicit R and D investment for his university.

Last January when the Government of Canada announced its intention to reform patent protection in order to attract new investment, Mr. Strangway contacted virtually every pharmaceutical company in Canada to seek research commitments.

Merck Frosst responded with a commitment of $15 million over five years. This represents about a quarter of Merck Frosst spending in support of research outside the company. The R and D contracted outside the company is in addition to an in-house research budget of between $35 million and $40 million a year.

The investment will be directed primarily to research and development in genetic disorders and will build upon Vancouver's acknowledged strength as a research centre in this field.

Researchers at the University of British Columbia in the biomedical research centre of Vancouver are among the 23 principal investigators working in 12 different universities in research facilities across the country as part of the Canadian genetic disease network.

This is one of the research networks sponsored under the Government of Canada's $240 million network of centres of excellence program. It has already announced remarkable breakthroughs in isolating the genetic defects responsible for cystic fibrosis, muscular dystrophy and myotonic dystrophy.

The work of the generic diseases network has advanced the search for cures for these crippling diseases, and scientists in Vancouver, such as Dr. Michael Hayden, will continue to explore new trails in genetic research.

By the way, Dr. Hayden's name has been brought forward as the eminent researcher who will operate the proposed new facility that will grow from the Merck Frosst investment. The facility will likely create 10 new faculty positions at UBC.

These faculty positions represent a tremendous opportunity for researchers in Canada who want to become involved in leading-edge R and D in one of the most exciting areas of science and technology. British Columbia, well-known for its forest and mineral wealth, is well on the way to becoming a world-renowned centre for genetics research.

What will it take for Merck Frosst to go through with its proposal to invest $15 million in genetics research in British Columbia? Most important, Merck Frosst requires the added patent protection that is contained in this bill before us today if it is to go ahead with its investment proposal.

I know that hon. members from both sides of this House support the principle of increased R and D. I know that hon. members from every region of the country will applaud a decision that will help add the University of British Columbia to the growing list of Canadian centres of excellence in pharmaceuticals research and development.

I would ask all of hon. members to help make sure that this project goes through. How can they help?

By providing adequate patent protection so that the company that is willing to make these costly investments in R and D will be able to reap the benefits through patent protection that lasts for a full 20-year term.

The legislation before us means new opportunities for researchers across Canada. It means the beginning of a new world class research facility at the University of British Columbia. It means more research investment that will help create balance among the regions of Canada in the effort of all provinces to retool their economies for the demands of the information age.

I urge members of all parties to support its speedy passage.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is fairly knowledgeable on this subject and has spent some time discussing it with people of the faculty of the University of British Columbia.

I want to tell him that in a visit to UBC a week and a half ago I did the same thing. I had a discussion with Dr. Bernard Bressler, who is knowledgeable in this field. It explained part of the reason why he and the members of the faculty of UBC sought passage of this bill. He mentioned the same $15 million grant that was available for research purposes at UBC as part of the reason for his support of this legislation.

What I would like to ask the hon. member to do is take the House into his confidence. He must have approached the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and perhaps his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare to see how much Canadians are going to pay for this research.

I think this is a fair question, and I would like to hear his answer to it. How much are the Canadian taxpayers going to pay in order to get this research in Canada? He is asking Canadian taxpayers to fork over another $800 million during the next six years in order to fund a few million in research.

I would like to know how many dollars are going to be spent. Perhaps he can also tell us how much more is going into the obscene profits already being made by the international drug companies—

An hon. member: The biggest profits in the world.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says they have the biggest profits in the world. Friends of mine who are unbiased observers of this call these profits obscene.

How much of the additional $800 million that is going to be taken out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer is going to that source?

I agree that research and development is very important. I concede that point, but Canadian taxpayers are really the ones who are going to fund this research if we change the law to allow this.

The hon. member knows the government has already changed the law once in a way that is very favourable to these drug companies. Now it is proposing to change the law again and hand over a few hundred million dollars more to these drug companies.

I want to to know how much Canadian taxpayers are going to pay for this research. How many dollars of taxes are going to be collected from every taxpayer in Canada for every dollar of research spent? Can the hon. member give us that figure?

Mr. Wilbee: Mr. Speaker, that is a very reasonable question and certainly I considered it myself.

First of all, I do not really agree with his number of $800 million. There has never been any basic research as to where that would actually come from. Like so many statistical studies, you can prove whatever you really want to from this type of thing. We can pick a number out of the air. We can neglect to include other factors such as what would the actual cost be without inflation, with inflation and what are the actual drug costs going to be even if this research is not done.

We cannot say that all the money is going to be put into research and will be taken directly off. In drug prices, as the hon. member probably knows, there is very little relationship between actual cost and what is charged. This is one of the facts of the industry. There are many different factors that are involved in drug prices.

For example, just the other day on the news there was a report where a criminal in the United States had sued the makers of halcion for approximately $1.5 million because he committed a horrendous crime after taking a halcion tablet. The drug company was expected to pay this penalty because somebody had abused its product. All over this continent people are suing the drug houses for exorbitant amounts. Also, the drug approval system we require is fantastically expensive.

I believe it is unrealistic to say that because we give three extra years of patent it is going to cost $800 million. We already have 17 years. As I have said, those figures may be used, but someone else on this side of the House may come up with an entirely different set of figures they can justify in the same way.

Certainly there is going to be some cost. I do not think anybody denies that. This $15 million being spent at UBC does not take into account all the other hundreds of millions of dollars that are going to be spent, the jobs that are going to be provided or the research that will stay at home. If this research is not going to be done in Canada, it is still has to be done somewhere. My feeling is that we should do it in Canada rather than in the United States or elsewhere.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to comment. I disagree with what the hon. member for Delta is saying. I remember when drug prices were reasonable and accessible to individuals. I do not know whether the member still practises or not, but if he goes to a drug store now and compares the prices with what they were just after we passed the last bill on pharmaceuticals in 1987, he will see that it allowed prices to skyrocket.

This bill is going to cost Canadian taxpayers maybe $400 million or $800 million. Perhaps if that money went into research and development in Canada we could accept that. But it will not stay here. It will go to international drug companies. It will not stay in Canada. We might get 5 per cent of it. His university in British Columbia might get a little bit of money but millions and millions of dollars will go to international drug companies in Switzerland, France, Britain and all over the world. That money is not going to stay here.

I ask him as a physician, did he notice that since we passed the last pharmaceutical act in 1987 that prices have increased tremendously? I wonder if he agrees with me on that?

Mr. Wilbee: Mr. Speaker, this is again a very critical thing. My hon. colleague will recognize that the increase in the cost of the medication which he buys across the counter, cold remedies or antihistamines or antacids or anything like that has gone up far more in that period than the cost of prescription drugs. He will also find that the cost of drugs which were on the market in 1987 have not gone up more than 2.6 per cent a year. It is the new medications coming on to the market where there is a large increase.

As I mentioned earlier, there are a lot of causes. The drug approval system takes a lot longer and is a lot tighter. It requires far more studies than in the past and a lot of duplication. We could do a lot in this area to assist in reducing the cost of pharmaceuticals to the companies. I think statistics will show that the cost of patent medications have not increased as much as other medications available on the market.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to wade into this debate on this very important legislation. It is important because at this time in Canadian history we may be giving up the one single intellectual property mechanism that makes sense. We do it one way in Canada, the world does it another way. They have demanded that we give it up and this government has said yes, we will.

Today this country is in a recession that is bleeding us with unemployment, bleeding us with bankruptcies, bleeding up with red ink, shrinkage, no growth. I find it strange that at this particular point in this year the government has chosen this time to push, even using time allocation in this House, this legislation that gives increased patent protection to those who have already got it. We are not talking here about little guys; we are talking about international drug companies. I find the timing is curious. It is unfortunate.

This bill proposes that Canada give up its system of what is called compulsory licensing. That system provides patent protection for the inventor of a drug for a period of seven to ten years, depending on how you measure the start date, when the drug is first marketed in Canada.

The rest of the law on intellectual property and patents in Canada, outside of the pharmaceutical area, runs on a 17-year rule, 17 years of protection.

We found reason in this country 25 years ago to depart from that intellectual property regime. We found a good socially beneficial reason to depart from 17 years of protection, and that reason involved the public interest and the need of individual Canadians to access pharmaceuticals at reasonable prices within a reasonable period. We found that generic drug manufacturers which were able to take compulsory licences were able to produce drugs at lower prices. I could say much lower; it will vary from drug to drug. In any event, we took that step and now this government is proposing that we walk away from it.

That compulsory licensing regime gave those pharmaceutical companies, the inventors, seven years of exclusivity and seven years without competition, seven years of monopoly, seven years of setting the price for their drug at whatever they wanted to set it at.

We figured that was fair because they invented the drug, they spent the money to research it, they spent the money to market and develop it, and they needed a return on their product.

Canada's system, made in Canada, not like anywhere else in the world, decided that instead of 17 years of monopoly and exclusivity, they should have seven. Now we want to walk away from that.

That price competition benefited all Canadians. I will refer to other things later in my remarks that would corroborate that.

Another thing that the compulsory licensing system did was foster the growth of an indigenous Canadian pharmaceutical industry. We have in this country examples of companies, indigenously Canadian, which have prospered using compulsory licences.

The other thing that compulsory licensing did was that indirectly it actually rode shotgun on price increases in the industry. For those who had a patent, the fact that there was a compulsory licence taken out by what we call the generic manufacturer had the direct effect of limiting the price increase on the patented drug. Because the company that held the patent knew that if they increased the price, as was their right because they had a monopoly, beyond a certain level the generic manufacturer would jump in with the compulsory licence and manufacture the drug at a lower cost. That was an indirect result of our compulsory licensing that benefited all Canadians. It was the Canadian approach but the world did it differently.

Based on a world-wide system, actually a mix and match, some countries in the western world subscribed to the 17 years of protection, the same kind of protection that the inventor of a new steel process or a new automobile engine would have. Other countries said to heck with it, they will not give anybody protection. They will simply take that steel process or that pharmaceutical and make it and will not give any royalties. They will not protect the patent. It was a bit of a mess.

However, since the last war the world has been consolidating in its rules in international trade and under the Uruguay round of GATT there was a commitment made I think by all of the member countries of GATT to provide uniform patent protection.

Canada then began to embark on this road of making our laws and the laws of all the other countries uniform. I simply ask the question now of whose system was better, Canada's or the 17 years of protection in the rest of the world, the 17 years of monopoly for pharmaceuticals? I do not have an answer to that, but I suspect that the Canadian system in comparison was really quite good. It served Canadians well for almost 25 years. We are going to walk away from it because the rest of the world, the big players, the multinationals, including the U.S., Swiss, French, English and German pharmaceutical companies, have all decided that Canada must join the club and use their rules, the 17 years of protection. I simply leave that question out there. Canadians know that they have benefited from the Canadian system.

Why does the rest of the world not change its rules to reflect some of the benefits and positive aspects of the Canadian system? The reason is that there are things called power and money. Those at the helm who hold the patent protection and who influence governments around the world a great deal, and we all recognize that, and who influence this government and past governments in Canada and all the others they influence have said that they want the 17 years and they are not prepared to let Canada or any other country outside the club continue in that approach.

We are now at a point at which we are going to give up all that we built in Canada in relation to pharmaceutical patents.

Last December, our Minister for International Trade met in Europe with the GATT countries and, as I understand it, without any authority from this House agreed that Canada would change its patent law, the stuff I have been talking about, effective December 20, 1991. That would be the day that Canada would give up its system. Our minister apparently agreed to that date without, as I say, any authority from this House and without checking with Canadians. That is the date that has been inserted in this bill. Retroactively, that is the date that our minister, the minister of this government, decided without authority that he would impose on Canadians and on the Canadian pharmaceutical industry. That is wrong.

I accept that there is a challenge here for Canada. Canada has to find a way to weave through the whole of the western world and a lot of the developing world that has adopted the 17 year rule. There is a challenge for us to make the world system right because I do not think it necessarily is right. I think it has flaws.

Should our Canadian law give an unrestricted monopoly to pharmaceutical patent holders for 17 years, recognizing that pharmaceuticals are a major and growing component of our health care system?

Our health care system is not a private sector driven commodity. We have recognized that in Canada. In relation to pharmaceuticals, we are about to walk away from our window here in Canada.

One of the suggestions to date which has been used in Canada, I do not know about other countries, is what is called a formulary. The government or the health care system generates a list of drugs that provide the most benefit at the lowest cost and it is out of the formulary that health care systems should see that drugs are prescribed. That is one mechanism to counter the monopoly of the pharmaceutical industries in which they do have a patent. If there is time I can address that later.

I have six separate concerns about what this bill does not do. The first is that it may pretend to but it does not address the issue of fairer drug prices from the perspective of both the producer and the consumer. It simply does not do that.

From the producer/manufacturer side, any student of business will know there are a certain number of concerns. The manufacturer wants to manufacture at the lowest cost he possibly can, but what incentive is there for the manufacturer to manufacture at a low cost if he has a monopoly? There is no downward price pressure. There is no competition.

The pharmaceutical company is simply going to pick the best price it can get. It will look for volume. If it prices it too high perhaps people will not buy it.

If there is a health care system paying for it, a health care system that you and I have to pay for, then maybe it will raise the price a bit higher because it is not coming directly out of the consumer's pocket.

The companies have to market their drug. Perhaps they have to research it continually, modify it over time, then they want their profit. They want a return that is fair, legitimate and a necessary part of our business environment. Keep in mind it is a monopoly marketplace when you have a patent on a pharmaceutical.

What about the consumer in all of this? We have had a lot of information put to the House over the last while I recall yesterday and today the member for Winnipeg South saying that the price increase in the first year would be less than zero per cent. I think she probably meant zero per cent and in the second year it would be 2 per cent.

We have to be honest about this. Even 2 per cent is a lot of money because we are dealing with a multibillion dollar industry here. That particular member suggests there is only a modest increase in price. Yesterday's article in The New York Times, which has been referred to, says clearly that the change is expected to cost Canadians about $400 million annually, a 12 per cent increase in spending on drugs.

The added cost would go to about $800 million by the late 1990s. That is a lot of money and that is coming out of the pockets of Canadians either directly or through their taxes to fund the health care system.

If 2 per cent means $200 million or $300 million then let us admit it. That is what it is going to cost in increased pricing. What do we get for the increased pricing? It is a windfall for these companies. They are saying that when the additional money comes in it will be reinvested in research and in marketing and in all of the other things. It will also be siphoned off into profit as perhaps it should be. Profit is not a bad word. What is the Canadian taxpayer getting in return for his $200 million or $300 million per year?

I think I read, and I stand corrected if I am wrong, that by the late 1990s, officials of the government admitted yesterday, it would be in the vicinity of $500 million in increased drug cost. That is half a billion dollars. That is a lot of toast no matter how you measure it.

On this issue of fair drug prices it is also recognized that Canada has one of the lowest cost structures for pharmaceuticals in the world. This article which I have already quoted says Canada's success with delivering drugs that cost lower than those in the United States is an important feature of its medical system which has been a model for many health policy experts seeking to contain soaring costs in the United States.

It also says the shorter period of patent protection has helped keep prices of drugs 32 per cent lower in Canada on average than in the United States.

We are talking about the same companies, the same manufacturers subject to the generic indigenous industry in Canada and yet our drug prices are 32 per cent lower. How did that ever happen? It was not the good will of the drug manufacturers that made that happen, it was the compulsory licensing system.

An hon. member: It was not because of the Tories either.

Mr. Lee: Let us take a look at the U.S. experience in this recession in drug prices. Our pharmaceutical price monitoring board attempts to monitor prices in drugs. Look at the U.S. experience in this previous year of recession. You would think that drug prices would be moderated, that all prices would be moderated. That did not happen, even in the United States.

Drug prices in the United States at the retail and the wholesale levels rose at double the rate of inflation in both cases: in the retail side, in the 12 months ending October, a 6.3 per cent increase in retail drug prices in the U.S. compared with a 3.2 per cent increase in the Consumer Price Index. That is a doubling.

In the wholesale area they went up 5.4 per cent compared with 1.7 per cent in the general producer price index. There is something happening out there that the consumer does not have any control over because if the recession did not keep the price down then the marketplace sure as heck did not and the consumer is helpless in the face of that kind of increase. That was in a year of recession.

What happens when we have a good year, when there is a monopoly, when there is no restriction on the price of the drug, either the old drug that is still patented or the new drug that enters the market?

Away from price competition there are still several other areas I wanted to mention. One of them, pharmaceuticals, as I have already said, is an integral part of the medical system in Canada. This bill fails to recognize that. A compulsory licensing system in Canada has permitted a generic indigenous Canadian pharmaceutical industry to develop and begin to prosper. This bill does not recognize that.

Currently in Canada there is no control over entry level drug pricing. This bill does not recognize that. I have already mentioned the retroactivity in this bill going back to the Dunkel agreement of December 20, 1991. That is unacceptable.

I want to wrap up by saying that the drug manufacturing companies are not evil villains. They produce a product that is integral to our health care system. We can do with drugs today what in some cases used to take two or three days in a hospital and that saves us a lot of money. There is a big future for the world, for the evolution of the human species, all involved in this pharmaceutical area. We have to treat the players in the industry with respect and they have to treat the consumers with respect and I think they have to hold out some mechanism for us to monitor those prices.

In Scarborough there are large generic manufacturers, large international drug companies. All of them are ready to go with more investment. If this bill passes some of them say they are ready to invest, but the money that will be used for that reinvestment will come out of the price increases that Canadians will be allowing if this bill goes through.

At this point I have to stay opposed to this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in 1987 I took part in the debate on Bill C–22. Back then, of course, I agreed with the government. I was on the government side at the time, and we realized that the policy of the Liberals—the Liberal member made a reference just now—had been more or less to deregulate drug patents by granting them only seven years of protection. We found that in the Montreal area, for instance, tens of thousands of jobs in medical research had been lost. Whole buildings had became vacant in the western part of Montreal It was clear that the Liberals' policy was entirely unacceptable.

As far as medical research is concerned, we in the north need special vaccines and drugs, and we need people who can do the research we need to deal with health problems that are specific to the north. For investment in research to be worth while, companies must have enough time to make good on their investment.

That is why I agree with Bill C-91 before the House today. I disagree with the Liberal member who just said that generic drugs were cheaper because even at the time we saw that prices of all pharmaceutical products increased at about the same rate.

As for manufacturing inside or outside the country, I would like to see the medical drugs that are specific to our needs manufactured inside Canada.

From these comments it should be clear that I will vote in favour of the bill. I disagree with the Liberal member who just spoke because the legislation his party adopted at the time scared off investors in the pharmaceutical industry and as a result, our university-trained researchers and experts had to go and do their research in the United States or elsewhere. We spend a lot of money training our young people to do research, but we do not give them a chance to do research in this country.

Mr. Speaker, these are all reasons why I intend to vote in favour of Bill C-91.

[English]

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I accept the suggestion that if more money is ploughed into the pharmaceutical industry, the pharmaceutical industry will use a portion of that money for research. No one would question that, but there is a ton of more money going into the industry and not every dollar of it is being used for research.

I said in my remarks that generic drugs were cheaper. I stand by that. I have also cited the statistic that under the Canadian system the prices of drugs are 32 per cent cheaper in Canada than in the United States. I did not say that drug prices did not increase. Of course prices will increase from time to time, whether it is a generic drug or a drug manufactured by a multinational or a PMAC company.

I do not think the hon. member has caught the drift of my remarks. I accept that there will be more research, but at what cost? How much more research are we going to get and at what cost? Is he suggesting that all of the additional half billion dollars that is to be spent by Canadian consumers as a direct result of this bill will go back into research? I do not think he is saying that.

I am pleased to see more research. I want to do whatever I can, as I am sure all Canadians do, to encourage increased research in Canada at all levels, not just with regard to pharmaceuticals. The real issue is at what cost and so far there is no tag, no string, nothing put on the additional money Canadian consumers will pay as a result of this patent bill.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on some of the points made by my hon. friend across the way.

First I will correct what he quoted me as saying. Yesterday I said that the first year the price increases would be zero and would gradually increase to less than 2 per cent by the year 2000.

Let me remind my hon. friend what was actually said in the report he was quoting from the newspaper with regard to the price differential between U.S. and Canadian drugs. It says:

> The major source of U.S.-Canadian differences in drug prices is not variations in manufacturers' cost. This holds true regardless of whether cost differences relate to research and development, marketing, production or distribution.
> Instead, government regulations and reimbursement practices contribute to lower average drug prices in Canada. In setting prices, manufacturers of patented drugs must conform to Canadian federal regulations that review prices for newly released drugs and restrain price increases from existing drugs.
> Furthermore, drug benefit plans run by provincial governments act to constrain manufacturers' discretion in price setting. Through the plans' reimbursement and their enrollees' drug purchases, the provinces exercise concentrated buying power to obtain low prices.
> In addition, provincial officials can remove drugs from their list of reimbursable drugs if the manufacturers' proposed price increases are considered to be too high.

When my hon. friend talks about price increases, he clearly overlooks the fact that we have the prices review board in place. We have had it in place since 1987, and it continues to be in place with the enactment of Bill C-91.

Its powers will be enhanced under this legislation. It will have the same authority as would a court. It can roll back prices. It can impose fines. It can even send people to jail if they price the drugs higher than the agreed upon system that will regulate those prices.

The fear that is being raised by some members of the opposition, not by my hon. friend particularly, that somehow there will be a huge price increase and the report in The New York Times are issues based upon less than factual information. They do not take into consideration the fact that we will have the PMPRB with enhanced authorities and enhanced abilities to ensure that drug prices are kept in line.

The information that the government has put forward is based on the understanding that the PMPRB will have these authorities and that we will have the ability to continue to regulate drug prices in the same way as we have in the past.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, if I let the hon. member have it her way, she would say that the price increases are to be so modest as to be negligible and let us not worry about it. Then I would ask her: Where are the millions and millions of dollars that the pharmaceutical companies have promised, and in fact are blackmailing us with, for new investment and research and development going to come from?

They are not going to come from the goodwill of the companies. They are going to come from the price increases. There is only one source; it is from price increases. If we have $500 million going back out in reinvestment, which we are not going to have, then we need to have $500 million coming in the front end.

There is only one place that supplies money for the front end, and that is the Canadian consumer or the drug plans. It is all coming out of our pockets. If it is $500 million in, it is going to be some hundred million dollars out, but a chunk of that is going to go to profit. It is going to go to marketing. We are simply adding more gasoline to the engine. That is what we are doing.

Maybe some people think that is great, but when we are paying for the gas we have to question its efficiency and we have to question its appropriateness. In this case the government is simply not measuring accurately.

I do not know who has the right figures. All I know is that there are a whole lot of promises from a whole lot of companies made contingent on the passage of this bill and they are only going to happen because the prices go up. We know who is going to pay the prices and I leave at that.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of intent to the previous speaker. I guess I am left a little puzzled. I cannot tell whether he supports the bill or opposes it. I do not know why I should be puzzled because that is the position of the Liberal Party.

I would like him to comment on two matters. This bill was a direct result of NAFTA. Does he and the Liberal Party oppose NAFTA? Does he and the Liberal Party agree that they have to cancel the North American free trade deal which is the result of Bill C-22?

How does he justify or reconcile his position with that of the member for Saint-Henri—Westmount, the Liberal critic on science and technology, who supports the extension of patent protection to the multinational drug companies?

Mr. Lee: I will be clear for the hon. member. I am not supporting this bill, but I know what would make me support it. I would support a PMPRB, a prices review board that had some teeth and could deal with entry level pricing as well as price increases of existing drugs. I would support it if it did not have retroactivity agreed to by a minister who did not have authority to agree to it—that is another thing—and if there were commitments or monitoring mechanisms within the bill to ensure that additional money put into the system was invested back into Canada for research and development and marketing. I would support it if those things were there, but they are not there.

Taking away compulsory licensing with nothing in return leaves Canadians with zero and in the hole. I do not support this bill.

Mr. Karpoff: You support the principle then.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to say that I too was in favour of Bill C-22 and I must rise in this House to speak for Bill C-91. After all I have heard here, especially when I see my Liberal colleague opposite give figures, I really wonder whether he even knows where he lives, with all the figures he just gave that are completely wrong.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-91 is designed to encourage science and technology, to promote greater experience on the markets and to help our researchers meet the challenges which arise—

[English]

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, this borders on privilege. Lest we get off on the wrong foot here, I know the member has laid the groundwork for his speech but I would not want him to leave the impression that I had given false figures, false information, to the House. If he is saying I did that then I want him to withdraw it. If he is saying he takes issue and differs with the figures I have used, that is one thing; but the way he has said it may leave the impression—and I hope he will clarify it—that I have delivered false information to the House.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will not take from me the time that the member spoke, but I must say that my hon. Liberal colleague has the wrong figures.

As I was saying before I was interrupted, our researchers must meet the challenges that arise in the international markets. Better patent protection will help us reach our objectives sooner and more effectively.

In our country, we have all it takes to be a leader in pharmaceutical research. Our medical profession is known for its excellence. Names like Banting, Penfield, Pinel and Selye have made us world famous. Our health care system is also the envy of the whole world.

Being from Laval, I personally knew Armand Frappier, who invented the first penicillin vaccine.

We also have a skilled labour force. Our tax credits are among the most generous in the world. But we lack something essential, namely protection for intellectual property to match the protection offered by other industrialized countries, patent legislation that would let us be competitive in R and D investments.

Since 1984, the government has attached high priority to reforming Canada's intellectual property legislation. It is part of our efforts for economic renewal.

Nevertheless, the government has continually had to fight to update, simplify and, I would even say, standardize these laws. The complaints expressed by the hon. members of the opposition do not surprise me at all. I remember that we had many difficulties with Bill C-22 that were often due to partisan politics. Through all these years, they have done all they could to compromise the progress we wanted to achieve.

I heard opposition members say that the government was rushing through second reading. They seem to forget that we are talking about an investment of some $500 million. Innovative drug companies have said that they would invest such amounts after they heard the government say last January that it would strengthen patent protection for pharmaceutical products.

The investments that I am talking about here are of prime importance at a time when the pharmaceutical industry is restructuring world-wide. Make no mistake: many other countries would want to benefit from such investments. If Canada does not act quickly enough, the door that is open to us may close again, forever.

I represent Laval-Est, a riding in the city of Laval, and this bill will help us do wonderful things, which have already begun thanks to Bill C-22. You no doubt know that in our riding we have companies like Bio-Mega, Marion-Merrell, which has been bought by Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc., formerly Nordic Laboratories Inc. We also have Biochem Pharma Inc. I recently heard its president, Mr. Bellini, a wonderful man, not because he has an Italian name but because he has made quite substantial investments in Biochem in Laval. By the way, Biochem has the rights for a drug to treat AIDS called 3TC, which was developed by a Quebec researcher, Dr. Bernard Belleau of McGill University in Montreal. This vaccine will be a Quebec product and the research and manufacturing will be done in our riding, in Laval, Quebec.

If these laws can help these people to invest but, as my opposition colleague just said, prices rose, I would not agree. When prices did not rise, they said it was due to the recession. If prices had risen, it would have been someone else's fault. It is always someone's fault. For now, the price has not gone up—it must be due to the recession. Personally, I think that even without the recession, prices would have stayed in line.

Bill C-91 also encourages companies to make drugs here in Canada for a North American and international market. It is very interesting to see how fast the investments are made.

I remember the debate on Bill C-22. We had demonstrations here on the Hill where unions, businessmen and all investors were on our side. Rarely is the government seen outside and photographed protesting with union people, but it happened with Bill C-22.

It happened. I would like to remind this House that the opposition has the very unenviable reputation of having delayed the patent reform beyond any reasonable deadline. In the last session, the opposition used every obstruction tactic imaginable in an effort to prevent or postpone the passage of this bill.

Remember that this bill passed first reading in the House on November 7, 1986. The Liberals and New Democrats, our colleagues opposite, obstructed the bill so much that it did not reach the other place until May 6, 1987, a delay of almost seven months. Then the ping-pong game began, as you may recall, the most incredible in all of Canada's parliamentary history. It acquainted us government members with the Senate because every evening we spent a few hours there watching the ping-pong game, the shouting matches, the vulgar language being used by those debating Bill C-22.

A month before they received the legislation, the senators created a special committee with a mandate to examine the prices of pharmaceutical products. The Liberal majority in the committee and the Senate managed to get amendments to Bill C-22 adopted by the Senate, and the bill was sent back to the House of Commons.

On September 1, 1987, we adopted a motion rejecting most of the amendments proposed by the Senate. Two days later, the Senate referred our motion to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. On October 21, the committee tabled its report. Again, the Liberal majority favoured amendments that were likely to upset the balance of the legislation and jeopardize its strong points.

Again, we rejected the proposals, and the bill came back to us a third time. This was November 19, 1987. Today is November 17. Two days from now it will again be November 19.

One year and 12 days after being tabled in the other place, Bill C-22 was passed and finally received Royal Assent. I remember the mood in Quebec at the time. I remember people who had investments which had to be postponed because of the bill. Postponing investments means people have to wait that much longer for a job or to invest for their company.

My point is that we can no longer afford this kind of foolishness. It is imperative to adopt this bill as soon as possible.

What bothers me is that some of the arguments I heard today are similar to what was said in the Senate when that body tried to jeopardize the government's legislation. Nothing has changed. They are using figures to scare the public. We hear all kinds of arguments. Anything goes, and the people listening wonder who is right.

As in 1987, the Liberals maintain that amendments to the Patent Act will raise the price of drugs. We have heard this argument before, and we will hear it again. At this point, I would like to quote Liberal Senator Norbert Thériault. Listen to what he had to say. It is really extraordinary. "By removing the competitive element provided by generic drugs in the industry, Bill C-22 will undoubtedly result in a huge price increase." Debates of the Senate, June 25, 1987, at page 1403. Another Liberal, Senator Lorne Bonnell, stated that we were encouraging research by the multinationals—we heard this again today—at the expense of Canadians, who would have to pay more for their drugs. To quote Mr. Bonnell: "For goodness sake, don't take it off the backs of the sick, the hospitalized, the infirm, and the aged by increasing drug prices". Debates of the Senate, August 13, 1987, page 1744.

He also said that the Canadian industry would suffer the negative impact of this bill, in terms that would have made my grandmother tremble. We heard this again today. I do not know whether anyone mentioned his grandmother, but mine is still alive. She is 98, and Bill C-91 certainly does not bother her at all.

He said: "When they pass Bill C-22, I ask them not to forget that they are hurting not only the sick, the aged, the crippled and the poor, and provincial governments". That is really too bad because the provincial governments asked us to pass this bill as soon as possible. "They are also hurting the agriculture and fisheries industries because of the cost of drugs in chemicals."

Similarly, Liberal Senator Buckwold raised the spectre of fear—which they are doing again today—by claiming that the legislation would hurt Canadians because it would increase the price of drugs. This is what he said.

"In my opinion, if we pass this bill we will be doing a great disservice to the people of Canada. We will be adding to the problem of health costs. We will be denying drugs to people who otherwise would have bought them, and who desperately need them." Debates of the Senate, June 23, 1987, at page 1347.

That is what the Liberals had to say. Today, we know they were wrong because the reality is light years away from these gloomy predictions. In fact, between January 1987 and December 1991, prices of patented drugs increased by an average of only 2.9 per cent per year, well below the average inflation rate for the same period. The people who kept raising the spectre of fear for political reasons were wrong, and I named a few just now.

As for the promised investment in R and D, the industry reached its objectives five years before the 1996 deadline. I have a note here which I could give you, Mr. Speaker. They promised to double their ratio of R and D to sales and reach 10 per cent in 1996, in 10 years. Believe it or not, by 1991 those objectives had already been met. Even more important, they showed they were committed to reaching those objectives and they met their commitments. And they did that in five years, instead of ten. We have to trust people a little. As for investment in R and D, the industry met its objectives well in advance.

Bill C-91 also gives new powers to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board created in 1987. It was said earlier today that prices might go up—the hon. member referred to this—but I think the review board can even put people in jail for excessive pricing, beyond what is normal in a competitive market.

The objective is above all for the review board to ensure that the prices of both new and existing patent drugs are not excessive. I am confident that the review board will be able to do so, thanks to the new powers it has under this bill.

These new powers will also enable the review board to examine initial prices for new patented drugs. This is not just about price increases. I think consumers can also get a new deal when a new product is launched at at an excessively high price, even if there are no further increases. That is something the review board must consider very seriously.

The board will also be able to order price reductions or impose fines retroactively and thus discourage the practice of charging excessive prices. As we said earlier, this could even mean a jail sentence. These new powers will give the board's rulings the same clout as a ruling by the Federal Court. As we said earlier, since it was created, the board has ensured that any increase in the price of patented drugs remained below the rate of inflation.

The hon. member said earlier that the reason prices did not go up was the recession. Of course, somebody always takes the credit for good news, while bad news is always the government's fault. In this case, inflation was down, no thanks to the board. It is too bad he forgot to mention that the board probably did something right. I agree that in the past we have had boards that were supposed to look after the consumer and were not always a success. In fact they were often a disaster, and I had to deal with a number of these boards, especially here in Ottawa. However, when the results are good, I think the board deserves some credit, although my Liberal colleague on the other side preferred to thinks it was due to the recession.

In its fourth report, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board said that the ratio of R and D to sales by patent-holding companies since 1991 has been around 9.7 per cent. Last year, these companies spent $376.4 million on R&D, an increase of 23 per cent over 1990.

I must admit that we notice these increases in my riding. I must say how proud I was again this morning. Knowing that we would be discussing this bill, as I drove along the highway in Laval, I saw something big being built and when I saw the name I was very glad because once again the drug company Bio-Mega has decided to expand and invest in Laval. It is putting up a big building. It is not Esso, I must admit, but Bio-Mega, which makes me very pleased, and it is now called Boehringer Ingelheim.

Bill C-91 will be studied by the committee and I am sure that all members of this House will have constructive suggestions. Let us act promptly and send this bill to the committee for consideration. I must tell everyone here to stop frightening people. Investors want to have some return. No one in business invests without getting a return. With the laws and the board, I am sure that consumers will be well protected and I hope that the board will be very strict.

My colleagues in the opposition are against it. They are against everything. They will not help us build. It is not thanks to them that we have had investments in our riding; it is thanks to Bill C-22, and I hope that we will have more with Bill C-91.

Mr. Milliken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe that you will find unanimous consent for the House to continue sitting between one and two o'clock this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the House to continue sitting over lunch hour, from one to two o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I did not hear anyone say no, so it is agreed and accepted.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest. I want to ask three specific questions.

I would like to point out something about this whole issue of pricing and research and development. First of all, looking at British Columbia, we have been promised $15 million over five years. However, it has already been documented that it is going to cost our provincial pharmacy program $40 million each and every year. On one drug alone that is caught in the pipeline, as they call it, that has been given a licence, it will be taken back because after December 1991 it will cost $146 million over the next 15 years.

Nobody in Canada believes the documentation of the Prices Review Board. It is simply because every other independent organization, like Green Shield, has documented that the average price increase of drugs already in existence was 6.4 per cent.

They did a study in B.C. which showed that the cost of drugs to the pharmacy program has increased 72 per cent. Out of that 17 per cent was because of additional usage, -47 per cent because of a reduction in dispensing fees—actually dispensing fee costs went down—and 133 per cent in average ingredient costs, in other words, the cost of the drugs to the pharmacy.

They talk about all of the wonderful research and development that has gone up to 10 per cent of sales. Compared to the rest of the world, the United States has a minimum mandatory 16 per cent, Germany has 16 per cent, the United Kingdom has 20.9 per cent and Sweden has 21.8 per cent. This is going back a couple of years. They have not even begun to catch up to the rate of research and development that takes place in other countries.

In addition, more than 50 per cent of our research is only clinical trials. It is not basic research.

Third, the Prices Review Board. The American drug companies made it very clear when the president of the pharmaceutical association, Gerald Mossinghoff, stated that the the members of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association in Washington would like to eliminate the Canadian government's price controls.

They want an extension of patent protection. Then they will eliminate the prices control. Lo and behold, what do you find? James MacPherson, the dean of Osgoode Hall Law School, said that there is no doubt that this legislation could be struck down on a constitutional challenge as it relates to price control.

What the Tories are saying is: "We will pretend we are hiding behind this prices control knowing full well it is going to get struck down by the American Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association which will challenge it in our courts".

My three questions are: How can you justify it knowing that the legislation as it pertains to price control is probably unconstitutional? How do you justify a rate of research and development which is more than 50 per cent clinical trial, has nothing to do with basic research and is not anywhere near any industrial country? How do you justify to Canadian taxpayers and Canadian patients a dramatic increase in drug costs over the last few years?

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it was a question or a speech, but let me answer my hon. colleague. I wish all the numbers he gave were dollar bills in my bank account. I would be a millionaire. If I start to go into these numbers, I will need a preparation of at least five minutes to make sure that the numbers he gave were the correct numbers.

What I can say to my hon. colleague is when we control the prices, we control the patent drugs. We do not control the whole world with this bill. When we speak about the increase and rising, we are speaking of zero this year and 2 per cent by the year 2000.

Mr. Karpoff: Baloney. Mulroney or baloney, it's about the same.

Mr. Della Noce: Well, if it is baloney I usually do not eat baloney. My hon. colleague says it is baloney. His numbers must be mortadella .When my hon. colleague asks questions, I wonder if he is not making a political speech to mix up people.

To answer regarding such big numbers is a little bit out of my context. People listening to us wonder if all these numbers can be retained in the memory. If they are really interested in these numbers, what is important is to protect the consumer. We have somebody there. We have a board and we have a control which did a good job this year. If they did a good job, we should not say it is because of the recession or inflation. If they did a good job, let us give them credit. If they did not do a good job, we will there to remind them.

Mr. Karpoff: Well, get rid of them.

Mr. Della Noce: We will get rid of them when they are no good. We do not get rid of them if they are successful. My hon. colleague said: "Get rid of them".

We do not get rid of people who produce. There are enough people who do not produce. When we have a good formation, we must keep it. I do not agree with either of my hon. colleagues who said it is because of the recession if the prices stayed low. It is because we have a board. We have some control and the job was well done.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I asked three specific questions and my hon. friend declined to answer any of them.

What does he say when the dean of law at Osgoode Hall says the whole of the Prices Review Board is probably unconstitutional? We are passing legislation that they know they can throw out. The member has not dealt with the whole issue. The price increase since patent protection has been brought in has been documented time and time again by independent organizations to be at 6.4 per cent or much higher. That is for existing patent drugs. This is not all of the other things.

Even their own government document showed that 40 per cent of the drugs came on the market over the guidelines of the Prices Review Board. They had no power to roll them back and he calls that effective.

I wish he would also answer the question about when Canada is going to catch up with the rate of research that is standard in every other country. Why did they not look at what happened before they brought in patent protection? We actually had faster increases in research and development before than we have since.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I love to answer my hon. colleague because sometimes I think it is more than funny when he asks me to decide when the judge did not even decide. Let us wait until the judge decides and then see if he has got a problem with lawyers. I must tell my hon. colleague that I asked for advice from seven different lawyers and they came with seven different answers. Maybe he should do like me, change lawyers and wait until the judges of the Supreme Court decide.

I must admit this is the first time I have seen a Prices Review Board which, having been established for only a few years, already has achieved some positive results. Some say it is not the board, it is because of the recession. Some say it is inflation. Until new things happen, I must say I would like to see the Prices Review Board stay and I will wait to see what the court will say.

I suggest to my hon. colleague that if he has problems with lawyers that he should do like I did, change all of them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Winnipeg North is lucky because the period of the first five hours of debate ends in one minute and he is the last speaker to benefit from a 20-minute speech and questions and comments. The hon. member for Winnipeg North has 20 minutes maximum.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed sad that the time left for this debate is only 20 minutes. I know that a number of MPs are still wanting to debate this issue because the government has made a terrible mistake once more.

I should like to start with what prompted this government to introduce this bill. To put it on the record, it is part of its economic agenda that was started in 1984. The then Minister of Finance, the present Minister for International Trade, said when he appeared before the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada last October, and I quote: "Since 1984 when the federal government brought in its agenda for economic renewal, this is precisely what we have been doing and will continue to do so in the future".

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in introducing this bill last September 17 said: "As far as economic benefits are concerned, Bill C-91 is another step in the government's program to modernize and rationalize Canadian patent legislation".

This is part of the government's economic agenda. However, Canadians know that its economic agenda has been a failure. We have a recession. We have 1.6 millions Canadians unemployed. We have the longest food bank line in the world and this government is trying to tell us that we should believe and that we should have trust and have faith in its economic agenda and therefore accept this new bill, Bill C-91.

I ask: Is it fair to ask of Canadians to trust this government? Canadians have spoken loudly. They do not trust this government and so they cannot trust as well the intent behind this bill as a tool for an economic agenda.

I should also indicate that this raises a fundamental issue. The same Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in opening debate on this bill last September 17 indicated as well: "Under Bill C-91 pharmaceutical products will be allowed the same 20-year protection as tools and communication systems". In other words, this minister is speaking for his government and cannot distinguish the fundamental difference between machine tools and drugs and medicines. Drugs and medicines are needed by patients because of illness, not because they would like to create something new. It is a desire for something, a necessity, without which human life is in danger and this minister equates medicines and drugs with tools by giving them the same life span of patent protection.

It raises the question then as to whether we will use the debate on this bill as an economic issue, or is it really a social issue? I submit that Bill C-91 is very much a social issue. I am sure there will be winners and losers and I speak for those on the losing end of this legislation. I am most concerned with them. They are my constituents in Winnipeg North, in the province of Manitoba, and in all of Canada. They are the men and women on the street who pay for prescription drugs, items that have become key to our health and continued well-being.

I submit that health consumers, especially seniors, will be the first casualties of Bill C-91 if enacted into law. I come to their defence because this government has failed to do so, siding instead with multinationals that develop their products elsewhere, refine their chemicals offshore, and tend to be evasive about the types and amount of research and development they actually do in this country.

We have heard from the Coalition for Biomedical and Health Research that the amount of research spent by the pharmaceutical industries in basic research is abysmal, really very small. Yet it is also known that the advances in basic research have contributed greatly to the introduction of new drugs and innovations into the pharmaceutical industry.

The pharmaceutical industry must be helped but we also have our health care system which is struggling for sustainability and this bill comes at the expense of medicare and the government cannot deny it.

Either the minister of health has been under a gag order or has been swayed by the politics of his peers, turning deaf ears to the provinces. The provinces have been left to squirm like bugs on a pin. They have been forced to endure freezes in federal transfer payments for health care.

Then there has been the effect of the GST on drugs and hospital services. More and more people have been pushed on to welfare by federal fiscal and unemployment insurance policies, culminating in greater numbers of people on provincial drug plans. As I indicated earlier an aging population means more seniors on drug plans.

The net result is a lack of fiscal elasticity for the provinces. Their budgets are stretched to the limit for health care. Any increase in the price of drugs is too much and this government has not denied that. In fact, it appears it has accepted it with pride, that $550 million is an acceptable price to pay in this day and age of recession. I cannot see the priorities of this government and this government cannot deny impending increases and is trying to pull out the safety net of generic drugs.

In fact I submit it is imperative that generic drugs get to the market quickly and 20 years, in my opinion, is not quick enough. This bill calls for another three years of patent protection, three more years for which the provinces must buy higher priced brand name drugs.

The government House leader was recently interviewed on CBC Radio and stated that the price of drugs would rise. Well, neither the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs nor the Minister for International Trade has denied that prices would climb as I indicated and they seem to relish that.

The fact is compulsory licensing keeps the cost of drugs down. Generic drug companies have evolved from the need of Canadians to protect the medical system. If I could so kindly remind this government, yesterday the government admitted that this bill will cost Canada $550 million by the year 2000, a headline in The Ottawa Citizen.

The health minister of Ontario has indicated that over 20 per cent of citizens are covered under the Ontario Drug Benefit Program and that Bill C-91 will have a price tag of $1 billion in the next 10 years. No matter which way you slice this bill it will cost millions.

Undoubtedly, the federal government did not drive a hard bargain and it was hoodwinked or brow-beaten by lobbyists. We could easily allocate $550 million for research and development directly under the leadership of the federal government. That is the way to go.

Bill C-91 promises to strengthen the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board and says that it can roll back prices, it can impose jail sentences, and so on. In the same breath, the minister said that the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has served to protect consumers allowing the cost of medicines to increase by only 2.9 per cent between 1987 and 1991. If he was so convinced that the board had done its duty, why then would he consider putting these so-called severe penalties?

I do recall once more that during the debate on Bill C-22 this government at that time indicated that it was the answer, that it was a balanced bill. Five years later, it is no longer a balanced bill, no longer a balanced law. In fact, the intent of Parliament at that time was to review this by the year 1996 and then report to this Chamber, making recommendations after consulting the Canadian public and all stakeholders in the pharmaceutical industry, health care system, provincial ministers, and so on. But it is only 1992 and already the rules of the game are changing. Is that fairness?

What the minister failed to concede was that the Green Shield plan has found the cost of drugs to be increasing at 11 per cent per year. In my province of Manitoba drug costs have jumped by 12 per cent. I will tell you how angry Manitobans will be if we proceed with Bill C-91, how upset my constituents of Winnipeg North will be.

Last summer Maclean's magazine had a cover story and I remember the title as being something like: "Canadians are mad as heck", because we do not listen to the concerns of our constituents. Constituents are telling us that Bill C-91 will deal a devastating blow to their pockets.

When we pay for a drug we pay not only for the research and development costs and a mark up for profit. We are also paying for a business to function, to expand, to pay shareholders, to recoup losses from failed drugs that did not reach market, for overhead and aggressive marketing. We are paying for offices with marbled floors, skylights and fountains, corporate jets and advertising. But when we buy a drug or a pill we are buying health and health must always be affordable to Canadians.

I would like to remind the Minister for International Trade about the World Economic Council report which stated that Canada's health and education systems give us competitive advantage. Well, let us treat our health care system with care and not imperil that advantage.

I wish the minister could have spoken to one witness, a mother, who appeared before the standing committee on health and welfare. Speaking about the death of her daughter from hepatitis B, these were her words: "After my daughter's death, we were all vaccinated against hepatitis B and we were paying $137 for three shots. It varies from clinic to clinic, and probably from city to city but in fact that is far too high. The federal and provincial governments have worked hand in hand and then we must bring the pharmaceutical companies to be responsible and give us a fair price because this is outrageous. They are just raping the citizens. We cannot afford this cost factor and it is not necessary".

I wish the minister had heard those words. Perhaps the minister should also try to listen to the seniors of this country, like those in Manitoba, those in Winnipeg North who launched a court action against the government because of the threats of Bill C–22. Now we are even going farther. Indeed, it is a disgrace that we are proceeding with this bill.

I bring to this House a certain amount of experience as a clinical doctor and a medical teacher. I know that if this government really wanted to help our universities, teaching hospitals, scientists and technicians it would have defined research and development by demanding a quota of basic research.

In one study published by the department of economics of the University of Pennsylvania in the journal Research Policy in 1991, looking at the role of basic research and how it has hastened the introduction of new drugs, the average time lag between the conclusion of the relevant academic research and the first commercial introduction of the innovations based on this research was about seven years. The estimated sales and savings of these new products to industry accounted for over $30 billion. We do not need Bill C–91 to ask our pharmaceutical industries to invest in research and development, there is already the moral force.

Academic research has allowed them to come seven years earlier than would have been possible. They have an obligation to contribute to research and development. They have an obligation to contribute to a medical discovery fund even without Bill C–91. Then a decade later, two decades later we would see what has happened.

Who does the minister serve? Does he and his government serve the people of Canada or multinational giants? I think the answer is clear. Nearing the conclusion of my debate today with the query directed to the minister of health, I know he has in his possession a study done by a University of Laval professor, Dr. Denis Gagnon. This study recommends to the government ways to clear the drug approval backlog and make our system even more efficient.

I estimate that in fact we will reduce the delay in the approval process by at least one year. That is one year of additional exclusivity already from the notice of compliance. Therefore, why has this minister of health not tabled in the House of Commons a document that I understand already exists and has been on his desk since July? I call upon the minister of health to release that document so that it can be part of the relevant debate today.

In closing, I wish to bring to the attention of the House the concern that this bill really fails Canadians in many, many ways. Once again, The New York Times of yesterday said that the differences in the price of drugs in Canada and across the border in the United States is anywhere from 5 per cent to 183 per cent. Take one group of drugs, those used for anxiety. The cost of drugs across the border in the United States is about 183 per cent more. No wonder they is a lot of anxiety in the States. Are we to import that level of anxiety to Canada and increase the price of drugs?

The argument that will be used to develop research and development, to encourage more jobs in this country, is the same argument used in 1987 when Bill C–22 was passed. It is the same old argument. In fact, Mr. Stewart MacLeod in a special article in The Free Press published last July 6 reminded us that if jobs are to be created in the pharmaceutical industry we must also remember that jobs may be lost from the generic industries. So there could be a balance.

Bill C-91 has no rationale today. It places our health care system in great jeopardy. It will adversely affect our seniors, it will adversely affect young families, and there is no reason for it.

Can we look upon Bill C-91 as an economic tool, or is it a bill that will provide safety and security to Canadians so that they have access to drugs that will cure them of their illnesses and restore them to health? Only then will they have a decent way of living and can participate in the workforce. Those are the questions, Mr. Speaker.

On that basis I strongly oppose Bill C-91. May the government have a change of heart and withdraw this bill.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what my colleague opposite had to say about this most important legislation, Bill C-91. He is in a very good position to appreciate the problems caused by this legislation because, as it turns out, he is a medical doctor, someone who is well aware of problems in that community. It is interesting to note that in the medical, hospital and health care providers community, he does find flaws in this bill.

I listened carefully when he mentioned the negative effect this bill will have on older people. I would just like to point out to him that various seniors groups from Quebec and elsewhere in Canada have already made it clear they are dissatisfied with this bill. I would also like to call his attention to the fact that the provincial health ministries have already registered their disapproval of this bill, which is quite interesting considering the bill provides for a marginal increase in investments by pharmaceutical companies, which in turn would create jobs. However, the provinces are not convinced. They said: "Perhaps there will be a few little jobs created here and there and a slight increase in investments but, all in all, we the provinces will have to pay more, a great deal more, for those few extra jobs".

I have two questions. The hon. member mentioned two things. First, a document he is hoping the minister will table in this House today in order to have a better idea of the effect Bill C-22 has had so far. I would like to know what document he is referring to and what use it is to us.

My second question is the following. Does he not find somewhat disturbing the fact that one of the main lobbyists for this legislation on pharmaceutical products is a former Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, namely Mrs. Judy Erola? I met her back in those days as a consumer advocate from Quebec. This bothers me and I would like to know if it bothers my colleague opposite to see this former Liberal member become the leading advocate for increasing the price of pharmaceutical products.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the second question, I have the highest respect for the former minister Judy Erola. She served our country well. She is now head of that industry association and I congratulate her for that. Of course she will present her point of view to us and that, in a real sense, is the challenge and the test of the maturity of democracy in our country, that we can hear opposing views.

However, I am not troubled because I know where I and my party stands. Am I troubled? The answer is no. We are testing the maturity of democracy in this country. Ms. Erola has her point of view and we have our policy position in the interest of Canadians.

In answer to the first question, the document I was alluding to that I would like the minister of health to table is a report commissioned by the department of health. It has asked Dr. Denis Gagnon of Laval University to look at and review the drug approval process for Canada and to see how we can make it more efficient so that there will be a speedier process and no backlog. Its advantage is that it will also enhance the introduction of essentially important new drugs for the benefit of consumers. It will also benefit the industry. I think this is excellent.

In a sense what I was saying earlier is that there already is the potential benefit coming in, not through Bill C-91, but as a consequence of the present legislation. Therefore, we do not need Bill C-91.

If we extend the monopolistic control on prices to any one group of companies and if we eliminate compulsory licensing altogether, as is envisioned after this Bill C-91 is passed, there will no longer be any incentive to go back to the drawing board and discover new drugs because the profits will be so lucrative that there will be no more incentive to discover new drugs. In a sense by having a conclusion or an end through compulsory licensing we are ensuring the search for new drugs continues in Canada.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I apologize that I did not hear all of the hon. member's speech, but I understand that he has some concerns about the cost of drugs as they will affect seniors.

I would ask the member why he has those concerns. How does he feel that this bill will impact on seniors adversely? It is simply is not accurate to contend that for a number of reasons. First of all, most seniors are covered by drug plans that cover most of the cost of drugs whether they are patented drugs or whether they are not patented drugs. Even for those seniors who are not covered, we are really only talking about a gradual increase of up to 2 per cent by the year 2000. It will actually be 1.7 per cent by the year 2000 which is over nine years. We are talking only about those drugs that are under patent. You must remember that is only a small proportion of the entire drug product that is sold to Canadians each year across the country at retail outlets across the country.

I might also mention that the Liberals had in fact, as I understand it, contemplated rescinding the compulsory licensing regime before they lost the election in 1984, because they too could see that this was a backward step in an increasingly globally competitive world. Therefore I am quite surprised that my colleague would come forward with an objection to the ending of this compulsory licensing regime because clearly the members of the previous Liberal government believed that it was something whose time had come, that it had fulfilled its purpose and should be rescinded.

Perhaps the hon. member could tell me why he thinks prices will rise inordinately when we have a prices review board that has been given additional powers to roll back drug price increases, to penalize, very severely, those offenders who dare to try to raise prices over the recommended level and which can put these people in jail, imprison them, or fine them.

Surely the member must know something I do not if he feels that prices will increase in view of all of these things.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, history must be quoted correctly. The Liberal government introduced compulsory licensing in Canada and we are proud of that.

Second, it is anticipated by this government in so many documents that I cannot read them all to the House at this time that by the year 1996 it will go even further into the issue of why no prices will increase.

The government has already admitted prices will increase. What else can I say? It has admitted prices will increase, but it has said by only 2 per cent. For seniors on fixed incomes, only 2 per cent. For seniors who may in fact already be poor, only 2 per cent.

The seniors of our country paid their dues during their working years. We cannot afford the national disgrace of saying now that the seniors should give an additional 2 per cent of expenditures for the drugs that they need.

I ask the hon. member if it is true, if it has been admitted. As there is no more time for me to speak further, I would be glad to elaborate outside the walls of this Chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind all hon. members that the first five hours of debate have now expired and we begin the period for speeches of 10 minutes maximum without questions or comments.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, many things have been said about this bill and what it entails in the last few hours and weeks.

This House and the other place have heard many debates on the subject of patent protection for some pharmaceuticals for some years now, but what this government has achieved since 1987 and what it intends to achieve with these amendments to the Patent Act is nothing less than a concrete and lasting example of providing good, effective government for the people of Canada.

Our government has succeeded in balancing economic growth with consumer protection through its policy on pharmaceutical patent protection. Bill C–91 continues in that tradition, building upon the successes of the 1987 revisions to the Patent Act.

In 1987 this government took its first step to begin to correct an outflow of economic activity in an industry which has traditionally had a strong scientific and manufacturing presence in Canada but which was on its way to leaving Canada for more welcome homes elsewhere in the world.

What the 1987 revisions to the Patent Act were meant to achieve was the reinstatement of a policy of recognition for discovery, for innovation in Canada while balancing that with the protection and the interest of the consumer.

Rewarding discovery is an essential component of developing a strong economy in an age of increasing technological sophistication and international competition. Quite frankly, we as a government wanted the pharmaceutical innovators to remain in Canada to develop a technological and research base here, not elsewhere. We wanted them to concentrate their businesses here, to employ our science graduates, to invest in plants and equipment on Canadian soil, to invest in research in Canadian universities and in Canadian hospitals and other research centres and export from Canada rather than import into Canada.

We wanted to accomplish this while at the same time provide a strong system of controls on the prices of patent medicines. There was never a question for us as a government of having a strong growth in the pharmaceutical industry at the expense of consumers. Part and parcel of our policy in 1987 as well as today was to have strong patented drug price controls to ensure that drug prices for Canadian consumers remain reasonable.

This legislation as well as the legislation of 1987 provides for exactly that. We created the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board in 1987 to control the prices of patent medicines in Canada. It has done its job since then and with this legislation it will be given even more powers. Bill C–91 gives the board expanded powers to roll back unwarranted price increases and provides for fines and sentences for those who do not comply.

By the year 2000 it is projected that the cost of purchases by pharmacies and hospitals of prescription and behind the counter drugs will only be 2 per cent higher due to the provisions of this legislation. It is projected through detailed calculations that the total added cost of patent drugs over the period 1992 to 1996 due to this legislation will be one dollar per Canadian more per year. One dollar per year per person in this country is not a large amount for having a policy that stimulates research and development in this country.

The opposition would have us spending all sorts of dollars per person of government money through taxation, but I guess that is a more clouded way and people do not realize that it is costing them. This is a straight-up, free enterprise, entrepreneurial way where there is research done at minimal cost.

Because of this bill Canada will reap the benefits of close to $.5 billion in increased investment by the innovative pharmaceutical industry in the foreseeable future. We are achieving a true balance in promoting economic growth while protecting the consumer through our continuing policy of pharmaceuticals.

The record since 1987 speaks for itself. The Patent Act amendments of 1987, then known as Bill C–22, have been a true success story. That success story is continuing to this day. However, it should be looked at in light of what the critics in this House and elsewhere had said at that time. One was that an innovative pharmaceutical industry would not meet its investment promises to the government. Second, the opposition said the government would not succeed in controlling patent drug prices. Third, the generic manufacturers would disappear.

Let me take the House through what has happened on all three counts since the passage of Bill C–22. The first issue is research spending. The innovative industry has delivered on its promised targets for doubling research spending in relation to sales five years earlier than was promised. This innovative pharmaceutical industry invested over $1 billion in R and D in Canada in the last five years, with over $340 million going to Canadian universities, hospitals and other medical research establishments.

I should add that since the government announced its intention to eliminate compulsory licensing, the industry has already announced over $500 million in new investment across Canada.

Second, the issue of contention in 1987 was drug prices. Price increases from existing patent drugs have kept an average growth of 2.9 per cent from 1987 to 1992, compared with an average Consumer Price Index of 4.7 per cent. This is a very strong record of effectively controlling patent drug prices and completely discredits the critics. We should make everyone think twice about their criticisms today.

It has become increasingly clear to others in the world that our system of drug price control works, our drug price control system has worked, and we certainly have every indication of that.

A study done by the U.S., one half of the 200 drugs studied, indicates significant drug prices being less at the wholesale level in Canada versus the United States. I can attest to that. I attended a meeting in the United States when congressman Bonior was putting on a seminar a few months ago and that was related in that meeting. They were surprised at the price of wholesale drugs in the United States versus the price in Canada. Certainly that was an important part of their discussion on that day when they talked about medicare and looking at ways of providing better medical care to their people in the United States. Clearly the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board is doing a good job.

The third issue of 1987 was the supposed disappearance of the generic manufacturers sector in Canada. It was all going to disappear. It is amazing, it did not disappear as was claimed by the critics in 1987. The results have been quite the contrary. The industry is growing, it has grown and has had twice the growth since 1987.

We can say quite correctly that the critics have been wrong on all three counts. As my dad always said, the best measure of what will happen is what has happened in the past and certainly the criticisms of the critics have not been proven on any point.

Bill C-91 is a prime example of good comprehensive government policy that effectively strikes a balance protecting the interests of consumers while stimulating the growth of a knowledge based, high technology industry here in Canada. We know we can compete internationally and this bill deserves the support of Parliament and of the people of Canada.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on Bill C-91. I am against this bill because I think that it will have three harmful effects for all Canadians.

First, I think that this bill will raise drug prices. Second, I think that it will hit older people especially. When I say older people, I will soon be 50 and I am talking about people 50 and older. You do not need to be a golden ager to know that drug prices are now out of control. With this Bill C-91, it will be a real jungle, if we go by what the New York Times wrote, and the reason I mention this newspaper is that I find it to be fairly independent in this debate. It is neither NDP nor Conservative nor Liberal; it is not even a Canadian paper. It is published outside Canada and it wrote that according to independent studies, this bill will cost us about $508 million more a year. This will have a second effect that will hurt all of Canada in that our health system will be more threatened because the provinces will have to delist some drugs or require more and more beneficiaries to pay part of the cost of medication.

We in Quebec have seen what happens when drug prices go up and druggists charge prescription fees. In Quebec we now have a user fee of $2 for every prescription filled. The minister said earlier that it was only 2 per cent more. Drugs will only cost us 2 per cent more if Bill C-91 is passed. But in Quebec we already pay more when the druggist charges $2 for every prescription.

A headline of an article in Le Devoir that I will quote reads: "Deterred by the user fee—the $2 charge—seniors cut their drug consumption too much". Because they have to pay $2 more, people are already deciding to do without their drugs. That is only $2, but now we are talking about 2 per cent.

I ask my colleague from Winnipeg South to really listen to the people in his riding. Let him go to the various activities of seniors' groups in his riding and I am sure that he will see that they are against this Bill C-91. If you do not want to hear your constituents, listen to your family, talk with your mother, your father and the older people in your family and you will realize, as the good colleague and good politician that you are, that drug prices are already unreasonable today. The system we have in the various provinces is already pushed to the limit in that they are looking more and more to see what service can be cut, what drug can be cut, what amount Canadians can be required to pay in order to balance the budget.

I certainly do not want to get into a war of figures because the government has figures showing that it will not cost that much and many jobs will be created. On the other hand, we are told that they are low-paying jobs, like those for cleaning staff in the various drug companies. One can always claim that it will do no harm, but, Mr. Speaker, I quoted you a figure that came not from the Liberals or the New Democrats or the Conservatives and not even from the Canadian government but from the Americans who say that Bill C–91 will bring them a billion dollars more.

I was disappointed when my colleague from Winnipeg replied by saying, "Come on, how can we trust the Americans?" You here in the House of Commons are acting as if the Americans were part of the evil empire. You are saying that they cannot be trusted. I am not asking anyone to trust all Americans but at least to trust the figures quoted in a reputable newspaper like the New York Times. Those figures were quoted there yesterday and I have not seen any retraction today. I have not heard this government ask that newspaper to retract so those figures still stand and they show that it will cost us a billion dollars more.

I conclude by saying that those listening and watching us will want to know whether to believe the Liberals, the Conservatives or the New Democrats. It is not necessary to trust us either, but check out drug prices, talk to your pharmacist and especially your doctor because he too will tell you that this is an unnecessary bill that will open the field of pharmaceuticals to a certain kind of banditry and make the law of the jungle prevail and above all that it will affect not just old people but everyone. That is what bothers me.

Although the government made promises to the drug companies, it should have told them: "Thanks for all your donations, but we did what we could and were unable to pass this bill. Wait for the next election and maybe after that we will submit this bill again". We must not pass this bill now because it is detrimental to Canadians' health.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate and I wish to begin by raising one very simple question: Why is it that the government in the last gasping, dying days of its existence is bringing in legislation which is so destructive and so injurious to the well-being of this country? Why does it believe that it has a mandate to so completely go against the interests of the large number of Canadians who depend upon proper health care and proper drug prices? Whom is it paying off? To whom is it answerable on this question? Clearly, there is nothing in this bill that justifies the Draconian actions of taking away what has been one of the most useful areas of social legislation that Canada has had for the last 20 years.

I was in this city at the time when the compulsory licensing bill was brought in. I was a special assistant to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the former leader of the Liberal Party, when we brought in compulsory licensing. I remember well the debate at the time and the committee examination because my job was to monitor what was taking place. I can remember the conditions back in 1968: price gouging, exorbitant, unfeeling rip-offs of all kinds of people by the major manufacturers, with no sense of responsibility. They were not simply providing a product, they were providing the life blood for hundreds of Canadians who need their medicaments.

Now we have a government that is going to return exactly back to the old system. It is turning the clock back over 20 years. Again, one would have to ask why. What is the reason? What possibly could seize it with this reason?

I suppose it is not too hard to find because all one has to do is read the North American free trade agreement and realize that this was a condition inserted by the now rejected Bush administration in the United States for signing the NAFTA agreement and this government went along. It was the classic pieces of silver that it sold out for. If anybody wants to know why they should object strenuously to the North American free trade agreement, it is because it includes measures like this that totally work against the interests of Canadians. This is not the only hidden nugget in that agreement, but this one is the most blatant and the most damaging because it goes to the very vital health of Canadians.

My colleague has reported the general accounting study done by the Americans, about the extra $400 million in health costs per year at a time when the health system is already overloaded. It is interesting that at a time when the Americans have examined the Canadian compulsory licensing system to see if that is a way of effectively cutting costs in their health care system, we are rejecting that very same system. I would suggest, watching the impacts of the American election, that President-elect Clinton has made a major commitment to reduce health costs. One of the things that the new administration will be looking at is this proposal to deal with compulsory licensing that Canada has had for over the past 25 years and it will take a hard look at that as one of the measures that it would introduce to reduce its own health costs—talk about a government that is swimming upstream.

• (1350)

Here we have an American administration trying to reduce health costs and we have a Canadian administration, because of a previous sell-out under NAFTA, saying it is going to go ahead with the bill.

It had received pleas from provincial health ministers of all political stripes right across this country to say this would put an enormous burden on the system.

Under those circumstances what nerve it has when its mandate is about through to go ahead and ram this bill through with a majority and I plead with Conservative members of Parliament who are responsible and accountable to their own constituents to tell their cabinet to withdraw this bill and not to proceed with this legislation.

I have heard some members get up and try to defend this on the other side, saying it will be a great boon to medical research. I look at the commitments. There has been some investment. Have they talked about the losses?

The generic drug industry of Canada is also investing substantially in original drug research. In my own city of Winnipeg several major companies have started up new plants and the president of Apotex has said without any hesitation that he will have to shut down a major plant in the city of Winnipeg because of this bill, not because it is not there, but because of this bill.

That example is reproduced right across Canada.

If you total the suggested increases in research with what we know are the known losses, the net impact in my view will be a substantial decline of a Canadian based generic drug industry that is prepared to invest right across Canada to use the facilities to start our own industry at a time when that is what we desperately need. Instead we are bringing in legislation in this House to serve the interests of multinationals and in which control accountability is missing.

As an intelligent, thoughtful member of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, can you find any reason to support this bill? You cannot because sitting in the chair in an impartial state you would have to make a judgment that there is no reason. There is no moral authority for this government to bring in the bill.

Members of this government will ultimately be answerable to the people, particularly to those in this country who must go daily to their pharmacist, their druggist to get medication. I had a case in my office about a month ago of a gentleman who has to take drugs on a daily basis for a very severe condition. They keep him alive. He has no choice in the matter. He has been buying generic drugs in bulk.

Even under those circumstances, as it has now shifted and the impact of Bill C-22, the old bill, has come into effect, it is harder and harder to get access to those drugs and he has seen increases of 10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 30 per cent in those prices.

If this bill goes through he has no chance. It will virtually double the cost of his pharmaceuticals. Who is going to pay for that? The health care system in the province of Manitoba, senior citizens, taxpayers.

I watched with some interest the Prime Minister last night saying he is going to have an economic renewal speech. What is his prescription for economic renewal? Increased cost; make basic pharmaceuticals higher priced, harder to get for people who need it. That is his prescription for economic renewal.

I can only say and plead there is only one way to stop the bill. We must recognize our limitations. We can only do that if certain members of Parliament on the government side have the courage of their conviction and the honesty of their view to know that the only reason for this bill, the only reason it was introduced at this time, the reason it is being rammed through by closure motion, why we are not being given proper opportunity to debate it, to hold hearings on it, is because of an obligation owing to a defeated president of the United States to get the NAFTA bill passed.

It is part of that general misguided sense of ideological purity that only this Prime Minister and his cabinet have. Only they know what is right and these obligations to the discredited members of that old neo-conservative coalition that unfortunately ran too many countries in the industrialized world for the past 10 years must finally come to an end.

I say again to the members of Parliament on the other side for the sake of seniors, for the sake of taxpayers, for the sake of our health care system, for the sake of preserving a Canadian based research industry, for the sake of standing up for the integrity and independence of this country to decide its own policies and not have them decided somewhere else, stand up in your caucus tomorrow morning when you have the chance and tell the Prime Minister, for the sake of this country, to withdraw Bill C-91.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of the debate on Bill C-91 that deserves special attention; that is its impact on Canada's senior citizens.

Seniors are probably the single group that is most strongly interested in the costs of medicine in this country. They are at least twice as likely to need prescription drugs as the average Canadian. Though most senior citizens are covered by provincial drug plans, changes in the costs of pharmaceutical products are something that seniors see and experience directly.

The Canadian government remains sensitive to the concerns of seniors about drug costs. The changes proposed in Bill C-91 will strengthen measures to guard against excessive increases in patent drug prices. Above all, they will expand the powers of the board that reviews patented drug prices in Canada.

Since 1987, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has tracked increases in the prices of patented pharmaceuticals and it has been singularly successful in keeping those increases well below the rate of inflation.

The record is clear: since the board was created, the costs of patented drugs have risen by an average of only 2.9 per cent a year, well below the average rate of increase in the consumer price index. This is good news for Canadian senior citizens.

The success of the board has even been noticed by our neighbours. A report by the United States general accounting office recently compared the costs of prescription drug prices in the United States and Canada. It found that on average the manufacturers' price for prescription drugs was 32 per cent higher in the United States than in Canada.

Furthermore, the study found that one half of the drugs cost at least 50 per cent more in the United States. Of the top selling 200 drugs, 27 cost at least 100 per cent more in the United States, three drugs cost 500 per cent more and one, Isodel, used in the treatment of angina, costs an incredible 967 per cent more in the United States than in Canada.

Since there are no differences in manufacturers' costs in the two countries, the study concluded that the major source of the difference in drug prices in the United States and Canada is to be found in the action of the Canadian government.

As the report says, in setting prices manufacturers of patented drugs must conform to Canadian federal regulations that review prices for newly released drugs and restrain price increases for existing drugs. The fact is that the Canadian system is working. The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has been proven to be an effective mechanism for keeping drug costs in line.

Bill C-91 strengthens the powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. Under its terms, the board will be able to roll back price increases and provide fines and jail terms for those found not to be in compliance with its guidelines.

The legislation also gives the PMPRB new powers to better control the prices at which new drugs are introduced into the marketplace. To enforce the board's authority, Bill C-91 makes it an offence for companies not to respond to board orders or to refuse to provide pricing or sales and expense information.

The net effect of these changes will be to make an already effective mechanism even more effective. It will ensure that those who hold drug patents will not be able to exploit those patents unfairly.

• (1400)

The provisions of Bill C-91 strike a reasonable balance between rewarding those who produce pharmaceutical innovations and protecting the interest of those like Canadian seniors who need effective and affordable medicines.

NUNAVUT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, the creation of Nunavut has been a dream of Inuit leadership since the 1970s.

The people of the eastern Arctic have sought a new jurisdiction in this country consistent with their desire to govern themselves and manage their own affairs. In this whole process, the people and Government of the Northwest Territories have been fully involved.

First, division of NWT was approved in principle by a majority of voters in a plebiscite in 1982. Second, in May this year a majority of voters approved the precise location of the new boundary in a second plebiscite.

On October 30, the Nunavut political accord was signed by the Government of Canada, the Government of the Northwest Territories and the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut.

Now, in a referendum held between November 3 and November 5, Inuit voters overwhelmingly said yes to the accord. With an 80 per cent turn-out, 69 per cent of the voters said yes and people who were not voting were counted as no votes. That is a very significant level of approval.

Accordingly the Government of Canada will be introducing legislation at the time of the claim settlement legislation to divide the Northwest Territories and set up Nunavut. A happy day, particularly because the peoples themselves have been directly involved in making these decisions.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I call on the government to reassure the veterans of Canada that the benefits and the programs it provides will continue as long as there are needy and disabled Canadians who need them.

Seventy-five years ago the Prime Minister of Canada promised the veterans of World War I that they would be cared for by a grateful nation. Today there is fear among the veteran population that this government is planning to abandon the veterans and the department in the name of cost efficiency.

I understand that at least 250 positions at DVA will be declared surplus. I also understand that the department is looking at a merger with the Department of National Defence.

We wonder if this government is also looking at taxing or cutting veterans benefits. It is time for the government to make a clear recommitment to the veterans of Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, this government's economic policies have been a disaster for Canada. The Conservative government and the previous Liberal government before it have followed policies which have increased unemployment in Canada.

On some of the reserves in my riding of Churchill and across Canada the unemployment rate exceeds 90 per cent. This desperate situation is made worse by inadequate housing and a lack of sewer and water facilities. Many reserves do not have permanent roads into their communities and others still rely on run-down diesel generators for electricity.

This lack of necessary houses and infrastructure creates an opportunity for the government. A water and sewage program along with a program to improve housing could employ people in both native and many other communities across Canada. These programs would improve the quality of life for thousands of native people.

I strongly urge the federal government to introduce these programs now in order to create jobs and to help make life for Canada's native peoples much better.

NUNAVUT

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I believe I speak for all members of this House when I say how pleased I am that on November 3 to November 5 of this year Inuit of the Northwest Territories voted overwhelmingly to their comprehensive land claim settlement agreement. In so doing they voted yes to settling the largest land claim in North America.

At the same time they have affirmed their aspirations to set up the new territory of Nunavut to further this stewardship of the lands and waters of the eastern Arctic and to better manage their own lives.

Through the whole region of Nunavut, 69 per cent of all eligible Inuit voters supported the claim settlement agreement. Of those voting, 85 per cent voted to support the settlement.

This was not only a vote on the claim. Settlement of the land claim is intimately linked to the goal of creating a new territory in the north, that is Nunavut.

Thus Nunavut will be established as a new territory alongside Yukon and Northwest Territories.

May I say that with the territory of Nunavut proposed for the year 1999, it will be a truly memorable inauguration to the 21st century.

GRAND-MÈRE ACTION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate Grands-mères Action in my riding for their good work against violence and sexism in the media. It is unacceptable that there is so much violence in 1992, and especially that the media do not feel that this issue should be on the agenda.

I believe we must address this problem right now if we really want to ensure a peaceful future for all Canadians.

Violence is unacceptable, whatever the group attacked, and we must correct the problem now. The media have a responsibility to promote a non-violent and non-sexist society and they have a lot of work to do in that respect.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses urged the Canadian Bankers Association to improve access to credit for small and medium-sized businesses in this country. The minister added that the economic recovery was also dependent on a commitment by the banks to provide additional money for loans to new small businesses and generally on the openness of financial institutions to the credit needs of small and medium-sized businesses.

The economy needs help. Canadian businesses must have fair access to credit. This is why I urge the lending institutions to show greater flexibility toward small businesses.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, when the federal government laid out GRIP in 1991 it promised a final payment in November 1992. Now the government indicates it will not be in a position to pay producers for wheat and barley until next year.

Why should cash starved farmers wait another few months before they can pay their debts? They are still suffering from the farm aid shortfall of 1990 when the federal government tried to spread the aid package for 1989 and 1991 across that year and the farm debt rose dramatically as a result.

Recent studies show that grain farmers have lost $6.7 billion since 1986. In Saskatchewan alone this translates into $106,000 net cash loss per farm on average. The result is that many of them have lost the equity in their farms and have lost their farms entirely, as the recent increase in bankruptcy figures in that part of the country show.

Spreading the aid thinner will not help the situation. If the payments are due now they should be made now and the package should be reassessed because it is totally inadequate.

CP RAIL

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Prime Minister announced in his speech on economic recovery that he would emphasize transportation links. Yet today we learned some very sad news for Quebec and for Canada, namely that CP Rail has requested authorization to end its service between Quebec and the maritimes.

Quebec will not accept this decision. The Eastern Townships will not accept this decision. The mayors and reeves in my region are upset. I urge the government to intervene immediately with CP Rail to stop this discrimination against Quebec and the maritimes. Trade between Quebec and the maritimes is now over $4 billion and we want to keep it. Our jobs are at stake.

THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ombudsman has declared that the drama documentary series The Valour and the Horror is flawed, that it fails to measure up to CBC's demanding policies and standards and that a number of the events and associations in the series are historically false.

That being the case, I call upon the Minister of Communications to direct the National Film Board to withdraw The Valour and the Horror from public distribution so it will not be available to schools and young people and the government will no longer be seen as denigrating the services of those who fought for Canada in World War II.

CENTENARY HEALTH CENTRE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in 1967, the centenary of Confederation, a new hospital opened in Scarborough. Fittingly it was called Centenary Hospital. Over the ensuing 25 years Centenary Hospital has grown just as Scarborough has grown.

Today the hospital, now known as Centenary Health Centre, is on the leading edge of health care services in Scarborough, metropolitan Toronto, and Ontario.

This reputation has been earned and is well deserved. The combination of excellent administrators, competent and dedicated staff, and selfless volunteers has resulted in a health centre relied upon by the citizens of Scarborough for their well-being.

The Margaret Birch wing permits patients to recuperate and rehabilitate right on the premises under the continuing and watchful eye of their surgeons.

On behalf of my constituents and all residents of Scarborough, I offer congratulations and thanks to all staff and volunteers of Centenary Health Centre for a quarter century of service to the local community.

JOB SEARCH

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to salute the decision of a group of unemployed workers to get together and learn how to do a successful job search.

Several groups of unemployed workers are spending three weeks from nine to five, acquiring the tools they need to enter the labour market. Writing a curriculum vitae, introductory and thank-you letters, simulated interviews on video and targeting of potential employers are all part of the session.

The federal government is proud to be associated with this job search clubs project, aware that to have a satisfying job is a legitimate goal. Although these are difficult times, there is always room for excellence.

In an increasingly competitive world, standards are high and getting the right job means going all-out.

CP RAIL SYSTEMS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we were dismayed to learn today of a CP Rail Systems application to abandon all railway operations east of Sherbrooke. This is another example of damage to the economic infrastructure of this country caused by government negligence and its complete inability to develop a consistent and comprehensive national transportation policy.

If this application is approved more than 300 railway jobs will be lost and hundreds of others in industries depending on rail freight services will be put in jeopardy.

While this government talks boldly of improving Canadian competitiveness, its inaction and irresponsibility fail to provide Canadian workers and business with the means and services they need in order to compete.

The CP Rail Systems announcement lays the blame for its application directly on the government's shoulders. It says that the absence of coherent and construction government policies has placed it in this unhappy position.

The railway industry has pleaded with the Government of Canada for years to amend its taxation and other policies to permit it to compete, but this government, this Tory government, has been satisfied to sit by while the Canadian economy literally falls apart.

POLITICS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I know I am not alone among my colleagues in this House in being concerned about the low state of respect and confidence in which the Canadian people so obviously appear to hold the parliamentary process in general and this Parliament in particular.

It is not only a source of frustration for most politicians who address this profession as a high calling, but the public mood of cynicism about government at all levels in Canada is indeed dangerous to the effectiveness of the whole democratic system.

There are many causes for the chasm of confidence between leadership and followership in Canada, but perhaps none more so than the constant pursuit of partisan politics, the everlasting search for support, the vigorous and sometimes vicious battle for votes.

I have become convinced that to a considerable extent Canadian cynicism with respect to politicians comes from a perception that the practice of politics is frequently tainted with a principle almost akin to prostitution, that the noble purpose of serving the public is too often based primarily on what measures will be electable rather than on what policies will be effective. We must commit ourselves to counter that perception. It is time for Parliament to become less partisan and more purposeful. Surely it is also time for each one of us as MPs to more—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, one of today's headlines in the Financial Post reads: "Resist Siren Call of the Spenders". I could not agree more.

One of the greatest mistakes the government could make would be to proceed down the road of massive government spending. More spending will simply add to the debt, rekindle inflation and increase interest rates. This would be a destructive course and should be avoided. As Canadians, we should know because previous governments have taken that path and we are still paying off their debts.

The fundamentals of a strong economy are in place and with some encouragement on the tax side, that is a reduction in taxes, specifically a reduction in the GST, along with additional yet fundamental changes in that area, consumer confidence will rebound, revenues will increase and the need for a massive injection of borrowed money into the economy can be avoided.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury just made a remark that this Parliament should set an example and be a little bit less partisan. I would like in asking my question of the Prime Minister to note that yesterday the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party asked this government for some answers on economic policies and there was no answer from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance.

The next thing we saw, and showing disrespect for this Parliament, the Prime Minister went out and made the announcement of his economic plan to a fund raising dinner at $500 a plate, neglecting to make that statement here in the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister announced a plan that was no plan at all because it will take its course. I would like to say to the Prime Minister that Campaign 2000, in a report on child poverty, said that one out of six children in Canada lives in poverty; that internationally we look terrible. It is shameful. The U.K., France, Holland, Germany and many others are ahead of us. We are barely above the United States. Everyone in this country knows that the best way to give pride and dignity to these children is to ensure that their parents have work in Canada.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will have a program soon to make sure that the fathers and mothers of these children will have some work so that they can give bread and dignity to their children.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the Leader of the Opposition failed to mention important measures the government has taken, especially this year, aimed at Canada's children.

Since the beginning of 1982, the government has invested around $3 billion, which includes the child tax benefit and the $500 million earmarked for children at risk, plus a number of projects concerning drugs and the environment, probably the largest amount of money invested by a Canadian government in the kind of situation we have today.

I believe that child poverty is something Canadians should never condone and that it will require a commensurate effort on the part of all governments and all Canadians.

I believe that considering the economic situation, to which he himself referred, the Leader of the Opposition should remember that what the government has done for Canada's children was done responsibly as part of our responsibility for managing the affairs of this country.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we had a debate in this House and the problem was examined by a committee, but none of the experts supported the government's point of view. The government has introduced a program that will give cheques to children during the first six months of the 1993 election year, but subsequently they will lose those benefits. Two years from now, they will be even worse off than they are today.

Instead of introducing these election gimmicks, could the minister perhaps talk to his colleagues and tell them that the best way to give these children some dignity and support is to ensure that their parents have jobs?

When will the government take the advice of the opposition, now supported by the New Democratic Party and even by the Bloc Quebecois, and introduce a program to finance infrastructures, with one third paid by the provinces, one third by the municipalities and one third by the federal government? This would put hundreds of people to work immediately.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition said that giving an additional $500 to every low-income family in Canada, especially those earning $10,000 or more, was a political ploy and an election gimmick. I think that calling any assistance we give to children an election gimmick reflects a lack of class and an outlook that is absolutely deplorable.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the minister appeared before the committee, he met the experts and everyone agreed that this was not a solution, or should I say it was a purely political solution to try and win votes—which they will not get in any event—during the first six months of 1993.

Is the minister prepared to go back and set up a long term program instead of this vote-winning gimmick?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The Leader of the Opposition may be concerned about the election, but I am concerned about the future of our children.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The sad reality in consequence of this government's economic policy is that the only growth has been in the number of poor in this country.

Today Campaign 2000 announced that this year it is expected that 900,000 children in this country will be on social assistance. This is a 200,000 increase in numbers since the 1988 election.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister: How can this government defend its economic policy when so many families have been left in poverty?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can just repeat in English what I said in French. In the last year, in light of the economic reality we face, the Government of Canada put out $3 billion for the children of Canada. Of course if we had the capacity to put up more we would, but we have to consider, as he said, the economic reality. A government such as ours which is able under these circumstances to put up that much money for poor children and children at risk should be commended by the member.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister knows full well that the problem of poverty is being created by his government's policies, that in fact the distribution of income between the rich and the poor is much worse since this government took power. There is now an unemployment rate of 30 per cent among families in poverty and 60 per cent in single parent families. When is this government going to present to the Canadian people an economic policy which will deal with this issue?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, in due course the government will make those announcements.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question and the minister is responding. I am sure the House will give the minister the courtesy to complete his answer.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Once again, we are talking about poverty with children, families and so on. I listened to his question and I believe he should listen to the answer. It is fundamental to understand that in light of the realities we face. One of my friends said that we invented it. If we invented poverty for children, it was certainly not here in 1975 and 1981–82. Poverty is a fact of any society and as a government, as would any government in the world, we are trying to deal with that, but as a responsible government we have to take into account all our realities.

Once again, this government gave $3 billion to poor people and particularly to the children in this country. We also put $15 billion a year into different departments for children. It is not enough. It is never enough for the children of Canada. But it is what we have the capacity to do, and it is what we will continue to do.

POVERTY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the issue of child poverty in this country and poverty which is increasing is, I am sure, of concern to every Canadian because we are really talking about the future of Canada and the ability and investment in the future of Canada. With one in six children living in poverty, as the child poverty action group has said today, we have to realize that of course poor children have poor parents.

I would like to address my question to the Prime Minister. Last night the Prime Minister spoke of modernizing our social programs. Surely one of the best modern social programs would be to have a goal of full employment and economic policies which would address that goal. The Prime Minister was willing to commit to a goal of full employment in the recent constitutional document. I would like to ask him if he is willing to commit again today and to commit his government to pursue that goal of full employment and the policies that flow from that.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the policies that we pursue are designed to increase employment and to eliminate to the extent humanly possible the problem of unemployment. It is a problem that affects all industrialized societies and it causes great damage to the social fabric of any nation. It causes great disappointment to families and it diminishes opportunities for our young people.

That is why the government, and governments, along with the private sector and the unions and all political parties, must have as their highest priority the intent to create new economic opportunities that translate into durable jobs for Canadians. That is the objective of all of our government policies. This is exactly what we are seeking to do, without affecting inflation negatively, while attracting foreign investment and creating a climate wherein this can be possible.

Mr. Fontana: How come it's had the reverse effect?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend has a seatmate making remarks. I do not think I would have any quarrel with the objective articulated by my hon. friend; where we may have some disagreements is how we achieve it.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

The reality is that we are not achieving it. In 1988 the Prime Minister promised jobs, jobs, jobs, and unemployment went up; the government promised to reduce the debt and the debt went up; the government has promised to reduce poverty in this country and poverty has simply increased in this country.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that Canada needs action now, not promise. We need economic policies, not the same ones and staying the course with those that have failed, but new economic policies that really address what is needed for the majority of Canadian people who now are looking forward to a future in poverty.

I say to the Prime Minister that the fundamentals are not working. Will the Prime Minister address that, admit that, and change the economic direction of this government to meet the very real needs of those Canadians who are suffering as a result of the policies of this government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the World Bank, the IMF and the OECD would disagree fundamentally with my hon. friend. It is their assessment that the fundamentals are working in Canada. They have stated that with an inflation rate of 1.3 per cent, Canada has now the lowest inflation rate in the industrialized world. They have stated as well that we will lead in terms of economic growth in the G-7 next year and that employment growth will be highest in Canada among any of the G-7 countries.

While we do have a serious problem, I think the general assessment around the world and nationally is that we have chosen the proper instruments to deal with it.

The alternative to what we are doing is printing money and spending borrowed money. If deficit financing and spending by governments were a solution, we would not have had the results that we had when the Liberals were there or when the Liberals were joined in a loose and affectionate alliance with the NDP. That did not work.

The fundamentals are in place and we hope to move it along even more.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The sad reality is that millions of Canadians are far more familiar with food banks than they are with the World Bank, and that is what we would like to change. We would like to see Canadians not so familiar with food banks.

In 1988, the Prime Minister said that the best social program was employment. He should tell that to his finance minister and the Governor of the Bank of Canada because yesterday interest rates rose again, which will raise the deficit and even more people will lose their jobs. The Conservative government's economic policies are undoubtedly a failure. Can the unemployed and welfare recipients find out what this government's alternative is?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat some of what I said a few moments ago in English; that despite the difficulties that the governments of all industrialized countries—Great Britain, France, Japan, Germany, the United States—are going through, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the OECD have concluded that the foundation is now in place for what we hope will be a lasting recovery in Canada in the coming months and years.

All the signs are both significant and encouraging for Canada. While I recognize the reality of the problem raised by my friend, we must also admit that there are very encouraging signs for the future of Canada.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Campaign 2000 report card on child poverty which has already been the subject of questions in this House today says with regard to the minister's new program, which includes an earned income supplement, "almost half of all poor families will receive no earning supplement in 1993".

In the light of this fact, how can the minister say that his program is doing anything worth while for poor families? Why will he not do something better to help poor children and their families all across this country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all I have not read the report. After I do, it will be easier for me to answer questions.

What I can say, however, is what we have always said about the tax benefit. We give $500 more per family to low income workers whose earnings average $10,000 to $20,000 as compared to those earning $50,000 to $60,000 a year. At that level there is a decreasing amount of money.

We continue to give more money than we did before. We consider factors such as the inflation rate, the cost of living and so on. These are applied to all families in Canada. For low income workers, the amount of money available today is greater than it was under the family allowance system.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the report also says that "it is estimated that only .7 per cent of single parent families will move above the poverty line due to this benefit in 1993 and only 1.6 per cent of poor couple families will do so".

The report says: "Moreover, these moderate increases will occur only if adequate jobs are available".

In light of the continuing desperately high levels of unemployment, more than 1.5 million people continue out of work and this government has done nothing to ensure that there will be adequate jobs, why has the government not come forward yet with a program to ensure that all Canadians have the jobs they require to provide a decent standard of living for themselves and their children?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I never said that the program for children replaced the jobs that have always been the first objective for the government and all Canadians. It is very obvious that the government's first objective in our economic policies is to create jobs. These programs that we put in place help to mitigate the problems faced by poor children in particular.

Once again, I quite agree that the job creation efforts made by other departments remain the fundamental response to the problem of child poverty in Canada.

MONTREAL

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, almost one in five people in the city of Montreal are out of work. In this year alone 17,000 people have lost their jobs in manufacturing, 10,000 in retail and 9,000 more in the financial sector.

On top of these very sad unemployment statistics, today we learn that the city's bond credit rating has dropped from AA to A-plus.

Montreal is the economic heart and lungs of the province of Quebec. Why did the Minister of Finance let things get to this point and what action plan, if any, does he have to revive the economy of Montreal?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand the difficulties throughout the country. As I said yesterday, the Canadian economy is going through a difficult period because the world economy is going through a difficult period.

Markets are soft. Commodity prices are weak. There is a huge overhang and a burden of debt at the consumer, corporate and government levels. All of these things are having an effect on the slowness of the world economy.

It is expected that the G–7 countries will grow by something like 1.7 per cent this year. There has been an increase in the unemployment numbers in the G–7 countries of some five million over the last two years. That has had a direct impact upon the economy of Canada.

I remind the hon. member that notwithstanding all the difficulties, there are 12,240,000 Canadians who are working in this country. We would like to see fewer people unemployed. Some of the initiatives that were outlined by the Prime Minister last night are things that we are developing. We will build upon the budget initiatives we brought down in February which are indeed working and strengthening—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister will be able to expand on the supplemental.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the 25 per cent unemployed in east end Montreal, Snowdon and Côte des Neiges are not going to get much comfort from those remarks.

According to data from the Quebec construction commission, the unemployment rate in that industry is about 50 per cent. Is the Minister of Finance prepared to announce immediately a program to rebuild infrastructure and renovate buildings in order to create jobs for these workers, as the Leader of the Opposition has already proposed, or will he wait until the unemployment rate is 100 per cent?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has addressed some of the points made by the hon. member. I would be interested in knowing how she proposes to pay for this sort of infrastructure spending, recognizing that the focus in Canada is on its level of debt, the burden of debt, not only at the federal level but at the provincial level.

I remind the hon. member that the unemployment figures are going down, not going up. There has been an improvement of 64,000 new jobs created in the last six months. Eighty-three thousand new jobs have been created in September and October of a permanent nature. While it is a slow recovery, consistent with the recovery that is going on globally, it is nevertheless a recovery and it is moving in a progressive way and not in a negative way.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday in this House we talked about the devastation that is imminent in the airline industry because of the policies of the Conservative government and the former Liberal government on deregulation. Today I want to raise with the minister the devastation that the policy has brought to Atlantic Canada.

• (1440)

Canadian Pacific Railway announced this morning it is its intention to seek permission of the National Transportation Agency to rip up every single track of theirs from Sherbrooke, Quebec, to Saint John, New Brunswick, as well as all their tracks in Nova Scotia. Will the Minister of Transport use the government's authority under section 23 of the National Transportation Act and instruct the NTA to reject any request to abandon any main line track by any railroad anywhere in Canada? Will he do that to protect Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the hon. member correctly, he would have us take steps to make businesses lose even more money so that job losses might be even greater in a few months.

There is a procedure in place. CP Rail announced this morning its intention to submit a request to the National Transportation Agency to abandon theses lines. The agency will hear the representations from all sides, from the users and from government. Every citizen or group who wishes to made representations may do so by contacting the National Transportation agency. The agency will assess the situation and give a ruling in August 1993.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister and the House that the National Transportation Act says that transportation is recognized as a key to regional and economic development and commercial viability of transportation links is balanced with regional economic development objectives in order that the potential economic strengths of each region may be realized.

Mayor Elsie Wayne of Saint John, New Brunswick agrees, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission agrees and, perhaps, even the Prime Minister in his pledge last night to rebuild the transportation infrastructure might agree.

Will the minister protect Saint John, New Brunswick, and the rest of Atlantic Canada from lack of competition and ensure that CP will continue to operate one way or the other?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the National Transportation Act was passed in 1987, it provided for a committee review of its content and impact. A committee was struck and is expected to table its report by January 31, 1993. Proposals will be made to ensure that this government's objectives, which are essential to our national economy, are reached and revisited.

DRUGS AND PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of industry.

When this government announced its intention to scrap compulsory licensing it said the cost to Canadian consumers would only be $29 million a year. Yesterday the minister's own officials revised that figure to $129 million a year and The New York Times yesterday pegged the extra cost to Canadian consumers at over $400 million per year.

Why is this minister intentionally confusing Canadians with phoney figures on the true cost of the elimination of compulsory licensing?

Mr. Speaker: I am not accepting that kind of a question. Why was this minister intentionally confusing Canadians? That is a clear allegation of lack of honesty and I do not think we need that. I am going to ask the hon. member to withdraw his remark.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the remark and ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I accept and I thank the hon. member for withdrawing. Perhaps the hon. member could complete his question.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, will the minister now stand and tell Canadian consumers why there is confusion over the various costs to consumers by the elimination of compulsory licensing. Could he tell us why there have been different figures from his own lips and those of his departmental officials?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question last spring for the same member.

We said at the time that the savings made by the compulsory licence system represented $300 million a year. However, in terms of the patent drugs covered by Bill C–91, it will be about $75 million because two–thirds to three–quarters of all drugs covered are non–patent drugs. If the $75 million is divided by two, because 50 per cent of the costs are covered by the health plan at the provincial level, it represents, as I said at the time, about $35 million to $40 million a year. I stand by the same figures today.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I sort of thank the minister for that clarification.

My supplementary question is again to the minister of industry. In a letter dated October 29 the provincial ministers of health universally reaffirmed their opposition to the elimination of compulsory licensing. However, in contrast yesterday The New York Times reported that the president of the huge U.S. drug lobby fully supports this government's plan to do away with its system of drug price controls.

Why is it that this government refuses to listen to the unanimous pleas from Canada's health ministers, yet continues to respond on command to the wishes of the huge U.S. multinational drug lobby?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague, the minister of health, has responded to the misconceptions that my hon. friend had on the price impact.

As I stated in the House yesterday in my speech on Bill C–91, the reason we are proceeding on this bill is because it is creating jobs and new investment, high–priced jobs and investment in research and development by companies in hospitals, universities and in medical institutions right across the country.

It is these value-added jobs which my friends opposite in the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party are appealing to this government to help to create. Then when we introduce some legislation that clearly is leading to the creation of this investment in these high value-added jobs, my hon. friend says that is the wrong way to go. You cannot have it both ways.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the exchanges in Question Period I am reminded of what the Prime Minister said when he was first elected, that after eight years we would never recognize Canada. He is right. It is in total collapse.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport about an another calamity that he is responsible for. Yesterday in this House the minister said that he supported and endorsed the efforts of the employees of Canadian Airlines to rescue their jobs. Today he is now reported as saying he has changed his mind, that he is now looking at a merger proposal.

I ask the Minister of Transport: What is the government plan? It is too late to be playing mental ping-pong with the lives and jobs of thousands of Canadians in the airline industry. Within the next 24 hours, will the government put forward its blueprint so that we can save this industry and save the jobs and have something to defend in this country when we take over this government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I protest vigorously against the allegation made by the other side to the effect that we had a change of heart or that I would have said that we had undertaken some other process. It is absolutely untrue. We are still looking at ways for the government to reconcile fiscal constraints with its desire to support the efforts of the Canadian Airlines employees in the best interest of the people of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister's inaction makes a mockery of the dedicated employees of Canadian Airlines, the management and the unions who have put together a workable positive approach to saving their company, saving their jobs.

It is five minutes to midnight on this issue. Will the minister quit stalling and announce that he will back the employee-led package? Yes or no?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have repeated many times that we are interested in this package provided that it meets the financial constraints of this country.

I again invite the Liberal Party to tell us at what price, to what amount it is prepared to expose the Canadian taxpayers to effect a settlement of this situation.

PROSPERITY INITIATIVE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and for International Trade.

At the end of October the minister received the conclusions of a year-long, nation-wide study on prosperity. My question to the minister is where do we go from here? So far there does not appear to be a lot of action coming out of the report and several of my constituents have expressed concern about the amount of money that was spent on the study.

Can the minister give us assurances that Canadians are going to get value for the money spent on the prosperity initiative?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, very clearly Canadians will see that they will really get value for money on this consultation. It involved meetings with 186 communities right across the country. Out of that has come an action plan from the private sector steering group which recommended a number of things that the Prime Minister referred to in his remarks last night, proposals relating to training, a partnership among business, labour and government to provide investment in the training possibilities for Canadian citizens, the work that needs to be done to increase our research and development effort, to increase our trade effort internationally, to rebuild the infrastructure in this country.

As these proposals get fleshed out, I think my hon. friend and his constituents will see that there really is going to be value for money here.

FOOD INDUSTRY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture or to whomever is speaking on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture.

On Friday the minister announced measures to largely deregulate the food industry, to shift responsibility for food safety and quality from government inspectors to industry itself.

Does this government not understand that there are limits to deregulation? Does it not even understand that it is the government's not industry's responsibility to make sure that Canadians do not eat bad meat, rotten eggs or contaminated poultry?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the president of the Public Service Alliance had to panic so much at the announcement made last Friday. Mr. Speaker, you will remember that when the budget was tabled, the Minister of Finance said three departments would review the regulations to ensure they meet the needs of a modern and competitive Canada.

Public health is not in danger here. Most of the recommendations in the report are not related to health or salubrity. They affect the classification and certification of exports. I think my colleague should join me in reassuring Canadian consumers and reaffirming there are no health hazards.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, we know what competition means. We know that it has meant C-91 and that it was supposed to have had no influence on health. Now we are hearing that inspectors will look and see what industry thinks after industry has done the job.

My supplementary is addressed to the Minister for International Trade. My question to him is quite simple: Will the minister admit that the North American free trade agreement provides for the harmonization toward an international standard for food quality that is lower than Canada's standards, that these deregulatory changes I asked about a moment ago are a part of that and that Canadians could very well face increased importation and availability on the market, for example, of chemically contaminated foods in increasing amounts from Mexico and the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that my hon. friend has asked me that question. I would like to refer him to the parts of the North American free trade agreement that he clearly has not read. There are specific provisions in the agreement which allow each country to set its own standards. They specifically allow those standards to be set above international norms precisely according to the desires of the country involved and has nothing to do with what the other two countries in the North American free trade area might want to have for themselves.

If my hon. friend would quit blowing off his mouth and listen—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina—Wascana.

TAXATION

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the current practice of Revenue Canada wherein court ordered child support payments are considered a tax deduction for the non-custodial parent and taxable income for the custodial parent. This places an added burden on the custodial parent and at the same time creates a more favourable financial situation for the other parent.

Could the minister advise the House whether or not the government intends to address this apparent inequity?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very important question, an issue with which I am very familiar.

He knows as well that this matter is currently before the courts and it would be inappropriate for me to make any specific comments in that regard except to say that I am prepared to look at the situation after the courts have dealt with it to continue the government's practice of bringing even greater fairness to the tax system.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister suggested that he is about to use public funds to put Canadian Airlines on an artificial respirator. But he knows full well that the airline is in dire straits and no band–aid, however costly, can put it back on its feet. Can government not see that by throwing good money its way, it is only prolonging Canadian Airlines' agony? Does government plan to continue squandering public funds instead of applying it toward genuine economic recovery?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think there is nothing further from the truth than saying that government committed funds. Government committed to look for, in partnership, a solution that would take into account its fiscal constraints, recognize the major role the company's employees are willing to play in finding a viable solution that would ensure the viability of the aeronautical industry and the airline industry for years to come while being in the best interest of the people of Canada.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, this kind of verbal covering–up is not helpful. Either there will be money and guarantees or there will not. It is well known that the usual means of intervention of government are guarantees or money. The minister knows full well that our domestic market cannot support two national airlines. The Montreal coalition also warned him that any public funds he may spend on Canadian Airlines are likely to compromise directly Air Canada's survival. Then we will have two lame ducks instead of one. How can the minister not be aware of the fact that he is destroying the Canadian transportation industry while striking a terrible blow to Montreal's economy at the same time?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it might be important for the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean to clarify whether he supports competition in the area of air transportation and whether he agrees that air carriers and the air transportation industry should be viable and serve the general interest of all Canadians. That is what we are trying to do, considering there are a great many jobs at stake. That is why we insist that it be in the best interest of the Canadian people.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries.

Has the minister now allowed licence holders of ITQs, either companies or fishermen, to buy and receive permanent quota transfers of fish from inshore fishermen in the Scotia–Fundy area?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check on that particular point to see exactly what the answer is. I cannot recall undertaking this action myself, but I will have to see whether the department has.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, assuming that the minister is not informed of what his department has done, it has sent out a form to allow such permanent transfers.

Does this not mean in the minister's opinion that the Scotia–Fundy area of fish could ultimately be caught by fishermen from another area or province and then landed in another area or province, therefore leaving communities in South West Nova without access to the fish and certainly without the jobs? In other words, whoever has the money can buy that quota and have the fish to catch and process somewhere else outside that area in Nova Scotia.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, fisheries in Canada is under federal jurisdiction. We do not have protectionist measures in effect to prevent the fish being caught from moving from one province to another.

I understand what the hon. member is concerned about. She wants naturally to protect the fishermen in her own area. But to get the full answer for the hon. member, I will have to check with the department. She does not need to fear. No one is going to discriminate against Scotia–Fundy. We act equally and fairly with respect to all areas in the fishery.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister speaking for agriculture today. It has to do with the study and possible removal of barley from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Now we know that the minister responsible for grains does not like the Canadian Wheat Board. We also know that he is a great fan of the multinationals which would love to undermine the Canadian Wheat Board. But the fact of the matter is that not one major farm organization in Canada supports this kind of move, not the CFA, not Prairie Pools and not even the Canadian Wheat Board. In fact the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board has said this: "This continental barley market is like wanting to be married and single at the same time".

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a very strong case. I would like him to put his question.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, all I want to know is where does this nonsense come from? How would he support this kind of study?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, are in Toronto consulting our provincial colleagues on the future of the Canadian farm industry. They are working very hard on these issues.

I will report the hon. member's comments to my colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, and see if they can be useful.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Labour.

For months now, a number of Canadian women have been waiting for the federal government to include the protective reassignment of working women in the Canada Labour Code.

Can the minister describe the progress made towards the protective reassignment of pregnant women in the federal Public Service?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure my colleague from Abitibi that the cabinet has in fact approved the bill on that issue, which I intend to table very soon. The bill will bring several amendments to Part III of the Canada Labour Code, including provisions concerning the reassignment of pregnant women.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for his work on that issue. I am sure women in his riding will vote for him in the next election.

THE LATE PAUL MCRAE

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this privilege this afternoon to be able to make some remarks in memory of a great citizen of northern Ontario, one of our finest citizens and a respected—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen to pay tribute to a former member of this House. I am sure that perhaps some members did not realize the occasion that we are now in. I am sure that for the remainder the hon. member will have the attention of the House.

Mr. Comuzzi: Thank you Mr. Speaker for intervening on this matter. I would like to rise to make some comments today about a former parliamentarian, Paul McRae, who passed away recently in Ottawa.

Prior to Mr. McRae's election to this House, he served with distinction as an educator in Thunder Bay and retired as a high school principal. I believe Sir Winston Churchill was the school he last was a principal at. He succeeded a very fine parliamentarian in his own right, the late Mr. Hubert Badanai, who served in this House for many years. I think Mr. McRae had a difficult job in succeeding a person of Mr. Badanai's stature from Thunder Bay, but to his credit Paul did his job very well.

He was a very effective parliamentarian, not only for his riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan, but he was an effective member for all of northwestern Ontario. He always dealt with great sincerity about the feelings and the viewpoints of the people of the north and considered everyone's concerns in northern Ontario to be his own responsibility.

On a personal note, it was my honour to have known Paul McRae prior to his becoming a member of this House, during the time he was a member of this House and after his membership in this House when he became a valued member of the CRTC here in Ottawa.

The very first call I got from Ottawa after my election some four years ago was a call from Paul asking if he could do anything in any way to assist me in the transition from Thunder Bay to Ottawa.

Through your leadership, Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of this House would like to join with me and the Liberal Party in offering our sincere sympathy and our condolences to his wife and his family.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I would like to associate myself with the words of my friend, the member for Thunder Bay.

Paul McRae came into this House in 1972 along with many of us. We were class-mates in that sense. He had been a teacher, as has been mentioned, and as the member for Provencher, the so-called first western riding, Thunder Bay was literally in our back door. We were neighbours.

Mr. McRae served very faithfully in this House up until 1984. He served on many committees including transport, national resources and communications. He was parliamentary secretary to a post we had then known as the Postmaster General and more laterally as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He was also appointed to the CRTC.

I take it that one has a slightly different view of a colleague from across the way. Paul McRae was one of those members willing to heed his party's call and if there was a speech to be made Paul was one of those who would make that speech; at least that is the way it appeared to us at all times.

I have described him as a happy warrior. I think that is what he was in this House. He represented his riding well. On behalf of my party, we would like to associate ourselves and express our condolences to the family.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I now represent the constituency Paul McRae represented so well for 12 years; first as the riding of Fort William and then, after redistribution, Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

I knew Paul as a political competitor and we ran against each other for the job that he held on two occasions. I can remember on the night of the 1980 election two of us arrived at CKPR television together literally shaking our heads in amazement because we had come so close, with 84 votes between the two of us, neither of us really knowing who was going to come out the winner that night.

Paul did and he served his constituents and this House very well. As the minister just said, he was very active on committees, particularly transport, because like a lot of us from Thunder Bay he recognized the importance of transportation to our region and its viability.

He was more than just a transport person or parliamentary secretary. He was very active in the Parliamentarians for Global Action. He was very strong in terms of his party for the call to end the cruise missile testing and on a number of occasions Paul did break ranks with the government of the day to let people know how he felt.

In addition to politics I knew Paul in a number of other ways. He was my high school vice-principal and I can remember working with him and the late Bob Cato, arranging dances at the high school. I remember being sent out one day to hire Neil Young and the Squires, now Crosby, Stills, Young and Nash.

I also worked with Paul when he was the principal of Sir Winston Churchill when I was a community development officer working with that neighbourhood to bring in some social change, some social action. I remember being at his house in Vickers Heights one night when he was part of the Lakehead social planning council. I cannot remember what the issue was but Paul was front and centre in that as he was in many other things.

One other memory I have, and it is not mine but from my predecessors in the region, is the fact that Paul McRae once was a CCFer. He ran for the CCF in Rainy River before 1972. I do remember being at the public meeting where Paul indicated that he felt it was time to make a change and he felt he could do more from within, as opposed to being a member of the opposition, and he lived up to that. He worked hard, he worked for the things he believed in, he worked hard for his constituents. I know that in addition to Yvonne, his wife, David, his son, and David's family, all of us in this House and in Thunder Bay will miss Paul.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will not take a long time but I would just like to add one further comment about Paul McRae's work as a parliamentarian.

Some very fine words have been spoken so far to describe his work as a constituency person and someone who was deeply interested in the issues of northern Ontario and of Canada. I would like to talk about my own experience with Paul from the time I began to serve with him in 1979 as someone who was that special breed of parliamentarian who took an interest in the world outside.

He became very active, as the last member of Parliament said, in Parliamentarians for Global Action. He was one of the most knowledgeable and informed members of Parliament on questions of nuclear disarmament, arms control and north-south issues. He put his energy and time and interest, not just in terms of what was happening to his own constituents, but he had a much broader constituency he felt he had to serve and that was people around the world who felt that they were being threatened or victimized. Something that deserves recognition in this House is the fact that even after he left the House and served at the CRTC, I can remember on virtually a weekly basis getting notes from him or articles or comments about various matters dealing with international affairs, particularly his really strong commitment to try to end the scourge of nuclear war in this world.

For that reason I will have a special memory of Paul McRae.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with members of the House in paying tribute to Paul McRae who served in this House for many years. Paul, as you know, was a member from Thunder Bay—Atikokan, a member of our northern Ontario caucus for a number of years.

As the hon. member from Winnipeg has just said, Paul liked to be involved in more global issues and issues that went beyond his own constituency. I think we all recognize that and it was especially refreshing because sometimes we do tend to get bogged down in all the nitty-gritty and the problems of our own constituency.

His wife Yvonne was from Manitoulin Island originally in my constituency and Paul actually taught school in Mindemoya. Paul had a great interest in the wide scope of issues of northern Ontario and of the country. When he left the House of Commons he served in the CRTC for a number of years. He always had that ability to put forward an alternative view. He did not always agree with the majority and that was very refreshing in the House of Commons. Some of those in the cabinet on the government side back in those days may not have found it as refreshing, but he had that special ability to look at the alternative view.

I want to join with members of the House in paying tribute to Paul and extending our condolences to his wife Yvonne and to his son David and his family.

Mr. Speaker: I do not usually do this, but I knew Paul McRae very well. I have been much affected, as I think members on both sides of the House have been, with the comments that have been made concerning our colleague. I found that Paul McCrae was one of the most idealistic men I ever knew and he had no apologies for it. He was not always easy to get along with, I suppose, because he reminded us of the distinction between right and wrong.

I remember once when the government of the day felt it had to take very strong measures with respect to energy resources and conservation. The then minister was the Hon. Donald Macdonald. I notice my colleague, the Hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who, like so many of us, was elected at the same time many years ago, is smiling because he probably remembers this.

There was a section in the act which gave Draconian measures to the government with respect to overriding any environmental laws, whether at the municipal or provincial level. I knew that Paul was deeply concerned about that and deeply concerned as to whether it was necessary. He and I worked together. I was a member of the opposition and a brand new member of the House. He arranged a meeting with himself, myself and the Hon. Donald Macdonald and officials. Very quietly he set out the reasons why he felt that particular section of the bill was not necessary. What is more, he pointed out that it went in a bad direction.

The Hon. Donald Macdonald listened. He and his officials discussed the matter further with Paul and myself and in one day the department came back, led by the minister, and said it agreed and would change it.

Sometimes people say that politicians do not make any difference. The right kind of politicians do make a difference.

That is just one story and there are others.

He made a difference and he was our friend and I am deeply conscious of the fact that he made a contribution to Canada which was important and a long way from being ordinary.

I hope his family will accept our condolences and our remarks of respect and affection for a very fine man.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PATENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canada's seniors need effective and affordable medicines. There are critics who do not want Canada to give the same protection to pharmaceutical patents as every other advanced industrial country.

They are not interested in attracting new investment or creating new jobs in this country. They do not want a strong and innovative pharmaceutical industry to grow on Canadian soil. They have used fear in their campaign against Bill C-91. They have attempted to frighten senior citizens with tales of spiralling drug costs and a collapse of the health care system in this country should the legislation be passed.

I think it is time to put an end to all this fear-mongering. Let us look at the facts. First, all pharmaceutical products account for only a small percentage of total health care costs in this country. Second, patented drugs account for less than half the costs of these pharmaceutical products or about 3 per cent of all Canadian health care costs at the retail level. Third, the net effect of the legislation will be to extend patent protection for an average of only about three years. The best estimates currently available suggest that this legislation will have no near-term impact on patented drug costs. Over the longer term, that is by the end of the decade, it is estimated that the additional costs incurred under this new policy will represent about 2 per cent of the value of purchases of prescription and behind-the-counter drugs by pharmacies and hospitals.

Indeed, the cumulative total increased cost of purchases of patented drugs by pharmacies and hospitals due to the elimination of compulsory licensing as a result of Bill C-91 over the next four-year period is estimated to be about $1 per Canadian per year or less than one-twentieth of one per cent of the total health care bill in Canada. That is hardly enough to bring down the Canadian health care system.

Let us not forget it is the ability to develop new and more effective medicines and treatments that is the best hope for keeping health care costs in line.

Research has shown that new drug treatments can actually save on over-all health care costs by reducing the need for far more expensive treatments involving surgery or hospitalization.

Bill C-91 is good for Canada's seniors and it is good for all Canadians. It will keep the cost of patented medicines in line. It will encourage the search for new and more effective medicines. It will attract investment and create jobs in the knowledge-intensive industrial sector.

Bill C-91 is a balanced piece of legislation that will ensure that effective medicines remain available to all Canadians who need them. It therefore deserves the support of the members of this House and a speedy passage through Parliament.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, this government which has now been in power for eight years has reached many lows, but with Bill C-91 that is now before us, this government has reached, yes, yet again, another very, very low in its administration of this country in the last eight years.

Bill C-91 has been worsened by the government moving time allocation, a means of closure. Here we have an important bill that is going to affect our elderly people, our seniors, taxpayers, insurance plans of one kind or another in all the provinces of the country and yet this government has the unmitigated gall, the nerve to move closure after having only a few hours of debate. I consider this a shameful and dastardly act.

This kind of major legislation affects hundreds of thousands of people, especially the elderly and of course all taxpayers in the country, reaching millions of people. I really do not think that this government has the mandate to move this kind of legislation. It simply does not have the mandate. Here is a government that is now beginning its fifth year in office. We have a government that has been down in the polls at 15 per cent, 16 per cent and 17 per cent for more than two years and yet this government believes, or at least it is pretending to believe, that it has the right and the mandate to bring in and to impose this kind of legislation on Canadians and again imposing it on elderly people, some of whom are the most vulnerable in our country. I say that this government does not have the mandate to bring forward this kind of legislation. If it had any decency whatsoever it would hold back this kind of legislation until after the next election so that the people of Canada could offer some comment.

But, no. This government shows again its arrogance and the fact that it is totally and completely out of touch with the Canadian people. It also shows that these people who constitute the current government will do anything to satisfy their big business friends, especially their big business friends from the United States. I know darn well that Canadians are not supporting them on this issue. Canadians do not support them.

It is the height of arrogance for the government to bring forward this kind of legislation so late in the day, when it is entering its fifth year. Instead of debating issues of this kind in the House, we should be out on the hustings in the midst of an election campaign.

Let us point out that we have model legislation that goes back over 20 years in this country, going back to the late 1960s. We have, under our compulsory licensing system, perhaps one of the most advanced forms of controlling prices of any country in the world and yet this government is prepared to tear that down.

We know, for example, that if we compare our prices of drugs with prices in the United States that we are enjoying a huge advantage. If you compare prices of brand name drugs in the United States with the prices of brand name drugs in Canada, we are talking savings on this side of the border in excess of 30 per cent. However, if you take into account our generic prices, if you compare brand name prices in the United States with prices of generic drugs in Canada, you are not talking savings on this side of the border of 30 per cent or 40 per cent or 50 per cent. You are now talking savings of 60 per cent. This government is prepared to throw that all away.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the Eastman commission in 1983 showed that since the inception of compulsory licensing between the late 1960s and the early 1980s Canadian taxpayers, because of compulsory licensing, saved well over $200 million. We are not talking 1990s prices, we are talking 1960s prices and 1970s prices. Canadians saved well over $200 million. We are talking in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a billion dollars. That is what this government wants to throw away. I do not think Canadians want that thrown away at all, but this government does.

For a government to bring in this kind of legislation it has to have some credibility because it is taking a major step. People have to believe that the government is doing the right thing. The people of Canada will only believe if the government has some kind of track record. Sadly, this government has a terrible track record when it comes to keeping promises. It has talked for eight years about just getting government out of the way, leaving it to the big boys, leaving it to the marketplace. Out of that process, out of that neo-conservative economics, the goods would just flow down on us from heaven. Some people refer to it as the trickle down theory.

Well, it has not worked. We have gone from bad to worse. The trickle down theory does not work. Neo-conservatism does not work. We have looked at Thatcherism in England and it is wanting. We have looked at the United States and what has happened under Reagan. Look what happened under Bush. It went from bad to worse. The United States of America went from the greatest creditor nation to the greatest debtor nation in a mere eight years of Reaganomics.

Yet, this is what the government is saying. Despite all the woes and despite all the failures of neo-conservative economics, we want more. Just get the government out of the road and leave it to the big boys, in this case to those big pharmaceutical companies. Happy days are going to be here again. We know that is not the truth. That is a crock.

The government said some time ago that it was not going to cost a lot of extra money. After all, we were going to get some new research and new development and we would get jobs and any little increase in the prices of drugs would be offset by this renewed economic activity, especially in the province of Quebec. The cost was going to be about $29 million or something like that. Just yesterday we got an estimate from The New York Times that the cost is not going to be $29 million; it is going to be in the neighbourhood of $500 million.

The headline in The Globe and Mail states: "Drug law cost set in the billions". Here is the headline from The Ottawa Citizen of today: "A bitter pill. Drug bill will cost Canadians an extra $550 million by the year 2000". Can you imagine? Yet, we are supposed to swallow this pill because it is good for the friends of the Progressive Conservative Government of Canada.

There is a higher calling than the Conservative Party of Canada. That higher calling is the country and the people of Canada and they do not want this Bill C-91 because they do not want to pay higher drug costs, which is exactly what is going to happen if Bill C-91 is passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to point out that no applause is allowed from the gallery.

[English]

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Domestic Worker Program; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Unemployment; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Softwood Lumber; the hon. member for Burin—St. George's—Westray Coal Mine; and the hon. member for York West—Drug abuse.

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House today on second reading of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act.

The government tabled its bill in the House on June 23, and on September 17, a little over two months ago, the debate started on second reading. It is now time to continue the process of adopting this important bill and give our country legislation that is in line with the latest patent legislation for pharmaceutical products and reflects the most advanced provisions in this field.

Today I simply want to give an overview of a bill with which hon. members are already familiar. There are certain basic questions I will try to answer: What kind of amendments are we proposing to the Patent Act? What will be the fundamental advantages of this new legislation? Will the Canadian public also benefit as a result of these amendments? How will these amendments put us in a better position to meet current challenges in the pharmaceutical industry, on Canadian and global markets?

Reasons for reinforcing the Patent Act include promoting investment in an advanced technology industry and making Canada more competitive on the international scene in a sector where competition is intense.

By eliminating compulsory licensing, Canada will bring its patent system more in line with that of its main trading partners. From now on, patent holders will be guaranteed exclusive protection on the market until the patent expires, in other words, for a period of 20 years. This is the same period granted patent holders in all other economic sectors.

The proposed legislation will encourage Canadians to develop new drugs in Canada, with the added benefit of reducing health care costs in the long term. I may recall that innovators, universities and research institutes have discovered or developed several new drugs in this country, including treatments for cancer, Parkinson's disease and diabetes.

Last year, the innovative sector in the pharmaceutical industry spent $84 million on research in universities and hospitals. In a region like the riding I represent, for instance, the presence of a university is a major economic factor. Universities contribute to the intellectual, social and economic development of a region.

Since 1987, the last time the government improved patent protection for brand-name drugs, the industry, which has already nearly 18,000 employees, created 2,400 new and highly specialized jobs for Canadian scientists and researchers.

In 1987, the innovative sector promised to double its R and D-sales ratio by 1996 if the government reinforced patent protection. By 1991, the industry had practically reached that objective, five years ahead of schedule, and also announced that it would make additional investments.

Since the government announced last January that it would eliminate compulsory licensing, innovative companies indicated their intention of investing an additional $500 million in this country; $90 million worth of additional projects were announced, to be directed to the regions away from central Canada between 1992 and 1996.

In Canada, more than 26 per cent of research and development consists of basic research on pharmaceutical products. This percentage represents a ratio comparable with the situation in other industrialized countries. Between 1987 and 1991, the innovative sector spent about $1.1 billion on research and development. Between 1988 and 1991, investment in basic research rose from $30.3 million to $94.2 million.

On June 19, 1992, Statistics Canada announced that between 1988 and 1992, the pharmaceutical industry recorded the highest growth rate—113 per cent—of all Canadian industries for R and D spending.

Major international innovators have already decided to grant new exclusive contracts to their Canadian plants. New spending on research and development, new scientific and technical jobs, spin-offs for other sectors and increased export sales are many factors that can be expected to improve Canada's competitive position on the international scene.

With the elimination of compulsory licensing, costs of purchases by pharmacies and hospitals of prescription and behind-the-counter drugs should not increase during the first year. Future increases should not exceed 2 per cent of purchase costs by the year 2000. On the other hand, we must stress this point. The increase in research leading to the development of new and more effective drugs could very well reduce health care costs in Canada, if they are combined with better management practices. The federal and provincial health departments have agreed on this issue and they are committed to working together toward that goal.

The generic drug industry, which employs some 2,300 people in Canada, will have to put up with a waiting period of about three years. But under the licences issued before December 20, 1991, generic drug companies will be allowed to carry on their activities and market their products. They will also be allowed to start developing a product before the patent expires. This will reduce the delay in introducing these products on the market. In proceeding in this fashion, the government creates a climate for generic drug companies similar to the one that exists in the other industrialized countries.

Bill C-91 also gives new powers to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, which was set up in 1987. The objective is to enable the board to make sure that the prices of new and existing patented drugs are not excessive.

These new powers will enable the board to influence more effectively the entry level pricing of new patented drugs. They will allow the board to order lower prices or to impose fines to compensate for previous prices deemed too high, thus deterring companies from abusive pricing. Finally, these new powers will give the orders issued by the board the same authority that a Federal Court order has. It must be said that since it was created, the board has been successful in keeping increases in the prices of patented drugs below the increases in the Consumer Price Index.

In proposing these amendments to the Patent Act, the Government of Canada is making its legislation match that of the other countries, which is a good thing. It promotes investments in our country and encourages companies to increase their R & D activities. It also creates new jobs for scientists and technicians, while ensuring that all Canadians can obtain at reasonable prices the patented drugs they need.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, this is outrageous legislation for two reasons. First, it furthers the attack, which was mentioned earlier, coming from a neo-conservative ideology on the Canadian structure of social support and social justice at the behest of foreign, alien standards for community economic and social conduct. This is the response to the free trade agreement and NAFTA. Second, it is an attack on democracy.

I expected to be able to speak for 20 minutes, but I cannot because this government once more has abused democracy.

This is contentious legislation. We are going to hear statistics bandied about in these chambers that are in complete contradiction of one another. For no other reason than that, this government should not have imposed limits on this debate.

We also know that this government is not only going to limit debate in this Chamber, it is going to make sure that nobody will have an adequate chance to know what it is doing and therefore will not have an adequate chance to have their voices heard.

This is about the abandonment of compulsory licensing. Very briefly we ought to say what that is all about. Compulsory licensing was introduced in 1969 at a time when Canadian drug prices were the highest in the world. It was said that patented drugs must be licensed for manufacture by generic companies, but not for nothing.

This government would have you believe that the generic companies were stealing the drugs, but in fact, just as a singer or a musician or a composer is paid royalties on their intellectual property, so are the patented drug manufacturers paid a royalty on those drugs. They profited by virtue of the existence of generics to a significant degree, just as Canadians profited by having an arrangement that ensured that our health care in this country would be affordable.

That is one thing the Americans do not have and it is one thing the Americans do not want us to have. The next step will not be another Bill C-22 or Bill C-91, it will be to eliminate any provisions that would limit the price of drugs. Perhaps when they have us hooked to another free trade deal, we will ban medicare altogether.

When Bill C-22 was introduced in 1987 we were told that there would be vast increases in research investment; that there would be vast increases in the number of jobs and that drug prices would not go up.

What happened? We are going to hear the government people saying that the amount of money or the percentage of sales devoted to research and development by members of the PMAC went from about 5 per cent to a little over 9.5 per cent in the interval, between 1987 and now.

Nobody mentions the fact that between 1980 and 1983, the percentage of sales invested in R and D doubled. It doubled without Bill C-22, it also doubled without Bill C-91.

Nobody on that side mentions that after 1985, in preparation for the introduction of Bill C-22, the drug companies managed to diminish the proportion of their sales invested in research to the lowest level in this decade in order to say afterward that they had increased their investments in R and D.

The patent and drug manufacturers do not put as much into research as do the generic manufacturers and 9.7 per cent of sales is a long way from the 16 per cent of sales which is invested in R and D in the United States. The amount that goes into basic research in Canada is still on a percentage basis only half what goes in down in the United States. The R and D that goes on in Canada is in the vast majority still clinical testing.

We do not have and are unlikely to have a patent drug industry that puts huge amounts of money into research and development so that management, research and development, production and sales are centred in Canada.

They told us that they were going to increase the number of scientific and highly-trained technical jobs by 3,000. Here one finds oneself immersed in a morass of statistics. According to the drug companies' statistics, 1,386 new jobs were produced. Two-thirds of those jobs were in administration and in sales. What is irreconcilable with that is the evidence gleaned from other sources which indicates that 850 production jobs were lost in the drug industry in which we are supposed to have 3,000 new jobs for scientists and technicians. It did not happen.

With respect to the promise that the prices of drugs would not go up, well, we know the evidence. We know that 40 per cent of new drugs were beyond the guidelines imposed by the Canadian Drug Prices Review Board. We know that the prices of drugs, after the passage of Bill C-22, exceeded the average increase in the CPI by over 2 per cent, 6.2 per cent as compared to 4.4 per cent for CPI.

We know from statistics prepared in Ontario and British Columbia by Green Shield that there have been massive increases in the price of drugs.

I should add this additional little piece of information. The industry promised that it would increase the amount of research investment in R and D by $1.4 billion over the level expected by the trend lines without Bill C-22, if you can understand what I am saying.

They have come nowhere near that, but what we have to understand is that the drug companies, even if they had put in that so-called $1.4 billion, would have spent nowhere near that amount. Something that has not been pointed out in this Chamber before is that in the province of Quebec, for every dollar the drug companies brag about putting into R and D, they in fact only invest 30 cents. Seventy cents of that dollar came from the Quebec government or the federal government.

In fact, anywhere in the United States the drug companies have to put 65 per cent of that dollar in. Nowhere in Canada do the drug companies have to put any more than half what they claim to put into R and D.

Now we have Bill C-91. Bill C-91 will eliminate compulsory licensing. It will provide the benefits of complete patent protection for 20 years for companies that do not even work their patent in Canada, that do nothing with respect to all those promises in Canada.

Furthermore, it is retroactive. It requires no production of fine chemicals in Canada. It is not good. Members sit over there and tell us that it is not going to cost Canadians any more for drugs. The government's own spokespersons say that by the turn of the century the budget for drugs in this country will be increased by $550 million per year.

Other statistics indicate that almost as soon as this legislation is passed, the cost to this nation for these patented drugs will increase by $500 million, and by the turn of the century, $1 billion more will be spent for drugs because of this bill than is being spent now.

This is offensive legislation introduced by a government that has offended the whole country. It should be withdrawn. If there are any Conservatives who give a damn about Canadians, they should stand up and say: "No more. This country has had enough of the wreckage that this government has imposed on Canada and Canadians, and on what Canada stands for". This bill should be defeated by true Canadians.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member opposite and other hon. members speaking with such great disrespect about this bill.

I am quite pleased and proud, frankly, to rise in support of this bill and to say, among other things, this is not just a bill about patent protection and about pharmaceuticals. It is a bill about economic development and I will get to that in a moment.

We have been focusing in detail on the provisions of Bill C-91 and it has been a useful and a necessary exercise. This is complex legislation, as it must be, to achieve the balance we need. It is also very important as we do so that we do not lose sight of some of the basic aims and principles which underlie this legislation. I would like to touch on these now.

First of all, we want to strengthen patent protection for brand name pharmaceutical products. We want to eliminate compulsory licensing and we will be the last major industrial country to do so. We want to provide controls in pricing of both new and existing patented drug products. We want to introduce the principle of innovation and discovery and to demonstrate that it will bring value both in terms of costs and cures and in terms of medical treatment more assuredly than any protection process.

I would like to quote Dr. David Stewart. I am sure this is probably repetitious, but it bears repetition. He says:

> Brand name companies develop new medications at tremendous expense. It now takes between $100–$250 million to develop a new drug and bring it to market. For every drug that is successfully marketed, there are large numbers of others that prove unworthy of further interest part way through their development.
> The new drugs that do make it to market save lives and alleviate suffering. In the process of doing this, they can save society and individuals very large amounts of money—they are highly cost effective.

They bring into the realm of knowledge products that otherwise would not ever have been available. This debate is about innovation and its relationship to Canada's future. It is also about the special importance of new knowledge and new understanding in a particular field, modern health and medicine. Where pharmaceutical research is concerned, humanity simply does not have the option of staying put.

Scientific exploration has allowed us to defeat many diseases and to alleviate much suffering which has burdened past generations, but many deadly scourges such as cancer, AIDS and so on remain unconquered and present tremendous challenges to us to conquer.

My family in recent months has had experience with heart disease. It has been very surprising and gratifying to me to realize that just in recent years there have been advances in drug technology that, if the patient can get to the hospital in time, frankly save lives which otherwise would not have been possible. As Dr. Richard Gallop, executive director of the Ontario Heart and Stroke Foundation said:

> While we are concerned about the question of the cost of drugs, we nevertheless recognize that considerable savings have been achieved in the cardiac area, in recent years, because of the break–through in drug technology. This has resulted in a substantial lowering of death and disability from heart disease and stroke.

I can speak with firsthand family experience that that is so. Therefore, it is absolutely necessary to encourage this work of discovery.

The fact is that strong, innovative pharmaceutical industries do not grow full–fledged out of the ground. They rise from the ground up, one laboratory after another, until clusters form and eventually a strong sector emerges.

Between 1988 and 1991 basic pharmaceutical research, and let me underline basic research, has more than tripled; from about $30.2 million to $94.2 million. Today the innovative pharmaceutical sector leads all others in the funding of medical research.

There is another basic principle involved here and it is that protection for the innovator and the developer is consistent with consumer interest in knowledge–based industries. What does the record show? Five years ago the opposition predicted that increased protection of patents through Bill C–22 would produce an explosive increase in the price of drugs. It did not happen. Over those five years, according to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, the average rate of increase in the price of patented drugs was less than 3 per cent a year. That was lower than the rate of inflation for the basket of goods and services covered by the Consumer Price Index and lower than the rate of inflation.

This debate is also about staying in step with the times. It is about adapting our policies and our laws to match changing needs and priorities. This applies with particular force to the matter of compulsory licensing. Members on the other side have sought to move this argument back 30 years and to base their arguments on the priorities and challenges of that period.

In the late 1960s there was legitimate concern about the lack of competition in Canada's pharmaceutical industry. Compulsory licensing was introduced at that time to make it possible for a generic industry to get started in Canada. It was like planting and nursing a new tree. Compulsory licensing was needed to support the industry in its early growth. That was close to a quarter of a century ago and today we have an established generic industry in Canada and it is a strong industry.

Our innovative patented medicine industry is also well established and growing. It employs 18,000 people now while the generic industry employs 2,600 people. What is significant is that in the five years since 1987 when Bill C–22 was introduced, the patented medicine industry has grown by 2,400 jobs or as much as the total generic industry as it exists today.

Study after study has come to the same conclusion: Our economic future depends on innovation and the encouragement of innovation. As the steering group on prosperity says: "We need to invent our future". To do that we have to think long term. We have to put in place the foundations for sustained growth and prosperity.

A debate about patented drugs today really is about the economy. Bill C–91 is a positive and powerful thrust pointing toward economic growth and it is one that we should all be supporting. This legislation will help us to build a strong, new sector of innovation into the Canadian economy. It will contribute to our competitiveness, it will contribute to jobs, to opportunity and to the improvement of our standards of living.

Throughout the world, pharmaceutical companies are investing huge amounts in research and development. In today's global market that money can go anywhere. By making the climate friendlier to innovation, we can ensure that much of it comes right here to Canada.

We need to move forward decisively on the economy and we need to move forward decisively on Bill C–91. For those reasons and for its great contribution to our medical research and our scientific knowledge, I urge the early passage of this bill with the support of all members of this House.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate today. However, it is not pleasing to look at Bill C–91, combined with Bill C–22, which is leading us down the path of higher drug prices. It is very unfortunate for the Canadian consumer and the Canadian senior citizen on a fixed income is going to lose more dollars out of their pockets.

The issue of patent protection for prescription drugs is quite old, dating back to the 1960s. In 1967 the member for Vancouver Quadra, then the Liberal minister of consumer affairs, brought in a system of compulsory licensing to protect the Canadian consumer. That system remained in effect for 20 years. During that period people like senior citizens benefited from the development of the generic drug industry that lowered the cost of many medications.

The system was fair. It helped consumers through lower prices, it allowed generic manufacturers to grow and employ over 2,500 Canadians and it still allowed the multinational drug companies to thrive in terms of market share and profitability.

Like the old saying goes, all good things come to an end. The balance system ended in 1987 when the Conservatives forced through Bill C–22. Do not worry, the government said, it will not hurt a bit; we will create lots of new research and development jobs for our young Canadian scientists. Sadly, this is just another Tory promise to be broken.

Let us look at the cost of prescription drugs. The Conservatives promised that the price increases for drugs would not exceed the rate of inflation. The government set up the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board to review and enforce the regulations and price increases. However, the government's performance in this area was very poor.

The review board is just a toothless tiger, unable to force the multinationals to follow the rules. In its fourth report to Parliament the chairman of the review board said, and I quote: "The high number of prices out of compliance (that is breaking the rules) suggests either that some patentees follow a strategy of setting high introductory drug prices so as to benefit from the temporary gain, or that they resist the board's guidelines".

The government's hand–picked chairman is admitting that the major drug companies are either deliberately gouging Canadian consumers or they are deliberately ignoring the rules completely.

In August of this year the NDP government of Bob Rae made drastic cuts to the Ontario Drug Benefit Plan. The cost of running the program had increased an average of 18 per cent over the last 10 years, so the NDP dropped the knife. I wonder if Bob Rae has figured out how a senior scraping by on a fixed income is going to come up with the extra dollars to pay for drugs that are not covered by the drug plan.

They could buy extended health insurance to cover the cost of prescription drugs. Green Shield, one of the largest operators of drug plans, prepared a report for its clients explaining why its premiums have been increasing so much. In its report Green Shield said: "The average cost of a prescription claim has risen at a rate in excess of

That is not all the company report had to say. According to Green Shield the average cost per claim for new drugs introduced between 1988 and 1991 was more than double the average for drugs introduced before 1988. The key question through all of this is who is going to pay. Why are drug prices going through the roof and what can seniors and the general public expect in the future? For this question the president and CEO of Green Shield had to say: "It is reasonable to suggest that any further extensions to patent life will result in continued high level of increase in drug costs".

During the debate on Bill C-22 seniors groups and consumer advocates told the government that prices would increase if patent protection was extended. Now we have proof that the government did not know what it was getting into. Instead of admitting that Bill C-22 was one more of its mistakes, the government is pushing ahead with extending patent protection even further. The government is turning its back on the seniors and is walking down the garden path to higher drug prices.

The promise the government made in 1987 has not been fulfilled. While spending for research and development has increased, much of it has gone toward clinical testing of drugs and not for the leading-edge research for new beneficial medications. Despite promises of new jobs, the multinational drug companies have actually cut back on staff.

I think it is quite unfortunate when the chairperson of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board in its report to Parliament indicated that drug prices have increased not below the rate of inflation, but well above the rate of inflation. For example, Green Shield increased by 11.4 per cent, Ontario Drug Benefit Plan by 13.2 per cent and Manitoba health insurance by 12.3 per cent. He also indicated that drug companies are totally ignoring the rules they agreed to five years ago. Unfortunately, there is no way to force them to follow the rules.

The people who are really getting walloped in this situation are the people on fixed income, the seniors of this country. One might say that seniors are only 11 per cent of the population, but they consume about 40 per cent of the drugs. What we are doing is taking and taking from the senior citizens. They have no recourse. We tell them to buy more medical plans. The medical plans are going up in price. They are caught. Most likely some of the seniors unfortunately, the people who have made this nation what it is for you and me, are possibly caught in the situation that they cannot pay for the drug plan and when it comes time to get the drug, they just have to do without.

I call on the government to show some compassion, look at Bill C-91, think of the Canadian people and withdraw this legislation.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to participating in this debate to correct some of the misinformation the previous speaker has just put on the record.

I will just mention a couple of figures that come to mind for example. He talked about an 11 per cent increase according to the Green Shield plan in drug prices. What he failed to mention was that includes all drugs, patented and non-patented. What he failed to mention is that patented drugs, which is what Bill C-91 deals with, represent 20 to 25 per cent of the total drugs. He fails to mention that prices for patented drugs over the last four years have increased less than the rate of inflation, less than the CPI, that the increases he is talking about are for the non-patented drugs which are not affected in any way, shape or form.

