FIFTH SESSION—SEVENTH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 11th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ROADS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 114) to amend the Act respecting roads and allowances in the province of Manitoba. He said: This is a Bill to amend chapter 49 of the Revised Statutes of Manitoba, by which certain road allowances are vested in the province under certain conditions, and it is to modify the manner in which these roads can be taken over by the province of Manitoba, particularly in organized municipalities. Under the previous Act the roads were surveyed simply, and are vested in the province of Manitoba; but by this Act we provided that all road allowances in townships surveyed up to the present time are declared to be the property of the province in all organized municipalities; and this provision is based upon that line. The other clauses of the Act lead up to that, and deal with the old roads in the city of Winnipeg. The Bill is asked for by the Government of Manitoba in order to do away with certain doubts that have existed there as to the old trails and roads in the city of Winnipeg, under the surveys that were made a few years ago.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THIRD READING.

THE CRIMINAL CODE, 1892.

Bill (No. 51) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, was read the second time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved:

That a Message be sent to the Senate, requesting their Honours to unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses to examine and report upon the Bill of the Commons, No. 51, intituled: "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892," and informing them that the Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, and Hon, Messrs. Daly, Dickey, Curran. and Messrs. Adams, Amyot, Baker, Brodeur, Carroll. Choquette, Coatsworth. Corbould, Delisle, Edgar, Forbes, Fraser, Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Langelier, McLeod, Masson, Monet, Mulock, Tisdale and Weldon, will act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of said Joint Committee, should the Senate agree to its creation.

Motion agreed to.

THE MARKLAND MORTGAGE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:—

That it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Finance to execute, on behalf of Her Majesty, a release and discharge of a certain mortgage given to Her Majesty in 1858 by the Hon. George H. Markland upon certain properties in the city of Kingston, which were sold in 1862 under the said mortgage, and to convey the properties so sold, freed and discharged from the said mertgage, to the persons entitled thereto, on payment of such part of the purchase money as now remains unpaid, either with or without interest and on such other terms and conditions as the Minister deems expedient in the public interest.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am certainly opposed to the proposition which the hon, gentleman now submits to the House. I do not know whether he has traced the history of this transaction, but this I know full well, that the papers of the year 1856, of the old Farliament of Canada, will show that this amount represents funds belonging to the University of Toronto; that the University of Toronto claimed the money that was so invested; that the Government itself is liable to the university for those moneys; and if the hon, gentleman undertakes to deal with this matter, he ought first to make the provision that the university necessary itself shall be secured an amount of money which is comprised in that mortgage I think in the and the interest thereon. appendices of 1856 a statement will be found which shows the origin of those moneys and for what purpose they were loaned. If I remember rightly, they were in some way connected with a canal; at all events. the moneys belonged to the University of Toronto, and the hon, gentleman ought, if he undertakes to deal with this mortgage, and he does propose to deal with it as the property of the Dominion of Canada, and as one which the Dominion has a right to remit, he ought to be prepared to secure to the university the funds which originally belonged to it.

Mr. FOSTER. The resolution as it stands on the paper, no doubt, deals with a debt due to the Crown, and as it involves a loss to the treasury, it should be introduced by a resolution, although I have already introduced a Bill on the subject. I had heard nothing until the hon. gentleman's speech to-day, with respect to any special claim which the University of Toronto has on the I found that this matter had property. been hanging up in the departments for several years. It was dealt with by the Public Accounts Committee some years ago; the Committee had all the papers before it, investigated the case, and made a report to the effect that the whole trust should be written off. The House adopted that report, although it never went any further. The proposal I submit to the House is not to wipe off the whole indebtedness, but to accept 50 per cent of the indebtedness which the parties interested are willing to give. However, I will look into the matter of which the hon, gentleman has spoken and when we come to the first reading of the Bill we can take the matter under consideration.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itsself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. I understood the other day when this matter was brought up for the first time that the hon, gentleman would bring down to the House the correspondence relating to this subject. I understand from the hon, gentleman to-day that there has been a report made by the Committee on Public Accounts. In what year was that made?

Mr. FOSTER. In 1888.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is perfectly clear that if that is the case, that the Committee were not properly informed with respect to the nature of the money.

Mr. FOSTER. That must be clear, because I find no mention of it whatever in the report.

Resolution reported.

R

THE MARKLAND MORTGAGE.

Mr. FOSTER moved the discharge of Order for second reading of Bill (No. 93) respecting the discharge of a mortgage to Her Majesty known as the Markland Mortgage.

Motion agreed to, Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

SUPPLY—THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I propose inviting the attention of the House and of the Government to the petition presented and read at the Table on behalf of the Auditor General. This petition shows that the Auditor General feels that in his present position and with the resources at his command he will not be able to properly discharge those duties which Parliament has imposed upon him. There is a strong sense of duty and a keen sense of unfair treatment pervading this petition. It is of special consequence to the House of Commons that this petition should receive very full consideration. From it, it is clear that he holds he is denied the necessary strength to enable him to efficiently discharge the duties that pertain to his office as Auditor General, that he is denied the ability to reward honest service, in the same way that persons at the head of other branches of the public service are permitted to do, and that he is denied the necessary means to secure the highest efficiency in the public interest in the department over which he presides. From that petition we gather that he has made representations to the Minister, with whom, by the law which created his department, he is authorized to officially communicate, and that those representations have not been heeded, that the communications which he has addressed to the Minister earnestly setting forth the duties of the office, the amount of labour involved, the interests which it is intended to protect, have not been answered. This office, beyoud any other office in the public service, is one in which this House has special interest, and the officer is rather the officer of this House, than an officer of the Government. He states in the communication which he has addressed to the House, that so long as Sir John Macdonald lived, he had his cordial support in the discharge of his duties, but that during the past two years his relations to the Government in the discharge of the duties as Auditor General have been less satisfactory than before. The importance of the case is brought before us by the statement of the fact that there is $40,000,000 of expenditure made annually, which requires to be properly audited, and it is his duty to see that every dollar is used for the purpose for which it is voted, if used at all, and for no other The importance of the office has been recognized long since in England. and those who have studied the public accounts of the expenditure of Canada during its earlier history, and since the creation of the office here, can have no doubt whatever that the office of Auditor General, and the discharge of the duties of that office in an efficient and satisfactory manner, are of the highest consequence to the good government of the country. It is true, the Auditor General has certain duties to discharge in connection with the administrative work of the Government; but, as an auditor of appropriations, he is not an officer of the executive at all, but an officer of this House. He was intended by the law to be placed under the protection of this House; and, if he is dealt with vexatiously, if he is subjected to embarrassments and difficulties by being denied either the aid or the pecuniary resources necessary to the carrying on of the work of his office, it is proper for him to bring that matter under the attention of this House; and it is proper for this House to afford to him the necessary protection and relief. It would be a most improper thing were he at the end of the next year unable to make a proper report, unable to give to the House the information which it requires, and were he to assign as an excuse for the failure to conform to the law, that the necessary means were not placed at his disposal for that purpose. This House is entitled to know what are the relations between its Auditor and the Government; and if the Government withholds from him that pecuniary support necessary to the proper discharge of his duties, it is his business to report that fact to this House. There was a time in the history of the English Government when the chief function of the House of Commons was to vote subsidies, when the redress of grievances and the work of legislation were solely under the control of the Crown and when the House of Commons sought to secure the redress of its grievances by petition to the Crown, asking that the Crown should legislate in a particular way. These petitions generally related to encroachments on the part of the Crown on the customary law of the country, and nearly all the legislation carried on by Parliament for centuries was nothing more than the restraint of the Crown from such encroachments and the restoration of the ancient usage. The great function of the House of Commons was the voting of the necessary supplies. It was not until the time of Charles II. that the practice was introduced by Charles Downing of dividing the subsidies granted to the Crown, and assigning a certain portion of each subsidy to a particular object. And so the Crown was restrained, so far as its conduct could be known to the House, by the detailed estimates of the Appropriation Act. But at that time there was no audit of the accounts, and flagrant abuses and misappropriations were from time to time brought to light. It was not until the time of William III. and Anne that Parliament took steps at all to secure an audit of the public accounts. When the House of Hanover came to the English throne, those provisions of the law was disregarded; and on more than one occasion under the rule of both George I, and George II. subsidies were made after the old fashion. Lump sums were voted and it was left to the Crown, on the advice of the Ministers. to decide how that money should be appropriated. In 1780, Mr. Burke, in his proposal for economical reform, also proposed scheme for the proper audit of the public accounts; and so we find, at least as early as 1785, that an Audit Act was adopted, and a committee was provided, appointed in the first instance by Parliament, but afterwards by the Crown, to exercise a superintending control over the expenditures that Government from time to time made. Those proceedings on the part of Parliament were not intended as checks upon the treasury at all. They were intended to enable the treasury to ascertain how far the subordinates of the Government were properly discharging the duties assigned to them, and how far the money was being applied to the purposes, not merely to which Parliament had voted it, but to which the Government intended that it should be applied by their subordinate officers. That was an audit altogether different from our modern conception of a proper audit. It was purely an administrative audit. It was an audit which exercised a certain superintending influence over the accountants of the various departments rather than over the treasury itself. system continued, with more or less comdown to 1857, when further pleteness. changes were made, and the present system was mainly adopted in the year 1865. Mr.

Mr. Mills (Bothwell).

Macaulay, who was Secretary of the Board of Audit at that time, says that the auditors ought to be made in fact as well as in theory the servants of the House of Commons; they ought to be dependent, for the means of discharging their duties efficiently, wholly on the House of Commons. He points out that if you make the audit in that regard dependent upon the Crown, he never can discharge those modern duties which it is intended he should discharge in exercising an efficient control over the expenditures by the executive Government itself. But when that subject was under discussion in the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone pointed out that the Board of Audit is intended as a board of verification-that its business is to ascertain whether the moneys are being precisely used for the purpose of which they are voted. Its business is to secure truth and accuracy in the administration of the finances of the country, but it is not intended that the Auditor General and the Controller, shall undertake in any way to govern the public policy in reference to public expenditure. Their duties are wholly of a legal, and not in any sense, of a political character. The coercive and political side which appertains to public expenditure, Mr. Gladstone observes, is wholly under the control of the House of Commons, and of the Committee of Public Accounts, and not under the Auditor General. He observes that the auditor does two things: He sees that the money is used for the purpose for which it is voted. and that it is paid out from the exchequer in accordance with the law. Mr. Macaulay, in the report to which I refer, makes the following observation:-

The whole of our experience as appropriation auditors tend to satisfy us that we ought to have no further communication with the executive departments than may be necessary for obtaining information. Whatever tends to associate us, either directly or indirectly, with the pecuniary transactions of the Government, cannot but tend to damage the credit of the Reports in which we require to submit those transactions to the judgment of Parliament.

Now, in England as here, there are two kinds of auditors, and this fact has in some degree served to confuse in the minds of members of the House, here as there, the duties and functions of the auditor, and his relation to the House of Commons and to the Government. There is an administrative audit, and there is an appropriation audit. So far as the Auditor General is engaged in the work of administrative audit, he is acting on behalf of the Government; he is assisting the Government in superintending the expenditures of public money. But in so far as he is acting as an appropriation auditor, he is superintending the action of the Government itself, and as an appropriation auditor he is an officer of this House. and of this House alone. Now, the auditor when he is engaged in the work of administrative audit, considers whether the departmental expenditure is in accordance with treasury instructions. The treasury decides what they will do in respect to any irregularity pointed out, and in England, as here, the auditors make their report through the Treasury Department; not because they are subordinate to the Treasury Department as appropriation auditors, not to give the Treasury Department a superintending control over the auditors, but to enable them to rectify any irregularity or mistake which the auditors have pointed out, and to enable them to accompany the report to the House, with any explana-tion they may choose to make in reference to that matter. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the position of the auditor here. The Auditor General is required to his report, not to the Finance make but Parliament. Minister. to and makes it through the Minister of Finance. and why? In order that he may enable the Minister of Finance, first, to make any correction that he or the Treasury Board may desire to make in respect to these irregularities, and to accompany the report with any explanation they may choose to make in respect to the matters which the Auditor General has to criticise. In England there was no provision made for questioning any expenditure in excess of the Parliamentary vote, or for the service for which any appropriation is made, and this expenditure was made without fear of detection, and very serious abuses grew up at one time, especially in connection with the army and navy vote. This in fact, led in a large degree to the modern system of audit in England, and led to the conferring upon the Auditor General and Controller there, supervision over the public appropriations. The appropriation audit now extends to every branch of the public expenditure. It is conducted by the Exchequer and Audit Department, in concert with the accountant of the branch whose accounts are under consideration. They act on behalf of the House of Commons and under the rules set out in the Acts of 1866 and 1884. see, first, that the expenditure is attested by regular vouchers; second, that the expenditure is sanctioned by the proper departmental authorities, and third, that it is distinctly authorized by some Act of Parlia- the Auditor General, because the Audiment. Under the first two heads the audit tor General is required to exercise is an administrative audit; under the whole three the audit is an appropriation audit. The first, as I pointed out, is sent to the treasury to rectify irregularities and then it is the duty of the auditor to report to the House of Commons every departure made from the Appropriation Act. Now, that was the condition of things that existed in England with respect to the audit of the public accounts at the time that our Act of 1878 was carried. Here our statute provides for the appointment of the auditor by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada. The auditor is entitled to hold his office, not during pleasure, but during good behaviour, and he can be only removed from that office upon an address supported by both Houses of Parliament. The appointments that are made in his department under the law, are made by the Governor General in Council, who have the power to regulate the numbers, the salaries, grades, and the classes of officers. Auditor General may make rules which are reported to the Treasury Department, and which are there approved of before they can come into operation. He may ask for information, or report for information any facts that he deems proper to the Governor General in Council, but he does this through the Minister of Finance as the organ of communication. It is the duty of the auditor to see that no payment is made for which there is no parliamentary appropriation; that there is no money paid beyond the amount voted, that he report to the Governor in Council, through the Minister of Finance. in cases where any accountant or sub-accountant has expended without authority or in excess of an appropriation. The Audit Act provides that no cheque shall issue from the Finance Department without the Auditor General's certificate, except: 1. Where the Law officers of the Crown, differ in opinion from the Auditor General. 2. Where there has been an accident during the recess and an unforeseen expense arises in consequence. 3. Where, upon the report of the Auditor General on the one side and the Deputy Minister of Finance on the other. the Treasury Board decides against the Auditor General. When accounts are prepared by the Department of Finance for the Auditor General, he is required to certify and to report upon them, and it is under this authority that payments are directed. The Auditor General's Report is required to be made to Parliament through the Minister of Finance for the reason I have already mentioned. The law assumes that there is a difference in the nature of the office of Auditor General from that of any other departmental offices connected with the public service. It places every other officer under the entire control of the Government, but it does not so place over the expenditures of the Government and to see that every dollar paid out of the public treasury is paid out under the authority of some law. And it is only by permitting to him a large measure of discretion and by meeting his wishes in every case, except where it can be shown that they are most unreasonable, that the relations which the Act creates between the Department of Finance and the Auditor General can be allowed to continue. Otherwise the function of the Auditor General would be very greatly impaired. He must be at liberty to set his opinion against that of the Ministers, and to override the opinions of the Ministers, except in the cases pointed out in the statute. Without this independence which the law intended to secure to him, his office would be of very little value. From the very nature of the work which he is called upon to perform, the officials which: he requires must be, on the whole, of a higher order than those in the average departments of the public service. The departments which are most nearly like that of the Auditor General, are the Departments of Justice, Inland Revenue, Finance, in consequence of the Insurance Department associated with it, and the Geological Branch. Now, I wish to call attention to some of those matters of which the Auditor General complains, and to point out to the House how obvious it is, from these facts, that the Auditor General has been unfairly dealt with by the Minister of Finance. Let me take the Department of Justice. There are fifteen clerks in that department. Three of them are chief clerks; five are first-class clerks. So that eight out of fifteen are chief or first-class clerks, making $53\frac{1}{3}$ per cent belonging to these two classes. Then take the Inland Revenue Department. In it there are twenty-two clerks, of which three are chief clerks, and six first-class clerks, that is nine out of twenty-two, or 40 8-10 per cent are of these higher grades. In the Finance Department there are twenty-eight clerks, of whom four are chief clerks and six firstclass, making ten out of twenty-eight, or 35% per cent. Then in the Geological Branch. there are twenty-nine clerks, of whom six are chief clerks, nine first-class, so that fifteen out of twenty-nine, or 51% per cent, belong to these two divisions. Now, look at the Auditor General's Department which ranks along with these, and is certainly a special department. There are twenty-four clerks in it, of whom three are chief clerks, and one first-class, that is four out of the twenty-four, or 16% per cent of the clerks in that department, belong to these two classes. Compare that with the departments I have mentioned:

Department of Justice... $53\frac{1}{3}$ per cent, first rank Inland Revenue...... $48\frac{1}{10}$ do do Finance Department.... $35\frac{3}{4}$ do do Geological Branch..... $51\frac{3}{4}$ do do Auditor General's Branch $16\frac{2}{3}$ do do

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Look at the average salaries paid in these different departments:

Department of Justice	$1,579 17
Inland Revenue	1,510 46
Finance Department	1,551 79
Geological Branch	1,564 22
Auditor General's Branch	1.073 94

Thus the Auditor General's branch is nearly $500 below the average of any one of these other departments. Now, the Auditor General required for the payment of extra I believe he communicated cleks, $1,800. with the Minister of Finance and informed him that every dollar of that would be required for the proper discharge of the work of his department. Yet the Minister of Finance cut that down to $1,300, and the Auditor General was not consulted. communication was had with him. The amount asked for, in the first instance, was necessarily small, but the Minister of Finance reduced that from $1.890 to $1.300. Now, look at the condition of the other departments. The Governor General's office is allowed for extra clerks, $1,400 this year, and $1,400 for next year. The Secretary of State's Department is allowed $1,600 for each year. I have no hesitation in saving that I am fairly convinced that the whole work of that department can be done by five clerks. I am perfectly sure of that, and yet you give to that department, which has scarcely anything to do. $1,600 for the payment of extra clerks and you withhold a considerable portion of the amount asked by the Auditor for the work of his department. Printing and Stationery, the average for the current year is $2,000, and they ask $2,000 for next year. In the Interior Department and Indian Affairs, the Government give $1,800 to each for extra clerks. In the Finance Department it was $1,000 for the current year, and the estimate is $1,000 for next year. In the Customs Department, the amount is $1.700 this year, and $1,700 for the coming year. In the Inland Revenue, it is $1,500 for the current year, and the same amount for the next year. In the Public Works, it is $1,500, and the estimate for next year is the same. In the Post Office Department, the estimate for extra clerks was $18,800 for the current year, and the Government is asking the same under their estimate for next year. In the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the estimate is the same for each year-$2,000. In the Department of Railways and Canals the figure is the same—$2,000 for each year. And the Auditor General asks $1,800 for extra clerks. and you propose to place at his disposal $1,300 for this purpose. This shows that you have given the Auditor General wholly different treatment from that you have meted out to the other departments of the public service. Then, you have a very large increase in the work of that department, as I shall presently show. It is said that the cost of the Auditor General's Department is large. Including salaries, printing and con- the manner in which he was engaged in tingencies, the amount asked for is about $40,000. This is for auditing $40,000,000, or at the rate of $100 of cost for every $100,000 of pecuniary transactions. I am perfectly sure that in the management of any private business that would not be considered a large rate. Then, it is said that the report is swollen far beyond what is necessary. do not think that that is so. There are in the report 1,600 pages. That means four pages of letter press for every $100,000 of public expenditure. We are told that there is more detail than is necessary; that in England the detail is not given so minutely as it is with us. In England they have upward of $400,000,000 of expenditure every year, and it would require twelve volumes of 1.600 pages each to give the expenditure with the same detail as it is given in the Auditor General's Report. Now, in England, as here, the information is given, not to inform the Government of something they did not know before, but for the information of the members of the House of Commons, and to enable the House of Commons to exercise that control over the public finances which it deems to be in the public interest. And so long as the report is not so voluminous or so minute as to prevent the House from becoming acquainted with its contents, it is not more minute than the public interests require. There is an impression abroad in the House that one of the grounds of the attempts to cripple the department of the Auditor General is that it is held by some that he gives details of matters that ought not to have found their way into his report. That would be a good objection if the statement made by the Auditor General in his report were inaccurate. But there is no charge of inaccuracy; there is merely the charge that it is not a comfortable thing for some parties who have received money from the public treasury to have pointed out the various purposes for which that money was obtained. Well, this may be a fault in the expenditure, or it may be a fault in the public raste. As to the latter, I do not think that any persons have done more to pervert the public taste-if it is regarded as a defect—than the gentlemen on the other side of the House and the press which supports them. We all remember the attacks made years ago upon the local government in Ontario. We remember the attacks made upon the Lieutenant-Governor the stories put in circula-Macdonald. sumptuous tion about the manner which his friends who accompanied him Arthur on one occasion were Port That provided for. was used for it was worth against the Lieutenant-Governor and the member of the Government most intimately associated with him on that occasion-the Commissioner of Crown Lands, if I remember rightly. And so this species of publication is not very agreeable. Now, in regard to the publication of such details, the service of the Government. If the Government secures a person to perform a service gratuitously, they naturally do not expect to provide for him in exactly the same way as they would provide for the secretary of a Minister. What would be quite proper in one case, might not be proper in another. In either case, we do not suppose that the Government would insist upon the parties living on treacle and brimstone.

Mr. FOSTER. They thought Cockburn should have done it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a rule laid down by the hon, gentleman's friends long ago. I suppose he has heard of "Little Miss —," a picture which hung in the room of one of the Ministers in Toronto. I suppose he has heard of the glasses and decanters furnished for the Speaker's room there. I suppose he has heard a great many things just of the kind that appear in the Auditor General's Report, which, it is complained do not properly appear in that report. I do not know what the hon, gentleman would put there. How would he account for the expenditure? Would he group a hundred of these expenditures and call them "sundries"? If that is the course he wishes to see pursued, the hon, gentleman ought to ask Parliament to adopt that course. when the Auditor General would be required to conform his conduct to the rule of Parliament in that as in every other particular. I believe a great many frauds have been detected, a great many mistakes have been corrected, by the full details published by the Auditor General. If I remember rightly, not long ago frauds were detected in connection with the management of the Carillon and Grenville Canal, the discovery being due to the full reports of the Auditor General. It was discovered that persons who had been dead for years were still upon the pay rolls, that supplies were purchased for those who had been in the church-yard for many years, and that $25,000 at least had been taken from the public treasury by manipulations of this sort. Now, it is said that this report has grown very large. That is because the Government have thrown the administrative audit upon the Auditor General. Let me call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the Indian accounts were given to the Auditor General to audit for the first time in 1882: that the Franchise Act accounts were given to him to audit after the passing of that measure, in 1886; that these $60,000 were struck off the charges on that measure by the Auditor General, and $200,000 on the charges connected with preparation of the voters' lists on the subsequent occasion. So that in connection with that matter, the work of the Auditor General's department has been increased, and at least $260,000 were saved to the public treasury in cona great deal depends upon the person and sequence of the audit. Then, there is the examination of the revenue returns, which was first given him in 1887, and which required, I am told, the services of four additional clerks. Now this reference to the Auditor General grew out of Mr. Tilton's case, in 1887. I believe that it was a proper thing; the audit is a necessary audit. is an administrative audit, it is true, it is a matter which concerns the Government: but in the prevention of frauds upon the Government in the administration of the departments, there is also a prevention of fraud upon the public treasury. Then the bank accounts and the currency accounts were given in charge to the Auditor General in 1887, and the store accounts were given him in 1894. Now, these are all administrative audits, but they have all added very largely to the work of the department, and they have all served to swell the volume which the Auditor General annually is required to lay upon our Table under the provisions of the Act. Now. the Auditor General requires examinations for promotion in his department precisely the same as in the other departments. Of course, they are of a somewhat different character, and of a higher order than the of the examinations required. majority What the Auditor General has complained of in his petition is that he has not enough money to pay the extra clerks required; that enough money is not voted to enable him to fill up the classes, and to promote men who are eligible for promotion in the public service in his department. The theoretical organization of that department stands as follows:-Chief clerks, three; first-class clerks, four; second-class clerks, five; or twelve of the three classes. The present organization is: Three chief clerks, one first-class clerk; and six second-class clerks. So it will be seen that the Auditor General's Department is kept below its theoretical organization, in the standing of those in the public service, as well as in numbers, and that the Auditor General is denied the right which is exercised by the head of every other department of the Government. It is complained that the Auditor General's Report is a work for the benefit of the Opposition. Now, whether it be so or not, depends largely upon the manner in which the Government discharge their duties, and the strictness with which they conform to the law. The Auditor General, in so far as his work comes in contact with the administrative work of the Government. is necessarily a criticism on the action of It is intended to be so. Government. does not matter who may be the Auditor General, or who may be the Government; that is the necessary relation between them, that is the necessary consequence of a proper audit; and unless it can be shown that the audit is dishonest; that the facts are perverted; that they are intended to convey an erroneous impression; then it seems to me there is nothing of which a Government have to complain in the audit of the public accounts. The public accounts in England show how closely the auditors and controller criticise the work of Government in the payment of public moneys. This department began in our Government in 1878, there was none in this country before. There can hardly be any complaints of want of economy in the audit office. There is no superannuation, I believe, at the present time in that office. is not a single party charged against the superannuation fund who has served in the Auditor General's Department. I do not know why the Minister of Finance has dealt with the Auditor General's Department in the way he has done; whether he thinks he is doing too much, or whether he thinks he is doing too little: whether he thinks that the persons in the public service in that department are less severely taxed with work than they are elsewhere, or whether they are more severely taxed. think it is impossible to look at the Auditor General's report and observe the number of items there reported, to bear in mind the fact that everything there reported is taken from the original documents-nothing is copied from any book or report made by any Minister's department-I say it is impossible to look at these facts without seeing that a great amount of work is performed in that department. Now, it seems to me that it is the business of this House to pay some regard to the petition which the Auditor General has addressed to this House. I am perfectly sure it never would have been submitted here if there was any hope or expectation that that department would be dealt with by the Government in the same way as others, that it would have meted out to it the same consideration that is extended to other departments of Government. Sir. this House has only to look at the facts I have mentioned, at the number of chief clerks, at the number of firstclass clerks, at the percentage which they constitute of the number of clerks in the service, as compared with every other department of the public service, to see that this is a marked department, that it has been marked out for the expression of the displeasure of the Administration. possible to look at the average salary of the clerks in that department, and compare them with the average salary in the Department of Justice, in the Department of Inland Revenue, in the Geological Branch, in the Department of Finance, without seeing that it has been a marked department. and that it is stamped with the expression of the displeasure of the Government. If the Government had anything to complain of, they should have come down and frankly stated what it was. But nothing of that sort has been done. I will not trouble the House with making a comparison as between all the departments of the Government, but if hon. members will take the whole departments and compare the various salaries paid in the whole of them. taken together, they will find that the average salary is considerable more than the average salary paid to the officers in the Audit Branch. That ought not to be so. for age clerk in the public service. There are special departments in which the average rank of attainment is higher than in others. I have already mentioned them—the Department of Justice, the Department of Inland Revenue, the Insurance Branch of the Department of Finance, the Geological Branch, and the Department of the Auditor General, and I have shown this House that the Auditor General's Department, as compared with the other departments, gives an average to each clerk of $1.070, while the average in the other departments is $1,570. being a difference of $500 between the average of the one and the other. Can any man in his senses say that is a mere accident, that a department so marked out has been fairly dealt with, or fairly treated, by the Administration? I say, Sir. there can be no two opinions on this subject. I will not trespass further on the indulgence of the House. I call the attention of the House to the work of the Auditor General's Department, to the number of persons employed, and to the fact that they, on the whole, work longer hours than do the clerks in almost every other department, taking the year together, and they are entitled to consideration which they have not received at the hands of the Minister who was intended by law to be the guardian of this department under the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Sir, I will try and not take up as much time as my hon, friend has consumed on this question, and will abridge a little at least by refusing to enter into the long historical disquisition to which he has treated the House as a sort of prelude to his discussion of the subject. With that history I have neither quarrel to make nor anything to say in its commendation: I dare say it is perfectly accurate, and will be found to be a very valuable contribution to the records of the House. However, I think this question is comparatively a simple one. We are dealing with the petition and the allegations made in the petition, and I found, as the hon. gentleman proceeded, that we are to deal with certain allegations not made in the peti-Upon certain private information, which he possesses, he has based his conclusions, and based his charges. My hon. friend was so imbued with information that he forgot its source. He began by saying the petition disclosed certain things.

tween the Auditor General and the Finance Minister, and those communications were discourteously treated, and an answer was not deigned to them. I have read over the petition rather carefully, and I cannot find anything of that kind stated in the the reasons I have mentioned, for those petition. So I fancy the hon, gentleman who are qualified to enter that branch of has been pumped so full of information the public service require, on the whole, a that he has mistaken the brief, and he higher degree of attainment than the aver- bases charges on information which is not before the House: it is, perhaps, within the cognizance of the hon gentleman but is not known to other hon, members. I want to say, in the first place, that the hon, gentleman attempted to give a party bias to this question, as I would have expected him to do, and, so far as the facts of the case are concerned, and so far as I myself am concerned, his charges in connection with Auditor General's Department are the based upon his own imagination, and upon nothing that can be found in fact. hon, gentleman ended his long disquisition by stating that any man in his senses could not come to any other conclusion than that there was a settled determination to treat the Auditor General's office unfairly and wrongly, as compared with other departments, as could be seen by the history of this case. I tell the hon, gentleman, and I tell him with all frankness, that so far as the Finance Minister is concerned. I do not think there is a Minister in the departments. and I do not know any hon, member on the floor of this House, who is to-day more in sympathy with the work and aim of the Auditor General than I myself am. Now. Sir. I set that explanation, made in all frankness. to the House, and, of course. made truthfully, against the suggestion of my hon, friend. If there has been any unfairness in the treatment of the Auditor General's Department, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, it must be had by inference, but it is not within his power to make the charge against the Finance Minister that he has imported party politics into his treatment of the Auditor General's Department, and that he has done one act against the honest and fair administration of that department, and that he has failed, in any respect, to do his duty to his own department, and to those which come under him. I let that statement go to the House and to the country against the assertion of the hon. gentleman. Surely we can discuss the merits of this case without drifting into party politics.

> I said nothing Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). about party politics.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not occupy the time of the House in discussing this question. I leave hon, members to judge from a perusal of "Hansard" as to whether that did not show throughout all the hon. gentleman's the petition disclosed certain things. It cannot be done. Now, whence comes the evidence of Department of Indian Affairs had ten first-that unfair treatment? My hon, friend class clerks last year, it has nine first-class knows, and those who sit behind him know. as the House knows, that this year has been a year when the Estimates have been very severely pruned—they have been very carefully looked into. My hon, friend leaps to the conclusion that the Auditor General's two men were not promoted because he was the Auditor General, and I was the Finance Minister, and that the other departments, for sooth, had been treated differently.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And so they have.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us see. I suppose I have a grudge against the Department of the Governor General. It had one firstclass clerk last year; it has only one first-class clerk this year. I must have a grudge against the Department of Justice. department had four first-class clerks last year; it has four this year. For the benefit of my hon, friend I will give him a little information which he does not possess. My hon, friend, the Minister of Justice, pressed before Council the appointment of two chief clerks in addition to those he already had, and pressed his claim with very great force, and with very great fairness. He did not get them. My hon. friend (Mr. Mills) did not know that fact; but he does happen to know that the Auditor General pressed for some promotions, and did not It is asserted that I am get them. sympathetic in dealing with other departments, but not with the Department of the Auditor General, and that I am importing animus and party feeling in dealing with it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Other departments have fifty-five.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon, gentleman cannot run round the bush. I will deal with those other matters later. He must take this dose of medicine at the present moment. Then I must have had spite against the Penitentiaries Branch. It had one first-class clerk last year; it has only one this year. I must have had spite against the Department of Militia and Defence. It had seven first-class clerks last year; it has seven this year. It is the same way with regard to the first-class clerks in the Secretary of State's Department; and also in the Department of Public Printing. I

The Auditor General diminished by one. The office of the Controller of the lies. North-west Mounted Police had one firstclass clerk last year; it has one now. The class clerks last year, it has nine first-class clerks this year. The Auditor General has The Departthe same in both years. In the Customs Department, there is an increase of one first-class clerk. In the Inland Revenue Department, the first-class clerks remain the same. In the Post Office Department the first-class clerks remain the same. and the second-class clerks are actually reduced by five, and the third-class clerks by four. In the Department of Agriculture the first-class clerks remain the same in both years, and in the Marine and Fisheries there is one more. In the Department of Public Works they are the same. In the Department of Railways and Canals they are the In the Geological staff, the firstsame. class clerks, or technical officers as they are called, are the same; and in the High Commissioner's office they are the same. Now, what does that show? It shows that when we go through the departments, the increase in first-class clerks is almost nil. and that the decrease more than offsets the increase, and that other departments have equal claim, as far as the first-class clerks are concerned, increase or decrease, than has the Auditor General's Department. So much with reference to that. I will take up another point. My hon, friend (Mr. Mills) gives it as his mature judgment, that if we want to make a comparison of the departments as to efficiency, ability, training, and high-class work, you must take the Justice Department, the Geological Department, the Finance Department, and the Auditor General's Department. Let us examine that position. Take the Geological Department. Every man of the technical officers in the Geological Department must be a specialist, and a specialist in what requires more than a mere glib facility of going over the multiplication table backwards, of counting up a row of figures which may come to be done automatically. and with very great accuracy; of seeing whether a certain appropriation amounted to a certain sum, and seeing whether the cheques drawn against the credit given for that appropriation amounted to exactly the same sum. I say that no man who understands what training and education means, would, for a moment, put the clerks, as an average. iu a counting department like that of the Auditor General, against the technical officers, geologists, astronomers, and the like of that in the Interior Department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear. You have got the salaries the same as in your own department.

Mr. FOSTER. I say more, I take the Department of the Minister of Justice and I say that his is a technical department. He has to have men who have been trained in law, men who have studied, and men who understand the intricacies of that great science which my hon, friend (Mr. Mills) pursues with such avidity and such success. I make the assertion here: That, as between the average ability, and the average training and capacity, necessary in the Auditor General's Department, as constituted; and, between the Justice Department, there is not a parallel to the disadvantage of the Justice Department, but quite the opposite. Take the Finance Department. I will say very little about that. except this, that I think the variety of work, and the kind of work that is done there, requires a set of officers, as a rule, of higher training and of greater ability, than is required in the Auditor General's Department. There is a grievance because the amount which was asked for contingencies in the Auditor General's Department, that is for temporary clerical work, was diminished. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) sees what is upon the face of the Estimates, but he does not see what was asked when the Estimates were being considered in Council. The Estimates had been gone through before, and sums that were asked for clerical help were cut down to the figures as they are. Just before we came to finish the Estimates, I went through them in Council, and, wishing to bring the contingencies for clerical work down to a certain sum, I docked off two or three departments, my own amongst the others, and the Auditor General's Department suffered to the extent of $500. did not have very much compunction in doing that, for this reason: That I knew that during the current year, two or three, or four permanent places in the Auditor General's Department had remained unfilled for a considerable length of time, and that the contingencies for clerical temporary help this year were large. These positions are in process of being filled, and, before the end of this year, will be filled, so that the Auditor General's Department starts out next year with its full complement of permanent men, and, consequently, comparing it with the current year, would reyear, and so I considered that the vote other civil servants. But in every other re-might be fairly well diminished. it was diminished by that amount. The Auditor General still gets $1.300 contingencies, and the Finance Department has only $1.000 contingencies. If you take it as treatment on behalf of the Finance Minister, unfair, regard to the Auditor General, as my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) says, what do you say to the Minister of Finance's treatment of his own department, where the contingencies are cut down to $1,000, or $300 less than the Auditor General has? Now, Sir, the Auditor General's office has fairly well increased. The Auditor General commenced, in 1879, with fourteen clerks. I suppose we may take 1880 as the first full year when he got into operation. He had fourteen clerks then, who were paid the sum of $14.929.17, and his contingencies were $2,547.42; the total being $17.476.59. In 1890 it had increased to twenty-one clerks, $23,076.78 for their pay, $2,990.40 for contingencies, or a total of $26,067.18. In 1894 it had increased to twenty-four clerks, with pay for the same amounting to $25,-962.52, with contingencies of $3,499.95, or a total of $29,462.47. That is, from 1880 upto 1894 the increase was from fourteen to twenty-four clerks, and the total cost, not taking in his own salary, was an increase of 68 per cent. Now, Sir, that is a very good increase, indeed. Sixty-eight per cent in a period of fourteen years. Let me take the Department of the Minister of Finance, and let me make a comparison as between the two. In 1879, the Departof the Minister of Finance had thirty-eight clerks, and in 1895 it has twenty-eight clerks. It spent, in 1879, $48,500, but it spent, in 1895, only $43.100; and I make the assertion here that the work of the Finance Department has increased just as largely in its importance, in the care that is given to it, and in the amount of actual work necessary in the department; it has increased just as much as has the Department of the Auditor General in the last ten years. In that respect I do not think there is very much to be found fault with. Just these few facts which I have given, disprove entirely that there was a certain course of action pursued towards the Auditor General's Department, which was not pursued towards the others, and that it was pursued through partisan motives. Now, Sir, the Auditor General is, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) says, an officer of this House. I do not think the Auditor General can really be called an officer of this House. There is a law upon the statutebooks, and that law gives it into the power of the Governor General in Council to appoint the Auditor General, and he is appointee of the Government for the being, time this in Dominion. His tenure of office is made conditional, and quire less temporary help than it did last in that respect he differs from most of the spect he is an officer appointed by the Government for the time being, under power conferred upon the Government by an Act of Parliament—the only way by which the Government can appoint an officer whatever. He is subject to the Civil Service Act, but he has certain powers which no other My hon, friend deputy head possesses. says there is evidence of unfair dealing towards that department. In 1886, in the revision of the statutes, the power which he was formerly supposed to possess, of promoting the clerks in his department, was taken from him; and when the Auditor General made that fact clear, first to myself and afterwards to Sir John Thompson, as Minister of Justice, I said to him at once, and Sir John Thompson said to him afterwards: "We will give to you the power which Parliament gave to you at first, and supposes you to have, and which has been taken from you." And, by a special Act, we re-conferred upon him that power, and made him supreme with regard to promotions in his own office. The only thing to which he is amenable in his department is this: that the money required for his clerks has to be voted by Parliament on the recommendation of the Government. My hon, friend says there is some other way of providing the money. Who is to vote it? Can be do it? If he made the attempt the Speaker would rule him out of order, though from the tenor of the argument the hon. gentleman advanced the other day when the Speaker ruled a Bill out of order, I should judge that the kon. gentleman feels himself competent to do almost anything he likes to do in this House. He will find, however, when he comes to canvass the ways and means, that there is no way by which the salaries of the officers of the Auditor General's Department can be voted except by the Government bringing them down in the Estimates, and asking the House to pass upon them. Apart from that, the Auditor General has full powers in his department; he makes rules and regulations for its management; he promotes according to what rules he sees fit himself to lay down. My hon, friend went into a historical disquisition as to audits, which was no doubt correct. He detailed very carefully, and I dare say very accurately, the kind of audit that exists in Great Britain. Our system of audit is modelled almost entirely on that of Great Britain; but I take exception to the statement, which my hon, friend made two or three times, that the Auditor General, in pursuance of his duties, must necessarily criticise the Government. I say that the Auditor General, in the proper discharge of his duties, may never have occasion to criticise the Government. What has he to do? His duties are laid down by the law; my hon. friend can read it, has read it. He has to see, in the first place, that there is a parliamentary authority for every expenditure. Is there any necessarily be considered to be antagonistic occasion for a quarrel between him and the Government in that? Must be necessarily criticise the Government when he goes to the Estimates as they were passed in the Supply Bill, and compares the credit he is asked to give with the wording of the vote? Not at all. He has to do more than that: he has to see, where the Government or the Treasury Board makes an appropriation of a certain amount, and in a certain way and under a certain heading, that the limit prescribed is not exceeded. Is there any chance of a quarrel between him and the Government with reference to his oversight of that? He has to see, when a credit is given. and cheques are issued on it, that the cheques and vouchers are placed before him-that sufficient proofs of the expenditure are there. There is no necessity of criticising the Government in that. Sir. if the Auditor General does not busy himself, as he has no business to busy himself, with the policy of the Government and party politics, there is no necessity for him, in the fulfilment of his duties, to criticise the Government. He is to critically examine departmental payments in respect to authority. The only possible chance of the Auditor General and the Government coming into collision-and it is a legal, not a party collision-is where he says he thinks there is no parliamentary authority for an expenditure, while the Minister of Justice, when the question is referred to him, says he thinks there is parliamentary authority. That settles it, and should not that settle it? Are we to have an Auditor General who in a case of that kind is to be superior to the law department of the Government? Not at all. If there arises a question of the legal construction of an appropriation by Parliament, and the Auditor General, a layman, thinks that it is not within the power of a department, according to that appropriation, to make a certain expenditure, the only thing for a Government to do, or the Government would come to standstill, is to have the matter submitted to its law officers, to accept the epinion of those law officers, and to stand on its responsibility. Such cases as that are provided for in the regular course--the report of the Minister of Justice coming back to the Treasury Board, and the Treasury Board passing upon it. These things give no occasion for collision between the Government and the Auditor General. The machinery is easily put into execution; it is plain and clear; it works automatically. In my experience with the Auditor General, I do not knew a single instance in which the least friction has arisen with reference to the working of that clause. So I say it is unfair for any one to argue that it is necessary for the Auditor General to criticise the Government; and I take exception to the clauses in this petition in which the Auditor General expresses the opinion that he must

to any Government in power, if he fairly discharges his duties. I do not think that is a right statement of the case; I do not think it is necessary, neither ought it, in fact to be the rule. Sir, there is one important point that is left out, and, as my hon, friend alluded to it, I will take that up for a moment. He states the number of clerks and their salaries-that is done also in the Auditor General's statement-in the Finance Department, and draws an average; and then he says that as the clerks in the Auditor's office are paid on the average so much less, therefore there is unfairness. My hon, friend did not take into account that the Finance Department, with its quota of clerks, has been in operation since 1867, that it commenced in that year with a staff of officers from the old united provinces, and that from 1867 forwards, by that gradual accretion and accumulation that will take place, the officers, under the statutory increases and promotions, have gradually gone up to the higher grades and to the larger salaries in those grades. The Auditor General's office started in 1879 with a very small proportion of old officials, almost the entire number who are there now being officials who have entered the service since 1879. And yet you want this fourteen year old department, under our system of increases or accretions, to average equal with a department which is so much older; and he draws a conclusion that if it does not average equal, there is unfairness to the one that everages less. I want to say Auditor General has not been unfairly treated in another way. The Civil Service is a unity. In all the different departments, we look very carefully at what is going on in every other department. We are anxious to have fair-play as between department and department. You cannot make a hard and fast iron rule which will hold always. There will be some instances, some right and laudable instances, where exceptions are made on account of merit and service. But we try to administer the Civil Service on a basis of uniformity in the several departments as nearly as possible, and there is no exception among the departments at Ottawa which is so marked as the Auditor General's in that respect. The Civil Service law provides that its members shall come in at the minimum salary of $400, with an addition in the case of optional subjects, and that the salary shall go on increasing at the rate of $50 per year until it reaches the maximum of the class; and so on through all the Now, the Auditor General has put grades. more men, at their first appointment, on higher salaries than minimum than probably any other department in proportion to its numbers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is not that a necessity from the work of his department?

the rule is that a clerk, in the third class for instance, may have his salary increased until it reaches the maximum of that class by the annual accretion allowed by law, after which he has a claim for promotion into a higher class. That is the rule, and we abide by that rule.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. FOSTER. I tell my hon, friend that we do. My hon, friend would perhaps found an argument to the contrary on some exception, but every rule has exceptions, and I am speaking of the rule. Of course when a vacancy takes place by death or otherwise, that rule may be broken; and the man who stands the highest in his class and is the best fitted to fill the vacancy is the one who is selected by the Minister for promotion. Such an event will operate to bring a man into a higher class before he has reached the maximum of the class from which he was promoted. But in these matters-not of promotions but of increases within the class and promotions without going to the top of the class-you will find that the Auditor General's Department shows exceptional instances. Here, for instance, in 1879. Mr. Thomas Porter went in, at a salary of $800, $400 above the minimum. Mr. Lynch went in at $400, had his salary increased from $500 to $700, was raised from $750 to $1,100, and then went as high as $1.350 by annual increase of $50. Take the case of F. Hayter, who went in at first at a salary of $700. $300 above the minimum, then went up by increases to $850, and jumped from $850 to $1,100, then went 70 $1,150, and from that jumped to $1,400, after which he had his salary increased from $1,700 to $1,800, and is now getting $2,000. I doubt if you can find in any other department so rapid a rise against the general settled rule. Take the case of J. Gorman, who went in at $700, was raised to $850 by increases and then jumped to $1.-100, after which he went to $1,150 by one year's increase, and then was promoted to $1,400, and to-day he has a salary of $2,000. I have nothing to say against these officers. They are all good officers, and the Auditor General lays great store by them; but I am pointing out that these do not show at all that the tendency of the Government and the Minister of Finance has been to put the repressive cap on the Auditor General's Department to any burdensome extent. Bolton went in at $700; Balderson went in at $800, was raised to $850, promoted to $1,100 and then transferred. Mr. J. C. Macdonald went in at $700; Mr. Bissonnette at $700. These two, I think, however, were transfers from the Post Office Department, and that should be taken into account. Miss Baldwin went in at $500; Reid at $800, and Kearns, who was transferred from the Post-office Department, at $700, went up to Mr. FOSTER. Not at all, in my opinion. $800, was then increased to $1,100, and now More than that. In the other departments gets $1,350. Mr. Martin who went in at $800, went up to $850 by increase, and was pro- opening should not exist for a laudable ambimoted directly to $1,100. Mr. Stevenson went in at $600, was raised from $900 to $1.100. Mr. Haves went in at $650 from the Post-office Department, went up from $850 to $1,100. Mr. Moore came in at $700, went to $800 by accretion, and was then advanced to The others seem to have gone in at $400 to $500. This shows that in the Auditor General's Department, not only have the clerks been in a great many cases taken in at larger salaries than the minimum but they have been rapidly advanced. If you will take the history of the department, it will show that there has been no disposition to prevent the Auditor General having full scope for his plea, which he made time and again, that he was anxious to get university graduates and that to get those he would have to offer them special inducements to accept office. I allowed that plea, and in case after case they went in at a larger salary than the minimum. There were other points mentioned by my hon. friend, but I think I have touched on the main points. With reference to the petition. as my hon, friend has introduced the matter of correspondence having passed between us, he knows as well as the Auditor General that these are busy times. They are busy times for me and for the Council. I received a notification from the Auditor General asking that this provision should be made and desiring me to get the determination of the Council upon it. I took it to the Council, but you cannot always get before Council, on a day's and sometimes a week's notice matters which are not very important or urgent. After I took it to the Council and waited an answer it had been there a few days, I received another com-munication—short but to the point—saying that if an answer were not given by the Council in a day or two, he would appeal to Parliament. I laid that letter under the cover of my blotter, and it has remained there until the present. Seeing that House has this petition before it. I may say frankly that I think the fairest way for the Auditor General to have proceeded, as he is an officer in the Civil Service, would have been to discuss the matter with the Government, to lay his grievance before the Government, and taken the reasons why the Government were not prepared to give him the increases he required this year and all the clerks he asked. Are we to be told that the efficiency of the department and its working is to be impaired because, forsooth, two second class clerks are not to have the promotion or the increase which the Auditor General desires? Are we to be told that the work of the department cannot go on satisfactorily and that the whole department is to be crippled because we do not convert two second-class clerks into firstclass clerks? Cannot the work be done

tion to rise, but I say this, that of the two clerks whose promotion the Auditor General asks, one has long got to the maximum of the class and the other has very lately come If these men had been to the maximum. year after year at the head of their class waiting for promotion and not getting it, I could see that their ambition would be somewhat nipped and they might more listlessly do their work. But that is not the case. I do not think it is the strongest of reasons for the Auditor General to say: The whole efficiency of my department is crippled, and I have to bring my case before Parliament and ask for a solemn investigation because two second-class clerks, at or near the maximum of their class, desired promotion and must be promoted this year. I do not think that is a reason for bringing this matter up here. I think we might have settled it if the Auditor General had simply preferred his request to the Government, consulted with them through me, and allowed a little time for consideration. My hon, friend drew an argument by inference from an unfortunate expression in this petition. It is not directly stated that the First Ministers, since the late Sir John Macdonald, have oppressed the Auditor General; but it is certainly an inference which my hon, friend was quick to take, that while Sir John Macdonald stood at the back of the Auditor General, the Premiers since then have rather oppressed him. There is an assertion made in this petition which I think I must notice. 'The Auditor General leaves it to be inferred that probably objections have been made because the promotions are not in the hands of the Government. He says:

It is possible that one of the objections to promotions here is that, when the money provision is made for a promotion, your petitioner makes the promotion, excluding from consideration everything but the claims which the candidates have made good by effective service in the Audit Office.