The concern about price rises in non-patented drugs lies totally within provincial jurisdiction. If the hon. member truly wanted to contribute to the understanding of Canadians, he would not confuse the two in the way he has done.

He talked about the increase in cost to the drug plan of the province of Ontario, for example. He fails to mention that is the total drugs prescribed within that plan including non-patented as well as patented.

He failed to take into account the number of people and the number of prescriptions. He failed to mention, as he could have, that the average senior citizen gets some 26 prescriptions per year in this country. There are many, many duplicates. Go into the medicine chests of a lot of senior citizens and you will see a lot of prescriptions. Because of their age they do not feel well, they see doctor, and they get prescriptions.

The mere expedient of having a central registry so that physicians or pharmacists could check to see whether in fact this is duplication would save millions. In fact, reducing by one prescription per senior citizen would save more money than even the worst assumption in terms of what Bill C-91 would take into account. It is that kind of misinformation that makes it very difficult for the public to understand.

Figure three in the March 19, 1992 report of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board shows very clearly in pictorial form since the introduction of Bill C-22 the prices of patented medicines—not all medicines, just patented because that is the only thing affected by this bill—rose less than the cost of inflation. In constant terms in fact the prices went down. They went down. That cannot be denied. It is incredible to me that that simple fact shown visually is ignored or distorted by opponents to this bill.

Look at the principle involved. The principle is very simple. It is a long-established principle. Creators have a right to exploit their creations. In terms of inventions the convention around the world is 17 to 20 years of exclusive right to market, to sell, to produce that which you invent and get the rewards for it. It is an absolutely essential ingredient in terms of promoting research, invention, creation.

Let me give an analogy. One of the significant costs of education is in textbooks, books for libraries, books for students. Those books are all copyrighted. The authors and the publishers have a copyright. You cannot duplicate the books. It is against the law. Why do we not save the education system money by having compulsory licensing of textbooks so that we could have generic copies? If there is a good book written, rather than paying the full price, we would allow somebody to produce a generic copy for the benefit of students and educational institutions. It would save hundreds of millions of dollars.

Who would support that in this House? Nobody. That is an affront to the author. It is an affront to the creative skills of the author. We recognize that the author has the right to—

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Bring in the bill.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member from the New Democratic Party says bring in the bill. He would have generic copies of textbooks. That is an interesting policy. Maybe the NDP would like to propose that we should have a debate on that.

The reality is that in all modern societies we recognize something called intellectual property. If you create the product of your mind, just as the product of your hands is yours, it is immoral for governments to come along and say that the product of your mind belongs to the common good because what that does is it turns off minds.

In terms of the pharmaceutical industry what we had prior to Bill C-22 was the situation where it simply did not make sense to do research in Canada because you spent $150 million to $200 million to develop a new drug. You spend that money, you create a new drug. If it has any market at all, it is because it helps people with their illnesses. And then you say: "But you, the creator, do not have the exclusive right to enjoy the fruits of invention; somebody else will enjoy them".

Then what happens is that there is not much research in Canada. Indeed, prior to 1987 pharmaceutical companies operating in Canada spent about 6 per cent of their total sales on research versus a world average of 10, 11 or 12 per cent, in that order. We had about half the research.

Mr. Milliken: Where is it? Tell us where.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member from Kingston should listen rather than heckle from his seat.

What has happened now is that the pharmaceutical industry said to us in 1987 that if we passed Bill C-22 it would raise the level of R and D in Canada to international levels by 1996, 10 per cent by 1996. Well, what happened in 1991? It was 9.7 per cent. This year it has already exceeded what had been committed to by 1996. Why? Because once you provide some protection for the fruits of research you get research. Lo and behold, Canadian universities and medical establishments, Canadian laboratories have shown that they are very good. We have some excellent people. Given the opportunity to pursue research and the opportunity to enjoy the fruits of that research, Canadians have responded.

The November 10 issue of The Globe and Mail on the report on health and pharmaceuticals says: "Robust industry defies sick economy". There are several pages about how robust the pharmaceutical industry is in Canada as a result of Bill C-22. What do we have? We have investments in research and development near international levels finally. We have a robust industry employing people and growing.

I will never forget the young man who stopped me on a street in Montreal and said: "Thank you, Mr. Andre. I have been working in California since graduating with my Ph.D. in biochemistry. As a result of Bill C-22 I have been able to come back to Canada and work in my home country doing research and development". The member from the New Democratic Party over there chuckles about this. He thinks it is pretty funny that we provide an environment for Canadian scientists to work in Canada.

What was said about Bill C-22? Let me read you some quotes on Bill C-22, one by the now NDP leader, but not then: "Estimates suggest that it will double or even triple the cost of prescription drugs in the country". What happened? They actually went down in real terms. I think it was the member for Essex—Windsor: "The bill will bring Canada dramatically higher drug prices and very little research". Wrong on both counts. More research, lower prices. What did the then leader of the Liberal Party say? "Consumers could wind up paying billions more under C-22." Wrong, dead wrong.

Mr. Milliken: Where are the facts on this? Who says so?

Mr. Andre: The facts say so. The hon. member from Kingston can read. He should read the report and look at the chart.

Mr. Milliken: It went up 4 per cent a year.

Mr. Andre: And inflation was more than that. The hon. member should know.

There was Ed Broadbent who said that already prices for drugs were going up four times the rate of inflation. Then there was that great journalist, Don McGillivray, who said: "The policy will not cause prices to rise, said Harvie Andre. He must have been talking for the benefit of the people who believe in the tooth fairy".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Time is running out and I invite the hon. speaker to conclude.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by reading a quote from an article in The Ottawa Citizen of October 6 because I think it explains why we are doing it: "Canada risks becoming a mere bystander in the global race for new drugs and treatments unless the government passes its controversial drug patent law, a group of researchers warned Monday. The real losers are going to be Canadians in need of innovative medical treatment, said Dr. Howard Dickson, chairman of the Coalition for Biomedical and Health Research and associate dean of research at Dalhousie University's faculty of medicine". It goes on to say: "The coalition is urging the passage of C-91".

The reality is that the scientists of this country want us to pass this bill because it is right. Those who understand what research and intellectual property is about want us to pass it because it is right. Those who look fairly at the success of Bill C-22 recognize that this is a move in the right direction that will produce more research, better drugs for Canadians, more jobs for Canadians, and in fact is the kind of legislation that any intelligent government would pass.

That is why I am pleased to support it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on Bill C-91. I want to address three issues: compulsory licensing, research and development in jobs and the cost of pharmaceutical drugs. First of all, I want to assure my hon. colleagues that I have in fact looked at the research and I am going to try to make a case which I think is fair.

We have to understand that compulsory licensing was brought in because the prices of pharmaceuticals in Canada were really much higher than in most countries of the world. Because it was difficult to try to make these medications available to our population, there was a different way to do it. In fact it was the right hon. member for Vancouver—Quadra who amended the Patent Act so that holders of drug patents no longer had a monopoly on the production and the bill established, as I was indicating, a system of compulsory licensing whereby generic drug companies could produce a patent drug by receiving the compulsory licence and paying the licence holder a royalty fee.

That was a step forward because this practice increased competition in the industry and lowered the aggregate price of drugs sold in Canada. It also had the effect of helping keep medicare and health costs stable. That has been demonstrated in a number of studies.

I want to point out a couple of studies that have dealt with that. For example, the report of the inquiry into the pharmaceutical industry, the Eastman report, stated that by 1983 the multinationals had lost only 3.1 per cent of the Canadian market to generic competition and the profit levels of the multinational companies in Canada were higher than in most well developed countries of the world.

It goes to show that in spite of these changes, that permitted keeping the cost down and therefore gave more access to Canadians generally and it did not have a large a large debilitating effect on the patent drug industry.

At the same time, the system of compulsory licensing brought the price of drugs in Canada under control. Here is where Eastman reports again. The system of compulsory licensing in Canada saved Canadian consumers $211 million.

It has also created a generic drug industry that employs over 2,500 people and does business in excess of $400 million. That is in comparison to multinationals which employ about 17,000 people and have a business of $4 billion, which is significantly larger.

I think most people would agree that in 1984 Canada was well served by a policy of compulsory licensing and medical drug patents. Why is it that the government decided to offer more protection? Why did it offer a monopoly if you wish to the multinationals? Why, when it was working perfectly well?

Since the passage of that infamous bill in 1987, Bill C-22, Canadians have become clearly aware that the board's methodology in terms of looking at prices is flawed. The Patent Medicine Prices Review Board only monitors the price of old drugs already on the market. It does very little to address the issue of new products coming on the market.

I want to quote that the real increase in the cost of drugs on the market has risen well over the rate of inflation. I want to point out as well that the following Canadian insurance plans have reported substantial increases in the prices of drugs since 1987: The Ontario government drug plan reports a 13.2 per cent increase; the Green Shield health insurance company reports an 11.4 per cent increase; the Manitoba health insurance plan has reported a 12.3 per cent increase. Now the government wants to offer less protection to consumers.

The fourth annual report of the PMPRB, which is a government board, ending December 31, 1991, admits that new drugs on the market have risen substantially since 1987. I want to quote from that report. "Even though price increases on existing drugs have been below inflation, the cost to consumers, third party insurers, and provincial drug plans have increased at a faster rate, chiefly because of the substitution of new drugs for those previously prescribed."

I could go on. I shall quote another study. It is a study prepared by the Department of Industry, Science and Technology entitled The Impact of Pharmaceutical Company-sponsored Basic Research at Canadian Universities. The report states: "In addressing the kinds of research and the amount that has taken place, Canadian medical schools have found that Bill C-22 has had a minimal impact on basic research and development in Canada".

This Bill C-22 that in essence destroyed compulsory licensing not only contributed to the increase in cost for medication, much of this medication going to seniors obviously and those people who are ill more than the average population, but contributed very little to research and development in this country.

This government board, the PMPRB, report said: "In relationship to the amount of activity in research and development, the location of significant research in the pharmaceutical industry is principally determined by the location of the parent firm's headquarters". There is proof that this bill is not going to do anything to generate significant additional research.

Further, in an OECD report entitled Multinational Enterprise: Governments and Technology the pharmaceutical industry states that whenever governments have tried to encourage pharmaceutical innovation in countries where it only exists at low levels—such as the case in Canada—the results have been disappointing.

What proof do we need that this is not the right type of legislation? A report from the department of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who introduced this bill shows that there has been limited job gain, little growth in basic research and almost no capacity to produce the active ingredients of drugs in Canada.

There had been a prediction in 1987 by the government that 3,000 jobs would be created by 1996. Another study concludes that only 1,386 jobs were created between 1987 and 1990, and nearly half of those were in marketing and sales. Only a third was in research and development, the area that the government had targeted for job creation.

You could look even further at those in research and development and realize that those that were taking place were not the kinds of jobs that we wanted primarily, although they were important jobs.

We opposed the last government intervention in this sector. We continue to oppose it because we believe that there is absolutely and totally inadequate proof that this is good for Canada, that this is good for Canadians and particularly for those Canadians who will need most assistance.

When I talk about Canadians who will need assistance with drugs and medicine, I am of course referring mainly to seniors. Except in rare cases, the need for medical attention tends to increase as we grow older. I suggest it is unfortunate that legislation such as this be allowed to cause hardship to the elderly.

There are those who are sick often, sometimes over the course of several years, and who will require medicine during most of their lives. Costs are already prohibitive. We suggest, and there is evidence to back this up, that they will only go higher with this legislation. I find it is absolutely irresponsible on the part of this government to go ahead with this.

I want to stress once more the fact that there is no adequate proof whatsoever to the effect that this bill will generate as many new jobs as government members claimed it will. Even if that many jobs were created, it would not be in the area they targeted, i.e. primarily research and development.

Why then has government decided to go ahead?

[English]

I want to finish by stressing strongly that Bill C-91 will have very similar effects to the last bill, C-22. It will not, if it passes, create the number of jobs in the areas that it was indicated it would and it will not hold the cost down.

• (1630)

We have a number of really incredible studies which show that actually the contrary will occur. Therefore, with that kind of evidence and that kind of proof, I have no choice but to say no to Bill C-91 for those Canadians who will need medication and in particular the seniors and those who have need of medication because of their medical condition.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to say a few words on this bill.

Patent protection is something that is easy to attack but it is a very fundamental principle. In fact, when you read the history of the western world, it was only when we got into patent protection that gives to somebody who creates something new an exclusive period to use it and to profit from it that all sorts of people spent time and effort in writing books and developing products because of that patent protection. It led to an enormous creative energy that swept across the western world. We are benefiting from that today.

In the sixties the price of drugs started to go up. There is no doubt about that and governments around the world reacted in different ways. Virtually every other country in the world that acted at all acted in terms of a prices review board. But Canada did not act that way. The then government, which was a Liberal government, decided that it would abolish patent protection. In a way it seemed like a weird choice but that is in effect what it did. It immediately had an impact. It meant that there was less and less research being done in Canada, and why not?

If you were a scientist or were employing scientists and you wanted to develop a drug, would you put that money in Canada where you have a very limited protection? Or would you put it in Germany or Switzerland or Britain or France or the United States or any other number of countries in the world where you could get the patent protection for the period?

Of course you would put your money elsewhere and that is what started to happen. Just recently, we were faced with the loss of Connaught Laboratories Limited to a French company. That was an outflow of decisions that were taken years before because that is what we all learn as members. It takes many years for these things to come to fruition.

The company that developed insulin did so in this country. Had we kept the patent protection, we should have continued to be at the cutting edge. We lost out on Connaught Laboratories Limited and it is now owned by a French company.

In 1984 we proposed a remedy. It was Bill C–22. It was an enormous battle. The two opposition parties fought it tooth and nail. We stuck together as a caucus and got it through. As a result, even though it is just a short period of time, there are 2,400 people working that would not otherwise be working. One billion dollars has been spent on research and development since 1987. Once this bill goes through, we will have another $900 million of projects that are actually on the books and ready to move. We will have $84 million in research going to universities.

The point I want to make is that that bill was dramatically opposed by the opposition. We pushed it through and there are jobs. Those jobs would not have been created in the absence of it. Have any generic companies gone out of business? Not one. They are all here. Indeed, when you look at the generics, they have actually gone and made investments in the United States. If the generics are not being hurt and the prices of patented drugs have gone up by less than inflation then who is hurt? Nobody is hurt. We have 2,400 people working and we have over $1 billion in research.

A second bill that came along dealt with copyright. That too was opposed by both opposition parties but with less vigour. It went through. Again the principle is that if somebody writes something or creates something, they should be able to get some benefit from that for a period of exclusivity.

The third bill that came along was for microchip technology. We have 25 companies that build these microchips. They needed to have patent protection for the topography. This is how these microchips are designed. As you know, they are simply layers of silicone. The people that design these are really like people that design apartments, figuring out how the water pipes go and the electrical pipes cords are put up and all that type of stuff.

By the time we got around to that bill, both opposition parties voted for it because they finally realized, I hope, that patent protection is good. On this bill they do not. I think it is really flowing out of their inability to stand up to Canadians and say the right thing. It is easy to oppose. It is an attractive thing to go out to seniors. There is no doubt that some of the stuff that has come from seniors shows that they have had the fear of God put in them because of some data that have come to them. Whether it is from the opposition parties or whether it is from the generic firms, it is out there and it is real.

The hard thing to do is to make a decision that is right for the country. Do we as a western country want to give up that historic patent protection that led to all sorts of creative ideas around the world? I do not think anyone would want to do that. It might appear attractive in the short term but it will sure hurt this country in the long term. Do we want our young kids in university to do the research to develop the drugs? We are going to buy them. There is no doubt if a drug comes in and is designed in the United States, Germany or Switzerland and will help on cancer, our people will spend every cent they have. Do we do the research here and have our own people with all the multiplier effects or do we buy it from abroad?

I believe we should be doing it here. That is how this bill is designed. We have all the protections of the Patent Medicine Prices Review Board, the same as other countries. If the companies get too far out of line, the board has the power to act and it will act with the full support of this Parliament and the Canadian people.

In the meantime, why would we put one hand behind their back because other people will step in and do the research? As I said, has any generic company disappeared? The fact of the matter is that they have not. When we look into the drugs that the generics choose to get into, they choose a very narrow spectrum of drugs from which they make enormous profits without ever having put one cent into basic research and funding of that research to create that new drug. If anything is a parasitic relationship it is the generics.

I would rather have myself criticized for supporting companies that do that basic research to create the new one than to be acting on behalf of the few companies, the generics, that are taking the research of somebody else and creating it at a very low price without having paid for the research. That to me does not seem right.

I believe that the balance in this bill between the legitimate pharmaceutical companies and the generics and the population at large is a proper balance and I am proud to vote for this bill.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take my place in the debate on this bill as well from the opposite point of view of the member who just spoke.

In my view this bill is simply another pay-back that the Conservative Party is making to the people who have financed its election campaigns over the years and a pay-back to its friends in the multinational corporations and their United States branch plan partners who have established really the Conservative agenda over the last eight years.

There have been a number of those kind of pay-offs to the American and multinational supporters of this government party. Those pay-offs have reduced the sovereignty of this country, have virtually bankrupted this government in its ability and power to act on behalf of its citizens. This is one of the reasons for this piece of legislation.

Mrs. Dobbie: Nobody believes that.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): If you are going to comment on what I am saying, madam, sit in your seat and do it like any other member.

It has also eliminated policies which the U.S. has considered trade irritants in Canadian policy so that the Conservative government has done a great service to the United States companies and to the branch plants subsidiaries that have financed its campaigns over the years. I understand that drug companies have done that to the extent of something like $48,000 a year. What we are seeing here is essentially a pay-back to those corporations and to those supporters of the Conservative Party.

I am a bit concerned about one of the statements that was made by the House leader. Essentially what he said is that creators have the right to exploit their creations.

To some extent that should be true. There should be some protection for intellectual property and some protection for those scientists and researchers who do the fundamental research that ultimately results in good things being developed and in new developments being made in science and literature and other fields of human endeavour.

To suggest that patents and protection of intellectual property have been the great motivator for that kind of human endeavour misses the point of tens of thousands of years of human creativity. There were a lot of things invented before the inception of patent laws; things like the wheel, the steam engine and the automobile. There were a lot of things invented before we brought down patent legislation in order to protect this intellectual property.

I was interested in the House leader's statement because he said that creators have the right to exploit their creations. Essentially when we are looking at drug companies and companies that hold these patents we are not looking at the creators themselves, we are looking at people who have the power to deal with scientists and researchers and creators. They are able to buy up the results of those creations and exploit the results of those creations for their own profit. That is precisely what we are talking about here.

We are going beyond this because we are talking not about the right of a creator to exploit his creation, but about the right of manufacturers to exploit the people of Canada because they hold a government granted, time limited right to a patent that gives them the right, not to exploit their creation, but to exploit Canadian people in a monopolistic kind of situation.

That is what disturbs me because of the hypocrisy of this government. On the one hand it says that the telecommunications industry should be open to the rigours and the discipline of competition, that there should be many people operating in the field and that nobody should have the exclusive right because perhaps they have developed that technology or because they have the wit and the wisdom to invest in that technology first. That does not grant you any kind of exclusive right.

It has opened up the telecommunications field to wide open competition.

Look what it has done to the airline industry. The airline industry is being deregulated, opened up to competition because this government believes that competition is a necessary thing to impose the rigours of the marketplace upon our industries so that they will become competitive world-wide. To demonstrate the hypocrisy of this government, what do we see in this legislation? In this legislation, in exchange for the $48,000 a year that the PC Canada fund gets from the drug companies, these drug companies are being given the exclusive monopolistic right. It is a restraint on trade, it is a restraint on competition, it is exactly what the Tories say they do not stand for.

Why are they giving this exclusive right, not to the creators of these drugs or these chemicals, but to the people who have the money to buy the products of the creative researchers and the creative scientists who operate in Canada, the United States and around the world? Why are they doing this? There has to be a better explanation than the pat line that was given to us by the House leader that creators have the right to exploit their creations or the line that was given to us by the member from Alberta in a similar vein.

I cannot even understand the logic of the arguments being made by the Conservative government opposite.

An hon. member: A last favour to their friend, George Bush.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): The drug companies are doing very well, thank you very much. Why do they need this additional protection, except to satisfy an unbelievable greed on the part of those drug companies? Look at the return on investments that those companies have enjoyed over the past many years, even when they were in competition with the generic drug manufacturers.

Here is a report about pharmaceutical patents and politics Canada in Bill C-22 which reports the pharmaceutical industry enjoyed an extremely healthy rate of return: in 1972, 24.7 per cent; at the same time all manufacturing companies were enjoying a return of 14.1 per cent. In 1976, still under the compulsory licensing division, 22.7 per cent return for drug companies whereas all manufacturing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to an order made earlier this day in accordance under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried. Consequently, the bill is referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

[English]

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I would like to point out that although I was present for the entire process of the vote, I did not participate as there have been some discussions about my chairing the legislative committee. Until that decision is taken, I remain neutral on the matter.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, because I was detained, I was unable to participate in the vote. Had I been here I would have voted with my party against this Draconian measure of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

SMALL BUSINESS SECTOR

BUY CANADA PROGRAM

The House resumed from May 14, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mr. Whittaker that, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small-business sector by targeting more federal contracts to the small-business sector and establishing a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I yield the floor to the hon. member for Jonquière, but first I would ask the co-operation of all members to hold private conversations outside the House.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in this debate on the motion of the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. The motion reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small-business sector by targeting more federal contracts to the small-business sector and establishing a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

I read what certain members said in this House about this motion and I would like, first of all, to quote what the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, a Liberal, a member of the opposition, said on this motion when he spoke of the Department of Supply and Services:

> The department of which he is in charge is one of the most efficient and co-operative of all government services since it deals with small and medium-sized businesses.

He added:

> It is fantastic.
> In fact, nothing prevents a small or medium-sized business to deal with the federal government.

That goes to show you the difference in perception between members of this House. On the one hand, we have an NDP member who would like to see the system improved because he believes it is not efficient and, on the other hand, a Liberal member who thinks it is fantastic and it works pretty well. But how does it really work when it comes to awarding contracts to small businesses within Supply and Services Canada?

Eighty percent of all contracts—I repeat 80 per cent—which go to tender are awarded to small and medium-sized businesses. That leaves 10 per cent which are awarded to what we call big businesses, but also offered to small businesses. In a way, 90 per cent of Supply and Services contracts go to small and medium-sized businesses.

You will therefore understand that I am somewhat puzzled by the request put forth by the member from the New Democratic Party who would like to improve the system. Could he tell us what exactly is the problem? Ninety per cent of contracts already go to small businesses. On top of that, for the last two years, the Minister of Supply and Services has created a system which is working or which at least allows our business people to use their computers to learn about the calls for tender put out by the government or by the Department of Supply and Services.

Under those circumstances, you will understand that what we hear from our small businesses, be it in the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean area or in the riding of Jonquières, or anywhere else in Quebec, is that people are pleased that the Department of Supply and Services has created this system to allow our small businesses to bid. They are ready to compete. All they ask is to have the opportunity to bid. It is what our government gave them two years ago.

That is why under the circumstances I really wonder if such a motion is not solely intended to allow the members to speak without achieving anything in terms of content since the system is working.

If the member is experiencing particular problems, there is an appeal mechanism for those businesses who feel that they were cheated. Judging by what we hear in the field from the business community and people, this mechanism is working just fine.

Ninety-seven per cent of businesses in Canada employ less than 50 people. Between 1981 and 1989, 81.5 per cent of jobs created in the country were in the small business sector.

For some contracts we have to take into account our GATT commitments; every contract over $204,000 must be open to foreign competitors. Do you know how many contracts that is, Mr. Speaker? Only 4.6 per cent of our contracts fall under this category according to the GATT agreement.

As far as the free trade agreement is concerned, there again certain provisions state that contracts for $25,000 and more must be open to foreign competition. However there are important exceptions which I will specify.

Areas like the police force, the Solicitor General, Justice, Fisheries and Oceans, Communications and National Defence are excluded; therefore, it represents 9 per cent or less of all contracts.

Let me go back to my opening remark. What we have put in place at Supply and Services is working out very well. Contractors say they are satisfied. They wanted to have the opportunity to bid and now they have it; not only that, they can even use their computers and know from day to day what goods and services our government needs. They are then in a better position to bid.

That is why I refuse to discuss this issue further because I feel that the motion proposed by the member is, to all intents and purposes, useless. People say they are happy with the present situation and if ever some improvements are in order, we will be very happy to see what can be done. Representing a riding where unemployment is high and where small businesses want work, you can rest assured that I would be the first one to do whatever is necessary to help them and make sure they have the opportunity to get contracts. As things stand right now, they say they have that opportunity.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in the debate this evening on this very important motion.

My colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has the vision to be able to see that the current system is not supporting small business and has put forward this motion as a means of asking the members of this House to demonstrate their support for small business and for the Buy Canadian program.

I have first-hand knowledge of many of the small businesses in my area and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it confirms my colleague's concerns.

Last week I visited the Institute of Ocean Sciences, which is a federal facility in my riding, located on Pat Bay, for the commissioning of an oil spill recovery barge. One of the things the Institute of Ocean Sciences wanted to do when the facility was first commissioned was to attract those high-tech, high-paying small business firms to the area so that the spin-offs from the Institute of Ocean Sciences would create employment and create all the spin-off benefits that small businesses generate in my area.

To a large degree that has happened. However, under this government there has been a rejection of that philosophy. It came first in 1989 with the dying of the unsolicited proposals program and those small businesses in the high-tech, high-paying field were strapped by the cancellation of that program.

They also were strapped because of the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement puts additional constraints and penalizes the small business sector in Canada.

Let me give a little background first. Of the number of businesses in Canada, 97 per cent are small businesses with less than 50 employees. That shows us all where the job creation potential is: 97 per cent of business in Canada is small business.

As I was saying, the free trade agreement has put further constraints on small business which has already been constrained by the high dollar, high interest rate policy of this government. Because of those three factors, over 13,000 businesses declared bankruptcy in 1991. I think that demonstrates that we do need some sort of federal initiative to support the small business sector. They are the ones that create the jobs that create tax revenue for our government so that we can pay for our social programs and create a strong economy.

Under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the federal government does not have to put out to tender those bids that are under $204,000. So the federal government can buy Canadian under GATT if it does not exceed $204,000. This is a fairly reasonable bidding process. Until the free trade agreement that was the relationship between Canada and the U.S. Under that agreement the bidding was dropped down to $29,000, which does not buy a whole lot, particularly in the high-tech, high-paying jobs that we want to create in our country, with the kind of benefits we would have in technology and education.

This would be annoying enough, even as it stands, if it were not for the kind of difference that the United States enjoys. It enjoys an advantage over us because it does not suffer from the same sort of provisions. They have a Buy America Act which protects, to a much greater degree, their small business sector.

In my riding of Saanich—Gulf Island those high-tech environmental technology firms are creating high-tech, high paying jobs, not the Mac jobs that this government is so proud of having created, not the $5 an hour jobs, but real jobs that can support real families, that can support real communities, that add to our tax base, that add to the wealth in our society, that are able to pay for higher education so we can actually have a future for our children and for our country.

What we also have incorporated in my colleague's motion is that there has to be more support for Buy Canada programs, and there has to be.

At the meeting of the Institute of Ocean Sciences last Thursday I was shown a particular computer modelling system and this modelling system was beautiful to behold. It had the map of Vancouver Island on the computer screen and the capability of that facility, as the promotional material showed, is not a computer mapping tool or geographic information system but it is the kind of management tool for making decisions.

It takes the map of Vancouver Island and if I were to ask what if an oil spill happened on Galiano Island, or in the Gulf of Georgia, that computer is able to look at the tides, the wind conditions, all of the situations which would determine where the oil is going to end up. Then our federal resources, the Canadian Coast Guard, the province of British Columbia, would know where to put their resources to clean it up.

This is the kind of technology that is available in Canada that we should be buying, that we should be protecting, creating jobs in our own community. Right now that is not happening and it is because of the sort of wrong-headed approach that the market is the salvation for all things. This government has forsaken those people who have created, who have had the initiative to go out and risk a lot of capital in developing these high tech tools for decision making.

In conclusion, I strongly urge the members of this House to support my colleague's motion, to show some vision for the 1990s and into the next century. We have the capability in Canada to provide the environmental technologies that will benefit not only our own communities, not only our own country, but the world.

I think we have a responsibility to be able to share that with the world.

Please vote yes on this initiative.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to contribute in this debate on a very important issue raised by the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

I easily understand why my colleague would move this motion, which I agree is in itself quite good, but I have serious questions on its relevance.

Let me read the motion, Mr. Speaker, and then I will comment.

> That. . . the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small business sector—

I will read the remainder later on.

If my colleague wants to develop a healthy small business sector, it seems to me that this is not a good time to present such a motion because, as far as I know, economic, fiscal and tax policies announced in different budgets, including the last one, did foster through special initiatives the development of businesses so that they may become a healthy sector. We should not forget that small businesses represent two thirds of our economy.

The first part of the motion leaves me unsatisfied, because the development of a healthy small business sector is already well under way.

I go back to the motion:

> —developing a healthy small-business sector in Canada by targeting more federal contracts to the small-business sector—

I will get back to the rest.

A moment ago, my colleague for Jonquière reminded us of some very interesting statistics. If we want to grant federal government contracts in larger numbers, we have to know what the situation is. Let me repeat the statistics recalled by my colleague for Jonquière. Already 90 per cent of the federal contracts are awarded, allocated to the small and medium-sized business sector in Canada. I might also add that through subcontracting from this sector, another 10 per cent of contracts are going to other small businesses. Nearly 90 per cent of those contracts go straight to the small business sector. I realize that we may not have achieved 100 percent, Mr. Speaker, but you have to admit that as currently worded this motion seems to be off the point. For my part I favour the new program, the new contract allocation policy has found in my own area, in my own riding of Richmond—Wolfe.

Many Chambers of Commerce are intensely involved in favouring the granting of such contracts in their area. I think particularly of the Eastern Townships, and I could also mention Richmond—Wolfe. If already 90 per cent of contracts are awarded to the small business sector, I fail to see how this motion should get our approval. While being virtuous per se, 100 per cent is nothing but wishful thinking.

I now come to the last feature, and I will quote if I may the rest of the hon. member's motion:

> —targeting more federal contracts to the small-business sector and establishing a more aggressive "Buy Canada" program.

Here perhaps could we take most exception to this motion, beyond the virtue it commends. There are obstacles to boosting a Buy Canada program. For instance, we live in an international market framework: there is the free trade with the United States and soon with Mexico, and it is ages since we are exporting and importing outside of those two markets. Canada is already known as an exporting country and its whole economy is largely reliant on export.

What happens? If we introduce what I would call a restrictive policy based directly on the Buy Canada principle, you can easily imagine how our international partners would react to such a policy, as commendable as it may be. The Buy Canada principle obviously has its merits. It is a goal that can be achieved through awareness programs and publicity. It is not hard to figure out that a strict governmental policy to that effect would soon be under attack.

In that regard, the last element may be the most difficult to achieve, whereas the other two that I mentioned earlier are already under way.

Of course, we can use the Canadian content to encourage people to buy Canadian. That is precisely where the policy of this government has played a role. Instead of imposing a restrictive, disciplinary not to say dictatorial policy, we chose other ways to encourage our people to buy Canadian, mainly by insisting more and more on a Canadian content for all our products. It can be done. There were up to nine policies before whereas we have only one today. We have managed to simplify the whole system relating to federal contracts.

That brings me, Mr. Speaker, to tell you this. I understand very well the good faith of my colleague from Okanagan and the validity of this motion. But I am not sure that it has a place here in the circumstances that we know, especially with its wording that causes some problems.

To sum up, as far as I am concerned, we have followed much tighter policies in order to establish and develop a healthier small business sector, and we have made good progress so far. You only have to think about the last tax decreases, incentives to businesses and loans in some cases, all aimed at making credit more easily available. So, I think we have made progress on the first element.

About the second one, as I mentioned earlier, more contracts is exactly what we have achieved with the new policy put forward by the minister these last three years. All businesses have access to government contracts and all managers, presidents or purchasing officers can bid through their own computer. What more can you ask for when you can practically access this information from your own home?

I do not think this second element can be discarded, quite the opposite. It is under way and things are going very well indeed. It is the last element I worry about, and that is why I am dead against this motion, because this third objective seems unrealistic and unachievable.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleague to reword his motion. Of course, the motion is now before us, before the House, but you will understand why I, among others, will have to stand against the motion on behalf of small businesses, given the achievements of our government.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand in this House today to speak to the motion which simply calls upon the government to consider the advisability of developing a healthy small business sector in Canada by targeting more federal contracts to the small business sector and establishing a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

I listened quite carefully to the previous speaker and I have read and reread this motion. For the life of me, I cannot imagine why anybody would want to vote against it. It is something that is straightforward and it is nothing more than developing a healthy, small business sector in Canada. I do not think that the mover of the motion could want any more than that and certainly I could not either.

I fully support this motion as I recognize the vital role that small business plays in Canada. Indeed, 40 per cent of Canadians work for small business and between 1978 and 1987—I notice that we all have different figures here—93 per cent of all new jobs were created by small business. These facts clearly show that small business is the engine of growth and new job opportunity in this country.

In October 1990 I wrote in a little local newspaper in my riding of Nepean, The Clarion, that these days entrepreneurs are confronted by market globalization, world-wide competition and increasingly demanding consumers. At the same time, the speed of change in world markets is in product development. Even global political systems are accelerating at a rate few would have imagined.

For Canadian small business, each of these changes has brought the issues of quality and productivity to the forefront and many people in the city of Nepean work in small business, as I said previously. Most talk of the need to compete head on with the best companies in the world.

They point out that to do so, our companies must do more than simply match the price, services and design of competitors on a local and regional scale. They must compete on the larger global scale. They must make their wares and services attractive and accessible to an expanding marketplace.

In an era of fewer and fewer trade barriers, consumers all over the world have free access to the highest quality products at the lowest possible prices. The result is simple. We have to become ever more competitive, we have to explore every avenue and take advantage of every opportunity to exploit the marketplace.

What has this government done to help small business in Canada?

As I review the past eight years I do not see much. I look at the GST. I would like to say that I consistently receive letters from constituents who own and work in small businesses. The overwhelming majority of them complain about the burden that has been placed on their businesses as a result of this unfair tax grab.

They write about the cost of and the difficulty in getting access to capital to expand their businesses. They write that the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Federal Business Development Bank do not seem to be in tune with the needs of small business.

At a time when many businesses have gone bankrupt in the last couple of years, I am hearing over and over again that banks are calling loans on small businesses. They are shutting down small business. What are we doing about it? What is this government doing about it? Not very much.

The government failed to reform the bankruptcy legislation until thousands of small firms went out of business. High interest rates combined with a high dollar gave us a made-in-Canada recession from which we are still trying to recover. All this government has given us is a hollow prosperity initiative. It offers no meaningful solutions.

As this motion says, the federal government should endeavour to target more federal contracts to the small business sector and to establish a more aggressive Buy Canada program. This is but one step toward encouraging this vitally important Canadian sector.

But more needs to be done. We have to address the issue of access to capital. We need to have export programs which will encourage small and medium sized firms to look outward. Currently less than 10 per cent of Canadian firms export. This has to be changed. We need to look at countries like Germany which have aggressive export programs.

There is much the Government of Canada could be doing to help small businesses prosper and grow in this country. I believe it is high time something be done. I certainly can support this motion.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt for putting forward this motion. I very much appreciate the words of the hon. member for Nepean. It is worth while to draw the attention of members to the wording of this motion because it is wording that members all sides of the House should be supporting. Essentially it says:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small business sector.

I wonder who could possibly be against that. The hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt proposes that we target federal contracts to the small business sector and establish a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

I cannot understand how a government that is thinking properly would reject this motion or reject the ideas contained in this motion, or a government that pretends to be a government for Canadians by Canadians in Canada. It simply does not make sense that government speakers would stand in this House and say, first, that they are against enhancing small business and, second, that they are against expanding the Buy Canada program and providing contracts to small businesses in order to encourage those businesses to grow and strive.

As my colleague pointed out these are businesses, depending on what figures we use, that create somewhere between 80 and 90 per cent of all new jobs in this country.

I heard the Minister of Finance, the Minister for International Trade and the Prime Minister talk this morning about the G-7, the World Bank and international agencies like the OECD, congratulating Canada for having all its fundamentals in the right place.

One fundamental that is not in the right place is jobs. This government should be about creating jobs. Well over one million Canadians are collecting welfare and unemployment insurance; 11.4 per cent of Canadian workers have no jobs to go to.

If the small business sector is responsible for creating somewhere between 80 per cent and 90 per cent of all employment in Canada then, by gosh, rather than having Conservative members standing in this House and rejecting a motion calling for the enhancement of small business by encouraging a Buy Canada program or providing more contracts to small business, they should have been on their hind feet demanding that the opposition present a motion like this one and indicating that they were going to be voting for it.

This is one of the problems with this government. When a motion comes from the opposition it refuses to listen to it. It refuses to accept good advice.

Unfortunately I heard the Prime Minister speaking at a meeting last night, I think it was in Montreal, in which he admitted that he was one of the most unpopular prime ministers in the history of this country because he thinks he was doing the right thing rather than the popular thing.

He is unpopular because he has been doing the wrong thing. He has not listened to Canadians. He has not listened to advice outside his own caucus and outside his own political advisers. That is why he is the most unpopular prime minister this country has ever had.

My colleague presents a very reasonable, reasoned motion. It came from the small business people in his riding and across the country he is in contact with. Yet the government rejects it out of hand. Why? It is because it came from the opposition. There can be no other logical reason for rejecting it.

In a speech a few months ago supporting this motion my colleague pointed out that even our major neighbour to the south, our major trading partner, has a similar program that has been very beneficial to small business in the United States. He pointed out that in 1989, under the U.S. Small Businesses Act, 18 per cent of prime contracts and 39 per cent of subcontracts representing a total value of $59 billion were awarded to small business. Of these, $13 billion in contracts were specifically designated by contractor officers as being set aside exclusively to the U.S. small business concerns.

Our major trading partner, the one we have joined in a free trade agreement, has a policy like this to encourage indigenous small business in the United States, and speakers on the Conservative side express some concern that our trading partners might get a little worried if we have a buy Canadian program for small business.

Everybody is going to be worried if a government that represents itself as a Government of Canada and for Canadians does not support a program like this one. It would be very surprising for me if the Conservative government and Conservative members stood in the House and voted against this motion because they felt it did not make sense. It would indicate they are against small business in Canada if they are against this kind of a Buy Canada program and support in the form of contracts to small businesses.

There are other areas of small business I would like to talk about for a few seconds before closing wherein this government has taken actions which have had the result of creating problems for small businesses that want to get into exports. A few minutes ago the Minister of Forestry was in the House. He has indicated in past months that he was supportive of secondary manufacturing of forest products in British Columbia.

However, a manufacturer in my riding manufactures furniture and framing component blanks for export to the northeast United States market. He exports them all across the United States to the northeast United States from the east coast of Vancouver Island. He had a problem with one of his receivables. He had a fraudulent purchase of his products. As a result the Export Development Corporation jacked up his premiums on his receivables insurance which just about drove him out of business.

What kind of way is that to support and encourage the development of secondary forest products manufacturing in British Columbia and the development of new export markets by small businesses into the United States and elsewhere in the world?

This government has taken action which has been deleterious to small business in Canada. I really cannot understand it and I cannot understand the attitude on the part of those members who say: "Since we did not think of this motion we are not going to support it". That is basically their attitude. The problem is that they have been taking their own advice for too long. That is why they are unpopular. That is why we have the most unpopular Prime Minister of Canada. That is why at the next election small business people along with other workers and other people in this country are go to rise up and throw the Conservatives out. Why do they not listen to good advice for a change?

This is a motion that is worth supporting. My colleague got the idea for this motion from the small business people this motion intends to support.

I would urge my Conservative colleagues to reconsider the hard line position they have taken against support of this motion. Small business people are watching their attitude about this motion and about small business in general.

I want to wind up by repeating this motion and questioning why Conservative members cannot vote for it. It states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small business sector in Canada—

How can they be against that? It continues:

—by targeting more federal contracts to the small business sector—

Are they against that? It continues:

—and establishing a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

How could the Conservatives be against that? They should stand up and support this country for a change and vote for this motion.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak on this motion. I thought it would be possible to debate it in a non-partisan way, but after listening to my hon. friend from the New Democratic Party I realize it is not to be. He was being extremely partisan when he asked the federal government: "Why don't you listen to the small business sector?"

Since he seems to have a very short memory, I would like to remind him of a few things. When we introduced the last federal budget, which raised the small business loans to $200,000 from $100,000, his party voted against it. They voted against the interests of small businesses of this country, responsible for creating jobs; they voted against helping small businesses get operating capital and better businesses opportunities. He motions that it is no so, but I remind him that his party voted against the last federal budget.

We have signed regional development agreements with each of the provinces; in the west we have set up a structure to help business, as in the maritimes and in Quebec. We created specific programs in specific business areas.

I would like to underscore another important point. When we were debating Bill C–22, which was to generate major investments in Quebec as well as other Canadians provinces like Manitoba, they voted against it. Today, these same people rise in the House of Commons to tell Canadians that the government is not sensitive to the needs of the small business sector. These same people, New Democrats in particular, were against tax credits to businesses because they allegedly do not pay they fair share. These same members of the New Democratic Party were against the signing of a free trade agreement with the United States, our main financial and economic partner. We trade mostly with the Americans. It is because of them that we can have social programs and policies which allow Canadians to grow in all provinces. It is the North American market which makes progress possible within the Canadian society.

These same individuals said no. But they are proud, for example, of the dispute settlement tribunal that was put in place with the Americans so that we could solve important issues like pork and other issues like lumber, that will come later. When I hear my New Democrat colleague say that the Canadian Minister of Forestry did not defend the interests of the forest producers, I remind him that we signed with the provinces agreements that come to more than $ 1 billion. I remind him as well that our minister defends Canadian forest products everywhere, in Canada, in the United States and in Europe, because we know that in British Columbia, as in Quebec and Ontario, it is extremely important to have a flourishing forest economy.

It is also important that other international communities know that Canada does things perfectly and properly. But where were the members of the Opposition? They were hiding behind their desks, because they were scared to defend effectively the interests of their constituents, their communities and their businesses, as our government and the Minister of Forestry do, as did the Minister of Finance during the last budgets, and as the Minister of Regional Development does, in order that—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

DOMESTIC WORKER PROGRAM

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on April 28 I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration why the day before he had implemented changes to the domestic workers program while the standing committee was still studying his proposals of January 30 and the committee had not yet reported. The minister had asked a committee to study certain proposals and before we finished studying the proposals, he implemented the changes he had proposed.

At the time I said this was an insult to the parliamentary committee and made a farce out of so–called parliamentary reform. It is interesting to note that the majority of members on that committee were Conservative Party members and the chairman was a member of the Conservative Party, but despite that the minister ignored the committee and went ahead.

I also pointed out to the minister that not one witness appearing before the committee up until that time had supported the proposals the minister had suggested. As a matter of fact he had not even consulted with any of those witnesses.

Since that time, the committee has tabled its unanimous report. It was tabled on July 28 and it disagrees with the new measures introduced by the minister on April 27. Under the minister's new program, domestic workers must have the equivalent of grade 12 in Canada and six months' full–time training.

It is very rare for domestics to go through to grade 12 in the countries they come from and there is no course for domestic workers in any countries except England and the United States. Where are the people from the Caribbean and the Philippines to get these courses? They may have grade 12 but that is a high level of education in those countries.

Since 1981, when the Liberal Party introduced this program, 60,000 women have come to Canada to serve as domestics. Many stayed and went on to better things. Prior to the minister's changes, a woman only needed one year of experience as a domestic. She did not need a grade 12 education or a formal course. If she had experience of one year working in a home with children, that was good enough to get her into the country as a domestic, if she showed the right sort of compassion and care for children. After two years of good work as a domestic, she was given the privilege of applying as a permanent resident, as a landed immigrant.

The committee unanimously said that it did not want grade 12 or the six months' training to be the sole criteria but that there should be a wide range of flexible criteria, including the experience of the woman as a domestic.

The minister said on April 28 when I raised this question: "If hon. members on the committee come up with recommendations to improve this program I will look at them seriously. I do not think this takes away from the efforts of the committee or the subcommittee".

The report has been out since July 28. We have not had any response from the minister yet. It is true he has until December 24 to respond. However, I am hopeful the government will listen to a unanimous committee report of this Parliament, have respect for that committee and in this case make changes to this program which are reasonable changes and not blindly follow the proposals of the minister.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, I would like to bring to his attention some of the details, some of the background and some of the reasoning for the changes.

As he knows, after several years of consultation the new live-in caregiver program was introduced on April 27, 1992 to replace what was the former Foreign Domestic Movement Program. This program continues to be the government's policy of meeting a labour market demand for live-in caregivers by facilitating the entry into Canada of trained and qualified workers. Several elements of the live-in caregiver program are specifically targeted to reduce the exploitation of domestic workers—which I know he would be concerned about—such as a model contract of employment and more information on the respective rights and responsibilities that they have.

The live-in caregiver program requires a grade 12 education and six months of training in the caregiving field. This reflects the level of responsibility given to live-in caregivers and recognizes the skills required to work independently in a caregiving role.

The education level required under the new program also reflects the realities of the Canadian labour market. Two-thirds of the new jobs in Canada by the year 2000 will require a minimum of 12 years of education.

Last year close to 60 per cent of all persons who landed under the foreign domestic program had over 12 years of education. These education requirements will lessen the chance of abuse as the worker will be better able to understand his or her rights and how to seek redress should these rights be infringed upon.

In answer to the concerns of the hon. member, the government appreciates the sound research of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration on this issue. I want to assure him that the minister and the department are reviewing the recommendations made by his committee.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on May 7, 1992, I raised a question with the Minister of Employment and Immigration in which I tried to show the minister that there was an important link between work and education, particularly with respect to young people. I pointed out to the minister that tuition fees had gone up and were continuing to increase substantially, making it more difficult for these young men and women to stay in school, college and university.

I pointed out that the student debt was going totally out of sight. We now have a debt load that people may never be able to repay. I stressed that there were waiting lists of up to two years for people waiting get into a program, that there were thousands of students as of that date without meaningful jobs. Of the very few jobs that were available, they were short-term, poorly remunerated, they would not last, they were dead end. They did very little to contribute to the education, the training or retraining of that particular person. I found that was really very deplorable.

On that particular date I recall we were not only talking about line-ups of over two years of applications but in one university in the city of Winnipeg, it was estimated that 300 people would lose their jobs. I wanted the minister to understand that these kinds of conditions are really demoralizing. They destroy our cities, our provinces, our country. My question was: Why had the government permitted this to happen?

In response the minister said that they were relying on the prosperity initiative to set things straight. What the minister did not understand is that there are problems that have to be dealt with immediately, today. If there is a fire you do not plan how you are going to get out and when you are going to get out. That should have been done before. You get out. After that you try to make sure that it does not happen again.

There are real needs out there. People are without jobs, tuition fees are increasing, the debt load is skyrocketing. What was the minister doing? Relying upon the prosperity initiative. Then he said: "Let us co-operate".

[Translation]

I am quite willing to co-operate. I gave him so may ideas, I do not understand why he did not do anything, nothing at all, six months after having said that.

[English]

Here are some of the things I suggested. The 3 per cent tax on student loans for those students who need to borrow so they are among the poorest of the poor students, eliminate it. Do not increase by six months the interest that has to be paid on student loans. Eliminate the GST on books and reading materials. This government had a wonderful opportunity and it denied it, it stopped it.

I said we should make sure we have appropriate summer jobs for these young men and women so they can help pay for the education they want so they can become contributing members of society. I did say stop slashing education, training, retraining, research and development. Come to grips with reality today. Six months later nothing has been done. We are still relying on the prosperity initiative and I fear for the future.

• (1810)

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the concerns of the hon. member for St. Boniface.

The Minister of State for Youth understands perfectly how difficult this summer and last year's have been for Canadians, young and those not so young.

I want to assure the hon. member that the government wants to make it clear that its goal is to assist all young Canadians if it can, those who are entering post-secondary institutions and those who need to get back into high school to complete their diploma.

I guess there are many programs that we could point to and I would like to reiterate for the member's information some of the programs that have been in place this summer. The figures are not in yet but the government expects that some 52,000 students have benefited from the subsidized summer employment program. Some $83 million was spent this summer across the country in seed funding, as the hon. member may know. That is an increase of $3 million over last year.

Again this year seed allocations in certain areas were increased to reflect changing labour market conditions. I know funding was increased in my riding and I would hope that probably they were in the riding of the hon. member. In the metro Toronto area last year the funds were tripled because of the changing economics in the labour situation there.

There is funding under the youth initiatives for 1992-93 set at $211 million and this would reflect the concern of the federal government.

Under the youth CJS program we had 143,000 young people who participated and in 1991 total youth spending under CJS was $446.9 million.

We are spending a lot of money and let us hope it has been well spent.

We have the co-operative education program and the stay in school program and START. Wow, Those programs are very important and they have worked very well.

We appreciate the member's concern and thank him for being concerned about it and bringing it to our attention.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on May 19 I asked a question in the House of the Minister of Forestry on a very important trade matter that is still before us. It is the whole question of the softwood lumber tariff dispute Canada is having with the United States.

I raised two important questions in that question to the minister that I would like to touch on briefly tonight and hopefully get a response from the government.

The first was the point following the delegation of New Democrat MPs to Washington, D.C. on this issue that clearly the whole basis behind the tariff dispute with the United States is the American attempt to grab our raw resources, in particular our raw logs, and ship them to the United States. They said that to us in very clear terms in Washington and it is clearly an issue that this Parliament and this government are going to have to deal with.

They also raised, as did we, the important issue of how to resolve this particular dispute. At that time the government was saying not to worry, the free trade agreement would save us, the dispute panels that would be set up under the free trade agreement would deal with the softwood lumber issue.

In Washington we were told by the commerce department that it had no opinion on this particular issue and that we would have to wait and see whether, even as weak as they are, the dispute panels can be used to try and resolve this issue. It is ironic that this question is being raised today because today in Washington there was to have been a panel hearing in which the U.S. lumber lobby, using every opportunity it has to try to thwart Canada's exports of softwood to the United States, was to have presented a motion basically suggesting that these dispute panels do not even have jurisdiction on the whole softwood question.

We understand that one of the American panel members, for whatever reason, was not able to attend today so the hearing was put off. It is very clear to all of us who are concerned about this issue from lumber exporting communities that the American political process, from the President on down to the U.S. lumber lobby, will use every effort, legitimate or not, to try and thwart our exports. That is clear from the attempted motion today which will obviously be brought forward at a later date. It is also clear from the recent petitioning of President-elect Clinton, who comes from Arkansas, one of the lumber producing states in the United States. The interest is to triple the current 6.5 per cent tariff on Canadian lumber exports.

It is a very clear and important issue for all of Canada, in particular my home province of British Columbia as a lumber exporter. In this ongoing trade dispute we have seen the failure of the free trade agreement to address this issue. It is a specific example of that. We may have to wait until April of next year before this issue might even possibly be dealt with, and even then we do not know if it is going to be dealt with in Canada's favour.

It is a critical issue, it is one that was raised in May. It is still relevant today, perhaps even more relevant given the whole question of the failure of the free trade agreement to try and resolve this issue.

I would ask the government to seriously review its position on this question. What is the state of this dispute panel mechanism? Can we rely on the government's assurances any more? I ask for some action from the government on this issue.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley regarding his question and raise whether article 2009 of the free trade agreement concerning the softwood lumber MOU precludes the appeal of the results of the countervailing duty investigation.

Article 1904 of the free trade agreement provides that either party may request a binding binational panel review following a final subsidy dumping or injury determination in the countervailing duty.

We have exercised our rights under the FTA and we have established chapter 19 panels to rule on the U.S. subsidy and the injury findings. On September 29, 1992 the U.S. Lumber Industry Coalition, as the member may know, filed a motion to dismiss the FTA chapter 19 panel examining the commerce department's final subsidy determination for lack of jurisdiction.

There is no question that the panel has jurisdiction to hear Canada's appeal. FTA article 2009 does not exempt the case from panel review. Canada and the United States have both filed briefs with the panel stating categorically that the panel has the exclusive jurisdiction to hear this appeal. We have confidence in the FTA dispute settlement process which has served us so well in the pork case and as well in the recent case involving live swine exports.

The resolution of this case is a priority of the government and we are resolved to exercise all our rights under the free trade agreement and the GATT in defence of our trade interests.

The federal government, the provinces and, I would like to remind the hon. member, the industry remain united in their determination to fight this case to the very bitter end and I thank him for his concern.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I raised the matter of the Westray mine disaster on May 21 and again the following day because there were so many unanswered questions. Six months later those questions still remain unanswered.

I was one of several of my colleagues, including in particular my friend and colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond, understandably determined to get to the bottom of this tragic affair, as are the families of the 26 men who lost their lives in that tragedy.

Last week's decision by Madam Justice Glube of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, a decision which is certainly a fair ruling based on the law, leaves the Nova Scotia government with very few options. There is a government which does have some options, the same options it has had for six months and has refused to exercise, the government that sits opposite.

The time has come for this government to relent and to establish a federal inquiry. Nothing in Madam Justice Glube's decision would rule out or prevent this government from taking that initiative and holding its own inquiry.

We on this side and in particular my colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond are calling today on the government to establish either a public inquiry into this or a standing committee assigned, similar to the one we held into the Al-Mashat affair last year.

That inquiry ought to be held without delay for several good reasons. One is that a dangerous precedent was established in this affair when the interests of political parties clearly overruled advice given by federal civil servants concerned with safety and the economic feasibility of that project. These officials ought to be given an opportunity to testify to that effect without any fear of reprisal.

Second, the Prime Minister must be called to testify as to his involvement in this affair. A senior official of Curragh Resources, Marvin Pelley, said that the Prime Minister was the facilitator in this. The member for Central Nova, the Minister of Public Works, and the premier, Mr. Cameron, stated in interviews with the Halifax paper The Chronicle Herald that without the help of the Prime Minister the project would have been killed. That is a direct quote from these men.

Third, the member himself, the Minister of Public Works, has had an involvement in this. He was involved in silencing the opposition of federal bureaucrats on this issue. That is well documented, and that needs to be scrutinized by a public inquiry or a standing committee.

Fourth, a committee of cabinet looked at this matter in 1988. What was it told by federal bureaucrats? Was the advice to proceed? What was the advice? Let us call these people and let us table the documents before a proper inquiry and have this issue out in the open once and for all.

Finally, Clifford Frame has been curiously successful in getting his way with this government in terms of financial assistance for his mining projects, although mining is hardly within his bailiwick.

We need to get to the bottom of this one. We owe it to those people. We owe it to the country as a whole. We owe it to the taxpayers. We owe it to people who believe in safety, who believe that safety ought to be a consideration when we are giving public assistance.

Why was a well ordered and defined decision-making process influenced by questionable political interests? That is just one of the many questions we need to get an answer to. Mr. Speaker, I think you agree we need to get to the bottom of this one.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the federal government does not have the jurisdiction in the area of occupational health and safety.

This is the responsibility of the provincial government. Notwithstanding this fact though, the Government of Canada took a variety of measures consistent with our role as a financial guarantor to ensure that the project he speaks of was technically safe and viable.

The initial environmental assessment, the Acres report, pointed out the key health and safety concerns associated with coal mines and the methods that the company was putting in place to overcome these concerns. All concerns including those pointed out by the Devco report were deemed to be correctable with known technology.

The CANMET review spoke briefly of mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion risk. It concluded that in spite of these technical uncertainties the proposal had no major technical failings. Westray was required to comply with all the appropriate coal mining regulations in Nova Scotia including those dealing with mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion matters and regular provincial mine inspections were carried out.

According to the mining industry, the causes and mechanisms of coal dust explosions are well understood through past research. It is the responsibility of the operators and the regulators to apply that knowledge base in developing control strategies.

We put in place steps to ensure that the company was in full compliance with the provincial regulatory standards and in health and safety. This was monitored on a monthly basis by independent mining consultants. All of these facts were taken into consideration before making the decision to fund this project by the federal government.

DRUG ABUSE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this occasion to review a question that I posed to the Solicitor General last May 5, 1992. It had to do with the serious problem of drug trafficking and drug abuse that unfortunately has afflicted all too many Canadians and certainly afflicted all too many neighbourhoods across our country, particularly in a large urban centre like metropolitan Toronto.

I do not want to suggest that we ought to be negative or have a doom and gloom approach to the situation. I believe that we have to lay the cards on the table and begin to realize that some of those neighbourhoods which are under siege by these drug traffickers are in fact losing the battle. Governments are perhaps losing the battle. For average Canadians and their neighbours living in those neighbourhoods and communities, the feelings by long measure are feelings of wanting to triumph over this serious cancer that is spreading and touching the lives of too many Canadians and particularly our young.

Therefore, I have had thousands of names put to petitions deposited on the floor of this House of Commons. I had the opportunity on several occasions of asking the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice as to what their answer would be on one particular aspect of fighting drugs on the streets. That one aspect happened to be the amendment to the Narcotics Control Act so as to share the assets that flow from any drug seizure. Rather than having all those assets flow back exclusively to the federal treasury, there could be a shared arrangement by which some of those assets would flow back to the local authorities, whether they be the municipal government or the police affiliates or in fact local organizations so that those entities which are on the leading edge of that battle, not those in the background, for instance, as the federal government in Ottawa, would have at their disposal some assets that would further the cause of putting back and stemming what seems to be a growing tide.

To his credit, the Solicitor General has said on a number of occasions, and in fact responded to my question, that he is in agreement with the general principle. He has been saying that for a very long time. He has also been saying for a very long time that legislation to amend the Narcotics Control Act is just around the corner.

It has been a very, very long corner indeed because we have not seen the legislation. We have the good intentions of the minister in his responses to this Chamber, but thus far we have not seen the realization or the fruition of bringing those amendments before the House of Commons at which point I believe there would be relatively speedy passage from all sides of the House because of the urgent need to do so.

Therefore, this evening I am looking forward to perhaps the parliamentary secretary giving us specifics and indicating that in fact we are not only paying lip service to this very urgent need but that the government is prepared to specifically with time constraints and agendas say yes, we are prepared to move and this is when and this is how.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think the whole subject is a little more complicated than the impression you might have gathered from the comments of the hon. member.

First of all, I think it should be pointed out that Canada's Criminal Code and its drug legislation does have provisions designed to attack the profit motive in a wide variety of crimes, not just narcotics crimes.

The ability of the Crown to apply for forfeiture of the proceeds of specified offences severely undermines the obvious profit motive for committing those offences.

This is a particularly effective tool in Canada's drug enforcement initiative. Sharing those forfeited assets with other jurisdictions should not be equated with giving the police another tool for the battle against drugs.

The hon. member's questions assumed that the forfeited assets are necessary in order to finance local law enforcement efforts. This seems dangerously close to making forfeitures the driving force for undertaking drug investigations.

The carnage, as he pointed out, caused by the drug trade is the reason behind these investigations. The ability to seize proceeds is an ancillary benefit. Any sharing of that benefit would be undertaken as a matter of fairness and not as the rationale for undertaking investigations. The simple fact is that many other enterprise crime investigations lead to forfeiture of assets, but this has not led to a demand for sharing in order to win the battle against those crimes.

It may in fact be the best indicator that the issue of sharing deserves careful examination, which the Solicitor General has indicated to the House he would do. Perhaps reimbursement of expenses may be appropriate, but viewing law enforcement as a business is not appropriate.

There is a popular myth that suggests that drug traffickers have rooms full of cash available for seizure and forfeiture. This view of assets available from drug seizures may drive the claim for sharing since this is an obvious source for enforcement revenues. I support the active use of our proceeds of crime scheme.

Essentially the scheme separates—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Your time has expired.

PORT GREVILLE SHIPBUILDING MUSEUM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my support for the Port Greville shipbuilding museum. This project is being established in an area of high unemployment and will add greatly to the tourism potential of this beautiful part of Nova Scotia.

Located on the shores of the Bay of Fundy, the Port Greville coast was a prominent shipbuilding region in the days of wooden ships at the turn of the century. This museum will pay tribute to this important piece of our history.

The people of the community have come together and raised a substantial part of the costs, as well as donated a large amount of time and labour. Applications for cost sharing have also been made to the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and the Department of Communications. I will be meeting with the appropriate officials to press for approval of these requests.

The project is genuine, it is worth while, and it is very much needed. The groundwork has been done by the local people and now is the time for government to provide much needed assistance.

NUNAVUT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, last week the Inuit of the eastern and central Arctic voted in favour of ratifying their land claim. Linked to that land claim is a process to create the new territory of Nunavut. The Inuit of Nunavut have expressed their desire to be more active partners in the Canadian federation. They have said they want more control over their lives.

The government must do its part by facilitating the transfer of control. Not only must the government ratify the land claim agreement, it must ensure that adequate resources are dedicated to implementing the agreement. Barely 12 hours after the vote results were announced, concerns were raised about inadequate federal implementation funding. Sufficient implementation funding is critical to the success of the land claim agreement.

I urge the government to be fair and generous in these financial negotiations. Do not deny the people of Nunavut the financial resources they need to fulfil the promise of Nunavut.

DRUG ABUSE AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, this week is a special week to promote public awareness of drug abuse. This provincial and local initiative is aimed at making us more aware of the impact of alcohol and other drugs on individuals.

Drug-related problems have an impact, either directly or indirectly, on all parts of our society. No single group or agency has the requisite resources to deal with these problems. Only by forming alliances and co-ordinating the efforts of individuals, groups, communities and all levels of government will we ever be able to limit the harm done by alcohol and other drugs.

The government supports this special drug awareness week, and I would encourage hon. members and all Canadians to take part in the activities and special events taking place this week in communities across Canada.

TRADE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee examining the North American free trade deal has no advertising budget and is not even an open process.

It is disturbing that the government managed to find $3 million to advertise the NAFTA deal but refused to approve even $15,000 to advertise where and when the subcommittee meetings were taking place.

I was surprised that when the New Democratic Party proposed that the committee hold hearings in every province and territory of this country the Liberals voted with the government that the committee should not travel to my home province of Saskatchewan, to New Brunswick, to Prince Edward Island, to Newfoundland, to Vancouver Island, to northern Ontario, or even to Toronto, Hamilton or Montreal. They also voted against allowing the committee to visit the various communities which have been devastated by the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

Why does the Liberal Party not want an open process? I can only guess it is because the Liberals and the Tories do not want Canadians to know that they both support anti-worker, anti-environment trade deals.

MIDDLE CLASS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian middle class is at a crossroads. Taxes are high and confidence is low.

A poll this week highlighted a disturbing reality. More than half of the people polled believed their children would be worse off than they were. This must and can be changed for if the Canadian middle class dies, Canada dies.

How do we change things? The federal government alone cannot do it through fairer taxes and spending cuts, both of which we must accomplish. Others have a role as well. Provincial governments can do the same and reduce the burden of government on middle class Canadians.

The private sector can take more risks with wealth and job creation. Unions can become partners in economic recovery. NDP governments can scrap pro–labour legislation and replace it with the right–to–work laws. Individual Canadians can accept more responsibility for their own lives, reducing the expectation of government hand–outs which this country can no longer afford.

It is time all of us did all we could to reaffirm the backbone of Canada, the diligent, industrious and disciplined middle class.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, the economic recession which has held Canada within its tight grip for over two years is a direct result of poor management of the Canadian economy by this government.

The government's mishandling of the Canadian economy has cost thousands of jobs and has increased the reliance of Canadians on food banks and other social services.

In my riding of Nipissing there has been a 30 per cent increase in the number of people who have filed new applications for unemployment insurance over the past three months. Hence 400 more Canadians are forced into the endless unemployment lines.

Accompanying this rise in UI claims is a 100 per cent increase in the number of families utilizing the food bank in North Bay since September. The government has done nothing to stimulate the economy and create jobs. The fact remains there are still 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work.

The time has come for the government to acknowledge that its economic policies have failed miserably and to implement job creation programs which will stimulate the economy and give Canadians hope for the future.

TRADE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, there is good news for farmers and there is good news for free traders from coast to coast in Canada.

A binational panel established under the free trade agreement rules recently ordered the United States to stop a countervailing action against Canadian hogs and to refund the duties already collected. The refund will total $10 million but is only a small part of the victory.

The major win comes with the decision that Americans had no right to say that Canada's national tripartite program gave Canadian farmers an unfair market advantage. As one Manitoba hog producer said: "With free trade we would have lost this last level of appeal".

The free trade agreement has doubled agricultural exports from Canada to the United States creating many new jobs. I rest my case.

POLITICAL SITUATION IN HAITI

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, recently, Mr. Marcel Gervais, Archbishop of Ottawa and president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to condemn the current political situation in Haiti.

Mr. Gervais wrote that on September 24, Mr. Willy Romélus, Bishop of Jérémie in Haiti, narrowly escaped an assassination attempt while spending the night in the rectory of the parish of Des Irois.

Because the situation in Haiti continues to deteriorate and the number of victims of repression is increasing, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops has asked the Canadian government to maintain its position on non-recognition of the de facto government in Haiti.

• (1410)

We must publicly condemn the harassment, threats and daily violations of human rights. We must condemn the present authorities who allow this to happen. Decisive action is necessary so that the Organization of American States can intervene actively and effectively.

We must ask the UN to support this exercise. The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops is also asking the government to tighten the embargo on military arms and equipment which the junta in Haiti is still able to buy.

ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, a while ago, following a tragic incident that took her sister Marie-Eve's life, a young girl decided to do something positive for a non-violent society.

Virginie Larivière decided that she had enough of seeing violence on television. She was not the only one who had had enough. Nearly a million and a half Canadians decided to support her efforts to eliminate violence on television.

Virginie Larivière is a living example of what we can do to change things and improve our society. Instead of feeling sorry for her fate and turning inward or complaining, she decided to get involved and fight violence.

We often tell our young people to get involved and do something. Virginie did that admirably and we have no right to remain indifferent to her request and the wishes of the Canadian people.

We must now take concrete action and show Virginie as well as all young people in this country that she did a good thing, the right thing and that change is possible if we really want it.

Congratulations to all the Virginie Larivières in Canada.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, everything indicates that the federal government intends to subsidize PWA and Canadian International.

Such a decision is contrary to the interests of Canadians and Quebecers. The president of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, Bernard Roy, said that the two carriers should be merged so we do not have to support two lame ducks.

The mayor of Montreal says that it is unthinkable to subsidize only one airline and the same, if not more, financial assistance would have to be given to Air Canada.

I agree. This bail-out is illogical and sheer waste. The federal government is not authorized to further indebt Canada and Quebec just to get votes.

ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Virginie Larivière is here in Ottawa today with her parents and the Conservative member for Terrebonne in order to table, in memory of her sister Marie-Eve, a petition signed by over a million people calling for the elimination of violence on television and in our society.

The people of the federal riding of Abitibi strongly supported Virginie's effort to have violent movies on television regulated by March 1993.

I met Virginie today and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker and all members of this House, that Virginie Larivière's team will apply all the pressure needed to win this cause.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal trade critic said to Canadians last night on CBC that it was no big deal if the North American free trade agreement was approved.

It is a big deal to Canadian seniors and families. They will have to pay the higher drug prices that NAFTA dictates through Bill C-91. It is a big deal to provincial health ministers and taxpayers who will pay at least $800 million more in increased drug prices.

What has happened to the federal minister of health who promised he would take the concerns of provincial ministers of health about Bill C-91 to cabinet?

Even if the Liberal trade critic still thinks it is no big deal, the word NAFTA means all Canadians will pay more for drugs. Seniors, families and taxpayers all know what the Liberals do not understand. More for drug prices is a big deal.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I bring you urgent and pressing news which I have learned from Calgary. I know that you are keenly interested in the future of the nation which is being plotted in the lavish Reform Party headquarters.

Last week the leader who flip-flopped said the federal government should not get involved in the Canadian Airlines issue. This week he says we should. What will he say next week?

Once he was against the GST, then he supported it and now he wants it both ways: Keep it and get rid of it. Once he supported Senate reform, then he campaigned to kill Senate reform.

Many Albertans are asking: What does the Reform Party stand for? We are quite well aware of what it is against.

PRIME MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, do you remember these immortal words?

There will be jobs for Liberals and NDPers too after I have been Prime Minister for 15 years and I cannot find a living, breathing Tory left to appoint.

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. Boudria: It was the Prime Minister who said that.

Last week, he was seen scraping the bottom of the barrel or should I say the patronage trough when he appointed his former baby-sitter and chauffeur, Michael McSweeney, to a $100,000 a year job.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Boudria: He appointed his pal, Keith Morgan, to a 10-year appointment on the parole board. Keith got a life sentence to the parole board.

Now the Prime Minister has appointed a former separatist cabinet minister, Jocelyne Ouellette, to a $140,000 high-flying job at the space agency.

Canadians are wondering who will be next. Will it be the hairdresser to the court of appeals, or Clover the poodle to the board of Petro-Canada?

We are all waiting anxiously and Clover is salivating at the thought.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that the new Clinton administration to be installed in two months holds the position of wanting to make some major changes to NAFTA.

Yesterday, the minister for trade said that this government wants to proceed very rapidly with ratification, even without knowing the position of the new administration. He is almost as irresponsible as the NDP members who want to tear up the agreement without knowing if there will be any changes at all.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will agree with us that it would be better for Canada and for everyone to wait until we know exactly what the position of the Clinton administration will be before asking Parliament to pass this bill in the House of Commons.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I thought when my friend was standing up to ask me a question on trade that he was going to comment on the very good news we had this morning, with exports to the United States up so far this year, a 10.5 per cent increase.

There is a 10.5 per cent increase in trade to a country that is having a slow economy. It clearly shows the benefits of the free trade agreement and it clearly shows the foresight of this government in entering into a free trade agreement. It also clearly demonstrates that Canadian companies are competing very effectively in taking advantage of the opportunities that the free trade agreement has presented to them.

Regarding the specific question of my hon. friend, he has not stated accurately what I said in committee last night. I said that we would be ready to proceed with legislation at the end of January or early in February, but before taking that final decision we would want to see exactly what the status of the process was in the United States and also to see precisely what Mr. Clinton might have in mind with these parallel agreements that he has talked about.

That was the position that I stated on two occasions to his trade critic last night. It was not as he has just put it in the House today.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister this question.

Would it not be more logical to wait until he knows exactly what the results of the negotiations will be with the new Clinton agreement before coming to this House? In doing what he is doing, he is playing his chips before negotiating. We are asking the minister to go back and negotiate. He should renegotiate not only environmental and labour standards, but he should renegotiate a clear independence for Canada on energy policy. He should negotiate what is a subsidy and what is dumping.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think if my friend took that position he would be playing right into the hands of the U.S. government. He would be saying that we are prepared to open up everything, that we are prepared to open up culture, health care and all these things that my hon. friend is concerned about.

We have said and what I said quite clearly at the committee last night is that the agreement that we agreed upon with the United States government and the Mexican government is an agreement among three sovereign governments. We expect that the Clinton administration will honour that agreement, and we are proceeding with NAFTA as it stands. What happens on the peripheral agreements, the supplementary agreements, are matters that can be discussed. We are already discussing them with the current administration. But the NAFTA stands.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the minister when he says that the U.S. administration will ask for changes and then claims that the agreement will remain the same. If any changes are accepted by the Americans and the Mexicans, this means a new agreement. My question for the minister is this: Why does he not wait and see what the final position of the new U.S. administration will be, before saying that we are entirely satisfied, because that is not the case. Canadians are not satisfied with the agreement between Canada, Mexico and the United States.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is saying be prepared to open up the NAFTA. We are not prepared to open up the NAFTA. The people who are affected by the NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement, people who are in the manufacturing sector, the forest products sector, the automotive sector, the cultural sector, have said that this is a good agreement. We are not prepared to open it up because we could stand the possibility of weakening that agreement.

If that is the position of the Liberal Party of Canada—He says he wants to negotiate. I am waiting to hear from his trade critic what areas the Liberal Party would like to renegotiate, and how it would like to renegotiate it. I think he will find that it is not possible to negotiate a better deal than we have already.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in September I asked the Minister for International Trade to table the government's impact studies on the North American free trade agreement. Instead, the minister tabled a series of promotional papers.

Having now initialled the agreement, and knowing that free trade inevitably does bring dislocation, why is the government unwilling to table today, to share with Canadians, the real impact studies which indicate where jobs will be lost and what specific adjustment assistance will be provided to help those workers and businesses adversely affected?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, so that the House is fully aware of this, last night I tabled about eight or nine studies that had already been made available, which my friend in the New Democratic Party had forgotten that we had done for the House.

In addition to that, I was prepared to discuss the Finance Department report on this, which covers extensively the benefits that will flow from the North American free trade agreement.

In addition, I tabled a bibliography, a listing of some 200 or 300 publications that have been done as to the effect of the North American free trade agreement on the three countries. Surely my hon. friend could have a very effective and very productive time in reviewing all of those.

My hon. friend talks about the impacts. The best way that we could understand the impacts of the free trade agreement was to discuss with the companies and the industries affected as we went through the negotiations just precisely how the various elements of the agreement were going to affect them. This is exactly what we did through the broadest possible consultation process that any government has ever conducted on the negotiations of a trade agreement.

On the question of adjustment—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move ahead.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): The minister knows very well that there are impact studies that analyse the real impact, not a promotional impact but the real impact, of the free trade agreement on Canadian workers and on Canadian business.

One aspect has been brought forward today by the Conference Board of Canada which has stated, and I quote: "As a result of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, many Canadian firms are facing fewer barriers to trade with the United States than they face within Canada".

The minister wants to speak about reports. The Macdonald commission, the de Grandpré report, the working group on prosperity have all asked the same question: If free trade with the United States and Mexico is good for Canada, why is free trade not good within Canada?

When will this government commit to a specific timetable and to specific measures to dismantle these harmful barriers within our country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend keeps talking about wanting to know the real impact of free trade. The real impact of free trade was announced this morning with the announcement that Canadian exports to the United States in the first nine months of this year were up 10.5 per cent compared to the first nine months last year. That is the real impact.

My hon. friend talks about interprovincial trade barriers. I am sure that he read this morning the very good news that the federal and provincial agriculture ministers have taken the very important first step in dealing with the trade barriers between the provinces in the area of agricultural policy.

We agree with the hon. member that it is important that we eliminate these. This was a primary objective that we had in the discussions on the constitutional reform proposals. We were not successful there, but I have a meeting, I believe it is the first week of—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask that ministers try to speed up their answers.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

It is clear since the House came back that this government has no new ideas on the economy, no new ideas to get Canadians back working. By the way, the real impact studies that we have seen are the impact that the Canada–U.S. trade deal has had with the loss of 350,000 manufacturing jobs and the high unemployment in this country. We have seen the impact of the Canada–U.S. trade deal.

I am very surprised to hear the Leader of the Opposition talk about having the opinions of Mr. Clinton taken into consideration when the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party on the subcommittee on trade have refused to have hearings on NAFTA in every province and every territory so that Canadians can have their say on the NAFTA deal.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. It is now in the government's hands. Will the government ensure that there is an open process, not by invitation only, so that Canadians in every part of this country can express their views on the proposed NAFTA trade arrangements?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to Canadians in every part of the country in terms of trade. Obviously the consultations that will go on at the special committee will be receiving representations from interested parties.

In respect of individual provinces and regions, my hon. friend will want to note that in the January–September period the 1992 merchandise exports to the United States are 10.5 per cent ahead of January–September 1991, on course to generate a full-year figure of $119 billion and substantially exceed the 1990 all-time record high of $110.5 billion. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks me a question and yet members of the NDP object to the answer.

Canada's merchandise exports to the United States have been at record levels in every month so far this year, hitting an all-time monthly high of $10.299 billion in September.

I will be happy to provide my friend with a breakdown by province where every Canadian province has substantially increased its exports to the United States since the coming into effect of the free trade agreement.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

Clearly there is both a great difference of opinion and experience about the results of the Canada–U.S. trade deal. I say to the Prime Minister: Given yesterday that the subcommittee examining the North American trade deal voted against a New Democratic motion to hold hearings in every province and territory, which means that there will not be hearings in Saskatchewan, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, Vancouver Island, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Toronto, Hamilton and—

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has referred to something in a committee but I do not think a question has been put. Is the hon. member putting a question?

Ms. McLaughlin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Why will the Prime Minister and this government not initiate an open door policy to hear what Canadians have to say on NAFTA, which is surely the economic constitution of Canada. Will he make sure they are not just hearings by invitation only but that there are hearings in every province and territory in the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, I am sure that the minister and the committee make their own rules with respect to hearings.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: I apologize for that hilarious remark, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Tobin: More nerve than a bad toothache.

Mr. Mulroney: Exactly, Brian. When they meet they will probably want to consider some simple facts. When Albertans come before the committee, my hon. friends from the NDP can ask whether it is true or not that Alberta's exports to the United States have risen exactly 30 per cent from 1988 to 1991.

Mr. Langdon: How about Saskatchewan?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says, how about Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan's exports have increased 18 per cent from $2.0 billion to $2.3 billion.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, what the government does not seem to realize is that there are many people in this country who have seen their plants and their jobs move south, who have seen the results of the Canada–U.S. trade deal and want to have a say and to bring forward their experience to parliamentarians who make the decisions on these very important issues.

Do I understand that the Prime Minister is in favour of very limited hearings on the NAFTA deal, and there will not be hearings in every province and territory? Is the Prime Minister in favour of having invitation only hearings for Canadian people on the NAFTA deal?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of wide-open discussions on trade agreements. In fact, I am even in favour of elections on trade agreements.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

With its trumped up charges of dumping, the U.S. steel industry has engaged in a fight to the finish with Canadian steelmakers to cut us out of the U.S. market. Recently, representatives of the industry throughout Canada had to publicly speak out against the Canadian government's lack of response and support.

My question is this: Why is this government casting aside Canadian steelmakers? Why will it not do everything it can to safeguard the jobs of thousands of Canadian workers?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not know who my hon. friend is talking about. I have met with senior executives of the steel companies, senior executives of the unions, senior representatives from the city of Hamilton and the city of Sault Ste. Marie on occasions during the course of the past year. I have stated very clearly to them the concerns we have with regard to the action that the United States is taking in the question of anti-dumping.

The Prime Minister, myself, our ambassador and other officials in Washington have discussed with the administration the possibility of a U.S.–Canada steel pact similar to the auto pact. We have not given up on the possibilities of that. There is also a possibility that with the change in administration we may have a greater chance of seeing that type of arrangement go forward.

However, these are matters that are continually on our platter. We are also working hard to make sure that the best interests of the steel industry are put forward in our discussions.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the steel industry went public on a CBC broadcast about 10 days ago and said there was a lack of support from the government. They also clearly said that the imposition of countervail duties by Canada was insufficient.

The minister has now said publicly that he is prepared to support a North American steel pact. We are delighted to hear that. The minister blew it in the NAFTA negotiations. He now has a chance to recoup. Bill Clinton has said that as a condition precedent to his signing NAFTA he wants to see new parallel agreements.

Will this government make a condition precedent to us signing NAFTA, the signing of a North American steel pact? Put your money where your mouth is.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps members might all consider exercising just a little bit of self-discipline for the rest of Question Period.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has to realize that time is of the essence with regard to the matters before the steel industry today. It is essential that we deal with these matters as quickly as possible. That is why we are having meetings with our industry and with the U.S. administration and with the new administration as soon as the appropriate people are in place.

We will continue to do that, but my hon. friend should be very careful in the way he phrases his questions, not to leave the impression that there will be more trade barriers between the United States and Canada. That might make it more difficult for Canadian ship owners to purchase ships and to operate the ships between the two countries.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, we agree with the minister that time is of the essence. That is why we have to ask how serious the government is when the Conservative chairman of the steel caucus has not called a meeting in two years. We wonder if his colleagues should not share the concern of the minister that indeed time is of the essence.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it concerns the fact that two years ago he co-chaired the United Nations world summit on children. At that conference he stated that the number one priority of his government was to combat child poverty.

The reality is that in the last 10 years the number of children using food banks in Canada has increased from zero to 700,000.

If the Prime Minister was serious about combating child poverty, why did his colleague in the House state yesterday that he did not even have a program to combat child poverty?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the absence of the member. We appreciate when she is not here because we avoid that kind of statement which is absolutely false.

Yesterday we said that Canadians will never accept poverty for children. We will fight and struggle against it. We budgeted $3 billion last year. However, it is not just a question of money, it is a question of society. Liberals had the same problem when they were in power. We have the problem and we have improved the situation, but children today face a lot of challenges.

However, we will continue to fight. I hope that if the member has good proposals to make to improve the situation, she will write me and tell me exactly what she believes should be done. In the meantime, she should once again recognize that the money we have put in and the programs we have put forward have helped Canadian children in the fight against poverty.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, what is false here is the minister's statement that children are better off today than they were 10 years ago. Does he realize that in Canada today, 700,000 children go to food banks? Ten years ago, young people did not go to food banks.

• (1440)

Why did the minister admit in this House yesterday that there was no established policy, when two years ago, his Prime Minister made it clear to the entire international community that his number one priority was the child assistance policy, which is no longer true today?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is amazing how the hon. member manages to say at anytime whatever comes into her head, even if it is completely inaccurate. There were always food banks for children, even when the hon. member's party was in power. In every society there have always been children who were helped by volunteer groups. I suggest she ask the World Health Organization and the United Nations Council on Children which stated that the policy developed by this Prime Minister after the children's summit and based on children at risk and on child benefits was one of the best in the world. I suggest she do her homework before talking through her hat in this House.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. During the recent referendum debate, the Government of Canada spent $350 million to make information available to Canadian people about what they were voting on. During that referendum debate an additional $3 million of taxpayers' money was spent to send out a government propaganda piece in favour of the North American free trade agreement.

In the face of these expenditures, can the Prime Minister tell me whether or not the people of Canada are entitled to the same access on NAFTA? Why is it we are not allowed to spend one penny to advertise that we are having committee hearings in five cities across this country on NAFTA?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the figures used by my hon. friend in future will be more accurate than the one he just used. He has seriously mislead the House and the Canadian people. This government and this Parliament never spent $350 million on information in respect of the last referendum.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, if I am to be corrected by the Prime Minister, may I make this request? Is the government willing to spend one-tenth of what it spent on advertising for the referendum to inform the people of this country where hearings are being held?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend ceases using numbers then all of a sudden he becomes more reasonable and his argument is easier to deal with.

Obviously one-tenth of $350 million is one thing, one-tenth of an infinitely more modest figure is another, and I will be happy to refer my hon. friend's request to the chairman of the standing committee.

POVERTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. Yesterday Campaign 2000 released its report on poverty. I hope by this time the minister has had an opportunity to read it.

This report states that a mother with two children receiving the greatest benefits will get a whole extra 46 cents a day per child with the new child benefit. Will the minister explain to these women exactly what sort of improvements will come into the lives of their children at the rate of 46 cents a day?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in any benefit package for children, we are trying to determine, first, what we have to do and, second, whom we will target.

The hon. member knows very well that the tax benefit package has been determined to target the low-income earners, those who want to remain in the labour force with an income between $10,000 and $20,000.

Five hundred dollars more per family per year represents a modest amount of money. But for a woman with three children in Toronto receiving $45 more per month, it may permit her to buy a little more food and clothing. You will understand that for her it is very important. This is the reason that package has been considered by Canadians as once again not answering all the problems but the government is giving it its best effort.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister always responds to these questions with the same answer that the government has no money.

The government is a system and has an approach to making choices. The government has made choices on how to spend $160 billion a year. The government has decided to spend $24 million promoting its agenda for prosperity.

Did the minister not oppose this? Did the minister not stand up and say: "No, put that money toward children. Quit wasting money on such a publicity stunt". Where is the minister when we need somebody to speak out for children?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compare figures with my hon. friend.

Yesterday, I said that this government spent $3 billion for children during the last year. It puts $15 billion a year in all departments and you are talking to me about $24 million. I tell you that the government has put $15 billion—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. minister would want to put his comments through the Chair as members do.

HEALTH

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Forty-three per cent of Canada's haemophiliacs, 800 men, women and children, are HIV positive as a result of receiving tainted blood. Half of those people have AIDS. This is not a partisan issue. It is for that reason that we in the opposition are proposing the following.

Will the minister and the Government of Canada immediately establish a fully independent inquiry, independent of governments, bureaucrats and politicians? Will the minister assure this House that this inquiry will be conducted by Canadians of the highest calibre and of the highest qualifications?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. I believe that Canadians need to have full confidence in the blood management system in Canada. I cannot give to my friend an absolute guarantee that we will put forward today a full inquiry in terms of the assessment of all that has happened with contaminated blood particularly from 1976 to 1987.

However I say that we are in touch with all the stakeholders. We are particularly in touch with the Red Cross. We are in touch with the Canadian Hemophilia Society. The department has been advised that if there is any reason to believe that something happened which would determine that it is a necessity to keep the full confidence of Canadians in the system we have now, I would not hesitate one second. For now and for the victims themselves, Mr. Page and even Mrs. Lucie Pépin, the executive director of the Hemophilia Society, said she does not want an inquiry now.

I repeat for all Canadians. If we had any reason to believe that it would be better to have an inquiry or investigation I would ask for one immediately.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, several hundred Canadians have AIDS as a result of blood transfusions. I have visited Casey House in Toronto. I have talked with these individuals. They are suffering and time is running out.

What plausible reason can the Minister of National Health and Welfare give to this House by denying Canadians a full public inquiry conducted by individuals of the highest calibre and the highest qualifications? What conceivable reason can the hon. minister give this House?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have also visited from Newfoundland to Vancouver many sites and hospitals where there are people with AIDS. I totally share the concerns the hon. member has.

Once again, having said that, to trigger a full investigation or inquiry the minister would have to have an honest conviction that this inquiry would provide to Canadians something we are not able to provide otherwise. Once again, the Red Cross, which is a highly considered organization in Canada, and the Hemophilia Society have not requested this so far. I assure my hon. friend if that request happens and I believe there is a necessity, I will act accordingly.

THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

The minister will know that the CBC ombudsman has declared what veterans across Canada have known for a long time that the documentary The Valour and the Horror is misleading and is historically wrong. That film is being distributed by the National Film Board.

In view of the condemnation of the documentary drama by the CBC ombudsman, will the minister direct the National Film Board not to distribute that film? Will he withdraw the film so that it will not be shown in schools and other institutions as a result of distribution by the National Film Board?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend will know, since the creation of the cultural agencies the government has maintained the principle of an arm's length relationship between the agencies and government.

The hon. member correctly points out that the CBC has put in place a procedure where people who feel aggrieved have the opportunity to have a fair and independent examination made of whether or not programming it shows meets adequate standards.

The government film commissioner and the chair of the National Film Board indicated just last week that she is studying the ombudsman's report. I think it is appropriate to allow her to do so.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Every day we see the disastrous results of the deregulation policies introduced first by the Liberals and continued by the Conservatives. Yesterday as this House knows, the CPR announced its intention to abandon its Atlantic lines east of Sherbrooke, Quebec. This morning on CTV's Canada AM the general manager of that company indicated that this was the beginning of the end of rail competition from Thunder Bay to the Atlantic Ocean.

My question for the Minister of Transport is the same as it was yesterday. Is the minister prepared to give a policy directive to the National Transportation Agency to order it not to accept any applications to abandon any main lines by any railroad anywhere in Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has indicated that it was the same question as yesterday, my answer would have to be the same.

We have put in place a system whereby a railway company that wants to abandon a section of its operation addresses its request to the National Transportation Agency which is an arm's length agency to the government.

This is the process that has been started. It will be examined. Every player, every stakeholder, every group, every person that wishes to question the advisability of this will have the occasion to appear before the NTA and in due course the NTA will render its decision. Then it is up to the cabinet and the transport minister to examine the findings and make a decision at that time.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister that this country was built on transportation and it was built by the policies of the government of the day focusing on transportation. The government just cannot wash its hands of it and leave it to the marketplace or the National Transportation Agency.

I want to turn to the other crisis in transportation and that is in the airline industry. I want to ask the Minister of Transport if he is prepared to call in the presidents of Air Canada and Canadian and tell them it is time to cease and desist this crazy kind of war they are having. Also, will he advise Canadians what the government is prepared to do in terms of protecting that industry and to ensure its long-term survivability, and will he make a commitment to turn back the clock and go back to regulation so we can have long-term stability in the airline industry?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish that the member had some continuity between the comments he made in his first question and the comments he made in the second question. He talks about reregulation and having a process.

This is exactly the process that was put in place in order that all cases concerning rail abandonment would be examined by an independent body to determine whether they were right in wanting to abandon that rail line. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. Either we have a process and we follow it, or we do not have a process.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Transport and it is strictly on the rail side and the announcement of Canadian yesterday that effectively guts Canadian operations in eastern Canada and cuts the Gordian knot that used to tie this country from coast to coast.

I understand the answer so far from the minister. However, has the minister now in his hands the report of the royal commission on transportation? If he has, will he make sure it is released forthwith in that it might impact on this whole question of abandonment of rail lines?

While he answers that, he could also answer the part of the question put yesterday when he referred to the NTA and the study of the act and the report that is supposed to be coming forward in January 1993 on the effectiveness of the act. Could the minister make sure that report does come through so it will have some effect on the hearings of the NTA before the abandonment process is completed?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to answer that, yes, we have received the report of the royal commission that was instigated and instituted by the Prime Minister in 1989. I am happy to report that the commission has completed its work on time and under budget and that the committee examining the NTA will also report on time and under budget before January 31, 1993. The tabling of the royal commission report is going to be very soon.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for those answers. I refer to the question from my hon. friend with regard to the official from CP saying yesterday and today that what happened in Atlantic Canada yesterday is, perhaps, going to happen in Quebec and Ontario.

Would the minister seriously consider calling in CP to see how valid that statement is? If we are talking about abandonment because of all the realistic factors that are considered then Atlantic Canada will not feel discriminated against as being a guinea pig. This process would also include those portions of Quebec and Ontario that are also under consideration.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the member that the NTA hearings are going to be held precisely for the people, groups, companies and the municipalities and provinces that want to question the decision of CP and the mathematics of it. They will have the occasion to do that in front an independent body.

In the meantime, we will receive the report of the committee examining the NTA and when the NTA gives its final answer to the requests of CP we will have the benefit of all these elements in place to make our final decision.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but follow up on the remark made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. This Saturday, I will have had the privilege as others of serving in this House for four years and I thought I had heard it all, but a New Democratic member from Ontario talking about disastrous policies?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Keyes: The $1 billion lawsuit filed yesterday by Canadian Airlines is just further proof of an industry in decay due to this government's stalling. When is the Minister of Transport finally going to end the fears and uncertainty of over 16,000 employees of Canadian airlines and end this crisis in Canada's airline industry?

• (1500)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. member that we received a concrete proposal from PWA and the employees last Tuesday. Since that time we have been exercising due diligence to find a solution that will assure us of a viable airline industry in the interest of all Canadians.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the clock is ticking. Canadian employees do not have much time. I have been getting the same answer from the Minister of Transport all week so I will ask my supplementary question of the Minister of Finance, himself a former Minister of Transport.

Is the Minister of Finance prepared to show the leadership necessary to save the thousands of jobs in western Canada, in Calgary and Edmonton, or is he too prepared to inflict more economic damage on this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indicated earlier that we were very much concerned and impressed by the fact that the employees of Canadian Airlines and PWA have come forward with voluntary concessions in their wage package and have also decided to invest in their own company through payroll deductions.

This is why we are at the table at the present time trying to find a solution that will save these jobs.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

The small business community is having a very difficult time getting banks to lend it money whether through an SBLA or through a regular loan. If they do lend money to small business, the security or collateral demanded is extremely onerous. This is slowing our economic recovery.

Is there any indication that the banks are changing this policy, and is the government doing everything it can to convince them to do so?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, that is a very timely question. I have just met with the banks and the Canadian Bankers' Association.

They have reported to me a slight increase in dollar amounts of loans to small business. They have also reported to me that they have frozen their service charges for up to two years in the case of most banks. This, though, is not enough when we have the FBDB increasing its loans 13 per cent in 1992 alone.

Therefore I have been working with them this week to make sure that the Small Businesses Loans Act, which is a federal government guaranteed program, is well publicized, well communicated, and that their personnel are well trained to use it, not only the present SBLA which we are slightly amending right now in the House but any future changes.

Together with the over 4,000 loans the FBDB has made, FEDNOR, ACOA, WD, our program in Quebec and our Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development program, we are moving on all fronts to try to help the small business community.

Our distinguished guests are now attending the seminar on parliaments, governments, human rights and democracy being held this week here in our Parliament.

POINTS OF ORDER

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, there may be a slight problem. Right in the midst of launching the public hearings on NAFTA I called the office to obtain copies of NAFTA and was told that there were no copies left and that they do not plan to print any more. If we are going to ask Canadians to respond at public hearings and they are asking now for copies of the agreement to respond intelligently, we should take some steps.

I realize that floppy disks are available for those people who have computers, but if they want to read hard copy I am told it is not available.

We are lucky the Minister for International Trade is still here. Perhaps he could enlighten us on when copies may be available.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is correct. The text is available on diskette and if a person does not have the equipment to use a diskette, it can be taken to a print shop and a copy can be printed up.

We are reviewing the matter to see whether it is appropriate to have another run of the text made available in addition to the diskette.

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I would seek unanimous consent of the House on this point of order. I would ask, notwithstanding Standing Order 36, that I be allowed to move:

That the petition by Virginie Larivière on violence on TV be received by the House and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture for its consideration.

There has been some discussion among the parties with regard to this matter. I believe there might be unanimous consent.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, this is a very unusual point of order. We have not arrived at the point when petitions are presented.

The minister is probably anxious to get back to his duties in terms of his leadership campaign. I just want to indicate to him that we would consent to having the petition tabled at this time. It is totally out of order because if follows—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. We are all aware that the petition was not presented in the proper form and that unanimous consent was sought to present the petition. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is rising on a point of order of which I have notice. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg Wascana is seeking the floor as well.

At this point there should be a moment of recognition for one of our former colleagues. If other points of orders could wait until we are finished with that matter, I would appreciate it.

On the same point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Wascana.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, Winnipeg Transcona is the name of my riding.

I wanted to rise in order to indicate the agreement of the New Democratic Party caucus with the motion by the hon. minister that the petitions gathered by this young woman be accepted by Parliament and be referred to the appropriate committee.

Perhaps it should have come at another time. The point of the opposition House leader is well taken, but this is when it has been presented and I do not think we should muddy the waters at all. I think we should make it absolutely clear that Parliament has taken this decision on behalf of this young woman who collected these petitions and who is concerned about violence on TV.

Tributes

We all ought to be concerned about violence on TV and this is one of the ways that we can show it.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, we gladly accede to such a recommendation and such a resolution. We salute this girl's tremendous courage. After the hardship she suffered, she can indeed be a model for us. But perhaps the most important lesson to learn is that we should listen to children more often.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank all members, and I wish to apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona for having mispronounced the name of his riding. I should know better. He is quite right.

THE LATE ANTHONY ROMAN

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Anthony Roman, a great Canadian who died unexpectedly on Friday, October 30, 1992, while recovering from brain surgery.

Anthony Roman was born January 17, 1936 in Velky-Ruskov, Czechoslovakia. He immigrated to Canada on June 19, 1937.

As a young man, Mr. Roman attended St. Michael's High School in Toronto and later attended the Ontario Agricultural College in Guelph.

Tony Roman's interest in politics was apparent early. He was elected a ward councillor in the township in 1966. He became deputy reeve in 1968, and when the town of Markham was formed in 1971 he was elected its first mayor.

• (1510)

Tony Roman served the people of Markham with distinction for over 20 years. This record of service included being chairman of the Regional Municipality of York in 1984.

Also in 1984 he ran successfully as a member of Parliament for the riding of York North. While sitting as an independent MP in Ottawa, Tony Roman served on the public accounts committee and on the panel of chairmen for legislative bills.

I believe Tony's first love was being mayor of Markham. Under his leadership and guidance Markham grew from a small village to a prosperous, energetic town of over 150,000 residents.

As Acting Mayor Frank Scarpitti said:

> When you thought about Markham you thought about Tony Roman.

York Region Chairman Eldred King said:

> He's made a great contribution to the town of Markham and the region of York for over 22 years. He will be missed.

In closing, our love and prayers go out to Tony's wife Elsie, sons Michael and Edward, daughters Maria and Paula, and his father George.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, Anthony Roman was my predecessor as the member of Parliament for York North, and his commitment to those he represented has always been an example for me.

Mr. Roman was a public servant; he devoted his life to serving and helping people. More than almost anything else he loved his town, Markham, and contributed greatly to its growth and advancement. I know that Mr. Roman will be greatly missed by everyone in Markham, in York region, and by those he served with in this place.

His long and esteemed career began in 1966 when he was elected as councillor in the township. Mr. Roman went on to serve as deputy reeve and was elected mayor of Markham in 1971.

He served with distinction in that post until 1984. He was also the regional chair of York region that year. 1984 was also the year Mr. Roman was elected as member of Parliament for York North.

It is a mark of his singular appeal that a man who ran as an independent in 1984 was rewarded by the electorate with its trust. He honoured that trust as a a member of Parliament and devoted himself to defending the interests of his constituents above all else.

In 1988 Mr. Roman returned to municipal politics and once again was elected as mayor of Markham, a position he held until his untimely passing last month. In losing Tony Roman the town of Markham and York region have lost one of their most tireless champions.

On behalf of the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, our caucus and our party, I would like to offer our most heartfelt sympathies to his wife Elsie, his sons Michael and Edward, his daughters Maria and Paula, and his father George. Our thoughts and prayers are with them.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, when Tony Roman was elected to the House of Commons to represent the constituency of York North in 1984 he brought with him a wealth of experience from having served for many years at both the regional and municipal levels of government. In the four years of his service in the House of Commons he drew on that experience to bring the concerns of his constituents to this House and to the committees on which he served.

After he chose not to seek re-election to the House of Commons in 1988 he went on to become the mayor of his community and continued to serve in that office until his untimely passing on October 30, 1992.

Tony Roman will be sadly missed by the people of his community and by the people of Canada as a whole.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, I want to express our sincere condolences to Tony's wife Elsie and to their children Michael, Maria, Paula and Edward.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, I mourn also for Tony Roman and want to put on the record the fond memories that I have of working with him in his public life and the commitment that he had to the people who elected him to be here.

I think he was one of the least partisan of all of the members of this House, always ready and willing to work and share with us in the interests of serving all of our constituents better. He was a wonderful representative of Markham and he will be missed.

I want also to add that when the story is written one day of the history of liberation of eastern Europe, and particularly the part of it that his family came from, which is Slovakia, that no small part of the work of liberating that part of eastern Europe is to the credit of the Canadian communities of immigrants from those parts of the world.

Mr. Roman was a proud member of one of the families from Slovakia who worked tirelessly for advancing the interests of democracy and the interests of freedom in the part of eastern Europe from which they had come.

I know about some of the things that they did and I commend them. I look forward to other Canadians becoming aware of what it is that was done by him in the spirit of opening up freedom and democracy in that part of the world. He will be missed and I send my own wishes to the members of his family, whom I know, and to all of those who mourn for him.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I knew Mr. Roman when he was elected in 1984 and I sat beside him for a while. He was a great man. He was elected as an independent member and, as was said, he was not partisan. He co-operated with everybody. It is tragic that he died and will not see his home country of Slovakia become independent on January 1, 1993.

Mr. Roman was a devoted family member, he was a devoted Canadian, and served his country very well. My sympathies go to his wife and his children.

POINT OF ORDER

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, I shall have the opportunity to review the "blues" in a few minutes, but I did want to respond or seek some clarification of the statement made by the leader of the NDP during Question Period.

It was to the effect that the Liberal members on the subcommittee on trade had voted against the committee travelling to all provinces and territories of Canada. In fact, the subcommittee had agreed in September to undertake some extensive travel. The motion yesterday would have had the effect of delaying that travel and closing off the opportunity to travel to the additional points at a later date.

I can assure the member from the NDP that in fact we support travel across Canada, full hearings on NAFTA, and we are ready to extend that travel if funds permit.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On the same point order, but before recognizing the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, I would like to point out to the House we are referring to something that first happened in committee and now we are getting into a debate. As I have listened to the hon. member for Etobicoke North, I will now listen to the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, just to put the record straight, the motion did not delay any action by the committee but added to the committee's activities. No specific dates were set for the end of those hearings and I am afraid the record is correct as presented by the leader of my party. The Liberals did vote against a motion to provide hearings right across this country in every province.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will not get into debate on this subject at this time.

• (1520)

We now proceed to tabling of documents. The hon. Minister of Transport has the floor.

Mr. Corbeil: Madam Speaker, pursuant—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Just a moment. I just said, and I will gladly repeat it in French for the hon. member for Richelieu, that I certainly did not want this to turn into a debate because we started by talking about something that happened in committee. I think that we have heard both sides of the coin and I would really want us to get on with Routine Proceedings now. That is why I already recognized—

I would really like us to go now to Tabling of Documents, unless the hon. member really has—

I do not see why we would start a debate now on this subject.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I agree not to talk about that subject, but I will tell you that I am very surprised by your lack of patience with a member of the Bloc Quebecois as compared to the other two parties.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think that the hon. member's remark is out of place.

Even before the hon. member rose, I said that I thought it was time to end a debate that was not appropriate now, long before the hon. member decided to get up. Believe me, I would have had the same answer for anyone who rose in this House for the same reasons.

We now proceed to tabling of documents.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

50TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 50th report of the Standing Committee on House Management. Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-368, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sureties to keep the peace).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I am introducing this bill today because of the sad fact in Canada that peace bonds are ineffective as a deterrent to violence, most particularly violence against women.

It is hoped that the proposed amendments to sections 8(10) and 8(11) of the Criminal Code will make peace bonds more effective by sending out a message that offenders will be prosecuted and by compelling justices of the peace to issue peace bonds.

In brief, these amendments would make it incumbent upon the justice of the peace to issue a peace bond in the case where a complainant has demonstrated that her fears are reasonable and, second, classify breaches of the peace by a person bound by a recognizance as indictable offences.

In this age of violence against women, it becomes even more true that justice must not only be done, it must be seen to be done.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Ms. Clancy moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Mr. Riis: Point of order, Madam Speaker. My hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, tabled the report from the management committee. Was that report the one striking the committee membership of Bill C-91? If so, were the correct procedures followed?

In other words were the Whips in agreement with the committee members serving on Bill C-91? That is not my understanding.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, the information I was given was that the Whips were in agreement. Otherwise I would not have presented the report.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-369, an act to amend the Criminal Code (breaking and entering).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Guarnieri: Madam Speaker, I am presenting two bills that attempt to reduce the current free rein in crime. One is amendments to an act to amend the Young Offenders Act, the purpose of which is to ensure that young persons who are 16 years of age and over and who are accused of sexual or aggravated assault, or any offence that has resulted in death will be tried in adult court.

The second bill is to provide for the imposition of a minimum term of imprisonment of one year in respect to the person who has never committed a break and enter offence but then commits two or more such offences. The same punishment would be imposed in respect to the person who commits a break and enter offence for which there has been a previous conviction.

The amendment provides for a minimum of one year in prison for any person who is a repeat break and enter offender.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Ms. Guarnieri moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-370, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Guarnieri: Madam Speaker, in my eagerness I have already given the explanation on break and entry.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Ms. Guarnieri moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Mr. Riis: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I hesitate to raise this but I believe there have been some procedural improprieties.

The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader asked permission to table the management committee report regarding the membership of Bill C-91, and that can only be done if the Whips have agreed to the membership, as my hon. friend has indicated.

My understanding is that there was no agreement at this point as they try to assemble the membership of that committee. In that case I do not think the report is receivable because of the inappropriate procedures followed.

I simply want to make that point. Until this is clarified I would ask my friend to withdraw the request. It is a very important issue. Most legislative committees would not have the same serious consideration but we are dealing with the Patent Act and I think it important that that committee be appropriately assembled.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will listen to the hon. parliamentary secretary, of course, but I think the hon. member for Kamloops will agree that normally he should have risen when the parliamentary secretary rose to present that motion. Now it has been accepted.

• (1530)

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I have no wish to tamper with the process. That is the last thing on my mind. I was given the draft report. I was informed that the Whips had consulted and that there was agreement. I tabled it in good faith. I have to accept what my hon. friend tells me, that there was not such an agreement. In that case, I will withdraw the report if I have the consent of the House.

I take it from my hon. friend that it was his Whip that did not assent. I was led to believe that his Whip was in agreement and that there was some hesitation on the part of the Official Opposition Whip but I was told that hurdle had been cleared. Therefore I sought leave to table the report.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the generous comments of my hon. friend. I certainly take his word when he says that he was given the impression that all of the Whips had agreed.

I would have rose at the time when he asked leave to table the report but I was not certain of the content of the management report that he was referring to by number 91 or whatever it was. Since that has been clarified, my hon. friend has asked that the tabling be withdrawn until we get this matter cleared up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

DISPOSITION OF REPORT STAGE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would move:

That, notwithstanding the order made on Tuesday, June 23, 1992 under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), any recorded divisions necessary to dispose of the report stage of Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, shall be deferred until Monday, November 23, 1992 at 6 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

AUTHORIZATION FOR CHAIRMAN TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would move:

That the chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Toronto from November 22 to 24, 1992 to attend the 13th annual conference of the Canadian Comprehensive Auditing Foundation.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I will be pleased to give our consent, but we would remind the three parties in the House that for such travels or when the House of Commons makes such decisions, we would like the Bloc Quebecois to be given more consideration, in view of the referendum result.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is therefore carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Saint-Julien: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. I am a member of the public accounts committee and I will not go to Toronto.

COMPREHENSIVE REVIEW OF ACT

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, this is the last of my three motions. I would move:

That pursuant to section 14 of an act respecting the registration of lobbyists, chapter 44, fourth supplement, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations be the committee to undertake a comprehensive review of the administration and operation of this act and submit a report to this House no later than one year after the review is undertaken.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I want to make it clear that it is our intention to proceed with this but not at this moment. There are some deliberations that ought to occur before this motion is passed. I want to make clear that we will support it as New Democrats. It is the appropriate process but we have some discussions we want to carry on with the government before we do that.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, with respect to the motion, there were discussions among House leaders. I wish to indicate the consent of my party to proceed with the contents of this particular motion.

RIDEAU RIVER CLEAN-UP AND MAINTENANCE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions. The first petition deals with pollution in the Rideau River in my riding and was signed by a number of constituents in Ottawa—Vanier. I would like Parliament to ask the federal government to act as an equal partner with provincial and municipal authorities in implementing an action plan for clean-up and maintenance of the Rideau River.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, my second petition deals with the Court Challenges Program, which as you know has helped a number of individuals and minority groups to have their constitutional linguistic and equality rights clarified before the courts.

As you know, the program was abolished by the government, and your petitioners strongly urge Parliament to reinstate this program so that Canadians, whatever their income or resources, can bring their cases before the courts and defend their fundamental and linguistic rights.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present today.

The first one arises out of the death of a constituent of mine and is related to a theme that has already arisen a couple of times in the House today, that is the issue of violence against women.

The people who have signed this petition call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada to permit the courts to prevent the release of individuals where it is shown that there is a substantial likelihood of further conjugal or family violence being perpetrated.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, my second petition concerns Bill C-91 and the issue of amending the drug patent laws of Canada.

The petitioners are concerned about the effect of Bill C-91 and its relationship to the North American free trade agreement.

They call upon Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22, passed in 1987, so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions concerning the case of Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who are Canadians imprisoned in Brazil. In the judgment of many Canadians they should now be back in Canada but for the cruelty of the minister of external affairs who refuses to request their expulsion, thereby leaves them in prison in Brazil where riots and massacres take place and where they are in imminent danger.

I present these petitions calling upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, petitioners from the province of Manitoba, including my own constituency, point out that Winnipeg has been well served by the name Winnipeg International Airport, previously Stevenson's Field.

These petitioners point out that the government considered the possibility of changing the current name to Diefenbaker airport. They note that the former Prime Minister was a native of Saskatchewan, and as well they believe that some of his actions while he was Prime Minister harmed the province's air industry.

They want to stress that we have many Manitobans who have contributed to Manitoba and to its airline industry. Finally they stress that any change would cost a great deal of money to everyone. They oppose this change and they want to make sure that it is prevented. I support this petition.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present to this House petitions certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

They contain another 10,000 signatures of Canadians, many of them gathered by my colleague representing the riding of Haldimand—Norfolk.

• (1540)

They support my private member's Bill C-330. They want Canadians to have a greater say in the disposition of offenders in the judicial process and call on Parliament to support victims' rights and the protection of the public from violent offenders.

There will be tens of thousands more signatures to be made tomorrow before I have my private member's hour on Bill C-330.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from close to 200 constituents.

They draw the House's attention to the fact that the U.S. has unfairly imposed a duty on our softwood lumber exports to that country and has engaged in numerous other trade practices which amount to harassment of Canadian producers. They also note that the free trade agreement has caused Canada to lose jobs and devastated the Canadian economy without providing the promised benefits.

The petitioners, therefore, call on Parliament to request that the PM and the Minister for International Trade take any action necessary to defend the interests of the Canadian softwood lumber industry against unfair duties. They also request Parliament to act immediately to affect the cancellation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I would also like to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents relating to Bill C-91.

The petition seeks to end the further licensing of generic drugs in Canada and also proposes to extend the patent protection for periods of up to 20 years.

The petitioners call on Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or to provide less coverage.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, it is my honour again today to present to this House a large number of petitions signed by people from across the country in memory of Rosalynn Dupuis, a young girl who was brutally murdered in the spring of this year in the Sudbury area. A young offender has been charged.

It is truly unfortunate that it takes a tragedy such as this one to make us realize a change in attitude and law is necessary.

I would like to thank those who have taken the time to circulate this petition and sign it. The tremendous response to this petition confirms the need for a tougher young offenders law.

REQUEST TO STOP VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I wish to table a petition signed by residents of Lebel-sur-Quévillon in Abitibi, which says that films on television that show scenes of violence are dangerous and cannot be tolerated because they act as an incentive to further violence.

Your petitioners point out that toys that provide an excuse for violent games are unacceptable and production of such toys should be stopped. Freedom of the press should be restricted in the case of reporting acts of violence. Information is repeatedly given on acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio. This may act as an incentive to commit identical acts of violence.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation and thus stop violence in our society, protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

HEALTH

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition of thousands of names collected by hundreds of registered nurses from the Sechelt Peninsula, the Powell River area, Campbell River and the North Island, all members of the RNABC, as part of the national health action lobby.

They have collected thousands of names in support of a petition that asks the government to ensure that the Canadian Constitution will contain the five basic principles of medicare, that the federal government will reaffirm its cost-sharing responsibility with the provinces for health care and that the federal government will set up a national monitoring agency to enforce federal-provincial health care programs.

MACKENZIE VALLEY HIGHWAY

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I present the Mackenzie Valley highway petition which states that whereas the Canadian government announced the commencement of the Mackenzie Valley highway in 1972 and construction was started on this important transportation link to the north; and whereas the economic need for a highway system has never been greater than it is today, the federal government has transferred responsibility for northern road construction but not the funding to the government of the Northwest Territories.

Therefore we request that the federal and territorial governments accept their joint responsibilities to the residents of the Mackenzie Valley corridor and commence discussions now to prepare a phased implementation plan for completion of the highway to Fort Norman, Norman Wells, Fort Good Hope and further north to tie in with the existing highway south of Inuvik.

Furthermore, we recommend that these discussions take place with the involvement of northerners and include a construction timetable for completion.

This is presented on behalf of 150 residents of the Sahtu region.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to present four petitions. They are all different but all concerned with Bill C-86.

The first petition is signed by 60 persons from Toronto who are concerned with recent amendments to the immigration bill, Bill C-86. In particular, they strongly oppose the restrictions and delay that parents will face when seeking to join their sons and daughters in Canada.

Therefore your petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to withdraw these amendments.

I have a second petition with 126 names of Canadians who are concerned with many of the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act and Bill C-86. They particularly oppose the provisions that allow decisions to be made retroactively on the ground that it would cause many individuals and families who have already relied upon an earlier decision to be affected in a serious manner.

They urge Parliament to urge the government to withdraw these amendments.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, my third petition is from 133 Canadians who point out that the refugee board at present is not allowed to review decisions even when it is apparent that a mistake may have been made, evidence that was missing is now available, or that the situation has turned.

This is in spite of the fact that the United Nations minimum guarantee for refugee status determination requires an appeal on the merits.

Therefore the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation which would provide a meaningful appeal on the merits for refugee claimants whose cases are rejected such that they have appeal rights comparable with everyone else in Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Finally, Madam Speaker, I have a petition from 136 people who are concerned with many of the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act, particularly the provisions allowing a detention review, after an initial hearing, only once every 30 days for persons detained by Canada Immigration.

They ask that the legislation provide for a detention review by an adjudicator within 48 hours with two further reviews conducted at least once in each of the next seven days, to ensure that no one is detained without unequivocal proof that he or she is a danger to the public or would not appear for the immigration proceedings.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of various communities: Westmount, Quebec; Gananoque, Ontario; Kingston, Ontario; and other places in Ontario including Calabogie and Kitchener.

The petitioners are opposed to the goods and services tax on books which the former Minister of Finance, who is here now, introduced. He must be feeling quite repentant because these petitions have been signed by thousands of Canadians across the country. There is a major campaign objecting to the tax that he introduced in this House. I hope he is feeling suitably chastized now that he has left that office because of the outrage he has provoked among Canadians concerning this tax on books. I think Canada is one of the few countries in the free world that taxes reading material.

These petitioners humbly call upon this House to repeal the iniquitous goods and services tax as it applies to books, newspapers and magazines.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by over 600 people from communities in my riding such as Prince Albert, Shellbrook, Christopher Lake, Spruce Home and Weirdale.

These people appreciate the benefits that they have had from the generic drug industry as we know it. They recognize Bill C-91 is another piece of legislation driven by free trade legislation. It is going to cost Canadians over $500 million in the coming years.

Therefore they are calling upon Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am presenting petitions today regarding the passage of Bill C-91, respecting the Patent Act.

The petitioners have asked the government to not proceed with the passage of this act. The legislation would seek to end the licensing of further generic drugs in Canada and would allow brand-name drug companies to market their drugs virtually without competition by generic companies for periods of up to 20 years. They are asking for a reconsideration of this act and the long-term costs of passing this type of legislation.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): I have a second petition to present, Madam Speaker.

A number of petitioners from my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap are very concerned about the proposed North American free trade agreement as it pertains to the possibility of water exports through non-energy pipelines.

They are asking that article 1401 of the proposed North American free trade agreement be reconsidered, that the government not proceed with this particular section of the agreement and that the government resolves the uncertainty surrounding the issue of water exports through the execution of a separate and binding joint diplomatic agreement stating that nothing in either the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or the proposed North American agreement would apply to Canada's water resources in other than bottled form.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure of introducing a petition in the House of Commons signed by many residents in the national capital region.

These residents are extremely upset with the high gasoline prices in the capital region when compared with prices in the rest of Ontario. These petitioners are calling on the government to take appropriate action in order to correct this injustice.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by approximately 300 residents of the Rosewood area in Scarborough—Rouge River.

The petition is in support of the work of the parents of Nina de Villiers. It points out the inadequacy of the judicial interim release procedures under the Criminal Code, the vulnerability of women and children to violent crime, the lack of accountability of agents of the Crown in bail proceedings and calls upon the government to make the necessary amendments to the Criminal Code and related legislation.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by 1,032 residents of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituency who call on the government to withdraw Bill C-91, the legislation that allows brand-name prescription drug companies to market their drugs without competition from generic drugs for periods of up to 20 years.

The petitioners, like those 438 signatories that I presented yesterday to the House, want to benefit from lower priced prescription drugs and want the provincial drug programs also to receive that benefit.

These petitions were signed and gathered by individuals who live in communities in my constituency like Mervin, Turtleford, Edam, Livelong, Leoville, Wilkie, Hafford, Blaine Lake, Marcelin, Richard, Stump Lake, Canwood, Speers, Mayfair and Paradise Hill. I thank the petitioners for their efforts.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of constituents from my riding, from the province itself and from the country dealing with the distribution of pornographic materials.

The petitioners ask Parliament to prohibit the distribution and sale of pornographic materials in our country such as Madonna's book.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition where the petitioners are concerned about the potential export of water by inter-basin transfers through the North American free trade agreement.

This is petition 343. I suppose there must have been thousands and thousands of petitioners who have indicated their concern. We are still waiting for the Minister for International Trade to announce that water is actually an exclusion from this deal.

Therefore the petitioners are simply asking once again for the minister to state that water is not part of the North American free trade agreement and to have to explicitly stated in the agreement.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Yes, four:

Mr. John Murphy, permanent alternate representative on the council to ICAO. Mr. Peter Bailey, chief, fleet and infrastructure. Mr. Ted Rudback, director general, Economic Analysis. Ms. Gail Zahradnitzky, regional director Winnipeg, policy and co-ordination.

This information has been protected under the Privacy Act section 26. However under section 8 of the Privacy Act, Ms. Zahradnitzky has agreed to release some information in light of an access to information request.

That is that she has received $7,391.44 in temporary dual residence assistance.

Mr. Bailey: His house did not sell in six months;

Mr. Rudback: Lease on dwelling in Montreal and family commitments;

Ms. Zahradnitzky: Her house had not been sold.

The department received notification from Ms. Zahradnitzky in December of 1991 that her house would be rented three to six months beginning in January 1992. At this time she was no longer receiving temporary dual residence assistance. Assistance ceased in September 1991.

Question No. 388—Mr. Mifflin:

Question No. 390—Miss Campbell (South West Nova):

For the fiscal year of 1991-92, how many public tenders did the Department of Supply and Services call and close without an award being made and what was the cost to the parties who bid on these cancelled tender calls?

Hon. Paul Wyatt Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): There is no mechanism in the procurement and acquisition support system (PASS) data base that can identify the number of times we might not issue a contract as a result of a tender call. Further, we are unable to identify the cost to the parties who bid on these cancelled tender calls. Only the parties themselves would be able to provide this information.

Question No. 400—Mr. Fisher:

Question No. 403—Miss Campbell (South West Nova):

With respect to the Department of Fisheries' helicopter service stationed in Yarmouth to provide fisheries surveillance in the Scotia Fundy region, (a) how is the number of actual flying hours arrived at after considering base costs (b) how many fishery surveillance trips were taken for the past eight months, how many hours were used for each trip, what was the total cost to the Department of Fisheries and how many charges were laid for overfishing (c) how many search and rescue trips were made over the same period of time and who paid for them?

Hon. John Carnell Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): DFO has a fixed budget for helicopter services in Southwest Nova. Actual flying hours are determined by:

(i) subtracting monthly basing charges and operational expenses (hangar maintenance, crew travel, and fuel) from the over-all budget; and

(ii) dividing the balance of the budget by the fixed hourly flying rate to determine the number of actual flying hours.

From January 1 to August 31, 1992, DFO conducted 163 surveillance trips utilizing 424 hours or an average of 2.6 hours per trip. The total cost was $1.4 million. During these trips, DFO encountered 64 suspected violations as follows:

—26 domestic vessels fishing during a closed season;

—8 domestic vessels fishing in a closed area;

—4 domestic vessels with improper identification markings;

—4 incidents of illegal salmon and lobster gear;

—1 foreign vessel entering Canadian fisheries waters without authority; and

—21 domestic vessels fishing not in accordance with their conditions of licence.

For that same period, the helicopter conducted eight search and rescue missions involving 12 actual trips totalling 20.9 hours. DFO covered the cost of 12.3 hours and DND covered the balance.

Question No. 411—Mr. Barrett:

Regarding the series of shows featuring trade commissioners to be held in Toronto, Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver later this year (a) what is the total estimated cost for the series of shows (b) what is the cost for each show (c) how much will be spent to bring trade commissioners back from their posts (d) have any contracts been entered into by the government in relation to these shows with private companies or individuals (e) what is the value of each of these contracts and who are the individuals or companies involved?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): In its eighth year ExportVision, formerly known as Marketplace, has been held annually by External Affairs and International Trade Canada to promote exports, exporting and to provide direct assistance and information on export markets and government assistance programs to Canada's business community in all regions during October, Canada International Trade Month.

This annual series of seminars and workshops, one-on-one meetings between trade commissioners and company representatives, self-funded networking luncheons and outreach activities with local chambers of commerce, colleges and schools and media representatives took place across Canada during October.

Some 3,500 persons, mostly from the private sector, participated in one or more of ExportVision's events. It remains too early for companies to say what impact their participation will have on their export operations this year. However, for example, last year, as a result of information provided in an interview that took place at the advance technology Marketplace in Vancouver, Systemhouse Pacific entered into an alliance with Samsung Data Systems Co. Ltd. of Korea, to provide its systems integration expertise to Asia. The potential of this deal is worth hundreds of millions to Canadians over the next five years.

The total estimated cost for the series held in Toronto, Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver is $99,275 and the individual estimated costs are: Toronto—$63,000; Montreal—$20,275; Calgary—$4,000; and Vancouver—$12,000. These costs include in-house costs.

Trade commissioners returning to participate in ExportVision also receive ongoing training, briefings and departmental initiative updates as part of their regular duties. Therefore the total estimated travel costs of $166,000 cannot totally be attributed to ExportVision.

Private sector contracts entered into regarding ExportVision are as follows:

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I am seeking some guidance here. I submitted Question No. 207 regarding the goods and services tax revenues in December 1991. It concerned the amounts and where they would be applied. There is still no response.

I was wondering if I could have an indication as to when it might be answered. As we can well appreciate, constituents are interested in this question and I have been getting some telephone calls.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I am a little concerned that my hon. friend has waited so long. I can tell him there are some three departments involved and the report is proceeding reasonably well. I believe it would be possible to produce it within the foreseeable future. I give my friend the undertaking that I will pursue it personally for him.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would ask that the Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

TRANSPORTATION

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received one application pursuant to Standing Order 52.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 52 to request an emergency debate on the state of Canada's transportation industry. I request this debate for a number of reasons, most of which are being played out on the front pages of most of our newspapers at this very moment. One of course is the story we have all been following very closely in the past number of weeks which involves all Canadians. That is the crisis in the airline industry which involves not only PWA and Canadian Airlines, but also Air Canada.

I think it is incumbent upon us as members of Parliament to stand up here in Parliament and debate this issue and debate it very, very soon.

In particular, as an Atlantic Canadian, the news yesterday in Atlantic Canada with regard to transportation was not particularly good. We have a crisis looming there as well since CP Rail made known its intention to abandon or seek abandonment of all its rail lines in Atlantic Canada.

I do not think I have to go on any further. It is being suggested by the other side of the House that I save my speech for the debate. Madam Speaker, I want to impress upon you the importance of it because in a country as large as Canada I think the 27 million Canadians who are watching us from time to time should be aware of exactly what is happening out there and it is incumbent upon us as members of Parliament to put that message out.

The decision has been made by CP Rail to abandon the rail lines in eastern Canada. That is an entire region of Canada that is going to be abandoned by a major corporation that has been mandated and has the responsibility to provide a service to a very important part of this country.

I request under Standing Order 52 an emergency debate based on the crisis facing Canada's transportation industry.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I rise on a point order, Madam Speaker. I wonder if I could be helpful on this point. Earlier in the week representatives of the New Democratic Party and others called for an emergency debate on the crisis facing our two major airlines.

• (1600)

Also, since then the crisis in Atlantic Canada, with the announcement that CP would be abandoning its rail, has arisen. To assist the Chair, I want to make it clear, since the request has come from a representative of the Progressive Conservative Party, on behalf of the New Democrats here in the House of Commons that this will be an opportunity to show the people of Canada that we are prepared to address what have to be the critical issues of the day, which I think was made very clear in the referendum campaign.

We are prepared to give our unanimous consent to this request to ensure that a proper debate takes place later tonight, not only on the airline crisis but on the crisis in the transportation sector generally, particularly, as my hon. friend mentioned, the situation regarding the CP announcement.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to echo what the hon. member for Kamloops has just said. We share the concern that has been raised by the hon. member.

As the government has obviously had one of its members put this forward and agrees that it is a crisis, I want to say that we would be more than happy to have an emergency debate and hope that Your Honour will find in favour of the position put forward by the hon. member.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am not exactly certain how this ought to proceed. However, if it will be helpful perhaps we could ask my hon. friend if he would seek unanimous consent of the House because the House could then agree and the debate would occur with the understanding that it would occur with the same restrictions and regulations that an emergency debate would have.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. members for their contributions.

I have in front of me an application under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte. I can understand the importance of the subject on which he is proposing the House should have an emergency debate.

At this time I do not think that it meets with the requirements of Standing Order 52. In that sense, I am not in a position to grant this emergency debate.

On the other hand, should House leaders get together and propose something to the House, then I am the servant of the House, as you all know. At this time I cannot, according to Standing Order 52, grant this emergency debate.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, if I have interpreted what you have said correctly consent to debate or emergency debate has been denied, but I do seek unanimous consent of the House to proceed in that fashion. If that would be appropriate I would then seek unanimous consent to do so.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that under Standing Order 52 an application is made to the Speaker as to the propriety, the correctness, the timeliness and the need for an emergency debate. It would seem to me that is the route it should go, and that we should await the Speaker's ruling on that particular question by the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I think the minister's suggestion is an excellent one. However, I think my recollection is that a decision has been rendered by the Chair and the Chair has deemed that this was not, in the Chair's estimation, a reason for an emergency debate.

I sense a spirit of generosity in the House today. My hon. friend has asked for unanimous consent for a special debate, let us call it, on this crisis that is facing the country, particularly those members from Atlantic Canada, and I simply want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party—I know I can speak for my colleagues—that we would be enthusiastic about a special debate this evening on this emergency facing the transportation sector of our country.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think that what my hon. friend from Kamloops is endeavouring to do is bring us holus-bolus the next stage of parliamentary reform, which would provide for such special debate.

I welcome his and his party's support. I would hope that he would agree, and it would be nice to have his commitment right here and now, to embrace the next phase of parliamentary reform including that provision. I see him nodding. I gather that we have his acceptance. If we could accept the balance of those recommendations and amend the Standing Orders right here and now it would be very positive and desirable.

As I understand it there is, in the absence of changes to the Standing Orders, no provision for the procedure that my hon. friend from Kamloops is proposing.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): I do stand to be corrected, but it is my understanding that it is a well-founded principle of our procedure that the House may at any time do virtually anything it wants by unanimous consent.

If the House decides by unanimous consent that it wishes to appoint a time this evening for the debate of this matter and wishes that debate to be conducted under terms that normally would be applicable only to emergency debates but decides in its wisdom at this time that it wants that debate to be so conducted then by unanimous consent it may so appoint.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, we might consider giving our unanimous consent, but not right away, not until we have discussed with the three leaders the role the Bloc will play in this debate in terms of the number of speakers.

Madam Deputy Speaker: At any rate, the Chair is in an extremely difficult position right now because Standing Order 52 says one thing—and there has already been a ruling on that—and pursuant to Standing Order 52, the request the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte is making does not meet all the conditions.

That being said, I did hear him request the unanimous consent of this House for such a debate to take place without the traditional request from the three House leaders. Unanimous consent has not been granted at this time. However, if the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte were to bring forward a written motion in due form requesting unanimous consent, the Chair would gladly put such motion to the House at that time. That is the only way I could accommodate the hon. member's request at this time without infringing upon these rules of ours that we have given ourselves.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the legislative committee.

Mr. Comuzzi: Madam Speaker, my point of order concerns the bill that is before the House right now in consideration of report stage.

To facilitate debate on the motions before the House today I would ask that perhaps the government side would consider not discussing their motions which just showed up on the Order Paper today.

It is an immigration bill. It has been rushed through hearings this summer in the House, and just this morning we received 10 or 12 recommendations from the government with respect to certain changes that it wants made on the Order Paper.

We know that the debate is going to carry on at this stage not only for the balance of today but it will most likely continue on Monday and perhaps into Tuesday.

There will be no harm done. It just gives us on this side of the House the opportunity to review the motions brought forward by the government and placed on the Order Paper today. We would be able to respond with perhaps a little more accuracy on those motions at another time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In just a moment I will listen to the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

I would like to give the official ruling as to what has been accepted and the way the motions have been divided.

• (1610)

I heard the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon saying that some motions came in at a late hour. All motions came to the House in the very late afternoon yesterday, for six o'clock last night.

I can tell the hon. member that our officers worked quite late into the evening and even early into the night so that we could get this together. Nobody has had more time or less time to study anybody else's motion.

I think the hon. member should first listen to the ruling as it will be given and then if the hon. member wants to discuss some further arrangements with the parliamentary secretary on the government side, that of course will be his own decision.

Does the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina have anything to add to this?

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I will wait. I will listen to your ruling and then perhaps resume this point.

Mr. Comuzzi: Madam Speaker, I understand the capable staff of this House worked well into the late hours of last evening in order to get this matter before the House in proper form.

On the Order Paper of yesterday, there were only those motions which were presented by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de Grâce of our party. There were no other motions on the Order Paper yesterday. As a result, if you check the Order Paper of yesterday you will find that those other motions appeared on the Order Paper on November 18 and there were no such motions on November 17. I say that with some respect.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As the hon. member does know, our Standing Order requires for all amendments to be at the Table before six o'clock the day before. Many arrived only late yesterday afternoon. We did the best we could and I am sure that with a little bit of discussion or negotiation things can be worked out.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out lines 32 to 34 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"prescribed date in each calendar year, which prescribed date shall be no later than November 1, cause"

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to explain very briefly the purpose of this amendment.

In the legislative committee it was agreed that such an amendment would be a good idea. What we agreed however was that the wording would read "that not later than the 60th day before the commencement of each calendar year".

Obviously the 60th day is something approaching the first day of November. It makes much more sense to put the first day of November in there and it has no other impact other than to be a little bit more modern and a little bit more sensible.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out line 11 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"making the application and any or all accompanying dependants".

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 4 by adding immediately after line 43 at page 15 the following:

"(6) A visa officer shall not refuse to issue a visitor's visa to a person who made an application pursuant to subsection (1), or any of the persons's dependants, where the person satisfies the visa officer that

(a) the person has a place of residence, immediate family and permanent employment in the person's country;

(b) the person and the person's dependants, as the case may be, have return tickets and intend to return to that country; and

(c) the person does not have a pending application for landing.

(7) For the purposes of paragraph 6(b), the fact that a person and the person's dependants will return to the person's country shall be presumed unless there is strong evidence to the contrary."

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

That Bill C-86 be amended in clause 4 by adding immediately after line 43 at page 15 the following:

"(6) A visa officer shall, in determining under this section whether or not an application for entry as a visitor is a person who may be granted entry as a bona fide visitor, take into account the existence of a valid and subsisting performance bond, surety or other prescribed security provided therefor to the Deputy Minister by a Canadian citizen or permanent resident who is a father, mother, brother, sister, son or daughter of the applicant or the spouse of a father, mother, brother, sister, son or daughter of the applicant and the existence of any security described in this subsection may be taken into account in relation to family of the applicant who intend to accompany the applicant on the same proposed visit.

(7) The absence of any security described in subsection (6) shall not be taken into account in making the determination described in subsection (2) and (4)".

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved:

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out line 8 at page 16 and substituting the following therefor:

"of that person".

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon) moved:

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 102 by striking out line 23 at page 111 and substituting the following therefor:

"and occupation, which terms and conditions shall be imposed for a period not exceeding two years".

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 102 by adding immediately after line 45 at page 114 the following:

"(13) Where an immigrant has paid fees for a visa application, the fees so incurred shall be reimbursed to the immigrant if the application is refused, or is not considered, as a result of retroactive regulations."

Mr. Comuzzi: Madam Speaker, these motions have been grouped: Motion No. 3 dealing with family members: Motion No. 5 dealing with visitors' visas; Motion No. 70 with residency requirements; and Motion No. 74 which deals with the refund of the fee. Let me first deal with family members and what is specifically meant by this clause.

When officials and senior immigration officers are processing an application they can assess all members of a family when deciding on the immigration application of one member of that family. It is our position that the application should only be assessed on the merits of that particular person who is making an application to come to Canada, along with those members of his family who will accompany the applicant to Canada.

Unless this procedure is followed it is a fundamental denial of procedural fairness if some person is being tried, being judged or is having an adjudication made on his or her behalf based on the actions of perhaps another family member.

When we talk about family members under the extended meaning of that phrase it embraces a whole class of people: spouses, fiancés, unmarried children of any age, a child under 13, or parents of any age, grandparents who are over 60, orphan brothers and sisters, nephews, nieces or grandchildren. It goes on and on.

The purpose of this amendment dealing with family members is to ensure that the application and consideration should only be given to that person who is applying for status along with those dependants or those people he will be bringing with him at the time of his application.

There is a proverb that we never had any opportunity to pick our family members, in his wisdom the good Lord having deprived us of that right, but he allowed us to choose our own friends. This particular section reminds me of that. It reminds this side that people who are making an application to come to this country are being jeopardized by certain acts of members of a truly large and extended family.

A hypothetical situation could result in valued members, whom we would welcome with open arms into our country as the very type of people this country wants and whose skills we need, being denied admittance because after an investigation of the extended family members one may have done something that is contrary to certain sections of the act. Although that person is not making any representation to become a Canadian citizen the application of that whole family is denied because of the acts of that one person at whatever time in that person's history.

We feel that matter should be clarified and that procedural fairness should be applied just to those people making application and to those who are intending to come to Canada with the original applicant.

With respect to visitors' visas, we are proposing a more definitive way for those folks who are working the immigration offices throughout the world to be able to make a more definitive answer with respect to visitors' visas.

We all know, those of us who work in our constituency offices, that if there is an immigration matter that comes before us it more often concerns a refusal of a visitor's permit to Canada. When there is an intervention by a member of Parliament questioning the wisdom of not granting a visitor's permit I would say that on 99.9 per cent of the occasions that this happens the visitor's permit is granted.

What we are trying to do with Motion No. 5 is eliminate some of the abuses that we have been finding recently in the foreign offices throughout the world, some of which we have heard of just recently. The amendment deals with the further presumption that when a person makes a statement under oath to a department official in our embassies that there is a fundamental rule in law of a presumption of innocence.

What we should be doing in this instance is presuming that the person who comes to our offices to be granted a visitor's visa should be presumed to have told the truth about everything in that application. At this particular period of time there is a presumption that perhaps what is being stated to a visa officer is not true.

What we are really doing in this motion is enforcing the concept which we all hold very dear in the system of laws that we have in this country, which is the presumption that the person who is making those statements is making the proper statements.

Therefore, we recommend that particular change with respect to the additions of the immigration officer being put into the position—and the operative words in the section that we propose are "shall not refuse", providing certain conditions in that application are adhered to. Once those conditions are adhered to it should only be a matter of procedure that the visitors' visa be granted to those people planning to visit relatives or friends in Canada.

Motion No. 70 concerns the residency requirement. It says that at the time of issuing an immigrant visa the period of time allocated to live in certain communities within our country should be limited to a two-year period.

I must confess that I have some doubts about this particular section. I am absolutely sure that this is one of the first sections of this proposed act that will be tested in the courts, right up to the Supreme Court of Canada, if it should pass. If a person becomes a landed immigrant and eventually becomes a citizen of this country and is forced to stay in a certain area, it infringes on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

If I am correct, what we are trying to do in legislation such as we have before us today is prevent the application and the costly processes with regard to legislation this House passes and which places a tremendous burden on Canadian citizens to have their matters tested in the courts. It is the duty of all of us who have anything to do with the wording of legislation to provide the proper legislation to prevent the necessity for this particular section to be tested in the courts for interpretation.

This is the highest court in the land. We should be very precise in the wording we use and very precise with what we are asking people to do through legislation such as this so that it does not interfere with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of Canada.

I would suspect that this is a matter that would be tested in the courts in very short order if this motion is not adhered to.

I might also add that on the residency requirement the Senate committee voted unanimously that this amendment, requiring a period not exceeding two years, be accepted. We propose that amendment with Motion No. 70.

Motion No. 74 concerns the refund of immigration fees. The bill as it reads now anticipates a retroactive processing charge of immigrant applications up to the point of either a suspension or a cancellation by the minister. Our amendment is again based on procedural fairness. The change that we are proposing in this particular motion is that once an application is accepted by a responsible official of the Government of Canada if that application at any time is thwarted because of procedural requirements or whatever reason, which should have been discovered at the time of acceptance of that application, then any funds paid by the person making the application should be refunded.

I believe the cost now is about $350. To some members of this House $350 is not a great amount of money. However, for people of Third World countries $350 is a large amount of money. That represents perhaps their total life savings, which they have given for the opportunity to come to Canada.

We would suggest once an application is accepted and the fee is paid that if there is a breakdown in the process or a suspension of the process that money be returned to the applicant.

Those are the points we want to make. We impress upon the government that they are very valid points. In some instances they will stop court proceedings. There is then a certain procedural fairness that applies to all Canadians by adhering to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of our country. It would make good sense if all sides accepted those recommendations.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to speak to these amendments.

First, I would like to congratulate my colleague for Thunder Bay—Nipigon for his excellent work on behalf of our caucus on the many amendments that have been proposed. I would also like to remind the House that the bill we are discussing today consists of some 113 pages, 128 clauses, the most extensive amendments in the history of the Immigration Act in Canada.

We should give due care and time to consider the amendments that we have proposed today. With respect to Motion No. 3 respecting family members, I would like to indicate that I strongly underscore the point made earlier by my colleague.

Indeed, we should continue to respect the individuality of citizens wherever they are. When they come and apply to Canada to be potential immigrants, the difficulties of one may not be used to penalize the potential benefits of others that come to our country.

We have seen cases of that. I have seen actual cases of a family member left behind. Now they are trying to continue to so–call extend the investigation of the remaining family member. Therefore, those who have arrived are filled with fear and trepidation. Will they be sent back if this one additional member of their family is unable to be allowed in under our current regulations?

I would like to underscore the fact that yes, we must evaluate those who have applied. Consider them on the basis of their reasons and intentions and the wishes of those of the same family who elect for whatever reason not to be included in that application must be respected. I have wondered if without that amendment being adopted we can in fact prevent really large families from coming to Canada under the guise that one family member is not admissible. That is not in keeping with the standards of the United Nations.

On the second point, Motion No. 5, regarding the visitor's visa, indeed we must underscore that the presumption of goodwill must be in favour of the applicant. We are proud of ourselves as a nation. We try to promote tourism to Canada. What better tool for tourism to say yes, Canada welcomes visitors from any land. Visitors applying to visit the country should not be quizzed as though they were already on trial, as though they were committing an offence. It is really a disgrace if we let the impression continue that in order to enter Canada you must pass a critical test, almost like a judicial trial.

We have to give the presumption of favourable consideration to the visitor applicants, moreover I submit, particularly when relatives of the potential visitor applicants are citizens of Canada. Can you imagine a Canadian citizen deprived of the benefit of a visit from his or her relatives from their country of birth?

It would be most painful, particularly when those visits are to join families in Canada in a special celebration such as a wedding anniversary. A golden anniversary is a classic example. Sometimes even when visiting family members whose relatives are near death in a hospital they encounter problems.

I submit that we should give good guidelines to our immigration officials so that they too will be placed in an easier position to evaluate. Let us remove from them as well the heavy burden of making the judgment as though the visitors are to violate the immigration law and the law of the country.

On the motion submitted by my colleague for Scarborough—Rouge River, I would like to indicate that this suggestion on the part of my colleague is really an attempt, almost a last desperate attempt, to find an additional tool with which we can allow legitimate visitors to enter the country.

If one were to ask me, we ought not to come to the requirement of a surety or a bond, but my colleague in trying to find a solution and give that extra ounce of assurance has come up creatively with this proposal which I support. I would like to indicate that perhaps this type of requirement would not be the routine requirement in the future.

On the issue of Motion No. 70 about the residency requirement, like my colleague from Thunder Bay I am seized by a nagging fear that this requirement may be contrary to section 6, paragraph 2, of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This section guarantees the mobility of any Canadian citizen, including landed Canadian immigrants. By reducing it to a two–year requirement, it could be construed perhaps as a part of a work contract. I am sure prospective immigrants would not mind that kind of designation to a designated place. I hope the courts would take a reasonable look at that.

I was once an immigrant. I entered the country in 1968. When I entered the city of Winnipeg in Manitoba, I did not think that I was only entering Winnipeg, although I knew where I was going geographically. I knew I was becoming a Canadian immigrant and in the future a Canadian citizen, which I did some three or four years later, in 1972.

The intention of the immigrant to be a Canadian should be looked upon with the kind of broad view that truly it is more than a mere statement of wanting to be a Canadian. There is inherent in that the rights that accrue to being a Canadian immigrant and in the future a Canadian citizen. Those rights are entrenched in the Citizenship Act and also in the Immigration Act.

On that basis, I definitely support a limitation of the residency requirement to at most two years in the belief that this will facilitate the entry of some of the immigrants in areas where their expertise and skills are needed most during a certain period of time.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): I want to thank you for reading through the amendment which was a little long but it was either you, Madam Speaker, or me who was going to read it.

In looking at this amendment, I want to ask members to put on somebody else's shoes here. I want them to put on the shoes of a Canadian who has a mother, father, brother, sister, son or daughter who is not a Canadian citizen and who resides in another country.

I want members to do that and then plan a visit of their family member, let us say their father or the mother. Plan a reunion, go through all of the planning, set aside the funds, get the family organized here, get the family organized there, purchase the airline ticket, which for overseas travel could be $1,000 or $2,000. Maybe it is the father and the mother. Then I want the members to think about their father and mother lining up at a foreign embassy or a high commission for a few hours, starting maybe at 5 a.m. or 6 a.m. and then being told to go away and get some more paperwork. Go and get a letter from your son or daughter in Canada. Do something else, we are missing a piece of paper. Come back next week. Bring them back next week, go through the process again, and then have the Canadian official decide no. In that context let us not have the Canadian official give any reason for the rejection of the application. Let us take the mother and father in that country and take them back to their home and have them write or telephone the son or daughter in Canada and say: "We were turned down. We do not know why".

I want members to put those shoes on and try to figure out why it is so many close relatives of Canadians living in countries abroad are turned down for visits. I know it is a large number because my constituents come to me with these problems. Maybe it does not happen in a lot of cities and towns across Canada, but it does happen in the riding that I represent. I know it happens in all of the ridings around my riding in metropolitan Toronto, and is probably a similar circumstance in Vancouver, Montreal and in other larger cities in Canada. This is a problem.

I want members to wear those shoes and I want the members to try to think of a way to overcome the problem. To date, we have not.

The law says now that the burden of showing entitlement to a visitor's visa is on the applicant, not on anybody else. If the applicant simply fails to convince the visa officer that he or she is bona fide and that he or she will comply with the terms of the visa, simply failing to convince is sufficient. The visa officer does not have to decide that person is a liar or will not comply. The visa officer simply has to reach a conclusion that the applicant has failed to convince.

There are a lot of reasons why these kinds of applicants could fail to convince. For example, they may not speak English very well. This happens all the time. They cannot convey. They are bona fides. They cannot convey all the nuances that have to be conveyed in trying to convince a visa officer that they are bona fide. I want members to think about that.

I and all members recognize that there are abuses. There have been abuses of the visitor visas and it still goes on now, originating from many countries. The current system penalizes the close relatives of Canadians, Canadian citizens. Canadians say: "Why can my mother, father, brother, sister, son and daughter not visit?" I do not have an answer for them.

This amendment which I have moved would permit a Canadian to put forward a surety or form of guarantee to the immigration deputy minister in the same type of surety vehicle that exists now for people who are released from custody by immigration officials. This would assist the visa officer if that surety was in existence and put forward by the Canadian in relation to the proposed visit of the mother, father, brother, sister, son or daughter. The visa officer would then know that there was a Canadian at the other end because sometimes they do not know that. They would know there was a Canadian who had put forth an undertaking that manifested or articulated the good faith of the Canadian in relation to the visit.

Some have suggested that there could be a charter problem here, but I do not understand that. I do not understand it because we already use sureties under the Immigration Act. Already visa officers abroad will consider letters from the Canadian relative alleging good faith or offering good faith and undertakings of financial support of the proposed visitor. As it so often happens with family visitors who do not often come with a lot of money, they stay with the relative here.

That is what my amendment proposes. My amendment does not change any of the existing criteria for visitor visas. None of those criteria are changed. All that it does is permit the addition of one new element, the surety representing the good faith of the Canadian in the invitation of the visitor who is a close family member.

I say to members here and I say to the members opposite recalling that this very subject was a matter which was considered as part of Private Members' Business in this House about a year ago. I say to them that it is important. I say that the Department of Immigration has not fairly and adequately considered this as a problem for reasons which I do not know. I certainly represent Canadians who know that it is a problem. The government has not responded. I say to it: Please, do not miss this opportunity to address this very particular and very real problem.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I rise particularly to speak to Motion No. 7 which stands in my name. Since it is a very simple motion I will have to explain what it is.

On page 16 of the bill, section 10.2(1) states:

> An immigrant who makes an application in Canada for landing may apply on behalf of that person and every dependant in Canada.

The point of my amendment is to strike out the words "in Canada" and replace them with the words "of that person" so that immigrant would be able to apply on behalf of himself or herself and every dependant of that person.

If a family is coming here and perhaps one teen-age dependant remains to study in the old country or for some reason wishes to stay temporarily but follow, it would seem to me very unfortunate if that person were not able to have an application for landing processed along with the parents and any other brothers and sisters.

It would be doubly unfortunate if the sponsorship procedure, which has now slowed down considerably through the mail-in arrangements at least around Toronto or the general crowding caused that 17 or 18 year old to be delayed in the working out of his application until he or she passed the age of 19. In that case he or she would no longer be a family member within the meaning of this act. He or she would have to apply as an independent immigrant and might have great difficulty doing that or at least have an unexpected delay.

It seems to me to be reasonable to allow the general immigrant family the same procedure as this bill allows to a person who has been found in Canada to be a refugee and is therefore entitled to apply for the landing of his whole family, which is almost always outside the country, at the same time as he or she applies for his landing.

I applaud the decision of the government to make that provision for the refugee because we have had great distress of thousands and thousands of people in refugee families who have been separated. I am not suggesting that there is likely to be the same amount of trouble in the same number of people in the non-refugee cases. In fact, landing within Canada, apart from refugees, is the exception rather than the rule. It will not happen very often and it has not happened very often. The rule is landing from outside Canada where this question does not apply.

I ask the members opposite to consider for their own constituents as well as for everybody elses' constituents the convenience, where it is asked, of making the application for all the dependants, including any who are overseas at the time of application in the case where a person is making application from within Canada himself or herself. It seems to me that it would be just as efficient from the point of view of the department and far more satisfactory from the point of view of that dependant and of the family.

While I am on this, I wish to comment on these other motions that are before us in this group.

Motion No. 3 would change the wording in clause 4 to "any or all accompanying dependants". It makes much more sense not to force people, if they do not wish it, to make an application for dependants overseas. For the reasons that have been given already, it should be left to the choice of the family concerned. It may be necessary to make certain assurances that the choice will not be reneged upon in legal form. However, if it is reneged upon, it should only be with the minister's permission or something like that. It seems to me quite unnecessary to restrict the family from that freedom of movement.

We should all be strongly in sympathy with Motions Nos. 5 and 6. I do not imagine there is any member of Parliament who has not been genuinely distressed at the difficulty that some constituents have in getting a visitors' visa. We heard the argument previously that if anything is written into the law then it becomes a matter of right that people can demand and even, perhaps, a subject of litigation. This is true.

In my experience the large number of applications for a family visitor that are delayed and even the large number that are finally refused as well as delayed is out of proportion to the danger of abuse in the other direction. I think the present abuse is to the disadvantage of the family and not really to the advantage of the department.

I wish to speak also on Motion No. 70. This new system of requiring some immigrants—we are told it will only be a handful—to live in certain areas is unnecessary. It will be entirely at the discretion of the government. Some immigrants will be told they have to go to Podunk and work at such and such an occupation. At present there is no time limit given.

It was suggested that it might end at three years when the person becomes a citizen and, therefore, can claim charter rights. I am not clear on that. If charter rights do not apply when the person is a permanent resident, I am not sure they apply when the person is a citizen. Alternatively, if a citizen could complain against that, then why not a permanent resident under the same charter?

I think a time limit is needed and it should be two years rather than three years. Things are mobile enough in Canada that circumstances change. I know that what was once considered mandatory conditions have now been softened so that they are not mandatory conditions and people can apply to have them changed if employment or living arrangements fail or something of that nature.

It would reduce the unnecessary burden of applications if the requirement to live in a certain area was limited to two years. Not all permanent residents wish to proceed or do proceed to citizenship at three years. Some people have stayed here for many years for reasons satisfactory to themselves and presumably of no harm to anybody else. I would not want them then to be held by this.

On Motion No. 74, where an immigrant has paid fees for a visa application, the fees so incurred shall be reimbursed to the immigrant if the application is refused or is not considered as a result of retroactive regulations.

It is quite true that the present fees—and they probably are not likely to go down, they are more likely to go up—can be a serious burden, especially on a family of several members from Third World countries, or even from many European countries. With the uncertainty that the application could be cancelled part way through by a retroactive decision and that the fees would have to be paid all over again, or the plan given up entirely even in future years seems to me a way of keeping immigrants out of Canada.

If that is not the intent of the government, I would hope that it would agree to this amendment. I know the government has emphasized the wish to have good immigrants, and I think we want immigrants to be attracted by reasonable government with a reasonable law such as this amendment proposes.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues for the comments they have made.

A number of points were made that will be extremely useful and will ensure that we have a fair, common sense, sensitive, orderly and humanitarian policy on immigration.

Most of us are coming at this from the basic principle that immigrants can and do enrich our country in many ways. We have in this House a colleague who has come from another country and has contributed a great deal to Canada.

In my own riding, we have a week called Kermes Week when we celebrate the achievements of the Belgian community. We have Folklorama as well where we have 50 various kiosks celebrating the various contributions of Canadians from some 50 different countries.

One of the points that I want to stress very strongly is that we have a number of what one could call nightmare situations or horror stories. I want to share with the House one case with which I am dealing currently.

A Canadian citizen whose widowed mother lives in Bangladesh has been waiting for two years and eight months and has not yet received even an interview. Still ahead of her are a background investigation and medicals. I find this deplorable, unnecessary and shocking. This mother is virtually by herself and almost three years later has still not been responded to.

In another case, a citizen in my constituency found out that members of his family in Vietnam had left on fragile boats and had reached Hong Kong. They could be repatriated to Vietnam at any time and there are serious questions which have been raised about the fate that awaits them on their return.

Perhaps the one issue—some of my colleagues have spoken about it—that enrages Canadian citizens most are those situations where parents or relatives want to come and visit them, but are unable to do so. Imagine the silliness of it all. We have mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters and sometimes spouses who will go to a point in the United States that is close to Canada and that individual who is here with a visa, or he may be a Canadian citizen, will go out of the country in order to visit those relatives or friends.

I cannot imagine this, particularly when we want to promote our country. We want to make sure that people come here rather than the United States. We want them to visit with their relatives at their home, to be able to share with them their new lives.

I will give you three quick situations. In one instance, a young woman is studying at the University of Manitoba and her husband is studying in Australia. Her husband wants to come to Winnipeg to visit his wife and there is the likelihood that he may want to stay here. I understand that, but at the same time once we have had a written commitment from both parties, it seems to me that we ought to take a chance. The reunion of those two people has been prevented.

In another instance, a gentleman who is a Canadian citizen wanted his mother-in-law to come to his wedding. Again, I understand that there may have been the possibility that the person from another country wanted to come and stay and they were prepared to make written commitments and yet that particular person who wanted to come to Canada for that wedding was unable to do so.

Finally my third example is of a woman who had not seen her parents for some time, whose parents were denied entry into Canada, even though she was a Canadian citizen. She had to fly out of the country to see her mother and father. I find that shocking and really unnecessary. This is one issue that must be dealt with.

I just want to make some very quick comments about the other amendments here. Clearly we need to deal with the applicant. Whatever the other members of the family do, in whatever way family is defined, should not have an impact upon the applicant's desire to come into the country.

I think we have to respect the fundamental principle of Canadian law as well that whatever is declared is true unless proven to be untrue. Otherwise, we apply two different standards.

I want to question the government—I say this in a very positive kind of way—about the residency requirements. Everyone tells me that it will not hold up in court. I wonder whether or not the government has checked this out. Is the government in fact proceeding here, yet it is for naught because it will not in fact go through?

Finally, with respect to immigration fees, I would like us to consider just how much $350 is today in Canadian money and how much this really represents to those who are very often in extremely difficult poverty-stricken situations. We really need to examine that.

We need to take very seriously those criticisms, those points that are being raised by organizations, including churches, that are committed to making sure that we have an orderly, sensitive and humanitarian approach to immigration in this country.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to follow my other colleagues in speaking on the report stage of this bill. I am sad, too, that we are still having this kind of debate with regard to immigration.

I look around among my own colleagues in the House this afternoon. I see names that are French, English, Italian, Hungarian, Filipino, Irish, Jewish or whatever in one portion of this House. We are all immigrants. The fact that some of us came recently while some of us had families that came a century or more ago is merely a question of timing.

The second thing that amazes me about the fact that we are still having this debate and dealing with a bill that is essentially flawed, is the size of this enormous country with its enormous potential and with its need for a larger population. How many of us in how many parts of the country and on how many occasions have used the image of our tiny population strung out across the bottom part of the country? How many of us have gone to northern Canada, to the vast empty reaches of this country, to see what could be done if only we had more people? How much could be done if only we opened our doors generously the way the doors were open certainly in the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries when my ancestors came here?

I hear my hon. friend from Alberta over there making comments about when the Liberals were in power. I guess what some of the people on the government side do not understand is that we in the Liberal Party learn from our mistakes. It might be something the hon. member might want to think on if indeed the process is possible. The hon. member from Newfoundland might want to think too, but I will deal with him in a minute.

One of the amendments that I want to talk about in particular has to do with family members and the questions that this bill raises. The bill provides that the government can assess all members of a family when it is deciding on the immigration application of one member of that family. That is nothing more and nothing less than guilt by association. There is a real problem.

It is true that some of us in this House subscribe to the theory of being one's brother's or one's sister's keeper, but this is going a little too far. Obviously in this modern age, and particularly in an age when families are split up and far away from each other even within one particular country, it is utterly insane to decide whether or not Mr. Jones should be accepted on the basis of whether or not his brother is an acceptable candidate. It goes against the rules of natural justice and it goes against those principles that we hold dear in our own Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I think it is utterly appalling that we are even contemplating something of this nature.

Look at the question of Canada and its immigration policy particularly in the world that we are facing today. Look at what is happening in eastern Europe. Look at what is happening in Africa in Somalia. We see the carnage in Yugoslavia and we know that there are those who are refugees in the truest sense of the word. They have no homes to go to any longer because their homes have been destroyed. They are the victims of civil war and insurrection based on ethnic cleansing or on religious bigotry.

We look at this immense country. We look at this blessed country. We look at each one of us who came ourselves or whose ancestors came here to escape something similar in another country to make a better life.

The parliamentarians and legislators of this country say: "Too bad for you. It is too late for you. I have my share. I am here but the rest of you can stay outside the door". How can we? How dare we? We did that, tragically, in times past in this country and all of us bear a portion of our national guilt for that. I do not want future Canadians to bear the same kind of guilt especially when a larger population is something we so desperately need.

Before I came up here on Monday, I was fortunate enough to be present at a YWCA breakfast where they awarded the peace medal to one of my constituents, Dr. Joni Guptill, who has been very active with Doctors Without Borders Médecins sans frontières in Africa and in Yugoslavia. Dr. Guptill herself spoke about the conditions in those countries. Peter Dalglish is the executive director of Street Kids International, an international foundation based in Toronto that looks after street children. He is a man who is known to many of us on this side of the House at least. He spoke at the same time as Dr. Guptill about the need for Canada to be generous.

The amendments we are bringing forward in this group and in other groups of amendments today are an attempt to make us more generous. We are known world-wide to be among the luckiest citizens on the face of the earth. Because we have so much, are so lucky and live in this incredibly wonderful country, we should be able to share this with others.

It is incumbent upon us to be generous. It is incumbent upon us to show that the legislation that we have dealing with immigration is open and forward looking and welcoming to those people in the world who we can use. The myths have been debunked. Immigrants are not a drain on the public purse. Immigrants do not create difficulties and problems to any extent in the manner that some already arrived and long-term Canadian citizens do. Immigrants are a blessing to a country.

Most important, each one of us has an absolute duty to remember from whence we came. We must not be smug and self-satisfied. We must know that the life-blood of our country and its future will be immigration. We forget this at our peril.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I would like to go back to a more specific issue that my friend for Thunder Bay—Nipigon was dealing with before. That is the issue of the visitor's visa and the very discretionary way in which visa officers in our embassies and high commissions deal with that.

I can give a number of examples of problems that I have experienced in my constituency office with families. They tried to bring family members from their homeland overseas to Canada and have had the experience of seeing them rejected in a very arbitrary way by visa officers overseas.

Many of these people are long-time citizens of my constituency who are productive and contributing members of Canadian society. These people are respected in their community, the province and across the country. They have been deprived of the right of contact with family members overseas because visa officers in our high commissions and embassies act in a very arbitrary way.

In many cases these potential visitors are even denied the right to make a written application to come to Canada as a visitor. Let me give you some examples. I had a constituent who is in the import and export business. One of his business partners is a citizen of the Philippines. She is between 25 and 35. The minute she went to talk to the Canadian immigration officials in the Philippines, they decided at first sight that she was an unsuitable visitor to Canada.

The reason for that is that some visa officers overseas have decided that women from certain countries who are of marriageable age would probably violate their visa requirements by trying to marry a Canadian and then apply for landed status in Canada. This woman was denied the right to even apply for a permit.

My constituent called me and asked me to write a letter of recommendation outlining the fact that this woman had been to Canada before on a 60-day visitor's visa and had done her business in Canada. She had travelled around to look at markets and at potential products to market in the Philippines. She had actually gone back before her visa had expired and was, in fact, an exemplary visitor to Canada.

Yet, this woman was rejected on sight. She was not even permitted to make a written application for a visa. She was simply rejected on sight. I think the immigration officer made a judgment that because she was of marriageable age that through his determination she was not entitled and was not a suitable visitor to Canada.

That has happened on a number of occasions. I know two young women from Chile who attempted to apply to visit Canada. At first, they were reluctant even to approach the Canadian embassy in Chile. They had heard from previous applicants that women of their age, determined by the visa officer to be of marriageable age, are not suitable visitors to Canada because they are likely to attempt to marry a Canadian male and then apply to stay in the country.

I point out that these women are not permitted to make applications. They are simply denied the right to come to Canada on sight because of a discriminatory choice that visa officers made about these women based on their marriageable age or entitlement to be married.

My concern is that the process used now is extremely arbitrary and open to those kinds of discriminatory choices. There has to be something written in legislation which first allows a person who applies for a visitor's visa to be able to make a written application and to outline their suitability to be a visitor to Canada. If they are denied, they should have the right to the reasons for that denial, reasons for the statement made by the visa officer that they are not a suitable visitor, and there should be a process to allow them to appeal.

My concern right now is that many of these people get their family members in Canada to go to their members of Parliament for a letter of recommendation outlining the family's residence in Canada, the fact that they are good citizens, and the fact that this person overseas—whom you do not know and only have the family's word for it—is unlikely to violate the conditions of the visa and is unlikely to stay in Canada at the point the visa expires.

As I have said, my concern is that the process is arbitrary and by requiring people to visit their member of Parliament to get a letter of recommendation it is also politicizing the process so those visitors from overseas get the impression that in Canada the right to visit this country is a right that is handed out by politicians in local communities. I do not think that is the impression we would like to convey to the visitors from overseas.

I think the process should be fair and non-discriminatory. It should be conducted in such a way that we allow Canadian citizens who at one time emigrated from other countries to have free contact with family members and friends from their homeland. I think they are being treated unfairly because of the arbitrary nature of the process as we currently have it under the act.

Finally, I would like to outline another case from the Philippines. Two of my constituents, a husband and wife, invited the wife's mother over to visit. They had not seen the wife's mother for many years. She was getting old, so they invited her to Canada to visit. She wanted to bring along her son because she did not feel she could make that journey. It is a long journey from the Philippines to western Canada. She did not feel she could make the journey alone. She might get sick or lost and she did not have the same kind of facility with the language that her daughter and son-in-law in Canada had. She wanted her son to accompany her.

Strangely enough, the visa officer accepted the visa of the mother and rejected the visa of the son because even though he was fully employed in the Philippines working for a telecommunications company, even though he had family in the Philippines that he was going to be leaving behind in order to come on this visit with his mother, even though he had a home and a job, all of those things, it was felt that as his pay with the telecommunications company in the Philippines was low he was likely to stay in Canada and try to apply for a job in Canada where his skills are paid for at a much higher rate by telecommunications companies.

What an arbitrary way to make these decisions. So the son was rejected and because the mother could not travel without accompaniment, she ended up not being able to visit her daughter as well. Again they came to me and applied to me as a member of Parliament to write a letter of recommendation as to the good name and reputation of my constituents living in Port Alberni.

The process should not be as arbitrary as it is and it should not be politicized the way visa officers in embassies overseas are forcing it to be. There should be a process laid down where family members of Canadians who are resident overseas and who want to visit Canada should have the right to make a written application for a visa. That visa should be processed according to certain criteria that those applicants are aware of.

If they are rejected there should be good reasons made for rejecting them and there should also be a process available to them to appeal. At that point during the appeal process then possibly the member of Parliament or other people willing to make recommendations should be involved.

I am concerned that what is happening here is that Canadians who have come from overseas are being denied the right of contact with their families as a result of arbitrary decisions being made in visa, embassy and high commission offices overseas. I hope that the amendments to this legislation will correct that kind of discriminatory behaviour and make it possible for Canadians to have those kinds of family contacts and visits from overseas.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I do not think there is any bill that touches more the expression of what this wonderful country of Canada is really all about: the openness, the respect for difference, and the wish of people around the world to come and either establish themselves here or visit family who are here, or perhaps just visit and see what this whole country is all about. We certainly raised the vision and the visibility of our country over the last couple of months. Nonetheless, we still have lots of people who care to join our shores who recognize the uniqueness of the diversity that is Canada when that diversity includes its culture along with its geography and its language.

We are dealing with specific amendments in this report stage to this extraordinarily complex bill. When I looked at this bill I could only say to my two colleagues, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, that they really had to have a tremendous amount of courage and enthusiasm to face a bill of this size in the very short time this government gave them to address the major concerns that are in this bill. Also, over the summer break while the rest of the members of this House perhaps were having some holidays and working in their ridings, these members had to sit and hear witnesses—I am glad at least we allowed witnesses to appear—and go through this enormous bill.

I have forgotten how many pages it is. Somewhere I had the number of pages because I was quite fascinated. We are talking about a bill with 128 sections and 113 pages. It is quite an extensive bill.

The amendments we are addressing today in this report stage start with the questions brought forward by my colleagues, the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce and the member from Thunder Bay, with respect to the matter of a visa. From my experience as a member, I can tell you that I have had so many visa refusals it is becoming almost an embarrassment. It would seem to be that there are more refusals coming from countries like Sri Lanka, India, Bangladesh, Russia. There is something wrong with the extent of what would seem to me to be countries which seem to be suffering more than other countries in terms of the receipt of a no on a request for a family visit or a visa.

I had one case that I dealt with today with our consulate and our consul general in New York. It was with a great degree of frustration that I spoke with our officers there. I must say that I was quite impressed with the quality of the service I received and I particularly noted Mr. John Baker who was very helpful and seemingly very thoughtful.

Nonetheless, he had some misinformation on the documents which he was reviewing. I am not suggesting that it was done in any kind of a duplicitous way, but I am saying that it was very difficult to try to resolve the problem of a Sikh family in my riding who were joyfully celebrating the marriage of their daughter, who just graduated as a doctor, to a doctor colleague. The wedding was taking place in New York. This gentleman, who is a substantial member of our community and well respected, had invited his brother and his brother's family to come to the wedding.

Only the brother intended to come and went to our offices in New Delhi, applied for a visitor's visa and was turned down in no time flat. He was turned down and it was a great disappointment to the family. He went across the street or however far away the United States Embassy was and he got a visa in a very short order. He landed in New York.

The wedding was this past Sunday. To Mr. Gill and his family, I wish them congratulations and I hope the young couple has a very happily wedded life.

His brother who is now here would like to come from New York to Montreal to visit the rest of the family. Once again, the gentleman went with his brother, a Canadian citizen, to our office to explain his case. He was there as an interpreter. I would suggest that the immigration or the consulate office says that perhaps it spent 10 minutes with him, but according to my friend he felt that maybe it was five minutes. He said: "Really, it felt like one minute but maybe it was five to seven minutes. They did not even listen to me, Mrs. Finestone. They didn't listen when I said I had a letter from the bank attesting to the substance of my brother. I had a letter from the bank which is an affidavit as well to the land that this man owns. I had this letter describing the fact that he is a man who is married with a wife and two children". His daughter is presently in a masters program at the university in New Delhi and he has family and obligations. He is well–to–do and well established in his own country. He wants to come merely for a visit.

The assessment that was given to me was that this gentleman has no ties that would make him want to return to India. He has no ties to his home country, no stakes to go back to and therefore, he does not seem to be a good risk. Frankly, I find that to be a matter of personal judgment, number one; no criteria, number two; and quite inhuman in the course of the joys of those particular moments in life when one would like to have one's family present.

I certainly am very supportive of the amendments that are brought forward and I hope the government will be with respect to having within the bill certain criteria that will help the visa officers in very crowded offices overseas have guidelines. Then it will not be arbitrary. There will be guidelines. As a matter of right, certain decisions will be taken without using a discriminatory sense of what one thinks is a person's potential to evade the proper procedures of immigration to come here and perhaps claim refugee status, which was not the intent at all in the case I mentioned.

Therefore, the motion makes good sense. I hope the government will seriously consider "that a visa officer"—this is the amendment—"shall not refuse to issue a visitor's visa to a person who made an application pursuant to subsection (1) or any of the person's dependants where the person satisfies the visa officer that: (1) A person has a place of residence, immediate family and permanent employment in the person's country".

I heard my colleague from Vancouver describing just such cases which would have had no problems on landing had they had this mere, simple criteria. Second, "that the person and the person's dependants as the case may be have return tickets and intend to return to that country; or the person does not have a pending application for landing".

For the purposes of whatever paragraph 6 (b) is in this instance, "the fact that a person and the person's dependants will return to the person's country shall be presumed unless there is strong evidence to the contrary". I do not know why we have to presume everybody is filled with ill will and mauvaise entente, poor intentions. I think the world generally is a decent place and individuals on a one to one basis should be presumed to be innocent rather than be declared guilty before the fact.

That is the first of a series of amendments which I think are important. I hope that we will give serious support to a list of directions. I see the parliamentary secretary shaking her head no. That is not very helpful.

Mr. Reid: That is the minister.

Mrs. Finestone: Are you now the minister? Pardon me. Excuse me, I forgot that. I am sorry, but as the minister I would hope that you would not be shaking your head no. Besides which, she is not the minister of immigration, Madam Speaker, so I hope that the minister of immigration will be a little more open to this.

The second set of motions I would like to address has to do with the question of the resident requirements. Under resident requirements, a person is sent to live in a certain area. I am concerned about this being subject to a charter challenge and I would strongly represent the right of mobility rights for people who come to this country. Has the notwithstanding clause been put in here? If not, it is the only way this would stand a charter challenge, I believe.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to speak to three of the amendments in the group, specifically Motions Nos. 3, 6 and 70, and I want to do so with some particularity.

Motion No. 3 deals with an applicant for an immigrant's visa. The section reads: "An application for an immigrant's visa shall". That is key because it is mandatory for the visa officer to consider the person making the application and every dependant of that person.

That is very important because the visa officer, therefore, must consider every dependant, whether or not that particular dependant is going to be accompanying the applicant to Canada. There have been many, many cases, and all of us in this House can cite them, where there has been unfairness because a person defined as a dependant under the immigration laws has prevented a family from coming to Canada even though that particular person who is defined as a dependant has no wish to come to Canada.

The intent, it seems to me, of Motion No. 3 is very clear, and that is to say all right, those who wish to come to Canada have to be considered, but those who are not accompanying the applicant should not affect the over–all application made by the applicant. That to me seems eminently reasonable. I stand to support it wholeheartedly. I am at a loss to understand what the department would find difficult about that. If there were some problem where later on somebody might make an application, one could always deal with that by way of regulation by saying that that particular dependant had to renounce or indicate that they would not use those who were allowed to come to Canada as a hook whereby they could come in.

There is a way of dealing with that without having to deny the entire application of the applicant and those dependants who would be accompanying the applicant, simply because another person defined as a dependant does not meet the criteria. I think Motion No. 3 is very, very reasonable and within the spirit of the Immigration Act and the proposed Bill C–86.

I would also like to speak in favour of Motion No. 6 put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. The House will remember that my colleague had a private member's bill which was, if not identical, very similar to this motion and which had an opportunity to be debated. I can tell you that from discussions with constituents of mine in the riding of Scarborough West, this amendment is eminently reasonable in their view. It is very simple to explain.

Let us say someone wants their aunt to visit them. They say: "Listen, we realize that you are afraid that my aunt will not go back. What I will do is I will put up a guarantee in the form of a mortgage or a bond on my home. If this person that you allow in does not go back then I will forfeit that $25,000 or that $15,000, or $5,000 or whatever it may be". That is very, very reasonable. It shows the bona fides of the person who is making the application to have the visitor come in.

I am certain that if this amendment were allowed, if there was any abuse of the system once the Immigration department started cashing in on those performance bonds, in very short order the word would spread across Canada that the department means business. If there is a false application made the immigration department is going to call that performance bond. The point is that the fear of the immigration officer abroad that this particular visitor would not return would very quickly be dealt with.

Some might say that is unfair to those people who cannot put forward a bond. I say no because my hon. colleague has dealt with that in subsection 7 of his amendment which clearly says that the absence of any security described in subsection 6 shall not, —that is mandatory,— be taken into account in determining the question we have been talking about.

I think that in searching for a solution to a very difficult problem, my hon. friend has come up with a very reasonable proposal. It is not something that is new or unique, that has not been brought to the attention of the department. On the contrary, the department is perfectly aware of it. But for some reason, and I do not know quite what it is, it has failed to act on it.

Therefore I want to say unequivocally that I support this particular amendment and the idea behind it, which is clearly to permit people who are Canadian citizens or landed immigrants to have visits from their family and friends and to guarantee to the Government of Canada that those people are indeed visitors and not people who are using visitor provisions to get here illegally. That is a reasonable proposal which helps, not hinders, the immigration system in this country and I hope that the government would consider it.

Finally, I would like to address Motion No. 70 which deals specifically with subsection 114(1) of the act. It talks about prescribing the classes of immigrants in respect of which landing shall be granted and then goes on to say that there can be terms and conditions imposed, including place of residence and occupation.

Some are worried about the charter implications. I would like to say I am one who is not concerned about the charter implications because the relevant section of the charter deals with citizens and landed immigrants or people with the status of landed immigrant.

Subsection (ii.2) of the proposed amendment clearly states that the department can prescribe classes of immigrants in respect of which landing shall be granted "subject to terms and conditions".

Of course one of those terms and conditions can be that you must live in a place for a certain period of time before we will grant you landed status. Therefore that person during that period of time is not landed and therefore is not within the definition provided in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. To me these arguments about the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a red herring.

Having said that, the amendment that we in this party have put forward provides a time limit. That time limit specifically states that where there is a condition concerning the place of residence and occupation, that time limit cannot be a period beyond two years.

That to me is a reasonable proposition. It accepts the principle that is in the section, which is the possible requirement concerning place of residence and occupation, and yet says you cannot abuse this. There will be a specific time limit that will be imposed, which will be a maximum of two years. It does not have to be two years. It can be less, but it certainly cannot be any more than that. That is fair. By that time the department should be able to determine whether or not the terms and conditions have been met. If they have, landed status should be able to be granted.

These three amendments are perfectly reasonable. I find it unconscionable for no one in the government to be standing up and commenting on these amendments or indicating why they are wrong or why they are not going to be accepted or indeed if they are going to be accepted. If they are, why do we not just get on with it, approve these amendments by voice vote and go?

If we are going to have a bunch voting no, if we are going to have a recorded vote, if we are going to get up and vote against these amendments, surely someone over there should be telling us what is wrong with these proposed amendments. It is not as if we are changing the entire act. It is not as if we are changing even the intent of the act. We are accepting the principle for example in Motion No. 70, but we are asking that there be a reasonable time limit. Where are the people who are going to be speaking against these amendments and telling Canadians why these amendments are unacceptable? I cannot see why they are unacceptable. They seem perfectly reasonable. I know for a fact, from discussions across Canada and in my riding, that these kinds of amendments are acceptable to the people of Canada. They are acceptable to immigrant people who want people to visit them, who want their relatives and friends to be able to come here and who are now meeting a bureaucratic brick wall.

For example, Motion No. 6 comes up with a solution. It comes up with a ladder whereby these people can climb over that brick wall and bring their friends in. We hear nothing on the other side and yet there is also a protection to Canada from those who would abuse the system because the bond would be forfeited. We do not hear any reason why there is something wrong with putting a time limit on a term and condition to live in a particular place, but most Canadians would think that is a reasonable situation.

Where is the negative here? If there is no negative, why do we not pass these amendments?

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I too would like to address a couple of the amendments set out in this grouping, perhaps starting with those dealing with visitor visas and the criteria being suggested to govern the granting of such visas.

I would be surprised if there were a member in this House who has not had the experience, probably many times, of having puzzled constituents come in to her or his office, saying that an immediate family member in x, y or z country has applied to come and visit Canada and has had that application turned down. You patiently sit down with the constituent and you go over the facts of the matter. You are left, time after time after time, scratching your head, trying to figure out what the heck the problem is. I had an instance just this last summer where we were dealing with a person who had been granted successive visitor visas previously. There was no change in that person's circumstances in their country of residence, yet they found that the latest application was turned down with, at best, a scant explanation.

This kind of utterly arbitrary exercise of authority certainly does the system no credit, it does the government no credit and it does the act no credit. Any attempt at this point to bring some degree of consistency and fairness into that, at present, utterly arbitrary system I would hope would only be welcomed by all of the members in this House. Again I say that I cannot imagine there is a member here who has not had this experience.

I do not understand why the government members would be, I assume, preparing to defeat these amendments. By the way, in my opinion, Motion No. 5 is superior to Motion No. 6, if for no other reason than the property requirements are not a proper element to be considered here. Were it mine to do, I would even loosen up proposed Motion No. 5. Be that as it may, these at least are an attempt to bring some objective criteria to the matter and, as such, I would hope would enjoy the widespread support of all members of the House.

Second, Motion No. 74 sets out in one small part to deal with the question of retroactivity that has vexed people who have considered this legislation since its introduction. This one small part has to do with fees charged for visa applications. That is all well and good, and I support it unreservedly.

However, I think that in considering Motion No. 74 we should have a thought as well for the general problem of retroactivity that afflicts this bill. There is major confusion at this point about which clauses in the new bill will be applied retroactively, and whether cases currently in the system will be continued or families made to reapply under the new regime established by this bill. The matter of visitor visa fees and immigrant fees are but one example.

There are other examples. I would like to give a couple out of my case files in Edmonton. One involves a woman who has been trying to sponsor her parents and two siblings since July 1990. After two years, little had happened. It was only through the intervention of my office that the application had begun to be processed. In the meantime, the father has died and the family abroad are dependent on their family member in Canada for support. Under the new quota system that the bill provides, it would only be if the family were lucky enough to get into this year's allotment that their application would be processed, if retroactivity is applied.

There is a chap who applied to bring his wife and children from Vietnam in 1986. It took four years to process the case and then, due to a number of circumstances springing from that prolonged period, the case was delayed. For the last two years, the case has been tied up in workings between various embassies in south-east Asia. These delays have been largely the fault of our embassies and procedures. If the case is not processed before the bill comes into effect, again this family will have to compete for spaces if retroactivity is applied.

In fact, the active cases I have in my office right now number at least 50 that will be affected to some degree by the retroactivity provisions in this bill. Therefore, I heartily support Motion No. 74 and would ask again that the government at least make clear its intentions with regard to retroactivity in this bill, intentions which to this day remain murky.

Last, the matter of Motion No. 70 and precisely what the authorities may and may not do in directing where people live, how long they stay, what professions they seek, et cetera, I would just note that I have a constituent named Andrew. He came to Edmonton because of the large Polish community there, the community being his sponsor in Canada.

However, given the authority contemplated in the bill, had the government directed his settlement it might have sent him to the maritimes or to B.C. because he was a fisherman. Now of course, he would be an unemployed fisherman. He came to Edmonton, trained as a carpenter, and he has been able to work consistently at his new profession.

I am trying wherever possible to back up the argument on the motions with concrete examples from my own experience of a constituency of average size, average population. This bill has serious flaws. They are flaws which at least are addressed and in part corrected by the motions we have before us in this grouping.

I now turn to the matter of visitors' visas and the utterly capricious way in which they are currently granted or withheld, the matter of the powers of the administration to direct people to do this. It has been correctly pointed out this will probably fall before a charter challenge. Also is the matter of retroactivity and what does or does not fall within retroactivity within the bill.

All of these things compel us to accept the amendments before us and I hope compel us, when we get the chance at third reading, to direct the government to go back and try again.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my riding of Ottawa Centre probably over 70 per cent of the work-load deals with both immigration and refugee cases. This is no different from any other urban riding anywhere in Canada.

Most of our colleagues in the House on a daily basis are faced with requests and questions from constituents, who are trying to bring in a family member as a visitor or as a landed immigrant or whether they have a friend who is a refugee claimant.

I want to say that our public servants have done an outstanding job in trying to keep up not only with the demands of the Canadian population, but also with the demands that members of Parliament and ministers are asking of them. Unfortunately throughout the past three years we have seen a tremendous increase in the work-load of our public servants, and we have seen a tremendous decrease in the numbers in the work force.

In other words, as we have more and more demands on the immigration offices and on embassies abroad, we have seen less and less manpower being allocated to those areas. We only have to look at some countries where there are waiting lists in excess of 5,000 applicants that are trying to get into the country. They have applied to come to Canada as landed immigrants and are waiting in desperate situations in some of those cases. Our public servants are doing their best to deal with it. Unfortunately with the present resources they cannot keep up with demands.

The same situation applies in the national capital region. In some cases applicants or constituents have to line up at the immigration offices an hour before the offices open so they have a chance to inquire about one case or another.

Rather than speak about the over-all bill I would like to focus on a couple of aspects. One aspect deals with work permits for refugees. Under the present law a work permit is issued to a refugee after he or she is recognized at the first stage, the credibility hearing. The present bill eliminates the first hearing and a refugee cannot obtain a work permit immediately. Therefore, a refugee claimant is forced to go on welfare and tremendous pressure is put on our social welfare system.

One of the motions that my colleagues have proposed would allow a refugee to obtain a work permit upon request, providing that a medical exam is passed. For the life of me I do not see why the government would not support a motion that would reduce the pressure on our social welfare system and would turn the refugee claimant who was waiting for his application to be processed into part of the work force. This is a very important motion and I hope the government will look at it with a positive eye.

Today I received a letter from Amnesty International which is extremely concerned about certain aspects of this bill and in particular about issues that deal with the refugee determination board.

Under the present bill, for a refugee to gain admission to Canada, his fate is decided by a senior immigration officer at the port of entry. At this stage a refugee claimant would have no right to a lawyer and would not automatically be given an oral hearing.

Amnesty International, through its communications and through its presentation to the committee, has requested that this be looked into and be addressed in a fair and reasonable way.

On another point, some claimants will only be accepted as refugees if there is a unanimous decision on the part of the board. I wonder what kind of a democracy we are living in that you would need a 100 per cent approval rate. It is known world-wide that in a democracy, if 50 plus one have said yes, you proceed. This particular aspect of the bill will have to be addressed.

I must commend Amnesty International for its work on behalf of refugee claimants world-wide and I must also commend our public servants who have worked tirelessly trying to address some of the issues they are faced with.

We support certain parts of the bill that deal with those who try to abuse the refugee system. However, at the same time we have proposed a number of amendments that the government should look at with a compassionate eye.

If you ask me for my views on this whole aspect, amnesty should be granted to all the refugees coming from countries that have civil wars or other problems through some sort of an administrative system. In this way we could save millions of taxpayers' dollars rather than carrying on with a lengthy process that is not beneficial to anybody.

On a final note, the refugee processing system has cost the government in excess of $500 million so far. However, we do not yet have a grip on this situation. It is my hope that over the next few weeks the minister will look at this issue a little more closely and try to see whether he cannot grant amnesty to many of these people who come from war-torn countries. I think compassion is the key issue in helping to resolve their problems.

Again I reiterate the fact that many of the amendments are put before the government in good faith and it is my hope that it will address and deal with them in good faith too.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in the debate on Bill C-86.

The concerns of immigration policy are very much ones in which many members of this House share because of what happens back home in our constituencies. I know the member for Winnipeg North, who is participating in this debate, is also very concerned about the future of the Winnipeg immigration community because he and I share many of the same problems. He has done a great deal of work on behalf of constituents throughout Manitoba and across the country who have troubles dealing with the Immigration Act.

I would like to say at the outset that we should take a minute to thank the many public servants across the country and around the world who faithfully try to respond to our many requests for information and for clarification of the status of our constituents and who have to go through a great deal of paper work in order to make sure we have the best immigration policy in this country.

Whenever a request is made on behalf of constituents of Winnipeg North Centre the public servants are very generous with the time they spend on the cases and are very forthright in the way they try to deal with each individual case.

Immigration is an area which is of concern in Winnipeg North Centre because we have a large number of people who choose that part of Winnipeg as their first home in Canada. It is one of those areas in which, because of the inexpensive housing and the services available in the inner city, people choose to live to start out their lives. As they move up they move on to other cities or into the suburbs of Winnipeg. However, when they are first in Winnipeg they are very needy and we need to develop a system which is much more responsive to the problems facing new Canadians.

However, that is outside the content of Bill C-86 except for one important point. The spirit with which we deal with people from other countries as they arrive in Canada is one of the bench-marks we have used for our country as being a democratic and open society.

I have always been impressed by the way in which people, for example from Vietnam, the Indo-China Chinese community in Winnipeg, people from Hong Kong, mainland China, the Asian community itself has been brought to Winnipeg through refugee policies and settlement policies to seek out and make a living here. Then when they try to extend their roots by bringing other members of family, friends, or students within the extended family they find there are a number of barriers.

As we receive people from the rest of the world, we have to understand that it is in fact a changed process. We are not the society we were in 1900, not the society we were in 1950, and by the year 2000 we will be an entirely different society.

It is up to us in the House of Commons to make sure that we modernize laws so that they respond and respect the people who are now to become part of our society. When it comes to issues of defining families and issues of trying to figure out which refugee is acceptable and which one is not, we have to remember we are not trying to make those definitions for the country that we were in the past but we are trying to make it for the country we are becoming and will become in the 21st century.

I say this because so many decisions do not come naturally and do not come easily. Let me put this case to you. In order to build up a family business, to make money in a strange society, people depend on family members whom they trust. It does not matter whether the person speaks the local language, the question is do they speak the language of the family. Can they be trusted with the cash? Do they know how to do a certain business like the lumber business? Have they been involved with it for generations?

When people start a small business in a strange society they want to work within the family until they are more confident of the culture, the business attitudes, and the ethics of a new society.

We are the host society to these businesses but we do not provide a generous environment. People say to their member of Parliament: "Sir, we want to bring in family members to help us with our business", which is a great idea, but when we face the regulatory process we find it almost impossible to assist them.

As we look at Bill C-86 we should be asking ourselves if we are modernizing the legislation in such a way as to help those who are coming to Canada become more deeply rooted and more successful financially, so that when we look ahead we have the people who form the core of our new business and professional classes and who will become our teachers, our business people and the owners of large businesses.

We must deal with the macro-economic question, which people do not usually associate with the immigration issue. The major problem that faces the Canadian economy has been the total collapse of many of the traditional sectors that we have depended upon, and manufacturing has been mentioned several times in this House of Commons. However, to move beyond that, the problem is a depletion of capital.

As we have experienced the Americanization and globalization of the economy the ability of Canadians to compete has been severely limited. We have talked about this on many different occasions. However, if we are going to be practical and if we are looking at ways to rebuild the economy, who are going to best be able to adjust to the new markets in Asia? Who are going to best be able to adjust to the markets in the Philippines? Who are going to best be able to understand what is happening in eastern Europe? Who are going to best be able to set up small firms in this country and take the inter-generational approach to building up capital and reaching out to these markets?

They are not the companies that are closing down factories. They are not the companies that are pulling out of Ontario and the maritimes and have pulled out of Manitoba. They will be new companies that we cannot even imagine as we stand in the House and talk about this issue.

The cornerstone to the economic revival of this country will be a revised and modernized Immigration Act.

We, on this side, were very disappointed to hear today that the government was using time allocation to speed the debate up and push this piece of legislation through. The bill is extremely long and complex, with 128 sections and 113 pages. It is the most extensive revision to the Immigration Act since 1978, and it deserves careful consideration.

The committee met all summer and heard from dozens of groups across the country. These groups were well organized and spoke against what the government was trying to do. Even in this context the changes have been done quickly and are not fully understood at this time.

In these circumstances the government's original handling of the bill was deplorable. The bill was tabled for a first reading on June 16, 1992 and called for a second reading debate on June 19. The vote on second reading was forced under a closure order on June 22 with only one and a half days of debate. Consequently, there was not enough time to examine the bill in detail or to discuss it with immigration experts and NGOs.

I raise this issue because in the debate that I have had in this House about the child benefits package I have found that there was the same rush, the same inability to discuss things intelligently and the same inability to bring in good witnesses. In fact, when good witnesses did appear in the middle of the summer, which was the only time the government had to meet with them, every one of these witnesses said that this was a bad piece of legislation. However, the government continued.

I hope and I trust, in the spirit of goodwill which prevails from time to time in this House, that the minister will listen to the opposition's point that it is not necessary to push, push, push and change some of the fundamentals of our immigration law without considering the implications.

Under severe criticism from all parts of the country the government finally became more flexible and committee hearings took place during the summer. The clause-by-clause examination of the bill was completed in committee on November 5, 1992, and during the clause-by-clause process the government agreed to 65 amendments. Some of these were technical but others were substantial and have led to a certain improvement in the bill. To that extent, we congratulate the government on being flexible in receiving these changes.

Nevertheless, many key offensive sections were not amended and the bill as a whole is still unacceptable to us.

There are four major points we would like to make on the consideration and which our critics, the members from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and Thunder Bay who have done a tremendous job in responding to this piece of legislation, would like Canadians to be aware of.

First, it would make it more difficult for law-abiding, hard-working immigrants to enter Canada, which is exactly what we do not want. Second, it puts barriers in the way of legitimate refugees. Third, it opens the door to inequity and capriciousness in the selection of immigrants. Fourth, it suspends traditional legal safeguards, especially in the areas of deportation without hearings, suspension of rights through retroactive provisions and so forth.

We also oppose the bill for two other reasons. One, there is an emphasis on enforcement as opposed to fairness and humanitarian values. Two, too much power has been transferred from the law and the House of Commons to the authority of the minister, which leaves the whole process open to abuse.

The Liberal caucus is providing a number of amendments that I would like the House to consider. We have provided amendments with regard to the provisions of how the assessment takes place with family members, with visitors' visas. It is unbelievable how difficult it is for people from many countries to come and visit family. We can almost say that the process is so biased against people from these countries that it borders on being an embarrassment to all Canadians. We have provided amendments dealing with work permits and many other areas.

Time is limited in a debate like this. However, although an overhaul of this legislation is badly needed I would like to say that this bill is a bad bill. We wish the government would withdraw it.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-86. These are the first amendments of any extent that have been made since 1978. There are many, many good things in this bill. What we are trying to do as a party is make the bill even better.

The proposed improvements to the bill have been a long time coming, but there are still some parts of the bill that are unacceptable.

An hon. member: Speak your mind.

Mr. Parent: The member from the other side is giving us encouragement to speak our minds and that is precisely what we intend to do.

In my view, one thing about this bill that should be noted is that it will make it more difficult for law-abiding, hard-working immigrants to enter Canada and will put barriers in the way of legitimate refugees.

I refer to the section on family members. The bill provides that the government can assess all members of a family when they are deciding on the immigration application of one member of that family. We are opposed to that provision. Through this amendment we propose that an individual should only be assessed with respect to those members of his or her family who accompany him or her to Canada under the application.

It begs the question as to how we can accept the fact that "the sins of the father are visited upon the sons" or vice versa. It seems to me that many people might be kept out because of some failure of another member of the family who at that point is not even applying to come into the country.

It is unfair to keep out an entire family because one brother or sister may have legal difficulties in his or her own country or might be a political activist who does not wish to come to Canada with the rest of the family, although I cannot for the life of me understand why anyone would not want to come to Canada. There are millions of people who are trying to get into this country.

In my view, this is the method by which the government hopes to keep out large families. Large families are a fact of life in most parts of this planet. I do not think that it is right that one person in a family, who may or may not be trying to come into this country, can keep the others from getting in because of some indiscretion or even misdemeanour.

My second point concerns visitors' visas. The bill does very little to improve the law or administration with respect to the granting of visitors' visas.

At the present time there are many incidents in which Canadians wish to bring members of their family to this country as visitors but are turned down. This happens consistently. The reason they are being turned down is because of situations in which immigration officers believe, rightly or wrongly, that they want to come in on a visitor's visa but they ultimately want to stay in the country.

We are prejudging them, we are giving to them motives which they may or may not have. I believe that we should at least take them at face value. If we find that they are coming into the country and abusing the system then they can be deported. My understanding of deportation is that when they are deported they should not be allowed to enter the country at a later time. That should be one of the items of basic fairness that we must examine and should have to live with.

I would like to address two other small areas and then expand from there.

The first is the residence requirement. The bill provides that conditions can be placed on an immigration visa obliging a person to live and work in a certain community. While the government agreed to amendments in committee which would moderate this situation it is still not acceptable.

Here I am of two minds. On the one hand, I believe that people coming in to Canada should accept, for a short time perhaps, working in certain areas in the country or landing in certain areas of the country. On the other hand, I am a little bit distressed. If we can do that to immigrants coming in then I wonder if we can at some later time also hope to do the same thing to other Canadian citizens.

Personally, I am a little bit reluctant to agree to the residence requirement although I can see that, at least initially, when a person enters the country it should be one thing we at least should consider.

I note here also that the Senate committee proposed a similar amendment. Perhaps more work could be done in that particular area.

In years gone by, with regard to immigration, people who came in from another country would—I do not know if I would use the word indentured, but it would be close to it—be given jobs working on certain farms, for example in the west or the north, or to put it another way in our under-populated areas. While this might seem to be a solution to some of our current problems it could have long-term ramifications for all Canadians. It is for this reason that I am reluctant to whole-heartedly back this particular amendment.

Another area is the refund of immigration fees. Bill C-86 proposes retroactive changes to the processing of immigration applications, including the suspension and cancellation of applications even after they have been moved considerably along the approval process.

In this amendment we say that if an application is cancelled after it had originally been accepted for processing then the fees for application should be refunded to the applicant. That seems fair to me. At the present time there is a fee of $350 for each immigrant application, and that represents a lot of money for people in Third World countries.

I do not denounce this bill completely. There are some things that are still not acceptable. However, with these few added amendments that we made in addition to the ones that have already been accepted—and we put in 65 amendments from this side of the floor—it would perhaps be worthy of our consideration.

A few other reasons that this bill is not acceptable in its present form is that it opens the door to inequity and capriciousness in the selection of immigrants. It suspends traditional legal safeguards, that is to say deportations without hearings and suspension of rights through retroactive provisions. I just do not like that. There is an emphasis on enforcement as opposed to fairness and humanitarian values. It must be noted that over the years we have been known as a very humane society. We have opened our doors and our hearts to immigrants from all lands. That is why Canadians are able to proceed, I hope harmoniously, for the duration of history. Over the years we have not had the racial unrest that has typified many of the other countries of the world. Witness Germany where there is this backlash of, we are told, right-wing neo-Nazis who want to close their doors to the opportunity for people coming in from the Third World.

We do not want that here and I am sure we are able to absorb not only the immigrants who have been coming in, but who will be coming in in the years ahead and we should be able to accept them with open arms.

I have found in my experience that most of these men and women want to come to this country to start a new and better life for themselves and for their children. It is very important for them to at least have their chance.

I do not say we should allow just anyone to come into the country. Yes, there must be criteria. There must be standards, but I think Canadians can learn to live with these standards. Even more than that, we must open up our boundaries to men and women who want to help us build a stronger and better country.

Finally, I feel that too much has been transferred from the law and the House of Commons to the authority of the minister. That leaves the whole process open to abuse. I do not in any way criticize the minister as being dishonest or anything like that. It is just that ministers, like all human beings, are fallible. In their fallibility they are prone many times to overlook other circumstances or people which in some way would reflect on the over-all aspect of Canada which we want seen in the world.

Immigrants have been and continue to be in many ways the backbone of our growth. We need new people to help us as a nation. Our nation over the years has grown because of new ideas which have been brought in. It ill behoves us to make conditions so difficult for immigrants coming in that they would not want to come to our shores, to our cities and to our homes and build a better country.

We are, after all, as has been said many times by my colleagues in this House, a nation of immigrants. We are a large nation geographically with a small population. We are told we can easily accommodate as many as 50 million to 60 million people on the land area that we have.

I think we should be looking in the years ahead to expand our population because quite frankly the world needs us as a representative of what the world could be. This is a nation where people can get along with one another and a nation where people can grow. This is precisely what we have in Canada and what we are offering to all citizens who want to come to our shores.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on an issue that is very close to my heart. Bill C–86 concerns amendments to the Immigration Act.

I stand as a former immigrant to Canada. I must say that when I immigrated in 1956 I was—and I still am—indeed very grateful to Canada for having accepted me as an immigrant. I think this spirit which I try to exemplify in terms of contributing to Canadian life is one that is exhibited by 99.99 per cent of the people who chose Canada and who were accepted by Canada as immigrants.

In fact, immigrants have contributed much to the development of Canada. There is not a sphere of life in Canada that has not been touched by the contributions of immigrants from all corners of the world. I wonder why, in its attempt to amend the Immigration Act, this government seems to have pandered to particularly the Reform Party ideology and philosophy of trying to close the door or make it more difficult for immigrants to come to Canada.

Immigrants have created employment in Canada. They do not take employment away from Canadians. They are vital to the professional life of Canada, to the economic life of Canada and to the cultural life of Canada. This is one of the few countries that in fact has multicultural laws that reflect and stress the importance of immigrants to Canada.

I find it very strange and very difficult to understand why a government would do some of the cruel things it is proposing in the legislation. An example is saying that you can send someone who comes as an immigrant to a part of the country without any kind of time limits and keep them there. In fact, an immigrant can come to Canada and he can bring with him all his dependants, but if there is one dependant left back in the other country, then that particular dependant would have to go through the whole rigmarole of applying, being sponsored or whatever else. We all know from experience in our riding offices the red tape and the rigmarole. As time goes on they could turn 19 and then they would have to re-apply as an independent.

There is the cruelty of refusing a refund to someone who has applied to become an immigrant to Canada after they pay the fee and decide not to go through with it or for some reason they are not passed. They cannot get their $300 or $350 back.

Maybe to the government members $350 is not a lot of money, but from where I come $350 represents a huge amount of money. Where I come from there is an exchange rate where $10 Canadian equals $100 Guyanese. That is $3,500. It is a humungous amount of money. And yet this government is proposing this particular change to the Immigration Act.

Along with my colleagues who served on the committee, we found there was not one group that supported these changes. Look at what happened. The government brought to the committee 70 amendments to a bill that has 100 pages. The government brought 70 changes and then another 11.

Not one group came before the committee. Ask my colleagues who sat on that committee. Not one group gave their okay to these changes. They all made these arguments much more eloquently than I can make them. Yet, this government using polls and tapping in to the xenophobia which we all know exists in the Canadian population, pandering to it and maybe trying to vault itself in the polls in terms of its popularity on the backs of immigrants is totally, totally unacceptable. It is absolutely shameful. It is not in the finest traditions of Canada.

My colleague from Spadina and my colleague for Thunder Bay—Nipigon have made some very thoughtful and fair amendments to try and make the bill more humane. To put a time limit of two years on where a person can be designated on their arrival is very wise. It seems to me that the government should accept that. What is wrong with accepting that? Is there a good reason. I hope the government spokesperson who will respond can give us a good reason and I do not want fluff. I do not want flim-flam and I do not want him to try any jiggery-pokery in this House.

I want to hear specific concrete reasons. I want the government spokesman to respond specifically to the other amendment of my colleague for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, the question of refunding people their money where an application is withdrawn and disallowed. I want to hear why you cannot do that. I want to hear from the minister's representative specific reasons why that amendment cannot be allowed.

I want to hear why the amendment of my colleague from Spadina cannot be allowed, the one where the family comes and brings the dependants but there are one or two dependants left in the other place. Why can they not do the paperwork to bring them at a later date. It could very well be that the dependant may be in school. He has to complete his school year.

Do not put your hands up in a pleading way. I want to hear why that cannot be processed at the same time and not have that dependant at a later date go through the rigmarole and the red tape that we all have to deal with in our riding offices.

Last, I have known through my office the power that is placed in the hands of the immigration officer in the other country where a person applies for a visitor's visa. A family member has died in Canada. It could be a father, a brother, a sister or a mother. What they put that person through. Often times they are denied the visitor's visa. By the time they get to the MP for us to go through the bureaucracy in Ottawa or even to the minister, the person has been buried. In some cases, the culture does not allow the person to be buried until that close relative is there.

Does the government not understand the sensitivity of that? Does this government not understand that? Yet, that immigration officer can simply say: "Well, I have detected in the demeanour when I interviewed the person in the New Delhi office that they do not want to come as a visitor and they might try to stay. They are not a bona fide visitor".

That is an awful lot of power. I think we ought to turn the tables around so that the person applying for the visitor's visa should have the onus placed on the immigration officer to prove. He does not have to prove anything. It leaves open whether it is a bias or prejudice. I do not think that is fair. We need to reverse the onus.

I want to know from the minister's mouthpiece that in fact we are going to get—

Mr. Reid: Order, order.

Mr. Rodriguez: What else can I use?

Mr. Reid: Fine, I am not taking that crap.

Mr. Rodriguez: You do not have to take it. Okay? You do not have to take it, but if you do not have to take it you can leave the room.

Mr. Edwards: That's not the way it works.

Mr. Rodriguez: That may not be the way it works, that is fine. Just tell the people out in the country, those who are going to be affected by this bill. They do not see the niceties of language. They only see the cruelty of these kinds of changes that are made.

I say that this government is pandering. It has the Reform Party banging away at it in the west and I think this is geared to outflank it on the right. That is what these amendments are all about. They have to do with politics and the Conservative Party's unpopularity.

I will be listening very carefully to the responses from the minister's spokesperson when he gets up to respond.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. I always enjoy listening to him in debate, but I regret his time has expired.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Earlier today I presented the 50th report of the Standing Committee on House Management. It was suspected that it was not totally in order.

I find on checking, Sir, that it was totally in order. Therefore, I would ask permission of the House to revert to the tabling of motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Tabling of report. The hon. member for Sudbury.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy to stand and speak in favour of these amendments to Bill C-86 which makes changes to the Immigration Act.

I am also pleased to be following my colleague from Nickel Belt. I must say that while many times I do not agree with his politics, I do feel that the member for Nickel Belt has added greatly to the culture in our country and to the culture in my riding with his colourful attitude and his very worth-while thoughts from time to time.

I still have a lot of work to do to get him convinced of some of my ways, but I will keep working on that. As you know, my colleague from Nickel Belt did immigrate at some point 20 or 30 years ago. I hate to tell you how old he is, but he is older than I am and that makes it better.

At any rate, I have to say that immigration is, of course, the backbone of our country. While many of us may have forgotten, most of us here if we go back far enough, are descendants of immigrants of one sort or another.

I think it is absolutely essential that we continue the tradition of Canadian immigration, that is, we welcome people from all over the world to come and share this land that we have, to help us build it and to become truly great Canadians as many, many immigrants have become.

I was born in the town of Kirkland Lake. Whether you are aware of it or not, after the Second World War Kirkland Lake, being a mining town, had many jobs at that time and many immigrants came and settled there. We learned many things. We learned hard work. We learned that they valued family greatly, and they certainly appreciated becoming Canadians. It was truly a momentous occasion for them who had had such great trials and tribulations during the war. They contributed to Canada and they have made it a different and I believe much better place.

When I became an adult I moved to Sudbury, another area where very much immigration has taken place over many years. There again you can see a model of what it is like where everyone lives together, works together and builds together, which we have done. There are people from every corner of the earth there. It is a wonderful community to use as an example for others who may not understand the value of immigration and how well it can function.

I look at some of these changes that are being proposed. I want to tell the people of this government about what happens when one of these immigrants who are now Canadians invites a member of his or her family, say from Poland, to come and visit. As you know, for very many years these people have not been able to travel freely and come to Canada. It is only in the last few years that they have had an opportunity to do so and to leave their country.

Many times they go to the Canadian consulate and they are denied a visitor's visa. Often it is because the person who is coming does not really understand the questions that are being asked. They are refused. The families are heart-broken because they would really like to have the opportunity to show the family that was left behind, say in Poland or in one of the eastern bloc countries, what their life has become, and to share with them a little bit over a few weeks some of the bounty that they have.

Many times I have had families from my riding come to see me to see if we can help. I must always explain that one way of getting this visitor's visa is to show that you own your home, that you have a job and a life in your country, and that there is no reason why you would want to stay in Canada, that you really only want to come for a visit.

I think it is especially important nowadays that we become more flexible, not less flexible, when it comes to issuing visitors' visas.

One of the other amendments here would provide that they not assess the whole family based on whether one brother is perhaps not what he should be. In most families there is a black sheep. You do not control everything your brothers and sisters do. A family may be denied the right to come to Canada because that family may have one brother or sister who is not doing things the way they would do them. Why would we judge the whole family by the actions of one? That is very, very serious. I would hope that we are more humane than that. It is very important that we treat people with respect. In that way we will be treated with respect.

One of the other problems with immigration is that often people pay to apply, and for some reason or another the application which was originally accepted is rejected. We have talked about how $350 does not seem like a large amount of money to us, although it is for many Canadians. It is something many people do not have quite at their fingertips. For some of these people it may even represent almost a year's worth, or two or three year's worth of savings.

That application money should be refunded. I think it is only fair that we treat people with some kind of respect. Often the application has been paid for perhaps by a Canadian family wishing to sponsor a relative. They may try again and again to sponsor this relative. To have them spend $350 every time gets to be a little bit expensive, especially if the application is first accepted and then rejected. I would like to see that kind of humanness put into the system.

The other thing is the residence requirement. I am all for encouraging immigrants to spend a certain amount of time in a certain area. I believe that there are times when we would want more people to come and settle in certain areas where there is a high demand for employment and perhaps it is difficult to get people to live there, but not for an extended period of time. It should be no more than two years. Often after two years they will be able to move on.

I am being told that my time is up. I want to say though that I would hope that the members of the government would show some humanness, some kindness and remember that somewhere along the way Canada welcomed us, or welcomed our fathers or our great-great-grandfathers. Basically most of us are immigrants. Let us make sure that we keep on being as humane and compassionate as people were then.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in this debate. I appreciate the opportunity to respond on behalf of the government. First and foremost, it is essential to say that this legislation ensures that the system we have in place will enable us in the future to bring people into this country who choose to become Canadians and my personal view and my personal hope is that it is in ever increasing numbers.

The second thing is that the system must ensure that those who need our protection from persecution around the world, who have not found refuge elsewhere can find refuge and protection in this country and that our tradition of leading the world in this area will be maintained and continued. It is essential that we have a system which is visible and a system which Canadians have confidence in. I fear that if we lose confidence in this system, Canadians will not tolerate the high numbers of immigrants we have seen in the past seven or eight years and will not tolerate increases in numbers of immigrants in the future.

I would like to comment very briefly on the six or seven points raised in this group of amendments. The first refers to Motion No. 3 which involves the question of accompanying dependants. I think it should be recognized first of all that the premise of the 1976 legislation was that all dependants or all applications for immigrant status were to be handled outside of the country.

The provision here is in fact a large step forward. What we have also done is ensure that visitors, when applying to come to Canada, only get assessed on the people who are coming with them and that refugees get a special consideration as they are considered as family units.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am told that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader just recently came into the House and sought unanimous consent to table the report of the Standing Committee on House Management having to do with striking the committee concerning Bill C-91. I just wanted to register with you, Mr. Speaker, a point of order that we will be raising this tomorrow morning. I wanted to do it as soon after the event as possible because the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has indicated that he thinks the Whips have agreed when in fact the Whips have not agreed in the same way that they had all not agreed when he tried to do this earlier in the day. We will be raising it with the Chair tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is fine. The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona has put his plea to the Chair. I am sure that will happen tomorrow.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I refer to clause 5, which refers to the question of criteria against which visitors' visas may be measured, and at the same time to Motion No. 7 from my friend for Scarborough—Rouge River. There is no question that we have all experienced a great deal of difficulty in dealing with visitors and visitors' visas. I will tell you and it is no surprise to this House that this is a tremendous problem for those held responsible for administering the immigration system and the people who are in the field representing Canada abroad.

I may say that the proposal of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River as an idea and as a policy holds some merit. There are some fundamental flaws in the system, however, which need to be looked at. One of the big difficulties we have is in prescribing criteria like this in a piece of legislation. Courts use that legislation as a strong measurement. If those are prescribed in the act and there is a problem in that the courts are interpreting them either much more strictly than they were intended or too leniently, we run into a problem in terms of fixing them. In fact, perhaps the best place to accomplish this would be in the regulations. As others have done, I caution against the fear that it becomes a capacity-to-pay privilege rather than a protection that is guaranteed by Canadians and those in this country who are prepared to put their resources behind their commitment.

I would like to refer to the question of mobility, Motion No. 70. On the question of the charter applying, first of all it should be recognized that the charter applies to the government, not to the people to whom the government applies the charter. That is more accurate than as has, perhaps, been said before. It may come under charter challenge but I think it is important to recognize exactly what the mobility provisions provide. For those people who might not normally have the opportunity to come to Canada because they would want to come to Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver, if there is employment in place and if there are support mechanisms in place, those people can come and live in the more remote parts of the country.

There were some real concerns raised in the hearings and we have addressed those, particularly as they involve the variance of conditions. We have provided in section 15 not only for the variance of conditions but also that the visa or immigration officer must vary those conditions. I think that is important and it is an important change.

In terms of the time frame, why should we limit it to two years? On the top end citizenship comes in three years. They would disappear. There may be circumstances where we would only want to put the conditions in place for one year. I would argue that two years is far too restrictive.

Very quickly, on the question of a fee, it is not an admission fee to Canada. The fee is a processing fee for the application and it should be recognized that the minister has made it clear and the evidence in the hearings has made it clear that the processing fee for those who have applied and have had their applications denied without any process or because of retroactivity or changes in policy will, in fact, have that fee refunded. There are opportunities in the regulations that would provide to have fees changed or taken into account if necessary.

One minute to conclude, Mr. Speaker, because I know you would like to have the opportunity to put this forward.

I think it is important to recognize that a number of people came before the committee on this legislation with a variety of views, a great deal of them very valid. The government responded as well to the opposition to say that this legislation is cruel and ridiculous. To say that nobody came forward in support of it is inaccurate and unfair. If one looks at the evidence, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the IRB and the Senate report, the government has addressed a number of those considerations. I would remind my friend opposite that in fact one of the groups that came forward, in fact one of the least fettered sources of support, was the union that represents the workers of Employment and Immigration Canada.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Brightwell (p. 10609).

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my constituency deserves more respect than that, sir.

I take pleasure in rising to speak on this motion introduced by my colleague and friend, the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo. The subject is really about cross-border shopping and the impact that has had particularly on the food-producing community and especially the farm and poultry community in Canada.

I have learned through the years that whenever one introduces an issue like this, there is an equal and opposite reaction to that motion somewhere else. There is not a thing we do in this House that does not affect another part of the community. In this case we are talking about the food producers of our land and they are, I guess, pitted so often against the consumer. It is unwitting and certainly not because producers want it that way. The consumer, however, wants low food prices and the producer wants to have cost recovery and some profit. This is understandable.

It has always been a mystery to me that those of us who are consumers feel free to organize in labour or trade unions. We feel that the employer is entitled to organize into employer groups and protect the business. The unions protect the interests of the workers so that they can have higher wages and better working conditions and the employer wants to protect his business so he can ensure his profits.

However, the consumer groups, when they band together, complain about marketing boards or supply management. I have never been able to understand why it was okay for the consumer groups to organize to protect themselves and protect their livelihood and act as though that does not increase the cost for the other people. That is, if the auto workers get a better wage it does not increase the price of cars, does it? They feel that they are entitled to that, but when farmers band together and form supply management systems and regimes to make sure that they get a return on their investment and maybe some profit, that somehow is scandalized by the consumer community. They think that is unfair.

I do not think it is unfair. I am not saying that I always agree with everything that the supply management system does, but I think that they are entitled to organize just as much as any other group is entitled to organize.

As I said, we are pitting the producer against the consumer in this issue unfortunately. It shows itself most vividly in cross-border shopping because everybody is looking for cheaper prices. They will willingly go into the United States where dairy products are subsidized many times up to the tune of 50 per cent and where the American taxpayer is helping to subsidize those farm products. We do not mind that, but we are saying that it is okay to go there and buy those products and ding the Canadian farmer out of his business.

I can tell you that in the Fraser Valley of British Columbia the estimate is $50 million to $60 million lost by the farmers of British Columbia every year from milk being brought in in the trunks of cars across the border. I understand why the consumer, with the squeeze on the cost of food nowadays, wants those cheaper prices, but how many dairy farmers have been driven out of business because of milk, eggs or chickens being brought across the border in the trunks of cars?

On the one hand we want to protect the Canadian farms because if we blacktop all of them, the prices will surely go up in the United States and they will have us entrapped.

The government on the other hand is trying to make it easy for the consumer by making transit across the border easy. This is something which every consumer should be able to enjoy. I agree with that. My own riding has the busiest border-crossing point west of Windsor and we have done a lot. The Minister of National Revenue has done a lot. He has opened special lanes for tourists. There is a pace lane at Douglas. He has increased the resources and the staff, introduced new technology, streamlined the enforcement procedures and instituted automatic cash machines providing gains of 70 per cent. The list goes on and on. Incidentally, he also improved the plants and the offices so that the mayor of Abbotsford, George Ferguson, has said that upgrading that border crossing at Sumas is encouraging Americans to come through at California, Oregon and Washington. On the one hand we want those people coming and spending their dollars. On the other hand, at the same time, we are saying we want ease for Canadians to go shopping in the United States.

They should also be aware of what that does to the Canadian producer. My colleague has introduced a motion which has called for a 48-hour delay in poultry and dairy products being brought into Canada. If Canadian consumers go down into the United States and buy dairy products there would be a 48-hour delay in bringing them into Canada by changing the permit system for importing them.

That complicates it even more for the government I hasten to say because if you have a 48-hour delay, the consumer cannot stay there and wait for the 48 hours. That means storage facilities. It becomes a terribly complex problem. Incidentally, I have not even mentioned the impact this has on the merchants in Canada for those who are at the border who experience a loss of business because of the cross-border shopping.

We want, on the one hand, to protect the rights of Canadians for free and easy access across the border. That ought to be. We believe in free trade. We want them to be able to move across the border at ease. We should also be aware of the impact that has on the commercial side, the merchants in Canada, and certainly on the food producer side.

My colleague has introduced this motion in representing a farming community. He is trying to do his part to make sure that the interests of the farming groups are protected by the system, but at the same time he recognizes that it is much more complex than that.

There have been discussions regarding the means to implement this procedure and it is not a simple yes or no vote in the House that will solve the problem because it means incredibly costly expenditures to bring about the procedures at the border that would allow us to implement this particular motion if we were going to do it. At the same time we want to do something tangible that will protect the farmers.

What are we going to do? As I said at the outset of my remarks, we want to protect the farmers, we want to protect the consumers, we want to protect the merchants and we are caught in that squeeze. Four hours of debate does not really elevate the intricacies of the issue to the degree that we need.

We have agreed that there should be a much more intense study of the problem and that we should be able to bring people into a discussion on this so we can hear from experts in the farming and commercial communities, from Revenue Canada officials and be able to define even more accurately what the issues are and how we can solve them.

My colleague has written a statement I would like to read and put on the record. The member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo has said: "Therefore I am pleased that the government has assured me that the subject matter of this motion will become a topic of a special committee study regardless of the outcome of the vote. I have also been assured that such a committee could continue through any prorogation if a House order is obtained".

I believe we have now concluded three hours of debate. Obviously there is much more that could be said about this subject. The farming community must be protected. The customs system must be able to operate at the border. We have to reduce the cost of enforcement at the border as we have been trying to do. We have to make it as efficient as possible at the border.

We have agreed that regardless of the vote tonight, there will be a special committee established, which has been lobbied for by the member from Perth, to make certain that all of the relevant issues are brought to the surface so we can come to a thorough understanding conclusion of this matter and we can do something tangible for the farmers of our country.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to support my colleague from Perth—Wellington—Waterloo who moved this motion. As the previous speaker started his speech, I too support marketing boards and the organized marketing procedures we use in Canada, which work well. Our party supports marketing boards.

I think this private member's motion supports, perhaps in an indirect fashion, marketing boards. I will just speak about dairy in this case, although his motion goes a little further than that, it goes into poultry too.

Marketing boards are responsible for giving us a superior product in the dairy industry. It is always in good supply, the highest quality at a fair price. Even if we take inflated dollars into account, the price of food in this country is still a fair price compared to other countries. In some instances, compared over the last few years, there may be even a decline in the price of food, which tells me something is working and there is some stability where marketing boards are involved.

I get a little nervous sometimes when we are told that once again GATT is down to the final hours. Those are the big players. There are 108 countries involved. Canada is not a big player in that GATT deal, but we certainly could be affected by it.

Our party has been consistent. We will protect marketing boards. The domestic market in this country is not up for grabs. That has been established. No Canadian wants Canada to become the dumping ground of the world for cheap dairy and poultry products. That is what marketing boards are endeavouring to protect. I do not think any Canadian would want to see a change from what it is right now where we have the best product that can be produced at a fair price.

I live in a border community. I know the consequences to to my part of the country of cross-border shopping. This item my colleague has brought forward in his private member's motion is one of the main culprits. Cross-border shopping has had a devastating effect on some small border communities. We put out some ideas periodically in the House as to what we think would correct this problem, but nothing has been done of any substantive nature.

The most recent article I have read is in one of Toronto's papers yesterday. It stated: "Same-day trips to the U.S. are on the rise". Anyone who thought that we had snuffed out cross-border shopping had better look at the facts.

The difficulty with the importing of dairy and poultry products under this general import permit is that people can bring in $20 worth of product as often as they like. They could conceivably go back and forth across the bridge several times a day, each time bringing back $20 worth of product. If a person is accompanied by his neighbour, he is entitled to bring $20 worth too. That would be $40 worth of milk for example. Forty dollars worth of milk is a lot of milk. He is supposed to be bringing it over for his own personal use. Sometimes I wonder.

The fact is he would pay duty on that, I suppose, if he wanted to go strictly by the law, but 10 per cent duty on dairy products would amount to about $2. It is customary at customs to waive anything in the neighbourhood of $2 or a little less or a little more. There is no incentive not to keep bringing the product across as many times as you like. This is having a very serious impact on the dairy and poultry industries in this country. Higher amounts occasionally are waived. Sometimes they do not stick to just $2. If they happen to be busy in customs, you can imagine what happens, they wave you on and you can have much more than $20 worth.

There is nothing to prevent an importer, somebody who is bringing it across, from going back and forth as many times as he likes. There is nothing wrong with that except it has a bad effect on the controlled marketing system that we have in this country. We think this marketing system is one of the best, and we think it should be protected.

Statistics will show, and they are there for the reading, that this has caused serious problems with the producers, the processors and the retailers. We are not talking about a few thousand dollars. We are talking about several million dollars annually being lost because people can run back and forth bringing back $20 worth each time.

This proposal that my colleague is presenting has the support and indeed, I think it originated with the dairy farmers of Canada who have made a study of this problem. They would like to see the general import permit changed in about three or four areas. The dairy industry happens to be permit number one, and it would like to have it changed, as my colleague has mentioned, so that a person would have to stay in the United States for a period of 48 hours, after which time he would be entitled to bring across $20 worth. That would not correct it totally. We would have some problems with it still, but it would make a great start. We want to cause a slowdown in this flood of milk that is coming across the border and turn it into a trickle. That is all my colleague across the way is trying to do, he is trying to institute an amendment that could be put in place.

Apparently this matter has been studied and Canada has the authority. There is nothing wrong with putting this amendment in place. It would conform with any rules that we have regarding free trade or any rules that we have regarding GATT. Therefore, I think it deserves support. I would like to see us support it. Our party will support it.

The dairy farmers of Canada need our support right now. We are supporting their marketing system. We would like to see it enhanced, of course, and we would like to see some clarification at GATT of article XI but those things will happen. It would be a good start if we could get this much done.

This could be done without causing great hardship. It is not intended to cause great hardship to anybody. If the rules were applied fairly, I suppose most people would bring $20 worth of product across once in a while and use it. That was the intention, but that was before there was a lot of running back and forth cross-border shopping. When this measure was put in place, perhaps there was not any particular advantage to going across and bringing back dairy or poultry products. That is not the case today.

My colleague is just trying to bring the rules up to date a bit. Circumstances are different out there today and I think that is what his amendment would do, change the rules in three or four areas. He speaks of poultry and dairy products and they are under four categories as far as the rules go.

I am pleased on behalf of our party—there may be other speakers too—to support his endeavours. I hope that something will be done. As I say, it would not be a great hardship to anybody. It is not as if it is very severe. We are just proposing that a stay in the States be for 48 hours before bringing across some dairy and poultry products. There would be no harm done. It would help stem the flow which dairy farmers tell us is having a severe impact on their industry.

It is a pleasure for me, personally, to support my colleague's private member's motion and I know I speak on behalf of my party.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my comments on this motion and emphasize that we in the Bloc Quebecois thoroughly agree with what it proposes to do. The mover of the motion deserves our congratulations. It is like a breath of fresh air to see a Tory member mindful of the concerns of his constituents and those of Quebecers and Canadians in general.

The mandatory 48-hour stay will definitely help small producers who are often located along the border and even those who are further away, now that changing consumer habits are becoming a threat, both in Canada and Quebec. The mandatory 48-hour stay will certainly help our farmers who, as you know, live with a lot of uncertainty and are often very worried about the outcome of the GATT talks.

As my learned colleague said before, there is a direct connection with our marketing board system. Our new marketing boards have been instrumental in maintaining prices and ensuring security of supply. As far as quality is concerned, if we compare what is produced in this country, in Quebec or the rest of Canada, product quality is quite superior, when we look at what is on supermarket shelves, because of better quality control. And since we use our marketing boards to regulate Canadian or Quebec consumption, we have a duty to protect those marketing boards, as the hon. member said. This motion reflects the need to listen to what our farmers have to say, especially in connection with the GATT talks which, as I said earlier, are a matter of great concern to our farmers.

This proposal is acceptable, it does not violate existing treaties and it is legally votable. It seems to me we have a duty to support an idea that is as brilliant as it is practical. We often tend to go on at length about agriculture in the abstract, but listening to our farmers also means actively responding, with actions like this one, to their needs and expectations. I think Motion M-633 should be considered by our government, and I think the mover and the seconder of the motion fully deserve our congratulations. All parties here in the House should support this motion which, although modest in scale, will help our agricultural industry.

I think this motion should also be seen by the government as an example of how it could be more attuned, as was one of its members, to the needs of Canadians and above all how to introduce practical measures that could be immediately effective in supporting our agricultural industry, our dairy producers, our egg producers, our turkey producers, and also ensure that unfortunate consumer habits that are spreading in this country and affecting dairy products and products in the areas I just mentioned will stop and that consumers will stop and think about the product quality we have right here. To maintain that quality we must buy these products, which are often the same price and even better quality, and ensure the survival of our agriculture with practical measures like this one.

The Bloc Quebecois takes great pleasure in supporting the motion before the House, which is being debated for the last time today, and it will vote in favour of the motion.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight to support the motion of the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo. It is time indeed that we take action on some of these issues that dramatically impact on the farmers of Canada, particularly those farmers of Canada who are not contributing to surpluses on the world markets.

This situation in which food is being brought in through cross-border shopping seriously undermines some of the most sophisticated marketing systems of any country in the world. Not only do we have those marketing systems but the food being sold under those marketing systems is also the highest quality of any country in the world, as a result of the inspection services we have here in Canada through Agriculture Canada, their inspectors and our own officials. The producers themselves are to be commended for the quality of food they produce. If people are paying less for food in the United States I can well understand why when I look at the differences in food quality between Canada and the United States.

These products being brought in are produced in an entirely different cost environment. I continue to keep tabs on the differences in costs between those of a dairy farmer in my own constituency and that of a county in Michigan, St. Clair County. Time and time again we have found that there is about a 25 per cent difference in the cost structure. This is a cost difference that our producers in Canada are powerless to do anything about.

Consequently, if we are going to have a viable industry in Canada a degree of protection must be provided. I believe this motion would go a long way toward providing it.

However, I do not accept the suggestion that this would be too difficult for the Minister for International Trade or the Minister of National Revenue to monitor. I can remember going across the border for years. If a person was there for more than 48 hours they were able to bring things back duty free. That was not difficult to monitor and this proposal would not be very difficult either. In fact, if we wanted to take a quart of milk into the U.S. I wonder how far we would get with it.

In view of the losses being incurred by the dairy farmers, particularly in the lower valley of British Columbia, in Ontario, in Quebec and in Atlantic Canada, this motion is long overdue. I hope it will be sent to committee tonight, be brought out very quickly and implemented as soon as possible so that the hurts and the cutbacks that are taking place in our industry at the present time do not have to continue.

Another thing we have to examine, and I have spoken about this quite a bit lately, is the current account deficit here in Canada. The Minister for International Trade loves to brag about the merchandise trade surplus but he does not say a word about the current account deficit. This money being spent outside of Canada is cash flowing out of Canada. Of course, that is part of the current account deficit. For every $20 billion in current account deficit we lose about 500,000 jobs in Canada. These are not my own figures, these are figures from prominent economists who have been studying this for quite some time.

This move alone would help get the government off the hook in terms of its current account deficit and what is happening to Canada because of it.

I also want to point out that here in Canada—I will go back to the year 1990 because that is the last year for which complete figures are available. We must look at the fact that it was about three years ago that the Minister of Agriculture started to talk not about the net farm income but the net family farm income in this House.

He pointed out that the average Canadian family farm income was almost $37,000, but out of that $37,000, $21,250 came from income earned either by the spouse or by the farmer himself working off the farm in some other industry to help supplement the farm income. That left a balance of about $15,500 in income from the farm itself. However, out of that figure $8,091 came from subsidies, either federal or provincial, leaving a net figure of about $7,400 from the farm operation itself.

Let me assure this House that the dairy farmers of Canada do not receive any subsidy at all for the fluid milk they produce. The only subsidy they receive is approximately $267 million for the industrial milk they produce, which is in turn made into cheese or skim milk powders and so on. This motion is really protecting the very viable industry which we have here in Canada including the poultry industry.

That average Canadian family farm income, and the net from the farm production alone of roughly $7,400, is a national disgrace. However, due to the marketing systems we have here the dairy farmers are not in that category. The dairy and poultry farmers are paying their way and they do not need any subsidy to do so. Look at their buildings and compare them with those of the dairy farmers of the United States and look at the poultry buildings here in Canada and make comparisons. It is an entirely different environment. For the good of all Canadians we should make sure that this motion passes as quickly as possible when it comes out of committee.

Another matter I want to touch upon and about which I am very concerned is health inspection in some of these institutions south of the border. We can look back at the deregulation that took place in the United States. It is on the books here. A deregulation of some of the regulations in Agriculture Canada was proposed last Friday by the Minister of Agriculture.

I am very concerned about it because we have the highest quality standards of any country in the world. When I look at some of the news media reports of what is happening in southern United States, and I will use the Atlanta Constitutional–Journal which did an ongoing study into health conditions in some of the poultry slaughtering plants in the United States, they indicate that conditions are absolutely deplorable.

Last Saturday night I was speaking in Bruce County to the Federation of Agriculture about this subject. One man in the audience rose and said: "You are exactly right. I am an inspector. I see truckloads of poultry coming into Canada from southern United States. In no way would it be allowed through a Canadian poultry processing plant".

There was a documentary on Prime Time Live last April 30 on the beef packing industry. We saw the conditions there. They would never be permitted in Canada. That would never be allowed to take place in Canada, under such deplorable conditions.

This bill not only protects the Canadian farmer but it protects the health of the Canadian consumer. Nobody is going to bring back some milk that is two days old or some chicken that is two or three days old, even though it could be sold over there. In this context, if we intend to keep control of the agricultural industry in Canada, if we intend to have our producers prosper, like any business they need a return on investment, management and risk.

As I look at the concentration in the agricultural industry in the United States at the present time, for example four firms control 45 per cent of the poultry produced and processed in the United States and four firms control 69 per cent of the beef produced and processed in the United States. We do not want to go that way. We must protect the Canadian family farm. It is the most viable institution we have for food production in the world. We have the highest quality food in any country in the world at a very reasonable price.

If food prices are too high here then I suggest to this House that we should look at the returns, the five-year average rate of returns of the Canadian dairy producers, which will range somewhere between 8 per cent and 10 per cent. We should compare that to other sectors of the food system, particularly the food distribution system with an average range of return of 17.2 per cent. It is not the farmers who are causing high prices.

I suggest this motion should be passed and sent on to committee immediately.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have this opportunity to stand and speak in favour of the motion brought before this House by the hon. member from Waterloo.

It is not often I get a chance to agree with a member on the government side on an initiative and I am pleased to be able to do it on this particular one. The motion calls for an amendment to the Export and Import Permits Act to provide that importations under the authority of import permits, namely pertaining to dairy products, to chicken, turkeys and eggs, shall be subject to a mandatory 48-hour stay of the importer.

In other words, if Canadians go across the border to Washington to purchase these goods, they would have to stay for a 48-hour period in order to bring them back essentially duty free.

This motion goes some way toward resolving the problem. It will not eliminate the problem altogether. I am speaking from the perspective of a member from British Columbia. I might add that I have some 87 dairy producers in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap as well as a large number of poultry producers and egg producers. Many Canadians are doing this but I make reference in particular to British Columbians who are going across the border for same-day visits to purchase commodities such as cheaper gas, dairy products and poultry products south of the border. This has really caused a significant economic haemorrhaging from the economy of not only British Columbia but Canada as a whole.

Certainly one cannot blame people for trying to find the best deal possible. Every family has a budget to meet and a financial expectation to live up to. They are looking obviously for the best deal they can find. That has been made somewhat more difficult I might add the fact that these goods have been subjected to different taxation rates in terms of production and whatnot through the goods and services tax and different classes of production. We simply have to recognize that British Columbian farmers and Canadian farmers face higher costs of production than farmers who have different economic circumstances south of the border. There is a price difference between these commodities. A person cannot blame someone for trying to save a buck.

People do not think all the time about the economic consequences of moving that dollar south of the border and the kind of economic haemorrhaging that it causes our economy. When Canadians or British Columbians shop south of the border they are exporting jobs. That has hurt British Columbia. I would submit that it has had a fairly dramatic impact on the viability of our agricultural sector in British Columbia. I do not have the particular figures at my fingertips right now, but I know that there has been a significant loss in the millions of dollars in terms of losses to the agricultural industry.

What happens of course is that as people purchase products outside the country, the consumption of B.C. or Canadian dairy products goes down accordingly. Therefore, the quotas that are assessed the dairy farmer or the chicken producer or the egg producer are reduced accordingly. It is not only for farmers close to the border, but for farmers all over British Columbia. It affects the entire industry. That has had a fairly dramatic impact.

I do think that this particular amendment will have a modifying effect on the purchase of these particular goods outside of the province. I would suggest it would have a fairly significant impact on the viability of those industries and small farms in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap, in ridings in the lower mainland, in the Fraser Valley and in the southern part of Vancouver Island.

Our economy in British Columbia is probably in better shape than in other parts of Canada, but there is no question that every time we lose a dollar to producers south of the border, we are essentially losing jobs. We are also losing tax revenues for both the provincial government and the federal government.

While we recognize, as I mentioned before, that consumers of course have every right to look for the best deal possible, I would hope that Canadians also recognize the importance of buying these products in Canada to support Canadian industries and to support the entire infrastructure. This has been put together to ensure that not only do consumers get fair prices but that the primary producers—the farmers and agriculturalists in Canada—have an opportunity to make a fair return on their investment.

It is a tough, tough business out there. Farming, agriculture and the return on investment is very low indeed. I think this government owes a responsibility to our Canadian farmers to do everything that it can to assist that industry to ensure that it remains viable and healthy in Canada.

I take pleasure in rising to support this particular motion and I congratulate the hon. member from Waterloo for having the courage—because, of course, there is going to be some criticism of this motion—to recognize the problem and the courage to attempt to make an honourable approach to resolving this particular issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried on division.

POINT OF ORDER

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON HOUSE MANAGEMENT

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops is rising on a point of order. I may know what it is. Ordinarily we would deal with it at the very end of Routine Proceedings and I am prepared, of course, to do that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate there is a reason to present this point of order now as opposed to at the end of Routine Proceedings because of a meeting that is scheduled for 11 a.m.

Late yesterday the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader rose in the House and asked for unanimous consent to table the 50th report of the House management committee. One would then assume that if there was going to be a report from the committee that the committee would have met to have a report.

I want to say there is actually one way around this. The practice of the House has been for some time now that when striking the membership of committees, if there was unanimous consent by the Whips, that authority was given to the Whips to agree that the report could be tabled without going to the management committee.

However, yesterday when my friend the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader introduced the tabling initiative I indicated at that time that we had not agreed to the membership of the committee and therefore the request was withdrawn.

Later in the day the same initiative was taken when the parliamentary secretary asked again that the report be tabled. The Whips did not agree. The only way then that that could proceed would be for the House management committee to meet, agree on the membership of the committee, and then the parliamentary secretary or the chair of the committee could ask that the report be tabled. That was not done.

In other words, in one of life's many mysteries, we would table the report of a committee which never met and I do not know how that could be done.

I think we have to watch this practice because if the parliamentary secretary was presenting a report that did not reflect the decision of the committee we are getting into very dangerous territory.

• (1010)

I would ask that you give some thought toward considering the 50th report of the Standing Committee on House Management not receivable at least until the committee has had a chance to meet and decide upon the report.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, the Whip for the New Democratic Party was seeking the floor. Perhaps it would be better to hear what he has to say before I respond, if that is all right.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I received a call when I was in a committee from the House leader's office indicating that the government had risen to present a report of the striking committee for Bill C-91.

I had submitted the name of our caucus member who was to be our representative on that committee, but it was not until I saw the Votes and Proceedings today that I saw the names of other members who are being appointed to that committee. There was no consultation with me as Whip of the New Democratic Party as to the composition of that committee. There was no meeting.

In fact after the telephone call and after the parliamentary secretary for the government House leader withdrew the report of the House management committee, I spoke directly to him in the House. I advised him that I did not agree with the tabling of the report and I further advised him of the need to call a meeting of the House management committee.

When the House management committee established the procedure to provide the Whips with the ability to present reports directly to the House if a unanimous decision was made, it was done to expedite the mechanics of operating the House of Commons. It was not designed in any way to provide an opportunity for the government to do what it felt was appropriate without ensuring that it had the support of the other two Whips.

I ask that you consider this matter and as my House leader has suggested, set aside the 50th report. In addition to that, the organizational meeting of Bill C–91 has been called for eleven o'clock this morning, the same time the House management committee has been called to meet. I ask that you find a way in which to suspend the organizational meeting of the Bill C–91 committee until such time as the House management committee has been able to receive the recommendation of the membership of that committee and determine whether that is an appropriate group of individuals to be on that committee.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Liberal Whip wishes to be heard.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I also want to say on this matter that it was only yesterday during Question Period that I submitted the names of the Official Opposition members to the committee clerk and I did not have any consultation with the other two Whips. I do not even know who the other members are. I was surprised when I saw on my office television that the striking report was being deposited unanimously.

Usually, even though we hardly ever oppose the chosen names, there is a minimum consultation and discussion so that we can strike a committee. Those are the facts I would like to present to you on this matter.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, now that no one else is rising to speak I will now endeavour to state my understanding of the circumstances.

During Routine Proceedings yesterday afternoon I did indeed table the 50th report of the Standing Committee on House Management which contained names of members from all three parties to become members of the legislative committee on Bill C–91.

This I did as a result of information that was conveyed to me during the course of Question Period that there had been the appropriate consultation among the Whips and that there had never been any difficulty from the perspective of the New Democratic Party. There had been some last minute discussions with the Liberal Party. However, I got the message that those discussions were now concluded and it was appropriate to table the report, which I then proceeded to do.

There was an intervention from the House leader of the New Democratic Party who said that the report was not in order from the perspective of his party. I subsequently had a private discussion with him in which I understood that the name of his representative had been submitted by the Whip and that it appeared to be in order. I then made some further inquiries and came to the conclusion that all was in order, that the report was properly constituted and that there had been a thorough discussion among the three Whips.

Then last evening I sought unanimous consent of the House to revert to Routine Proceedings for the purpose of receiving the motion. That consent was given by the House and I deposited the report, having earlier in the day of course deferred to the word of my friend, the hon. member of the New Democratic Party, having received earlier unanimous consent to withdraw the first deposition.

I think it is important the House understand that the practice is that the Whips never see the names submitted by the other parties. It has been standard practice since April that the Whips do not consult as a group. The report was submitted on behalf of the House management committee as the appropriate vehicle for channeling the names submitted by the Whips.

I would submit, Sir, that the report was properly deposited, that the committee is now properly constituted and ought to begin its work.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed an unusual incident. I say unusual for these reasons.

Yesterday, my colleague, the House leader for the New Democratic Party and deputy leader, spoke. We have heard him again today and we have heard the Whip for the New Democratic Party. They indicated yesterday very clearly that there were some difficulties surrounding this particular issue as to the unanimous report of the striking committee.

Having said that, I think the signal was clear, the direction was clear that if one were to proceed in a positive manner obviously there would have to be meaningful consultations which would have to take place thereafter. This is the direction that the management committee has given the striking committee. That is the way it operates.

We have heard again this morning from my colleagues, the House leader of the NDP and the Whip from the Official Opposition, that those consultations did not take place. I think the parliamentary secretary is right when he says that names were given by the respective parties, but the second part of the equation in terms of consultations did not take place.

Also, in this particular incident, I do not believe the Whip from the Official Opposition signed the report normally provided by the clerk. I think he did in fact send a letter indicating the names. If one wishes to interpret that as being a form of consultation, I do not think one would be accurate.

I think that is a very clear statement of the facts. The signal was given yesterday. There have not been consultations. It has not been unanimous and I am sure that with some goodwill on the part of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that this report ought not to proceed as tabled yesterday.

One might ask: "How come unanimous consent was given last evening?" That in itself is quite an oddity in view of what the deputy leader and the House leader for the New Democratic Party said yesterday. He was not in the House, the Whip of that party was not in the House, the House leader of the Liberals was not here nor the Whip. I am not trying to impute motive but I suggest that this is an unusual occurrence and I would hope that the parliamentary secretary will relent in his persistence of pursuing with this report in view of the facts and the signals which have been exchanged by the respective parties.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think I have identified where the problem is. In listening carefully to the words of my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, he indicated that the respective Whips had submitted the names of the representatives of the parties for the committee.

The House management committee has empowered the Whips to report directly to the House when there is unanimous agreement among them on the membership of the committee. In other words, in those many cases where there was agreement among the Whips that the composition—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, please. The hon. member for Kamloops made a reference. Is the hon. member reading from the motion of the committee passed some time ago with respect to the unanimous consent?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am paraphrasing what the agreement was, and that was that where there is agreement among the Whips on the membership of the committee—that does not mean having submitted a name, but on the membership of the committee—it proceeds automatically to the House and not necessarily through the House management committee process.

The point that we are making this morning is that the membership was not agreed upon by the Whips. Normally it is, but this is one case where it was not. Names were submitted but there was no indication from the Whip of the New Democratic Party—I cannot speak for the Whip of the Liberal Party—that they had agreed to the membership of this important committee. That is the point.

While I respect the views of my hon. friend that, yes, we did submit a name, I want to simply make the case that the composition of the committee was not agreed upon by the Whips, which therefore makes it now necessary to go back to the management committee to receive its report.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, just to support the position made by our House leader and the Whip of the New Democratic Party, I know that we are not supposed to look into the internal operations of a committee, but there was no committee meeting to authorize this report. The parliamentary secretary for the government House leader says, well, the Whips agreed. It is evident that the Whips did not agree. In communications directly with him and with each other, they did not agree on the composition of this committee.

This committee is, therefore, not struck. The House management committee did not meet. Therefore, the House management committee cannot report to this House. It does not have any authorization whatsoever to make a report when the committee itself did not meet.

The only exception to that is if the three Whips unanimously agree on the composition of a committee. Then they can authorize the chair of the House management committee to report to the House. They did not do that.

The only remedy the government had at that time, when the three Whips did not agree unanimously, was to call a meeting of the full committee, where I suspect using their majority they would have got their way. But they rushed that process. We know that they are very intent on getting the changes to the Patent Act through the House, but to skip the necessary requirement of having a full House management committee when they knew that there was a dispute among the Whips is unacceptable.

I think it is very important, Mr. Speaker, that not only do you not allow this report to be received and acted upon, but that instructions be issued for that committee not to start its work in one half hour's time.

Mr. Speaker: Before we go any further, perhaps hon. members could assist me on facts. It has been asserted, I am sure with complete bona fides, that a committee meeting has been called for eleven o'clock this morning. Now I am told that maybe that assertion is in error. Can hon. members assist the Chair on this?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, there are two committee meetings called for eleven o'clock this morning. My understanding is that there is a meeting of the legislative committee on Bill C–91 called for eleven o'clock this morning. There is also a meeting of the House management committee called for eleven o'clock this morning, of course in separate rooms.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. parliamentary secretary to continue with his comments.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I will try to be as brief as possible because I truly believe that this debate belongs in the House management committee rather than on the floor of the House, but it is here and we must deal with it here.

On April 29, 1992 the House of Commons concurred in the 28th report of the House management committee and this report dealt with standing order changes regarding legislative committees.

On May 7, 1992 the House management committee passed a report which stated: "That further to the motion adopted by the committee on June 18, 1991, the subcommittee composed of the three Whips be delegated all authority to act as striking committee pursuant to Standing Order 113, and provided that the report recommendations are unanimous it present them directly to the chairman of the committee for presentation to the House on behalf of the committee".

This allowed the striking committee to bypass the House management committee in order to table reports on the membership of legislative committees. The clerks of the House management committee needed to put in place a process whereby they could get consent on membership from the Whips and get the reports into the House.

Up until this point the Whips were able to do the same thing by submitting the names of the members from their own caucus to the clerks who would put together a list. The list would then be circulated among the Whips for their signature and then returned to the clerks. The clerks then put together a report for the chair to table.

This was thought to be a rather cumbersome process and so after the above motion was passed the clerks consulted with the Whips and decided on a new process. Again, briefly, it goes like this. The Whips submit the name of the member to sit on the committee along with the Whips' initials. The clerks can immediately put together a report for the chair of the House management committee to table.

Problems arose with this as well. The office of the New Democratic Party Whip regularly sent over names of members without the initials of the hon. New Democratic Party Whip. The clerks would send the notice back and ask for the initials. Sometimes this would take a few days. The clerks began to submit reports without the New Democratic Party Whip's initials.

At least three cases are on file with the clerks' office in which the hon. New Democratic Party Whip did not initial his submission. The reports were tabled and deemed adopted without incident. Those reports were: the 40th report, Bill C-73; the 46th report, Bill C-79; and another report which number I do not have but it was with reference to Bill C-78.

Table clerks have told us and it is my judgment that if the committee chair feels that the committee report is in order and he or someone on his behalf tables the report it then is in order.

If the opposition raises a point of order on the matter I believe the Chair should not entertain arguments because as far as I am concerned the committee report is before the House. If the Whips are unhappy with that, I submit is a committee problem and must be dealt with within the committee.

I did have an opportunity to consult with the chair of the House management committee yesterday evening and he confirms the facts as I have outlined them. I regret that he is out of the city today and not able to be in the House, but I can assure the House that the view as I have outlined it was confirmed by him in a conversation I had with him yesterday evening.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the next hon. member, but I just want to point out to the House that there seems to be some confusion about the situation at eleven o'clock.

The information that I have is that no formal notice has gone out to hold that meeting.

• (1030)

My concern now is that whether it is at eleven o'clock or whether it may come back a little later, there is a point of order in front of the Chamber and in front of the Chair. I think I am going to have to deal with it unless hon. members can resolve it among themselves, which would be the best solution, but that may not be possible.

I will hear the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. Unless there is something vital and new that has to be brought in—the hon. member for Saint-Léonard wants to speak—it is probably my responsibility now to reserve and see how quickly I can settle this matter, if it is appropriate for me to do so.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I want to add one key point. Yesterday I advised the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, when he was in his seat in the House, that I did not agree to the report of the House management committee to strike Bill C-91. I indicated very clearly that the matter should be referred to the House management committee to be resolved.

Regardless of whether or not there was a signature, regardless of whatever the process was, I told the hon. member that I did not agree with the report.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, the striking committee of the subcommittee of the House management committee is composed of three Whips: the government Whip, the opposition Whip and the NDP Whip.

This subcommittee was created and received power delegated from the House management committee to expedite the changes in the formation of the committees so that the subcommittee did not have to go to the House management committee to get approval before presenting the report.

With this delegation of power one thing is very clear. This report has to be unanimous. If it is not unanimous it cannot be presented to the House. It has to go to the House management committee. What is happening this morning has not happened in the past. Once the names were given by the three Whips a report was prepared and the clerk was asked to have the three Whips sign that report before putting it before the House.

As opposition Whip I was not asked to sign that report and I therefore did not sign the report. I do not think, if we look at that report, that my signature or initials are there. I heard that the NDP Whip did the same thing.

There was no meeting. Whether physically or by signature there is no agreement. This matter is to be discussed at eleven o'clock and the striking committee has to report to the House management committee and maybe we could clear it up this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Keeping in mind that if I am to deal with this matter I had better get at it; time is slipping by.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can offer a solution which is fairly straightforward.

I would like to think we made the case strongly that this report ought not to be considered receivable. If the Speaker were simply to rule that the report submitted, the 50th report, is not receivable, at eleven o'clock the management committee could meet and deal with the issue. If the legislative committee meeting for Bill C-91 can be put off until some time later in the day then I think things can proceed as normal.

It is important at this point that the management committee deal with this issue and the report be subsequently tabled in the House. Then the legislative committee could get on with its business.

Mr. Speaker: Unless somebody has something which is absolutely vital, I have to go and deal with this matter. We cannot talk about it all day.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is showing some concern. I do not want to cut him off.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we certainly want to give you sufficient time to adjudicate on the matter but, suffice it to say, I concur with my colleagues, the House leader of the NDP and the deputy leader, that in fact the NDP Whip said no in the House of Commons yesterday.

No was said in the House of Commons by the NDP House leader; no has been said today by the opposition Whip. Those facts have to be paramount in Your Honour's decision.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. At 9.30 this morning, the clerk of the legislative committee on Bill C-91 called the office of the member who would be appointed from the New Democratic Party saying that a meeting was set for 11 a.m. today in Room 536 of the Wellington Building.

We just received a call to say that meeting has been cancelled. My only concern is that things seem to be happening very quickly in the last hour. I would like to be assured that no meeting of this committee would be called until Your Honour has had a chance to report back to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The issue that I am asked to decide may very well, depending on my considerations if meetings go ahead when the Chair has been asked to determine as a consequence of interventions that have been made, the appropriateness of the entire procedure, then I have to deal with that issue.

Naturally the better course would be that members co-operate and that there would certainly be no meeting by the legislative committee. The management committee may indeed want to meet and to discuss this matter. If that resolves it all then I would not have to make a ruling.

I must say that I am reluctant to put the Chair into the midst of all this, but I have the matter in front of me and I am going to try to deal with it. In the meantime, while I withdraw and reserve and try to help resolve this hon. members might also see if they can resolve it.

I am going to ask my Deputy Speaker to proceed with Routine Proceedings. I know that there is a question of privilege coming up later. We may ask the hon. member who is busy somewhere else at the moment to adjourn that. His place would be confirmed and the hon. member for Kamloops might want to discuss that with him.

I am going to leave the chair, reserve, and see if I can solve this issue. I would ask other hon. members to see if they can solve it before I have to.

CHILD DAY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-371, an act respecting a national child day.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, the intention of the bill is to ask the House to designate November 20 of every year as a national child day.

Canada very proudly co-chaired the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and was among the first countries to push for children's rights internationally.

I hope that this bill will commend itself strongly to hon. members of all parties, so that we could obtain unanimous consent to pass this measure at all stages without debate in Private Members' Business later this afternoon.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Harb moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-372, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and to impose mandatory disclosure of members' expenses directly related to their parliamentary duties. Every year, not later than 30 days after October 31 and 30 days after March 31, members would provide a statement of expenses directly related to their parliamentary duties. This bill would come into effect at the beginning of the Thirty-Fifth Parliament.

The proposed legislation follows the recommendations of the sixth report of the Special Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act, tabled in this House by the hon. member for Verchères on December 18, 1990.

Finally, the bill follows the recommendations made by the Auditor General of Canada, Mr. Denis Desautels, in his report on the audit of the House of Commons Administration, section 6, "members' expenses", submitted to the Speaker of the House in November 1991.

I also want to thank the hon. member for Terrebonne for seconding my motion to introduce this bill.

PETITIONS

CRTC

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, the petitioners who signed these petitions request that the CRTC regulate the use of foul and inappropriate language on radio and television.

They believe that parental efforts to raise children are often undermined by what happens on radio and television, particularly with respect to the use of language and violence. They stress that foul language is not necessary to inform or to entertain. They believe foul language is similar to violence, that it is one form of violence.

The petitioners ask for strict rules of conduct.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my second petition is with respect to education. These petitioners stress the importance of quality education in Canada to meet increased productivity and to ensure that we are competitive. They condemn the 3 per cent tax on student loans; they criticize the cuts to education via the transfer payments route; and they want accessible education for everyone.

The National Consortium of Scientific and Educational Societies is in Ottawa at this particular time making these same points.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I am tabling a petition from residents of Senneterre and Barraute in Abitibi that says that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence.

They point out that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. The freedom of the press to report violent acts should be limited and information on acts of violence which is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same violent acts.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eliminate violence in our society in order to better protect our children and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions from citizens of my riding and the immediate area. I might add also that I am a bit sad to have to present these petitions because they deal with violence against women and children. More particularly, they deal with the violent deaths of Nina de Villiers of the Burlington area, Kristen French of St. Catharines and Carrie Pinard, a young lady who was gunned down inadvertently by young offenders while she was just minding her own business. We have seen an upsurge of violence and the hundreds of signators of this petition are very much taken aback because of this violence.

• (1050)

I urge the Minister of Justice to look into these petitions and that some consideration be given to them in this House. Further steps should be taken to somehow amend the Young Offenders Act so that our citizens are better protected in Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions I would like to present from citizens across the country. Almost every province is represented. These are in addition to the many thousands of signatures I previously submitted.

The petitioners are deeply concerned about the plight of refugee families in Canada. They urge the minister of immigration to issue ministers' permits for spouses and dependant children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada and allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petition has been certified correct as to form and content by the clerk of petitions. The petition contains some 191 signatures, mostly from my own constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, particularly from the cities of Revelstoke, Trail, Rossland, Castlegar and the villages of Montrose and Perthvale.

The petitioners point out that Canadians are in danger of losing their first class telephone system and that Canada's tradition of universal, affordable service is at risk if long distance competition is approved by the CRTC as proposed by Unitel and B.C. Rail enters the telecommunications market.

The petitioners urge the Government of Canada to consult with all affected parties, especially rural residents who are at risk of substantially increased costs for local telephone calls.

Finally, they urge the Government of Canada to hold local hearings in rural communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telephone system.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present to this House a rather large petition, certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

The petition contains the signatures of over 15,000 Canadians who support Bill C-330. They want Canadians to have a greater say in the disposition of offenders in the judicial process and call upon Parliament to support victim's rights and the protection of the public from violent offenders.

This brings to over 50,000 the number of signatures brought to this House. Tonight Bill C-330 will have its day in the highest court in the land.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty on behalf of a number of citizens of the province of Quebec to present this petition.

For 50 years there has been illegal traffic of workers between the Haitian Republic and the Dominican Republic. These workers are not well treated and the petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to take issue with the Dominican Republic to try and rectify the situation relative to the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition in the House on behalf of the people on the coast of British Columbia who depend on the transportation safety system. They point out that the Conservative government's effort to destaff and downgrade the lighthouses on the coast of British Columbia was a dangerous and reckless act.

They ask the House of Commons to call on the Ministry of Transport to immediately implement the upgrading report, called The Future of Lighthouses on the Coast of British Columbia in order that the safety net can be improved and strengthened.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from central British Columbia who express their concern regarding a company that has announced its intention to divert water from the North Thompson River near Valemount and sell the water in the southern California area. This is one of the major river diversion plans.

Consequently the petitioners are urging the Government of Canada to state categorically it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be diverted into the United States and to state Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians from across the country. The largest number of them are from Kingston, but there are some from Bolton, Halifax, Amherstview, Windsor and even Toronto.

These people came to Kingston in the summer, went into book stores, and were shocked when they had to pay 7 per cent GST on their purchases of books, magazines and newspapers.

Canada is one of the very few democratic countries in the world where we have such a pernicious tax as this goods and services tax on the printed word. These Canadians are shocked they have to pay this every time they purchase a book. Book sellers are horrified. They have to go through the expense of collecting this tax, which is unfair and unjust.

These petitioners call on Parliament to repeal the goods and services tax in so far as it applies to books, magazines and newspapers.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, Question No. 383 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 383—Mr. Karpoff:

> Have any studies been done by or for government departments, bodies or agencies since January 1, 1989 regarding the estimated cost of a national child care program, and if so, (a) what are the dates of these studies (b) who are the authors of these studies?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Finance and National Health and Welfare as follows:

The Department of Finance has not undertaken any studies since January 1, 1989, to estimate the cost of a national child care (spaces) program.

It should be noted however that the government provides support to families most in need of assistance and is addressing the problems faced by children at risk—child physical and sexual abuse, poor nutrition and health. That is why the 1992 budget announced an increase of $2.1 billion in federal support for families over the next five years. Furthermore, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has recently announced a $500 million child development initiative aimed at preventing and reducing conditions of risk among children.

Federal expenditures on measures related to child care now total over $1 billion per year. These include the Child Care Expense Deduction, the Child Tax Credit Supplement, the federal share of day care expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan, and child care allowances for parents participating in federal training programs. In addition, the federal government contributes some $1.4 billion in maternity and parental benefits under the unemployment insurance program.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has not conducted any studies on the estimated cost of a national child care program, nor has it funded any such studies since January 1, 1989.

The Department of National Health and Welfare conducted a great deal of research and policy development in preparation for the national child care bill of the last Parliament (this bill, C-144, did not receive Royal Assent before the 1988 election). This body of research was used in the preparation of a number of estimates of the potential costs of child care programs in 1989 and following years. For example, new estimates for child care spaces creation were prepared by varying the expenditures per space (to account for cost increases) and the numbers of new spaces, and re-estimating the total.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if Question No. 247 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 247 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 247—Mr. Taylor:

Since April 1, 1991, has any information been refused under Section 68 and 69 of the Access to Information Act and, if so, (a) how many times (b) what is the number of such exemptions claimed by department or agency (c) what is the percentage of the refusals in relation to total number of requests?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, assuming that Bill C-26 is called as first item under Government Orders this morning, I think you will find a disposition on the part of the House to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of the report stage of Bill C-26.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, that request has been made by the Official Opposition. As far as the government's side is concerned, it would be satisfactory.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 23, consideration of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 15, 16, 18, 19 and 23.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are resuming debate on Motions Nos. 15, 16, 18, 19 and 23. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor and he has eight minutes remaining on debate.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I will forgo any further comment on these particular sections and possibly participate in the discussions on another set of amendments later in the day.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to speak on this important issue today in the House of Commons.

I would like to point out how concerned we in the New Democratic Party are about the treatment of the Public Service of Canada by the present government. There is an enormous effort on the part of the government to brand the Public Service of Canada as having responsibility for many of the things that have gone wrong in terms of the government deficit and government programs, and this is absolutely false.

Canada has one of the finest and most dedicated public services in the world. Instead of attacking, demoralizing and blaming it for all the ills in the world, the government should support it thoroughly.

I will use a couple of quick examples of the kind of demoralisation that has gone on. The first one is the lighthouse services on the coast of British Columbia. The Liberal government attempted to de-staff the lighthouses of British Columbia, and this was then picked up by the Conservative government. It ran study after study and then attempted to implement a program to remove those lighthouse keepers. They are people who have been incredibly dedicated in isolated services and have provided a tremendous service to the people of Canada. Once in power, the government immediately went to the attack. I recall that happening in previous Parliaments when the Liberals were in power. There were enormous community fights on the coast of British Columbia to defend and keep their lighthouse services and transportation safety services. When the Liberals left power, we faced exactly the same thing with the Conservative government.

We have been through this three times, and every time the government attempts to blame these people for inefficiencies, the community rises to their defence.

In the latest round, the Conservative government came out with a proposal to de-staff lighthouse services, automate them and really downgrade their function. We had very large meetings in Prince Rupert with members of the public and members of the marine and aviation transportation communities. They told us we are making this system far more dangerous than it already is by removing these positions.

There were meetings in Port Hardy and Campbell River. By the time the public meetings hit Campbell River, the government realized the political consequences of continuing in this vein were going to be fatal. It realized those public servants provided enormous service to the people who travel the coast of British Columbia all year round, realizing that it is a dangerous place to function and operate.

At one point, after a previous encounter, the government realized the error of its ways. It realized that to try to remove those public servants and blame them for many cost overruns and problems along that line would not wash, so it indicated it would allow those positions to continue in the Public Service. It then put out The Future Role of Lighthouses report and promised to upgrade the Public Service and those facilities. The report went through to Ottawa, hit the President of the Treasury Board, and died.

It really talked about the kind of service those people could contribute to Canadians. It is a tremendously valued and respected service. It simply asked for some support to keep those public servants on the job, doing what Canadians need the Public Service to do, and in this case it is protect their lives. It just called for some simple support, by means of a communication system, where lighthouse keepers could inform people in the marine and air transportation sectors about the local conditions around the lighthouse. This was often the only effective form of weather communication.

It also talked about adding basic weather reporting facilities so these public servants could enhance the job they do, but to date there has been absolutely nothing. The previous Liberal government and the Conservative government have each tried twice to de-staff this program, but with the public in an absolute uproar about it, it has cancelled its plans.

It is now trying to erode that service through the back door by shutting down the lighthouse at Sand Heads. We would really like to know what the consultant's report says about putting the public service staff back in that lighthouse to provide top quality safety service to the public.

I would like to hear the minister responsible for the Treasury Board stand up in the House and tell us if staff will be put back in that facility. I would like him to guarantee the government will not try to get rid of these public servants out the back door. Public servants cannot do a decent job for Canadians unless they are given basic minimum equipment. Again we see the strangler of the money-bag of the people of Canada here in the House. I think it would be really very productive for the minister responsible for the Treasury Board to tell us very clearly if it will provide the Public Service with the tools to do the job. The public servants need communications equipment. They need weather reporting equipment, some basic weather training and a commitment to provide those services to the public. They need some basic search and rescue equipment, such as a boat and motor. They need a basic telephone. People in the regional office in British Columbia are talking about pulling telephones and just simple basic equipment out of lighthouses.

In many cases it is not just an attempt to save the taxpayers of Canada money. The people of Canada are being placed in serious danger. It just aggravates public servants attempting to do their jobs when you remove these picky little things. It breaks morale to try to discipline people through the back door for what I think are legitimate and important examples of what the Public Service is doing right now.

Quite honestly, if the government is looking at removing or replacing some of the people, there are a few folks in management in the regional and headquarter offices who could be replaced. Ultimately, it is not the public servants who need to be replaced. They are the ones who follow the directions of this government.

This government is enforcing absolutely unacceptable approaches on management for dealing with the Public Service. The government is hauling away the equipment to do the job from the Public Service and breaking the morale of the finest public servants in the world. It is attempting to blame them for the shortcomings of this government, and that will not wash.

Privatization is really causing an enormous break in morale within the Public Service. The Minister of Transport is considering a proposal from the district and regional office of the Pacific region to privatize coast guard helicopter services and coast guard search and rescue services with those helicopters. This is irresponsible and dangerous. It breaks the morale of the Public Service. It demonstrates the government has no understanding, on a day to day basis, of their job and mission when they are told they can be replaced by Okanagan Helicopter and Canadian Helicopter. The government is going to turn that operation over as a lucrative plum to its friends and may even give them the equipment to boot.

It reminds me of the Bill Vander Zalms of the world who sell the public highway service of British Columbia to the private sector. It has been a complete disaster. The government gave away the land and the equipment. It just gave a great little plum to some friends out there. Public transportation infrastructure was handed over to the private sector. If that is done to the helicopter service on the coast of B.C. it would be absolutely destructive for the Public Service and for the safety of British Columbians.

On Sunday afternoon, November 22, in Campbell River there is going to be an enormous public meeting on the issue of the future of lighthouses. We are satisfied they are not going to be de-staffed at this point, but there must be a commitment to upgrade those lighthouses. We need representation at that meeting from the Ministry of Transport to tell us if it is going to protect the safety of British Columbians by upgrading those lighthouses and keeping those public servants on the job and able to do the job.

We want somebody from the Ministry of Transport at that meeting at the Labour Hall in Campbell River at 2 p.m. on Sunday, November 22, to tell us the government is going to kill this proposal to privatize coast guard helicopter services and keep those public servants behind those controls, saving the lives of British Columbians.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, we had a fairly lengthy debate on this group of motions when we last met in June. As we are resuming debate after a six month absence, I thought it was important to put the rest of today's debate in context and remind the House and the public that we are meeting today to debate this important bill, again under closure. A government which has spent several million dollars developing the report for this legislation now wants debate on it concluded in less than two additional sitting days. Once again the public is denied the right to hear the merits and demerits of the government's actions and to make their own judgment.

Nonetheless I do not think that is too important. The vast majority of Canadians have already made their judgments on this government and will be expressing those as soon as they get the opportunity at the ballot box.

I do want to again come back because the last few months have given a meaning to this bill and I think it is important to remind both the House and the public what is fundamental about this bill. It is not an esoteric exercise in internal organization of government. It is a bill that has a very real impact on the service Canadians get every day from their government and on the value they get for the money that goes into the Public Service.

During the referendum we heard one strong theme from Canadians, that they want a national government capable of governing this country in the interests of all Canadians. They want a national vision. They want a clear sense of direction and they want leadership from their national government in planning the future of this country.

That leadership depends on whom we elect to Parliament, but it depends even more on those people that day in and day out serve Canadians from coast to coast. The previous speaker referred to everything from the most remote lighthouse on the west coast of Canada to the most remote harbour on the east coast of Canada to the most remote outpost in northern Canada. It is Public Service employees who provide those services to Canadians and allow us to build our future together.

The other thing Canadians said during the referendum is that they are tired of confrontation. They want more co-operation. You do not get co-operation instead of confrontation with a government that insists on having confrontational relationships with its own employees as opposed to working in partnership with them, as it is encouraging the private sector to do with its employees.

You do not get co-operation instead of confrontation when you have months and months of rumours that the government is planning to cut 10 per cent of its employees at a time when more Canadians than ever before in the history of this country are unemployed and are facing Christmas and the holiday season with some pretty bleak prospects, not only for themselves but for their children's future as well.

The other thing Canadians said during the referendum is that they want leadership. They want government leadership in addressing the urgent economic situation of this country, not only the misery of five million Canadians affected by high unemployment, but the fundamental problems with our economy, the failure of this government to even understand the impact of global trends on Canada and to help Canadians prepare and plan and adjust to those changes. That kind of leadership does not come only from the benches in this House. It has to come from top to bottom in the Public Service of Canada.

We have a prosperity report that says there should be a systematic, thorough examination of governments at all levels where duplication is, where overlap is, and how efficiency can be improved. What do we have the government doing? A totally ad hoc, across the board threat of job cuts, job losses. We all know what that does. It does not save any money for Canadians, it just puts more money into the hands of the friends of the government who want to pick up that work on contract.

We have the release of the report of the International Labour Organization, a tripartite labour-management-government organization that is responsible for overseeing international conventions on labour relations, slamming this government for its treatment of its own employees.

It is not surprising to see the bill we have before us and have had before us for some months now from a government that fundamentally does not believe in government. It believes in getting out of government doing anything. I think the referendum showed us clearly that the attitude of government is at odds with what Canadians want. It is probably why we sat through months and months of committee hearings with the elected members of this government having virtually no comment and no discussion on the bill before us. They have sat through hours in this House equally silent, refusing even to debate the dozens of amendments that members of the opposition have put forward, motions and amendments that would improve this bill. We have not even had the courtesy of allowing minor corrections to the bill that are necessary to make it technically correct.

We have a government in power that does not understand the purpose of government. Members opposite in the governing party are not debating the amendments to this bill because they do not understand this bill, they do not understand the purpose of the amendments and they are unable to debate them on their merits.

We have a government that is bereft of ideas, that is tired and that should be replaced. All we can hope to do in the two days of debate remaining is to ensure that a very damaging bill is at least subject to public scrutiny and subject to our best attempts to have improvements made to it.

I want to comment briefly on the particular group of motions before us because they go to the heart of what is wrong with this bill. If we have had the best Public Service in the world, and we have had in this country, it is because for the better part of a century we have been committed to the principle that you do not get a job based on who you know or who your father was or who you have paid off. You get a job because you are the best person to do the job.

These motions go directly to the heart of that issue and this bill presented by the government goes directly to the heart of trying to destroy what is known as the merit principle. That is why these amendments are put forward, to say very clearly that you get an appointment because you are the best person for the job, not on some arbitrary standard your manager sets, not on some standard which may be described because your manager happens to like you, but because we have looked at the people who are qualified to serve the people of Canada and we have chosen the best. That is what Motion No. 16 is trying to accomplish. I urge the government to seriously consider supporting it.

A couple of subsequent amendments tried to correct what has been a misapplication of the merit principle for many decades in this country and throughout society. Let us be honest. We all know that when it comes to judging people on their ability to do the job, some people never get quite judged only on ability, but on their gender or on their colour or on the fact that they happen to have a disability. That is why we have not seen throughout society and throughout government women, aboriginal peoples, visible minorities and people with disabilities moving much below the lowest ranks.

The remaining motions are to ensure that measures in our hiring practices that discriminate against people on the basis of anything but ability are removed.

I urge the government at this last moment to consider supporting those amendments.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am not pleased about the bill, but I am pleased to have a chance to speak against it.

This is Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act and Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts related to it. I want to speak particularly about the so–called merit principle that the government is bent on bringing in.

This principle would allow the Public Service Commission to appoint people on the basis of what it calls the competence of a person as measured by such standards of competence as the commission may establish. In other words, it will be favouritism. It will be division and the encouragement of mutual suspicion, non co–operation and destruction of morale.

To destroy agreed and objective systems of selection, competition and promotion clearly is done with the intent to destroy the Public Service as a public service. It is to prepare the way for total privatization of the Public Service, yet the government will not come out and openly state its intent. It knows there would be a revolt of the staff.

Revolts of staff are already brewing. My familiarity particularly is with the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the staff working in the Ontario region and the Toronto district.

Over the last 11 years, my constituency office has had good working relations with the staff of the Canada immigration centres in Toronto, not that there were not problems. Of course, there were problems. There were problems from the point of view of a constituent, there were problems from the point of view of my office staff and there were problems from the point of view of the immigration staff.

Nobody monopolizes all the problems, nobody is free of responsibility for this or that part of the problems. What I am talking about is that through consistent effort by my staff in the constituency office over these 11 years, they have been able to establish reasonable communication with their counterparts in the local immigration centres, and on the higher levels as well when necessary.

That is to say until this year. This year things have changed. Staff has been slashed. The government brags about increasing the number of immigrants to Canada. Toronto is the main destination of immigrants, especially of refugees. More than half the refugees come to the Toronto region. Perhaps it is not more than half the immigrants, but certainly a very large percentage of them. However, the government has been slashing the staff in Toronto, especially over this past year.

Immigration staff who used to have a case load of perhaps 30, 40 or 50 now have a case load of 100. One of them at the lower management level confessed to my assistant and said: "When I look at 100 cases sitting on my desk, I say that is 100 families whose life I am messing up and I cannot do anything about it". They are simply overloaded.

Recently there was a big hullabaloo over an exposé on television about war criminals having been admitted to Canada from Somalia. I am told that one of those was admitted by one of the Toronto staff because he was so overloaded with work that he did not have time to check properly on that case, to ask the questions he should have asked. The staff is blamed and of course the government uses that gladly as an excuse for saying that we need nastier laws. We need to be able to exclude people on mere suspicion, as the present Bill C–86 provides.

If the officer has reason to believe that the person has done something in another country that is an offence in Canada, then he is inadmissible. "Reason to believe," in other words mere suspicion. Maybe he just does not like the colour of the person's skin and concludes therefore that the person might do something wrong in Canada.

I have had the case of a Canadian citizen from an African country, a landed immigrant, a citizen trying to bring immediate family members, pressing an immigration officer to do his duty in the matter and the immigration officer bursting out and saying: "How the hell did you get here?" The person said: "I'm a Canadian citizen". He said: "You're the ones that are causing the trouble". That person was black.

I do not know the officer who did that. Whether that is a consistent pattern with that officer of racial prejudice, I am not prepared to say. What I am prepared to say is that officers who are under unreasonable pressure of work may do things that are not normally within their character. None of us is so perfect that we can respond to the public as we ought to respond when the pressures of work become unreasonable.

I am told that currently in the staff slashing process they come to an officer and say: "How many reports can you do in a day?" He gives a number. They go to another officer: "How many reports can you do in a day?" She gives a number. After getting these numbers they say: "You are all going to have to do x number," a higher number in a day. It means they can lay off more staff and simply load impossible piles of paper work on the immigration staff.

Until the spring of this year when my office phoned or faxed to the immigration office to get a status report on the request of a constituent, it would take a matter of two or three days, half a week or at the most a week to get an answer. Now it is not unusual to go several months without getting an answer to the simple question, what is the status of this person's request? Repeated phone calls, repeated faxes do not get answers to questions.

The government has been slashing the staff and setting one staff person against another so that everyone is discouraged from co–operating. Each staff member is running scared of being laid off and is working against everyone else as often as he or she is working with everyone else. This was not the case before in the Toronto immigration offices.

Canadian citizens and Canadian permanent residents are being badly served by this change in the staff. The worst news of all is the new system of mail–in. Instead of a Toronto person going to the immigration office and saying: "I would like to sponsor my mother from the old country", or whatever, he is now told to phone in and wait for a package. "We'll mail you a package. You fill out the kit." You mail it in and then you sit and wait for an answer, which is probably to tell you did not fill it in right. Once you could get advice from the immigration officer on how to fill in the forms because the average Canadian is not an expert in immigration technicalities. Now they are shut out. They cannot get advice. They cannot get answers. They cannot get the service of the immigration department.

• (1130)

That is the result of this government's plan to close down most of the immigration offices in Canada and force all people to deal by mail with a system that is incapable of doing this job by mail under the conditions that this government is enforcing. Therefore this bill is a scandal.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, since this is the first time that I speak in this debate, I would first of all like to tell this House about the admiration and respect I have for the Canadian Public Service. I am talking as President of the Treasury Board, of course, but also as a former civil servant who knows first hand whereof he speaks.

[English]

The civil service of Canada is miles ahead of the people I have heard on the opposition side in their readiness to face the challenges of the modern world. Bill C–26 does not come from outer space. It comes from vast consultations in the Public Service. Managers are also members of the Public Service. Employees are part of the Public Service. It is together with them that we have prepared this bill which provides additional flexibility to face the changing world.

The hon. member for Ottawa West said that we have to prepare Canadians for change. To do that we have to change ourselves and adapt. Did she visit Expo Innovation, the exhibition that was put together by the Public Service and various departments here in Ottawa to show the new technology they have brought to the management of this country. It was one of the proudest moments of my career as minister. They have been inventive.

All this new technology brings with it concern for their own jobs because with machines and new technology sometimes you can do more with fewer people. However, the purpose of the public service is not to guarantee employment for millions or a hundred thousand people. It is to provide the best possible service to Canadians, and the only sacred principle is to make sure that Canadians get the best possible service with the resources available. They have to be imaginative and they are. I face these changes with great confidence.

The member for North Island—Powell River indicated that in our decision last year to introduce legislation on wage restraint we were punishing the civil servants. I have repeated in this House time and time again that this is not the case.

I would say that Canadians are being punished by the harsh realities of the modern world. Canadians feel the strain of a very difficult environment and the government also feels it. The government depends on the economy to have access to the resources needed to provide the services. It has had to adjust and take that into account and it has.

One of the great threats to our competitive capacity was the unit labour cost. We decided we had to do something as the manager of the largest organization in Canada to show the way. The member for Ottawa West said we had to show leadership. We have. We have been followed by many provinces and by the private sector. We have been able to reduce our unit labour cost to the extent that we had the lowest inflation rate in the western world at the present time. We are showing the way.

There was some mention that little consultation took place. If there was ever a bill presented in this House of Commons in Ottawa with so much discussion and consultation this is it. We have had 10 task forces made up of hundreds of members taken from all government departments. They had focus groups, workshops and various surveys that involved 7,600 public servants. I could go on. We had nearly one million brochures sent out to discuss our approach. The result is Bill C–26, a modern way of management.

My last remarks will be on the merit principle. Listening to the opposition, Bill C–26 is to achieve something terrible. I disagree totally with them. Merit, that is the selection of the best qualified person, will continue to apply on recruitment and on promotion. One must not forget that merit has never been an absolute concept. It has adapted to the various circumstances and social conditions throughout the years. For example, priority for appointment is given to persons facing lay–off. This is not merit. Preference is given to veterans. This is not merit. Canadian citizens, in certain instances, and local residents are given preference. This is not merit. Therefore, it has never been an absolute.

Today improved service to Canadians is what the Public Service is all about and it has to be done through an efficient and effective deployment process which is a very important part of this bill. People who are being deployed have already proven themselves to be capable of performing duties at a given level of responsibility. I do not see what is gained by requiring a complete reassessment of their capabilities every time they are moved to similar jobs.

Favouritism has been mentioned. Managers are members of the Public Service. They come from the Public Service and they have to deliver the best possible service. They want to have the best people around them.

Therefore, I believe that this bill and in particular article 10 is very important as we proposed it. I also think that Bill C-26 is an example of its time.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to say a few words after listening to the President of the Treasury Board outline, to quote him, the fact that the unit labour cost of the Public Service should show the way in our society, should lead the private sector. Now he says that we have the lowest inflation rate. That perhaps is what is wrong with the principles behind what the government is doing in this section of the bill and with the Public Service.

How do you judge the value of a worker who is working for the people of Canada and not to make a dollar for the people of Canada? How do you judge that?

While I was listening to the minister, as he said that improved service is the way to go and that is what this bill does, that is what the government has done for the people of Canada, I was thinking about overworked public servants in the unemployment insurance offices of our high unemployment areas in Canada: in Gander, Newfoundland; in Grand Falls, Newfoundland. There are a lot of Ganders and Grand Falls right across this country where people are overworked. They just cannot keep up with the workload.

How do you make a judgment on the fact that today, November 1992, Canada pension disability offices in this country are now taking off of one desk and putting before the board of appeal the applications that were sent for appeal on March 1, 1992.

Let me get this straight now so that there is no cloudiness about it at all, so there is no doubt about it at all. A person who applies for Canada pension disability under appeal to the Government of Canada today and who wrote his or her appeal on March 1 or before March 1 is now having the appeal dealt with by the Public Service of Canada. March, April, May, June, July, August, September, October and now we are into November. It has been nine months. That is a record.

The minister talks about records. The Government of Canada has set a record today. Somebody who appeals Canada pension disability in this country, somebody who is in a hospital, is having Household Finance, Avco, or the Bank of Nova Scotia threatening to seize his or her property, home or car, such people are in hospital and having everything seized. They will qualify for Canada pension disability. I ask the minister not to get me wrong. They will qualify, but it takes nine months for an application of appeal to be read, to go from one desk to another desk. It is incredible, absolutely incredible.

What happens in the cases of people who are completely disabled and something has been lost like a letter from a doctor? I am not talking about 10 or 20 cases; I am talking about hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of cases right across Canada.

An hon. member: Thousands.

Mr. Baker: Thousands, the hon. member says. There are thousands of cases today. In nine months a record has been set. In terms of Canada pension disability a record has been set for the sick, the elderly and the disabled, people who have been injured on the job. They are losing their homes, losing their property, because the banks will not wait for an appeal. When has a bank in Canada or in any other country in the industrialized world waited for a disability insurance appeal? The Government of Canada has set a record today of nine months for that appeal to be heard.