I am bound to say, in all fairness and frankness, that the Auditor General might better have left that out. I cited the case in which Sir John Thompson, as Minister of Justice and leader of the Government, and I took steps speedily to replace the power of promotion in the hands of the Auditor General when, by inadvertence, it had been taken by the consent—the passive away House. At least, he Auditor General and the tax-payer are just would have both the positive and negatas far apart as the Clerk of this House tive—the names of those who received money and the tax-payer. The Auditor General does his work and the Government does its work; the Government is responsible to the members of this House, and the members of this House will fight the battle of the tax-payers. And so I think that statement might also have been left out of the Auditor General's petition. Now, as to the audit. My hon. friend wants to know whether there is not a good deal of dissatisfaction on the part of the Government as to the kind of display made in the Auditor General's book-whether that is not a reason for all this alleged op-There is no oppression, but supis worth. Let any hon, gentleman take the report for 1879, and a number of succeeding years, and read them, and he will see the English system copied exactly. If there was anything wrong with the account, he made a note of it. I have here the audit for the British Parliament for 1891 and 1892. Take, for instance, the expenditures on royal parks and gardens. You have a statement of the salaries, the grant that was made, what was spent less than was granted, or what was spent more than was granted, under the different items. and the certificate of the Auditor General to that effect. But when we take the report of the Auditor General of the Dominion for 1894, or any other of his reports of late years, we find that it is much more than an audit: it is a display of every item of expenditure and revenue down to its minutest detail, so far as his staff have the time to gather it up. and so far as printer's ink can spread it out to be reported to this Parliament.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there anything wrong in that?

Mr. FOSTER. Is there anything wrong in that? My hon. friend might say there was nothing wrong with a great many things which would yet be out of place under certain circumstances. There is nothing wrong with my hon. friend dancing a jig; but if he were to step out on this floor and dance a jig while the Speaker was in the Chair, his act would attract attention as being somewhat out of place. There would be nothing wrong in the Auditor General, if he took it into his head, making his volume five times as large as it is by putting in the names of and the names of those who did not. Take, for instance, the first thing in the Auditor General's Report. There is a list giving the names of persons who received pay from more than one source, exactly the amount received in each case and the source from which it was received. Is there anything wrong in that? my hon, friend would say, No. nothing wrong in that, and the Auditor General does not say there is anything wrong in it. The law permits the payment; the House of Commons passed the law; the administration is acting according to the law. There is no audit in this. The English audit, pose we take that argument and see what it and what was formerly the Auditor Genewas founded, and the Act gave the Auditor amount over or what amount under the grant. and if at any time he found that there was a theft of money or any wrong in any way, he would simply make a note of it and call the attention of the House to it. But this report goes very much further. It is a display of items which have nothing to do with an audit. Sir, you may look through the Audit Act without finding anything that forbids the Auditor General to display all these items, but you will find also that the general tenor of the Act is to provide for an audit such as the Auditor General first made. He is to take the expenditure and the grants made by Parliament and to see that the expenditure is made in accordance with the grant, and if there is any overexpenditure or under-expenditure, he is to make a statement of that fact—not to put down the details of every transaction with every Tom. Dick and Harry who happened to be paid for a pound of nails or a hundred feet of boards. Now, do you see how unfair this is in some respects, and how misleading to members of the House. If the Auditor General's Report is to give the details of everything that is bought and sold, there ought to be alongside the specification in each case. Otherwise we are led into difficulty in discussing the matter in this House. And if we, with our knowledge of the technique of these matters, are apt to be mishow much more are the public led. whose hands this volume may hapinto pen to fall, likely to be misled. have the generic name given in any case, but you may have a dozen species of that thing, varying in value by hundreds of dollars. Simply to give the name and the price, without any specification as to quality or anything of that kind, is really wrong information. I will not pursue this subject any further at the present time. I want to say this, that I do not think we can grant, on this petition, the committee that is asked for. To grant a state committee, a committee of the House. on the statement that two men have been refused promotion, and every male inhabitant of Canada to whom that $500. in a year of stringency, has been taken from the contingency account, is, I ister of Finance did not feel at all disposed. think, a request which the House can hardly as he intimates, to be in any way concernacede to. What the Auditor really asks ed in enlarging the volume of the Auditor the House to do is to censure the Government, and this from an appointee of Government and a member of the civil service is too absurd to consider seriously.

Mr. COCHRANE. How much salary are these two men getting now?

Mr. FOSTER. I think they are getting $1,400 each, one has lately come to the maximum and the other has been there for a year or two its way clear to grant a commission upon these grounds. It may, however, become necessary some time or other for the Government to have a special commission appointed who will take up this whole question of audit, and report upon the matter for the information of the Government and the House; but the committee that is asked for; by the petition, and, on the grounds that petition sets forth, cannot be granted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Like a lady's letter. I think the pith of the hon. gentleman's speech was in his postscript. He made it very apparent, indeed, that he regretted the good old days when the audit was compressed into a space that was not likely to give any trouble to the Department of Finance, or to the supporters of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. And your days, when there was none.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. the party who created the audit, and I created it with knowledge. I knew that when our expenditure was a matter of $14.000.000 less than the present Government had to provide for, there not likely to be much necessity for an audit; and if the hon, gentleman had imitated my example, and if, in the space of five years and after, he had had to encounter an expenditure of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 incurred by his predecessors, and yet was able to point to a total increased expenditure of barely $200,000, there would be much less need for an audit than we have now. However, it is clear that the real offence the Auditor General has committed, as the Minister made abundantly clear before he concluded his remarks, was this, that the Auditor General—who, I beg to inform him, is in a very special sense an officer of Farliament, as contradistinguished from an officer of the Government-has given, for many years back a huge amount of information to the people of Canada which has been, no doubt, very inconvenient to the hon, gentleman and his friends. The Auditor General has brought to light a vast number of expenditures which reflect no credit on the Government of which the hon, gentleman is a member, and I have

General's Report. I am bound to say that in the report as it stands, there is quite enough to give food for reflection, not merely to the hon, gentleman and his supporters, but to all persons throughout this country who care to know how it comes to pass that to-day we are spending very close on $40,000,000 for services which ought never to have cost this country $25,000,000. and, with proper and wise administration, The Government cannot see never would have cost this country $25,-000,000. Now, Sir, the hon, gentleman was good enough to point out the marvellous increases, the startling and sudden jumps, which have taken place in the Department of the Auditor General. Did he ever hear of a very remarkable sudden jump which took place in the case of a Mr. McLeod, who. I think, was pitchforked into the Civil Service with very little experience at all, and who, if I am not mistaken, is now receiving about $2,400 a year as Assistant Receiver General, somewhere down in St. John, a gentleman with whom the Minister of Finance is very familiarly acquaint-

The second secon

Mr. FOSTER. I know him well, and he is a fine fellow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. he was promoted to about $2,400 a year, with very little merit, except that he happens to be a rather close connection of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FOSTER. His merits are undoubted, but you are wrong in your figures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount he receives?

An hon. MEMBER. Two thousand two hundred.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will Now. Sir. give him the benefit of $200. the hon, gentleman went at considerable length into the question of the amount which the Auditor General's Department now receives. I have taken the trouble to look at the details of that department in the year 1892, and I find there were then twenty-five officers, whereas there are now twenty-six. Those twenty-five officers, in 1892, received $25,095; the twenty-six are now receiving $26,740. Well, deducting the $500 which, I suppose, would be about the amount paid the extra clerk employed since that time, it does look as if there was no very great increase in these four years, but a vastly less increase than the ordinary statutory allowances would provide. Now, were these twenty-six officials receiving the average statutory allowance of $50 a year, which is rarely refused in the other departments, the expenditure for this office would be $30,000, in place of $26,740. Applying not the slightest doubt myself that the Min- that test, which, I admit, is a somewhat rough one, but still a reasonably fair one, it would appear that there had been, since 1892, a period of four years, making allowance for that officer I spoke of, a total increase of $1,200, all told, in the Auditor General's Department; while the ordinary statutory increases of $50 for twenty-six men would have amounted to about $1,300 for one year; so that the increase in that way has been about one-fourth, apparently, of the ordinary increase which could have been expected to take place. Now, there may be a sufficient explanation for that; I do not know whether there is or not; but I do say that prima facie the fact that the Auditor General's Department merely received an increase of $250 or $300 a year for four years, does look a little like no very rapid promotion, no very particular recognition of the services which his officers may have rendered. I see, too, that in 1892 -and in 1891, for that matter-there was just the same staff, apparently, of chief clerks, and first and second-class clerks, that there is now. In 1892 there were three chief clerks, one first-class_clerk, and five The number of thirdsecond-class clerks. class clerks appears to have been the same. As I have said, there may be a sufficient reason, but it is perfectly apparent that the annual increment in that office has been very considerably below that which has taken place in several of the other offices. I did not hear the Finance Minister state that there had been any great number of removals, or that there had been any great number of officials placed on the superannuation list from the Auditor General's Department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). None at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; there were several officers placed on the superannuation list, but, unfortunately for the comparison, they have all died, while the Finance men have lived.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. have been worked to death, in fact. But I will let that go. Now, I am rather inclined to think that it would be in the interest of the Minister of Finance to deal a little more liberally with the Auditor General. The Minister of Finance himself stands, to a certain extent, in the same relation that the Auditor General does to the public expenditure; and although his good intentions have been vastly in excess of his performances, and although he has tried, at times, with very poor success, indeed, to curb the extravagances of his colleagues, I think for the purpose of keeping his colleagues in order, there is no better or valuable official than the Auditor General. The Auditor General, and here I take issue with some state. ments made by the Finance Minister, by displaying in the fashion he has done all the details of expenditures which have taken most wholesome check on the natural extravagance in which all the departments will indulge unless very strictly curbed.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like the hon. gentleman's opinion as to that being a good audit.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say it is a very valuable service to the country, and is highly appreciated. There is no bluebook issued by this House for which I have received such an immense number of applications as for that of the Auditor General.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, I say there is no blue-book issued by this House, if hon. gentlemen will take the which, read the newspapers caretrouble to fully, furnishes so many good and useful texts and so many illustrations of the extravagance which has led us to cur present pass, because I have no hesitation whatever in saying to the hon, gentleman that however much or little he may hold himself personally responsible for it, the position of Canada to-day, with its estimated expenditure of $39,225,000 is in itself a proof, especially in view of the fact that we bave a population of barely 5,000,000, that it has been most extravagantly governed; and I have not the slightest doubt if it had not been for the Auditor General and the display made from time to time of the way in which the people's money goes, that expenditure would have far exceeded even that enormous figure. It is perfectly clear that Parliament created the office of Auditor General and gave to the occupant of the office a tenure similar to that of the judges, it intended him to be in a particular. sense an officer of Parliament and independent of the Government of the day. That was the evident intention with which that Act was passed, and to a very considerable extent, and to the credit of the late Prime Minister, be it said, that was always recognized by Sir John Macdonald at least. But it is equally clear to every hon. member on both sides of the House that it is utterly and entirely impossible for the Auditor General to discharge his functions properly unless he is allowed reasonable latitude in the matter of having a proper staff. It would be utterly and entirely absurd for us in one breath to say that this shall be an independent officer, the Government shall not have power to dismiss him at their pleasure and shall not have power to compel him to do this or that, although in certain ways, provided by statute, they may override him. leaving him however the right of appealing to Parliament and stating the grounds of between himself and the the difference Government, and in another breath to refuse to such official a reasonable staff to enable him to discharge his duties. In his petition before us the Auditor General makes place in the public departments, places a a statement which should not be disregarded.

He informs us that he is obliged as it is for the Auditor General to ask. I note that to work his staff to an extent that he cannot in the Department of Secretary of State, hope to continue for a long time; he tells where there does not appear to be an overus that he wants a small addition to his clerical staff and that be believes such is necessary to the proper administration of ment of Printing and Stationery, $2,000 is the work, and that he is compelled, however allowed under this head; in the Department regretfully, to appeal from the decision of of the Interior there are two distinct allowthe Minister, which for his own convenience ances made, $1,800 in one branch and $1,800 he would avoid. I would not upnoted any in the Department of Indian Affairs, $3,600 other member of the Civil Service. Lolding in all; against $1,800 asked, but not granted, office under ordinary tenure, in appearing to the office of the Auditor General. The to Parliament; but I contend that the Auditor General is our servant, is in a special sense a servant of the House, in contradistinction to a servant of the Government of the day. The Auditor General was are appointed for that purpose, the Act shows for clearly and distinctly this intention, and the think it is perfectly proper to ask, why fact, to which the hon, gentleman aliuded, single out the Auditor General's Department shows this, for he alone of all the officials out of a dozen departments for a special allowed to promote, although not to: appoint, showing distinctly the great difference existing between him and any other head of a department. How is it possible that he should discharge the duties properly unless allowed a reasonable staff? And I am bound to say that looking at the amount of work done, looking at the character of the work, it appears to me that there are very few departments indeed in which it is more necessary to have more capable officers or men who will work more freely in the public service than in such a department as this, and if you take away from those officers all hope of promotion and let it be understood that when a man goes into the Audit Department his salary will be smaller and his chance of promotion less than in any other department, or at all events that he will advance much more slowly, most surely you hamper the Auditor General and by degrees will impair the efficiency of his I showed from the records of 1891-92 that the rate of increased expenditure in his department is very much less than could have been expected; that whereas in those nary $50 increase, there would have been site that the people should do so. But the an addition of $5.000 to the total instead of fact is, and if he regards his own popularity about $1.200, allowing for the salary larity and the interests of his own party, four years, had the officers received the ordiof the extra officers. Let us come to consider another matter of which the Auditor General complains, and that is the fact that his allowances have been cut down. It appears to me that this is an extraordinary step for the Minister to take to leave almost every other department in full possession of such clerical assistance as it needs and cut down the Auditor General of all men in the world. As my hon, friend from Bothwell pointed out, the Governor General's Secretary's office receives the same clerical assistance; the Department of Justice is reduced to some small extent, and I must say, with all due defference to the Minister of Justice, that if he requires clerical assistance to the amount of $2.500, which is put down in the Estimates, $1,800 is not an excessive sum his Supplementary Estimates. The reduction whelming amount of work, $1,600 is allowed for clerical assistance. In the Department of Printing and Stationery, $2,000 is same remark applies to all the departments. Agriculture alone excepted, I suppose in consequence of all census returns being and all these completed. departments allowed precisely same the clerical assistance \mathbf{as} before. reduction? Surely it is quite as important that we should know how the public money is spent as we should be informed as to what happens in the Department of Interior or Indian Affairs, or Printing, or even Public Works. It does appear, looking at the two facts to which I have called attention, as if the Auditor General had a strong prima facie case for coming to this House and saying that he was rather unfairly treated in this matter. I have no doubt that the amount of work thrown on the department has increased in a very unusual degree. The very fulness of details, to which the Minister objects as much as to the size of the volume. and the very great particularity with which the various expenditures are given, afford proof enough that the officers of the department do not eat the bread idleness whatever else they may do. And there is this other point which the Minister would do well to consider. As I have said, there is no single blue-book issued which the country pays more attention studies more carefully than the Auditor General's Report. It may not be pleasant always to hon. gentlemen oppo-I would say to him: Just now on the verge of a general election the worst thing that he could do would be to allow it to appear, that he was anxious to diminish the strictness of the investigation which the Auditor General is making. I add, that in the general public interest, which in this matter undoubtedly ought to govern the House, I think he would be well advised to lay down the rule, that the Auditor General should be interfered with as little as possible. I do not think there is the slightest risk that the Auditor General would ask for any extraordinary or any excessive appropriation. In point of fact the Auditor General is asking for less, or the Minister is giving him less, both in his main Estimates and on the two together, I see, amounts close on to $1,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Some older men have died out, and younger men are going in at less salaries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, if you are able to cut him down on the main Estimates, it is all the better reason for giving him the little paltry assistance he asked for on the minor ones. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had a special grudge against the Auditor General. I am inclined to think that if he understands his business, he would know that the Auditor General is a very valuable buffer between himself and his colleagues, particularly those in the spending departments. But, I strongly suspeet that the Finance Minister—and the whole of these Estimates look like it—that the hon, gentleman wherever he could, and wherever he dared, made reductions without much consideration of what the consequences would be. Where he stumbled against some refractory colleagues, he was not able to cut much, but as the Auditor General was not a colleague, he was able to make a cut there, and he did it accordingly. We know exactly what these contingencies amount to and how they are managed. We know perfectly well that at a future time it is the easiest thing in the world to supplementarise" in favour of these other departments, if they happen to require to expend a little more than is given them. Therefore, it would be a perfectly safe thing, if he wanted to make a show, to do as his predecessors and himself have done before, and cut down in some cases, knowing that it did not amount to anything, for if there were no Supplementary Estimates this year, there would be Supplementary Estimates next year, and they could all be replaced without inconvenience to anybody. This, however, does not apply to the case of the Auditor General. I dare say, as the Finance Minister made very clear, it is not altogether pleasant to have all these details paraded. There is no doubt whatever that they do supply a good deal of food for thought and meditation to persons who cannot for the life of them understand, no more than I can, how it comes te pass that we require nearly forty million dollars a year to run the Government of this country. I have no doubt that the various details that we find in the report of the Auditor General, do give occasion to a great many persons to reflect rather gravely on the way in which Canada is governed to-day, and, therefore, I can quite understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) does not find it pleasant to have all these things extended. But the Pinance Minister says, that if the Auditor General goes into these details he should go into them a great deal more fully. Sir, I cannot agree with him there. I think the Auditor General does his duty very fully as it is, and I am not disposed to advise him. even at the suggestion of the Finance Minister, to go into very much more minutiae than he now does. I would rather recommend that this House, and particularly the members of the House who support the Government, should take the report as it stands, and read it, and digest it thoroughly, and come to a clear understanding as to how the money goes. If they do that, I am perfectly certain they will become, for once in their lives-that is to say, the great majority of them I hope—will become for once in their lives real earnest supporters of the Minister (Mr. Foster) in that policy of economy which he has so often proclaimed, and which up to this time, even with the assistance of the Auditor General—and it has been very valuable aid to him-he has found it so utterly impossible for him to put in practice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The point that has been raised has at any rate not produced the issue which the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has suggested. and that was: whether the Government was in favour of an audit or against an audit, or whether the Government was in favour of a thorough and complete audit or a partial and incomplete one. That is not the question at all. The Government and the Conservative party have been loyal to the intentions of Parliament in their regard for the Audit Act of 1878, and the amendments made to that Act since. They have proven that by never having suggested any departure in the slightest particular, from the legislation to secure that mose desirable object. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have greater respect for the office of the Auditor General than has the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), because the great benefit that the Auditor General seems to be in his eye to any Government (and perhaps that was the reason for his creation) is that he is a buffer-whether an old buffer or otherwise he did not say-but at any rate the great purpose of this officer, as the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) suggested, was to act as a buffer. Now, political history has shown us that there is much in that observation dropped by the way, because it fell to the lot of the late Alex. Mackenzie, Premier of the Liberal Government, to publish, after the defeat of his Government a very good and substantial reason for some sort of buffer. That hon. gentleman told us in unmistakable terms that it was almost an impossible task for him to guard the public treasury, and that he had to rest on his arms day and night to protect that treasury. It then apparently devolved upon the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to introduce into this legislature, a Bill for the creation of this grand buffer, and to assist his Premier in keeping off these hungry and dangerous supporters. The hon, gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has contended that it was always the intention that this officer should be a parliamentary officer, and under parliamentary control. the hon, gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) to his own Bill, and he will find that that was not his intention, and that when he introduced the Bill he did not propose that the Auditor General should be half so independent in the conduct of his office, as he is to-day. He did not propose that the Auditor General should have power, either to promote, suspend, or dismiss the officers of the Audit Department. That suggestion came from an outside member and was incorporated in the Bill. The hon, gentleman did advocate that we should keep, as nearly as possible to the English system of audit, and efforts were made in that direction, and all that the Finance Minister has contended to-day is in the direction of the English system of audit. No one at any time, whether at the inception of this legislation or since, has suggested that the English system, which was the system we attempted to copy, is violated in any respect. And, while the same great powers are given to the Auditor General in England as are confided in our Auditor, the Minister of Finance to-day made reference to the manner in which the Auditor General in England performs his duties, to show, as I take it, how far the Auditor General in Canada goes beyond the proper spirit of the discharge of his duty, beyond the scope of his duty, beyond the scope that was intended, and beyond the scope that serves any useful public purpose. No one will deny that it is to the benefit of the Opposition that there should be the greatest possible light thrown upon all affairs of Government, small as well as big. Often, public opinion forms around the smaller items of expenditure of Government, rather than around the larger items which more particularly concerns the public weal. But, I would submit for the consideration of hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House: whether it is not a most creditable thing for the Government of the day, 1878, that since with a system of practised audit \mathbf{as} you cannot find British Parliament—a system it in 8 of audit that lays bare every two-penny-halfpenny expenditure, and sets out the accounts in this enormous and bulky form-the Government has been able to stand criticism of every character, carping, generous or small, and has been able to live where strong and properly administered Governments might fall, in consequence of the slightest misconduct, simply because of an impression, a false impression, that might be created in the minds of many electors not thoroughly informed of the difficulty of controlling expenditure on the part of the best of governments. With all these facts and figures put before the public, the position of the Government to-day is as strong as ever. It reflects, of course, a great deal of credit upon the intelligence of the electorate; but I press that point to show to what an unfair extent any Auditor General may exercise what the House considers his powers, but what practice shows not to be his duty and not to be encouraged. I will make some references to very valuable information obtained on this point by the Public Accounts Committee in England, The Public Accounts Committee there, as we know, discharges duties of great importance and benefit to the state. They go, with the Auditor General, not on a venture to fasten on the Government and on the departments great wrongs; but they go with the Auditor General, as a business body, to assist him in a proper presentation of the parliamentary or national accounts; and, as I will show later on, their opinion and the opinion of the Auditor General in England, is totally at variance with the opinion of the Auditor General in Canada as to his duty and his position. I am surprised that in this House no comment should have been made upon an extraordinary and unparalleled procedure on the part of the Auditor General in petitioning the House of Commons in regard to the matter contained in that petition. It is perhaps as well that no point of order was raised, and that a full discussion was invited by the leader of the Government; but that the petition is irregular can hardly be gainsaid by any one. When Parliament created that officer and that office-whether he was to be wholly a parliamentary officer or not does not matter in this consideration -three modes only were specifically mentioned as to how and where he should be heard. and in what manner his views were to be laid before Parliament. In one part of his duties he was to communicate with the Treasury Board; in another respect, and for the information of Parliament, he was to communicate through the Minister of Finance as Receiver General; and he was at all times as in England the Auditor confines himself. in ventilating his opinion in regard to the proper audit and the proper means of audit —to be in communication with the Public Accounts Committee. These are the ways in which it is pointed out that the Auditor General may be heard by the Parliament of his country; but in taking the extraordinary and irregular course of presenting a petition to this House, which the hon, gentleman deems a censure on the Government of the day, he has ridden roughshod over the rules of this House. A personal grievance may be presented here by petition and may be discussed: but I challenge hon. gentlemen to find that departmental grievances, or grievances from the judiciary or from parliamentary officers, are fit subjects of petition or of consideration by way of petition by this Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman seems to doubt that. If he looks at the rules of this House he will find that Rule 86 states:

Every petition, not containing matter in breach of the privileges of this House, and which according to the rules of practice of this House can be received, is brought to the Table by direction of the Speaker, who cannot allow any debate, or any member to speak upon, or in relation to, such petition; but it may be read by the Clerk at the Table, if required; or, if it complains of some present personal grievance, requiring an immediate remedy, the matter contained therein may be brought into immediate discussion.

Let the hon, gentleman find a precedent for an officer holding this position, or any other position in the service of the Government, ventilating here, by way of petition, questions of this character, or questions concerning chiefly public officers who are members of the Civil Service. The petition involves. if it involves anything, an expenditure of public money; and the demand for a committee is also most irregular-so irregular that the hon, member for Bothwell did not press that upon the attention of the House for a moment. I pointed out, however, to show the rash, not to say the indelicate manner-

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon, gentleman challenge the Auditor General's right to petition the House and to set forth his reasons for doing so?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. say that the objection to that procedure has been waived, and that perhaps under the circumstances, it is as well that it should be; but I press the point upon the House. to show the indelicate haste with which the Auditor General has brought forward this one-sided statement, which the Government are convinced, as my colleagues inform me, and as I myself know in regard to many things within my own knowledge, is erroneous in many vital particulars. The demand for a committee in a matter for which this Government is certainly responsible—that is, the proper administration of that office and the seeing that adequate money is obtained from this Parliament in order to carry on the important duties of that office-could not for a moment be granted by this House without the House coming to the conclusion that the Government had lost the confidence of the House as a Gov-ernment in every respect. Such a committee could not be granted by a Government that is strong enough to stand, as this Government is. Now, the hon, member for South Oxford dilated with pleasure upon the fact that there was much food for reflection in the Auditor General's Report; and I have no doubt that that report is so framed as to make it acceptable to the Opposition. But how does that meet the point mentioned by the Minister of Finance, that an enormous account of material and style, whereas other part of that thick and bulky volume serves no purpose whatever, and that an enormous part of it contains misleading and inaccurate staements? But the Government of the day do not propose to say. "You shall not print the items, if you have the time and Parliament desires that to be done; but the Government of the day and Parliament ought to insist that if you attempt to put the details of those items before the public, you shall not vary or alter them in the Department of the Auditor General"; and, in that case, I take it, the sum the Auditor would require in order to have full transcripts made of all the accounts in detail, would be a sum that this Parliament would not for many a long day feel itself justified in granting. The work would be enormous. Take, again, the correspondence. What is it? I have had some experience of this in a department which has to do with many small items of expenditure. You find many pages in the report to which the Public Accounts Committee never thinks of referring-why? Because they relate to matters that have arisen between the accountant of some department and the Auditor's office, which have been adjusted, and as to which there is no dispute. The report shows that the two offices came into collision. A mistake is made; the Auditor General calls attention to it; rectification is at once made, and four or five letters are immediately sent to the printer to be included in the report. If my memory serves me right, the only reason which the Auditor General gave is the absurd reason that these letters showed the value of the office. Who asked him to prove the wisdom of this Parliament in any particular? What is the use of printing pages of correspondence when their publication cannot in any way benefit the public interest? Why, for instance, publish correspondence concerning how much every member of this House drew for sessional indemnity, and items of that character, which take up page after page.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why not?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. do not think any member of this House has ever suggested the good purpose of the correspondence to which I have referred or of the publication of details of expenditure in that way. Take, for instance, the misrepresentations in that report, perhaps owing to want of time-but ought not justice to be considered as well as time? Take, for instance, an item in connection with my department, in which police gloves are put down at so much a pair. The price seems extraordinary, and then further down you see gloves charged at one-third the price, a suspicion enters the mind of the reader as to how these prices come to vary. The explanation in the account will satisfy everyone. Regimental regulation gloves, for certain purposes, cost a certain amount, on port, ordinary gloves apparently go in at the same price as the special article. And so all the way through. To my mind, if the public and Parliament want that information, they want it in full, and it ought to the facts. If the staff at his disposal was be put in the report of realizable to the facts. If the staff at his disposal was ought not to be put in as his clerks are Parliament. Then if he were asked by the pleased to consider will suffice. Time and Public Accounts Committee why he did not again, page after page, there are the most investigate further, he could make his reply: unfair representations that could possibly be I did all I could with the staff at my commade. The hon, gentleman referred to the mand. He would then be examined as to question of superannuation. I think the the work his staff were employed upon, and Minister of Finance explained how much it would be for the committee to report to there is in the theory of the Auditor General, the House that the audit office was not suffion that subject. Those who are on that list connected with his office have died; those connected with the Finance Department on audit office ought to speak, and not by critithe list have not. The promotion of men has been more rapid in the Auditor Gen- dent, for the audit office to take a position eral's Department, as I am informed, than which makes it an ally of the members of in any other in the service of the Govern- the Opposition and causes it to speak from ment, taking the clerks all round. complaint can be founded on that? As regards the cutting down of the expenditure, nearly every department has had its expenditure cut down this year, as has been said more than once. But the only point on he holds—that is, if he is to be of service to which the hon, member for South Oxford seemed to dwell was this question of the $500 or so in connection with clerical assistance. It is well known that the Auditor General and the clerks of his department, instead of doing this work which he thinks will be in arrears, attend needlessly the Committee of Public Accounts which sits twice a week, even when that committee is not engaged in any system of audit but in an inquiry into the policy and the manuer of carrying on our public works. You will find at every meeting present the Auditor General himself and one of his clerks. A different course pursued by him would, I am satisfied, enable him to do much of the work he complains will not be done if he does not receive this $500 additional and have one or two promotions made. Let me quote one or two extracts from the petition to show that the Auditor General has most unduly misconceived his responsibilities and his duties as such. He says:

That it is quite uscless to make the Auditor General a parliamentary officer with the object of securing an independent examination of the expenditure of $40,000,000 and of the collection of the same amount of revenue, as well as of giving an intelligible statement in detail of all, while there is left entirely in the hands of those whose financial transactions he is to criticise, the power to give or withhold assistance, and the power to promote the clerks or keep them for ever in the same position.

That statement shows that he does not properly appreciate his duties in that connection. What are they? It is not for him to tell us how we are to establish an audit office, how we are to amend the Act, or

He is simply be put in the report as received by the only able to put so much work before Parlia-Auditor General from the department. It ment, he would place that work before ciently manned, or some other action would be taken. That is the manner in which the cising. It is not, according to English prece-What the Opposition benches. The object of the audit office is simply to ascertain the naked facts and leave them for Parliament to consider or discuss. In that way alone would the Auditor General properly fill the position any government and not to be, as he thinks necessary, hostile to or unpopular with any government. If he does his duty properly, it is to the disgrace and discredit of the Government that he should be unpopular. If he performs his duty as laid down by Parliament, under directions given him by the Public Accounts Committee, he does what any government should be grateful to him for doing; but if he steps outside of that, in the way he is attempting to do now, and goes beyond his duty, he creates the suspicion, in the minds of many in the country, that he has some object in making these criticisms and attacks on the Government. I propose not only to submit this petition to the test of eminent experts on the question in England, but to the opinion which the same Auditor General himself formed of his public duties as far back as 1879, when he first assumed the position, and also to the opinion given at that time from the Department of Justice, written by Mr. Lash, who was then Deputy Minister of Justice.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before I resume the observations that I ventured to begin before the House rose, I would like to add to what I said in referring to Rule 86. Of course, the Government did not take any objection, nor did any member of the House, to the consideration of this petition; and, perhaps, I went too far in the application of that rule.

What induced me to refer to it was this: The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) almost immediately-perhaps a day had elapsed, or the petition had just been read at the Table-on this motion, proposed to And that was advert to that petition. what was running in my mind, and the rule seems to refer to that. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to some of the statements in the petition, this extraordinary document of the Auditor General. I promised to emphasize from a point of view of the Auditor General in England and the the Auditor General's course was a course not contemplated by the legislature, and not justified by the practice obtaining in these matters; and, to show that he had unfortunately misapprehended his functions and the responsibility resting upon him. I think his course unfortunate, not only from his point of view, but in every sense, in view of his high and important office. I do not suppose there will be any dispute about this, however much we may differ about the facts-that nothing would be more unfortunate for the Parliament of Canada, and for the Audit Department, than that it should appear that the Auditor General had departed from the impartial position he should occupy. His duties, it may be said, are in some respects ministerial, and, in others, judicial. And the moment it can be feared even, by the pople of this country—to say nothing of the political parties, leaving them aside for the moment—that he is assuming a position of antagonism to the Government, or sympathizing with the party on either side of the House, the usefulness of his office would be gone; his usefulness, at any rate, would be gone. And it is with these ideas solely that I approach the criticism of this petition. To make his position strong with the country and strong with Parliament, there should be nothing that would induce a reasonable mind to assume that he wished to either attack or defend the Government of the To attack any party is none of his business; he is to be absolutely impartial. Now, he knows that before he presents this petition the responsibilites that lie upon the executive. He knows that the executive must stand or fall according to the opinion of this House, and, so eager is he for a verdict that he is induced, in addition to other sentences to which I have referred. to write as follows:-

No fair-minded man can conclude that the Audit Office clerks should remain at $1,074, while the general service is at $1,228, and is advancing. The innuendo in that sentence is obvious: the attack is obvious. And, Mr. Speaker. that innuendo is resisted and resented, and that attack, as will be seen from the observations of the Minister of Finance, can be easily met, and easily dealt with. But the Auditor General goes on to say:

It should not be left to the executive of the day to determine the number of employees of the Audit Office, and particularly the number of their respective grades.

Mr. Speaker, Parliament thought otherwise when the Bill establishing the audit office was passed, and the Government of that time, under whom the audit office was constituted, thought differently. Parliament, from that day down to this. has thought otherwise. And, in assuming the position of a critic, the Auditor General Auditor General in Canada the fact that is going altogether outside of his functions that Parliament intended that he should discharge. He says further:

That should be done by Parliament.

But he does not add, as he apparently assumes, that this should be done by Parliament upon the inspiration of the Auditor General, or upon his advice. He goes on to say:

If the Auditor General does his duty, he and his staff will be unpopular with the Government. no matter what may be the political complexion of the dominant party.

I say that no more unfortunate sentence could come from the pen of the Auditor General; no more unjustifiable sentence, under the circumstances, could be written It shows that he has absolutely by him. mistaken his duty and his position. Why should he say, for sooth, that if he does his duty, he and his staff will be unpopular with the Government? Why should he offer, or venture, or dare to come to this House with such an assertion? almost term it an impudent assertion, in view of the position he is understood to occupy in connection with the legislation that this Parliament has decided to adopt, and inview of his experience as detailed by the Minister of Finance. Why did he venture such a remark? Upon foundation could such a remark rest? Where has he ascertained that by doing his duty he became unpopular with this Government? Sir, I say, in corroboration of the statement of the Minister of Finance. that ever since I have been a member of the Government, I have never known the Minister of Finance, in Council or out of it, do otherwise than strengthen and fortify the position of the Auditor General, as his position was understood in the light of the legislation adopted. What Government was it that asked this Parliament to increase the emoluments that the Auditor General was receiving from Parliament, but the Government of the day, under its former leader? Who was it but the Government of the party in power that came down to Parliament and asked, time and again, for increases and promotions to deserving officers of the audit office, or those represented to be qualified for promotion and increase of salary? Yet without any facts, without the slightest justification, the Auditor General undertakes to tell this Parliament that if he and his staff do their duty they will be unpopular with the Gov-We have nothing to say against ernment. his staff; we assume that they do their duty. But we regretfully say that, if the Auditor General rushes into the political fray, takes sides with the hon, gentlemen opposite, places himself in confidential relation with the hon, member for Bothwell, who, of course, opposes this Government tooth and nail; that his usefulness in the country will largely interfered with, and that his reputation for impartiality will be absolutely destroyed, and in that respect he will not be able satisfactorily to discharge his duties. He attacks, in that respect, not only the Government of to-day, but any Government that may be formed; and I venture again to submit that in that matter he cannot have the sympathy of either side of this House. There is no hon, gentleman opposite who has ventured so far as to say that the Auditor General and his staff, if they do their duty rigidly, will be unpopular with the Government, whether Liberal or Conservative. For instance, let me ask hon, gentlemen opposite, do they agree that that gentleman and his staff will come under their animadversion and cease to be personae gratiae to them, if, as he states, they simply do their duty? It would not be going too far to say that that sentence is an insult to this Parliament, to hon, gentlemen opposite as well as to us. The leader of the Opposition shakes his head; I take it, therefore, that he agrees, and I am sorry to believe it, that if the hon, gentleman peradventure should become the head of the Government, and if the Auditor General and his staff should do their duty, they would be unpopular with the Government of which the hon, gentleman would be the head. Is he willing to take that position?

Mr. LAURIER. No; if he does his duty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER Exactly, and that is my contention. I say that if he does his duty honestly and fearlessly, he has a right to count upon the support of the members to your right and the members to your left. Therefore the statement of the leader of the Opposition is in support of the position I maintain, that that sentence in his statement is absolutely unwarranted. Far better that we should have no Auditor General, if there was a grain of truth in that assertion. Then he goes on and refers to a passage in his report of 1893, which evidently he thinks has not been carefully considered by this Parliament. But this reflection, I beg to say, is as much upon the hon, gentlemen opposite as it is upon us, particularly if the contention be right that was urged to-day, that he is a parliamentary officer. That statement made in his report of 1893, was as follows:—

Is it not better to show clear-headed and industrious men that you appreciate their intelligence and zeal by giving with pleasure to three the salaries you would be forced to give to four, and get from them more work than from six of the other kind, and of an immeasurably better quality? Then, the man who is brightened by his work being appreciated, respects himself and takes an interest in everything connected with his department.

So he has to instruct us; he has to instruct gentlemen to your right and gentlemen to your left as to the manner in which the Civil Service shall be conducted. You have passed a Civil Service Act, you have laid down certain rules for promotion, certain ideas as to the basis of a Civil Service organization, that should obtain in this country. But the Auditor General says that is all wrong, it is wrong to proceed from grade to grade, it is wrong to proceed according to the spirit of the Civil Service Act, but Parliament should go further and give the Auditor General rights that no man in this House would contend it was ever contemplated that he should possess. That is another criticism that ill becomes him in his office. Personally, I have nothing against the Auditor General. My relations with him, I may say have been pleasant from the time I became a member of the Government down to this day. But I am discussing matters of principle, just as the Auditor General wants to discuss them in his petition; and I refer to him merely as an officer, whether a parliamentary officer or an officer on the civil list, with certain privileges, certain peculiar privileges, given to him in regard to removals by this Parliament. But I say that is a criticism and an attack altogether outside of his sphere. That is a matter of opinion to be discussed on the floor of this House, that is a subject for the legislators of this country, and is no more a subject for him to bring before this House than for a second or third-class clerk in any branch That is the position of the Civil Service. that I believe I can support by good authority. Then, again, he has another sentence that I think it would have been well for him to have omitted from his petition, considering the position he occupies. He says:

The politicians have done enough for a man when they have secured his appointment.

No doubt it was the intention of the hon. member for South Oxford, as it has been the intention of Parliament ever since, not that politicians as such should secure appointments to the office of Auditor General, but that the responsible executive of this Government should have the right of appointment to that office. That has never been questioned in this Parliament up to to-day. and we are to learn from this impartial officer, we are to learn from this Auditor, if you please, to-day that ever since 1867 there has been something radically wrong, and that only political considerations prevailed in the first appointment, either to his office. or any office of any other department. I think that is an overdrawn statement, even regarding the system under which we live and under which this country is governed. Party men, hon, gentlemen opposite me today, may have that opinion, but that is nor a fair or impartial judgment of the considerations that prevail in appointments to office. Many good cases could be cited to illustrate the contrary. Then, again, he says:

Supposing there were a change of government to-morrow, what efficiency would there be in the Audit Office if the incomers could put friends, with short experience, and, therefore, insufficient knowledge of the more important work of the office, over the heads of those who have always done their duty, and have full knowledge

I call attention to that in order to put in a stronger light the authorities to which I will refer later in regard to the sphere and the duties of the Auditor General. Again, there is a sentence to which the Minister of Finance, the leader of the Government in this House, referred to to-day, where the Auditor says:

As long as your petitioner is in his present office, no matter what party holds the reins of power, every effort will be made to keep the financial affairs right, and in cases where it is impossible to do that, to make it as clear as possible to the tax-payers of the country wherein, in his opinion, the wrong consists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask how it can be that the Auditor General should attempt to keep the financial affairs of this country right? I say that the tax-payers of this country look at present to the executive to keep the financial affairs right. I say that the Opposition are charged with the duty of seeing that the executive perform those duties themselves, and the Opposition would be the first to deride, and sneer at, and laugh down any executive that attempted to shield themselves behind the Auditor General, and to say that Parliament had put that responsibility upon him as supervisor. But would the Auditor General like to appear as the responsible supervisor, for instance, of the charges, whether exaggerated or otherwise, that have been levelled against the executive in regard to the conduct of financial affairs

We are attacked, day in and day out, because of crass negligence, as it is alleged. by hon, gentlemen opposite in regard to the conduct of financial affairs. We are charged with having permitted large sums of money being improperly taken from the public treasury; we are charged with having allowed thieves to break in and steal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. – Hear, hear.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. These charges, I say, have not been founded upon facts. But suppose they were, as hon, gentlemen by their derisive cries of "Hear, hear," would intimate, would they take it as an answer from us that the Auditor General neglected his duties, that he did not exercise every effort to keep the financial affairs right? They know that if there is anything in half the cases they have urged before Parliament, that statement of the Auditor General would bring upon him a responsibility in connection with which he would occupy a very humiliating position, because, notwithstanding what he says of his powers and functions, if the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite be right, he is the man who is guilty, for he never smelled or thought of the wrong-doings those hon, gentlemen have tried to urge in this House, and before the country as naving been committed by the Government of the day. With all the detectives at his command, with all the efforts to pry into this department, and into that department, it is the great boast of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to their so-called scandals, that they, out of their own peculiar ingenuity, and with all their own peculiar means, unaided by the Government or any officer connected with the Government, unaided by this parliamentary officer, the Auditor General, or any one else, got upon the track of the guilty, and they proposed in their own particular way, to ferret out these iniquities and lay them bare. I have referred to some of the extraordinary statements most unfortunately put into that document, statements that will not, unfortunately for this country, and for this Parliament, leave him in as strong a position as he was before he put his name to those But I should like the House, statements. in order to appreciate some of the criticisms that I venture to make, to hear from the Auditor General himself what he thought his proper functions were, not on the eve of a general election, mark you, Mr. Speaker, not at a critical time, as this may possibly be, but when he came to that office with good intentions, when he had studied, as no doubt, judging from his report, he of this country from 1878 down to this date? | had studied the legislation from which our

Act was copied, the legislation of the Imperial Parliament. The leader of the Government in this House has to-day pointed out the marked difference in volume in the report, as published in 1877, and the report as published in later years. True, it is, that business may have increased, the expenditure may be larger; nevertheless, a difference in the system on the part of the Auditor General has been made clear. He began by following the English system in reference to the statement of the audit which he had made, as to the discrepancy between the vote of Parliament and the expenditure by the Government. or in regard to the object, or omission of that expenditure. In this report of 1879. the Auditor General says:

The Audit Act having been based on that of the Imperial Parliament now in force, the undersigned has assumed that, so far as circumstances permit, it is advisable in such contingencies as are not provided for by our Statute, to follow the system which has grown up under the English Act.

For convenience, I propose, and it is fair to the Auditor General to do so, to assume, as I have good warrant to do, that in every particular outside of the powers of appointment and suspension and matters of that kind, we follow the 'ipsissima verba' of the English Act. I take it that the Finance Minister, in the Mackenzie Government was warranted in making that statement, which he did, in 1878, that our Audit Act was practically a copy of the English Act. with the exception of those differences that were absolutely necessary; but, as regards this discussion, I have examined them, and in nearly every particular the powers are the same. After studying that Act, and studying the very valuable reports made by the Public Accounts Committee, from year to year, in England, the Auditor General wrote the sentence I have repeated. added this:

The appropriation accounts are made use of to provide Parliament with explanations of causes which led to expenditures different from what were anticipated when Parliament was asked to make the appropriation.

That is clearly the rule in England. ought clearly to be the course followed in Canada. But where do you find authority for the insertion of tittle-tattle, and correspondence between the departments that has never led to an investigation, that has never been the cause of observation in this Parliament during the period I have had a seat in the House, since 1883. Where do you find the necessity for that waste of printer's ink, printers' time, and public money? Where has there been the expression on the part of the Public Accounts Committee, or on the part of this House, that they wanted it, for a single expression of opinion would have been a justification

—no one denies it—of putting all these little items into his report; but the difference. I submit, between the Auditor General in England, and the Auditor General in Canada is this: That the one waits for these suggestions from the proper authority; the other rushes, without waiting for suggestions from any quarter, or, at all events. suggestions which are openly made-suggestions from the Public Accounts Committee, or from hon. members on this side of the House, or on the other-pell-mell into this extravagance and into the extraordinary document which is now before us. one without a precedent, in any Parliament governed under British institutions. The Auditor General, I say, began well, in 1879. He was new to the business, but he had, apparently, studied, as these extracts from his report show, the practice of an Auditor General governed by similar legislation to that prevailing in Canada. I would ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to something else in the same report, to show that at that time, when it could not be supposed there was any other motive behind the Auditor General than a desire to properly discharge his duties under the supervision and control of Parliament, he repeated in his report, an opinion given by Mr. Lash, the Deputy Minister of Justice, in 1879, for his guidance, I take it. a man in every sense qualified to advise the Auditor General on a subject of that kind. as no man in this House will dispute-and with Mr. Lash I agree in every particular. He said:

The broad question is, whether you should, or indeed whether you have the right to, inquire into the right of the Government to pass an Order in Council authorizing the expenditure of public money, or whether your duty and power as Auditor General is limited merely to seeing that any moneys, the expenditure of which has been authorized by Order in Council or depart-mentally, according to circumstances, have been voted by Parliament to be used for the purpose I have given the matter very careful consideration, and am satisfied that your duties and powers as Auditor General are confined to seeing that any moneys which the Government seek to expend, have been voted to Her Majesty for the purpose, and that you have no right to inquire into the legal right of the Government to do that for which they seek to expend the money which has been voted to them by Parliament. The question is one of principle, not of degree.