The minister talks about efficiency. Why does it take nine months? It is because the people who had retired in the department were not replaced. Their desks are there. Their telephones are there. However they were not replaced in the department. Now the question is: why not?

I would say it was for two main reasons. First, there has been a freeze on hiring in the Public Service. Second, the government has been attacking the problem in the very way that the minister has outlined today. He asked: "What can we do to bring down the unit labour cost?" He brought in a system whereby managers in the Public Service could not go up any higher in their salary scale. He brought in what was called performance bonuses. If they cut back in their departments they got an extra bonus at the end of the year. Pay offs for lay offs; that is what it was.

That was a part of the problem and the freeze was the other part of the problem. That is why today we have empty seats in the Public Service right across Canada. We have public servants who do not really have the desire to work overtime every day without getting paid for it, and they are drastically overworked.

The minister talks about money. We are going to hear it in the statement of the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance. The freezes will be extended and the cuts will be announced.

What did these employees get? If they did not get a salary increase over the past few years, what did they get? The minister says 3 per cent. I will tell him what they got, compared with the friends of the government, also appointed by the minister and cabinet.

They did not get an increase. They did not get an increase of $11,880 as the president of CN looks at in his range. They cannot go up to $407,880 as the chief executive officer of CN can today. They do not qualify for a potential bonus of $101,970 this year, and the minister speaks about 3 per cent. It is not only him.

Let us look at Canada Post. How much did the salary of its head go up this financial year? It went up $9,300 this financial year, with a potential bonus to the head of Canada Post this year of $79,800 just before Christmas. The minister did not talk about that.

Using the merit principle of unit labour cost, by what logic does the minister let the head of Canadian National qualify for a potential bonus? That is over and above his salary which can go up to $407,880 this year. On top of that he can get $101,970 in a bonus. What performance do they judge for him? Is it the number of railway tracks he closes down?

Mr. Speaker, you are telling me I am running short of time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow him one more minute to wind up.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, let me wind up by saying, now that we have looked at the bonus for CN, that we should look at the potential bonus for the head of Canada Post of $78,800 on top of a salary of $319,300. Is it for free stamps? No. It is for the number of post offices he has closed. That is the judgment of the Government of Canada.

I will conclude. Do we know what they gave to the employees of the department of employment this past year? They were given mugs and they were given pins. The mugs they were given said on the side: "We are together. Our reason for being", in French and English, "is to create employment". On the bottom of the mug it said: "Made in Taiwan".

The pins they gave out to hard working public servants in the department of employment said: "We are together" and on the backs of these nice gold pins was printed: "Made in the U.S.A."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 15. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

• (1150)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed with please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 16. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 19.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am having trouble keeping up with you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motion No. 15, if carried, obviates a vote on Motions Nos. 16 and 18. If negatived, we must vote on Motion No. 16. Is that all right?

Ms. Langan: That is fine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 23. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order for clarification. I do not believe you called Motion No. 18 for a deferred vote. I heard you call Motions Nos. 15, 16, 19 and 23.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Because the division on Motion No. 15 was deferred we do not vote on Motion No. 18 until we have dispensed with Motion No. 15. If it is negatived then we must vote on Motion No. 18. If it is carried it obviates a vote on Motion No. 18.

We are now on Motion No. 25.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, when I rose on a point of order asking you to slow down it was at the point when you were dealing with Motion No. 16. I was not able to hear what you had called on the yeas and nays.

You called for the yeas and nays, said what they were, and then went right on. It was not clear to me what the outcome was or whether we needed to rise from our seats.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): An affirmative vote on Motion No. 15 obviates the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 16 and 18. This has been deferred until 4.45 p.m. today.

The next question is on Motion No. 25.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 25

That Bill C–26 be amended in Clause 15 by striking out line 20 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"made from an eligibility list established for the position or positions of a similar occupational nature and level and where such list is exhausted, the appointment may be made from an eligibility list established for a position or positions of a similar occupational nature at a higher level, in accordance".

She said: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak at length on this single motion. Again it goes to the heart of the merit principle and whether the fundamental process in hiring, promoting and appointing people within the Public Service is based on their qualifications in order of priority or not.

The eligibility lists are established to ensure that where there is a number of positions requiring the same qualifications, the most qualified person gets appointed first. The second most qualified gets appointed next and so on down the line until the positions are filled.

There is another fundamental issue, however. This bill like many others that have come before this House in the last few years establishes a process of regulation instead of legislation. What should clearly be spelled out in legislation to protect people's rights or to allow people to know the law is more and more frequently, we are finding, being left to the discretion of the government to establish regulations. This is another such section.

The legislation right now is very clear on how an eligibility list is established and on how it is to be used. That is in the legislation. The government's bill now proposes to undermine the purpose of the eligibility list and, further, to say that regulations of the Public Service Commission will determine how the lists are made and how they are applied.

This is a further erosion of the merit principle and its protection in the Public Service Employment Act. This amendment reinstates the current definition of an eligibility list. It puts it clearly in the legislation and avoids one more thing. It is passed over to the government and to bureaucracies to establish by regulation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 25. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That Bill C–26 be amended in Clause 16 by striking out lines 37 to 44 at page 8.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I think we have a grouping of Motions Nos. 27, 29 and 31. Motions Nos. 27 and 31 stand in my name and Motion No. 29 stands in the name of the member for Kingston and the Islands. I would ask the consent of the House in the absence of the member for Kingston and the Islands at committee to move Motion No. 29 in his name. He has just arrived. Consent is not necessary.

• (1200)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member is right. There is the other side of the page which I did not have an opportunity to look at.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 16 by adding immediately after line 28 at page 9 the following:

"21.3 (1) The Commission shall, on request by a candidate or person that is entitled to appeal pursuant to subsection (1), disclose to the candidate or person, the information on which the Commission based its selection, including, in the case of a request by a candidate,

(a) any report made in respect of the candidate;

(b) information regarding the status of the candidate in the competition; and

(c) written reasons for the candidate's non-appointment.

(2) Where a person is appointed or is about to be appointed under this Act and the selection was made within the Public Service without competition, any person may, within fourteen days after the date of publication of notice of appointment, request the opinion of the Commission referred to in subsection (1).

(3) Where a person makes a request pursuant to subsection (1), the Commission shall

(a) where requested, give the person an opportunity to be heard before the Commission renders its opinion;

(b) give written notice of its opinion within thirty days of the request for an opinion, unless it is unable to do so, in which case it shall notify the person, in writing, of the reasons for its inability to render an opinion and the date by which it will do so; and

(c) set out in the notice referred to in paragraph (b), the reasons for its opinion.

(4) A board established by the Commission to conduct an inquiry pursuant to subsection (1) shall give at least fourteen days' notice to the candidate or person appealing and to the deputy head concerned or to their representatives, of the time and place fixed by the board for the conduct of the inquiry.

(5) No document or information may be used in an inquiry before a board described in subsection (1) unless the candidate or person appealing to the board has prior knowledge of the information or contents of the document.

(6) A board described in subsection (1) has power to summon and enforce the attendance of any witness it considers necessary to the inquiry and to compel the witness to give oral or written evidence on oath and to produce any document or thing that the board considers requisite to a full inquiry."

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 19 by striking out line 2 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"specified period, except where the person has been appointed for one or more terms totalling one year or more to the position that the person occupied at the time the person was laid off."

She said: Mr. Speaker, just speaking again briefly to my Motions Nos. 27 and 31 and referring briefly to the motion of the member for Kingston and the Islands, one of the things that we in the opposition stressed during the committee hearings and during debate in this House is the issue of accountability.

If managers are to be given more responsibility, they must be given more accountability. Notwithstanding frequent requests to the President of the Treasury Board and to senior officials during the hearings, none of them has been able to point out any section or any wording in the act that increases accountability.

This is a public corporation. It is not a private corporation where accountability is the bottom line. Accountability is to the elected representatives of the people of Canada. It is desperately missing from this bill.

Motion No. 27 is a good example. It deletes the right to appeal against an appointment except where it can be established that an appointment was not made on merit. The ability to appeal, the ability to have some independent review of this new discretion managers are to be given is curtailed at every step of this bill. That means there is no power to oversee whether this new responsibility is being exercised responsibly.

Motion No. 27 simply seeks to delete those sections which limit the right of an employee to appeal an appointment. It ensures that the Public Service Commission, which is the guardian of the merit principle, has not only an opportunity but an obligation to review appointments, to ensure that they have been properly carried out. Without that review, the Canadian public has no assurance that their Public Service is not becoming a hotbed and a nest of appointments by favouritism.

I am not sure why these motions are grouped, frankly, because Motion No. 31 is on quite a distinct subject. However, what Motion No. 31 does is endeavour to ensure that term employees are covered by the work force adjustment policy. Throughout the Public Service there has been an abuse of term employees. The vast majority of those term employees are women or they are people with disabilities who are hired to meet a target. They are on for a few months and then they are extended for a few months, and then they are extended for a few months, and then they are extended for a few months. Many of them have been in the Public Service for periods approaching five years without ever having established any rights as employees or any security.

To me, that is an abuse of a mechanism that should be there to meet short-term needs. It is an abuse of people who are performing a full-time job on an ongoing basis but are not allowed to have any of the benefits of that service.

What this motion does is ensure that where work is contracted out, term employees who have been there for an extended period of time have the same protection as indeterminate employees. They have been working beside each other, doing the same work, performing the same service for Canadians. They should be entitled to the same rights of protection when their work is contracted out.

I am going to refer very briefly to Motion No. 29. Essentially this motion of my colleague is attempting to deal with the situation that has been outstanding for nearly a decade. For nine years the committee on scrutiny of regulations has criticized the appeal procedures, the investigation procedures of the Public Service Commission. In reports to this House, it has recommended regulations that would ensure fairness and due process in appeals held by the Public Service Commission. For nine years the Public Service Commission has stalled on implementing those regulations for whatever reason I do not know, but I have seen horrifying examples of people denied due process to even know the information on which their appeal should be considered to have an opportunity to respond and to have time to prepare their case.

This very comprehensive motion from my colleague is intended to finally get this House to take action if the Public Service Commission will not, despite unanimous reports from an all-party committee to this House on numerous occasions.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a few words to address some of the very legitimate concerns expressed by the member for Ottawa West.

On Motion No. 27 in particular, we have legal counsel which indicated that removal of this section in its entirety could effectively remove any right to appeal. There is also corrective action and obviously this is not what is being sought.

On the lay-off rights of term employees, it is a fact that the provision in the bill that denies lay-off rights to term employees is intended to protect the continuing employment of career public servants. The term employees by definition are hired for specified periods and should have no expectation of continuing employment in the Public Service. That is what the definition is all about.

They have been excluded from lay-off rights since 1977. For example in some cases, term employees are hired for recurring periods of more than one year in one job. This often occurs precisely because the ongoing nature of the work is in doubt. Term employees are hired specifically in order that no commitment to indeterminate employment be made.

On accountability to Parliament, in particular the Public Service Commission and all its annual reports on all matters related to staffing and other matters within its jurisdiction, the President of the Treasury Board reports specifically on employment equity as required under the Financial Administration Act. The President of the Treasury Board is also answerable to Parliament. The head of the Public Service, the Clerk, reports annually to the Prime Minister on the state of the Public Service and the report is brought to Parliament. The various acts place many obligations on the agencies which are answerable to Parliament.

The accountability is there. The hon. member should find some comfort in that.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that I got to make my speech after hearing the rather feeble attempts of the minister to explain away these amendments. Frankly, he has ignored the point of the amendments. I urge him to get his legal advisers in the lobby and speak to them again because they are getting him in a position where he is getting himself in difficulty in the House. First of all, he said that Motion No. 27 moved by my colleague will take away a right of appeal. The right of appeal is granted by subsection 21(1) already. It is not taking it away. What it deals with is appeals from decisions of boards appointed under subsection 21(1) which deal with the appeal. They are saying that those boards' appeals can only be appealed on the ground that the measures taken did not result in the selection for appointment according to merit. In other words, this section that my colleague has moved to be deleted takes away the restriction on the kind of appeals that can be launched. For him to suggest that his legal advisers have told him that this takes away the right of appeal altogether, as I say, his legal advisers are giving him bum advice and I would suggest he replace them quickly.

Second, Motion No. 29 which I have moved is in response to very specific recommendations made by a joint parliamentary committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. I do not have a copy of the report here with me, but the report was made in either 1986 or 1987, and possibly as late as 1988. There was a request for a response from the Public Service Commission and that response was tabled in this House immediately before the election in 1988. I think it was the last day of the session. That is how responsive the Public Service Commission is to reports and how accountable it is to this House and to the Senate. There was no opportunity for any input by this House on that report before the election was called.

Basically what the Public Service Commission told the standing joint committee to do was "get stuffed". I do not agree with that kind of accountability, and neither should the minister. He should either insist that the Public Service Commission comply with the report of the committee, to whom it is responsible, or get out of office. Its members are obviously unfit to hold office in the Public Service Commission if they think they can continually thumb their nose at a parliamentary committee when they are charged under their act of being responsible to Parliament.

This committee was acting as the agent of this House and of the Senate. It was a joint appointment, it was a unanimous report of that committee, and the Public Service Commission in effect said to the committee: "We don't care what you think, we know better. We know that public servants don't need rights when they launch appeals. We know that we can allow the Public Service Commission, us, to decide what they should see and what they should not see when they launch an appeal. We will decide, for example, that they won't see any reports made in respect of their candidacy. We will decide whether information regarding the status of the candidate in the competition should be seen by the appellant". That is the position the commission is taking.

No other public body exercises such Draconian jurisdiction over appellants before it. Under our rules of natural justice, an appellant would do better than they do before the Public Service Commission. Appellants are put through the hoops, they are told they are not allowed to see material that in any other public board they would be allowed to see as part of the appeal process. I invite the minister, who really is impartial in this—this is a dispute between the commission and Parliament—to look at these amendments again and ask if these amendments are not acceptable. Why should we not require the Public Service Commission to disclose these facts to appellants so that they can properly prepare themselves for an appeal? That is all this is asking for.

The minister surely has no interest in the outcome of this as long as the thing is conducted fairly. As minister, it is his duty to see that the hearing is conducted in a fair manner for all parties concerned. Surely it is fair that an appellant have access to the books and records that the commission has when he or she is launching an appeal. Surely those records should be made available. This amendment requires that. That is all it requires.

The minister, as the Queen's representative and as the Queen's adviser, must recognize that the Queen as fountainhead of all justice in our country and under our Constitution must be seen to act fairly and justly to all her subjects including those who make an appeal to the Public Service Commission because they feel they have been unfairly treated in the selection process.

I know that the President of the Treasury Board is an eminently fair man. He would not want to see Her Majesty's subjects deprived of any rights they should be able to exercise. This amendment only clarifies those rights, strengthens those rights, and in fact gives them rights which a hard-nosed and frankly irresponsible Public Service Commission refuses to give by regulation to these people. It says we will make the decision on an individual and ad hoc basis. It is not good enough and the minister knows it is not good enough. As a minister who has some interest in justice and fairness on behalf of the Queen and on behalf of all his colleagues in the cabinet, he will want to see that this kind of amendment is put forward.

I see the Minister of Labour is here today. He knows that in appeals to the Canada Labour Relations Board, this kind of manifest unfairness would not be permitted. The rules of the labour board are quite specific. They grant rights to the parties before the board to see the documentation.

He would be shocked, horrified, if he went to the Public Service Commission and found out how much of this information is withheld by the commission. He would be equally shocked if he had read the report of the standing joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which studied the issue and made specific recommendations for amendments exactly along the lines I have included in this amendment. He would be doubly shocked if he had heard the response of the Public Service Commission saying they knew better than the committee and would ignore the committee. He would not tolerate this.

Surely he can implore his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, to come up with something a little fairer and agree to this amendment.

Let us see what it is that is proposed in the amendment.

> (a) where requested, give the person an opportunity to be heard before the Commission renders its opinion;
> (b) give written notice of its opinion within thirty days of the request for an opinion,—

Imagine having to give your opinion in writing. The Public Service Commission does not think it has to do that.

> —unless it is unable to do so, in which case it shall notify the person, in writing, of the reasons for its inability to render an opinion and the date by which it will do so; and

In other words it is only expecting what is fair and reasonable and just, natural justice.

Because the Public Service Commission has been so reluctant to agree to abide by the rules of natural justice, in fact has ignored them in many cases, we have sought, as the standing joint committee did, to spell out those rules in writing in the statute. They will not do it by regulation. We as the House of Commons and Senate can do it by statute. Because this Public Service is so unresponsive to Parliament and to the requests of its committees I suggest we do it by act of Parliament, that we include this provision in the bill.

The minister would not want to see these people treated unfairly. I know that. I urge him to speak to his legal advisers again and see if they do not agree that this is a fair and reasonable recommendation. Do not speak to the legal advisers for the Public Service Commission. Speak to the people in the Department of Justice that do not have a vested interest in the outcome of this matter. Let us see if this cannot be agreed to as part of the proposition put forward as a reasonable proposition in this bill and agreed to today in this House.

I invite the minister to support this amendment and let us get on with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is group six, Motion No. 27, which will be voted upon separately, Motion No. 29 by Mr. Milliken will be voted upon separately, and Motion No. 31 will be voted upon separately.

The first question is on Motion No. 27. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is important when we are looking at these motions and particularly Motion No. 33 to appreciate the fact that the ability of the department to deploy workers is another central component to Bill C–26. Because the government is seeking the ability to lay–off workers by contracting out their jobs, it has moved yet again to get around a ruling of the courts by changing the powers of managers to deploy or transfer workers.

The government is seeking to add flexibility to the process of moving workers within and through various classifications, but it is doing so in such a way that it violates the merit principle and the rights of the workers.

Again we see in this clause the principle that if you circumvent the law and get caught, you change the law. It is as simple as that. That is the attitude of this government. What it is planning through this clause and the reason we have moved this motion, is the unfettered right to deploy workers as in the instance of the modification of the merit principle. It would allow managers to groom their favourites by appointing them to positions which would give them an advantage not available to other workers.

Combine that with the new classification system envisioned by the PS 2000 task force and this right to deploy means that a great many workers will be seen simply as movable pieces in a huge puzzle, being moved without competition or right of appeal. Just envision a huge chess board with workers in the public sector on that board and being moved strategically at the will of the game player but with no say about where, when or how one is moved.

The assurances of government spokespersons, and I am sure we will hear from the minister following my speech—

Mr. Milliken: Do not count on it.

Ms. Langan: I would be just as pleased if he did not respond, but I suspect he does not agree with me on this issue.

The assurances of the government spokespersons before the committee that workers would only be deployed with their agreement rings very hollow. All sorts of means of coercion can be used, and no doubt will be used, to encourage workers to accept deployments.

If anybody is unclear about what deployments are, deployments mean employees are moved from one position to another. It means they could be moving from Quebec to Alberta. It means they could be moving from British Columbia to Ottawa. It means they could be moving from Ottawa to Newfoundland. That is what deployment means. It also means that they could be moving within departments.

Mr. Milliken: Or from the government bench to the opposition bench.

Ms. Langan: Yes, there would be quite a shuffle with the government moving to the third party and the New Democrats becoming government and the Liberals remaining where they are.

I do not want to trivialize this very important part of the legislation by getting into an exchange with my colleagues. It is absolutely critical that more than ever the career–passive employees in the government service will be subject to the discretion of managers. The manager will decide who gets deployed where and because of this clause in the legislation the worker will have to accept a deployment.

The minister tells us that is not true. The minister will say that it is up to the employee who has the right to say no. Then what happens? There is no provision in the future for protection for the workers, so the worker says no. Does he or she ever get promoted again? Probably not. When he or she finds a position where the deployment would be useful to his or her career path, does that worker have the opportunity to ask for or move to deployment? The worker may have the opportunity to ask for it, but will he or she get it? Probably not, depending on the manager.

We have ourselves a situation where it is one more opportunity for there to be disagreement between a worker and the employer and the employee to be penalized.

No one here wants to hinder the effective and efficient functioning of the Public Service, but if the ability of managers to deploy workers in order to enhance the delivery of programs and services is desired, this must be done with appropriate safeguards.

Therefore, this amendment recognizes that a deployment mechanism can assist, not hinder, the effective functioning of the Public Service. However, it must be done within the guidelines explicitly spelled out in the act. Deployments must be made to the benefit of the worker and the demonstrated needs, not the wilful needs, of the department or agency.

I have illustrated how critical it is that the government agree to Motion No. 33. I am sure the minister, being a reasonable and thoughtful man, having listened to me carefully, will consider the motion as being fair and reasonable.

I would like to touch on another of the motions we are covering in this grouping, and that is Motion No. 34. The motion expands the grounds under which a worker can appeal a deployment. That is very critical, building on what I said before about the ability of managers to have discretion to act upon favouritism, to not like a worker for one reason or another and, because we are all human, let that interfere with his or her operation of a work place. It is very critical we have those expanded grounds upon which a person can appeal a deployment.

There must be a wide-ranging ability to appeal without these restrictions in the legislation. I am not denigrating management in the Public Service, but we have documented instances of managers who have been misguided, for whatever reason. It is absolutely critical to safeguard and even avoid having managers tempted to practise favouritism. All of the amendments in this section should be passed.

I would urge the minister to support both my amendment and the Liberal amendments under the section of deployment. We all know he is a fair and reasonable man and will look at these amendments very carefully.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that not only is the minister fair and reasonable, but so are several of the other members on this side.

I had the privilege, earlier this year, of spending many hours in committee with the hon. member who has just spoken. We did not agree on the process nor on the final result of how we wanted to accomplish something, but we did agree on many things. We agreed we have a good civil service in Canada and we want the best possible people working in it.

There were debates from time to time, and one of my concerns was that when someone goes into management, he automatically loses all of the advantages and strengths he had as an employee. I do not think we can automatically say all employees are good and all managers are bad.

I want to go on the record as saying I know very many people who work for the federal civil service. They are good, hard-working, dedicated people. I know a lot of managers in our civil service who are also good, competent, qualified people.

I can draw an analogy to our position here. I have a teenage son who told me prior to my being elected everyone thought I was the perfect person for the job. I was approachable, hard working and dedicated. Immediately after my election I became a politician. I was associated with politicians and that attributed certain motives to me I did not necessarily have.

We have to be very careful when we are talking about the civil service that we do not ascribe motives to them they do not have. We have to recognize we have good, competent, qualified people working at all levels of our federal civil service. There may be one or two bad apples in the barrel, but we should not paint them all with the same brush.

We are talking about deployment. The hon. member who just spoke asked the minister to be reasonable. I think the bill and what is presented in it is reasonable.

Bill C-26 proposes that deputy heads be given statutory authority to deploy their employees, subject of course to direction from the Treasury Board, to ensure service-wide considerations are taken into account. With the changes in the bill, deputy heads are going to have more flexibility to move employees to new positions with their consent. That is an order to the operational requirements, to encourage career development and provide compassionate grounds. I am sure the hon. member would agree these are all valid and worth while reasons.

Deployment is not a new concept. It is very similar to what most public servants know as lateral transfers. In 1991 alone there were some 25,000 lateral transfers in the Public Service. They amounted to more than 25 per cent of all internal appointments. It is a widely used staffing tool.

However, with the proposals there are some significant differences.

Unlike lateral transfers, deployments will not be appointments made by the Public Service Commission, but will result from decisions made by deputy heads with an employee's agreement.

This will enable deputies to move employees quickly for many reasons, including changing priorities or workloads; employee career interests and aspirations; the future requirements of the department for certain skills which can be developed in-house; the developmental needs of employment equity group members and the need to address unique situations compassionately.

For example, we may have a requirement to move an employee to be near special medical facilities. These are realities Public Service managers face every day, yet under the current legislation it is difficult to address them. The changes in this bill will give them that authority.

With deployment, the government is providing managers with a flexible staffing tool to allow them to move their employees quickly and efficiently as required. At the same time it ensures the very legitimate interests of employees are taken into consideration. Thus there is provision for employees to give consent to a deployment, and there is a recourse process which provides for independent review of the deployment consideration and decision.

Indeed, this balance is a key feature of much of what the government is proposing in Bill C-26 with management flexibility on the one hand balanced with consideration for employee concerns on the other.

During the committee hearings on Bill C-26, there was a good deal of discussion by witnesses and committee members about some of the features of deployment being proposed. I want to take just a few moments to address some of them.

Concerns were expressed that in making deployment, the deputy head will not be required to make a selection according to merit. This does not mean deputy heads can or will deploy incompetent persons as some witnesses suggested.

We must remember, an employee being deployed has already been qualified by the Public Service Commission for that particular level of responsibility. Little is gained by requiring a complete re-examination of the employee's qualifications or requiring him or her to be compared again to all other potential candidates.

In making their selections for deployment, deputy heads will not be required to apply all the prescriptive and procedural rules of the Public Service employment that apply to appointments.

May I remind hon. members we are not speaking here about recruitment or promotional appointments, which will continue to require selection according to merit. What about jobs at the same level with essentially the same or similar salary, benefits, conditions and duties?

We need to remember public service managers are under increasing pressure to improve the quality and volume of services they provide to the public. They are being asked to do this with increasingly tight resources and have up until now responded very well to that challenge. Managers know full well they cannot improve services without competent and well-trained employees.

The deployment provisions of Bill C-26 will allow employees to benefit from new experiences and give them the opportunity to gain new skills and training. This is critical to maintaining the professional and high quality federal Public Service we are striving to maintain.

Another major concern expressed by some of the witnesses was the view that some public service managers will use the deployment authority to arbitrarily move employees, favour friends and harass enemies. Their solution is statutory provisions to regulate the manager's behaviour and decision making.

I cannot support that view, nor would my colleagues I am sure. Public service managers as a group are not arbitrary. They are not unfair and do not lack good judgment. There may be mistakes made, but in an organization as large as ours with 218,000 employees and some 100,000 staffing positions a year, mistakes are inevitable.

That is what the recourse process is designed to find and resolve. That is why the Treasury Board will monitor and audit departmental deployment activities. The solution is not to limit the scope of action and flexibility of all managers for the sake of a relatively few mistakes that will be made.

The solution is not to tie the hands of managers and limit completely their authority to respond to organizational requirements. Rather, we need to ensure managers are well trained and understand the principles and values that should guide deployment decisions. We need to correct errors when they occur, and hold managers accountable for their decisions.

I have mentioned that deployment is not a new concept. It is commonly used in many jurisdictions. For many years in the Public Service, transfers or deployments, as they are now called, were treated as simple, routine, administrative matters. This did not appear to cause any great difficulty or concern.

• (1240)

With this flexibility, Canada managed to build a Public Service acknowledged to be one of the best in the world.

Let us continue to achieve this level of professionalism and competence. It is in the interest of all Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the amendment I moved is part of this group of amendments and is similar to the one I moved before.

I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Red Deer's speech. I listened to it quite closely. I am prepared to concede many of the points in his speech. I am prepared to concede, for the purposes of my arguments today, that what the government is doing by making this transfer of powers to managers in the Public Service may be satisfactory. Let us assume for this purpose it is.

It is still fair, and he must agree it would be fair if there is a problem, if there is an appeal from a decision one of these managers has made, the person hearing the appeal ought to ensure the hearing is conducted in a fair and reasonable way. My amendment seeks to ensure that fact.

My amendment does not interfere with the discretion of the persons making the decisions on transfers and so on. It ensures that when there is an appeal from a decision that has been made, the appeal is conducted in a fair way.

Unfortunately, I suspect my amendment is in trouble. Given the voice vote we had awhile ago, I sense the government is going to vote against my earlier amendment. The new amendment we are debating now, No. 42, is contingent on that earlier one passing. If it gets defeated, the meaning of my subsequent amendment will be lost.

This amendment seeks to import to the appeal process, in the case of deployments, the same rules that should apply in the case of appointments. The rules I have recommended are not ones I thought up myself. I do not claim credit of authorship. These rules were drafted by an all-party committee of both Houses of Parliament on which members opposite had a majority. The members of that committee agreed there were fair and reasonable means of requiring disclosure and conducting a hearing. That is what the committee thought up.

The committee was composed of all parties, but was dominated by Conservatives. In other words, the President of the Treasury Board's own colleagues all agreed these kinds of measures were appropriate and recommended them to the Public Service Commission.

I see he is here and has not yet moved to speak on these rules. My last speech did not even provoke him to any comment. He simply hung behind the comments of his legal advisors. I hoped he was going to stand up and tell us he had fired them already because they clearly have given him bad advice. I would not take their advice on an issue like this if they gave me the advice he cited earlier. Maybe he misrepresented what they said, I do not know. If he did not, it was terrible advice and he should stand up and agree that the amendments proposed here are all in accordance with the rules of natural justice. There is nothing shocking. There is nothing earth shattering in anything that was proposed in that list of amendments the board might reasonably ensure appellants have in their hands when they do an appeal. In fact, all of them have been recommended by a standing joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

I should also say the committee that made this unanimous recommendation did it before the last election in 1988. The representation of the opposition on those committees must have been miniscule, because the government had such a huge majority in this House. Three-quarters of the members of the committee must have been its own backbenchers. I do not understand why it would ignore the wishes of its own party members.

The hon. member for Red Deer says there are lots of reasonable people on his side of the House. Let us see them show their reason and stand up and support these amendments on the vote. Let us see some evidence of reason. It is fine to stand up and make pious speeches that must have been written by somebody working for the minister or in the department of the Treasury Board because it was so one-sided.

Let us assume the member believed every word he uttered. I am quite prepared to believe that. Then let us have them show some reason. The easy way to do that is to support these very reasonable amendments. He could either go to the minister and urge the minister to repent and change his view and support these things, or stand up on his own with his colleagues, the group of them that he says are so reasonable over there, and show their reason and support these amendments. Let us vote them through, fix this bill, and generally treat our public servants fairly.

Surely he would agree that if the deployment is to take place, the person making the decision has to act reasonably. If there is an appeal and it is shown that the person has acted unreasonably, the decision can be overturned. The appeal process is already there. What the amendments seek to do is ensure that the appeal is conducted in a fair and reasonable way. Certainly he must agree that that is a reasonable way to start. Surely he does not think the person making the decision on the appeal should behave arbitrarily or should deprive the person making the appeal of information that the person reasonably needs to proceed with the appeal. Surely he does not think that.

He, I accept, might be like the minister, fair and reasonable. Yet the minister will not respond to these amendments in a meaningful way. He tells us that his legal advisers think that they are unnecessary, or that they take away rights.

I say to the hon. member: read the amendments. I do not know whether the hon. member is a lawyer or not, but he can read this and I am sure that he would disagree with the advice that the minister has been given. Even a layman can see that these do not take away rights. They give rights, that is what they are here for.

I invite the minister to reconsider, if not fully repent of his position, accept these amendments and let us improve this bill. Let us not sit here and say there is no room for improvement any more, because that is what the minister and his so-called reasonable colleagues at the back are saying.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, this bill is a basic change in the philosophy of government relative to the Public Service. It is a move from service to the public to something which is maybe closer to no service unless you can find the right place to get that service.

I speak this way because I find, as my colleague from Trinity—Spadina indicated earlier, that in several of the departments across the country action has already been taken to move people to change the structure of the civil service so that those parts of the country which are being most affected will not get the kind of service they had in the past.

The example used by my colleague from Trinity—Spadina was immigration. We have been told that there is going to be a change in the immigration structure, that instead of having people dealing with people, in the future the department of immigration will have a mail-in service for application, a reply by mail, or a 1-800 number which will get you not a person, but an answering service and it will indicate that if you want an application to press number 3 and there are no people so there is no use pressing number 8.

In each case what is being attempted is to move the whole of the civil service away from dealing with people and move it closer, as the minister says, to a modern method of management which has no people in it. Service to the public of Canada has been by a civil service that has been well trained and well motivated to provide that service.

What this and the ability of these particular motions do—and I hope they work well and that they accept the amendments—is to give the government the power to deploy people so that they can close down places like Prince Albert which has an immigration centre, Saskatoon which has an immigration centre, Regina which has an immigration centre. These will be closed down. If you want some service you will go to three places: Vancouver, Toronto or Montreal. Otherwise the service will not be available under any circumstances.

If you or one of your constituents wants to sponsor an immigrant, they call the 800 number, find out where to get an application, send in the application and then it will be sent back because it was not filled in properly because there was nobody around to help or to indicate how to fill it in.

All of these services which have been part of the great civil service of Canada, the service that has been provided to the Canadian people, are being eliminated gradually and in these particular clauses—let us hope they work well—is an opportunity or a method by which the government can close down certain departments or parts of departments in different parts of the country.

Mr. Milliken: Come to Ontario and see what they are doing there.

Mr. Hovdebo: The further I can stay away from Toronto the better and Ottawa is not so good either.

I believe the member for Gander—Grand Falls indicated it took a long time to get any kind of service in certain areas. If you eliminate the people in these areas it is going to take longer still.

If the member wants a good example he should try the process of getting a pension through veterans affairs. To go through all six stages of the process of getting a veterans affairs pension takes an average of six years. That means some of them take much longer than that and by that time the veteran has passed on so you do not have to worry about it.

The more we depend upon machines and the less we depend upon people to give us the kind of service we want, the longer it is going to take and the more ineffective—I am not going to say less efficient—but the less effective it is going to be.

The ability in these particular clauses which allow the government to deploy people from one area to another, to move people without necessarily taking into account the wishes of the employee allows it to do things with the civil service which will give less efficient, less effective and less valuable service to the people of Canada.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on a bill that greatly affects Canadians and especially residents of the national capital region, in particular my constituents in Carleton—Gloucester.

As we well know, the Public Service has more than 220,000 employees in all throughout Canada. A common misunderstanding, though, is that all public servants live here in the national capital region, although we know very well that maybe 25 to 27 per cent of them are in the national capital region, but most public servants are spread all across the country according to local needs. Their number in any province is generally more or less proportional to that province's share of the total population.

As we say on both sides of this House, our public servants do an outstanding job. Public servants are there to implement the laws of the land. Public servants are there to ensure that the laws passed by the Parliament of Canada are applied and enforced. Public servants are there to serve the community, to serve Canadians, to make our quality of life better all the time.

The last time the laws affecting the federal Public Service were thoroughly examined was in 1967. We now have a new bill. I congratulate the President of the Treasury Board on presenting a very worth while bill to improve the operation of the Public Service. I was pleased and honoured to be on the committee that studied the bill. For weeks and even months, we studied this bill clause by clause. The bill is a good idea. It goes in the right direction. However, at some point one would think that the Public Service should be treated like a private enterprise, according to what the government says.

I sincerely believe that public servants are really different from workers in private industry. Government does not operate in the same way as private industry. Private industry must not only provide a service to the public but it must also make a profit. The public service, that is the government, is there to serve the community. We must help the community. Sometimes we also need regulations to ensure that things are done correctly. That is the case, for example, with inspections.

Nevertheless, even with all the esteem I have for the President of the Treasury Board, I believe that he is making a monumental mistake by not listening to the opposition members who proposed some real amendments to the bill.

I was surprised to see that the minister refused or turned a deaf ear to the suggestions and comments of my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, who challenged him, saying that he thinks some laws—and I recognize the member from Kingston and the Islands as a legal authority. We know that he was a lawyer of high standing in Kingston. He challenged the President of the Treasury Board by saying that his bill contained serious legal errors in the amendments it proposed. This does not go against the comments and statements the minister received from lawyers in his own department or from other government departments.

I was surprised to see the President of the Treasury Board, who is usually not at a loss for words, remain silent when challenged by my colleague.

We talk about deployment. In general, it is a good idea. I am sure that some public servants want a deployment. It opens new horizons for them and public servants want to serve the public. They are good public servants in the proper sense of the word who sometimes want transfers so that they can better serve Canadians or perhaps they find new employment opportunities that are interesting and meet their aspirations.

• (1300)

We often see managers who are keen on having a terrific team. That is worth while, putting together a team that is effective and efficient in the way it provides services to the public. Managers who always try to have a terrific team are to be commended. In fact, most people are like that. I am sure that our Public Service will keep improving, if this attitude or culture is encouraged. However, if a manager has the right to be authoritarian in the case of deployment and can ignore eligibility criteria and people's qualifications and bilingualism, for instance or merit, there is always a risk of abuse. That is why I deplore the fact that the President of the Treasury Board will not listen to the suggestions made by the Liberal Party.

Our amendments are intended to prevent abuse, favouritism, nepotism and prejudice of a linguistic, racial or even sexual nature. For instance, a male manager might not want any female employees because he is prejudiced against women. Occasionally, married women who have children leave their jobs for a certain period, which may not be well received by certain managers, and I would call this prejudice on their part.

With this mechanism an employee would be able to protest and appeal in the case of unfair deployment arising from favouritism, nepotism or prejudice. We need a mechanism to protect public servants against managers or rather certain managers—fortunately they are a minority—who occasionally tend towards favouritism, nepotism or, as I said before, prejudice of a linguistic, racial or sexual nature.

In concluding, I would ask the President of the Treasury Board to respond to my colleague's challenge.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say to both the member for Carleton—Gloucester and the member for Kingston and the Islands that there is no disagreement on the objectives for equity, fairness and sound management. What I would tell them to begin with on transfers is this: The reason that I was slow to speak up or less spontaneous, perhaps, is that this issue was debated at length, inside and out, I believe, for hours on end in committee meetings and that all those points which were raised were covered in extensive major discussions.

What I have some difficulty with is that since there may be abuses, which I do not deny, we should not, for fear of abuses or improprieties, make the system rigid. We should try to find a way to address the legitimate concerns of my colleagues opposite, but perhaps in a more flexible way. I would say, for example, that Motion No. 33 now being debated would require Treasury Board to include in the act valid reasons for transfers in the directives addressed to deputy heads.

Obviously, when Treasury Board sets personnel policies, it specifies the objectives being pursued. Of course, it will take care to tell managers that they can transfer employees for professional development, for operational reasons or for humanitarian reasons as someone mentioned. I believe that in his question, the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester said that someone might want to move an employee closer to a certain place for health reasons, for example.

These are the same reasons as appear in the amendment. If the circumstances are defined and limited in the law, it could be difficult in future to add other equally legitimate circumstances, even if all parties agree. I believe that it is easier to do that in a policy than in legislation.

For example, in practice, we do not have a very good idea of what such an amendment would do. What does it mean? What does desmonstrated needs of the employee and management mean? How can such needs be demonstrated and to whom does one demonstrate them? Since employees must agree to these transfers, in my opinion, that is the best guarantee that the need is demonstrated.

Personally, I have no quarrel with my colleagues opposite on the objectives being pursued, but I may disagree on the means to reach them, so as not to make the system unnecessarily more cumbersome in an attempt to make it safe from any abuse. I do not want the system to be rigid and prevent the rest of the government apparatus from functioning better.

I believe that both objectives can be reconciled in a more flexible way and that is what we are trying to do in Bill C-26.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I too want to suggest to the minister that we are not trying to be confrontational, we are trying to bring to his attention some of the experiences we are having as members of Parliament when we are dealing on the front lines day to day with people who come to our offices. Many of the cases or problems we receive in our offices are a result of our constituents not being able to work through or with the various departments or the Public Service itself.

Right now the morale of the Public Service is very low. It is very low for a number of reasons. The relationship between the Public Service and the Government of Canada in the last few years has not been that great.

During a very difficult economic period the resources of the Public Service are called on even more intensely. When our constituents are meeting with public servants whose morale is low, whether it is because they do not have enough man-years or their superiors are not motivating them or treating them properly, it all of a sudden creates a frustration in the way they serve the public. We as members of Parliament are the net beneficiaries of that frustration.

If we are attempting to lift confidence and help those people who are in the most difficulty—that is what the Public Service is there for, to help those who are in most difficulty—then it seems to me that the very asset, the human capital is not showing the kind of goodwill or respect that we could be showing. We must try to motivate its quality of service and its attitude of caring and approachableness because it touches all of the people of Canada in a way that ultimately is a reflection on us.

I do not think it is really an issue of whether one is a Liberal, Conservative or NDP. When people go into a Government of Canada office and they do not feel they are being looked after properly by the bureaucracy or by the public servants, when they come into my office they do not say: "That darned Public Service is PC or Liberal", they hold me as much responsible for poor service by the bureaucracy as they do the Government of Canada.

It is incumbent upon us on this side of the House to suggest that there are things in the government's actions and the way it is restructuring the Public Service that is not lifting the morale of the Public Service. Ultimately this has an effect on the service to the public in every department and in every region of this country. I cannot imagine a member in this House who does not share this view. It does not matter what department.

In my own community a day does not pass when we do not have people coming to our offices talking about the fact that the department of immigration just does not seem to have the resources to cope with the demands. The department of employment there does not seem to have enough public service support to meet the demand. In the areas related to manpower retraining, public servants with all the goodwill, all the best intentions are pulling out their hair because this government has an attitude.

Did I understand the minister earlier when he mentioned units of labour. Is that the way he quantifies service to the public? A person may come in with a problem and may be there for five or ten minutes. The next person may have a difficulty that takes a public servant an hour or two hours to solve. When we are interacting on problems that are highly personal and we are dealing on a case by case basis, there should not be a clock sitting on the public servant's desk so that he has to think he has to pass so many units through his shop in a particular hour or day.

Our Public Service was the envy of the world for many, many years because of its commitment to caring and quality of service. At one time it was an honour and a privilege to be a member of the Public Service of Canada. When Treasury Board wants to cut the man-years in this section and cut the man-years in another department, it defeats the whole purpose of what our Public Service is supposed to be about because it just takes the heart and soul out of the job.

My message to the government is that it has a very important tool in the public servants of Canada. They are the frontline ambassadors in all the various departments of government. They are the people who on a day to day basis represent the implementation of the legislation that we pass. They can have an effect on the attitudes of people toward the legislation, toward the job we are doing. Right now I think the Government of Canada is not using that instrument to mobilize a positive spirit in this country. I do not think it is respecting the potential for building a new sense of morale in this country. I would urge through you, Mr. Speaker, asking them once again to go back to their drawing board and try to show a little more spirit of goodwill and appreciation for the quality work they do when they are treated in a fair and equitable way.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to say a few words on this legislation.

Yesterday I received a letter from an archivist who works at the National Research Council. I was amazed at what he said to me. I will get to that. One of the comments he made was that the more we change, the more we stay the same. He sent me a copy of a communiqué which was put out around 1942. The riding of Ottawa Centre used to be called the Ottawa West Liberal Association. I guess there was a Tory and then there was a Liberal.

This particular householder was put out by the Liberal candidate who at the time was attacking the government record. On one side of the householder they have the record of the government of which Dr. Manion was minister of railways and canals from 1930 to 1935. The other side of it had the Mackenzie King government record from 1935 to 1940, and the householder was comparing those records.

In the government record from 1930 to 1935, first they cut the salaries of the public servants by 10 per cent; second, they stopped promotions and increases; third, they dismissed or retired thousands of civil servants without adequate provision for their maintenance; fourth, they removed from office most of the deputy ministers within a short period; fifth, by such drastic measures they disrupted the morale of the service and created an atmosphere of mistrust and apprehension, which destroyed contentment and impaired efficiencies throughout all departments. This was in 1930 to 1935.

On the other hand, from 1935 to 1940, the householder goes on to state that the Mackenzie King government during those five years, one, restored full salaries; two, once again allowed usual promotions and reclassification for all cases; three, introduced the right of appeal for unsuccessful candidates and promotional competitions; four, re-employed large numbers of civil servants let out by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and the Hon. Dr. Manion; five, brought back to the service the sense of security lost under the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and Hon. Dr. Manion and re-established normal morale and efficiencies in government offices.

How true, Mr. Speaker, as my constituent has indicated, that the more we change the more we stay the same.

Basically what was happening between 1930 and 1935 is no different than what has been happening from 1984 to 1992. First, the Public Service has been hit with a salary freeze. We have seen the largest walk–out ever in the history of our Public Service. They walked on Parliament Hill by the thousands. Promotions and increases, as we have seen, to a large extent stopped. There have been massive lay offs. The morale is at an all–time low. As well, in terms of promotions within the Public Service we have not seen many taking place over the past few years.

What needs to be done is for the government to look at all of those issues and try to address one of the most important problems that is now facing our Public Service and that is the issue of morale. The President of the Treasury Board had the chance to visit one of the symposiums at Lansdowne Park. I am sure he would agree with me that if anything he can be very, very proud of the quality of our public servants, the quality of work they do. I am sure he would also agree with me that we have the finest Public Service anywhere in the world.

One thing that was circulating everywhere I went within the Public Service was that there is some element of a morale problem, some element of mistrust, some element of disillusionment, an element of despair. They need leadership at the top which says: "Not only are you doing a good job, but we are going to give you the tools you need in order to continue doing such a good job".

The contracting out, the decentralization which the government has embarked on, the downsizing, as well as a lot of questions when it comes to the partnership between the employee and the employers, all have to be addressed a little more compassionately than the government has done in the past.

To that extent, it is my hope that the government will finally see the light regarding the amendments that my colleague from Ottawa West has put forward before the House of Commons and try to address them in a positive and comprehensive fashion.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Motion No. 33 dealing with the amendment to clause 22. I would like to speak to that.

As you know, that concerns the right to deploy. Just to put it in its proper context for people who are watching and listening to us today, I think we should just give a general idea of what this concerns.

When we talk about the right to deploy, we are talking about the right for a department head or anyone who is in a position to do so to send a worker, a public servant, some place else to work in this country. I do not in any way wish to fetter the hands of the government to prevent the government from sending members of the Public Service elsewhere in this country to do their job. I think that is important, that we have to have a work force which is flexible, and the needs change throughout Canada. I think that is a reasonable assumption to make.

However, here it is giving the right to deployment which will affect a worker's entire life, I would say, his surroundings, his environment, when it may be something that may be no more than a whim of the person who has the authority to act.

Whether we are dealing with the Public Service or with any group in this country, I am always concerned when I see power that does not have sufficient constraints, power which can be abused. You have seen I am sure, as I have seen, where things are not specifically excluded, they are included. In fact, it is a rule of law that if something is not excluded, it is included. It can be done if there is not a specific condition that says it cannot be done.

Here, where we are dealing with the deployment of people, of workers, we are dealing with changing their life style, changing their neighbourhoods, changing schools, changing friendships. Many times these types of deployments can be carried out in a way that would have the effect of punishment, perhaps a punishing effect that may be wanted, that may be desired by whomever has this power, or it may be completely unintentional. But it is punishment in any case.

I want to point out that the power the government has under this bill to change a public employee's place of work is quite considerable. This power could be misused. I suggest that this clause we are debating, which deals with that form of abuse of power, does not afford enough protection to the people this legislation applies to. I am referring to the public service employees. Some members opposite will say: "Phillip, there is nothing to worry about. It is no big deal. No way will an individual, a French-speaking employee, be deployed to Saskatchewan for instance, where everybody speaks English, or an English-speaking employee be deployed in Quebec, say in Chibougamau. That is not going to happen." But those things do happen. That is the problem I see with this bill, specifically clause 22, and Motion No. 33 which is designed to improve this provision. There is no protection against that kind of thing happening.

Usually I suggest relying on good old common sense. That is true. Usually we rely on the various directors using common sense so as not to put their subordinates through undue handships. But common sense does not always prevail in government, and I have supporting cases in point. I should pay this government a compliment. I have recently seen a case where good old common sense prevailed. Speaking of the Public Service, you know how the Official Languages Act is being defended, the protection that it is afforded across Canada. The public service employees are in fact at the forefront when it comes to really promoting English and French.

But a little while ago, I have noticed that, using their common sense, some public service employees decided it would serve no useful purpose to translate into French hundreds and hundreds of books like those containing the details on the frigates that were bought and built recently for the Canadian forces. They decided it was not necessary. Unfortunately, it was already done and we paid $100 million for a now useless translation. It is totally useless because when it was finally ready, all the data in these manuals on the frigates were obsolete. Worse still, French-speaking engineers and others who had to use the armed forces books in their work would rather use the English version because they felt more comfortable with the terminology.

After that, the Minister for National Defence appointed several persons—I think there were three from his department, including the much talented Ed Broadbent—to see if we could use some common sense when applying the Official Languages Act to avoid spending the taxpayers' money on translating everything. Astonishingly enough, a report published two days ago quotes armed forces' personnel as saying that the government could save a lot of money if it stopped translating every thing that moved in the Canadian Armed Forces. We should stick to what is essential.

Just think, Mr. Speaker. Had we done so five years ago, we would have saved $100 million translating technical manuals for the five fregates built in eastern Canada, and that is just one example.

I think common sense is what we need here, and by the way, I want to congratulate the government on its latest report on the use of official languages in the armed forces, because I think that is a good example. Without cutting a single job, without penalizing or punishing anyone, we could have saved $100 million.

That is why when I look at the bill before the House today, I say: Whoa, just a minute. Could we not use our common sense and put some kind of protection in this bill for employees who might be sent elsewhere in Canada on short notice and perhaps even without their consent? Even with their consent, when you work in the Public Service, do you really have a choice when your boss tells you: "Listen Phillip, they need you in Jonquière, and you have to move there with your family". I love Jonquière, and I like Chicoutimi and the Saguenay, but I have made my life in Montreal and my wife works there.

This bill must provide public servants with some protection against this kind of disruption in their lives, which will occur if they can be sent anywhere at all in Canada. If they are willing, there is no problem, but as I said before, do they really have a choice? There is always some pressure involved when people are asked to move, we assume, because of operational considerations.

Since the minister is in the House, I appreciate this opportunity to air this topic, because I know he is aware of my longstanding campaign for bonuses for members of the RCMP, who never received them although they were bilingual. Perhaps we should challenge the use of these bonuses today. I agree this is something that would bear reassessment. However, I think it is really unfortunate that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did not get the bonus and received no help at all from the government. The case is now before the courts, so the government could show its goodwill. They already lost once before the Federal Court, which was very clear in its ruling. It said: "Listen, pay those people. You are wrong and you ought to pay them". Now the case is before the Court of Appeal.

If it goes all the way to the Supreme Court, it will cost—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time expired about one minute ago. The hon. member for Halifax.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, growing up in Canada there are constants that some of us believe and put our faith in. I used to say half in jest and wholly in earnest that the three constants in my family were the Catholic church, the Liberal Party and the Montreal Canadiens. There was probably more truth than fiction in that.

On a serious note, and this bill is a very serious note, one of the things I think Canadians have always believed in and have always taken pride in is that we have and have had the best Public Service of any country in the industrialized world. That is not to say it is perfect. That is not to say things cannot go wrong. That is not to say things do not go wrong.

I think most of us, particularly those of us who were interested in the workings of government and the delivery of services to Canadian citizens through the Public Service, always felt that we could be proud of the Public Service of Canada. One of the reasons that we could be proud of the Public Service of Canada was because a happy work force is a productive work force. A very simple statement.

The problem with Bill C–26 is that it is going a fair way toward destroying that. Too many things have obviously happened already in the breakdown of relations between the workers and the governors. The abandonment of the merit principle which is what effectively is happening under Bill C–26 is possibly the most dangerous development, certainly with regard to the Public Service of Canada, that this government has brought forward.

The Federal Court of Canada in 1992 struck down the Order in Council giving the deputy ministers the freedom to transfer any employee because "it departs substantially from the merit principle". The judge said regarding one of the government's arguments that if he accepted that particular position: "I would be defeating the whole purpose of the Public Service Employment Act which is to ensure that appointments to the Public Service are made on the basis of merit".

What happens under Bill C–26? It allows managers to move employees to any other position within a level to any other location or any other department without regard to merit or other employees who may be equally or better qualified.

It is interesting that this bill should be up–to–date and that we should be at report stage today. It is interesting we are dealing with these amendments today. Since I became a member of this House four years ago—and I represent Halifax which is the third largest public service town in Canada after Ottawa and Montreal—I have heard a lot of complaints from public servants.

I have particularly heard a lot of complaints from women in the Public Service about a variety of matters. In most cases we were unable to take the matter further because the women out of a fear of reprisal, out of fear of what might happen did not wish to. I would say to them that they would have to allow me to do this if they wanted me to follow the matter up and they would say that no, they were not ready for that. I can understand that. I understand that feeling. It saddens me that that is perceived to be the case in Canada, that it is perceived to be the case in the Public Service of Canada.

As I say, it is particularly interesting that we are discussing the abandonment of the merit principle today because one week ago I met with two young women in my riding of Halifax who have had an exceptionally difficult time over the past year. Their allegations, which will be public before the end of the weekend, were on sexual harassment within the Public Service of Canada. When I asked these young women if they were prepared to go public they said: "Yes, what further can happen to us?"

In doing my job as their representative I have gone further and I have met today with senior officials in the Public Service of Canada. I have to say I was not very happy because there is a mood there, there is a response there in spite of the quite good Treasury Board guidelines with regard to sexual harassment. I said to one of these senior officials in the department: "Sir, you just do not get it. You just do not understand. There is clearly a gender gap in existence here and you do not see it. We have spoken now for one hour and you still do not understand. There is no point in my walking around this circle any longer".

I use this example because one way or another, the women in the Public Service and the women of Canada are going to ensure that managers, directors and ministers get it. The time when women will sit back and accept this kind of behaviour is over. At the same time, why is the government pandering to this kind of activity by allowing the abandonment of the merit principle? What is going to happen under this regime, under this theory of deployment to women who are being harassed, who are the subject of unfair treatment, whether sexual harassment or another form?

If managers have the right to abandon the merit principle, what recourse are they going to have? Today, in discussing with senior members of the Public Service of Canada the question of what sanctions would be brought forward to a founded charge of sexual harassment I got no response. There was no sanction. No sanction was intended and it was a founded charge.

If today there is no recourse when the merit principle, however tenuously, is still in existence, what in the name of Heaven will happen when the merit principle no longer exists? Where will these people go, whether it is women, minorities, francophones in the famous Trochu or anglophones in Quebec, whether it is Canadians of colour or of a different religious or ethnocultural background? Where will they go if the merit principle has been destroyed?

This is Canada. What are we on about here? What are we doing? How can we stand here in this House and advocate even for one minute this development in what was once a proud Public Service?

In greater Halifax–Dartmouth, there are 30,000 public servants and an awful lot of them are women. An awful lot of them work not in management, not as regional directors, not as executives within the Public Service but they are ordinary, everyday working people.

Mr. Speaker through you, I am speaking to the minister and beyond the minister, I am speaking to them. I am saying to those public servants in Halifax, in Ottawa and in Montreal, we on this side of the House may have made our mistakes but we believe in the merit principle. We believe that the merit principle is something that you, as the workers in the Public Service of Canada, should be able to hang your hats on.

We deplore a government that would abandon you. We deplore a government so bereft of principle that it throws away this one.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I hasten to reassure the hon. member since she makes such a fuss about this that the merit principle is not disappearing. Let her rest assured that the best qualified person will continue to apply on recruitment and promotion. Once somebody has reached a certain level, with their consent they will be moved laterally. That is the flexibility needed in a modern civil service and it will allow women to have wider experience and have access to promotion. I assure the hon. member that she does not need to worry about that. The merit principle is still there for recruitment and promotion.

Apart from that, she seems to consider that managers in the Public Service are all monsters. I assure her that they are competent managers committed to their employees. They come from the civil service. Most of them are from the civil service. Why would they all of a sudden become such monsters? They were raised through the civil service and I do not accept that they are arbitrarily and unfairly lacking in judgment. They are accountable for their actions. I have full confidence that this bill is a great improvement in the modernization of our Public Service.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to follow my colleague from Halifax. The kinds of concerns she expressed are exactly the concerns I have heard from women in the Public Service, from people with disabilities in the Public Service and from visible minorities in the Public Service.

The minister is absolutely right. The majority of our managers are responsible, well-intentioned people. No, they are not going to turn into raving monsters wielding power irresponsibly overnight because of new legislation that allows them to do it. Legislation is written and restrictions are applied for those whose own moral principles do not guide them in the right direction. There are a few of those in any organization.

The minister, by his own comments, has refused to acknowledge the seriousness of the situation the member for Halifax is bringing to the attention of this House. Harassment is a fact in the Public Service. Discrimination is a fact in the Public Service. There is no other explanation for the fact that 50 per cent of those working for the Public Service of Canada are women and only 15 per cent of those in management are women.

It is not because they are less well educated. The fact is they are better educated. The minister's own department did a major report on women in the Public Service. It demonstrated clearly that attitudes place that glass ceiling above our heads and keep us crashing into it but never going beyond it.

Let me talk about deployments. The minister has said that deployments are not an abandonment of the merit principle. The legislation says otherwise. Deployments move somebody from one job to another. It may be up 10 scales; it may be down 10 scales. The minister has refused to accept amendments that would clarify what a deployment is and what it is limited to.

Normally when people move from one position to another they go through a process of being measured against other people qualified for the position to make sure that the best person gets the job. If there is any violation of that, any violation of fairness, they can appeal the decision and have it corrected.

Numerous situations have been highly publicized in this region and in other parts of Canada where that process has worked to unearth the promotion of favourites as opposed to the best qualified person. Let us not pretend a problem does not exist. If we pretend it does not exist we will never even attempt to solve it.

Motion No. 43 in the package we are dealing with specifically goes to the very misinformation that has been provided to the House that it does not violate the merit principle. It specifically exempts deployments from those sections of the act that protect the merit principle. That is why I have proposed Motion No. 43. It would at least require that the merit principle apply and that bilingualism and the need to provide services in our two official languages apply to deployments.

The minister's legislation now before the House exempts deployments from any requirements of the merit principle and any requirements to consider the need for bilingual services. I draw the attention of the House to clause 22 which specifically says deployments are exempt from these provisions of the act.

When a manager has total control over whether one progresses in the Public Service, moves sideways for other career opportunities or not, no wonder someone who is already vulnerable in employment the concern is: if I am nice to my boss I will get an appointment and if I am not I will not.

That is reason the Motion No. 40. A deputy could not unduly delay dealing with a complaint and would have to tell the employee in 90 days how the complaint had been dealt with and whether sanctions had been taken, as my colleague from Halifax was saying, to correct a misuse of the deployment system.

It goes back to the fundamental principle that if there is an appeal and a complaint procedure people have a right to timely justice. They have a right to know the information on which the complaint was decided. They have a right, which is not spelled out in the government's legislation, to know that it was dealt with and how it was dealt with.

I have dealt with, as my colleague has, numerous harassment complaints in the Public Service and in the military. They can take months and sometimes years to resolve. This is unacceptable. A deputy cannot sit there with the power over somebody's life and refuse to deal with a very serious complaint which inhibits morale in the Public Service.

In Motion No. 38 I have moved that a section be deleted from this clause. The minister has said deployments are voluntary. Well, that is nonsense. This section of clause 22 says that is Treasury Board has the right to deprive anybody of the right to complain against the deployment they feel is not fair, is not just, is not warranted or is based on favouritism. Why is the minister not prepared to consider that amendment?

This group of amendments is intended to try to minimize the damage of this whole section on deployment. It puts power in the hands of managers without requiring any accountability, without requiring any independent review of how they are exercising that power.

The minister stood in the House today and said: "Deployment is not an abandonment of the merit principle". Deployments are just another word for transfers. Transfers have already been tested in the Federal Court of Canada. The right to make transfers without competition has been found to be substantially in opposition to the merit principle. The judge in that case said: "I would be defeating the whole purpose of the Public Service Employment Act which is to ensure that appointments to the Public Service are made on the basis of merit", if he accepted this transfer mechanism of the government.

The minister says things will be used responsibly. In fact we know that the Public Service Commission extended to the external affairs department exclusions from the merit principle even when it knew that power at external affairs was being abused.

Is it any wonder my colleague from Kingston and the Islands has moved several amendments to require the Public Service Commission to act in a fair manner consistent with natural justice when it hears appeals and complaints?

These clauses which we are attempting to amend make the Public Service a chequer-board on which anybody can be moved around at the will or whim of a manager. They completely obliterate the distinction between what is a slight sideward move into another office and what is a major promotion.

If the minister believes that power is not going to be abused, that it is not going to be used to coerce and harass people, the minister is too naive to be sitting in this Chamber. I ask him to look again at those amendments, to see the tremendous damage that will be done to the Public Service of Canada, and to look at some reasonable changes to the legislation before it is too late.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, this section on deployment is quite shocking. I simply want to review some of what the government is asking us to accept.

On the right to deploy, except as provided in this act or any other act, the deputy head has the exclusive right and authority to make deployment to or within that part of the Public Service over which the deputy has the jurisdiction. This can be for an indeterminate period. Unless some other period is specified, deployment is for an indeterminate period and on conditions. The main condition is that deployment shall be made in such manner as Treasury Board may direct.

In other words, overriding other considerations Treasury Board can simply direct: do this; do that and deploy them. It is this same Treasury Board that brought us the strike last year, the first strike in the history of the Public Service and one of the most massive strikes in Canada because of the absolute stubbornness of Treasury Board in insisting on the most unacceptable conditions being agreed to before anything else would be negotiated. The record is fully worrisome so far as Treasury Board is concerned.

Then it says that no employee shall be deployed without the consent of the employee. That is a joke. Obviously the alternatives offered will ensure consent and the employee will not have a right seriously to object to what is being done. This will mean that people will be moved without competition, without the right to appeal the move, and their careers will be at the whim of the manager.

In the department of immigration in the Public Service with which I am most familiar this is going to mean in the very near future, in weeks or months, massive redeployment of staff from the offices to be closed all across the country. Perhaps they will be lucky to be redeployed and not just laid off. Of course this depends on how many casuals there are.

But what is planned, so I am advised, is to close all except three offices in Canada. All other Canadians will be given a 1-800 number to phone in to try to get some kind of service from one of those three offices. The employees who had been working in those offices will be redeployed. They will be given the choice of being redeployed or starving, I guess. There will be chaos in the department as a large number of employees in the immigration sector are deployed across Canada or dumped.

This act is a very serious weapon of intimidation in the hands of Treasury Board and in the hands of the senior management of the Department of Employment and Immigration.

The public should understand not only how the employees are being mistreated under this act, but how the public is going to be badly served by the government's idea of cost cutting. It clearly is a prelude to privatization of the whole service.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member is not finished his speech he will have five minutes remaining when we resume after three o'clock.

Mr. Heap: You looked so uncomfortable in your seat; you were bouncing up and down. I thought you were trying to tell me it was time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am not uncomfortable. The hon. member will have five minutes remaining after three o'clock.

It being two o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

FLOW-THROUGH SHARES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, according to journalist Michel Girard of La Presse, flow-through shares are still the tax shelters that give the biggest tax savings. Investors will tell you that is as it should be since they are the riskiest investment on the market.

It is much less risky to invest in flow-through shares today than it was in the past. Why? Because the mining promoters who have been able to survive the three-year-old depression in the mining industry offer much better mining exploration projects than before. By better, I mean less risky.

Many newcomers invested in poor mining exploration projects in the past and they lost much of their initial investment. In the boom years, 1986, 1987 and 1988, too many junk peddlers pretended to be mining promoters. Today, fortunately, the junk peddlers have left the mining sector—at least, we hope so.

Nevertheless, many investors have made a bundle by putting some of their savings in flow-through shares.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, Ontario corn and soybean producers are in an unprecedented cash crisis and need urgent action by the federal government.

The Ontario corn crop alone is worth $600 million. Dismal harvesting conditions and high moisture levels mean that 95 per cent of that crop and 40 per cent of the Ontario soybeans are still in the field and unable to be harvested. Much of it will remain there until spring, or at least well after freeze-up.

Because most of the crop is still standing in the field producers will not be eligible for advance payments under the Advance Payments for Crops Act. The lack of an advance payment means many producers are facing a cash crunch.

I call on the government to make the necessary adjustments immediately to allow the unharvested crop to be used under that program.

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, today in Canada our children do matter. UNICEF identified the need to recognize the rights of children around the world. In 1988 the concept of a world summit was identified in its annual report.

November 20, 1989 was the day when the UN adopted a convention on the rights of the child. Canada and five other countries, under the co-chairmanship of our Prime Minister, were instrumental in garnering the support of over 70 countries around the world.

Canada's participation in the world summit for children in 1990, the ratification of the convention on the rights of the child, the announcement of Brighter Futures and the introduction of the child tax benefit have all been important and very substantive efforts on behalf of our children.

UNICEF has recognized Canada's Brighter Futures action as one of the world's best in industrialized world.

National child day can be an important opportunity for Canadians to acknowledge the value of children in our families and indeed in our society. It is fitting that national child day be established in Canada.

KAL FLIGHT 007

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have written an open letter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs today and I would like to paraphrase some of its contents.

I have written the minister regarding the KAL 007 airline tragedy of September 1, 1983. It is a very sensitive issue, but I would suggest that a final resolution has come its time.

Over the past nine years the matter of the needless deaths of 269 individuals including 10 Canadians has been continually brought forward by the governments of various countries, by various authors and by the affected families.

Each time new speculation and evidence as to the true events surrounding the tragedy have been brought to light, much to the torment of the families. External Affairs has been very forthcoming with information, but it is clear the status quo is not acceptable.

To offer poignant support for this assertion is a recent indication by a Korean politician who alleges that a leaked CIA report refers to currently imprisoned survivors of this tragedy. Certainly these types of assertions must be addressed in the most expedient manner possible.

Just yesterday Mr. Yeltsin presented to the Korean government the black boxes of the KAL airliner. Hopefully these may provide some insight into the events of the disaster.

However, I would encourage the minister to initiate a thorough non-partisan investigation—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

SUNTHETIC ENERGY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, Sunthetic Energy is proposing to build with private moneys a $700 million petrochemical complex in the Sudbury area.

This megaproject will produce ethers to be used as fuel additives for export to the U.S. and will create thousands of direct and indirect jobs across Ontario.

As Canadians we must do everything in our power to encourage and support new job creating businesses. If the NDP in Ontario does not act quickly this project will be built in the U.S.

The Sunthetic project has been widely endorsed by, among others, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, the Association of Municipalities of Ontario and all Ontario's regional municipalities and their chairmen.

I plead with the NDP in Ontario to practise what it has preached in the past, approve this project and create a new industry and new jobs for Ontario. Actions speak louder than words. Do it now.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, there are excellent indications that our economy is slowly but surely rising.

Let us consider the following. Retail sales averaged an increase of 1.2 per cent in July and August. Housing starts were up to 6.7 per cent and sales of existing homes rose 4.8 per cent in the third quarter. Labour productivity rose 3.3 per cent in the first half of this year and the Statistics Canada leading indicator continues to increase. We saw the largest increase in 11 months in August of this year.

The government has also turned around an operating budget deficit of $16.1 billion that we inherited, to an operating surplus of over $12 billion in 1991.

The good news is going to keep getting better. We are on the right track. This government is making the proper decisions to ensure a better economic future for all Canadians without borrowing from future generations.

S. O. 31

FUR INDUSTRY DEFENCE PROGRAM

Mrs. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, in 1987 the federal government initiated the Fur Industry Defence Program to protect and develop Canada's fur trade and markets and to enhance the aboriginal people's involvement in the fur trade. The program is based upon the fundamental principle of allowing the fur industry to defend itself.

The program has come to the end of its five–year mandate. I urge the government to renew its support for the Fur Industry Defence Program and to provide the money necessary to support an increase of involvement of aboriginal people in all aspects of the fur industry in Canada. As a major stakeholder and as a group which has made significant contributions to the fur industry they deserve more support from the Government of Canada.

We as Canadians all know that fur built this country.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to add my voice to the growing movement in Canada regarding the portrayal of violence on television.

Members will recall that in February this Chamber unanimously agreed in calling for a full review of the media's portrayal of violence toward and the abuse of women and children. We must have that review.

Canadians of all ages, from all walks of life, are pushing for someone to do something. From Quebec's young Virginie Larivière, who is circulating a petition calling for a law against TV violence to the Prime Minister himself who signed her petition, a national consensus is building.

I urge hon. members to tap into the feelings of their constituents and this consensus that is developing across our nation. Please show leadership. For us to say nothing is for us to do nothing.

THE ECONOMY

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, it has become painfully clear to Canadians that the current Progressive Conservative government has destroyed the Canadian economy.

When the Conservatives are finally voted out of office they will have left a legacy of a national debt approaching half a trillion dollars. Yet they perpetually blame the Liberal administration of eight years ago for the financial mess today.

I agree that perhaps the Liberals are no better at balancing a budget than are the Conservatives. I cannot believe that after eight years the Tories refuse to take responsibility for their own dismal management skills and instead blame someone else.

My party, the Reform Party of Canada, would begin to put our fiscal house in order by applying all GST revenues to the national debt. Subsequently, upon balancing the budget, we would remove the GST by reducing it in stages to zero.

If the government were truly serious about improving the Canadian economy and stimulating growth, it would do well to adopt the Reform Party's proposal on this as well as many others that it has adopted.

PARTY CANDIDATES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, when I sought the nomination of the Conservative Party in my riding four years ago I did not have to be approved by any elitist selection committee of party insiders or to be sanctioned by the leader.

Instead I brought average Canadians with me to an open and fair nomination meeting where a democratic vote determined who would represent the party. What a difference this direct democracy among Conservatives is from what the Reform and Liberal parties do.

Reform candidates have to be approved by the party elite after filling out questionnaires. Now Liberal candidates do not need to worry about democracy. The Liberal leader, afraid of the dirty details of the democratic process, is simply appointing candidates even over the objections of local party members. Then he has the nerve to discipline his own distraught members of Parliament and wonder what is wrong with fairness and the open voting process.

• (1410)

Thank goodness in Canada there is at least one party, the Conservative Party, which keeps Parliament democratic. It is for the people, by the people, and of the people.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is currently evaluating a proposal to privatize Canadian Coast Guard helicopters. The Pacific region of Canada's Coast Guard is evaluating the helicopter privatization proposal right now.

This helicopter privatization proposal is reckless, dangerous, and will compromise the safety of British Columbians. The Minister of Transport should stand in this House and announce that this privatization project is dead.

The Minister of Transport, if he has the courage, should also attend a public meeting in the Labour Centre in Campbell River, B.C., on Sunday, November 22, to justify to the people of British Columbia his refusal to upgrade light stations and the government's proposal to privatize coast guard helicopters.

The minister should come to the meeting and let the public tell him exactly what it thinks of this helicopter privatization proposal, and that is no.

FISHERIES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I stand today on behalf of the workers of two fish plants in my constituency which have been closed: Highland Fisheries in Glace Bay and National Sea Products in Louisbourg.

The Government of Canada has closed what has been known as 4V–N fishery for this coming December. This decision was made without any consultations with the fish plants involved or the workers.

In point of fact this was part of the groundfish management plan last year. As a result companies and workers made strategic decisions with regard to their particular livelihoods, keeping in mind these fish plants would have the fisheries for the month of December.

In Glace Bay over 150 jobs will be affected by this particular announcement. In Louisbourg another fish plant will be closed for the month of December. There are high prospects that it may be closed permanently or at least for an indefinite period of time.

This decision by the Government of Canada without proper consultations among fish plant operators as well as employees directly affects their livelihood and the livelihood of the communities where these individuals reside.

I would call upon the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the minister responsible for ACOA to take direct intervention in order to help and to assist these workers.

CANADIAN ASTRONAUT STEVE MCLEAN

Mr. Jean–Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that Canadian astronaut Steve McLean is in the national capital today. He recently returned from his mission on the space shuttle Columbia.

Mr. McLean, who is originally from Ottawa, by the way, spent almost 10 days in orbit on board the shuttle last month. While in space, he carried out Canex–2, a series of seven experiments in space science, space technology and the life sciences. Steve was continuing the work done by Marc Garneau on Challenger in 1984 and more recently by Roberta Bondar on Discovery.

We are all very proud of what our Canadian astronauts have done, and today especially of the feats performed by Steve McLean. They are a model for young Canadians and a challenge for future generations to match.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on an issue of fundamental democracy.

In February of this year the National Liberal Convention in Hull gave its leadership permission to side-step regular nominations in this country. Now the Liberal leadership has done that in the case of the Toronto riding of York Centre. The former mayor of Toronto Art Eggleton has been appointed—and I stress appointed—as a candidate in 1992. Local Liberals are objecting to this.

We have had three courageous MPs who have spoken out: the member from Broadview—Greenwood, the member from Eglinton—Lawrence and the member from York South—Weston who, by the way, has now been rebuffed and stripped of his critic duties because he had the courage to speak out against the democratic procedure of the Liberal Party of this country.

I close by saying that when it circumvents a nomination process, when it circumvents democracy in this country, there is something fundamentally wrong with that political party. In this country a political party is judged by how it governs itself. It must be accountable to the people. It must not be afraid to—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-Est): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Liberal MP for York South—Weston, said he was stripped of his critic's role last night because he refused to sign a letter of apology to the Liberal Party. He is no longer the critic on employment and immigration because he refused to apologize publicly for criticizing the backroom boys of the Liberal Party.

The Liberal leader recently appointed former Toronto mayor Art Eggleton as the Liberal candidate in the York Centre riding, by-passing the normal open nomination process by bumping a Canadian of Italian origin, Mr. Peter Li Preti who had sold in excess of 3,000 membership cards.

Is this the way the Liberal Party treats Canadians of Italian origin?

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to the importance of leaving an environmental heritage to our young people.

Clearly, our natural resources are not inexhaustible. That is why we must act for the environment every day. Car pooling, recycling and waste control are only a few examples of what can be done.

We do not have the right to live on our environmental capital, since we are mortgaging the future and can never pay it back.

It is in everyone's interest to live in a healthy environment. We must all act accordingly.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Four years ago this week in his final campaign appearance in Canada's largest city, the Prime Minister promised a group of unemployed Torontonians: "We'll put you back to work". When he said that, there were 65,000 people in Toronto looking for jobs. Today there are 236,000 people in that city alone who do not have work and thousands more who have given up trying.

What fourth anniversary message does the Prime Minister have for those 236,000 Torontonians that have lost hope in his government?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that the hon. member failed to point out in her question is that we have come through a world-wide recession over that period of time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: The opposition can disagree with that but the facts and figures show that very plainly.

We now see signs that we are coming out of the recessionary period we have gone through. There are some very hopeful signs that the economy is picking up, including retail sale increases, house sale increases. We are seeing an increase in production and we are seeing a great increase in exports this year of record levels which shows that the free trade agreement is working.

This is very little consolation for those who are unemployed and I admit that. There are signs that the economy is coming around. The unemployment rate has been dropping. Jobs have been created over the last few months. Some 64,000 new full-time jobs have been created and that is an important sign. We are heading in the right direction.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the bank rate today jumped by 98 basis points. The minister claims that the government is the victim of a world-wide recession. The fact is the Minister of Finance admitted in this House that he and his government deliberately induced a made-in-Canada recession to slow down the overheated economy that was identified in the city of Toronto.

No one made them do it. They chose to do it. Now they say: "Let us put you back to work". Where is the government's basic plan to put Canadians back to work? How many jobs will it create and when will it announce details to the 1.6 million Canadians who have given up hope in this government?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the government has announced many projects that create employment. I notice with great interest that the NDP has decided that it would scrap a helicopter purchase that the government has made. It is going to create thousands and thousands of jobs in Ontario and in Halifax, Nova Scotia where I visited a plant that is going to outfit all the helicopters. All kinds of projects are going on where money is being spent.

• (1420)

Not only is our dollar under attack, but currencies around the world are under attack at the present time in this unsettling period and are extremely volatile.

The hon. member did not stand up in the House when the interest rate dropped 18 weeks in a row and congratulate the government.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, four years ago the Tories won their second election, and what do we see today? Unemployment: out of control; transportation policy; out of control; business bankruptcies: out of control; deficit: out of control; and cities and provinces that are losing their credit rating. Where is the Prime Minister's plan for Canada's economic recovery, or is he just going to tell 1.6 million unemployed in Canada to get out?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The hon. member asked the same question in English and French.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the deficit situation in this particular period is not like the deficit situation that we found in 1981-82 when income dropped for the government. The spending of the government has been maintained at a good solid level, but income is down somewhat which has increased the deficit.

It is interesting that she is complaining about the deficit increasing when her party is advocating spending more and more, throwing more money at the problems rather than getting the basics right, getting interest rates down, holding them down, getting inflation down and holding it down.

I might quote to the hon. member from an article in The Financial Post which says that Canada has the fastest growth of industrial production over the last year among the 13 major countries tracked. Although this is not spectacular by any stretch of the imagination, it is far ahead of the other industrialized countries, including the United States and Japan, which slipped minus 8 per cent and Germany which slipped minus 3 per cent.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the final report of the Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation depicts a cruel, vicious vision for transportation in the 21st century which I am sure even has Sir John A. Macdonald rolling in his grave.

The report urges the government to abandon its responsibility of providing affordable transportation to all regions of Canada, adopting a user-pay system. If you do not have the money, you will not travel.

Will the Minister of Transport reject this $25 million report which will turn the national dream into the national nightmare?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not advocating in his dreamland that we keep transportation vehicles running around the country with nobody in them and the taxpayers of Canada paying for it.

The hon. member is giving a quick evaluation of a report that was presented by a group of very competent, expert people. They spent three years listening to people, examining the situation and coming to conclusions. The hon. member should have enough sense to respect the judgment of people who have spent so much time and effort in trying to examine the transportation framework that should exist in this country over a 30-year period.

This is an excellent report. It is far-reaching.

We have to examine the report very seriously over more than a 24-hour period of time. We should examine all the recommendations and see how they will help us maintain a viable, competitive and efficient transportation industry.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this minister is giving a ringing endorsement to this report.

Surely this minister realizes that a national passenger transportation policy is about serving people. It is about providing them with a safe, affordable and regionally accessible system of transportation.

The report recommends that our national transportation policy not be concerned with regional economic development. It states it very clearly. Is the minister abandoning the regions? Will he condemn the report outright?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thought that the first question of the member was just driven by his predilection to blame the government. I would not have thought he would go so far as interpreting incorrectly what I have just said.

I said that this is a good report that has been put together by a number of people who have worked very seriously on this for three years. They are trying to tell the people of Canada that we have to examine how we operate the transportation system in order that it be affordable, efficient, safe and that people should take into consideration what it costs the taxpayers of Canada who do not travel to keep the system operating.

We are going to examine each of the recommendations very carefully and we will then report to the House of Commons.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to informing Canadians, we know that the government can provide text and documents when it wants to. We have had a recent example of that when Canadians were informed about the political constitution of the country.

Canadians are anxious to know other information. They are well aware of the tens of thousands of jobs that have been lost because of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. They are concerned about jobs that will be lost as a result of the Mexico-United States-Canada free trade agreement. They have a right to know.

Yet when Canadians want to get a copy of the publication regarding NAFTA, there are no copies available. There are no copies available for the public of Canada.

My question for the Acting Prime Minister is this. Why is this government in effect banning this publication from the Canadian public?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I gather the hon. member has a banned document in front of him.

Mr. Andre: You've got one right there.

Mr. Hockin: It is published by the Government of Canada. It is freely available. He is creating a tempest in the teapot.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want to have copies of the North American free trade agreement. Canadians have a right to have copies of the agreement. Yet to get a copy of the agreement today, you have to telephone the United States department of commerce. It will send you a copy.

The Government of Canada will not send you a copy. There are no copies available. There are no copies in the depositories. There are no copies in the libraries. The chambers of commerce of Red Deer and Chicoutimi cannot get copies from this government.

Is this a forerunner of what we can expect? If you want to find out how NAFTA is going to affect your sector of the economy, your business or your community, will you have to telephone Washington, D.C.? Why can you not telephone Ottawa, Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if you want to find out how an improved trading relationship with the United States will affect the Canadian economy, British Columbia in particular, talk to companies that are expanding and increasing employment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that the government is not answering the question.

Why is the document not available to the people of Canada? I understand that the Conservatives and the Liberals have agreed that there will not be hearings in every province of the country. There will not be hearings in the part of Canada, the industrial heartland, that was most adversely affected by the Canada–U.S. trade deal. I understand that if you are lucky enough to have a computer programmed with WordPerfect 5.1, you can have a disk, but for the average Canadian this deal is not available.

• (1430)

I am going to ask the minister to do the right thing today. Will he table this agreement in the House of Commons at least, so that the document section can provide copies to the people of Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows it is going to be tabled in the House and he knows it has to be translated. We will make sure that it is tabled.

As for the committee's travels, the representatives of all three parties and the management committee of the committee that is looking at this has agreed on the six cities they are going to visit. He knows that. It is my understanding that the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca agreed to this itinerary. He did not want to go to those particular cities that the hon. member mentioned.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. The Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation, which was appointed by this government, tells us that substantially the government will no longer play a role in building infrastructures and systems for passenger transportation in this country.

More specifically, I would like to ask the minister: Does he support the Commission's recommendation, yes or no? Or does he agree with me that the government still has an important role to play in building the ties that keep this country together?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the report was submitted by a group of people who worked very hard for three years.

These people have a lot of expertise. They consulted with many people and examined all these questions with great intelligence and care.

Today this group has submitted a very explicit report full of statistics and comments. I think we owe it to the people who prepared this report to make a detailed study of each recommendation, because we must not forget that their objective is to establish, over the next 30 years, a transportation system that is viable, effective and financially sound. This is not going to happen overnight.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, that is all very well, but it does not answer my question.

Specifically, my question concerns the following. The report states that it is based on the premise that the market, not governments, should decide who may transport passengers. That is the premise of this report. Does the minister agree, at least with the premise? Or does he reject this premise, as I do? Yes or no?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's response to this recommendation simply proves that these people are not prepared to consider today's situation in relation to the future. They want to make a snap decision, without considering its ramifications for the next 20 or 30 years.

Again, this report is intended as a guide for government decision making during the next 30 years. These are not decisions that are made overnight. Careful consideration of every aspect of these recommendations will be necessary before reporting on them to Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The airline workers demonstration today on Parliament Hill shows that the government has created another crisis in our transport industry and an extremely serious one.

As a result of the government's continued mismanagement generally, and in particular of the airline industry 800 Gemini workers in Winnipeg and elsewhere who have excellent high-tech jobs could lose that work. What is the government going to do to help these workers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, once again, I would like to have the member of the opposition party tell us exactly in what direction that party is going. A couple of weeks ago the leader of that party said to the government: "You must come to the help of one of the players in this situation". The proposal is to take apart the Gemini system. We have now the other member saying: "You have to help the Gemini system". I think he must realize that there is a lot of contradiction in what he says in reference to what his own leader said a couple of weeks ago.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): The party's position has not changed. The minister is unable to understand it and that is unfortunate.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is another failure of the government in this whole air transport issue. The government misjudged this situation as it has misjudged many others, and it knows it. It has failed yet again. What will it do to get out of this crisis, to make sure that thousands of jobs are not lost? Does it understand this? Yes or no.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will remind the hon. member opposite that the commercial civil aviation industry is in crisis throughout the world. In every country now, all airlines are in great difficulty and are trying to get out of it by forming closer relations among several companies. We now have two Canadian carriers in financial difficulty with a very high level of debt. On Tuesday, a few days ago, we received a very specific proposal from the employees and from Canadian Airlines and its employees. We said how impressed we were by the employees' decision to accept wage concessions and to invest their own money. We agreed to look into this very serious proposal with them and to try to find a solution whereby we could save the Canadian civil aviation industry and protect as many jobs as possible in a fiscally responsible way for all Canadians.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The bank rate today has jumped almost 1 per cent because of lack of international confidence in government policies. A 1 per cent increase in the bank rate means a loss of 40,000 jobs. It means an almost $2 billion increase in our deficit. It means $570 more each year for somebody with a $70,000 mortgage.

Given an inflation rate which is far below the target the government had even set for itself, how can the government justify such an unheard of dramatic increase in interest rates which will so seriously damage Canadians right across this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Again, Mr. Speaker, I repeat to my hon. friend: Where was he when the interest rates dropped 18 or 19 weeks in a row, to levels that we have not seen since the 1970s?

As the hon. member knows, there clearly has been pressure in currency markets over the last several months directed at many of the currencies. It is not only a judgment on the federal government, it is also a judgment on provincial governments, municipal governments in the way they have been controlling their expenditures over the past number of years, the debt load that they are all carrying, and so on. But it is not just Canada. It is other currencies in the world as well.

The interest rates are still—

Mr. Peterson: It's their fault.

Mr. McDermid: No, I am not blaming them all. We are all in the same boat. Interest rates are still much lower than they have been traditionally over the last number of years. Those people who, for example, in 1990 were paying mortgages at 14 per cent today are at some 8 per cent and are saving themselves over $400 per month, based on a $100,000 mortgage.

• (1440)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact the United States mortgage rates are significantly below those in Canada. Interest rates generally in the United States are significantly below those in Canada. In the United States, despite the fact that it has a bigger deficit in relative terms, interest rates are staying down. The international community is showing confidence in the new Clinton government because it is going to change policies and expand jobs.

Why will this government not escape from the Reagan–Thatcher time warp that it is caught in and recognize that it has to change its policies and move ahead with job expansion in this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I debated with my friend for many, many months, in fact a couple of years, on the free trade agreement. I have never heard anyone who knocked the United States more than the hon. member. Today he is advocating that we adopt the economic policies of the United States.

The member is also one who says that Canada should have economic sovereignty. He is now telling us that we should follow the economic policies of the United States. The NDP speaks with forked tongue and cannot have it both ways.

TRANSPORTATION

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Pacific's decision to abandon its rail lines in eastern Quebec and the maritimes shatters this government's already tattered commitment to regional development.

From a region devastated by government policy, I ask the Minister of Transport why would he not use his discretionary power under the National Transportation Act and reverse this action today?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned yesterday, this regulatory process of the NTA was put in place so that when railway companies want to abandon lines they can address themselves to this agency which will hear all sides. The railway companies, the municipalities, the provinces, the ports, individuals, shippers, anybody who wants to be heard will have a chance to put his side of the story. At the end of the day, the NTA is going to come down with a decision either positive or negative. At that time there is another possibility for the government to examine that conclusion and make its best decision.

I would suggest that the most efficient and most democratic way of going about this is to take this request from CP and put it through the NTA process, as they have done, then let the story unfold with input from everybody. Then the government can take its responsibility afterward because the decision that has been taken is not to remove, it is to ask for permission to remove.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, that is a fine answer, but surely the minister is aware—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Clancy: Not that fine, gentlemen. Surely the minister is aware that his discretionary power under section 23 of the National Transportation Act must be exercised before the hearing takes place. It is not individual groups such as the minister listed that are going to restore jobs in Atlantic Canada and eastern Quebec, it is the minister and this government.

Is he going to act and act now? If he is not going to act now why will he not act for the benefit of Canadians?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because it is in the best interest of Canadians to hear what everybody has to say on this matter.

I fully understand the content of the article that the hon. member is referring to, but I say that it is most preferable to let the process run its course. This is the only way that all interested parties will be in a position to tell their side of the story and hear the other sides. At the end of the day it comes back to the government to make a final decision. Until that time nothing is going to happen.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

I was born in 1960 and my generation grew up with the dream that if we worked hard we would be rewarded with opportunities. That dream has been shattered. The new coalition of unemployed Canadians, factory workers, university graduates, carpenters, technologists, managers and professionals all share in the human misery of this unforgiving recession.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister, when will he restore the dream?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has indicated that he will be coming forward very shortly with an economic statement in the House, to be delivered within the next week or so, which I think will answer a lot of the concerns the hon. member has raised today.

We too are concerned about employment and the facts that we are experiencing right now. However, I do want to remind the hon. member that between 1984 and 1992, 1,320,000 more Canadians are working than in 1985. Those are a lot of jobs that have been created over the last 10 years. It is not enough to fill the ranks of the unemployed in this country and we admit that. That is something we all have to concentrate on. However, it is a record that no other country in the world can match per capita and we should be proud of that.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that this government fails to understand the real problems of real people.

Last Monday, Jonathan Rosen, aged 31, lined up with 350 other people to apply for one of 20 minimum wage jobs at the Eaton Centre. Six months ago Jonathan Rosen worked for the federal government.

Roberto Soarez, age 28, a university graduate who has been out of work for a year, also lined up for one of those minimum wage jobs. The dream is slipping away from my generation. Why does the government refuse to provide innovative and effective programs to create jobs for Canadians and restore the dream?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the purchasing the federal government is doing is creating thousands of jobs in the private sector. They are very important high-tech jobs. We just have to look at some of the contracts that have been announced over the last year. They are very important for our work force right across this country. We are doing something in that regard within the budgetary limits of this government.

I can sympathize with those people who are having a tough time finding a job. It is difficult. As I have said, the unemployment rate is dropping. In the past year 64,000 jobs have been created. Signs of growth in the economy are very promising and we are encouraged that Canada is on the way to recovery.

AVIATION INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Earlier today over 2,000 Air Canada employees were outside this Chamber. They are very scared. They and their families are worried about whether or not they will have a job tomorrow, which is no different than the worry that Canadian employees have.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport if the government has arrived at a solution, not just for the short term, to keep either carrier or both carriers afloat but for the long term of the Canadian aviation industry? Has the government arrived at a solution?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned before, a formal proposal was put to us by PWA and its employees this Tuesday. We started working on that proposal immediately after we received it. We have met with representatives of the employees of the company and also of the company that is trying to finalize the transaction. We are working on a very tense schedule to arrive at a solution.

When I came out of a meeting last night, I mentioned that we had made enough progress to believe that we will be able to come to a constructive resolution before the end of this week or early next week. We are taking into consideration, of course, the employment of all the employees of the whole airline system in Canada.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the minister answered only in part.

He indicated that the government was working on the short-term crisis but he did not indicate, like the Minister of Finance did on CBC radio this morning, that the government was recognizing that the marketplace had not worked and that the government was examining options. It called them policy options, although in any other language it is some form of reregulation.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport through you, Mr. Speaker, whether the government finally recognizes that bailouts of a carrier by themselves do not guarantee the survival of the Canadian aviation industry, nor does it guarantee the ongoing operation and ownership by Canadians of the Canadian airline industry.

Is the government prepared to move to ensure that regulation will be put in place to make sure that those carriers can survive in the long term?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is putting words into my mouth or at least he is trying to ignore what I have been saying in this House from the very beginning, in response to questions about this matter.

I repeat that we must seriously consider this offer to ensure it is not a temporary solution. What we want is a permanent solution to create a system that is as viable, effective, and financially and fiscally sound as it can be.

CANADIAN MIDDLE CLASS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, a number of my constituents have expressed concern that the Canadian middle class may be dying.

In fact, a national newspaper series this week flatly states that that is the case. My question to the Acting Minister of Finance is this. What measures has the government taken, or does it propose to take, to bolster confidence among middle class Canadians to help them be able to plan a secure future?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I think the first thing we should look at is the United Nations study that picks Canada as the number one country in the world in which people desire to live.

I think that being judged by our peers as being the number one country in itself says that we are doing well and that the middle class by no stretch of the imagination is dying.

There are many things in our economy to encourage the middle class such as low inflation and the low interest rates that we are experiencing now. I am convinced that with the tax cuts that we are having on January 1 which will put $1.2 billion more into the economy, together with all the other factors, the middle class can be asured that they will always have a very strong and important place in Canadian society.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

According to Jacques Pelletier, an analyst with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Montreal, residential construction preceded the over-all start-up of economic activity during the last economic recovery.

Unfortunately, the government refuses to recognize the important role this industry has to play in getting the economy started again. Why is the government dragging its feet on bringing in an infrastructures program, a program that is directly related to recovery in the construction industry and recovery of the economy in general?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the government has shown that it does understand the importance of the residential component of the construction industry.

Measures taken in the last budget to allow people to use money in their RRSPs, and the government's general policy, especially as it has affected inflation and interest rates, are the best kind of government intervention, which benefits all economic sectors in this country. We must realize that the best thing the government can do is provide the right conditions for industries to develop, including cheap capital and low mortgages.

My colleague, the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, has already pointed out the beneficial impact of our policy on inflation and interest rates.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is still directed to the same minister.

The sector worst hit by this recession has been the construction industry, where unemployment is around 50 per cent. There has been a 14 per cent drop in residential construction, as the minister mentioned earlier, in the Montreal area, compared with the previous month alone.

Considering these figures, why won't the government introduce a genuine economic recovery program, such as modernizing infrastructures, in order to give construction and the economy in general a boost? When will we get this program?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, a couple of years ago, the government said that the economy was overheating, and that because of very high interest and inflation rates and artificially high prices for homes, the situation was very precarious. The result is that Canadians are now deep in debt. Governments, companies and Canadians are in debt, and their purchasing power has diminished considerably.

As a government we are trying to do our share to create better conditions and free up capital so that people can borrow, instead of using all the capital available to pay off Canada's debt. We are making an effort to boost recovery in all these sectors, including the residential construction sector.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today the government raised the interest rate by 98 basis points, for a whopping increase of 29 per cent in the past eight days. Last month Canada lost another 28,000 manufacturing jobs and manufacturing bankruptcies are at a record high.

This government has not been able to deal with the deficit, it has not been able to deal with jobs. This government's legacy is the deindustrialization of Canada.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister: Why does this government continue to batter Canada's manufacturers with its high interest rate policy?

An hon. member: High interest rate policy, heavens to Betsy. Jim, you were around when it was 22 per cent.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this country has among the lowest interest rates of any country in the industrialized world. The hon. member should really look around the world and see what interest rates are outside of Canada.

The second point is manufacturing. In fact, unit labour costs are improving in a very important way in manufacturing. We are becoming much more competitive. As a matter of fact as a proportion of our exports, manufacturing has increased from 24 per cent to 26 per cent of our exports. Not only that, but shipments were up 4 per cent in August. The gains were broadly based. Seventeen out of 22 major groups recorded increases.

We also have manufacturing capacity utilization numbers. That is very important. They have increased for the second consecutive quarter and 17 of 22 industrial groups recorded capacity utilization gains.

So there are signs of health. There are signs of improvement in the manufacturing sector.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, if our interest rates are so low, why are they 4 percentage points higher than the United States and in real terms 6.35 per cent higher than U.S. rates? That is where it counts.

If the minister wants to talk about trade, the trade that really counts is in high-tech goods. Our deficit is $15 billion in high-tech goods and growing.

I go back to the question of our manufacturing sector. Since January 1989 Canada has lost 375,000 jobs, 18 per cent of all its manufacturing jobs.

When will the government admit that its policies are not just working or is its position that we do not need to have a strong manufacturing sector in order to have a strong economic future in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians do not know and the hon. member clearly does not know that while the Canadian manufacturing sector represents a smaller share of our GDP than it used to, it has continued to grow in absolute terms. It has continued to grow in absolute terms. Indeed, its size has nearly doubled over the last two decades. To give the impression that there is no manufacturing reality left in Canada is really quite wrong.

I really want to give my hon. friend an interesting answer on interest rates. In the United States, although it is violated sometimes, a state government or governor is not allowed to send an unbalanced budget to the legislature.

In this country provinces can run big deficits, especially the Peterson government and the NDP government in Ontario.

Oral Questions

OLDMAN RIVER DAM

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who answered questions regarding the panel report on the Oldman River dam on the floor of this House on May 2. This is what he said and I quote: "The government responded favourably to 22 of the 23 recommendations contained in the report—.We have accepted that recommendation with the 22 other recommendations contained in this report—.We will ensure that they are implemented".

Could the Minister of Transport tell us why not a single one of those 22 recommendations have been fulfilled now, today, six months later?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I stand by the words I spoke in the House on May 23. Certainly the member will understand that if we want implementation of the recommendations in an orderly fashion, we have to put in place the mechanisms and the process to make sure it will happen so that this thing does not get bottled up.

This is what we are doing at the present time. I stand by what I said in the House of Commons on May 23. We are going to see that these 22 recommendations are implemented but we want to make sure that when it happens we have a process and mechanism in place.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a very short supplementary question.

Eighty per cent of the potential environmental damage will occur if the reservoirs are allowed to fill with next spring's run-off. Will the minister get his feet off the recommendations and tell this House in absolute terms that those 22 recommendations will be fully implemented before next spring's run-off goes into the Oldman dam reservoir?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be absolutely irresponsible to make such a commitment. We are committed to making sure the recommendations are implemented. Therefore it is absolutely illogical and irresponsible to say that it will be implemented by that date. I will not fall into that trap.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the representative of the Board of Internal Economy in the House of Commons, namely the hon. member for Saint-Léonard.

In 1990, the House of Commons bought a colour offset press for $800,000. In 1991, the Auditor General of Canada recommended that Parliament thoroughly investigate the purchase of this press.

Can the hon. member tell us today whether the Board of Internal Economy has decided after a study was done whether this press should be kept or not?

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Board of Internal Economy, I am pleased to answer my colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi.

Further to the Auditor General's report and a very detailed study ordered by House of Commons officials from a consulting firm, Mr. Speaker, the Board of Internal Economy approved the sale of the press in question. It was exchanged for a smaller press and a credit to buy other pieces of equipment.

The press obtained in exchange better meets the needs of the Printing Division of the House in terms of cost benefit, productivity improvements and flexibility for future technology. If my colleague needs more detailed information, I am prepared to ask the officials to provide him with the necessary details.

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Dr. Steve McLean, Canadian astronaut.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINT OF ORDER

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON HOUSE MANAGEMENT

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise with regard to a point of order raised this morning by the hon. member for Kamloops.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that at that time the subject was the composition of the legislative committee for Bill C-91 and the report of the House management committee in connection therewith.

Sir, when you left the Chair I am sure you are aware that the House leaders had agreed to try to resolve this matter within the bosom of the House management committee.

I can report to you, Sir, and to the House that the committee met at 11 o'clock this morning and dealt with the generic issue of how committees are constituted and I believe has put together an improved mechanism in that regard.

However, on the specific point of the constitution of the committee on Bill C-91 there is now clearly agreement among the Whips and the committee is in fact constituted by motion of the House management committee.

Therefore I would submit, with all respect, that the point of order is no longer valid or relevant.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has explained the process that was followed accurately. We look forward to receiving the report tomorrow and it will be adopted upon its submission at the appropriate time, during Routine Proceedings.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions for the government House leader about the business of the House. While I am on my feet I want to indicate I hope that the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship could remain in the Chamber for a brief moment. Perhaps the government House leader could indicate to the House the business for the rest of the day—

Mr. Speaker: Excuse me. I wonder if the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond wishes to rise on the matter that was raised by the parliamentary secretary.

I have listened carefully to the response of the hon. member for Kamloops. The issue before the House and before the Chair is whether or not, as a consequence of these discussions earlier today, there is now that unanimous consent which was asked for as a consequence of the reference to the motion of the committee some time ago when it established a subcommittee.

What I have to know is there unanimous consent? The effect of unanimous consent is that the introduction of the matter will stand but I think we must be absolutely sure what we are agreeing to. I wonder if the hon. member for Kamloops could assist the Chair.

Mr. Riis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I can assist the Chair. The concern we had this morning, and I think this is the point being made by myself and my hon. friend the opposition party House leader, was that the appropriate procedures had not been followed.

It was suggested it should go to the management committee and then after it has a chance to meet, a report would be drafted and submitted to the House of Commons. That is the appropriate procedure and that is what is being done. Tomorrow during Routine Proceedings I expect the report will be tabled and will be adopted on the tabling.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, you referred to unanimous consent. I think the unanimous consent issue before us, if indeed a unanimous consent issue is before us, is whether or not consent was given to interrupting Government Orders yesterday evening in order revert to motions to table a particular committee report. I think that is the focus of the unanimous consent issue.

The position the government takes is that we do not believe there were any improprieties at all. We believe the constitution of the committee on Bill C–91 was perfectly in order. Now that the House management committee has reviewed it and has in fact constituted that committee with the participation and consent of the Whips, that committee is now established.

Mr. Speaker: We have spent a lot of time on this today and I am going to come back to the difficulty the Chair may be having.

It seems to me that as a consequence of the extra meeting that was held today there is now agreement by the Whips. There is no need for another presentation to the House of Commons. The matter has been resolved.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says no. I will hear an argument on it but I am having great difficulty following a suggestion that despite the meeting that was arranged today, despite the fact that there is unanimous consent, this whole procedure has to be gone through again. That is the difficulty I am having.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the difficulty. The management committee was convened today because there was not agreement among the Whips. Therefore the matter had to be referred to the management committee.

It was referred to the management committee and therefore the committee rendered a decision. That decision will now be represented in a committee report which will be tabled at the appropriate time. That is the procedure we follow.

• (1510)

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that was the procedure that we reconfirmed in the committee session earlier today. In other words, if the Whips cannot come to an agreement it must go to the management committee for a decision. That is what we did. The Whips could not come to an agreement and it was then placed before the management committee. It was on the agenda, it was dealt with.

That committee presumably will submit a report during Routine Proceedings tomorrow and then that report will be deemed to have been adopted. That is the procedure that we accepted in the committee today and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that is the process we should follow now.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, my recollection of the events is that names were submitted yesterday, or prior to yesterday, by the Whips of all three parties to participate in the legislative committee for Bill C–91.

There was some challenge subsequent to that report being received by the House as to whether the report was properly constituted. There were some discussions this morning in the House management committee about how to establish greater certainty that the Whips had, in fact, put names in for legislative committees, in a generic sense.

There was also some discussion and disagreement about precisely what happens after the Whips submit names for legislative committees. There was never any dispute that the Whips of the three parties had submitted names for this legislative committee. The names are as they were tabled yesterday in the House by me on behalf of the chairman of the House management committee.

I take the position, Sir, that that committee report has been received and that any dispute surrounding its reception has now been cleared up.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I just want to clarify one thing. The parliamentary secretary for the government House leader said that yesterday the report was properly constituted. We had a long debate about it here in the House. We decided in the House management committee that the report was not properly constituted because there was no meeting.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the House management committee had to pass a resolution to adopt the report about a quarter to twelve. Therefore, I want to make it clear that yesterday's report was not properly constituted because there was no quorum, the meeting did not take place, and there was no unanimous consent.

I want to make the record clear, that consent was given through a House management committee vote in the committee room at a quarter to twelve today and not yesterday.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, what my friend, certainly inadvertently, left out of the true statement that he just made is the fact that the House management committee has been operating for over a year now, I believe, under a system whereby if the Whips submit names for a committee that that authority is then delegated to the Whips to present that report through the clerk without a formal meeting of the House management committee taking place.

The discussion that took place in the House management committee today was how to achieve greater certainty that the Whips had in fact submitted the names. It was agreed that certainty could be achieved through requiring the signatures of the Whips to be attached, and that is the process that has been agreed will be followed in future cases.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty that the Chair is having is this: The first thing I have to be sure of is, do the Whips agree as to the content of the report? If there is agreement, and remember it has already been presented to the House and was accepted unanimously—

Mr. Gagliano: Which report?

Mr. Speaker: A subcommittee. If there was unanimous consent, I am having very great difficulty in understanding why procedurally we need another submission of the report to the House.

It seems to me if there is now unanimous consent, the matter is over with and it stands. If I could find some rationale for coming to any other conclusion, I might be able to follow it but I am having difficulty.

Mr. Riis: Perhaps I can be helpful by suggesting the report tabled yesterday was an illegitimate report.

It was a report of a meeting that never occurred. How can you table a report of a committee that never took place? That was the argument we made.

I gave notice last night that we would raise it today. We said for the Chair to accept a report of a committee that never occurred seemed to be ludicrous, quite frankly. It seemed to be unreasonable.

In your judgment, Mr. Speaker, you suggested we attempt to resolve this in the management committee, and we did.

My friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader said, as an item of business, the Whips have not been able to come to an agreement on the composition of the committee to receive witnesses to consider Bill C-91.

The question was then put to the committee. The motion was: "I recommend the following composition". There was some comment and I participated in it. Then there was a vote and it passed. In other words, the committee dealt with this very specific issue as it should have.

I therefore submit that since the committee has now held a meeting and dealt with the impasse successfully, it is now able to draft a report and submit it to the House. Upon submission, it will be considered adopted.

The appropriate time to do that is during Routine Proceedings, and we would expect to see it then.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make the obvious point.

For well over a year the procedure on legislative committees has been that each of the Whips submits the names of his representatives. That is deemed to constitute a meeting of the committee for the purposes of establishing a committee. That has been used for over a year with no difficulties.

On that basis, my parliamentary secretary tabled the report yesterday. The House leader of the New Democratic Party stood up and said: "Whoops, tilt". His Whip had not put in the right name. We subsequently found out his Whip had put in the name.

The names of the members on the committee are now known and there is no question as to who the people are. Yesterday the House unanimously agreed to the establishment of the committee with the same names that were known yesterday.

Do we now have to wait until tomorrow? I know one should not ascribe motives, but the net effect of this alteration of one year and one-half or more procedures has been to delay the start-up of this committee.

The purpose the New Democratic Party had in mind by misinforming the House as to what its Whip had done or not done is apparently part of the games around here. The public should know the reality is the committee is established by unanimous consent. The membership is known. Perhaps it is necessary to keep delaying for the purpose of delaying, but I wonder if the people of Canada think they are getting good value from their parliamentarians who are using these tactics.

Mr. Speaker: I have been trying to find a way to resolve this difficulty without having to make hard rulings.

I cannot make any further decisions until I know if there is consent to the substance of the report as a consequence of the discussion that took place this morning. If there is no consent, let the Chair know because then we are no further ahead than we were this morning. If there is consent, then I have to decide whether it is necessary to submit it again or whether the submission that went in yesterday stands as a consequence of the information I have been given and the undertakings I have heard.

Mr. Dingwall: I would hope the government House leader has read discussions we had this morning. I am sure it is very clear to the viewing audience and people who watch our proceedings that there is clear consensus and agreement on substance in the second report.

There has been no agreement on the first report, as my colleague, the House leader for the New Democratic Party has said and as my Whip from Saint-Léonard has indicated. That is the reason why it went back to the management committee for further deliberations.

Coming out of those deliberations there is now a consensus. I believe, quite rightly, this will tabled at the appropriate time, which will probably be tomorrow, and we will proceed.

To answer the Chair's question, yes, there is consensus on the second report because the first report was not submitted properly under the rules of this House.

Mr. Speaker: I may be losing track of this, but I thought there were two situations yesterday when the hon. parliamentary House leader proposed the report to the House and there was objection taken to the first. The parliamentary House leader gave it consideration, as I remember from the information given to me this morning. I do not know exactly what happened and it is not for me to consider, but when I came back to the House later it unanimously accepted the report. The opposition has made it very clear in a succinct and courteous manner that consent was not given on the substance of the report.

I thought we were trying to see whether it was agreed the substance of the report put in by the parliamentary secretary would stand as submitted. That position seems to make sense procedurally.

If I take the position put forward by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the hon. member for Kamloops and perhaps others, there is now disagreement on the floor of the House, not over the substance of the unanimous consent, but as to whether or not it is appropriate procedurally to have the parliamentary House leader, on behalf of the government, submit the report again tomorrow. It seems to me that is the question I now have to answer, if I have correctly understood everybody.

I will give that some consideration and report back to the House. I do not think I need any further argument. If there is something I have missed, I will need further argument, but I do not think I have.

Mr. Riis: There is one additional piece of information that might be helpful. The Chair accepted the report tabled yesterday of a meeting that did not occur. I think it is a very dangerous precedent if the Chair accepts a report submitted by a committee chair of a meeting that did not occur. It provides additional power now to the parliamentary secretary if this is accepted.

It provides additional power to the chair of the management committee, if that person is allowed to table reports of committee meetings that never occurred. I think that is a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. Edwards: In this place and in our committees, much of the lubricant to make things flow comes from goodwill, good faith, character and integrity.

Often we can agree with each other's suggestions, respond to each other and communicate with each other without a formal meeting actually taking place. I think my friend from Kamloops would acknowledge there have been a number of instances in the past year and beyond when committees have been constituted by consultation among the Whips, without a meeting ever actually taking place and through the delegated authority from the House management committee being deposited with the clerk.

I do not want that mis-impression to stay on the record. In this case I want to take just a minute or so to read from the "blues" of this morning's committee meeting because they respond to something my friend said earlier.

My friend suggested I said in the committee this morning that the committee, as deposited last night, was not properly constituted. I did not say that. This is what I said: "In the tabling of the report on Bill C-91 it was my sincere belief that all Whips had assented to the total composition of the committee. My subsequent investigation confirmed that and that is why I retabled it after having withdrawn it at Mr. Riis's request. I can give a very formal undertaking that the government would never proceed to put forward a list of names as chair or acting chair of the Standing Committee on House Management unless there had been proper submission of names by the opposition parties of their lists and the appropriate consultation. It was my belief that the consultation had taken place".

Finally, on the same pertinent point, I moved this morning in the committee the following: "That this committee accept that list as the legislative committee for Bill C-91". The committee accepted that particular motion which, in my view, confirmed the action of yesterday.

I submit that the agreement today and the consent you have obtained from the House leaders confirms the names as submitted in the report of the House management committee last night are the appropriate names and that committee now stands properly constituted, since the House has received the report.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to consider my position. I have been assisted a great deal with that argument and I will report back as quickly as I can.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the parliamentary secretary. Can he indicate to the House what the business will be for the remainder of today, Friday, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week? Perhaps he can indicate when a minister of the Crown will move that tomorrow is designated as a supply day.

I have a few other short questions on House business I would like to put to the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in response to my friend's question today, we will be completing report stage of Bill C-26 on PS 2000.

Since my friend has guided me to that point, I will ask a minister of the Crown, namely my friend the hon. Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, to formally designate tomorrow, Friday, November 20, as the first of three allotted days remaining for this supply period.

On Monday we will continue with report stage of Bill C-86, respecting the Immigration Act. On Tuesday, we will again continue with Bill C-86 and one hopes we will be able to finish it next week. Discussions will continue with colleagues from the opposition on the business for the rest of the week.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, two further points to the parliamentary secretary. I wish to inform him and members of the House since it is our supply day we will be moving a motion of non-confidence tomorrow. I do want to alert members of the government, although there will be a vote taken on that motion on Monday of next week.

My second comment to the parliamentary secretary is that he will know the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship has had a report, Paying Too Dearly, which came from the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons some time ago. The minister has written to the chairman of the committee outlining why he could not give a written comprehensive response in the time provided by the Standing Orders. The rationale which was indicated in the letter was that because of the referendum, cabinet meetings were not taking place and it could not be given at this time.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary and/or the minister could indicate as to when we will receive a comprehensive response to that particular committee report and if he could indicate to the House whether or not that will be soon or later because he is in breach of the Standing Orders of the House.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, consistent with the policy of the government and the House I am now waiting to consult my cabinet colleagues. The appropriate appearance will be taking place before a cabinet committee at a very early opportunity. I am now waiting for that appearance to take place. As soon as I have received the consent and agreement of my colleagues, you can be assured that I will bring forward the response I have prepared for Paying too Dearly.

While I am on my feet, I would like to formally designate tomorrow, Friday, November 20, as the first of three allotted days remaining for this supply period.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, my final question to the parliamentary secretary relates to the comments which were made today by the Minister of Transport in terms of a decision which will be reached, as he indicated, later this week or very early next week concerning the situation with the airlines. I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could reflect upon my request to convene some discussions with the Minister of Transport as to whether there will be a ministerial statement accompanying the announcement by the Government of Canada so that we would have sufficient time for our critics and the critics of the New Democratic Party to participate in that statement.

If there is no ministerial statement, in view of the seriousness of the subject matter, namely the airline industry, perhaps the parliamentary secretary would give some consideration to having all-party agreement for the purposes of an emergency debate at that time when the minister has made his decision. Would he give some consideration to that request?

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, in answer to the first point of my hon. friend, I would say yes. I would take it as given that the normal courtesy surrounding a ministerial statement would be extended to the opposition so that they would have advance notice of that taking place if, in fact, it is going to take place.

On the second point, the question of an emergency debate by agreement on the airline situation following upon the minister's and cabinet's decision in the matter, I will take the representation of my hon. friend and make sure it is well-known.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have two specific questions and one general one for my hon. friend. If he cannot indicate today, perhaps he could get back to the House and tell us when the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act to deal with marine oil spills will be brought before the House. We have waited some time now. There was some anticipation that they would be introduced before the Christmas recess.

Second, will the parliamentary secretary indicate when the new environmental assessment act will be given Royal Assent? Again, we have been waiting some time for that Royal Assent.

Last, this is more of a general question. Does the parliamentary secretary expect to be introducing any bills before Christmas that would actually create employment in the country?

Mr. Edwards: To give a very direct and specific answer to my hon. friend, no the parliamentary secretary does not intend to introduce any such bill. With reference to the other questions, I will have to make inquiries and get back to my hon. friend.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 33, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 43 (p. 13624-13625).

Madam Deputy Speaker: There were five minutes remaining in the intervention by the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I want to express my thanks for the consideration of the hon. Speaker who was in the Chair an hour and a half ago in reminding me that I have these five minutes.

Before Question Period I described what I think is wrong about the government's proposed policy of deployment of public servants. I will not repeat that now. I want to use these few minutes to suggest what I think is a better way.

I am referring to Motion No. 33 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops. I will read the motion because this concerns a great deal of the public:

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 22 by adding immediately after line 14 at page 12 the following:

"(2) In applying subsection (1) Treasury Board shall, in the deployment of an employee, include in its direction the following factors:

(a) the need to develop the employee through additional work experience;

(b) the demonstrated need to fill a vacancy on an immediate basis;

(c) the demonstrated needs of both the employee and management and;

(d) compassionate grounds."

I think that this is a very reasonable and preferable alternative to what the government has proposed that I criticized before.

In my 18 years as a labourer on a factory floor in a unionized plant we had many disputes. I was involved in some of them as an employee; I was involved in some of them as an officer of the union. Generally speaking, we resolved those disputes not to perfect satisfaction but to workable relations. I might add, and I do not take all the credit for this, during the time I was working there and during the time I was an officer, there was no work stoppage. There was no strike. I credit in part the management of that enterprise which was a local branch of a large multinational corporation. I credit it in recognizing the necessity of considering the employees' needs when it expects the employee to consider the necessity of the employer's needs.

These are four very simple matters to recognize, not easy, but clear enough. One is the need to develop the employee through additional work experience, so if there is an improved job to be done, a better job through more experience, the employee, all employees, should have the same chance through the provisions for competition, through the provisions for appeal which appear to be denied by the government's new proposal.

Second, there should be a demonstrated need to fill the vacancy on an immediate basis. We had occasions when somebody had to fill in on a temporary basis because of an absence or an extra workload, but that did not create a permanent position. That should be observed here in the much greater matter of deployment, that maybe arrangements need to be made temporarily but it is different from using them as the grounds to do it permanently.

Third, the demonstrated needs of both the employee and management should be observed. This is not reflected in the company's proposal. It does say that no employee shall be deployed without the consent of the employee, but it does not give the employee any ground to stand on. If he or she feels that the deployment would be disadvantageous, he or she is not given by the government's proposal any ground to stand on to make that point, any ground by which to justify refusal.

Finally, on compassionate grounds, the employee is expected from time to time to recognize the employer's unusual need. I ask that the same be written in, that the employee may have an unusual need to reject the deployment.

Those are grounds for approving this very good amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops.

POINT OF ORDER

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON HOUSE MANAGEMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I thank the hon. members for their indulgence in co-operating with the Chair twice today on adjournments on this particular issue. I am now in a position where I am going to have to make a ruling and I will probably file some careful reasons for it later. However it is in the interests of the House that a decision be made.

In my view, what happened today when the committee met is that the three Whips clearly agreed as to the substance of the report. It happens that what they agreed to today was the same as in the report that was put forward at the end of yesterday afternoon by the parliamentary secretary on behalf of the government.

I am satisfied, though, on what I have heard that for whatever reason, no matter what anybody may have personally felt or thought, there was not unanimous consent to the report that was filed in front of the House yesterday afternoon.

I felt this morning that it would be possible, if all hon. members involved were given a chance to meet together, that the report filed last night could be deemed to be accepted. But that also would require consent. That consent is not there.

So I am ruling the report of yesterday afternoon is null and void, and it is up to hon. members as to what they wish to do with the discussions that took place today.

If I feel it is appropriate, it may well be I will file more detailed reasons later because I know there is some concern by hon. members about the procedure we have been following. I am sorry that as your Speaker I cannot resolve it any better than that, but this is what I think we have to do.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 33, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 43 (p. 13624-13625).

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I just wanted to intervene here for a few minutes with regard to some of the remarks made by my colleague from the New Democratic Party. He certainly has mentioned some important issues such as workable relations, employees' needs and deployment.

I wanted to remind the House that the merit principle does remain for recruitment to and promotion within the Public Service. This is very important and is one thing that we discussed at committee level for quite some time.

Also, deployment requires consent, consent of the employee who is being moved. There is recourse in this process and the recourse does include an independent investigation that is under the arm of the Public Service Commission. We recognize that sometimes there could be problems, but we have looked at both sides of it and provided the process for investigation in case there is some sort of coercion. If you take those two things in conjunction, the merit principle is not compromised by moving employees when you have their consent.

In our meetings we heard from many witnesses who said deployment is extremely necessary. It is going on in private enterprise, in all our provinces in Canada, and throughout the world.

When there is no need for a position in one location and that person could be utilized in another, it is extremely advantageous to both the employee and the employer to move the best person with his or her consent. This gives both sides flexibility, which is something we need in the government and the Public Service to become more efficient and respond to the needs of the public.

I have heard throughout my community, and I think some of my colleagues have as well, that private enterprise has moved toward efficiency and better management of its funding and people. I think if we really look carefully, the merit principle remains and we will certainly be taking the consent of the employees on deployment.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 45

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 23 by adding immediately after line 19 at page 14 the following:

"(2) Without limiting the generality of subsection (1), the Commission shall, in respect of an appeal under subsection 21(1), make regulations

(a) requiring the disclosure of any document or information of which the appellant has no knowledge or that has not been communicated to the appellant and on which the deputy head might rely;

(b) prescribing a notice period of not less than two weeks in respect of the time and place of any hearing held for purposes of the appeal."

She said: Madam Speaker, the intent of this motion has been more fully dealt with by a couple of amendments proposed by my colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands.

As he mentioned in discussing those amendments, we are endeavouring to correct the situation that is nearly a decade old, whereby a joint committee of both chambers of this Parliament and of all parties has repeatedly recommended the Public Service Commission have regulations as to how it conducts its hearings.

It has failed in the past to conduct its hearings with due regard for fair process and natural justice.

The amendment I have moved would require the Public Service Commission to make regulations. For nearly a decade it has persistently resisted the expressed views of reports to this Parliament from its own committees.

It has delayed responding to those reports. It has come close to expressing contempt for the opinions of parliamentarians as put forward in the reports of that committee to this Chamber and to the other place.

The commission is now saying it is going to conduct an inquiry to see what kind of regulations it should have.

After nine years of resisting the views of this Parliament as to fair process for employees appealing a decision, I think it is time for this Parliament to tell the commission it must have regulations and this is its opportunity to do so.

It is really quite simple but there is nothing in place, believe it or not, that now requires somebody who brings an appeal to the Public Service Commission to have access to all the information that will be used in considering that appeal.

It is impossible for an appellant to have fair justice, if he or she has objected to a decision and walks into a hearing not even knowing what information will be used in that hearing. Yet that is what happens consistently and that is why the joint parliamentary committee on the scrutiny of regulations has twice recommended regulations to ensure information is available to people whose livelihoods depend on the decisions made by the commission.

The other thing that can and does happen is people are not given adequate notice of a hearing that affects the very continuance of their employment in some cases. It affects whether they are dealt with fairly in promotions. The second part of this amendment requires the commission to have regulations saying people must have at least two weeks' notice of the time and place when their own appeal will be heard.

It is only fair to allow a person to consider the information to be used in the hearing and consult counsel or a union representative. Yet there is no requirement and no body I am aware of that operates without regulations with respect to notice and the information to be provided to the person whose very future depends on the decision of that tribunal.

That is the sole purpose of this amendment. I ask, as my colleague from Kingston and the Islands did, that the government consider why it is willing to let the commission continue to stonewall the expressed wish of Parliament.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I want to speak to this particular motion and add a few comments.

I want to support the motion and the basic principle that we need to ensure the Public Service Commission will implement regulations to ensure due process and appeals. Surely that is a basic, fundamental principle upon which our labour relations are based.

My party, the Liberal Party of Canada, stands for a professional civil service that is non-partisan in nature and treats all employees with respect and fairness. It should be a model of labour relations in Canada. It should be a model in terms of the treatment of its employees as well.

The Public Service should be responsive to the needs of Canadians, draw the finest and the best and be able to keep them as well. We unequivocally support the merit principle. My colleagues and I denounce patronage and favouritism in the civil service.

We also believe deployments and re-deployments without consideration of the merit principle flaunt that principle. They counteract it and are inappropriate.

I note here that casual employees have virtually no rights, and I find that most unfortunate and inappropriate I might add. I think the whole concept of hiring any qualified person available is not necessarily a fair one. It could disregard the merit principle and we have to be on guard for that kind of possible violation.

I have noted on a number of occasions in this House that contracting out can cost more. While there have been deep cuts to the civil service and at times, the government has bragged about those, it has been unable and/or unwilling to show how many dollars have been spent on contracting out, and whether or not that contracting out has been more expensive for Canadians if one looks at the over-all total.

That is a question I placed on the Order Paper to which I failed to receive an appropriate, adequate or precise answer.

I note the bill does not deal with pension reform, and that is unfortunate. It was a golden opportunity to do so, and it could have addressed the whole notion of de-indexing pensions, which people are very nervous about and my party opposes.

I believe, as a former senior civil servant, there is an excessive use of regulations in some certain instances. There are too many exclusions from the collective bargaining process, and the increased flexibility for managers is not counterbalanced by increased accountability.

• (1600)

To sum up, I would say that the main thrust of this bill, and a very sound one at that, is to try and come up with a policy, a somewhat different one if you want, ensuring that our Public Service will be able to meet today's and tomorrow's needs, to retain the best men and women to answer the call of the Canadian people and provide them with top quality services.

My fear is that, if we get overly concerned with flexibility—as desirable as it may be at times—we will unwillingly end up missing out on the merits we were looking for, that is, the principles we wanted to be applied, and that would be unfortunate.

I noted in several instances, as you probably did as well, Madam Speaker, that many organizations besides the unions and the employees involved are concerned about these changes. Why? Certainly there are broad-minded people in these organizations, men and women who understand what the Public Service is about and share the principles I just mentioned, men and women who want to make sure that our Public Service is the best there is. If these people are concerned—and several are both against and concerned—why go ahead at this time?

Why not stop and reconsider, and try to come up with sound proposals that would address their worst fears.

[English]

I think it is important to ensure that our civil service remains at all times at the service of Canadians, staffed with the very best possible and, I stress again, with a code of conduct and labour relations that are the model for the country. If we, as the highest court of the land, are unable to give the example to other employers then why should we expect other employers to do what is right for their employees.

[Translation]

That is why I rose in this House today to share with you my thoughts about what should be done.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I want to make a few comments with regard to Motion No. 45. As my colleague from St. Boniface has indicated, I too am very much in favour of having a professional Public Service. By and large I think we do, but some of the rules and regulations which they, as employees, have to engage in from time to time leaves one wanting to ask a number of questions. Motion No. 45 addresses a very important aspect of the appeal process that an employee of the Public Service of Canada would have at his or her disposal should that be necessary.

The whole question on the issue of due process is something which has been a major study, if you will, in administrative law on a variety of different subjects. I would think that the parliamentary secretary, who is in the Chamber today, would want to concur that the rules of natural justice ought to apply to individuals who may be seeking an appeal based upon a particular complaint and/or an unfair action which may have been taken against them.

I want to indicate to the House regarding disclosure, the motion in part reads:

> (a) requiring the disclosure of any document or information of which the appellant has no knowledge

You do not have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to figure out that when you go before a commission which is going to make a decision which affects you personally and how you will interface with other employees, and may have dire consequences as to whether or not your position will remain in effect, it is essential in 1992 and certainly for years to come that germane information be made readily available to the person in question.

Canadians would find it rather repugnant if many of them were aware that under this particular procedure, documents would not necessarily be included and verbal information, files of that nature, were not fully disclosed to the appellant in question.

That is wrong. It is terribly wrong. People might want to argue that this is not a court of law. I suggest through the Chair to members opposite that we are talking about a quasi body which has particular functions. In this day and age when employment opportunities are so scarce as a result of government policy which I know Madam Speaker does not agree with, it is even all the more important to make sure that our regulations pursuant to appeals certainly follow a due process in the rules of natural justice.

We are not asking for the moon. We are asking for such basic things as requiring the disclosure of any document or information of which the appellant has no knowledge or, in another incident, that has not been communicated to the appellant and on which the deputy head might rely.

It would be terribly, terribly unfair. If you are going to a civil proceeding or a civil trial and information is sprung at one side, whether it be the appellant in a particular case, if that information is not made readily available it makes it very difficult if not next to impossible to prepare a proper case in order to respond to some of the allegations and to some of the suggestions which may be forthcoming.

The second part of it is very very simple. It is obvious. Perhaps it needs to be underlined. The second part of Motion No. 45 reads:

> (b) prescribing a notice period of not less than two weeks in respect of the time and place of any hearing held for the purposes of the appeal.

Two weeks is basically 10 working days, if that is what we determine under the purposes of the regulations. Surely an individual who has been aggrieved and wishes to appeal that decision can have 10 working days or the equivalent of two weeks in order to prepare that appeal.

Those of us who have never been in situations or have had to go before a board which may adjudicate on our futures or how we interface with others workers in the work place might not find this to be overly important. I suggest to the Chair that when an appellant, an individual who has been aggrieved, has lost that and wishes to appeal that to a higher body, that individual may want to take, not an unreasonable period of time, but some time to reflect upon the decision in order to prepare a case which is reasonable, which is understandable and which they are comfortable with in presenting on appeal.

Therefore, it would seem to me that two weeks is not an inordinate amount of time to give to an individual who is aggrieved, has not been successful with that particular grievance and is now appealing that particular decision.

I want to share with the Chair that I would hope the rules of natural justice give the right to a hearing. It also implies that a fair hearing is a right. It would be similar if you, Madam Speaker, were to hear a point of order which was complicated in its nature and said to the House when 15 or 25 members wish to stand to make an intervention: "Well, I am not going to listen to anyone. I am going to make my decision". I think the regulations in part under this particular Motion No. 45 give the individual and the system a greater assurance that things will not be done in an arbitrary way. Notice and information will be provided so that proper and fair decisions can be made. After all, governments at the national level as well as at the provincial and municipal levels have to provide an example for the private sector and for the non-profit organizations throughout this country.

We are not asking for something which is totally unreasonable, out of line or unfair. I think it meets the test of being very reasonable and appropriate and also meets the test of rules of natural justice. I hope that members across the way will give careful consideration to the contents of Motion No. 45, keeping in mind that all of us from all political parties are interested in making certain that the professionalism of the Public Service is of a standard that cannot be questioned at any time.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee, and on Motion No. 45.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am going to be very brief on this particular amendment. It is important to say that this amendment is attempting to ensure, as previous speakers have said, that natural justice is done. Everywhere else in Canada we believe in the basic principle of natural justice. To put this into plain language, what this amendment calls for is that the employee must be told what the employer is going to use against him or her and you be told in sufficient time, two weeks, in order to prepare a response. It is as simple as that.

Both opposition parties would not feel so strongly in favour of this particular amendment and probably would have been satisfied with the government's clause on this had we not had a situation where three times out of the last nine years, in fact since the Liberals were in government, the agency responsible for the implementation of this act has been advised in reports that natural justice was not being served and they were failing very seriously in this regard. Three times in nine years they were failing and refused to protect in the most basic way the right of workers to a fair and open hearing.

I believe that clarifies why people on this side of the House are not satisfied to hear the government say: "We will protect the workers". We are asking for natural justice here, the right of a worker to have basic information about what he or she is being accused of and two weeks in which to prepare a response.

In our Canada that is not an outrageous or extreme thing to ask for, particularly with the track record of the commission.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, just before we take the question, I listened very carefully to my colleague from British Columbia. She served on the legislative committee and certainly contributed a great deal.

I just want to remind her and indeed all of us that the commission has committed itself to make regulations to this particular effect once Bill C-26 is through the House or is passed. It informed its members as of last April, so I think we have heeded some of this advice and some of the concerns that are there and indeed, this will be looked into and addressed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 45. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

An hon. member: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 47

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 31 by striking out line 42 at page 17 and substituting the following therefor:

""Chair" for the word "Chairman" wher-".

That Bill C-26 be amended by adding immediately after line 43 at page 17 the following new clause:

"31.1 The French version of the said Act is further amended by substituting the words "la présidence" for "le président" wherever the latter occurs in the said Act."

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 78

(a) by striking out line 37 at page 49 and substituting the following therefor:

"78.(1) The English version of the said Act is"; and

(b) by adding immediately after line 4 at page 50 the following:

"(2) The French version of the said Act is further amended by substituting the word "présidence" for the word "président", the word "vice-présidence" for the word "vice-président" and the words "suppléance de la présidence" for the words "président suppléant"."

She said: Madam Speaker, I do not wish to speak long on any of these amendments, but simply indicate the purpose of them. I have sat through a number of legislative committees and I have certainly spent enough hours, in fact months, on this particular legislation.

A good part of our discussion has been about equity and fairness and in regarding all people as equal, based on their ability to do a job. Until the legislation passed by this House reflects an equal treatment of men and women and reflects in its language that we do not discriminate on the basis of gender, it will be very difficult to change attitudes out there in society and in the work place about where women fit in society.

We have been very ad hoc in this Chamber about gender neutral language in our legislation. I am merely proposing language that is consistent with other bills that we have done. In fact, with respect to the French reference to la Présidence, that was a rare and welcome result of co–operation between government and non–government members on a previous legislative committee to come up with language that is equally gender neutral in French and in English. I would hope that notwithstanding the fate of these particular amendments, Madam Speaker, that you, and through you the Speaker, will take very seriously this issue of how legislation comes before the House so that it is consistently gender neutral.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported with amendments from a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Motions Nos. 51 and 53 are grouped for debate.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 51

That Bill C–26 be amended in Clause 32 by striking out lines 7 to 9 at page 19.

Motion No. 53

That Bill C–26 be amended in Clause 32 by striking out line 21 at page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"basis, unless the person has been so employed for a period of six months or more,"

She said: Madam Speaker, I want to speak very briefly on this and again on the issue of fair and equal treatment.

What this clause that I am proposing to amend does is define who an employee is for purposes of bargaining rights and any collective rights under the Public Service Employment Act.

One of the things it does is exclude part-time employees. Part-time employees and their access to full rights as workers is an important issue for women. It is an important issue for people with disabilities. Increasingly it is an important issue for all workers who are concerned about blending their work environment with their personal responsibilities. I think the government is well aware that in the private sector, as in the public sector, that is becoming a key issue on how one attracts and retains qualified productive employees. To exclude part-time employees from any collective rights whatsoever is archaic, to say the least. The government has taken one progressive step in giving part-time employees access to pension rights. It is also time to give them access to other rights as employees.

Motion No. 53 is a similar motion. In the legislation that is before us, "casual employees" are excluded from any rights. We previously debated casuals in the federal government. This legislation sets up a whole new group of employees that can be hired or fired on a moment's notice or on a whim. They have no rights. Nonetheless the legislation is set up so that they can continually, year after year, be working as casuals for the Government of Canada.

It is wrong to have casuals who may be with you year after year with absolutely no rights as employees. These would be full-time people who would have no benefits, no rights to grieve, no rights to complain if they have been dismissed, no matter how long they have been with the government. They have no right to appeal any action taken against them.

This leaves us open again to full arbitrary action by those who have control over their lives. In both these cases, a humane, fair and just work place requires that these employees have access to rights.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, once again I would like to say thank you to my colleague from Ottawa West. I do recognize some of her concerns.

Today, part-time employees who work more than 12.5 hours per week have collective rights. They have had them since 1967. That is not going to change under the bill.

We did make some extensions with regard to 3,000 and 4,000 employees who were previously excluded on confidential grounds unrelated to labour relation confidentialities. We have made some rights in that area.

We are speaking of casual labour. I know and understand the concerns that the people have, but the amendments with regard to casual labour in clause 16 of the bill provides that casual employees may be appointed for a period of up to 90 days. That can be extended, but in no case can they work more than 125 days.

This is consistent with many of the labour relations acts right across the country. We are being extremely consistent and we have recognized the concerns of our people.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for the government side of the House is absolutely right. The government is consistent. It is consistently mean-spirited and determined to take away every right that a public sector worker under its jurisdiction has, wants or should have under what we, as Canadians, believe are basic rights of working people.

It is quite misleading for the hon. member to say that part-time workers have had the right after so many hours for an indefinite period of time. Yes, that is true, but casual workers do not. There are casual workers right here in this building who have been working for the government for 20 years and are still casual workers.

They have no rights to vacation, they have no rights to collective bargaining protection, they have no rights to union protection and they have no rights to grieve. They have no rights, period. They have worked here for 20 years, and I can parade them out for this government any time it wants to know who they are.

The problem is that they are afraid to speak out. They are afraid to say anything because they have no rights. I am sorry if I sound a little bit uptight about this but it is a very important issue. It is time that workers who work for this government and this country get the protection that all workers should enjoy. They should not be treated as a different class of worker for endless years.

We are not talking about casual workers when it is 20 years. There is nothing casual about that. That is a lifetime commitment to this country and to this government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 53. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville—Court Challenges Program; the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke—Westray Mine; the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—Montreal's Economy; the hon. member for South West Nova—Fisheries.

Ms. Joy Langan (for Mr. Riis) moved:

Motion No. 55.

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 32 by adding immediately after line 41 at page 19 the following:

"(2.1) That the definition of "grievance", other than paragraphs (a) and (b), in section 2 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted:

"grievance" means a complaint in writing presented in accordance with this Act by an employee on his or her own behalf or on behalf of the employee and one or more other employees or by a bargaining agent acting on its own behalf or on behalf of one or more employees, except that".

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 32 by striking out lines 42 to 45 at page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) The definition of "grievance" in section 2 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted:

"grievance" means a complaint in writing presented in accordance with this Act by an employee on behalf of the employee or on behalf of the employee and one or more other employees or a complaint in writing presented in accordance with this Act by a bargaining agent acting on its own behalf or on behalf of one or more employees, except that".

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, it is really important that we start to see the pattern emerging here. We are starting to see a pattern of amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act that include things like endless terms for casuals, with no willingness to take a look at the unfairness of that, and clauses such as those we have just had motions on that take away workers' rights and allow the government to transfer people with impunity. All the way through the discussions on this in the community hearings, in the committee meetings following that, in the clause by clause debate in committee, and now in the House we consistently see that paternalistic big brother attitude of trust us, trust the Public Service Commission. It said it would do it years ago and it still is not doing it.

It is important that we start to view this document for what it is, and that is a mean-spirited, nasty document that is designed to take away rights. It is designed to set the pace because what happens in the federal government service sets the attitude and the pace for federal jurisdiction collective bargaining and federal jurisdiction corporate attitudes.

It is important too when we address the amendment regarding grievances to be very clear on what this motion is about. It would bring the rights of public sector workers into line with the rights of private sector workers. It is not a lot to ask, not an unreasonable request. That is in the area with regard to grievances.

As it currently stands, the Public Service Staff Relations Act without this amendment does not allow unions to have policy grievances. This motion would remedy that omission in the act. If the representatives of the worker are truly to be regarded as partners in the work place, as we have heard so vociferously from the government in the past couple of years about the partnership in the work place, the unions then must have the right to pursue work place issues which affect their membership and even in the absence of an individual griever.

Why would the union have to have the right to pursue a grievance in the absence of an individual griever, one might ask. Because in many instances a worker is too intimidated because of threat or fear, it may be unfounded fear, of reprisals if he or she grieves against the employer.

This amendment allows the union, on behalf of that worker who is afraid to grieve, the right to grieve on his or her behalf. That is all this amendment does. The government has decided in its wisdom this is another right that we are not prepared to allow our workers to have.

This is not a new concept in the labour relations field. It is something that private sector workers enjoy under labour codes across this country, including the Canada Labour Code. If you work for the government, you do not have the rights that a worker in the private sector under the Canada Labour Code has.

Given the restrictions on collective bargaining already faced by the unions in the federal public sector, this motion is a very small step toward the recognition that the workers and their representatives have the right to seek and receive a determination of their rights. It is about protecting an individual worker and ensuring that every opportunity is there so that an aggrieved worker with no fear of repercussion can grieve.

It is not a frivolous motion. It is not intended to open the door to a flood of silly grievances or bum beefs. It is a serious amendment that would ensure a worker has the right without fear of recrimination to grieve that he or she is protected. It is also a motion that would provide the union with the right to a policy grievance if the worker did not like the working conditions but it was contrary to what has been agreed to in the collective agreement.

I would ask again that the government take this particular motion into account as being a fair-minded one and when we vote on these motions on Monday would support this amendment.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to repeat what has already been said by my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam. However, it is time for the Public Service Employment Act to come a little closer, for its own employees, to rights enjoyed by every other worker across this country. The issue of the individuals who are afraid of reprisals if they stand up for their rights is a very real one. It is becoming even more crucial because of the amendments in this piece of legislation before us.