I pause to say that in my humble opinion, the Auditor General has not followed the advice of Mr. Lash, but has arrogated to himself powers and responsibilities that were never contemplated by Parliament to be conferred upon him. He has discussed such questions as to whether you should pay the subscriptions to newspapers in advance so as to get the discount, or whether you should pay the subscriptions when the year ran out. He has occupied pages of the report to lay before Parliament that some departments of the Auditor General. He has the power paid for subscriptions to newspapers the end of the year instead of the beginning, and had lost 50 cents sometimes upon the transaction. According to Mr. Lash, and I think. according to the best opinions upon that subject, that is not for him; that is for Parliament. The money was spent honestly, the money was spent under the vote of Parliament, in the case, for instance, to which I have referred. By an advance payment we might have saved something, but the amount was exigible from the Government when the account was sent in. The amount was voted and it was paid. His duty was done. and if he thought the members of this House were interested in the question of whether we might save a little discount, and to get that small and comparatively infinitesimal item to the benefit of the exchequer of this country, his duty would have been discharged as I believe the authorities show, by simply citing the fact that some of these papers were paid for at the end of the year instead of at the beginning, and that if we had paid for them at the beginning of the year we would have got them for less. Then the Public Accounts Committee and the Parliament of Canada, could have impressed their opinions upon the Executive, and after that it would have been a question interesting to this House. Mr. Lash, in that letter, continues to say:

If you have a right to inquire into the legal right of the Government to do something which may appear to you to be clearly beyond their powers as a Government, then you would have an equal right, and it would be your duty, to inquire into the validity, in a legal point of view, of every act done by the Government involving the expenditure of money. It is out of the question that any such responsibility should be cast Parliament never intended to make upon vou. you the judge in the first instance of the validity of all the executive acts of the Crown. It must be remembered that Government is reponsible to Parliament and to the people for their acts. It is for them to satisfy Parliament and the people that they did not exceed their authority. or to justify any excess of authority on their part, and. when necessary, to ask Parliament to confirm Once it were admitted that the their actions. Government had to satisfy the Auditor General, or any other person outside of Parliament, as to the legal validity of any proposed action on their part before such action could be taken, it is not difficult to imagine that the consequences might be disastrous.

All we plead for, Mr. Speaker, is not to restrict the legitimate powers of the Auditor General, but to take good care that this Parliament surrenders to no officer, whether an officer of the Government or an officer of Parliament, the responsibilities and duties of the Executive. We ask for an open and fair trial. We ask for no mercy at the hands of Parliament, or at the hands of the country; but we do resist and we do protest against the assumption of the position of a censor of this Parliament or of the Executive being in the hands of one man, no matter what safeguards he may think he has around him. Then, again, Mr. Lash, in that part of his letter, concludes:

A reference to the provisions of the Act under which you hold office, shows, I think, that your duties and powers are confined to these I have mentioned.

I would add this to Mr. Lash's letter. In the Department of Justice, if a letter is written under the inspiration of the Minister, the deputy would refer to the Minister's approval in that connection; and it is important in this particular, because Mr. Lash was just then an officer found in the department, appointed by the Government of which Mr. Mackenzie had been the leader, and instead of that letter being, as ordinarily would appear, under the instructions of the Minister of Justice in 1879, it was a letter written by Mr. Lash on his own responsibility and subsequently submitted to the Minister of Justice, who, out of the ordinary course, added, "I concur in this opinion." But let me go further. I have in this book a statement which will justify every criticism I have made in regard to the decency of the position that the Auditor General should regard in this connection; the decencies, for instance, of the relative position of the Auditor and the Government, let alone what was the intention of the Audit Act and of Parliament. It is a rebuke, in this report I hold in my hand, upon the action now adopted by the same gentleman, the Auditor General of this country. Mr. Mc-Dougall, the present Auditor General, after commenting upon Mr. Lash's letter in 1879, adds:

It is plain that the attempt to control, against the will of the Government, their expenditure, while within parliamentary grants, through a single person, the inferior of each of the members of the Cabinet in rank, would be out of the question—

Now mark you this, Mr. Speaker.

-would indeed be as useless to the country as it would be unpleasant to the officer.

And what is he attempting to do to-day? To criticise us in the boldest manner as to the conduct of matters placed, mark you, not under the control of the Auditor General. but under the control of the Executive. Any member of this House may in reason take the whole basis of the Audit Act; they may show that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was entirely wrong when he attempted to control the administration of the Audit Office, so far as the appointments to the office were concerned; but I can urge on the grounds I have quoted, and on the authorities I have cited, that it is not for the Auditor General to interpose and become a critic. It is his place to remain outside, in every respect, of the walls of Parliament. It is his place simply to act at the bidding, so far as Parliament is concerned, of the Public Accounts Committee; and the Public Accounts Committee have every means of obtaining the fullest information on the facts that it was meant that the Auditor General should submit, through these different channels I have mentioned, to the Parliament of this country for their consideration and action as well. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, if the House will extend its indulgence to me, I will refer to a very interesting discussion on a matter of this kind that took place in Accounts Committee in England. There had been there, as hon, gentlemen know, the fullest inquiry into the best system of audit, consistent with the responsibility of the executive—and that was always the marked feature-running over a long period of years. The hon, member for Bothwell to-day gave us a history of the audit system of England-and I do not quarrel with his history at all. All I say is that any student will find-and he himself, I believe, will agree with me-that while the desire was growing greater every year to secure a better check, a better audit, and if you like a better system, in regard to the dispesition of the moneys voted by Parliament, the most jealous care was taken by the English Parliament that in all these particulars the executive should never relinquish their authority, or control, or responsibility.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Over administrative votes.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir Exactly. So that, for instance, in all these particulars it would never lie in the mouth of the Administration of the day to say: This was all done by your Auditor General; this was all passed by the Audit Department. The responsibility in all these cases remained, and properly remained, on the shoulders of the executive. In this case we shirk no responsibility; we wish to conceal nothing; but we believe we are strong enough as a Government to resist the slightest invasion of the rights of Parliament or the rights of the executive at the hands of either an Auditor General or any other person. The responsibility we claim is ours. We are responsible for the conduct of that department. If, for instance, we find that suggestions made in this debate are founded upon facts-that the Auditor General is extravagantly conducting the affairs of his department, that he is going altogether outside of his functions, that in doing that he is absolutely wasting the funds of the people of this country-I take it that hon. gentlemen would not deny that it is our duty to come down to Parliament and ask for relief -to expose the situation. I take it that the officers of this department, who are placed under our surveillance and control to a large extent by the legislation of this country, are officers of the Government of Canada, and not officers of the Auditor General. Does any hon, gentleman dispute that? If he does, I ask, how is it that the appointments lie in our hands? And in regard to it that under the law he is to be the appointee of the Governor General in Council. and not of Parliament? How is it that in reference to all these officers the Auditor General's complaint is levelled, not against the Parliament of Canada, but against the Government? And is the contention to be persisted in that these officers-who, so far as their appointments and their salaries are concerned, hold their positions as do the officers of other departments-are to have their grievances ventilated freely on the floor of this House, and those grievances inquired into here, while other officers in other departments, similarly appointed and similarly provided for, are to remain dumb. and to continue to be, as these officers were evidently intended to be, officers of the Government of Canada, and in the Civil Service of Canada, with all its advantages and all its disadvantages? Now, I hold under my hand a lot of evidence taken on subjects akin to the one we are considering; and as I read it over to-day. I was struck with the difference that obtains in England and in Canada in the conception of this office. For instance, while hon, gentlemen assume to be protectors and advocates of the Auditor General, and seem to have a sort of unwritten alliance with him, in England the idea is totally different. There, in regard to the Auditor General-who, mark you, by their legislation is far more independent of the Government of the day than the Auditor General of Canada, and is given with the assent of Parliament, greater and larger powers—the whole idea is to assist the Auditor General and to assist every spending department in the service of the Government. and to embarrass none of them. I will not weary the House with attempting a history of this matter in England; but before Lord Northbrook's committee, Mr. Stansfeld, a member of Parliament, who had given a great deal of inquiry into the administration of the Audit Department and into the question of a proper audit of all the accounts of the Kingdom, was called; and afterwards Sir William Dunbar, the great authority on this subject in England, the gentleman whose name was mentioned when this Act was first suggested to the House, corroborated the views of Mr. Stansfeld as to the duties of the Audit Department. I will endeavour to give to the House the evidence, and not at great length. The Right Hon. James Stansfeld, a member of the House of Commons, was called and examined before the Committee on Public Accounts in June, 1871; and in case any hon. gentleman wishes to follow this matter up, I may say that this is taken from an Imperial blue-book, entitled Reports of Committees, Vol. 5, of 1871. At question 2270, Mr. Stansfeld says:

When you audit, there are two questions which you have to ask yourself, as an auditor. The first is, For whom do I audit? The second is, this parliamentary officer so-called, how is for what purpose, with what object do I audit?

The Controller and Auditor General audits the House of Commons, and his first for function in auditing is to see that has been spent except in accordmoney ance with the votes and with the Appropriation Now, as a practical man, if you were to Act. give him the audit and put it to his discretion how he should conduct the audit of the Army and Navy departments, he would never propose to take out of the hands of those great departments the whole labour and business and responsibility of a detailed examination of vouchers. Audit has to be conducted under certain reasonable and practical conditions. Every auditor He judges for himtrusts to a certain extent. self how far he may trust the ordinary conduct of accounts in a department whose accounts he has From time to time he takes up a porto audit. tion of those accounts and goes very minutely into them, and institutes what I might call a detective audit, but I do not know of any system of audit applied to the accounts of any commercial firm or of any company, which professes entirely to exonerate the department or the concern itself from the duty of understanding or looking after its own accounts.

Again he says, question 2271;

Sometimes the Controller and Auditor General is asked by a department to undertake a departmental audit.

Then he bears in mind that he is auditing,—mark the distinction—not only for the House of Commons but for the department, and that therefore he has to exercise a much closer and a much more detailed examination.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman says "hear, hear." That is just it. The trouble the Auditor makes in this case is that he is auditing for the departments and not for the House of Commons. That is the criticism, I would make, that he goes so far as to encumber his staff and I have further references which will make it clear that he cannot, with any staff we can put at his hands, honestly, fairly and fully present that audit to this House. He has never yet done so or attempted to do so. in my opinion. Another expert in these matters was called, Mr. Foster, not the leader of the House here, but a gentleman who has the same broad public knowledge of the way public business should be conducted. was asked:

What have you to say as to the possibility of detecting any irregularity from information which you might receive casually from any of the gentlemen at the War Office?

Mr. Foster was evidently a member of the audit department. He said:

I think that under the present system there is very little probability of detection. We are bound to accept, and practically the accountants render the vouchers for the amount recorded in the books, and not the sub-vouchers. We do not look into the sub-vouchers, but we accept the account and certificate of the departmental officers. That account might be composed of a variety of things, some of which might be improperly authorized, improperly made or improperly vouched. I have, in fact, no means of discovering irregularities or of bringing them under the notice of Parliament.

That is with regard to one of the largest spending departments in the Imperial Kingdom. Sir William Dunbar affirms the evidence of the Right Hon. Mr. Stansfeld, at question 2722, and says a little more. I would trouble the House to follow what he says in that particular. He had been asked to carefully consider this evidence and to come at a later day to the Public Accounts Committee and give them the benefit of his expert and mature consideration. He said:

I entirely concur in the evidence which was given by Mr. Stansfeld upon that subject, in answer to question 2270, on page 9. The views which he therein sets forth, so much more ably and lucidly than I could have expressed them, are the views which I have steadily maintained before this committee.

Again at 2725, he says:

Then, may we take it that that was your whole object in framing the two first paragraphs of your report?—That was my object; I have drawn the attention of Parliament to the difference of principle, because it seemed to me that, sooner or later, it might become a question for consideration, whether the powers of the Controller and Auditor General, on behalf of Parliament, should not be enlarged as regards the Army and Navy accounts. The question is distinctly for the House of Commons.

Mark this, Mr. Speaker, if you please:

If the House of Commons is satisfied with the present audit, so is the Controller and Auditor General. He has only to obey the instructions of the House of Commons, and not to lay down regulations for them.

I think that goes a long way to support the position I have ventured to take in this discussion, that this officer is not to instruct us, but that we were to instruct nim. Again, Sir William Dunbar says, in reply to the question: What extent of audit would satisfy you? I ask the attention of hon. gentlemen to this particularly, and I hope I am not wearying the House. I only submit this evidence for what it is worth. It affected my opinion, and it may have some weight with other hon. gentlemen. Sir William Dunbar was asked what extent of audit would satisfy him, and he replied:

I hold that that is a question which ought never to be put to me. It is not a question of what will satisfy me, but of what will satisfy the House of Commons. As I explained before, I am the instrument of the House of Commons. Supposing that an audit committee had been appointed by the House of Commons; they would have exercised the very functions assigned to the Controller and Auditor General. They would have made the whole of the public accountants accountable to them; they would, through the instrumentality of their own officers, have examined their accounts; they might have examined some accounts very minutely and others with a lighter hand, and, in their discretion, they might have made an audit of the Army and Navy accounts what they have prescribed for the guidance of the Controller and Auditor General. They would then, if they had discovered any inaccuracies or irregularities, have recorded their opinions thereupon, and they would have submitted these opinions to the House. That is precisely the process that I follow under the direction of the House.

Then the question was put to him:

Supposing the House of Commons were to declare itself not satisfied with the present limited appropriation audit which you conduct, and to give you the power and the staff necessary to conduct a complete audit, would not that be really calling upon you to do a second time work which had already been done within the War Office?

To which he replied:

That depends entirely upon the directions which may be given me by the House of Commons. An effectual audit does not necessarily mean a complete second detailed examination.

Then the question is put:

That is to say, by direction of the Act of Parliament?—Yes, I mean by direction of the Act of Parliament; the directions of the House of Commons under which I act, are embodied in an Act of Parliament. An auditor is not entitled to make regulations for himself; the regulations for his guidance must be prescribed by his employers. The House of Commons, therefore, must lay down the regulations under which their officer must conduct the audit of public accounts on their behalf. For reasons no doubt satisfactory to themselves, they have laid down those regulations to which I have pointed, some more comprehensive, and others, as in the case of the Army and Navy, more limited.

Again at 2752, he says:

The duties of the Controller and Auditor General are passive; to obey the instructions which are laid down for him; not to prescribe what they should be.

That is the evidence which, I think, is at least entitled to serious consideration at the hands of the House in support of the position I am taking, and that is that the Auditor General should not himself undertake to instruct this House as to the system; that that is a matter peculiar to the House of Commons; and when we want his assistance, we will ask for it and it will be suggested in the proper way how we shall obtain it. There are other questions that I would perhaps have been warranted in going into, but I find that I have already occupied so much of the time of the House by reference to what I believe valuable opinion, that I will not venture to trespass at greater length upon your attention. But I hope that in all I have said I have in no sense led the House to misunderstand the position which I believe the leader of this House, with the assent of all his colleagues, has taken up to-day. And it is not that we desire to flinch in any the most particular from thorough critical examination that this House considers necessary; but that we are most jealous that there shall be no interference with the functions of this House, or with the functions of the executive, mark you, on the part of any officer of a department, either in the Auditor General's branch or in any other branch, but that in the regular and constitutional manner, subjects requiring attention shall be brought forward by members of this House upon their responsibility.

No. 3. The NATION of the Property of the Community of the

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can promise the House that, though I follow the Minister of Justice in the debate and intend to refer to some of his statements and arguments. I shall not follow him in the length of time he has thought fit to occupy in dealing with this The hon, gentleman thought it necessary to occupy a half an hour before dinner and over an hour since dinner, not in discussing the petition of the Auditor General but in denouncing the conduct of that gentleman in language which I venture to say can hardly be regarded as judicious. Coming from the Minister of Justice, I will venture say that his language was extreme and ill-judged. The hon, gentleman knows that the Auditor General occupies a posiin this country which the general tion public would be sorry to see impaired. He is an officer of very great responsibility and power. Parliament has seen fit to invest him with authority which the executive, strong as the hon, gentleman pronounced it to be, have no right to interfere with. He holds his office by the same tenure as a judge of the land-during good behaviour, and no government. I care not how strong it might be, would dare to interfere directly with the Auditor General. The hon, gentleman has seen fit to berate and denounce that gentleman by the hour as though he were a common criminal. He has told us that the Anditor General's petition was both unconstitutional and impudent. After reflection he withdrew the first statement, and before he closed admitted that the Auditor General had pursued a perfectly proper constitutional course in laying what he believed to be his grievance before this House. So we start with the fact that we have a petition properly laid before us and containing statements that demand our careful attention. I venture to say, Sir, that in the discharge of his duties for the last sixteen years, the Auditor General, has so entrenched himself in the public favour that no government would dare directly to impair the usefulness of his office. He is recognized. Sir, as the economy branch of the Government, that branch of the Government which holds control over the extravagance which in the past has been reckless. And hon, gentlemen know this, and it is because they know it that they denounced him in this House. I rise for one to enter my protest against an officer so situated being denounced as this officer has been denounced to-night. So long as the Auditor General discharges his duties fairly, faithfully and fearlessly, he can only count on enemies in the executive, but, at least, he can hope for the endorsement and approval of members on both sides of this House who know how desirable it is that the checking of the public expenditure, should be real and not perfunctory. Now, Parliament has made the Auditor General an independent officer; but if he is not supported with a proper staff, you may do indirectly what you dare not do directly—you may make him an inefficient officer. The hon. gentleman told us to-night about the nature of the Auditor General's duties, and cites the evidence given in Britain, I think he said, in the year 1861-

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No ; 1871.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, 1871—at parliamentary inquiry in England, showing the opinions which certain gentlemen there held as to the functions of the Auditor. I venture respectfully to submit to the hon. gentleman that three-quarters of the quotations he made are entirely beside the mark. Because the Auditor General And why? here does not hold his office and does not discharge the duties appertaining to his office under any instructions from the executive or even from this House; but he holds his office and discharges his functions as they are prescribed in an Act of Parliament, and if he faithfully discharges his duties, whether he pleases or displeases the executive, he will gain the approval of the better men on both sides of the House. Now, instead of referring to the opinion of gentlemen in England, whoever they may be, it would have been better if the hon, gentleman had referred to the Act of Parliament itself.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. is almost a transcript of the Imperial Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In some respects it goes a good deal further. The Act provides for the appointment of an Auditor General and defines his duties. After providing for appointment and providing that the Auditor General shall have power to order the internal conduct of his own office, it goes on to provide in section 31:

The Auditor General shall see that no cheque issues for the payment of any public money for which there is no direct parliamentary appropriation, or in excess of such appropriation, the expenditure of which has been authorized by the Governor in Council; and he shall report to the Governor in Council, through the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, any case in which a sub-accountant has expended money out of the proceeds of any accountable credit, for any purpose for which there is no legislative authority, or beyond the amount for which there is such authority.

Now, the hon. gentleman knows that the Auditor General dare not shirk his duties in that regard. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that if any officer of the Government, whether he is one of the execu-Government, whether he is one of the execu-tive, or a deputy head, infringes the rule of the public service of Canada, unless, in addi-laid down there, the Auditor General is not bound to call him to account and to bring the facts officially before the proper authority and also publish it in his report? Act goes on further to provide:

No cheque for public money shall issue except upon the certificate of the Auditor General that there is parliamentary authority for the expenditure.

So that he is bound in every case where expenditure takes place to see that there is proper parliamentary authority for it. Then, after certain cases are provided for, the Act provides:

If the Auditor General has refused to certify that a cheque of the Minister of Finance and Leceiver General may issue, on the ground that the money is not justly due, or that it is in excess of the authority granted by the Council, or for any reason other than that there is no parliamentary authority, then, upon the report of the case pre-pared by the Auditor General and the Deputy of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, the Treasury Board shall be the judge of the sufficiency of the Auditor General's objection, and may sustain him or order the issue of the cheque, in its discretion:

2. The Auditor General shall in all such cases prepare a statement of all such legal opinions, reports of Council, special warrants and cheques issued without his certificate, and of all expenditure incurred in consequence thereof, which he shall deliver to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, to be by him presented to Parliament, not later than the third day of the session thereof next ensuing.

So, when the hon, gentleman talks about the Auditor General publishing what he is pleased to call a not very dignified language. the tittle-tattle of his report, he forgets that in all these instances the Auditor General is merely discharging his duties devolving upon him under the statute.

Mr. FOSTER. What you read does not give him the power you claim.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, it does.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a special case when certain contingencies arise.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say, in all these excepted cases, where he refuses to pass the cheque and is over-ruled by the treasury board he must publish the correspondence in his report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not what I referred to as tittle-tattle; but the ordinary correspondence that takes place daily.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The next section goes on to provide:

No payment shall be authorized by the Auditor General-

And this is a most material section of the law

-in respect of work performed, or material sup-required in that behalf, the officer under whose special charge such part of the public service is, certifies that such work has been performed, or such material supplied, as the case may be, and that the price charged is according to contract, or, if not covered by a contract, is fair and just.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But there is nothing about puting it in the report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want to show that every expenditure is to be examined by the Auditor General, and the requirements of this section have to be examined into by him to see that they have been complied with. Now, I want to say that every expenditure has to be examined by the Auditor General according to the requirements of this section, and he has to see that they are complied with, and to see that the charges are just and fair. Very well, if these are his duties, and he has to see that these charges are just and fair, in what better manner can he discharge that duty than by publishing the prices which the Govfor these articles in his I submit to the Governernment pay for annual report? ment that this ought not to be a matter of political recrimination at all; I submit that when the Auditor General publishes his report, containing the items, and the amounts paid for the particular services, he is, in that way, offering the best audit that could possibly be offered. And why? Because his report goes throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and the taxpayers themselves and their representatives here are then enabled to judge whether impositions are being practiced upon the Government. I say, in that regard, that the Auditor General's hands should be strengthened. repeat what my hon. friends from this side have already said, that the general public receive his report with the greatest pos-sible satisfaction. Before that report was published, the people of this Dominion were in almost absolute ignorance of what took place with regard to the expenditure of public money. The hon, gentleman says that the Auditor General has made the most unfair representations that can be made, on page after page, of his report; but the hon. gentleman failed to support that reckless assertion with any proof whatever. hon, gentleman made the assertion, but I did not see him take up the report and give one single instance that an unfair representation was made by the Auditor General.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. gave one instance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman said that the Auditor General had an ulterior design in probing the accounts. think it was an ungenerous assertion for the Minister to make; nevertheless, it was tion to any other voucher or certificate which is tion to make, and one that is not based upon a tittle of evidence. So far as my intercourse with the Auditor General has gone during the time I have sat in this House. I have found him most scrupulously careful to keep himself absolutely within the terms of his duty, and not to give the slightest word or hint to any member of the Opposition, beyond the information derived from his printed report. He is a man who has conducted himself in a way that deserves commendation at the hands of members of Parliament upon both sides: and I heard with extreme pain and regret members of the Government, and the Minister of Justice, especially, trying to throw a doubt upon the probity, and the honour, and the integrity of that official. Sir, the hon. gentleman ventured to give a most unfortunate illustration in respect to the criticism which the Auditor General has passed upon money spent for newspapers. What do I find in that particular? hon, member treats that as if it was a twopenny-ha'-penny matter of a few dollars. As a matter of fact, during the last ten years, I find that the Government have spent no less than $37,000 on newspapers for the several departments alone. While the hon, gentleman may not think that is a matter deserving of any comment or criticism by the Auditor General, I think the general tax-payer will thank the Aud-itor General every time his attention is called to that extravagant expenditure.

> CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How much could we have saved if we had paid them in advance?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know what you would have saved, but I know that if you do pay an unfair price for newspapers. the Auditor General is bound by the statutes to examine into it and point it out; and if the hon. gentleman thinks he should not do it because the amount is only a trivial $37,000, I venture to differ with him, and I think the House and the country will differ with him. It is just the same in the matter They tried to laugh it down of cab hire. at the time, but, as a matter of fact, the expenditure in that regard has been so enormous for the past few years that it has properly challenged the direct attention of the Auditor General. And so through all the Auditor General's Report. Now, the Minister of Justice says that suspicion in the mind of the reader is formed by publicity. I venture to say that if the Auditor General's report was not published, and was not circulated throughout this land, the suspicion would be intensified tenfold. because the public would never understand how these people can have managed to run up the expenditure from $24,000,000 to $40,000,000, as they have done. But the Auditor General's Report is calculated to cheered by the hon. member for Annapolis allay suspicion, and, in all respects where (Mr. Mills). It was an ungenerous asserthe expenditure is defensible, the defence comes out on a page of the Auditor General's Report, and requires no further comment. But where the shoe pinches is here, that in thousands of instances the expenditure is indefensible, and they know it, but they do not want the public to know it. Now, I venture to ask the hon. gentleman himself, who has had a large experience in the Public Accounts Committee. what position that committee would be in to-day if we had not the Auditor General's Report before us? We get two days out of the week for that committee, at the latter end of the session, with a great deal of We sit for two hours, and it takes trouble. five or six sessions to go through any large inquiry at all, and I say that if the details of the expenditure were not published in the Auditor General's report, if we had to move for them, and wait until they were brought down from the Public Accounts Committee, as formerly had to be done, all audit and all criticism of public expendi-The hon. gentleture would be avoided. man would then live in his political Utopia; he could spend what he liked, and challenge hon. gentlemen to show how it was extravagant.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman asks me a question; does he want an answer?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am replying to the hon. gentleman's statement that the publication of the items generates suspicion in the minds of the reader, and I wish to repeat again that if the expenditure has been just and fair, or within the limit of what is just and fair, no suspicion can be generated; everybody who wishes to defend the expenditure can do it, because the purpose for which it was expended, the amount which was expended, the time it was expended, and the person to whom it is paid, are all published.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman says that I made that statement. I know he does not wish to misrepresent me, and I wish to say that I was referring particularly to the police account. I did not say that the publication of the account misrepresented the facts; I said that the manner in which it was published did misrepresent the facts, and cause an unfair suspicion, and I instanced one particular case, the case of gloves. But I did not make the general statement that the fact of making the publication created an unfair suspicion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am willing to accept the hon. gentleman's withdrawal, and I am willing to let the statement he made with respect to the gloves, go for what it was worth. But I want to ask the House this: If the Minister of Justice believes, as he says to-night he does, that the manner in which that expenditure is set out in the Auditor General's Report is unfair, how is it that with the Auditor General attending every meeting of the Public Accounts Committee for years back, the hon. gentleman, with the book in his hand, has never called the attention of the committee or of the Auditor General to the fault? How is it that he has not called upon the Auditor General where he can answer for himself, and rise in the Public Accounts Committee, and explain? Instead of that, the hon. gentleman gets up in this House, where the mouth of the Auditor General is shut, and he can make no reply, and makes a charge which is calculated to undermine his character for impartiality. venture to tell the hon, gentleman that the position he took to-night is an undignified one, as well as an unjust one. Now, Sir, the hon, gentleman in quoting a phrase which read from the evidence he given in England, in this inquiry, said: "The duty of the Auditor should be "The duty of the Auditor should be a passive duty." Well, Sir, in the sense Auditor General that the is give instructions to the Government, no one disputes that position. The Government have not to give instructions to him in his own sphere; he is independent of the Government, just as the Government is independent of him. He has been made so by Parliament, and it will be a dangerous step when the Government asks their parliamentary majority to withdraw that independence from the Auditor General; it will be a dangerous day for the tax-payer of this country when the only check upon extravagant expenditure is taken away. venture to submit this to the House, that when the hon. gentleman made use of that expression that the Auditor should be a passive Auditor, his object was to compel him to act with just such a staff as the Government choose to give him, whether that staff is an efficient one or an inefficient one.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman cheers that. That shows I am right. Very well, now let us examine where this is gong to end. Suppose, for instance, that the hon, gentleman supplies him with an an inefficient staff, and the Auditor General finds that he cannot discharge his duties as prescribed by statute with the staff given him. Still, my hon. friend would say to him: You must remain perfectly passive, with the knowledge that you are not discharging the duty which you are paid to discharge; you are not to say a word, you are not to come to Parliament with a complaint. I charge that if the hon. gentleman's argument was carried to a logical conclusion the result would be this, that you would destroy the efficiency of the Auditor General's Department by an indirect blow, by a stab below the ribs; vou would do that which you have not the courage to do openly. Now, Sir, I was surprised to hear the Minister of Finance make the statement he did respecting the increase of expenditure in the different departments. Why, the hon, gentleman, after hearing the statement made by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), should have been more ingenuous. He talks about the expenditure of the Auditor General in 1880 and compares it with 1894, and triumphantly asks his followers: Has there not been a very large increase in the staff of that department between 1880 and 1894? And asking the question, he supposes he has answered it. Did not the hon, gentleman here read to him that since 1880 there has been an enormous amount of work thrown on that department, work that did not devolve upon it in 1879 and 1880. What are the facts? The whole Indian accounts in 1882 were placed upon the Auditor General; the whole accounts connected with the Franchise Act were placed upon him in 1886, and the examination of the revenue returns in 1887—a new branch altogether-the Auditor not having been charged with this work until 1887 when it was entrusted to him by an Order in Council. The hon, member for Bothwell reminds me that this work required four additional clerks. Then there were the accounts of the banks, the currency account in 1887, and stores account in 1894. These go to show that it is not fair or just to the Auditor General to take up the staff as it stood in 1879 and compare it with 1894, and say, look at the great increase in the staff, and then declare that no increase should be asked. Such a course was calculated to mislead the judgment of the House and the country. The administrative audit was also added after that time. I will not trouble the House by attempting to justify the phraseology and verbiage of the Auditor General's petition. The Minister of Justice has criticised with the greatest severity the language used in that petition; but he failed to tell the House this, that the language although used in a broad and general sense must be understood to have reference to the specific duties of the Auditor General's Department, and understood in that sense, it is quite defensible. The Auditor General does not assume to dictate to this House and the country as to the mode of regulating the financial affairs, except in so far as the expenditure is concerned and so far as it comes within the purview of his powers as laid down by statute. I am not here to justify the Auditor General in attempting to dictate to the House and the Government the financial policy; that is a matter altogether beyond his ken or control. I have never heard that he has assumed any such power, I think he has kept fairly well within the duties of his office, difficult and onerous as they are, and not calculated at all events to make him a most popular officer, but I repeat that he is an officer whose hands should be strengthened by this House on all proper occasions, and I venture to say that this is an occasion when he should receive the moral support of members on both sides. I am not competent to judge whether there should be an increase of one or two, or three clerks in his department: all he asks is that a joint committee should be struck, composed by members of both sides of the House, to determine that question. The proposition to my mind does not seem to be an unfair one. I do not think it should be refused, as the leader of the House refused it, and I think that the la :guage in which that officer was denounced by the Minister of Justice is altogether indefensible.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) generally begins a judicial speech by saying that the hon, gentleman who previously addressed the House did not speak in a judicial manner, but before he closes his speech it is evident that he preaches that which he does not practice, because no one will charge the hon, gentleman with having delivered an eminently judicial speech.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. DICKEY. There is one opinion only. In my remarks I will follow the hon. member for Prince Edward Island in reply to the Minister of Justice. The hon. gentleman said the quotations made by the Minister of Justice had no reference to this case. The quotations made by the Minister were with respect to the English Act, which is admitted to be in terms almost identical with the present Act, and where there is a difference from the present Act it is in favour of powers given to the English auditor. And yet the hon, member for Queen's said that the quotations of the Minister of Justice, which showed the limitations which the constitutional authorities in the mother Parliadeemed it necessary to around the power of the Auditor Gen-England, of were noï relevant eral to this discussion. What does the hon. for Queen's think of the opinmember of Mr. Lash, the Deputy ter of Justice of the late Government, an opinion that was adopted by the Auditor General himself? When did the constitution of the office of the Auditor General change? Was the Auditor General right when he assumed office and stated his view of his functions in his report of 1879? And was Mr. Lash right when he gave his view, because if Mr. Lash was right, delivering a responsible opinion for the guidance of the Government, the hon. member for Queen's and other hon. gentlemen opposite are wrong in the opinions they are maintaining to-day, possibly for political purposes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We did not go on Mr. Lash's judgment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Auditor did.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon, gentleman says we could do nothing without the Auditor General. I am not here to find the slightest fault with the office of Auditor General; it is not only a very desirable office, it is almost a necessary office. The hon, gentleman said that previous to the appointment of an Auditor General, in 1878, the people of the country knew nothing about the finances.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; I said the details.

Mr. DICKEY. I beg to remind the hon. gentleman that the Opposition in the days before 1878 took very good care that the people understood the details and the general plan of the finances, and without the assistance of an Auditor General they showed so many irregularities on the part of hon, gentlemen who now sit opposite that they were forced into Opposition, where they have remained ever since. So although this is a very important office, still it is not an office absolutely essential to enable the people to understand the finances, and the vigorous opposition was quite as good in that way as is an Auditor General himself. What is the gist of this matter? This is not a large question in extent, though perhaps it is in principle. There are two matters at issue here between hon, gentlemen sitting on the opposite sides of the House. The first is: Should this petition be considered by What action the House? The next is: should be taken upon it? In the first place, with respect to the presentation of the petition to the House, I do not suppose it is unconstitutional, or that it should be ruled out of order, although there might be some ground for a contention of that sort. But I submit to the House in all sincerity that, if this is a practice which it is desirable for this House to favour, what is the result of the Auditor General's request? It is that the Governor in Council shall take action with respect to his department, either by the promotion of clerks, by the appointment of new clerks or by the granting of money for extra clerks. Therefore the Auditor General, who is a civil servant, is coming to Parliament by petition, and asking that the hand of the executive be forced with respect to the disposition of public money. Is it to be said here, that the Deputy Minister of any of the different departments-

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman pardon me. I am quite sure he would not want to do an injustice to the hon. gentleman. I may have misread his petition, but if I have read it correctly, the Auditor does not ask anything except that a committee of both sides be struck to see how far his demands might be reasonable.

Mr. DICKEY. Quite so. Does the hon. gentleman think it a proper system to obtain, that the deputy heads of the various departments of the Government should petition Parliament to review the acts of the Executive?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. DICKEY. Certainly not. Sir, if there is one thing that strikes a man who comes to Ottawa and remains here for a few years. it is that here, as in other countries, there is a tendency in human nature for a man to magnify his office. There is a tendency for a man who has become the head, or a permanent officer of a department, to become wedded to the routine of that office, and I do not know any officer in which that is more patent than in the Auditor General himself. He began a very humble individual, discharging functions which he thought the Parliament of Canada had placed upon his shoulders, and discharging them properly. The hon, gentlemen opposite got hold of his report, and they began to praise the Auditor General, and to persuade him that he was the 'imperium in imperio,' that he was the man on whom they depended for all the material they found against the Government. and from the time that the Auditor General fell under the evil influence of the counsel of hon, gentlemen opposite, he began to magnify his office. I ask any hon. gentleman who is unprejudiced to read that clause in the petition to which the Minister of Justice has referred:

As long as your petitioner is in his present office, no matter what party holds the reins of power, every effort will be made to keep the financial affairs right, and in cases where it is impossible to do that, to make it as clear as possible to the taxpayers of the country wherein, in his opinion, the wrong consists.

I ask any hon, gentleman to read that and tell me, if it is not the utterance of a man who is so puffed up with the office he holds and the functions he discharges, that really he begins to consider himself the whole electorate, and the whole Opposition, and the whole press of the country as well. He says, I will do this. I will keep financial affairs right, and if I cannot keep financial affairs right, I will inform the country about it. That is the utterance-not in the slightest degree of a man who is actuated by any improper motive—but it is the utterance of a man who is suffering from this disease of official magnificence which I have described.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That disease is very contagious.

Mr. DICKEY. I have not myself been long enough in office to acquire it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We are warning you.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will acquire it for some time to come.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He is not very anxious about it.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think he is. Now, the clerks of the Auditor General's office are appointed by the Governor in Council under the express authority of the Act. The hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) says that the Auditor General was made an independent officer by Parliament. I entirely disagree with him in that. Parliament was invited to make him an independent officer. and to give him the right to appoint and promote and classify his own clerks, as under the English system, but Parliament deliberately refused to make him an independent officer in that regard. The hon, gentleman (Mr. Davies) may read that Act through and through, and he will find that the only way in which the Auditor General differs from the ordinary civil servant is in his tenure of office, in which respect, of course, he is entirely independent of the Executive of the

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is the great thing.

Mr. DICKEY. But the clerks which he appoints, and the clerks which inferentially his petition asks should be appointed, are the appointees of the Governor in Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In the first instance.

Mr. DICKEY. You may try to get around it any way you like, but in the end it comes to this, that this is an attempt on the part of the head of a department under this Government, to come to Parliament by way of petition, and through the means of a committee of the House, to force the hands of the Government to promote the expenditure and importance of his own department. It is a bad principle. It would lead to trouble. It would take from the Executive of the country the responsibility which it is forced to bear for the expenditure of the public money. Suppose that the Government acceded to this request, and as they could do, put a majority of their own friends on the committee, and suppose the committee recommended extravagant expenditures in the Auditor General's Department, what would be the position of the Government? I would like to know from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) what would be the ministerial responsibility then? How could you graft on the English system of ministerial responsibility any such odious excrescence as an Auditor General who is independent of the Government in that way, and for whose expenditure nobody is responsible. He is not responsible himself, the committee of the House would not be responsible, the Government would not be responsible, and the result would be that public money would be spent without anybody being responsible. One more point, Sir, and I have done. What is the substantive trouble here? What is com- to say that he believed the Finance Minister plained of? Why, if you listen to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), you would imagine that there was some great wrong being perpetrated on the Auditor General; that he was subjected to persecution by this Government; that he had been carrying out his duties in the midst of all the difficulties that could be thrown in his path; that this Tory Government, in order to cover up their own iniquities—which the hon, gentleman from Queen's '(Mr. Davies) alluded to in such a judicial and calm manner in his speech-that this Tory Government. in order to hide these, had been oppressing the Auditor General. Well, there is nothing in the petition whatever to endorse that. The petition says that the Auditor General complains that his men are not promoted fast enough. What has that got to do with their work? Will John Smith, who is a first-class clerk, do any more work because you make him John Smith, a chief clerk, or will Tom Jones, a third-class clerk, do any more work if you promote him to the second-class. It is not proposed to add a to the department. single man that the Auditor General not alleged not alleged short handed. It is he has been that in any one instance hampered for want of hands. And yet these hon, gentlemen opposite make the statement, when the petition which they hold in their hand shows to the House and to the country that the only thing which the Auditor General complains of is that he cannot promote fast enough the men whom he has worked with and got fond of in his association with them. It is not a suggestion that they cannot do the work. It is not a suggestion that he cannot produce the bulky volume, half of which is work that the Auditor Generalat least, if he took a more modest view of his functions—ought not to feel obliged to The Auditor General complains perform. that the vote for his extra clerks is reduced in the Estimates. Now, I will make a proposition to hon. gentlemen opposite. If they will go through the whole departments of this Government, and find any deputy head of a department that does not grumble at the Finance Minister for cutting off his appropriation for extra clerks, I will give them leave to say that the Auditor General has But if the treated. been badly finds. he would gentleman as with respect the Auditor General, to this matter of extra clerks, is treated better than any head of department in the whole range of the departments of the Government, then he will find that the Auditor General has nothing to complain with other officers of the compared Government. Sir, we know that this is a time when we are trying, hon. gentlemen opposite may think not very successfully, to promote economy; the hon. member for South Oxford was candid and fair enough was making every endeavour to cut down expenses; and what is the complaint? That the Auditor General, in this general cutting down, which affects every department, has lost $500 with which to employ special clerks. That is the whole sum and substance of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite need not expect it to go forth to the world, that the Auditor General has stated in this petition that he is hampered in his work, or that he finds difficulty in criticising the Government, or that he has not hands enough with which to do his work. No statement of that kind is made. The Auditor General goes out of his way to say, as he should say, and as it was perfectly proper for him to say:

Your petitioner does not want it to be understood that he complains about the treatment of this office until the last year or two. The success of the office, such as it is, has been brought about in a great measure by Ministers who supported it when it was placed on its present basis, par-ticularly by Sir John Macdonald.

So that the Auditor General tells you that during all these years he has been hand-somely supported in his office by the Ministers of the Conservative party, and that it is only as to the last year or two, when we have found the stress of falling revenue obliging us to cut down expenses, that he begins to complain almost as badly as an ordinary politician would, that he has not enough to pay his extra clerks. That is the sum and substance of the matter. I do not propose to detain the House with any further argument, except to restate the position I take—that this petition is a bad precedent, a precedent that will come home to roost some day in quarters where it is not anticipated; that the Auditor General was badly advised, whoever advised him, when he made this petition; and that substantially there is no grievance complained of, and nothing suggested but a committee to go into a fishing excursion in connection with this matter. I beg to state along with the Minister of Justice, that there is not the slightest wish on the part of the Government to do anything in this matter other than to uphold what we consider to be the ancient practice and just privileges of this House and the executive Government which leads particular matters referred to as in regard to the principle involved, in a calm, temporate and judicial manner; and I think the judgment of the House must be that the answer given on the other side was not at all in the same spirit. That is to be deprecated; but what is more to be deprecated. in my opinion—and this is the only reason why I offer any observations to the House is the doctrine which has been asserted. that the Auditor General is nothing more than an officer of this Government. Sir, this is a very important distinction to be made. If the Auditor General were nothing more than an officer of the Government, I quite agree with the Minister of Militia, that the petition which he presented House would be worse than unwarranted. and should not be even received by this But, if, on the other band, the Audi-House. tor General is not an officer of the Government, but an officer of this House, independent of the Government and directly responsible to Parliament, and to nobody else, was quite within then this petition rights. If he felt that he was not properly treated, or that he had a grievance, he had the right, like every other subject of Her Majesty, of petitioning Parliament. This is the whole question. Now, two reasons have been given for the statement, unheard of until this evening that the Auditor General is simply an officer of this Government. The first reason is that he is appointed by the Governor in Council. That is true; but the Governor in Council who appoints him has no authority over him. As to all the other officers appointed by the Governor in Council who are officers of this Government, the power which appoints has the power to remove. That is what constitutes an officer of the Government. But when an officer is appointed by the Government whom the Government has no power to remove, manifestly the intention of the law is that that officer should not be responsible to Government. Judges are not appointed by the Governor in Council, in exactly the same manner as the Auditor General; but they cannot be removed by the Government. They can be removed only by a vote of this House, and not an ordinary vote, but by a vote recorded in a certain manner and with certain formalities observed. Another reason put forward in support of the contention that the Auditor General is an officer of the Government is that he has not the power to appoint his own clerks. The same reasoning would apply to the judges. I do not know of any judge appointed by this Government who has the power of appointing his own clerk. The judges of the Supreme Court have not that power.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I have only a few observations to offer to the House on this occasion, and I would not have opened my mouth at all were it not for the fact that a doctrine altogether inadmissable in my judgment has pervaded all the speeches which we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. In the first place, I think it is to be deplored that the spirit in which the hon. member for Bothwell approached this question has not been at all reciprocated by the hon, gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House. Mvhon. friend from Bothwell presented the question, which undoubtedly is a very important one, not so much in regard to the judges petitioning Parliament for a clerk;

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPLER. Did the hon. gentleman ever hear of a judge petitioning Parliament for a clerk?

Mr. LAURIER. I have not heard of the but I have heard of them petitioning to the Government; and I dare say that if their petition were not heeded, it would be their privilege to petition the House. It would be monstrous to contend, on the grounds ef these two reasons, that the Auditor General is an officer of the Government. He is an officer of Parliament, and the very nature of his duties must necessarily make him Government. What the of would be his usefulness if he were to be dependent on this Government? The law gives him the power to check the Gov-ernment—to refuse the payment of moneys authorized by the Government. Would there be any sense in supposing that the law would vest such power in an officer dependent upon the good will of the Government? Why, Sir, it is manifest that if an officer subordinate to the Government were invested with that power, he could not discharge it in an independent manner. He would be altogether dependent on the power of the Government. But the very duties of the office which he has to discharge could not be discharged efficiently unless by an officer quite independent of the Government. If the Auditor General is an officer of the Government, I ask hon. gentlemen on the other side to tell me who is the Minister responsible for him to this House? I do not know of any other officer of this Government who carries his responsibility directly to this House. Every one is responsible to a Minister, who is responsible to this House and Parliament. Now, who is the Minister responsible to this House for the conduct of the Auditor General? It is not the Minister of Finance, although the Auditor General would come more properly within his province, nor is it any other Minister. In fact the Auditor General is not dependent on anybody, except Parliament. The only authority to which he is responsible is Parliament. If this be admitted, and I do not see how it can be successfully controverted, the Auditor General was properly within his rights when, finding there was between him and the Government a difference of opinion, he appealed to the House to which both he and the Government are responsible. There is something more behind. The Minister of Militia let out a word which may give us the key to the long debate we have had on this very simple question-a debate three-fourths of which was not germane to the petition or to the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; three-fourths was not germane to the question brought up by the hon. member for Bothwell. But it was a debate on the powers of the Auditor General, as they are exercised, with the view of establishing the opinion just uttered by of all the speeches we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite to-day-that the audit office is useless; and we are coming evidently very rapidly to the day when it will be said that the Government expenditure must not be attacked at all. And I can well understand how much better that would be for the Government. But I say this, which the hon, gentleman and everybody will admit, that it is in the very nature of public expenditure—nay of any expenditure by trustees-that it must be audited and checked. Now, the contention of the Minister of Finance this afternoon—a contention supported afterwards and repeated both by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Militia, was simply this: that the Auditor General is not an auditor but simply an accountant; that all his duties are simply to go over the figures and to see that they come in their proper place and within their proper appropriation. The Auditor General, it is said, must not be a critic: he must be gingerly in all his dealings with the Government. Why, no audit, either of Government expenditure or of any expenditure, can be effective unless it be made in a critical manner. I maintain that the duties of any audit, whether it be of the expenses of a Government, or a bank, or of a simple municipal council, must be undertaken with a critical eye. An auditor must not undertake his duties with the idea of simply passing over the various items, but must enter into them with a critical eye and the determination to detect anything that may be wrong, and he is quite justified in supposing that there has been wrong. Why, whenever we put money into the hands of trustees, the experience of mankind has shown us that every item of the expenditure should be audited. Otherwise human nature might be carried away, and it is because we believe that trustees may be carried away from the sphere of their duties that an audit is necessary. If we were to trust them implicitly, in the belief that they would always do right, there would be no necessity to look over their accounts; but it is simply that, either through design or accident, there may be a discrepancy or something wrong with the expenditure that wherever there are trustees there must be auditors. This is a fundamental principle and this is the reason the Audit Act is necessary. But what is the fault found with the Auditor General after all? This debate has taken a wider range than it should, because the subject-matter of the petition is very small after all. It simply relates to the expenditure of $500, but the debate has taken a wider range, and the whole special duties to be discharged by the Auditor General have been brought into it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made a the Minister of Militia (Mr. Dickey), that the audit office is altogether useless and must be abolished before long. This is the gist long contention that he does not properly discharge his duties. But what is after all the whole blame they put upon him? Simply that he burdens his reports with too many details. If there is any other criticism that has been made this evening I would like to know what it is. Simply that his report is too elaborate and long.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And misleading.

Mr. LAURIER. That is only an inference. The complaint simply is that he burdens his report with too many details.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And shows carelessness.