We have talked earlier about casual employees who will have no rights. A whole new classification of employees is being created in Bill C-26. We have talked about deployment, which is going to apply, ultimately, to virtually any appointment within the Public Service except the initial hiring. There will be virtually no right to appeal or complain against deployments which can move one from here to Halifax, from Halifax to Vancouver, from one department to the other, up the scale or down the scale of salaries. Because of those deployments, opportunities to advance and fear of being demoted will depend on the goodwill of the supervisor, there is going to be even more reluctance than there is now to complain in an informal way or launch a formal grievance.

It becomes even more important then that public service employees have the ability to complain or launch a grievance on behalf of a group of employees who are all affected, rather than each of them having to individually launch a grievance and be subject to reprisals.

One may say that does not happen. We have wonderful managers and that simply does not happen. The whole grievance procedure ensures it happens. The whole hierarchy in the Public Service ensures it happens. I have seen complaints from people about harassment that drag on month after month after month, going up the line from a supervisor who is responsible to a supervisor above him or her. Each one simply reaffirms the decision taken at the previous level. That is the way it works, let us be honest.

People stop making complaints, accept unjust treatment and are subject to reprisals when they do complain or grieve. If any of us are listening to our constituents who are Public Service employees, we know it happens. That is why this ability to take a collective agreement is essential if we truly want a public service where harassment and reprisals against people for standing up for their rights are not the rule but the exception. Then these amendments to the grievance procedure are absolutely essential.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West) moved that Bill C-330, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents in Hamilton, the victims of crimes and their families, the 55,000 Canadians who have signed the petition in support of Bill C-330, and on behalf of the regional municipality of Waterloo, the corporation of the city of Cambridge, the corporation of the city of Kitchener, the corporation of the city of Hamilton, the Canadian Police Association, the Ontario Police Association, and the Ontario Police Chiefs, it is an honour and a privilege to rise in this House to debate second reading of Bill C-330.

As many of us watch and participate in the House today and as many of the Canadians who have written to me are watching and are aware of this debate, the bill rose out of concerns of victims of violence. It arises from the multitude of tragedies and unspeakable anguish of victims of violent crimes, be they the victims of an assault or the parents or spouse of a deceased victim who have lost faith in our system of justice and want change.

Let me be clear at this point on their aspirations. These victims of violent crimes do not want to get even. They are not looking for any kind of revenge. They want a system of justice to take into consideration; first, the views of the victim of a violent offence as it relates to the sentencing of the individual charged with an offence, and second, the protection of the public from violent offenders.

It is truly amazing from the many, many town hall meetings I attended with members of families who are themselves victims of violence that these families are not out for money. They are not out for revenge. They just plain and simple do not want to be victimized again. They do not want others to go through the same tragic circumstances they have had to live through.

Victims of violent crimes and hundreds of thousands of Canadians know that despite the changes made to date on parole legislation through Bill C-36 and the codification of existing legal practices and conventions through Bill C-90, this is just the first step. So much more can be done to address the concerns of victims of violence.

Back in March 1991 I met with members of the Edwards family in my Hamilton constituency office. The Edwards family are the victims of a most brutal crime. Sitting across from me was Michelle Edwards who watched as her parents were murdered in their home. With her was her brother-in-law, Terry Smith, who has been a valuable friend and confidant and someone who has helped me construct this bill from that very first visit back in March 1991.

They were in my office just a week after Michelle's parents were murdered. Their fear at that point, a week after that murder, was that there was a good possibility they had heard that the murderer of Michelle's parents, if convicted of the crime, would be released from prison in as little as 15 years. In fact, their fear was that if convicted the individual would be eligible for escorted day passes. There were questions as to how the murderer was out on bail. He was charged with a violent offence at the time and was out on bail. The very woman sitting across from me in my Hamilton constituency office had watched this individual murder her parents while out on bail.

Upon completion of the six week trial the individual in question was convicted of two counts of first degree murder and one count of attempted murder. As it was described to me the Edwards family truly believed that the individual would serve the rest of his life in prison for these crimes.

In fact, when they came out of the court room after having sat through all that trial and having watched the individual be convicted of his crimes, people were coming up to them and saying: "Congratulations. You will not have to worry about him anymore; he is in jail for the rest of his life with no chance of parole". To their horror and in fact disgust they painfully learned that not only would this individual serve just one sentence for all three convictions, or as Michelle put it to me: "He killed my mother. The death of my father and the attempted murder of me were freebies". He would be eligible for full parole in just 15 years. In fact, under the current law he is eligible for an escorted temporary absence today.

If that crime had happened to any of us sitting in the House today, how do you think we would respond? From the beginning Bill C-330 was a response not only to this personal and tragic case but it also became a focus of bitterness and sorrow following the murders of Nina de Villiers, Kristen French, Leslie Mahaffey and Kayla Klaudusz. All these shook southern Ontario specifically in 1991.

Before explaining the details of Bill C-330 to this House I want to explain the government's legislative initiatives for the public. This is all necessary in order to highlight the fact that even the most recent amendments to our laws fall very short of the types of amendments victims of crime and the cause of public protection deserve.

Bill C-36 introduced by the Solicitor General in October 1991 and proclaimed in June of this year is in essence a reshuffling of the deck of parole and the related provisions of the Criminal Code. What I mean by this is that the bill was heralded by the Solicitor General in the following way: "The act contains significant measures to reform the legislation. Above all, these measures assert that the primary duty of the corrections system is protection of the public". In fact, Bill C-36 did attempt to comfort the victims of violence but what it did not do was assure those victims of violence. What it did do is create more laws but not enough justice.

How about those dangerous offenders, offenders who are convicted and sentenced to federal prisons for offences such as sexual assault, aggravated sexual assault, assault with a weapon and murder? Violent offences. The changes to legislation with respect to these offenders were not the types of changes that would benefit public protection.

For offences other than murder, offenders are eligible for full parole after serving one-third of their sentence. If the National Parole Board considers an offender fit for parole they can be paroled. However, under a provision of Bill C-36 called statutory release at two-thirds of their sentence, offenders must be released from prison.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if certain offenders have not been released at the one-third point of their sentences because the National Parole Board considers them unfit for full parole does this legislation meet the test of public protection if they must be allowed full parole after serving just two-thirds of their sentence? No.

The government's bill fails the test of public protection. It is nothing short of a farce. It has been allowed to trumpet this bill as representing the paramountcy of public protection. Nothing could be further from the truth.

At the time of passage of Bill C-36 we in the official opposition called on the government to simultaneously provide sentencing legislation because we cannot have one without the other. Finally it produced Bill C-90 which we on this side of the House believe also fails the test of public protection.

What does this House know about our system of justice and parole? The House recalls the case of Daniel Gingras, an inmate at the Edmonton institution who escaped while on escorted temporary absence to the West Edmonton Mall. It was deemed to be for rehabilitative reasons. He was allowed to go to the mall because it was his birthday.

Daniel Gingras was able to convince the warden of the penitentiary to allow him to go with an escort smaller than the larger burly escort who was scheduled to take him. He escaped his guardian's custody and while at large from prison murdered two people and later was convicted on two counts of first degree murder.

There are so many other examples, all violent criminals, all individuals who are convicted of murder or rape. Daniel Gingras as we mentioned on escorted temporary absence in the province of Alberta, went on to murder two more people. Alan Légere on medical temporary absence in New Brunswick went on to murder four people. Patrick Mailloux on day parole in New Brunswick went on to murder one more person. Joseph Fredricks under mandatory supervision in Ontario went on to murder one person. Melvin Stanton on day parole in Ontario went on to murder one person. David Rose, out on day parole in Alberta went on to murder one person.

How about the latest? I have 18 names here, Mr. Speaker. My time is short. How about Dean Cyr? That is a name we have all read in the papers just recently. While out on parole in the province of Alberta he murdered two more people.

A man who gunned down nine members of a Saskatchewan family and sentenced as Canada's first mass murderer has been released from Penetanguishene hospital although the public was not informed. Is this protection of the public?

Again I ask my colleagues in this House to put yourselves in the shoes of the victims of violence. Are these not frightening examples of how the justice system has failed victims of violence? These situations which I have outlined are only the thin edge of the wedge. They represent only a fraction of the cases where violent offenders are released from prison on day parole or temporary escorted and unescorted absences, who have committed violent crimes and Canadians feel powerless to do anything about it.

As a former Alberta crown prosecutor, Scott Newark, has noted, a list of offenders he recently compiled shows that in the last five years 19 offenders were found to have been responsible for 22 murders while on some form of parole. As Scott Newark noted, Canadians should be made aware of these incidents because he wants them to know that they are not the exception to the rule. They occur much more frequently. He wants Canadians to know that these are not cases of offenders falling through the cracks because if they were, these cracks are as wide as the Grand Canyon.

Under Bill C-330 I believe that Canadians can feel secure. Unlike Bill C-36 and Bill C-90, Bill C-330 does protect the public. It provides public protection and the rights of victims as its paramount objectives. Under my bill, victims of violence will have rights, rights not considerations.

• (1710)

The victims of violent crimes or their families or their spouses, if the person is deceased, must be consulted throughout the judicial process. It is not much to ask. When an offender is arrested, the victims must be notified of his or her release on bail. If the offender commits an act while out on bail, he or she will be incarcerated pending trial.

Victims of crime will be consulted all the way through the trial. They will be present at pre-trial hearings, where so often the plea bargaining process that Canadians hear about will be curtailed because the victim's statements must be taken into consideration and lesser charges will not be traded off to dispense with the case.

When the offenders are convicted, victims of crime must be notified of any change in incarceration of that inmate. Victims would be notified of the day on which an inmate was scheduled for parole, the days on which the inmate would be absent on escorted absence for rehabilitative reasons, and any escape of the offender.

With respect to unescorted or escorted temporary absences, for violent offenders convicted of sexual assault, aggravated sexual assault, assault with a weapon, and murder, Bill C–330 would deny day passes and escorted or unescorted absences. Bill C–330 would keep those violent offenders in jail until they were eligible for full parole. If they wanted to be released on a day parole or on an escorted or unescorted temporary absence for humanitarian or rehabilitative or medical reasons, they could get it. But that decision would have to come directly from cabinet.

This is what we are talking about. We are talking about public protection and accountability. Members of the National Parole Board are seen as somehow isolated from the concerns of Canadians, and perhaps they are in many respects. Certainly we have many examples of that. This bill would make our elected cabinet responsible for releasing offenders and make the system accountable. Is that not what Canadians are crying out for today? They want accountability.

Bill C–330 would deny parole to offenders convicted of first degree murder. The law currently states that the remedy for persons convicted of first degree murder is life in prison with no chance of parole for 25 years. This bill would remove eligibility for parole. Life would mean life. For the thousands of victims in Canada who want real protection, life means life.

That may be harsh, and I know some members in this House would find that too tough. I have spoken to the Edwards family. I have consulted with them and I said, look, there may be members in the House of Commons who might not agree with you, and in fact may not allow—if you can imagine for a moment—this bill to go on to committee stage for a full and frank discussion, because of that particular motion. The Edwards family said fine, then tell them.

We go to committee stage and just maybe we can discuss it, and if it is too harsh then what we can do is not have life mean life, but maybe we can put forward the position that if an individual is convicted of three murders then that individual gets a 25 year sentence for each of the murders. In our current system, if I go out and murder someone, then another one, and another one, as happened to the Edwards family, I go to jail for one term of 25 years if convicted. So it was a freebie for me that I murdered her father. It was a freebie for me that I almost murdered Michelle. All these are freebies, because I will only go in for 25 years. Then I will be eligible for a reduction by parole to 15 years. I can apply.

Is there anyone among us here tonight who would say that we are not even prepared to discuss this issue at committee stage? I would like to seek the unanimous consent of this House that at the conclusion of this debate, at one minute to six, to move Bill C–330 to a legislative committee in the departmental envelope.

I thank you for that consideration, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my colleagues in the House of Commons for their attention. I know they have received mail and petitions. I thank the victims of violence who participated in the process of this bill: the Edwards family and the Smith family who consulted with me and helped me structure this bill. I also thank the legal clerk of the House who helped me put this bill together. I thank all those people who took pen in hand, in all the communities across this country, not just Ontario, and put their signature to a petition that said: "Please, at least give us the opportunity to have the open discussion at committee stage".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to read that to the House and get consent.

The member seeks the unanimous consent of this House to move Bill C–330 to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, what I am asking for is that you move that motion at the conclusion of the frank and open discussion in my private members' hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So you want the unanimous consent at the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. Keyes: Yes, thank you.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, thank you for letting me speak today in the debate on Private Member's Bill C–330. It seems that the criminal justice system has held a place of prominence in the House in recent months. The Minister of Justice has sponsored legislative reform in the areas of sexual assault, gun control, young offenders, extradition, mental disorder, and sentencing. The Solicitor General has done his share in legislative reform with amendments to the Criminal Records Act and sweeping reform, indeed the complete replacement, of the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act through Bill C–36 which has created a new Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

Far be it from me to say that any legislation, no matter how newly minted, is perfect for all situations. It is our duty as legislators to remain vigilant for changing circumstances that may require the reform of existing laws and we must be alert to inconsistencies and anomalies in our laws that may give rise to injustices. The private member's bill is a mechanism by which reparative measures can be suggested—and sometimes enacted. I need not remind hon. members that the persistence of the hon. member for Mississauga South in the matter of pardons had much influence on the recent initiative which revised the Criminal Records Act. I am a great believer in the importance of those items debated under Private Members' Business.

The bill before us, standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West, seems to fit right in with the recent government reforms in the area of criminal justice.

I fear however that Bill C–330, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Parole Act, asks us to reconsider items that could have been included in Bill C–36. Indeed, many of these points were reviewed extensively by witnesses and parliamentarians in the process of passing Bill C–36.

As all hon. members probably know, Bill C–330 was referred to the Standing Committee on Private Members' Business, where all parties are represented. Upon review, it was determined that since this bill did not have unanimous support in the House of Commons, it would not be put to a vote at second reading.

I know that some tragic events in and around the constituency of Hamilton West have put tremendous pressure on the hon. member and on us all to find solutions to problems in the field of criminal justice.

The public reaction to recent deplorable and senseless crimes is quite understandable. Canadians' efforts to urge the government to make changes are commendable. However, I think that several of the amendments proposed in the bill are already in the new Corrections and Conditional Release Act, while some of the other proposed measures do less for victims than this legislation.

In the limited time available to me, I would like to show you how the government has already addressed many of the key issues in Bill C–330. I think that hon. members will then see that the bill before us as it is does not reflect the best interests of the Canadian public.

The new Corrections and Conditional Release Act came into force on November 1, 1992. It provides a comprehensive set of rules governing how a prison sentence is to be served and when and how release will take place.

This legislation makes it clear that public safety is the paramount consideration in all correctional decision-making and provides explicit criteria for correctional and conditional release decisions. The legislation provides authority and direction to correctional staff and officials and informs offenders of the nature of their obligations and rights, as well as the limitations on those rights.

It promotes more effective exchange of information concerning offenders between correctional authorities, the courts, the police and officials responsible for release. Of great importance is the specific authority it provides for the release of pertinent information about offenders to victims of crime. This is also a key feature of Bill C–330.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the new law provides better protection to victims and involves them more in the correctional and conditional release process. Its provisions for use of victims' statements and for sharing information are not restricted to certain categories of offences or to certain decisions. Bill C–330 is restricted in these respects, and would exclude certain victims from participating in these ways.

The new act allows for victim input at all points in the correctional process. Similarly, it allows victims of any criminal act, not just the few crimes listed in Bill C–330, to request specific information on offenders.

The CCRA goes even further, in that it permits the National Parole Board to increase public access to parole hearings by giving it the authority to decide who may attend them as an observer.

This will allow more members of the public, including victims, to attend hearings and will help open up the parole process, demystify it and promote accountability in parole decisions.

A number of elements in Bill C–330 are not compatible with the new act and therefore should not be supported. For example, Bill C–330 would restrict certain types of conditional release for certain violent offenders. Of course the government endorses the principle that violent offenders should be more closely scrutinized and more stringently dealt with than non–violent offenders. That is at the heart of the CCRA. However, the government also recognizes that gradual, structured, controlled release of offenders is in the community's best interest. Eliminating certain types of conditional release for those offenders who most need a structured, controlled return to the community makes no sense to me.

We must remember that not only full–time release to the community is involved. We are also talking about short–term releases whereby offenders can obtain therapeutic treatment in the community when such treatment is not available in the institution.

Surely that type of release, where the offender does not pose a risk, is in the best interests of both the public and the offenders. Yet Bill C–330 would abolish that type of release for those offenders who need it most.

The bill also proposes that certain temporary absence passes be approved by cabinet rather than by the National Parole Board. The Solicitor General commissioned a comprehensive outside review of the temporary absence program as part of the reform of the correctional system. Nowhere in the report, which was written by a panel consisting of a lawyer, a former member of Parliament and a former police chief and which endorsed the temporary absence program subject to a number of recommendations, did they recommend that authority for temporary absences be turned over to cabinet.

If a temporary absence program is to be effective, it must have decision–makers who are familiar with the individual offender's case, and it must be able to respond to situations where, for example, an offender requests a pass to attend the funeral of a family member being held within a day or two. Requiring such requests to go to cabinet would be extraordinarily cumbersome and completely counterproductive to the aims of the temporary absence program. If accountability for decision–making is the issue, I would suggest that there are better ways of achieving it.

The central objective of the CCRA is increased public protection and restoration of public confidence in the system. The problem of crime will always be with us, and the debate will continue as to how best to deal with convicted offenders, especially those convicted of violent offences. We must at all times remain attentive to public concerns about crime and criminal justice.

[English]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be here this afternoon to make my contribution to this debate on Bill C–330, standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West.

For a long time we have been dealing with a very serious and tragic problem in our society, and that is the increase in the number of violent crimes being committed day by day across this country. There is a very real fear that unless we adopt the appropriate measures, the criminal element within our society and our society itself will become more and more like our neighbours to the south.

At the outset of my brief remarks I want to remind the House that the Americans have gone the route that Bill C–330 to some extent wishes to go, the turn the lock and throw the key away approach to violent offenders.

If longer sentences or lifetime sentences would bring greater security to our neighbourhoods, I would support it. Also the United States would probably be the safest country in the world in which to live. Unfortunately, that is not what happens. There is no correlation between longer sentences and diminution in the number of violent crimes in society. Surely we have to look elsewhere for some of the solutions. I am suggesting that there are no solutions to this problem that will totally eradicate violent crime. I know the hon. member appreciates that as well.

For example, this bill would completely eliminate parole for offenders convicted of first degree murder.

• (1730)

I know that many of these murders, in fact most of them, are heinous crimes, they are horrible crimes. The member knows that some of the perpetrators will never be let out. I am quite certain that Clifford Olson is there for the rest of his life. There are others like him in there.

Take for example the 12 who are out right now as a result of the 15-year judicial review. Not one of them has reoffended. We have people in this country today who were convicted of capital murder under the old system who have never reoffended. Indeed, if you take all the convicted murderers as a group in our prison population, when they are released they have the lowest recidivism rate of any group in our prison system.

I know that it almost sounds cruel to use these statistics and figures if we are dealing with an individual personal tragedy. Words, arguments, debate or laws cannot bring back loved ones. They cannot erase the horrible memory of that terrible, heinous crime and I am not suggesting for a moment that anything we do in this Chamber can accomplish that. I am asking and pleading for a reasonable objective approach when it comes to altering the laws with respect to violent criminals. I am convinced that violent criminals should be kept in jail much longer than they presently are. The one-third can now be increased to one-half of sentence.

I told the Solicitor General in the justice and solicitor general's committee that if he wanted to raise that to 75 per cent of the sentence, I would support him, provided that the government was prepared to improve the programs for these offenders when they were behind bars and provided the programs were made adequate for all of them.

You know what happens now. They get thrown into prison, they sit there and vegetate for about one-half, two-thirds or three-quarters of their sentence and then in the year before they are to be released they are zipped through a program and out the door they go, not fully prepared for the street.

One of the basic tenets in our criminal justice system and in our prison system today is that history has proven it is safer for society to gradually release violent offenders and even some sexual offenders. They should gradually be released into society rather than keeping them there for five, eight or ten years and then throwing them out cold turkey on to the street without any preparation, without any training or rehabilitation programs and without any supervision.

When the warrant expires, they have done their time and they are out the door. Some of them are cunning enough to know that they do not want early parole. They would rather wait until termination of sentence so that they could go out without any supervision. That is the time to make sure you gate them and bring them back in. That is where I would like to see this bill become operative.

I am supporting this bill at second reading because I want it to go to a committee. I want it fully discussed because there are a lot of things wrong with our criminal justice system today and there are a lot of things wrong with our present parole system which Bill C-36 incidentally, does not address. I sat through all those hearings and as far as I am concerned, it was largely a sham.

Let us take a look at some of the statistics on temporary escorted and unescorted leaves. The successful completion rate in this country of unescorted temporary absences is 99.28 per cent. This is not an exact science. We know that if we are going to have a system where they are gradually released into society, unfortunately and tragically, someone is going to reoffend.

It is not an exact science. We do not have a 100 per cent guarantee, but when the unescorted temporary absence success rate is 99.28 per cent that is pretty good. In fact, it is one of the best in the world.

Escorted temporary absences are 99.97 per cent successful. It takes only one to rape, murder, strangle and kill an innocent girl, a loved one, a mother or a father. It sickens the whole community, but I do not know how we square that with keeping them all behind bars for the entire sentence so they come on to the street totally unprepared. I suggest to you it could be worse. I am not saying that it would be. I am saying it could be worse than these statistics would otherwise suggest.

There should be "no ETA for humanitarian or medical reasons unless approved by Governor in Council". Between 1975 and 1986, the National Parole Board released 52,484 inmates. I really do not know how a cabinet could handle that kind of workload. They would end up taking the advice of the National Parole Board anyway. As a practical measure I do not think it would work. It would be rubber stamped through the cabinet and they would be on parole anyway.

While I use that figure of 52,484 inmates who were paroled in those 11 or 12 years, only 63 of them where serving a sentence for capital murder, which would be similar to murder one today. Of those 63 who were serving a sentence for capital murder that were sentenced before 1976, only two were sent back because they had committed an offence against a person.

If we try to look at this as dispassionately as we can, we come to several conclusions. First, the system is not perfect. Second, the parole system is extremely effective and very successful when compared to other jurisdictions, for example in the United States or in Europe. It is not perfect but it is extremely good. Third, how do we get around the issue of gradual release into society if we are going to throw the key away and keep people in jail for the rest of their lives, particularly in the case of those convicted of first degree murder.

Sometimes even the worst human wretch in society is capable of reformation and rehabilitation. We have living examples of them today in our society, where they have been rehabilitated and have come back to live useful lives.

Could you imagine what prisons would be like if we had lifers in there with no hope of release ever? Could you imagine what life would be like for prison guards, for other inmates and for other people working in the prison environment? It would be an intolerable situation.

I look forward to further discussions on Bill C-330. I thank the member for Hamilton West for presenting this bill. I hope it will go to a committee so that we can give it a thorough airing.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to comment briefly on Bill C-330.

First of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West who introduced this private member's bill in the House. As you know, I seconded the motion for second reading, which does not mean I agree with all the provisions the bill contains. In fact, if that were the case, we could rid of the process we have here in Parliament—second reading, study in committee and third reading—and just fine tune the changes made in various bills during consideration in committee.

My point is that although a member may disagree with one or two sections of a bill, this is not sufficient reason to reject the entire text, at least not at the second reading stage.

At third reading, if members of this House are still convinced the bill was not satisfactorily improved in committee, the process will take its course.

[English]

That is not what is before us today. This is discussion in principle. This is second reading. The discussion in principle is on the topic whether or not violent crime victims and their families should be allowed a greater say. That is the fundamental principle behind it.

Yes, some provisions of the bill are perhaps harsh. I will get to those later. With this bill there would be an automatic provision for victims to provide an impact statement for their families. That is something we badly need.

• (1740)

[Translation]

The hon. member for Charlesbourg told us earlier that it was now possible in some cases for victims to provide this kind of impact statement. That may be true, but it is not automatic. It is optional, as a result of recent amendments to Bill C-36. With Bill C-330, if I am not mistaken, this privilege would become a right. I think that symbolically this is very important.

[English]

The member for Brant spoke of the lock the door and throw away the key approach. I know he did not suggest that was exactly the purpose of the bill, but that concern does exist. Nowhere in this bill does it say criminals are not to be rehabilitated while they are incarcerated.

There is nothing in the bill which precludes that from happening, nor is there anything that precludes the rehabilitation of criminals right now, even though it is not done sufficiently in my view. To that extent, I share the view of the member for Brant that criminals are not adequately rehabilitated at the present time.

We do not have a bad record as a nation in that regard, but that does not mean to say it cannot be improved. We should do more.

On the other hand, the rights of the victim and the rights of the convicted criminal are on a pendulum and I believe at the present time that pendulum has swung quite a bit too far in the direction of those who have committed the crimes. The victims are neglected, or at least not being treated as they should.

[Translation]

That is why I welcome the opportunity to support this bill. I hope that later on all members will vote for the bill at second reading, not so that it can be rushed through the House and get Royal Assent and come into effect tomorrow morning—members opposite know better than that—but so that it can be referred to a parliamentary committee that will give the proposed legislation thorough consideration, amend the bill and improve it as all bills should be, especially government bills, which often need improving. It is certainly not unusual for a bill to require some changes at the committee stage.

Personally I think the section that says someone who has committed murder should never be allowed to leave prison is too harsh. However, I believe the present legislation is not strict enough. Of course there will be adjustments in committee, as the hon. member for Brant mentioned. By referring the bill to a parliamentary committee, we will have a chance to talk to a number of people who advise us and make recommendations.

[English]

In terms of whether or not cabinet approval should be sought for releases, I find it unusual that some would say cabinet approval would be a form of rubber stamp. Perhaps that is so, to a degree, but the accountability is still there.

I remind the House that right now, for instance, thousands upon thousands of people in this country are landed immigrants through the same process of Order in Council approvals. You see stacks of them in the Canada Gazette all the time. Why is that not just left to administration? Because there is a form of accountability there. When the system goes wrong we can ultimately, as the custodians of the rights of the people of this country, ask questions in this House. That is one of the reasons why that is there. The fact that cabinet ministers' staff advise them to make recommendations does not particularly bother me. I do not expect the minister to physically enter the penitentiary and start interviewing all the candidates before they can go to their mother-in-law's funeral or something. Obviously that is not going to happen.

I do think the level of accountability has to be increased, notwithstanding the fact ministers will likely have staff to assist them. That staff will probably end up being either the Parole Board or a similar instrument, but the accountability will be there and nowhere will people be able to say: "It is not my fault, the Parole Board acts independently".

[Translation]

I also wish to see prisoners gradually released into society and I think that the member for Hamilton West feels the same. In other words, those who are released must be better prepared when they come out of prison.

We also want the victims' rights and those of their families to be respected. I feel we have neglected the victims' rights over the last few years and even the last decades, and in saying this, I want in no way to put the blame on one minister or one person in particular. I just feel it is time we did something for the victims.

I ask all my colleagues here today to allow this bill to proceed, at least up to the committee stage, at which time we shall give our verdict.

[English]

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to speak this evening on Bill C-330, a private member's bill, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Parole Act that was moved by the member for Hamilton West.

Numerous petitions were distributed around the country and here a Conservative member of Parliament is allowing a petition to go into his office that was forwarded to a Liberal member of Parliament. I can assure you that has only happened once, that I can think of, in my office.

Though we often disagree on many issues, when the member for Hamilton West first mentioned this issue to me there was an initial amount of support. The member has explained the benefits he sees in the legislation and there are many principles I can support in this bill.

I think this bill represents the many discussions that take place in this country in barber shops, coffee shops and variety stores when people are buying their newspapers. This is one of the issues they do talk about.

This bill does have some weaknesses. Regarding crimes of violence, for example, I think there is a need for a more comprehensive list of violent offences. I also think there is a need to more stringently define those measures rather than those that apply to non-violent offenders. We have to make that distinction.

I do not think the member for Hamilton West would object to having this discussion take place in a parliamentary committee. When it comes to victims' statements, I congratulate the member for clearly putting in the bill that the definition of a victim includes: "any relative of that person".

We should go further with the section relating to impact statements. It is important to expand the categories of offences for which victims' statements can be used. It is also important to expand when victim impact statements can be used for detention reviews. I think we should go even further and ensure that victims are given the right to attend the parole hearings. Those are the ways I think this particular provision can be strengthened. The member for Hamilton West may disagree with some of these views, but I think he would welcome an open discussion in a committee where not only other MPs but witnesses can come forward, discuss their concerns and get victims' statements from those who are victims of violence offences.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell talked about the releasing authority and the fact that it may require cabinet approval. I think that might be too restrictive, but again it is something that can and should be discussed in committee where we can discuss the views of the Parole Board or whoever makes the decisions to ensure that there is public safety. In many ways I think I would like to keep the politics out of those subjective decisions.

In the city of Cambridge, like the member for Hamilton West has indicated, there are many instances. I have a series of newspaper clippings that relate to a couple in Cambridge that are well respected in the community, Doug and Margaret Pollington. This is a Cambridge couple that have been battling their own life sentence since the day their son-in-law killed their 29-year-old daughter and two children aged five and six in 1976.

Since August 1, they have been playing a waiting game because the son-in-law becomes eligible to apply for a judicial review after serving only 15 years of his life sentence. The concern that the Pollingtons have is that there is no time limit for when the review must be applied for. Although the victims cannot currently make a statement or express their feelings about the review board, they must wait around for the prisoner to apply for a review.

That statement was recorded in the press before the passage of Bill C-36. Bill C-36 does allow victim impact statements. That legislation is too new to really make a valid comment on its effectiveness. The Pollingtons did recognize that indeed Bill C-36 could help them. After the passage of Bill C-36 there is a belief that maybe Bill C-36 could have gone further.

In this particular case Mr. Pollington admits that his main reason for getting involved with a petition on this legislation is because he wants to make sure that his own family is protected from the man who has already killed three members of his family. As he presented the petition around the city, he did not hide the fact that the clause stating that a life sentence for a person convicted of first degree murder should mean life and that for people convicted of first degree murder no day passes, escorted or unescorted, should be issued. He did not hide that particular fact.

Mr. Pollington and his wife appeared before Cambridge city council and received support for his petition. He went to Kitchener city council and also received the support of the council. Subsequently, he went to the regional council of Waterloo and also received the support of that council.

There were a few members of the regional council and city council who voted against it. Their reasons were the same reasons I would like to see it go to committee, so that there would be frank discussion. The people of Correctional Services for example could come forward would then explain and have an educated debate. Both sides would then understand where everyone is coming from. Councillors that did vote against it said they were hoping that when it comes forward there can be debate and we can hear from all sides on the issue.

Doug Pollington has also gone out to the high schools, not to solicit signatures for his petition but to discuss the Parole Act and specifically the victims' role, victims' statements and their importance. He has gone out to the schools. Hopefully the information that the kids are getting in their law classes will make them consider changing the law in the future. Again, he is not trying to recruit students into joining him or becoming involved with this petition, but he thinks it is important that they have an understanding of the effects the system does has on victims of crime.

He started out hoping to gather some 8,000 or optimistically 10,000 signatures on his petition. In the Cambridge area, 18,000 have signed his petition supporting Bill C-330.

What is happening here is that Mr. Pollington's petition is speaking for the people because he realizes how much the Cambridge community, like every other community, is upset and has concerns about the Canadian justice system.

I respect the role of the Standing Committee on House Management. I am tempted to stand here and say that I respect its judgment. However, I am suggesting that I disagree with its decision because it limits debate today.

I believe this is an issue that deserves discussion in committee because the general public want to have an open discussion on this. I think the bill can be improved, but more important, the principles must be discussed. There is a need to openly discuss why the rules should be tightened up for allowing temporary absence from prison.

I hope the next time I have a chance to speak on this bill it will be in a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, given the reason we are elected is to serve our constituents, to provide for them the opportunity of a full and frank discussion and given the support I have from my colleagues in the Liberal Party, the New Democratic Party and my colleagues in the Conservative Party, I seek unanimous consent for the second reading motion on Bill C-330 to be put to a vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I find it indeed unfortunate that the member for Charlesbourg would not give consent to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that is not a point of order. It is a point of debate.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity tonight to expand a little bit on the question I posed to the minister of fisheries on the permanent quota transfer which I am not sure has commenced yet, but I have certainly seen an application for permanent quota transfers sent to people in my riding. At the time the minister answered that he was not aware this was going on and said that he would ask his department to look into it.

A lot of people in my constituency would say that this is what the policy of this government has led to and that there were no alternatives for the fishermen and the fish processing companies in the area than to go to a permanent quota transfer.

What it does in my estimation is that where we had temporary transfer of quota between the fishermen and companies in the last two years we will now, in other words, have a permanent transfer. I have not been able to find out who actually controls the fish for 1991 or 1992. That is just one area of concern I have. Do the companies control it now or do the fishermen control it?

It used to be that if a fishermen could go out to fish, the companies locally would be able to process that fish, sell it and the local economy would be very good. As you transfer the fish from the fishermen over to the companies, you are now going to have some companies that cannot pay so they will probably not be able to purchase that quota. Other companies will be able to pay or banks will be involved in purchasing that quota.

Basically, I can guarantee that most of the fishermen will not be able to individually purchase a share of that quota. It will have to be a company. A bank will recognize that companies have assets and this will become one of its assets.

Where is the fish going to be processed and where is the company going to end up if it gets into difficulty? Will it end up a company in Newfoundland catching fish in the southwestern part of Nova Scotia, or a company coming and catching the fish in a part of southwestern Nova Scotia and bringing it back to Quebec to be processed if our companies get into trouble in the future. It has happened repeatedly on the east coast that companies have got into trouble. Look at National Sea, Nickerson's, and the companies in Newfoundland.

I also want to say there is another aspect to this. I do not think the government or the department of fisheries will ever be able to manage or control stocks. As most of the people in this House know, since 1988 one of the first things I asked was to have an in depth evaluation of the stocks in Scotia–Fundy, particularly in the Bay of Fundy, 4VWX, evaluated so we knew the condition of the stocks. They have not done that, they continue not to do it, and yet now, with these individual transferable quotas to fishermen and to companies, we have a fishery that goes on year round. As long as you can prove you have access to some quota you are entitled to be out there.

The fishery is going to be fished out by somebody. I know some fishermen who cannot afford the penalties and who will only fish four months. They see a boat out there that has less individual quota than they do and is fishing year round. Where is the management? Where is the enforcement? There has to be a very real concern.

I hope tonight I am going to have an answer from the parliamentary secretary as to why the minister is going that way and why he is allowing the fishery to leave. I see it happening in the future. I see it happening even now, companies not processing groundfish. It will just be processed in certain areas and maybe even leave our area.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I was in the House the other day when the hon. member raised her question with regard to permanent transfers of individual transferable quotas and maybe I can clear up some of the confusion, or try to.

The operating guidelines developed for the Scotia–Fundy ITQ program permits the transfer of ITQ between fishermen and companies. These guidelines were developed in consultation with the industry and implemented by the department at the industry's request.

The possibility for the Scotia–Fundy ITQs to be caught by fishermen from other provinces was raised on the 17th. I wish to clarify that the ITQs can only be transferred between the 450 participants in the program, all of which are fishermen from the Scotia–Fundy region. You must remember this region includes the southern part of New Brunswick and that ITQs could be transferred from Nova Scotia fishermen to New Brunswick fishermen.

The reverse is true as well. It is also believed that these new guidelines are going to be quite favourable to the southwest Nova Scotia fishermen because throughout Atlantic Canada they are recognized on an average as being the most prosperous and truly the most entrepreneurial.

It would be expected that the fishermen from the west Nova Scotia area could get more fish and more jobs and over-all the ITQ program does not discriminate. Indeed, it was implemented by the industry in consultation with the people involved.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to refresh the House's memory on the question, and what I believe were the inadequate answers given to my questions regarding the Westray mining disaster.

The questions were raised last May 22, and the disaster of course took place on May 9 of this year.

I just preface my remarks by quoting the last verse of a miner's lament, a rather well-known one called Dark as a Dungeon.

> I think when I die and the ages do roll My body will harden and turn into coal. As I look through the door of my heavenly home I will pity the miner adigging my bone.

A lot of miners in Nova Scotia, around Pictou County and throughout the country are simply not satisfied and their bones will not rest until they get some clear answers from this government.

Why did the federal government, which does not normally make major investments in mining operations, take a risk not only with public money but with the lives of Nova Scotia miners in this operation? The government suggested it had every reason to believe and understand it would be a very high risk operation. Why did it not take extra measures to ensure that the Government of Nova Scotia and the agencies directly responsible for mine safety were doing more than the normal routine run of the mill job to ensure the safety of the people who would be working in that operation. This mine likely would not have opened without the major intervention of the Prime Minister and ministers of the Crown, and would not have happened without the federal money that was later expended.

In my question on May 22 I pointed out that according to the engineering consultants for the Bank of Nova Scotia, the construction of the Westray coal mine was one of the most rapid they had ever seen. It is extremely fast to achieve an underground mine in 10 months; normally you are talking years instead of months.

That information was available to the government. Other information as explained by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was available to the government. In spite of that, the construction of the mine went ahead.

Since then we have had the Nova Scotia inquiries cancelled; we have had charges laid. It is possible still for the federal government to answer the legitimate needs of these miners and their families and launch their own federal inquiry quite in keeping with the ruling given by the Chief Justice of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court in dealing with why this operation was allowed to go ahead with massive infusions of federal money, in spite of the warnings.

That is what those mining families want to know. That is what this House has a right to know. Whether it is a public inquiry or a committee of this House, those families deserve answers and we intend to keep pursuing this government until those answers are forthcoming.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Westray mine disaster was a sad day, not just for the people in that particular area of Nova Scotia but for all Canadians. The hon. member knows the federal government does not have jurisdiction in the area of occupational health and safety. This is truly the responsibility of the provincial government.

Notwithstanding this fact, the Government of Canada took a variety of measures consistent with our role as financial guarantors to ensure that the project was technically viable.

The initial environmental assessment, the Acres report, pointed out the key health and safety concerns associated with coal mines and the methods that the company was putting into place to overcome these concerns. All concerns, including those pointed out by the Associated Mining Consultants Inc., were deemed to be correctable with known technology. The CANMET review spoke briefly of mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion risk and concluded that in spite of these technical uncertainties, the proposal had no major technical barriers.

• (1810)

Westray was required to comply with all appropriate coal mining regulations in Nova Scotia, including those dealing with mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion matters and regular provincial mine inspections were carried out.

We put in place steps to ensure the company was in full compliance with the provincial regulatory standards on health and safety. This was monitored on a monthly basis by an independent mining consultant. All of these facts were taken into consideration before the federal government made the decision to fund the project.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions since May 8, 1992, I have raised in this House the issue of the economy of Montreal and its unacceptably high level of unemployment.

I asked the government to explain why it continually refuses to participate in an infrastructure repair program to stimulate job creation in the greater Montreal area.

The idea of this program was put forward by the Liberal leader and supported by the mayor of Montreal and by the Quebec government. The only thing missing is the federal government's participation.

We Liberals believe that a job creation program of this magnitude is necessary for Montreal. When I asked my question on May 8, the unemployment rate stood at 12.9 per cent. Since then there has been no improvement. In fact, the situation has worsened.

Let us just look at the past year. According to Statistics Canada, there were 186,000 officially unemployed people in greater Montreal. That figure does not take into account those who have simply given up looking for a job because they are completely demoralized. Today there are over 204,000 unemployed people in the region. This, in my opinion, is far from an improvement.

According to a report prepared by the economic studies service of the Mouvement Desjardins, the Montreal region has lost no less than 60,000 jobs since the fall of 1990. During that period, 17,000 workers lost their jobs in manufacturing, 10,000 in retailing, 9,000 in the financial sector, and the list goes on and on.

The President of the Treasury Board would have us believe that his government does a lot more for the Montreal region. If that is the case, why is the region economy deteriorating so much? The average rate of unemployment now stands at 16 per cent, and in the east end of the city it is as high as 25 per cent.

The minister refers to the aeronautical and pharmaceutical industries. I recognize that these are important and make a great contribution to the economy of Canada and of Montreal, but they do nothing for those workers who have lost their jobs in construction or manufacturing.

According to the Commission de la construction du Québec, the unemployment rate in that industry is almost 50 per cent for the province, and more than half of the workers affected are in the Montreal area.

We Liberals believe that a program to modernize our infrastructure would greatly help get the construction industry and the economy in general back on track. So even if the aeronautical industry benefits some sectors of the economy, it would be irresponsible to think that it is the solution to all our unemployment problems. As well, it would be irresponsible to neglect those individuals who have lost their jobs in manufacturing or construction. An infrastructure program would help those people directly.

On May 8 and again today I asked the government to explain why it continues to refuse to immediately implement this infrastructure program that would get the economy going. We are well aware that if you get the construction industry going, the rest of the economy will follow. We could put people to work and these people will spend and pay taxes. Thus, the government will also get some return on these important investments for the economy and the social fabric of our country.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that, in spite of the particularly gloomy picture he has just drawn of that area, Montreal can nevertheless rely today on a very modern manufacturing sector. This sector has progressed markedly, especially over the past decade.

Take for instance the aircraft industry, where 40,000 jobs were created in the Montreal area during that period. There is also the electrical and electronic products sector and that of machinery, chemical products, plastics and rubber, as well as the petroleum and printing industries. All these sectors have been extremely productive in the Montreal area.

All these sectors are growing rapidly and provide secure, well-paid, new jobs in the metropolitan area as well as new technologies.

However, it is obvious that what we need most in Montreal right now is to broaden this modern and promising manufacturing base and to broaden it at least enough to offset the job losses up until now as well as those anticipated in waning traditional industries.

Therefore, our role in government is to support this manufacturing base as part of a concerted effort, with a consistent development strategy relying on the Montreal's strengths.

As we know, two programs have been implemented in Montreal recently, the IRPEEM and the IRPSWM, that the hon. member is very familiar with. These have helped support major investments as well as creating thousands of jobs in the area.

Mr. Speaker, I want to reassure the hon. member for Saint-Léonard that government has indeed taken the action he is requesting concerning the Montreal area. Also, government is planning further action, in consultation with the business community, the municipalities and the provincial governments, to ensure that Montreal remains a major player not only in the economic development of Quebec but also in that of the whole country. I am convinced that his party will support the Montreal area development initiatives we will be putting forward.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In accordance with Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow, at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing 24(1).

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation and has lost the confidence of this House and of the Canadian people and that, therefore, an election should be called forthwith, in accordance with the Canadian custom, practice and tradition of holding a general election at least every four years.

He said: Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to address this very important subject. I am sure all Canadians will listen carefully to today's debate and will reach the same conclusion I did: this government should call an election now. That would be a great idea.

I can hear the Tories opposite heckling, although the debate has barely started. Perhaps members opposite feel uncomfortable about this motion and don't like it. Are there any Conservatives opposed to this motion? Ah, the heckling has stopped, so we can assume they support it.

I move this motion today because I feel we need an election. The government has been in power four years, and according to Canadian tradition, four years is a full term. So it is now time to call an election.

Tomorrow will be the anniversary, not a happy occasion, of the election held on November 21, 1988. Bearing that in mind, it would be appropriate to call an election now, and there are two reasons for this: first because, as I said earlier, this government's time has run out and, second, because the government no longer enjoys the confidence of Canadians.

[English]

I have here a newspaper article which I would like to read. It is dated yesterday. This is not something I said. This comes from a totally objective source, The Toronto Star. This source quotes the Gallup organization. It states:

The Gallup organization says that the Conservative Party today enjoys the support of 22 per cent of Canadians.

The Liberal Party enjoys the support of 47 per cent. I say to my colleagues: "What do you think of that?"

As bad as 22 per cent might seem, they had an even worse level of support some time ago. Now the end-dippers, or the New Democrats as they are sometimes called, enjoy the support of a large number of Canadians, namely 14 per cent.

• (1010)

I say to the cousins of Bob Rae, 14 per cent is certainly all they deserve. The deform party—the Reform Party has the support of 11 per cent of Canadians. That is about 12 per cent too many. I say to the large contingent of the deform party—the Reform Party—present in the House right now that is more support than it deserves.

I notice some members across do not think that there should be an election called right now. I can detect that from their remarks.

I want to quote Hansard of December 9, 1983. Let me read the following quote and see if we can guess who said it: "The government should honour that fundamental British tradition in this country which calls for an election not in five years but within four years so that the people can judge the action of the government".

An hon. member: That sounds like Brian Mulroney.

Mr. Boudria: Was that not well said? As far as I am concerned, those are immortal words. They are immortal words.

December 9, 1983, let us listen to this quote now: "I tell you it does happen that a government sits too long. It does become exhausted and bankrupt of ideas". Were those not fine words?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Boudria: My colleagues all think they were fine words.

Let us hear a motion that was introduced in the House on December 9, 1983, by the then member for Central Nova. The then member for Central Nova in December 1983 just happens to represent the riding of Charlevoix today, and of course he is the Prime Minister, at least temporarily.

Here is what the then member for Central Nova said in December 1983. Listen to this, Madam Speaker, and I say to my colleagues: Pay attention because we will ask questions later. "This House regrets to inform Your Excellency that the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the social and economic affairs of the nation and has lost the confidence of this House and of all Canadian people, and therefore requires that an election be called"—listen to this now—"in accordance with the Canadian custom, practice and tradition of having a general election at least every four years".

Was that not well said? It was a brilliant remark from the then member for Central Nova. I say that if the then member for Central Nova, today the member for Charlevoix, was right in 1983, he is still right today. I am sure he will vote for my motion.

In a television interview right about the same time, the then member for Central Nova, today the member for Manicouagan—I am sorry for Charlevoix. I apologize to the member for Manicouagan. I in no way wanted to put to him to the level of the Prime Minister right now. It probably constitutes a question of privilege for him to have been so insulted, but I apologize to the member.

In a television interview in 1983 the then member for Central Nova said: "This is a country where historically a parliamentary majority has governed for four years or less, not more". Well said, eh? There is more. I can assure that there is more. Let me continue.

On October 1, 1988, there was an election launch statement at Rideau Hall. We all remember that day. The Prime Minister called the election and then turned it into a free trade type of referendum which he was losing in the beginning and then got all the big corporate sector to bail him out. He finally won on that, although all Canadians were disappointed and we are all suffering from the lost jobs since then.

In any case, here is what he said on October 1, 1988: "It has been a Canadian tradition to call an election after a government has completed four years of a mandate". These are not words that the Prime Minister attributed to another party. He attributed that to his own government. His own government's mandate had expired after four years. The Prime Minister said so at Rideau Hall.

I am sure the Prime Minister told us the truth, as he always does, particularly when he speaks from Rideau Hall. There you go. Times change, and the Prime Minister's opinion changes from time to time. I wanted to put this as nicely as possible. Professor Jean-Luc Pepin described this uncanny knack of the Prime Ministers in the following way some years ago. He said that the Prime Minister suffers from an acute psychological need to embellish the truth. That was put very kindly. Anyway, the Prime Minister later had a modification of his opinion. Here is what he said:

[Translation]

"We are one year away from an election, and we will have time to discuss it". That was October 24, 1992, in an interview with the Journal de Montréal. Amazing how the Prime Minister's position has changed. On October 24, 1992 he decided that his government's term would be five years instead of four, although in 1988 he said that the government's term would end after four years.

An hon. member: And he was right.

Mr. Boudria: Of course he was right. We supported that at the time. In 1983 the Prime Minister said the previous government's term was up after four years. If it were true in 1983 and 1988, considering that today most Canadians would like to get rid of the present government, it is still true in 1992. Why did the Prime Minister change his mind? I have no idea. I have some more quotes.

[English]

These quotes are just excellent. I am sure they will be appreciated immensely.

A former member for Mississauga North, Alex Jupp, said this on October 19, 1979. We all remember Alex Jupp, of course. I see all my colleagues nodding in the affirmative. He said: "The dates for the calling of a general election should be prescribed every four years. We should not give prime ministers the right to play games with the electorate, with political parties and the lives of those who offer themselves for public office".

Brilliant, is it not?

Here is what the then member for Simcoe South, Ron Stewart, said in 1982. We all remember him, particularly francophones like myself. I remember him fondly for his support of APEC. I remember Mr. Stewart very fondly.

An hon. member: Was he one of the dinosaurs?

Mr. Boudria: He was a prehistoric creature, but he was not a dinosaur. He said on May 4, 1983: "As long as there is an alternative time to an election, the Prime Minister is able to pick and choose the time most favourable to him. His own interests become paramount, not those of the nation. There is always the temptation for the Prime Minister to use his power to retain power or to promote party ends, even though such ends may not be in the public good".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boudria: Ron Stewart said that.

Now let us hear what the member from the other place, Lowell Murray, said. We all know Lowell. Here is what he said on February 24, 1984: "After four years, Canadians are entitled to have their say about the government. After four years, Canada is entitled to a general election. For all practical purposes, after four years the government's term has come to an end".

I cannot wait till tomorrow because it will be four years. By the time we vote on this motion on Monday, the government's term would have expired two days prior, according to Lowell and according to the Prime Minister, according to his many pronouncements, save and except of course the one that he made recently. I know on that particular day he probably was not thinking straight.

Now let us hear what Professor Peter Hogg, professor of law at Osgoode Hall, said about all this in 1985. Listen to this eminent professor of law at Osgoode Hall. He said: "It is not the practice of the Canadian federal prime ministers to allow the House of Commons to continue until the expiration of the five-year term". It is very important. A professor of law says that the usual practice is for the Prime Minister to select what he regards as a propitious time for an election and to advise the Governor General to dissolve the House in time for that election.

• (1020)

Clearly the professor of law says it is not supposed to be five years. The Prime Minister said it is supposed to be four years. I say let us do it. Let us do it now. Canadians cannot wait.

[Translation]

I would now like to comment briefly on this government's record during the past nine years. Not a happy task, but it has to be done. I would like to quote a number of Conservatives. I know it is cruel to do this first thing in the morning, Madam Speaker, and I realize that you are objectivity itself, but I am afraid that just the same you will have to listen to all this. This is what was said.

In 1988 the Minister of Finance at the time said: "In three and a half years our economic achievements have been spectacular. Our policies and initiatives have created the successful economic climate we enjoy today". I wonder whether he could say the same today.

This is what the Prime Minister said on October 27, 1988, believe it or not: "My government has worked hard to promote our national interests, and we have bolstered our national sovereignty in various ways by putting our financial house in order". Imagine, we can hardly take that seriously.

Here is what the Prime Minister said in December 1983. Hon. members will recall that in December 1983 he called for an election because the previous government was already four years old or just about. In fact, the government had not been in power for four years at the time. The government was elected in February 1980, so its term would not have expired until two months later. However, according to the then hon. member for Central Nova an election had to be called. I will read the quote.

[English]

Here is what the member for Central Nova said at the time: "The problem with the Government of Canada, as presently constituted, is that it has lost the confidence of the people. Confidence is very fragile and difficult to define. Once you have lost it you can never recapture it. Once you have betrayed your word or you have let people down you have an enormous problem ahead of you".

Let us call an election. Let us do it now. That is what the people want. That is what I want. That is what my constituents want. Let us do it.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the member's comment about four years ago. I was wondering if he would take his mind back to the majority government led by the hon. Pierre Trudeau who was elected on July 8, 1974 and did not bother going to the country until May 22, 1979; pretty close to 4 years and 10 months later.

Then maybe he could also take his mind back to the government of the right hon. Pierre Trudeau, elected on February 18, 1980, who did not bother going to the country until September 4, 1984; a little over 4 years and 6 months.

He will appreciate the four-year period expires on November 21, 1992, but that is in the middle of the winter. Surely we must also take a look at the time of year. It would be absolutely too ridiculous to try to run a general election through the winter.

We ran one through the winter in 1980. It was a heck of a hard election to run. I won that election, but wandering through snow banks trying to put signs up in frozen ground and trying to knock on doors at that time of year was impossible.

All I have to say to the member is: surely some common sense must prevail on the other side. Surely they have some more reason to demand an election. Maybe the reason is as declared by Mr. Hurtig in The Toronto Star this morning, wherein he said that while the Liberal Party has 47 per cent in the Gallup poll, its support across the country is only one-sixteenth inch deep. It is soft, soft, soft.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, those were excellent questions.

I want to say to the member that it was his leader who, on at least three occasions, said that he would call an election every four years. He even said, about his own government, that its time expired four years and about two weeks after it started; actually it was four years and 26 days the last time. That is when the election was called. The Prime Minister himself said that his mandate had expired.

Mr. Milliken: So did Lowell, and he is an expert.

Mr. Boudria: So did Lowell, and he is an expert. Far be it for me to contradict Lowell.

The member across the way does not think we should have an election in winter because it is inconvenient. Let us ask Canadians which they prefer: having an election in winter or keeping the Tories until spring.

I know what they want. They would gladly put up with an election in winter if it means getting rid of those people across the way.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I first of all wanted to congratulate my colleague who made a presentation that is worth looking into very closely.

[English]

It was a well researched, comprehensive, insightful address. Whether we agree or do not agree with my colleague I think we have to acknowledge that he has proven beyond doubt that if the Prime Minister and his minister and advisers were to be true to themselves they would be calling an election.

But there may be another reason why an election should be called. This week has seen an unprecedented number of government fiascos: unemployment, which is at record highs and continues to climb; interest rates that continue to climb; the deficit and the debt which are out of control, if we look at the newspapers today; the airlines crisis which we have all experienced in the last several days; and the fisheries that are on virtual brink of collapse. Canadians have lost faith in this government. They have done so for some time now and they want an election.

While I acknowledge that my colleague has proven without doubt that if the Prime Minister and his key advisers were in fact true to the statements they have made in the past they would call an election, there is another equally important reason, perhaps deeper reason. I have given some examples of a government being unable to manage any more. I wonder if the member would care to react to that.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, as usual my colleague is quite right and very insightful.

He indicated quite accurately that the people want an election. That is quite true. They do not just want it because it is something neat to have. They want it because this government is unable to govern any more, if it ever was.

My colleague has given examples of this government's lack of ability. There is one that is even deeper than the ones he mentioned. To me it was the report on child poverty that we saw earlier last week that over a million children were living below the poverty level and the fact in this country we have more food banks than we have McDonald's restaurants as we are speaking today. All that reflects in the support the government has.

I enumerated the level of popularity of the government at the beginning of my remarks. The reason why the people no longer want this government is not because they are simply tired of it or they do not want to look at it any more. It is because it is unable to govern. That is why the present government has less than half the support the opposition has.

There is a reason for that. The reason, as I say, is not just because people are fed up looking at them. It is because people do not think that the Conservatives can govern, and they cannot. Furthermore, according to the Prime Minister, his term has expired anyway. Therefore, as they say, let us not wait for spring; do it now.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I think the debate today should be extremely serious. It is one that concerns each and every one of us in this House.

The first 10 minutes of the hon. member's time were specifically related to remarking on various polls and the idea of polling and elections. Why do we not get down to the specifics?

There are problems. I am one who will acknowledge there are problems with regard to the economy and social conditions. I would hope that today maybe all of us would enter into a debate where we could share ideas, look at specific problems, and how we could reallocate funding in regard to helping those people who are really in need.

If the member is calling for funding cuts in certain departments so we can help those people in need or for a boost to the economy by helping people get educated or better trained, I am willing to listen to him; but I do not think we want to spend the day shooting arrows at one another. Why do we not work together to resolve the problems?

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, the member might not like the fact that we are quoting the Prime Minister. Perhaps it is unfair to quote the Prime Minister using his words, or maybe she thinks it is unfair, but it is too late to repent. The mandate is up, not just according to me or according to our tradition, but more so according to the Prime Minister himself.

The mandate has expired. No death-bed repentance will do any good for the member across the way or her colleague, the minister over there, or any one else. Time is up. Call an election. That is what we need to do right now. That is what the people want.

It is clear this government no longer has the moral authority to govern, the authority according to the Prime Minister to govern, or the level of support necessary to govern. It has to call an election according to the rules it has set down for itself.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I really looked forward to participating in this debate today. It is a very serious one and one to which I want to contribute.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell asserts that the government cannot provide leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation and that there has been a loss of confidence in the House and with the Canadian people.

I find this extremely unfair and incorrect. It makes me realize more than ever that many of us in this House, indeed the hon. member and some of his colleagues on the opposite side, have lost touch with reality and what makes this country tick.

What makes this country tick has a great deal to do with revenues in and moneys out. Therefore, let me just start with regard to moneys in and moneys out. If we turn to the 1982 budget presented by the Minister of Finance we find on page 98 the budgetary expenditures. They are listed there. With regard to major transfers to persons including old age security, unemployment insurance benefits and family allowances, there is $42.3 billion.

Let us look at other major transfers to other levels of government. The EPF goes to health care and post-secondary education in the provinces, the CAP provides 50 cents on the dollar for social services in the provinces, and equalization in transfer payments help those provinces that perhaps do not have the revenues or the ability to raise funds to provide similar or basic services across the country. The federal government transfers in the area of $24.1 billion. Add those up. It comes to $66.5 billion, which is two-thirds of the amount of money we as a government will be expending in the year 1992-93. Along with that, payments are made to Crown corporations and defence, international assistance and government operations. The total spending is $119.4 billion. The public debt charges are $40.2 billion. Therefore the total spending will be $159.6 billion.

We cannot get away from servicing the debt like my friends in the NDP would like to do. At the same time we have to take a look at the money that comes in. Revenues come in from personal and corporate income tax, UI, sales and excise taxes, the goods and services tax. Those revenues go to help service the debt and pay down the deficit along with other revenues.

The budget estimate was $132.1 billion. We are in a recession, as is the rest of the world, and money is not coming in. Therefore we have a deficit, a major problem. Why do we not get to the basics of how we can reallocate funding to help those people really in need and get the economy moving in this country?

Let us start with the United Nations. The United Nations placed Canada first in the world based on factors such as life expectancy, education levels and our purchasing power. It ranks us ahead of other nations known for economic strength, such as Japan and the United States. All of us have to recognize, especially in the year of our 125th birthday, that Canadians are really proud of our country.

I learned during the referendum debate that Canadians from coast to coast are proud to belong to this country and proud of our achievements. They all want a good future that includes ten provinces and two territories. They have confidence in this country and in this government to exercise and show the way to a brighter future. But there are no simple solutions and no magic formula. We have made very tough decisions to make sure the economy did stay strong and could provide the social services that are needed. They could be sustained but we have to improve them.

Look at what happened during the 1970s and the early 1980s. Money was borrowed to pay for programs. That was the the decision of Liberal government of the day, and rightly so. It felt it could borrow money to provide programs. It went from a surplus in 1969 which was in the area of about $300 million, to a deficit in of about $38 billion in 1984. The Liberal government was providing programs to the people of Canada on borrowed money.

When we came into power we had to turn things around. Today we do not borrow money to pay for programs. Our programs are all paid for by revenues that are taken in. In fact, we had a $29 billion turnaround. However, it is not enough mainly because servicing the debt is costing us more and more. However, we have made major decisions since 1984 to show leadership and to deal with the economy. It has not been easy.

The economic renewal agenda that was set out in 1984 has been followed consistently. We have never lost sight of the major goals of deficit reduction, helping those in need and making this country prosper.

The first thing we did was to get rid of the National Energy Program that really devastated us in the west, specifically Alberta but also Saskatchewan and British Columbia. The energy and transportation sectors were deregulated at the insistence of the people who lived in the west, who were paying unfairly. Spending restraints were put in, as was deficit reduction. The unemployment insurance program was reformed. Tax reform and free trade initiatives were brought forward. We also initiated NAFTA, which is a trade agreement with the United States and Mexico.

• (1040)

All of these have been on our agenda for eight years. This is the kind of leadership that Canadians want. Canada cannot have strong social policies without a strong economy.

We understand that these go together. They are two sides of the same coin. The best social policy that we can have in this country is to give people the skills and the tools to go out and work and help themselves.

We have to have a population that is healthy, that is confident, that is productive and able to respond to changes, to new opportunities that are happening globally, not just here. Good social policy is not always about new programs, more programs, more money. It is about giving Canadians the tools, the knowledge to get on with the economy and in our society.

We defined our goals and we defined our policies early on in 1984–85. On the economic side we have created new opportunities. We have made regulatory changes. We have made trade arrangements. As I said, we reformed taxes and we have had some good sound fiscal management.

Let me just talk about the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, the FTA. Everybody on the other side debated against us and fought us.

An hon. member: We were right.

Mrs. Sparrow: You were wrong. You are absolutely wrong and the figures are there to prove it. We are a trading nation. I would say that 30 per cent of our revenues depend on our exports. We either export or we do not sustain the standard of living that Canadians want. We have to change with the global community in order to move on so we can not only build the better widgets, we can trade them more effectively, more efficiently and we can beat our competitors in the market. That means markets all around the world.

Our exports to the U.S. have increased by $15 billion since we brought in the FTA. That is up 9 per cent. It also translates into 200,000 jobs. The North American free trade agreement which is under debate today, known as NAFTA, is to expand upon that and it is to secure our gains and give us even greater opportunities, not just into the United States but into Central America, South America, Australia and New Zealand.

We are going to do tax reform. I recognize that. We did bring in tax reform for greater fairness for the entrepreneurs and business. If we do not have business operating, we do not generate the wealth to support the social services and programs that we want to provide to Canadians.

We brought in the GST, which replaced the old manufacturers' sales tax. It levels the playing field so the manufacturing industries and all industries can meet the competition of our imports.

We privatized 22 Crown corporations. We downsized the government, cutting 46 boards and agencies and we have taken 92,000 people off the government payroll and put them into private enterprise.

Labour market policies have moved to increase the participation so that we all start working together. If labour, provincial governments, federal government, municipal governments, academic or educational institutions, municipalities, do not start working together as partners, instead of fighting one another, we are never going to win.

We have made many changes on the social side. We have made changes to help women and improve the employment equity programs. We have made changes for the disabled and especially those people who have physical problems as well as mental problems.

Canadians know not to throw away more money. Spend money more effectively, more efficiently so the programs can be delivered. The programs have to be examined. Many have been there for 20 or 25 years. Our world has changed. I am not saying throw them out. I am saying let us debate today and look at them.

Let us look at our health care system. We have the best health care system in the world. We have listened to the United States election debates over the past few months. The U.S. is looking at our health care system. It can be improved upon, and perhaps it can be delivered more effectively and more efficiently but that is an ongoing debate.

Let us look at our infant mortality. It has declined from 27 deaths per 1,000 to 7.2 deaths today. We have the best record. Life expectancies have climbed not only for the men but for the women as well.

Canadian research is contributing to new cures. We are looking at AIDS. We are looking at cancer, muscular dystrophy, cystic fibrosis and the disabled. We live healthier lives. Canadians are now eating better, they are exercising and they are even taking precautions to avoid sexually transmitted diseases.

On the poverty front we have made progress. Let us take a look. The number of Canadians living below the poverty line has declined by 1 million since 1984. The incidence of poverty among the elderly in the last 20 years has fallen dramatically. More has to be done, and I acknowledge that. We all have to work together to achieve it.

Important steps have been taken to combat violence against women, abuse against children and the elderly. With the four-year, $136 million family violence initiative that we undertook a few years ago, we have awarded about 15 research centres. There is one in Montreal and one through Laval University. There are others through B.C. and Moncton, New Brunswick and western Ontario to look at family violence, home violence and abuse against children.

With regard to my colleague, the minister who looks after the status of women, we have a task force looking at what is going on and why more families are having problems.

How about looking at children at risk? The minister of health and welfare some months ago brought down Brighter Futures, which dedicates $500 million with regard to the prevention, the promotion, the protection of children, working in partnership with all other levels of governments and the various agencies.

We are also looking at our aboriginal colleagues who have many problems, whether we are talking about drugs or alcohol abuse or family violence. There will be funding set aside within this program to help them come to the root of their problems.

We have shown compassion, maybe not enough according to my colleagues across the aisle, but there are children at risk and all of us have to deal with it.

Let us look at the child tax benefit package that will be implemented on January 1, 1993. It combines the family allowances child credit and the refundable child tax credit. It is going to put $2.1 billion more into programs that will assist families. This is an initiative taken by our government.

Mr. Milliken: It did nothing for the poorest.

Mrs. Sparrow: I am very sorry, you are wrong. This provides extra funding for those at low income.

If you are talking about those on social services and welfare, the provinces set the levels for that. If the federal government is going to increase its tax benefits or its social aid, the provincial governments lower it.

• (1050)

That is not fair. What I am saying is that it is time the province of Ontario started working with the other provinces and with the federal government so we can combat these problems and work together.

I wish I had a lot longer because we have made many inroads with regard to this. We know we are suffering. We know we are suffering from a global recession that has caused problems all around the world.

Let us take a look at this. It is affecting all families, specifically here in Canada in all our communities. It is affecting the industries. This has brought home to us the real truth about globalization and the need to trade and how international competitiveness is really the root of how to resolve some of these problems. Our future prosperity can only be guaranteed by higher productivity. How are we going to get higher productivity in this country?

The Minister for International Trade, through his prosperity report which has been condemned by some of the colleagues sitting over there, went to the people all across Canada. He had over 186 meetings with various Canadians on how to improve our productivity. It has to be labour. It has to be governments and it has to be the people all working together.

Do not continue to fight. Why do we not work together? This is what we have to do to resolve the problem. People have to stress education. We have to stress job training and greater training in order that the labour force can move forward, accept the technology and the scientific advancements and move into the 21st century.

Why is there a 30 per cent drop-out rate of students in high schools? That is unacceptable. We put into place programs to keep youngsters in school. One in four in the labour force is illiterate; they cannot read the manuals or operate the machinery they are supposed to run. More has to be done. Our private enterprise is taking on more responsibility but those people out in the business world have to realize, such as Japan has done, that time has to be set aside for continuing education in order to train labour forces working with the educational institutions so that they can upgrade and teach people to go out in the world and be more competitive.

We have education, training, job retraining, trade agreements to make us more prosperous and more competitive. On the social side we are already spending 66 per cent, two-thirds of our expenditures budget. We would like to spend more but the money is not there. What we should be discussing today is how we get the economy back so we can support the social programs that we have.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, we know today is opposition day and the Liberal motion is to remind us that there is a tradition to have an election every four years.

I am not quite sure what an election would do right now in the sense of changing things. I know the Liberals are thirsting for power. I know the Liberals for a long time have seen themselves at 50 per cent across Canada in the polls. They want to get into the little patronage deals that they can because they have been out of power for some time. I am sure they are going to be very effective at it. I recall when Mr. Trudeau stepped down there was an orgy of patronage and I do not think that Canadian memories are that short. They remember that as well.

Rather than condemn this government for everything and say it has done everything wrong, I would like to put in perspective what it has done because it has not done everything wrong. It has done some things right. I would like to speak on that.

First I would like to mention that we have two problems. We have a constitutional problem that we tried to deal with recently and we have a problem in the economic sense. Both of these problems are fairly inter-related. Looking at the constitutional problem, the government has taken a good stab at it. The government has tried. It has made some mistakes, but when you take a look at what it has tried to do with administrative agreements with the provinces, that has been a good tradition, both with Quebec and other provinces.

Administrative agreements mean that a province can have special agreements under the Constitution with the federal government, providing a kind of flexible Constitution. The provinces are not all treated the same and some have different needs. For example, on the east coast you may have the need for the UIC to be cognizant of the fact that there is a seasonal work force which is far different in fishing than elsewhere.

In the west you will notice there is accommodation that should be made for allowing western provinces to have the RCMP as their policing force rather than the extra expense of their own policing force.

This is a good trend. The government and governments before should be complimented for having this kind of constitutional approach.

I would also like to make a point as official languages critic about the Official Languages Act. I have been very much concerned about the money we spend for the Official Languages Act in areas where the translation of documents or translation services may not be required and may not be even necessary.

I was very pleased to see the government in the committee that was formed by the Minister of National Defence, I believe, dealing with the armed forces and the translation services and the use of French there, saying essentially we should use common sense. In a case where we had the frigates that were built in eastern Canada for approximately several billion dollars, $100 million was spent just in translation of those details of what the ships contain and their engineering points.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was wondering if the hon. member remembered that this is question and comments and he was not on debate, as the time is getting short.

Mr. Edmonston: I hope to conclude this comment in the next two minutes if I may. I believe it is 10 minutes for questions or comments.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been in the House for quite a few years and the period of question and comments is to be shared between different members and should be about the intervention which has just been heard in the House.

Maybe we should allow the hon. member to make a comment and the hon. member can by all means rise on debate or on questions and comments later on in the day. Four minutes have gone already.

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, I am not too sure of the question but if I could I would like to thank my colleague with regard to the tone of his intervention. What he has done is set the stage with regard to some things we have done right, some things we can do better and maybe some things we have done wrong. We all have to acknowledge that.

What I really like about his comments is that if we do not all start working in the same direction perhaps we will not resolve the issues.

There have been constitutional problems which have faced this country for a number of years but they have been highlighted maybe since 1982. There are great difficulties that we have tried to overcome with regard to the Meech Lake accord, which failed, and with regard to the Charlottetown accord.

Canadians did have the opportunity to vote on that last October 26. To resolve some of those issues, my colleague was talking about administration agreements with the provinces. I think one area that we really have to look at has to deal with the free trade in our country and this would have great progressive advantages to making us more prosperous.

Why should we have 500 trade barriers here costing us $6.5 billion every year, hurting us, when if we all started working together we could all succeed?

• (1100)

Madam Deputy Speaker: After Question Period and Routine Proceedings there will be three minutes of questions and comments, following the hon. member's intervention.

It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 35 the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STUDENTS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, all week we have been discussing the government's inability to manage the country, to govern not only the economy but programs for people.

Unfortunately in this debate students have often been forgotten. I need to remind people here assembled today that tuition fees have increased at unprecedented highs. GST on books is still a problem, and next week I will be reintroducing my bill to removed this tax. There is still a 3 per cent administrative fee on student loans, a tax on those who need money most. There will be six months extra interest for students to pay on their loans. There are taxes being paid on scholarships and bursaries.

There is a lamentable job situation. It was particularly bad last summer and it continues to be so. Students cannot earn money to continue their education.

All of this and much more increase student debt and student despair and prevent our young people from becoming employable in the future and contributing as fully as they could to Canada.

4–H CLUBS OF CANADA

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, recently the Government of Canada released Inventing Our Future—An Action Plan for Canada's Prosperity, a plan which emphasizes Canada's need for a strong learning culture.

Operating in our country for many years is an organization which has consistently promoted this same goal. I speak of the 4–H Clubs of Canada.

The 4–H Clubs work with rural young people who learn through club projects to focus on results to make learning continuous, to innovate with new technology and to be dedicated to personal development, community leadership and responsible citizenship.

Helping 4-H members acquire a positive attitude toward learning increases their knowledge and develops useful skills to equip our young people for the future.

There are 4-H Clubs across Canada, nine of which are located in my riding of St. Albert. The national 4-H organization is committed to assisting our young people to become confident and capable citizens of tomorrow.

I salute all 4-H Club members, volunteer club leaders and sponsors across this great country of Canada.

RAIL TRANSPORTATION IN ABITIBI

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, Quebec's economic development depends on developing its regions, in particular its outlying regions where its main natural resources such as wood and various industrial minerals are found.

The railway lines must be saved and integrated with the basic rail system in Quebec and Canada in the long term.

The Canadian government must maintain passenger transport to Abitibi—Témiscamingue. Crown corporations like Via Rail and CN should look more closely at regional development, by transferring the decision-making centre for our region from Montreal to Senneterre.

TRAINING AND ADJUSTMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, last night the Prime Minister tried to make a grand announcement about government money for the training of unemployed workers. His announcement at a Tory fund raising dinner in Toronto only reminded us of how terrible the government's record for training has been in Algoma this past year.

Training dollars were cut by 75 per cent, from $2.5 million to only $600,000 this year, even though a thousand workers were laid off at Denison Mines last spring.

Recently 75 training positions were approved to start next year. Then the government cancelled these until the local community agreed to provide 25 per cent of the training costs.

The government shut down the Denison Labour Adjustment Centre in August and is closing the Community Adjustment Centre next month, even though some 3,400 people have been laid off during the last couple of years.

Shutting down these community adjustment centres is simply shameful. I call on the government to reinstate in 1993 the funding that was provided last year for training and adjustment programs.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired.

HEALTHY EATING

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Madam Speaker, I wish to commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare for releasing Canada's Food Guide to Healthy Eating. This food guide has a new name, a new look and a new approach to healthy eating.

The food guide is targeted at Canadians four years of age and older and is based on the nutrition recommendations in Canada's Guidelines for Healthy Eating released by Health and Welfare Canada in 1990.

The food guide was developed by conducting consumer research and by consulting with a broad range of stakeholders, including health professionals and their associations, universities, voluntary organizations, the private sector and governments.

For 50 years the food guide has been a popular and widely recognized resource on health eating for Canadians. We should all join Health and Welfare Canada and its partners in bringing the new healthy eating message to Canadians.

RAIL SYSTEM

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, at what point will the government wake up and intervene to save the Canadian rail system from extinction?

This week the CPR applied to abandon everything east of Sherbrooke, Quebec. CN is trying to sell five freight lines in Ontario and has struck a deal with Burlington Northern to have 50,000 rail cars go directly from Edmonton to Chicago, eliminating jobs in Winnipeg and other points along Canadian lines. Not so long ago we were protesting CP Rail by-passing Winnipeg with potash shipments. What is next? What is so efficient about the growing marginalization of parts of the Canadian system at the expense of cities like Winnipeg and the people who live and work in such cities?

If we add to this the ongoing Tory conspiracy against Churchill, and the way that Liberal and Tory deregulation has put so many airline jobs at risk in Winnipeg, one wonders just what has to happen before the government wakes up to the fact that there is nothing efficient about destroying the economic base of places like Winnipeg.

Efficiency is for the sake of people. People do not exist for the sake of efficiency.

BREAST CANCER

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, every year in Canada there are more than 5,000 deaths from breast cancer and approximately 15,000 new cases of breast cancer are diagnosed. Breast cancer is the most frequent cancer among women. It is a killer.

This week the Royal Bank of Canada contributed $500,000 to the corporate fund for breast cancer research. I want to applaud its generous donation and to congratulate the Royal Bank on taking the initiative in this matter. I would encourage other corporations to join with the Royal Bank and with all other individual Canadians who want to meet the challenge and conquer this disease.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, last night the Prime Minister began his election campaign by making new promises on the economy. Just as in 1988, the Conservatives will promise the world but will do nothing to improve the everyday situation.

[English]

Canadians have heard this same old song before and they just do not believe the Prime Minister any more.

Four years ago he said that his government would be fiscally responsible, yet our deficit is projected to be $34 billion. He promised adjustment programs for workers displaced by free trade, yet nothing has been put in place and 1.5 million people are out of work.

[Translation]

Canadians have had quite enough of the Prime Minister's promises, and they will let him know that during the next election by electing a party that can keep its promises, the Liberal Party.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank and congratulate the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Canadian Armed Forces for keeping 3,000 kilograms of cocaine off Canadian streets.

The day before yesterday, in a high altitude drama, two Canadian CF-18s intercepted a drug laden aircraft in Canadian air space. RCMP detachments in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, joined by Canadian Forces officials, tracked the plane as it flew over New Brunswick.

The suspects fled the aircraft after it landed but were soon rounded up by a thorough search by police and soldiers. The suspects are currently guests of Her Majesty in Trois-Rivières, Quebec.

On behalf of a grateful nation I want to thank the Canadian Armed Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for sending a very loud and clear message to foreign drug dealers: "Stay out of Canada".

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, Sam Ifijeka, a Canadian of African origin, this week resigned as a commissioner of the refugee division of the Immigration and Refugee Board, publicly accusing the management of being racist and of pressuring commissioners to reject more and more refugees. He is not the first former commissioner to make such accusations.

In fact during the past three years while the Canadian government has reduced the number of refugees selected overseas, the refugee division has also been steadily reducing the rate at which it accepts claimants in Canada as refugees.

Five months ago Mr. Ifijeka wrote a 20-page letter to the Prime Minister and the Clerk of the Privy Council detailing his accusations and documenting them. Obviously this government has ignored these concerns. This morning I have delivered a copy of that material to the minister's office.

• (1110)

I now call on the minister in co-operation with the Prime Minister to order immediately an independent and impartial investigation of Mr. Ifijeka's accusations.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, a large number of Canadian companies find it easier to conduct business with American companies as opposed to those in our own country.

While we have reduced barriers between ourselves and our major trading partners, interprovincial trade barriers still haunt us. This means consumers pay more in higher taxes and higher prices. Business has suffered as well for the same reasons.

The Minister for International Trade will be meeting with his provincial counterparts in a few weeks with the hope of successfully lowering these barriers. If the minister succeeds Canadians will benefit greatly as we will be able to increase business and pass on the savings to the consumer.

Let us hope that success will result from their efforts.

GUATEMALA

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, last week the Prime Minister disgraced Canada again by refusing to meet with Nobel Peace Prize winner, Rigoberta Menchu.

Several international leaders, including the Secretary General of the U.N. and the Pope, have shown her the respect she deserves by speaking with her personally about human rights in her native Guatemala.

Now we learn the government has denied a visa to Mr. Jorge Soto and two academics who are coming to Canada on behalf of an umbrella group currently negotiating a peace accord with the Guatemalan government.

They were to meet with the House of Commons subcommittee on human rights to brief us on the negotiations and to seek advice on the principal point at which the negotiations are stuck, human rights.

Ironically Mr. Soto visited Canada only two years ago at the request of the Canadian government. Why the duplicity? The minister of immigration's office says the decision to deny the men a visa was made at the embassy in Mexico. Officials of the embassy say the decision was made by the minister's office here.

Which is it? Why is this government obstructing efforts to bring peace to Guatemala?

PRICING POLICY

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, when goods are offered for sale in most provinces in Canada they are offered at one price and the consumer winds up paying a very much higher price. In Ontario if goods are offered for $10 they pay $11.50 at the cash register.

Merchants know exactly what taxes are, yet they continue to try to deceive buyers by false advertising of prices that do not include taxes or charges associated with the product.

I call upon the government to introduce legislation to force prices to include all applicable taxes at the point of sale. This misrepresentation and deceit should not be allowed to continue any longer.

LEONARD PELTIER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, 55 members of Parliament intervened in the case of Leonard Peltier last week before the U.S. Court of Appeal in St. Paul, Minnesota. Once again the U.S. courts and the U.S. justice system have been asked to remedy the damage done to Canada and to Leonard Peltier.

It is clear now and has been clear for some time that the Poorbear affidavits used to extradite Leonard Peltier were known to be false at the time they were placed before Canadian courts by the Government of the United States.

United States Senior Circuit Judge Gerald W. Heaney wrote to me on May 19 of this year and confirmed that the U.S. Department of Justice was being disingenuous, to use his words, in its position with Canada's Minister of Justice on the Peltier case.

Surely the time has come for the Government of Canada to pick up the phone and call Washington. Our extradition treaty and our courts were abused in the case of Leonard Peltier and this must be remedied.

Any minister who allows this matter to go unchallenged is no better than those who created the fraud in the first place.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, on November 17, 180 Bosnian refugees who were being sponsored by British NGOs were refused visas to enter Britain by Mr. John Major and his government. These men, women and children were homeless, living in buses, and had relatives in Britain.

The British parliamentary opposition had asked the government to show compassion, but Mr. John Major continued to refuse them entry. By this action the British government showed its true face as a hypocritical power in this war.

Austria, on the other hand, that has already accepted 60,000 Bosnians allowed them entry.

I urge the Government of Canada to indicate to Mr. Major and his government that this action is not conducive to a peaceful and humanitarian resolution of the war waged by Serbia against Bosnia-Hercegovina and Croatia.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, Canadians are anxiously awaiting their federal government's new job strategy. They must be very nervous.

In Ontario, we have Premier Bob Rae who earlier this year announced a $1 billion job creation scheme. As of last month, 675 jobs had been created at a cost to taxpayers of $21 million, an average salary of $31,000 per employee. In addition, 20,000 subsidized child care spaces were offered as part of the program. All of 38 people among the 675 employed are using the subsidies.

This dazzling example of blundering mismanagement serves as an example of what not to do. Given the Tory government's past record, Canadians must be anticipating with dread any new program.

What they want is an election now, so they can elect a Liberal government that can manage this country, unlike the Tories and the NDP.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, it is with concern that I rise to bring to the attention of the House the grave situation in the Scotia-Fundy and Gulf of St. Lawrence groundfishery. The direct cutbacks with which the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is faced will impact not only on my province but indeed on my own constituency.

I want to assure the people of the south shore that I will vigilantly defend the interests of our plant workers and our fishermen. All week I have been consulting with industry representatives, with fishermen and with community leaders. I have written to and met with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to put forward what I feel are constructive suggestions and the principles that should guide government action in meeting this challenging situation.

The minister must accept and act on valid scientific advice. Second, the bulk of the cuts must be shared equally by all sectors. Third, support measures must be put in place with the cuts to lessen the impact of those cuts and to provide necessary support for our people and our communities until such time as the resource can be restored.

Finally, I have urged the minister to initiate a formal review of fish harvesting technology to ensure that when the resource is restored it will be exploited in accordance with the principles of sustainable development and I have urged him to ensure that the task force on income security in the fishing industry reviews the long-term needs of Nova Scotians dependent on the fishing industry as well.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday I visited Hamilton and spoke to students at McMaster University. I met some workers. The number of jobs that have been lost in that area is terrible. With regard to the morale of the people, there is a sense of despair about what they will do after they graduate.

I met the mayor after that. The mayor said to me: "When will the government start to proceed with the idea that your party offered to the nation earlier in the year?" In January we said let us have a good program where the federal government will pay one-third of the cost, the provincial government one-third of the cost and the municipalities one-third of the cost. The mayor said to me that if this program were put in place, they have a lot of projects that could start putting people to work right away. For every $1 that the government will be investing in this program, there will $3 of work done.

Why is the government being so stubborn, not wanting to take this idea that has been approved and asked for by the mayors of municipalities in Canada? Of course, some of the jobs will be done just by municipal governments. Perhaps the federal government will not have all the credit it wants, but people will have work. That will create jobs and hope in the country.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think that the situation is indeed difficult and we are very much aware of it.

Many Canadians are hurting. That is why we must be sure that we do not lead them into dead-end streets and that we come forward with solutions that are very real.

One of the major problems which has led to a limit on the capacity of the government to intervene is the fact that we are all—the federal government, provincial governments and municipal governments—over indebted. Our debts are so high that they threaten our own sovereignty. We are paying the interest on the debt. We have not increased the debt by spending one additional penny.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loiselle: Indeed we have. I can show that at any time.

Basically what we have to do is find real solutions. When the hon. member says one-third, one-third and one-third, there is only one Canadian taxpayer and that taxpayer is already overloaded with taxes. I do not think this is a proper avenue.

We are prepared to consider with provincial governments. We are studying with them. The Prime Minister and my colleague, the Minister of Finance, have indicated certain areas of intervention where we can through reallocation, by being very careful and fiscally responsible, intervene but not beyond that.

• (1120)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, when the government took power in 1984, the debt was $175 billion, whereas today it is $450 billion. But they say that they did not add a penny to the debt! I don't know what kind of mathematics the President of the Treasury Board is using, but I would tell him that the government's inaction and bad policies have created that situation.

In the past eight years, there have been 31 tax increases, there have been cuts and deficits over $30 billion every year this government has been in power.

I would like to ask the government to change its attitude a little and to adopt this idea in order to create jobs. For every dollar invested by the federal government, three dollars will be spent. This is a concrete idea. For every billion dollars spent by the federal government, it will recover $750 million in taxes and savings on unemployment insurance that it would otherwise have to pay. Why does the government not take the initiative of spending a dollar to get back three?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I believe that shows how little the Liberals really understand the economy.

The Leader of the Opposition does not understand why we had a $200 billion debt with an operating deficit. We could not pay it because we had to borrow to pay salaries. This country was literally bankrupt. We went from minus 16 to minus 12 to minus 8 to zero and now we have an operating surplus. Slowly confidence is returning and interest rates have fallen.

In the last recession, we had interest rates of 22 and 23 per cent, high mortgage rates and inflation of 10 per cent. Inflation is now 1.6 per cent, one of the lowest rates in the western world, and we have interest rates at which business can afford to borrow.

That is what a government can do to create conditions in which industry can recover. But the whole world is in a recession. Next year, there will be 42 million unemployed in the OECD countries and Canada now has one of the strongest growth rates, although the rate is very small.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like the minister to explain that to the 1.6 million unemployed. Most of them are unemployed because this government has a policy of just fighting inflation. The minister today is misleading the people and talking about lower interest rates in Canada. In Canada treasury bills for 90 days today are more than twice the price the American administration has to pay to get this money. The interest rates are twice as high in Canada today as in the United States and our government is doing nothing. Does it not want to create any hope for the Canadian people? The way we are going, it is going to be worse next year. We have to create some jobs, otherwise people will suffer even more and we may reach two million unemployed if this government does not wake up.

Look what is happening in the United States. They have a government—it is not in place yet—which gave hope to the Americans and hope to the nation that things will turn around. Here, with this government, it is despair, despair, despair.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, let us talk about hope and let us look at the real numbers.

Even though they are not very brilliant, and I do not deny that, we had the fastest growth of industrial production over the last year among the 13 major countries, which indicates that this is not a Canadian problem, it is a world problem. It was only .9 per cent growth. The next best were Australia and the United States at .2 per cent. They were .7 per cent below Canada while nine countries, including Japan, were at minus 8 per cent. Germany was at minus 3 per cent. We were at plus .9. This is not despondency. These are good numbers and the basics are right.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In his speech last night to a $500 a plate elitist Tory fund raising dinner, the Prime Minister seemed to say that his government would be putting $300 million more into training from the unemployment insurance fund.

I ask the acting Prime Minister: How will this help the close to 750,000 people who are out of work but who are no longer able to get unemployment insurance payments? Why does the government not do something for these people who cannot afford $5 for dinner, much less $500 to attend a Tory fund raiser?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the plight of certain Canadians who are going through tough times.

He seems to find it funny that the Prime Minister of Canada last night indicated to Canadians that this government, on the advice of the private sector, labour, business and special interest groups which made a recommendation, would increase the active use of the UI fund in order to train Canadians so that they get a better job.

I know that it is tough for a Liberal to understand that in today's economy you need to have high skills. You need to have better training. This is the key to prosperity. It is the key to competitiveness. That is why the Prime Minister made that announcement last night.

I think the unemployed people who know that they have to train and improve their skills will welcome that news.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the minister of employment has not answered my question as to how this announcement will help the 750,000 who are not eligible for unemployment insurance. I wish the government would talk more about the deficit in jobs than about the other kinds of deficits that seem to be on its mind more than anything else.

Twice this week the Prime Minister gave what purported to be economic speeches at $500 a plate Tory fund-raising dinners. I ask the Acting Prime Minister: If the government finally has a plan for economic recovery, why it does not disclose that plan fully right now through this Parliament to all Canadians, most of whom cannot afford $500 for an elitist Tory fund raising dinner and likely could not stomach it anyway?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it will be interesting for the hon. member to label the fund raisers of the Liberal Party. Maybe they do not have any. I know he hates us running in the black and him in the red, but that is not the question. The issue is the economy and jobs.

The Prime Minister last night and again on Monday here in Ottawa outlined the five principles that were guiding the economic policy of this government. I know that the Liberals like to see doom and gloom, and that is all they see. However, there are positive signs in the economy and those measures that are being outlined by the Prime Minister are in order to spur the creation of jobs, real jobs, and not make-work projects like the Liberals are advocating for Canadians.

I think that is what they want, and they will get their verdict on that issue.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

For two years now I and my colleagues have been calling on this government to take action to prevent the collapse of Canada's two national airlines. Today as Canadian Airlines gets closer and closer to the edge, we find that the only action that the government seems prepared to be willing to take is, first, to demand more concessions from the workers and, second, to demand that Canadian Airlines put another 2,500 people out on the street.

Perhaps that is why the Prime Minister announced last night an extra $300 million for training. He knows there are going to be a lot more people out there looking for help as a result of the government's policies.

Will the minister confirm that in fact that is its strategy, more concessions from the workers and more job lay-offs from the airlines? If that is true, will he explain to the people of Canada why this government wants the crisis solved on the backs of the workers as opposed to taking its responsibility?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my answer to his question is no, the government has not done such a thing.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, since 1990 over 5,000 jobs have been lost in the airline industry.

That is 5,000 people who are no longer working for an industry that they believed in.

• (1130)

Is it not fair to suggest that the workers have already paid the price for the crisis in the airline industry? This is the crisis which was created by this government and the previous government.

Is the government prepared to demand yet a higher price from the workers? Is it prepared to invest in the future of the Canadian airline industry and provide enough funds to Canadian Airlines in particular to ensure that there is no need for an American airline to buy 40 per cent of Canadian Airlines? Will the government take that serious step?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, last Tuesday we received a proposal from the employees of Canadian Airlines together with PWA and AMR in which the employees offered to participate in an amount up to around $130 to $150 million. We indicated that because of this commitment by the employees we were prepared to listen and to examine the proposal. We have been doing so since last Tuesday on a very tight schedule. There have been many meetings and a lot of discussions.

The proposal they have presented to us has a lot of hurdles in it. There are very difficult aspects to reconcile with the best interests of Canadians considering again the necessity to be very watchful on our financial situation. The discussions are ongoing and we expect to arrive at a constructive resolution no later than the beginning of next week.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that financial assistance by itself will not lead to a permanent solution to the crisis in the airline industry. What the industry also needs, in addition to funds to keep both carriers in the air, is an assurance that there will be some kind of regulatory control to eliminate the excesses in the marketplace, whether it is pricing or whether it is the crazy kind of competition we have seen in a number of city pairs.

Is the government prepared to take that other step to ensure that not only the taxpayers' money is secured in any kind of assistance to the airlines, but also that the industry itself will survive not just for a year, not just for two years, but well past the year 2000?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, that is precisely the position we have taken all along on this issue. We do not want the solution we provide to be only temporary. We have to take into consideration the jobs involved, whether direct or not, the financial situation of the two companies, the situation of civil aviation world-wide and how the market is positioning itself.

We are presently looking at all those factors. That is why it is now time to establish an ongoing dialogue with the people who have put their proposals forward to us last Tuesday to find a solution that is fiscally responsible, in the best interest of all Canadians and long-lasting rather that temporary.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question as well is for the Minister of Transport.

The royal commission on transport recommendations can be summed up pretty easily. If you live in an area that has the population, you get the transportation. But if you live in a place like Atlantic Canada with a smaller population, you do not get the transportation or the industry or the jobs that go with it.

I ask the minister to be clear. Does he repudiate the recommendations of this royal commission or does he support these policies which would result in nothing short of economic apartheid for Canada's regions?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I mentioned yesterday that this commission was put together three years ago. It was made up of very qualified people with expertise: Mr. Louis Hyndman, Madam Marie-Josée Drouin, Madam Susan Fish, Mr. Marc Gaudry, Mr. John Hamilton, Mr. John Helliwell, Mr. Bill Kelly, Mr. Maurice LeClair, Mr. James McNiven and Dr. Janet Smith who have been in the field of transport for many years.

This commission put a lot of work, a lot of effort, and a lot of thought into what it did over the three-year period. Its four-volume report contains not only enunciation of principles but also a lot of statistics and figures on what is going to happen in the transportation field for passengers in the next 30 years.

I suggest to the hon. member that if through his reading of the four volumes he has some specific questions, comments or suggestions to make, we would all benefit from that because what we have to do is examine these questions very carefully and come to a viable solution in the best interests of the nation.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): On a supplementary, Madam Speaker, it is clear the government has no policy except to read volumes of documents because it does not know where it is going in the transportation sector.

What this government has never fully understood is that a country as vast and as diverse as Canada cannot only be run as a business, it must also be run as a nation. To do so means that certain costs are incurred, costs like providing equal and affordable access to viable modes of transportation no matter where one lives in this great nation.

I ask the minister for some clarification on the government's policy. Last night the Prime Minister said that he was looking at investment in the transportation sector while the minister said that he was studying cuts in the transportation sector. He cannot have it both ways. I ask him which is it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, to say such things, one has to be either totally irresponsible or ignorant of the facts. This commission did not only make recommendations on principles, it put together four volumes analyzing all these questions. As part of its analysis, the commission looked at the situation of the people who live in isolated areas and at how their transportation needs could be met. It is absolutely not true that this commission suggested that the transportation needs in isolated areas be disregarded. The commission has enunciated principles they suggest we use as a basis for a very thorough examination—and I think it is simply a question of respect for the work of a commission paid for with public money—of these recommendations before making a final decision.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last night in Toronto, the Prime Minister announced there would be changes in the unemployment insurance system. He also announced that he would free $300 million for manpower training. Could the minister tell the House today what these changes involve and how much of the $300 million would go to Quebec?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it should come as no surprise to the hon. member that the Prime Minister referred to a program that was made possible by Bill C-21, the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The hon. member will recall that his party and his colleagues in the other place held up the bill and prevented its passage for more than a year. Thanks to this program, in the past three years we have been able to increase the amount of money used to help people get the training they need by 67 per cent. That is a very substantial increase. Stressing how important it is to provide training for Canadian workers, the Prime Minister indicated last night that the $1.95 billion the government has currently invested in our labour force will be increased by $1.2 billion. This increase will provide training for more unemployed workers who, as a result of industrial restructuring, must upgrade their skills. As for the details of the program, I have a statutory obligation to table this information in the House, and that will be done.

• (1140)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I may remind the minister that for the past three years, unemployment has been increasing daily, and millions of unemployed Canadians are no longer listed as such because they are no longer listed as being entitled to benefits. They are completely discouraged.

Will the minister make this announcement in the House as soon as possible? What he has done in this area so far has not changed the fact that unemployment is increasing daily. Will these new measures put people back to work, preferably as soon as possible?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will understand that the unemployment insurance budget run from January 1 to December 31, which is the current financial year. The amounts for the current financial year have not been changed by this announcement. However, as far as next year is concerned, the additional $1.2 billion will be announced in the House as soon as possible. The recommendation for this increase, made by the labour force development commission, has been approved, and the details will be available to the House and to Canadians very shortly.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, yesterday Mr. Justice Marshall Rothstein of the Federal Court of Canada, in the case of the referendum on national unity, ruled that the government "did not have reasonable grounds to withhold disclosure".

I ask the acting Prime Minister regarding the free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico, will the government finally release the documents, polls and studies it has done so that the people of Canada can know what the effects of this agreement will be?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, we will be looking at the judgment by Mr. Justice Rothstein and taking the appropriate actions after we have had the opportunity to examine it closely. It came down yesterday.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the judgment was against the government. It has tried to hold back that information.

Will the government again try to hold back information on the free trade agreement with Canada, the United States and Mexico? We have asked six times in this House for sector by sector studies and we have not got that information. Why will the government not release it to Canadians?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, the fact that the matter has been before the courts indicates there is some question as to the obligation of the government with respect to several of these matters.

There has been a judgment by Mr. Justice Rothstein which we will consider and which we will take into account with regard to other actions before the government.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board in the absence of the Minister of Communications.

Today the media informs us that taxpayers have been paying since May and will be paying until March of 1993 for a swanky apartment in Ottawa at the Minto Place Hotel and a free airline ticket to Vancouver every 14 days for the assistant deputy minister of communications.

I want to ask the minister in charge of the purse-strings: Is this what he considers to be wise expenditure of taxpayers' hard earned dollars?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I will take notice of the question, not having been previously advised of the issue, and will make sure that the minister, on his return, addresses himself to the question at that point.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am surprised the government doesn't know what was in the headlines this morning. Even the Minister of Transport must know about it.

My question to the minister is this: The spokesperson for the Department of Communications said, in response to questions from the media and I quote: "Within six months he is expected to decide whether he is going to leave the foothills of the Rockies. He has been attached to this area".

I would like to ask the government, which seems to be in a fog this morning, what it intends to do to stop this profligate spending?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, hiring contracts often include special provisions. These are usually reasonable and take the family situation into account. I am not familiar with the particular case mentioned by the hon. member, but we will look into the matter and get back to him at the appropriate time.

LABOUR

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. The people of Yellowknife have been living in fear for almost six months. Essentially the community has been ripped apart.

The level of violence and tension is escalating each day and is affecting the entire community. Intimidation is reaching uncivilized proportions. Local government is worried that acts of violence will accelerate during winter months. For example, the power outages we have experienced successively could have a devastating impact on the community of 17,000.

As I have asked many times through correspondence and in person, what is the minister prepared to do before tragedy strikes this community again? When, for example, will the result of the mediation be made public?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Labour is away on government business today. I will pass on the member's question to him.

The information I have is that mediation is going on. Without having any details on the matter, it is worth remembering that mediation does involve the parties and mediation can do so much to bring parties together. However, fundamentally it is for the parties to reach an agreement among themselves at the end of the day.

As far as the other incidents she alludes to, there is a great deal of concern in this House about incidents around this strike. We all feel deeply that these are sad events when they occur. I understand there is also an investigation going on and hopefully it will lead to some conclusion.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Despite the horrific level of violence and the tragedy that has taken place, the minister responsible, who has sole jurisdiction and responsibility federally because we have no territorial labour legislation, has done next to nothing to resolve the situation.

I have asked this government time and time again to take a course of action. I have asked the minister responsible to travel to Yellowknife, NWT to see first-hand what is going on. Is the minister prepared to station someone from the labour department in Yellowknife to personally experience what the people there are experiencing, the terror and the tension? Perhaps then he would take responsible action. He would do the responsible thing and take a course of action to find a resolution to this very sad situation.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, from the member's question, she is alluding to two areas of responsibility. One is the labour dispute itself and I will certainly convey the question to my colleague. I guess I can only reiterate that at the end of the day it is the parties that have to come to an agreement. It is not the minister who can do that or a mediator for them.

On the allegation of violence, the Solicitor General's office will be interested in those comments. I assume that if the member has any specific information about any possible violence that she would bring that to the attention of the appropriate officials.

Mrs. Blondin-Andrew: Just ask the RCMP. They put out a report every day.

Mr. Charest: I assume the member will bring that to the attention of those officials and the authorities who have the responsibility for enforcing the law.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

For several months, the people of Abitibi and northern Quebec have been worried about the ozone layer.

We all know that you are a man of action and I wonder what Canada's position will be at the meeting on world environment in Copenhagen next week. Is the purpose to follow up on the Montreal Protocol and protect the ozone layer?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, indeed, this whole issue of ozone depletion is a great worry for the public. Here in Canada we have a protocol named after a very important Canadian city, Montreal. Canada has always been a leader in this field.

The meeting in Copenhagen will enable the participants to review the provisions of the protocol as such. Canada has already taken a position, with the provinces' support, to speed up the elimination of CFC's by 1995. I will not go into details here, but other substances will also be dealt with.

Madam Speaker, Canada will also insist on recycling and recovering CFC's. Here again, the provinces have put forward regulations dealing with those issues. This is within their jurisdiction.

• (1150)

I am pleased to tell you today that there is a consensus across the country on these issues and we will urge the international community to do the same.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister continues his dance of the seven veils, gradually revealing his economic plans outside the House. However, some of these plans have already been rejected; for instance, the highways initiative which Ontario attacked this week as being far too narrow and unfair in its limited help for Ontario where most jobs have been lost in this recession.

Will the government agree to include a wider variety of infrastructure projects in its proposed program, and will it provide a larger share of federal resources to Ontario than the 15 per cent which is presently planned?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Finance will make a statement early next month, on December 2, when the policies of the government to address the present situation will be made public.

On the highway initiative, we have said that we are prepared to develop with the provinces a fiscally responsible solution. We cannot do otherwise. If deficit spending and more borrowing were the answer to unemployment, Ontario would be booming, because the Ontario government has done that and the situation has gotten worse.

It is important to tell Canadians who are hurting that the solutions are not easy and that we can easily make them worse unless we manage our affairs properly. If we really want to help them, we have to get our house in order and be sure we are headed in the right direction and not down dead-end streets. More borrowing would lead to higher interest rates. A one per cent growth in interest rates would cost the government $1.8 billion more, which would not be available for highways or anything else. This is the harsh reality we are dealing with.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the reality is that this government has made the deficit at the federal level much worse, so much so that 35 cents out of every tax dollar is paid for debt servicing, whereas in the province of Ontario it is 14 cents out of every tax dollar, a major difference.

Environmental groups have also attacked the highways initiative as the wrong way to get people back to work.

Will the government also fund a new green jobs initiative to support improving energy efficiency, new recycling activities and upgrading municipal sewage and water treatment? This could give us thousands of new jobs and a much cleaner environment.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the difference between our deficit and the deficit of the Government of Ontario is very important. Our deficit does not come from additional expenditures by this government. We have kept our expenditures under control. Our deficit comes from higher unemployment and lesser revenue and not higher spending, which is the case in Ontario. This is quite a difference.

Does the hon. member suggest we borrow more money? Canadians are extremely worried about our debt situation and the cost and the threat to our programs. If the hon. member is concerned about maintaining good social programs and a capacity to assist people who need it, he has to be very careful that we do not spend all the money on these kinds of projects.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

There are no rail lines in Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island and the government has abandoned the line from Sydney to Truro. Now CP wants to abandon all the lines east of Sherbrooke. At this rate there will be no rail lines in Atlantic Canada.

The Trans-Canada Highway is a two-lane mess and the Royal Commission on Passenger Transportation has said: Pay as you go.

Will the minister explain to Atlantic Canadians how they can pay as you go when there is nothing to go on, even if they had the money to pay?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Surely, Madam Speaker, the hon. member, whom I have known for many years to be a responsible person, would like to correct the record. The Government of Canada entered into an agreement with the Government of Newfoundland to remove the railways from Newfoundland and replace them by participating in road building in Newfoundland. This was not a unilateral decision by the Government of Canada.

The Truro–Sydney line has not been abandoned. CN has tried to sell that line. It has received some proposals that it is examining at the present time. These will have to be examined by the government as well.

CP's action this week is not the removal of the line. CP is asking the NTA to give it permission to do so. During that process everyone who is not in agreement will have the occasion to make their comments known. This is a very good democratic process.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The minister will surely be able to elaborate in his answer to the supplementary question. The hon. member for Moncton has the floor.

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, Atlantic Canadians are going to feel a lot better after that announcement.

With the abandonment of rail service in Atlantic Canada, transport traffic on our killer Trans-Canada Highway will dramatically increase. The Prime Minister continues to dither on whether there should be a national highways upgrading program. Each weekend in New Brunswick we read in our newspapers about more deaths on the Trans-Canada Highway.

Will the minister commit, whether other provinces join in or not, to upgrade the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member opposite will know that at a meeting with the Prime Minister of Canada last March, the first ministers agreed that a program to repair our national highways would be set up with federal participation. Later, the Minister of Finance included this item in his budget. Since then, discussions have been held with the premiers and the ministers of transport to try to come up with a solution acceptable to all provinces.

INTEREST RATES

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, although interest rates today are significantly below those of previous years, yesterday's interest rate increase will no doubt present problems for small businesses that need to borrow money to start up or to expand.

My question is for the minister for small business. What initiatives is he undertaking to help this vital sector of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her question.

At present in the House we are amending the Small Businesses Loans Act to raise the ceiling. I have also indicated that we can improve that Small Businesses Loans Act even further to give access to federal loan guarantees to small business. The Federal Business Development Bank has increased its loans 13 per cent this year.

We will continue through all our regional agencies to help small business. There will be new initiatives coming as well, as the Prime Minister said last night.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A single question from the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings and a single question from the hon. member for Skeena.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister or whomever is answering on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture today.

We know that a cold and wet summer and fall in Ontario, and as well in much of Canada but particularly in Ontario, have left 1.5 million acres of corn in the field. Farmers have been unable to harvest 90 per cent of the crop because of high moisture content in the corn and in the fields. Farmers are strapped for cash. The present advance payment program does not allow the use of that program for standing crops.

• (1200)

Is the government prepared to make adjustments to that program so that this money, which would not be new money, would be available to those corn producers to pay their bills this fall?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to respond to the hon. member's question about the current situation.

I know the government is aware of the terrible situation in Ontario, particularly with the wet weather and the lack of maturity of some of the corn crop.

The department is currently reviewing existing programs to see if there is not some method of getting some assistance out to the cash strapped farmers. We are aware of the disastrous situation and the lack of cash. We know that at this time of year many farmers have to depend on the sale of crops to meet expenditures.

We are working with the provinces through crop insurance, et cetera to see if there is something we can do.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, on April 21, 1988 the President of the Privy Council, in response to my questions, told the House: "If plutonium is to be moved following current practices by sea, that plutonium is subject to hijacking, subject to uses that can be extremely dangerous not only to Canadians but to all of mankind".

Japan required Canada's consent before beginning to ship 35 tonnes of plutonium oxide from Europe to Japan. The first shipment of 1.5 tonnes left France November 8 and is now in the south Atlantic. Canada gave its consent.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would explain to Canadians why the government reversed its position on safety and has now approved the risks of hijacking, nuclear accidents and possible contamination of the high seas.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member correctly quoted me in my former capacity as giving the statement that he quoted into the record.

I have not been following the file personally lately. The Secretary of State for External Affair is away from the House today on public business. I will draw the member's question to her attention and I am sure she will respond to it.

THE LATE HON. SENATOR THOMAS LEFEBVRE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to rise in the House today to announce the death of our friend, Senator Tom Lefebvre.

As you know, he was a member of this House for the riding of Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle for a long time, from 1965 to 1984. He was also our party's whip when we formed the government for many years. I am sure that opposition members and members of all parties realized what a gentleman and hard worker he was. He probably represented the best that Parliament can produce. He was a very simple man who came from a rural background. He spent his life serving his fellow citizens at all levels. He had only friends.

Personally, I considered him as one of my good friends, one of my good advisers, because he did not seek publicity or promotions and served his constituents extremely well. When we have difficulties in politics, and each one of us has had some, there are always people like him whom one wants to have around. In all circumstances, when giving advice, he showed sound judgment and really reflected the political grass roots.

He also believed deeply in this country.

[English]

Whenever he went travelling in Canada and abroad, he solidly defended the virtues of Canadians. I have heard him making some very moving, simple speeches about what it is like to be Canadian, to be of a different language and sharing his experiences with others.

He represented a riding where the francophones and the anglophones live together. He always maintained peace among them and he was admired by the two communities. I am very sad today, and I know that my colleagues will share this sense of a great loss.

[Translation]

Tom was a very fine man. He was a fine example of what this country can produce.

On behalf of my party and my colleagues, I would like to offer his very charming wife and his family our sincerest condolences. His wife and children can take comfort in remembering that he was a real gentleman. He was a very good Canadian.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, my party and I wish to join in what the Leader of the Opposition said. Tom Lefebvre was well liked here in the House and respected as an effective member and as a Canadian who never questioned the value of our great country.

[English]

He was a friend of mine and was one of those few people who served in this House whom every member could honestly call a friend and regarded as a friend.

As the Leader of the Opposition has said, he was first elected here for Pontiac—Temiscamingue and then served for the riding of Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle. He was the Whip of his party in government. That in many ways is the most partisan of jobs and yet he did not conduct it in a way that caused others in this House and other parties to regard him as a partisan; quite the contrary.

He saw his responsibilities as the chief government Whip to make this Canadian institution work and he did what he could to make this institution work. I think all of us were surprised and certainly deeply saddened by the news this morning of his death.

He served, as the Leader of the Opposition has indicated, on in effect three levels of government in Canada. He was a local councillor in Temiscamingue, he then served in this House and he was also the chairman of the NATO parliamentary delegation, indicating a very active and constructive interest in international affairs.

In the other place he served on the committee on energy, environment and natural resources and naturally, given his long experience in the workings of Parliament, on the committee dealing with internal economy and budget administration.

He was a friend of all of us. I want to express to his family the condolences of the Prime Minister, myself, and all of us who feel today that we have lost a friend in the passing of Tom Lefebvre.

[Translation]

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I knew Tom Lefebvre very well, as did the members for Regina—Lumsden and Brant, who were also his friends.

He was only 65 years old. He was the member for Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle where he was elected in 1965 and re-elected five times to this House. I remember Mr. Lefebvre very well, because I was the Whip for the New Democratic Party between 1975 and 1981 and during that time, he was chief Whip for the Liberal Party in the Government of Canada. After the 1979 election, he became chief whip for the Liberal Party in opposition.

Later, I remember very well that he was appointed to the Senate in July 1984 by the then Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. He was also a parliamentary secretary when he was a government member.

[English]

Mr. Lefebvre was very well liked by all members of the House. I remember when I was elected back in 1968 he was one of those people whom, regardless of which party he was in, you could approach. He was very approachable, helpful, likeable and he was highly respected. He loved this institution, he loved Parliament, and he made a contribution to the institution of Parliament.

After he left this place he was named to the Senate and he continued his love for the parliamentary institution in the other place. He was very active in many of the parliamentary associations and really enjoyed being part of public life.

On behalf of my party I want to extend my deepest sympathy and condolences to his wife, children and the rest of his family.

[Translation]

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I was also very saddened this morning when I learned that Senator Tom Lefebvre had died.

As one of his constituents, I knew Tom for nearly 20 years. He worked very hard for his riding and was always attentive to his constituents' needs. He lived his whole life in politics because politics was his life. For me, this is a very sad day.

• (1210)

[English]

I was very saddened to hear of Tom's passing today, and I call him Tom with all respect because everybody always called him Tom in the riding.

He treated each and every one equally, he listened carefully to all constituents.

I would like to pass on deepest sympathy and condolences on behalf of all constituents of Pontiac-Gatineau—Labelle, whom he served so well, and myself to his dear wife Lea, and to his children Lise, Guy and Jean.

PRIVILEGE

PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Point of privilege, Madam Speaker. I am sorry to rise suddenly on this issue but it is of utmost importance and it is a point of privilege.

At the same time as my colleagues and I were standing in this House moments ago to pay our respects to a colleague who has just passed on, the staff of the President of the Treasury Board was handing out details of budgetary cuts in the hallway outside this Parliament instead of tabling them in this Parliament.

If the Chair would review the definition of contempt on page 143, chapter 10, of Erskine May's 20th edition, I would submit that the actions taken by the government, more particularly the President of the Treasury Board, are in contempt of this House.

Clearly these actions show the most disrespect for this Parliament when a document of this nature announcing major budgetary cuts to a whole variety of government departments is not tabled in the House but distributed to the press in the scrum area by the staff of the President of the Treasury Board at the same time as we are sitting, in particular on the issue we were discussing at the time the incident happened.

This reeks of disrespect for this Parliament.

I call upon the government House leader to avail himself of that information, to speak to his colleague, and I would ask the Speaker to rule on this issue at the appropriate moment. I submit that this is clearly in contempt of Parliament. This goes against our practices. Never would we do anything like this in the past on any occasion, let alone the occasion we are living through right now.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have never heard a more irrelevant or inaccurate suggestion of what is a point of privilege or contempt of the House.

Apparently what the President of the Treasury Board is guilty of is informing the public through the media, which is the messenger we use, of some actions taken by the Treasury Board.

I am really dumbfounded as to what is behind the indignation of the hon. member. Is he suggesting that any government action, anything taken by any minister, must never be communicated to the media or to the public, to those affected, except by way of tabling a document in the House of Commons?

Frankly I am quite astounded by the hon. member's raising this point. I listened to his speech this morning on the motion he has on the floor and I would really wonder how respectful of Parliament that was.

I am not raising a point of privilege on it. That is part of the partisan debate that goes on around here all the time; perhaps the kind of debate that does not give the public a great deal of respect for this institution but it happens nonetheless.

I have to say dismiss out of hand any notion that somehow it is an offence for a minister and/or his staff to make comments about or inform the affected public and the media of actions taken within that minister's department.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I do not believe that this is a question of privilege or a point of order.

The problem here is that there were questions during Question Period on the economy on what the government is going to do. In none of the answers from the ministers, including the minister whose department released the letter, did they indicate that this action was not only being contemplated but that it was being done at that time.

In other words, press secretaries were running around this building passing out letters in French or English, depending on the reporter, and the minister who was standing up answering questions on the economy did not have the courtesy to tell the people in this House and Canadians directly what the government was doing.

The government should be more forthcoming and more honest with Canadians.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order. The NDP and the government House leader in saying that it is not a point of privilege and not a point of order are forgetting the fundamental reason why we are here.

There is such a thing as accountability to the people of Canada through this House. This is not an ordinary announcement that the hon. minister has just released here today. This is not an ordinary piddling little announcement on something. No, this is a major change in the budget and the estimates of the government departments going through this Chamber. This is a major change. The outline given outside the doors to this Chamber talks about exactly $500 million in the next two months, one-half billion dollars while the estimates, while the legislation arising out of the budget of the estimates of the department, are going through this Chamber.

Madam Speaker, I want you to keep in mind and I would like you to think about this: There is only one reason why this Chamber sits. There is only one reason primary why this Chamber, called the Parliament of Canada, sits here. That is to make the government accountable to the people of Canada through this Chamber because there is no other mechanism.

We debate in this House all the time our rules concerning Question Period and the accountability of the government to the people. We have seen the erosion of certain principles of accountability like committee of the whole because it has all become very complex.

This smacks at that very principle. The government cannot, while we are sitting on a Friday afternoon, keep it in mind, circulate outside this Chamber a document which changes the very business that we are considering in estimates which were approved by this Chamber and on which we have spent months.

Here the government is changing the entire business of the country on a Friday afternoon at 20 minutes after twelve o'clock outside this Chamber without allowing it to be heard and to permit us to do our job as members of Parliament.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, on a question of privilege. I would like to table in the House the letter that was sent by the secretary-general of the Treasury Board to other deputy ministers to inform them of the decisions they have to make pertaining to the management of their departments.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I suggest there is no need at this time to make decisions, rulings or assumptions, to look at what this or that person may have done and to decide one way or the other. I think that, over the years, in the Canadian practice and laws, several Speakers' rulings have reaffirmed that documents circulated outside this House can not normally form the basis of a question of privilege. The President of the Treasury Board has indicated that, in any case, he will be tabling this document at the call of the "Tabling of documents". I promise to take this up anyway with the Speaker and we will get back to the House on this if need be. But for the time being, I believe the matter is closed.

OFFICE OF THE VICTIMS' ADVOCATE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-373, an act respecting the Office of the Victims' Advocate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, the office of advocate would be an officer of the House of Commons. The advocate would provide support and information to victims on every criminal procedure affecting them and their offender, not only what the general law states, but information on individual cases as is allowed by law.

Third, the office of advocate would establish contact between victims and counsellors and support groups in the community. He or she would provide compensation for any costs incurred by the victim that are not borne by existing government programs or insurance policies.

Finally, and above all, the advocate would recognize the pain and would address the needs of victims of crimes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Blackburn (Brant) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

BILL C-327

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, it gives me great personal privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present four separate petitions from across the country: Regina, Saskatchewan; Stratford, Ontario; Brampton; Yellowknife; Nepean; Ottawa; Port Alberni, B.C.; Orleans and Gloucester. All of these petitioners are speaking out in support of C-327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them.

This bill will be debated this afternoon from four o'clock to five o'clock in Private Members' Business and I would solicit support from both other parties.

EDUCATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present as well. One relates to the problem that teachers experience in purchasing equipment and services to use for the education of our children. They note that the teachers bear a burden of extra curricular expenses in order to improve their professional skills and to acquire certain academic services and materials which are intended to further the level of education for our children.

The petitioners also note that self-employed professionals and business people have deductions for operating expenses and improving their office or business, even deductions for two-martini lunches and the services of prostitutes through escort agencies. They therefore call upon Parliament to request that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue take action to amend the present Income Tax Act to allow teachers who teach in the educational institutions of Canada deductions for professional expenses made during the course of their employment.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, my second petition comes from the west coast of Vancouver Island, in particular Port Alberni in my constituency. In this petition the petitioners note that U.S. has unfairly imposed a duty on Canadian softwood lumber exports to the United States and has engaged in numerous other trade practices which amount to harassment of Canadian producers.

They also note that the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States has resulted in lost jobs and devastation of the Canadian economy without providing the promised benefits.

The petitioners, therefore, call upon Parliament to request that the Prime Minister and the Minister Responsible for International Trade take any action necessary to defend the interests of the Canadian softwood lumber industry against the unfair duty and request that Parliament act immediately to effect the cancellation of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

POVERTY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, my final petition is from a number of people in the community of Port Alberni who note that on November 24, 1989, the House of Commons expressed its concern for more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and noted that Parliament sought to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

They note that poverty among children inhibits learning and preparation for employment, thereby constituting a future cost to Canadian national productivity.

They note that on May 7, 1992, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said: "There is no plan to cope with the problem of poverty exclusively for children". They also note that Canada has ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and has a moral obligation to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada.

They therefore call upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table four petitions signed by residents of Malarctic, Dubuisson, Val-d'Or, Radisson, James Bay, Sullivan and Vassan, in Abitibi, who claim that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite to more violence.

They say that all toys that incite to violent games are unacceptable and should no longer be produced. They also suggest that the freedom of the press to report violent acts should be limited, and information on acts of violence which is repeated too often on all television stations as well as on the radio can incite others to commit the same violent acts.

Therefore, the petitioners humbly call on Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eradicate violence in our society in order to better protect our children and ensure a better quality of life for all of our fellow citizens.

[English]

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present on behalf of the First Nations a petition regarding aboriginal languages which are 53 distinct living and vital languages, representing 11 linguistic families.

The undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament to fulfil its responsibilities to the citizens of the First Nations and aboriginal peoples in Canada by taking immediate steps to recognize the right to use, preserve and enhance aboriginal languages.

This is something that was attempted in the Constitution. Unfortunately, it failed. However, this petition expresses the will of the people regarding the importance of their language.

HOUSING

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I too have the privilege of presenting a petition with many hundreds of names on it organized by the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation.

The petitioners wish to draw to the attention of the House that many Canadians experience serious housing problems and that the Government of Canada terminated the federal Co-operative Housing Program on February 25, 1992. This action has eliminated 2,000 new co-op housing units for 1992 alone, along with 4,000 construction and manufacturing jobs for the same period and that there are approximately 164,000 rental households who want to move into co-op housing due to the success of the program in creating affordable, stable and mixed income communities.

• (1230)

Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to reinstate the federal co-op housing program immediately and to commit the $6.1 million to the program which had been planned for 1992 to permit approximately 2,000 co-op housing units to be sponsored this year.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have two different petitions to present today. I am pleased to present more petitions signed by residents of the rural municipality of Beaver River and the communities of Pierceland and Goodsoil in northwest Saskatchewan.

The petitions concern the northern tax allowance and outline these residents' frustrations with the errors made by Revenue Canada in interpreting how the benefit affects them.

The petitioners ask that the government and the Minister of National Revenue review the recent ruling of the Tax Court of Canada which returned the benefits to only some residents of the area eligible for the northern tax allowance. The petitioners ask the minister to change this policy so that all residents who are otherwise eligible will be treated fairly.

BILL C-91

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I am also pleased to present today petitions signed by another 668 residents of northwest Saskatchewan who want the government to withdraw Bill C-91, the legislation that will allow brand name prescription drug companies to market their drugs without competition from generic drugs for periods of up to 20 years.

With these signatures from residents of the communities such as The Battlefords, Speers, Meadow Lake, Shell Lake, Wilkie and Canwood, the total number of signatures I have now presented from residents of the constituency I represent total 1,700.

I am in agreement with the concerns raised by these petitioners and I join them in asking the government to withdraw Bill C-91.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I suggest, Madam Speaker, that all questions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had two questions on the Order Paper, Nos. 283 and 284, since April 1, 1992, close to eight months. Although I requested an answer to those questions in 45 days, the minister has refused to answer.

I would therefore give notice under Standing Order 39(5)(b), that I intend to transfer Question No. 283 and to raise the subject matter thereof under the adjournment motion of the House. I do hope the minister will then see fit to answer Question No. 284.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As far as Question No. 283 is concerned, our rules do provide for such a procedure. It is agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I did have a conversation with the hon. member earlier this week. I told him that best efforts were being made to get him answers to both questions.

It is his right to have the first matter transferred for debate and I understand that now will happen.

I regret that I was not able to deliver on my best efforts by the end of this week, but I can assure him that there is no refusal on the part of the minister. It is a matter of processing the appropriate paper, and every effort is being made to supply him with the answer to the other question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Boudria (p. 13691).

Madam Deputy Speaker: There were three minutes left in the question and comment period following the intervention by the member for Calgary Southwest.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to ask a question of my hon. colleague on the other side of the House.

This motion states specifically that it is a debate on confidence in the government and the government's inability to provide leadership and direction on the economic and social affairs of the nation.

As I have stated publicly before, I am really at a loss and severely frustrated with the whole issue of the giant mine strike in Yellowknife.

Clearly there has not been the kind of direction and the kind of leadership required to resolve the issue. It has had a devastating impact on all citizens. It has been a no-win situation for the Northwest Territories. For the citizens of Yellowknife it has essentially ripped the community apart. We are in a situation that is on the verge of another perhaps devastating event that could occur. Every day the tensions escalate in that community. What is occurring is that the RCMP is putting out press releases with every incident that occurs in relation to this strike.

It is unresolved at this point. It is quite clear, as my hon. colleague will know, that the government has sole jurisdiction in this particular area, sole responsibility, because there is no NWT labour legislation.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague why the impact of this strike has had such a devastating impact on the economy. Talk to anyone on the streets of Yellowknife; the cab drivers, the people in the cafes, the people in government offices will tell you that it has had not only a morally devastating impact socially but a devastating economic impact.

I would like to ask the hon. member why the Minister of Labour has taken a holiday on this issue. Why is it that the mediation has not been aggressive enough to have come to some resolution on this particular issue? Where is the leadership? Where is the confidence that we need at this time in the community of Yellowknife?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, to my colleague, the member for Western Arctic, I would like to extend not only my sympathies but the sympathies of all members with us today to those people in the city of Yellowknife and specifically to those families that lost their loved ones. This strike was devastating as were the events that followed afterwards.

It has ripped the community apart, and I will acknowledge that.

The Minister of Labour did travel to Edmonton some months ago and drew both parties together with regard to a mediator to try and resolve the very difficult situation up in Yellowknife. I can assure my colleague that he has not taken a holiday. There are procedures that we go through and obviously sometimes it is very difficult to get striking parties to come to an agreement.

I certainly once again extend my sincere sympathies, but must also say to her that this is in the forefront of the Minister of Labour's concerns and hopefully there will be some resolution in a short period of time.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity given to me to take part in the debate on my colleague's motion. I note that it is very similar to a motion that was presented to the House by the Tories way back prior to the dissolution of Parliament in 1984 when they were attempting to get the Liberals to call an election and to move out of the way. At that time the Liberals were a very unpopular government.

I am a bit concerned that this motion is made to be a little cute and is motivated by revenge more than anything else. It does not really express concern for the unfortunate economic situation that most Canadians find themselves in today. It is unfortunate that in the lead-off speech made by the Liberal Party the member did not cite any of those concerns, that he only quoted the polls and referred back to the debate that took place in 1984 when the Tories presented a similar motion to the Liberal government of the day.

I was hoping that if the Liberals were going to be bringing forth a motion of non-confidence in the government, it be one that contained some substance and that the debate would contain some substance and not just a bit of a gimmick to try to bring about a little revenge for a motion that the Tories brought against the Liberals several years ago that was equally devoid of substance.

It seems to me that one of the reasons why Canadians have lost confidence in Parliament and in parliamentarians is that they see these kinds of gimmicks going on in the House of Commons where one party is attempting to get revenge on another party for a slight that it experienced eight to ten years ago.

Canadians do not want to see that kind of thing. They want to see the substance of their concerns discussed on the floor of Parliament and they want to see something done about their concerns. It is unfortunate that in his opening speech the proposer of this motion did not get down to the substance of the things that people in Canada are concerned about.

There is no question that in terms of managing the economy for the benefit of all Canadians, the current government in office has been a massive failure. There were promises made when it came to office in 1984: the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs made by the current Prime Minister; the promise to reduce the national debt and to eliminate the national deficit; the promise through privatization and deregulation to improve transportation, communications and even that old Conservative whipping boy, the post office.

There was the promise of tax fairness and the promise of the government and the Prime Minister to create a government of national reconciliation. When you look at these promises and at the promise made by the Conservatives to protect social programs as a sacred trust of this nation, you have to, as every Canadian has done, measure the Tories against the promises and against their own standard which they established in 1984. Every Canadian has to judge that this government has been a massive failure even when judged against its own standards of performance.

It is not necessarily a failure of unprecedented proportions. I would like to draw attention to some of the comparisons that should be made between the Tories and the Liberals. When you measure the performance of the Tories in office against the performance of the Liberals in office, you find that in terms of failure they come to an absolute dead heat.

We like to talk about the Liberals as a party that talks like New Democrats in opposition and acts like Tories in office. It is reminiscent of Tommy Douglas' old stories about the white cats and the black cats in mouseland. It does not matter which colour of cat is in office at any particular time, it is still bad for the mice and basically that is the situation we are facing.

If the point of this resolution is to call an election so that we can switch the black cats with the white cats, what is the point in any case? It is going to be just as bad for Canadians in the short term and just as bad for Canadians in the long run. What we need is a new way of approaching government in this country and a new kind of leadership. We need a new style of leadership in this country and that style of leadership does not seem to be coming from either the Tory government on that side or from the Liberal government on that side.

That leaves a pretty good option, the leadership potential of the member for Yukon, the leader of the New Democratic Party. If an election were going to bring about that eventuality, Canadians would be very hopeful about the outcome of an election. You would see some changes in this country that would really serve the interests of the people of Canada, rather than dealing with the motivation of revenge between the two parties that have currently switched back and forth between office over the last several decades, the last century of the history of this country.

If that were the outcome of the election, Canadians would have some hope for the future.

When I hear the Minister of Finance speaking in this House and answering every single question from this side with the statement that everything is going along okay and using the term "the fundamentals are in order", it is pretty clear to me that either the minister is out of touch with the fundamentals or his definition of what the fundamentals are varies to a great degree as to what the fundamentals are for those many Canadians out there. He is also fond of quoting, as the member for Calgary Southwest did in her presentation to the House, the United Nations study which shows that in terms of quality of life for the last couple of years.

Canada has led all the other nations of the world, including some of the other industrialized nations. It is obvious the member has not read the study too closely. Maybe she read the prepared package that the Conservative speechwriters gave to her. When the studies that the United Nations have done are broken down, when the figures are pulled apart, and you look at the quality of life in Canada from the point of view of women, then Canada falls to rank 17th in terms of the quality of life for women in Canada.

I certainly would be interested if the aggregates were broken down so that unemployed people, people in the poorer socio-economic levels of society, were also given an opportunity to see where they stand with respect to other countries in the world. They would fall far below 17th in the world and fall well below what is experienced in what we call Third World countries in dealing with poverty.

I wish the Conservative government would be a little more honest when it is dealing with the United Nations study because it is not all of one piece. The stuff they leave out is probably more important to Canadians because it shows, at least from the point of view of women, that Canada is not number one, that we fall to 15th or 17th in the world, and that we are led by most of the other industrialized countries who value women a lot more than we appear to value women in Canada.

The statement that the fundamentals are in order also ignores the fact of what Canadians are experiencing. Take the example of unemployment. In my riding, thousands of loggers and forest industry workers have lost their jobs over the years since 1982. For those people the fundamentals are not in order.

As a result of mismanagement of the forest industry, as a result of the harsh programs being brought in by this government, as a result of the harsh programs in downsizing being brought about by corporations operating in the forest industry, and as a result of the very conservative management approach that is being taken by those forest companies, thousands of people in my own community have seen their jobs disappear, and any hope or potential for employment has disappeared as well.

The same thing is being duplicated all across this country. I look at the experience of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where according to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which understates the case in terms of the loss of manufacturing jobs in this country, 350,000 jobs have been lost in the manufacturing sector; 63,000 of those in Quebec.

What kind of devastation is present in the economy of those two provinces, largely as a result of the economic and trade policies of the Conservative government? Many of these people have no jobs to turn to because of the damage done by the Conservatives to the economy.

Many of them made good wages in the past, have spent a lifetime building up assets, building up homes, creating the possibility of education for their families, vacations for their families, and yet for many of them those assets have been wiped out in a stroke by the bad economic management of this Conservative government, bad economic policies, and bad trade policies.

The cold, hard statistics of inflation, of trade balances and that kind of thing, do not take into account the desperation that these people feel when they are faced with the prospect of no new employment and in fact do not even know which way to turn.

Families are breaking up, assets are being lost, lives are being disrupted and destroyed, and all as a result of the Conservative economic and trade policies. When the minister says that the fundamentals are in order and that Canada enjoys the highest quality of life according to the United Nations studies, she is ignoring the many people who are included in the aggregate figures. Their life experiences are very much different from the experience of the people who are benefiting from Conservative economic policies.

Conservative members talk about the government having dealt with the debt problem. I am astounded they could suggest that that might be happening. The net debt when the Conservative government took over in 1984 was about $160 billion. That was a heavy debt, something that needed to be dealt with. The Conservatives have run up that debt to well over $450 billion. It has far more than doubled. It has almost tripled and they cannot blame the Liberals any more for the problems of the debt.

This problem is being caused by Tory mismanagement of the economy. Every time hundreds of people are laid off, every time a corporation is privatized that ends up going belly-up, every time the size of the civil service is cut back, those people do not end up in jobs in the private sector because the private sector has been killed off as well. As a result those people end up on the unemployment list and on the welfare list. They become a negative draw on the economy. They take welfare. They take unemployment insurance and they contribute to the rising deficit of the government and the rising debt of the government.

That is the member's responsibility. That is the government's fault. It has mismanaged the economy and that is the reason why the debt is increasing. The Tories cannot look back 10 years any more and blame the Liberals for that problem. It is their problem and it is because of their ill-timed, ill-conceived policies that we are in the position we are now where we are facing a debt of almost $450 billion.

That does not mean that the Liberals were any better than the present government. As far as I am concerned and as far as the people of Canada are concerned they are both in a dead heat, a plague on both their houses.

When the Liberals were in office from 1979 or 1980 through to 1984 they doubled the debt even in that short stretch of four years by adopting Tory policies. That is why I say the Liberals sound like New Democrats in opposition but they act like Tories in office. People in Canada are saying a plague on both their houses. They have both given a bad name to politics and a bad name to democratic government in this country.

Some people have said that the conflict between the Liberals and Tories that we see in this motion, this gimmicky motion that the Liberals have reached back almost 10 years to dig out of Hansard in order to get their revenge against the Tory policy, is a bit of a cola war like the war between Pepsi and Coca-Cola.

I will tell the member and the gentleman who is here from the Liberal Party, that many people across Canada are saying, "What's the diff?" What is the difference if a Liberal government is in office or a Tory government is in office? They bring down the same policies which are of no benefit whatsoever for ordinary Canadian citizens.

I look at the debate going on now about transportation and the crisis that the two national airlines find themselves in largely as a result of deregulation and the hands-off transportation policies being taken by both the Liberal government and the Tory government.

It was actually the Liberal transportation minister back in the 1980s who brought in the deregulation policy in spite of warnings from the other parties that this kind of deregulation policy would not work in Canada, that it would kill the two competing airline systems. They were told it would create thousands of job losses, but for ideological reasons the Liberals went ahead with the program and the Tories completed it because there is no difference between a Tory and a Liberal in office.

The Tories followed up the program to the maximum ideological extent and, as a result, the airlines today are facing the kind of crisis that we are in. We see the threat of tens of thousands of jobs being lost in the Canadian airline industry. In fact we are looking at two airlines that at one time, before the the Liberals and the Tories got their monkey wrench into the system, were considered to be among the best performing airlines on the face of the earth. Now look what we have got as a result of Liberal and Tory mismanagement. The same thing applies to the railway system.

In particular, I look at social programs because of the news that came out yesterday about the fact that one million children are still living in poverty in this country. How can we see a gimmicky kind of motion without any substance being presented to the House of Commons by the Liberal Party? Why do we not hear about their proposals to deal with those one million children currently living in poverty?

As far as I am concerned we have two parties here who are fighting over which snouts end up in the trough. As was pointed out when the election expenses information came down, they are both corporate-financed political parties. They belong to and are intertwined with the system of one dollar, one vote while the rest of the people in Canada are in the system of one person, one vote, the democratic system.

People across Canada are now saying: A plague on both your houses. None of you have done anything worth while for Canada. They want to get rid of both of you. The sooner that happens the better it is going to be for Canadians.

There is a political party that represents that one person one vote system, that democratic system that Canadians are so proud of and want to see implemented in the House of Commons, not the old boy network, not the corporate sponsored political party system that we have with the Liberals and Tories. They want to see people who represent all Canadians.

If an election results from this motion, if the government decides, as it should, to step out of government and call an election, the Canadian people are going to give it some thought. They are going to compare the Liberals to the Conservatives. We are going to provide a bit of that comparison so that they will have accurate information. People will see there is absolutely no difference between the black cats and the white cats, between one corporate sponsored party and another corporate financed party, that their policies are all the same and that they have been deleterious to the people of Canada. They are going to kick them all out and put in a government that represents the democratic system in Canada, that represents a bottom-up approach to politics where the people count rather than those at the $500 a plate dinner.

We intend to support this motion. We would like to see the government kicked out. We do not think that they have any ideas that are beneficial to Canadians. In fact we see in the headlines that the Prime Minister is making speeches at $500 a plate dinners announcing programs that are designed not for the people of Canada but, as the headlines in The Globe and Mail state: "Move to be announced December 2 will be designed to rebuild Tory fortunes". The last thing the people of Canada want is any kind of system to rebuild the Tory fortunes.

Canadians want to see the Tories out of there as soon as possible because the damage they can do in the last year of their term is so great, given the damage that they have done in the first seven or eight years, that they want to see them out altogether. Their main concern is that they may substitute the other Tory political party, the Liberals.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I listened with great attention to the diatribe of the hon. member. He is asking the Canadian people to vote for the NDP which enjoys the support of 14 per cent of Canadians.

An hon. member: Six per cent in Quebec.

Mr. Boudria: Six per cent in Quebec. That does not form a strong government.

[Translation]

That does not have much hope. With only 6 per cent of declared voters, it is rather difficult to get any candidate elected.

[English]

The member was saying that the New Democratic Party is very democratic. I wonder if that means he dissociates himself from the NDP Government of Ontario's labour laws. For instance, in this great spirit of democracy the member is talking about, under its new labour legislation there will be votes to unionize shops and those votes will not have to be taken by secret ballot. Is that his concept of democracy? It is not mine. I do not even think it is the concept of democracy of some of the members across the way, although they can speak for themselves.

• (1300)

He was speaking of the good quality of government. Is he saying that the NDP at the federal level could do for Canada what Bob Rae has done for Ontario? If that is the case, as we say in my riding, non merci. I do not think that is the kind of situation we would want where under the provincial New Democrats in Ontario these so-called socialists are cutting social programs and closing down hospital beds. Can you imagine socialists closing down hospital beds? That is what we are seeing in the province of Ontario.

My question to the member is: Does his party at the federal level want to shut down hospital beds as well, just as the Ontario government does?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question. He mentioned the labour laws in Ontario and whether those labour laws are democratic. I can tell the member many people in Ontario feel that those labour laws are a heck of a lot better than the labour laws which persisted in Ontario up to the time the New Democratic Party was elected.

In fact, the labour laws in British Columbia have been brought in, in a similar vein. For example, there is a provision in the British Columbia labour law to eliminate the very kind of scab labour that the member for Western Arctic was complaining about in terms of the Giant mine dispute which resulted in a tremendous amount of violence taking place on the picket line at the Giant mine.

Anti-scab legislation will soon be in effect in Ontario, British Columbia and Quebec. As a result, in those provinces we are going to see a reduction in picket line violence. Hopefully, before the federal Minister of Labour leaves office he will adopt similar anti-scab legislation because I cannot see the possibility of the Liberals doing that when they take office, if that is the member's concern about the labour legislation in Ontario.

I think what the member is concerned about is that great strides have been taken in labour legislation in Ontario for the first time after many, many years of Liberal and Tory government. It is now catching up to some of the western provinces like Saskatchewan and British Columbia and in some areas catching up to more rational labour legislation in Quebec.

I am very proud of what has been done in terms of the progress made in labour legislation in those provinces. I hope the member will take a closer look at them before he asks his questions.

With respect to closing hospital beds, I think the member will understand that there is a new direction taking place in health care. In part it is being forced upon provinces by cutbacks in transfer programs and EPF funding and in some of the wealthier provinces like Ontario, Alberta and Quebec, through cutbacks in Canada Assistance Plan funding.

I have talked to ministers of finance and ministers of health from those provinces who are forced into extremely difficult positions in terms of dealing with health care because the federal government is constantly cutting back on those transfer payments. In fact, that process started when the Liberals were in office and that pressure was put on provinces prior to the Conservative government coming into office in 1984. Therefore, the Liberals have nothing to be proud about in terms of the cutbacks in transfer payments to fund hospital and health care in the provinces. That is the real reason for the cutback in hospital beds.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my colleague from Comox—Alberni that he did add substance to the debate. I thank him for that. He discussed issues dealing with the economy and social affairs of this nation and I think that is what this House should be all about. I have to say that while he outlined certain philosophies he believes in, I do not agree with him but that is fair ball.