Mr. LAURIER. That is the opinon of the other side, but I do not believe that it is the opinion entertained by the Canadian people at large. The contrary was said by the hon. member for South Oxford this There is no public book of afternoon. greater value to-day than the Auditor General's Report as it is made. There is nothing that has thrown greater light into the actual work of Administration than this very bluebook, and I believe this is the secret of all the objection we have heard against the Auditor General. My hon, friend said a moment ago, if the Auditor General properly discharged his duty he should not incur the enmity of any political party. I agree with him. If the Auditor General discharges his duty properly, he should not incur the enmity of any political party. He should not, but he does. I believe from the very speech of the hon, gentleman that all they have to reproach him with is simply that he threw too much light on their administration, and had, therefore, incurred their enmity. As to the merits of the petition, I have not a word to say for or against. I do not pretend to be able at this moment to form any judgment upon the merits of the complaint. The Auditor General asks for more power and more help. This is denied by the Gov-I am not prepared to condemn ernment. the Government. The Government may be right and the Auditor General may be wrong. That is a point upon which I have not formed any opinion at present. what is the case here? We find a difference of opinion between two independent powers -because, I repeat again, the Auditor General is independent of the Government and responsible only to Parliament. Here are two powers equally responsible—the Government and the Auditor General. There is a difference between them. I am not prepared to say which of them is right, but I say that when one of them comes to Parliament and simply asks that the matter be investigated. the demand is so very reasonable that I am surprised it was not granted at once.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to detain the House only for a few moments to read the report of a speech with regard to this office made by Sir Sir Charles Tupper when Minister of Finance, on the occasion of the proposed increase of salary to the Auditor General. Perhaps it will be the best answer to the criticism of the Minister of Justice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What year?

Mr. McMULLEN. This speech was made on 17th April, 1888.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a long time ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. Sir Charles Tupper said:

I have no hesitation in saying, as head of the Finance Department, and so being brought in constant and frequent intercourse with the Auditor General, that I believe that it would be impossible for members on either side of this House to over-rate the careful and painstaking ability of that officer or his conscientious devotion to the duties of the most important office which he discharges. He is in every sense of the word an officer of Parliament. Although he has felt it occasionally to be his duty to differ with mem-bers of the Administration, and with the conduct of the affairs of the public departments in carrying out the details of his office, I have no hesitation in saying that he has discharged his duty in such a way as to win the confidence and hearty approval of every member of the Government, as I am sure he has earned it of every member of both sides of the House.

Then again, he says:

I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite, that the last thing the Government had in view in this Bill, was to do anything that should enable us to interfere in the slightest degree with the position Parliament has given to the Auditor General. I quite concur in the views expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the value of this officer, to a very great extent, depends on the position he holds as an officer of Parliament, and the sole object we had in view in giving the benefit of the Superannuation Act, was to give a deserving officer the privileges which the Act would confer. But I do see a point in what has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this involves the contingency of the power of removal of the officer by the action of the Government, which certainly was not the intention. I will leave the clause was not the intention. ever for such amendment as will enable us entirely to avoid any such thing.

I give the quotations I have just read as a reply to the lengthy tirade against the Auditor General by the Minister of Justice.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

The hon. gentleman will re-Mr. DALY. collect, by the treaty made in 1850, the sum of £4,160 cash in hand was paid to the Indians, and a perpetual annuity of £1,100 was agreed to be paid to them, and in 1868, $88,-000 was funded at 5 per cent to produce the annuity of £1,100, or $4,400 in currency; and it was provided in the treaty that when the value of the lands was sufficient to produce an amount that would permit the province, without incurring loss, to increase that annuity, it should be augmented to a sum not exceeding $4 per capita. Since 1875 the annuity has been increased to that amount; and it appears that during the last three years the parliamentary appropriation required has averaged $16,816 per annum. In addition to the annuities there were expenses which amount in some years to about $750.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was not so desirous of obtaining the particulars the hon, gentleman is giving, as to know what arrangements have been come to with Ontario and Quebec. My recollection is, that the Dominion Government have always contended that the province of Ontario was responsible for this Robinson treaty annuity. I want to know whether that matter was decided in the course of the late arbitration; and, if so, how?

Mr. DALY. It was decided by the arbitrators in favour of the Dominion, with the exception of the interest on the arrears.

RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. under the statement, the Dominion would be entitled to a very considerable sum of money.

Mr. DALY. Yes. The province of Ontario has appealed from the decision, and the case will be decided by the Supreme Court. The Dominion has entered a cross appeal on the question of interest. I think the case has been argued, speaking from memory, but decision not given.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We ought to get a decision within a year?

$228 for islands, it appears that in 1886 a Mr. Newson was sent up to survey certain islands in the eastern portion of Stony Lake, among which were the islands numbered 82 and 83. These islands were sold to a Mr. Grubb, of Peterboro', in 1888, for $40 each. The department subsequently learned that these islands were part of the mainland, and that the building of the Trent Valley Canal had raised the waters of the river. and had made what was originally part of the mainland these two islands that were surveyed by the surveyor. The surveyor failed to notify the department that they had been part of the mainland, and it is doubtful whether he knew himself. This Mr. Grubb, to whom they had been sold, made improvements on island No. 82 to the amount of $250, and the department offered to cancel the sale to Mr. Grubb and pay him his purchase money at the rate of 31/2 per cent, which is the rate of interest we get for Indian funds, which, with the $250, would make $346.80. Then Strickland & Burnham were asked if they would pay the department for the improvements that were made, and they replied that these improvements were of no benefit to them, and they would rather not do so; but they were willing to let Mr. Grubb retain the island if the department would pay them $250 for island 82, and $75 for island 83, making a total of $325. This offer was accepted, but as the department had no funds, and the mistake had been made by the officers of the department, it was not fair to make it a charge on the funds of the Indians, the department now ask Parliament to vote the sum of $228.20 to repay Messrs. Strickland & Burnham the value of the land which was sold to Grubb as islands 82 and 83. It does not come out of the Indian fund.

Mr. BORDEN. Can the Minister give some particulars with reference to this item of $1,000 for medical attendance and medicine to Indians in Nova Scotia?

Mr. DALY. The appropriation made in 1894-95 was $2,000, and we have accounts remaining unpaid amounting, up to the time the Estimates were before Council, to $740. This is to meet the difference between the amount that was appropriated by Parliament and the bills that have already been renwithin a few months. As to the item of dered by medical men for services to the Indians. We have exercised every economy, but there has been a great deal of sickness among the Indians, and the bills are large.

Mr. BORDEN. Can you give the items?

The amount paid is $2,000 for a total of 1.806 Indian population in Nova Scotia.

Mr. BORDEN. It seems to me that some of these charges are very large, and I notice that the same names run through the accounts from year to year. In the county of King's, where there are quite a number of Indians, the medical attendance is $2, and the year before it was $48. In the county of Digby last year the medical attendance was nearly $500, and Mr. Ellison figures there as receiving $311. I see that in the list read by the Minister, his name appears for $267. I notice in the county of Hants that a Dr. Adlington received $146.50, and in the list read by the Minister his name figures for a larger amount. Now, taking the county of Digby, it is remarkable to find such a large expenditure for medical attendance and medicine as compared with the relief given to the Indians in other respects. There is nearly $500 for medical attendance there, while the amount given for blankets was only $18; for flour, $48; for eats and seed, $6; teaming, &c., $53; potatoes, $16. Now, from some knowledge of the subject, I suggest to the Minister that it would be worth his while to examine somewhat closely into this account for medical fees for Indians in Nova Scotia. I know that in one or two counties some years ago, gross abuses existed, and when the matter was inquired into and changes were made, the expenditure was reduced from hundreds of dollars down to the same locality. I think that if more money were expended in giving these unfortunate people blankets, flour, potatoes, food. &c., it is possible that less money would be required for medical attendance and medicines. I must say that $500 for medical attendance on the Indians in the county of Digby is altogether too large, unless there was some extraordinary epidemic prevailing there; but I have not heard of any, although I live not many miles from the county of Digby. This item requires explanation. I merely make these suggestions to the Minister, because I think he will find in that direction reason for inquiry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total Indian population in Nova Scotia?

Mr. DALY: One thousand, eight hundred and six. In answer to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), I may say that I am not myself familiar with the facts in relation to the expenditure for medicine in Digby, but I find we paid $267 to Dr. Ellison. By the report of the agent, it appears that there has been much sickness on the reserve during the winter; that seven deaths occurred; that there were nine births; the population being five more than last year, the total population being 183. During last year we have adopted a new principle, and intend to cut down the expenditure for medicinal and other supplies in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the other provinces. Matters have not been running as satisfactorily as they might have No effort seems to have been made to make the Indians independent, but they have been brought up with the idea to look to the agent in case of distress and also With the inaugufor medical attendance. ration of the new system we expect next year to be able to show different results as regards medical expenditure.

The amount expended in Mr. BORDEN. 1892-93 for medical supplies and attendance was $500 for a population of 180, or an average of about $3 per head. If this rule were applied to the white population, the expenditure would be equal to $60,000 a year for medical attendance and medicine, which would be ridiculous. How are the medical men paid?

Mr. DALY. The Indian population for the province is 2,141. Doctors receive 50 cents per mile going and coming and the cost of medicine, and nothing for attendance unless the patient requires surgical treatment; for an office consultation the doctor gets 50 cents. All the accounts are audited here.

Fraser agency the total expenditure was $10,984, and of that $1,796 went to the doc-At Kamloops station the total expenditure was $3,860, and of that, $1,532 was paid to the doctors. At the North-west Coast agency, over $3,000 were paid to the aoctors out of a total expenditure of $10,-At another agency, out of a total expenditure of $2,458, over $700 was paid for medical attendance. Such expenditures requires explanation from the Minister, because he is asking for an additional grant of In some cases, half the amount is paid to the doctors, and in other cases, 25 per cent, and from reading the report of the Department of Indian Affairs, I gather that the fewer doctors sent there the better, because the Indians appear to die more rapidly when they have medical attendance.

Mr. DALY, The appropriation made by Parliament in the main Estimates last session has been exceeded by the amount we details given at pages 7-A to 12-A of the Mr DALY.

We had at the time the Estinow ask. mates were before Council, unpaid accounts in the department for medical attendance British Columbia to the amount of in It will take fully that amount to meet the bills for the current year, up to That will make a total ex-30th June. penditure in British Columbia of $10,000 for medical attendance on an Indian population of 25,807 for the current year, as against an expenditure of $11.044 in 1892-93, and an expenditure of $13,600 in 1893-So we have effected a saving of $3,600 compared with the former year, even with this $4,000 added. No doubt we would not have required this additional amount if the sum asked last year had been granted in the main Estimates, but the Finance Minister thought the amount would not be No doubt this appears to be a required. large sum, but, in view of the large Indian population, the long distance to travel, and the fact that medical attendance is more expensive there than elsewhere in the Dominion, the amount does not appear excessive. We have already reduced the expenditure $3,500 in one year, and the department is making efforts to effect still further reductions. I can give the exact expenditure on each of the reserves for medicine during the present year in British Columbia, which shows that between 1st July, 1894, and 7th January, 1895, it amounted to $5.996.85. This $4,000 will make up the $10,000 expended, as against $13,600 in the year previous. Where there are no doctors medicines are handed out to the Missionaries to whom we supply them. Te medical tariff in British Columbia is 50 cents a mile going, and 50 cents a mile returning, and 50 cents for medicines and $1.50 for professional services. The department is very much in disgrace with the medical profession in British Columbia because we have seen fit to cut down their bills, and the doctors and the. representatives of the province have made We have succeeded in cutting complaints. the expenses down $3,500 in one year and I hope to reduce it still further.

Mr. PATTERSON (Brant). Have these bands no trust funds?

Mr. DALY. Very few of them. We support them principally in medical attendance, and if we do not do so they go back to the old habits of their tribes, which would result in something far worse to us than our expenditure in this direction.

Geological Survey-

Artesian boring in North-west Territories

Mr. McMULLEN. What amount of money has been expended altogether for artesian boring?

Mr. DALY. There was appropriated last session for boring for petroleum at Athabasca $7,000, and of that sum $5,000 has been expended up to January last according to Geological Report. On October the 24th the boring reached a depth of 1,011 feet and Mr. Fraser reported this year, that he succeeded in getting down to 12,000 feet. He has some difficulties there on account of shale and some other matters, but he hopes during the present month to get to the contract depth, and this money is to enable them to go to 15,000 feet in the event of our not the hon, gentleman must give a little more striking oil at 12,000 feet. We have expended the greater portion of the money in material and freight, and it would be lost if we did not get 300 feet below the contract depth. In the event of oil not being struck at Athabasca, Mr. Fraser will remove in July to Pelican Lake where the tar sands are visible to the naked eye, and where according to the report of Mr. McConnell in 1890, it is expected oil will be struck at 700 feet. Dr. Dawson's report says:

It appears to be most important that the investigation of the petroleum fields of Athabasca and Northern Alberta, thus begun during the past summer, should be continued until the main features at least of the character and value of these fields shall have been determined.

We expect to have the boring at Athabasca and Pelican Lake finished before September.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What explorations are intended for 1895-96? and what parties have been entrusted with the work?

Mr. DALY. The explorations this year will be confined to the fields which have been covered by the ordinary officers of the department during these last few Mr. McConnell will continue his work in the Kootenay district, Dr. Bell is going up to the Temiscamingue and Mr. Fletcher and others employed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, will continue their work. The other officers of the department will be employed in Ontario in completing the sheets of the that have been Geological maps survey during the last few years. There is no extraordinary work being undertaken, in view of the fact that my estimates have been materially reduced. We are doing only the necessary work in the different provinces to complete the work which the department has undertaken during the last eight or ten years.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will Mr. Tyrrell not be doing anything further in the unexplored territory?

Mr. DALY. No. He is to complete some work which he started several years ago east of Lake Winnipeg. There will be no further exploration outside of the bounds of civilization.

Miscellaneous-

To meet balance of expense incurred in connection with the Colonial Conference held in Ottawa in June and July,$4,443 32 for services in connection with the Colonial Conference, netwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary :- J. L. Payne, joint secretary, $200; Douglas Stewart, joint secretary, $200; John Carleton, messenger, $100..... 500 60

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the total expense of the conference?

Mr. FOSTER. About $14,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think explanation of this vote.

Mr. FOSTER. The amount asked for here is for travel from Vancouver to Ottawa. sleeping-car accommodation, dining-car accommodation, a slight stop at Glacier House, Mount Stephen House and the Banff Springs Hotel, more dining-car accommodation, the Hotel Manitoba at Winnipeg, tickets from Ottawa to Toronto.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know why the Government asks us to consent to these extra payments to J. L. Payne, Douglas Stewart and John Carleton? I notice that these men are already well paid. Payne gets $1,750 a year, and Mr. Stewart $2.800 a year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He did not get that then. At that time he was Sir John Thompson's private secretary.

Mr. McMULLEN. In the Civil Service List he is set down as receiving $2,200 and $600 as private secretary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. he got $2,400 altogther as private secretary.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, $2,400 is a very good salary, without asking the country to vote more. I notice that the names of these two men appear every year as subjects of special votes, in violation of the Civil Service Act, and I would like to know why it is.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no vote in violation of the Civil Service Act. These two gentlemen were secretaries to the Colonial Conference. It was a very important conference, and there was a great deal of work in connection with it. These gentlemen not only kept a record of the proceedings of the conference, and superintended the printing of the report, but for a considerable length of time they were at work night and day and carried on a large correspondence in connec-They also made preparations tion with it. for the different entertainments and festivities which it was thought Canada should give in honour of the visiting delegates, and they had charge of some of the excursions which were taken by the delegates to the different cities of the Dominion. It is usual in cases of this kind to recognize the services of the secretaries in some slight way. As we have not titles to give them, we ask Parliament to vote them this small sum.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to correct the Minister of Justice. He said the salary received by Mr. Stewart was $2,400. by the Auditor General's Report that Douglas Stewart received, as clerk of Justice Department, $1,800; as Minister's private secretary, $600, and for services, Behring Sea, $400, making $2,800. Now the Minister of Finance says that some extra services were performed by these individuals in connection with the Colonial Conference. Were they not paid their full salaries for serving the country-$1,750 in one case, and $2.800 in the I would like to know if their whole time is not at the country's disposal for any duty they may be called upon to fulfil? This system of extra payments is taken advantage of to pay every clerk in the different departments for every little incident on which they can base a claim for extra services. I say that the system is an abuse, and should be stopped. The committee has no right to grant to these men, who are receiving now more than their services are worth, any further sums of money. We have too many blood-suckers in this Dominion who are ready to take advantage of every little excuse to draw money out of the public treasury and put it in their own pockets. There is no excuse for the Minister of Finance, in the face of the impoverished condition of the people of this country, in the face of his deficit of $4,500,000, and in the face of the necessity of providing for other things which are pressing upon the Government, coming forward and asking the committee to vote $200 additional to each of these two men, who are already amply paid. It is a gross piece of injustice, and, for my part. I intend to resent all such payments in the interest of the people of this country.

Further amount required to meet expenditure in connection with the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic...... $8,00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a fair opportunity for the hon, gentleman to let us know what this commission has really cost us, and, I might add, what conceivable good it has done to any human being other than the three or four gentlemen who have extracted a good many thousand dollars for sitting on the commission and obtaining an amount of information, of which the most important item I have found is that, if the general cookery of Canada were improved. and the women would make themselves better cooks, there would be fewer drunkards in the Dominion. It may be true, and it is, no doubt, a valuable thing to pay $100,-000 for it, but I think we might have had it for considerably less expenditure of time and money.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon, friend has had his usual blast. I do not suppose that this is quite the time for us to go into the merits of the commission. That was the outcome of a resolution passed by Parliament. As to the cost, I find that up to the 7th June, 1895, there was expended $63,184, and $8,000 is asked for here, so that the cost, as appears from that calculation, will be about $70,000.

Mr. McMullen.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the meaning of the transfer. Is that to reduce the amount by $20,000?

CONTRACTOR OF THE SECOND SECON

Mr. FOSTER. That is to make available for printing, $20,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That has to be added to the $70,000?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The evidence has already been printed and distributed—that is the parliamentary supply. The report is now being printed, and the printing of the report, and any further copies of evidence required will come out of the $20,000, so that the whole cost of the commission. printing, and all, will be between $80.060 and $90,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will that be the whole expenditure?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a very considerable item, between $80,000 and $90,-000 for the hon, gentleman to find out whether Parliament should legislate in the direction in which some eight or ten gears ago he contended there is no doubt it ought to legislate. It seems to me a very serious responsibility devolves upon the Minister of Finance. He was perfectly sure, ten years ago, that Parliament ought to legislate. Now, he has put the country to the expense of $80,000 or $90,0000 to find out wnether the opinion he entertained was good or not, so that the hon, gentleman's faith in his former convictions was not, when it came to the test, after all, as strong as he led the country to suppose it was. hon. gentleman, of course, will be able to tell us whether he has got in the report, which he has no doubt digested and thoroughly mastered, that information which has removed all the doubts which had arisen in his mind, and he will be able to tell us perhaps now what course he thinks, in the public interest, should be taken. The hon. gentleman, we know, was an ardent advocate of prohibition. He appointed this commission to remove doubts and to secure. perhaps, that fortification and support from it, which you may call courage if you like but not the courage of the kind with which the hon. gentleman proposed to fight. will tell us now whether he proposes to submit any legislation upon this question. I suppose the report is premature, but it is here now, and the elections are not over. Will the hon, gentleman tell us whether the Government propose to act on this report before the elections, or whether they intend to submit it as a question for the consideration of the people as to submit to the sovereign people in the matter, or whether they intend to act upon the views of the commissioners, and to fight those men who are in favour of prohibition? It is a very important question, certainly very important, or the hon. gentleman would never have put the country to the expense he did in connection with this matter. If he had not thought it important, I am sure that his regard for the public treasury and economy and his strong conviction of duty, would have all stood in the way of the appointment of such a commission. Now, the hon. gentleman has had his commission and report, which, although it might have been light literature in the days of Methuselah. caunot be called so in the lives of men of three score and ten; and I question whether the hon, gentleman, with all his industry, can afford sufficient time to make himself conversant with the views of the commissioners, and the witnesses they examined. Not-withstanding the heat of the evening, the House will listen with interest to any opinion the hon, gentleman can give us in this matter.

My hon, friend has put Mr. FOSTER. several questions to me, and made known a number of wants, but I have some conscientious scruples against going into that matter just at present, because such great constitutionalists as my hon, friend and myself ought to set a good example; and it is altogether out of order to discuss the policy of a question of this kind over a supplemental vote simply meant to finish up the expenditure heretofore authorized. On that account, to set a good example to the House-and I am sorry my hon. friend has lapsed so often, but he has made several this session-I must refuse to put myself out of order. There is another reason why I should not care to discuss the question brought up by my hon. friend. The report is a long one, and the evidence still longer. and I would not like to take my hon. friend at a disadvantage. Although I have some knowledge of what is in the evidence and the report, I would like to give my hon, friend longer time to make himself sufficiently conversant with the case to discuss it upon its merits.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not require this report to fortify my opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not asked to fortify my opinions or to give my particular views with reference to it, but to inform other members of the House who needed information.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The benighted members.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman got the courage of his opinions?

Mr. FOSTER. I always had.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the first place, we ought to have some detailed statement as to how this amount was spent, and in particular I should like to know what were the amounts which were paid to the several commissioners individually for the time they expended. The hongentleman says that the sum total of expenditure is $63.000, and $20,000 for printing, making $83,000 altogether.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is this $8,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose that is included.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well. say $90,000. I would like to know what amounts were paid to these parties. I may say that I look upon this whole expenditure as a gross waste of public money. I do not believe that one copper's worth of good has resulted to the country from this expenditure. There are some indications that the Government was anxious that every interest should be represented on this commission. Inasmuch as the president, a very worthy gentleman and a gentleman of impertance, is believed to be either directly or indirectly interested in a great brewery in or near the city of Montreal, it is peculiarly proper that he should be made president. I have no doubt that he was by no manner of means the least useful member of the committee. I should like to know what these gentlemen were paid for their valuable services and for the valuable report they have presented.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon, gentleman wants to know what this $8,000 is to be devoted to?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; I wanted to know what sums were paid to the commissioners.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think I can give that, for that carries back to the expenditure of previous years, and I came prepared to explain this item. In the $63,000 which was expended up to 7th June, $13,636.27 were for the Queen's Printer; $3,874.75 for translation; $7,776.95 for reporting; $2,393.52 for reporters' travelling expenses; $2,591.47 for sundries—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friends seem very suspicious. Sundries in this case means paper pads and that kind of thing—$4,629 for clerical and other assistance. That makes a total of about $35,000, and all the rest of $63,000, or about $28,000 was paid to the commissioners.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How was that divided—how much to each commissioner?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot give the hon. gentleman that. The information has appeared in the Auditor General's Report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will look up the Auditor General's Report, page C-26, he will find the information. Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How many commissioners were there, and at what rate were they paid?

Mr. FOSTER. There were five, and they were paid $10 per day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What proportion of the $8,000 is to be paid to each of them?

Mr. FOSTER. I think this $8,000 is to pay some balances due to the commissioners, also clerical assistance, travelling expenses and reporting.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. What amount was paid for translation?

Mr. FOSTER. $3.000.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. To whom?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Montpetit.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Was there a contract?

Mr. FOSTER. The regular rates were paid to him, as recommended by the Queen's Printer.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Was not the contract broken?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so. Mr. Monpetit is not being employed at the present time.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I saw some letters in the press complaining that the Government had broken their contract.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt that he was complaining.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Was there anything in his complaint?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not see the complaint.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He complained that the Government were not willing to pay for his work, and had taken away his contract.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government, when they had all the work they wanted from him paid what was due him. That is all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Was any money paid to Mr. Kribbs, or Mr. Spence, for gathering the evidence?

Mr. FOSTER. There was not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. Minister of Justice referred us to the Auditor General's Report, page C—26. But that does not give the information my hon. friend asked for at all. What was asked for was the amount paid each of the commissioners?

Mr. FOSTER. To get that it would be necessary to add the payments for the two years during which these payments had been running.

Mr. FRASER. This is the last time the House will be called upon to vote any sum for this commission, I understand?

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon gentleman is anxious to give another vote—

Mr. FRASER. Not in the least. I do not think I would stand very well in my county if I recommended more expenditure for this commission; enough has been thrown away already. But if this is the last vote to be given for this commission, I think it would be well that the expenditure under each of these heads should be given definitely.

Mr. FOSTER. A vote has passed the House for a return covering all this information, which return will be ready in a day or two.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is very doubtful that it will be ready in a day or two. We have had a good many returns ordered by the House that have not yet been brought down.

Mr. FRASER. There will be some difficulty when this item is passed in getting back to this important subject. I do not know whether the Finance Minister was trying to restrain his laughter when he was giving his answers, or whether he was trying to hasten through this as a disagreeable subject. But when he spoke of "sundries" he could hardly help laughing outright. I think this subject should be gone into.

Mr. FOSTER. But this is scarcely the time.

Mr. FRASER. Then I wonder when the time will come.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon, gentleman has a policy he would like to set forth, he might bring forward a motion. If my hon, friends coposite have a policy that they would like to be sharply defined before the House, I will be very glad to hear it.

Mr. FRASER. We have a policy, but if we were to attempt to present it, we would be met by the statement that there is no item before the House. I do not say that all commissions are frauds, but I do say that the time spent to get that information has been wasted. Mr. Kribbs was worth all the commission put together, because he issued his work some six months ago, in which he gave the results of the inquiry to the men engaged in the traffic which he represented. I cannot see why this report was delayed so long, when Mr. Kribbs, who had no better opportunity than the commissioners, was able to make his report six months ago. In looking at these volumes, I think the reference made by the hon. member for Bothwell is very appropriate. I think if Lord Macaulay had those volumes before him, he would never have complained of Dr. Nairn's book as he did. These huge volumes contain the most trifling things, everything that any man wanted to say before that commission is presented in those volumes for the information of Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) While it may be very well open to any member of Parliament to propose a policy, the question we are now discussing is the fact that the groping for a policy which the hon, gentleman has indulged in, has cost this country $90,000, and we want to know who got the money. The hon, gentleman thought he had a policy some years ago, but he found he had not, and he went groping for one. Now to whom has he paid that $90,000? This item should not pass until we get that information. The item is before us, and the hon. gentleman ought to have been prepared to give us this information. He tells us where some of the money has gone, but how much has been paid to each of these commissioners? That is the question many people are seeking information upon outside this House.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody questions the right of my hon. friend to have the information. The statement I made, I think, ought to be reasonably satisfactory; I said that on that item of $8,000 for finishing up the vote, I did not happen to have the figures with me. I said also that the return had been called for, that the House had passed it, and that it was being prepared, and it would give all the particulars. I think that is reasonable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not exactly. Here we are asked for $8,000 to make up the total of $90,000. Now, the hon. gentleman knows that when it is the last vote, the custom is to receive full information as to all the disbursements that have gone on, and I think he should have been prepared with details. I am quite sure that when the hon. gentleman's colleagues were on this side, they insisted on every ample information about any similar vote, but I do not think they had any similar vote to discuss.

Mr. FOSTER. We are going to give all the information, of course.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not notice that the Minister read the travelling expenses of the commissioners.

Mr. FOSTER. They come in with each commissioner's account.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to a statement made by Sir John Thompson in July, 1894, in replying to the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson.)

Up to the present time the Royal Commission has cost about $100,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was wrong.

Mr. McMULLEN. That was the statement that was then made. Now, before we finally pass this item, it is but fair that the committee should know what has been paid to the several commissioners. Can it be possible that the Minister of Finance is not in possession of the facts to enable him to answer that question? If he is not, I think the item should be allowed to stand until he is able to answer the question. He asks now for $8,000 finally to settle up the matters connected with this commission, but he declines to tell us what each commissioner has received.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon, gentleman admitted himself a moment ago that the question was a fair one. He says that this commission is to cost $90,000, $10,000 less than was estimated last year, and he asks $8,000 to complete the whole thing. He admits we should have a detailed statement of the expenditure so far, and we require it in order to see whether the further amount he asks for is justifiable. If he is not ready to give the information at present, I think he will save time by allowing the item to stand.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to be un-What is the point at reasonable at all. issue? It is simply to determine the amount received by each commissioner, that is all. I have given you the item, $63,000 to date, and $8,000 asked for. I have given you what has been spent for printing; I have given you an estimate of what is still required for printing; I have given the cost of the translation, the cost of the reporting, and I have given other items that I have read out. If you take these from the $63,000, it leaves about $30,000, which has been expended the commissioners. among Now. exactly what the commissioners got $30,000. get—they Hon. tlemen opposite are curious to know what each got, and they have a perfect right to that information. That information is being made up in detail in answer to an address passed by the House, and it will be laid before it. Have I not given the committee all essential information? Is there any reason why the item should stand because I cannot, for the moment, divide the amount paid to the commissioners among the different commissioners?

Mr. LAURIER. Is there anything to be concealed in that?

Mr. FOSTER. No. What is to be concealed? An Order in Council was passed, under which they obtained so much per day and so much for living expenses. It is as plain as can be, and the sum I mentioned was divided among them. What is there to keep back? The hon. gentleman is oversuspicious.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not understand that there is anything to keep back. The hongentleman said that it was quite true the information should be given, but he is not ready to give it. When is the proper time that such information should be given if not at this very moment, when the hongentleman asks for a further vote.

Mr. FOSTER. If I had the information I should be glad to give it.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon, gentleman should have it at this moment, and he has no right to ask the committee to vote money unless he is prepared to give the necessary information. If the hon, gentleman is not prepared to give it, let the item stand.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, if the hon, gentleman chooses to be unreasonable, when I have already given every detail of expenditure under the heading of this item, and the total amount paid to the commissioners, only I am not able at the moment to say what amount was received by each. If the hon, gentleman says no, I am willing to stay here, and I am not willing to let the item go. It is, of course, within his right to stop the voting of supplies.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon, gentleman is not putting the matter fairly. There has been considerable discussion as to the respective amounts paid to the several commissioners. The information has been asked by a number of temperance newspapers and anti-temperance newspapers as to how the division took place. Members of Parliament are expected to obtain the information at this time, because it is the proper time. The hon, gentleman stated that he has not that information to-night. The leader of the Opposition then asked that the item be allowed to stand, which he is entitled to do. In what respect is he unreasonable? The Minister is seeking to force this item through the committee without furnishing information, and which our constituents are demanding.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to force the item through. If hon, gentlemen opposite do not want to pass it, let it stand.

Item allowed to stand.

To pay to the Medicine Hat General Hospital-

$280 50

For the maintenance of R. VanLuven from 10th May, 1891, to 30th November, 1892, 561 days at 50c. per day.. For the maintenance of S. Johnson from 15th November, 1890, to 30th November, 1892, 746 days at 50c. per day 373 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cause of these payments?

Mr. DALY. The explanation is this. These two men are paralytics and have been in the Medicine Hat hospital since the date given. Previous to being taken into that hospital, one had been in the Mounted Police barracks at Fort Saskatchewan, and the other in the barracks at Prince Albert, and as it was not possible to look after them there, the Medicine Hat hospital authorities In 1892, an order was took them over. passed in the North-west Territories Assembly giving 50 cents per day to the hospital. This is to pay 50 cents per day to the hospital for the accommodation up to the time the order was passed.

Mr. Foster.

To cover expenses of the late Hon. Sir J. S. D. Thompson's funeral (Governor General's warrant)...... $25,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Some explanations must be given as to this item. Here is a very large sum for expenses of this kind, and details ought to be furnished to the committee, and fully. I must say, with respect to these expenses, that there appears to be ground for suspecting or believing that very unusual and very lavish and unnecessary expenditure in that respect was incurred, and full details should be given.

Mr. HAGGART. I will give the hon, gentleman full details, for I have them all here. $3,000 was paid to the Nova Scotia Furnishing Company on account of public buildings. Then there is the sum of $911 to James Monoghan & Sons for building vault, building roadway, &c.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask if that is the full account of the Nova Scotia Furnishing Company?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes. Halifax Illuminating and Motor Company, $1,600; lighting provincial buildings, $333; rations to militia, $31; Kenny & Co., bunting, $1,228; E. A. Neill, $39 for services and use of horses; also an account from Dodwell & Greenwood; Gordon & Keefe, $5,000; Snow, $1,800.

Mr. LAURIER. What goods were supplied for the $5,000?

Mr. HAGGART. Draperies and furnishings, among the items being 13,600 yards of black material. There is an account of $86 from A. P. Sherwood, chief of Dominion Police. The cost of car service on the Intercolonial Railway, special train Ottawa to Halifax and return, and disbursements, was $3,616.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are we to understand that the bills now laid before the House cover all the claims of which the Government have any knowledge, with respect to the funeral of the late Premier?

Mr. HAGGART. That is all that has come to my knowledge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And that there are no other claims placed before the Government?

Mr. HAGGART. That is all I have any knowledge of.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do those bills amount to $25,000?

Mr. FORBES. There is only about $15,-000.

Mr. HAGGART. I think they do. The whole expenditure, except the railroad account was under the management of the Minister of Public Works. I was one of the committee, but I am not acquainted with the details.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You only account Collection of Revenue-Customsfor $15,000. You ask us to vote $25,000. and you don't say what the other $10,000 is for. It is a subject which one does not care to discuss very much, but the hon. gentleman will see that the amount asked for is so much beyond what any reasonable being would suppose could be expended for a public funeral, that the public will insist upon correct details being given to show how the money was gotten rid of. We all know that the circumstances attending the death of the late Premier were such, that public opinion, I think, fully supported the Government in giving his remains a public funeral. I do not think there is any complaint about that, but the sum total of the expenditure put down here is so outrageously beyond what any person's idea of the expenditure would be, that there should be full particulars given.

AND A STATE OF THE STATE OF THE

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps we had better let the item stand until the Minister of Public Works is in the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask that copies of these accounts be laid on the Table, or that they be published in some way so that members can know what they are. We do not want to criticise this item unjustly, and I think there is a disposition to allow everything that is generous, but unjustifiable extravagance will not be endorsed by myself, at least, even if it is for a public purpose, the propriety of which I am not slow to acknowledge. I do not wish to say one word against the propriety of giving the remains a public funeral, but in this, as in other matters, there is a measure to the extravagance that should be tolerated, and painful though it may be, I will insist upon having this matter discussed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Are these accounts to be placed in such a position that members can have access to them?

Mr. FORBES. Cannot copies be laid on the Table?

Mr. HAGGART. The original accounts are here, and there are objections made to a number of items by the officers of the department, I will try and get copies laid on the Table.

Item allowed to stand.

Contribution to the Lady Thompson $25,000 fund

Mr. LAURIER. This item had better be allowed to stand along with the other one.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no connection between the two votes.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will see that it will save a great deal of time if the two items are taken one after another.

Item allowed to stand.

To pay Mr. Miles Cowan, clerk in Her Majesty's Customs at the Port of Windsor, Ont., an allowance in addition to his salfor services rendered while acting collector at that port, from 1st June, 1889, to 30th November, 1892. (Revote.)..... $600

Mr. McMULLEN. What is this for?

Mr. WALLACE. This account was voted last year, but was not paid out. Mr. Cowan acted as collector of customs for about two and a half years, and this is as the vote states.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is his salary?

Mr. WALLACE. His salary was $1,100 a year then, and it is now $1,200.

Mr. McGREGOR. This amount is all Mr. Cowan acted as collector for right. nearly three years, and as the collector in that district gets $1,900 a year, the country saved a large amount by availing of Mr. Cowan's services. They have twenty-five officers under the collector there, and there are three railways, and the ferries cross every five minutes. This is a very active customs point, and the amount collected is very large, being in the neighbourhood of $250,000 a year. Mr. Cowan is a very efficient officer, and instead of the amount being $600, it should be a good deal larger, and should be $1,200 at least. He is one of the best officers I know of in the department, and even now, after the death of the old collector, the new one having been appointed, this gentleman (Mr. Cowan) and Mr. Morton have to take full charge of the office at times, because the collector who has been appointed is not an efficient officer.

Legal expenses Toronto Railway Company vs. the Queen $1,143 79

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was a litigation between the company and the Crown to ascertain whether the electric car rails were free of duty or not, under the general item in the tariff, and the decision was that they were not free.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did it cost $1,100 to ascertain that point?

Mr. FOSTER. We have to have a case made up and argued before the courts.

Mr. FRASER. Were the other parties not able to pay?

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They will pay the costs taxable against them.

Mr. FRASER. Did the Government agree to pay their costs?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. 🥿 Mr. FRASER. Then, why does not the Government claim the costs from the other side?

The reason we have Mr. WALLACE. asked this amount is this: We have won the suit, but the other party has appealed the case to the Supreme Court, and we have to pay our lawyer in the meantime until the case is decided. If we win the case again, the amount will be taxable, and repaid to us.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is the solicitor?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Hodgins, of Toronto.

Weights and Measures-

To pay Levi Werner compensation for loss by use of improperly verified mea-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How do we come to be called upon to pay this?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). This represents half the amount of the claim made by Mr. Werner. One of the assistants of the Weights and Measures Department made a mistake in verifying a measure belonging to Mr. Werner, the result of which was that for five or six years he suffered a loss. 1891 a claim was sent into the department, but the amount of the claim was disputed. Efforts were made to get at a proper estimate of the loss sustained by Mr. Werner, because it was felt that it was not fair that the merchant should suffer loss in consequence of a mistake of one of our officers.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What was the size of the measure?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I cannot tell at this moment. It was used for vinegar and such articles. The mistake was apparent, because it was discovered when the measure was sent for reverification by Mr. Assistant Inspector Fitzgerald, of Hamilton. whole amount of the claim was $126.38. Mr. Werner's books were examined by officers of our department, and it did appear that he had sustained a loss; but the amount which the department agreed to submit to the Treasury Board, and which the Treasury Board passed, was only about half the amount claimed. I may say that while I had some doubts and have still as to the liability of the department to pay a claim of this sort, the equity of the case appeared to me to be with Mr. Werner; and when I discovered that the department had before my time paid a similar claim in the case of one Mr. Bennett, the circumstances being exactly the same, I did not hesitate any longer in making the recommendation.

Mr. RIDER. What is Mr. Werner's business, and where does he reside?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). He is a merchant in Dunnville.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I would like to know if the Minister will follow the same principle in the case of Mr. Rousseau, of St. Ignace, from whom a quantity of liquor was improperly seized by the department and sold. The court has decided that the man was not paid; and I would like to know if the department will refund Mr. Rousseau the money?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am surprised at the hon, gentleman asking that question. He knows that the two cases are entirely different. The hon, gentleman was counsel in three cases of seizures. These cases were decided in favour of the Crown. The hon. gentleman claimed that the decisions were not in accordance with the law or the facts, and appealed the cases to the Superior Court, which decided them in his favour. There is no reason why the hon, gentleman should obtrude a question of that kind here, especially as he and I are discussing whether the Crown should pay his costs and the value of the liquors seized and sold.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The case of Mr. Rousseau is the same as this case. An officer of the department went to Rousseau's store and seized three barrels of whisky, brought them to Quebec and sold them, and then took action against him. The case was decided in the district against Rousseau. I took it to Quebec, where the three judges of the Superior Court decided that I was right and that the officer of the department had no right to seize the liquor. I would like to know if the precedent established in this case will be followed in the case of Mr. Rousseau?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a trifling sum in itself, but it appears to me that the hon. gentleman is establishing a mighty curious precedent. I find considerable difficulty in supposing that an average country merchant would have used a measure to his own disadvantage for five years and never found it out. If he did, he is an unusual specimen of a country merchant, and I am bound to tell the hon, gentleman that he may have a considerable number of other claims of the same kind if he does not take care. How does the hon, gentleman know that this particular measure was the one used at all?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We know by the marks of verification on it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should think the hon, gentleman and his officers were showing great faith. A good many men would have been apt to detect the inaccuracy of the measure after a very short period of use, and they might very easily use another measure to their own advantage, and then bring in a claim. I fail to see how the hon, gentleman could test the accuracy of Mr. Werner's statement.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville.) I think I said to the hon. gentleman that I had some difficulty myself in commending this claim, and it had been under discussion for over two years. It arose before my time in the deat fault; it was proved that the duty was partment. There was a precedent exactly similar, and I did not make the recommendation until every fact was thoroughly investigated. The merchants' books of accounts and his sales were checked, his character was known, and we all believed he actually suffered a loss through the mistake of the officer.

Mr. RIDER. Do I understand from the Controller that inspection takes place only once in five years? Inspection should take place oftener; and I fail to see how the inspector performed his duty if he allowed the article to be used five years without being inspected.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We allowed less than one-half of the claim. We did not allow it for two years. There was some evidence, clear evidence, that this particular measure was in use and had been used by the merchant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What did the discrepancy amount to?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have the whole account here. The claim consisted of 63 gallons of molasses at 40 cents; 41 gallons of syrup at 52 cents; 298 gallons of oil at 20 cents; 89 gallons of vinegar. The account is a very long one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears this was a measure of general utility. If he used the same measure for coal oil and molasses, all I can say is that the stomachs of the natives of that locality must have been well fortified.

Mr. FRASER. When did the Minister decide the question?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Some two or three months ago.

Post Office—Outside Service—
Amount required to complete the payments for mail service on the Intercolonial Railway for the year 1894-95.$19,289 09
Amount required to complete the payments for ordinary mail service.... 40,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cause of these two large amounts, $20,000 and $40,000?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. With regard to the $19,289, a portion of the Intercolonial railway, by statute, was placed upon the main line, and became therefore entitled to receive pay at the rate of $130 per mile, and that is Government railway in Cape Breton.

Mr. FRASER. Has that made any difference in carrying the mails in Cape Breton? When you pay the Intercolonial, did you pay as much for carrying the mails as formerly?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Of course not. The hon, gentleman means that the contracts for carrying the mails before the railway took charge were different from what they are now. When the railway took charge, several contracts which we had given naturally had to be cancelled, and are now replaced by the railway which carries the mail.

Mr. FRASER. Has the Minister applied the same rule to all the contracts?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. It is very strange that one man there should be getting $9,000 when he only got $6,000 before.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We have not come to him yet.

Mr. FRASER. I will come to him when we get to the other estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the explanation of the vote of $40,000 required for additional mail service?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The whole service costs about $800,000, and it is impossible to get any closer than we have done so far, and this is to complete the amount to pay for the whole service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is rather a loose way of doing business. Surely the department could estimate within $40,000. Have there been additional routes opened? Has any additional service been rendered for this $40,000? It does seem a loose way to come down and say you want $40,000 because you could not estimate within that amount. Has there been any additional number of new post offices brought into service to account for the discrepancy?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There are new tenders coming in every day and the old ones running out. When I say that the whole service represents $800,000, I think I am quite within the bounds in saying that $40,000 is not to be considered as very large.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 12th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 115) for the relief of Helen Woodburn Jarvis (from the Senate).—(Mr. Edgar.)

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DALY introduced Bill (No. 116) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. EDGAR. Explain.

Mr. DALY. This Bill is similar to an Act that passed last session in regard to certain school lands that were occupied by squatters prior to 1st January, 1880. It was thought when the legislation was introduced last session that we had succeeded in dealing with all the claims; but since that date representations have been made to this Government, and also to the Government of Manitoba, that certain other persons whose names are mentioned had occupied school lands prior to 1st January, 1880; and this legislation is on the line of the legislation introduced and passed last session. It is introduced with the concurrence of the local government of Manitoba, and it is proposed to give to these people entry to these lands on proving to the satisfaction of the agents of the Dominion lands that they had performed homestead duties prior to 1st January, 1880, so as to entitle them to homestead entry, the Government substituting other lands for the same, so as to make up the necessary quantity for the school lands.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COST OF RETURNS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, What have the returns asked for by the members of this House from the different departments cost for making said returns, giving name of each member asking for said return during the years 1891-92-93-94 and 1895?

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say to my hon. friend that it is impossible to answer that question in anything like brief form, and in order to answer it some search and accounting will be required. If the hon. gentleman will move an address and thus secure the return, the information will be furnished, because the Government possess most of the information, though, perhaps, not all.

SAVING BANKS DEPOSITS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. What is the total amount of the deposits in the several classes of savings banks operated by Government under $500, and the number of such depositors? 2. What is the total amount of such deposits between $500 and $1,000 each, and the number of such depositors? 3. What is the total amount of such deposits on sums above $1,000, and the number of such depositors?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I shall, in answer to that question, submit the information I have received from the department. The answers to the above questions, so far as they relate to the Post Office Savings Bank, will require the examination and re-arrangement into three distinct classes of the balances at the credit of 120,000 depositors' accounts, and to do that, at this season of the year, with an office staff provided for current daily work, will necessarily involve considerable delay. It may be possible to give the required figures before the close of the present session, and a special effort will be made to do so. I think that if the hon, gentleman would kindly put it in the shape of a return, it would be more convenient to bring down.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the return ever he brought down?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think so.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can answer half the question. I will give the hon, gentleman the information he asks for, with reference to the Government savings banks, and that will be an instalment which may satisfy him. The following is the statement: him. The following is the statement:—

GALOPS RAPIDS—DISMISSED EM-PLOYEES.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Lister) asked, Were any of the engineers employed on the Galops Rapids works dismissed or suspended? If so, what were the names of such engineers, and were they dismissed or sus-If dismissed or suspended, what pended? Is it the intention of the was the cause? department to reinstate such engineers? Has any recommendation been made to the Government in that direction? Has a suit been pending between the Government and the contractors respecting the said works? If so, has a decision been rendered in favour of the contractors? Were the engineers given to understand that they were suspended only pending such suit? Was there any evidence of collusion between the contractors and engineers?

Mr. HAGGART. The services of Mr. Haycock and Mr. Ross were dispensed with; their services were no longer required. Dr.
Reid, M.P., has asked that Mr. Haycock be re-employed, as has also Mr. Haycock's brother. A suit has been pending with the contractors for deepening and straightening the Galops Rapid channel. A judgment has been rendered in favour of the contractors.
There was no evidence proving collusion between the engineers and the contractors.

SEWER IN VALLEYFIELD.

Mr. BERGERON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to repair the sewer of Victoria Street, in Valleyfield, in the way asked for by the Council of the town? If not, what do the Government intend to do in the case?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have not come to the conclusion to repair the sewer on Victoria Street, Valleyfield, in the manner asked for by the Council of that town. The Government have not decided what they will do in the matter.

GILBERT DREDGING AND BLASTING COMPANY.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Has the claim of the Gilbert Dredging and Blasting Company, arising out of the cancellation by the Government of their contract for the construction of a portion of the Cornwall Canal, been settled? If so, when, and on what terms? If not, in what condition is it now?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. The claim in connection with the cancellation of Messrs. Gilbert Dredging and Blasting Company of a portion of Sections 5 and 8 and the whole of Sections 6 and 7 of the Cornwall Canal, has been settled. 2. On the 18th April, 1894, by payment of 15 per cent on the value of work estimated as remaining to be done, amounting to $29,350.

ANTIGONISH AND SHERBROOKE MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. FRASER asked, Have the Government received petitions from a large number of persons urging that the mail route from Antigonish to Sherbrooke be changed and run from Sunnybrae, Pictou county, to Sherbrooke? Do the Government propose making the change?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Government has received petitions from a number of persons urging that the mail route from Antigonish to Sherbrooke be changed and run from Sunnybrae, Pictou County, to Sherbrooke. The Government does not propose to make the change asked for.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT LAND-ISLE AUX NOIX.

Mr. RIDER asked, 1. Did the Government duly advertise the sale of the Government land, consisting of over 135 acres, situated on the east side of the Richelieu River, in the county of Iberville, opposite "Isle aux Noix," before selling the same to Hiram Sewell Foster, under patent dated the 16th May, 1894, for the sum of $600? 2. What reasons had the Government for selling said property at that time? 3. Was it sold after valuation? If so, who was the valuator? When was the valuation made, and what was the amount named in the report? 4. Were the negotiations carried through by any member of Parliament? If so. bv whom? 5. How was payment made? by cheque, on what bank? 6. Is the Government aware that any member is, or was, directly or indirectly personally interested in the purchase thereof?