I do want to ask him questions regarding jobs and employment. He is right. This is a major area, because we have to give those people the tools to go and get the work so they can get off welfare or UI and create revenue. We have already allocated some $3.2 billion to retrain people on UI. It seems to me that the hon. member voted against changes regarding the UI bill we brought in about a year or a year and a half ago.

The hon. member also said that he was very much against the free trade agreement. I understand his philosophies. But we are an exporting nation and if the rest of the world is moving into trading blocs, such as Europe and the Pacific Rim, we cannot stick our heads in the sand. We either get out there and compete and beat, or we are not going to maintain our standard of living. The same is true for NAFTA.

The hon. member mentions that he does not agree with privatization. I happen to agree. But the question comes down to this: How are we going to raise revenues? We cannot tax the people any more. What we have to do is cut expenditures and maybe reallocate.

I would like to hear the hon. member's ideas and the substance of his concerns on how we could reallocate funds to help those people really in need.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I would like to thank the member for the question. Over the years in this House, in this Parliament, our party has put forward a number of proposals that would first of all generate revenues. Those proposals would also distribute revenues more fairly so that they would not all be taken off the backs of the lower and middle income workers and all the credits would not go to people at the high end of the income scale in the way that the Conservative tax policy has been structured.

If the member reads taxation statistics, she will know that the last eight years under Tory rule have been a tremendous boon to those at the high end of the income scale. They have actually had a tax reduction. As a result, the people at the lower and middle class end of the income scale have had to pay for that largesse. So, as we have proposed in this House, we would like to see a mechanism for redistributing the burden.

In her initial presentation the member talked about getting all Canadians to work together. I think the Prime Minister started off on the right track when he talked about a government of national reconciliation. When he was first elected it will be recalled that he brought Bob Hawke, the Prime Minister of Australia, up here. He brought workers and corporate and public representatives to Ottawa for a meeting to find out how the people of Canada in the various sectors could pull together. It collapsed, because the Prime Minister himself did not seem to have a commitment to it.

I recall when we were talking about the problems we had in shipping wheat through west coast ports that were on strike, the Prime Minister stood up and said: "Well, you talk to your friends in labour to see if they can stop the strike". I will tell the hon. member what the problem is. If the government by that kind of statement is admitting it has no friends in labour, then it has no opportunity to set up a government of national consensus. It has no opportunity to get a government of reconciliation that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. Questions and comments have been terminated. On debate the hon. member for Saint-Léonard. I believe you are splitting your time with the hon. member for Nepean.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm that I will share my speaking time with the hon. member for Nepean.

The subject of debate on this opposition day is the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation and has lost the confidence of this House and of the Canadian people and that, therefore, an election should be called forthwith, in accordance with the Canadian custom, practice and tradition of holding a general election at least every four years.

• (1310)

What does this motion say? First of all, it states that in accordance with tradition, an election should be called every four years. In fact the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott-Russell was inspired by the very motion moved by the present Prime Minister, then Leader of the Opposition, in the House on December 9, 1983. Today, after eight years of government we have every kind of problem you can think of, and the country is in a crisis. Eight or nine years ago, the present Prime Minister believed it was important to have an election every four years and made it quite clear it was a Canadian tradition, and repeated this during the 1988 election campaign.

On October 24, 1992, and I am quoting from an interview with the Journal de Montréal, the Prime Minister said: "We are one year away from an election, and we will have time to discuss it". This is one more promise he does not intend to keep. He now believes the government should be able to stay for up to five years. What did the Prime Minister say on December 9, 1983 about governments staying longer than five years? He said: "Sure, some governments might decide to stay for more than four years, but it just means they are tired. It means they are bankrupt". This is what is happening to a government that has lost the confidence of the Canadian people. Not just in one region of this country but in all regions. Just look at the latest polls.

Since I am sharing my speaking time with the hon. member from Nepean, I would like to use the few minutes I have left to talk mostly about my own region, the Montreal region, which is in very bad shape. I remember we used to have a slogan in Montreal: Montreal equals pride, Montreal equals city. Today it is the unemployment capital and the bankruptcy capital. Montreal is no longer Canada's metropolis. Montreal is truly at risk. Since January 1992 we have been suggesting that. The government keeps telling us that the opposition only criticizes. It is easy to criticize, but if you have ideas, let us know and tell us about them. We suggested a short-term action plan in January 1992, ten months ago, with a very vital component. I am referring to an infrastructure program that would have made it possible to kick-start the economy and put Canadians and especially the people of Montreal back to work, because in Montreal construction has always been the bell wether industry. It always took the lead and the rest followed. The construction industry was always there to kick-start the economy and had, in the process, created thousands of jobs, and we had projects that enhanced the environment and the quality of life in our region and our city.

Let us look at the situation in Montreal. In October 1991 Montreal had an unemployment rate of 11.5 per cent or 186,000 people out of work. Today, a year later, the rate is 12.8 per cent or 204,000 people without work.

In the construction industry alone, the engine, a key economic sector, the unemployment rate is nearly 50 per cent. I am not the one saying that. It is the Quebec construction industry commission, the organization that manages all the regulations of the Quebec construction industry for both employees and management. Poverty in Montreal: a little over 615,000 people or 21.5 per cent of the total population of the metropolitan area live in poor households. More than 70 per cent of these poor people live on the island of Montreal and 50 per cent in the city of Montreal itself. In the city of Montreal, which has a million inhabitants, one family in four and one out of two single people are on low income. That is the sad situation of Montreal.

In Montreal alone the food banks distribute 12 tonnes of food a day, enough to fill the Olympic Stadium field to a height of eight feet ten times a year. I am not the one saying that. It was in Le Soleil on March 25, 1992.

Half the adults in Montreal do not work, according to an unpublished document of the Quebec Department of Labour and Income Security. I am not the one saying that; it was in La Presse on February 29, 1992.

The employment level in the cities of Montreal and Laval is 54.6 per cent. A dynamic city usually has an employment level of around 70 per cent outside recession periods.

That is the picture of Montreal. That in broad strokes is how the newspapers describe Montreal.

The occupancy rate for office buildings is lower in Montreal than in the rest of Canada. That was in Le Devoir on November 10, 1992. La Presse of November 10, 1992 reports that home building dropped 11 per cent in October. An 11 per cent drop in just one month. How does one revive the economy when the government tries to tell us that things are moving now and starting to go well?

Poverty among families and children is getting worse in Canada, according to the Campaign 2000 report.

People pay $1,900 more in taxes under the Conservatives. Middle income families have borne the brunt of tax increases since 1984, according to one study. This is not just what opposition critics say; the figures and studies are there.

Despite all that, in addition to raising taxes, the government has also increased all service costs. The other day I had a sickening experience. In my riding office I received an old man who wanted to bring his nephew to Canada because he was old and needed some family member near him. He was told by the immigration bureau that he first had to pay $450 for a sponsorship application, although this service was free before.

We could talk about taxes and charges for immigration, citizenship and passports. If you want a small booklet or folder from the Federal Business Development Bank you have to pay for it.

Despite all that, again this morning, the $34.6 billion federal deficit exceeds the government's objectives, since the minister in his last budget told us that it would be about $27 billion. The deficit is now $35 billion, in spite of all the tax increases.

I see that my time is nearly up.

• (1320)

It is clear. My colleague had to move a motion because it will be four years tomorrow. Since this government was elected and it is now time to have an election so that Canadians can change this government and hope to have a better life, as the Americans just did south of our border.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, last night in this House I had the opportunity to provide answers to some of the concerns of the hon. member for Saint-Léonard regarding the economy of Montreal. I find it particularly hard to take that in all his statements, he never said anything positive about the economy of Montreal and the dynamism of its people.

Through my involvement with the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, I have had the opportunity in the last several years to meet the business community of Montreal and to work closely with many of those involved in that region, and I can tell you that the people of Montreal and the participants in the economic, social and political life of that region are extremely dynamic. Through their efforts, they were able to make up for the losses incurred in certain traditional sectors, which were doomed in any case. Some industries were going to disappear but the business people and successive municipal governments in Montreal have worked hard, to strengthen the aeronautics, high technology, pharmaceutical and research and development sectors. For instance, we can think of Bombardier, which is an extremely dynamic company, run and controlled by Montrealers.

One must recognize that Montreal remains a strategic location on the St. Lawrence Seaway. Montreal is still at the crossroads of the major airlines of the world. Since 1984, our government has supported all the efforts to stimulate the economy of Montreal and to maintain a strong economic activity in that city. Our government has also supported the efforts made by these involved in Montreal's economy.

I tend to believe that the negative aspects in the Montreal region are much more the result of short-sighted policies implemented by the previous federal government and the government of the Parti Quebecois. Could the hon. member for Saint-Léonard tell us at some point if he sees anything positive about the situation in Montreal?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, last night my colleague and I had a little discussion on that issue. I deplored the situation, as I just did again, because for a year now, I have been asking questions in the House about the bad situation that prevails in Montreal.

Yet, last night and again today, my colleague talked about the aeronautic industry. Indeed, there have been some small investments here and there. We know that the aeronautic industry is very important for Montreal. But when Montrealers look at what is going on today in that field with our two air lines, they get very worried. What does the governmente do? It was aware of the problems, which have existed for two years. The government drags its feet.

As for pharmaceuticals, I agree that this sector has attracted investments and created hundreds of jobs. But the problem still remains. The unemployment rate in Montreal is now over 17 per cent. Therefore I cannot talk about anything else. This unemployment rate of 17 per cent is for the east end of Montreal. In my area, it is as high as 25 per cent. This situation is unbearable.

The hon. member says that the government has always supported those who have wanted to launch projects. In Montreal we had the PAREL program which was very important for the city of Montreal. It provided for the renovation of houses and gave work to the construction industry. This government eliminated the program.

The mayors of Montreal and of several suburbs support our request for the implementation of an infrastructure program because it would provide work for just about everybody, not only skilled workers. That is what we need. This is why I say that the government should heed the requests made by every group and sector of our society for the immediate implementation of an infrastructure program to stimulate the economy and put Canadians back to work.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand in this House and speak to the motion which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation and has lost the confidence of this House and of the Canadian people and that, therefore, an election should be called forthwith, in accordance with the Canadian custom, practice and tradition of holding a general election at least every four years.

This motion was put forward by my esteemed colleague for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. It is most important and very serious.

In 1983 the current Prime Minister stood in this House and declared: "The government should honour the fundamental British tradition in this country which calls for an election, not in five years, but within four years, so that people can judge the action of the government".

I whole-heartedly agree with the Prime Minister in his comments. I also must congratulate him for sticking to his principles the first four years of his mandate as Prime Minister of this country. He launched the 1988 election by declaring: "It has been a Canadian tradition to call an election after a government has completed four years of a mandate".

One would expect any principled individual to do the same thing four years later, but unfortunately this same Prime Minister has decided that there are things greater than principle. Even more unfortunately we have seen this Prime Minister and his Conservative colleagues cast aside principle on too many occasions over the past eight years.

The latest polls show the popularity of this government at only 22 per cent. I would like to take the time today to outline some of the things which have caused Canadians to lose confidence in this government.

First and foremost is the economy. It has been totally mismanaged by this Conservative government. The inaugural issue of Canadian Business Economics reports that tax increases since 1984 have been historically unprecedented in magnitude. The increase in the tax burden in Canada was by far the largest among the G-7 countries of the world.

Taxes on the household sector in this country saw an increase of 6.7 per cent of gross domestic product between 1984 and 1991. Comparatively in the United States, the increase was only 1.3 per cent. Furthermore the additional tax burden borne by the average Canadian family will be an increase of $1,894 in 1992.

It is well recognized that the major challenge facing Canada today is that we must become more competitive in today's interdependent and highly competitive global economy. However, some serious disturbing signs of Canadian competitiveness and our weaknesses have emerged over the last 10 years. Specifically, in relation to our major international competitors, growth in our manufacturing productivity and technology performance—two key indicators of competitiveness—has been quite poor. Our ability to compete in today's changing world economy is being eroded, not the least by the amount of the national debt that Canadians are financing.

Canada's merchandise trade surplus has fallen from $19.8 billion in 1984 to $11 billion in 1991. Canada's current account balance has gone from a $2 billion surplus in 1984 to a deficit of $27 billion in 1991.

Canada's share of world trade slipped from 5 per cent in 1979 to 4 per cent in 1989. Canada only has 2.6 per cent of the world share of trade in high technology products, compared with 3.5 per cent in 1971. Canada's labour productivity has grown only 1.8 per cent between 1979 and 1989, compared with 5.5 per cent in Japan and 3.2 per cent in the United States. Canada has lost over 200,000 manufacturing jobs over the past 30 months, and most of those jobs were here in the province of Ontario.

In order to meet the demands of globalization, some important restructuring in industrial economies is necessary. Unfortunately the government has not taken any steps to meet these demands.

Canada needs a policy which both acknowledges economic change and which helps Canadians adapt to these changes. Recognizing the link between free markets and government is one step toward accomplishing this goal.

Liberals advocate a global trade policy driven by Canada's strategic trade priorities which reduces our dependence on the United States and which would endeavour to make Canada the first global outward oriented economy on the continent.

Liberals recognize that trade policy must be closely associated with domestic policy. Monetary fiscal investment, training, education and research policies must be linked together with our trade policy. The Conservative government has failed to recognize this need. It has also failed to recognize the need to rethink attitudes toward issues such as education and training, research and development, interprovincial trade barriers and labour management relations.

The Conservative government has failed to realize that education, research and environmental policies are the building blocks of economic growth. These failures have caused serious problems for Canadians from coast to coast.

The current Prime Minister of Canada told this House in 1983: "It does happen that a government sits too long. It does become exhausted and it does become bankrupt of ideas".

I think Canadians everywhere recognize the truth of those words. This Conservative government has lost the confidence of the Canadian people. An election should be called. Canadians have suffered enough.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I was glad that my colleague started her speech by reading the motion before us today, and I will do the same because I want the Canadian people to know exactly what we are dealing with today.

The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation—

The opposition has been clamouring for elections. When you call for elections to be held, you do so because you intend to campaign and win and eventually come to power. God forbid this political formation was to come to power with the same leader today.

Twice in the past this leader had the opportunity to put goverment finance in order. Each time—and I think that many share this view—he failed. Let me give you a couple of examples. The Leader of the Opposition was the President of Treasury Board from 1974 to 1976. Normally, the role of Treasury Board is to veto the expenditures the various departments are planning. However, government expenditures increased by 16.3 per cent in 1975–76 and 14.6 per cent in 1976–77. Within two years this Leader of the Opposition who aspires to become Prime Minister of Canada authorized the following increases in expenditures: a 34 per cent increase in salary and wages; 18 per cent in communication and transportation expenses; 43 per cent in government rent expenses; 53 per cent in expenses associated with machinery and equipment, and, finally, 38 per cent for professional and special services.

That is not all. Later on, the Leader of the Opposition became Minister of Finance from 1977 to 1979. During 1978–79 expenditures went up 10.3 per cent and for 1978–79 the defict grew because of an increase of the national debt in excess of 50 per cent within two years.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, this parliamentarian, this Leader of the Opposition, likes to spend and to borrow. In this House he has opposed just about every expenditure restraint measure put forward by this government, while requesting additional financing for a slew of programs and other expenditures.

The prospect of this political formation coming to power worries me. I would like to ask the hon. member if the Canadian people can afford such a leader in terms of the management of government finance?

[English]

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member on the opposite side of the House for her comments.

It never ceases to amaze me that we have had a government in power for eight years that cannot resist speaking on records of previous governments and will not address its own record as the government of this country.

Since the previous speaker raised the issue of what the Liberals have done in the past, I would like to talk also about that. Under previous Liberal governments, the people of this country had prosperity. The finest social programs in this country were implemented under previous Liberal governments.

Our medicare system was initiated by a Liberal government. We have our old age security pensions, thanks to Liberal governments. We have our social safety net program, thanks to previous Liberal governments. We had the highest standard of living that we have ever had in this country under previous Liberal governments.

I do not believe that any Liberal government of the past has anything to be ashamed of. We can hold our head high. We can be proud.

Under this present government we have had the biggest tax increases in history. From the period 1984 to 1988, this country had the largest increase in revenue in history. What did the government do with it? It blew it.

I circulated just recently a questionnaire on the economy in the constituency of Nepean. Questionnaire after questionnaire was returned to me. People are anxious, people are cynical about this government. They have had tax increases that they cannot carry. They have their young people that they can no longer educate. Our young people cannot get jobs. This government does not have one thing to hold its head up high about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting debate today.

I want to talk specifically on the motion put forward today that calls for an election and holding the Prime Minister to statements that he made from time to time when he was in opposition. Not a whole lot has changed. I guess that is the role that we play when we are in opposition, reminding government of some of the things that it said when it was in opposition.

We know and you know it is constitutionally set out that we have elections every five years in this country and we are going to have another one. There is no question about it. I guess if I were a member of the Liberal Party I would be calling for an election.

Some hon. members: Now, now.

Mr. Thompson: They are saying "now, now". It is coming, as the Prime Minister has noted. If I were leading in the polls, I would certainly want an election now as well.

The reason the election is not going to happen now is simply because the support that they are receiving now is rather shallowly rooted.

• (1340)

There are reasons for that. Obviously one of the reasons the support is going to other parties than ours is simply because of the tough times we are going through. No one questions that. We are going through some pretty tough times.

I want to point to an election south of the border in the last couple of weeks in the United States of America. What did they do? We know what they did. They turfed out the incumbent president, did they not? They turfed him out for a number of reasons. They were not satisfied with what was happening. We can understand that because that is how it works.

The point to be made is that if we had an election today, the very same thing could happen. In the U.S. there were signs that the American economy was starting to pick up. In fact the U.S. had six consecutive months of growth in their economy. We can argue that it was not strong enough and we will all accept that. Obviously the American people did not think that it was strong enough.

I wish to point something out in the November 16 edition of Business Week. There is a weekly article called "Business Outlook". I just want to read from that because I think it puts it in perspective. "The sign in President-elect Bill Clinton's campaign's headquarters in Little Rock says it all. It is the economy, stupid". That note kept Clinton's election bid focused on the key issue, which he rode all the way to the White House.

No mistake there. He did the right thing. I do not blame him. I would do the same thing if I were running for office there. After the election they say: "Now comes the hard part. What makes the President-elect's task unusually difficult is the long-term nature of many of the economy's problems and Washington's diminished power to do anything about them. The limitations placed on both fiscal and monetary policy by record federal deficits and other structural impediments only complicate the job at finding solutions that everyone can live with, especially the financial markets".

That is not unlike some of our problems. The previous speaker from Nepean focused on the debt and I will have to step through that as well. The world is locked into some pretty tough economic times. The U.S. obviously is and Canada obviously is. We are a product of many, many years of mismanagement. It would be unfair for me to blame just the previous Liberal government. It is easy for me to say that because most of them over there will admit that they made mistakes. All governments in the western world in the last 25 to 30 years have all developed this mentality that we can live off our credit and that we really do not have to pay the bills.

The day of reckoning is here. That day of reckoning actually started in 1984 for us when we took office. What happened in 1984 when we took office was simply this. As members on the front bench admitted in 1984, they had left the cupboard bare. There was no money anywhere. They thought that we would have such a tough time governing and have to face such tough music that we would never get re-elected. They took great delight in that. That happened to be the way it was.

The problem was on that $200 billion debt that we inherited, we did not have the cash to pay interest on it. We had a structural deficit, a yearly deficit that added to the problem. What we were doing was to borrow money to buy the groceries. What has happened between 1984 and 1992, a period of eight years, is that that debt has compounded. The interest on that debt is compounded. Anyone knows that if you put money in the bank at 12 per cent interest for six years your principal will double with compounded interest. That is the way it works.

Unfortunately it operates the reverse when you owe money. Now we have an accumulated debt of over $400 billion and we do not like it. Nobody likes it. Folks over there do not like it either. The point that I am making in reference to the U.S. is simply this. No matter who takes office tomorrow morning if we did have an election, we are facing the reality of some pretty tough music, as Bill Clinton is facing in the United States.

I wish Mr. Clinton the best of luck for a lot of reasons. He deserves the job, he worked hard for it, he had a flawless campaign and there is no question about it. It is argued in the States that the president squandered his popularity, that he should have dealt with the tough issues when his popularity was very high. The American people probably would have accepted that. He did not do it.

I hope the American economy does grow because it is a great trading partner of ours and it just happens to be one of the reasons why our position internationally is not worse than it is. The statistics prove that our trade relations with the United States and the free trade agreement are working in our favour.

This year our trade surplus with the United States will be at an all-time historical high. It should come in in our favour, that is, with a surplus of $19 billion to $20 billion. It is working. Therefore, we cannot allow ourselves to fall into that flawed logic that the opposition sometimes throws at us. It is working well.

If the American economy can pick up some speed and continue to grow, it should pay dividends to us as Canadians. After all, the U.S. is our biggest trading partner. We wish it the best of luck and Mr. Clinton too. We hope the U.S. can proceed down the road to economic recovery.

I want to compare as well today before I sit down our record with the record across the floor. Ten years ago today, Mr. Speaker, you were sitting here and I was not. At that time unemployment in this country was 13 per cent. Interest rates were at 22 per cent. I remember those because I was working in the car business and I had to scratch and work pretty hard to make a living.

Inflation peaked at that period at 13 per cent. I want to compare those three statistics with what is happening today in Canada. We do not take much pride in this, but unemployment today is 11.3 per cent, which is less than it was 10 years ago. We are coming out of it. We can talk a little bit about the increase in employment rolls today as well.

Interest rates today even after yesterday's big increase are at 9 per cent. The prime rate is 9 per cent. Ten years ago it was at 22 per cent. Inflation 10 years ago was 13 per cent and today it is 1.3 per cent.

What is happening is that we do have the fundamentals there. They are there and if the world economy can move out of the recession, the western world particularly, we are positioned to do very well.

I have last week's The Economist. It has charts in here and it is important that we look at these from time to time because when they rail against what we are doing as a government, they fail to recognize what we are doing in relation to the rest of the world, whether it is interest rates or something else.

I know we are taking a lot of heat on the interest rate increase from yesterday. It is remarkable. When you look at the economic and financial indicators that apply to the rest of the world, you will find that we are positioned very well. In terms of prime lending rates, there are only two industrialized nations on the face of the earth that have lower rates than Canada, and that has not always been the case. Those two countries for the sake of interest are Japan and the United States. The United States is just marginally behind us and that is important to consider.

Let us go back to some of those indicators that I mentioned earlier. When foreign corporations, banking institutions and entrepreneurs take a look at a country and decide where they are going to invest, those are some of the things that they look at. They look particularly at inflation.

• (1350)

Inflation under the previous administration, as I pointed out, is exactly 10 times less today than it was 10 years ago. Canada is open for investment. We are going to continue to get foreign investment in this country because the indicators are there that some of the things that we are doing are starting to work.

Let me go through more of them. Labour productivity in this country rose 3.3 per cent in the first half of this year. It never did that under the previous administration. Labour unit growth decelerated. It went down. It is one of the things that we like to see go down. Labour costs went down. They fell sharply to 1.5 per cent in the first half of 1992 from a high of 8.2 per cent in the first quarter of 1991.

Those are the types of numbers that investors are looking at. Those are the types of things that investors in this country take some satisfaction from. They know that it is not perfect out there, but they know the fundamentals are there. That is important.

One thing that has not happened in 25 or 30 years is that relative to the United States, our big trading partner to the south, unit labour costs in Canada were down almost 5 per cent in the first half of this year, a remarkable statistic. That should be telling all Canadians that we are becoming competitive and the rest of the world is recognizing that. We just need a few breaks along the way to move to where we want to be with those unemployment numbers increasingly declining, going down, moving in the right direction.

In relation to the free trade agreement, I have mentioned some of the numbers and I mentioned the fact that our trade surplus with the United States this year will be the highest in the history of Canada, not lower. Our exports of goods and services have increased by over $15 billion since the FTA was implemented. Canada's share of the total U.S. imports has risen 3 per cent to 20 per cent since 1989. In other words, the total number of goods imported into that country in relation to Canada has increased by 3 per cent, but do not tell anybody that. Do not tell the United States that. If it knew that it would not be too pleased with the statistic.

What does the NDP say about all this? My Liberal friends will get a kick out of this one. What did the leader of the NDP say the other day? She said if they get elected they are going to do a couple of things. The first thing they are going to do is tear up that agreement. They are going to change it. We will not have to worry about her tearing it up or the NDP because it is not going to take office. The fight will be between us and the folks immediately across the Chamber.

I should not blame it on the leader of the NDP because this is party policy, they were all part of this one, but the leader of the NDP is also telling us that if they take office they will abolish the GST. This is most interesting. What they are forgetting is that the GST accounts for about $18 billion worth of revenue.

Again, our friends across the Chamber recognize that. They have basically said there may be some restructuring—they will not tell us what kind of restructuring—but no way can they eliminate it because they are smart enough to know that you cannot forgo $18 billion in revenue.

The folks at the other end of the Chamber, the NDP, have indicated that they will eliminate the GST or that source of revenue, totalling $18 billion. They forgot to tell us what they are going to replace it with. Correction, they did not tell us what they would replace it with, they will not replace it. What they will do is add another $18 billion on to the debt load.

Perhaps they will not. Perhaps what they will do is follow the member for Timmins—Chapleau. He says if we take office do not worry about borrowing money, do not worry about raising money, we will just turn on the printing presses and print more money. That is the other side of their philosophy.

What it brings to mind is an article in Maclean's magazine of November 23. The article, Business Watch, written by Peter C. Newman, says beware of Marxist philosophy. David Blake called it Marxist philosophy but he alludes to the Marx brothers, Harpo, Groucho, and Chico. They all reside on that end of the Chamber. That is the Marxist philosophy that they follow because you do not have to be accountable to anyone, make any kind of outrageous promise that you wish, because you will never have to take office, you never will take office, you never have to honour those pledges to the Canadian people.

The people of Canada are not satisfied, I agree with you totally and that is borne out in the statistics in terms of our popularity. I go back to a term heard from time to time in regard to elections. A famous Canadian tells us this one from time to time: "There is nothing like a lynching to focus the mind."

It goes back to what I am referring to, their lead in the polls. What is going to happen when the Canadian people go to the polls is they will sort through all of this. They say things are not good and things are not good in Europe or the U.S. and President-elect Clinton is struggling to make things better in the U.S. What they will figure out is there are no magic answers because if there were magic answers we would wave the wand and everything would be perfect.

We are caught in an economic trap in a sense because government debt load is the highest in recorded history. The private sector debt load, the corporate side, is the highest in the history of the country and consumer debt is the highest in the history of the country. That is pretty well the same in all parts of the world. That is what makes it so difficult for us to get out from underneath this terrible burden.

We can be assured of one thing, one thing that we will not do, and that is we are not going to borrow money to solve the problem because history simply proves that does not work. It simply does not work and we are not going to do it.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was quite interested when the hon. member was talking about the NDP policies. We agree on that. Not all of the blame is to fall on the government's shoulders. The Government of Ontario takes a big part of that blame. There is no question about it. The member is quite right when he talked about the failure of the NDP governments in Ontario and in most of the provinces that have leaders who are NDP. Their policies have failed. We have seen more and more plants closing on a daily basis in those provinces.

I was quite interested when he indicated that the NDP's way out of the recession is by printing more money. That is very interesting and I would like to find out more about that printing machine or that way of reducing the deficit.

I am also quite interested to hear that in Ontario we have the largest ever deficit in the history of the province. I do not know about this next budget but perhaps we will have per capita in Ontario, with an NDP government, the largest deficit anywhere in the western hemisphere.

The reason I am upset about it is that lately the Government of Ontario is embarking on a mission to go after senior citizens who live in government subsidized housing. In addition to the rent that they pay, now the Government of Ontario wants to charge them extra for painting the apartment or for cleaning their windows from the outside.

When a government that always claims to be the friend of the people proceeds with such initiatives and when it starts taking such actions, you and I know the true picture of the NDP government and the true philosophy and policy of the NDP government, which is this: When they are in opposition they say one thing, but when they form the government they say something else. Well, that was the NDP.

In terms of the comment of the hon. member from the government side that we do not have the money so we cannot spend it, I want to share one thing with him. It takes money to make money. If you do not invest in the economy, you are not going to be able to generate revenues. That is why the Liberal policy, as it was communicated by our leader, of investing in an infrastructure is the best way in the short term to activate or kick-start the economy, in order to create jobs, in order to invest in the future, in order to help out Canadians who are struggling to make it.

I do not want to go over the past. I was not around eight or ten years ago in order to defend the track record of this ministry or that ministry. But we have a minister here, the Minister of Transport, who was a co-chair of the national task force on the infrastructure. I recall I was a municipal politician at the time. I read his report. I was pleased that he had supported at that time a call on the government to enact a tri-party agreement whereby the federal government would put in a third, the provincial government would put a third and the municipal government a third toward infrastructure.

I call on the minister to go back to that report and to encourage his colleagues in caucus in order to make sure that an infrastructure program is put in place so we can attack this problem in the short term.

I would like to hear a comment from the hon. member, telling me whether he supports such an initiative that deals with infrastructure proposals.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I do not totally disagree with the suggestion of putting massive amounts of money into infrastructure. I do not think anyone, even on this side of the House, would totally disagree with it. The difficulty obviously is how much is enough, and where do you find the money? That is the problem that I guess we as a government face. It is a tough one.

We use the old term ourselves, even though sometimes we hate to hear it, kick-start the economy. Going back to what I had previously mentioned, that would be fine if our debt load were not as high as it presently is. There is no problem with that. The problem is when you step through all the engines of the economy, if you wish, the private sector—that is the engine—the corporate sector, and you might say the individual sector, all of those things have to be working to make the economy work.

You know there is a very, very high debt level, and that is the problem. How much do you use? In a sense, when you say how much do you use, you are asking how much do you borrow to make it happen.

Here is an interesting statistic. We talk about the time that we took office and what we have for an accumulated debt today. Let us forget about whose fault it is. We will continually blame each other, no matter how long this House sits. Anyway, we all agree that today it is somewhere in the vicinity of $400 billion, give or take a few billion. But let us say it is $400 billion, which it is. Today it consumes about 31 per cent of all revenue, just paying interest on that debt load of $400 billion.

If we had followed on the old course with the spending habits of the previous government, and with due respect not too many of us in this House were in that old government, none of us on this side at least, statistically we would have a debt load now of $900 billion, close to one trillion. There are so many zeros on the end of that one you need a half-ton truck to carry them around with you. We would have a debt load of about $900 billion. This is the important part to remember because it would not be consuming 31 per cent of revenues to service the interest on the debt, it would be taking over 60 per cent of those revenues. Then you have lost control. The International Monetary Fund moves in and governs Canada, if you wish. That is the difficulty.

That goes back to the premise of the member's question. How much do we borrow to throw into the economy to kick-start it? The honest to goodness truth is that I am not sure we can afford to borrow any more. I think we have got to find the money somehow. Personally, I see the solution to the problem as simply this: The international world and the corporate sector do have a fairly high degree of confidence in Canada. The difficulty now is that we do not have confidence in ourselves at the consumer level.

What I see happening in Canada today, and you can blame it on a number of things including, if you wish, our tax structure, is that consumers in Canada are not spending and retail tax revenues are going to be down. My guess is, based on what I see happening, they are going to be down by about 13 per cent. Therefore, the best thing that could happen in Canada would be if consumers started spending. It would generate enough revenue that the government then would have enough movement to do something without borrowing more money.

I think part of the solution to the problem rests with ourselves. When that confidence reaches a certain point and Canadians start spending, I think we will be on the road to recovery because the other fundamentals are there. That is happening south of the border, it is starting to happen here and we hope that it continues to proceed along that way.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the previous speaker from the government side. I want to say respectfully to the member from New Brunswick who spoke to the issue of infrastructure that I am sure the people in his region and his province are waiting anxiously for some announcement in the area of infrastructure to address the highways of New Brunswick and equally so across all other provinces of the country. I think that there is some interest. We welcome that initiative from the government side and look forward to it coming forward as soon as possible.

To the issue of today, I am pleased to rise on the motion brought forward by my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. The motion before us today states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation and has lost the confidence of this House and of the Canadian people and that, therefore, an election should be called forthwith, in accordance with the Canadian custom, practice and tradition of holding a general election at least every four years.

Canadians know that the fourth anniversary of the Conservative government's election occurs this weekend. I do not know that a great number of Canadians will be celebrating and saying "happy Anniversary" and the likes of that. They are aware because over the last four years the people of Canada have suffered considerably under the social and economic mismanagement of the country by the Conservatives.

It is understandably hard for Canadians to forget four years of being taxed to death, of losing their jobs and of the damage they have received from a never-ending recession. The Canadian economy today is in ruins. Over 1.6 million Canadians are out of work while many more have simply given up trying to find a job. The number of welfare recipients across Canada has steadily increased and will continue to do so as more and more businesses and factories close and as those who receive UI have their claims run out without finding any alternative employment. What is even worse, the evidence indicates that child poverty in Canada has reached critical proportions. According to a recent report issued by Campaign 2000, which represents a coalition of national and community social organizations, between 1989 and 1990 the number of children living in poverty increased by more than 170,000 to a total of 1.1 million. This means that one out of six Canadian children lives in poverty.

In addition, the report states that there are 342 food banks in Canada and that two thirds of food baskets go to families with children. In my opinion, these statistics amount to a national disgrace for our country and the government must assume a large part of the responsibility for what has occurred.

The city of Cornwall in my riding of Stormont—Dundas is a clear example of how the federal government has failed to provide the economic leadership and direction required for Canada. Cornwall has suffered considerably as a result of the recession. Like many other cities and towns across Canada that have been hard hit, Cornwall has received nothing from Ottawa that could stimulate an economic recovery.

For over two years my colleagues from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Leeds—Grenville, Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke and I have asked the government to implement an eastern Ontario economic development program for the region. The government, however, has chosen to ignore the severe economic downturn that has occurred in communities such as Hawkesbury, Pembroke and Cornwall.

Massive lay-offs, plant closures and job losses have failed to convince the government that a need exists for assistance similar to what the government provides through the FEDNOR program for northern Ontario or the Canada—Quebec subsidiary agreement.

The recession, combined with the GST, the fall-out from the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the dramatic increase in cross-border shopping, which is itself directly related to the excessive taxes the government has introduced, have all taken their toll on the local economy of Cornwall and other border communities.

Over the past 36 months plant closures have caused over 2,500 jobs to be lost. The unemployment rate in Cornwall is over 20 per cent and the city ranks third in Ontario in the percentage of population on general welfare. Yet, instead of doing something to generate business and investment, the federal government has done virtually nothing.

Given the situation in Cornwall and in other communities across Canada which have suffered similar economic fates, one is truly left wondering how many Canadians have to lose their jobs, how many Canadians have to go on welfare and how many Canadian factories and businesses have to cease operations and close their doors before the government will act.

In its rampant pursuit to control the deficit, the government has plunged the nation into economic chaos. The odd thing about it is that the deficit, let alone the national debt, is hardly being addressed at all. In fact, every time the Minister of Finance has made a forecast about the amount of the deficit and the government's ability to address it, he has never come close.

Yesterday the government released its budget deficit figure for 1991–92. The final figure of $34.6 billion for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992 is $4 billion more than the previous fiscal year and is more than $3 billion higher than what was forecast in the federal budget last February.

When the Conservatives first took office in 1984, they inherited a period of reasonable economic growth in Canada. Yet, even with this period to build upon and after introducing well over 30 new or increased taxes which taxed Canadians into oblivion, they have nothing to show for it at the conclusion of their eight–year reign of economic terror. Any other respectable government would be ashamed of itself. Not this one. Its economic philosophy of stay the course has been the same since day one in 1984. It has stayed the course. While the government has remained ideologically sound, it has all but bankrupted the Canadian economy.

It is unconscionable for this government to run ads on national television about how Canada can be competitive in the world and how job retraining programs are providing the impetus for the Canada of tomorrow. Every Canadian knows that we can compete with the best in the world if given the opportunity. Unfortunately it is very hard to be competitive if the federal government itself is incompetent.

It is no secret, as much as the present government would like it to be, that there are not enough funds to meet the demand for job retraining programs.

I recently participated in a rather unpleasant experience in my riding. The local Canada employment office in Cornwall had to inform unemployed workers participating in educational upgrading programs that there were not enough funds left to see them through to graduation. Some of these individuals were finished their first year of courses and were well on their way to learning new skills, to being better qualified and thereby obtaining improved opportunities at re–entering the work force. I can assure you that the "yes we can" slogans from the government's TV ad campaign were not going over very big then.

I would like to make one other point, and it is with reference to the impact that the economic policy of the government has had on small businesses in Canada. I believe that small business is the backbone of the Canadian economy, however the goods and services tax and the myriad of taxes that have descended upon small business owners have forced many of them into bankruptcy.

The combination of the ongoing recession, the implementation of the GST, the recent high interest rate policy of the government and the reluctance of the Canadian consumers to purchase goods and services while in fear of losing their jobs have all had a disastrous impact on the ability of small business to survive.

It is my belief that not only has the small business community had to endure the fall–out from the government's economic mismanagement, it has perhaps suffered a significant blow to the desire of individuals to take the risk and start up a business.

I believe the federal government has done a considerable amount to erase the entrepreneurial spirit in Canada. With today's tough economic climate, there are not too many people eager to rush in and start a small business. Such a situation does not hold much promise for a better economic future for Canada. Given the number of Canadians that small businesses employ and their importance to the Canadian economy, it is imperative that measures be taken to rekindle the entrepreneurial spirit in our country before it is lost forever.

One of the first steps in that process and also to bring about an over–all economic recovery would be for the Prime Minister to dissolve Parliament and provide Canadians with an opportunity to elect a new government that has both the ideas and the ability to bring about the real and economic change.

The Prime Minister has stated that come election time his government will have nothing to fear in going before the people of Canada on its record. If this is indeed the case, the Prime Minister should refrain from looking at polls and go to the people instead and to do this at the earliest opportunity for the sake of Canada and all Canadians.

In conclusion, in order to hasten the Prime Minister along, I ask that all members of this House support the motion which is before us today.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I heard one of my colleagues across the Chamber today saying: "It takes money to make money. Spend, spend, spend". Over the years, I have heard this many times from the opposition. Certainly, if we look at the record, the growth in program spending for the years 1969–70 to 1984–85 was on average 13.8 per cent. The growth in the last three years of the Liberal government, when we look at 1980–81, was 16.5 per cent. In 1981–82 it was 14.75 per cent and in 1982–83 it was 19.75 per cent.

In the last eight years this government has looked at an increase of on average 3.6 per cent. My question to my colleague across the way is: Is this the policy of the Liberals? Is it the policy to spend, spend, spend, to spend our way out of the recession? Do they have anything else to offer Canadians other than to spend, spend, spend?

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Wild Rose for her question. With regard to spending, the intervention we heard prior to my speaking from her colleague from New Brunswick in relation to infrastructure would give her some insight into the ideals and policies of the Liberal government.

In fact, yes, at this time in our economy and facing the high unemployment we have, we would intervene. We hope that her government will do likewise. If I read correctly and if I am hearing properly, in fact those members are considering and will bring forward an infrastructure program in partnership with the provinces to address the issue of transportation through improvements to highways.

I believe that is very similar to the thoughts and beliefs of the Liberal Party. The Liberal Party has been on the record for some time in wanting to have government, in this case this government, get into partnership with the provinces and with municipalities in an infrastructure program. I welcome the initiative that the government is bringing in an infrastructure program in partnership with the provinces to address the national transportation network through highway improvements and so on.

Certainly the Liberal Party is in support of those types of initiatives. My party does not believe in spending and spending. We have to be fiscally responsible regardless of who forms the next government. But certainly this is a critical time for government to get involved in the marketplace and initiate an infrastructure program. I hope the government will act on its initiative that I understand is coming forward very shortly.

What else would the Liberal Party have to offer? We would have a great deal of hope to offer to Canadians. They want the chance, as our good neighbours to the south had recently, of going to the polls, electing a new government and giving them new hope.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member make reference to the goods and services tax as being one of the evils this government has created, or at least in any event it is being harnessed with the blame. I sat here intrigued. I too do not like being the bearer of a public, a visible tax to replace a hidden tax.

As we all know in this Chamber the public does not react to the reality that this visible tax has replaced a hidden tax. It just requires a leap of faith. We thought that with the initiation of this tax Canadian taxpayers had the right to know what the government was taking out of their pockets and as a result we decided to go public with it. Perhaps politically it was not a very astute move but from the standpoint of honesty it was really the only way we could go.

I sat intrigued and asked myself if perhaps there was a better way to raise the revenues which everyone in the House will recognize were raised in a negative way in manufacturing through the federal sales tax and replaced by the goods and services tax.

Let us assume a full moon should rise at the same time that a low comes in from the maritimes and clouds everyone's vision and a Liberal government should be elected, what would the Liberal Party do? What would it suggest we do? What would it do to replace the revenue from the GST? Should it eliminate it or in fact would its plan be to eliminate it?

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's question. Let me start off by speaking on the GST from a regional perspective, from my own situation in Stormont—Dundas and Cornwall, which is on the north shores of the St. Lawrence river just adjacent to northern New York State. Taxes are never popular for any government, be it municipal, provincial or federal. It will be no different for the next government. If ever there was a tax revolt in Canada particularly in border communities, this tax initiated that more than any other I recollect.

Another negative impact of that tax has been that a great deal of money has gone underground. You see people trading services and so on. I recognize as the hon. member said that the former tax it replaced—and I am of that same school of thought, that tax had to be replaced. In this case, the government chose this tax. For the Liberal Party we recognize first and foremost that there is that $18 billion revenue which has to be replaced. You cannot say that you are going to get rid of the tax and not replace it. I recognize that the NDP possibly has a different approach to that. Certainly Liberals recognize that there is a very real revenue there that is critical to the operation of government. Certainly we are in the process of preparing to bring to the Canadian electorate an alternative to that tax recognizing that that revenue has to be substituted. We look forward to bringing that option to the electorate.

As soon as we fulfil this motion today all Canadians will know what the Liberal Party is going to do very precisely to replace that $18 billion revenue that is presently being generated by the goods and services tax.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am also going to consider the motion from the Liberal Opposition which says: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation and has lost the confidence of this House and of the Canadian people," and it goes on about a general election.

I could say to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that I do not listen to criticisms from people with a short memory, but since he is calling for an election I will speak as if I were on the campaign trail. Speaking of election, I must say that I am ready to go as soon as one is called.

Here is part of my first speech, a speech I will deliver tomorrow morning, Saturday, November 21. I can tell the hon. member from the New Democratic Party who is trying to interrupt that unlike him I do not heed polls. Maybe he should try his luck and run for mayor of Montreal this time.

I am pleased to repeat what was said on May 31, 1991 about the Liberal member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, who was a member of the Bélanger-Campeau commission: "Over the last few days, the Liberal member severely criticized the federal intrusion into regional development, and his recent statements to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission showed that Mr. Ouellet was not talking in good faith". The member was saying: "You are not happy when the federal government does not invest, but when it does, you consider that it is dangerous and you say beware of Greeks bearing gifts".

On November 27, 1990, as one can see on page 809 of the official transcripts of the Bélanger-Campeau commission, the same member for Papineau—Saint-Michel said: "When you look at the performance of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion—that is the Conservative government—you realize that year in year out almost a third of its budget goes to Quebec, either through master agreements signed with the provincial government or through direct subsidies to industry. How can you underestimate the concrete results of these direct interventions by the Canadian Conservative government, which might not have given you all you expected but has nevertheless brought about concrete results".

That same November 27, on page 770, the same member is reported to have said: "The PQ is prejudiced against the Canadian government and it distorts the Canadian contribution to regional development". This was written by the member in a press release issued in response to a submission by PQ ridings.

In the newspaper of November 28, 1990 one could read: "Finally yesterday, after defending Quebec's jurisdiction in the area of regional development, he said that it was poor timing to try to intervene in new areas of provincial jurisdiction at a time when we try to come up with a new division of responsibilities within Confederation".

Following the results of the referendum in Quebec there was an editorial in La Presse dated November 14, 1992, signed by Alain Dubuc. It is important that all Canadians know about the comments of one of the best journalists in Canada. He said: "Now that nobody wants to talk about the constitution, we will have to look at problems that we tried to ignore for a decade. It is going to be painful. We have been in a slump for quite a while now. The slide in the standard of living started as early as 1977, but the financial crisis of the state started to build momentum in 1982. As for the economy, Canada has been gradually losing its competitive edge for the last decade; during those ten years, except for a few bursts of energy such as the Ontario Boom, not only has Canada become less prosperous but it has been finding it hard to keep up with the most performing countries". In my opinion, it is this continuous downturn which triggered the political crisis, I mean the crisis which started in 1977. Canada, the triumphant one, was created in the sixties and seventies, rather artificially through massive federal interventions such as regional assistance financed by Ottawa, social programs financed by Ottawa and national institutions also financed by Ottawa.

When the economic slow down and the ensuing loss of prosperity started to impede the workings of the nation, the Canadian Government became unable to deliver the goods, which marked the beginning of the end. For example, it was when the federal government, under the Liberals, tried to replenish its coffers by taxing western resources that the west rebelled. And the more pronounced the crisis became, the more resentment grew as the Liberal government in Ottawa took measures to avert a financial catastrophe.

The reason why Canadians hate the Prime Minister so much is because of a whole array of politics such as the GST, free trade, symbolic cuts to VIA Rail for example, the redesign of unemployment insurance and tax increases. They want to shoot the messenger.

They are disillusioned with politicians mainly because there are no more handouts from the State and their dissatisfaction with federalism in its present form can also be explained that way. That is how, in my opinion, this creeping economic crisis contained all the right ingredients for a political crisis. But the whole situation was compounded by a unique Canadian attitude. Instead of facing up to reality, Canadians chose to flee. They took refuge in their national sport, the Constitution game, and tried to solve very real problems through constitutional amendments. Each region translated its deep resentment into constitutional parlance.

But the bottom line is that if the economy had been in good shape and the central government in good health, this crisis would never have occurred, at least not to such a degree. It is not sure that we can ever go back. These constitutional debates are addictive; right now we are going through withdrawal pains. We have witnessed that for the last few weeks. Canadians are just now discovering their economic woes. And the first thing they want to do is find a political solution to them, throw Brian Mulroney out. But who will take his place? A minority government made up of regional parties who do not even have an economic platform. Once again we resort to magic. People want to replace Mulroney with someone who will promise them things. And lo and behold, the Liberal Party has been making promises these last few days—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that he should not be using the Prime Minister's name. It is the right hon. Prime Minister. Instead of Mr. Mulroney use right hon. Prime Minister, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, you are right. As I was saying at the beginning of my speech, I thought I was in the middle of an election campaign.

People want to replace him with somebody who makes promises, when what we need is somebody who will dare tell the truth. The fact is only a government not afraid of being unpopular will be able to get us out of this mess. Our economy is a shambles. I believe the only person who is not afraid to tell the truth is the Prime Minister of Canada.

In February 1983, under the Liberal government, Abitibi had the highest unemployment rate in the last decade to this day. On June 23, 1992, a local newspaper, La Frontière, mentioned the 1983 unemployment rate: "In the last 12 years, unemployment rates have often exceeded 20 per cent in the regions. Just look at those numbers: November 1981, 22.7 per cent; December 1981, 21.3 per cent. Every month of 1982, except October when the rate was 19.2, and the first six months of 1983, including February when the unemployment rate reached a record high of 28 per cent in Abitibi—Témiscamingue under a Liberal government. In 1984 unemployment remained very high: 21.7 in February, 20.3 in March, 25.7 in September. Such was the situation when we took over in 1984. Today I can tell my political opponents that unemployment is at 12.5 per cent.

Another thing must also be mentioned. Since 1984 when it was first elected, we have solved regional problems in my part of the country. Keep in mind that my riding is the largest one in all of the ten provinces. The day after I won the 1984 election, we discovered that some issues had been neglected for 26 years, some for 10 years. When people speak today of faulty management, I can tell you it is shocking. I could call my critics on the other side many collective names, but I will refrain from doing so.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you, speaking about issues left unsolved for 26 years, about the housing facilities in Barraute, 26 years without giving the people a place to live. We had the Pavillon d'hébergement the very year I was elected. The new terminal at the Transport Canada regional airport was another problem that had been neglected for many years and so were the Cadillac stadium, airports for northern Quebec, developed in cooperation with the federal government, and the Amos municipal airport. Listen, that was a financial matter and the liberal member was a native from Amos and he never could find one penny to invest during the four years he was there. After only three years we solved the financial problem of that airport. I could mention numerous other cases like that.

However, there is one issue I would like to refer to. We were speaking about manpower training. The Parti québécois member for Rouyn-Noranda, Mr. Rémi Trudel, said last year that the best consultation program in Quebec was the communities program created by the federal Tories. It included a Business Development Centre and a Community Futures Committee. With the help of the government in place, we succeeded in doing some patching and we tried to find solutions after a 20 year liberal reign. It is fun to give one's first speech during an electoral period. They want an election. Well we are ready.

It is my first speech. When we go on the election trail, I will be able to say this is my second speech. But I want to warn them before they come to Abitibi. In any case, when they do come, they get there in the afternoon and go back the same night. They make a speech, but they are out of there the very next day. We never see them again. There is one thing I want to tell you though, Mr. Speaker. When I was elected in 1984, I was elected to serve the population be it Liberal or NDP; that is my mandate. If we speak about what we did, we certainly did our bit to maintain jobs. I have here the newspaper from Sunday, October 18, 1992. That is not so long ago. This, the oldest newspaper in Val-d'Or, said the Business Development Centre helped maintain 89 jobs. What is that? That type of thing did not exist in the liberal days. People were starving. They had trouble finding two meals a day.

In the Courrier de Malartic of June 5, 1990 they said that the Business Development Centre of the valley of gold was now ready to fulfil its mission. Those are concrete measures that were implemented in all of the Abitibi—Témiscamingue region. I say to our Liberal opponents that if they want us to call an election, they had better examine our political and our financial accomplishments before they come to our part of the country.

There is one issue I hate to raise in front of the Canadian taxpayers, but I will do so.

• (1440)

Of course there are some good members in the Liberal caucus and the NDP caucus as well. However, according to an article in Montreal's La Presse which appeared on Wednesday, September 30, 1987 the Liberals made Canadians lose billions of dollars. That is what it says. By being excessively concerned with political considerations—this is about 1987, during a press conference held by the Auditor General of Canada, Mr. Ken Dye—the former Liberal government wasted billions of dollars of taxpayers' money.

Early in 1984 the Department of Finance knew the scientific research tax credit program was in trouble. This was early in 1984. It is now 1992, and they want us to call an election. They have forgotten they were in power for 20 years. They have forgotten they left us a debt of $209 billion. They have forgotten that from 1984 to 1992, the compound interest totalled $238 billion. We all have loans. I do, and I pay compound interest on those loans. But the Liberal government left us a present of $238 billion. Imagine what we could do today, if we did not have that debt.

"We repeated our warning half way through the year—these were public servants talking to the Liberal government—but the department did nothing because the government had to". Well that is interesting because these are news clippings from 1987, and they say: "the department did nothing because the government was about to start its election campaign, Mr. Dye explained, appearing before the House of Commons public accounts committee".

Today a member moved a motion calling for an election! Let us go back to 1987. The quote continues "if it had intervened sooner the Liberal government could have saved substantial amounts. Very substantial amounts, since billions of dollars were involved. This controversial tax credit became the costliest tax fiasco in Canadian history. When it was announced in 1983, former Finance Minister Marc Lalonde expected the program would not cost the government, i.e. the taxpayers, more than $200 million".

Scientific research is important. I supported this $200 million program. We welcomed this program. It was welcomed by business people, students and our universities. Everyone was delighted, because $200 million was reasonable. But look at what happened.

The program was abolished by the Conservative government—and we are still in power—and it was criticized for doing so. It was in all the newspapers, and the media really attacked us. However, what the media did not know was that shortly after this government came to power, the program had mushroomed to the tune of $3.5 billion, and up to $1.9 billion of that amount had disappeared as a result of fraud.

How could anyone expect a $200 million program, paid for by taxpayers, to end up costing $3.5 billion, while $1.9 billion of this disappeared as a result of fraud? Just think if we had been able to save that money, those $1.9 billion, how many hospitals we could have built for the sick, how many schools we could have built for our children and how much money we could have invested in regional development.

Fraud was committed when businesses and private citizens applied for tax credits without doing research. The purpose of the program was to offer generous tax credits as an incentive to companies and private citizens to invest in research and development.

According to Mr. Dye, the Department of Finance should have had some suspicions from the very beginning, considering the flood of requests for application forms as soon as the program came into effect in January 1984. However, Mr. Lalonde was confident he had a program that would produce results.

Today many people look at the polls and some look at the figures for their ridings. Polls may be important, but before calling an election, I think we should look at all the Liberal dossiers, the previous government and all its programs.

They did some good things. They helped the people, but when we look at a $200 million program that mushroomed into a $3.5 billion–program, of which $1.9 billion disappeared as a result of fraud, one wonders what happened. As far as elections are concerned we are ready for an election. We are ready to defend our ridings. But I want to make one thing clear to the opposition: We are working for the people of this country. It is not easy today. We are trying to find solutions, but we should all remember that together we can do the job. Together with the opposition. It does not matter who the parties are. Let's find solutions and do what has to be done, in the best interests of all Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, thank you for letting me make some remarks to my colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi, whom I find very enthusiastic and even humorous on occasion and with whom I sit on the Public Accounts Committee. I commend him for agreeing that an election should be held. The hon. member for Abitibi tells us that he is quite ready for an election as of November 21. As you might expect, we will wait a while, perhaps until the snow has melted in Abitibi, so that people can go and vote in large numbers for our colleague from Abitibi. I say that tongue in cheek because our friend, the hon. member for Abitibi, has made gratuitous assertions throughout his speech in this debate.

I found one of the great weaknesses of the Conservative Party today, and we saw it in the hon. member for Abitibi, is that they go back to 1984 or 1983 or 1972 or 1965. As you would expect, they never want to touch the 1930s. One thing we must remember is that we are talking about the government that is now in power. I will tell you about the period from 1988 to 1992 and this government should end in 1993. The debate is on 1988 to 1992, or 1993 if you prefer. The economic policies and guidelines and programs of this government are at issue. That is the question. The question is not whether former Prime Minister Clark or former Prime Minister Diefenbaker or former Prime Minister R. B. Bennett or former Prime Minister Trudeau or former Prime Minister Pearson did this or that.

That is like a boxer who talks about his previous fights of past years. The fight that concerns us is the one today. Today's fight is on the period from 1988 to 1992. I would like the hon. member to tell me about the reports we see every week in the Public Accounts Committee: the Auditor General's reports and disastrous comments about this government's mismanagement. It is all very well to tell us that 89 jobs were created in Abitibi. I would like to know how many food banks were created in Abitibi, in Quebec and throughout Canada between 1988 and 1992. How many manufacturing plants shut down? How many people were laid off? How many unemployed do we have? How many people are looking for work? How many are on welfare? And of those who have jobs, how many feel insecure because of the lack of confidence? What is the interest rate today? And to conclude, if he wants to end with just this question, how much money did the government waste from 1988 to 1992 on advertising campaigns on television and in newspapers and magazines? I would like the hon. member for Abitibi to tell me about that waste of money.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, in answering the Liberal member for Carleton—Gloucester, and I was expecting that one, let us go back to the last few months. I will have to make a second political speech. It will be short and easy. If you look at the development in Abitibi, especially in my riding, which is the largest in all ten provinces, we succeeded in implementing Canada-Quebec agreements on economic development that provide $75 million for 4 ridings. Today there are $14 million left out of the original contribution of $35 million of the federal government. But I made some projects. I made a lot of projects and it is thanks to the two governments that we were able to have agreements. We had a $100 million Canada-Quebec agreement on mining development; the Abitibi—Témiscamingue got $24,8 million. It is not because of the Conservative members but, rather, because of the taxpayers, the contractors and those who have mining projects. We are here to serve these people. We are not here just to cut ribbons and make good speeches. We are here to take calls in our office.

This summer Employment and Immigration was short of $1.3 million to help our students, namely those unemployed people who wanted some training, and who wanted to study and complete their high school. Our government was able to find that money thanks to the Quebec Minister of State for Employment and Immigration. We solved the problem.

Since the hon. member referred to food, let me say that the day after the referendum I turned the first sod for a food co-op, a $4.1 million project. I can tell you that we are building with the Crees in Val-d'Or a food and distribution centre. This is a $5.4 million project that will create 20 jobs.

Talking about bad management, my friend is a member of the public accounts committee. But what is taking place right now with the public accounts? They are just finding out that money was wasted on CIDA programs, on programs and projects that go back 10 years. We always find out about the bad news five or six years later.

If we talk about development it is because it is important to us. We work and we try to find solutions. He talked about the Business Development Centre that helps preserve 89 jobs. Our government has spent $2.2 million in the Val-d'Or region to help businesses and to protect jobs.

The hon. member talks about wasting money. I am pleased to hear him talk about wasting money and I am also pleased to tell him that I am the only Canadian and Conservative member of Parliament, that releases his expenses throughout Canada. I release them to all the media, every three months. I just tabled a bill here in this House. I hope that the hon. member will support it so that after the next election all federal members of Parliament will make their expenses public. But when my colleague talks about wasting money for publication and publicity purposes in Canada, I would like to get figures. In any case, the federal government has always been the one that spent the most money to inform the taxpayers and the public of its programs. This has always been the case.

I agree with the hon. member when he says that it is not easy these days. We are here to serve the public, regardless of our political stripes.

In my offices, I have one in Senneterre where, for the first time they have an MP office, one in Amos and Val-d'Or. We take calls and it is not easy these days to talk to students and unemployed people, but together we can find solutions and go forward to build a better Canada.

Mr. Bellemare: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know that it is Friday afternoon and that everybody is tired. But is it appropriate in the House of Commons for a member to rise when he is wearing an old pair of blue jeans?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that, from where I am, I can see the hon. member is wearing a shirt, a tie and a jacket, as we can see on the television screen. This Friday afternoon, everything seems in order to me.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order because I would like to show to all Canadians that indeed I am wearing jeans. But wearing jeans is as important in Abitibi as wearing a suit. Where I come from, people wear suits or jeans, and I will not let others insult me because I wear jeans. I have the right to wear them in the House.

[English]

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I just hope the said jeans were made in Canada and were union made.

It gives me the greatest pleasure to stand in support of the motion before the House today which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the economic and social affairs of the nation and has lost the confidence of this House and of the Canadian people and that, therefore, an election should be called forthwith, in accordance with the Canadian custom, practice and tradition of holding a general election at least every four years.

I am not sure about the part that talks about Canadian custom. It has been for the last couple of years, but it has not always been like that.

One of the reasons why I fully support the motion itself is that there is an increasing or growing number of Canadians who will become thoroughly convinced that this government is on a scorched earth policy in so far as the Canadian infrastructure is concerned.

A growing number of Canadians sincerely believe that we are going down a path that will see the eventual destruction of Canada as we know it as an independent, sovereign nation.

Madam Speaker, as you have consistently watched how this government has operated since it came into power in 1984, I am sure that as an independent member of the House you would share some of those concerns.

I particularly want to spend a few minutes talking about what this government has done on the fiscal front since it was elected in 1984. From the then Minister of Finance's first budget when he attacked old age pensions by attempting to deindex them and was unsuccessful in doing that—but he was successful in deindexing family allowances at the time—and in nearly every successive budget since that government came to power there has been a continued attack on Canada's social safety net.

One of the major arguments that the government has used for attacking these social programs is that the government has to control Canada's deficit and social programs are the cause of Canada's deficit.

A number of articles have been written in recent months which clearly show that is not the case. Of course we have argued over the years that is not the case. However, it is nice to see an independent group such as the Canadian Economic Observer write an article in June 1991 called the "Growth of the Federal Debt" which clearly substantiates the arguments we have been making over the years.

I will quote from the article. It analyses the contributions to the growth of the debt after 1975 made by both total revenue and expenditures and their components and says that while the consequences of the debt are controversial, the statistics presented will make it easier to understand how the current level of indebtedness occurred.

It continues that broadly speaking government program spending as a share of Gross Domestic Product did not rise significantly over the whole period from 1975. In fact, it moderated compared to the preceding 10 years when social programs proliferated. Expenditures and social programs did not contribute significantly to the growth of government spending relative to the Gross Domestic Product.

Excluding the cost of unemployment insurance, which is intended to be self–financed and over the business cycle, social program spending has not increased relative to the GDP over the last 16 years. This moderation would have been more evident but for sharp increases in interest payments on the public debt.

Deficits also became steadily larger after 1975–76, initially more from shortfall of revenues than higher spending, and much of the shortfall originated in numerous changes designed to reduce taxes and in the transfer of tax points to the provinces.

Even more recently, on November 5, 1992, another economist, Patrick Grady of Global Economics Limited corporation, also issued a report which clearly showed that much of the reason why Canada's deficit was so large was the regressive tax reforms brought in by this federal government. There has been a steady erosion of disposable income by middle and low income Canadians through this government in successive budgets nickel and diming people to death.

The average Canadian family, according to this study, is paying about $2,945 more in taxes today than it was in 1984. That is nearly $3,000 per family in disposable income that is not being regenerated within the Canadian economy.

When I hear this government say that there is nothing it can do in order to alleviate the poverty of over one million kids in this country who are relying on food banks to have a healthy life style, I just do not understand that.

What has happened is the government has shifted the tax burden away from the corporate sector. I heard my friend over there talking about how his government was helping businesses by the use of tax dollars in his particular constituency. I would like to see, just for a small change in emphasis, perhaps this government getting its priorities right and spending some of those tax dollars on thousands and thousands of Canadian families facing desperate conditions today because of the policies followed by this government.

If we take a look at yesterday's Quorum, a press clipping service received by all members of Parliament, we see that the justice panel, the justice committee of the House of Commons, has decided to take a look into the recession as a factor in the increase in the crime rate in this country.

I do not know why a Commons committee today has to undertake that kind of study. It has been well documented. There was a study done by then Senator Hubert Humphrey in the United States labour department in the middle 1970s that clearly showed a link between government economic policy, and in this case a recessionary one, and the increase in crime, in family violence, in suicide rates and in child poverty. I could go on and on and on. It has all been well documented.

This government is choosing to ignore that and to say its whole emphasis as a government has to be on deficit reduction, as opposed to doing things to help alleviate the desperate poverty that many people are living in today.

Even if the recession were to end tomorrow, the various studies I have seen clearly indicate that the effects of that recession do not end when the recession ends. The social programs are going to be with us for at least 10 to 15 years after we get out of this recessionary period.

I am concerned about that. Most people I talk to, ordinary Canadians for the want of a better term, are very much concerned about that. When they talk about the recession, everybody agrees it was made in Canada.

It was a deliberate policy by this government particularly aimed at Ontario and Toronto.

When we get through that people then become quite concerned about jobs, and properly so, the jobs that presently exist and how secure they are. They take a look at the effects of the Canada free trade agreement on jobs, particularly in my own province but also elsewhere. Then they listen to this government saying that not only is it happy with the existing free trade agreement with the United States, but it wants to expand it to include Mexico and broaden it even further after that to include the whole North American continent.

An hon. member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): I will tell the member what is wrong with that. He should come to my constituency and talk to people who were productively employed for years, are no longer productively employed and do not have a hope in hell, quite frankly, of getting a job ever again because of their age.

I have people living in my constituency—and we could say the same about nearly every constituency in this country—who began working in a plant, a factory or an office at age 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 or whatever. They had every right to expect, based on past performance, they would probably work with that company until their retirement at age 65.

What has happened is that much of the secondary manufacturing in this country has gone down the tubes. We said it would go down the tubes with free trade, mainly because of the branch plant economy that has existed in Canada since the late 1930s.

I want this hon. member from the government side to come down and talk to the people who come into my office. They have worked for the same employer for 30 or 40 years and suddenly wake up one morning and the employer has closed the plant gates. He could try telling those 50-year old or 55-year old individuals that free trade has been good for them.

It is okay for those guys over there who probably came out of some lucrative small business community. They probably owned it themselves and had money oozing out of their bloody pockets on a personal basis. If they tell average Canadians that at age 50 or age 55 there will be all kinds of employers out there begging those individuals who have the skills and the education to come and work for them, they are dreaming. That just ain't happening.

They should get out there on the streets and talk to people. They should find out for themselves the kind of misery the policies of this government have inflicted on decent working people. It is a crying shame.

The quicker we dump that lot and hopefully not replace them by the other lot that was in there before, the happier I will be and I think the happier the Canadian population will be.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, the member for Beaches—Woodbine has probably said what I would like to say. Perhaps I would say it in a slightly different way but the message is the same.

We are approaching the fourth anniversary of this particular session. I go to a lot of anniversary celebrations in my constituency and normally they are quite happy events. However, may I suggest the anniversary of this government will not be greeted with celebration among most Canadians. I suspect that over most of the country there is a pall; it will be a day of mourning rather than a day of celebration.

The Prime Minister has said they have to get the fundamentals right. If they do not get the fundamentals right in an eight-year period, it is likely they will never get them right. Coming from an educational background, if students do not succeed after eight years of something, then there is something dramatically wrong, either the system is totally wrong, but I suspect the policies of this government are totally wrong.

When are the policies going to be changed? If the policies are not working, it is obvious we have to bring down something different. They say, "we are going to stay the course". God forbid we stay the course. It is like a ship going through the shoals; it runs into a GST over here, but they say well, let's forge ahead. They come to their so-called tax reform and hit large rocks and are pounded on those. But still they say, let's stay the course. They come to a waterfall, it is free trade and NAFTA. What the heck, we are staying the course, even if we have to go over the waterfall and the ship and the captain and the crew have to go down. It doesn't really matter, we are going to stay the course.

It is imperative that an election come forward as soon as possible, because people say they do not want them to stay the course; they do not want them to get the fundamentals right, they want to change direction. They do not agree with their fundamentals.

I have to give the government credit for sticking with what it believes. I happen to believe it is totally incorrect, but it is certainly consistent.

My friends to the right are terribly inconsistent. The member says they stand for everything. Exactly. That is the Liberal stance. When they are in government perhaps they will agree with the friends across the aisle, but right now I think they agree with us. I have to give the government credit for consistency.

My colleague from Comox—Alberni talked about Tommy Douglas's famous analogy of the black cats and the white cats. The black cats come in and they bring in policy that is of no benefit at all to the average Canadian. The Liberals, they are a different colour cat, but they come in with the same kind of policy. On occasion, the cats get together and say: "They don't like the black cats and they don't like the white cats, maybe we should accept some spotted cats—black cats with white spots or white cats with black spots." However, the policy is not good for the people because they remain mice. If the people are mice, cats pass legislation that is good for cats and not good for mice. This Tommy Douglas analogy never ever loses its impact upon people.

I was looking at the legislation the government has passed and wondering what we had here. We have the GST and we know the fiasco that was; free trade, we know what happened as a result of that. Probably some of the jobs—and many of them were—lost in the manufacturing sector were lost because of the recession, but nevertheless the bottom line is there are hundreds of thousands of jobs gone, jobs that will never come back. So we will expand that to Mexico and beyond that.

The member across asks what is wrong with that. What is wrong with it is going to South America and not improving the standards of any of the workers, that is what is wrong with it. Everybody is for free trade as long as the standards of the people who are involved in the trade agreement are increased.

This government has capped transfer payments to the provinces. We have an airline tragedy, a crisis. We had a crisis in train transportation a couple of years ago. We have an attack on our social assistance programs. Medicare is under attack. Family allowances are under attack. We are under attack with the clawback provision. All these programs were under attack and the government won that battle, it killed them completely. Now we have unlimited deregulation of drug prices, Bill C-91.

We have to change the direction of government. A change of direction would be brought about by an election. The people want an opportunity to clear the air. In the United States people are feeling good. They feel better now that the Bush style is gone, the Reagan style is gone, the Thatcher style is gone. People are rebuking that kind of economic policy for their countries and Canada will also rebuke this government.

Once in awhile the government says: "We have created a lot of jobs. We have created thousands of jobs". I want to point out that 91 per cent of the jobs created in 1990 were service-oriented. I have nothing against service oriented jobs, they are wonderful, but at the same time a country requires a manufacturing base. The Tories are killing the manufacturing base of this country, in particular in the province of Ontario which once was a very proud and wealthy province. This government has had a great deal to do with the demise of Ontario's success.

There is no fish in this country, there is no work in this country, there is no direction in this country, there is no leadership in this country, there are no new ideas, there is no confidence, there is no credibility, and most of all there is no hope. The only thing that will restore hope to the country would be an election and you people are going to have to be removed from government.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, it is no wonder that people in this country are losing respect for politicians, if they turn on the tube and listen to the kind of nonsense we just heard from the hon. member opposite.

When we talk about what is happening to the economy, when we talk about the half-truths that they speak all the time, this is where the problems really come. The member talked about no fish as if it was the government's fault.

Mr. Butland: That is right.

Mr. McCreath: It is the government's fault that there is no fish in the ocean. Governments control the number of fish in the ocean. People in Atlantic Canada know better than that. That is why there are no NDP members in Atlantic Canada.

The member talks about business and what is good for business and creating jobs in this country. Why is it that the NDP is dropping like a stone in the polls in Ontario? It is because some of these things that sounded great at the London School of Economics in the days of Laski and socialism were still thought to be a credible economic policy, people in Ontario are finding out just what a good idea socialist NDP politics are.

What do we hear? We hear that the free trade agreement has taken it all apart. Now we will have the North American free trade agreement and by golly every 47 cent an hour Mexican is going to take jobs away from Canadians. What balderdash.

The facts of the situation are that since the FTA came into being, 19 out of 22 Canadian industrial sectors have gained a greater share of the market. Is that not strange? Do not confuse rhetoric with fact.

We noticed the increase in investment. Compared to 1988 before the FTA, our export of goods to the United States is $15 billion higher. How many jobs are involved in $15 billion? Boy oh boy, that is an awful lot of people. We do not hear about this very often. Every little sparrow that falls, somebody said, when the FTA was brought in is going to be blamed on the FTA. Ignore the recession.

My friends opposite would have us believe that job losses in Canada have nothing to do with the recession. It all has to do with the FTA and the GST. What does the GST do? It makes the cost of the manufacturing process more competitive. That is why our exports have gone up. That is why we have attracted investment. That is why every industrialized country in the world, except the Americans, have that kind of added value consumption tax. It is more efficient. It enables business to work. The same applies with markets.

I have one simple question for my hon. friend. If his policies are such a profound and brilliant idea, if this is the way of the future, can he explain to me why the popularity of the NDP in Ontario and indeed in British Columbia is dropping like a stone?

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I would not anticipate anything other than a simple question. We heard a lot of bluster and I acknowledge the member's enthusiasm for what he may or may not believe in.

The facts are that exports to the United States have increased, and we accept that, but we have become almost totally reliant on the United States. Exports to Asia and Europe have gone down. Should the government not be concerned about that? Oh, no, it is not concerned about that. Tie yourself to one power. Forget Asia, forget Europe. They are not important any more. Exports to the United States are not on value added goods, they are on natural resources. It is raw export. Do not be fooling the public into thinking that the government has created jobs. The net loss of jobs is in the hundred of thousands, no matter how the government cuts it.

• (1520)

We are prepared to go into an election—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and to have an opportunity to assure Canadians that the government recognizes fully the importance of training as the key to our social and economic well-being.

I want to talk about labour force training programs and the importance of Canada's labour force for our government in order to demonstrate how we have always been concerned with that aspect in our good management policies.

Training programs allow people to acquire new skills, and it takes skills and knowledge to ensure that the largest number of Canadians participate in the labour market and in the prosperity of our country.

That is why, this year, our government will spend $3.55 billion to provide training to some 770,000 people. This represents a net increase of $450 million compared to last year's training budget of $3.1 billion and an increase of close to 60 per cent compared to the $2.1 billion spent on training just seven years ago, in 1985–86.

The spending for 1993 will be $2.2 billion and will be aimed at the Developmental Uses of Unemployment Insurance. The announcement made last night by the Prime Minister shows once again that our government is committed to helping unemployed Canadians.

For those who do not know what is meant by developmental uses of unemployment insurance, it is a plan whereby UI recipients are given income support while they acquire the skills that will allow them to find a job.

By implementing this measure, the government follows the recommendations of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board, which I will talk to you about in more detail in a few moments. The board recommended an increase from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion of the unemployment insurance developmental uses budget for the 1992 calendar year.

Training requests and participation in the Work Sharing Program increased so much that we had to inject $150 million more in those activities.

To also help people who do not get unemployment insurance, the government will spend $1.6 billion for job training and job creation through the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

Now that emphasis is being put on the developmental uses of unemployment insurance, we can provide more profitable and efficient training to Canadians who need it.

Credit for this new initiative must be given to the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. The creation of this board, which incidentally is not a government agency, is an important step in our involvement in the labour market. It marks the beginning of a new form of cooperation between governments and their main partners, the business community, labour unions and social action groups. These partners can now directly take part in the decision-making process, hence becoming architects of prosperity in our country.

Our government is proud to be involved in the promotion of job related training. The Minister of Employment and Immigration showed leadership in that area and turned labour force development into a responsibility we share with our partners, the private sector and other levels of government.

Preparing Canadians for the future means an important commitment to training. Canada will do everything possible to give itself a highly skilled labour force.

However, from what we see in other countries, we must do more.

Only 25 per cent of Canadian businesses provide formal training to their employees. Companies in Japan spend five times more than Canadian businesses on training. Despite a high rate of unemployment, many jobs are not filled. Each month, employers are unable to find workers with the required skills to fill tens of thousands of jobs.

Many of those unqualified workers dropped out of school only to find themselves part of the first ever group of unemployed in Canada who have never held a job in their life. The unemployment rate of this group stood at 15.9 per cent in 1991, compared to 3.9 per cent for graduate students.

Our economy creates highly specialized jobs requiring more that 17 years of formal education. By the year 2000, half of the new jobs will require as much. We need more workers with the qualifications needed on the labour market.

Since the birth rate is falling, Canada will have to make a better use of the under utilized groups in our labour force, that is women, handicapped persons, natives and visible minorities.

That is why this government launched the Canadian Jobs Strategy in order to emphasize job related skills development, specially in the four groups I just mentioned. This year the budget of the Canadian Jobs Strategy will be $1.6 billion.

Manpower development is a shared responsibility. That is why the labour force development strategy was launched in 1989. It emphasizes partnership and program flexibility. Immigration and Employment Canada's programs and services have been made more flexible and more accessible thanks to the advice of our new partners in the labour market.

The Unemployment Insurance Act was amended in order to channel a greater share of unemployment funds towards the training of the jobless. In this we followed the advice of our partners in the labour market. Unemployment funds used for training rose from $500 million in 1990 to $1.95 billion in 1992.

This is obviously a more productive use of unemployment funds, and that approach is fully supported by our partners in the labour market, that is all employers and workers who are the sole contributors in the unemployment insurance program.

In order to give our labour market partners a permanent role to play in the training policy and see to it that they always have a say in the matter, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has set up the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. Co-chaired by business and labour representatives, it is comprised of 22 members representing the labour unions, the business world and the academic circles. The most used groups in the labour force are also represented. There are members representing women, handicapped people, natives and visible minorities.

The mandate of this board is to help enhance training in Canada. That is something no government or agency can do alone. To enhance training, qualification standards have to be established through consensus between provinces. A network of provincial and territorial labour force development boards has also to be set up, as well as local boards, so that decisions concerning training be taken at the grass root level, as they should be.

These new partnerships between the private sector, Canadian individuals and governments are in my view critical for the prosperity and the economic well-being of Canada.

To ensure the social and economic well-being of Canada, governments must be ready to give up some of the control they have in these coveted areas of policy and program establishing. In light of the experience of other countries and the opinions expressed by the leaders of the labour unions, the business world and the academic circles, it appears that we have to act upon our partners' advice instead of considering them as mere advisors.

• (1530)

Pathways to Success, the aboriginal employment and training strategy implemented by Employment and Immigration Canada, is a perfect example of the application of that principle. Thanks to this strategy, aboriginal training boards, which had a consultant role previously, have become full partners. Now aboriginal people are able to control their own destiny, with the required skills and the means to take action.

They are told: "Develop your own training programs and your own job creation projects, according to your particular needs and exclusively for your people". It is the first time that such a partnership is created. This partnership will ensure that training programs for aboriginal people are provided, managed and controlled by aboriginal people themselves, in collaboration with Employment and Immigration Canada.

This strategy is extremely beneficial to some 78 aboriginal groups across Canada. These groups are now able to allocate millions of dollars to training centres in their community so that their aboriginal clients can acquire the new skills that will allow them to find a job.

Last April the Minister of Employment and Immigration approved funding for four experimental sites: two in British Columbia and two in Ontario. Together, these four aboriginal management boards will provide training and job creation programs worth approximately $21 million to some 5,000 clients over the next 18 months. This represents another important breakthrough in our efforts to develop partnerships for the future.

The creation of new partnerships with the private sector is of the utmost importance. In the past, the private sector including the business community, labour unions, social action groups and other non-governmental organizations did not have a specific role to play in the resolution of problems related to the labour market. In Canada we do not have a tradition like other countries do of putting aside differences to collaborate on matters of common interest, such as training.

But a consensus on training matters came out of the consultations which led to the labour force development strategy. That consensus offered the perspective of new approaches. Employment and Immigration Canada now follows up on this consensus by establishing new cooperation structures, like national native management commissions, labour development commissions and productive uses of UI funds.

Let me give a couple of examples of persons who can benefit from a development program offered by Employment and Immigration Canada: a woman who is 36 years old, spent 20 years in the catering business and was laid off twice in the last two years, which is, it goes without saying, a very discouraging situation, or a 30-year old person who wants to work in the hospitality industry, but a job is more and more difficult to find.

These cases are a sign of the times. Even if the tourist industry is a big employer, there is a lack of qualified people for the jobs. Therefore, with the financial assistance of Employment and Immigration, the principal intervenors in this industry will work together to help these women upgrade their skills to better meet market requirements.

Those intervenors can train front-line employees and supervisors who get UI benefits. There is such a high labour turnover in the hospitality industry that it is hard to maintain a quality service. Employers are pleased to see the government and everyone in the industry cooperate to improve the situation. This is only one example among many.

This vision is one of an active society where the government is suppossed to help people prepare for the job market, where working people are rewarded, where counselling, training, relocating and business starting services are offered to those who are looking for a job. Labour market reintegration requires income maintenance, but the focus is not income maintenance nor reintegration. It is work itself.

In the same way, the prosperity initiative forced us back in the real world and replaced the economy on the forefront of our concerns. Indeed the UI reform should enable a more active use of UI funds and promote self-sufficiency among unemployed workers.

We must also promote more private sector investments in training to make our labour more competitive and we must help people adjust themselves to competition. According to a comparison with other countries, all members of the Organization for Economic Development, Canada trails behind in terms of its active assistance initiatives compared to its passive ones. We are on the right track, but we must do more.

We are actively trying to find solutions and our programs are constantly improved. Training did not respond to private sector needs, so we handed the controls over to the private sector, that is to the labour development commissions. Right now 68 000 employers and associations offer training, and 200 private sector groups instead of public servants are taking up courses.

We are getting excellent results with our industry adjustment program, so we doubled the funds. We were not getting good results with respect to the natives, so we gave them responsibility through the Pathways to Success strategy. Our labour market had obsolete professional standards in the area of automotive repair, so we called on the Canadian Automotive Repair and Service Council. Our high schools were getting poor results with respect to high risk youths, so we funded co-operative education, which encourages young people to go on with their studies while gaining work experience and a sense of reality.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration certainly has shown some leadership, with the support of his department which has a unique approach to dealing with the problems of our modern era, which require creative solutions instead of well-worn criticism.

Those problems can be solved, but not though traditional means. With traditional solutions, governments are always right. This must be the kind of solution the mover of this motion has in mind. But none of the problems we have fit the traditional mould. Times have changed, as the hon. member will realize if he takes the time to try and understand the problems we have to deal with daily with our partners.

I have shown that our government strives to manage Canadian affairs properly and looks after labour development and new skills development. In recent years it implemented programs that will allow the young, the natives and women to get better jobs for longer periods of time, and that will help many people to launch new businesses.

I will conclude by saying that our government did look after fundamental problems in manpower training and implemented programs suited to present needs. It will still try and make these programs better, more effective and more accessible for those who need them.

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague on an extremely instructive and well documented speech. It is going to take a while to digest all that.

I listened carefully and with interest because, in my riding many high-tech industries greatly benefited from all these manpower training initiatives. Take for instance IBM, General Electric, Mitel, Insdana, Econo-Bell, all those companies seeking manpower, that need skilled manpower and were able to take advantage of our programs.

I would also like to mention another organization, the TCIT. This acronym stands for Townships Corporation for Industrial Training. This group of business people, mainly entrepreneurs, got together with the teaching community to communicate their needs, saying for instance: "We would need so many welders in our company. Could you please train them". School is there to train welders, and it is the same in several other fields.

I am thinking of another group called Passage Yamaska; my colleague spoke about training for women. Passage Yamaska is for women between the ages of 30 and 45 who have left work for all sorts of reasons or to raise their young children or for other women who never worked and are now free and wonder about their future and go to Passage Yamaska to find a way into the working world. These are all examples. You talked about the co-op program, which is still wonderful. Students spend three days a week in school and two on traineeships in business and actually see what the world of work is like.

What I wanted to tell my colleague is that further to all these programs and this whole labour force training policy the Minister of Finance announced a prosperity agenda very recently. This plan was developed by an independent group of men and women, business people, union leaders, educators who wanted to promote a learning culture. Six of their ten recommendations directly concern labour force training. I do not know whether my colleague would like to elaborate on that at a time when the competitiveness of our companies is so vital because of the globalization of markets. I would like my colleague to show me that this prosperity agenda really meets a need.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, obviously the comments made by the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi are very much to the point. The consultations on the prosperity agenda showed us that there are huge labour force training needs throughout the country, in preparing young people for the labour market and integrating target groups, namely native people, the disabled and visible minorities who have to be integrated into the labour market. Business people and owners and labour unions also told us that more effort must be made on manpower training programs to properly target available jobs and give people access to them by giving them the skills they need.

That is why the report of the prosperity task force contains a series of recommendations on that problem. I must tell you that the department responsible for implementing all components of the prosperity agenda, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, with which I have the great privilege of working very closely, will focus on meeting the requirements of the prosperity agenda and especially on labour force training needs. With Employment and Immigration we will really try to put in place labour force training programs that will give those in need of training and those who receive training real access to the jobs available in a modern economy.

I just heard NDP members lash out at our free trade agreements with our partners. Look, we are on the eve of the 21st century. We can no longer put up a fence around our country. We must trade with neighboring countries and the greatest market potential is with North America, with the United States and with South America. We have put in place the means that will give us access to those markets. That is why we must orient our labour force training programs to these new needs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe I have 30 seconds left. I must call it 3:45 p.m. unless the hon. member wants to ask a very fast question.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I was intending to be very gracious and very eloquent on the subject of this debate. In thirty seconds, I have no confidence in this government. I think it should call an election.

It being 3.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Business of Supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

Accordingly the question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

An hon. member: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), a recorded division stands deferred until six o'clock p.m. Monday, November 23, 1992.

Pursuant to Standing Order 37, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper. With consent, may we carry on with Private Members' Business?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

EMPLOYEE SHARE PURCHASE PLAN ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Butland that Bill C–327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be invited to speak on this private member's bill. I would like to support this bill in relationship to the current ongoing issue of the Canadian Airlines employees' proposal that has been put forward in the last week or so to the government for consideration.

I must say that this has been a very contentious debate. I think that it pertains generally to the specifics of this private member's bill. It proposes that the employees would play a fairly major role in the contribution that it makes and in the direction that this one airline would go in terms of the whole airline industry.

What it proposes is that the employees would contribute approximately $150 million toward becoming major shareholders and stakeholders in this particular deal that they have proposed to the federal government.

I feel that a sense of ownership gives a sense of dignity, a sense of possession, a sense of pride and respect. It is generally proven to be one of the main pushes for incentives that employees would have in the company that they work for or the corporation they work for in order to do a good job, to provide quality of service.

We know that Canadian Airlines in and of itself is ranked I believe ninth for the quality of service that it offers. We take a particular interest. As the member of Parliament for Western Arctic, I have been notified by a number of northerners and westerners. I am sure all of us from the west understand that this is a priority for not only northerners but westerners as well.

I am particularly concerned about the way in which this whole merger and this proposal has been handled in that it is generally not a new problem.

• (1550)

It is one that has been evolving over a period of time. As a member of Parliament and as a citizen of the western Arctic, I believe and share the concern with other westerners and with other Canadians as well. We have prominent politicians from the west who have every reason to support this kind of an initiative. Those politicians stem all the way from the Deputy Prime Minister to the House Leader from Calgary, from the deputy House leader to various members of Parliament in B.C., Saskatchewan, Alberta, including of course yourself, Mr. Speaker.

Canadian Airlines employees and the people related to that particular industry, all the employees, understand that we support their initiative. They know full well that their members of Parliament, particularly from the west and those cities from where the deputy House leader, the Minister of Agriculture and the Deputy Prime Minister come will have the full confidence and support of that power in cabinet to achieve their goals. They know that and I know that because that is the way it works and that is the way power works.

We will not get what is our due in the west if we do not use the power and the instruments that we have been given by those people to represent them. This is a good deal. In particular I have to state that the reason I support this initiative is because it gives the greatest incentive to keep the industry competitive, to keep monolithic approaches from becoming predatory on the consumers in terms of the kind of rates they would have to pay when they travel. Northerners for instance do not have the luxury as do other Canadians in choosing between accessible forms of transportation.

The northern economy, the tourism industry and the quality of life would be severely affected by a monopoly air merger. The north needs to have guaranteed airline competition. I am not in support of some of the components of the National Passenger Transport Commission's recommendation in terms of not being able to provide any kind of funding or assistance to Canadian Airlines or to Air Canada. I think that that has occurred in the past. In this one instance the industry, particularly this airline, is performing well. Both have debts. That is a fact. But we do not have the option in the north. We do not have other viable forms of transportation.

Most of the travel in the Northwest Territories is done by air. We do not have the luxury to choose. From the time that I was four or five years old, I lived in a bush camp. I used to look across to Norman Wells, which is a community that is a centre for travel. It has a large terminal for the Sarto region. In that particular area, looking across to that community, I would see in the olden days, fifties and sixties, Canadian Pacific come and go from that particular airport.

On this day I can go back to that same bush camp and what do I see? I see Canadian Airlines come and go. That is the history of our territory. We have a relationship with the people who work in that industry. We do not have the luxury of dissociating ourselves in any industry in the north from the people who we work with. On the planes, in the restaurants, in the cabs, in the homes and on the streets, we live in close proximity to one another. We are forced into a situation where we cannot dissociate our living working relationships as you would in large urban centres.

I really have to say that I am proud we have had this airline industry in our area for as long as I can remember. It has served us well. I really believe having asked the minister a question in the House on September 10 that I was sincere in trying to seek some kind of consensus.

I think that this private member's bill, Bill C-327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them, is a very noble effort to address a very serious need. I have risen in the House on a number of occasions. I have lobbied other people to also support the employees' initiative. I cannot understand any one elected politician who comes from the west, Manitoba, B.C., Saskatchewan and Alberta, who would not support this initiative. This is absolutely necessary for the survival of the industry in the west.

We have to put forward the priorities of the people we represent. I do not only represent the people who live in the Northwest Territories. I represent the people who come in and out and provide a service, like Canadian Airlines.

I think it is a great proposal. I think it is noble in this day and age. I think it is respectful and it is dignified that a group of employees would band together to come up with a proposal. It is not criticism without constructive input. It is something they have proposed. They are willing to put in money. They are willing to put in time. They are willing to put in energy and effort to save the airline. I really believe that we need this.

In the Northwest Territories we know that if we have one carrier we will be subject to a monopolistic situation that would force, because we have no other modes of transportation, our situation to a point where most people would not be able to afford to travel. Travel is not a luxury for these people. Travel is a necessity, for medical purposes, for work purposes.

It is extremely expensive to live in the Northwest Territories. We need this idea. The government has to support this deal. I urge the Minister of Transport to be innovative, to be fair minded and to accept the deal that has been put forward by the Canadian Airlines employees.

As a member from the Northwest Territories, Western Arctic, as a member from western Canada, and as a fair minded representative of all Canadians, I plead with the government to accept this proposal and to actualize what is in essence Bill C-327 for the employees of Canadian Airlines.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer some brief comments on the comments just made by the hon. member for Western Arctic.

I would like to point out to her that I share her concerns about the airline situation in this country and specifically the Canadian Airlines situation.

I would like to tell her that it is not the participation of the employees, or the project for the employees to participate in the survival of the company that creates some problems. On the contrary. It should and it would help the situation. It is the other part of the financial package that is being put together that causes some concern to the government and that the government is really looking at.

Also, I would like to offer to her that even without Bill C-327, it would not prevent the employees of Canadian Airlines from participating in their company. I would like to share some comments I have and some concerns I have with the House and with my hon. colleagues on Bill C-327.

[Translation]

As the hon. members know, Bill C-327 recommends that government encourage employees to take an economic interest in the corporation that employs them.

This motion—and let us not forget it—would amend the Income Tax Act to allow for a deduction from taxable income for 50 percent of the employee's and employer's net investment in an employee share purchase program, as well as the interest earned by a financial institution on loans to such plans.

To qualify for these tax preferences, the employees have to take over the employing corporation. But first, I would like to thank the hon. member for raising the issue of improved employer-employee relations. It is a well-known fact that work relations improve when employee participation in the corporation increases.

Government recognizes that co-operation between the two groups improves Canadian businesses competitiveness and thus the growth of our economy in the long term.

• (1600)

As hon. members probably know, in 1984 the previous government proposed in a publication entitled "Gain Sharing for A Stronger Economy" a plan which would have provided, for the payment of employees, a tax credit shared between employers and employees according to a percentage of the profits.

As with most employee ownership plans, the objectives of that one were to improve labour-management relations and to increase labour productivity.

You will also recall, Mr. Speaker, that labour and management groups were against that proposal. After a careful examination, the government of the day rejected it.

This is not at all surprising, considering the objectives that the government pursued subsequently with its tax reform. One of those main objectives was to promote decisions what could stimulate the economy instead of giving particular tax incentives. That objective was attained by the elimination of many incentives which, often, were open to only a small group of taxpayers.

Also many deductions were eliminated or replaced with credits. Then the broadening of the tax base had the effect of reducing tax rates. Thus many Canadians, mostly older people or low income people, had their tax liability reduced.

Bill C-327 will defeat that objective because it would effectively promote the use of public funds to the benefit of a small group of individuals who want to take control of the business that employs them.

Considering the importance of controlling the deficit, it would become necessary to increase taxes of all other Canadians in order to support the employee share ownership plans. In that respect it is important that hon. members realize that what Bill C-327 proposes is, to some extent, a redistribution of income.

But more important, the tax reform greatly helped to reduce tax incentives which had the effect of distorting the economic decision-making process. The broadening of the tax base and the reduction of tax rates, by helping to eliminate the incentives which distorted investment decisions, promoted long-term economic growth.

Moreover not only are these initial deductions distorting economic decisions, but the national and international experience shows that a large part of these tax incentives is given to people for something they would have done anyway. Therefore we are using considerable revenues to encourage a minimal additional activity.

At a time when government is trying to use wisely its scarce resources, it does not seem to me appropriate to implement such a plan. As hon. members know, interest on the federal debt will amount to $43.2 billion this year, that is 27 cents per dollar of budgetary expenditures.

Every dollar added today to the deficit increases the debt burden of future generations. It is therefore very important that we reduce the debt. We will succeed only by controlling expenses and protecting fiscal revenues.

The impact of Bill C-327 on the deficit would be significant as the generous fiscal treatment could encourage a large number of companies to restructure the remuneration of employees in such a way as to take maximum advantage of the incentive.

In some cases, financial participation of employees in their company can increase productivity and therefore stimulate the general economy. This is why our fiscal system already encourages such measures. In particular, the government is strongly backing the financial participation of employees through labour sponsored venture capital corporations. The preferential treatment given these corporations has been further improved in the last budget. Employees are also benefiting from special privileges when they are given options to buy shares by their employer.

Combined with the generous lifetime capital gains exemption, these programs are a powerful incentive to employees to buy shares in Canadian companies without distorting on investment decisions.

As we said during the last budget, the government would rather rely on the strong principles underlying the labour sponsored venture capital corporations which are prohibited from investing in a single company. This provision is based on the old adage which advises not to put all the eggs in one basket. In the case of the proposal of Bill C-327 the eggs are not only the worker's investments. They are also his job.

I believe hon. members will agree with me that it would be inappropriate for the government to encourage individuals to take such risks.

I think I speak for a large number of Canadians when I say that increased productivity and better labour relations are key elements to the success of our great country. However, I fear that Bill C-327 will not help in that matter. Not only will it be costly and unfair but also it might not achieve what it was meant for.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to deal with this issue in this House. I hope my hon. colleagues will find the information I gave them useful in judging the merits of Bill C-327.

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): It is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise today to speak on Bill C-327, presented by my NDP colleague from Sault Ste. Marie.

This bill has come at the right time. It is a private member's bill which speaks to the problem that employees have in buying into a company which many times may be in difficulty and the employees want to actually save the company.

I should bring to the House's attention that this is not a rare occurrence. There is legislation which in effect permits employees to buy into a company and actually become the owners of a company. I can give you the example of Weirton Steel in Ohio which was to be closed in 1982 because, of course, of low profits—remember the 1982 recession. The employees decided to buy into the company and actually purchased the plant entirely. Finally what they succeeded in doing was turning that company around, and that meant that the owners of the company reaped the benefits of having turned it around after it was about ready to go into bankruptcy.

But something closer to us, in Kapuskasing, Ontario there was a recent success in an employee buy out, where Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company reported a $2 million profit between December 1, 1991 and June 30, 1992. Before that time, before the employees had bought it out, it was in a deficit position.

It makes me think that perhaps we should have the employees buy out this government. Maybe we would have the country finally running in a profit-making position. I do not know, but maybe that is called an election. Maybe the federal example for an employee buy out is an election. In any case, in other jurisdictions employee buy outs have been very successful,making it easy for employees to buy a company is nothing new. We have had that in Quebec for a long time now thanks to a piece of legislation called the Co-operatives Act which allows employees to buy a company, whether it is in financial trouble or not.

[Translation]

I feel that the idea behind this private member's bill presented by my colleague from the NDP makes a lot of sense. I think that my friend opposite does understand what I mean by that. It makes a lot of sense to let employees buy a company if they so desire and to make it easier for them to do so. That is exactly what Bill C-327 is all about.

I would like to draw the Chair's attention to the fact that this common sense approach could be applied to the airline industry. However, this bill is no panacea. We must not kid ourselves and believe that employees working for airlines such as Canadian Air or Air Canada will be able to buy those companies. It is too much money, it is impossible. For my part, I think that as a government we must be extremely cautious before even considering giving one penny to either Canadian Air or Air Canada. We have to be cautious because I am convinced that giving money away, $300 million here, $300 million there, will end up being a disservice to Canadians. Therefore, in that respect I am extremely conservative, and I must apologize for using this term. I am not sure I would be prepared to invest taxpayers' money to take an active interest in an airline.

• (1610)

Mr. Boudria: Watch your language.

Mr. Edmonston: A word like conservative in the mouth of my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Good old common sense is indeed very important because we may be a tad too partisan in thinking that, if it is coming from the other side of the House, an idea is no longer valid. As a matter of fact, I wanted to say, in the two minutes I have left, that good ideas were put forward. Even from the other side. Perhaps my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell could acknowledge that regarding the official languages, for example, as he is no doubt aware, government commissioned a study on the subject.

[English]

I will say it in English because I think it is of particular importance to our English speaking listeners and viewers. The government, with the armed forces, has commissioned a study looking at the translation of documents and the use of French in the armed forces. That study has come out saying that we had better use common sense.

There have been occasions on which we have had $100 million spent for translation of technical manuals for the frigates that were being built on the east coast of Canada. That was a waste of money because even the francophones, the French speaking engineers, and other people on this project were not happy with the translations because it came too late in French and they were not familiar with the French terms.

I do like what the government has done this time. The government report said we will use common sense and if we need to have the English translated into French we will have a French person in that district decide whether it is really practical. That is the common sense approach I appreciate in which we do not waste taxpayers' money. I wish to congratulate the government, particularly the minister of defence, for having commissioned this study and I hope the government follows through on this study.

However, I would like to also compliment my colleague for his private member's bill, Bill C-327. I think it is using the same kind of common sense approach to studying a very serious problem; that is, employee participation in companies, allowing employees to participate in an active way by buying out companies. Who actually knows more about a company's operation but the employees who work on the ground floor?

Once again I wish to compliment my colleague and thank the Liberal and the Conservative members of Parliament who spoke to this bill. It is a very important bill and I hope we pass it.

[Translation]

M. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I think the NDP member should be congratulated because this is a common sense measure, legislation encouraging employees to buy shares in their employer's company. The reason I want to say a few words on this is that I had the honour to represent the Papineau riding at the provincial level and I developed an interest for this kind of program allowing employees to buy the company they were working for, for whatever reason. I remember, at that time, asking the American Embassy for information because the U.S. had implemented similar legislation. Their plan was called ESOP, the Employee Share Ownership Plan. According to the bill adopted by the American Congress, employees could invest in their company enough to acquire a majority of the shares and the government helped the employees buy the company. Therefore, it is a very logical, down to earth measure. In the U.S., they called the results of the ESOP program: "People's Capitalism". It is people's capitalism if you wish; it is very simple. Employees have the opportunity, with the help of the government, to buy a company either because it is having a hard time or because it is about to close down; whatever the reason, employees can buy the shares.

The advantage of all this is that after two years, the American Senate requested a report on that program; after all, the government did invest millions of dollars.

Much to their surprise, they realized the productivity in employee owned companies increased, not only by 10, 15 or 20 per cent, but even by 150 per cent in some cases. That goes to show that when employees can influence company policies and implement measures to increase próductivity it works. Why? It is all very simple. When you own the company, when your input or your contribution will show up on you pay cheque then you will certainly do everything you can to increase productivity.

I wonder why such a bill was not introduced before. I think we made a step in the right direction by doing so today. We know miracles never happen in this House. We come up with projects and ideas, and it all takes time. Our friends on the other side, they are few and there will be fewer in the future, do not realize that is the way to go. If people are ready to invest in their own future, I think we will get extraordinary results. The timing is excellent and I think this bill will be studied in committee. The government may not be ready for such measures, but I know one thing: whatever the future holds for us, people want to contribute to the prosperity of our country. The best way to prosper is to have a vested interest in success, and to profit from it. This bill makes a lot of sense. It is very sensible and its time has come.

I just want to add that it has been tried in the United States. I have some results here. Yes, I have, I asked the American embassy for documentation a few years back. We can see how successful it was in the States, and I know we can achieve the same results, if not better, here.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for the few minutes you gave me. I hope this bill is a good start, that one day it will become reality and play a major part in rebuilding our economy.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am going to be recognizing the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie and in doing so, under Standing Order 44(3), in all cases the Speaker shall inform the House that the reply of the mover of the original motion closes the debate, there will be no further speakers.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the words of the member for Papineau and my colleague from Chambly. I must extend my thanks to the government side as well for allowing this bill to go forward at second reading to a legislative committee. It is very personally gratifying to have that co-operation among the three parties. As we all know we do not see it too often. Therefore, I do appreciate the co-operation from the two other parties and of course from my own colleagues.

As the member indicated, this is a concept that is not new. It is very much alive in the United States and in Europe. Its time has come. Of course our perspective on this is that Bill C-327 employee ownership is social democracy in action. Some people say that social democracy is dead and we say it is not. This is one way that we can show in a very positive way that employees, employers and governments can participate and effect change in the workplace.

Bill C-327 was brought about because of the Algoma Steel Corporation. We went through a great deal of distress in the community and there was some urgency. There was a crisis, that the entire company would close and many thousands of people would be put out of work. However, again co-operation from the Ontario government and federal government spearheaded by the union and sacrifice on the part of the workers brought about an employee majority ownership of the corporation.

I want to say that the Algoma Steel situation prompted the bringing forward of this bill. Since that time the model of this bill could be used in a whole host of other cases.

I think legislation is necessary to treat the potential closings of industries and large and small businesses across this country. Rather than governments having to deal with them on a piecemeal basis, on a one-by-one basis in a crisis situation in a day-to-day situation, it is imperative that we deal with it in a logical, comprehensive way and I think this legislation is a start.

I am very much accepting of the fact that when it does go to committee, amendments may in fact be in order. This bill deals with majority ownership, but I think it is imperative that partial ownership be recognized. Maybe that is the route to go.

I look forward to what will happen at committee that I understand has to be struck within five days. I look forward to some expediency in this matter because each and every day there are new considerations by new people, new businesses or businesses that are in difficulty.

I cite the Balmer mine in British Columbia that presently is undergoing this consideration. There is a company called Rexdale in Haileybury in northern Ontario where the process failed because there was no legislation in place.

I think the time has come to thank people from across the country, both individuals who have signed petitions and people who have given quite good support from across the country, so there is widespread support for the concept if not the specific bill.

We have had petitions in from Newfoundland, St. John's and Mount Pearl; in Ontario, Sault Ste. Marie, St. Thomas, Brampton, Keewatin, Thunder Bay, Ottawa, Kemptville, Wawa, Kenora, London, Longbow Lake, Nepean, Stratford, Clarence Creek; in Quebec, Val-des-Monts, Gatineau, Aylmer; Regina, Saskatchewan; in B.C., Chilliwack, Sardis, Port Alberni, Nanaimo, Vedder Crossing, Cultus Lake; in the Northwest Territories, Yellowknife.

There is, indeed, widespread support. As far as business goes, the Chamber of Commerce in my city supports it. The Algoma Steel Credit Union, in labour CUPE local 5; Hamilton, Transportation and Communications Union of CLC; Port Alberni and District Labour Council; St. Thomas and District Labour Council; the city of Sault Ste. Marie; Saskatchewan Economic Diversification and Trade; Saskatchewan Minister of Labour and the British Columbia Labour and Consumer Services under the signature of Moe Sihota, support it.

There is indication that the country and the residents of the country are prepared to address this. Once again I want to thank the government for allowing this bill to go forward to committee in the very near future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 4.23 o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

AUTOMOTIVE POLLUTION REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, June 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ferguson that Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to discuss the health aspects of the issues raised by Bill C-226, namely the continued use of the manganese containing gasoline additive MMT, or its substitution.

Our experience with lead additives showed how a seemingly unimportant decision to use a specific additive can have far-reaching health consequences. The ultimate gasoline additive is one that is appropriate both technically and from a health and environmental point of view.

MMT was introduced into the Canadian and U.S. markets in the mid-1970s for use as an octane booster in both leaded and unleaded gasoline. In 1978 the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency banned its use in unleaded gasoline for reasons unrelated to health.

It had been found to slightly reduce the efficiency of the catalytic converters then available for vehicles running on unleaded fuel. At that time there was no concern about possible adverse health effects and it has continued to be used in leaded gasoline in the United States.

Also in 1978 Health and Welfare Canada conducted an assessment of the potential health hazards of MMT and its products of combustion, manganese oxides. It was concluded that the expected increase of airborne manganese due to MMT under worse case conditions would not be a hazard to health based on the evidence available at that particular time.

In 1985 the Royal Society of Canada's commission on lead re-examined the health implications of increased manganese oxides from MMT with the then proposed phase out of lead additives. The commission noted that the increase in intake via inhalation was small even by comparison to intake from other sources of manganese, and was minute by comparison to intake from food. There was a wide margin of safety between the small extra intake due to MMT and any adverse effects on the nervous system noted in animal or in human studies.

National Health and Welfare has continued to assess MMT and monitors any new information on exposure and health effects. The recent application in 1990-91 by the manufacturer of MMT to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency for permission to reintroduce MMT into the unleaded gasoline was rejected, again because of concerns about conflicting data on hydrocarbon emission increases and catalyst deterioration. Health issues and concerns were not cited as the reason for the decision.

Much of this concern is rooted in the fear that because manganese is another heavy metal like lead, use of manganese could lead to a repeat of the same kinds of contamination and health problems associated with leaded gasoline additives.

Airborne lead from gasoline combustion was a major source of exposure for young children. The majority of daily intake was indirectly attributable to airborne lead and was due to the lead deposited near roadways, on the soil and the plants in urban areas. This point has been raised as a potential concern with manganese. However, unlike lead, manganese is abundant in soil and is naturally present in high amounts, several hundred times the amount deposited by combustion of gasoline containing MMT. In addition, ingested manganese appears to be well handled by the human body.

There are some critical differences between lead and manganese. Manganese is an essential element, required in fairly large amounts every day to maintain our health. This means that there is a threshold below which there will not be any toxicity, and we do not have the same concerns about exposure to trace amounts in the environment.

Manganese intake, metabolism and excretion are generally efficiently controlled by the body, and manganese is not stored for many years in the body in the way observed with lead.

In contrast, lead has no known biological function. It is a general cell poison. It is highly toxic at extremely low dosages. In the last 20 years we have witnessed a continual lowering of the blood lead level considered to be a health concern for children.

At very high doses manganese like lead is a severe neurotoxin. The question for us today is, how high is too high? In miners, smelter workers, those exposed to 50,000 or more times the normal air levels of manganese, mental disturbances, slow clumsy body movements, speech disturbances and muscle rigidity similar to Parkinson's disease, have been cited. This is a condition called manganism. Somewhat lower levels, around one milligram per cubic metre, have resulted in the first signs of brain damage, including fatigue and hand tremors in exposed smelter workers. Since typical air concentrations in Canadian cities are about 20,000 times lower than this, 0.04 micrograms per cubic metre, neurological damage is not a health effect of concern at normal levels. This conclusion is supported by the U.S. Public Health Service in a 1991 report.

There are, on the other hand, some important differences between lead and manganese which decrease our certainty about the effects of manganese. While lead appears to be equally toxic whether ingested in food or inhaled from air, manganese appears to be much more toxic when inhaled. This has created a lot of concern and has also led some people to discount the information on safe levels of intake gained from ingestion studies. Too much manganese is toxic, regardless of its route of entry into the body.

We are all exposed to manganese in both air and food. Under normal circumstances, as in most Canadian cities, airborne manganese is extremely low, and we breathe in about a microgram of manganese each day from the air. On the other hand, we take in somewhere between 2,000 and 9,000 micrograms per day from our food. Absorption is very much higher via the lungs than it is via the gastrointestinal tract, probably between 10 and 30 times higher. But the amount to which we are exposed via air is so much lower that the effects of increased lung absorption are really wiped out. Therefore it is extremely unlikely that the small amount taken in by inhalation is going to have any measurable effect.

Special groups in the population who take up more manganese on a body weight basis than most include infants, youngsters, pregnant women, people who are anaemic, or have calcium, protein or other deficiencies. In these cases the contribution for inhalation is really dwarfed by the contribution from food.

Infants and children have been singled out as a particular risk for manganese because of their undeveloped metabolic processes which allow about 100 per cent absorption and zero per cent excretion for the first few weeks of life. This is a normal pattern and MMT derived manganese would be a very small portion of the total. There is no evidence that this group is particularly susceptible to brain damage from manganese, unlike the case with lead.

The elderly may be susceptible to this type of damage but we lack the knowledge about both susceptibility and differences in metabolism in this particular group.

In conclusion, our experience has shown us that there are not too many health effects at this particular point in time. I would like to recommend that this bill not be supported at this particular time. There is no need from a health perspective to phase out MMT and replace it.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in today's debate on Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution. I would like to commend my hon. colleague, the member for Lambton—Middlesex for initiating this private members' bill, which I believe is deserving of the support of this House.

The Liberal Party has consistently supported the need for Canada to develop alternative fuels instead of relying solely upon non-renewable fossil fuels. In 1984, the then Liberal Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, the same individual who is sponsoring today's bill, stated: "The federal government supported alternative energy sources and was prepared to implement a program for the development of ethanol blended fuels in Canada".

In addition, on April 17, 1991 the Leader of the Official Opposition called upon the federal government to introduce legislation to support the use of ethanol and ban the gasoline additive referred to as MMT. The hon. member also indicated his personal support for a 3.2 per cent oxygen content in Canadian gasoline.

Bill C-226 is designed to reduce pollutants that are released into our environment by automobiles. To accomplish this reduction, clause 3 of the bill would prohibit the sale, importation or production in Canada of any gasoline that had an oxygen content of less than 3.2 per cent by weight and contained the substance MMT.

Increasing the oxygen content will make gasoline burn cleaner as it causes a reduction in carbon dioxide and carbon monoxide while also reducing other organic substances or residues. In addition, by eliminating MMT, a danger to public health would be removed from our atmosphere. MMT is believed to mix with blood in humans and attack brain cells when absorbed into the respiratory system. With evidence suggesting that MMT poses a health risk, I am sure many Canadians would like to see it banned in Canada.

Since 1978 MMT has been banned in the United States. MMT is a suspected neurotoxin that is believed to lead to diseases such as Parkinson's. In addition, the use of MMT in our gasolines increases hydrocarbon emissions by up to 27 per cent. Clearly we can do without MMT in Canada.

We can get rid of MMT and also obtain a 3.2 per cent oxygen content in our gasoline. By using a 10 per cent ethanol blended gasoline we can significantly reduce CO, CO_2 and N_{ox} emissions. A 10 per cent ethanol blend would reduce carbon monoxide by 25 per cent, carbon dioxide by 5.9 per cent, nitrous oxide by 5.7 per cent volatile organic compounds by 8.5 per cent and ground level ozone by 5.3 per cent.

Aside from eliminating a significant amount of pollutants from the air and removing MMT, there are other advantages to be obtained by using a 10 per cent ethanol blended gasoline. By blending we can help conserve our non-renewable sources of fossil fuels. In addition, as fuel ethanol is manufactured from renewable biological feedstock such as corn, barley and wheat, the supply is virtually unlimited.

• (1120)

Another major point concerns the present economic difficulties facing Canadian grain growers. With historically low prices for their crops farmers would certainly welcome the market ethanol would provide. With producers experiencing problems with marketing their grains at prices which meet their production costs, an increase in demand for ethanol would be financially beneficial for farmers.

In my riding of Stormont—Dundas a considerable amount of interest and work went toward the establishment of an ethanol plant in Ingleside. I certainly want to congratulate the Seaway Valley Farmers Energy Co-operative for its work in trying to create a grain fed ethanol plant.

I also want to recognize and commend Mr. John Cleary, MPP for Cornwall, and Mr. Noble Villeneuve, MPP for SDG and East Grenville, for their commitment to this project.

On a related matter there is a hope, as Ontario corn farmers face the worst harvest conditions experienced in 20 years, that everything will be done by the federal government to assist farmers in avoiding serious financial problems.

This matter was raised in the House on Friday by my colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings. I hope we will soon see some action taken by the government to help address the cash flow problems of producers who are not able to harvest and sell their corn to meet fall debt obligations.

I believe the government should indicate at the earliest opportunity that it will permit advance payments to be issued for corn left standing in the field under the Advance Payments for Crops Act program and the associated Cash Flow Enhancement Program.

It is clear that Bill C-226 is attempting to provide cleaner and safer air for Canadians. There is no doubt the reductions in noxious gases and toxins that using ethanol blended gasoline would accomplish. We have an opportunity before us today for this House to give its support to a very worth-while piece of legislation.

I know members opposite are supportive of the environment. In addition, I am aware how the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture is very much in support of ethanol blended gasoline. One cannot pick up a story in the media on ethanol without seeing either the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex or the hon. member for Huron—Bruce pictured in it.

By supporting this bill we can take a step forward for our environment, our health, our farmers, our natural resources and, above all, our future. We can also display once again that Canada is the leader in environmental protection and technology.

It is important for us to remain at the top as it can mean millions for Canada. At present considerable work in the area of biological renewable fuels is being conducted throughout the world. One example is in Germany where a test car has been developed with a rapeseed oil powered engine.

I am pleased to support Bill C-226. I also recognize its importance in opening up the expanded and highly beneficial use of alternative fuel for Canadians and Canada. Bill C-226 supports our environment and calls for a ban on MMT.

I believe Canadians would appreciate the onus being placed on MMT to prove it is safe rather than for others to say it is not. Nonetheless, MMT is being used without adequate and irrefutable evidence to substantiate that it is indeed safe and therefore should be banned. The time has come to say no to MMT.

In conclusion I want again to commend my hon. colleague from Lambton—Middlesex on this legislation which seeks to make Canadian gasoline the cleanest burning and least polluting in the world. I would like to ask members of this House to give it their support.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the privilege to speak in this Chamber on Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution.

Before addressing the specific issues of Bill C-226, I would like to say a few words about automotive pollution, what this government has done and, more important, will be doing about automotive pollution.

Automotive pollution is the single biggest factor contributing to the formation of smog in Canadian cities. Under the green plan, this government's comprehensive environmental agenda for tackling Canada's pollution problems, the Minister of Environment announced a $30 million initiative to combat urban smog.

Another initiative will see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources undertaking measures to initiate a further round of fuel efficiency targets for new vehicles, an important element in the government's plan to stabilize the emissions of greenhouse gases.

Certainly Canada has launched a number of initiatives to limit pollution from motor vehicles. We have eliminated the use of lead additives in gasoline. No longer will we have to worry about the potential threat to health, especially to the health of our young children, that the presence of lead in gasoline posed.

We are currently assessing ways to reduce the sulphur contents of diesel fuel which, when used with more technologically advanced engines, will reduce the emissions of particulate and black smoke emanating from large trucks and buses.

Our standards for the exhaust coming out of the tailpipes of our cars and small trucks are among the most stringent in the world. These standards set strict limits for nitrogen oxides which contribute to acid rain and are key components in the formation of smog. They also set limits on the amount of hydrocarbons, another major contributor to smog that cars can emit, and on carbon monoxide.

On February 20 of this year my colleague, the hon. Minister of Transport, signed a memorandum of understanding with Canadian car manufacturers and with car importers to establish striker standards which will come into effect in 1994.

We are committed to protecting the Canadian environment. We are moving forward on a number of fronts, including a comprehensive agenda to further control pollution from motor vehicles. This includes fuel quality as well as new vehicle emission standards.

Bill C-226 has two major purposes. First, the bill would require that all gasoline in Canada contain as a minimum 3.2 per cent of weight oxygen. This minimum percentage effectively favours the use of ethanol over other oxygenates such as methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE. Ethanol is an alcohol that can be derived from grains or biomass. When blended with gasoline it acts as an octane enhancer. Even as I speak, the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is making a major announcement in Saskatoon to encourage the production and use of fuel ethanol in Canada.

The environmental benefit of blending ethanol with gasoline is that it leads to reduced emissions of carbon monoxide. Depending on the biomass and processes used for making the ethanol, ethanol may also offer an over-all reduction in carbon dioxide emissions, one of the principal greenhouse gases.

The Canadian government, in its desire of establish a biofuels industry and a level playing field for oxygenated fuels with other alternative fuels such as propane and natural gas, effective April 1 of this year, removed the federal excise tax of 8.5 cents per litre on the ethanol portion of the fuel produced from biomass. The removal of this tax is an incentive for the marketplace to determine the range and extent for the manufacture, use and distribution of these fuels.

Carbon monoxide emissions from motor vehicles are highest during the winter months because it takes longer for the engine and catalytic converter to warm up and function efficiently. In the United States the use of up to 2.7 per cent by weight oxygen in gasoline has been mandated during the four winter months in areas where levels of carbon monoxide exceed the ambient air quality standards.

• (1130)

There is, however, concern that gasoline blends with over 2 per cent by weight oxygen can lead to increases in emissions of nitrogen oxides, thereby contributing to the formation of smog. Smog is a summertime problem in many parts of Canada. Certainly given the initiatives to reduce smog in the United States, this would not be desirable.

Based on these facts Bill C-226 which calls for a minimum 3.2 per cent by weight oxygen in gasoline year round cannot be justified on its environmental benefits.

The second part of Bill C-226 calls for a ban on MMT, a manganese additive used in gasoline as an octane enhancer. In Canada the use of MMT as an octane enhancer is allowed in unleaded gasoline up to a maximum of 18 milligrams of manganese per litre. In the United States the use of MMT in unleaded gasoline has not been allowed since 1978, although it continues to be used in leaded gasoline.

The use of MMT in gasoline has been the subject of a number of studies in three major areas: the health effects of manganese released into the environment with combustion, the effect of MMT on hydrocarbon emissions, and the effect of MMT on catalytic converters.

Health and Welfare Canada has concluded that the use of MMT at current levels does not pose a threat to human health. Air quality data has not shown an increase in the concentration of manganese in the air over the last number of years.

A very comprehensive review by the Ethyl Corporation showed that emissions from cars fuelled with gasoline containing MMT have reduced amounts of nitrogen oxides and increased amounts of hydrocarbons when compared to vehicles fuelled with MMT-free gasoline. The emissions met the prevailing tailpipe standards and there was no observable effect on the performance of the catalytic converters.

A less extensive review by the Ford Motor Company shows a much higher increase in the hydrocarbon emissions due to MMT and no reduction in the emissions of nitrogen oxides. Deterioration of the catalytic converters was also observed.

After reviewing both studies, the United States Environmental Protection Agency denied a petition by the Ethyl Corporation to allow the use of MMT as an octane booster in unleaded gasoline but continues to allow its use in leaded gasoline.

It should be recognized that an MMT induced increase in hydrocarbon emissions will become a more important consideration in 1994 when, as mentioned earlier, more stringent vehicle emission standards will come into effect. Generally the government's role is to identify standards to meet environmental quality objectives.

Our intervention to regulate fuel quality should only be where no other mechanism will achieve the desired result, such as our intervention with lead through the voluntary co-operative efforts of the fuel suppliers and motor vehicle manufacturers. Specifications for fuel quality are developed to ensure that appropriate fuels are available throughout Canada. This market based approach has proven effective and therefore the government will continue to support and facilitate these efforts.

In closing let me emphasize once more that we cannot support this bill because, first, mandating the use of 3.2 per cent weight oxygen in gasoline year round is not justified on the basis of environmental benefit. The existing data on the effect of MMT on exhaust emissions and catalyst efficiency are inconclusive. According to Health and Welfare's assessment, there is no evidence of any adverse health effects related to the use of MMT in gasoline. The benefits of removing MMT and adding oxygenates to gasoline should be addressed as well as development of a comprehensive strategy on fuel quality. The development of such a strategy should involve fuel producers, engine and vehicle manufacturers and government regulatory and fuel standard setting agencies.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words this morning on Bill C-226 of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex. I congratulate him on bringing forward this bill. The operative clauses are fairly simple but the implications for Canadian agriculture, the environment and for health and safety are very large and extensive for our country.

I want to comment on the speeches of the two previous speakers, the member for Calgary Southeast and the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka. The parliamentary secretary has gone into some detail to try to justify the use of MMT in Canadian fuels. Yet it is clear that the United States is not moving away from its ban on MMT.

I have in my hand a document put out by the Department of Health and Human Services from the National Institute of Environmental Health Science in North Carolina, in which the director, Dr. David P. Rall, a physician and a Ph.D., outlines to some extent the very grave concerns that agency had with the use of MMT when it was proposed that it be reinstated. On June 7, 1990 he outlined in some detail the concern about the toxic effects, the absorption effects through the skin and the impact on the central nervous system in great detail. Clearly the United States is not moving away from the ban it has placed on phasing out MMT.

With regard to the comments by the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, he mentioned that the minister of energy is making a major statement in Saskatoon this morning. I must say that in my view is totally unacceptable. We have a major piece of legislation before the House this morning. If the minister is going to be making a major statement with regard to the use of ethanol, it should be made in the House of Commons, not at a press conference in Saskatoon. I would hope that when the minister returns to the House he will explain why he did not make the major statement here. This is the Parliament of Canada. This is where statements are supposed to be made on matters that have an effect on our economy, the environment, health and safety and transportation of fuel supplies in this country, not at a press conference in Saskatoon.

On Friday we received a beautiful, thick, glossy booklet put out by the Department of the Environment which outlines programs and activities that the government is involved in. In the section on agriculture there is one page entitled "Sustainable Agriculture". This is the entire content on agriculture in that booklet.

It is interesting to hear government members talking about the importance of moving to sustainable agriculture, the use of ethanol and renewable fuels and so on. However, in this document put out by the Department of the Environment there is not a single mention of the use of ethanol, even though the government did take the initiative of reducing the excise tax 8.2 cents per litre this past spring. We are very appreciative of the government making that initiative, but we have not seen it followed through by other action.

• (1140)

The bill before us this morning, Bill C-226, does principally two things. It requires that gasoline have 3.2 per cent oxygen by weight. The best way to do this is through the use of ethanol. It also removes or bans the use of MMT because of the health concerns that this chemical has caused and the fact that it has been banned in the United States for many years.

The implications of these two actions as proposed in the bill by the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex are very extensive. They reach far beyond those two little clauses in the bill. The impact is on the environment, to reduce the production of carbon dioxide, which has been a major concern and major target in reducing the impact of the greenhouse effect. The impact of banning MMT has wide implications for health in our country. In many areas of the United States they are moving rapidly to eliminate MMT. They are using ethanol and other forms of chemicals as octane enhancers.

The impact of moving to the use of ethanol in our country would be very extensive for agriculture. It is estimated that it would take between five million and eight million tonnes of grain. Whether it was feed wheat in the west or corn in Ontario, the implications of that are very extensive. We only have to look at our largest export markets: some four million or five million tonnes to Russia and the other Russian republics. Therefore, you are talking about something that would be larger in terms of the use of our western grains than any one of our single exports of grain. This of course would have a profound impact on diversification of Canadian agriculture.

I had the opportunity last spring to visit the Lanigan ethanol plant east of Saskatoon. It is a tremendous facility, producing some 10 million litres of ethanol. It utilizes some one million bushels of grain and, at the same time, it uses the material that is left over after the ethanol process has taken place to feed some 15,000 head of cattle. It is a major agriculture diversification facility.

The government should be moving on this immediately. By 1995 it is estimated that we will be importing some 500,000 barrels per day of light crude. Surely if we can replace a large percentage of that with the use of our own ethanol made from our own biomass, but principally grain, feed wheat and corn, we should be doing it. The foreign exchange implications are very great.

This bill would achieve all of these things. We hope that the government will move in this direction and that it will adopt this legislation because the impacts would be very great and very useful for our country. This bill would achieve all of these things.

However, there needs to be a commitment by government to more research and development and to reducing the cost of production. There needs to be a public commitment by the government to the use of these fuels because of the impact they will have on agriculture, diversifying our economy and, of course, public health and the environment.

I hope the government will reconsider the position that it has taken here this morning as set out by the two government members who have spoken. The impact could be very beneficial for our country if the government were to adopt Bill C-226 which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex. I certainly hope the government will reconsider and send this bill to committee for analysis and further study, and ultimately for implementation.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this bill, particularly as I am a farmer and know of the developments on ethanol in the Lanigan area which the hon. member just mentioned. It is east of Saskatoon where the minister of energy is making a very important announcement today. Our government has removed the taxation on ethanol and taken a very balanced approach to this whole area.

Proposed Bill C-226 would set a minimum allowable content for oxygen in gasoline and ban a manganese gasoline component, MMT, which is currently in widespread use in Canadian unleaded gasoline.

Is this kind of legislation acceptable in Canada? What is the environmental objective of the bill? Is it reasonable to pre-empt a comprehensive review of gasoline specifications and environmental impacts under way in Canada and the United States by pronouncing on one of several possible specification changes?

Federal departments are currently involved in reviewing all aspects of gasoline formulation. Further research on the air quality impacts of oxygenated fuels is required in the context of the examination of changes in several components of gasoline. This is a very complex subject with large potential impacts on the economics of the refining industry, the cost of gasoline, and air quality in urban areas.

The first part of this bill proposes to prohibit the sale in Canada of gasoline that does not contain at least 3.2 per cent oxygen, ostensibly to reduce automotive pollution. This minimum allowable oxygen content could be met using ethanol as a gasoline blending component and might also be met with the use of MTBE, but at higher blending volumes than commonly used for MTBE. However, since over 18 per cent of MTBE is required to meet 3.2 per cent oxygen content, which exceeds the amount of MTBE currently allowed, the use of ethanol to meet this oxygen content might be more likely.

A minimum allowable oxygen content of 3.2 per cent in gasoline, therefore, would favour the use of ethanol in an attempt to create a new industry in Canada as well as a secondary market for grains. What will be the effect of requiring this high level of oxygen content in Canadian gasoline?

Oxygenates in gasoline have been found to reduce emissions of carbon monoxide. However, at levels greater than 2 per cent, oxygenates have also been found to increase tailpipe emissions of oxides of nitrogen. These nitrogen oxides react with hydrocarbons to form ground level ozone, a cause of smog.

Depending on how the oxygenates are blended into gasoline, there is also risk of increased hydrocarbons emissions, the other component required for ozone or smog. So depending upon the environmental situation in a given region, such a high level of oxygen content might actually worsen local air quality.

• (1150)

In Canada, high ozone levels and smog are a concern in the lower mainland of British Columbia and in the corridor between Windsor, Ontario and Quebec City and in some regions of Atlantic Canada, at least for part of the year. In these areas some actions have been taken to reduce hydrocarbonate emissions, particularly in the summer months. Forcing such a high oxygenate content into gasoline might worsen the ozone problems, counteracting the results of their programs to date.

Given this situation, mandating that Canadian gasoline contain 3.2 per cent oxygen cannot be justified on environmental grounds.

The U.S. is going through a process of identifying gasoline formulations that give environmental benefits at reasonable costs in their circumstances. Canadians should learn from the U.S. experience and examine the options of gasoline specifications that are available to the refining industry and the provinces, through the established process of the Canadian General Standards Board. Sufficient technical information would be required before the federal government attempts to modify the existing gasoline specification process to address the unique environmental concerns of the various parts of Canada.

The over-all impact on vehicle emissions of a change in gasoline specifications is often not clear, since often the change in gasoline properties will have the effect of reducing some of the vehicle tailpipe emissions while increasing others. Arbitrary specifications which are designed to force the market penetration for ethanol should not be encouraged by supporting Bill C-226. Rather, the established process of considering changes in gasoline formulation through consultation with the vehicle and oil industries and the provincial governments, in conjunction with the Canadian General Standards Board should be followed.

What has the government already done to encourage the use of ethanol as an automotive fuel?

In the February federal budget, the excise tax of 8.5 cents per litre, normally charged on all gasoline sales, has been waived on the content of fuel ethanol produced from biomass. This incentive will offset some of the costs of blending alcohols into gasoline, making it more attractive as a gasoline blending component. Undoubtedly this has been a factor in the recent decision of United Co-operatives of Ontario to begin marketing a gasohol blend in southern Ontario.

In 1990 ethanol-gasoline blends were granted the right to use the Ecologo, under the government's Environmental Choice Program. This program helps promote the use of certain products by increasing consumer awareness of the environmental benefits.

In addition, under the green plan and other government programs, research and development continues to be carried out to reduce the costs of ethanol production so that alcohols can make an even greater contribution to meeting the energy needs of Canadians. A lot of research effort is also directed toward a better understanding of the ways in which transportation fuel formulation can impact on air quality.

We believe that Canada's agricultural industries and the producers of fuel ethanol can take advantage of these initiatives to develop a strong, viable fuel ethanol industry that can significantly contribute to Canada's energy future.

The second element of this bill proposes to prohibit the use of Methylcyclopentadienyl Manganese Tricarbonyl, or MMT for those who prefer using acronyms. MMT additives are one of the options refiners have to increase the octane rating of gasoline. Its big advantage is that it makes a very cost effective contribution to gasoline octane levels, at least at the level at which it is permitted. If MMT were not allowed, gasoline production costs would increase, likely leading to higher gasoline costs to consumers.

MMT has been used as a gasoline component in almost all Canadian motor fuels since 1978. In the United States, MMT was believed to interfere with some of the early automotive exhaust emission control systems and so it is used in lead free gasoline and has been disallowed by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency since the 1970s. Its use however continues to be allowed in the U.S. in leaded gasoline.

MMT has undergone extensive assessment in Canada to determine the environmental and health impacts. Although Transport Canada uses gasoline that does not contain MMT in the compliance testing in new vehicles, Environment Canada has tested emissions of vehicles burning MMT containing gasoline and demonstrates that these vehicles were within emission standards.

With regard to the health aspect of MMT, there is no evidence that the use of MMT causes any direct health threat. In fact, manganese is considered to be one of the essential elements of a balanced diet and over 99 per cent of the body's intake of manganese is from a dietary source.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak on the bill of my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex, Bill C-226, which would legislate a minimum level of oxygen in gasoline sold across this country at 3.2 per cent by weight and eliminate the use of MMT in gasoline sold in this country.

As I listened to comments made by my colleagues across the floor, once again it reminds me, and I am sure many other Canadians, of what drives the government to its policies of acceptance and rejection of certain legislation proposed either by itself or by us and that seems to be the corporate agenda. Where in the policies of this government do the issues of concern to the people come into being?

I listened to arguments from my colleagues on the government side against passage of Bill C-226. Their argument is that which was put out by the large corporations in this country that might tend to lose something if there was a ban on the use of MMT in gasolines.

I am very concerned about the importance of banning MMT in our gasolines for health reasons. I am very concerned about substituting this octane enhancer MMT by the use of ethanol in our fuels because of its important positive environmental impacts and also the positive impact it would have on the agricultural sector of our country.

I cannot understand how colleagues who understand that there could be even the slightest cause for problems to the health of our nation through the use of MMT in gasoline could object to the elimination of its presence in gasolines at this time.

Last week we listened to reports of how haemophiliacs have suffered because of blood transfusions when a government was warned that a certain procedure could cause complications and the government refused at that time to take adequate necessary measures to countermand that. We see today, the very negative results of that.

Now we hear of another possible threat to the health of Canadians from manganese as it exists in the chemical MMT, a chemical that can cause characteristics similar to lead when absorbed. Manganese is a chemical which is absorbed, and retained. As it is absorbed and retained has an increasing toxicity that can particularly imperil children and the aged in our society.

Manganese is a normal element in the chemistry of the air we breathe and some of the food that we absorb, but when it is absorbed at levels that are too high it does have a toxic reaction. It becomes a neurotoxin and has persistent and irreversible pathological effects on brain structure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

[English]

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 18, consideration of Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon) moved:

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 6 by adding immediately after line 9 at page 17 the following:

"(1.2) Notwithstanding section 10, where a person claims to be a Convention refugee, the person shall, upon request, be granted authorization to engage in employment on completion of the medical examination referred to in subsection (1.1)."

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, no wonder there is so much cynicism and disdain for politicians in this country when we see what the government has just done in putting another motion of closure on this bill. We have a government that speaks time and again in favour of parliamentary reform and democracy and yet, at the same time, systematically closes down debate on important and controversial bills.

Here we have the most extensive amendment to the Immigration Act since 1976, a bill with 128 sections and 113 pages. Yet at second reading—which by the way it called two days after the bill was tabled—second reading was limited to one and a half days on a closure motion. Now report stage where 69 amendments including 10 new amendments from the government have been tabled has been limited to one and a half days—a short day last week and one day today—and then the government is limiting third reading to one day tomorrow.

If the government had been reasonable and really did believe in democracy and parliamentary reform and had let this debate run its course, it would have only taken another couple of days. When I was asked by the government House leader and the representatives on the other side, I said that we could have done our amendments on report stage in two full days and probably we would want another full day for third reading.

But no, for all these amendments, for the New Democratic Party's amendments and for our amendments, because it has used up 45 minutes on this closure motion, in effect we really are not even going to get two full days. We got a half day last Wednesday and another half day today.

We are dealing with matters that touch the very heart of this nation. We are dealing with matters that touch on the peace and stability of the whole world. Experts before our committee predict that we will have an increase of three billion in world population in the next 30 years. We now have 20 million refugees in the world and here we are spending a few simple days on these matters when this should involve a lot of discussion and a lot of thought.

I have just come from a meeting at the United Nations. These matters are causing great concern in the United States and in all countries of western Europe: in Germany, in the United Kingdom, in France. They are allowing at least some time to discuss the matter.

Motion No. 9 before us is a Liberal Party amendment dealing with the granting of work permits. Right now, under the present law with the two-stage refugee hearing, a refugee is granted his or her work permit after being recognized at the first stage hearing. Right now it only takes about two months to get to the first stage hearing.

Under the bill before us, there is no provision to grant a work permit to a refugee until the refugee is fully recognized by the Immigration and Refugee Board. In the past this has taken up to two years but now takes between five and six months. But we do not know what might happen with the increased flows of refugees. There is no provision in this bill to provide for the quick and reasonable granting of work permits to refugees after they come into the country. What does this mean?

We had municipalities from Ontario appearing before the committee saying that because the federal government will not grant these work permits quick enough and will not provide for a quick granting of a work permit, many of these people have to rely on welfare. This great number of refugees has to rely on welfare whereas many of them could be working. By the way, many refugees work in the most menial of jobs. They take jobs that many Canadians will not take. But they could be doing that kind of work if we provided for the granting of work permits.

What is suggested in this amendment is that the work permit be granted after the completion of the medical examination. The government has said that the medical examination must take place within 60 days. We are saying in this amendment that we should put into the law that the work permit should be granted after the medical has been completed, which is after 60 days.

The government says that if that is done, people will come to Canada as refugees just to get a work permit within 60 days. What nonsense that people are going to leave Yugoslavia, people are going to leave Bangladesh, people are going to leave countries in central America just to come here and work after 60 days. They are coming because they are legitimate refugees and they are being driven from their countries by violence, by fear, and by persecution.

We should allow these people who want to work, if there are jobs available to them, to work after 60 days, as they can now after the first stage hearing. We support the abolition of the first stage hearing and we believe that the provision to grant the work permit at the end of the first stage hearing is a good thing. However, to leave it open-ended with no provision in the law for the granting of the work permit until the person is fully recognized as a refugee is not only stupid but is inhumane.

In committee the government accepted a certain number of amendments. This is the kind of amendment I thought it would have appreciated and would have agreed to. Under the new system it says that people will fully complete the process in five or six months, if it is contested. However, that is not assured. That is a hope. What is wrong with putting the provision into the law, such as we done under the present law, that a work permit could be granted after 60 days, after the completion of the medical examination?

As I said, the government agreed to certain amendments in committee and that was good. It showed some reasonableness and the bill was improved in committee. Unfortunately, many oppressive sections still remain and in our amendments before the House we hope to deal with those oppressive sections. This is one of them.

I am now doubtful whether we will even have a chance to debate many of these important amendments coming from the opposition parties. There is this closure motion. It is going to be voted on at 6 o'clock tonight and there are 60 some amendments to deal with. It is totally ridiculous.

I am urging the government to reconsider and accept this amendment or one like it.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment that has just been moved by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. I wish to add a little to his opening remarks about the shortness of time for this very important debate.

The government put in 70 amendments at almost the last minute before the committee hearings. The government put these 11 amendments in at the very last minute before the deadline last Tuesday. The government knew what it was doing. It told us that it took eight months to prepare this bill before it was tabled in June and then there were two days to study it. Staff lawyers take two weeks to study it and there is only a day and a half for debate.

Committee reading was during the summer when most of the people who could advise committee members were on vacation and when committee members also needed some time with their families. Now after committee hearings there are further amendments from the government and one and a half days to debate the amendments in a long bill—128 pages. It is clear the government does not want to have debate. We will not be able to do justice to the necessary amendments after I, and perhaps other colleagues, have eliminated some of the amendments we originally thought were necessary for the sake of focusing on the more important ones.

This amendment, which would give refugee claimants a chance to work and earn their living within 60 days of their arrival, is extremely important to metropolitan Toronto and the surrounding municipalities. The majority of refugees who have come to Canada are in the Toronto region.

Welfare costs are already very high because Toronto now has higher than average official unemployment, higher than the Canadian average. It is not as high as Newfoundland or Montreal but it is higher than the average for Canada. This has been going on for several years and it has affected welfare costs.

One neighbouring municipality has complained about the number of refugees on welfare even though the numbers are not that great.

In fact, the government is well aware that by putting a cap on the welfare payments it is making it next to impossible for municipalities in Toronto and the region to cover the cost of the refugees whom the government will not allow to work.

Under the new system the government says it take three, four or five months at most until there is a decision. It will not agree to give a work permit at the end of two months because it claims there would be fraud.

I do not understand how the minister can support that with a straight face because he told our committee publicly that the vast majority of refugee claimants are real refugees. Those were the minister's words: "The vast majority are real refugees". In fact he has repeated it.

If the vast majority are refugees how many people are going to travel thousands of miles—whether it is from east, west or south, they do not come across the pole—for what cannot be more than two or three months work at low wages? This is not an attempt to protect the country against a flood of frauds. This is an attempt to punish refugees for being refugees. It is an attempt to punish people who are being persecuted, who are being threatened with persecution, because they have come to seek safety in a country which in the past, before the last four or five years, earned a great reputation for accepting people in need of protection.

There is no good reason for refusing to let these people work. They want to work. They did not come here to live off welfare. They want to earn their way.

The municipalities want them to work and have said so. The Association of Canadian Municipalities said that to the committee. Yet this government refuses to allow them to work and it can only be because the government is adopting the policy of what is called humane deterrents, as expressed by a previous director of refugee affairs, Raphael Girard. We will not shoot them at the border, we will not send them away without a hearing, but if possible we will make them wish they had never come there by making life miserable with delays and under-funded refugee processing systems and by making it as hard as possible for them to earn a living or to pay for legal help.

This has increasingly become the growing policy of this government. Its refusal in committee to give us any answers to our questions on this point shows it is not willing to listen to reason, unless it has a last minute change of heart now.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to comment on the amendment and then I will continue in the time remaining to comment on the earlier comments of my colleagues.

In terms of the amendment, the bill does not provide for any specific point at which authorization for a work permit will be given. That is in response to the flexibility that is essential to changing conditions.

There is no question that there has been quite a broad debate on this subject. It is a concern that a number have raised, particularly the municipalities, in terms of access to a work permit.

I think what is important, and I would disagree with my colleague for Trinity—Spadina on this one point, is that a great deal of the refugee sections of this bill are in response to a number of people who were concerned that the process needs to be speeded up to be more humane and to provide for better service for refugees.

The intent of this legislation is to ensure that positive determinations are reached within two or three months, which is essentially the same effect as that of the proposed amendment. What we do not provide for specifically is that work permits be issued before the determination is found, and the policy will reflect that in the end.

• (1300)

I want to return, if I may, to the comments of my colleagues from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and Trinity—Spadina about the process that we have encountered here. I would like to remind all members of the House that this legislative committee received 186 letters and 116 briefs over a period of four months.

We heard 110 witnesses, 48 groups and 35 officials from federal government departments. Within the community this was widely discussed and a number of meetings were held outside of the committee, both with individual members and with the government.

Therefore, when I hear a complaint on one hand that there were 70 amendments and a comment on the other that the government was not responsive I wonder a little bit about the inconsistency. Most of the government amendments were either technical, in response to very specific concerns raised by witnesses or in response to the opposition.

Certainly, we did not address all of the concerns raised by the opposition or all of the concerns raised by the witnesses. That happens in this process. However, both of my colleagues have said elsewhere that they felt in certain areas that the government was responsive.

The government put forward its amendments when others put forward their amendments, and certainly before the report stage met all its obligations to do so. Its amendments, with one exception, are very technical and make the bill a little bit better.

I too have no sympathy for the process of time allocation. I do not like the process, but on Thursday last we debated Bill C-86 for three hours in this House. We dealt with one quick amendment that took 40 seconds. We dealt with another group of amendments, six amendments, for the rest of the time, one topic.

I spoke—I was the only government member to do so—for eight minutes in this House while successive opposition members trooped in and made speeches that had nothing to do with this bill. That was absolutely their right. However, when I hear the opposition complain that it does not have time to debate the amendments I worry about those lost three hours and where they went, and how far we might have gotten in discussions on these amendments.

Frankly, I lose a little bit of my concern about time allocation when I am confronted with this indignation this morning and am expected to have some sympathy for that position.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I too want to speak to this amendment because I think it is very typical of what has happened in this country concerning the amendments to the Immigration Act.

There has been some dialogue. The community is very concerned. It is becoming apparent that this government is out of step with the wishes of the vast majority of Canadians, as reflected in this bill and in the amendments it is putting forward.

For example, most Canadians think that family class and assisted relatives should be the priority in immigration, but this bill does not reflect that. Canadians feel that because it has been the history of Canadian immigration. Historically, people can come, and they have relatives here who can assist them in integration into the Canadian community by finding employment, finding housing and dealing with Canadian culture. This bill does not reflect that.

In my community of Surrey North there is a very large immigrant population. There are a large number of Asians from Hong Kong and from some other parts of south-east Asia. In particular, we have a very large Sikh population. The Sikh population has made tremendous contributions to the economic and cultural well-being of Surrey, of British Columbia and of Canada.

We are now downplaying that community's ability to involve its relatives in coming to Canada to strengthen Canada. Those people have extended families and they want extended families to come here.

Similarly immigrants in this country have always had a very high commitment to the work ethic. They have wanted to work from the day they arrived in Canada, like my father when as an immigrant digging ditches in March in Edmonton. He wanted to work and that was the work available.

This particular amendment is saying the same thing to refugees. Refugees who have arrived in Canada want very quickly to be able to shift from being a burden on Canada to being a contributor to Canada. They want to be able to get employment so they can support themselves and their families.

We have a government that is not listening to them, not listening to provincial governments that are having to provide income assistance for people who are awaiting the determination of their status and not listening to the general public. The general public says these people are here and while they are here why not allow them to work while their determination is being made? It certainly would be a benefit to the community, to them and to their families.

I cannot agree with the last speaker about the fact that this bill and the amendments put forward by the government have been debated by the public. After the government tabled the bill, there were meetings right across this country of concerned citizens and groups looking at the bill. All of a sudden there are amendments put forward and they have not had the opportunity to study those amendments, to determine whether they meet the concerns raised whether they support them. If the government actually had any faith in its package of amendments, it would let the public look at it at leisure. It would let the public determine whether it could now support the package. I believe the reason the government is now determined to push this bill through is that it knows it would not stand the scrutiny that people would give it if they had a more leisurely opportunity to look at the amendments.

I want to again say that I support this amendment. Most Canadians do. Most Canadians do not agree with the thrust of the government in this bill. They certainly do not agree with the fact that the government will not accept this amendment.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, in order to facilitate the debate today I was not going to debate this particular motion. After the government advocate from St. John's, Newfoundland, spoke just a few moments ago I thought that it was only right that we should respond to some of the accusations that were made in the context of the motion that we are debating today before this House.

There was some discussion, and I agree with my friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and my colleague, the member for Trinity—Spadina, what they have said with respect to the rights of people as they enter Canada, either as an immigrant or as a refugee, and their right to work.

First let me make a couple of comments about some very important matters that were dealt with the last time this bill was debated in the House. There were some very, very important amendments proposed by this side of the House, by both the NDP and the Liberal Party, with respect to substantive issues concerning the immigration bill.

We are concerned that time allocation was just announced a short while ago with respect to a discussion on the amendments. Let me just go over four or five of the amendments that we discussed in some detail. There were many people on this side of the House who wanted to continue the debate on matters that concern issues involving family members and their right to come to Canada. One fundamental principle that we stand for in the Liberal Party is uniting family members should they choose to become immigrants or refugees to Canada. That bill was debated. There were members on this side of the House who wanted to continue the debate.

The second motion, No. 5, was a motion on visitors' visas. We all know, as I said on the last day in this House, that visitors' visas were the ones that were causing the most concern with respect to problems with immigration outside of the country for members on both sides of the House about how those visitors' visas were granted. Our proposals were very sound and made sense. The proposals would have facilitated the operation.

The debate was stunted because not enough members were given enough time to make the salient points that they wanted to make with respect to a very vital issue, the visitors' visas that are issued by every embassy in the world. It is not done right. Our recommendations, as proposed by my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, were substantial and they were recommendations that this government should have taken into consideration and implemented without question. That was debated.

Other issues debated were the refund of immigration fees, which was not of much consequence but there were members who wanted to debate that issue, and Motion No. 70, the resident requirements. Along with that, Motion No. 7, proposed by my friend from Trinity—Spadina, and Motion No. 6, presented by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River, were substantive issues that this government should have adopted and implemented in this act to make it a more humane and palatable piece of legislation that would guide not only the immigration process in this House but the refugee problem that the government still cannot seem to correct.

The issue before the House now, Motion No. 9, is a motion which we have proposed for the benefit of the municipalities of this country. To put it in its simplest context, its simplest terms, as people come into this country, either by immigration or as refugees, they are denied the opportunity of having a work permit issued immediately.

What we are saying is that as soon as the medical process is through, which takes about 60 days, they should be offered the opportunity to go to work if, because of the economy, a job is available.

Having been offered the opportunity to go to work, at that point, 60 days after their arrival, what does it do? It takes a substantial amount of people who come to this country off of the welfare Rolls. We all know, through the experience not only in Ontario but in Quebec and every other province in this country, that the substantial portion of welfare payments is made through the municipalities. I compliment my friend, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, for attending all these meetings and for having the perseverance to bring this motion to the House. What we are trying to accomplish is a resolution that will help to eliminate the costly welfare system that we have in our country.

For people who have to apply for welfare, it is picked up proportionately by the provincial government and by the municipal government. If we afford the person more of an opportunity to get to work as soon as he is allowed to come into Canada, it would reduce the welfare rolls substantially, particularly in Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal where over 90 per cent decide to locate when they become either accepted refugees or immigrants to our country.

This is a motion that is spoken to and presented on behalf of the municipalities of Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal and all the other municipalities right across this country. It goes toward helping them bring under control the very expensive social welfare system that they are forced to fund.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 9.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

We will now proceed with consideration of Motions Nos. 10, 11, 12 and 13, standing in the name of the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina, and Motion No. 22, standing in the name of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, which have been grouped for debate.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved:

"(c.1) persons who".

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 11

(a) by striking out lines 10 and 11 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"zation that has been prescribed as an organziation which is or was engaged in"; and

"and while members are believed on reasonable grounds to have participated in such acts".

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 11 by striking out lines 37 and 38 at page 22 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a. 1) persons who".

Motion No. 13.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 11 by striking out lines 22 and 23 at page 23 and substituting the following therefor:

"(ii) have been convicted outside".

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon) moved:

Motion No. 22.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 28 by striking out lines 19 and 20 at page 40 and substituting the following therefor:

"constitute a serious threat to the security of Canada or whose presence endan-".

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the time we have I want to focus particularly on three of these motions, Motion No. 10, which would do also for Motions Nos. 12 and 13, and Motions Nos. 11 and 22.

Motion No. 10, along with Motions Nos. 12 and 13, is a motion to remove some offensive words from the bill, offensive in the place where they occur; namely, the words "who there are reasonable grounds to believe".

What we are talking about is a bill that says if there are reasonable grounds to believe that you have been convicted of something outside of Canada you can be excluded. That is an innovation in our law which obviously suits some police-minded people but does not suit the general public of Canada which believes that a person is innocent until proven guilty.

If the government thinks it has reason to believe that a person has been convicted outside Canada, it has a duty to find out whether that is true, what country it happened in, what court it happened in, where the record of conviction is, rather than say there is a rumour that there has been a conviction of this or that.

It is extremely unjust that a person should be turned away with little or no chance to seriously defend himself or herself simply on suspicion or rumour.

Clause 10 and clause 12 both fail on that point, and clause 13 also.

What I want to have there is that we will deal with persons who have been convicted, or in the case of clause 13, persons who have been convicted outside the country, not persons whom somebody suspects were convicted.

• (1320)

Clause 11 is a little different. Clause 11 would amend page 21 of the bill. I will read a little bit of page 21 to give the context. This is a clause to exclude people on the grounds of their connection with espionage, terrorism or subversion. It is agreed. There was no debate in the committee and I do not think there is any debate here that we need to keep out people who are concerned with espionage, subversion or terrorism. However, what this bill does at this point is to say that we will exclude persons where there are reasonable grounds to believe are or were members of an organization, that there are reasonable grounds to believe is or was engaged in acts of espionage or subversion or terrorism. In other words, it is twice built on rumour: he is, she is or was at some date last year or 20 years or 40 years ago a member of a certain organization or we have reason to think that and we have reason to think that organization, somewhere in the world, 10 years ago, 50 years ago, 1 year ago, it does not matter, was engaged in some of these activities and because this person belongs to that organization, the person will not be admitted to Canada.

What I would like to see changed is that at least the people should be able to know what is the organization or organizations whose members are forbidden to enter Canada. Therefore, I ask that the government prescribe these organizations and say that this, that or other organizations have been engaged in terrorism, or whatever it may be, and any member therefore can be excluded unless there is a catch-all clause at the end and unless the minister says it is all right. However, generally speaking, they will be excluded without much consideration.

Second, I believe the law should say that he or she will be excluded if at the time there is reasonable ground to believe that the person participated in those actions. In other words, a person could be a member of the African National Congress and not have been a participant in all the actions of that congress. A person could be a member of the Republican Party and not have been engaged in the Watergate burglary and so on and so forth. If the tables are turned, a person could be a member of the RCMP and not have been engaged in the crimes that they committed during the 1970s in Canada.

It should be limited to an organization that has been listed as subversive, terrorist or a spy organization and there should be grounds to believe that a person was a member and took part in those actions.

Finally, just a brief word. I want to say that I support strongly Motion No. 22 where it says that we should exclude people because they constitute a serious threat to the security of Canada, not a threat to the security or interests of Canada. Security, yes. If he or she is a threat to the security of Canada, we have to put them out, but if they are a threat to the interest of Canada, that is undefined. Does that mean they are opponents of the Tory government or, if there is a change, opponents of some other government? What are these interests to which the person could be a threat? It is so undefined that a person could not possibly be expected to defend himself against that and therefore it really means that we do not like the colour of that person's eyes or maybe the colour of that person's skin so we call him a threat to our interests.

Those are the only three I wish to speak on and they cover the other two that I have listed here.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak in particular to amendment No. 22 which was tabled by the Liberal Party and which is being debated in this grouping. Amendment 22 would strike out of article 28 on page 40 the words "threat to the interests of Canada".

Let me explain. That clause of the bill says: "For purposes of section 39 to 40.2, to enable the Government of Canada to fulfil its duty to remove persons who constitute a threat to the security or interests of Canada". In other words, this is a clause in the bill that allows the government to deport people who are a threat to the security and to the interests of Canada.

We in the Liberal Party accept fully the right to deport people who are a threat to the security of the country. That was in the bill we put to the House in the 1970s. The words "security of the country" are well known. That could be criminality, espionage, terrorism or subversion. Therefore, we believe that people who are a threat to the security of Canada should be deported. In this bill the government has also put in the words "a threat to the interests of Canada". That is not defined. What immigration officers are going to decide if a proposed immigrant is a threat to the interests of Canada?

If somebody appears at our borders or at our embassy abroad and says: "I want to immigrate to Canada", are they going to question them and ask: "Are you against the GST?". Some people in this country and this government think if you are against the GST, you are against the interests of the country. Are they going to ask: "Are you against the North American free trade agreement?" Some people might think if you are against the North American free trade agreement you are against the interests of Canada. Is being against this bill being against the interests of Canada, in the view of some government officials?

The point of the matter is that being against the interests of Canada is not defined. It is too broad and too general. Who is going to make the decision about whether an applicant for immigration is against the interests of Canada and, therefore, should be deported?

In my amendment to the government amendment, I am suggesting that we strike out the words "against the interests of Canada" and simply keep "threat to the security of Canada". We all agree that we do not want people in this country who are against the security of the country. However, we do not want some wishy–washy words in our law that say that we can deport people who are against the interests of Canada and nobody defines what "the interests of Canada" means. It is so general it could mean almost anything to a government in power. It would define what the interests of Canada would be. We do not think that should be in our law.

I am surprised that the government has not gone along with us on this one. I know many people on the government side and I think they would agree with me on this point. However, that is the purport of Motion No. 22.

I just want to say a few words on the amendments tabled by my colleague for Trinity—Spadina. As I said a few minutes ago, the Liberal Party fully supports provisions in the law that would keep out of Canada criminals, subversives, terrorists, spies and so on. We support measures along those lines. This bill goes beyond that. This bill provides, for example, that you could be kept out not simply because you have committed a crime but because there are reasonable grounds to believe that you might have committed a crime. That is quite different. Not that you have committed, but reasonable grounds to believe that you have committed. Right now the law says that if you have committed an offence you do not get in. Good enough. Then it goes beyond criminal offences. It goes on to deal with acts or omissions. If in addition you have committed acts or omissions in another country that would be considered criminal offences then you are also barred. My colleague's amendments are attempting to deal with this.

The worst amendments of all are the two catch–all ones that are so broad that they take in almost everything. One is if you belong to an organization that might have committed an offence in the past. He mentioned Exxon.

• (1330)

An American may wish to emigrate from the United States. If he or she worked for Exxon, because Exxon was convicted of an environmental offence a few years ago, according to the words of this section they could be barred from admission.

If you belonged to the Republican Party or Greenpeace, in which organizations there have been members who have committed offences over the years, just because they committed an offence or the organization was found guilty of an offence, are you going to bar forever all the other people, who might have been very good people, just because they belonged to an organization which was so structured?

We support those amendments as well. We think the government has drawn the net too widely in trying to keep out people. What is wrong in drawing it so widely is that you end up with subjective decision making, not objective criteria. You end up with unfairness. Whereas one person might get in and not be considered as being against the interest of Canada, another person may be considered as being against the interests of Canada. There may be reasonable grounds to believe that they belong to an organization that had committed offences. In another case there might not be reasonable grounds.

There is a thin line here that is too vague and will lead to unfairness. It is against the traditions of this country with respect to immigration.

I wish to get back to our own amendment, that we keep the provision that you can deport people who are a threat to the security of the country but we take out the part that says that you should be deported or sent away because you may be against the interest of Canada.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to respond on this group of amendments. Like my friends across the way, I will tend to do it by referring to Motions Nos. 10, 12 and 13 together, 11 and 22 on their own.

On Motions Nos. 10, 12 and 13, I want to say, and I know that many people in this House recognize it, that the principle of reasonable grounds in criminal activities are well established in this country, not only for the Criminal Code, the tax act and the competition legislation but it is something that requires a well established objective basis.

In the past, the courts quite clearly have made decisions along this line. To suggest that it is simply government responding to rumours would not stand up in any court and would not be reasonable in any government administrative process under Bill C–86 or any other legislation.

In terms of proposal No. 11, it suggests that we would only be able to keep people out that are members of prescribed organizations. In discussing this at length in the legislative committee, one of the expressions I used then which I think is appropriate at this time is that while it is impossible always to know the nature of an immigrant or of a refugee that you might want to bring in in the future, it is equally impossible to be able to know and therefore define all of those people that you are going to want to exclude in the future.

I understand when my colleagues often talk about clauses in legislation which sometimes are too wide open and perhaps cast too broad a net. But I also have come to understand the real problem that we have when we quite clearly start trying to go too far to define. In our attempt to be prudent and fair, we find ourselves in a position where we work against not only the interest of the country but against those who choose to come to the country.

On Motion No. 22, which involves the discussion that my colleague had about the question of the interest of Canada, I want to make two comments if I may. First of all, this particular clause, clause 28 of this bill which will be section 38.1 of the new law when it is in place, is a purpose clause. It provides, as my hon. friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has said, for the setting up of sections 39 and 40, which provide for the certification process in recognition that you do not want to have too much power without the proper checks and balances.

This legislation provides for a certification process under the provisions where there is a threat to the country. Both the minister of immigration and the Solicitor General must sign a certificate and that is what this process allows for. Certainly there is protection provided in section 6 of the charter that relates to the same thing.

The second point is that the interests of Canada are not always clearly defined but sometimes they are readily evident. Unfortunately we have seen in this country from time to time those who have come here and co-ordinated or undertaken activities that have nothing to do with things in Canada but with other countries.

For instance, if there was an effort to carry on a plan of terrorism or subversion in another country from Canada it is certainly not a threat to the security of Canada but it is a threat to the interests of Canada.

One thing this particular section of amendments addresses, which is sometimes very difficult for some of us to come to grips with, and I find myself in this bind often, is the question of balance. We constantly must balance the interests of Canada and Canadians with our responsibility to not only provide the opportunity for those who want to come to Canada and contribute to this country but also to provide safe haven and refuge. Certainly in my view that is the greater responsibility that we have.

The balance comes in ensuring that we have a system that is fair, accessible and open and continues to allow Canada to live up to its tradition of being a protector without parallel around the world, while at the same time ensuring the security of Canadians and the immigration refugee determination system by knowing who we have in the process and by being able to deal in those very rare situations with those who should not be in this country. Until now in some cases the minister and the department have not had the ability to remove people from this country when I think any reasonable person would say they should be gone. That is what some of these provisions provide for.

I suppose we could sit and imagine situations where there would be a negative effect, where provisions could, if we examined them in isolation, be used against those who choose to come to Canada. That has not been the tradition in this country. That is not the way the Immigration Act has been used, either the 1976 act or the 1988 act. I do not believe there are many who believe that is about to change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The debate will be on all the motions just moved.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have one motion in this grouping. The other nine or ten are all government motions. I will comment on a couple of the government motions that I think are not merely technicalities. I think they are quite harmful and I regret very much that we were given so little time, on top of everything else, to handle these late government motions after their eight, ten or twelve months of preparation.

First, my Motion No. 14 places a condition on the new powers of the senior immigration officer. On page 25 there is a section, and I will not read it all, that says, after listing certain grounds of inadmissibility:

the senior immigration officer shall allow the person—

That is the person who has just been confronting him.

—to leave Canada forthwith or make an exclusion order against the person.

In other words, he either leaves voluntarily or is ordered to leave.

I wish to add these words:

unless the person requests an inquiry or claims to be a permanent resident, in which case the senior immigration officer shall cause an inquiry to be held concerning the person as soon as is reasonably practicable.

As it stands, the power given to the senior immigration officer is far too absolute, far too arbitrary. There are some things that cannot be cleared up, just standing there, between a person coming in and the immigration officer, even if they are sitting down. The person does not have the time to find out what test he must meet, which was unexpected, and the immigration officer may or may not give him sufficient time, it may not even be practically possible for him to do it. That is why the inquiry system is used.

I am thinking particularly of a person who is a permanent resident but who, in coming back or even after he has come back, may be challenged as not being a permanent resident but a visitor who over-stayed his visa or somebody who came in without a visa, who sneaked in. He may be picked up at his home a day later or a month later and deported without notice as an indirect consequence of this clause and other clauses which the government is about to pass.

Under the new system the person should have a permanent resident card instead of the landing paper. However, there are a couple of problems with that system. The card may expire and if the person has been legitimately abroad working or studying, fully intending to return to Canada, he may be told that he does not have a valid card and is not a resident. The person may have lost the card. It may have been stolen, this can happen. The person may then be told that unless he can prove right on the spot that he is a permanent Canadian resident and he is not a permanent resident he is excluded.

I believe there would be many injustices, perhaps unintentional injustices, in such a case. A person may not be prepared, may not carry around all kinds of documentation with him. If he was robbed of his wallet, and perhaps other documentation was lost as well, they would be available at home in Toronto, or wherever else the person lives, but not available right there while he is standing in front of the senior immigration officer.

There will be other occasions when the person believes that his statement of fact is not properly understood by the immigration officer.

In either case, whether it is a permanent resident or somebody else who believes that he should have the right to inquiry, I believe that this clause should be amended to give him that right to an inquiry before an adjudicator with the time—it should not be instantly then, it could not be instantly then, but it says "within a reasonably practicable time"—to collect whatever evidence this person may have that he is currently a Canadian citizen ordinarily living in Canada but away on business.

For some reason not explained the government is abolishing a very practical arrangement, which is that if a person is leaving Canada to study for a year or something like that and is a permanent resident, a person can get a certificate from the government that certifies that he is a permanent resident and has the right to return. That is the law at present. That provision is being taken away by this bill. It means that the person coming back is very vulnerable to being mistakenly accused of not being a permanent resident. The only recourse against that is that he be allowed to go to an inquiry and have opportunity to present the evidence which would then enable the immigration officers to do justice to his real situation.

I would hope that on further consideration the government would consider this amendment and support it.

There are two other motions I wish to speak on. Motion No. 17, as far as I can understand it—and some of these I have not been able to understand, even with the help of some legal, professional advice—would give this power of exclusion, particularly page 32 which changes the line significantly. Instead of saying that the senior immigration officer may make a departure order against a person as long as he knows that person is not alleged to be a person described in any other paragraph or somebody who overstayed a visa and was ordered to leave and knows that the person is not the person described.

In other words, if he said it is alleged it is reported, that a certain person should not be let in, the procedure is that the matter would go to inquiry and the person would have the chance to prove that the allegation is mistaken or untrue and that he is not somebody who should be excluded. This subtle little change means instead of saying the person is not alleged to be a person described, it says the person is not the person described. In other words, the senior immigration officer is to make his decision on the spot, not to do a report to an inquiry, but to say leave the country now.

This is a mistake. This is in Motion No. 17, which I will have to oppose for that reason.

Likewise, Motion No. 32 says it is going to strike out certain lines and substitute: "A person who claims to be a convention refugee on or after the day on which this subsection comes into force is not eligible to have the claim determined by the refugee division if (a) the person had, before that date, claimed to be a convention refugee and the person was determined not to have a credible basis for the claim; (b) the person was before that day issued a departure notice; (c) the person has not left Canada since the departure notice was issued".

There have been several refugee claimants who have challenged in courts successfully the denial of their credible basis on the grounds that the test was unreasonably hard at that preliminary stage. This would insist that such a person would be sent away before he has a chance to make the appeal.

That would be very unjust and although this is only transitional from the old system to the new, there are some cases which are in the pipe right now. One of them has already been to court and will go to court further. While it is being decided by the court, and while other cases are being decided by the court, we should not introduce this clause which would send the person out of the country to possible persecution, even death, without the court's having given an opinion on the matter.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, recognizing that I have six minutes with the endurance of my colleagues, I will refer to these amendments as a group as best I can identifying them.

The first would stem from Motion No. 68, which deals with clause 102. There are subsequent amendments that will be found in clauses 21, 22, 23 and 45. What that does is allows the government instead of being able to only set one period of time, to set more than one period of time.

An example that I would give is if the departure order said that the time of leaving the country was January 15 but an H and C hearing was arranged for February 15, it would allow for a second period or another set of periods to be put in place and that adds some flexibility. As I said, there are some sequential amendments that go with that.

I want to refer to the amendments that flow from clause 80 which refer to provisions that are transitory and relate to changes in sections 113 and 27(21).

What would happen is if the departure notice is in place for a certain period, the new legislation would come into place. What the new legislation will say is that the departure order becomes a deportation order in either 90 days or the date already in the departure notice, whichever is the greatest.

What that obviously does is allow for more equal treatment of time. You can argue that one date is 89 days away, another date is two days away, and that is not equal. It ensures that the date for everybody is 90 days from when the legislation comes into effect.

We should remember that those who have departure notices in hand already will have had hearings either before an adjudicator or other processes in place.

I want to refer to Motion No. 41 which refers to the costs of removal that would be incumbent upon a transportation company. The costs to be paid are the actual costs if the regulations have not provided for prescribed costs.

Motion No. 40 would allow, not demand, that the officer would be able to put in place a 12-month order against returning to Canada. This would prevent against going literally from one border station to the other. This is something that does not apply to refugees and is something we have seen the need for in the past.

The amendments to clause 36 provide for more precision and the proposed amendment makes it clearer; before it was a bit loosey-goosey.

I would like to respond very briefly to Motion No. 14 put forward by my friend, the member for Trinity—Spadina. He would, I know, agree with me that in terms of dealing with permanent residents and lost cards, there was quite an extensive process of amendments put in place through which the government was responding to very real concerns of the opposition and other people.

Certainly section 23 subsection 4(b)(ii) provides for the protection he seeks. It is important to recognize that if someone is a permanent resident and comes forward and says he has lost his card, it is not simply a matter of that is it, that is tough, he is done for. If that person has the ability to show there are good grounds that he or she is a permanent resident, this new card, which will be provided to students and others, will be replaced.

However, if after all of that we or the immigration officer or whoever comes to the conclusion that they do not believe there is permanent residency, that there is absolutely nothing to be done to convince them of it, there is an appeal procedure which provides for that person to come to Canada for that appeal. That should be recognized. Again, refugees are quite clearly protected from this section. They are not included in this group. I think that is another important recognition.

DELTA HOSPITAL

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the Delta Hospital has always been a prime example of a community hospital with active participation of the community in the affairs of the hospital in the form of volunteers and also fund-raising.

The hospital is currently in the midst of major fund-raising efforts, during the month of November, and to date has raised $650,000 of a $1 million goal. These funds are to provide a computerization of patient information, second, to support the excellent emergency department with equipment and assist the casualty officers and, third, to provide an education endowment fund to ensure continuing education and upgrading of all the hospital staff.

I commend the Delta community and its hospital board and staff for the excellent facility that they are developing and their accomplishments to date.

QUEEN'S GOLDEN GAELS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the Queen's Golden Gaels won the Vanier Cup for the third time. Playing stifling defence and with a potent offensive attack led by running back Brad Elberg, the Gaels completely overwhelmed the Saint Mary's Huskies 31 to 0.

I am sure all members of this House, even those who attended Saint Mary's, will join with me in offering our heartiest congratulations to the Gaels on their convincing triumph and to the Huskies who played the high calibre of football we have come to expect of their team in recent years.

Special congratulations must be extended to Queen's coach Doug Hargreaves. He has led the Gaels for 17 years. Through hard work and dedication he has ensured that Queen's is consistently among the top teams in Canada.

Today, in addition to being the best university in Canada, Queen's can now rightfully boast that it has, without doubt, the best college football team in the country.

BLENDED FUELS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, one of the happier events in my riding earlier this fall was the opening of a blended fuels gas bar. Now I and my constituents in Halton Hills can tank up with gasahol, which is comprised of 10 per cent ethanol. This fuel is environmentally friendly and completely renewable. It helps consumers protect the air they breathe while providing an important market for local corn producers.

The advent of gasahol is directly attributable to the actions of the federal government. The last budget removed the excise tax on the ethanol portion of blended fuels, making them commercially viable.

Now the government is doing even more. Today in Saskatoon the energy minister announced a five-year $12 million green plan project to encourage the production and use of ethanol in Canada. This initiative will expand the assessments of fuel emissions, support research and development of ethanol production technologies and encourage commercially viable ethanol projects.

Ethanol is one of Canada's future fuels: clean burning, powerful and ecologically responsible.

I am proud to be part of a political party which recognizes and promotes this.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to express my exasperation with this government's economic policies.

Canadians are suffering and far too many are living below the poverty line. High unemployment rates have become chronic. In my riding of Northumberland alone, we are experiencing a backlog of 500 welfare applications, with an additional 2,000 people about to exhaust their unemployment insurance, thereby swelling the welfare rolls to unprecedented levels.

The number of hungry children sitting in classrooms forced with their families to food banks is directly linked to unemployment. One million, one hundred thousand Canadian children live in poverty.

Since 1989 when this House passed a resolution to end child poverty in Canada by the year 2000, 170,000 more children find themselves living in poverty. Government economic policies are responsible for this deplorable situation.

Without question human beings, Canadians, are our greatest natural resource. Children are our future. Swift action must be taken to lower unemployment rates and to directly benefit Canadian children living in poverty.

SCHOOL BUS SAFETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for several months, coroner Marc-André Bouliane has been fighting a big battle in Quebec for our children's safety when they ride school buses.

Here is a man who cares and listens to all parents and those whose children were killed by a school bus.

Mr. Bouliane is shaking up the Government of Quebec and the school commissions in that province. He is fighting, but it is not a revolt. On the contrary it is learning to be responsible for what happens.

Mr. Bouliane, you have my respect and, for the love of our children, continue your struggle.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, for the 300 communities across Canada that depend on the forest industry, staying the course with this government's trade policy means failure.

From 1987, when it signed the softwood lumber memorandum of understanding with the United States, to the four straight losses during the countervail hearings, this government has betrayed the people who earn their living by working in an industry that is our number one export earner.

We learned on Friday that the Canada-U.S. panel hearing the softwood subsidy and injury case has collapsed. One of the panellists has resigned due to a conflict of interest and this resignation has suspended the panel and, as weak as it is, will further delay resolution of the issue, costing more Canadian jobs.

Staying the course means that Americans will continue to attack Canadian industries at every opportunity. For the sake of our forests, change course.

HADASSAH-WIZO

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Hadassah-Wizo organization of Canada launched its 75th anniversary celebration under the leadership of President Esther Matlow. I want to recognize the exceptional achievements of the women in this important organization.

The 17,000 women from across Canada work together to improve the lives of Israeli women, children and seniors. They also educate Canadians about Israel, Zionism and Jewish culture.

Hadassah-Wizo plays a major role in providing social services in Israel and promoting women's rights and human rights in Canada. They do an outstanding job funding many services, including schools and hospitals in Israel.

I applaud the work these women have accomplished over the past 75 years. They have left an indelible mark on the Canadian and Israeli way of life. Many people will continue to benefit from their devoted efforts in years to come.

LEONARD PELTIER

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on November 9 the case of Leonard Peltier, Indian rights activist was heard by the United States Court of Appeal in St. Paul, Minnesota.

At that appeal the views of 55 Canadian members of Parliament were presented in a brief to the court by Toronto lawyer Diane Martin. We argued that Peltier's extradition from Canada to the United States in 1976 was fraudulent in that it was based on a false American affidavit, another example of judicial discrimination against aboriginal people.

Not only did this act constitute a gross injustice to Leonard Peltier, but it was also an arrogant abuse of the Canadian courts by the FBI. This is not the behaviour one expects between friendly sovereign countries.

Once again we are asking the Canadian government to recognize that this extradition was fraudulent and that it approach the American government to request a new trial for Leonard Peltier.

After 16 years of imprisonment ,this the very least we can do.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, having been very involved in the issue in recent months, I note with disappointment today that, perhaps due to some bitterness, some of us are refusing to negotiate any administrative agreement with any province whatsoever.

I would remind you that in the constitutional negotiations, everyone saw an advantage in transferring labour force training to the provinces. How can one justify refusing to negotiate administrative agreements today? Economically it would save taxpayers $250 to $300 million and eliminate overlapping if manpower training were transferred to Quebec.

Quebec insists on negotiating such an agreement and we as a government cannot for long justify a seemingly intransigent attitude to our constituents. All parties concerned in Quebec are unanimous in considering the transfer of labour force training to be essential. Let us leave bitterness behind and work to improve—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is now up. The hon. member for Mount Royal has the floor.

HADASSAH-WIZO

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, today marks the 75th anniversary of Hadassah-Wizo, Canada's largest organization of 17,000 Jewish women, active from sea to sea, through their 276 chapters. Highly regarded at home and abroad as a force for good, they have been at the heart of Israel's history, its social and humanitarian development ever since its creation in 1917, the very year of the Balfour declaration and more than a generation before modern Israel became a reality.

• (1410)

In their high energy achievements and unrelenting pursuit of social betterment, they have championed an impressive number of causes vital to the well-being of Canadians as well as to the Jewish and Arab women and children in Israel. An outstanding training ground in community leadership skills, participants in all facets of their own communities' life, they also made significant contributions at the international deliberations for the Decade for Women in Mexico and Nairobi.

It is with some small measure of shared pride as a long time member that I salute their work, local and global, acts of loving kindness, Mitzvot. Yasher Koach as their's is not a simple task, it requires devotion to principle, as well as planned strategic action in cultural, educational, youth and elder care as well.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the previous Liberal government established the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation to buy and sell fish in much of northern Ontario, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and the Northwest Territories. The FFMC has been both necessary and important for many who are involved in the fishing industry.

Unfortunately under both the Liberals and the Conservatives this agency has failed to provide the flexibility to meet the real needs of those who fish for a living. This was a major concern of a conference raised by delegates in Winnipeg last weekend, a conference that no federal minister deemed important enough to attend.

Why is it impossible to buy fish in many of the communities that are surrounded by the very lakes in which these fish are caught? Why do major cities in Canada not sell these same fish and why do those who fish for a living not have any effective role in making the decisions that determine their lives?

For the sake of the children of those who fish for a living, I ask the government to change the course and to work positively to solve the problems these people face.

CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, high quality education and training are essential to Canada's future ability to remain competitive internationally. With the creation of the Canada Scholarships Program in 1988 as part of Innovaction, the Canadian Strategy for Science and Technology, and its extension to 1995–96, the federal government will have invested a total of $155 million to encourage young people to become educated in high technology and to ensure that an adequate supply of highly trained Canadians exists in the scientific and technical fields for the future.

I am proud to say that this week 48 such gifted students from the University of New Brunswick's faculties of Engineering, Computer Science and Science are receiving scholarships amounting to $2,000 per year over the next four years.

These young men and women will have the opportunity to compete for careers in fields where the forecasted demand for highly qualified people in science and engineering will exceed that of most other occupations. Canada scholars will not only be viewed as prime prospects by employers in industry and the public sector, but will lead Canada's participation in the high technology and knowledge based economy that the world will offer in the next century.

I know the House will join me in congratulating all recipients of Canada scholarships in this country.

DETERIORATION OF OZONE LAYER

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as far as the ozone layer is concerned, the situation is serious and indeed urgent.

This year, the ozone layer reached its lowest level in decades and it is deteriorating at a faster rate than expected. Last month, the ozone layer above Canadian cities reached its lowest level in over 30 years.

This situation, is hazardous to human health. The deterioration of the ozone layer increases the risk of skin cancer and of cataracts that can cause blindness, and it has a disastrous impact on farm production. The health and well-being of Canadians and of the whole world are at stake.

Today, in Copenhagen, nearly 90 countries are trying to accelerate elimination of substances that destroy the ozone layer. I urge the government to take the kind of progressive position the occasion demands and show that Canada is capable of leadership in this field. The government must approve a specific and definitive timeframe for the complete elimination of methyl bromide and commit itself to banning the use of HCFCs. This is imperative, in order to protect human health.

STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the student loans program is under review currently. This review involves all aspects of the program. A frequent complaint received in my office is that the income ceiling disqualifies many prospective students from student loans and prevents their continuing education.

A student coming from a family with a total family income in the $35,000 to $40,000 range will have a difficult time securing a student loan, and chances are the application will require an appeal.

If Canada is to maintain its place as having a leading economy, we must ensure that those students with the desire and ability are able to continue their education.

The Secretary of State must address a high delinquency rate now running at one student loan in five. As well, he must also deal with steadily increasing administration costs.

With all this in mind, I urge the Secretary of State to work toward raising the maximum family income limits to ensure that our students have a chance to complete their education.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

According to the newspapers, in his speech yesterday in Montreal the Prime Minister said that he would enact policies that would be right for the country in the future. Canadians wonder why he failed to do so during the past eight years.

He also said that his current non-interventionist policies were in the best interests of our children.

Today 406,000 young people in this country between the ages of 15 and 24 are looking for work. The question is this: Will the Prime Minister do something so that these 406,000 young people will be able to go home at night with the satisfaction of having earned an honest living?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my speech yesterday in Montreal, I said that despite the problems that exist throughout the industrialized world today, there is some good news for the Canadian economy.

Canadian productivity has increased 5.2 per cent, while unit costs have dropped more than 5 per cent, which is a major contribution towards improving our productivity and our competitive position.

Furthermore, interest rates remain competitive, while inflation is now 1.6 per cent on an annual basis, the lowest of any major industrialized country.

The International Monetary Fund predicts that next year, the economic growth rate in Canada will be 4.4 per cent, the highest in the industrialized world. Even more important, among the G-7 countries, Canada will rank first on job creation.

Despite our own problems and those that exist in all major industrialized countries, the outlook for a strong and durable recovery in this country is bright and encouraging.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have heard these predictions in the House for a long time. It is always like that: next year, next year and next year. The people of Canada know that the situation is very bad today.

Last night again the Prime Minister said that he always tries to do the right thing for Canada. In 1983 he referred in this House to: "that fundamental British tradition in this country, which calls for an election not in five years, but within four years, so that the people can judge the actions of this government".

When he want to Rideau Hall to announce the 1988 election, the Prime Minister said: "It has been the Canadian tradition to call an election after a government has completed four years of a mandate".

If it was right in 1983 and right in 1988, why does the Prime Minister not do the right thing and call an election? We are in the fifth year of the mandate.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the tradition to which my hon. friend refers is four years and our four years was on Saturday.

My hon. friend may want to wait a few days before we give him some news. However, given the solicitude of my hon. friend for a four-year mandate, I wonder what his reaction was around the cabinet table when the first Liberal government from 1968 to 1972 went four years and four months. The second Liberal government, from 1974 to 1979, went four years and ten months.

• (1420)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, did the hon. member, who was then a minister, rise up at the cabinet table and say to Prime Minister Trudeau: "Prime Minister, this is wrong. You must call an election in four years or I am going to resign"?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a strong tradition in Canada too, that when a government waits till the fifth year, normally it loses the election, because it is an admission that they are afraid of the people.

The Prime Minister yesterday referred to the possibility of waiting until next fall. He might be about to repeat the experience of Mr. Hatfield in New Brunswick where he waited until the last minute to call an election. He was waiting for something to happen, and something did happen: He got zero seats.

The Prime Minister was so happy with my statement that I thought he wanted to get up and announce the election right away. Now he says we have to wait a few days. Can he promise us he will make that announcement before Christmas?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when I get up to announce an election my hon. friend is going to wish I had sat down.

My hon. friend's knowledge of history is quite minimal, otherwise he would know that the party that violated the four years' rule more often than not was his. Of course, he was a member of the government and so—

Mr. Marchi: You had the option.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says I had an option. Here we go again. I always feel comfortable, Mr. Speaker, with a Liberal leader who is sitting twenty points ahead about eight or nine months before an election, calling for an election, because when it comes he always regrets the result.

Mr. Chrétien: Let's do it right now.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister. In his speech last night he said, in effect, that Canada's children would thank him and his government for its policies. Because of these policies 700,000 of Canada's children go to food banks; 700,000 children and more—a million children—live in poverty. There are record levels of unemployment among youth.

How can the Prime Minister honestly expect Canada's children to thank him for his policies since they mean nothing more for them now or in the future but the bread line, the unemployment line and the welfare line?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows full well that when he was first sworn in to government, the Government of Canada was spending 12 cents on the dollar to service its debt. When he left in 1984 it was spending 32 cents on the dollar, the worst record of any country in the industrialized world.

Had the Liberals remained in office and spent exactly the same percentage of the GDP on programs as they were then spending, the deficit this morning would be $82 billion on revenues of $128 billion.

What we are doing on behalf of the children and grandchildren of Canada is saving them from a future with nothing but debt, with no running room, with no flexibility. We want to provide them with a growing economy and we want to provide them with growing economic opportunities. The only way that we can do this is by managing the economy of Canada effectively today so that they

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister.

If Conservative government policies are so good for Canada, if they are the right ones for Canada, why are more than 1.5 million Canadians still out of work with little prospect of jobs for months and perhaps for years? Why is our economic growth so slow and so weak?

Speaking of deficits, why is this government's deficit for this year some $7 billion more than the Prime Minister's own Minister of Finance said it was going to be only last February?

In short, if the Conservative government's medicine is so good, why is the patient, the Canadian economy, still so sick?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to suggest that we are not going through difficult times here and around the industrialized world.

Obviously unemployment is too high, but unemployment today is less than it was when my hon. friend last served in government. The day he turned the government over it was 11.7 per cent.

My hon. friend asks about progress. I suppose it is all relative. Ten years ago, when my hon. friend was a member of the government, it was coming out of a serious recession as well. It was not easy.

Mrs. Finestone: Not as badly as you.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "Not as badly as we were". Let us compare.

Ten years ago this morning the interest rates were 22.75 per cent in Canada. This morning the interest rates are 9 per cent. Ten years ago this morning the inflation rate was 10.9 per cent and this morning it is 1.6 per cent.

The unemployment rate, notwithstanding what my hon. friend says, was in point of fact worse. The combination of these rates brought about the misery index which was the worst in the history of Canada under that party.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that democracy in Canada was founded on the convention that an election will be held every four years.

As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister said that we should honour this fundamental British tradition in this country which call for an election, not every five years, but within four years so that the people can judge the actions of the government.

The Prime Minister will also know that during peacetime, only three times this century has a government extended its mandate beyond that four-year period. The Prime Minister will also know that during his time in office, the lives of Canadians are worse than when he assumed office. He knows that his program has essentially failed the people of Canada.

Would he do the children and the grandchildren of Canada the ultimate favour, give them a Christmas present by calling an election today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, only a deepest commitment to the fundamental precepts of Judaeo-Christian charity would prevent me from calling an election in the interests of the NDP today because there would not be one of them left if an election was called today. They do provide value to this House of Commons.

Mr. Martin: Sometimes.

Mr. Mulroney: The statistics of my hon. friend in regard to this government are of course quite false. The information that he has imparted to the House is misleading and I know that he would want to withdraw it in much the same way as he says that only three times in this century have governments gone beyond four years. They have gone six times beyond four years and many times have been successful.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, at our standing in the polls, we are quite prepared to go to the people today. I challenge him to do the same thing.

On the weekend the Prime Minister said that for the sake of our children, we have to get the fundamentals in place. We have to stay the course. What does this course mean? It means we have a crisis in transport. We have a crisis in agriculture. We have a crisis in fisheries on both the east and the west coasts. We have a crisis in debt management. However, we have a growth in banking. Back in 1981 there was one food bank. Today under this government, we have 348 food banks across Canada. There has been a tremendous growth in food banks thanks to the government's policies.

• (1430)

The people have definitely lost confidence in this government. That is why we are in this crisis situation today in terms of the dollar and interest rates. They have lost confidence.

In the best interest of our children and our grandchildren, will the Prime Minister do the right thing, either change course or for goodness' sake, call and election?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that because of the polls people have lost confidence in the government and therefore this government should resign. Would he give the same advice to the NDP in Ontario?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: I am not suggesting he should. I am just wondering if he has or if he would consider it.

My hon. friend refers to the realities. I have indicated what the fundamentals are according to the IMF and my hon. friend should take some encouragement from this. Canada is expected to lead the G-7 in economic growth in 1993 with a growth rate of 4.4 per cent. We are expected to lead the industrialized countries with the lowest inflation rate in the neighbourhood of 2 per cent in 1993. But much more important, Canada is forecast to lead the G-7 countries in terms of employment growth. That means we have the fundamentals right, irrespective of the nature of the international difficulties and that Canadians will benefit from the programs we have put in place.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we are getting sick of hearing this Prime Minister serving up Tory-light as a way to respond to these very serious concerns being raised by members of the opposition parties.

Not only are the New Democrats calling for a change of course, but members of his own caucus are as well. I have before me a letter from a member of his own caucus, in fact a previous cabinet minister, which says: "I believe that the government should not proceed at this time with some of the fundamentals, namely the North American free trade agreement, and should publicly commit itself and all its resources to the goal of full employment".

If the Prime Minister does not listen to the New Democrats, if he does not listen to the people of Canada, will he at least listen to members of his own caucus who are saying abandon NAFTA and turn his attention to creating full employment in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to listen to that member of caucus if my hon. friend will assure me that he will listen carefully to Mel Hurtig.

Mel has said, and he said this without having received a federal subsidy, that the NDP is through and that the Liberals do not have much of a chance. My fear is that he may wind up supporting me.

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This weekend the President of Mexico said that he will be meeting in January with President-elect Bill Clinton to negotiate a solution to the problems of NAFTA, including new issues such as immigration and extradition. Contrary to what this tired old government has been telling Canadians, we are now in fact facing de facto changes to NAFTA.

Will the Prime Minister recognize there are deep problems with that NAFTA agreement? It is now time to put forward a Canadian agenda for changes to trade agreements to promote Canadian interests.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is of course quite wrong. There are no deep problems with NAFTA at all. NAFTA will be signed and implemented as it has been agreed upon.

The President-elect of the United States has indicated that for example with regard to Mexico there are some difficulties on the environment, particularly between Mexico and the United States. There are some immigration problems between Mexico and the United States that are widely known and that have nothing to do with the substance of NAFTA. In the course of negotiating this, apparently they feel it would be appropriate to conclude some parallel arrangements that might help them deal with these two or three specific problems. So be it, we wish them well. They have nothing to do with the fundamentals of NAFTA, which will remain intact.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a sign of the total bankruptcy of ideas of this government that it does not recognize that the ravaging of the environment and the reduction of standards for workers are not part of a trade agreement because we already have seen a loss of 350,000 jobs in the manufacturing area for Canadians alone. Most of all we should know what a bad trade agreement can do to workers and to the environment.

I want to ask the Prime Minister again why does this lame duck government that has lost all credibility with Canadians persist in trying to ram through a trade agreement that will be destructive to the future of young Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, trade between Canada and the United States has increased by $16 billion since the free trade agreement was signed between Canada and the United States.

My hon. friend raises the question of trade. Trade has increased dramatically between Canada and the United States. The forecast on the first six months of this year indicates an increase of 10.5 per cent of trade between Canada and the United States raising our exports to $119 billion. That is the largest trade arrangement between Canada and the United States ever, and the most successful.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Current account deficit.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is now talking about current account. I would be happy to discuss that. We are talking now about export trade. Our exports to the United States are at a record level. In light of this and foreign investments have increased—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The largest current account deficit.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor and is answering the question.

Mr. Mulroney: Foreign investment has increased in Canada by $6.5 billion net, I believe, since the free trade agreement was signed. So we are very much in favour of the free trade agreement, as is President-elect Clinton.

My question to the hon. member would be: The NDP has the position that it is going to abrogate the free trade agreement. It is going to tear it up. What is the position of the Liberal Party of Canada in respect to the free trade agreement?

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the answer is very clear. We will negotiate a good agreement. We are not going to do like either the Tories in Ottawa or the NDP in Ontario. We are not the Bobbsey Twins of the apocalypse, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

My question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. The government persists in hanging on to power and doing nothing. For example, no industry is more affected by the government's inertia than the steel industry. No industry is in greater need of a good free trade agreement, which the government has not delivered.

That being so, and since the government refuses to reopen negotiations, what exactly does the government intend to do to give us what it says it supports, a real North American steel pact?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House just last Thursday, I told the hon. member and members opposite that we have had significant discussions with both the Canadian industry, management as well as the union leaders. We have raised this particular issue with the U.S. government, the Prime Minister with the President, myself with Carla Hills, and our embassy representatives with a wide range of people in the administration. We have been told that there is no support for this as far as the U.S. industry is concerned.

We are seeking ways to try to encourage that support with the industry using the various contacts we have. If it is possible to get a U.S.-Canada steel accord we are very supportive of that. We have made that clear all along. But one cannot just turn the tap on and say we will have a steel accord. There has to be agreement on both sides. That is what we are trying to build right now.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, if there were support by the U.S. industry then the Canadian industry would not need this government to go to bat for it. If you can understand that, that is when you are needed and then you should act and if not, then you have not acted.

On another subject, President-elect Clinton said last week that he would like to see the North American free trade agreement extended to Chile and Argentina as soon as possible. To extend the NAFTA with its current bias against Canadian exporters would only make a very bad situation worse. Why has the Canadian government not taken the lead with the governments of Mexico, Chile and Argentina? Why has Canada not indicated or demonstrated that it is in the common interest of all potential signatories to make the removal of U.S. harassment, the misuse by the United States of anti-dumping suits, a condition precedent to any further agreements?

• (1440)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I may have missed something in the exchange. I am trying to understand the position of the Liberal Party. On the one hand we have the critic from Winnipeg saying that he wants us not to go ahead with this deal, that he wants us to renegotiate the deal whatever that means. On the other hand, we have the critic from Montreal saying that he wants us to expand the NAFTA, that he wants to see it go to Venezuela and Chile.

What is the position of the Liberal Party of Canada? Are you for it? Are you against it? Are you right down the middle? Because it is very uncomfortable being right down the middle.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have to say that I finally agree with the trade minister on some comment in the House of Commons.

This government talks about getting the fundamentals right. I have here dozens of free trade sector studies that were forced out of the government in 1986 under access to information. They provide the industry-by-industry cost comparisons which are needed to judge the effects of any trade agreement.

Will the trade minister tell us why he has not released similar sector-by-sector studies on free trade with Mexico? Does he not realize that one of the key fundamentals for all Canadians, their children, and their children's children is being open and honest with information?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, last week in committee I drew the attention of the committee to pages and pages of studies that have been done by this government and others within Canada, within the United States and within Mexico. There are studies after studies after studies if my hon. friend wants to spend the time dealing with them.

Let me just draw his attention to some specific facts, not studies about what the future might bring, but facts about what has happened under the free trade agreement which my hon. friend opposite says is such a disaster and which the member from Winnipeg says is such a disaster.

Mr. Langdon: Answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend is having a hard time keeping his mouth shut and trying to listen to the answer at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: We will move on.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that there have been no sectoral studies.

My question is for the Prime Minister who has said that his government has the fundamentals right and that it will stay the course. I am wondering what these fundamentals are. Is it the nearly 58,000 bankruptcies so far this year? Is it the nearly 400 plant closures in Ontario, the 3.5 million people on UI or welfare, the 405 new food banks, or is it the 20 per cent of the population that already has half the wealth while getting still more? Is this the dreadful path of fundamentals on which this government will stay the course for the benefit of our children?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the fundamentals, if we are going to enjoy sustained growth, are low inflation, low interest rates, higher economic growth, all of which are forecast by the IMF, but more important high productivity growth and low unit costs. For the first time in many years Canada's productivity increase this year is twice that of the United States and higher than all of the other G-7 countries. These are most encouraging points even though—

Mr. McCurdy: To whom?

Mr. Mulroney: Well, my hon. friend says to whom. All that indicates is a great deal of ignorance because it is to all Canadians.

The only way we are going to increase wealth is by enhancing productivity. That is the only way to sell products abroad, thereby creating jobs at home.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It concerns the scientific evidence released by his department on Friday which recommends further drastic cuts to cod quotas in Atlantic Canada.

Obviously the advice cannot be ignored, but the minister knows that these quota cuts will lead to thousands of job losses in fish plants in communities across Atlantic Canada.

Will the minister inform the House what measures his government has in place to assist those individuals and communities and on what date this compensation program will be announced?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I made public the advice from CAFSAC, from our scientists with reference to the total allowable catches that should be put in place for 1993 in the Atlantic groundfish fishery.

With reference to most stocks their advice is that these stocks are under pressure and the total allowable catches should be reduced very considerably; in fact up to 70 per cent in the case of one of the stocks involved. This will have a serious impact on the Atlantic groundfish fishery, particularly in Cape Breton, eastern Nova Scotia, the west side of Newfoundland, the south coast of Newfoundland, and parts of New Brunswick.

The next step is to meet with the industry again and with the provincial governments to get their advice on what they think of this scientific advice—it is advice that we can accept or amend if we wish—and how they think a reduction should be put in place.

If extraordinary assistance is needed for some fishermen, certain gear types or whatever that will not be able to make a living or meet their expenses because of these reductions, I have no doubt that some assistance will be put in place.

First a decision has to be made and that will not be made until the middle of December. Then we will have to see what 1993 brings.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, that is a tired answer from a tired minister of a tired government.

The minister of fisheries knows that these cuts will close entire communities in Atlantic Canada, including perhaps Petit de Grat in my constituency.

Restructuring the fishery over the long term is certainly necessary, but will the minister not admit that part of the task of rebuilding the fishery is to support the people who will depend on it when it is rebuilt?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel particularly tired, but if I am tired it has not stopped me from assisting 20,000 fishermen in the province of Newfoundland when we had to declare a northern cod moratorium. It has not prevented me from working so that the Grand Bank plant, the Gaultois plant and others have come back from certain disasters that they suffered.

We will continue to do that, but we cannot put a plan in motion until decisions are made as to what total allowable catches should be.

We have to recognize the fact that the unemployment insurance program is in place, that many fishermen and fish plant workers are on that program now, and that whatever the effects will be of the 1993 Atlantic groundfish management plan there can be no effects until it is put in place. If there are effects then which cannot be met by regular government assistance programs I have no doubt that with the support of the Prime Minister, which I have had to date and which I am sure I will always have when it comes to helping people, we will put in place a plan that will help those who need that assistance.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, let us put the question to the Prime Minister who I know is not tired of or bored by the plight of Atlantic fishermen and plant workers.

Will he go to bat in cabinet for those people affected by last week's quota cut proposals? Does he condone the discrimination that is implicit in his minister's response whereby he gives compensation to northern cod fishermen but refuses to do it for other Atlantic fishermen and plant workers, including those in the plant at Ramea, for example?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows better, although we will never know in this House that he knows better.

The situation with respect to the northern cod fishery was that scientists recommended they found conditions unparalleled in any other fishery. They recommended that the TAC be reduced to the lowest level possible and that it should in no way exceed 50,000 tonnes of fish which was already just about caught for that particular year. They pointed out that there were two year classes, 1986 and 1987, which had to be saved so that they would reach spawning age, or the stock itself might very well not survive.

This is unparalleled in any of these other fisheries. In none of these other fisheries do the scientists recommend that there be a moratorium or that the stocks be reduced to the lowest level possible. Therefore we do not have similar situations. We have stocks with a spawning biomass about half the long-term average or higher.

I cannot close fisheries, unprecedented actions never before taken in the history of Canada, simply because the hon. gentleman represents an area which is not a northern cod area but where they are having difficulties with the fishery.

There have been good seasons and bad seasons in the fishery for 400 years. I am not going to close a fishery unless I have absolutely no other alternative. Where fishermen and plant workers require assistance I will do my best to see they get it. I have never been too tired to do that and I will never be too tired to do that.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, maybe the minister could expend some of that energy on the Ramea people. There is a case that he has skated all around but has not addressed, and I ask him to do that.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Is the real reason he is not declaring a moratorium on the south coast of Newfoundland at 3PS and in the gulf that he will then have to provide compensation as he has done with the northern cod? Is that not the real reason he is hiding behind a partial closure to avoid the compensation?

Why does he not come clean with those fishermen? He can shout and bellow all he wants. Those people are hurting just as badly as those involved in the northern cod fishery.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, every government program involving the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars has to have rules and regulations.

With respect to the Northern Cod Compensation Program we made a very generous rule, that for fish plant to be eligible it would only need to have a throughput of 10 per cent, and that particular plant's throughput should be the northern cod in either the year 1990 or the year 1991. It was a very generous provision.

In the case of the plant at Ramea it did not have a 10 per cent throughput of northern cod in either 1990 or 1991 because the people managing that plant did not apparently choose to put northern cod through the plant. Therefore the plant is not eligible for northern cod. I cannot make it eligible for northern cod. It does not meet the rules of the program. I invite the member—

Mr. Speaker: I am going to move on.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The federal Minister of Justice is not unaware of the law enforcement problems faced by the Sûreté du Québec on Mohawk reserves. Since the Mohawks have recently said through their leaders that they do not intend to comply with the new federal gun control law, what has the minister planned with the Sûreté du Québec to enforce this law on Mohawk territory and can she assure us that there will be no exception and this law will apply to everyone?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the gun control laws apply to all Canadians. No exception has been made for native people or any other group. This was true before the recent amendments took effect and it is still true today.

As for enforcement of the gun control laws, the hon. member knows that the administration of justice is in provincial jurisdiction. It is not up to us to enforce the law in Quebec; it is up to the Attorney General of Quebec and the Minister of Public Security in that province. It would be presumptuous on my part and inappropriate to tell them how to do their job.

Nevertheless, the Government of Quebec has already asked the federal government for help, which has been duly provided. It is not our business to intervene in fields under provincial jurisdiction unless we are expressly asked to do so.

Unless and until such a request is made to the Government of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: I want to move on.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. At $500 a plate Conservative Party fund raisers the Prime Minister has been bragging about his government's economic policies. He says: "We have got the fundamentals right. We are staying the course".

Yet with unemployment at over 1.5 million and growing, child poverty at 1.1 million and growing, and social assistance recipients at 2.6 million and growing, this is not the sort of progress we need.

For the sake of Canada and their children, will the Prime Minister finally admit his government's mistakes, change course and help make life better for Canadian families, not worse?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to unemployment and says it is growing. That statement is false. Then he refers to child poverty and says it is growing. That statement is false as well. The prefatory remarks by my hon. friend are misleading, inaccurate and bear no reflection whatsoever of the latest economic realties.

I have already indicated that the best way we can preserve economic opportunities for our children is to make sure that we do not burden them any further with debts to pay for today's programs. The best way to do that is to increase our productivity, to increase investment, to open new trading opportunities, and to invest in human resources to provide them with appropriate opportunities in the future. That is exactly what we are in the process of doing.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that he plans to stay the course and give us more of the same. I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare can assure women in Canada that he will not be giving us more of the same.

There have been increasing reports that saline breast implants may be the host for fungus infection and their safety is in question. At the same time the six-month voluntary moratorium for silicone gel implants has expired.

Will the minister advise Canadian women what he intends to do regarding both the saline and the silicone breast implants?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the saline breast implants, the member knows that report came out very recently. Normally those implants were considered as safe and were even recommended to replace the silicone gel breast implants. The department is looking at the report to see if it is necessary to take action and, if so, we will do that.

In terms of the moratorium the member will understand that with the referendum we had to postpone some answers to the reports to the House on hepatitis b, on breast cancer and on the moratorium.

I will come forward soon with answers to their reports and give my answer to the moratorium on silicone gel breast implants.

ROUGE VALLEY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for the Environment.

Last Friday the Ontario NDP government's Interim Waste Authority published its short list of three proposed sites in York region to handle 40 million tonnes of metro's garbage, and I was astounded to hear that site M-6 which borders on the Rouge Valley was on the short list.

On Friday I announced that if the NDP government were foolish enough to proceed with this site, my government would seriously consider terminating the $10 million financial commitment we made in 1988 to help create the Rouge Valley Park.

Does the minister agree that the IWA and the Ontario NDP government should be put on notice that we strongly object to site M-6 being on the short list?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to respond to the member's question.

There has been constant vigilance by our government and Canadians have worked to persuade successive Ontario governments of the need to protect and preserve the Rouge Valley in the national interest as a magnificent park in the greater metropolitan Toronto area.

• (1500)

This latest NDP announcement certainly flies in the face of the position of the federal government and, indeed, of Canadians that the Rouge Valley be established with no expressways, no development and no dumps. Our government is working diligently to preserve its historic and natural aspects. We look forward to working with the provincial government in order to preserve this and we need to preserve its magnificence today.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Prime Minister said on December 9, 1983: "It does happen that a government sits too long. It does become exhausted and bankrupt of ideas".

Will the minister tell us how the government now proposes to provide Canadians with a stable, competitive and Canadian-controlled airline industry, or will he acknowledge that this exhausted government is bankrupt of ideas?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that last week I said many times in this House that we had received a joint proposal from PWA and its council of employees on either Tuesday, November 10 or November 17.

Since that time we have been working diligently with all parties to try and go over the different hurdles there are in this proposal. We are working to arrive at a solution that will assure the airline system in Canada of stability over a long-term period and the viability of the components.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health.

One of the most telling signs that this is a tired and old government has been in the placement and treatment of health care in this country for the last four years.

Last week the minister was asked to respond to the very serious issue of tainted blood in the Canadian blood supply system. The minister at that time refused to have a public and impartial inquiry. Today we stand again in this House and ask the government to provide for an independent inquiry to ensure that the blood supply system in this country is protected.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is no reason to change the decision that I gave to the House last week. I said at that time that from the information provided there is no reason to believe that what happened in 1984 should trigger the kind of inquiry he is referring to, except if there is any new evidence, any new information that would make this inquiry necessary.

I also said last week that I would be ready to do so. However, with the information we have, there is no reason for an inquiry. He knows that his colleague from Winnipeg, with two or three other members, has decided in the subcommittee on health to consider some kind of inquiry. We will collaborate and I believe should wait for the result of that inquiry at the parliamentary level.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition signed by residents of Amos, La Motte, Landrienne, Senneterre, La Corne, Saint-Marc-de-Figuery, Berry, Villemontel, Saint-Félix-de-Dalquier and Préissac, in Abitibi. Your petitioners are of the opinion that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and should be banned because they generate more violence.

This petition says that toys that encourage violent games are unacceptable and that the manufacture thereof should be banned. It also points out that when acts of violence are reported, freedom of the press should be restricted, and that news about acts of violence, broadcast repeatedly on all channels and on radio, can lead to further, identical acts of violence.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation dealing with the points mentioned, in order to eradicate violence in our society, provide better safeguards for our children and improve the quality of life of everyone in this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Miliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several residents of Kingston and other cities, in Ontario and other provinces, who object to the goods and services tax, but especially to the tax as it is applied to books.

[English]

The petitioners are appalled that Canada is one of the few countries if not the only country in the western world, that taxes the reading of books, magazines and newspapers.

One might expect such a law in a totalitarian state but not in a free democratic country like Canada where the printed word is one of the cornerstones of our freedom and where magazines and newspapers and freedom of the press are considered one of our great freedoms and indeed, a very important freedom in Canada.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to repeal the goods and services tax in so far as it applies to publications. I am pleased to support and present this petition.

RAILWAY SAFETY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to introduce a petition on behalf of many people in the Stewiacke, Nova Scotia area.

The petitioners request that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police be vested with the statutory authority to enforce all existing and future safety regulations and provisions under the Railway Safety Act where currently they have no power or authorization to investigate or intervene on behalf of the citizens when a breach of the said act is committed.

This petition results from a series of accidents at the railway crossing at Stewiacke. The people there are most concerned that the provision is not properly enforced, in their opinion. Perhaps this petition will help get that enforcement.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): As you know, Mr. Speaker, the communist authorities of Vietnam vowed during the seventh congress of the communist party that it will use all means necessary to maintain the power of the party.

Some of my constituents, Canadians of Vietnamese origin, have signed petitions calling on the government first, to encourage and pressure the Vietnamese government to abandon its inhumane policies and restore civil and humane rights in Vietnam; second, that all Vietnamese regulations, codes and constitutional provisions prohibiting free expression or denying freedom of association or religious freedom be eliminated; and finally, that the Vietnamese government and the communist party of Vietnam make a formal commitment to permit free and fair elections under international supervision so that the citizens of the country may determine the future leadership and orientation of their government.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions I wish to present. The first one is signed by several hundred members of New Westminster and my own riding. It points out that family class and assisted relative immigrants have been historically an important part of Canadian immigration policy and that assisted relatives and family class immigrants have people in Canada that can assist them with obtaining employment, housing, and learning Canadian customs and language.

The petition goes on to point out that the present proposals by this government will downplay assisted relatives and family class and calls on this government to develop a policy that gives first priority to family class and assisted relatives.

INDIA

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the second petition points out that approximately 75 per cent of all activity in the Delhi office in India comes from the Punjab, for visitors' visas and immigration cases. It points out that it is very difficult for people to travel within India from the Punjab down to Delhi and is often not safe.

The petitioners call upon this government to establish a consular service in the Punjab.

NARCOTICS CONTROL ACT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the battle against drugs is being waged in virtually every Canadian community across our country. It is sad to see in many of these same communities that the battle is being lost to those who wish to spread this malaise across the country, particularly among our youth.

• (1510)

Therefore I am proud to present two additional petitions of a wider campaign. Petitioners of my riding of York West ask the government as one possible tool with which to aid those frontline organizations in the battle that the Narcotics Control Act be amended so that the assets from drug seizures can be shared with local police organizations and community associations.

In this way those funds would not only go into the general revenue fund at the federal level but would get reinvested, if you will, with organizations that are on the front lines of trying to combat this malaise that is afflicting all too many Canadians.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, issues of personal safety and security are high in the minds of Canadians these days as we hear many stories.

Today I stand again in memory of Rosalynn Dupuis, the nine-year old girl who was brutally murdered. People are signing the many petitions which are being circulated asking that the government reconsider its way of dealing with serious crimes committed by young offenders.

People from across Canada are signing these petitions asking that the government act and act quickly.

BILL C-91

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by people from many provinces who are deeply concerned that Bill C-91, which has recently been in front of the House and is now in committee, seeks to end the licensing of no-name generic drugs in Canada.

Most observers have pointed out, including the government's own analysts, that this will result in significantly higher costs for consumers, for provincial governments, and therefore for taxpayers across this country.

The petitioners, on whose behalf I have the honour to present this petition, ask this House of Commons not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 which was passed in 1987. It extended at that time the privileges given to the multinational drug companies, those brand name companies which have been so profitable in the past and which will be even more profitable in the future with this new legislation. I hope it is rejected.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the privilege of presenting petitions signed by thousands of constituents. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children.

The petitioners ask and encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse. They want this Parliament to develop legislation to provide assistance and support for women reporting assault or abuse. They want to make sure that we concentrate a special effort on the training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about woman and child abuse and also to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 344 and 391.

[Text]

Question No. 344—Mr. Wood:

Since 1988, with respect to logging on federally owned land, (a) how many licences have been awarded (b) who received these licences (c) for how long were the licences in force (d) what is the allowable harvest for each licence (e) how much land has been reforested as a percentage relative to the land logged over this same period?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Since 1988, with respect to logging on federally owned land:

(a) Licences have been awarded for three properties.

(b) The licences were awarded to:

(i) Canadian Forest Products Ltd. (Canfor), for Timber Berth 408 in Wood Buffalo National Park, Alberta.

(ii) Cariboo Indian Enterprises Ltd, for a property owned by the Department of National Defence and managed by the B.C. Ministry of Forests: Lot 7741, Chilcotin Military Block at Williams Lake, British Columbia.

(iii) Crestbrook Forest Industries, for lands owned by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and managed by the B.C. Ministry of Forests: Dominion Coal Blocks—parcels 73 and 82, near Cranbrook, British Columbia.

For each property the following table indicates, respectively:

(c) The duration for which the licence is (was) in force.

(d) The allowable harvest or annual Allowable cut (AAC).

	Duration of licence	Date of expiry	AAC (m^3)
(i) Wood Buffalo	21 years (*1)	year 2002	4000,000 (*2)
(ii) Chilcotin	15 years	year 1997	31,000 (*3)
(iii) Cranbrook	3 yrs + 8 mths	April 1993	21,2000

Notes: *1 The licence was declared invalid on June 12, 1992
*2 Due to controversy surrounding the licence, no logging has occured since 1990. Actuel havest levels were roughly 50 per cent of the AAC.
*3 In response to native land claims no logging has occured since 1989.

(e) The estimated percentage of land reforested relative to land logged for each property is as follows:

(i) Timber Berth 408, Wood Buffalo National Park: approximately 20 per cent of the area harvested has regenerated naturally. There has been no artificial reforestation.

(ii) Lot 7741, Chilcotin Military Block: Natural regeneration is the prescribed method of reforestation, but the extent of land regenerated is not known since no surveys have been taken in the last five years.

(iii) Dominion Coal Blocks: An estimated 100 per cent of the land harvested is reforested as a condition if the terms of the forest licence.

Question No. 391—Mr. Caccia:

Was there a decision made to install a new set of advanced short-range radars as part of the $1.3 billion North Warning System and, if so, what were the reasons motivating that decision and, specifically, who are the potential enemies that would warrant the construction of this radar system?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Yes, the 1985 memorandum of understanding between the Governments of Canada and the United States sets out the parameters for the construction of the North Warning System (NWS) and outlines the terms of a decision to install a set of short-range radars as part of the NWS. As part of the North American Air Defence Modernization Program, the NWS will assist in providing comprehensive coverage of aerial approaches to the North American continent. With the end of the cold war the importance of such coverage for Canada has become less a question of potential enemies than of being able to conduct effective surveillance over the approaches to Canadian airspace. The maintenance of this capability is an important aspect of Canadian sovereignty and security.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this amendment is simply to make sure that we amend the French so it is consistent with the English. [Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Debate is on all the motions that have just been moved.

[English]

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, the pressure from the government has given us 10 minutes to debate 15 motions and these motions cover some of the most important points of difference.

The great majority of the 40-odd groups that appeared before our committee was opposed to the harsh restrictions placed on the entry of people into Canada to claim refugee status, restrictions harsher than in the previous law. I have several motions dealing with this but I probably will not be able to deal with all of them in 10 minutes, let alone with the ones from the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. I would say I do support the motions from the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce as well.

• (1530)

My first motion, No. 23, is to replace part of clause 35 with these words: "unless an appeal from the order has been allowed"—that is an order to depart—"or unless the person satisfies an adjudicator, upon application, that there are good reasons why the claim"—that was the refugee claim—"was not made prior to the issuance of the removal order, and that the claim is not obviously unfounded".

I am trying to plug a hole in the process created by the government's abolishing the requirement that when the person who might be a refugee claimant comes to an inquiry, he be asked: Do you wish to make a refugee claim? That is in the present law. That has been crossed out, abolished.

There is a danger that a genuine refugee claimant will not know at what point he should say that he is a refugee or a refugee claimant, or that he is afraid of persecution if he returns. He might talk about things that happened back home but not clearly say that he is afraid of persecution and he may never be considered to have made a refugee claim.

I have asked in the motion that that hole be filled with this requirement, that if he does say he is a refugee and if at some later stage he explains why he did not make it at the beginning as required—because he was not asked—that he be allowed to proceed with the claim.

Motion No. 24 would add in: "A person who expresses a fear of persecution shall be advised by the immigration officer of the availability of the refugee determination process". This addresses the same point in a different way. If an immigration officer understands that a person has expressed a fear of persecution the officer has the duty to tell him what the steps are by which he can apply to have that claim properly adjudged.

Motion No. 25 is a clause that sends a person back to a country through which he passed where he can be returned, a so-called safe country, of which the government proposes to make a list. It says he can be sent back if it is a country to which he can be returned. Then I wish to add these words: "and where the person can remain".

Countries have sometimes accepted a refugee claimant back and then shipped him on to the country he originally fled from. It has to be a country where the person can remain and it shall not be done unless the person satisfies the refugee division that the person has a well-founded fear of persecution in that country.

In other words, the person claims that he is afraid. If he is a Sri Lankan or a black African and is afraid to go back to Germany because of the race riots there, that should not be adjudged by the senior immigration officer at the border. The senior immigration officer should send that question for decision by the body that is specially trained, specially appointed and empowered to adjudge that question: the refugee division of the Immigration and Refugee Board.

I will skip Motion No. 26 and go on to Motion No. 27. Again this is to describe the country to which Canada intends to send a person back on the grounds that he should make and should have made a refugee claim there. Some countries have a very sloppy, superficial treatment of refugees partly because they do not have the money—very poor countries—or partly because they do not agree that much with it.

This is to be a country in the words I have here: "that has undertaken by means of a bilateral agreement with Canada or by means of a multilateral agreement to readmit and determine the refugee claims of persons who are returned to its territory from Canada". It is not enough to readmit him; they have to agree to determine the refugee claims.

Skipping Motion No. 28, I will go to Motion No. 29. This deals with a person who had decided in Canada not to be a refugee, had left the country and then came back again. The question is: Does he have reason to come back that he was considered not to have the first time he came? My motion inserts the words: "If that person has been decided by a competent person or body not to be a convention refugee or not to be eligible to have the claim determined by the refugee division, he can be sent away, unless the person can satisfy the refugee division that there has been a change in circumstances which justifies a reconsideration of the original decision".

In Sri Lanka the Indian army came in and for two or three months and there was so-called peace. The refugee board decided it was all right to send Sri Lankans back to Sri Lanka. War broke out again and the refugee board would not send them back then, or almost none of them, during that war time. The circumstances had changed. That should be available to a person who went out and came back again, if he can convince the board, not the officer at the border, but the expert refugee board is the one that should be convinced of that and the officer should send him there.

Motion No. 64 would substitute on page 102 a much better approach for making these bilateral agreements. I am going to read it, although I might run out of time: "The minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may, subject to ratification in accordance with subsection (2), enter into these agreements"—that is, for burden sharing, for sharing the work of supporting, examining and perhaps entertaining refugees and the ratification that is required". Subsection (2) reads: "The Minister of Employment and Immigration shall lay or cause to be laid before each House of Parliament, for ratification, at least 60 sitting days before its effective date, every agreement that is proposed to be entered into under subsection (1), and it shall stand referred to such committees as may be designated or established by each House of Parliament".

The question of whether a country such as Germany is fit to have black refugee claimants returned there is a matter that should be debated within this House and not just done behind the closed doors of cabinet. That is the purpose of this motion.

Motion No. 67 is a motion to describe countries that we consider adequate with their refugee policy. It would amend clause 102 by inserting these words: "Countries that are parties to and comply with their obligations under the convention and international human rights law"—which goes far beyond the convention in many ways—"and that have agreed to accept back on their territory persons who came to Canada through that country, and to ensure that those persons will have their refugee claims fully determined, and if accepted as refugees have all the rights afforded under the convention". That is a very complete definition which I think we should be using.

Finally Motion No. 71 concerns countries from which the refugee might have come, or claims to have come: "The Governor in Council shall only prescribe a country under paragraph (1)(s) or renew any prescription under that paragraph for that country if; (a) the country ensures respect for human rights of refugees and refugee claimants as established by the convention and international human rights law; (b) has instituted a procedure to identify and protect the convention refugees which meets the standards set by the executive committee of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees"—by the way Canada is on the executive of the High Commission for Refugees—"(c) has undertaken by international agreement or otherwise to readmit and determine the refugee claims of persons returning to its territory by Canada".

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I am going to talk to Motions Nos. 31, 36 and 34 and 66 which are amendments I put forward on behalf of the Liberal Party.

• (1540)

Under the present law, there is a two-stage process for admitting refugees to this country. At the first stage they determine questions of eligibility to proceed to a full hearing before the refugee board and they deal with questions of credibility.

The overwhelming number of experts in this field and the overwhelming number of witnesses who came before committee agreed with the government's move to get rid of the first stage hearing because a great percentage of the cases that went to the first stage hearing were agreed to and went on to the second stage. Therefore it was a waste of time and a waste of resources.

However, it was our view if you get rid of the first-stage hearing dealing with eligibility that you transfer those matters to the full hearing of the board as a preliminary question. You do that before the board because there is due process before the board. There is a right to representation, the right to interpretation and so on.

However that is not what the government has done in Bill C-86. It got rid of the first stage hearing dealing with questions of eligibility where there was due process and the right to a lawyer and so on. But it has given the decision making on eligibility to a senior immigration officer, to an official who will make a decision on these matters. This will be done without any due process, without any right to be heard by the refugee applicant, without any lawyer or any interpreter or whatever. He will make a decision just by looking at paper.

We say that is absolutely wrong. In effect, what the government is doing in Bill C-86 is placing a barrier between the refugee applicant and the refugee board where his case will be heard because it will allow, under Bill C-86, a senior immigration officer to turn away certain refugee applicants on the basis of five criteria. This is one of the principal objections to this bill.

Here we are, a signatory to the Geneva convention where we agree to accept refugees who are fleeing from countries of persecution and so on, but we are not giving them a right to be heard in all cases. We are giving a senior immigration officer the right to turn them away without a hearing and without due process which is against the legal traditions of this country.

In my amendment I am saying that one of the grounds on which the senior immigration officer can turn the applicant away is if the senior immigration officer believes that the applicant has been recognized as a refugee in another country. The government is saying that it is a black and white issue. There is no need for a hearing.

That is nonsense. All the experts before us have said it is not a black and white issue. Very often refugees come from one country. They flee into a neighbouring country. They stay there for a few weeks or a few days, maybe in a refugee camp. They get fed, clothed and many live in a tent, and then they go on maybe to Europe and finally come to Canada. The question as to whether they are recognized as refugees in those countries is a very difficult and complex one. Many countries do not have very clear-cut processes as we have in Canada which finally do say: "Yes, you are a refugee" or "No, you are not a refugee".

We believe that that issue should not be left to a senior immigration officer who can decide that without any hearing or right to be heard. What we are saying in Motion No. 31 is that in that particular case, there would be referral for a hearing and the senior immigration officer would have to inform the refugee applicant of such a hearing especially where he or she would qualify under section 53. Section 53 is an exception to that rule, that where the person's life or freedom would be threatened for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or for political opinion, should be allowed to stay in this country and not sent back to one of those countries, even if that person was recognized as a refugee in those countries. The other thing we are saying is that the senior immigration officer should refer those cases for a hearing when there is some doubt as to whether the applicant is eligible or not.

Another reason or the major criterion on which the senior immigration officer can turn people away is if the senior immigration officer believes that the applicant comes from what is called a safe third country. We say that the definition of a safe third country is too narrow. We totally agree with the report of the Senate committee. The Senate did a pre-study of this bill and with a Conservative majority and with the Conservative chairman, Senator Kinsella, they criticized the safe country provision on the following grounds.

They said that in order to return a person to a safe third country there must be a bilateral or multilateral agreement specifying which state is responsible for examining a refugee claim. It should be a precondition that we have either a bilateral or multilateral agreement with other countries so that they will treat people who are returned to them in a fair and judicial way. They go on to say that the country to which we return individuals must comply with the total convention relating to the status of refugees and not just simply article 33, as is provided for in Bill C-86.

In other words, we do not return the person to that third country unless we have a convention with that country. That country must agree with the entire international convention on refugees, and finally that country must have a refugee determination system equivalent to the Canadian system that complies with Canadian principles of fundamental justice.

We are saying in these amendments that there must be due process in the decision with respect to eligibility and if we are going to return people to a safe third country, the safe third country must be defined in the way that was set out in the Senate report. Our amendments are totally in accordance with the Senate pre-study report. We are also saying that there must be greater access to section 53 which would prevent an applicant from being returned to another country where that person's life or freedom would be threatened for reasons of race, religion, nationality or membership in a particular party or social group.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make some short remarks in support of the amendments by my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. From time to time in Toronto we are experiencing a situation where many of our public servants who are dealing with these immigration matters at the border crossing are telling us that they are so overworked that there is absolutely no way that they cope with the workload that is put on them. At times we have had situations where their stress has caused a reaction which has not served the process or the spirit of our refugee system very well. We have always had the judicial process to rely on.

It is not only wrong to leave this decision to the bureaucrat or to the official in charge, it is also unfair because we are putting them in a position where their judgment from time to time can be clouded. It is not a question of us saying that people should not be deported if they constitute a threat to the security of Canada. That is sometimes the position that is being presented to us by opposition, that we are just opening our doors to anyone and everyone.

There is a fine line. We are taking a very strong stand on anyone who is a threat to security or someone who has a criminal record. It is very important that this amendment be supported to make sure that we keep our judicial process in place.

• (1550)

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to reply on this grouping of amendments. It is important though to point out first, and I know my friend from Trinity—Spadina did not really mean this, that to suggest that there is anything the government has done in terms of the allocation of time that each speaker has in this debate, or the grouping of the amendments. This of course is not the case.

Those are the rules of the House and they have nothing to do with time allocation or anything else. That is the way this process works. I am sure he did not really mean to suggest that the government had caused him to have only 10 minutes or that the government had grouped these amendments. That simply is not the fact. I know he would want me to correct that impression which has been left.

Both my colleagues, the members for Trinity—Spadina and Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, have rightly said that this group of amendments addresses a very important section of this piece of legislation.

As has been pointed out there was much concern around the two levels of hearings. The suggestion was that the first level be removed.

What is left though is obviously the concern that the process allows, as it must, for the question of determining eligibility.

The legislation provides that the senior immigration officer must be able to say to anybody who claims refugee status that they have access to the refugee determination system unless five conditions exist. Without going into detail, the primary concern is whether that refugee has found the protection he or she seeks in another country and whether that refugee in coming to Canada is bringing with him or her something that will provide a threat to the security of the country, a serious offence.

What has been very clear from the evidence in the committee is that if the senior immigration officer cannot simply and clearly show that the refugee applicant is breaking one of those five conditions then the refugee applicant has access to the determination system.

Quite simply put, if the applicant is not ineligible he or she is eligible. It is not a question of discretion. It is not a question of judgment. It is the obligation of the senior immigration officer, or in one case it gets referred to an adjudicator, to be able to show that this person is a convention refugee or has come from a country where protection is provided or has committed serious offences.

The second concept that we must deal with is the question of shared responsibility. Canada's very strong history in this area is such that we have become a very favoured nation. I think it is something we should be proud of and that we need to encourage. However, we also must recognize at a time when the number of refugees around this world is increasing that we all, particularly in the west or the north, in the industrialized world, have a responsibility.

It is incumbent upon us collectively to work to ensure, through the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, that we have a system in place that can deal with refugees.

An added burden of responsibility falls on Canada. We have to lead the rest of the world to the level of fairness and equity in our determination system. This process of shared responsibility, formally signing agreements, will increase the responsibility of other countries. That is particularly important.

Without going into the specifics of all of these motions, because a number of them come together, it is very important to recognize what section 53 of the legislation does. It is known as the non-refoulement provision. That says that we cannot send people back to a country where their freedom is threatened.

If we are in a position where perhaps that exists, section 53 says that a refugee shall not:

> be removed from Canada to a country where the person's life or freedom would be threatened for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion unless

It cannot happen. There are two exceptions. They are people described as inadmissible under paragraph 19(1)(c). It also refers to paragraph 19(1)(e), (f), (g), (j), (k), or (l), which involves security for the most part.

There is an added provision, which is that if that question arises the minister must show that the person constitutes a danger to the public in Canada. That is a condition that says that there may be reasons to remove them but they can only be removed under certain conditions and if they are a threat to Canada and the place to which they are removed will offer them the protection that is important.

I remind members again that there has long been a discussion about the charter. Many people do not agree with this, and to me it is very fundamental. The charter governs how governments relate to people. The charter says that the Government of Canada must apply its laws to people whether they are in this country or outside. Some have argued that the charter should not apply unless one is physically in Canada. Some would argue that the charter should not apply unless a person is a landed immigrant. Some would argue that the charter should not apply unless the person is a citizen of this country.

I reject all of those positions fundamentally. The bill reflects that. The mood of the people who came before us reflected that the charter should apply to anybody who Canada deals with anywhere, that we cannot make decisions based on race, on nationality, country of origin or ethnicity. To do so would be fundamentally wrong.

Without addressing the specifics of all of these amendments I have addressed most of them in terms of their intent and what they deal with.

the Chairperson may direct the Refugee Division to reconsider its determination."

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are three amendments in this grouping and I will deal with each of the three amendments one after the other.

The first one deals with the whole question of eligibility and who should decide on eligibility for those who apply as refugees in this country.

As I stated earlier this afternoon, under the present law there is a two-stage process and eligibility is decided at the first stage with the right of an attorney with due process and all the protections of the law.

For some years now we and many other people in Canada who are involved in the refugee process have said that the first stage was a wasteful process because the overwhelming number of cases at that stage were accepted and consequently it simply wasted time, resources, money and the work of people.

We proposed that the first stage hearing be done away with and the government is doing away with it in Bill C-86.

However, the government has taken some of the questions that were dealt with at the first stage hearing and has given those to a senior immigration officer who will decide whether a refugee applicant is eligible to appear before the Immigration and Refugee Board and have his case determined in accordance with law and in accordance with our traditions for due process with the right to be heard and the right to an attorney.

Here we will have under this bill a senior immigration officer making decisions with respect to the refugee claim which could turn away the refugee claimant, send him away from this country, without ever having a chance to have his case properly heard and we disagree with that.

What we are saying in motion No. 37 is where the senior immigration officer feels that the refugee applicant is not eligible on any of the five grounds, the five criteria, that case should immediately be sent to the Immigration and Refugee Board where there will be the right to an attorney, the right to be heard, the right of due process and that question of eligibility should be heard as a preliminary matter by the Immigration and Refugee Board.

This is the only way you can be fair to all refugee claimants. They have a right to be heard with proper representation and the proper protections of the law. Otherwise you will have senior immigration officers turning away these refugee applicants, sometimes without any full examination of the matter, a simple paper examination, no right to be heard, and that is contrary to the traditions of this country. That is the purpose of the first amendment, Motion No. 37.

Then we go to amendment 54. Under the present law before the Immigration and Refugee Board, refugee claims are heard by two members. In order to be recognized as a refugee you only have to have the agreement of one of the two members. This is to give the benefit of the doubt to the refugee claimant and that system has worked fairly well.

The great majority of the cases get the agreement of both members of the board but only one vote is necessary to be accepted in this country as a refugee. What Bill C-86 says is that in certain cases, and three cases are laid down, you need the two votes of the Immigration and Refugee Board in order to be recognized as a refugee.

We say that is unfair. First of all it is going to waste a lot of time. Lawyers will argue before the board as a preliminary matter whether this is a case that requires one vote or two votes and where it is decided that it requires two votes we say the result will be in too many cases an inequity. Some people will be admitted because they only need one vote, while others will be turned away because they require two votes.

We say the government has not demonstrated why we must go to the two-vote process. The only thing we can presume is that it is trying to make it more difficult for refugees to be recognized as such in this country. By this amendment we are saying we should strike out from Bill

C-86 those provisions which require two votes rather than one.

Finally, Motion No. 57 provides for an appeal or a review of any decision of the Immigration and Refugee Board that is based on questions of fact or questions of error.

For years now, ever since the Immigration and Refugee Board was set up, churches, NGOs, lawyers, experts who work with immigrants and refugees have said there must be an appeal process on the substance. The government has never agreed to that, although there have been many bad decisions. In every other area of life where the courts are involved or where there are quasi-judicial bodies, there are always appeals.

The government has allowed an appeal in law and that appeal on law can go to the Federal Court and right up to the Supreme Court of Canada in some cases, but it has never allowed an appeal on the facts, on the substance of the case, and we say that is wrong.

It is impossible for a system to be perfect and when you are dealing with human lives, with people fleeing from oppression, people who are fleeing from totalitarian governments, from civil wars such as in Yugoslavia or Somalia, or some of the situations that took place in Latin America, you cannot put these lives in danger. You simply do not have a system which provides for a corrective process, a review process.

In our amendment, amendment 57, we are saying there can be a review of a decision of the Immigration and Refugee Board in which the chairman orders such a review when there is new evidence that was not before the board in the first place, when it has been determined some of the evidence was wrong, or in general when there has been an error in the decision that was made. These are questions of fact, not questions of law, and we believe very strongly that there should be an appeal there as well.

• (1620)

The three matters before the House now as far as the Liberal Party is concerned are, first, that all questions of eligibility should be finally decided by the Immigration and Refugee Board, not by senior immigration officers. Second, there should be no requirement for a unanimous decision of the board. The present system in which only one out of two is sufficient should remain. Third, there should be a review or an appeal process on the substance of our refugee system.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with my five motions here. I want to deal with four of them very quickly and on the three motions of the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, my party and I are in agreement with him.

Motion No. 48 is extremely important because of what I mentioned before about the gap at the border. It is lovely if the refugee gets to section 53, which the hon. member for St. John's East mentioned, but how does he get there? That was not clear in the discussions we had in committee. It may be clear to the government but it is not clear to me and to a lot of the public.

Until about seven years ago lawyers were allowed to meet potential clients right at the border, for example at Pearson Airport, and assist them while they had their first examinations by immigration officers. This government stopped that six or seven years ago. Now people are examined by an immigration officer and perhaps by a senior immigration office who takes notes which can be used against that person later on. However, that person has no witness, let alone legal advice.

We raised this question with the government and it said of course they will be allowed to have legal counsel if it is available. That has not been put in writing anywhere, except that it is recorded in the transcript of the meeting.

The government said it was going to change the regulations it adopted seven years ago which prevented lawyers from having access to any person arriving to enter Canada.

My party and I want to write in section 48 that in any proceeding before an immigration officer or a senior immigration officer, a person who claims to be a convention refugee may be represented by a barrister, solicitor or other counsel. This is a need that has been confirmed by the experience of not having that opportunity. No longer will the person have legal counsel provided by the federal government. That is abolished. I am not raising that issue. I am saying that if a lawyer is there, he or she should be able to assist the refugee claimant at the very first interview, not farther down the road when there could be a dispute about what was said or whether the questions were properly asked.

Motion No. 49 concerns whether the hearing will be held in camera. The government has met us part way on this, saying that it will be in camera if it can be shown that there is any danger. It will be in camera unless there is an application to make it public. In that case, if the claimant can show that there is danger to the claimant or other persons, it should not be held in public.

There is a further need that was in the previous law. They should also be satisfied that the conduct at the proceedings in public would not impede the subject of the proceedings. That is the refugee claimant; he or she is the subject. When she is the subject it is even more important because many female refugee claimants have had dreadful experiences getting through borders to get to Canada. Because of cultural taboos which are stronger in some places than others, they find it very hard to tell what was done to them as women in such and such a place, even to an officer, let alone to a battery of journalists or other strangers.

Therefore it has been found that they sometimes fail to tell what has happened and that seriously damages their credibility later on, even though it was true. I want it in here that it will not impede the subject of the proceedings and no member of that person's family would be adversely affected. It is impeding the subject that we need to get in there.

Motions Nos. 50 and 51 refer to the minister's intervention. Motion No. 50 would delete what is at present at the bottom of page 68: "That the panel may, if it considers it appropriate to do so, give the minister a reasonable opportunity to question the person making the claim and any other witnesses, and to make representations concerning the claim".

I believe that is highly improper when the whole basis of the hearing was that it should be non-adversarial. This is not a criminal; we are not talking about proof, for proof is almost impossible to get from the old country at these hearings. We are talking about trying to find out whether the person has a claim, and to cross-examine him in an adversarial way, as has sometimes happened in a minister's intervention through his deputy, is perhaps necessary in certain cases, which I will deal with, but as a generality is grossly unfair to the refugee claimant.

Coming now to Motion No. 51, I would like to see it reworded if it can be agreed that: "The Board may, if it considers it that legal issues of general importance, including issues of constitutional interpretation, application or validity, are raised in the proceedings, may give the minister an opportunity".

In other words, it is to limit the occasion in which the minister, through an adversarial prosecuting attorney approach, can cross-examine the claimant.

Finally, I want to deal with my motion, Motion No. 52, which I consider, in the light of the many deputations that we have heard to which the member for St. John's East has referred, perhaps the most important one apart from the questions of eligibility at the border.

If they do not get to the Immigration and Refugee Board, this question does not arise. If they do get to the Immigration and Refugee Board, the key issue is that it has been experience now that certain refugee claimants were rejected by the IRB and later it was found that there was information, maybe old information, which did not come to light in this country, or information based on changed country circumstances. It was not available in any documented form; for example, a warrant for arrest, which was not available at the time of the hearing.

As I mentioned before, the war in Sri Lanka, which ended when the Indian army intervened and then broke out again within two or three months, is still going on two or three years later.

My motion is:

(7) Notwithstanding any other provision of this act, if the Chairperson is satisfied that:

(a) sufficient new evidence exists which was not available at the time of the Refugee Division hearing, or

(b) conditions in the country of origin, or of habitual residence, as the case may be, have so changed, such that a different decision by the Refugee Division might be warranted, the Chairman may cause a new hearing of the claim to be held.

This does not increase the appeals to the courts, which have been a matter of concern on the government's side; overloading the courts and perhaps causing delays. This might cause a delay but of a very limited sort since it is not an adversarial type of hearing; it is an inquiry into the person's status, whether or not he or she is a refugee.

The chairman has the responsibility under this motion, if it is adopted, to be satisfied that there is reason to reopen or to have cause for a new hearing of the claim to be held.

I want to quote just one example from one of the witnesses who had documented many cases, about 50 cases out of 100 or more, that the vigil group examined; 50 cases it felt should have been re-examined. In one of six examples it gave us, it said: "Mr. E. is a Sri Lankan Tamil who fled Sri Lanka in 1989 after two of his friends were killed for providing equipment to the Tamil Tigers. He too had unwillingly given equipment to the Tigers and feared for his life. From 1974 to 1989, Mr. E. had been detained and repeatedly tortured brutally by the Sri Lankan army and the Indian peacekeeping forces. On the occasion, he was also detained by the Tigers. As a result of this treatment, Mr. E. continues to have flash-backs of his experiences of torture. He suffers from insomnia, nightmares, digestive problems and anxiety. The Immigration and Refugee Board refused Mr. E. because it misunderstood his testimony and believed he only feared the Indian army which had left the country. It gave no recognition to the cumulative effect of the numerous detentions and extreme persecution that Mr. E. endured at the hands of various armies, especially the Sri Lankan army which is still engaged in the bitter civil war against the Tigers".

If any such evidence should be brought before the chairman, I hope this Parliament would allow the chairman to use his judgment to reopen the case.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Chairman, I would like first to comment on the three motions of my friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. The first motion, No. 38, deals with the fact that all eligibility hearings be referred to the IRB. Motion No. 54 deals with what has come to be known as the split decision question. The third motion is the question of appeals.

I talked earlier about the senior immigration officer and his responsibilities in determining eligibility for access to the system. What the senior immigration officer does not do is deal with the credibility of the case. He does not talk about the nature of persecution. He would not talk about whether this person is a refugee or would have a valid refugee claim. The two levels of hearings are something we have tried to move away from because of the pressure it puts on the refugee claimants. We also have the problem of the pressure that it puts on the system and that in turn impacts on our ability to respond judiciously and quickly.

The question of the split decision, as it is referred to, has caused some concern and we have had a lot of discussion about it. Quite clearly it is one that responds to a current situation that has created concern in a number of areas.

The area that has created most debate and has worried most of us more than any other is the question that applies to documents. There is a misconception abroad that if anybody arrives with false documents or no documents, they automatically are in a position in which they must have a unanimous decision, remembering that in our system today if you appear before two members of the IRB and one says that you have a valid claim then that claim is accepted.

What the legislation says is that if you were in possession of documents—and remember we have amended it to respond to the some of the concerns—and you destroyed those documents without good reason, you will then need two people, not one, on the board saying that you have a legitimate claim. It is not whether you have false documents, it is not whether you have destroyed your documents for good reason, it is not whether you somehow got on a plane with no documents; rather, it is that you had the documents, you destroyed the documents and you had no good reason for doing so.

For those of us for whom that was a great concern in the beginning, this goes a long way in addressing that problem. The documents had to have been in the person's possession and they had to have been destroyed.

On the question of appeal, the law today does not allow for appeals on anything but questions of law. The question therefore is what do we do about it if we need to do anything about it?

I think it was Dr. Guy Goodwin-Gill who came before the committee and said: "Be careful now if you start getting into appeals on the basis of fact. What you end up with is a first level system that is not as responsible and as thorough as it should be, not that that is wanton or willing. It happens, it is human nature".

Clearly the process of appealing in law continues and is to be provided for in a different court but it is still there.

What is important and in my view a very major step is that the government has said that it understands that the process of appealing on humanitarian and compassionate grounds has not been effective. I would argue that is exactly the case, that it needs to be visible and that there needs to be real criteria against which people can measure what they do and how successful they can or cannot be.

As a result, the government has asked the former first chair of the IRB, Mr. Gordon Fairweather, earlier a member of this institution, to set up the regulations on this. They will consult on that process as well so that we do have an H and C process, as we call it, humanitarian and compassionate grounds, that is visible.

All of us who deal with refugees who appeal under the H and C provisions do not know what we are shooting at, do not know what the targets are, do not know what criteria the case that we present will be judged against. I think that is important.

It is important as well in a couple of other provisions, not the least of which is the one covered in Motion No. 52 by my friend from Trinity—Spadina, where he talks about changed circumstances.

We discussed earlier a proposed amendment that dealt with a 12-month ban for reapplying. I pointed out at that time it does not apply to refugees. Someone can come back in 90 days. However, in the interim, it is important to recognize that the humanitarian and compassionate provisions will provide for and take into account the questions of changed circumstance.

Most of the early discussions or arguments or debates I had with the IRB were over changed circumstances. We had to apply these against humanitarian and compassionate grounds. It has been very difficult. We have not been successful in that area. My friend is right in pointing out that we must take into account changed circumstances, not changed circumstances in Canada or necessarily with the refugee, but particularly how that refugee relates back to changed circumstances in his or her country.

I want very quickly to comment on his proposal in Motion No. 51. I am not sure I completely understand this section about the minister appearing, particularly when we are dealing with big legal issues. I would think that the answer is that we would want some of these big cases that deal on those issues discussed in a court where perhaps it is more appropriate.

One of the problems we have with confidentiality is what is known as the Pacific Press case. We are not particularly happy with the amendment we brought forward because it is not complete. My friend from Trinity—Spadina is right when he says that the ability to have a confidential hearing is something that needs to be protected. For the refugee, it needs to be protected. For the refugee's family, it needs to be protected. For those that are left behind, it needs to be protected. Obviously if someone has fled their homeland, they are fleeing persecution and that condition continues.

The government has gone as far as it can in recognizing the decision of Pacific Press which says that the media should have access.

• (1640)

The assumption is that the cases will be closed, however, if there is an application to the IRB, then a decision is to be taken.

The initial government proposal under Bill C-86 was that they would not be closed. That was unacceptable for a lot of reasons. The amendment that was brought forward in the committee was an attempt to find a balance between the judgment of the court and a desire to keep the hearings confidential.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon) moved:

Motion No. 43.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 48 by striking out line 9 at page 58 and substituting the following therefor:

"exceeding five years, but may be removed".

Motion No. 45.

(a) by striking out line 24 at page 60 and substituting the following therefor:

"61.(1) Subject to subsection (1.1), each member of the Refugee Divi-"; and

"(1.1) The appointment made under subsection (1) is subject to the approval of the Standing Committee of the House of Commons to which matters of immigration and refugee status are referred.

(1.2) An appointment that is subject to the approval of the Standing Committee of the House of Commons to which matters of immigration and refugee status are referred under this section shall be deemed to have been approved if the Standing Committee has not voted to withhold its approval of the appointment within thirty days after it has received a request for approval."

Motion No. 47.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 50 by striking out line 28 at page 60 and substituting the following therefor:

"exceeding five years."

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, these three amendments put forward by the Liberal Party have to do with appointments to the board. The first two amendments would have appointments to the board limited to five years. Bill C-86 provides that the appointment of the chairman and the board members can be for up to seven years. Considering the government's record with these appointments we do not think that is acceptable.

The other amendment is one which would require all nominees for appointment to the Immigration and Refugee Board be approved by the Standing Committee on Employment and Immigration.

• (1650)

Why are we making these two proposals? We are making these proposals because the majority of appointments to the Immigration and Refugee Board have been too political. They have been for individuals who are unfamiliar with immigration and refugee matters. As a matter of fact, they are not only unfamiliar but insensitive to immigration and refugee matters. There have been some, what I would call, horror stories with respect to incidents happening before the board.

It is true that in Bill C-86 the government is giving the chairman certain authority to discipline members of the board who do not carry out their functions properly or who misbehave, but we do not think that is enough.

We had incidents last winter where members of the board ridiculed claimants before the board, laughed at them, made fun of their cases. We had other incidents where members of the board fell asleep while refugee applicants were making their cases. Recently a member of the board resigned because of what he called widespread racism among certain members of the board.

I acknowledge immediately that there have been some very good appointments to the board. I give credit to the past chairman of the board, Mr. Fairweather. Although he was a Conservative member of this House, he was an outstanding appointment and did a good job; but he was not responsible for the appointments.

As I say some of these appointments were very ill advised. As a matter of fact they proved to be an embarrassment to the government. The most recent one is the case where a member resigned and stated that he resigned because he felt there was widespread racism with respect to certain members of the board and he could not work in that atmosphere.

We propose two things: First, that the appointments of the chairperson and of members be limited to five years. We feel five years is enough. It gives them enough time to develop in their work, but on the other hand it is not too long if they are bad appointments. Second, we are suggesting that with appointments of this kind, as I said earlier in this debate, people are dealing with questions of life and death with respect to people fleeing from countries of oppression. If the wrong decision is made or if this is not taken seriously, they could be returned to countries where they would be imprisoned or would even be killed.

We have recommended something similar to what they do in the United States where senior appointments are approved by committees of Congress. We are suggesting that the appointments be approved by the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration.

That may not be the best answer, but it will be an improvement over what is presently in place where the government unilaterally and without any consultation makes these appointments and too many of them have been bad. There might be other methods of reviewing appointments.

A few years ago when the Liberal Party was in government we set up a system for reviewing appointments to the bench with the Canadian Bar Association. There might be a better way of getting approval for individuals to be appointed to the Immigration and Refugee Board. I was hoping that my amendment would push or press the government to come up with a better answer, but it has not. It is quite content to continue along the lines it has already proceeded so I am putting my amendment that these appointments must be subject to approval by the parliamentary committee.

One must remember that the government has a majority of members on these committees, but the very fact that the appointment would have to be reviewed would deter the government from making silly appointments as it has done from time to time. I think it would encourage the government to make better appointments knowing that those appointments would have to be reviewed publicly.

There are the three amendments. The purpose of them is to improve appointments to the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favour of these three amendments. I listened very carefully to my colleague, our critic for immigration. He made excellent points, but I want to reiterate them as a member from metropolitan Toronto who has had many people come into his riding office over the last four years to complain about the nature of the process and how their claims were being dealt with, particularly by the people listening to the claims.

I note one of the amendments would limit the appointment of the chairperson from seven to five years. I think that is a very good idea. There is no demonstrable reason to have an appointment for seven years. In other appointments such as the chairman of the National Parole Board we have all kinds of different things. There is no reason to have them appointed for beyond a period of five years.

That is also coincidentally the maximum mandate of a particular government. It only makes sense that when there is a change of government there might be a change of focus, there might be a change of approach, and therefore there might be a need to change a particular person, in this case the chairperson.

However, my colleagues were being charitable in connection with the length of time that members can be appointed. Five years is exceedingly generous, never mind seven years. However that is fine. It is better to be generous than not so. Certainly the chairperson must be there for a period of time to establish a stamp of his or her own method of operating the particular department.

What is most important it seems to me in this triplicate of amendments is this notion that we get the people involved through the Parliament of Canada. How do we do that? By getting the House of Commons standing committee involved.

It is a very reasonable proposal. We have just recently seen over the last little while in 1992 how the United States has a situation where various appointees can be examined and can in fact be turned down depending on the rationale. That is not so much the point because we are not going a witch-hunt in committee. Anybody brought forward as a proposed person by the government is not automatically going to be wrong. No, on the contrary.

It is to give Canadians and the people who are involved with that particular system—the lawyers, the refugee claimants and the various other people—a sense of empowerment if I can put it that way. Canadians feel they are not empowered. They feel that too many things are being decided without their input.

Another perfect example is the Governor in Council. Who is that? That is the Prime Minister. He is going to make all these appointments. Nobody is going to be consulted, at least no one in terms of what the ordinary Canadian on the street can possibly understand to be a person who would be consulted. No, it is going to be the Prime Minister making decisions.

If we bring this matter before the House of Commons through one of its committees, it gives Canadians an opportunity to feel that their government is open, is not hiding things, is not subject to patronage. Rather it welcomes the opportunity to have the impact and input of Canadians on who these people will be.

I hear all sorts of dinosauric grumblings on the government side because they do not want openness. They are perfectly willing to have their little patronage plums and have people hand little gifts out for doing certain things for their party. We do not take that approach on this side. We think there should be more power in the House of Commons, not less power in the House of Commons. We think parliamentary committees should have more power, not less power.

We make a reasonable suggestion, a reasonable amendment in which we suggest the House of Commons committee review these appointments. We go one step further because we know there might be someone who would say it would be dragged on for political purposes. On the contrary, it says right in the amendment that in 30 days the decision has to be made.

It is interesting that there is all kinds of carping over there from various members, but I would be very surprised if any of them had the courage to stand up on their hind legs and tell us why this amendment was bad.

Precisely what is wrong with it? Why should Parliament and parliamentary committees not get involved in the political appointments that are presently being done behind closed doors? I challenge someone over there to get up and tell Canadians for householder use and for the next election, if necessary, that they should not be involved in the appointments to this board.

I commend the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon for bringing three well thought out amendments to this act which give people empowerment, which give Canadians the realistic belief that they are having some impact on what is going on behind closed doors in the Prime Minister's Office. I support the amendments whole-heartedly.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the interest of finishing our work before the deadline, all I have to say is that I support the three motions moved by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I will not take the full time allotted to me, but I just wanted to make an intervention after my colleague from Scarborough West and our critic from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce made recommendations on these motions.

I should say at the outset that we had some discussion on our side as to whether the appointments should be made for the five-year period or the seven-year period as recommended by the government. These are some of the most highly sought appointments that any government can make.

I had opted for something less than five years. My colleague convinced me, with his wealth of experience and time spent on immigration matters, that five years was a good compromise between what we were proposing and what the Conservatives were proposing. Five years is a very long time, particularly when a bad appointment has been made and that person is kept on the bench, as I call it, for five years.

We have already seen some of those. There are very good appointments and I compliment the government for making them. Unfortunately there are some bad appointments. It is unfortunate there is not a mechanism within the structure so a bad appointment can be corrected immediately. Once a bad appointment is made, according to this particular statute there is very little that can be done about it. If we do not want the person that we are paying somewhere around $85,000 or $100,000 a year plus expenses for sitting on and hearing cases because he is not good at what he is doing, we must retain him and still continue to pay him. It is almost as if we have to remove him by way of a judicial hearing or something approaching the judicial inquiry process on appointments to the bench.

I did not want to dwell too much on the length of time. We agree it should be shorter. However, I did want to mention the quality of the appointments and try to impress upon the government across that they are a little different from regular appointments made to different boards. These are people who are making quasi-judicial decisions concerning the future of people's lives.

As a result of these quasi-judicial decisions affecting the lives of people, they are considered to be statutory powers given to them under the act. As a result of the statutory interpretation of these powers, as my colleague knows, they are all subject to the rules of natural justice and at least to the doctrine of procedural fairness that is so necessary.

That is why it is so important for every appointment made in the future that these people be brought before the parliamentary committee so that we can test whether they have some knowledge of the rules of procedural fairness or the rules of natural justice. It is fundamental knowledge on behalf of these appointments that they should have an inherent knowledge of that particular legal framework. When we talk of the rules of procedural fairness we are talking about the fundamental rules of the right to have counsel present when one is making one's case, the permitting of a transcript to be made during the hearing, and the ability of the people who are calling the hearing to state their position prior to the hearing date so that the person making the application knows the case which he has to meet.

Other procedural requirements are the care that must be taken to make sure that those who make the decisions are those who hear the evidence. We have seen instances where those who have heard the evidence have not necessarily made the decisions. In the last six to eight months we have been able to see predetermined judgments where one fills in the blanks and that certainly flies in the face of procedural fairness or natural justice that should be afforded to every person pursuant to section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I see my time is getting short. Our side believes that one thing we should be trying to do to stay out of the court system and the appeal process on these hearings that take a considerable amount of time is those persons who are going to be charged with the responsibility of hearing these cases should at least have some knowledge of the rules of procedural fairness, some knowledge of the rules of natural justice so that when they are hearing these cases there can be no appeal if these cases are heard properly in the first instance.

I support this motion whole-heartedly. I hope that the government will reconsider its position and endorse this proposal and have every person who is considered to be or is under consideration to be a quasi-judicial officer for the immigration appeal board appear before an independent group of members of Parliament so that they can at least be questioned on those matters that are absolutely relevant to fairness in procedure on behalf of the cases that the refugees will be claiming to it.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief on this point. I think we have heard a lot of discussion on the matter.

I would take exception to perhaps a little bit of the cynicism. I think members of this House know I try to be fairly non-partisan. I do sometimes get upset in this House when I consider the source of comments to be a rap against government or a particular member. When I hear the source of some of the comments on appointments in this House, sometimes it makes me chuckle a little bit. However, enough said.

To me, the key components or the key attributes for an appointment to the IRB should be first of all, compassion, second, common sense and third, enough intelligence and capacity to deal with the tremendous amount of work, the tremendous amount of pressure and the very confusing and often conflicting evidence that leads to a very difficult and sometimes very heart-wrenching decision.

In respect of that, the IRB has set up a very detailed and comprehensive process of training and education. It has developed a whole series of guidelines which help board members to make their decisions and has set in place a series of systems that will provide for review of performance and discipline where it is warranted and necessary.

As we look at Motion No. 43, we should recognize that yes, we can debate whether the chair should be there for five years or for seven years. I would argue that the chair should be there for seven years to allow for the continuity that is important in order for the chair to become familiar not just with the day-to-day goings on, but the over-all direction of what the board does and to ensure that he or she can carry out the job efficiently in that time.

It is important to recognize that as is the case with normal board members, at any time the chair can be removed for cause. The Order in Council can be rescinded and the person can be removed from that position as can any board member if there is good reason to do so.

• (1710)

Now for the question of allowing the standing committee to review the appointments. I think one of my colleagues across the way mentioned how it may not be the right solution but it may not be a bad idea. I do not argue that it may not be a bad idea, but I agree that for us now in this piece of legislation to suggest that the tribunal appointments all of a sudden be reviewed by a standing committee would get us into a position that this bill would create a precedent that may not be suitable in relation to other legislation that does the same thing. As I said, I am not convinced that it is perhaps not a good idea to look at, but I would argue that to move this amendment now is not the thing to do.

As I look at the board that has operated in St. John's for the last number of years, the person that is seen I suppose as the chair, Lisa Gilad, has a background in immigration. She has written books on the process. The three people who are with her, one of whom has been transferred in from Stephenville, Jim Sparks, along with Tom Rideout and Tom Murphy have shown that their ability and willingness to work hard has led to the belief in many quarters in this country that one of the best places to have a hearing heard for fairness and equity is St. John's, Newfoundland. That is not something I am just saying. It is something the system recognizes because they have taken their jobs seriously and they conduct themselves very conscientiously. They have received the respect of the community because of the work they have done and, in particular, if I may say so, because of the leadership of Lisa Gilad.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved:

Motion No. 58.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 73 by striking out lines 23 to 42 at page 81 and substituting the following therefor:

"peal only if

(a) the Trial Division has, at the time of rendering judgement certified that a serious question of general importance is involved and has stated that questions; or

(b) the Federal Court of Appeal has granted leave to appeal.

(2) An application for leave to appeal pursuant to paragraph (1)(b) shall be made within fifteen days after the pronouncement of the judgement from which leave to appeal is sought, unless a judge of the Federal Court of Appeal for special reasons provides for a longer time.

(3) An application for leave pursuant to paragraph (1)(b) shall be determined by a single judge of the Federal Court of Appeal without an oral hearing, unless the judge directs that an oral hearing be held.

(4) Where a judgement of the Federal Court Trial Division is appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal pursuant to paragraphs (1)(a) or (b), the appeal shall be commenced by filing a notice of appeal within fifteen days after the pronouncement of the judgement or the granting of leave as the case may be, unless a judge of the Court of Appeal extend the time for special reasons.

(5) For greater certainty, neither a decision by a judge of the Federal Court—Trial Division whether or not to certify that a serious question of general importance is involved in any matter, or by a judge of the Federal Court of Appeal whether or not to grant leave to appeal, is subject to appeal."

Motion No. 81.

That Bill C-86 be amended by deleting Clause 113.

[English]

Motion No. 82.

That Bill C-86 be amended by deleting Clause 114.

Motion No. 83.

That Bill C-86 be amended by deleting Clause 115.

Motion No. 84.

That Bill C-86 be amended by deleting Clause 116.

Motion No. 85.

That Bill C-86 be amended by deleting Clause 117.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this group of amendments is really only two amendments. One is Motion No. 58 amending the procedure for applying for a certain kind of appeal. The other really is amending the responsibility for appeals, but because of the rules of procedure we follow the second one has to be done five times, that is to say, deleting five clauses which are all essentially part of the same action.

Motion No. 58 is important because it would protect some of the rights of appeal not just by refugees but by anybody in Canada under any section of the Immigration Act. In other words, it affects Canadian citizens if they do not think they have been given the right decision about sponsoring a relative. It can affect a Canadian permanent resident. It can affect an ordinary immigrant and of course it can affect a refugee claimant.

What we have in the Canadian justice system generally is that a decision can be appealed. Even a convicted criminal has the right to appeal in case the judge may have made a mistake. However, the 1987 amendments to the Immigration Act very gravely restricted this appeal right for refugee claimants and immigrants and permanent residents and Canadian citizens, everybody in the country. It prohibited the appeal on the merits, that is to say an appeal to decide whether the Immigration and Refugee Board or any other body, adjudicator, even an immigration officer, had made a mistake about the facts. It permits only an application for a judicial review that is to decide whether the decision maker failed to follow the lawfully required procedures.

This is quite unfair since refugee claimants, immigrants, Canadian permanent residents, Canadian citizens, as such, are not common criminals. They should not have fewer rights than common criminals. In particular refugees should not have fewer rights in a matter that could be a life-and-death decision for them.

Bill C-86 restricts this right still further by prohibiting an appeal of the decision of a judge of the Federal Court trial division. If a question has been appealed to the Federal Court and the appellant is not satisfied, he cannot appeal it unless the judge who gave the negative decision to him or her, while rendering the judgment has certified that a serious question of general importance is involved and the judge has stated that question.

That is ridiculous. Nowhere else in the Canadian justice system is the right to appeal made to depend on a judge saying that maybe he was wrong in the decision, and it is an important matter and an appeal to a higher court would be allowed. We are told it is done somewhere else, but nowhere in Canada.

Motion No. 58 would at least protect the universally existing right of the refugee claimant, immigrant, permanent resident or Canadian citizen to ask the Federal Court of Appeal to grant leave to appeal the lower court's decision.

• (1720)

That is the present law. The federal court can grant that.

What I would like to do with this motion is restore that right to refugees, to permanent residents, to citizens and to any immigrant as the case may be.

My motion is supported by the Canadian Bar Association, the Ontario Refugee Lawyers Association, and the Ontario Law Union. They all support this right to seek the leave of a higher court to appeal a lower court decision.

There are not many appeals now because each level of the court denies most of the applications it gets for judicial review. Therefore the courts can defend themselves from being overloaded. It is important in our Canadian, and British, system of justice that there be the possibility of a case going to a higher court and that it should not be so ridiculously restricted as it is by Bill

C-86 because the higher courts do have a responsibility for interpreting, evaluating and testing lower court decisions. That is the first action.

The second action concerns the other five motions. These five motions of the bill will further restrict the right of appeal in immigration matters at the time of transition from the present act to when the amended act comes into force. It will retroactively move cases that were before the court of appeal, at the earliest stage, back to the trial court. That means that instead of three experienced judges evaluating the work of a less experienced judge another less experienced judge will be evaluating the less experienced judge or perhaps even a newly appointed judge, appointed specifically for that purpose as is provided elsewhere in the act.

There is the further problem that the court of appeal at present has the power to set aside the decision of the lower court and substitute for it the decision of the court of appeal. That gives a final answer to the matter and saves time, trouble and uncertainty for everybody.

Bill C-86 takes away that power. By sending it back to another judge of the trial division it creates a situation in which the other judge can only say to the first judge: "Well, you were wrong, try it again". It leaves the matter dragging on, using up time and creating great uncertainty.

I am asking the House to restore that part of the right that the present act provides for appeal by permission of the court of appeal and to restore it for those who may be just acquiring that right but might lose it in the transition. It still does not give, under the Immigration Act, the rights that Canadians and all others in Canada enjoy in other matters but at least it would not take away the small right that they have now.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I support these amendments by my hon. colleague from Trinity—Spadina because, as he said, the grounds for appeal are already very limited. I spoke a few minutes ago in favour of an amendment that I was putting forward which would allow the chairman of the board to order a review of decisions of the board. That will be voted on later.

Here the hon. member for Spadina is dealing with the situation in which the judge of the federal court must produce a certificate before his own decision can be appealed. This is an unusual provision in Canadian law. Usually in Canadian law if someone wants to appeal to an appeal court they beg leave to appeal at that very appeal court. They ask it if they can appeal a lower court's judge and the higher court, the court of appeal, decides whether their case is subject to appeal to their court or not.

However, in Bill C-86 the government is saying: "You can only appeal to the higher court if the judge whose decision you do not like certifies that you can appeal his judgment", which is not the tradition of our legal system.

When we discussed this in committee the minister and his officials said: "They do something similar in one situation in Great Britain". They may in Great Britain in one situation but the general rule in Britain and Canada and in most democratic countries is that people apply for leave to appeal to the court of appeal. They do not ask the judge whose decision they do not like to provide a certificate saying that they can appeal his judgment. For these reasons I support the hon. member.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I just have a comment on this question of appeal. It is important to first recognize that what we are doing is moving from the appeal division to the trial division of the Federal Court.

The real effect of that as much as anything is to move from a panel of three to a panel of one. The impact there, quite simply, is that with more judges and more justices of the Federal Court the system can move along. I would hope that nobody would question whether—

Mr. Allmand: That's all right. We agree with that.

Mr. Reid: I am delighted to know that my friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce agrees.

Mr. Allmand: With that part.

Mr. Reid: With that part. The second question refers to the appeals question. It is important to point out and to recognize that there is nothing in Bill C-86 that takes away a level of review or appeal.

You can argue, and quite justly so, that Bill C-86 may not grant another level of appeal. As we try to make this system more efficient and more effective, particularly for those who are in it, it surely makes no sense when taking away a level of hearings on the refugee side to add levels on the other end.

I do not want that to be construed to say that it should be at the expense of justice. It is important to recognize that we have not taken away an existing level of appeal.

Mr. Heap: You have taken away a level of appeal.

Mr. Reid: I am making a mistake by engaging in a conversation with my colleague opposite.

I think what he would argue is that in changing the system we are taking away a level of appeal. I would argue that we have changed the system but we have not taken away a level of appeal. What we have is a justice making the decision as to whether it is in the general interest that it carry on.

It is not a question of his decision being questioned. He is not being asked to say: "I have made this decision. On the other hand, I do not know that I have made the right decision". He is being asked to say: "I have made this decision, but there remain questions of general interest or questions of the law". It is not an unreasonable decision to ask someone to make.

I think of the quality of the people who are on the Federal Court, I need not list the names because they are familiar to many of us. I think they are people who are regarded as very capable. I do not think it is a situation in which we are asking someone to criticize their own decision. The appeal is on the basis of general interest and matters of law, and not on whether the decision is a good one or a bad one. It is important that we remember that.

I say to my friend opposite in terms of the next five motions to remove clauses 113, 114, 115, 116 and 117, that frankly I am not sure of the intent and I have consulted with others. I have heard my colleague talk about why he wants to do something, but I am not sure that if we were to do this we would be in a position from which we could really carry on.

I would just like to talk about clause 116 alone. It says:

> —had been set down for hearing before that date and for which no decision has been rendered before that date, shall be heard by the Federal Court of Appeal as though section 73 of this act had not come into force.

• (1730)

I must say I am just wondering, as are those I have consulted, where all this has come from and the impact. We are quite concerned. These are transitional provisions. We would all be at a loss were they not there.

[Translation]

The vote on Motion No. 81 also applies to Motions Nos. 82, 83, 84 and 85.

We now proceed to the consideration of Motions Nos. 59, 60 and 61.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved:

Motion No. 59.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 78 by striking out lines 21 to 30 at page 85 and substituting the following therefor:

"Act or the regulations."

Motion No. 60.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 80 by adding immediately after line 33 at page 86 the following:

"(4) Notwithstanding this section, a transportation company is not liable to pay, in respect of a person, any administration fee for a period of more than six months after the date of entry of the person in Canada."

Motion No. 61.

That Bill C-86 be amended in Clause 82 by striking out lines 24 to 35 at page 89.

He said: Mr. Speaker, these three motions, Motions Nos. 59, 60 and 61, concern transportation companies. In the 1978 bill there were penalties provided for transportation companies bringing in undocumented aliens. The penalties were greatly increased in size and scope in the 1987 amendments and they have been further increased in size and scope here.

Some of these motions were suggested by the representatives of the transportation companies, particularly air and sea transportation, who appeared before our committee.

The focus of this part of the bill is to attempt to discourage transportation companies from bringing in undocumented aliens, that is to say people who do not have a valid passport with a visa. The present act provides heavy penalties to the owners of ships, airplanes or vehicles that bring in these undocumented aliens if the owner and the employees fail to exercise due diligence in examining the passports and visas of members or in stopping stowaways. Bill C-86 would both increase the size of the penalties and add an unfair procedure.

Motion No. 59 amends Bill C-86 by deleting lines 21 to 30 of clause 78. It requires that the transportation company either ensure that all passengers have the required documents from the time they embark until the time they are presented to the immigration officers in Canada, or else collect the documents and hold them for presentation with the passengers to the immigration officers.

This is an unreasonable requirement. It would put some ship agents, for example, right out of business. It is close to doing that under the present act but would do it more so under the proposed bill.

After all, false visas and passports which can be obtained for a price are being so well forged that even immigration officers sometimes get fooled. It is unfair to penalize transportation crews for not doing the immigration officer's specialized job better than the immigration officer himself may be able to do it.

The government did go part way by putting in the word knowingly. Transportation companies are at fault if they knowingly bring in an undocumented alien. That was a very good move which we strongly support, bringing it back to the wording that was used in the 1987 legislation. It still has an unfair procedure for penalizing them if it thinks that due diligence was not used; in other words that it was done knowingly.

In the second place the problem further is that the passport is the property of a foreign government and it is to be kept in the possession of the person who is identified by it. Ordering transportation crews to seize passports, with the visas in them, infringes the sovereignty of another government and ought not to be done without the express approval of that government.

Here is the sting: Motion No. 60 amends page 60 after line 33 by adding "notwithstanding this section, a transportation company is not liable to pay in respect of a person any administration fee for a period of more than six months after the date of entry of the person into Canada". This says that the matter cannot be dragged out for years and years, and then stick them with the fine.

The problem is that Motion No. 61 has to do with the power of the minister to take the fine out of the deposited money. The bill provides that the minister can require the transportation company to deposit the equivalent of money in an account, and then when the minister has decided that the company improperly allowed an undocumented alien to enter the country, the deputy minister can order that the fine be taken out of that account. That is very convenient for the government; it does not have to do the work of going to court to prove that the transportation company was negligent in having allowed that undocumented alien to slip through. It just takes the money.

I suppose the transportation company can go to court and try to prove that the government was wrong in taking the money, but that is not the normal way of carrying on business, to take the money first and then have somebody else do the proving afterward. Shoot first and ask questions afterward is not in our Canadian tradition of justice.

Therefore, I ask that these three motions be adopted so as to restore a measure of fairness. I have not talked about the size of the fines, which are bigger, but I have simply requested a measure of procedural fairness for the transportation companies.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, we support these amendments. They are similar to ones that we presented in committee which would have alleviated the heavy burden that the government is putting on the transportation companies.

• (1740)

The government is applying very heavy penalties to the airlines and to the shipping companies even when these transportation companies use due diligence and do everything in their power to prevent illegal immigrants coming aboard their aeroplanes or ships. This does not seem fair. There are penalties now but this bill greatly increases the penalties.

The airline and shipping executives came to us and told us that they are at a period in their history when the airlines are going bankrupt all over the world, when their costs are exceedingly high and the government is putting this new burden on them at this time.

It is an interesting matter when the NDP and the Liberals are going to the support of the large airline companies which employ a lot of Canadians and provide a lot of employment and the bad Conservative government is putting a very heavy burden on them and shifting them closer to situations of financial impossibility.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being facetious and getting myself in trouble, I certainly hope if we have problems in the airline industry the government does not get blamed for the demise of one of the companies because it did not pass an amendment to Bill C-86.

As I pointed out in committee, I am the one standing up saying we should get tougher with the companies, and my two friends opposite are there loyally and I have to say diligently defending their interests.

Mr. Heap: That is your problem. You are on the wrong side.

Mr. Reid: Many have said that before. I would argue the points they make are not entirely invalid, but I would also suggest that the impact of Bill C-86 as it applies to the transportation companies is not going to be as horrendous as my friends portray.

The current act empowers companies to hold documents. As a transporter of people they are responsible for ensuring that if they bring those people to this country, those people have to be able to be accepted in this country.

If those people are not being accepted because they do not have the correct documents, and this obviously does not apply as much to refugees as it does to immigrants, then they are partly responsible for the situation and therefore they must share some of that responsibility by covering the cost.

As my colleague from Trinity—Spadina has pointed out, we did put the word knowingly in so that it cannot be an innocent situation. There is no question that the amendments we brought forward in the committee to the bill are responding to a very real change and a very real need that exists today.

I have to say that the performance of Canadian transportation companies, particularly the two airlines, has been very good. The relationship between the department and those companies is very strong because there is an understanding on what each other needs and what the problems are.

Mr. Angus: That is because they are in your back pocket.

Mr. Reid: I am not standing here defending them and that has proved to be very productive.

Quite clearly the regulations we have in this country are nowhere near as strenuous as the obligations placed particularly on air transport companies in countries like the United States where pilots literally travel—I hope I do not get any of them in trouble—with large amounts of cash accessible to them so they can pay fines and penalties and get out of countries if it is necessary.

Motion No. 60 limits the period to six months. It is recognized that part of the penalty is being responsible for the removal costs and transporting people back. It is not simply an airline ticket. It involves all that has gone on at the time. It may take some period of time to compile those costs and they are there.

We did move an amendment earlier that reflects the fact that prescribed costs can be laid down. Clearly what I hope my colleagues recognize is that there has been a genuine effort made and there is a real relationship there. The penalties are not going to be arbitrary and if one person gets through a company is not necessarily hit with this big fine. That simply will not happen and the relationship with Canadian companies has been very good, and we have seen that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not certain of the mood of the House, but perhaps there might be a disposition to apply the vote which has just been taken to Motions Nos. 5, 6, 7, 9, 10 and 14.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we are a bit disappointed tonight. We were hoping to have an opportunity to debate these various motions. Since the government has precluded that option, I think we should at least vote on those motions, even if we cannot debate them.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, had I been here, it would have been my pleasure to vote with my party yes, and against the government's insensitivity.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there is no unanimous consent, each motion we voted on separately.

The question is on Motion No. 5.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Mr. Riis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Considering that we are only about a quarter of the way through the voting and recognizing that all of the pages have exams to write, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent to send some of the pages home.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we concur with the sentiment that pages would be well served by spending the balance of the evening studying for their exams. There is a very easy way to do it, which is to start to allow votes we are taking now to apply to other items down the road. We have no objection to them being read so that the Canadian public knows what we are voting on, but I think Canadians find it rather ridiculous that we are holding up a lot of young people from their examinations simply to repeat voting patterns which are already well established.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the people of Canada should be reminded that it was the government that decided we would do this tonight. It was the government that decided that under time allocation the votes would be tonight, and so we are simply following the rules.

• (2000)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As I said, we could dispense with these votes certainly within a half to three quarters of an hour with a little co-operation. It does cost on average something like $200,000 an hour to run this place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

The next question is on Motion No. 28.

I am certain, Mr. Speaker, were you to test the House you would now find unanimous consent to allow the pages to leave. We get paid to stay here and do this stuff and they do not.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We can vote through tonight into tomorrow morning until the cows come home, but the pages' shifts normally end at this hour of 8.30 p.m. Eastern Standard Time and many of them have exams in two weeks. I do not believe these young people should be held hostage to lengthy marathon votes.

I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke, that the pages be dismissed forthwith and give them a break. They have got exams coming up. Let us go—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member cannot move a motion unless he has unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think most of us have eaten so I wonder if there would be unanimous consent, if we are not prepared to let them go home, at least to let them have some of the dinner in which we are participating.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is a no.

The next question is on Motion No. 36.

The House divided on Motion No. 36, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if at this point there would be unanimous consent to release the young people to go back to their studies tonight.

I wonder what kind of bitter twisted human beings would keep these young people here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 38.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues on the other side. I gather there have been consultations with members of all parties. I think you might find disposition for unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken to the remaining report stage amendments on Bill C-26.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, there appears to be 42 amendments yet to deal with. I think it is important that members recognize that when the government decides to use time allocation to curtail debate it is appropriate that we vote on all the amendments put forward.

However, the point has been made tonight. As a result we will certainly give our concurrence to proceed.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would ask that I be shown as voting with my party on the remaining amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motions Nos. 3, 5, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 18, 19, 23, 25, 27, 29, 31, 33, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 43, 45, 47, 51, 53, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60, 62, 64, 66, 67, 68, 70, 72, 73, 77, 79, 81 are lost.

Motions Nos. 7, 49 and 75 are also negatived.

The House divided on Motion No. 3, which was negatived on the following division:

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, over the course of the past three years the world airline industry has fallen into a deepening financial crisis. Since 1990 the industry has lost in the order of $ 10 billion.

Major factors contributing to those losses were the drop in demand occasioned by the gulf war, and the heightened security threat to travellers, concurrent increases in the price of fuel, all compounded by the subsequent recession.

[English]

Like most carriers around the world, the Canadian airline industry has experienced significant losses, high debt loads, a sluggish traffic situation and vigorous price competition. Unfortunately, there are no quick or easy solutions for returning our carriers to financial health.

Both carriers have already taken painful steps to stem the losses. A greater effort to bring cost structures into line with other carriers, however, must now be mounted if Canada is to retain its competitive position in the world aviation industry.

The Canadian industry needs rationalization. Capacity is too great for current demand and prices are too low to cover costs.

[Translation]

The difficulties faced by our carriers have arisen against the backdrop of rapid change in the global aviation industry. The world economy is experiencing rapid change. The globalization of the world economic system has resulted in major restructuring of many of our industrial sectors.

In response to increasing competitive pressures, carriers have consolidated, for example, British Airways and British Caledonian, Delta and Western Airlines, and KLM and Northwest, both within and, in some cases, across national boundaries.

Carriers have also looked for opportunities to expand their global networks through a variety of partnership mechanisms. Examples of carrier alliances include PWA—Canadian Airlines and Lufthansa, as well as Air Canada and United Airlines.

In addition, the need for more extensive networks has encouraged the emergence of commercial practices designed to maximize a carrier's ability to capture and keep traffic.

• (1010)

Frequent flyer programs are one example with which air travellers are familiar.

[English]

The successful carrier of the future must have an extensive network and the means to attract a sufficient traffic base to support the enormous cost that these networks entail.

In the past 15 years a new fixed-cost element has emerged to become an essential feature of providing an extensive network of services. I refer now to the need to have computer and telecommunications technology strong enough to manipulate billions of pieces of information relating to fares, schedules, flights, seats, reservations, yield management, equipment, and staff assignment, as well as other aspects of airline operations and planning. Hence the importance of linking to a computer reservation system, the essential tool for sales and planning.

Very few carriers in the world are generating profits today. In this respect our carriers are not unique. For Canada, however, the trend toward globalization means that the financial difficulties facing our two carriers has put the Canadian industry at a crossroads.

The strategies we now pursue will dictate not only the structure of the Canadian industry but also the international position of our nation's airline industry.

[Translation]

Canada's transportation policy framework is set out in section 3 of the National Transportation Act of 1987. The framework is based on the principle of competition and market forces as the best means to achieve the goals of our transportation policy. This policy has been of direct benefit to travellers through reductions in price and increased services. The government is still firmly committed to this policy.

The policy has as its foundation the need to provide a safe, economic, efficient and adequate network of viable and effective transportation services to meet the needs of travellers and shippers and to maintain the economic well-being and growth of Canada.

In addition, the policy framework is sufficiently flexible to allow Canadian carriers the benefits of investments from foreign interests. As is the case in most aviation countries of the world, however, Canada's policy requires that air carriers be controlled in fact by Canadians.

[English]

Some have argued that the competitive principles which underpin our policy may not be sufficiently supported by the current regulatory regime of the National Transportation Act. The peculiar structure of Canada's airline industry, combined with the difficult market conditions that the industry has experienced in the past few years, have led some observers to suggest the need for reinforcement of our regulatory framework. It may be necessary to re-examine the framework to ensure that it will promote a healthy, competitive environment for the airline industry.

Let us look at the proposal of PWA, the Council of Employees and American Airlines.

For several months now, PWA Corporation has been engaged in discussions designed to improve its balance sheet and its ability to compete in the future. On Tuesday, November 10, the chairman and CEO of PWA, Mr. Rhys Eaton, and the lead spokesperson for the Council of Employees, Mr. Sidney Fattedad, put forward a proposal for the consideration of the Canadian government.

This proposal requires that a number of conditions be satisfied before it can be completed. Let me outline the conditions in the PWA-employee council-American Airlines proposal.

Government funding requirements: The deal calls for significant amounts of government funding; a guarantee of up to $290 million is required until closing of the deal, $200 million from the federal government and $90 million from provincial governments. On closing the deal, PWA proposes to repay $100 million to the federal government. After the closing of the deal and for a period of 36 months thereafter, a continuing cushion of up to $190 million, $100 million coming from the federal government and $90 million from provincial governments, is required.

American Airlines investments. American Airlines is prepared to invest $246 million, to be taken in voting and non-voting convertible preferred shares, at the closing of the deal with PWA/Canadian Airlines if certain conditions are met, one of which concerns the Gemini system.

Before closing, the Gemini Computer Reservation Company must release PWA from its contract for hosting services such that a variety of administrative, marketing and data management processing services may be provided to PWA/Canadian Airlines through the American Airlines Sabre system.

American Airlines requires strenghthening of PWA's balance sheet. To meet this condition PWA/Canadian Airlines is seeking to raise $125 million in equity by way of public issue and PWA/Canadian employees have stated they are prepared to contribute $100 million to $150 million through salary deductions for a period of three years in exchange for equity.

The agreements call for American Airlines to appoint two members of an eight-member board of directors on PWA/Canadian Airlines. Those members would have ongoing veto rights over certain management decisions, such as appointment of the CEO; annual business, capital and financing plans; capital expenditures over a threshold amount; mergers or acquisitions of assets over a certain amount.

The agreements also call for American Airlines to provide valuable processing services for PWA/Canadian, mainly through its Sabre system, such as operations planning; pricing and yield management; food and beverage support services; international base operations; technical services and accounting.

The agreement also includes the requirement that all current foreign route authorities of PWA/Canadian be in full force and effect as of closing.