Mr. DALY. 1. The Government did not advertise the sale, for the reason that the property was sold under the provisions of the Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 55, section 5, subsection 3. That subsection authorizes the sale of any ordnance lands which are occupied with the consent of the Crown to the person in possession without resorting to public auction. 2. Because it was considered a desirable thing in the public interest to sell the property, and the leaseholder had expressed a desire to buy. 3. It had been inspected in 1888 by the late Mr. Mills, the clerk in charge at the time of ordnance and admiralty lands, and appraised at $600. 4. The negotiations were not conducted by a member of Parliament. 5. Payment was made by deposit to the credit of the Receiver General in the Merchants Bank of Canada. 6. The Government have no reason to think that any member of Parliament is interested in property in any way.

ISLE AUX NOIX.

Mr. RIDER asked, Does the Government still own the property known as the "Isle aux Noix." and what use is being made of the premises? If leased in whole or in part, to whom? For how much yearly, or otherwise, and how are payments made? If not leased, has permission been granted to any one to use the lands for pasturing horses, and to whom?

Mr. DICKEY. The Government still own the property known as the "Isle aux Noix." The buildings are only used as quarters for a caretaker. The property is leased in part: 155 acres are leased to Mr. Peter Smith for pasturage at an annual rental of $80. A small plot of garden is rented to Miss O'Hara at a yearly rental of $4. The rentals of both tenants are payable half-yearly. No permission has been granted by the department to any parties, apart from the tenants on their holdings, to use any of the land for pasturage purposes.

KILDARE STATION POST OFFICE, P. E. I.

Mr. PERRY asked. Has a postmaster been appointed at Kildare Station, lot 2, Prince Edward Island, in the place of Avit Perry, deceased? If so, who is he? If no appointment has been made, who is acting postmaster? Has he given security? If so, who are his securities?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A postmistress has been appointed at Kildare Station, lot 2, Prince Edward Island, in place of Avit Poirrier (not Perry), deceased. The name of the postmistress is Marguerite Poirrier. She has given security. Her sureties are Sylvain E. Perry and John B. Arsenault.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—SUMMER VACATION.

Mr. FRASER (for Mr. Forbes) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to grant to Intercolonial Railway operators and clerks the usual summer vacation with salary continued in the same manner as is accorded to officials of other Government departments?

Mr. HAGGART. It is proposed to give two weeks vacation with pay to the despatchers, telegraph operators, and station-masters, as their hours on duty are very long, but not to the clerks, as there does not appear to be the same reason for it.

BUTTER TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, What was the weight per package of the packages of creamery butter purchased by the Government last winter for shipment to Great Britain? What sales have been made, and what prices have been realized per pound since the statement made by the Secretary of State on the 16th of May? Have all the packages been sold, or do any remain at present in the hands of the Government? Was any of this butter sold in Montreal not for shipment to Britain? If so, for what reason, and how much was thus sold, and what price per pound was realized for it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Nine hundred and fifteen packages of butter, shipped from Montreal, weighed 48,937 pounds net, being an average of 53.48 pounds of butter per pack-No account sales of them have been received since the statement made by me to the House on the 16th of May. hundred and forty-six packages of butter were sold in Montreal, which were paid for by an advance of 20 cents per pound by Payments have been the Government. made on three lots of butter at 20 cents a pound, which were not included in the former return; and payments are to be The reason why the made on two lots. butter, which was inspected and for which payments of 20 cents per pound were made. was not sent to England, was because it was not in packages which appeared to be suitable for export to Great Britain. to enhance the reputation of the packages of our butter there. The dairy commissioner has received information from some of his correspondents in England, stating that there would be no difficulty in doing a steady trade in butter, similar to that contained in the best lots shipped last winter, especially now that buyers are getting to know it.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. Rider.

with the Portage la Prairie post office site?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is scarcely in order in bringing up a decision made by yourself, some sessions after that decision was made, and I would ask your ruling on that point.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon, gentleman has risen to a question of privilege, and I do not think the Speaker has yet heard what the question is.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, the hon, gentleman has just stated it.

The point of order just taken cannot be considered, as the hon. gentleman who has risen to a question of privilege has not yet been able to state do so without being interrupted.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman may state the question that he desires to bring up.

Mr. MARTIN. What I desired, Mr. Speaker, was to ask you to reconsider the decision given by you in calling me to order for certain expressions I used in the debate on the Portage la Prairie post office site, which occurred on Monday last. would ask you to reconsider whether the words I used then were not strictly parliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may state to the House that I have no doubt at all as to the propriety of my ruling on that occasion. I will draw the attention of the House to the 8th Rule, which says:

The Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House.

And Rule 12 says:

A member called to order shall sit down, but afterwards explain. The House, if appealed to, shall decide on the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be final.

My own view is that the appeal must be made when the decision is rendered.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not wish to make any appeal to the House, Mr. Speaker. All I wish to do is to ask you yourself to reconsider the matter-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MARTIN-and to give certain reasons to endeavour to show you, as I was not in a position to do at that moment. that my expressions were parliamentary. You will remember. Mr. Speaker, that I bowed to your decision at the time

Mr. SPEAKER. I gave my decision in

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you would be impugned, of course that may be done reconsider a decision given by you on Mon- in the ordinary parliamentary way: and day last during the debate in connection upon this point I may say this: The House has invested the Speaker with very extensive powers. If, in the exercise of those powers, his conduct is to be called in question in an irregular manner, it seems to me the authority of the Chair would be very greatly jeopardized, and those who wish to maintain the authority of the Chair will agree with me that that is not desirable. So much with regard to the result which might follow if these irregular attacks were permitted to be made upon the Chair. With regard to the question of order, I have to say that it is my duty to see that the rights of every member of this House are respected; but, as a member of the House, I have my own rights, which I think the House will agree with me ought to be recognized; and one of those the question, and he has a perfect right to rights is that if my conduct is to be called in question, it should be done by a motion properly put upon the paper, susceptible of being discussed and susceptible of being amended. I am quite willing to submit my conduct to the decision of the House, and to abide by whatever decision the House may arrive at.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to dissent, to a certain extent, from the views of Your Honour that have just been ex-There is no desire to find fault pressed. with your ruling of two days ago. There is no desire at all, and I would be sorry if the impression were to prevail that my hon, friend's object was at all to impugn the ruling you gave the other day. I humbly bowed, and so did my hon, friend, to your ruling; but while it is the duty of every gentleman, when called to order by the Speaker, to bow to his decision unless there be very strong reasons for not doing so, even if at the time his judgment was not at all in accord with that of the Speaker. I can recall to your experience, Mr. Speaker, that you have yourself, of your own motion, reversed a decision which you had given on a previous day. On reflection you came to a different conclusion, and in reversing your previous decision you did a manly and honest act for which you deserved to be commended. But if instead your attention had been called to the decision, without any object at all of impugning your motive, and if a discussion had ensued, I do not see that the authority of the Chair would have been impaired in any way or that anything derogatory to the dignity of the House would have taken place. In the matter before us, my hon. friend from Winnipeg conceived that the ruling of the Chair might be questioned and proposed to give reasons for his opinion. I deprecate the idea that in so doing he is wanting at all in respect to the Chair. On the contrary, I am sure I voice his own feeling when I say regard to that matter, and I have no doubt that he has the highest respect for your as to its correctness. If my conduct is to authority, Mr. Speaker, but that respect is not inconsistent with an opinion of dissent in the case of any special ruling. In this matter my hon. friend acted properly at the moment in bowing to the ruling of the Chair; but he is quite within his rights in caling the attention of the House, at a subsequent period, to the interpretation of the rule as given by the Speaker and to submit his own views as a question of privilege. I have not heard the argument of my hon. friend. and I do not know what he intends to say; but if after hearing my hon, friend I came to the conclusion that Mr. Speaker erred in the application of the rule, that would in no way impair the respect which I give him.

Mr. FOSTER. The tenor of the remarks of my hon. friend is entirely counteracted by the assertion which Mr. Speaker has already made at this sitting with reference to this very point of order on which he ruled the other day and to which the hon. gentleman bowed, as was his duty. Mr. Speaker has declared to-day that he can give no other decision. He has not intimated that he can reverse his decision. On the contrary, he has told the House, at this sitting, that he maintains his decision to be good and cannot reverse it. What does my hon. friend want to do? He was here the other day when the ruling was given. It is a very simple question; there is nothing complex about it. My hon, friend from Winnipeg offended against one of the plainest rules of the House-that rule which requires the courtesy of not imputing to an hon. member corrupt or wrong motives with regard to any statement he has made. He offended that rule of this House, which is an indispensable rule and condition of debate in any deliberative body, and he was called to order. The question is a plain, simple one, free from any technicality or ambiguity. Mr. Speaker gave his decision, and to that decision the hon. gentleman bowed. When he attempts to bring it up again. Mr. Speaker intimates that his mind has not changed but that in his opinion the ruling was right and proper. If then, in these circumstances, any hon, member is free to precipitate a discussion at any time he may choose, and have the Speaker's ruling debated in the House, the Speaker will no longer have the authority which he should possess in order to enforce order and decorum in the conduct of our debates. I am astonished that my hon, friend, in so plain a case of disobedience to the rules of the House and in so plain a case of opposition to the Speaker's decision without any indication from the Speaker of a change of opinion, would support a procedure of this kind.

he asks, not that the House shall review the decision of the Speaker, but that the Speaker himself shall reconsider that decision with the aid of such other reasons and authorities as may be given to him. only remember one case since I have been in Parliament where a matter of that sort has come before the Chair, and that was a case in which Mr. Speaker Cockburn had ruled against the Hon. Sandfield Macdonald on some matter which the latter had brought to the attention of the House. On a subsequent day Mr. Macdonald, who had himself been some time before. Speaker of the House and was fairly well familiar with the rules, called the attention of the Speaker to the fact that he had erred, and asserted what he considered should have been the ruling of the House in a discussion somewhat similar to that which my hon, friend proposes to bring up now. The hon, gentleman says that the conduct of the hon, member for Winnipeg was a clear offence against the rules of the House. I am not going to say that it is not against the rules as they at present stand, but I have myself a very distinct recollection of many rulings in England where a distinction was made between charging a member with having said what was untrue and characterizing the statement itself—a distinction between a personal charge against the individual and an assertion of the inaccuracy of the statement. Whether that distinction is preserved in the modern rules or not, I do not pretend to say.

Mr. SPEAKER. The most recent decision I find with reference to the matter is perfeetly applicable to this case. Mr. Speaker Peel decided on the 15th May, 1884, that any question affecting the conduct of the Chair or any ruling given by the Speaker should come before the House in such a way that the whole House would be able to decide upon it. The proper way is to give notice and put a motion in specific form before the House, so that the whole House may have cognizance of it.

FUNERAL EXPENSES—LATE SIR JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Public Bills and Orders are called, I wish to call the attention of the leader of the House to the conversation we had late last night in Supply with reference to the proposed vote of $25,000 for the funeral expenses of the late Sir John Thompson. I understood at the time that the agreement was come to that the accounts should be placed on the Table of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that statement was made. The accounts were handed to me by the Minister of Railways, but as they were the original accounts I did not wish to proMr. HAGGART. I expect to have the copies by to-morrow. I ordered them to be prepared.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

On the order:

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If it is in order, Mr. Speaker, I would move that this order be discharged. I think that with the consent of the House this might be done. I might say that the hon, gentleman in charge of the Bill, though I did not make this suggestion to him, was perfectly satisfied with the intimation I gave, in compliance with the general understanding of the House, that the provisions of this Bill were to be introduced as an amendment to the Criminal Code, so I thought with the general consent, this order might disappear.

Mr. LAURIER. I imagine the better way would be to transfer it to the Government orders.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I showed the hon, member who has charge of the Bill the draft of the substitute proposed, and he was perfectly satisfied with it, and returned it to me with an expression of his satisfaction.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon, gentleman will say that he has the authority of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to this motion—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I cannot say I have that. The Bill had better stand.

SUPERANNUATION ACT.

On the Order for resuming adjourned debate for second reading of Bill (No. 6) further to amend the Superannuation Act.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have not yet had time to look up the authorities on the question raised with regard to this Bill. I would ask that it be allowed to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. No. My own opinion is very decided: this Bill is one that must be introduced on the authority of the Crown and by resolution.

UNLAWFUL ASSOCIATIONS AND OATHS.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) further to amend the tenth chapter of the Consolidated Statutes, is no innovation, and I take it to be wholly for Lower Canada, respecting Seditious and Unlawful Associations and Oaths. He said: This Bill is of so simple a character, and as it seems to me, so commendable, as to require only a few brief words of explanation. The object of the Bill is to remove certain disabilities under which the Masonic body acting under the jurisdiction of the grand lodge of Quebec now rests. But I desire it to be well understood that the Bill makes no innovation and confers no new privileges. Before the union of the old provinces of Canada. I think about the year 1840, an Act was passed by the legislature of the province of Lower Canada, entitled "An Act respecting Seditious and Unlawful Associations and Oaths," prescribing certain penalties to oath-bound associations, for instance:

Every society or association, the members whereof are, according to the rules thereof, or to any provision, or any agreement for that purpose, required * * * to take any oath or engagement * * * not required or authorized by law, and every society or association, the members whereof, or any of them, take, or in any manner bind themselves by, any such oath or engagement.

- were made subject to certain penalties. But the last clause of this Act-which, let it be well understood, was passed by the legislature of Lower Canada about the year 1810, and which appears in the Consolidated Statates of Lower Canada, provides:

And whereas, certain societies have been long accustomed to be holden in this province, under the denomination of lodges of Free Masons, the meetings whereof have been in great measure directed to charitable purposes—nothing in this Act shall extend to the meetings of any such society or lodge, holden under the said denomination and in conformity to the rules prevailing among the said societies of Free Masons; provided, such society or lodge has been constituted by or under the authority of warrants in that behalf, granted by, or derived from, any grand master or grand lodge in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Now, at the time of the passage of this statute, all Masonic bodies in the province of Quebec were acting under the jurisdiction of the grand lodge of Great Britain. Subsequently the grand lodge of Canada was constituted, and, in 1885, a statute was passed by the united provinces extending the same exemption to Masonic lodges acting under the jurisdiction of the grand lodge of Canada. Again, subsequently, about the year 1870, the grand lodge of Quebec was formed out of the grand lodge of Canada. But the exemption and relief from these penalties respecting unlawful associations and oaths was not extended to the lodges acting under the jurisdiction of the grand lodge of Quebec. The object of this Bill is to give to the latter the same measure of relief which the Masonic organizations acting under the jurisdiction of the grand lodge of Great Britain and the grand lodge of Canada enjoy. As I have said, there unnecessary to address to this House any argument whatever as to the propriety of passing the Bill which I have now the honour to ask the House to read a second time with respect to a society whose character is so high, whose members occupy so prominent a place in the country and whose purposes are so well known to be of a benevolent character. I move the second reading of this Bill, seconded by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson).

Motion agreed to. Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Commit-

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McKAY. I would move that another clause be added to this Bill. This measure is intended to exempt the Masonic order from all penalties they may labour under at present in respect of the law referred to. I think the same exemption should be extended to other charitable and benevolent associations, so as to relieve them from the disabilities under which they labour. would move that the following clause be added:-

That all societies, associations and lodges. whose members are bound by oath, and whose objects are exclusively of a social, charitable and benevolent character, are hereby exempted from the penalties prescribed by chapter 10 of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada.

I move that this clause be added to the Bill for the purpose of relieving members of other charitable associations in the province of Quebec from the disabilities which they may labour under.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I believe that this amendment is out of order, not being relevant to the Bill which has just passed its second reading. The hon, gentleman cannot move it until notice is given the House.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CONTRACTS TO ALIENS.

McLENNAN moved second reading Bill (No. 9) to prevent the letting contracts to aliens. He said: Mr. Speaker, it may be necessary for me to offer some explanations in regard to this Bill. I have no fault or quarrel with the contractors who are doing work in this country, and I believe many of them are very good men. It is the principle and not the individuals that I object to. This Bill only deals with the letting of Government contracts. It does not interfere with the investing of capital in our country; neither does it interfere with men entering into enterprises of any kind or description, and letting contracts to whom they please. Even this is a privilege which is not extended to us by the people of the United States. It does not interfere with immigration, nor deprive foreigners from getting employment in Canada. Any person coming into our country is treated with a consideration, which is not extended to the people of Canada in the United States. In every advertisement of a contract to be let by the Government of the United States, the attention of tenderers is drawn to the Acts of Congress depriving aliens from getting employment or labour in that country. It is true, perhaps, that the Government have not legislated against an alien getting a contract in the United States, but they have placed conditions in their statutes, specifications and forms of contract, and the securities necessary to be furnished are such that it is impossible for a Canadian to carry out such stipulations, and the consequence is that it practically means "No Canadians need apply." If a Canadian does apply, it is with the distinct understanding that if he comes to the United States, he must leave his staff and men behind him, including the foreman, superintendents and men who helped him to carry on his former work. This denial to him of the privilege of taking his staff with him to engage in a contract is a serious loss, as I know from personal that one of the greatest experience difficulties a man has to contend the getting up of a thorough organization in the commencement of the work. Canadian contractors have had to provide expensive plant and material to be prepared to take the Government contracts, and the Dominion of Canada is spending a good deal of money in improvements for the sake of these improvements themselves, and also for the purpose of giving our men employment in the country, so as to prevent them from leaving and seeking it elsewhere, and we should certainly have the privilege of earning and retaining the money expended by our Government in the country. With Canadians carrying on the work, they would, no doubt, employ their staff, superintendents, foremen, horses, plant and machinery which is manufactured in Canada, instead of allowing American contractors to come here and take the profits of their contracts away with them as well as their staff, and the savings of the men employed, depriving our people of employment and reducing the wages of They refuse us the our labouring men. privilege of being employed upon their works and we should not continue to allow them to take the money contributed by our people from Canada. There are certain restrictions in the contract law by the Gov-United of the States. ernment where plant can be purchased as well and as cheaply in the United States, they are bound by contract to do so. In Canada, I understand, the plant and machinery of six months.

alien contractors has been allowed to be brought in under bond, and if charged any duty, it was but a nominal sum. However, I am told by the Controller of Customs that such is not the case now, and I am glad to know it. But in the case of a Canadian contractor going to the United States, if he has plant in this country, the terms of the contract and the law governing contracts sets forth, that "United States plant is preferable." If a Canadian did get a contract in the United States, he would be expected to leave his machinery in Canada and purchase that of the United with which to carry on Canadian contractors bringing machiwork. nery into the United States have to pay the United States with which to carry on work. Canadian contractors bringing machinery into the United States have to pay 40 or 50 per cent duty thereon; while the American contractors were allowed to bring their plant and machinery in here in bond, and take it back with them. The Canadian Government received no duty on the material brought over to perform the work of the contract let to such Americans, and in any case we would have to pay a higher duty than they would. This might amount to more than the difference in the price for the contract, even though the Americans were the lowest tenderer. The savings of the contractor, the earnings of the men invested in the country, and the labour employed in manufacturing the plant in Canada would certainly more than balance any loss that might be sustained in any other way in regard to contracts. The following sections are from the Acts of Congress of 1884-85, "Alien Contract Labour":

Section 3. Any person, partnership or company knowingly assisting, encouraging or soliciting the migration or importation of any alien or aliens, foreigner or foreigners into the United States, its territories or the District of Columbia, to perform labour or service of any kind under contract or agreement, express or implied, parol or special, with such alien or aliens, foreigner or foreigners previous to becoming residents or citizens of the United States, shall forfeit and pay for every such offence the sum of one thousand dollars, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor, including any such alien or foreigner who may be a party to any such contract or agreement, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the circuit courts of the United States.

Section 4. The master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on any such vessel, and land or permit to be landed, from any foreign port or place, any alien labourer, mechanic or artisan, who, previous to embarkation on such vessel, had entered into contract or agreement, parol or special, express or implied, to perform labour or service in the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars for each and every such alien labourer, mechanic or artisan so brought as aforesaid, and may also be imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months.

Section 5 (as amended by chapter 551, Acts of 1890-91). Nothing in this Act shall be so construed as to prevent any citizen or subject of any foreign country temporarily residing in the United States, either in private or official capacity, from engaging under contract or otherwise persons not residents or citizens of the United States to act as private secretaries, servants or domestics for such foreigner temporarily residing in the United States as aforesaid: nor shall this Act be so construed as to prevent any person or persons, partnership or corporation from engaging under contract or agreement skilled workmen in foreign countries to perform labour in the United States in or upon any new industry not at present established in the United States; provided, that skilled labour for that purpose cannot otherwise be obtained.

Section 8.—"An Act to prohibit the immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract to perform labour."—And the same is hereby amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in case he shall be satisfied that an immigrant has been allowed to land contrary to the prohibition of that law, to cause such immigrant, within the period of one year of landing or entry, to be taken into custody and returned to the country from whence he came, at the expense of the owner of the importing vessel.

I have here the specification of contract of the United States Government. Clause 1 of the specification is as follows:—

The attention of bidders is especially invited to the Acts of Congress, approved 26th February, 1885, and 23rd February, 1887, as printed in volume 23, page 332, and volume 24, page 414, United States Statutes at large, which prohibit the importation of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in the United States or territories or the District of Columbia.

Clause 2 is as follows :-

Preference will be given to articles or materials of domestic production, conditions and quality and price being equal, including in the price of foreign articles the duty thereon.

Clause 7 says:—

Surities must be citizens of the United States.

So the House will see that preference is given to articles and materials of domestic production, thus making it almost impossible for Canadians to go to the United States and take work. Even if a Canadian contractor took his plant to the United States, he would be compelled to pay a duty of 40 or 50 per cent on its admittance. was led to understand some time ago-I do not know what is done now-that American plant and material was allowed to come in from the United States under bond, it being agreed that the plant should be taken back when the contract was finished. have spoken to the Controller of Customs on this matter, and he informs me that such is not the case. I am very glad to know it, because it would be very unfair to com-pel the payment of duty on Canadian plant entering the United States, and allow similar plant and material to come in from the United States free of duty. Another diffi-going to the United States and getting contracts is, that sureties must be citizens of the United States. It is also found that the amount of the security is very large, and that the sureties must be well-known men, living in the United States, and they must make affidavit on the back of the bond or in contract that they justify in double the amount of the penalty. Then, when the contractor obtains the sureties, they must be endorsed by officials of the United States Government, thus making it still more difficult for a Canadian or alien to get work in that country. I have received several letters from Canadian contractors in connection with this matter, including one from Mr. John S. Henry, of Hamilton, who says that ten years ago we could go freely into the United States and compete for contracts. but at the present time no Canadian need apply; that if he was fortunate enough to get the work, he would be so harassed by every one that he would be glad to give it up, and that it is practically impossible for any Canadian to get any federal or state government contract. I find that the legisla-tures of the different states have passed legislation preventing Canadians getting contracts under any consideration. At page 134 of the statutes of Illinois, Acts of 1889, I find the following:-

Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any board or commission, or any officer or other person acting for the state, or any county, township, city, village, district, or other municipality in the state, or any contractor or sub-contractor, under any or either of said municipalities, to employ any person or persons other than native-born or naturalized citizens, or those who have in good faith declared their intentions to become citizens of the United States, when such employees are to be paid, in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, out of any funds raised by taxation.

Section 2. It shall be the duty of any person or Section 2. It shall be the duty of any person or persons employing labour or other services, to be paid for, in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, out of any funds raised by taxation, to file with the treasurer or disbursing officer of such funds a certificate showing, to the best of his knowledge and belief, that the persons so employed * are citizens of the United States, or have in good faith declared their intentions to become such citizens, or are of such age or sex, that they cannot declare their intentions to become citizens, or cannot be formally declared to be citizens by an order of a court of record.

Section 5. Whenever any employer, contractor or sub-contractor, by written or oral information, or from any source, has reason to believe that he has in his employ persons other than native or naturalized citizens, or those who have in good faith declared their intentions to become citizens, whose pay is to be drawn, in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, from such public funds, he shall at once investigate the matter, and if he shall find said information to have been correct, he shall discharge such employee or employees, and a failure to do so shall render him liable to the municipality * for any of such funds paid to such alien.

United States free of duty. Another difficulty that stands in the way of Canadians Section 6. In all cases where an alien, after filing his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall, for the space of three months after he could lawfully do so, fail to take out his final papers and complete his citizenship, such failure shall be prima facie evidence that his declaration of intentions was not made in good faith.

In the state of Idaho, Article 13, referring to employment of aliens on public works, section 5 says:

No person not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become such, shall be employed upon or in connection with any state or municipal work.

In New York the law is similar to that of Illinois, and in almost every state of the Union there are conditions introduced into the law, so as to prevent aliens from getting the work. The law of the state of Wyoming, says:

Labour on public works, citizens of the United States only to be employed.—Section 1. No person not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become such, shall be employed upon or in connection with any state, county or municipal work.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown to the House what they do in the United States with respect to alien labour. Some years ago our people used to go to the United States and get contracts there, and Canadian contractors have been the builders of some of their most important works. Even in some cases where the contractors of that country failed in carrying through the work, our Canadian contractors went over there and completed it. I might mention in this connection the case of the Hoosac Tunnel, which was completed by the Messrs. Shanly Bros. Formerly we had free access to the United States, and if we could do the work as well, and cheaper, than their own contractors we had the privilege of competing with them. But now, they have shut out Canadians from getting employment, and their specifications, and forms of contract are so fixed as practically to exclude us there. the any work doing Canadian contractor first place the handicapped by their refusing to allow his plant to go into the United States, unless by paying a higher duty than an American contractor would have to pay for bringing his plant into Canada. Again, a Canadian contractor would have a staff well trained and organized in Canada, and if he could not take them with him into the United States he would be at a great disadvantage. A contractor from Canada would have to buy his plant in the United States and leave his own plant at home, a fact in itself which effectually would prevent a Canadian contractor taking work there. I have no desire to do anything to interfere with labour coming into Canada. When a man puts his foot on British soil here, he is placed on a level with every other man, and if there is employment and he is willing to work, he any way, but I do say, Mr. Speaker, that in justice to the contractors of Canada they should be protected in their own country so long as other contractors are protected against Canadians. There is another consideration in this matter which is of very great importance. The profits of United States contractors who do work in Canada are not invested in Canada, but they are taken back and invested to the advantage of a foreign country. Again, these contractors. very often, bring over their labourers with and these labourers return spend their earnings at home. If these profits were properly invested in Canada, there is no doubt but that they would be beneficial to the country. I do say, Sir. that this capital kept within the country. and well invested, might be of greater benefit to us, than the saving of any little difference which there might be in the contract price. I wish every man who is in this country doing work, if he be an alien, to distinctly understand that I have nothing against Americans. Canada and the United States are on the most friendly terms, and I hope they will remain so, but as a matter of business, and as a matter of justice and fair-play to Canadians, I believe that while we are treated in this way by the United States, we should stand up for our rights at home. I do not believe in the principle of letting Canadian contracts to aliens, sometimes in preference to our own people.

Mr. HAGGART. I was very much interested in the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan). He points out that the alien laws in the United States prevent Canadian contractors getting work in that country, and he also instanced the difficulty contractors had in moving their plant into that country. The hon, gentleman also referred to the effect of the alien law upon labourers, and how impossible it was to employ Canadians for the purpose of carrying on contracts in the United States. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) will look at his Bill he will see that it has a much wider scope than one would infer from listening to his remarks. His Bill would apply to Frenchmen, or Belgians, or aliens coming from any country in the world. For instance, if the Bill passed, it would prevent the Government from entering into a contract with a Belgian firm for supplying a bridge. Perhaps we would not have power to pass such an Act as this, and if we had the power, perhaps we are bound to the contrary by obligations in treaties which the British Government has entered into with foreign countries. remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mc-Lennan) have been devoted entirely to the legislation which has passed in the United order to States, and in reach citizens of that country, he has given this Bill \mathbf{a} scope that would gets the opportunity. I have no wish to do to aliens from any country in the world. anything that would interfere with that in I doubt very much the necessity or the desirability of any such legislation, which would apply to people of other countries whose legislation is, perhaps, most favourable to contractors belonging to this country, such as Germans, French, Belgians. and other Europeans. Canadian contractors might also go into South America and make contracts for any public work. This Bill would apply to all these. It would also apply to contracts for locomotives, or materials for a railway, and to any contract which a Government might enter into for building a railway for which material could be got from a foreign country. Surely the hon, gentleman does not intend that his Bill should have a scope of that kind. He intended, perhaps, that the Bill should be allowed to go to committee, and that its scope should be limited to that class of aliens who reside in the United States. Legislation of that kind is exceedingly ob-We could not embody in a Bill passed by this House a direct statement singling out the inhabitants of the United States as against the inhabitants of any other country, and say that any alien from any other country in the world could enter into a contract in Canada, while an inhabitant of the United States could not The policy of the Government, in reference to these matters, without any legislation at all, has been proved in the contracts which I myself have let on behalf of the Crown for carrying on works in certain portions of the country. I make it a condition that the labourers employed on these works shall be Canadians, or British subjects, or such labour as would be acceptable to the people of Canada; and I think that might be fully protected if left to the Government. The Government might also make it a condition that the parties tendering for any contract let by the Government should be British subjects; or, in awarding a contract, they might skip a lower tenderer who was an alien. They could regulate the matter in that manner, without the objectionable form of an Act of Parliament, by which aliens, no matter from what country they came, would be deprived of the opportunity of entering into a public contract of any kind with Her Majesty in Canada. There may be times when it may be requisite to enter into a contract with aliens, and it might be against public policy, and the interest of the country to deprive the Crown of the liberty to secure what might be a benefit to this country. Under the hon. gentleman's Bill, ipso facto, a contract with a foreigner would be void, and penalties would be attached to it. I know that the hon. gentleman has no other object in view than to secure legislation of a reciprocal character, applying to others the same measure that they apply to us; and his intention was solely to prevent citizens of the United States competing with contractors in this country, when the same privilege to our contractors going over But that might be accomplished there. without this Bill at all; and I think the hon, gentleman should take the assurance of the Government that in any contracts which may be entered into, the Government can exercise the liberty of rejecting any tender which they think is not in the interest of the inhabitants of this country, by skipping a lower tenderer from the United States, and awarding the contract to a resident of this country.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister of Railways has concluded with a very remarkable proposal. He proposes that the Government should do something which, under the Public Works Act, I do not think they can do-which they have always felt it necessary to give some technical excuse for doing when they have done it. He says it is open to the Government to accomplish the purposes of this Bill by passing over a lower tender put in by an alien in order to accept a higher tender put in by a Canadian, if they see fit to do so. That is how I understood him, and I was astonished that he should make that statement at the close of a speech which, in the main, tended towards opposition to the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Glengarry. As to that Bill, I am sorry to say that we in this part of the House have only the face of the Bill to go upon, as the hon. gentleman's explanations were entirely inaudible here, although, from the voluminous nature of his brief, they were doubtless very valuable. The Bill, on its face, is a move in the direction of creating a new monopoly—a monopoly distinctly opposed to the public interest. We have already, I think, as many monopolies as the country can afford. We have a sugar monopoly, a cotton monopoly, a woollen monopoly, an agricultural implement monopoly, and so forth; and now, the hon. gentleman, a contractor himself, who knows the needs of that poverty-stricken class, who have not yet, apparently, shared in the benefits of the National Policy, wishes to create a monopoly for the Canadian contractor. Judging from the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. member for Glengarry must have said something about the Alien Labour law of the United States. That has no connection whatever with the subject-matter of this Bill. This Bill does not deal in any respect with the employment of aliens to work on contracts in Canada. It deals purely and simply with the letting of contracts. The question before the House is: Shall we limit the choice of the Government in letting contracts to such tenders as are put in by Canadians? I say that would be limiting the power of the Government in letting a contract, in a way that would be distinctly inconsistent with the public interest. It would mean that rings could be formed amongst Cana-United States Government do not allow the dian contractors in the same way in which rings have been formed amongst Canadian manufacturers, only more effectually, because the manufacturers have only high protection in their favour, while the contractors would have a prohibitory law in their That combination would exclude favour. all competition, except such as the Canadian contractors' ring would be inclined to permit. The Canadian contractors' ring would have all the contracts among themselves and all the extras and all the boodle. It is absurd to contend in this House that the Canadian contractor has not a good chance for making money out of Canadian public works as The hon. things stand. member Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is a proof, in his own person, of the fact that Canadian contractors can, and do, make a good thing out of Canadian public contracts. The hon. gentleman has certainly made a good thing out of more than one public contract. He has shown his enterprise, ability and management in making very handsome profits out of these contracts. He is himself a striking proof that the Canadian contractor has a chance, and the allegation that he has not any show in comparison with foreign competitors, would be the only possible reason which could be urged for adopting a Bill of this kind. Therefore, I say that the suggestion of the Minister of Railways that this Bill should go into committee, and be changed in some mysterious way in committee, is one consistent with the public interest, and with the tone of the hon. Minister's own speech. If we were to give this Bill a second reading, we would be adopting a principle which the hon. Minister himself declares is not capable of adoption by this House, namely, that we have the right to exclude aliens from taking contracts in this country, or that it would be advisable to exclude them. He intimated that the principle of the Bill was bad and impracticable, and yet he proposes that we should give it a second reading and go into committee on it.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not propose that.

Mr. CASEY. I certainly heard him say that it might be as well to go into comnrittee.

Mr. CURRAN. He said that the hon. mover of the Bill might suggest that.

Mr. CASEY. I did not mean to misrepresent the hon. gentleman, and certainly thought he used the words I quoted. I am satisfied that the hon. Minister will agree with me, judging from the tone of the rest of his speech, that we would be doing a very unwise and improper thing if we gave this Bill a second reading at all.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. member for Glengarry. He has ably stated a grievance which Canadians feel in this country. He speaks from experience, and also for a large number of contractors who have gone from the county of Glengarry, which he has the honour to represent in this House. The men of Glengarry, without much capital, but with unbounded energy and industry, have gone from that county and spread all over this continent. especially the United States, where they have built millions of dollars' worth of public works. Now, however, they find themselves so harassed by laws and restrictions that they are no longer able to carry on such works in the United States, and they think that the law of retaliation should be put in force in this The Americans ought, at least, to country. treat us as we treat them, but they are not disposed to do that. They are not disposed to treat us generously or fairly with regard to the fisheries, wrecking laws, quarantine regulations, and hundreds of other things; and if we sit quietly down and allow them to smite us on the one cheek, they will expect us to turn the other and will harass us in every way. The time has come, or will soon come, when we, as Canadians, ought to insist on a reciprocity of treatment. As they treat us we should treat them. I would not like to see the measure made as strict as the hon. member for Glengarry proposes, but I would like to see something carried out in the line suggested by the Minister of Railways and Canals, namely, that if the Americans insist on treating us as they have been doing, and if they intend making these harassing acts of theirs still more stringent, we ought to adopt some scheme for treating them as they treat us, and in that way, at least, protect our people. Especially should that be done by a Government or party who say that their policy is a national policy. It is because the Americans are so strongly national, so patriotic, that they have passed all this legislation, and the result has been that they have built up their own industries and contractors, and kept their work for their own people. As Canadians, we ought to do the same; and in standing up for that principle. I have a great deal of sympathy for the hon. member for Glengarry, and hope there will be such an expression of opinion from the House that the Government will be strengthened in following some such line as the Minister of Railways and Canals has indicated.

Mr. TISDALE. I must say that, like the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), I have a great deal of sympathy in the line of the Bill which the hon. member for Glengarry has introduced. I am very sorry that the hon, gentleman did not speak loud enough for all of us to hear what he said, because he gave a very interesting and lengthy account, not only of the legislation of the general government of the United States, but of the still stronger laws of the different states on the line of his Bill. Now, I deprecate such legislation by any country. Of course, I concede the right of the general government and the different states to pass any legislation they see fit, but I deprecate such legislation, for this reason. I do not believe that legislation upon the extreme lines they have seen fit to adopt is such as will in the end tend to their best interests. While I have this sympathy for the hon. member for Glengarry, and while the time may come when, if the United States should continue that class of legislation—and particularly if it should be aimed especially at Canada, as some of the state legislatures have done by mentioning Canada in particular-I should be prepared to go the whole length which the hon, gentleman proposes to-day, there is one difficulty which seems to me insuperable at present, and which has been explained by the Minister of Railways, and that is the difficulty of making such a law apply to the United States, by especially naming the United States, and not making it apply to other countries. The United States, in their legislation, do not designate any particular country, but apply it to all countries alike. But in order that a law of that kind might be of any adequate relief to us, we would have to specially apply it to the United States. That at present would be very difficult. In fact, I think it is impossible, and certainly it would be a very undesirable class of legislation. It would be a class of legislation which the United States so far have not applied, because their legislation applies to all aliens indiscriminately. In that they have the advantage of us; and although their legislation may hit us hard, we cannot say that it is aimed en-tirely at us, so far as I understand the laws they have passed in relation to this class of contracts. Then comes the question, in some respects possibly more important than the And that is that such legislation might involve our paying a much higher price for the construction of public works of a certain nature. It can hardly be urged that the general interests of the country would be served by our having to pay larger prices for the construction of public works, for the cost of which the people have to pay. That is a very grave consideration, especially in a country such as Canada, where we are building and will have to continue to build extensive public works if we go on improving, as I think we should, our different systems of transportation. Now, I do not agree with the hon. member from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) in saying that the Minister propounded an improper proposition in saying that the Government, so far as they could see their way to do it, would take care that on our public works, the work should go to Canadians. Mind you, he limited his proposition to the application as consistent this rule in so far with the public interests. I do not care whether it is a Liberal or Conservative Goverument-of course, I have my preferences which party should control public affairs, but I apply the same principles to both-I believe that they should do everything possible, consistent with a due consideration public for the interest. to utilize the labour upon these public works for the benefit of our own people, along the general lines suggested by the hon. Minister. I understand that in some contracts where the contractor was an alien, the hon. Minister has insisted-and this was agreeable to both sides-that Canadian labour should be employed. So, though we cannot legislate on lines that would look like directing the law against one particular people, I, for my part, shall be prepared to strengthen the hands of any Government, Conservative or Reform, in saying—and I am prepared to say it and take the responsibility of it -that our public works should be carried on in this manner, so far as it can be done consistently with the interests of the public. And I want to say further, and I am glad to say it now that a subject has arisen upon which such a remark is pertinent, that, while I am not prepared to go so far as suggested by my hon, friend from Glengarry, and while all my feelings towards the people of the United States are of the friendliest character, I still hold that there is room here for two great Anglo-Saxon nations, managing their affairs on the lines of free government; yet, if they believe it necessary in their own interest to impose restrictions which are aimed especially at us, the time may come, if they drive us too far, when it will be our duty to say that we can get along without them as well as they can get along without us, and when, by express enactment of our legislature, we shall retaliate on the same lines. So, while I am not prepared to support the hon. member for Glengarry to the full extent he proposes to go, I am prepared, and I will insist, so far as I have any influence with our Government, that the rule of fair-play to our own workmen shall be applied so far as it is not inconsistent with the interests of the country at large. And I will go this much further—I will give my support in carrying out a policy of this kind, even to a Government to which I may be opposed. I think the thanks of this House and this country are due to the hon. member for Glengarry for the trouble he has taken —and it must have involved no little trouble -to gather the information he has laid before us, information which, spread upon the pages of "Hansard," will be of value in the future.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. member who has just taken his seat gives a great deal of credit to the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) for gathering the information he has given to the House this afternoon. I notice that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals also extended his sympathy to the hon. member for Glengarry. But neither of these hon. gentlemen has offered the hon. gentleman of the Bill any support. Now, I quite agree with the objection to the Bill raised by the Minister of Railways and Canals, that it will be too specific in its character in declaring that no American should be allowed to take a contract under the Canadian Government. We Canadians, I think, are quite able, whether as contractors or in any other walk of life, to hold our own, even against Canadian contractors are the Americans. able to go over to the United States and take contracts, and they are even able to take their plant over. I have done a little of that kind of thing myself, Mr. Speaker, even with a 40 per cent duty The only item upon which against me. the Americans insist in the exclusion of alien labour, is on Government works. Any private enterprises, such as railways and other large undertakings, that are not under the direct control of the Government, are as free to all contractors as public works are free to all contractors in the Dominion of Canada. Now, the hon. Minister says that he can get over the difficulty of opposing the Americans in the awarding of con-Well, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the House and to the country that he has never taken much care to have this kind of work kept in the hands of Canadians; for, upon the Welland Canal, the pick of all the contracts, and all the good portions of the work along the line of the canal were let to the Americans. sorry to say also, Mr. Speaker, that to-day all the large public works that are being carried on by the Dominion Government are in the hands of American contractors. Of course, we are to be protected so far as the workmen are concerned; for the Minister says that under the new order of things, while he is in his present office, he will insist upon the American contractors employing Canadian labour. But he does not say anything about insisting upon the American contractors staying here with the profits they make out of Canadian works. The workman is to be protected, but the contractor is to be free to take the whole I have of the money out of the country. just this to say: We cannot possibly legislate against any one country; and if the principle of this Bill were carried out, then, out by pointed the Minister Railways and Canals, not only labour. but all materials for public works would be prevented from coming into Canada. If I understand the hon. gentleman's idea, and I think I do, it is to prevent American contractors from coming into Canada and competing with Canadian contractors. But his Bill goes further than that. If he would confine his Bill to the principle of reciprocity, going only as far as the Americans go, then he would attain his object. But I think the Bill in its present shape will be thrown out by the Government on account of its overreaching character.

Mr. McALISTER. As has already been pointed out by the Minister of Railways, the scope of this Bill is wider than was anticipated, I presume, by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), who introduced it. The Bill not only provides that all contracts let to aliens shall be void, but it makes no provision for aliens residing in Canada getting contracts. We know that a great many people come from foreign countries to Canada and reside therein without becoming citizens for a number of years; and under the provisions of this Bill they would be precluded from entering into any contract with the Government. Now, this would be unfair. There are many Canadians residing in the United States who prefer to retain their Canadian citizenship, and who refuse to become naturalized citizens of the United States; for the same reason people from the United States and other countries coming into Canada to reside. may prefer to retain their citizenship rather than become naturalized citizens of Canada. Now, under the provisions of this Bill such men residing in Canada are precluded from entering into any contract with the Dominion Government for the construction of any public work. There are many men living in this country who are not citizens of Canada, and who are not allowed to vote, yet they own a great deal of property in Canada upon which they pay taxes. and are citizens of this country to all intents and purposes. If this Bill were passed in its present shape, it would shut out from taking contracts from the Government all these men who are in the position I have described. I do not imagine that the hon. gentleman intends his Bill to apply to people of this class, but in its present shape it makes no exception in favour of men who are practically residents of Canada without being citizens. foreigner But a could come in and get \mathbf{a} citizen of this country to enter into a contract the Government, and he could import his alien labour which I understand from the hon. member from Glengarry is the chief evil which his Bill is designed to remedy. I think, therefore, that the principle of the Bill is bad and it should not be adopted. Even though the United States pass laws which are detrimental to the interests of other countries, I do not think it would be wise for us to pass retaliatory laws where such laws may be injurious to ourselves. As has been pointed out by my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), this Bill may prevent the Government from accepting the lowest tender, and consequently the cost of public works may be materially increased. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) referred to important contracts that are now let by the Government to Americans. and I think that is another reason why it is inadvisable to pass this Bill. Although contracts are let to Americans, I am informed that in every instance they vere the contract; and if the Government were precluded from giving contracts to Americans, it is evident that the cost of our public works in some instances would be somewhat; increased.

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon, member for: Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) has undoubtedly been actuated by the very best motives that can possibly sway a member of this House. in introducing that Bill I am satisfied that his object was to protect Canadians against; outside competition. It was not intended to prevent the Government of the day from letting contracts in France, or Belgium, or any other country, where it is found that material, &c., can be bought to better advantage than it can be manufactured in Canada and supplied on public works. think that if the Bill was framed so as not to prevent the Government from letting such contracts as it is absolutely necessary that they should let out of the country, it would supply a long felt want in the Dominion of Canada. I was pleased to hear the fair and manly criticism made by the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Gibson), who undoubtedly is the strongest advocate of the Bill that has yet spoken in the House. There is no doubt that Canadian contractors can hold their own with any other contractors in the world, I care not where the others Very large public works have been constructed in Canada from 1875 until 1885. Indeed, you may go back to the time of the construction of the Intercolonial and from that time until the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, very large public works have been under construction in the Dominion of Canada, both of railways and canals. Now, as long as Canadian tractors stood upon the same plane as American contractors, I would be the last to advocate a Bill that would look like a retaliatory measure. But when we find that Canadians cannot take contracts, either from the United States Government or from many of the states in the union, I say that the Canadian contractor and the Canadian workingman are placed at a disadvantage as compared with Americans, and it is the duty of a fraternal and protective government to come to their aid and give them that protection they deserve. Now. Sir. the hon, member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) attempted to make a point by representing that this Bill would create a monopoly. Well, it is only an exhibition, such as we often see in this House, of gentlemen speaking on subjects that they know nothing whatever about. I would like to ask what possibility there is of the creation of a monopoly among 3,000 or 4,000 individuals? In every town and city in the Dominion of Canada to-day there are a number of contractors, some large and some small. The cities of Montreal. Toronto, Hamilton, London, Quebec. Halifax, in fact every city in the Do- it is simply impossible to sell it. To-day, lowest tenderers, and therefore they received iminion, has its quota of contractors; and I would like to ask any sensible man how it is possible for these 3,000 men, doing each a distinct business for himself, to form a combination and create a monopoly case a \mathbf{Bill} of this kind is passed. There is no probability of such a result taking place. If the Government are going to let contracts-and no doubt the Bill of the hon, member for Glengarry was intended to cover such contracts-for the construction of railways, canals and public works, and I do not think the Bill was ever intended to cover the letting of contracts in foreign countries, if we pass a Bill to protect Canadian contractors we pass a Bill also to protect Canadian labourers, and the Bill would apply also to every man employed here by a citizen of the United States or any other country. In practice this Bill would come to be applied more particularly against the people of the United States than against those of France, Germany, Belgium, or any other country, for as the United States lie alongside of this Dominion, it is natural that its citizens should come ever here and tender for contracts. Canadians are not allowed to go over there and contract for public works, and therefore it is unfair to the contractors and labourers of Canada to allow the Americans to come in here and tender for our public works, and if there is any possibility of placing this Bill in such a shape that it could be passed and the relief asked by the hon, member for Glengarry granted, I say that, irrespective of our political faith or creed, we are not true to our trust unless we carry out the views enunciated by that hon, member on the floor of the House this afternoon. Very many persons do not know the number of contracts let in this Dominion. Nor do they know the amount of money that has been invested in plant to carry on the works that have been under construction during the last twenty years. If there is one business more than another that suffers as regards depreciation of investment in plant, it is that of a contractor. A contractor may obtain a contract on which he may be employed for a couple of years. He will probably be obliged to expend $100,000, or even $200,-000 in purchasing the necessary plant to carry out the work. If a similar contract does not present itself for some years, the contractor's investment is tied up. Someone may say: Well, if the money is invested in plant, why does he not realize on the plant? No one fully appreciates the difficulty of realizing on plant until he has had some experience in selling plant. I have known cases in which plant has not brought 10 cents on the dollar after the work was finished, simply because nobody wanted it. Possibly a boiler or an engine might be sold which could be utilized on another work, but if you take railway plant or canal plant, such as is required for any public work, all the contractors in the Dominion have more or less plant on hand, and they will only be too glad to obtain contracts. And let me point out this fact, to show that it is simply absurd for any one for a moment to suppose that there can be a monopoly created by passing a Bill of this kind, that any work put up to tender is contracted for at prices extremely low, in fact, prices have decreased during the last twenty years over 50 per cent, and in some cases even over 60 per cent. On railway works, where formerly 30 or 40 or 50 cents were paid per yard of earth, to-day the work is done for 7, 8 or 10 cents. The consequence is that any protection which can be given to the contractors in Canada-and when you are doing that you are at the same time protecting the labourers—will receive my most cheerful support, and by my voice and vote I will endeavour to pass such a Bill as has been incroduced by the hon, member for Glengarry to-day.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no doubt whatever that those who have been noticing current events of late years, must observe the strong provocation that exists for the introduction of such a Bill. The action of Inspector Debarres at Buffalo, who appears to be engaged during his whole time in shutting out of the United States Canadians who happen to go there under contract, either individually or otherwise, makes it a matter of regret at such times that we have not a law so that we could retaliate to some extent in the same direction. This action is not confined to that locality, but prevails all along the whole frontier of the United States. What we find to prevail opposite Buffalo and Rochester, in New York State, we also find in Detroit and Michigan. For several years past the Americans have come over from Michigan in large numbers under contract and have worked in the pine woods of Canada, to the detriment of Canadian labour; they have taken away thousands of saw-logs; many have employed Canadians, and have taken their logs to the lakes, where they have been shipped to the other side, and the wages not paid, and many Canadians who expected to have been employed had not been employed on account of men having been brought from the other side. On this account it is to be regretted at times that we have not put a law on the statute-book such as that proposed by the hon. member for Glengarry. But that Bill does not go far enough to reach such cases, for it only applies to contracts entered into by the Government on behalf of Her Majesty; and therefore it would not reach this class of cases to which I have referred. Notwithstanding the fact, as I believe, that we are fairly entitled to pass such a law to protect ourselves, still I do not think it would be good policy to go that far, because, as one hon. member has already remarked, if we do so the near future, when we will be obliged we may be doing something that will react on ourselves in a most injurious manner. It is said that works when open to tenders from the world must naturally result in being done at the lowest possible prices. The hon, member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) said that the pick of all the contracts are to-day in the hands of Americans, he also told the House that Canadians are quite able to meet the Americans in open market and can carry out contracts as cheaply as they do. He also told the House that there are plenty of Canadian contractors. It is pretty difficult to reconcile these two statements, and I fail to understand what explanation he can offer. If Canadians are able to compete with Americans, both as regards intelligence and enterprise means, and in the next breath he says that the pick of all the contracts are in the hands of Americans, how does he account for that fact? Is it not clear that Americans have underbidden Canadians? and, if so. Canada and the Canadian Government would be saving money when contracts were les to Americans. That is the case, I think, and I do not believe we should go so far as to violate the principle by trying to make Canada a close corporation for the benefit of Canadian contractors. would advocate the adoption of all measures to protect Canadian labourers, who are too often supplanted by Americans to their disadvantage. While the provocation for enacting this measure is very strong, I do not think we have reached a time in the hiswe tory of the country when should go so far as to embody in an Act of Parliament the principle contained in this Bill. Nor do I think it would be wise to go so far as to carry out the provisions of the Bill, even if we could do so. Section 3, of this Bill, says:

No alien shall be interested, either directly or indirectly, as a partner or in any other way, in any contract for any public work to be constructed for Her Majesty in the Dominion of Canada.

Now, as Canadians we would be glad at any time to see foreigners investing their money in the public works of this country, whether they are Government works or those promoted by private individuals. We are always willing to accept their capital.

Mr. McLENNAN. This would not interfere with that.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bill must go that far when it says, that aliens cannot be interested in such work directly or indirectly. If an alien sends capital here to be employed by a Canadian in public works, surely he would be indirectly interested in that contract, and so, if the Bill became law, Canada would be deprived of the advantage of the investment of that capital. In that respect. I think, the Bill is at fault. I believe the time will come, however, and perhaps in of necessity to protect Canadians. I am glad to hear from the Minister of Railways that in letting recent contracts he did make reasonable efforts to protect Canadian labour. That is in the right direction; but if we went the full length of this Bill, we would go too far, and, therefore, I would be sorry to see its principle become law.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think the hon, member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is entitled to the thanks of every hon, member on both sides of the House, for having introduced this Bill, and I hope he will carry it to a successful issue. I have on the Order paper myself a Bill dealing with alien labour, which I hope we will reach before the session closes, and if not, I will ask the Government to take it under their charge so that we may pass it. I have received letters from one end of the Dominion to the other in favour of that Bill. In glancing through them, I see there is one from Nelson, B.C., one from Fort Erie, and one from the county of Charlotte, N.B., asking that this Bill be put through. The course that I intend to take with reference to my Bill I would suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) (to adopt in relation to his, namely, that it should come into force by proclamation of the Governor General when it is found that other countries that have Bills against Canadian labour and Canadian contractors, refuse to withdraw them; or if a satisfactory arrangement is made with foreign countries in the matter, then that the Canadian law should not be proclaimed. It is a fact that Canadians cannot go into the United States to compete with the citizens of that country for any public contract, nor can workmen living on this side of the line cross to the United States for their day's labour, and return to Canada at night. That is unfair to the Canadian labourer. It is consequently unfair that citizens of the United States should come in here taking contracts, not only for buildings, but for hauling the minerals of British Columbia into the United States, employing American teams and labourers, and bringing their profits back to the United States with them. I think, that as soon as the Government of this country protects the labouring men by passing an alien labour law similar to that of the United States, the better it will be for our country. I shall have much pleasure in supporting the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan). I think with my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) that it should be amended in a few minor particulars, and that it should be brought into operation only by proclamation of the Governor General. Perhaps it might be that correspondence between our Government and the Government of the United States might result in their suspending their law, in which case, of course, the proclamation of the Canadian law would not issue.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) has brought this matter forward not at all too soon, and I think that the contractors, the labourers, and the mechanics of the Dominion owe him a debt of gratitude for so doing. I am thoroughly in accord with the principle of this Bill, and although the Minister of Railways stated that he does not believe it would be a good thing for us to pass it as it is, still I think that we should insert the thin end of the wedge anyway. The question has now been brought before Parliament and before the country, and we all can see the unfairness which is done to Canadians as the matter stands at the present time. Many cases have been brought to my notice in which the Canadian mechanic especially, has been unfairly dealt with by the United States alien law. Canadians are not allowed to work on public works in the United States, and, therefore, I think that Americans should not be allowed to work on similar works in Canada. I was glad to hear the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) state that he was bringing in a Bill in regard to alien labour, and when that matter comes up. I shall have something to say about it, because I think it is a subject which deserves the serious consideration of the Parliament of Canada. I shall have very great pleasure in supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), as I think it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. McGREGOR. As I live in a city on the border, I am free to say that we have almost free trade with reference to our labourers crossing backwards and forwards to the United States. We have a population of 12,000 in Windsor, and from six to seven hundred cross daily to the States, and come back at night and spend their money on our side of the water. It is true that a few from the American side work on the Canadian side, but we reciprocate in that matter. Now, Sir, I have never heard of the Americans interfering with our people, except at times when they are crossing in large numbers, or bringing in valuable tools when it is required that they should be properly entered and the duty paid. If this alien labour law came into effect along the borders where we live, it would have a very bad influence indeed, because a large portion of our people employ one part of their family on the Canadian side, and the other, on the American side. I think, that we are just a little too soon in introducing such a Bill as that proposed by the member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). There is no doubt that Americans have been engaged on some contracts in this country, but as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) said, Canadians are prepared to compete with the world for contracts in Canada. I think we might safely allow this Bill to stand over for a time and see what our American neighbours will do. They may before long give us the advantage of their country for labour purposes. I am opposed to the Bill.

Mr. GILLIES. I listened this afternoon with considerable attention to the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), when he was making the motion for the second reading of this Bill. I am sure the members of this House are considerably indebted to him for the very valuable information he gave to us in regard to the laws existing on the other side of the line with respect to the letting of public contracts. While in sympathy with very many of the views put forth by the hon. gentleman, I cannot support the present Bill. His idea in the main was, I think, to introduce legislation that would benefit the labouring classes; but, while that was his object, I think the Bill will be very far from giving practical effect to that very desirable end. The hiring of labour is not touched in any way by the hon, gentleman's Bill. If it should succeed in confining the letting of public contracts to Canadians, the Bill would have the effect to a certain extent of boycotting the public contractors of Canada by other countries; because, if we look abroad for a moment, we shall find that there is not a single country in the civilized world, so far as I know, that has such a law as the hon. gentleman proposes to put upon our statute-book. In France, Spain, Germany, Belgium, Russia, and the South American Republics, government contracts, with certain limitations, are as free to Canadians as they are to natives of those countries. We know as a matter of fact that many British people have made enormous fortunes out of government contracts in Russia; and if we passed this Bill, what would be the effect? Legislation of a similar character might very fairly be enacted against us by those countries in which government contracts are now free to Canadian contractors, and Canadian contractors would find that the only field they could enter would be their own country. For these reasons, I am opposed to the Bill.

Mr. INGRAM. I think a great deal of credit is due to the hon. member for Glengarry for introducing this Bill. Whether it passes its second reading or not, it deserves to be favourably received for this reason if for no other: that it will show our neighbours across the line that there are many members of the Canadian Parliament who believe that we should treat American contractors in Canada as Canadian contractors are treated in the United States. It has been alleged that the object of the hon. gentleman, in moving this Bill, is to create a monopoly among the contractors of this country. Well, Sir, knowing the hon. gentleman as I do, I believe he has no idea of doing any such thing. I believe he has an interest in the labouring classes of this If Canadian contractors obtain naturally employ Canadian workmen; but how is it with American contractors? myself have known American contractors who obtained contracts in Canada, to bring in American labourers to do the work and to compete with the honest labour of Canada. I am sorry that the question of the Alien Labour law has been mixed up with the consideration of this Bill. I hope that before the close of this session the hon. members of this House will have an opportunity of discussing that question. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) says that the passing of this Bill will do a great deal of injury to the city of Windsor. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is correct to a certain extent; but he must bear in mind that there are other places along the border, such as Fort Erie, Niagara Falls, and St. Stephens, in the county of Charlotte, N.B., where it would operate in the interest of our Canadian people. So far as I am personally concerned, I am not in favour of legislation of the kind introduced by the hon, member for Glengarry, nor that introduced by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). But where the American people have shown a disposition to treat our people in the unfair manner they have done, I believe the duty devolves upon us as Canadians to show that we do not appreciate that sort of treatment. It may be said that two wrong acts do make a right, and that is true; but under the circumstances I think we are justified in showing them that we do not appreciate the kind of legislation which they have put into force against our people. It has been charged, and I have read it in some of the newspapers, that the Bill of the hon. member for Glengarry had reference to private works. That statement is unjust to my hon. friend, because this Bill does not affect private contracts at all, but simply contracts made by the Government. I trust that whatever may be the result of this discussion to-day, the attention of our friends across the line will be drawn to it, and that they may be induced to treat our contractors with greater fairness than they have hitherto done.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

tleman as I do, I believe he has no idea of doing any such thing. I believe he has an interest in the labouring classes of this country. If Canadian contractors obtain government contracts in Canada, they will to provide that the directors, or officers, or contractors, of any railway company, to which any subsidy, advance, or loan, or bonus, of public money has been granted by Parliament, and while any part of such subsidy is a subsisting claim against the Government, shall not, directly or indirectly, contribute towards election funds, following exactly the words of the present law as regards contractors for public works. The principle of prohibiting the beneficiaries of public works from contributing to election funds is embodied in section 131 of the Criminal Code of 1892. amendment which the late Sir John Thompson adopted on the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, in the year 1891, and it was included in the criminal code when consolidated the following year. Now, every one, as the law stands, who has a contract with the Government is prohibited when he says this instance is old and stale. from contributing to the election expenses. The people are in this House and directing of any candidate, directly or indirectly, and the Government to-day who were interested officers of railway companies which receive the evils I seek to prevent, a more proper subsidies from Parliament should not also instance could not be given. Why, Sir, if be restricted in the same way. The print this proposed amendment to the Criminal ciple has been adopted, and I would merely Code had been in force then, that great apply it to another class. It is much worse scandal would never have happened; and I in the public interest to have those who are propose to try to prevent hon, gentlemen interested in subsidies to railways at liberty opposite from getting themselves into scrapes to contribute to election funds than it is of that kind in the future, if I possibly can to allow small contractors for public works do so by legislation. Coming down a little to contribute, because, while an ordinary later we have the case of the Lake St. John public work may be let by a department Railway. Now, this is not stale. The Postby tender to the lowest bidder, his contri master General I am sure would not say bution to an election fund is a comparatively that that was a stale affair. Nobody now trifling objection; but when Parliament is in this House would say that this was stale, called upon to vote subsidies for certain. Why, was it not proved to a demonstration railways, those who are benefited have a under oath, over and over again, in the direct interest in making their influence committees that the parties beneficially interfelt by contributing money towards the ested in the subsidy to the Lake St. John election of members of Parliament who Railway contributed $25,000 towards the vote these subsidies and in favour of the election funds of hon, gentlemen opposite, candidates of the Government by whose Orders in Council these subsidies are dis- Company, in which case the late J. Therefore, I contend, that in this denald, the contractor-the company having case which I submit to the House there is received a subsidy of about $500,000much more necessity for applying a strict swore that he expended $25,000 for political legal provision. Now, I cannot see why it purposes, being, as he explained, "a real Conshould be necessary to give illustrations of the evils that have already been proven to exist in the way of election contributions by railway companies that are receiving public subsidies. But, Sir, it is very easy for me to refer the House to some of these abuses. There is a well known case. In 1872, Parliament authorized the Government to grant provided of imprisonment and fine, and if the 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000 in contribution has been large, the fine may be money in aid to a Pacific Railway.

There is a member sitting in this House to-day who was a director in Sir Hugh Allan's company, and that hon, gentleman is the recently elected member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy). And, Sir, there is an hon, gentleman who, two or three minutes ago was in his seat here, the hon, member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), who was the recipient That was an of over $32,000 of that election fund. And. Sir, the gentleman who is the leader of the Government to-day, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, voted in this House against granting the inquiry moved for by Mr. Huntington into the Pacific scandal. So the hon, member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) is altogether astray I cannot possibly see why contractors and in that transaction, and as an illustration of Then there was the Temiscouata Railway servative right through." These are instances. flagrant instances, of the evils which I desire to check. The House, as I said, has gone the length of saying that it shall be a penal offence for any contractor with the Government for the smallest service to contribute to an election fund. A penalty is increased to double the amount of the contribution. And, Sir, consider the anomaly that presents itself. Suppose the $2.500,000 should be given to the Hudson Bay Railway -would it not be an anomaly for us to allow it to pe possible that any officers directors or for or contractors that railway should contribute to the election fund of either party. This exclusion of an important class of contractors shows to me that the hon, gentleman has a secret end in view. If he should earnestly be anxious to prevent any contribution to electoral funds, I would say to him: Provide that any subscriptions of anything or by any one for an election will be strictly forbidden. But if you are going to make a selection and say that a class of citizens will have rights that another class will not Mr. EDGAR. And is there anything with which to reproach the present Prime Minister? The hon. Minister of Justice, the hon, leader of this House, the hon, the Minister of Public Works, the hon. Secretary of State? not known that the present Administration, taken as a whole or individually, wishes electoral purity to absolutely prevail, and that we all of us wish it on this side of the House? But if I am told that it is wrong for some classes of people to subscribe at election times I will reply: Prevent any one from subscribing. Why should a Federal contractor enjoy to a less extent than his neighbour the right to subscribe? Why should a railway director, who is generally considered in our country as one of the most intelligent, devoted, active and enterprising citizens, be denied the right to contribute as any other citizen to electoral funds? Go in any parish, town or county, and you will find that the most intelligent and active citizen there is generally a director of a railway company. And because that man had the courage to devote part of his capital to promoting the growth of his country, he will be told: Sir, you are unworthy to take any part in the public business! We have penal laws against electoral corruption. For my part, I have urged that the voter be compelled to go to the poll so as to be preserved from one danger of corruption. I was denied this by both sides of the House. I infer from this I infer from this that in some quarters they are trying to prevent corruption when they suffer by it, but are willing to allow it when they profit by it. This Bill seems to me an unwarranted outrage to a class of respected and respectable citizens, it seems to me to be incomplete and likely to favour one party to the detriment of the other. It seems to me to strike a class of citizens to the exclusion of many others and to the exclusive benefit of one party, without making electoral purity more secure. If the promoter of this Bill should be earnestly willing to cause electoral purity to prevail in this country, I would readily vote for his Bill. Has he stated why he was making the exceptions I have pointed out! For my part, I am for any measure that might secure the utmost electoral purity. I will go further; I would be in favour of a legislation that would not allow a candidate to be accompanied by any other person during an electoral contest. I make it compulsory for a candidate to conduct his contest alone, of a law that would prevent him, for instance, from being accompanied by such a crowd of stump speakers and canvassers as are now carried at a great expense into the counties and are sent travelling from one end of the country to the other. I would be in favour of such a law because it would tend to truly lessen electoral corruption. By such a law we would say to a candidate: You wish to solicit the votes of the electors, very well; but you will conduct your contest alone, without any help from outside and by only relying on your good name, your abilities and your platform to win votes. You will not have the assistance of all these speakers foreign to the county, imported from outside and often at a very great expense. I repeat I would be in favour of an earnest and thorough legislation, but let no one come and ask me to state that such and such a citizen ought to be disfranchised because they are opposed to a political party.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Speaker, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without protesting against the remarks just made by the hon, member. Whenever the hon, member for Bellechasse Amyot) rises in this House, he seems to delight in going back to his past course, so much so that one is lead to believe it weighs upon his heart, and that in order to insult and abuse those to whom he owes the position he now occupies in this House. not rise for the purpose of discussing the Bill moved by the hon, member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar); I will merely say I am in favour of this Bill for the reason that I think it might, if properly carried out, prevent scandals such as those of the Curran Bridge, of the Saulte Ste. Marie Canal, and of the Pacific. Those whom this Bill would not reach will have nothing to fear from its being carried out, since it does not concern them. Indeed, those who need no subscriptions to be returned have no reason to fear the passing of a Bill such as this. can understand that such men as are in need, in order to get returned, of the public contractors' money, or a share of the railway subsidies, should object to the Bill. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), has referred to the Baie des Chaleurs scandal, but he ought to have kept silent and say nothing about the money, for if any scandal there was, it is by no means sure that he never needed part of this money to get returned in Bellechasse. If there is a man who should never refer to the scandals, or rather the so-called scandals, that took place in 1881, in the province of Quebec, it is the very member for Bellechasse who was implicated in them, if any there were, and got out of them his large share. Here is another member who, from 1885 to 1891, has would be in favour of a law that would called the hon, gentlemen opposite robbers and plunderers, who has charged them with leading the country to dishonour, and who now is licking their feet in order to obtain their favours and the votes of their party; it is the same gentleman who now has the audacity to rise in this House whenever an opportunity offers and pour abuse on the Liberal party, on the memory of the lamented Mr. Mercier, as well as on the Liberal Administration in whose views he so ardently shared, and whose favours and patronage he likewise so ardently received. Why should not he at least keep silent? He should have at least the decency to keep silent and not abuse those who got him returned in 1891. It is true the hon, member for Bellechasse easily forgets his past course, and the circumstances under which he was returned at the election in 1891. It is true in 1891 he was returned through the party he now opposes and abuses, by means of the Baie des Chaleurs subscriptions, if there was any, and in spite of the endeavours of the party whose favours he now seeks, a party which had rightly thrown him out of its ranks, and had we known him then as we know him now, the hon, gentleman would have been likewise thrown out of the ranks of the Liberal party. For my part I would have done it. I was surprised to hear from the hon, gentleman the statement that there was no scandal attached to the name of the Ministers he now upholds. I would only need to go through "Hansard" for 1891 to find evidence in support of the statement that hon, member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) never ceased denouncing his present friends. What did he not say against this Government? Is it not the same gentleman who exclaimed in this House that protection was a nice thing, but that this question was worn out, and, moreover, that the principle of free trade and protection were no more in question, that the question was simply to drive from power the robbers and plunderers of the Quebec Harbour Works? Those whom he now defends, he was then piling abuse upon them. We now see the same gentleman licking the feet of the men he then abused. Why? In order that he may obtain their favour, and by this means again secure the mandate with which he was entrusted in 1891, owing to the support given him by the Liberal party. As regards the Bill of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the Liberal party approve of it, I think, for there is nothing in it likely to affect this party. For my part, I am willing to vote for the Bill, because it will be its object to prevent the big contractors from requesting and being granted subsidies for railway schemes, and taking part of these subsidies to give it as subscription to the electoral fund of the Conservative party for the purpose of securing the election of ministerial candidates. I, therefore, thought it my duty not to allow the provoking statements of the member for Bellechasse to pass unchallenged.

this evening his political course since 1891. I will do that in due time. I will now repeat what I once said to him-even though it would only cause him to beware—that he should be the last man to pour abuse upon the members of the Liberal party, and take upon himself to sing the praises of the Conservative party. The hon, member for Bellechasse has alternately given his support to the Conservative party and to the Liberal party; there is hardly a question as to which he did not hold conflicting opinions; he has flattered both parties to have their favour. It is his own business; I tell him that we will discuss all such things in due time before his voters. For the moment, I would invite him to cease raising the veil cast over his past and abusing those who always did good to him.

Mr. DAVIN. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation,) I am well pleased to find that the hon, member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) has at last made known his inmost thought. This has been weighing upon his heart for a long time and he has intended, no doubt, for years to make before this House the statements we have just heard. He gave utterance to his abuse elsewhere, he wrote it in the newspapers, he repeated it whenever I was away. The hon. gentleman contends that I was returned in 1891 by means of the money raised by the Baie des Chaleurs scandal. It is the first time he makes this statement so as to be well understood. I call on him to show proof of it. Let him give it, if he has any. In 1891 I ran as a National Conservative. That election cost me very little. It was protested and I came victorious out of this as of many other protests previously entered against me by the Liberal party and which were rejected after being investigated. I am not ashamed to talk about what I did in 1891. I went through the consequences of the National movement inaugurated in 1885; I acted in good faith and I have nothing to regret of what I did then, since the feelings by which I was actuated were pure and loyal. I had yielded to a patriotic feeling and I was bound by my past. Mr. Speaker, if the thing had to be done anew. I would avail myself of the experience I have gained since then, but that is not now in question. The question is as to what I did. I was a National Conservative and as such I had, to a certain extent, to associate with the Liberal party during the years that elapsed between 1886 and 1891. That is true. The Liberal party supported me in the county of Bellechasse, it is also true. But the hon. gentleman has hinted that I was implicated in the Quebec scandals. If he has any regard for his own reports, he will tell us in what scandalous affair the name of the member for Bellechasse was implicated. Let him say so, now is the time and I am ready to I did not intend to discuss reply to any charge of this kind. He will no doubt say: As a lawyer, you had some work from the Quebec Government. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I had some work from that Government and I was paid for part of that work. I fully and fairly earned that money and what I thus earned and a good deal more went for the support of an organ which was defending the interests of the National Conservative party. That was no boodling. I had a right to earn my living in the capacity of a lawyer and I think that when I represented the Crown in Quebec, the number of verdicts I obtained was so large that if the hon, member for Montmagny should only There was nothing against his honour nor be willing to consult those of his friends who were pleading in defence of the criminals my political reasons about a political quesbrought at that time before the court, they tion and he understood them. And if I should again appeal to my electors for their support, it will be with as honourable a name, with as spotless i a reputation for honesty as when they entrusted me with their mandate. I challenge the hon, member for Montmagny to find out anything whatever likely to tarnish my reputation as an honest man. He may lay general charges, he may pour abuse upon me: he has a voice sufficiently powerful, his heart is filled with enough bitterness and malice for him to do that; but I will tell him this: Specify one case, one circumstance in which I was implicated in a scandalous or illegal transaction. If you find out a single one, you will then have the right to atrack me before this House, in the press or The hon, gentleman upon the hustings. thinks others have no right to their convictions, that he alone has such a right. I soon found out this platform was deserted even by its promoters and that moreover is had become unpracticable. I then realized that I was following a wrong path. Was I bound to remain in it the rest of my life? The gentlemen opposite had deserted their flag; could they force me to remain faithful to it? The hon, gentleman may continue to abuse me in connection with this incident of my career; I leave it to the public and this House to decide between he and me. As to boodling, the people are perfectly informed; they know that I never was guilty of it and that I hold it in execration. I call upon the hon. gentleman to particularize, and I know he is unable to do it. He knows under what circumstances I left the Liberal party. I went and informed him and told him why I could no longer march in the ranks under his leadership. I leave him free to relate the conversation we had about that. against him in that interview. I gave him told: You were favours of the party [What other Let the hon, gentleman, state House or out of it, and let him state when I received favours, or what favours I wished to receive or could receive. If he cannot do it, it is because he has asserted a groundless fact, because he was wanting to the code of honour, which is no more allowed in this House than elsewhere. When he asserted that I left the Liberal party because I was driven away from it, when he asserted that I left it through an interested motive, he has malignantly made groundless statements. I challenge him to prove his assertions. He is prompt in laying charges; I call upon him to give his proofs; if he does not do it, I call upon both sides of the House to protect the good faith, honesty and sincerity of purpose of a public man who is acting straightforwardly. I do not deny to my opponents their good faith, their convictions and their sincerity. But is there no other way of replying to the political arguments of a man than telling him: Your arguments do not hold good, since they are urged by you? Is there no other way of discussing the merits of a question than to abuse an opponent personally? How often, when I spoke in this House, was I interrupted by the hon, gentleman crying out to me: "Why don't you speak of the North-west?" Well, there again, I defy him. Let him find out in my whole conduct in the North-west, when I was the commanding officer of the Ninth battalion, a single reprehensible act. I had into my hands millions of dollars at my disposal in the North-west, I signed cheques for nearly a million dollars, I had charge of the whole large district of Alberta. I had the direction not only of the 9th battalion, but of other battalions, for, in the meantime, I happened to be by seniority the commanding officer of a whole brigade. Well. I defy any one on earth to find out a single reprehensible act in my whole conduct during that campaign. Let any one mention an order to which I disobeyed, a single act unworthy of a

He changed his political allegiance without going before the county of Bellechasse so that the flag confided to his care might be handed back to them; he transferred this flag to another party without the consent of those who put it into his hands. In 1892, when the Hon. Mr. Mercier was into power in Quebec, the hon, member for Bellechasse defended him with all his might. He thus defended him up to the general election, and it was only after this that he turned his back to him when Mr. Mercier could give him no more favours, nor patronage, nor provisions. I made him the offer, in 1892, to go in the county of Bellechasse and discuss all these questions and the hon. member promised me that after the session, he would come and meet me in his county. But he had not the courage to come. Now, I give him again rendezvous, and we will see if he will sion I charge the hon. gentleman, before

Before speaking as he does, he ought to surrender the mandate of the county of Bellechasse, as he no longer represents in this House the principles of the voters of this county. They returned him as a Liberal, and since then he has changed party and renounced the policy approved of by the majority of his voters. Let him, therefore, keep silent as to these questions of so-called scandals, for it is within his own knowledge that these charges of boodlings and scandals are groundless. For he knows that when commissions qualified as petit banc were appointed to prosecute the Mercier Government his present friends looked everywhere for evidence in support charges of boodlings and could not find any. And, Mr. Speaker, who was the lawyer who, before the royal commission and the petit banc, was defending the Mercier Government if not the very hon. member for Bellechasse. Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The debate which is now going on is surely of a great advantage, for it had the effect of making known to the House a great many things which we, voters of the province of Quebec, were perfectly aware of, but which the other members of this House did not know as well as we did. These things were up to now denied by the hon, gentlemen opposite, but this evening the hon, member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) has confessed before this House and before the country, that actually the money coming from Baie des Chaleurs scandal was used in securing the return of the Liberal candi-He contends that my hon. dates in 1891. friend the member for Bellechasse would not have been returned had he not had the help of the money provided by the Liberal party through the Baie des Chaleurs scan-Therefore, it is duly admitted that dal. such money went into the bribing fund of the Liberal party, and the hon. member for Bellechasse, who then ran with the support of the Mercier Government and of the leader of the Opposition, should have had a portion of this money, since it was to be distributed in the interests of the Liberal candidates in the province of Quebec, such was the reasoning of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) received his part, I presume, the same as the hon, member for Bellechasse, according to the statement made by the hon. member for Montmagny. Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon, member does not wish to raise a point of order, he has no right to speak.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I said that the hon, member for Bellechasse was well founded in saying that the Bill now before us is not complete; it is expressly worded so as to prevent any subscriptions from any persons considered as friends of the Conservative party, while it reserves full liberty of action for the friends. the public contractors of the local governments, which, it was well known, are for the three-fourths Liberals. After what has happened in the province of Quebec at the elections of 1891, are we not justified in saying to those who come here and advocate electoral purity, and who profited, without any scruple or remorse, by the robberies and plunders practised by their friends then into power at Quebec, to begin by giving example rather than precept. Are we not justified in saying to them: Right your own wrongs, before trying to right the wrongs of others, and before bringing up in this House measures such as this. Who were the guilty parties in 1891? Here is a party which, in 1891, when it was into power at Quebec, robbed the sum of $254,000 during the single day of the 24th of February, 1891, here is a party convicted of an enormous fraud, here is a party which give money to bribe the electorate, and we, members of the Conservative party, would not have the right to defend our friends, to defend our party, and to put under the eyes of our accusers the frauds and robberies of which they were guilty! They ought to remember that they have no right to make painful allusions. This Bill is not complete, it was drawn up and submitted to this House for the sole purpose of trying to tyrannize over and ill-treat a certain number of citizens, while reserving full protection for the Liberal governments in the various provinces of the Dominion. Mr. Speaker, I have no mission to defend the hon. member for Bellechasse. If there is any man able to do it in this House, it is the very member himself; but I cannot but protest against the mean charges laid by the hon. member for Montmagny, against the odious generalities which he uttered here and which he is quite unable to prove. We know who the parties were who boodled in the province of Quebec. Their names are present in our memory and if we were allowed to speak in this House as we speak before the people, I could name some who are here and who very likely would blush with shame. I will not do it, but it does not preclude of knowing their names, and the hon. member for Bellechasse is not amongst them. The Conservative papers never contended that the hon member for Bellechase had received money on false pretenses. He had some patronage from the province of Quebec. He had even a good deal. But it was obtained quite correctly. But is it to be inferred from the fact that he received such patronage, that he obtained money under false pretenses, or the proceeds of illegitimate doings? There is a great difference in that. I say once more that the hon. member for Bellechasse was charged neither by the Liberal party nor by any member of the Conservative party with having obtained money under false pretenses from the Quebec Government. If we swept the province of Quebec, in 1892, it was because we knew such things. We will refer to them at the next election; they will be once more one of the strongest weapons we will have in use. For my part I will have no scruple in referring to the Baie des Chaleurs scandal or to the Langlais scandal. They are ashamed for the province of Quebec, but these things are too recent to be forgotten yet, and the people remembers them. also know that the Dominion Liberal party is the same party which drained the treasury of the provinces of Quebec in 1891. If they are not the same men by name, it is the same party which profited by the boodling in 1891. And the hon, member for Montmagny in particular believes that we will no more refer to this. We will refer to it not only in the province of Quebec, but also, I hope, in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) who gives us such a help in that Baie des Chaleurs affair will know how to speak of it, in order to support his party against the Liberal party. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and seeing the object sought by this Bill, I think the whole House, or at least the whole Conservative party ought to agree in rejecting it; for I consider, as such as it is, it is immoral and cannot receive the support of the members of this House.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. regret that I did not happen to be in the House when the hon, gentleman who has the Bill in charge, discussed it, and so I missed the first part of his remarks.

gentleman has acted to a great extent upon the objections that were made to a proposal of a similar character submitted last year by the leader of the Opposition, when the subsidies to railways were under consideration towards the end of the last session. When the Bill dealing with these subsidies was before the House, the leader of the Opposition moved that the resolution should not be read, but be referred back to the committee to consider several clauses. In that amendment, I find the following:—

That every officer and director of said companies, and every person having a contract with any of the companies for the performance of any work, or the doing of anything, or the furnishing of any goods, effects or materials, and having, or expecting to have, any claim or demand against the company by reason of such contract. who either directly or indirectly, by himself or any person on his behalf, subscribes, furnishes or gives, or promises to subscribe, furnish, or give, any money or other special consideration for the purpose of promoting the election of any candidate to a legislature or to Parliament, or with the intent in any way of causing or effecting the result of a provincial or Dominion election, is guilty of a misdemeanour.

The leader of the Government, on that occasion, resisted this proposition. He dwelt it is true, largely on the impropriety of constituting such act a misdemeanour, after the action that had been taken in connection with the criminal code; and he also found fault with a suggestion of this kind being made as an addition to a railway Bill, and pointed out that if the proposition were to be entertained by the House, it would find a proper place in connection with the code. So I observe that the hon. gentleman, acting on that suggestion, has brought this subject before us, as an amendment proposed to be made to the criminal code. I fear, however, that the hon, gentleman is not dealing as completely with the subject as the House dealt with really the same principle in 1891; and I think the hon, gentleman referred to that legislation, where, instead of railway companies, directors, or officers, being aimed at, Government contractors were aimed at, and the House, therefore, as he argued to-night, I think, had adopted, in large part, the general principle that is involved in the amendment under consideration. hon, gentleman will remember that on that occasion the House did not confine its attention to contractors dealing with the Federal Government, but took care to make that provision broad and comprehensive, and to embrace all contractors with any government, federal or local; therefore, the proposition removed any suspicion that a special effort was being made in connection simply with federal contracts. the hon, gentleman will see from the resolution of the leader of the Opposition, which I have just read to the House, that there missed the first part of his remarks. But was an attempt to keep to the old legisla-in looking over the Bill I find that the hon. tion, and a reference was made to the election to Parliament, or to a legislature; whereas, I find in this Bill that the hon. gentleman has eliminated entirely the class of contracts having relation to a local government; because he recites in the first part of the clause:

Any one, being a director, officer or contractor of any railway company to which any subsidy, advance, loan or bonus of public money has been granted or made by the Governor in Council or by Parliament-.

Dropping the word "government," which is in the code, he proceeds to amend, and in the particular section to which it refers, the word "government" being defined in the code as including "the Government of Canada, the government of any province of Canada, as well as Her Majesty in the right of Canada, or any province thereof.'

Mr. EDGAn. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow me to state that if the clause is not strictly drawn, according to that resolution, it was through inadvertance. The latter part of the clause applies to provinces, and I would be only too glad to use the word "government," or any other word, in committee.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is quite satisfactory to me, so far as that point is concerned. Now, I find that that point is concerned. a further objection was made by the leader of the Government last session to the legislation then drafted, and the draft has been carefully reconsidered, no doubt, and put into a proper form with the exception of that feature to which I have just alluded. But the leader of the Government, I find, pointed out a rather extraordinary feature in connection with this legislation, not, I take it, as an objection to the principle involved in this amendment, but in reference to the length to which the proposed legislation would go. His reference is short and concise, and perhaps I could not do better than to state what he said:

There is on the statute-book a law with reference to subscriptions by contractors with the The Act would then contain this Government. extraordinary feature, that, while the president, secretary, manager, members and contractors of all those railway companies are eligible to sit in Parliament-

And so they would be, notwithstanding the Bill now under consideration.

-they would be prevented from subscribing to their own elections, or to that of a co-director who might be a personal friend, and who might be able to furnish him even with the necessary money to put up a deposit, or any other legitimate expense, to an election either to the Dominion Parliament or a local legislature.

Now, no matter how the House may ultimately decide that subject, it is a matter that ought to be very carefully and thoroughly discussed, and I desire to say frankly to this House that I have not had an Mullen), and during the course of his remarks notice of the Government, as it was perhaps my duty to do. But I rise for the purpose of saying that at the earliest possible moment I shall advise with my colleagues as to the action that will be proposed, and, in the event of this subject being considered, I feel certain that the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill will go still further in the line of the suggestion of the late leader of the Government. and not only reserve this clause in the form it is, with the suggested addition, but will consent that if the Government is favourable to it, or if the House should be favourable to the adoption of the principle, to add it to the consolidated amendments which have been referred to the subcommittee, and I rise, therefore, at the present moment, merely to move the adjournment of the present debate for the express purpose of advising with the Government as to whether the Bill, as it stands, with the addition I have suggested, shall be accepted by the Government, or whether some other and further proposition shall be made. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. EDGAR. There seems to be undoubtedly an amount of fairness in the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice. If the principle of the amendment were agreed to by the House it would be referred to the special committee. I think the suggestion is a proper one; but I should like some assurance from the hon, gentleman that an opportunity will be given to the House for the consideration of this measure after the Government have taken it into consideration.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. have no hesitation, after speaking with the leader of the House in stating that there is no desire to prevent its consideration.

Mr. INGRAM. Before the motion to adjourn the debate is adopted, I desire to offer a few remarks on the motion moved by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). In doing so, I desire to make a statement in order to put a little matter right. The hon. in his remarks charged the Government with granting subsidies for the purpose of influencing the electors to support Government candidates for parliamentary honours. As I may not have another oppor-tunity to set this matter right, I ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to it in order that some hon, gentlemen opposite may have an opportunity to contradict the statements they have made elsewhere with respect to certain subsidies granted in the riding I have the honour to represent. In March last hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe, rather feared there was about to be a general election. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) addressed the constituents of the hon. member for North Wellington opportunity of bringing this under the he made certain statements charging the Government with granting subsidies in certain constituencies with the sole view of securing the election of certain candidates. Among the candidates mentioned I was one. The hon, gentleman found fault with the granting of a subsidy of $3,200 per mile for sixteen miles of railway to run from Tilsonburgh to Port Burwell in the east riding of Elgin. The hon, gentleman's remarks were somewhat in this line. I read from a letter sent to me by a gentleman who listened to the speech. He said:

Arthur, 25th March, 1895.

Mr. Ingram, M.P.

Dear Sir,—We had the Hon. Mr. Mills speaking here in the interest of J. McMullen, M.P., of North Wellington, in our town hall, Monday evening, and in the course of his remarks he referred to a line of railway that was built from Tilsonburg through your riding to the lake, that received $3,200 per mile from the Government, to secure your election against Mr. Wilson, and that a man not over thirty years of age could carry all the freight on his back that went over the road, without any trouble; that it ran through a country that was nothing but sand, which would not grow anything; that the road did not I did not believe pay the running expenses. there was such a road in Canada, therefore, I thought I would write you for information on the If you can find out the facts of the matter. case, let me know and greatly oblige.

Yours truly, R. MARTIN.

Assuming that the hon, gentleman did make that statement, I knowing that statement to be incorrect in every particular wrote—wishing to be very careful that the hon, gentleman should not be misrepresented—and asked that gentleman to get one or more responsible parties in the village of Arthur to corroborate the statement. I received this reply on March 4th, 1895:

Arthur, Ont., 4th April, 1895.

A. B. Ingram, Esq.

Dear Sir,—We, the undersigned electors, certify, that we were present at the meeting held in the town hall on Monday evening 25th March, and we heard the Hon. Mr. Mills speak, and that the words in the letter written by R. Martin to you, are as near the words used by Mr. Mills as it is possible to quote them from memory.

WILLIAM TERNAN,

Those gentlemen certified to the statement made by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. Let us see whether the facts bear out the statement or not. I was elected on 5th March, 1891; I was unseated in December, 1891; I was re-elected on February 12th, 1892. The first subsidy voted and assented to was on 9th July, 1892. It is unfair, therefore, to say that this was a subsidy which in any way affected my election, because it was not granted by the Government until several months after my election. The subsidy was revoted and assented to on 23rd July, 1894. In rising to make this explanation, I regret very much that the hon. gentleman is not in his place, because if hon. gentlemen make statements of this character, and make such statements as are not borne out by the facts, then it is the duty of hon. members to challenge them and have those hon, gentlemen place themselves on record in this House, which is the proper place, so that the people will not be misled in condemning the Government for granting subsidies in various constituencies. It has been frequently said that hon, gentlemen opposite run down this country. This is correct if the hon. gentleman's statement be true, that this road runs through a section of country where there is nothing but sand. I want the hon, gentleman to come down to East Elgin and make that statement to electors, and he will soon find out that it will have greater effect than finding fault with the granting of subsidies. In order to show that the Government was justified in granting the subsidy I may say that the Ontario Government at the last session of the legislature voted a subsidy of $2.000 per mile to the Tilsonburg and Port Burwell What Railway Company. induced Government to do this? It was because they felt it was a section of country which required a railway. Their policy, as everybody who understands anything regarding the Government in Ontario, knows, has been to make no grants in old settled counties for railways, but recognizing the importance of building a railway through that section they reversed their usual policy and granted to the road a subsidy of $2,000 per mile. I am glad the hon, member for Bothwell is now in his place. If this statement was not made by the hon. gentleman, let him deny it. He can take which horn of the dilemma he chooses. If the hon, gentleman denies that he made the statement, then he and the hon. member for North Wellington must settle the matter between themselves; but as regards the county of Elgin, the statement made by the hon. gentleman is incorrect. The road is not built yet, and the statement cannot therefore be true that any man under thirty years of age could carry on his back all the traffic that would pass over the road.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I beg to say, Mr. Speaker, that I never said there was a road in existence from Tilsonburg to Port Burwell.

Mr. INGRAM. What did you say?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am answering what the hon, gentleman has read. I know there is no railway in existence there, and I never said there was a road in existence, nor did I discuss the amount of freight or traffic over the road. I said this: That there was a line proposed to be subsidized by the Government there that never would be built, that there was no traffic to sustain a road in that quarter, and what is more, that it was proposed to subsidize the line to aid the hon, gentleman in an election. I say that now.

Mr. INGRAM. And I deny that statement.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say, the hon. gentleman knows that no road could be built there with any hope or expectation that it would pay running expenses, and that being so, the hon. gentleman knows right well that if a road were proposed there, it was not proposed with any hope or expectation that the road would be constructed, but that a few electors living along the line between Tilsonburg and Port Burwell might be influenced in the hon. gentleman's favour.

Mr. INGRAM. Permit me to state——Some hon. MEMBERS, Order.

Mr. INGRAM. I am in order. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills). My election took place on the 5th February. 1892, and the subsidy was not granted until the 8th July, 1892, and how could that have affected my election?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, gentleman (Mr. Mills) has got out of this in a very philosophical way. There was not a definiteness about it nor a reference to the locality—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon, gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has no right to question the statement I have made. The hon, gentleman (Mr. Ingram) has read a letter here and asked me to repeat what I did say. I have told the hon, gentleman what I said. He was not present, and he is not in a position to question any report of what I have said.

Mr. SPROULE. Evidently this gentleman whoever he was, must have written immediately after the language was used by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), and he therefore was likely to remember, and to refer to a specific instance that must have been mentioned—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPROULE. I am quite in order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, you are not.

Mr. SPROULE. This gentleman must have referred to some specific incident that took place at the time, and I assume that he was referring to what took place, and was more likely, or as likely, to be as near correct as the hon. member (Mr. Mills) must be now, after the lapse of several months; and who, on the spur of the moment, is endeavouring to call on his memory as to what took place a long time ago.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have stated explicitly what I did say, or to the effect of what I said, and having made that statement the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has no right to get up in this House and question it. He is not in order to do so.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, gentleman does not say he said it, but he says he meant to say it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I said what I did say.

Mr. SPROULE. He should have said it if he meant to say it, but he did not say it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPROULE. If he withdraws the statement now, and goes back on his record, I am quite satisfied.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) wish to deny the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not denying it at all. I say, if the hon. gentieman (Mr. Mills) wishes to deny it now, I am satisfied. I am not questioning it, but on the contrary I am perfectly satisfied with his explanation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then sit down.

Mr. SPROULE. I have a perfect right to speak, and I shall.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon, gentleman has no right to call in question what I have said.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has a perfect right to criticise what the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said. He is doing that and he is perfectly in order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He is not in order. What the hon, gentleman (Mr. Sproule) was doing, was to dispute the correctness of my hon, friend's (Mr. Mills) statement, which he has no right to do.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) was criticising the statement of the hon. gentleman, and in that he was in order.

Mr. LAURIER. He was not in order. He was contradicting the statement of the hon. gentleman from Bothwell.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) said that he accepted the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell, and then he was called to order when he was proceeding with his speech. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has a right to the floor.

Mr. SPROULE. I said he was doing it in a philosophical manner. I said that I was satisfied with the hon. gentleman's explanation and denial, and what more does he want? If he was wrong before and correct new I am satisfied, and if he was correct before and wrong now, I am satisfied. It does not matter which way.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) proceeded a moment ago to quote the opinion of witnesses, who, he said, were present, against the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills). He had no right to do that.

Mr. SPROULE. I said if such and such a thing had taken place, under the circumstances it was reasonable to suppose that the statement of this gentleman was likely to be as correct as the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) who calls up the subject to his memory now after a lapse of several months, and, I think, there is nothing wrong in that. With reference to the Bill before the House, Sir, I think it is a very important and at the same time a very drastic measure. Let us consider for a moment that there are practically only two great corporations in Canada and that these two railway companies have largely absorbed all the shorter railways of the country, whether they are branch lines or important trunk lines. Now, in connection with these two great railways, there are many subsidies given both by provincial and Dominion Governments, and this Bill, if passed, would apply directly and indirectly to every person who was connected with these two great railways, or any subordinate railways. The Bill says:

Or (j.) being a director, officer or contractor of any railway company to which any subsidy, advance, loan or bonus of public money has been granted or made by the Governor in Council or by Parliament, and while any part of such subsidy, advance, loan, or bonus is a subsisting claim against the Government, either directly or indirectly, by himself or by any person on his behalf, subscribes, furnishes or gives, or promises to subscribe, furnish or give, any money or other valuable consideration, for the purpose of promoting the election of any candidate, or of any number, class, or party of candidates, to a legislature or to Parliament, or with the intent in any way of influencing or affecting the result of a provincial or Dominion election.