[Translation]

These conditions raise for the government a number of difficult issues. In assessing these issues, the government has sought to balance the following considerations: the financial woes affecting the industry as a whole; the large number of direct and indirect jobs at stake; the impressive dedication and commitment of PWA/CAIL employees who are prepared to make a substantial investment in their company; the constraints on the finances of the Government of Canada; the need to not expose the Canadian taxpayer to an imprudent measure of financial risk; the assistance already provided to PWA through the purchase of aircraft at a cost to taxpayers of over $200 million and to Air Canada at the time of its privatization; the requirement of the deal for the federal government to provide financial assistance for an uncertain period of time, because the closing of the deal is dependent on the resolution of issues relating to Gemini, which are currently before the Ontario Court and the Competiton Tribunal; the need for a proposal that will lead to a return to financal stability in the airline industry; and the legal requirement that, at the end of the day, PWA/CAIL will continue to be controlled in fact by Canadians.

[English]

Our preference is to look to every reasonable alternative to preserve a competitive airline system in Canada. Given the importance of the issues at hand, the government wishes members of the House to be apprised of the complexities of the issues. All key stakeholders have to be part of the solution.

To this end, the government will provide up to $50 million in financial assistance to PWA in order to provide an opportunity to explore with all interested parties, including provinces and employees, the actions necessary to minimize taxpayers financial exposure and to support a viable Canadian competitive airline system.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Minister of Transport spoke for 12 minutes and 30 seconds.

[English]

Mr. Manley: The minister's statement today contains many comments which we have been seeking over many months to elicit from that side of the House.

It contains, once and for all, a recognition that indeed the Canadian airline industry is in, as it has been for some time, a state of crisis. It acknowledges at last that the existing regulatory regime may not be serving the needs of Canadian Airline employees and consumers of the airline services for competition because it is leading to a lack of competition.

I am sure the minister does not need to be reminded of the statement of his predecessor, now the Minister of Finance, who said in the House of Commons on April 12, 1988: "The results of regulatory reform and the passage of the National Transportation Act have created a new environment and with it a stable, viable and very competitive airline sector in Canada".

Would that it were so. What we have in today's statement—as I say it is better late than never, but at last we have it—an acknowledgement that the structure of Canada's airline industry has led some observers to suggest the need of reinforcement of our regulatory framework and it states: "It may be necessary to suggest a recalibration of the framework to ensure that it will promote a healthy, competitive environment for the airline industry".

It is high time, but perhaps too late, that this minister has finally taken upon himself responsibility for dealing with this vital and important sector. We have gone through this now for many months. We asked him back in February what he proposed to do about what then was a looming crisis in the airline sector.

What did he say then? "It is in the best interests of consumers and the travelling public in this country to have two airline companies that are in the best possible shape. That is what we want to achieve in the months to come."

What happened in the months to come? It was on February 4 in this House when he said that. In the months to come, Canada's two national carriers lost an average of $2 million a day. Ten months of inactivity by this government have gone by. Today it is putting up $50 million of taxpayers' money. That is 25 days' losses.

Where has the minister been? What has he been thinking over all this time?

We look at the passage of time in this House and in the committee dedicated to studying these issues. In April, the Liberals on the transport committee said to that committee: "Let us study the problems in the airline industry". At that time, the contemplated transaction between American Airlines and Canadian was in the public news, saying that the discussions were under way, and many statements were being made about it.

The government sent members to that committee to shut down that inquiry, to refuse to permit the transport committee of the House of Commons to look at this crucial issue. In August when the AMR and Canadian discussions broke down and it was proposed that there be a merger between Air Canada and Canadian, again we asked for the transport committee to look at it. Again, the government refused to have the House of Commons transport committee conduct an inquiry into this crucial issue.

To his credit, the chairman of the consumer and corporate affairs committee had the nerve to hold two days of hearings on the issue before the government members on that committee refused to hear any more evidence about the crisis in this crucial sector.

In September we had the execution of an agreement to move toward a merger of Air Canada and Canadian Airlines. At that time the Leader of the Opposition asked that the government take some measures to review, with a high level panel of experts, what would be in the best interests of the Canadian taxpayer, the Canadian traveller and the Canadian Airline employees, to see what we should do and, if necessary, to give financial assistance to both airlines through tax abatement in order that there be time for that inquiry to be conducted.

The issues that the Leader of the Opposition asked to be reviewed are almost the same as those listed in the minister's statement this morning. On September 9 we were asking him to review these things to determine what should be done.

Certainly this is not a simple issue. It is not an issue that has a lot of simple solutions that anyone can put forward. There is a need for study. We are vitally concerned that taxpayers' money not be flushed down the drain in some last minute scheme to save any company that is going down the tubes anyway. That is important. But the time that has gone by that time that has been wasted on this refusal to listen, this refusal to act, this refusal to talk is what has really cost taxpayers, travellers and airline employees in this country.

[Translation]

Surely it is not a matter of favouring one airline over another, or of saving Canadian Airlines and thus endangering Air Canada. We believe that it is necessary for us in Canada to have two airlines that are competitive on domestic routes. That is the policy which the minister announced here in the House on February 4. There has been no policy to stabilize the aviation industry since then. The problems which have existed since February 4 existed throughout 1991.

[English]

Ever since the gulf war and the recession took hold, airline companies have been suffering. This is not news. The Minister of Transport surely can read the financial statements of the airlines as well as other analysts can. The failure to act for so long that gives rise to the crisis we face today has made it far worse, far more difficult to deal with, and created greater uncertainty in everyone's minds.

As to the solution that is put forward today, yes, we need to do a study; yes, we need to be careful with taxpayers' money; but to put $50 million in today without any clear indication of where the government seeks to go is to put a band-aid on a very serious problem while giving us virtually no indication of what outcome the government really hopes to achieve in this matter.

We do not know what conditions are imposed on this $50 million offer of financial assistance. We do not know whether the government has certain answers in mind for the series of questions posed by the minister which would serve as conditions precedent to giving the additional financial assistance that has been stipulated in the transaction that he outlined this morning. We do not know whether the Government of Canada believes that the transaction proposed between American Airlines and Canadian Airlines constitutes a change of control to American Airlines, remembering that the determination of that matter is appealable on public policy grounds to the federal cabinet. It is incumbent upon the government to come forward, to come out of the weeds, and say what it is it thinks of that proposed transaction. We do not know. We do not know what the government's view is on the long-term competitive possibilities in this industry.

If we do not continue to have two national carriers competing on domestic routes, what does the government have in mind to fulfil the repeated promises of this minister and his predecessors to provide competition in the airline industry in Canada?

• (1030)

We have no notion of that and yet, as I say, these are not problems that have recently emerged. These are problems that have been clearly on the public policy table for months and months and months. It is time this government took its responsibility once and for all and either addressed itself to these problems, came out of the weeds and told Canadians what it thought should be done, or get out of the way and let somebody else take over.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the announcement today that the Government of Canada is going to give Canadian Airlines $50 million with no strings attached, no return to regulation and no forced ending to crazy competition is clearly outrageous.

This is the 82-day solution. Canadian Airlines is losing $600,000 a day. When you work that into $50 million it takes you to Valentine's Day in 1993. That is how much time this government has decided to buy Canadian while it dithers about what kind of long-term solution is needed.

This government has had not months to find a solution; it knew two years ago when I raised it in the House that the airlines were beginning to bleed. This bleeding has continued now to the point where Canadian Airlines is in jeopardy of going under.

The government knew two years ago and failed to act. It failed to take the matter seriously and the reality has come home to roost that the government is now finding itself in a crisis situation and does not know what to do about it. This decision is no decision at all. It is buying time with taxpayers' money.

I want to ask the minister what strings are attached to this $50 million. Is this an equity investment? Is this a loan? Is this a loan guarantee? Is this a gift? What is this? Is it just opening up the tap to allow taxpayers' money to flow through the minister's hands into Canadian and on to the floor as it continues to bleed?

By itself, $50 million is not going to do anything. All it is going to do is buy somebody some time to come up with a solution. For example, does this $50 million give the government a say in the operation of Canadian Airlines between now and the end of the 82 days?

The minister spent a lot of time in his statement talking about the proposal between Canadian and American, the employees and laying the framework for the international crisis in the aviation industry. All that is well and good, but one simple paragraph on the action the government was going to take and all he told us was that Canadian Airlines has a cheque for $50 million and he did not tell us what has to be done with that or what protection there is for the taxpayer with that kind of allocation.

There is no indication in the minister's statement that irrespective of a return to re-regulation he is going to call in Air Canada and Canadian and knock their heads together and say: "Boys, look. We have to stop this crazy competition. We have too many planes leaving the same airport within five minutes of each other, going to the same destinations half full. You have to stop doing that because it is hurting your bottom line". Anybody with a grade two education can figure that one out.

But no, the government has not decided to do that and we do not have to have regulation to do that. The influence of the Minister of Transport can be used to call in the presidents of those two companies to sort it out and provide a solution in the interim that will stop the bleeding while putting in place a long-term solution which clearly, from our perspective, is a return to regulation.

Even in his overview the minister would not use the word re-regulation. He talked about reinforcement of our regulatory framework or a recalibration of the framework.

The reality is that whether it is a policy change or whether it is recalibration or reinforcement, we have to put rules in place that on the one hand protect the bottom line of the carriers so they do not continue to bleed and that on the other hand protect the consumers, the people who fly on the planes, the communities which rely on those planes for their economic development and their ongoing operations as a community.

The other thing that this non-decision does is it continues the difficulty the employees, not just at Canadian, but at Air Canada and the regional partners of the two carriers are experiencing. I have talked to them. I have talked to pilots, to flight attendants who do not know if they are going to have jobs tomorrow. This decision extends that anguish. There will be flight attendants, pilots, maintenance staff, baggage handlers and people at head office who will go home tonight and whose spouses will ask: "What are our chances?" They will not know because this government dithered instead of making a decision and instead of accepting its responsibility to govern, which it got from the people of Canada four years ago this week.

The government bought itself more time because quite frankly, it refused to admit when it accepted the deregulation policies handed down to it by the former Liberal administration that it was wrong. It was the wrong thing to do. It refused to accept that and as a result we have 30,000 or 40,000 people directly who will be going home tonight scared silly about whether or not they have a job and whether or not they have a future.

That is unfair. This government could have and should have and still could make a decision to do more than just an 82-day solution. It could find a real solution to the problems of the industry.

What we see today is an indication of the reality of this government. It cannot make a decision. It cannot recognize that its economic policies have failed. It has shown once again that this government literally is unable to govern and to make the tough decisions it needs to make. Mind you, it is quite good in making those tough decisions when it hurts Canadians, like the free trade agreement or the goods and services tax. It is okay for it to make those kinds of tough decisions. But the really tough ones are when it has to eat crow, has to eat its own words and recognize that perhaps there was a mistake made when it entered into economic regulatory reform. That is the tough decision that it is struggling with and that is why we do not have a decision today.

This announcement says it all. Not only has this government lost the moral authority to govern, but it has lost the ability to govern. Quite frankly, it is time for the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance, who is really running this show, and the rest of them to get out of here before they do any more damage to the transportation industry in this country or generally to this great country that we love. It really is time to call an election and let the people decide.

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House does not usually let us speak on ministers' statements, but I would tell the Speaker that we regret it very much since we are the only party to have a clear position on this issue. Our critic on this subject is here and he would like to be able to speak. Therefore I ask the House for unanimous consent so that he can do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent in the House for an independent member to speak on the statement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, for several weeks we have been hearing about Canadian Airlines and conversations between the government and that company. That seems rather strange to us because in 1987 we allowed the privatization of Air Canada in order to have free competition in the aviation industry, especially for passenger transport in Canada.

• (1040)

By privatizing Air Canada, which was running a deficit year after year, we gave it the ability to raise cash to renew its fleet. I remember that when we privatized Air Canada, the president of Air Canada at that time said: "We need to be privatized because we need cash to renew our aircraft fleet". It seems that is not exactly what Air Canada did. Instead, this company used the cash to lower its fares in an attempt to kill Canadian Airlines. In a way, it tried to eliminate Canadian Airlines and become the only major carrier in Canada. The way Air Canada acted was rather unfair.

Today, of course, Canadian Airlines is in a difficult position and so is Air Canada. Both companies are in difficulty. I think that if business people are not serious enough to work together to make their companies profitable, that is their problem. They must agree to operate the two companies profitably or they must merge.

I think that merger was discussed several times between Canadian Airlines and Air Canada, but they came to opposite conclusions. I think that private enterprise should be allowed to compete in a healthy way and that is what the government wants, I believe. If there is one company of this size too many in Canada, the two companies need only merge, seriously streamline their operations and make a profitable Canadian company. I think that is the only way to have a fair and just solution.

In that regard, I sincerely hope that the federal government does not meddle in private enterprise by subsidizing one company to the detriment of another. Clearly in this case if we help Canadian Airlines, we will just hurt Air Canada. We will have solved nothing because in a few months or years we will have the same problem: we will have to subsidize Air Canada. In this case we must let market forces operate and the business managers must be serious: either merge if necessary or leave the scene. It is their choice and that is free enterprise. If we want a serious aviation industry in Canada, we must let market forces work themselves out.

I sincerely hope that the companies will make another effort to talk to each other about merging or rationalizing so that Canada can have a solid and prosperous airline.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was going to ask the consent of the House to make a few remarks, too. I was wondering if the House would agree. I know the rule set out in Standing Order 33 does not say other members can speak, but it does not say they cannot speak. That is the reason I would like to have a chance to make a few remarks if there is consent of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the floor to the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I believed we were still in Tabling of Documents.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to revert to Tabling of Documents?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–374, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce today a bill respecting an amendment to the Excise Tax Act. The intent of the bill is to solve a problem that has existed across the country in connection with the goods and services tax.

The great complaint about this tax is that it is visible or it is demanded by retailers at every sale. The trouble is that right throughout Canada we have provincial sales taxes as well. Every time someone goes to the store to buy something, they are faced with the goods and services tax and the provincial sales tax. At no time are the goods being purchased in any way or shape at the price advertised by the merchant.

Merchants know when they are selling goods to the public that there are taxes, and merchants ought to make clear the exact calculation of the tax and advertise the total price, not just the price without the taxes because this causes nothing but misrepresentation and concern to the public.

This bill will demand that when goods are advertised at a price they be sold at that price. If the merchant wants to add tax after, he can always advertise the goods plus tax at 7 per cent. Otherwise the goods are sold at the price advertised.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Blenkarn moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

NATIONAL UNITY IN DIVERSITY WEEK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-375, an act respecting national unity in diversity week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Baha'i community of Canada for taking the leadership in this initiative. This national unity in diversity week would not only reinforce multiculturalism as a vital part of Canadian policy but would go a step further in educating Canadians to the fact that unity in diversity is a prerequisite for peace and harmony in our country and around the world.

• (1050)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Attewell moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-376, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (scabs and essential services).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Labour Code to preclude Crown corporations from using scabs during a strike and also to maintain essential services. Indeed, for some time now the major central labour bodies in Quebec have been shifting toward responsible and civilized trade unionism.

This bill will encourage workers to stand up for their rights and interests as members of a society where the improved standard of living of individuals is achieved through consultation, especially in the case of exploitative governments. The same certainly cannot be said of Canadian unionism which still hinges on a strategy of confrontation and power relationship.

Let us think of the human factor and remember the victims of the tragedy in Yellowknife at the Giant mine, in 1992. I want to thank the hon. member for Jonquière for his support to this important legislation for the Canadian workers.

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While fully supporting the bill introduced by the hon. member, I believe that this very bill has already been defeated once during this session. I am wondering whether it can be tabled twice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but I cannot allow a point of order of this nature at this time.

Mr. Saint-Julien moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the petition I have the honour to present today is signed by numerous residents of the Kingston area.

These petitioners are upset and concerned that this government has introduced a tax on reading materials.

I think they, along with Your Honour and all members of this House, must be frankly disgusted that we are taxing the printed word in Canada when freedom of information is a cornerstone of our liberties, when freedom of the press is certainly a cornerstone of our liberties, and yet the government chooses to tax books, magazines and newspapers.

These petitioners are opposed to this tax. They have signed this petition in opposition to it. They call upon Parliament to repeal the goods and services tax in so far as it applies to the sale of books, magazines and newspapers.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before proceeding with this item, I notice that some members seem to want to have a private conversation. I would suggest that they take it outside the House.

[English]

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have in front of me about 50 pages of petitions containing about 10,000 signatures dealing with the issue of child poverty in response to the fact that the minister of health announced six months ago that the government was no longer committed as it was in the House three years ago to the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000. Several thousand Canadians have been working together on this, including this morning when we had a breakfast. Members of the group are in the House of Commons gallery, led by Reverend Brian Weatherdon from Ottawa. Through this petition they have once again brought to the attention of the House that Canadians want the House of the Commons, the Parliament of Canada, to address the questions of child poverty immediately and not to defer them.

On behalf of this group I present these petitions and wish that the Government of Canada would listen to what they have to say.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to introduce a similar petition signed by people from all across Canada: from British Columbia, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, and so on.

These people have signed the same petition on which my colleague from Winnipeg has spoken. They are calling on the government to take action in order to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

This petition was sponsored by Partnership Against Poverty, headed by one of the most distinguished churches in my community, St. Andrew's at the corner of Wellington and Kent Streets.

I congratulate them and add my voice to that of my colleague from Winnipeg calling upon the government to fulfil the commitment of a few years back to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. It is only fair to fulfil the commitment this House voted on unanimously.

CONSULAR SERVICES

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions this morning.

The first one points out that Canadian consular services overseas are to provide services in such matters as immigration and visitor visas.

It also points out that the consular services in New Delhi are overworked, that 75 per cent of the people who use those services come from the Punjab, and that it is difficult for people coming from the Punjab to travel to New Delhi.

It asks the government to open a new Canadian consular service and immigration office in the Punjab.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my second petition, again signed by a large number of people from the lower mainland, points out that family class and assisted relative immigrants have historically been an important part of Canadian immigration and that family class and assisted relatives always have people in Canada to assist them in finding employment, housing and learning Canadian language and customs.

It points out that the government's present proposals would make it more difficult for family class and assisted relatives to obtain immigration. It calls upon this government to undertake a policy that would give first priority for immigration to Canada to immigrants in the family and assisted relative class.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions on behalf of about 6,000 Canadians representing the points of view of millions of Canadians and criticizing this government for not responding to the unanimous motion passed three years ago to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

The Partnership against Poverty under the leadership of Reverend Brian Weatherdon has worked across this country gathering names on petitions from every province, every territory and every community across this country, pointing out the social and economic costs incurred by the enormous amount of poverty in Canada, the poverty of over 1.1 million children and growing every day, and the unfortunate nature of the comments of the minister responsible regarding the lack of any plan for dealing with child poverty by this government. He said there was no plan for dealing with the problem of poverty exclusively for children.

There were the commitments of the Prime Minister with regard to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the commitments of this House to eliminate child poverty. Yet, as this petition points out, these problems are getting worse.

On behalf of millions of Canadians the petition calls upon Parliament to take necessary actions to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of child poverty and to do what this government has failed to do: develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table a petition signed by thousands of Canadians from across the country who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to continue to take whatever action necessary to reaffirm and achieve its goal of eradicating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop an action plan for that purpose.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling a petition from residents of Manneville, Sainte-Gertrude, Val-d'Or and Louvicourt, in Abitibi, who say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence.

• (1100)

They point out that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and production of such toys should be stopped. Freedom of the press should be restricted when reporting acts of violence as information repeatedly given on television, on all channels, as well as on radio, can act as an incentive to commit similar acts of violence.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass appropriate legislation to eliminate violence in our society, thus affording our children better protection and our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, petitioners request that the goods and services tax on books and reading materials be removed.

They point out that we have never had such a tax and that literacy is the cornerstone of a democracy such as ours. It also flies in the face of our country's competitiveness and productivity, supposed objectives of the government. They request that it be removed immediately.

I shall be introducing a private members' bill shortly to try to achieve that objective.

THE MEDIA

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition in which petitioners request the CRTC to ensure there is no inappropriate language used in the media, particularly on radio and television. They feel that it is not necessary in entertaining the general public.

They point out that it is a form of abuse and violence and that Canadians generally oppose this kind of programming. They ask that this be done as soon as possible.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting petitions signed by thousands of men, women and children from all across Canada who recognize that the incidence of violence against women and children is unacceptable.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to accept legislation that would provide relief and support to women as mothers to protect their children. They want legislation that will emphasize the need for abuser rehabilitation.

They also ask that a special effort be made in training police, lawyers, court workers and judges so they become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and that public attention be focused on this very important, long ignored problem.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my petition deals with section 745 of the Criminal Code. It is signed by approximately 1,000 people.

Under section 745 of the Criminal Code, convicted murderers are allowed to apply for a reduction in the number of years they are required to serve before becoming eligible for parole. Those convicted of first degree murder, for example, and sentenced to at least 25 years in prison, can have that 25-year period reduced to somewhere between 15 and 25 years.

The 1,000 people who have signed this petition are calling upon Parliament to rescind section 745 of the Criminal Code so that those convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to a period of incarceration of 15 to 25 years would not be eligible to reduce their parole eligibility.

IMMIGRATION ACT

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is the third reading stage of the bill. It is usual for the minister or another minister to introduce the debate at third reading and give us reasons why we should support the bill. I do not see the minister here and I do not see anybody else here to move the debate.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I appreciate my hon. friend drawing that fact to the House's attention. I am informed that the minister is on his way. There was apparently a delay that was not anticipated. I am sure he regrets the inconvenience to the House, but he will be with us momentarily.

I believe that the House may be disposed to giving the minister an opportunity to arrive as I am informed that he is fleet of foot. He has just demonstrated that, Mr. Speaker. Again I want to thank my hon. friend from NDG for raising the point.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had to rush to the House to address my colleagues on Bill C-86.

[English]

It has been five months since we introduced Bill C-86 and since then the bill has been subjected to intense, detailed and exhaustive scrutiny by members of the legislative committee, by the Senate committee in its pre-study of the bill, by hundreds of individuals and organizations representing Canadians from all walks of life, and through their briefs, representations and presentations by members on both sides of the House at report stage.

With the exception of the behaviour that we saw last night by a party in this House, I have been impressed time and time again by the constructive co-operation demonstrated by everyone involved in the passage of this bill. Members of the legislative and Senate committees have repeatedly demonstrated a deep appreciation of what immigration means to this country and a genuine concern to ensure that the measures proposed by Bill C–86 are fair, practical and in the best interests of Canada.

I have followed with particular interest the work of the Senate committee which submitted a pre–study report that showed considerable care and deliberation. The Senate pre–study report concentrated on proposed amendments relating to refugee status determination and drew heavily upon the testimony of the first chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board, Mr. Fairweather, and Mr. Chefeke, the former Canadian representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

It is clear that members of the committee listened carefully to the testimony and raised in their pre–study report issues that have been in the forefront of the debate on this very important legislation. I commend them for it. I have not always agreed with what members have said about the bill, but I would like to say that I respect their views. I value the work they have done. This has clearly been an effective legislative process. Bill C–86 has been improved by that process.

What is remarkable is that on issues so often the subject of conflicting and polarized opinion, there has been enough common ground in most cases to work out reasonable amendments to the bill.

I had the chance to hear what the Liberal immigration critic, the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, had to say about the legislative committee and the government amendments. If I can quote him, the member said that there is no doubt this committee has worked better than most committees of which he has been a member and the government listened to reasonable arguments in many cases.

There is widespread agreement that Bill C–86 responds to a real need for change and that it is based on sound principles. Few would disagree that change is necessary if we are to manage immigration effectively and fairly in a changing world.

The effectiveness of our immigration and refugee system is being severely tested by mounting international and domestic pressures. This is a fact of life. Our current Immigration Act was developed 16 years ago with the experiences of the 1960s and the 1970s as sign posts for the future. In some respects, those were simpler times. It was easier to manage the immigrant selection system and abuses of our program were less pervasive.

[Translation]

The fact is, it is becoming increasingly difficult to meet those objectives in the world of the 90s using the tools of the 70s.

That is why we need Bill C–86. Last June I indicated my commitment and the government's commitment to remain open to constructive amendments to Bill C–86 provided that they did not compromise the principles on which it is based. Let me state those principles once again.

First, and there can be no compromise here, Bill C–86 must preserve the integrity, compassion and humanitarian values of our immigration and refugee programs. Second, our immigration program must continue to serve the best interests of Canada and all Canadians. Third, the proposals must result in better management and control of all aspects of our immigration and refugee programs.

In accordance with those principles, Bill C–86 provides for improvements in three main areas. First, we will be able to make a better selection of candidates for immigration in Canada thanks to a better monitoring and management of categories and numbers of immigrants.

Thus, immigration will continue to contribute to the development of our society and to our economic prosperity in all regions of Canada. Second, we will be able to better protect the Canadian society through more stringent enforcement and control mechanisms in order to preserve the integrity of our programs and protect Canadians against those who take advantage of our programs and break our laws. Third, we will further streamline the refugee determination system in order to improve the effectiveness of an excellent program—recognized as such throughout the world—with fair decisions rendered more quickly.

Those are the three main principles underlying Bill C–86.

[English]

It is clear that the majority of Canadians recognize the need for changes to the old Immigration Act and the majority agree that the focus of Bill C-86 is right. The focus is right; effective selection and management of the immigration program, better protection against criminals and terrorists and a fair, streamlined refugee determination system.

At the same time, concerns have been expressed about how specific provisions of Bill C-86 might work in practice. That is fair. I have listened to those concerns carefully. In many cases, most notably they have been with respect to the role of the senior immigration officer. Anyone who looks at how we do our work will see that those concerns are simply unfounded.

I am surprised at the lack of foundation because our experience as a country, as a people in Canada and the work of this department is surely not what sparks this unfounded concern. It has to be something else.

In most cases, as I said, there were legitimate concerns. There have been cases where the legislative concerns have been expressed and also cases where ambiguity could be cleared up. The government has responded, as recognized by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, to those concerns in a responsible and reasonable manner.

Amendments were brought forward to clarify, answer and otherwise improve Bill C-86. To name a few examples, methods have been found to continue to hold refugee hearings in camera. It was not there. It was a concern. It was looked at, considered, and taking the views of the many witnesses and the members of the committee, we brought about that change.

Ministerial oversight of section 46.01(c)(e) and 53.1 of the act will be maintained. It was not there. Reporting requirements for changes to the annual immigration plan have been enhanced and measures to more precisely target criminally inadmissible provisions have been adopted. These changes are a direct result of testimony presented to the legislative committee, recommendations in the Senate, a pre-study report and the comments of other interested Canadians. However, none of the amendments alters the basic goals and principles of Bill C-86. Indeed, I believe that these amendments help to achieve these goals.

[Translation]

The fundamental objectives of our immigration program, either social, humanitarian or economic, are very important.

As a government, we strongly believe that the majority of Canadians share those objectives. We should all be pleased that the legislative review process has identified ways to make Bill C-86 even more effective in achieving these shared goals.

[English]

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that Canada maintain an immigration and refugee program that is fair, balanced and effective, an immigration program that can operate in the demanding conditions of the world today, a world which many people simply want us to ignore, but we cannot with the trust that people have given us ignore that reality. That is what Bill C-86 is all about, reality.

I think that the majority of Canadians share these objectives. We should all be pleased that this process has identified ways to make Bill C-86 more effective in achieving these shared goals.

It will give the men and women who deliver Canada's immigration program the tools they need to meet these challenges.

• (1120)

It will ensure, at a time when countries all over the world are facing growing demands to cut back on immigration, that Canada can maintain its tradition as a welcoming, compassionate nation, ready and able to help those in need. It will ensure that at a time when growing numbers of people around the world are seeking to circumvent or abuse immigration programs, Canadians will be protected. That is important. It will ensure that those who wish to come to Canada and those who seek refuge in Canada can expect timely, fair and compassionate treatment.

Before I finish, there is one more point I wish to make. It has been clear since Bill C-86 was first introduced more than five months ago that certain members opposite had little criticism to offer about the substance of the bill. In fact, both opposition critics who are here today praised different parts of the bill. Last night, the NDP abandoned any pretension that it wished to attack the bill itself. Instead, it attacked the process.

The NDP tried to introduce gridlock government to Canada. Some time today I expect that attack on process to begin anew. I expect the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina or another member of his party to try and suggest that this bill is being rammed through without due regard to the parliamentary process. That was the premise of the circus last night.

That simply is not true. I am not saying that in a partisan way. I am just asking members to look at the facts. Bill C–86 was introduced more than five months ago. Since then, an all–party legislative committee has spent some 61 hours studying the bill. Most bills in this place receive between 20 and 40 hours of study, fully one–third less than Bill C–86. In fact, of the 73 bills passed by this Parliament since May 1991, I am only aware of two other bills out of 73 that have been studied longer by a committee.

During the study of Bill C–86, more than 110 witnesses from all across Canada, coast to coast to coast, appeared before the committee. Still more witnesses appeared before the Senate committee. By the time third reading is completed today, this bill will have been debated in this House for more than 20 hours. Again, this is well above the average.

When you hear people say that this bill needs more study, think about the facts: Sixty–one hours of committee study; 110 witnesses; a Senate pre–study and more than 20 hours of parliamentary debate.

The record is clear. There has been an exhaustive debate and study of Bill C–86. It is a good piece of legislation. It will ensure that immigration continues to contribute as it has for more than 125 years to the social and economic well–being of Canada and of Canadians. Canadians expect as much. I urge all members of the House, on whatever side, to join in passing this bill.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as I said on other interventions with respect to this bill, this bill represents the most extensive amendments to our immigration laws since 1976–77. It is a bill of 128 clauses, comprising 113 pages.

When the bill was tabled on June 16, which by the way was during the last week of the sittings before we adjourned for the summer, it was brought on for debate after two days. In the committee the minister said that it took him and his officials eight months to prepare this bill. We all know that he has a large number of experts and officials to help him in such matters. Yet, when he put the bill before the House, a long and complicated bill as I just mentioned, he gave the opposition two days to examine the bill before it was brought on for debate. We were expected on second reading of that bill to speak intelligently about the bill without having really an opportunity to examine it properly.

We were not the only ones. Although I have specialized in immigration to a certain extent and while my colleague from Spadina has specialized in immigration, it was still extremely difficult if not impossible to examine this bill properly in the two days before we started second reading debate. We consulted with immigration lawyers, NGOs and other groups that work full time in this area. They had no time to do it either, so we could not seek their advice.

My point is this. All this pious talk by the government from time to time on parliamentary reform and respect for Parliament and respect for democracy is really a pile of nonsense. Once it brought the bill on for second reading debate in June, as I say two days after the bill was tabled, it immediately introduced time allocation and allowed only one and a half days of debate at second reading.

I give credit to the legislative committee, chaired by the hon. member for Lethbridge, who I think did an excellent job. I see him entering the House. I congratulate him. He was fair. He took a reasonable approach in the committee and agreed to the extension of hearings beyond what was originally planned. He gave, I thought, a good hearing to those people who wanted to be heard. I also give credit to the chief government spokesman, the hon. member for St. John's East, who also took a fair and reasonable approach in the committee. It was principally because of these two members that we were able to get some improvements in committee.

There were improvements in the committee. After what we said in the opposition within the first few weeks after the bill was tabled, criticisms that we raised and then were raised by the witnesses time after time when they came before the committee, the committee finally accepted the soundness of the arguments that were being made and made some changes. For example, as pointed out by the minister, it changed the provisions with respect to public hearings. The bill provided that hearings on refugee cases would be public. Nearly all the witnesses said that was wrong, that it would put the family of the applicant in jeopardy, that it could put him or her in jeopardy. Therefore, the government changed that. It has now gone back to the old rule, which is that hearings before the refugee board will be, by general rule, in camera and only in public by exception. That was one change that was made.

The committee also changed the very harsh detention procedures that were provided for in the bill. The bill provided that once a person was put in detention for an immigration question, there would only be a review every 30 days. That was a waste of government resources and harsh and unreasonable with respect to these immigrants.

I must point out that immigration detention is not for people who are charged with criminal offences. They would go into the regular court system. This is for people who have not committed criminal offences but for one reason or another are deemed to require detention because they may not appear for hearings or whatever.

• (1130)

In any case, the government agreed to an amendment on that. It also agreed to amend the provisions with respect to fingerprints. All those fingerprints will now be destroyed once the immigrant becomes a Canadian citizen.

To a certain extent the provisions on inadmissibility with respect to terrorism and criminality were changed to make them more reasonable. Changes were also made with respect to the permanent residence card.

Certain changes were made in committee and those changes improved the bill. On the whole, the committee worked well. There were only seven members of this House on the committee: four government members, two members from the Liberal Party, and one member of the New Democratic Party, and this is a House of 295 members.

There are a lot of members in this House who are concerned with immigration and refugee matters. The place where they can get involved is during the debate in this House. As I said, the government only allowed one and a half days at second reading on that debate. Yesterday, it provided for only one and a half days' debate at report stage with 86 amendments to deal with and has also curtailed the time for third reading, the debate in which we are now involved, to one day.

In this House we will only have a total of four days and those days have already been cut back. Yesterday we lost a lot of time because of the voting on the closure procedure. We lost about an hour. Today we lost more time because of the statements that were made. Although there is an attempt to make part of that up, it is not going to make up the total time.

Here we have an extremely important bill, the most extensive bill on immigration since 1976, on an issue that is causing problems all over the world, in the United Kingdom, Germany, France, the United States and Italy, with the mass movement of peoples and we are only spending a very limited amount of time discussing it.

It is not just the question of involving the members of this House in an issue they are all very concerned with. It also involves the general public. Although the press is allowed to come in and report the committee's work, very little reporting is done of those legislative committees, whereas the proceedings of this House are televised and the general public, not just the experts and the NGOs, can be informed with respect to debate. If the debate only goes on for a few days, there is not much chance to deeply penetrate public opinion on these issues.

I talked about the importance of the issues and why it was necessary that we debate these things at greater length in this House. Experts tell us that the population of the world will increase by three billion people in the next 30 years, by three billion people. That is going to impact on all countries in the world. Right now we have 20 million refugees in the world as a result of civil war, tribal conflict, totalitarian oppressive regimes, drought, hunger and so on, for many reasons.

That is going to increase and we have to give attention in our public policy formulation to these issues. It is not just a question of bringing a bill before the House and ramming it through in a few days. If we intend to develop our immigration policy wisely we need to spend some time on it. How are we going to deal with this vast increase in population in the world? What kind of rules are we going to have? How are we going to balance order with humanity? I do not think we have done that in this debate which is being rammed through in an obscene manner.

We in the Liberal Party have always agreed with a dynamic immigration policy but we also believe controls are needed. The doors cannot be wide open. The flow into our country has to be controlled or else the country will lose the good things which attract people to it. A program of assisting people to integrate into the Canadian way of life is needed. Our party treasures the valuable role immigrants and refugees have played in this country. The greatest eras of prosperity in this country have followed the great waves of immigration, whether it was on the prairies, or in the big cities of Ontario or Quebec. We have had the greatest eras of prosperity following great waves of immigration and some of the controversy which took place with respect to some of them completely disappeared after a few years.

I recall in the 1950s when I was at McGill University that because of the Hungarian revolution against the communist regime, over 30,000 people fled Hungary and came to this country. They are all well settled today. They and their children are doing an outstanding job as Canadians. It is the same with the Czechs who came in a similar situation and the Chileans and the Ugandan Asians and so on. They have all contributed greatly to this country.

As I have said, some improvements were made in Bill C-86 in committee but many of the offensive provisions remain and because of that, the bill is still badly flawed.

Despite those amendments this bill will still make it more difficult for law-abiding, hard-working immigrants to enter Canada. It still puts barriers in the way of legitimate refugees. As a matter of fact, very little was done to deal with that issue in the committee or in the report stage yesterday.

The bill opens the door to inequity and capriciousness in the selection of immigrants and it suspends traditional legal safeguards which are customary in Canada. For example, it provides for deportations without hearings. It provides for the suspension of rights through retroactive provisions. Throughout the entire bill there is an emphasis on enforcement as opposed to fairness and humanitarian values.

Finally, Bill C-86 transfers a lot of matters which are presently in the law and are subject to the control of the House of Commons and Parliament to the minister and his officials who can now change the law by regulation and Order in Council. There has been a massive transfer of authority from Parliament to officials and the minister in this bill and that leaves the whole process open to abuse. We never know from year to year what kind of government we are going to have or what kind of minister we are going to have. We could have a very good minister who believes in fairness and who may use these provisions with wisdom, but we could also have a minister who would not.

Parliament must be in control of these things. We are the elected representatives of the people. There is a role for Orders in Council and while there is a role for regulation where things can be done by the government without consulting Parliament, I believe it has gone beyond that point in this bill.

I want to mention some of the things still in this bill that are wrong and are unacceptable. To begin with, one of the major criticisms of the bill is the new powers given to the senior immigration officer in dealing with refugees at the border. When I say at the border, I also mean at airports, points of entry and so on.

Under the present law, the law as it was before this bill, we had a two-stage hearing for the screening of refugees. The first stage was to decide on the credibility of the refugee's case and also whether the refugee was eligible to go on to the full hearing, the second stage. There was a lot of criticism about that first-stage hearing. It was felt that it wasted a lot of time, it prolonged the process unnecessarily, was costly and really was unnecessary because the overwhelming majority of cases that went to the first stage went on to the second stage in any event. While we wasted a lot of time with this first-stage hearing, it did not really screen out many individuals.

On the other hand, there was due process at that first stage. The refugee applicant had the right to an attorney, he was fully informed of his rights and he was protected in presenting his case at that first-stage hearing.

The government has gone along with the proposal that the first-stage hearing should be abolished and in Bill C-86 has abolished the first-stage hearing. That is good. However, it has given some of the authority that was held by the officials at the first-stage hearing to a senior immigration officer who will now have the right to turn away refugee applicants without any hearing, without any representation by attorney, without any due process.

The refugee appears at the airport or the border claiming refugee status. The senior immigration officer can look at his documents and his papers and on the basis of five criteria that are written in the law can say: "I am sorry. You cannot come in. You cannot even get to the refugee board where you and your attorney can plead your case".

In effect, the government in this bill has put a barrier between the refugee applicant and his right to a fair hearing before the board. In doing that, it has not solved any problems. As a matter of fact, it has gone against the legal and justice traditions of this country in doing that.

The minister in his speech this morning has said that he listened to the concerns about the powers of the senior immigration officer at the border and he says they are unfounded. These criticisms do not simply come from members of Parliament, such as myself and the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina and others who participated in the committee. These criticisms come from lawyers and immigration experts who have worked in the immigration field for years. They say that these issues to be decided by the senior immigration officer are not simply black and white issues which can be decided by looking at documents. There are many grey areas where the applicant should have a right to explain and to plead his case.

But no, the government has not listened on this particular matter and has stuck to the provisions of the bill. We are going to have a bill, we are going to have a law if this continues to be rammed through, where a senior immigration officer, without any right for the refugee to be heard, will be able to turn away that refugee before he ever gets to the Immigration and Refugee Board, which is the board that is supposed to determine whether or not the person is a valid refugee.

There were estimates made before the committee that 45 to 50 per cent of the applicants could be turned away by the senior immigration officer at this first step without any right to be heard by the refugee board.

That is a very offensive provision. We had amendments in committee with respect to that, to change it or to do away with it. For example, I had an amendment which was similar to the recommendation in the report from the Senate. All were rejected. My amendment was to the effect and was four square with the Senate proposal that if the senior immigration officer felt that the refugee was not eligible, then that entire matter should be referred to the Immigration and Refugee Board where it would be examined as a preliminary issue before it examined the substance of his refugee claim. That would be fair because before the board is the full right of due process with the right of representation.

The minister this morning said that he respected and thought the Senate had a great report, but in effect he has refused to agree with most of the recommendations made by the Senate committee, which was chaired by a Conservative senator and has a majority of Conservative senators on the committee. I do not know what is going to happen when the bill goes to the Senate. It will be interesting to watch that. The Senate is going to get a bill that it criticized in many respects and asked for amendments in its pre-study. However, we will see what happens.

Another major issue that was raised by witnesses and was not changed by the government is the whole question of the split decision before the board in recognizing a refugee. Under the present law, when a refugee goes before the Immigration Refugee Board there are two members of the board present. In order to win the case, to be recognized as a refugee, a claimant only needs the positive vote of one of the two members of the board.

That was done by the government a few years ago because it felt the benefit of the doubt should be given to the refugee. Somebody fleeing from a situation of oppression, who has been persecuted because of politics, religion, ethnic origin, tribe or whatever, has their liberty in danger. They flee a country, come to Canada and claim refugee status. The law said that if one of the two members of the board could be convinced, the claimant would be accepted as a refugee.

In this bill, the government has now made it mandatory in three areas where the refugee claimant will have to get the votes of both members of the board. It has not really explained why it has done that. Why is it necessary?

The government says the system worked well before the board yet it is changing the rules and requiring two votes in certain matters. We tried to change that in committee. Our amendments were turned down. We tried to change it again yesterday at report stage and it was turned down. One can only assume that the rule was put in simply to keep out more refugees.

One could understand if it was to keep out refugees who did not have a good case, but it is likely to keep out a lot of legitimate refugees. It will bring about unfairness among different individual refugees. Some will get in because they only need one vote. Some will be turned away because they need two votes.

I must say—immigration lawyers confirm this—that a lot of time will be spent before each board hearing deciding whether it is a case that requires two votes or one vote. There is a chance the backlog will be built up again with all this nonsense and this new, unfair provision.

We also attempted to amend the provisions on family members. The government says that in assessing an applicant for immigration, it will assess the entire family, including those who are not accompanying the immigrant to Canada. We feel that is not fair and it is not the traditional way. Only members of the family accompanying the parents or the principal members of the family should be assessed for admission. That amendment was turned down.

We tried to put criteria into the law which would guide the minister and the officials in the granting of visitors' visas, and it was turned down.

Members of Parliament in all parts of this House have had terrible horror cases where Canadians have tried to bring members of their families from their countries of origin as visitors to visit with them and they cannot get them in, even when these individuals have homes in their countries of origin. They have jobs, they have other members of their family, they have every intention of returning but they are systematically turned down.

We tried to change that, but the government refused. The government still has in this bill extremely wide provisions to block the admissibility of immigrants with respect to criminality and to subversion.

I want to make it clear that we in the Liberal Party are totally opposed to the admission to Canada of criminals, terrorists, subversives or people who engage in espionage. That was already in the law, but the government has put in new provisions which go too far.

For example, there is one provision that says that if people are found to be a threat to the security of Canada beyond terrorism, subversion and espionage, they can still be excluded. We asked the minister and the officials what sort of thing could be beyond terrorism, subversion and espionage. They cannot give us examples.

The criminal lawyers that appeared before the committee just could not imagine what might be a threat to the security of Canada other than those three things which are already in the law.

• (1150)

It is the same with the new provision which was directed supposedly against organized crime. We agree that people involved in organized crime should not be admitted to the country. The provision is written broadly. It states that: "If the officials have reasonable grounds to believe that a person belongs to an organization which might reasonably be involved in crime at some time—". The wording of the section keeps going on. As was pointed out in the debate yesterday, it could include somebody that worked for Exxon in the United States. That organization was convicted of an environmental offence a few years ago. Witness after witness tried to bring this to the attention of the government officials, said the clause should be narrowed, it should be made more specific, but they did not do that.

Great powers are also given to the minister and his officials in managing what are now called streams of immigration. They can retroactively change the rules with respect to certain streams that will be admitted and those that will not.

Somebody could proceed under the new rules of this bill quite considerably down the path to being accepted as a refugee and then the government could decide it was not going to accept any more refugees from that stream. It could suspend or cancel all those applications and take people from, let us say, another class, another stream altogether.

There are other flaws in the bill. I have tried to highlight some of the more offensive sections but the bill is still seriously flawed. We look at the direction the government is moving from some of the things it has done in recent months.

Yesterday or last Friday the government announced it is moving over 200 immigration officials to Vegreville, Alberta. Vegreville is probably a very good rural Alberta town, but a town that is principally an agricultural centre. The government is going to set up a Canadian centre for immigration. This is where it is going to review immigration applications; not in Edmonton, Winnipeg or Vancouver, which are immigration centres, but in Vegreville.

The government is setting up this centre, which will review applications simply on a paper basis without any face to face interview with the immigration applicants. How inhumane can you get? Most of these immigrants cannot speak English or French. They cannot fill out the documents properly without assistance, yet they will have to fill out documents which will be sent to Vegreville. They may be accepted or turned down as immigrants without any face to face interview. Since they will be living in the big cities of Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Edmonton, many of them will have no chance to get on the phone and ask: what happened to my application? One wonders about provisions such as this.

I have no objection to moving all kinds of government departments and parts of the government to Vegreville when it is appropriate to do so, but to move an immigration centre to a small community where there are not the community support services for immigration, probably very few if any immigration lawyers or centres for the assistance of immigrants, is inexplicable.

Even though everything is supposed to be done by paper there, I am sure as a member of Parliament and having dealt with immigration matters over the years, people will be phoning us and asking about their applications. It is stuck out in Vegreville.

In any case, this is the direction the government is moving. It is trying to deal with immigrants as faceless phantoms. Decisions will be made based on paperwork without any contact with these people who have a hard time not only speaking English and French but reading and writing in English or French. It is going to make the decisions on paperwork.

Look at the way it handled the domestic worker issue. Most of our domestic workers come from Third World countries. The government put in a provision just this spring where applicants now must have grade 12 and a six month course to be a domestic worker. No consideration is given to the fact that the person might have been a very good caretaker of children for years and years. That will not count because in many of these countries, whether it is the Caribbean or Asia, they just do not have the opportunity to take six month courses in domestic work and many of them do not have an opportunity to go to grade 12.

On March 27 the government changed the family class regulations. Now it will only accept under family class people under 19, unless they are in school or they are handicapped.

I had an amendment yesterday on appointments to the board. I got a copy of a letter the other day from a member of the board who resigned, saying that the board was rampant with racism. This person said he was obliged to resign, that the way the work of the board was being carried on in Toronto was unacceptable to him and he wrote a letter to the Privy Council resigning.

I raise these issues because this bill is giving more and more authority to government and officials. The government tells us not to worry, everything will be done well, these officials will be well trained. There are many good officials, but the government has been cutting them back as well. They do not have the time, they are over–worked and over–burdened; their tempers get short sometimes.

We see what is happening already. The government introduced a special program with respect to Yugoslavia but only a small percentage of visas have been issued under that program. In effect, the program has not worked. Worse still, the government while announcing the special program for Yugoslavia, did not announce a similar program for a country that is even worse hit, Somalia.

I raise these issues because it indicates to us that it is not a good thing to pass a bill like this, which will give even more authority to officials and to Order in Council and to regulations and to the government, when they have shown us already the sorts of things they are doing. They made the decision to switch these 200 employees to Vegreville and set up this new immigration centre which will handle applications based on paper and not face to face interviews. They did not have to come to Parliament, they did that through just an administrative decision.

It is the same thing with the special programs for Yugoslavia and the one that does not exist for Somalia. I could go on.

The minister said this morning that this bill received more attention than any other bill that he can remember. It goes to show that he has a pretty short memory. He has only been in this House since this Conservative government came to power.

I must tell him that before this Conservative government was in power it was customary to give a much longer period of time to the examination of bills. As a matter of fact, when we in the Liberal Party were in government, if we had put an allocation of time on a bill it was considered a national shame. It was an outrage. Now this government does it systematically. Allocation of time and closure are provisions that are meant to deal with abuse by the opposition in filibustering bills.

I could understand if an opposition party decides to carry on systematic filibustering and opposition day after day after day. Then you bring in a closure motion or an allocation of time. But we do not even get a chance to make our first speech and the government rams in these time allocation rules on major, very extensive bills.

The minister's memory is extremely short. Yes, the process worked pretty well in committee on this bill, but it did not work well at all at second reading, at report stage or third reading. The time is extremely limited for the issues to be discussed and, as I pointed out, there are only seven members of this House in the committee, whereas there are 295 members in this House and many of them have something to say about immigration matters. Many of them come from constituencies with large immigration populations.

In conclusion let me say that Canadians want a controlled immigration policy, but they also want fairness, equity and humanity. This bill unfortunately will give us the opposite. I have to say that many provisions in this bill move in the opposite direction of fairness, the opposite direction of equity and the opposite direction of humanitarian considerations. I mentioned some of the examples.

The government says that the purpose of the bill is to allow it to better manage the immigration system. It certainly will do that but at a great cost with retroactive measures, with deportations without hearings, with the ability to switch, pick and choose streams of immigration; things that are not traditional in our system and not in the law at the present time.

Therefore, despite some improvements that were made in committee, this bill is still unacceptable and we will be voting against it at third reading today.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the 20 minutes I am given I wish mainly to reflect on what Bill C–86 means in the present world we live in.

First, I wish to reply to the minister when he said sarcastically that I withdrew yesterday from criticizing the bill and criticized only the hasty process by which this very large and complicated bill has been rammed through. I do criticize the process, as my colleague from Notre–Dame–de–Grâce has, but the minister then hurried away in case he might hear an answer to his wisecrack.

What the minister said is clearly not true. The amendments that I proposed in the committee were nearly all rejected by the committee, especially the important ones. Likewise, the amendments I moved yesterday were all rejected by the Tories. The Tories in the committee and the Tories in the House stonewalled all the important amendments proposed either by the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce or by me.

Bill C–86 is very harmful, as has been said by a great many Canadians, including expert lawyers who have had a chance to get to understand what the bill does.

I fully agree with the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce in his criticisms of the bill, but since I have only half as much time allowed to me I will not repeat them in detail. However, I will simply review them in order to reflect on them because I want to ask why this bill has been driven so hastily and with so little openness to genuine criticism by this government. Why were so few substantial amendments accepted?

Some people have suggested it is the fear of the Reform Party in order to get back the votes of wandering Tories. Some people have suggested, and I think there is more to this, that it is a fear of immigrants, and I will come back to that.

The cabinet and the bureaucrats are insistent on establishing far greater control in their own hands of the immigration process, free from public knowledge, from public criticism and free from parliamentary criticism for the large part rather than emphasizing trying to give better service to Canadian citizens, residents, immigrants and refugees.

The Conservatives have reduced the chance for due process at the border, particularly in the matter of access to legal counsel. They have made permanent residents less secure. Some of them can now be removed without an inquiry. They have given less priority to family class and they have introduced a brand new, very rare principle of law called retroactivity. They can retroactively cancel immigration applications, investors' funds and work permits, and that threatens all people. It even threatens Canadian citizens when they try to apply to bring relatives here through sponsorship.

They can be very selective about it. They made higher immigration barriers such as the powers of the senior immigration officer to turn away probably a majority of the people without their having the oral hearing that the Supreme Court guaranteed.

There would be no second look in the refugee division when facts are brought out to show that the decision of the division previously was wrong. The power of the SIO to send people back to what the government is pleased to call a safe third country has a very important international meaning.

This safe third country provision, sending them back saying they should have made a refugee application somewhere else, is most significant because most refugee producing countries have no direct passage to Canada.

The safe third country rule can shut out, therefore, the big majority of claimants who have been coming in the last 10 or 20 years. It implicitly bars people who have darker skin than most Canadians.

Canada's policy on refugees has always been a bit ambiguous. After World War II there was the UN Declaration of Human Rights; I believe it is article 13 that said a person has the right to seek protection against his own government or her own government from a foreign state. Canada largely ignored that and still selected refugees mainly if it felt they would turn out to be useful economic immigrants.

In 1973 the convention refugee claimants from Uruguay and Chile and generally parts in the south started coming to Canada mainly from countries that had been invaded by U.S. investment, U.S. CIA operations and U.S. arms.

In Canada there was an intense controversy over Sikh refugee claimants which produced the same decision, guaranteeing an oral hearing to anyone in Canada who makes a refugee claim.

This was a human rights landmark in Canada's immigration process. It was a high point. Since then this government has been sliding in the other direction, especially since the end of the 1980s when the Soviet power collapsed and the cold war had ended. Without the communist threat Canada's principles of refugee policy began to veer uncertainly because previously they had emphasized automatically bringing in people who were fleeing from a communist country.

When a boatload of dark-skinned people landed illegally in Nova Scotia and the people welcomed them with tea and sandwiches, the Prime Minister and the then minister of immigration started worrying publicly about invasion. You would think they came ashore with machine guns or bazookas or something. All they came with were dark skins. Canada's policy began to waiver then.

I want to look quickly at post World War II migration patterns. They concern some other countries more than Canada but Canada is part of the North Atlantic bloc. Especially I want to look at the migration patterns of dark-skinned people to the United States, the chief world investor in the past four decades, including in those countries in the south which are sometimes called Third World countries.

Investing first began in industrialized agriculture in those countries, replacing subsistence farming with agribusiness, cash-cropping for export to the United States and northwestern Europe.

Investments were also developed in low-wage manufacturing, drawing the women from the farms, later the men, because they could not work effectively without their women to share the work on the farms. In the factories were produced exports for United States and northwest Europe.

An example is Santo Domingo. The United States invaded that in 1965 to prop up a military industrial coup. It was followed up with U.S. investments, sheltering some of the refugees in the U.S., and migration jumped 12 times, from 4,500 between 1955 and 1959 to 58,000 between 1965 and 1969.

• (1210)

In Haiti, U.S. investment in the 1970s for industrialized agriculture and manufacturing for exports to the U.S.A. and northwest Europe also coincided with mass immigration beginning to the United States. El Salvador had heavy U.S. investments in the 1970s, mingled with the 14 rich families there that monopolized the agriculture. They forced a mass exodus of former campesinos, farm owners, from the farms to farm day labour and industrial labour.

In the 1980s there was civil war by resistance of the people against a United States armed tyranny of the landowners. That caused massive emigration from that little country; from a country of five million people, almost 600,000 moved to the United States, illegally, but they are there as cheap labour.

There are examples of the same also with Korea, the Philippines, Indonesia and Taiwan. In the 1970s in all these countries there were massive flows of American investment with military collaboration and massive migration from those countries to the United States; 81 per cent of all Korean immigrants emigrated to the United States. Almost 100 per cent of Filipinos who emigrated went to the United States. The United States received 70 per cent of the Caribbean immigration but 100 per cent from Santo Domingo, as I mentioned before.

From Central America, the United States receives 19 per cent but from El Salvador, 52 per cent.

The pattern is that cheap labour, cheap land and cheap resources are invested by the United States for their super profits. They also bring about in return massive migration because at the same time the United States' market for low wage labour in the 1970s drew them to the United States.

It is similar with Japan. It is expanding its investments into southeast Asia and the southwest Pacific. It has now drawn cheap labour from those countries in spite of its 2,000 years of racist exclusionism.

We also note that northern Europe during the 1970s invested heavily in north Africa, the Middle East and south Europe. It also brought cheap labour from those countries to northwestern Europe.

What does this mean for Canada's immigration policy? These are the countries with which Canada is a partner. Canada is part of this group of north Atlantic countries, mostly reflected in the North Atlantic Treaty, but also as a trade bloc and part of the ones that conquered and colonized the countries of the south.

For two to three decades these north Atlantic countries, including Canada, have invested and intervened politically and with armaments in the southern neighbours. The rich countries grew richer and the people of the poor countries grew poorer. While tens of billions of dollars net were taken each year by the north from the south, puppet governments with arms from the north suppressed the revolts of the people.

One instructive example is Arabia, which was partitioned after World War I and again after World War II. It was manipulated a couple of years ago into the gulf war so as to restore north Atlantic control over the oil resources there.

During the same decades, mass migration brought on cheap labour from the Caribbean, Africa, south Europe, the Middle East and the Pacific Islands to the United States and northwestern Europe. The northern economies are staggering badly, partly under the weight of the debt that the Third World cannot pay, a trade in dollars of debt that it cannot pay. The cost of policing it, providing arms and lending it the money to buy arms are all putting it further in debt. Now that our economy is staggering, we have racial conflicts breaking out against the visible minorities in many of the north Atlantic countries.

What I have attempted to suggest is an understanding of Canada's present situation in the world regarding immigration and refugees. Canada, as a north Atlantic country, is beginning to show fear of refugees. Canada talks about not being able to absorb all the refugees who might come here. That is quite true. Neither I nor anyone else says that we should take 20 million refugees. However, Canada and the other countries of the north Atlantic community are not seriously trying to deal in any other way with the problems that drove these refugees from their homes, whether they are strictly political problems or whether they are economic problems caused by ruin of the land through agribusiness, industrialized farming systems brought in by the north.

They do not offer a solution either by admitting them to Canada and other countries of the north or by enabling them to survive where they are. The money available to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees to sustain them in their camps or to help them to return is so small that they are in desperate physical condition.

Canada also seems to be showing fear of immigration. That is why there is this big emphasis in the bill on control. The cabinet and the bureaucrats must control the immigrants, the Canadian permanent residents and even Canadian citizens.

I have a question which I want to leave with this House and those who are listening. The question is: Will we let Canada sink into a fortress mentality? We have been increasing the arms budget. Once the Soviet Union is gone, we cannot justify helicopters for chasing Soviet subs, but we are buying them anyway. For what? For another Oka or perhaps for intervening again in the Middle East?

In fear we are arming ourselves more and more and it is a question of what for. Are we going to renew the kind of wars of conquest that were symbolized by Columbus 500 years ago this year, wars of the north, that is western Europe and north America, against the south? Will we recognize that we cannot do that again and even survive ourselves? The world is being ruined by wars. The world is being ruined by a greedy approach to agriculture and a greedy approach to manufacturing which produces, regardless of who can consume, regardless of who needs to consume, regardless of who gets a chance to consume, only for a high-priced market.

Will we recognize that we are in danger of ruining the planet we live on as well as destroying the people? Will we join with the people of what we call the Third World, people largely of the southern continents, Latin America, the Caribbean, Africa, southern parts of Asia and the islands of the Pacific, as equals for the survival of all of us and listen to their needs which are vastly greater than ours because of the unequal trade relations we have enforced with our military for five centuries? Will we join with them as equal human beings for survival of the human race on the planet?

This is the question that Bill C-86 is bringing to the minds of several people. Canada does not have an independent world military system like the United States, Britain or France, or such as Germany or perhaps Japan would like to have if it changed its constitution.

We are not a big player on the world scene. That is one advantage we have because we are not committed, we are not locked into hundreds of military bases around the world. We are into a very few. We have not committed ourselves so deeply to the military domination of the world. We have a choice before us. We can work for a policy of peace and co-operation rather than domination and fear. We can begin that by re-examining our immigration policy, asking ourselves why we are afraid of refugees, why we are afraid of immigrants, why we do not provide, as our amendments ask to provide, even the right to legal counsel when a person is at the border and in danger of being turned away.

The government has said they can have legal counsel if it is available, but it will not do anything to make legal counsel available. The government has said: "We won't send anybody back to a country where he or she fears persecution", but it will not tell us how the person is to get from the border point to those who will decide that that person should not be sent home.

All the amendments that we put in order to have the good intentions expressed by the government put into action were met with saying: "Trust us. We wouldn't do anything unkind or unfair or unjust". Laws are not meant to put all that power solely into the hands of government, cabinet and officials. Laws are meant to be in the hands of all the elected representatives, such as all the members of Parliament. That is the main fault in this law and raises the question of what is this government afraid of.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Spadina for his remarks and also for the great contribution that he made throughout the work in committee, day in, day out, long days in which we worked together. I want to thank him.

In the minister's remarks, he said he thought that the pre-study report of the Senate was an excellent report. I was a bit surprised that he said that because he accepted very few of the recommendations of the Senate committee.

I am just looking at the Senate's report now. It made 14 recommendations. As far as I can see, the government only accepted two of them. It accepted the recommendation that hearings of the refugee division should be held in camera as a general rule. The government accepted that change. The Senate also said that the definition of terrorism should be redefined. The government did that.

Of all the other recommendations, and there are 14, that is really only two. For example, on safe third country, the Senate states that a precondition should be a treaty between Canada and the country, in which treaty it should be clear that that country adheres to the entire convention on the status of refugees, not just article 33. It also states that that country must have a refugee determination system that complies with Canadian principles of fundamental justice; in other words, it has to have a system more or less like our system where one has a hearing and so on.

The government did not accept any of those recommendations because the SIO is given all these powers. By the way, the Senate recommended that if the senior immigration officer should decide that a refugee was not eligible, the case should go to the Immigration and Refugee Board for a determination. That was a major recommendation. The government did not accept that.

The Senate said that the provision on the split on making a unanimous consideration on the board is wrong. It said that it should be reconsidered, that the split decision was unacceptable.

In any case, I want to ask the hon. member what he thought of the Senate report. Does he think that the government has really paid any attention to this report, despite the rhetoric of the minister in saying what a wonderful report it is?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, as well as for his very kind remarks.

I wish to say that I benefited greatly by his experience when we were on the committee together, he having been in Parliament twice as long as I and having had a great deal of experience that I have not had. We gave the best possible representation that I can imagine on behalf of the people who wrote to us, phoned us, telegraphed us and presented briefs as well as those who came and spoke to us.

I do consider with him that the Senate report was very encouraging. It did not propose amendments because that would not be in order at that time. It did propose recommendations. I hope to see all its recommendations reappear as amendments. The only technical point I would disagree on with the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce is that the government did not redefine terrorism at the Senate's request.

Instead, after its request the government withdrew its proposed definition of terrorism. I do not really know whether we are better or worse off. We have an undefined word there and what it is going to mean, who it is going to exclude I do not know.

Certainly, I did not like the definition that the government had there. It would have excluded far too many people, but we do not have a good definition yet. The government just backed away.

The other proposals that the member refers to are certainly very necessary, such as for a safe third country. The member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and I tried every way we could think of to get some recognition of the points that the Senate was making and got none at all.

Therefore, the minister is obviously speaking with his tongue in his cheek to put the best face on it possible when he says that the member and I were satisfied with the work of the committee. We were satisfied with the conduct of the committee. The conduct was fair and considerate but the decisions of the majority of the committee were very unfortunate.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to participate in this third reading debate on Bill C-86. Before I start I understand that due to the ministerial statement this morning, there is unanimous agreement to debate this bill through the lunch hour or at least into the lunch hour.

I am wondering if the Chair would find if there is such unanimity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend debate until two o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to assure you and other members as well as any Canadians who may be watching today that the committee stage to Bill C-86 worked very well.

We sat throughout the summer months when other members were presumably at the cottage or the lake and we heard some 110 witnesses, some 48 of which were groups. We reviewed 116 briefs and 186 letters.

The result of that was some 102 amendments. I agree that a number of those were technical but about 70 of those amendments really flowed from the evidence and from the skill and expertise of the members who sat on that committee.

We came together and debated each of those clauses, clause by clause, and the collective judgment of the committee was that some 122 amendments, of which 70 flowed out of the evidence, should be made.

If I were the member for Trinity—Spadina or Notre-Dame-de-Grâce or any of the government members, I would be immensely proud because it was not always that way that members of the opposition could substantially change the direction of a bill by carrying the judgment as a question of logic and common sense.

Second, as the chairperson of that committee, I want to thank the committee members because they did work hard. We heard some 61 hours of evidence versus an average of around 30. I note that the rules of the House for the most part are agreed to by all of the parties.

Canada's Parliament now really has about half of the legislative jurisdiction and yet we sit practically all year long. Contrast that with Britain and France and other unitary states where the Parliaments have to do all of the whole range of constitutional legislative authority. Bills like this in France and in Britain would very quickly go through a second reading stage; most parties agree to a two-hour debate in which the two or three parties present their views and then it goes off to a committee for an extended process. This committee worked very well.

I particularly want to state that the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the member for Trinity—Spadina, representing the two opposition parties, were both very fair minded in their questioning of witnesses. They brought out points that were unique and needed to be brought out and which often resulted in amendments. The government members—the member for La Prairie, the member for Red Deer, the member for Surrey—White Rock—worked very hard on this bill. We were led most ably by the parliamentary secretary, the member for St. John's East.

Committees cannot work unless you have a good parliamentary secretary with whom you can place calls to go back to the minister and fight with the minister and push the officials to get amendments through. The distinguished member for St. John's East did that on behalf of all of us and deserves plaudits which I am happy to share.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thacker: The parliamentary secretary can only operate if we have a minister who is prepared to accept the judgment of the parliamentary secretary and the officials and the Minister of Employment and Immigration did that very well. I can remember some years ago being a parliamentary secretary. If you have a minister who is a little bit nervous about the process and not confident in himself, then you cannot do very much in committee. If you have a confident minister who knows the bill and is confident with his officials, then you can get a lot done. That is what happened here.

The officials gave us very good reasons concerning many of the amendments that were put again in this House. They had been withdrawn at committee stage. The officials provided us with very good reasons why some things could not be done. It became a question of judgment and a question of what is right for the broad context of the nation as a whole.

I am confident that when the Chair reviews the record it will find that it has gone well.

With respect to the witnesses, they did a good job. We as members of Parliament know that most witnesses come in with a very narrow special interest group, really special pleaders. That is not to criticize them because we invite them in. Taxpayers pay their way in. As members of Parliament, we have to take a much broader view. We have to do what we think is right for Canada as a whole, given the international context and what would represent the national interest.

When you think about that you realize—and we all know this from the evidence that came before us in committee—that Canada is incredibly generous in terms of immigration and particularly refugees.

I think of those refugees in certain parts of the world who go into countries and do not get any permanent residency status or landed immigrant status with the view to becoming citizens and could spend the rest of their lives with no nationality. They cannot go home to the country where they are being persecuted, not an illusion of persecution but real persecution. In this country we give them a chance to become Canadians. The vast majority have gone on to become very successful Canadians. As Canadians we can be proud that we are one of the most generous countries in the world.

Another point I would like to make, and it is really ironic, is that some bright young student should do a master's degree or even a Ph.D. by going back and tracing the history of the immigration law of this country. In the immigration law in the earlier years, every change was opposed by groups. Often when further changes were brought in years later, those same groups came back and praised the original amendments that they had originally opposed and did not want any more changes.

That is exactly what has happened on this bill. We as members of Parliament have the duty to put that into proper context and to come up with our best judgment. I believe the committee did that, representing all three political parties in this House.

What is in the amended bill? First of all it retains our historic goals of which we can be immensely proud. Family reunification constitutes approximately 64 per cent of the 250,000 immigrants this country will accept this year.

I remind Canadians that in the last recession immigration dropped down to as low as 80,000. While members might criticize Conservative members of Parliament, I believe it is unjustified in this case because it is true that some Canadians have fears of people from other parts of the world but that is not unique to Canada but to the human condition as a result of our coming from nuclear families and the tribalism that affects us all.

The fact of the matter is that it would be a lot easier for the Conservative members of Parliament, the Conservative government and the Prime Minister to cut that back because of this mythology. It is a myth that immigrants and refugees take away jobs from Canadians. It is exactly the opposite.

If the argument were true that immigrants take jobs away and leave the country poor, Canada would be very poor because with the exception of one million aboriginal peoples in this country, we are all immigrants and the country has done very well; we are number one, as the United Nations points out, of all the countries in the world.

The Conservative members of Parliament and the Prime Minister deserve a lot of credit and plaudits for standing up to the mythology and saying we are in tough times because we are making this enormous adjustment from an industrial manufacturing infrastructure to a post-industrial information microchip service industry in which banking and commerce and all of those types of things are more important. That is an enormous adjustment for the people to have to make but it has to be made.

In spite of that we have the vision and the courage to keep the immigration and refugee level up because it is important for other parts of the world and because it is important for Canada. The underlying point I would like to make and which I believe passionately is that the world will not long permit 26 million people to occupy this vast, rich, bountiful country.

If we existed anywhere else in the world except next to the United States we would have long ago been taken over. If these 26 million people lived next to China or India or the other high population areas of the world, they would have swept in and took us over. They would not have been able to stop themselves. It is only because we are next to that mighty democracy to the south of us, and even it tried in 1812 and soon realized that Canadians were not going to put up with that. Nonetheless, we would not have been as successful against other people as we were against the Americans.

Refugee protection is another important arm of this bill and refugees constitute about 20 per cent of the 250,000 people who come in on average. The third component is economic growth. That is about 16 per cent.

Another way of looking at it is that for each 100 people who come in, only 16 are coming because of their skills. That has gone on for a number years and because we believe in family reunification, those people, that 16 per cent, are able to then sponsor their immediate families; sisters, siblings, parents and children.

They are also able to assist another group, a broader group than their families, which permits them to get into the extended family and the clan basis which is so important to other cultures around the world. Only 16 out of 100 come for their actual skills. The other 84 per cent come under family reunification and refugees.

I believe we should be proud of that but nonetheless there is a strong body of thought out there that Canada should be selecting a lot more rigorously for skills.

There has been some criticism and I do not believe it is well founded anymore because I believe we as a nation have to stop these bogus refugee claims. The reason is that they block real refugees.

• (1240)

There are some 10 million-plus genuine refugees in camps around the world today. Those are the people our constituents want to help. Instead, an enormous amount of time and an enormous amount of money are wasted in western worlds by a group of refugees who are really asylum shopping or genuine immigrants trying to get ahead of the line by posing as refugees.

That is not fair. I truly do not believe that it is right or fair that we as Canadians should be devoting so much time, money and effort. The Immigration Review Board spends a lot of its time on those types of claims. I really do not think it is a proper way for us to be spending our resources when genuine refugees are languishing by the millions and millions in camps around the world.

There is another reason the refugee process has to be changed a bit. It does protect and continue the Immigration Refugee Board. That process was opposed by many people in 1987. As I said earlier, many of those same groups are now back saying it is a good deal and do not change it any more; they love it. The fact of the matter is that it needed to be changed, it has been changed, and I think it has been changed in a way that is positive.

I would like to be a bit partisan because I am a member of Parliament and I belong to a political party that I believe deserves more credit than it is getting for many of the very tough decisions that the nation has had to take and which other nations around the world have had to take, even those led by social democratic parties and by liberal parties. The irony of course is that they are being equally criticized in their countries. Canadians need to see that and understand that in a broader context.

Last night was a bit of a fiasco, but I cannot be very critical of it. When we were in opposition we would sometimes get our knickers in a knot too. We would end up forcing the government to vote on all sorts of amendments. We would go into the late hours of the night and sometimes early into the morning.

Canadians need to know several facts about the opposition amendments. In some ways I was amazed at the lack of realism of some of the amendments. Some of the amendments they proposed would have prevented this minister and future ministers of immigration from ensuring that immigration continued to benefit Canada and would cost Canadian taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars.

If most Canadians realized that roughly $1 billion was spent on immigration, they would be angry with us and saying to us that we needed to look at it closely. They are hurting. They feel overtaxed in spite of the good services they are getting in this country. They would want us to look at it very closely.

The NDP proposed several amendments which I believe would seriously undermine the minister's ability to protect Canada and Canadians from terrorists and criminals. In its view, even if we have reasonable grounds to believe that someone is a terrorist or is a member of a criminal organization or has committed criminal acts, that person should be allowed into Canada. That means that if we have police reports or even affidavits from witnesses we would not be able to keep that person out. I just believe, as a question of judgment, that most Canadians would want the minister to have the power and would not want such a person to be here.

My colleagues opposite seem very concerned about the transportation companies. This government has indicated its concerns as well. But we have to recognize this bill does not seek to impose higher costs on transportation companies. Rather, it seeks to ensure that the transportation companies fulfil their responsibility for the people they bring to this country being properly documented. If carriers do so they will not bear any costs. It is only if they fail to check the people they bring here for passports, visas or whatever travel documents are appropriate, that they will be required to pay a fee.

Unfortunately the threat of penalty seems to be the only way we can ensure that they meet their responsibilities, particularly the international airlines. Our domestic airlines have worked very hard and well at making the system work. It has not been true with respect to some international carriers and this bill gives the minister the power to ensure that it happens.

I think the Liberal Party proposed that eligibility decisions for refugee claimants should be made by the Immigration and Refugee Board. I am convinced these decisions are straightforward and factual decisions which can effectively be made by a senior immigration officer.

Moreover, I am convinced that the Canadian taxpayer should not be burdened with the additional cost of up to $200 million over the next five years if we were to agree to have such decisions made by the board.

I could go on and on about it, but I would like to turn to my conclusions. No other nation has an immigration policy as open and generous as Canada. Our welcome reception of immigrants and refugees has given us the reputation as a caring, compassionate nation internationally. People come from many other countries to study Canada's immigration system, the department as well as the Immigration Review Board. They come to learn how we do it.

It is an expensive system and many other countries cannot afford it. I do not think we should be sitting here in our rich splendour, saying that every other country has to come up to our standards exactly and do things exactly the way we do, as long as they are meeting the principle.

As I said earlier we admit some 250,000 immigrants a year. That is up from 80,000 during the last recession. Politically it is certainly easier to reduce.

Canadians are concerned about immigration, about costs and lengthening delays. We must manage our immigration policy. We need a new set of tools and that is what this bill will provide.

In short, I believe that over all it is good public policy. I urge members of Parliament to vote in favour of it later this day.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, to me this legislation is unacceptable because it goes against certain fundamental democratic principles. I would appreciate if the hon. member would comment on some of the points that seem to deviate from these principles. For instance, the right to appeal a decision has been eliminated or substantially restricted.

Another example of what I see as a serious infringement of the rule of law is the use of the principle of guilt by association. I wonder whether the government realizes that under a provision of this kind, Nelson Mandela, whom the Prime Minister hugged repeatedly in front of the television cameras, would have trouble emigrating to Canada.

I would also like some comments on the economic aspects because I think the legislation is not very consistent when it denies work permits to people who claim refugee status, which practically forces them to live on welfare.

In other words, the government cuts off people's income and then has to spend more on social assistance. Whether it is federal, provincial or municipal, it is still taxpayers' money.

I would also like someone to explain why the retroactivity principle has been applied to immigration, which I feel is a contradiction of the most elementary principles of justice.

I would also like the hon. member to comment on the fact that immigration officers are given arbitrary powers which are actually judicial powers in disguise, especially since the claimant in most cases is not entitled to a lawyer or hearings are held without a lawyer being present, although that right would seem to be one of the basic principles of the law in this country.

I would appreciate the hon. member's comments on these points.

[English]

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I will try to take my colleague's points in order.

With respect to lack of appeal—and I am not sure if he said lack of appeal—there are proper appeal procedures in this bill. It is true there are not as many steps as could be taken under the old bill, but under the old bill there were cases wherein the legal system was abused. It led to people staying in the country for years and years. Those people did not get status and, as he said, were sitting around. Sometimes they were even on welfare waiting for all this to occur and years passed. Some of them had families back in their home countries.

• (1250)

It is an obligation of the country to have an appeal process and there is one on the proper questions of the law, for example. It has to be an orderly and quick process. That is what this bill will provide. If my friend looks at it carefully maybe he will change his mind.

Turning to guilt by association, that was largely a question of how to word some of the clauses so that a member who belongs to an association abroad, some members of which do bad things, could be blocked. Some members belong to associations where maybe a wing of the group is terrorists and the others are decent people trying to carry on.

We struggled with the wording. The member would have been more than welcome to come to the committee. I am not criticizing him for not being there because he does attend committee meetings. On this one we were struggling for words that would do the job. We had legal advisers and lawyers from the Department of Justice. Outside people had their views. We struggled as members.

Often a certificate is required from the Solicitor General as well as the minister before certain things can be done. Then there is an appeal mechanism through the courts as well. We think we have a mix that will work.

We can always draw examples of somebody working for Exxon Corporation who technically could be blocked, but in the day-to-day administration we know that will not occur. There has to be a certain degree of trust. Even under the existing act we could find wording that would give a minister or a bureaucrat who wanted to be abusive all the powers to do that. That gets back to the general way our society works, which is pretty fair-minded. We have those judges. If somebody gets too far out of line a judge will snap their suspenders and snap them hard.

With respect to refugees on welfare while the process is going through, I am absolutely satisfied the time will be reduced as a result of the screening mechanism and all other administrative changes. It should not take more than six months. The vast majority will be settled within six months. That is not too bad.

When we look at the other provisions of the bill, they say that once a person is admitted all the rest of his or her family can come in instantly. That is a great improvement to the existing situation. We did hear evidence as to how the existing law really did cause some genuine hardships. That will not happen.

With respect to the arbitrary powers, my colleague opposite is probably referring to section 46.01. This is the power of a senior immigration officer to do an administrative review when somebody shows up at the border to see if the person should be admitted. If there is any dispute at all the vast majority of them will go through to the Immigration and Refugee Board. However, I would ask my friend to read section 46.01 carefully. It gives that SIO power. I want to read it because it is not unreasonable:

> A person who claims to be a Convention refugee is not eligible to have the claim determined by the Refugee Division—

That means he is not eligible to have the claim go on to the IRB where two members will sit and there will be legal counsel and all that. It continues:

> —if the person
> (a) has been recognized as a Convention refugee by a country, other than Canada, that is a country to which the person can be returned;

That does not seem to be unreasonable. It deals with somebody coming from western Europe, the asylum shoppers. If they are already in the western world, the United States or western Europe, why should we spend time and money going through that process again? They are in the western world. Meanwhile there are millions of good refugees languishing around the world and we should be bringing them in.

It goes on:

(c) has, since last coming into Canada, been determined

(i) by the Refugee Division not to be a—refugee—

It is reasonable if the person who was here before and found not to be a refugee leaves and comes back and the SIO says: "No, no, your claim was looked at a few months ago. I am not going to let you in again". I do not see that as unreasonable. People should not be able to step out and start the whole process over again with all the legal costs to our taxpayers.

Here is another one:

(d) has been determined under this Act or the regulations, to be a Convention refugee;

If they had already been through it and found to be a convention refugee, why would they go through again? The CSIO can make that decision. These are largely decisions that will be administrative based on paper.

I should not take more time but I certainly could.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lethbridge is an eminent lawyer. Over the years I have known him to speak in favour of due process.

I cannot understand when somebody's rights are in jeopardy, as a refugee's are, why he thinks it is all right that he could be turned away by a senior immigration officer without any right of representation, any right to be heard and could be returned to a country where his life or his liberty would be in jeopardy.

I want to refer him to the Senate report. The Senate, which is chaired by a Conservative senator and which has a majority of Conservative members, said that it was opposed to that. It felt that where eligibility is concerned and the senior immigration officer would turn down a person on the basis of eligibility, that matter should be referred to the IRB, which was a unanimous report of the Senate on that point.

All the witnesses from the Canadian Bar Association, the Association of Immigration Lawyers, the Law Union of Ontario and the Association des avocats immigrants du Québec said that this is an area, the decision-making process before the CSIO, where there should be the right to be heard and the right of due process because serious rights were in jeopardy.

As an eminent lawyer, I do not see how the hon. member can justify otherwise.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, my support is predicated on the actual wording of 4601 which we had a lot of evidence on. We heard the lawyers who came in, and it is quite proper for lawyers to be arguing due process as we all should as members of Parliament and former lawyers. The officials, as I remember, came back and actually were able to show us how these were easily determined administrative decisions and that if there were any doubt about any of that, it would automatically flow through to the IRB.

That is the way it should be. I am saying to my friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that if that turns out not to be the case, I have absolutely no doubt lawyers will bring applications and they will find a way under law or under equity, as will the judges, to remedy it and declare that section somehow ultra vires of Parliament or they will find it to be a violation of the charter. They will find a way, but I do not think it is going to happen. I looked at it very carefully. I fretted about it but the officials carried my judgment when we got right into it word by word.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate.

Since the early eighties when I was the Minister of Employment and Immigration I felt that the way in which this country deals with those thousands of people victimized around the world is one of our most important responsibilities.

It used to be said that a country is determined by how it treats its least fortunate. In this world of interdependence I think we are as much judged by how we treat the least fortunate around the world.

In that case, I can only say that this bill we are debating in its final reading is a tale of tragedy. First, there is the tragedy of the people we are dealing with. The numbers of refugees who appear on our screens each night on the news are only a small sample of the enormous misfortune and suffering experienced by tens of thousands of men, women and children around the world.

There is a tendency in this country to think that somehow we are threatened by these movements of people.

• (1300)

We are very privileged because if you look at what is happening today in Germany, Croatia or Afghanistan, they are host countries that are accepting hundreds of thousands of refugees. The kind of drumbeat of fear and concern that is being raised by certain sources in this country is really one of illusion.

The other tragedy that this debate recommends is what we are doing about it. The bill in front of us represents a major change in the governing philosophy this country has used since the end of the Second World War to deal with these mass movements of people who have been victimized abroad.

It has been one of the important acts of stewardship of the Parliament of Canada to ensure that Canada has an open door policy and not a closed door policy. This bill almost caps what I have seen over the past several years as a major turning away from that philosophy.

It is a major shift in the attitude toward immigrants and refugees as if somehow we have turned them into a scapegoat, something to be feared and something to be cautioned against, as opposed to saying something that is part of our responsibility as a privileged nation to provide for open and active reception.

Just think for a moment that at the end of the Second World War Canada accepted hundreds of thousands of displaced persons who had been thrown up in the turbulence and turmoil of the Second World War. There were hundreds of thousands of Canadians, many of whose sons and daughters are sitting in the House of Commons today because they got that chance.

Think for a moment what happened during the time of the major revolt in Czechoslovakia and in Hungary in the mid-1950s when again Canada opened its doors to tens of thousands of Hungarians, Czechs and Poles who were escaping communist tyranny. We are not talking about small hundreds, we are talking about tens of thousands.

Think of what happened when Idi Amin took over Uganda and expelled the East Indians who had been part of that country for generations. Again, this country was a leader in accepting tens of thousands of people who had been ethnically cleansed from Uganda at the time.

Think of the record that was jointly shared by both the previous Clark government and the Trudeau government, accepting over 200,000 refugees from Indo-China. There were 200,000 in contrast with what happened in this House of Commons when 26 refugees arrived on the shore of Nova Scotia.

We were called back into emergency session of Parliament because it was portrayed by the then minister of immigration as being a national emergency that somehow Canada was going to be invaded by this great hoard. If that was not a clear signal of the changes that we are now beginning to see the final fruits of in this bill, I do not know what was.

It was a clear sense that all of a sudden the government had broken with that continuity of policy. It had begun to take a totally different attitude. It had begun to go back to the days that Irving Abella wrote about in the 1930s in her book None is too Many when the philosophy of the Canadian government was how many to keep out and not how many to bring in.

It was an exclusionary policy based upon sheer discrimination. Sadly, Bill C-86 only brings to a final stage that kind of Draconian, discriminatory closed door attitude that has since become the new hallmark of Canadian immigration refugee policy. It is so ironic and sad in a way to hear the Minister of Employment and Immigration and other members on the other side of the House talk with some pride about the honours that have been given to Canada for our work dealing with refugees, taking a lead.

It is as if somehow this justified what they are doing now without recognizing that the bill that we are now debating contradicts and rejects the very fundamental premises upon which Canada acquired that sense of reputation and distinction. It is turning its back on those previous positions and policies and philosophies that were taken by both Liberal and Conservative governments over the past 45 years.

When the record of this government is written, which will be done in the next six or seven weeks, when the historians finally get a chance to sift through the sand and find out what it did, this will be one of the blackest marks on the record of this government. It is basically saying that rather than responding in an open, generous and progressive way to the incredible problems of displaced persons and refugees, of victims of tyranny and economic deprivation, it is withdrawing inside the fortress.

I admit we are not alone. There is no question that is the dominant response by the various neo-conservative governments in the western world, and we are seeing it. Look what happened in Britain a week ago. It refused to take people who had been kicked out of their country in Bosnia. Is our record any better?

I recall with great force the announcements of the minister last summer about accepting 25,000 families from the horrible situation in former Yugoslavia; great fanfare, great announcement, great public photo opportunities, but if you look at the record today, about 150 to 200 families have been accepted. It is disgraceful, absolutely disgraceful.

We see what is happening in Somalia with the incredible human suffering and when representation and pressure were made to see if Canada could bring out particularly orphaned children and others, the response of the Minister of Employment and Immigration was to the effect that they really would not fit into Canada.

Never mind the big cases that hit the newspapers, look what has happened. You can go to any office of any constituency of any member of Parliament in this country and they can tell you what is going on in the Department of Employment and Immigration in terms of exercising some judgment based upon compassion or humanitarianism, looking at it case by case to see if there is some kind of judgment call that could be made as the responsibility of the minister.

I recall when I was in that post, Friday nights when I left Ottawa to go back to Winnipeg with two briefcases full of cases to look at, it was the most awesome and heavy responsibility I have ever had in my life because I was making literally judgments about life and death for so many people.

The reason the minister was given discretion in the Immigration Act of 1977 was that some human judgment based upon a sense of fairness or equity or compassion could be exercised. That has ceased to exist. There is no judgment being made, it has been turned into an assembly line. The assembly line is reject, reject, reject. There is no compassion being exercised, there is no sense of justice being used.

The standard formula now is "no point going to the minister's office, it does not care. We know that we will simply get the black dot, the rejection slip".

Look what it is doing. The latest announcement is it is going to set up new immigration processing centres in Vegreville. Vegreville is a great place to have it but are we turning our immigration refugee procedure into an assembly line in which you run the paper through as if it were some kind of mass-produced washing machine? We are talking about human beings here, we are talking about people's lives—people who need the kind of interface with an immigration officer; talking to families, listening to their cases, having officials know there is a philosophy to judge as to whether that case deserves some sort of fair treatment.

• (1310)

Now we are turning it into a paragon of efficiency. Even at that, the government is downsizing the department by 25 per cent. Increasingly there will be less and less human contact and the long lines of refugees sitting in the camps in eastern Europe, Africa, Asia and Latin America will never see anybody again. The long lines of people trying to reunite with their families from the Philippines or India will never get to have their applications even considered by the human eye.

Then we get Bill C-86 on which my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce waged a wonderful rearguard action trying to hold back this juggernaut that is moving against us. The government attempts to justify it as a way of getting better control. It is fooling people but it is not telling the truth.

The so-called third safe country principle? If someone has come from a country that Canada considers a proper country of good bona fide credentials then they automatically get rejected at the border under this legislation.

How do we explain that for long periods of time the United States of America under the Reagan and Bush administrations rejected close to 85 per cent or 90 per cent of all refugee applicants from Central America, especially during the turmoils in Nicaragua, El Salvador and now in Guatemala. For ideological reasons the Government of the United States would not accept that someone fleeing terrorism or the death squad in Central America was a bona fide refugee because the government of America was supporting those regimes.

Under this legislation we have to send them back to the United States, which means they go back into the cauldron. They go back where their lives and their families are threatened and endangered.

How can we say that is a criteria that must be honoured not as an exception but as the standard rule with no right of appeal? Look at the story that came out last week. It was I think again a sign of the times. Dr. Sam Ifejika, a member of the refugee board, resigned because he said: "I have been asked to explain my positive decisions a number of times but I have never been asked to explain my negative decisions. The direction of the refugee board is against the letter and spirit of the United Nations convention on refugees and Ottawa's proposed new immigration law would foster this inhuman policy".

This is their own appointment. This is a member of their own board who resigned because he said in effect the whole weight of government policy is: How do you close the door and keep people out?

It really surprises me because this has not been the tradition of the Conservative Party. I recall very well when I became the successor to the minister of immigration, Mr. Atkey, when he said one of the responsibilities of a minister of immigration is to make sure not to open up the Pandora's box of fear and intimidation about refugees and immigration. Yet that has been the underlying philosophy with this government since the day it came in.

It has broken that continuity and it has turned its back on traditions that have been established successively through the St. Laurent, Pearson, Diefenbaker, Trudeau and Clark governments and I am not sure why. I guess we could all speculate as to what would be the reasons for this shift, this major transformation.

I can tell hon. members and I think all my colleagues who are in the House with me would agree that it will not last very long. When there is an election and the people of this country change the government, what is now Bill C-86 will be the law for only a short period of time. This is not the way we would deal with immigrants and refugees around the world. We cannot accept that Canada should so clearly turn its face against its responsibilities. Let us not quibble about that. All those bureaucrats and people who are getting the engine running and putting the pieces together had better make it temporary because it is not going to last that long. There will be a change back to the far more humane and responsible Liberal notion of what to do.

This government may have some short-term satisfaction that it has shown the Reform Party it can be tougher on immigrants than the Reform Party can be, but it is a false victory that will not last any longer than this government will last.

While I have the opportunity, let me just say that another part of the picture is missing. The amendments proposed by my colleague were very important. He said that one of the things which has to be done about the whole area of immigration and refugee policy is to make it more democratic and more accountable. Appointments to the board should be approved by Parliament. Regulations tabled must be put in a way that they can be not only examined but also rejected by parliamentary vote. There must be a far more open system of examination so that it is transparent and visible.

We have also put forward that if there is going to be a proper refugee immigration policy there must also be deep concern for what happens after people arrive here. What are the present figures? I think over half of those who come into this country do not receive proper education in French or English. It is no wonder they become a problem when they are not even given one of the basic tools to survive, which is one of the languages of the land. The Government of Canada continues to shrink the second language programs in this country.

I will not have time to fully get into this and it may be a debate for another time, but there must also be an international response. We cannot pretend that we can solve these problems simply by ourselves. If Canada surely wanted to show leadership in this world, this is an area that we could take on as our own to try to bring the countries of a developed, industrial world, which have wealth and advantage and privilege, to ask: How do we deal with the vast amounts of human suffering? How do we make sure people will not be freezing in the cold of Bosnia this winter, or dying of starvation in Somalia, or being left to neglect in Afghanistan for tens of years, or being left hanging around the camps in the Middle East as they have been for the last 40 or 50 years?

Surely this area has been neglected by all the countries, but because of our tradition and reputation we can provide an important contribution to the world by drawing attention at the G–7 and at the United Nations population conferences for a brand new definition of what is a refugee and how the world comes to grips with an enormous and gargantuan, but singularly human, problem.

I say that we cannot take on that kind of leadership ourselves until we undo this kind of legislation which sets Canada back 75 years.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I have been carefully listening to my colleague opposite make the same statements I have been hearing for the last eight years to the effect that the Conservative government has done nothing good during that period.

I heard him say a moment ago that since we have been in power, in the sole area of immigration all they have heard is no, no, no. I would like to ask him if he remembers—since he was a member of the government before 1984—what were the immigration quotas set by his government compared to the ones our government set in 1992, just to see if he is right in claiming that all we can say is no, no, no and no.

• (1320)

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I said that this Conservative government turned down refugees, not immigrants. There is a difference.

Under the Trudeau government, we adopted a new approach toward refugees. We enlarged the meaning of the term refugee. We established several special programs for refugees from Central America, for example, and from Africa and Cambodia too. We also set up a meeting of several host countries in order to develop a common program.

Our principle regarding refugees was to view each case on its own merits, be it on compassionate, fair or other humanitarian grounds. We cannot fail to notice that it is no longer the case these days with a minister who turns down just about every appeal. That is what I told the hon. member and he knows the situation well.

At the same time, we are in the midst of a recession. We therefore approached unions, management and NGOs in order to establish acceptable immigration levels. A decision should be arrived at in consultation with all these stakeholders.

Mr. Jourdenais: Mr. Speaker, my colleague just mentioned that it is indeed refugees that our minister is turning down. Is it really humane to let these people wait for six or seven years before telling them if they qualify as refugees? That was the case when I came along in 1984. There were six or seven appeals. People had to wait for six or seven years without knowing whether or not they qualified as refugees and if they were going to be accepted or rejected. At the very last minute, after six or seven years, they were told: "Sorry you are not a refugee, the system does not allow it. You are not included, you are not in the right category". In 1987 we changed the system in order to make the waiting period much shorter and with the new scheme, it will only be six months to a year maximum. Does he not think that what we are offering now is by far superior to what the Liberals had in 1984 and before that?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I remember the time when the hon. member chaired the House sub–committee on immigration. He made several recommendations which were rejected by the government. I quite agree with him, we need an efficient process but at the same time it is extremely important for that process to be fair and equitable. Members made some substantial recommendations but, unfortunately, their own government rejected them.

We would have had a much better system if it had accepted the recommendations made by these members and by the committee. Unfortunately, because of this government's negative philosophy, it will not be possible.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to you that my colleague from Red Deer and I would like to share the allotted time. I will use about 10 minutes and he will take the rest.

I would like to outline how Bill C–86 will lead to improvements in the management of immigration. Bill C–86 is above all about management. Management requires research, analysis and a systematic step–by–step approach. However, management in the 1990s requires much more than that.

Legislators today must have the courage to experiment and adapt creatively to the environment. As Gordon Fairweather, the retiring chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board, said: "The international migration of people is one of the great social issues of this decade".

[English]

While immigration may not be at the front of everyone's mind, it is certainly at the back. Polls show that more than half of Canadians believe the country needs immigrants and that we are not accepting too many. Of Canadians, 72 per cent agree that immigrants contribute to Canada's economy and almost 70 per cent believe they add to Canadian culture.

[Translation]

This is not a time for a tougher, closed-door approach to immigration. We are a welcoming people, but please do not take us for granted.

Canadians want good management and they want us to make it easier for families already here to reunite. They want us to block people trying to sneak in illegally and they want us to give preference to immigrants with marketable skills. They want these skilled people settled in areas where those skills are most needed.

Good management is based on values. Although we need skilled immigrants, we have tried not to sacrifice humanitarian values to economic expedience.

The amendments in Bill C-86 will ensure that Canada remains what it is, a very welcoming country. The three pillars of our immigration policy adopted in 1976 have not been touched. Family reunification, protection to refugees and migration for economic growth are still there.

[English]

The new bill proposes to eliminate the first level of the refugee determination system by having a fully trained senior immigration officer at the port of entry make key decisions. In certain instances the senior immigration officer will be able, on the basis of facts, to exclude the person from the refugee determination process. I say on the basis of facts because the officer is not called upon to exercise judgment or make a subjective assessment. Overpowering your staff is not good management. What the senior officer must do is direct every refugee claimant to the refugee determination process. That is the rule, except in five instances where objective facts show that the person should not access the system.

[Translation]

For example, if the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Solicitor General issue a certificate saying a person is not admissible because he or she is a criminal, then the senior immigration officer has no judgement to make. All he or she says is: "I'm sorry, you cannot access the determination process, you're excluded".

Another way to manage the flow of refugees is to keep accurate records of every newcomer. Many refugees have no identification while others have ID they admit is fraudulent.

[English]

With claimants like these, their fingerprints and faces are their only identification. The only way to record their entry into Canada is to fingerprint and photograph them. That is what we mean by adapting creatively to the environment. This is what Canada is. Canada's Auditor General recommended that measure to prevent multiple claims and abuse of provincial and municipal welfare programs.

• (1330)

[Translation]

If someone comes here as an immigrant, we must investigate him. If they just show up with no identification, we have no idea who they are and we are entitled to find out.

When a refugee becomes a Canadian citizen, there is no need to keep his fingerprints. The major amendments to the act are as follows:

First, our officials will be better able to manage our intake of immigrants according to the goals agreed to by provincial governments, the private sector and non-governmental groups across the country.

Second, better control of abuse by detecting people who try to skirt the rules, by preventing terrorists or criminals from entering the country and by removing those who have no right to remain here.

Third, better management of the refugee claimant system by making it more cost-effective, fair and humane.

[English]

Fourth, we will better manage the needs of provinces and regions by selecting skilled immigrants and bringing them here quickly.

Fifth, we will better administer the program by improving the quality of service, lessening paperwork, speeding up decision making and cutting costs.

We need effective tools for managing the numbers and selecting people who best meet Canada's needs. The current act is deficient in this regard.

That is why Bill C-86 proposes selecting more skilled immigrants, business people and investors to contribute to regional development and help seed our future prosperity.

[Translation]

What we need is a better balance. This is the reasoning behind the proposed streaming of immigrants. These amendments will better enable us to select people who contribute to the labour market. Good management must show measurable benefits.

This shift toward economic migration will not be dramatic. To ensure that the numbers and types of immigrants we let in reflect the plan, the make-up of each stream will also be determined in consultation with the provinces and other interested groups.

[English]

Here are some proposed streams. Stream one people will be processed on demand, with no limit to how many are landed each year. Family identification is still central to our policy. However, we have enlarged the family class definition so we have to make distinctions. Families—the father, mother and children, including adopted children—will get priority. The children are not subject to any quota or level. Hence someone already living in Canada can sponsor a spouse, fiance and dependent children including adopted children. Stream one also includes convention refugees who need protection and immigrant investors.

Applicants in stream two are also on a first come, first served basis but they are subject to limits set out in the plan. People in stream two could include parents and grandparents of people already here and refugees who are government assisted or privately sponsored. It also includes those let in under special programs.

Stream three people are skilled immigrants and entrepreneurs who meet our economic needs. Once our targets are met no others would be accepted so no backlog would occur.

In addition to these three main streams, investors and skilled immigrants will be selected for different regions across Canada according to their needs.

The amendments propose that we select skilled immigrants who are willing to go to areas where those skills are needed. That is, we will impose a condition on their visa that they work in such areas.

Today we impose the same conditions on temporary workers, except temporary workers have no landing rights whatsoever. Now we plan to tell skilled immigrants not only that we will impose a condition on their visa, but we will land them and allow them to become citizens.

[Translation]

If I had to characterize this bill in a few words, I would use the words common sense, for that is what this package is all about. Our legislative framework needs updating for the times. We must start doing things that make sense, that will help us meet the challenges we face today.

Bill C-86 makes sense because it lets people do their jobs. It makes sense because it means faster processing, according to clearly understood rules, applied consistently.

Personally, I believe that immigration has made a great contribution to Canada and the world. This legislation will ensure that it remains an asset throughout the 1990s and into the future.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very concise survey of the advantages he sees in the bill.

I would like to ask him at least one question concerning a matter that I am sure he heard raised by quite a few witnesses about what happens, as it does happen, when the refugee division of the Immigration and Refugee Board makes a mistake, misunderstands the evidence.

There are cases on record to show where they misunderstand the evidence and declare a person not to be a refugee in spite of evidence which indicates the other or the case where evidence comes in later. Perhaps the refugee has not yet left the country but evidence arrives that just was not available at the time he or she was here. Or, there is the case where the country's circumstances have changed for the worst so that if the board decided while it was looking at the case that it was safe to return there could be changes both ways.

Sometimes when a refugee leaves the country it is very unsafe because of the government in power which has threatened to persecute him or has persecuted him. Then there is a change. This happened in Eritrea. Then the Canadian government can pass the information on to the board saying that the government has changed and it is now safe to send people home. However, in Eritrea it was found that the new government was just as hostile to some of the political groups as the old government had been.

How do we get that taken into account? We were told by the government all that would be looked after under humanitarian and compassionate consideration. That is not satisfactory to many people who have been directly concerned with refugees because humanitarian, compassionate consideration is supposed to be for reasons other than refugee status.

I do not know how many times the present minister has risen in this House in response to a question from the opposition asking whether he would use his humanitarian, compassionate powers on behalf of a certain rejected refugee claimant. What he says is: "We have a good refugee system. He has been found not to be a refugee and I am not going to interfere". In other words, his humanitarian, compassionate grounds have nothing to do with refugee status. To say that there cannot be an appeal—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Time is running out. If the hon. member wants an answer, it is time to end his comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Jourdenais: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite has just made another great speech on immigration, as usual. His question is three or four fold, but I will try to be as concise as possible.

His question is: what happens when the refugee division of the Immigration and Refugee Board makes a mistake? When making a decision on the basis of the five criteria, the senior immigration officer will have to take into account any change that may have occurred in the country of origin of the refugee claimant.

What the board does presently is to examine each case, determine whether the individual is a refugee or not and, at the request of the minister, review claims that were turned down. We have seen decisions overturned and claimants be granted refugee status following a review.

What if the people left the country after the decision was made? The officer's decision to turn down a claim is based solely on facts, on criteria. It will have the same effect.

I agree with the member opposite because we have been working on the same committee for eight years and I understand his position. There have been instances where there were problems, but—what can I say—nobody is perfect. This is the second time in eight years that we change this legislation.

• (1340)

I chaired the committee in 1987, as some members pointed out, and I worked very hard to have the legislation changed. I had suggested several changes at the time, eight of which were actually incorporated in the legislation, and I will keep on working to have yet more deficiencies corrected in the future.

[English]

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): I appreciate my colleague's sharing his time with me because there are a number of members who want to speak on this bill. I want to commend all members of this House for their interest and participation in this debate.

This is extremely important legislation and we all agree, all of us who sat on the legislative committee and all members of this House, that this country has been enriched by immigration. If we look around our House, with very few exceptions we are all either immigrants or descended from immigrants.

The purpose of this bill is to enable the government to better manage immigration. The idea is to make it easier for legitimate refugees to qualify, to make it faster and more efficient for immigrants to be approved and to also screen out those who abuse our hospitality.

Prior to 1989 the refugee determination system was not as efficient as we would perhaps have liked it to be. That, combined with the increasing number of people who were seeking protection from persecution in their own homelands, resulted in the inevitable long delays. The system, as we know, became bogged down. Rather than give up in despair, the government established the Immigration and Refugee Board and now our refugee status determination system is finally under control. We need to ensure that our refugee program stays that way.

We want to ensure that every legitimate refugee receives a fair hearing. However, there will always be a few who will try to take advantage of our good will. My constituents told me in a survey this summer in no uncertain terms that they do not want an open door for criminals, they do not want those coming in who would abuse their hospitality.

This nation and all Canadians are generous to those in distress, but we do not appreciate being taken advantage of. Our current system for determining refugee status is a considerable improvement over the previous one but it still needs to be more efficient. The vast majority of cases are now processed within six to twelve months but every one of us from our experience in our offices knows of examples that have taken longer than that.

The government's very reasonable goal is to process all claims within six months. Not only do these delays impose additional hardships on people who are accepted as refugees, but they encourage some who will not qualify as refugees to use the process just to stay in Canada. The problem is not with the refugees who are sponsored by the federal government or sponsored by private organizations such as church groups. In these cases the determination and selection process happens abroad and the reception and settlement process for these individuals is planned. The problem can be with people who show up on our doorstep, usually at an airport, and ask for refugee status.

Last year there were approximately 30,000 people claiming refugee status this way; 30,000 potential refugees is not an insignificant number. There are provisions in Bill C-86 to deal with this situation. One provision is to work with the airlines that would bring the would-be refugees to Canada. Air carriers must be held responsible for passengers who have inadequate or improper documentation. In the past four years that number has been about 23,000, or nearly one-quarter of the persons who presented themselves at Canadian airports.

Another consideration is that there are clearly situations in which the person does not need the protection of Canada. These people should be denied access to the determination system. Processing a refugee claim can run anywhere up to $50,000 and Canadian taxpayers should not have to foot the bill for individuals who are simply trying to take advantage of our good nature.

Another consideration is that we are working with a number of national governments to try to stem the practice of people claiming refugee status in several countries, refugee shopping if you will. There is an agreement among some European countries that the first country the claimant enters takes responsibility for processing the claim. It sounds like a good system.

Misunderstanding has arisen on the proposal to give senior immigration officers, or SIOs, increased responsibility in determining whether a person deserves access to our determination system. This is not to be a judgment call on the part of the immigration officer. The criteria for making these decisions are clearly spelled out. The senior immigration officer will receive special training to make these decisions. The SIO will simply look at the five exceptions that would deny access to the individual. If none of these exceptions applies the person would automatically have access to the Immigration and Refugee Board.

The intent of Bill C-86 is to streamline the system. We want decisions to be made faster. Everyone wants them to be completely fair.

Experience has taught us that the current two-stage procedure with a preliminary hearing and a more detailed assessment is not the best way to handle this process. The reason is that over 95 per cent of claimants move on to the second stage. Let us eliminate the first stage which we know is costly but not always effective.

We can cut three to six months off the length of time it takes to make a final determination. We can save Canadians tax dollars and work permits can be issued as soon as a claimant has been accepted.

A moment ago I mentioned the problem of claimants arriving without documentation. We also get claimants from democratic countries such as the United States. Confusing as it may seem, some claimants while their claim is pending return to the country where they say they are being persecuted. In these specific cases, we are proposing that both members of the Immigration and Refugee Board who are hearing a claim would have to agree on the person's right to refugee status, not just one member as is the case now.

I hasten to add that in other cases as long as one of the two board members accepts the person's claim, that will be sufficient for refugee status.

I am sure that hon. members will agree that once a person has been accepted as a refugee, we should help that person become a productive member of Canadian society as quickly as possible. Right now there are delays for as long as two years before some people are landed.

Bill C–86 will help us speed up the process of granting permanent residence. These people will be able to include family members in their applications. I know hon. members will agree that people are much happier and more productive when they are together as a family.

I know that hon. members agree that we must protect those who genuinely need our protection. On the other hand, Canadians' tolerance and compassion are stretched to the limit when individuals who do not qualify for refugee status remain here, taking advantage of our generous system.

Bill C–86 will correct this anomaly. The backlog before the Federal Court is so enormous that it could take several years before a decision is reached on a claimant's appeal to stay in Canada. Bill C–86 does not take away anyone's right to appeal but we can speed up the process by having the review conducted by one judge rather than three and having it reviewed in the trial division of the Federal Court. We have limited resources and they should be used to help people who are genuine refugees and in need of our help.

We have all heard the horror stories of criminals who get into Canada claiming to be refugees. This is not a situation that Canadians tolerate. Crime is on the rise in our society and we certainly do not need to import any more of it. Individuals convicted of crimes can already be refused admission into Canada, but what about persons whom we know have been involved in criminal activity but who have not been convicted? Bill C–86 will help us keep these undesirable people out of Canada.

Immigration and refugee determination has always been and will always be a contentious issue and I along with any member of this government will welcome any constructive suggestion on how to deal with this sensitive issue. Let us all remember that Canada has the most generous and open refugee system in the world. We should be compassionate toward people who deserve compassion, but we should act decisively with those who abuse our generosity.

Our immigration and refugee system must continue to earn the respect and confidence of Canadians. It has been and will continue to be an important program for contributing to national unity and prosperity and the measures that we are proposing in Bill C–86 will help to curtail abuse of the system and defend its integrity. I would urge all hon. members to support this extremely important legislation.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C–86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof. Before I get into some of the specific concerns I have about the bill, I would like to say that when you are a member in an urban riding, as I am from downtown Toronto, Canadians should understand that about 75 per cent of the work that we do in our offices is related to immigration. There is not a day that passes without us opening another eight or ten new files on immigration.

This was actually one of the things that shocked me when I was first elected in 1988 because I had always believed that with any immigration difficulties we had a rather large department of immigration coast to coast with the required number of man-years that could basically look after any of these complex problems, whether they are refugees, people claiming refugee status in Canada or Canadians trying to land family members from other parts of the world.

We soon discovered that the reason people came to members of Parliament rather than deal exclusively with the immigration department was that the basic system, the basic machinery, in that department was not really working well.

I do not need to take a political shot here at the government in the sense that when we were in power that our immigration system was perfect and since the Conservatives took over it got a lot worse. This has always been a very difficult department to manage and operate.

The challenge for us is to constantly work at reviewing this legislation and amending it so that it can deal with the complex issues that face us on an ongoing basis. These issues do change, sometimes because of situations that we cannot foresee or crises around the world where all of a sudden we will have large numbers of people who want to claim refugee status in Canada and sometimes the system no matter how well we try to design an act it is just not good enough.

One of the frustrations that we have on this side of the House during this particular debate is the fact that my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has presented many constructive amendments that were drafted not just by the member alone but were put together and organized by him after listening to many experts from across the country. These experts work on this issue day in and day out, some as professionals and people who have been actual victims of our system, and so our colleague, the hon. member from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce presented all of these amendments to this House and the government basically rejected all of these amendments. I find that approach to such a complex issue a little arrogant. We are not trying to settle political scores on this side of the House while we are trying to put forward a constructive amendment to a very complex bill.

If we reviewed the witnesses and reviewed the experience of my colleague for many years, it seems to me in the spirit of trying to design and create better legislation, it would have served the government to be a bit more receptive to some of these amendments which ultimately would have served all of us a lot better.

This is important because this type of attitude, this rigidity toward the Immigration Act, eventually is transmitted through the entire department and it becomes part of the spirit of the people that are delivering and implementing the act.

I know in my own specific riding I have had such cases. I cite the Dularie Boodlall case. This women was a victim of violence in Trinidad. She came to my office because she had a deportation notice. She had explained to the officials that her life had been threatened, she had been beaten several times, here is the documentation. The police had documented this information. The officials wanted to deport her back to an environment where her husband was living, where she had received threats to her life. The system, the department, rejected her appeal.

She came to my office several times. I know she also went to the member for Trinity—Spadina and I believe she went to the member for Parkdale—High Park. The various organizations in the city appealed to us and it was only after very forceful representations in this House that the minister reversed his decision and we were able on humanitarian and compassionate grounds to get that specific case reversed.

My point is that we are constantly being presented with cases in our offices. We are constantly receiving representations from churches and other credible organizations where people are pleading for help and quite often even with all of the resources that we have we sometimes cannot get the minister's office to reverse its position.

What concerns me about this legislation is the fact that we, as MPs, will have even less opportunity to take on those very sensitive cases because in this legislation we are delegating so much authority to public servants. Therefore the political culture, those of us who are dealing directly with the people that elect us, will have less to do in our relationship with them. I think this is a basic flaw in the legislation.

It is very important that we put the government on notice that this aspect of the legislation is very weak. It may appeal to an element in our country that tends to be very right wing in their attitude about the way we process and handle refugees and deportations. Taking the humanitarian tone out of the system is wrong.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

AUDITOR GENERAL OF CANADA

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table the report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1992.

[Translation]

I remind hon. members that, under Standing Order 108(3)(e), this report is deemed to have been permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the recent report by the National Transportation Agency confirms that Canada lacks a policy on national transportation.

Some two years ago this Conservative government cancelled passenger rail service from Sudbury to Winnipeg. Communities like Marathon, Terrace Bay, Schreiber, Nipigon, Red Rock, Dryden, Kenora and Thunder Bay must rely on highways, which in the north are not great, or expensive airline tickets.

This government has in essence denied passenger rail service to over 350,000 people from northern Ontario. This Draconian measure deals specifically with people. Let me give an example.

Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Kokanie of Thunder Bay, whose son died in The Pas, Manitoba, were unfortunately not able to travel by air or by car since Mr. Kokanie could no longer drive. Unfortunately, because of their disabilities they could not take any means of available transportation and because the train was not travelling, they could not attend their son's funeral.

This is not an isolated situation for those 350,000 residents. We call upon this government to immediately restore passenger rail service to the 350,000 people from northern Ontario.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, as part of the Canada 125 celebrations, on November 18 six businesses in my riding received awards from the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency recognizing their endurance for over 125 years.

These businesses fall into the category of small business in the area where 80 per cent of jobs in Canada are generated. In fact, 99 per cent of Canadian companies have less than 100 employees.

These six businesses that were established over 125 years ago are Bentley's Ltd., The Snook Group, Wilson Fuels, Pugsley's Pharmacy, Dominion Bridge Atlantic, and Tingley Monuments Ltd. They have all proven their ability to survive through recessions, two world wars, and all of the challenges businesses must face by continually demanding excellence in every aspect of their operation. One business, Pugsley's Pharmacy, was once operated by Sir Charles Tupper, former Prime Minister of Canada.

As a small business person myself, I take my hat off to each and every one and wish each of them another 125 years of success.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in Canada if journalists are critical of the government, they can find themselves in the doghouse. In Mexico if journalists are critical of the government, they can find themselves in the cemetery.

The Canadian Centre of International PEN, a writers' group, sent a letter recently to our Minister of Justice expressing shock at the recent murder of another prominent Mexican journalist, Ignacio Mendoza Castillo, on November 13 in Mexico City. I say another because 20 reporters have lost their lives during the first half of President Salinas' term.

PEN has called for Canada, the United States and Mexico to make human rights and freedom of speech a non-negotiable item of the North American free trade agreement negotiations. I quote from their letter: "It is imperative that the Canadian government communicate its concerns to the Mexican government over this brutal murder and the continuing threat to other journalists and writers working in Mexico. We also call upon the Canadian government to reconsider its position and to take the initiative in calling for improvements in human rights and freedom of expression in Mexico before NAFTA is legislated into law".

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, following a complaint by a merchant in Val d'Or, 14 male letter carriers and one female letter carrier were each suspended five days without pay for delivering flyers too soon.

Normally, a merchant expects quick delivery so that potential customers are aware of a sale as soon as possible.

This was the exception that proves the rule. The customer complained about the negative impact on his sale: 1,500 of his 12,000 flyers were delivered three hours before closing time in Val d'Or on November 16.

Since in other cases management tolerates and even approves early delivery of flyers, there was no need to punish employees who thought they were doing a good job.

The outrageous part of this story is that Canada Post is not imposing the suspension today—I have a copy here—but at the end of April 1993.

Canada Post abuses a system that has become far too authoritarian and I think a suspension is too drastic. A reprimand in writing in the employee's file would have been enough.

Canada Post shows a complete lack of understanding and respect for its employees and as far as I am concerned, the human relations branch of Canada Post in Quebec City and Ottawa deserves no respect either for the time being.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago, the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence decided to purchase three Airbus aircraft plus spare parts from Canadian International for $195 million.

The purpose of this decision was to save Canadian International. Unfortunately, Canadian International survived for only a few months. Today, the Minister of Transport is giving Canadian International a few months reprieve with $50 million. How many hundreds of millions of dollars are we going to spend to help Canadian International survive a few more months?

M6 LANDFILL SITE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the IWA announced the M6 landfill site in Markham was one of three sites on the short list of dumping grounds for ultimately 40 million tonnes of metropolitan Toronto's garbage.

Today, I want to strongly object to the M6 site because it would violate Transport Canada's bird hazard guidelines which state that a dumpsite should not be within eight kilometres of an airport.

The Markham—Stouffville hospital heliport is located only 3,000 metres from the M6 site. This is a 24-hour emergency service. The M6 site is only 2.5 kilometres from the edge of the proposed Pickering airport boundary. Garbage dumps attract thousands of sea-gulls and other birds which threaten air safety. Why does the NDP government want to risk people's lives by ignoring Transport Canada's guidelines?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday in Charlottetown, P.E.I., a federal tax court judge stated that he had no jurisdiction to rule on arm's length cases brought before him under Revenue Canada appeals and UI insurability.

This ruling has national implications and all such appeals are now suspended until the problem is resolved.

This leaves citizens who have been denied UIC benefits under section 32(c) of the UI Act and section 25(1) of the Revenue Canada Act which deals with the term arm's length with another extended wait before decisions are made in their cases. They have already waited a year.

In addition, the appellants in the case will also have to fund these legal arguments out of their own pocket. It is difficult to believe that a judge refused to rule on the interpretation of federal legislation, but it is more difficult to believe citizens who have been refused UIC benefits have to pay for the lawyers and judges who argue the case.

I urge the Minister of National Revenue to give an order to have this impasse resolved immediately and to lift the burden of paying for the resolution of the impasse off the shoulders of disqualified UI claimants by providing funds to have these cases argued and resolved.

WHITE RIBBON AGAINST PORNOGRAPHY WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as all members of the House will know, October 25 to November 1 was the annual White Ribbon against Pornography Week.

In my riding of Sarnia—Lambton, I was presented with 275 white ribbons from a delegation of the Catholic Women's League from St. Peter's Church.

Members of St. Peter's Church wore these ribbons to show their support for this important cause. Recently, the Supreme Court unanimously upheld the anti-obscenity provisions of the Criminal Code as they apply to publications, video tapes, movies and other pornographic material.

This law is important. It is needed to protect women and children against violent and sexual exploitation. The federal government is now considering a law on pornography and children to protect the most vulnerable in our society from sexual exploitation and abuse.

I would like to reassure Canadians that our government is committed to fighting the violent and sexual exploitation of women and children.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, today is the third anniversary of the unanimous House of Commons motion to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

I rise today to lament the fact that this government has failed to fulfil the promise it made to Canadians three years ago. The Prime Minister constantly reminds this House of his commitment to Canada's children, yet their situation is getting worse and not better.

More than 1.1 million children are living in poverty in this country and an estimated 700,000 are using a food bank each year. As if to highlight this government's hypocrisy, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has chosen today to announce a campaign to spotlight Canada's participation in the UN Year of the Family in 1994. We know this government's track record and hope that this will not be another multi-million dollar advertising campaign. We hope that this is not an attempt by the government to inflate its own image while drawing attention away from those issues of real importance to Canadian families, like having a job to come home from each day and enough food on the table each night.

HUTTERITES

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, across Canada's prairie provinces thrive 20,000 people whose commitment to agriculture and to the rural economy knows no equal. Followers of Jakob Hutter, dating from the mid-sixteenth century, the Hutterite brethren have developed a commitment to social and moral values that many other Canadians can only dream of.

In Manitoba, 6,000 Hutterites produce a third of our pork and one-quarter of our eggs and turkeys. Hutterian women maintain skills and crafts that many Canadian women have abandoned for other pursuits.

Although it may not be for everyone, the Hutterite way of life has withstood the test of time in Canada for over the past 100 years. The next time you are in Manitoba, I invite you to visit a colony and see a refreshing and distinct side of our Canadian mosaic.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's report has been made public today. It will identify government waste, as it should. But there was waste here in the House of Commons last night which will not be mentioned. The NDP, suffering from its abysmal showing in the polls, lower than it has ever, ever been, decided to hold roughly five hours of votes, thereby necessitating the expenditure of thousands of dollars of precious taxpayers' money. A vote that would normally have taken a fraction of the time was extended by approximately five hours. That was an irresponsible act, a charade that will be recognized as such by the people of Canada in the next federal election.

NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, while acknowledging the very serious problems of deficit and debt which confront Canadians, a recent article in the Fraser Forum confirms the improving trend of some important fundamentals in the federal government's financial management. They bear repeating.

One of the most encouraging realities is the reversal from deficit to surplus in the program operating account, excluding debt costs. Eight years ago the federal government spent $16 billion more on program spending than it collected in revenue. Last year the government spent $10.1 billion less on program spending than it collected on revenue, despite the presence of the recession.

Primarily this has been achieved by controlling the rate of growth in government program spending which has been held to 3.9 per cent annually over the past eight years, as opposed to 13.7 per cent in the 15 years before that.

The level of federal debt has become unacceptably high but real progress has at least been made in curtailing its rate of growth. That is a trend we simply must follow until the debt begins to fall.

S. O. 31

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, last year two women, two of my constituents in Halifax who were employed by the Public Service Commission of Canada in the staffing branch, lodged a complaint of sexual harassment against their superiors. Both a management review and the departmental investigation found sexual harassment had occurred.

When one of the complainants attempted to transfer, her efforts were repeatedly blocked. What has happened? Today she is effectively out of a job. Today the other complainant was informed that her contract is being terminated. The investigation of the department stated that a punitive approach had already been taken against these women.

What guarantees does this government offer that there will be sanctions against sexual harassers and that women who complain will not be punished?

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PENSIONS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I believe that pension benefits for members of Parliament should be reviewed. Members of Parliament make monthly contributions to a fund that pays their pensions. The fund is self-supporting, nonetheless the public perception is that the pension is far too generous. For example, some people think that members qualify for pensions too early.

I hope that members on both sides of the House will support a review of members' pensions by an unbiased panel.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, an interesting thing is happening. At this time many people are growing more and more concerned about the sunken Soviet submarine which contains plutonium and the possibility therein for a massive pollution of that particular region of the world, particularly the ocean and the fishing stocks, et cetera. We are also entering an entirely new era where nuclear waste is going to be transported by ship, thus creating the possibility of having to deal with this kind of situation over and over again.

I say is that perhaps this government and other governments that have a say in this should learn something from this sunken Soviet ship and try to reach an international treaty to prevent the shipment of nuclear waste by sea under any circumstances.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada has released several positive statements pointing to hopes that the economy is beginning a sustained recovery. August, September and October showed excellent increases in the GDP, employment, retail sales, as well as housing and auto sales.

Consumer confidence is improving and emphasis should be placed on this. If consumers return with a sustained level of spending it will help this country tremendously in gaining back a more prosperous standard of living.

Indications from our neighbours to the south point to improvements in growth in the U.S. economy. This will have a direct impact on Canada's recovery.

These are good signs and ones that should give renewed hope to all of our citizens.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in his report tabled today in the House, the Auditor General of Canada stated that as a result of tax loopholes for foreign affiliates, the federal government is losing hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why hundreds of millions of Canadian dollars invested in Singapore, Switzerland, Barbados, the Netherlands and many other countries are tax exempt, while Canadians have had to swallow 32 tax increases in eight years?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the taxation of foreign affiliates is indeed a very complex matter. This government took action in 1988 when it introduced the general anti-avoidance rules into the Income Tax Act.

The hon. member must recognize we have to have a tax system that is competitive, that ensures our tax regime is consistent with international norms and that is not more punitive than tax regimes in other countries because that is part and parcel of a positive investment environment. That is what we have been trying to achieve and that is the balance we have been trying to strike.

I am not sure whether the Auditor General has really recognized the actions we have taken with respect to the general anti-avoidance rules.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, with great respect to the Minister of Finance, he cannot do his own job and he should not tell the Auditor General how to do his.

In 1987 the Department of Finance announced that it would review the tax rules on interest deductibility of foreign source income and foreign affiliation. More than five years later, in 1992, these studies have not been completed. What is the government waiting for? Why is the government giving a tax break to corporate agencies and people in Hamilton, Bermuda, but not to those in Hamilton, Ontario? Why are there tax breaks to businesses operating in Barbados, another tax haven, and not to businesses operating in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that in 1988 my predecessor brought the general tax avoidance rule into the Income Tax Act. Again, I remind the hon. member that Canada's tax policy has to be consistent with international norms.

Hon. members stand up in the House day in and day out and talk about a positive investment climate. We need investment in this country and we need to have an environment that is competitive, that encourages competitiveness and that will encourage investment and the creation of jobs.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is clear the government does not know how to administer tax measures.

According to the Auditor General's report tabled this morning, the government had allocated $422 million for preparing, introducing and managing the GST, the goods and services tax.

• (1420)

However, the government spent $808 million, which is twice as much. The GST costs more than was expected, revenues are lower and the deficit is higher than was anticipated, and so forth.

Will the government finally admit that its administration is out of control and go to the people with a general election?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be very careful as to how he reads the Auditor General's report. Nowhere in the report does the Auditor General state that the planning, preparation or the administration of the GST is costing more than what was provided to Parliament. Nowhere. I challenge the hon. member to show me. In fact, I had a meeting yesterday with the Auditor General and we concluded that was not the case.

The fact of the matter is that the hon. member is comparing apples and oranges and we are comparing apples and apples, or oranges and oranges. The Auditor General concludes in his report that—

Mr. Boudria: Some fancy footwork now.

Mr. Fontana: It is twice as much. Can you not count?

Mr. Jelinek: They get very nervous when there is an honest answer coming to a falsified question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: The Auditor General concludes: "We found that there was no departure from reporting requirements for budgetary expenditures. The costs were disclosed in various main estimates by year and were spread among all involved departments and agencies". The bottom line is the same between the Auditor General's report and our projections on the GST.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On page 49 of the Auditor General's report the Auditor General says: "In September 1990, the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, again advised the Department of Finance about concerns it has with existing legislation. Taxpayers can transfer foreign subsidiaries' losses to their Canadian parents; move Canadian corporation's income offshore and convert income of Canadian corporations into tax-free income".

Why has the Minister of Finance ignored the warnings of the Department of National Revenue on this matter? Why does he consider helping companies to invest in tax havens more important than creating jobs in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the introduction of the general anti-avoidance rules into the Income Tax Act in 1988 has in effect taken care of most of those issues the Auditor General has referred to.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance says that the introduction of anti-avoidance rules in 1988 has taken care of this matter. Then I ask the Minister of Finance, why is the Auditor General of Canada raising a concern about this matter saying that it has not been taken care of in his report tabled today for 1992? You had better check your calendar, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members ought also to place their questions through the Speaker.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance why he says this matter was taken care of in 1988 when the Auditor General in his report tabled today for 1992 says that it has not been taken care of. Can he explain this discrepancy between the views of the servant of Parliament, the Auditor General, and what he just told this House?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my response remains the same. I will certainly look into it in more detail. However, the fact of the matter is we believe that those issues have been covered as a result of the introduction of the general anti-avoidance rule which was brought in by my predecessor.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who will know that any government's priority must be to find ways and means to put 1,600,000 Canadians back to work, to give them jobs they most sorely need.

The government keeps telling us that it does not have any money and yet in No. 2.58, the Auditor General says that hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue have been lost as a result of corporate loopholes. That is what it says. In spite of what the Minister of Finance is saying about what happened back in 1988, the Auditor General is saying that hundreds of millions of dollars are lost each year because of corporate tax loopholes.

Will the Minister of Finance do the right thing in an effort for fairness and justice in our tax system? Will he close those loopholes, collect those revenues and create those jobs with that additional revenue?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again my predecessor has the record of closing many of the hundreds of tax loopholes which were left there by the previous administration. The fact of the matter is that many of the same members are now saying: "We need some incentives in the system to encourage jobs and to generate investment". I wonder to what specific loopholes the hon. member is in fact referring.

I can tell the hon. member that one of the best ways for his party to contribute to job creation is get off this protectionist kick it is on that suggests we should become a closed economy, that we should not open our doors to trade, that we should not open our doors to investment. That is not our approach.

Our approach is that we are open for business, we are open for trade, we believe in the free trade agreement with the United States and—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the government has had eight years to close those loopholes and it has in fact put all of Canada out for sale.

While the Auditor General points out the tax unfairness between the corporate taxpayers, he also points out that the small business community suffers while our large corporations profit. Will the government now recognize that the small business community is the future creator of jobs in Canada and will it move immediately to level the playing field for that sector?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I agree, Mr. Speaker, that the small business community is one of the major components of job creation in this country. That is why we are continually taking steps to encourage the small business sector.

I note one of the tax loopholes that the New Democratic Party refers to at all times is the capital gains exemption that is applied to small business. That is one of the loopholes I suspect it wants to do away with. That would not help small business. It would hurt small business.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the government's fiscal and monetary policies have created a situation where we have over 1.5 million people unemployed. At the same time we look at the Auditor General's report and we find that the foreign affiliates of Canadian corporations have invested more than $90 billion offshore in offshore tax havens.

Will the minister commit now that this multimillion dollar tax rip-off will be shut down and the money used for job creation for those 1.5 million desperate unemployed people in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, my predecessor brought in provisions such as the large corporation tax and the general anti-avoidance rules as ways and means to close a number of these loopholes. There is also the fact that the scientific research and development incentive was part of the former administration's $1 billion boondoggle. Those kinds of things were closed. There have been a number of loopholes which have been closed.

If there are any further examples, we will certainly take them into consideration.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Today the Auditor General told us that the government gave 22 untendered contracts ranging between $35,000 and $743,000 for the so-called prosperity agenda, all in contravention of Treasury Board rules.

I want to ask the minister: Why does this tired old government think that rules are made to be broken? Why does the minister tell Canadians to tighten their belts at the same time as the purse strings are being loosened for Conservative Party hacks and supporters?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me say to the hon. member that this government was off and running with the prosperity initiative drawing out ideas from people across the country. We were developing policies as to how we would respond to the people of this country in bringing about a package of policies which would do exactly what the hon. member wants and that is to move this country into the nineties, into the next century with a series and a composition of policies that are designed to improve the competitive position of this country.

• (1430)

The hon. member asked a specific question about tendering practices. The practices that were followed were consistent with the spirit of the rules. However, because of the urgency of getting the prosperity initiative launched, there was not sufficient time to follow the policy to the letter. It was with a desire to move ahead as quickly as we could that we took this action.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I can tell that this is a very tender subject with the government across the way.

[Translation]

My supplementary is for the minister who just answered. The Auditor General also declared today that two thirds of these contracts were paid even before the work was done.

Therefore, I would ask the minister the following: when will this old and tired government learn that the taxpayers' money does not belong to the Tories and that they cannot use it to reward their friends?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to understand how the member would describe the government the way he has when we are anxious to get out and do things that will help the success of this economy. It is precisely for that reason we have been subject to this comment by the Auditor General.

My hon. friend should know that the spirit of the policies was followed in the way that we went about handing out the contracts because of the importance we felt of getting on with the job and dealing with the problems we are addressing, problems countries around the world are facing. It is because we were anxious to get out there that we took the action we did.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works.

Despite the Auditor General's previous reports which indicate that lease/purchase agreements is a very costly method of acquiring public buildings, how can this tired old government justify entering into a 25-year lease agreement in 1991 for the Louis St. Laurent building in Hull?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, for a number of reasons.

On the contrary, this government very energetically pursued the request of DND to provide some long-term stable space for the department. We acquired some valuable additional assets, converted them into a lease/purchase agreement, avoided moving expenses and, perhaps more important, preserved 40,000 square metres of space on the Outaouais side which helped to preserve the important proportion of space traditionally allocated on both sides of the river.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

We know that the Department of National Defence will no longer need the Louis-Saint-Laurent building after only 10 years of a 25-year lease contract with a purchase option.

We know that this building has cost private industry $41.5 million and that, according to very conservative figures, taxpayers will probably have paid more than $270 million at the end of the contract.

How can this exhausted government which refuses to follow the advice of the Auditor General justify this gargantuan squandering of public funds?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, over the term of this lease/purchase agreement there will be ample opportunity because of the turnovers that Public Works and this government require to utilize that building fully.

Although at the time the timeframe that DND required it may not have been apparent, it will be fully utilized and will present good value for the money when the analysis is completed.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Today the Auditor General reported on the procurement policies of the Department of National Defence. He used these words among others: defective, cumbersome, ineffective, very expensive, wasted costs amounting to several billions of dollars, and equipment exceeding existing or planned capabilities elsewhere in the world.

Will the Prime Minister at least take the first two steps necessary to bring the department's spending under control: freeze the $4.4 billion helicopter program and fire the Minister of National Defence?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the member we have everything to fire in the department.

[Translation]

I read the Auditor General's report a few hours ago and I found it very interesting on the whole. Most of the analyses were made in co-operation with and with the collaboration of the Department of National Defence and over the last few months we have modified a number of our policies in accordance with the Auditor General's suggestions.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's report says that these programs and problems are continuing.

The report additionally says that virtually all projects examined experience schedule delays and cost overruns. Spare costs exceed 50 per cent of alternative costs. There are severe deficiencies in the naval reserve and militia and substantial deficiencies in the air reserve, programs which cost over three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Will the government concede that Department of National Defence spending is completely out of control?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the answer to that question is a definite no. The department must take into account the constantly evolving international situation, it must consider the fact that most of these major projects take 10, even 15 years between the time of their inception and the delivery of the products to the department. We are very aware of the importance of the public funds invested in these projects and that is why we will abide by the Auditor General's suggestions and streamline some of our procedures.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, in his report, the Auditor General says that the annual deficit and the debt are of great concern to Canadians. In the last budget, the forecast for the deficit was less than $28 billion and it has now reached $35 billion.

Why will the Minister of Finance not accept the Auditor General's recommendation and recognize that the Tory government must give Parliament and Canadian taxpayers more precise information on the debt and the deficit and more realistic comparisons between anticipated results and the actual figures?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I genuinely appreciate the comments of the Auditor General because he recognizes the importance of controlling the deficit and dealing with the structural debt problems. I also appreciate the fact he has indicated that we should be taking more steps to communicate these to the Canadian public.

I find that most encouraging and I find the hon. member's question most encouraging, because day in and day out we get criticized from opposition members for advertising and for spending money on the dissemination of information.

Things such as Where Your Tax Dollars Go is something that is available to all Canadians. We try to send out this kind of information on a monthly and quarterly basis.

If the hon. member's question is in the form of a representation to do more of that, I will take that under serious advisement.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General states in his annual report that the government has given absolutely no indication that it intends to publish the performance score card he asked for last year on its action plan to reduce the deficit. That action plan incidentally has seen the predicted deficit jump from $28 billion to $35 billion.

Is it because the Minister of Finance is too embarrassed to report accurately on his government's performance with respect to its eight-year stewardship, or is it just that the Tories do not understand what kind of damage they have inflicted on the Canadian economy as a result of their policies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have an action plan to propose to the House of Commons and the people of Canada on December 2. I hope the hon. member will stand in his place and support us.

• (1440)

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

According to the Auditor General, Canada's international debt exposure to regional development banks, plus this government's debt forgiveness last year to Poland and Egypt, comprised billions of dollars of Canadian undisclosed debt. Why is this tired old government hiding its real and total indebtedness from the Canadian people?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, speaking of a tired old government, we have a tired old opposition party over there, the Liberal Party, that has not had a new policy idea since the seventies.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: As the hon. member knows, Canada extends credit to a number of sovereign states for many reasons: to promote Canadian exports, to support our foreign policy objectives and to aid in the economic development of less developed countries.

The government remains of the view that the principle of the ultimate collectability of these sovereign loans is the basis upon which we participate in the Paris Club, a group of creditor countries. It is in that forum that we deal with these particular issues because there are other countries involved in precisely the same activity and we work at that in a collective manner.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, if the minister would look at the report he would see that the Auditor General and this government-to-be do not agree.

My supplementary question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Canada pays more per capita to international development banks than any other nation despite the fact that full audits are not available.

We know the good track record of non-government organizations in alleviating global poverty and promoting sustainable development. We question the performance of international development banks.

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs guarantee no further cutbacks to NGO programs?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's chapter on regional development banks points to a very complex aspect of our international co-operation activities. Nevertheless, I think that these regional development banks play a very important role in the support they give developing countries.

Of course, our program is very varied and supports different activities of our development partners for the benefit of the countries concerned. These partners may be NGOs, which my colleague just mentioned, the private sector, institutions and also regional development banks which we think play a very important role.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Our constitutional proposals included transferring labour force training to the provinces. Today, because Canadians said no in the referendum, we seem to be saying to them with some bitterness, "No, too bad. You should have said yes".

Nevertheless, since eliminating overlap could save $250 to $300 million and the transfer could be done through an administrative agreement on manpower training, does he not find that our attitude toward Quebec seems to be intransigent, since there is consensus on this issue in our province?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not with bitterness but rather fully aware of the people's verdict on the provisions of the Charlottetown accord that we will deal with the request to transfer jurisdiction or authority.

The problem now is that it is crucial for the competitiveness of the Canadian economy to have a trained labour force. Surely within the present constitutional framework a way can be found with the provinces and the private sector to avoid duplication and ensure that taxpayers and Canadians who need training benefit from a coherent, well-co-ordinated program. That is the challenge before all of us parliamentarians. In January, I intend to call Canada's ministers of employment and immigration together to see how we can better co-ordinate our activities so that Quebec workers end up benefiting from these training programs.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last Thursday the Bank of Canada raised its interest rates by almost 1 per cent, but the value of the Canadian dollar still fell. Clearly speculators do not believe that the government is going to keep interest rates so high when the Canadian economy is in such bad shape. Today the bank rate has gone up almost another full percentage point.

What strategy does this government think it is following? Does the minister not realize that keeping interest rates lower and letting the dollar find its own level would be far healthier for the Canadian economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, financial markets internationally have been very volatile over the last month or so. In so far as Canada is concerned, it has put upward pressure on interest rates and downward pressure on the value of the dollar.

I am concerned about this volatility and I am concerned about the effect that it will have on economic recovery, but I reiterate the point that I have made on previous occasions: there is international uncertainty and volatility. I note that today the European banks have had to raise their interest rates in Ireland, Spain, Portugal, Norway and Greece.

The hon. member is aware of the exchange volatility in the U.K., France and other countries. There also appears to be an element of speculation in recent financial market developments.

I want to assure the hon. member and the country that the government is not changing its economic policy stance. We are committed to the principle of price stability. We are committed to the principle of fiscal consolidation and we are committed to the principle of economic restructuring. We will continue to follow those policies.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the key question is whether this government is committed to a policy of full employment and economic expansion like the United States government that has just been elected seems to be.

The minister should be aware that a reduction of three percentage points in Canadian interest rates on a sustained basis means 125,000 new jobs. It means the difference between thousands of small businesses surviving or collapsing.

Will this government place these new jobs and the survival of these small businesses first and stop trying to maintain the value of the dollar by pushing up interest rates?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting proposal. I am rather attracted to the hon. member's observation that he is attracted to the Clinton policy initiatives.

President-elect Clinton is very much in favour of the free trade agreement because he thinks it is good for Canada and for the United States. President-elect Clinton is very much in favour of the North American free trade agreement because he thinks it is good for jobs in Canada, the United States and Mexico. Does that mean the hon. member is going to support that as well?

The hon. member knows better. You cannot just simply dial a phone and reduce interest rates by 3 per cent. That is being naive.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State and the government House leader.

This is further to the question I directed to the Minister of Labour on November 17, 1992, concerning inclusion in the Canada Labour Code of the preventive withdrawal of pregnant workers. The answer I received was that cabinet had approved the bill in question and the minister intended to table the bill in the very near future.

Can the minister let the House know today when this bill, which is extremely important for all Canadian women, will be placed on the legislative agenda for consideration at the earliest possible opportunity in the House of Commons?

• (1450)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member pointed out, my cabinet colleagues have agreed in principle with this very important bill which deals with the redeployment of pregnant women.

I can assure the hon. member and other members of this House that the government intends to table this bill in the near future. I want to congratulate the hon. member on the interest he has shown in this matter.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The Auditor General this morning listed case after case where the management of capital projects by DND has been, in his words, ineffective. Yet this tired old government and this tired old minister have kept in place exactly the same management procedures for the production of the EH-101 helicopter.