Now, let me give an example for the purpose of making myself plain, and I wish the hon. gentleman to excuse me if I refer to him personally. I think the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), is a director of a short line of railway that is to-day run by the Grand Trunk Railway. Suppose that railway were being extended to the lake, and suppose that either the provincial or Dominion Government was to give a subsidy for the continuation of that railway, which would be very natural as they have given it for the line at present built; then my hon. friend would be unable, directly or indirectly, and as the Bill provides, to subscribe any money for any election, provincial or federal, even though the money might be legitimately used. It does not matter whether the candidate should be for a Dominion or provincial election, or whether he belong to one party or the other. I assume that he would give the money for legitimate purposes in an election contest, but if this Bill were passed the hon. gentleman would be deliberately violating the law, and could be called to account for it before the courts of the country. I think the measure entirely too drastic, because if you remember the number of subordinate lines that are owned by these two great corporations, and that are being extended in different directions in Manitoba, the North-west Territories, British Columbia, Ontario, Quebee, Nova Scotia, and in Prince Edward Island; one can readily un-derstand how it would be possible to connect almost every public man in the Dominien, directly or indirectly, with these two If they gave to the railway corporations. extent of one dollar for the promotion of an election, it would make them amenable to an infraction of the law under this Bill. It seems to me that that would be going much further than it was ever contemplated to go by any law which provided for punishing corruption at elections. Now, I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar), when he drafted this Bill, never thought of this, or at least, that he never looked carefully into this Bill; or else that he did not hope the Bill should pass, for if he did he would not have put it on the Order paper; because I believe the hon, gentleman himself would be one of the first to suffer under the operation of this Bill. I do not know whether he is now interested in any railway; but if not now, he was only a few years ago interested in a railway, for which, I understand, he hoped to receive some Government aid. I do not know whether he did or did not receive it. might be fair enough that he should receive it in the interests of the ratepayers who would be benefited by that railway: but if he did receive it, and his own Bill became law, and he attempted to support a candidate, by giving or promising to give any money or other valuable consideration to secure his election, he would be violating his own law, and be liable to punishment. I do not think he contemplated that. If I know anything of the hon. gentleman, he would not go through any such contest without violating this law. I think the Bill is going too far. Again, it provides that if this is done "for the purpose of promoting the election of any candidate, or of any number, class or party of candidates," the law will be violated. It does not matter whether it is an individual candidate, a number of candidates, a party or class of candidates, or whether the election be for a Dominion or provincial legislature; if he gave money or other valuable consideration for the promotion of the election, he would be violating this law. If this Bill were on the statute-book no-day, I think we could scarcely run an election without having parties brought before the courts for violation of the law. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman, being a lawyer, would suffer indirectly from that; because if litigation was the outcome of his Bill, the profession would be benefited. But I am very far from supposing that the hon, gentleman is so mercenary in his nature as to propose it for that purpose. I think he has done it inadvertently, with the object of in-timidating parties who might be interested in railways, either directly or indirectly, such as parties belonging to a municipality or a county, or directors or officers or contractors. They would be held accountable for their conduct if they took part in a provincial or Dominion election. Therefore, I say this Bill goes too far, and I do not think the judgment of the House is that it ought to become law; I do not think the good sense of the House will allow it to become law; and I do not think the hon. gentleman will gain much from the cheap popularity that will come to him from the introduction of a Bill of this character, which he cannot reasonably hope will become law or ever be put into practice.

Mr. TISDALE. I regret that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has left the Chamber, because I wished to correct some things that he said while he was here; but I will make the correction in his absence, as it may not be possible to do so at another time. I wish to explain how impossible it was that the subsidy granted affect the election of my friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), because, as he explained, and I will take the liberty of repeating, so that the facts will be known to every member of the House. the hon. member for East Elgin was elected in 1891; he was unseated and was re-elected in February, 1892; and the subsidy was granted in July, 1892; so that it was impossible that it could in any way affect the election. Another statement of the hon. gentleman I wish to correct, because I know that part of the country. This railway runs along the western border of the riding I have the honour to represent, and one of the municipalities in my riding voted a subsidy for it. The hon, gentleman said that the municipalities through which it runs are all sand, and that a man could carry on his shoulders all the freight that it would have, and therefore, he said, the railway could not be built, and it would be useless if built. The hon, gentleman made a very sweeping condemnation of the railway. Yet this House voted $3,200 a mile for that railway, and from the information submitted to it; and as the hon. member for East Elgin said, the Ontario Government were so impressed with its importance that they had followed for forgotten himself and allowed himself to years of not granting any more aid to railways in the old settled parts of Ontario, and last session granted it $2,000 a mile. In addition to these subsidies, the municipalities through which it runs for the sixteen miles voted for it $52,000 or $53,000 of bonuses; and I want to tell the hon. gentleman that these municipalities know a great deal more about that country than he does. The hon, gentleman ought not to make such statements without some personal knowledge on the subject. If he would visit that part of the country and see the sort of country it is. I am sure he would be fair enough to take back the words he has uttered here to-night to its discredit. I have no hesitation in saying that while it would not pay a company to build that read without assistance, yet, with the subsidies which have been granted, it would pay the interest on the small amount of money that would be required in addition, besides paying operating expenses. There is a large tract of country to the east of this road. The nearest point where there a railway on the lake to the east is Port Rowan, about thirty miles distant; and on the west is Port Stanley, I presume, about 50 miles distant. There is a wide tract of country between these two points that the railway would serve, and it would obtain a fair amount of traffic in that part of the country from the lake to Tilsonburg, where it would connect with the Grand Trunk and with the Canada Southern Division of the Michigan Central. So that it would be a most important factor in the development of that district, and in providing proper railway communication to one of the oldest parts of Ontario, which heretofore has been without it. I am surprised at the statements of the hon, member for Bothwell, because, as a rule, he is careful ir his utterances upon subjects of this sort, and I believe he always intends to be fair. He should not make statements so utterly unsupported in regard to the motives that induced this Government to grant the aid, because, as the facts show, he is entirely mistaken, the aid having been granted long subsequent to the election. In the by-election of 1892 I had the pleasure of being in the township of Bayham, which is one of the largest townships in the county of Elgin, advocating the election of my hon. friend who so ably represents the east riding in this House. I never heard the question of the subsidy in connection with that road discussed during that election, and it was not voted for months afterwards, I deprecate strongly, tlemen, no matter from what side of the House, coming into a constituency and making statements with reference to public undertakings without having previously prepared themselves with a correct knowledge be led so wide of the facts as regards this It has the endorsement of this subsidy. House, which voted the subsidy, and of the municipalities which gave other generous subsidies, and it has, besides, the endorsement of the Ontario Government, which went out of its way to make an exception in favour of this road, so strongly did that Government believe in the necessity and the importance of this enterprise which my hon, friend attacked.

ADJOURNMENT—GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. What does the hon. gentleman propose to take up to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. I am very anxious to get the Supplementary Estimates through, because the session is going on to a great length, and we shall have to get these Estimates into the shape of a Bill in order to get money for certain services which are urgent. To-morrow I shall try to finish the supplementaries, and then shall try to take up the other Estimates, and I hope my hon. friend will be in a good mood and humour to expedite business.

Mr. LAURIER. I would be in a far better mood if the hon, gentleman would state what he intends to do with regard to the policy of the country-whether we are to have those measures of which we have heard a great deal, but as to which he will not express his intentions. If he would, that, perhaps, would be a very effective way of expediting business. I may say that my hon. friend beside me has an amendment to make to-morrow on the subject of the Curran Bridge on going into Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. Minister of Railways bring down the accounts promised with reference to the expenditure on Sir John Thompson's funeral?

Mr. HAGGART. I will bring them down at the opening of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say that my hon. friend appears to be very insistent.

Mr. LAURIER. I am.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask him whether in the history of the Canadian Parliament, the House has ever been, at so early a stage of the session, in possession of so much information with respect to the exact amount of legislation, estimates, subsidies, &c., that brought down by the Governwould be More than a month ago. almost, ment? every important piece of legislation that For the funeral of Sir Geo. Cartier the the Government intended to bring down was outlined. The statement was made that no further supplementary Estimates this year may be looked for, and that no railway subsidies would be placed before the House. I just bring that fact to the attention of my hon. friend. A clean bill, with one single exception, was given to the House, and yet hon, gentlemen opposite have shown, I think, an undue amount of dissatisfaction because of that one little item.

Mr. LAURIER. A little item of $2,500,-000, as to which the Government came to a conclusion two months or more ago, and as to which they are not able to say whether or not they will abide by their judgment. If the hon, gentleman were able to say "We have passed the order and intend to follow it up, or we have changed our minds," we would have something definite.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not keep the hon. gentleman much longer in doubt.

Motion agreed to: and House adjourned at 10 p.m.

STATE FUNERALS.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked, What are the names of the Canadians who have had a public funeral at the expense of the State, since the year 1867? What was the total outlay for the funeral in each case?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. Sir Geo. Et. Cartier, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John Thompson. 2. amount in the Public Accounts is given as $10,000. For Sir John A. Macdonald the expenditure was $6,938.02. For the funeral of Sir John Thompson the accounts are not yet adjusted but will amount, it is expected, to about the sum voted, viz., $25,000. I find in the Public Accounts that the Government paid $295 on account of the funeral of T. D'Arcy McGee.

I. C. R. TIME-TABLE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked. Is the new timetable of the Intercolonial Railway now decided upon? If so, at what hour will the passenger train and express be due at Lévis?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, the time-table is now decided upon. The through express will arrive at Lévis at 16.00 o'clock. The local express will arrive at Lévis at 13.30 o'clock.

CAP ST. IGNACE STATION-I. C. R.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, When is the Railway Department going to begin the construction of the new siding on the Intercolonial at Cap St. Ignace station, as recommended by Mr. James Yeo, roadmaster, and as promised by the officials at Moncton?

Mr. HAGGART. There is no information as regards a new siding at Cap St. Ignace, but the General Manager has been asked for the facts in relation thereto, and his reply has not yet reached Ottawa.

FREE GOODS IMPORTED BY GOVERN-MENT.

Mr. CASEY asked, What are the details as to description, classification and value of the goods imported, free of duty, by the Government during the last fiscal year?

Mr. WALLACE. The information asked for by the hon. member as to "what are the details as to description, classification and value of the goods imported, free of duty, by the Government during the last fiscal year," cannot be furnished except by getting a special return from the ports, as the department has no record of the details required. Therefore, the hon, member will require to move for an Order of the House.

Mr. CASEY. Let it stand until the information comes in.

Mr. WALLACE. That might take some weeks, and the information would be too voluminous to read.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The greater portion of the information the hon. gentleman requires was given in a return that was brought down some few days ago.

Mr. OUIMET.

MANITOBA SCHOOLS—COMMUNICATIONS WITH HIS EXCELLENCY.

Commission and and the second of the second

Mr. McCARTHY asked, 1. Whether it is the fact that negotiations have recently taken place between His Excellency the Governor General and the Honourable Messrs. Greenway and Sifton, Premier and Attorney General of Manitoba, on the subject of or in relation to the action of the legislature of that province on the remedial order passed by the Governor General in Council on the subject of the Public Schools Act of the province, or in connection therewith? 2. Was the Governor General in these negotiations acting on the advice of the Privy Council, or in what capacity? 3. Have the negotiations been con-cluded? 4. Is it the intention of the Government to bring down to the House the history and result of the negotiations, and if not, why not?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), I may say, that nothing which could be called "negotiations," in the proper acceptation of that word, have taken place recently between His Excellency the Governor General and the Hon. Messrs. Greenway and Sifton; &c. &c. But, the Governor General has had some communication with these gentlemen at Ottawa. In these negotiations—if the question is a question of fact—the answer to it is: That the Governor General was not acting on the advice of the Privy Council. The negotiations,—as I have said, in the former reply there was nothing that could be called negotiations—I believe the communications have been concluded. There is nothing to bring down to the House as to the history.

WHARF AT MAGOG, P.Q.

Mr. RIDER asked, Has the Government purchased any property in the town of Magog, province of Quebec, for a public wharf? Where is it located, and does the purchase include necessary land for wharf and approaches thereto? Who were the owners, and through what party is the purchase being negotiated? What will be the gross cost of the purchase, and what sum will be required to put the property in suitable condition for public use?

Mr. OUIMET. Steps are now being taken through the Department of Justice to purchase the wharf now existing at Magog. The wharf is situated at the foot of the street immediately west of the Canadian Pacific Railway station, distant from said station about 125 feet. The purchase will include the land and approaches. Messrs C. C. Smith & Co. are the present owners of the wharf. The purchase is being made through the Department of Justice. The gross cost of the purchase will be $2,500, and the Chief Engineer reports that $200 will be required to put the property in suitable condition for sity of having lightning rods placed upon public use.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES-GEN-ERAL REVENUE FUND.

Mr. DALY moved that, to-morrow, the House do resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that any payment heretofore made to the General Revenue Fund of the North-west Territories of any fine, penalty or forfeiture which belonged to Her Majesty for the public uses of Canada, or of any portion of any such fine, penalty or forfeiture, be ratified, and that the amount of such fine, penalty or forfeiture, or portion thereof, need not be paid over to Her Majesty to be applied to such public uses.

Motion agreed to.

LOBSTER FISHING SEASON.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, with respect to a telegram which I have just received, whether or not he has granted an extension of twenty days, or any other time, in the lobster fishing season to the lobster fisheries on the coast of Prince Edward Island from West Point to St. Peters?

Mr. COSTIGAN. An extension has been granted, and I think, within the district named by the hon, gentleman.

Mr. FORBES. Does that extension extend the fish. as far north as the coast of Labrador? Protection

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; it is confined to the district named by the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I.

PROTECTION OF OTTAWA PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. CASEY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the House, and especially of the hon. Minister of Public Works, to the injury done this morning by lightning to one of the buildings on these grounds. The fact, as reported to me, is that the lightning also struck this block in which the Houses of Parliament are situated; it appears that the current was felt and played pranks in several of the rooms. I may say, in parantheses, that I believe some of the committees were slightly electrified this forenoon by lightcommittees ning or otherwise. But, speaking seriously, the fact has been demonstrated that these buildings, in spite of their national character and public usefulness, are liable to be struck by lightning as well as other buildings. The startling fact appears also to be demonstrated that these buildings are not protected by lightning rods; and 1 would call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the advisability and necessity of having lightning rods placed upon them for the protection of the lives of the people who are obliged to remain within them, as well as of the public property. I hope it is too late in the day to argue that lightning rods are a necessity. When the buildings are struck, the large amount of iron in the floor joists and in the walls appears to become saturated with electricity, which escapes by way of the electric light, telegraph and telephone wires. I believe that the iron in the buildings has been relied on too much to carry off the lightning. It appears that it is not sufficient, and something ought to be done to increase the protection of these buildings.

THE FISHERIES ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 67) further to amend the Fisheries Act. He said: I gave a short explanation of this Bill when it was introduced: but perhaps it would be well now to state more fully the reasons which seem to call for this measure at present. Before last year there were two Acts of Parliament dealing with the throwing into rivers of sawdust and other matters injurious to fish. One was a clause of the Fisheries Act preventing the throwing of all such objectionable matters into rivers frequented by certain kinds of fish. But it contained a proviso giving power to the Governor in Council to exempt certain rivers and certain portions of rivers where the exemption might be given with safety to The other Act was that for the Protection of Navigable Waters, which contained and still contains a clause prohibiting those objectionable matters being thrown into rivers, and concaining also a proviso giving power to the Governor General in Council to exempt rivers or portions of rivers where that might be done with safety to navigation. Last year a short amendment was made in the Fisheries Act, which in effect terminated all exemptions heretofore granted, on the 1st day of May las t: but no change was made in the Act for the Protection of Navigable Rivers. Under that Act the Governor in Council has still power to exempt navigable rivers, but not such rivers as are inhabited by the fish named in the Fisheries Act.

Mr. LAURIER. What kind of fish are they?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the names of the fish. It was considered a great hardship, especially to the mill-owners, who had been exempt for many years, that this exemption should be swept suddenly. The House will SO away. remember inquiries that several and investigations have made into been \mathbf{We} subject. have representations made by scientific men, by engineers and millwrights, practical men who examined a great number of the mills on the Ottawa

River; and it is their undoubted opinion that in the case of most of the mills-those of older construction—their structure could not be changed so as to comply with the law without almost entirely rebuilding them. I propose by this Bill to deal with the mat-ter in a temporary way. I propose that the Bill should only have effect for two years. for these reasons. It would restore during that period exemptions already given in good faith to the mills on the rivers named in the Orders in Council, and would restore the power of giving such other exemptions. within that term of two years, as it may be found necessary and just to give. I propose a limit of two years because I think that within that time the whole question may be dealt with in a more practical way than it possibly can be at present. mentioned the River St. John, the other day, and I am afraid that some hon, members misunderstood my object in mentioning that river alone. I simply spoke of it as one of the international rivers where it would be a hardship to enforce a regulation on the one side while the mill-owners on the other were left free to do as they pleased. I simply meant that the object of the law would not be accomplished unless the same legislation applied to both sides of the river. and that remark, of course, applies equally to the St. Croix and other international rivers. I simply mentioned the St. John as an illustration, because it is the largest in volume and longest in length, as regards the boundaries between the two countries. Another reason why this delay should be given is to enable us to prepare a more perfect measure. That whole question is now under consideration. Our commissioner, who is in communication with the commissioner of the United States on other subjects, has brought this matter to the attention of the United States authorities, and we have the assurance that it will receive their attention with a view of co-operating in some joint regulations. It is only reasonable therefore that we should await that action on their part. Another reason is that the Act does not define to what rivers it applies; and after full inquiries, a measure may be introduced by which a large number of small streams and brooks in inland sections of the country might be exempted entirely, because the House may decide that they are not, in a practical sense, navigable rivers. With regard to the Fisheries Act, there is certainly, quite a number of rivers of different sizes that might certainly be exempted from its operation, because the construction of mills and the putting of sawdust into those rivers could not possibly injuriously affect the fish. These are the reasons which induce me to ask the House to pass this measure for a term of two years. Hon, gentlemen may ask if we have made an inquiry, because an inquiry was promised. My predecessor appointed a commissioner to visit as many of these places as law from what it was last year-possible so as to report the facts, and he has visited the majority perhaps of the mills east of Ottawa. His inquiry is not yet complete. We require a full report, not only with regard to the mills, but the rivers as

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not intend to discuss this Bill at length. The proviso which the Minister asked the House to adopt is one which vests in himself the absolute discretion of determining what rivers shall be exempt or whether the millowners on such rivers shall wholly or partially be exempt from the operation of the Act. I understood the hon, gentleman to say that such discretion does not exist at present.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was taken away by the Act of last year and expired the 1st of May.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Now, the hon. gentleman proposes to re-establish it in the law,-

Mr. COSTIGAN. For a limited time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—which will necessarily cover the coming elections; and although it would be unfair to assume that any Minister would use an important discretion for political purposes, still it is fair to ask whether Parliament should, in legislating upon this subject, divest itself of a power which it ought itself to exercise and hand it over to the Minister to exercise or not at his mere discretion. I think the principle is bad. If the Government determine that any exemptions ought in the public interest to be made, the Minister of Marine should be prepared to submit those exemptions to the judgment of Parliament, and ask Parliament to put them in the form of a statute.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is not new.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The discretion existed before, but it was taken away by starute, and now the hon. gentleman proposes to re-enact it. I say that is an unfair way of legislating.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has forgotton that this was the law for years. The right to exercise that discretion obtained ever since the Fishery Act was adopted. It certainly existed between 1874 and 1878 and was acted upon. The hon, gentleman could not, I think, have caught exactly the explanation of the Minister of Marine, because this is not a case of resorting to power by the Minister at all. Those conversant with the lumber industry will know that the people interested in that business, regardless of politics, made out a case to the satisfaction, at any rate, of the Minister of Marine, which he now practically presents to the House. They represented that a sudden change of the any disapproval of any judgment the Minister of Marine might arrive at, but I submit that his judgment should be submitted to the House. It may be perfectly right, and the majority of the House may vote for it, but my objection was, not to the judgment he may have reached, but to his reserving full discretion to himself.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman has raised an important question on which, as I am informed, there is no difference of opinion, and that is the policy, in a case of this kind, of leaving l'arliament to say what special privileges in these waters mill-owners should possess I never knew a more difficult responsibility to discharge than the exercise of that discretion. The hon, gentleman has suggested a suspicion in connection with the elections. Well, all sort of suspicions must and did arise every time that power was exercised by the Governor in Council. But the present Minister of Marine, because he does not ask to have that power restored to the Governor in Council, or vested in the Minister, or to have it taken out of the hands of Parliament. But he says, owing to these inconveniences, and owing to the effect of the sudden cessation of these exemptions upon the trade of this country, it is asked that the power that was in the Government permanently should be restored temporarily, that is until 1897, so that preparations may be made in the case of the vast number of waters where the exemption obtained, where the business was altogether arranged in view of that exemption, and where, in some cases, it was found after the notice of the law was received, to be absolutely impossible, without very heavy loss and, in some cases, stoppage of business altogether, to comply with the law. So the hon, gentleman will observe that there is no attempt to obtain a restoration of the responsibility, which is so difficult to discharge on the part of any executive, but simply a proposal to adopt the best means by which a sudden loss and sudden interruption of business to parties who may be considered, to some extent, to have acquired vested rights in this regard, may be averted. And I know enough of the representations that have been made to know that they come from all parts of the country, and were wholly separate and apart from political considerations.

Mr. EDWARDS. I desire to say a few words with regard to the Bill now under consideration; and, being a lumberman largely engaged in the business, and one who does not put either sawdust or mill refuse in the river, my evidence, I think, should be received as that of an unbiassed witness. For many years, under the statute it was illegal to put sawdust in the river, but with the proviso that the Governor General in Council had the power to exempt from the operation of the law such streams as, in the discretion to hon. gentlemen, that I should advocate

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not express of the Government, it was deemed proper to exempt. At the last session of Parliament an amendment to the Fisheries Act was introduced in the Senate and came over to this House and was passed in the dying days of the session. It was passed through this House, I think, in one day, at a time when the House was holding two or three sittings in the same day. I happened to be absent at the time, or I would have opposed the passage of the Bill. I would have opposed it, not because it would affect me individually in any sense, but because I believe, in the public interest, the Bill should not have become law. Now, there are a great many who believe that the putting of sawdust in the river—I will deal with the Ottawa only, because it is the one with which I am most conversant—is an injury to navigation. Let me say at once that if I had my choice, I would prefer that the sawdust should not be put in the river, but I think the question ought to be decided upon considerations of whether the putting of sawdust in the river would be a greater injury to the country than would be involved in the effort to prevent the practice. I am engaged not only in sawing but in navigation upon the river, and I make this statement: That in no place whatever in the Ottawa River, except at the foot of the locks, is any injury done to navigation by the presence of the sawdust. There is no point, even in the shallow places, where there is a less depth of water than there was twenty or thirty or forty years ago. It is true that some of the bays may fill up to some extent, but, so far as the navigation of the river in concerned. the putting of the sawdust in the river is no injury at all. Boatmen, pleasure seekers, may perhaps meet with trifling difficulties: but, so far as navigation is concerned, no injury is done. I think that the great question, so far as the Ottawa River is concerned, is whether a great and important industry is to be very seriously interfered with, or whether a few pleasure-seekers are to suffer some little inconvenience upon some casions. Now as to the question of the two years being given, to my own knowledge, those who came to urge this point upon the Government came perfectly independent of political considerations. And not only so, Mr. Speaker, but shortly after the opening of Parliament, I presented a petition in this House signed by nearly every owner of property between this city and Grenville on both sides of the river, asking that the clause passed last session be rescinded. Now, asking that the who are the people who should be considered-the property owners along the banks of the river who use the river constantly. or a number of gentlemen living in the city of Ottawa who have very little use for the river at all? I think by all means owners of property and those who navigate the river are those who ought first to be this proposal as I do. At Rockland we own steam mills where we can burn the sawdust with very great facility; in fact it is the easiest way for us to dispose of it. There we have always burned our sawdust and mill refuse. At our mills at New Edinburgh. the conditions are entirely different from those affecting other water mills on the Ottawa River. There we take our power from the Rideau River as it falls into the Ottawa, and have a very high head. Our mill is built on the bank of the river on a very high cliff, and we are practically in the same position as if our mill were a steam mill. We have facilities for accumulating the sawdust and taking it out. Our reason for putting up a burner is that we have a very small discharge from our mill into Ottawa, and sawdust there put in would be an injury to ourselves. That is the reason why, in the construction of the mill, we provided for burning the refuse. I may say I have had a very long-well, no. I will not say a very long but a very considerableexperience in saw-milling; and I think I understand this question pretty fairly well. Now the position of the other water mills on the river is simply this: They are constructed, just as water mills usually are, in the bed of the stream, in order to get possible. greatest head of water That being the case, the machinery is all down in the lower part of the mill, and during high water in the spring of the year, the water actually comes up to the level of the sawing floor, and is only kept out of the machinery by the dam. Now, a great many think that it is possible for gentlemen owning mills so constructed to dispose of the sawdust just as we are doing. From my experience, I say that it is impossible. In most cases, a very large expenditure, indeed, would be required in order to accumulate the sawdust and elevate it into the burners to be consumed; and, in most cases, in fact in almost every case. I think that reconstruction would have to take place. Now, as the law stands to-day, every one of these mills is liable at any time to be fined. Let me ask: What would be the condition if these mills were prosecuted under the Act, and should cease to run? The effect would simply be this, that plentiful as labour is, large as are the number of men unemployed, thousands of men on the Ottawa River would be thrown out of employment. Under these circumstances, I think that the Government, at least, should make a tempoary arrangement whereby the mills may be able to proceed with the work, and the labourers of the country continue to be employed. There are those who think that if this large expenditure for reconstruction were forced upon the lumbermen, the cost of such re-construction would come out of the lumbermen themselves. I deny that in toto. It would come out of the country, and out of the labour of the country; because all con-tions of every kind may temporarily come out of the proprietor but ultimately it comes out of the labour of the country. To enforce the law as it now. be a very serious infliction would the Ottawa Valley; in fact, it would imperil the whole business of the Ottawa and I think every River; hon. gentleman will agree with me that the lumber business on that river is our greatest business. Now, I sincerely hope, in the interests of the Ottawa River, and in the interests of the country, that the law now proposed by the Minister of Marine will go into effect, and that, within a period of two years, an arrangement may be made whereby this matter will be finally settled. There is, I think, a question of vested rights to be considered. When this business was begun on the Ottawa River, and on all the other rivers where it exists, it was very small, but it gradually grew and attained the great proportion it has to-day. A very large expenditure has been incurred in mill construction, and a large amount of money has been invested in other ways connected with this industry. If this change has to be made all over Canada, it will be a very serious loss, indeed, to the country. Now, what I would suggest is this: Looking forward two years to the time when it is hoped some arrangement may be made, I would suggest that all mills at present in operation on such rivers as the Ottawa, where no great injury to navigation is done, should be allowed to continue their operations as at present, but the law should provide that any new mills that may be constructed shall be obliged to dispose of their sawdust and other refuse otherwise than putting it in the river.

Mr. AMYOT. Speak about fish.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, so far as fish is concerned, it is true that some maintain that fishing has been seriously injured by throwing mill refuse into the Ottawa River: but I have lived all my life on the river, and am unable to say whether that is the case or not. My own opinion is that it is not the case. It is true that years ago there were more fish in the river than there are to-day, but it is also true that there are far more fishermen on the river to-day than there were years ago. Fishing is now carried on for commercial purposes, and, consequently, the fish are being more rapidly taken out. There is another thing. Carillon dam down at the foot of Long Sault, prevents certain fish coming up the river, and that is. I think, another reason why the quantity of fish may have been lessened. But if the sawdust were injurious to think they would ceased altogether to exist in that river. Many kinds of fish that existed years ago are still found here, but perhaps in less numbers than formerly. But let me remind the House that the petition presented to this structions of the kind, in fact, all construc- | Parliament by myself, bore the names of nearly every fisherman on the river; in fact, I think every fisherman signed the petition. As I stated in the beginning of my remarks, I am not at all personally interested in this question. I am not interesting myself in favour of the lumbermen; I have not been solicited by the lumbermen to interest myself in this matter; but knowing all the conditions, and having regard to the great importance of the lumber industry in the Ottawa Valley, and knowing that no very serious injury is done by putting the sawdust in the river, I take the position on this question that I have stated.

Mr. DEVLIN. I merely rise to endorse what has been so well said by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). I would like to take up a point that was made a moment ago by my hon, friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) in regard to political considerations that may be connected with this question. I can assure him that whatever power may be vested in the hands of the Minister in that respect, one party cannot suffer from its exercise much more than the other, inasmuch as those who are interested in the lumber business, so far at least as the Ottawa River is concerned, belong to both parties, and if punishment is meted out to one, it is sure to be meted out to the other. A short time ago considerable alarm was felt by the lumber interests of the Ottawa Valley in regard to the law as it stands. They felt that if the law were enforced, their interests, their vested rights, as the hon, member for Russell has put it. would suffer. Now, if the representations made by the lumber merchants of the Ottawa Valley are true, and I believe they are true, namely, that if the law were carried out they would be obliged to remove their mills, what would the consequences be? Why. Sir. the removal of the mills from Ottawa—I speak solely of the Ottawa Valley. and not in regard to any other river-would be a serious blow to the trade of the city of Ottawa, and a serious blow to the trade of the city of Hull. We know, as a matter of fact, that the population of the city of Hull, and a large part of the population of the city of Ottawa, depend upon the maintenance of those mills for their subsistence. Any one who visits the Chaudière at almost any time of the day during the summer months, will perceive the hundreds, nay, the thousands, of men who are there employed, who are earning their living in those mills. The hon, member for Russell has pointed out, and has established, that the erection of those burners, and the means of conveying the refuse into those burners. would entail an immense cost upon the lumbermen of the Chaudière, owing to the situation of their There is a question whether the throwing of sawdust into the Ottawa is a greater nuisance than would be the smoke from burners. It is a very serious question. nuisance than would be the smoke from burners. It is a very serious question. From burners erected in all the lumber sawdust is killing off the fish. In the third mills on the Ottawa in the immediate vicinity of Hull, a cloud of smoke would arise that would prove more disagreeable and a greater nuisance to the city of Ottawa than is the throwing of sawdust into the river as a nuisance to pleasure-seekers. If any persons have the right to complain in regard to the sawdust in the Ottawa, they are the landowners in the Ottawa Valley, especially those whose properties border on the river, and the member for Edwards) has represented Russell (Mr. that petitions have recently been signed by almost every landowner, showing that they offer no objection to the Bill introduced by the Minister of Marine. I merely rose for the purpose of seconding what was said so well by the hon, member for Russell, and giving my word, also, in favour of affording that protection to the lumber merchants of the Chaudière to which they were entitled.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the observations that have fallen from two very practical men in regard to this matter of saw-dust in the rivers of Canada; one, the hon member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), and the other the hon, member for the county of Ottawa (Mr. Devlin). Both those gentlemen live in this section of the country, and one is practically and largely concerned in the manufacture of lumber. His observations were of a technical character, and he, being a thoroughly practical lumberman, and knowing the effect of sawdust in the streams, his opinion is one on which great reliance should be placed. During the time I have lived in the valley of the Ottawa, I have had the subject of sawdust before me. Many persons live under the idea that it is a deleterious substance. a medical man, I will no doubt be asked to pronounce a medical opinion. gards sawdust, what has been the practical results on the health of the community? We know that throughout the length of the Ottawa Valley, where sawdust is passing down all the time, there is a large population. If we inquire into the life history of the people of this section, we find that in each family there are ten or twelve children at least. So that sawdust passing in the waters through the valley of the Ottawa cannot be injurious to health. the second place, people speak of the destruction of fish in the Ottawa River. Let me tell this House that any individual who has lived here twenty-five years, and will compare the fish products then with what they are to-day, as seen in the market every Friday morning-for we know Friday is a good day for taking fish there-will find an exhibition of the finest fish produced in any of the tributaries of the rivers of the Dominion of Canada. Where do they come place, I have a report by one of the first engineers of Canada, Mr. Sandford Fleming. He went into the whole subject most carefully, and prepared an elaborate report, and the statements in that report can be accepted with a considerable degree of credence. Riparian owners claim that they suffer damage from the operations of the lumber manufacturers. But what is this damage? It consists of a considerable amount of mill refuse being piled on the shore, which is sold annually for a considerable sum, besides supplying all the wood they require themselves for their purposes. That, however, is a point out of which some persons try to make a great deal. Mr. Sandford Fleming, in the concluding remarks of his report, said:

With respect to the future, it is conclusively established that there is no probability of the navigation between Ottawa and Grenville being irredeemably destroyed, or seriously obstructed, from the cause assigned, for centuries to come.

I thoroughly believe in that opinion, for those who now sail up and down the Ottawa in ordinary steamers find the main channel is not obstructed. There are some places, side bays, where the sawdust has accumulated, but there is no material damage done. If we inquire into the character of the lumber trade, do we not find that the lumbermen of the Chaudière have contributed not only to the wealth and prosperity of the capital, but also to the progress of the whole Dominion as well. I do not think, when those men erected their mills they were impressed with the idea that sawdust was of such deleterious a nature as is now supposed by some people. It is true that the hon. member for Russell has recently put up a consuming appliance for sawdust; but let me tell the House that some of the large mills in this section are so constructed that it would be utterly impossible to put in such an appliance without entirely rebuilding the mills. Again, at Hawkesbury there is one of the largest mills in the Ottawa Valley, owned by the Ottawa Lumber Company. We know that mill is also built so that machinery of this description could not be applied. If we inquire into the circumstances of the case, what are they? The mills which are pouring sawdust into the river at that point, where the rapids are, do not appear to be causing any material disadvantage whatever. They are not injuring navigation for there is no navigation there. They are not injuring trade or commerce. They are not producing any deleterious influence on the wealth or health of the community. But some persons look upon this question as a big wall—they have sawdust in their eye constantly. They are getting up an agitation, for what purpose? Some consider it a matter of a local character, and they think that in it they are getting up an agitation, for what purpose? they think that in it they have a great subject to discuss, and a great nuisance to put down. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that, looking at this question in the widest and most comprehensive sense, the observations of the hon, member for Russell are of such a character it is impossible to controvert them. I will take any man on the sawdust question and look into it with him, either as regards its physical effect, or its healthy character, or so far as trade and commerce are concerned. It is a subject that is constantly overdrawn. I support the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in introducing his Bill because he has put in it a clause which is based on common sense, that two years shall be allowed to elapse in order that the question may be entered into more fully than it is possible to do, even to-day, and at the end of those two years a practical solution of the difficulty may be reached whereby those mills which are known to be of such a character that it is impossible to make satisfactory arrangements for introducing the necessary apparatus, may reach some satisfactory conclusion as between the Government and the mill-owners, which will be advantageous, not only to our own people, but to the country at large.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are we to understand that the hon, gentleman lends the weight of his professional opinion to the proposition that the dissemination of saw-dust is beneficial, not only to the fish in the river, but to the people on the banks?

Sir JAMES GRANT. I say it does not harm either the fish or the people.

Mr. FORBES. With respect to this Bill, let me say that a few days ago I moved for copies of the report of the expert sent by the Government to visit the rivers and streams with a view to ascertain what rivers should be permanently exempted from the Act of last session. I am glad that this Bill has been brought down by the Government. Of course, it is only a temporary measure: I trust, however, it will be made a permanent one after the arguments we have heard to-day. What I desire, however, particularly to ascertain, after the remarks made by the Minister and hon. members specially concerned in the great lumber interest, is this: Are the lumbermen to consider this Bill as notifying them that when the two years are elapsed they will have the whole force of the Government called into requisition to prevent sawdust being emptied into the rivers of the country? Are they to rest upon the assurance of the Government, and the statement of the Minister that this exemption will last for two years, and two years only, and. come what may, or cost what it will to the mill-owners of the country, whose interests are affected, they shall then be required to have their mills in such condition that there shall be no exemptions required; that all the sawdust will have to be destroyed. and that, by that time, their mills will have to be so constructed as to utterly destroy the sawdust, or else that they will be obliged to shut down their mills?

Applie program and control of the co

Mr. DEVLIN. We will be in power then.

Mr. FORBES. I dare say the Liberal Government will be in power then, but we would like to have the benefit of the advice now of our friends in Opposition at that time.

Mr. FOSTER. You are two young optimists.

Mr. FORBES. I judge from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture in the Senate, that the Government are looking forward to the permanent exemption of merely the Ottawa River and the St. John River.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Bill covers all the rivers that were exempted.

Mr. FORBES. There is nothing in the Bill which leads one to come to the Minister's conclusion, but I have the statement of one of his confrères that that is the intention of the law, and members everywhere are discussing the exemption of the Ottawa River only.

Mr. DEVLIN. And the Gatineau.

Mr. FORBES. I ask the Government if they do not consider that other rivers are equally entitled to the same rights? The persons engaged in the lumber industry on other rivers than the Ottawa and St. John. have certain rights which must be recognized by whatever Government is in power. The rights of navigation only should be paramount to the rights of the lumberman, and the rights of the river fisheries should only come in the third place. Sawdust has no injurious effect upon the fisheries which are off the coast. We have had the opinion of an experimental medical man.

Mr. FOSTER., That is rough on him.

Mr. FORBES. I mean an expert medical man. We have had his opinion that sawdust is not against good health, but that on the contrary it tends to increase the population, even to a greater extent than the vigorous immigration policy of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. Why, then, should not this exemption apply to other rivers of the Dominion? In Nova Scotia we have rivers which are shorter than the Ottawa, but the waters of which run more rapidly and on which the protection of the fisheries is safeguarded better than on the Ottawa, and, therefore, I say that if there is any reason for exempting the Ottawa, these reasons apply with double force to the rivers of the maritime provinces, and especially the rivers on the south-western coast of Nova Scotia on which lumbermen have invested vast sums of money in the erection of mills. I ask the Government to tell the citizens of the south shore now, whether or not we are to interpret this Act as a notice to the mill-owners that they will be required to reconstruct their mills in order to comply with this law two years hence. Let them state now that there shall be no exemption of any rivers in the Dominion of Canada, if that is their intention. By this Act, the Government are notifying the mill-owners that they must reconstruct their mills so that they can destroy all deleterious matter which goes into the water, or otherwise that they will be obliged by this law to abandon their mills. That is the natural conclusion from the statement of the Minister of Marine, or else, on the other hand, we must assume that the Government are going to exempt all rivers which are now exempt. In the words of section 2 of the Bill:

rantaparta statuspatan salahan Polisian salah salahan salahan

2. Any exemptions granted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries under subsection two of section fifteen of The Fisheries Act, and in force on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, shall remain in force until the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, unless sooner revoked by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

—as political exigencies would require. contend, Mr. Speaker, that all rivers now exempt, together with any rivers properly entitled to exemption, should be exempted at the end of two years from now, and if that is the real intention of the Government, why do they not state it now. The hon. Minister will see that for the two years there will be great perturbation as to whether millewners are going to be affected by this Bill or not. I trust that the Government will not act in such a way as would be calculated to cause the mill-owners to have frequent interviews and negotiations with them on this matter. The present Minister (Mr. Costigan) may not be aware, but his predecessor (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is aware, of the negotiations with the mill-owners which were carried on in New Brunswick last fall. There were then certain representations placed before the Government and certain promises made. mill-owners rely upon the fact, as intimated to them by the Government officials, that there would be a permanent exemption made of certain rivers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was no such arrangement.

Mr. FORBES. Then there will be no permanent exemptions made in favour of the Ottawa River and the St. John River?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This Bill does not contemplate it.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. Minister begs the question. He says that there may be permanent exemption as regards Ottawa and St. John rivers, but he will not say that in regard to the maritime province rivers. Are the Ottawa and St. John rivers to be selected for special favour by the Government, and are the other rivers of the maritime provinces to have the law vigorously enforced in their regard? Is this act only a temporary makeshift of the Government to curry favour with the mill-owners, and is it the intention of the Government later on to enforce the law vigorously? If such is the case the millowners should understand it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The mill-owners understand it all right.

Mr. FORBES. I shall only be too glad to know that, if such be the case. Mr. Speaker, I add the plea that if the Minister of Marine is going to make anything like a law which will give permanent exemption, I demand with all the force possible, that the rivers of the maritime provinces, and especially those on the south coast of Nova Scotia, shall have equal privileges with any other rivers in the Dominion of Canada.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This Bill applies all over Canada.

Mr. FORBES. If any river in Canada is to get permanent exemption from the operation of last year's Act, then those rivers on the south shore of Nova Scotia should have it, and must have it. The lumbermen have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars there, and, as the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) has well said: Every dollar they are compelled to spend to reconstruct their mills will be a direct tax on the labour of these several sections of the country. The millowners are therefore entitled to a square and honest declaration on the part of the Government with regard to these points I have mentioned.

Mr. BRYSON. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say a word or two in reference to the very important question which is now before the House. At the outset, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Marine for the very prompt manner in which he has brought forward this Bill at the opening of the session. As was said by the hon, member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), the Bill which passed this House last session was amended in the Senate during the dying days of the session. When the amendment came back to the House of Commons I did not notice that such an amendment was introduced, and had I been aware of it, I certainly would have directed the attention of the House to it at the time. For many years there has been very great discussion as to the results of the deposit of sawdust and mill refuse in the Ottawa River. Seventeen or eighteen years ago a petition was presented to this House in respect to that, and subsequently a Royal Commission took the evidence of experts who had examined the navigation of the river at the different points between Grenville and the city O.S The conclusion then arrived at was that the channel of the river was not materially disturbed by the deposit of sawdust. I understand that the survey of the Ottawa Mr. FORES.

River made last year by Mr. Fleming. who took soundings and made examinations at almost every mile between here and Grenville, goes to prove that the channel of the Ottawa River has been not at all seriously affected by the deposit of sawdust; but, on the contrary, it was found at many points to be deeper than it was five years ago. Now, while it may be argued that the sawdust is deposited in the bays of the river, to the detriment of the farmers living along its banks, that idea is dispelled from my mind by the fact that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). the hon, member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), a few days ago presented petitions to this House signed by seveneighths or more of the ratepayers living along the banks of the Ottawa River, appealing to this House to rescind the Act of last session, and to continue to the millowners of the Ottawa and Gatineau rivers the privilege that has heretofore been extended to them. If any one could know whether or not any injury is done to the river, surely the men living along its banks are in the best position to judge. While I do not deny that at the foot of the hill where we now stand, at the mouth of the Rideau Canal, there is a very large deposit of sawdust which in a few years may have to be removed, yet, considering the magnitude of the lumber trade of this country, it is for this House seriously to consider whether we should not unanimously, irrespective of party, support what is for the greatest good of the greatest number of people in this country. We should remember that 300,000,000 feet of lumber is manufactured annually at this point, that during the last forty years the mill-owners have been dumping sawdust into the Ottawa River without serious detriment to the interests of the country, and that to prevent them doing that would be practically to close the water mills at the Chaudière and on the Gatineau. The owners of these mills cannot, I understand, without great expense, if at all, raise the floors of their mills so as to allow the sawdust to be carried beneath the floors. If you take two or three feet from the head of water used for running the mills, you practically put these men in the position of being obliged to abandon the process of manufacturing by water power. You practically say to the mill-owners: You have to put in steam appliances, because the water-powers of this country are of little or no use for the manufacture of lumber under such restrictions. That would be a very serious thing to the labouring men whom they employ. If the Government insisted that Ottawa the River mill-owners should stop putting sawdust in the river, not only would they have to close down their mills, but two-thirds of the cut in the woods next year would have to be abandoned, because the cut of logs this year would have to remain in the river and be sawn next year. I think this matter should be viewed from a business standpoint. Fishermen from the counties of Carleton and Russell have gone to Ottawa county and fished in streams where no sawdust is deposited; and they have frequently expressed to me in conversation on the trains, the opinion that the fishing is as good below the city of Ottawa as it is above. So far as the health of the children is concerned, we have the opinion a medical man, and it would be most unfair for a layman to offer an opinion on that subject. I think the argument of the hon, member for Queen's, who said that this was a temporary measure of relief, was very fair. I think the hon. Minister of Marine might possibly go further, but for the The hon, the Senate may other House. view this matter as they did last session. but my strong opinion is that the mills now operated by water power on the Ottawa and the Gatineau should be exempt for all time to come—that the Order in Council should be permanent so far as the mills at present constructed are concerned. I think it would be only fair to the owners of those mills, to give them an opportunity to offer evidence to show that it would be impossible for them to continue to carry on their business if the Act should be put into force at the end of two years. I hope that before the end of those two years the Government, whether Liberal or Conservative I care not, will consider frankly and fairly, in the interest of the lumber industry, and in the interest of the labouring classes who are supported by that industry, whether these mill-owners should not be allowed to put in evidence to show that it is impossible for them to put sawdust carriers into the mills so constructed, and that they should be permanently relieved from the operation of any such measure as is now contemplated. Therefore, while I am quite willing to admit that the dumping of sawdust into the rivers is to some extent a nuisance to the people who use those rivers for pleasure-seeking and for navigation, yet when we consider that fully two-thirds of the cut of the Ottawa River has been exhausted, and that the mills are sawing lumber on an improved system by which not more than two-thirds as much sawdust as formerly is deposited in the river, and no serious difficulty is found in navigating it, I think the Government and the House should hesitate to put a damper upon those gentlemen who have so much capital invested in lumber properties and mill industries. I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill so promptly introduced by the hon. Minister of Marine.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I wish to say a word or two in support of what my hon. friend mills to burn their sawdust, we might as well at once order them to close their mills. They have suffered in our section of the country from prosecutions, which I may call malicious prosecutions, with regard to rivers in which there is no fish worth mentioning. As to the owners of land who might be affected by this sawdust, they have an action of damages in our civil law to protect themselves; but this fishery interest is a minor consideration altogether to the lumber interest. We have in Megantic and Arthabaska rivers like the Bécancour, the Nicolet and their tributaries, on which mill-owners have been occasionally troubled by these malicious prosecutions for the protection of fish which have no existence. As soon as you can find a few small fish in any of those rivers, you may put the law in operation and stop a very important business. In the townships which are comparatively new, there is a good deal of lumber being made, and a very large number of small water mills; and if you oblige these mill-owners to carry on that expensive process of burning sawdust, they will have to close their establishments, to the great damage not only of themselves but of the surrounding country.

Mr. KAULBACH. I have listened with much attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), and others, and as I represent a county which is largely interested in the milling industry. I cannot allow this Bill to pass without expressing my views with regard to it. The lumbering industry is one which, from its importance, ought to be very carefully cousidered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has charge of this Bill. He should consider, first of all, whether in restricting the milling industry he is not inflicting a large amount of injury upon other industries and upon the people inhabiting those sections of the country where the milling industry flourishes. I know that in the district I have the honour to represent, that industry has been carried on very successfully, and will continue to prosper if not restricted, as it has been in recent years. It cannot, with any show of reason, be contended that the emptying of the sawdust into the rivers has at all affected the industry of fishing, because in most of the rivers where the milling industry is carried on, the fish appear to be quite as plentiful now as they were in the past, making proper allowances for the many more hands employed in the capture of them. I approve of this Bill as a measure of present relief, and hope it will result in a measure affording permanent relief. It gives the Minister of Marine two years to consider the matter. has stated. I believe this Act should exempt and allows him the discretion during that sawdust at once as not being a deleterious period of exempting other rivers than those substance. In fact, as the hon, gentleman which were formerly exempted, on a good has said, instead of obliging the owners of case being made out for exemption; and that being a step in the right direction. I can support the Bill. I do not see why the two rivers, the Ottawa and the St. John, should be exempted while others are required to come under the operation of the law. If the argument is good that the mills on the Ottawa and St. John rivers are so constructed that it is impossible to construct furnaces for the destruction of their sawdust, is not the argument doubly strong in favour of the small mills on the rivers in Lunenburg county? The hon, member for Pontiac has urged very strongly that the Ottawa should be exempted, but sufficiently cogent reasons can be advanced for exempting the rivers in the province of Nove Scotia. I concur in the principle of the Bill, and I hope that in the two years which it has to run the Government will send an official to inspect the La Have and other rivers in the county I have the honour to represent, and obtain a report of such a character as will warrant the Minister of Marine in bringing down a measure which will afford permanent relief to all those parties who now feel that they are hardly dealt with under the operation of the present Act.

Mr. FRASER. I am very glad to hear the remarks of my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), for I know of no part of the Dominion which has suffered more from vexatious proceedings than the hon. gentleman's own county.

Mr. KAULBACH. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. I only regret he did not speak in the same way some time ago and insist that the Government should act in that county as he now proposes they should.

Mr. KAULBACH. "Hansard" will show that I have done so.

Mr. FRASER. This debate has proved one thing, and that is, that the only reason why sawdust should be kept out of the rivers is because it interferes with navigation. There is no question about fish at all, which was the great question heretofore. After the lucid explanation given by the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), I am sure that all controversy hereafter will cease. I regret that the hon. Minister of Marine had not that information before him when he did prosecute so very vigorously certain parties in the interests of the fish, and I would throw out the hint that a further suggestion made by my genial friend should be seriously considered by the Government. Here is an opportunity by which the Government may, in the future, avoid having to face such a state of things as the census discloses. Here is an industry which the Government may profit by—the sawdust industry. In that the Government have an industry by which they may increase our population. They have now in their hands a means by which the next census shall show a different state of things from the last. In place of allowing the sawdust to lie in the rivers into which it is thrown, let it be collected and distributed throughout the various streams, and you shall have such a triumph that this Dominion, so far as population is concerned, shall bloom and flourish like the rose. It strikes me that the Government should not hesitate in taking this method of covering up deficits in their system, which so far they have been unable to hide; and if they do that, the good results will more than counterbalance the loss of a few fish. I am glad the only question now raised is one of navigation, and I can safely say there is not a river-I speak of Nova Scotia particularly—with the navigation of which the sawdust thrown into the stream interferes. And, as the fish question is out of it. I ask that the Minister will at once see that an Act is passed exempting every river in Nova Scotia.

hon. member Mr. SCRIVER. The Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) referred to an abuse which exists in his county and which also exists in mine, and, I daresay, in many others. In those counties we have comparatively small streams, upon which there are small mills, and in which streams there are no edible fish of any consequence. I called the attention of the hon. Minister's predecessor to these facts and to the further fact that the officials of the department in these parts of the country were in the habit, for some reason or other-and I am afraid not always influenced by the best of motives-of making occasional raids upon these poor, weak mill-owners and imposing arbitrary fines upon them. as a rule, these mills are not operated to the extent of more than three months in the year, and the sawdust which results from their operation is a very small matter indeed. And yet the owners have been required by these officials to take baskets-for they cannot afford machinery to carry the sawdust away-and remove this sawdust from the mills. And this after imposing these arbitrary fines upon them. Though I made as earnest representations as I could, I did not succeed in getting the relief I thought our citizens were entitled to. The conduct on the part of the officials of which I complain is not carried on with any degree of consistency or regularity. These tations of theirs are made at intervals of perhaps two years. Without warning they pounce down upon the mill-owners and say: You must pay $40 or $50 or worse will befall you. I say, from my own personal knowledge, that this practice exists on these small rivers -small affluents of the Chateauguay and other streams which empty into the St. Lawrence, and which, to-day, have not in them edible fish in sufficient quantity to make it worth while to send officials to them at all.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. COSTIGAN. I find that the Act applying to these rivers gives the power under the proviso to the Governor in Council and not to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I would like to have this Bill uniform with the former Act, and I would move that the words "Governor in Council" be substituted for the words "Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

Mr. LAVERGNE. I think it has been pretty well agreed, particularly since we have heard the expert opinion of the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), that the saw-dust is not a deleterious substance so far as the fish are concerned. I think, therefore, that we might as well strike out the words "or saw-dust." At least we might as well exempt at once the tributaries of large rivers, for instance, as my hon, friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Seriver) said a few moments ago, those that flow into the Chateauguay, the Nicolet, the Becancour and others upon which are small water-mills whose owners are sometimes troubled with malicious prosecutions. I would not charge these prosecutions as the outcome of the illwill of the fishery inspector himself, but people make complaints to him. I would like the opinion of the committee on this proposal, I move, seconded by the hon, member for Ottawa county (Mr. Devlin), that the words "or saw-dust" in the fourth line of paragraph 2, section 1, be struck out.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I hope the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment will reflect upon the position. I think he could not have heard the statement I made as to the object of the Bill. As the law at present stands, every mill-owner on large stream or small who puts saw-dust in the river is liable to prosecution and heavy penalties. The hou. gentleman thinks we ought to exempt certain streams. But what progress should we make if we undertook to discuss the question on that basis now. The hon, gentleman knows those streams in his own locality that ought to be exempted. But after we have dealt with these streams we should be obliged to consider similar representations from gentlemen from Nova Scotia, gentlemen from the North-west and other localities. We are asking for delay in the enforcement of this law that we may make inquiries and find out what rivers ought to be ex-empted from the operation of the law. The law, as it stands at present, prohibits the putting of saw-dust into any river frequented by fish, under serious penalties. In order to minimize the effect of the law. I propose, in the first place, to restore the exemptions that were made, and that have been practically dealt with. These ex-emptions have gone on for years, and I propose to ask the House to give power during the existence of this Act, to make such further exemptions as may be deemed wise in the public interest. I think that covers the whole ground.

The state of the s

Mr. GILLMOR. Will the hon. Minister name the rivers that he proposes to exempt?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I stated as clearly as possible that I could not now undertake to name them; and one reason why I submit this Bill with this two years clause, is to get information. I can name one river, the St. John River; and I can name another river, from my own knowledge of the position, namely, the St. Croix, because it is an international river. I suppose that will satisfy the hon. gentleman. Any one can see that the same reason that applies to the St. John as an international river, will apply to the St. Croix, or any other international river. But the House would not expect any person to be in a position at once to state what rivers throughout the Dominion should be exempt, and what should not.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the statement just made by the hon. gentleman is hardly borne out by the Bill. As I understand the Bill, during the next two years, he shall have power to exempt certain rivers from the operation of this Act; after two years he shall not have that power, and, therefore, there will be no more exemption after that period.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Unless there is other legislation in the meanwhile.

Mr. LAURIER. That is quite a different thing. That would be contemplated legislation, of which we know nothing, whereas we are now dealing with the measure before the House. If the Government have secrets, they had better lay them before the House at once. But, according to this Bill, it seems to me that for two years to come the Minister can grant exemption to certain parties from the operation of this Bill, that is to say, he can prevent saw-dust from being thrown into certain rivers, and allow it to be thrown into others; but, after two years, all rivers in Canada will be put on the same footing, and none will be allowed to throw saw-dust into them.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I did not say that at all.

Mr. LAURIER. The Bill says so.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; the Bill does not say so. The Bill says that it shall only have operation or effect for two years, and it could not possibly give power to the Governer in Council, or to anybody else, to exempt after the Bill had expired. The power to exempt cannot exist any longer than the Bill exists.

Mr. LAURIER. The section provides that it shall be an offence to throw saw-dust, refuse, or other deleterious matter into the river, and then it goes on to say:

Provided always, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may exempt from the operation of this subsection, wholly or partially, any stream or streams with respect to which he considers that its enforcement is not requisite in the public interest.

That is to say, the Governor in Council henceforth will have power to exempt certain rivers from the operation of this section. He may allow saw-dust to be thrown into certain rivers, but no such exemption shall have force or effect after 30th June, 1897. At present, this power of exemption is vested in the Governor in Council, who may exempt certain rivers from the operation of this law, but, after the two years are expired, neither the Minister or the Governor in Council will have power to make any such exemption.

Mr. DEVLIN. This is a very serious matter. The trouble which exists to-day, and which it is being sought to remove, will all begin over again in two years. I am speaking now as representing the lumber interests of Ottawa County, and we hope that the mills there will be exempted from the operation of this Bill during the next two years. We hope more than that. There is no man in this House who supposes that any lumberman who has large milis on the Ottawa, intends to change them at the expiration of two years. the capital invested, the structures erected, everything shows that it is almost impossible to do such a thing; consequently, there will be the same state of alarm at the expiration of two years as there has been for the past years. I think the fact pointed out by the leader of the Opposition is a serious one, and for that reason I hold that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), and which I had the honour of seconding, is a good one, namely, that the word saw-dust be struck out. What is the use of the word saw-dust there, any-Are you going to give exemption in one case and refuse it in another? do not ask any more rights for the lumbermen of the Ottawa Valley than I would see extended to the lumbermen of Nova Scotia, or any other portion of the Dominion. Their rights, no doubt, are just as good and as sacred as ours; and ours are just as good and as sacred as theirs. There should be no possibility of the Government showing favour in one instance and refusing it in another, or doing justice in one case and perhaps doing an injustice in another. I hold that the Bill is unfortunate in this sense, that this state of alarm will exist again for two years, and that after that lumbermen the period disturbed state. in a gentleman understand what the consequences will be? Perhaps the effect will be to destroy a large portion of the trade that might be done under other circumstances, if the lumbermen were not under the apprehension that two years hence they would be obliged to build burners. I say, then, with the hon member for Drummond and Arthabaska, that it would be a wise thing to remove the word saw-dust, at all events, from the section.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon, gentleman will find, on reflection, that the line of action he proposes is directed against the interests of the gentlemen for whom he professes to speak. He must recollect that the law, as it now exists, was passed without dissent in this House, and by a large majority in the other Under this law, the lumbermen House. are subject to very heavy penalties, indeed, and, in order that they shall not be taken suddenly, this measure, at any rate, gives them a respite of two years. I venture to say that while opinions differ in this House, a large majority of the people of Canada who are interested in the rivers. and in the fisheries, hold the very opposite views to those that were expressed to the effect that it is doubtful whether saw-dust has a deleterious effect upon fish. All the fishery authorities of this country, of England, and of the United States, agree that saw-dust is most deleterious to fish life. When this subject was threshed out in the House of Commons, when I was at the head of the Marine and Fisheries Department, the great preponderance of opinion in the House at that time, though we were not then considering a section of this kind, was against the dumping of saw-dust into rivers. Now, the lumbermen are approaching this question as reasonable men. They find out how the law stands, they have come to the Government and have asked for some relief, or, at any rate, an oppor-In my extunity to prepare themselves. perience many a lumberman who has sent in reams of papers to convince me that it was absolutely impossible to consume the saw-dust of his mill, nevertheless, finding that the law was to be enforced, has gone and fitted up his mill. Take, for instance, the case of the La Have River, to which the hon. member for St. John incidentally referred. The gentlemen on that river are very important lumbermen; they insisted in the press, and in long arguments addressed to the department, that they could not adapt their mills to consume the saw-dust Having been prosecuted, and having found a law in force with which they were compelled to comply, they provided apparatus for their mills. So it was on Rice Lake and on Otonabee River, where the mill-owners for some time disregarded the law, but in due will again be course they put in apparatus at their mills. Does the hon. and benefit followed in connection with the fisheries there. I say the prevailing senti-ment is in favour of very rigid legislation on this subject, and recognizing this fact, the Government have concluded to go this tar. and have asked for a probationary period of two years. They have not assumed a dictatorial position. That is as far as the Government have ventured to go on the information they now possess. What they will do afterwards will depend on what new light will be thrown on the question, and whether the views expressed by some hon, gentlemen opposite are found to be generally shared by it; but the information in the hands of the Government, as the Minister of Marine has shown, would justify this measure, so as to give the mill-owners ample notice. I would ask, is it in the interest of the lumbermen, knowing the strong view taken in the Senate, to attack a principle which has been on the statute-books so long? Let us rather put such a Bill through as we have reason to believe will pass both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS. I desire to say a word with respect to the apparatus for doing away with the mill refuse to which the hon. The con-Minister of Justice has referred. vary in different places. Some lumbermen no doubt will say that it is impossible to apply the necessary apparatus; but they will afterwards find that it is quite possible. That undoubtedly is true, and it is possible that such cases may occur on the Ottawa, and I am only referring to the Ottawa. I assure this House that in most cases the mills on the Ottawa would require to be reconstructed; I need not name the mills, but the most important mills here would require to be reconstructed. As to comparing the River Otonabee with the Ottawa, I fail to see any comparison between the two rivers. The former is a very small stream.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I made no comparison. I referred to the Otonabee as a case where the mill-owners thought they could not comply with the law, but finding the law was to be enforced, they did so.

Mr. EDWARDS. The Otonabee is a very small river, and it is quite possible that saw-dust might accumulate in it to such an extent as to be a very serious obstacle, while in the Ottawa it is impossible because of the capacity of the river.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There are a great many opinions in regard to the Ottawa as to whether navigation is affected or not by saw-dust.

Mr. EDWARDS. So far as that is concerned, there is no two opinions by unbiassed men.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have been on board of a steamer on the regular line which was stopped by the sawdust-it was the "Empress," which is running now.

Mr. DEVLIN. When was it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was when the water was very high.

Mr. EDWARDS. The Minister of Justice never was on a steamer that was stopped by the accumulation of saw-dust so as to impede navigation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was my information as to the cause.

Mr. EDWARDS. The captain of the "Empress" has made as much of this matter as possible; but he has come over to the side of the lumbermen and has changed his views very recently.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Nearly all the steamers about here are owned by the lumbermen of Ottawa.

Mr. EDWARDS. Never was the passage of a steamer on the Ottawa impeded by the accumulation of saw-dust; but with a low-pressure engine the condenser is sometimes affected.

Sir CILARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That does not matter much to the owner, if it causes the vessel to stop.

Mr. EDWARDS. There is only one such engine on the Ottawa River. I have been travelling on this river for many years, and I never knew a single case to occur. I think the case to which the hon. Minister has referred is the only case which has ever happened.

Mr. SCRIVER. I am entirely opposed to the amendment moved by the hon. member Arthabaska and Drummond (Mr. Lavergne), because I am not prepared to believe, after what has been said this afternoon, that saw-dust is not deleterious to risn life. For my own part, I believe it is. Yet there seems to be a disposition on the part of a good many of my fellow-memberssimply because nothing was said on the other side and we have had one distinguished medical authority giving his opinion that saw-dust is not deleterious to fish life-to accept that opinion. I believe it is deleterious, and therefore I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. GILLMOR. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) thinks saw-dust is injurious to fish life. I should like to know if he has had any practical experience. Are there not as many fish in the streams with which he is acquainted as ever there were?

Mr. SCRIVER. No.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have lived nearly as many years as the hon. gentleman and although I know a great many streams, I am not acquainted with any in which, after the mills have been erected there, there Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER, were not about as many fish as before. Most And a very good one that it did. He took of the mills in Canada are situated on streams where the fish possess no commercial value and are of little consequence. Even if they do suffer somewhat from the saw-dust, and I believe they do not, it is a trifling matter. I remember very well that Mr. Rogers, a gentleman with whom the late Minister of Marine is well acquainted, published a treatise on this subject, which I read, and in it he expressed the opinion, after many years' experience, that saw-dust prove the fact that it is injurious to the fish. What are the fish in our rivers, or at all events in the rivers with which I am acquainted? They consist of small trout, perch or chub, and their preservation is of little importance compared with the great lumber interest. The power given in this Bill is one of which the Minister I have no doubt would be glad to rid himself. I know there are people who are afraid that this Act may not be equitably administered, that some people may be oppressed in consequence of their political views. I am slow, however, to believe that such would be the case. The Minister of Marine is a practical man, who knows the mills and the fishing in the rivers generally. I have been acquainted for about sixty years with the river near where I live, and I know that the same fish which were caught then can be caught now, and in just about equal quantities. We never, however, caught any for commercial purposes, but simply for sport. As regards saw-dust filling up the channels of navigable rivers. I do not believe such a result would The saw-dust would be carried happen. away from the main channel, although it might accumulate in eddies or dead water. The saw-dust does not rise above the surface of the water and is almost constantly in motion, and if it accumulates in bays it is cleared out by the spring freshets. I do not know whether the Government are aware that there are in this Bill powers which may be abused. I am sure that the Minister would be glad to get rid of the responsibility which attaches to him, so that he will not be suspected of favouring one at the expense of another. It is very risky to put a statute on the book which confers this power of discrimination on any one person. I do not see how it can be avoided for the present, and I really think it is the best arrangement that can now be made. I do not see many hon. gentlemen state that this is injurious to the fish. My hon. friend will remember Mr. Rogers, a fishery inspector of very great experience. The hon. gentleman will not deny that Mr. Rogers is a man of intelligence, a painstaking man, a pretty conceited man, and he could write books very both sides.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which side was the strongest?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I went on his first opinion.

Mr. GILLMOR. He took some side that did not please you and he went out. Now, with regard to the state of Maine: Does the saw-dust not go into the Penobscot River and the St. Croix River, and after the Uniis not injurious to fish. I should like to ted States decided that saw-dust was injuri-know how hon, gentlemen are going to ous to fish-life, why did they not prevent it ous to fish-life, why did they not prevent it on those rivers?

> Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman knows the fisheries have gone there.

Mr. GILLMOR. Well, they have not stopped the saw-dust. They are taking salmen on the St. Croix River now. It is my impression that when the Government takes the trouble to inform itself, that they will make a general exemption of all rivers on which this great lumbering industry exists. If there should be a little loss to the fisheries, it is not at all to be compared with the loss there would be if our lumbering industry were interfered with.

Mr. FORBES. I am prepared to accept the amendment for several reasons. First, the lumbering industry is far and away more important than the river fishery interests. There is vastly more capital engaged in the lumbering business, and I am told that the ratio is, that $12 are invested in the lumber industry for the $1 invested in the river fisheries. From the time the men go into the woods until the lumber is put on board the vessel, three men are engaged in that business, during the greater portion of the year, for every one man engaged in the river fisheries during three or four months out of the twelve. Is it not the supreme duty of the Government to look after the best interests of the majority of the people? They have no right to single out one section or class to the advantage or disadvantage of Government should legislate in the best interests of the great majority, and upon that principle I argue in support of the amendment that the word "saw-dust" should be struck out. Now, as regards the effect of the saw-dust upon the river fisheries -and I discriminate between the river fisheries and in the inshore coast fisheries in this matter. When the saw-dust gets to the coast, it has no effect whatever upon the cod, mackerel or lobster fishery. Its only effect is upon the salmon and small fish in the rivers. On the two rivers with which I am thoroughly familiar and in which I have fished for many years, the salmon well, but Mr. Rogers gave a very convincing argument that the saw-dust did not injure the fish.

Have hished for many years, the salmon fishery is not in any way seriously affected by the deposit of saw-dust. On the Medway River, in Queen's County, N.S., the salmon pools are to-day worth 100 per cent more than they were ten years ago. The fish itself is also more valuable, and the fishermen, with the exception of those around the mouth of the river where they use nets and traps, are sportsmen, and they lease those pools because there are plenty of salmon in them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was the law in force on the Medway?

Mr. FORBES. No; it was one of the exempted rivers, and I say that the saw-dust does not affect the fisheries there.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is a very rapid current in that river, and it was represented that the saw-dust was carried out to the ocean.

Mr. FORBES. The hon, gentleman says that the Medway was exempted because of the rapid current.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is my recollection.

Mr. FORBES. That may be one reason, and a very good and true one. I can take him to some of the best fishing pools in Canada, where, sitting in a birch bark canoe with a rod in his hand, he can "rise" the silver salmon, and forget all about the anxieties of Government, and even of the salary attached to his office.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no saw-dust in that river.

Mr. FORRES. There is saw-dust in that river to a limited extent only.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then the representations were false.

Mr. FORBES. I cannot help about the representations. I say that there is no sawdust in that river to any deleterious extent. But there is a certain deposit upon that river, and we know from practical experience that it has not affected the fish-life in any degree whatever. The same argument will apply to the Mersey or Liverpool River.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not exempted.

Mr. FORBES. It is.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. FORBES. I will be charitable enough to say that the hon. Minister, has forgotten about it. It has been exempted for years, for there is no machinery in the mills to destroy the saw-aust, although there is for destroying the slabs. The saw-dust is lying upon the bed of that river, and upon the banks to a great extent, but I do not think any one will say that it seriously injures the fisheries there. I admit that navigation has been hurt at the bar of the Liverpool River by the saw-dust, but it is not to any extent, and it is only at that point and where vessels of light draught can easily go, and also vessels of greater draught if we had proper dredge appliances. Although I contend that navigation is paramount to the lumbering industry, yet, navigation has only been slightly impeded there, and not to any extent, whereas the lumbering industry is of very great importance. Salmon are in the Mersey River as plentiful to-day, if not more plentiful, than they were four or five years In this river, nets are set, and I Government sub-leases those think the portions of the river near Liverpool, and derives considerable revenue thereby. While it is an open and debatable question whether the letting of saw-dust down our rivers does or does not injure fish life, yet in this new country we ought to consider the great lumber interest as far above and beyond the fishing interest of our rivers in importance. We should say to the lumbermen: We will do nothing to hamper you in your business; we will do what is fair by you, and allow you to make all the money you can out of your business without handicapping you with vexatious To the fishermen, we should regulations. say: We do not want to injure you, but it has been reported to us that the putting of saw-dust into the rivers does not injure fish life or hurt you in your calling; that is a debatable question. I think we should leave matters as they are for a few years in order that substantial proof might be obtained whether fish life is or is not injured by saw-dust in the rivers. The larger refuse, like slabs and bark, might be immediately destroyed at the mills, or sold; but the saw-dust question, which is the only bone of contention, should be allowed to stand for future settlement. The Minister has the right under the constitution to regulate the fisheries, and in so doing to see that certain conditions shall be observed. British North America Act provides that the Parliament of Canada shall have control of the fisheries only for purposes of regulation. The Minister has not power to stop or hamper or hinder any trade or calling of any citizen of this country. He has a right to say to the mill-owner: If you are going to put your saw-dust into the river, we have the authority, under the power to regulate trade and commerce, to place an Act on the statute-book providing that you shall cut lumber under such conditions that the saw-dust shall be put in the rivers in a certain way; but he has not the right to do what will put a stop to the lumber industry of this country. If the hon. Minister is going to bring the lumber industry of this country into collision with the smaller fishing industries of the rivers, he will be taking a very serious step. think the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) is perfectly regular, and should be accepted.

Mr. EDWARDS. In addressing the House this afternoon I distinctly stated that I did not pretend to know the effect of saw-dust on fish life. I simply expressed my opinion that saw-dust was not injurious to the fish of the Ottawa River. So far as that river is concerned, the wood gathered by the inhabitants from the mills is far more valuable to them than all the fish in the I regret that this amendment has been proposed, because it introduces into the discussion a new phase, which may make it far more difficult to achieve what is desired under this Bill. The effect of the Bill, if it is passed as proposed by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, will be simply to restore the conditions which existed previous to the 1st of May, and to give two years more in which to arrange this matter in some way. The rivers will be exempted as before by the Governor in Council where it is found that that may be done without serious injury. What I apprehend is that if this amendment is insisted upon, the Bill may be killed altogether, and very serious consequences will Within two years the whole sawdust question may be disposed of. It may be that before the expiration of that time all the saw-dust now thrown into the Ottawa River, and other rivers, will be converted into fuel. All the refuse from converted into fuel. All the refuse from the milis may be turned to such account that it may be profitable to the lumbermen themselves to make the change. In the interest of the lumber trade throughout Canada, it is desirable that this Bill should pass, and the introduction of amendments of this kind, which only cause more dis-cussion and difficulty, may destroy the Bill altogether. In view of the action of the Senate last year, I do not think the Government should go further than they are going. All that the Bill means is that two years more will be given in which to make the change, or in which to have a general Act passed that will dispose of the whole question.

Mr. OUIMET. Before the question is put, I would like to mention to the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), who has intimated his intention of voting for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Arthabaska, that if he had paid any attention to what has taken place in his own county in the Gatineau River, he would see that the dumping of saw-dust into that river has formed a shoal of very considerable magnitude near the present Gatineau bridge. The current has been completely changed, which has caused landslides in the spring. It has entailed a pretty large expenditure to stop these, and they cannot well be stopped unless that shoal is dredged, and the dredging would be certainly very expensive.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does the existence of that bar interfere with navigation?

Mr. EDWARDS.

Mr. OUIMET. It interferes in this way: that it has changed the channel, and now the boats have to go up the river by passing very near the shore. The result from the washing of the shore has been a landslide of considerable magnitude. I think that the present road, leading from Gatineau Village to the bridge, has been all washed into the river. At one time the inhabitants of Gatineau Village were very much afraid that the river would take its course through the village.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. Minister of Public Works has said that if I had studied the interests of Gatineau Valley perhaps I would not have spoken as I did.

Mr. OUIMET. I put it in a much milder way. I only said that this fact had escaped your notice.

Mr. DEVLIN. What did not escape my notice then was the general interest of my county and the country. That did not escape my notice when I spoke a few moments ago. I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I wish to say that I do not think that because a little bit of a bar may exist at the mouth of the Gatineau, mills on the Ottawa and the Gatineau, and perhaps one hundred other rivers, should be threatened with the serious calamity of being at any moment obliged to close down their operations. When I spoke a moment ago on this subject, I think I spoke in sympathy with the feeling expressed by landowners living along the Gatineau and the Ottawa rivers on both sides. I am of opinion, notwith-standing the opinion of the Minister of Public Works, that the navigation of the Gatineau River is not seriously interfered with by reason of that little bar. He said that the channel has slightly changed, but he knows perfectly well that there is an immense volume of water in the Gatineau which must find an outlet, and which has an outlet by the channel of which he speaks. Has there been any dredge at that bar? Have there been any demands on the Department of Public Works for dredging by boat-owners complaining that the naviga-tion has been interfered with? I do not think so. I do not think either that the fisheries of the Gatineau have been seriously injured by reason of the deposits of saw-dust in that river. When I spoke a moment ago of the bar, I spoke of the Gatineau, the Lievre, and other tributaries. This is a serious question, one in which not only the mill-owners are interested, but those who in summer and winter have to earn a living for struggle families. Those are interested this question, and I do not think that the throwing of a little saw-dust into the Gatineau or Ottawa or any other river, should be considered so great a calamity to the country generally that we should pass a law which will close up the mills that give bread to our working population.

Mr. LAVERGNE. In answer to the hon. Minister, I may say that the amendment which I propose does not affect in any way navigable rivers. It has simply to do with the Fisheries Act. The fact that a man has been prosecuted for throwing saw-dust into a river where there are fish has nothing to do with prosecuting him for throwing into a navigable river. They are both different acts. It is no objection to the amendment to say that a bar exists in the Gatineau River which may be an obstacle to navigation, because that has nothing to do with the question of the fisheries. A man may be prosecuted under the Fisheries Act who could not be prosecuted under the Act applying to navigable waters. Under the Fisheries Act, a man may be prosecuted on the ground that there are fish in the river, and the Act is so general that it may cover every little stream. That is why I proposed this amendment, so that an exemption should be made at least in the case of such small streams.

On section 2,

Any exemptions granted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries under subsection two of section fifteen of The Fisheries Act, and in force on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, shall remain in force until the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, unless sooner revoked by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and all penalties incurred, or to which any person has become liable, under the section substituted by the said section six of chapter fifty-one of the Statutes of 1894, with respect to any stream or streams which were exempt from the operation of subsection two of section fifteen of The Fisheries Act upon the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, are hereby remitted.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the section be amended by substituting the words "Governor General in Council" for the words "Minister of Marine" wherever the latter occur.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN. Is the La Have River, N.S., one of those proposed to be exempted?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not.

Mr. BORDEN. Then the observations made by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) were not very appropriate. I understood the hon. gentleman to congratulate the Government upon being about to pass legislation which would extend to the River La Have, and he felt particularly desirous that the exemption should extend to that river. Subsequently my attention was attracted by a remark which fell from the Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), to the effect that very large milling concerns doing business on the La Have had complied with the Act and constructed the necessary apparatus for burning saw-dust, and had really become penitent and asked from the department absolution for their sins. It occurred to me, if the statement made by the hon, member for Lunenburg be true, that it was an extraordinary procedure for the Government to compel these men to comply with the Act, and then, after they had done so at an enormous expense, throw the river open and allow other people, who had perhaps not gone to this expense, the privilege of throwing saw-dust into it.

Mr. KAULBACH. I do not think the House misunderstood me, though perhaps my hon. friend from King's did. I approve of the principle of the Bill, and have stated that I approve of it for this reason—that it gave an opportunity to the Government for two years to inquire which rivers should be exempted, and I said that I hoped that, in the meantime, an officer would be sent from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to examine the La Have River and report upon it with a view to having that river exempted with others.

Mr. BORDEN. But all this is after some gentlemen who happen to be politically opposed to the hon. gentleman have been put to the tremendous expense of putting up the necessary machinery to burn the saw-dust. I think it is a pity that the hon. gentleman who is now so anxious that justice should be done to the particular people doing business on the La Have River, that he did not start a little earlier.

Mr. KAULBACH. My hon. friend from King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden) has apparently taken a deep interest in the firm of Messrs. Davidson & Sons, of my county; but I do not think the interest on their behalf that he has exhibited is any greater than my own. I consider that that firm, as I have stated before, has been hardly dealt with. would go further than that, and say that I feel that in view of the treatment extended by the Government to Messrs. Davidson & Sons. the Government, in their wisdom, might consider whether the suits that have recently been brought against them were of such a character as to warrant the imposition of a penalty, and under the circumstances it would not be advisable to drop the penalty and pay the costs of suits.

Mr. BORDEN. Then the hon. gentleman, as I understand, will urge not only that the Government will forgive them all the fines that have been imposed, but place this river under this Act, and also recoup the Davidsons for all the money they have lost during the years they were prevented from doing business, and also all the money they have expended in constructing this expensive apparatus for destroying the saw-dust.

Mr. FRASER. Is it not possible that injury may be done in making the exemptions in force from 30th April, 1895, not giving an opportunity for any other exemptions the Minister may see fit to make after that date? Under this it would appear that the Minister up to 30th April, 1895, had knowledge of all the rivers that should be exempt, and that no information coming after this would be considered. It seems to me that any river which the Minister considers should be exempt should be brought under the operation of the Act, as well as those decided upon up to 30th April last.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) has given expression to a hope as to what the Government shall see fit to do in relation to the case he mentioned. Well, it is easy to express a hope; but will he get the assurance of the Minister alongside of whom he sits, or can he get any of the Ministers to state that they are in accord with him in the opinion he expresses.

Mr. KAULBACH. I have no doubt that the Government will do what is just in the matter.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

DELAY IN TAKING THE CHAIR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is not dealing at all fairly with the House to open the evening sitting at twenty-five minutes to nine. It puts everybody to great inconvenience when the Chair is taken on one occasion at eight o'clock sharp, on another at half-past eight, and on another at twenty-five minutes to nine. It seems to me that the Chair ought to be taken at a fixed time every night, and if it was understood that eight was the hour, the rule ought to be consistently observed.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon, friend is quite right. The understanding is that the Chair shall be taken at eight o'clock. I think there are very few evenings this session when it has not been taken very promptly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I beg to observe that on the very last Government day, Tuesday. it was fully half-past eight before we met here and opened the proceedings. There must have been special occasion on that night for the Minister of Justice, and I do not want to dwell too much upon it, but as a matter of fact—

Mr. FOSTER. There have only been two nights when there has been any considerable delay.

Mr. Borden.

SUPPLY—CURRAN BRIDGE—BRIGADE CAMP, NO. 1 DISTRICT.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LAURIER. Yesterday I gave the leader of the House notice that I would bring up the Curran Bridge matter on proposal to go into Supply. But the day is so far advanced now that it seems almost impossible—in fact it is quite impossible—to take up such an important matter to-day. I will take another occasion to refer to this subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to take the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House a matter of considerable interest to the section of the country in which I live and which I represent. I refer to the change which has been made in regard to the date of holding the brigade camp in No. 1 district. The House knows that until within a few weeks ago it was expected that the rural battalions would not be drilled at all: the members of these corps had every reason to believe that no camp would be Then, at short notice, it was announced that on the 18th of this month brigade camp would be held in No. 1 district. I believe, Sir, that the officers and men of the battalions who were ordered to camp responded and were willing to do the best they could, under circumstances of great inconvenience, to attend camp when it was desired. But I cannot understand why this change has been made at the present time. I am inclined to think Mr. Speaker, that it was inconvenience enough for the officers and men interested that the Government should not have announced their policy with regard to these camps in the usual way at an earlier date. But what is more serious than even the and undecided action of the indefinite Government, to my mind, is the change of date which was, after a great deal of consideration, decided to be the most convenient date for the volunteers to drill, if a drill was to be held at this time of the year. This is a matter that has received consideration by the department and by the officers of the various battalions, as well as by this House, for a great many years. As you know, Sir, the camps are not held in all sections of the country on the same date, for several reasons. It was found that one date would suit one section of the country, and another date would be more convenient for another section. Now, I may say with regard to the section of the country where I live, and in the interests of the battalion to which I belong, that this change will cause a great deal of inconvenience and dissatisfaction. Being a rural battalion, many of the members are farmers, and if they had been called out as intended on the 18th of this month, it would have been comparatively a time of leisure as compared with the 25th of this month, and the time during which the camp will continue. Now, the House will recognize that that is a very important matter for the officers and men of rural battalions. In addition to that, they have received a very short notice. A great majority of the young men belonging to these volunteer corps have to make arrangements with their employers for a couple of weeks absence at camp, and having made those arrangements it would be very in-convenient perhaps for many of them now to make new arrangements to get away. The same remark will apply to the officers. They are business men, professional men, or farmers, and are connected with the battalion as officers, and having made their arrangements on such short notice, and now having to make this change, they will suffer a great deal of inconvenience. Therefore, I think that in addition to the inconvenience and want of action on the part of the Government for the past year that we have to complain of in connection with the drill, it is very unfortunate this move should have occurred at the present time. I wish to say also that, as every representative here from that section of the country well knows, the camp will extend over the 1st of July, which is a national holiday. Now, in almost every town and village in that section of the country, arrangements have been made by committees of citizens, or by the municipal authorities, to have public demonstrations. In these, every man will want to take part, the young men belonging to these battalions, the officers, and especially the bands, have to be depended on to take part in those celebrations. For this reason, also, I take this opportunity of expressing my protest against the proceeding, and I would like to know what explanation can be given to the volunteers, to the officers, and to the people in those sections, for the change that has been made. I am not inclined to scold or find fault, particularly, with regard to this matter. I will say this for the Minister himself, that having just taken the position, probably he has listened to some solicitations that have caused him to come to this decision-I can hardly imagine how, because, as every hon, gentleman knows, this has been a matter of discussion for years. It has been settled as to what date would be most convenient to the officers and men in the different sections of the country, and I could not allow this opportunity to pass without making this protest, on behalf of the volunteers concerned, against the change that has been made.

Mr. DICKEY. In reply to the hon. gentleman I have to say that the date for the camp at London was fixed by the "Gazette" for the 18th of this present month, as a matter Everybody understood that would be the date, but afterwards I learned from a great many sources in the city of London that the almost universal desire in postponed until the 25th, as a more convenient date. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I am extremely sorry that I was not in possession of his views before I came to any decision, because I can assure him that if I had known that any serious interests would have been affected, I should not have dreamed of interfering with the regular routine. I did it, however, with the desire of meeting, what I supposed, was the general convenience of the people of the locality, and of those who were chiefly, interested. I hoped that the hon. gentleman would have been so grateful to the Government and to myself for deciding to drill the volunteers this year, that he would not have said very much about these matters of drill. But I must say to him, and to the House. that I am extremely sorry, personally, that the change I made has not been satisfactory to him, and to the others whom he represents, and who, I have no doubt, are interested in the matter. However, this matter. as all other discussions connected with it in the House, will be of service to me in forming my militia character.

CAMPBELL. Can the date Mr. be changed?

Mr. DICKEY. It has been changed once, and it is impossible to change it back. cannot possibly be held now on any other date than the 25th, no matter who may be inconvenienced:

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like to corroborate what the Minister of Militia has said in regard to the camp at London. I have been written to on this subject, not by people in London, but by some of the officers in that district, asking for this change. for the very reasons mentioned by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). At first they thought there was not going to be any camp at all, and the volunteers in general were very much disappointed. Then when they were notified that they were to go into camp, they found the notice given them was too short. The hon, member for North Oxford knows, as well as myself, that it is very difficult for the officers of rural battalions to get their companies together on short notice, and many of the officers, as well as the men in that district, were not prepared for going into camp. If the Government had given them a little longer notice, they would have been able to bring out better companies and make a better battalion. On the whole, I quite agree with the remarks that have been made by the hon. the Minister of Militia.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am very sorry that the Minister of Militia has made the change. I think the first date fixed, the 18th, would have been much more convenient for the people of western Ontario. As the hon. member for North Oxford says, a great many of the young men who attend these drills, that section was that the camp should be are farmers' sons and business men, and it is very inconvenient for them to absent themselves from home at the date which has been fixed. Besides, the demonstrations that will take place on the 1st July in all the little towns, will be seriously interfered with by the absence of the volunteer companies. I would like to know what representations were made to the Minister that induced him to make the change. Did any of the commanding officers ask for the change to a later date?

Mr. DICKEY. I could not give the hon. gentleman the names here; I would be glad to give him the names at the department. There were representations from officers, certainly, but I do not remember the names.

Mr. TISDALE. I would like to ask for information, as I understand that the battalion the hon. gentleman from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) belongs to, does not drill this year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You are quite mistaken, it does drill. I may also say that other battalions outside the county of Oxford, have made even stronger complaints than our own battalion, but as we are a good and loyal set of volunteers, we accept the decision of the department, even though it is a wrong one.

Mr. TISDALE. I may say that one Lieutenant-Colonel wrote to me asking if I could possibly get the time fixed to a later date.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not in September?

Mr. TISDALE. No; but either the 25th June, or the first part of July would have given them more time.

Motion agreed to; and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Further amount required to meet expenditure in connection with the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic. (Authority is hereby given to transfer to "Legislation" the amount, $20,000, voted for printing, &c., in "Miscellaneous" in the Supply Bill for 1894-95, and to make it available up to 31st December, 1895)...

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We now want the particulars of these expenditures, so far as regards the several gentlemen who were on the commission.

Mr. FOSTER. Sir Joseph Hickson, as chairman, received $2,222.81; Mr. Clarke, $2,468.67; Mr. Gigault, $2,374.11; Rev. Dr. McLeod. $6,918.76; Judge McDonald, $3,918.25; Mr. Monaghan, secretary, $10,068.66.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have already expressed my opinion that I doubt if any money was ever more recklessly expended since Parliament has come together here. This whole business looks to me like a job from beginning to end. Ninety thousand dollars of the money of the people of Canada have been expended for no conceivable purpose, except for the object of enabling the Government to shirk an unpleasant decision, and an unpleasant vote. But, wholly apart from that, I should like to know on what possible ground one member of the commission, Rev. Dr. McLeod, should have received more than double the amount paid to the chairman, and very nearly double the amount paid to any other member? I understand this gentleman is down for $6,900, as against $2,200 to the president, $2,400 to Mr. Clarke, $2.300 to another member of the commission and $3.900 to another. Surely there ought to be some reasonable proportion between the sums paid to each individual member. What possible ground could there be for one commissioner obtaining twice as much as any other?

Mr. FOSTER. The real ground was that the gentleman did twice as much work as the others. The Order in Council fixes the rate of payment at $10 a day, when they are at work on the commission, and gives them a stated allowance for living expenses. It is upon that basis the commission did its work, and on that basis the chairman and the secretary of the commission checked off the amounts to the different commissioners. Rev. Dr. McLeod received more than others for that reason, and for that reason alone.

Mr. FLINT. It is very much to be regretted that this commission has cost the Government so much money.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FLINT. I am quite confident that had the House entertained the least idea when the motion was passed that when the bills came to be paid they would amount to such a large sum, it would not have accepted the resolution. Notwithstanding the desire of members on both sides of the House to obtain all information possible on this subject, I think they would have hesitated to trust either the Government or any commission with the power given them if the House had had any idea that the country would be charged such an immense sum. I have not changed the view I held at the time of the discussion after which that resolution was accepted. Notwithstanding the length of time that has elapsed, and the experience we have had, the results given to the country by this commission have intensified the belief I then expressed that it was worse than useless, and a waste of time and money to undertake to gather information in that way. We have six volumes of 1,400 or 1,500 pages each, containing the evidence secured by those gentlemen over the English-speaking parts of North America. I do not ing the population of Canada, 100 persons will ever read that evidence through. would certainly pity and sympathize with any one who undertook to read it through with the idea of obtaining any very great amount of light on the matter investigated. Probably one reason why such large sums may have been allowed to those commissioners was that it may have been believed to be their duty to study the evidence they had taken, to marshal the facts in some shape out of those voluminous reports, and endeavour to give the country some idea of what was said by the witnesses whom they summoned or who volunteered to go before While speaking on this subject, I desire to say that it is much to be regretted that at this late date of the session of 1895 the House is not in possession of the report of the commission. That report is a very voluminous document, I understand, and will, when published, form a volume as large, if not larger, than any of the volumes of evidence already placed in the hands of members. That report might fairly demand some study at the hands of those who are interested in the economic question which arises, and the other questions which arise in connection with the subject of the liquor traffic. But in the very nature of things it will not be in the hands of those interested in the studying of those questions for some time, probably not until after the prorogation of Parliament. So this House will not be in possession of the results of this expensive experiment, and will not be able to take advantage of what has cost the country so much money, until another session. session will, in all human probability, follow a general election, and the electors of the country, a large number of whom are intensely interested in the question which arises and which has been considered by this commission, will not be in a position to form any opinion on the subis which there discussed. The whole management of this question the Administration has shown a very great misapprehension of the position, and a very great neglect of all the ordinary precautions which ought to have been taken, if they sincerely desired to place the House and the country in possession of facts in regard to the extent of the liquor traffic and its results on the varied interests of the Dominion. I call the attention of the Government to the very strange circumstance, that in no portion of the country have those who are committed to the prohibition movement expressed approval of this commission or of the labours which they have undertaken. It is a curious circumstance that neither Conservative nor Liberal prohibitionists have ever given it any support what-ever. This shows that there has been serious regard for this commission on the part of those who are earnestly anxious for the promotion of temperance. In a few days we may have to discuss in this House the question of prohibition, and, unfortunately, we will come to a discussion of that question in the absence of the report which gives the result of the information which has been so laboriously gathered by the commission. I think, Sir, that the Government should have taken the House and the country more fully into its confidence before outlining the course the commissioners should which before fixing their remuneration at this very extravagant rate. After the passage of the resolution providing for the commission, I found in conversation with many who took a deep interest in the question, that it was thought that perhaps after all a flood of information upon economic points might be given to the House, and that the information would be valuable when we came to discuss the various questions which would arise as to the effect of the liquor traffic. That commission might have held its sessions in the capital city of Ottawa. It might have gathered a large quantity of valuable information, statistical and otherwise, from works in the library, and it might have secured in a short time all the information necessary to enable the House to discuss the question with the greatest intelligence. As it is, I very greatly fear that the question is to be clouded rather than illuminated by its labours.

The manner in which the commission proceeded aroused a certain amount of ridicule from men who had given their lives to the study of problems connected with the promotion of the temperance interests of the people. They proceeded from town to town, and from village to village, holding an elaborate court, and calling before them all and sundry who desired to Reporters of great express their views. ability were at hand to record whatever any person chose to say, and we have in the volumes of evidence the diverse opinions of hundreds of men whose opinions are not valuable in any other way than as an expression of private opinion. The report of the commission we are not able to discuss yet. The most enterprising journal in the country could not afford more than a column or two of its space to an analysis of the contents of the report. A cursory glance at the published reports in the newspapers shows that it was impossible to give us any clear idea of the real findings of the commission, or of the evidence on which they base their I learn, however, that the mafindings.

jority of the commission reported against the idea of a prohibitory liquor law, and that the minority, the Rev. Dr. McLeod. reported strongly in favour of legislation of that kind. So far as the House is concerned, the evidence is valueless at the pre sent time, because we are not yet in a position to know the findings of the commission. I believe that it will be found, upon inquiry, that this money has been practi-One-tenth of the sum would cally wasted. have placed the House and the country in possession of all the facts upon which a clear judgment could have been based in legislating upon this question. It places the members of the commission in an unfortunate attitude, because striving, as we have a right to assume they did strive, to discharge their duty, intentionally or unintentionally, they have been enabled to make heavy drafts upon the treasury; drafts much heavier, I think, than the country is willing to justify in view of the meagre results attained.

It is to be regretted that more stringent rules were not laid down by the Government in regard to the procedure of the commission. In the first place, the commission was too large. It was unwieldy. There were seven members, when three would just as thoroughly have secured all the evidence necessary. In many instances members of the commission found that their private business interfered with their travelling abroad to listen to the evidence, and then, of course, it was left to the other members. In the cases where evidence was taken in the United States, and up and down throughout the Dominion, one commissioner, with a stenographer, could just as well, and perhaps better, have done the work than three or four, or more, commissioners, travelling at a great expense to the people of Canada. The whole plan of the commission was erroneous. The idea was clearly based upon the desire of the majority of the House to avoid coming to a conclusion any earlier than it was forced upon them, and their intentions have resulted, as we predicted they would result, in a delay, which will prevent the consideration of the evidence and the report until after the general electtions, and which will relegate the whole matter to a new Parliament elected without any special reference to the temperance question. This question, instead of being cleared up, has been clouded by too much evidenceby evidence upon points which were not really assigned to the commission. I have communications from many people who have glanced hastily over the report—the report, at any rate, as given to the press—and I am informed that the commission have gone very much beyond the instructions of the resolution passed by this House. The Government itself—and this will come up later when I have the documents before me-gave the commission a larger scope of inquiry than the resolution of the House did, and enabled these gentlemen, at a great expenditure of time and a great waste of money, to pile up a mass of evidence and a lengthy report which the country will not have an opportunity of seeing until long after the time they should have seen and studied it. and in such a form that hundreds and thousands, who are deeply interested in the question, will feel anxious to avoid rather than to study it. I very much regret this in the interest of true reform. I think it has a tendency to make those who are interested in pressing this question before the electorate, feel that the sympathies of the majerity of this House are not with them. and that the means which might have been used to place information clearly within their reach have been used to becloud the issue and to delay the time at which the decision should have been reached. I would like to ask the Minister if the sums he has mentioned include the cost of printing and distributing the evidence and the report?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I gave those figures the other night, including the cost of printing the evidence and the report.

Mr. FLINT. Will the Minister give the full amount, then, that the commission will have cost, including both the salaries of the commissioners and the printing?

Mr. FOSTER. I gave that the other night. It is in "Hansard," if my hon. friend will look at it. Then hon. gentlemen opposite were dissatisfied, because they had not the information with reference to the individual members of the commission. To-night I brought that information, so that the two together make the total information in my possession.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The item of $8,000, which the committee now have before them, is, I understand, a balance of $90,000 which it has cost this country to obtain the opinion of the five gentlemen who were appointed as royal commissioners on the subject of prohibition?

Mr. FOSTER. No; the hon. gentleman is quite wrong.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman the other night stated it to be the sum that it had cost.

Mr. FOSTER. I stated that as the sum to get the opinion, the printing of the report and the printing of the evidence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then we will add the printing of the report. Now, I venture to say that there is not a man in the House of Commons whose opinion on the subject of prohibition will be changed or modified one iota by the fact that these commissioners have reported one way or the other. My hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has clearly expressed the fact in saying that both prohibitionists and anti-prohibitionists looked on the whole thing as a huge farce. The Government were unable themselves to form any opinion; on this subject as on many others they were unable to lead the House; and they tried to get a buffer between themselves and public opinion in the form of a royal commission. I venture to say that that commission have acted in a way that did not command the approval of either the prohibitionists or the anti-prohibitionists. The House of Commons expressed itself years ago as quite willing to legislate upon this question of prohibition, and when public opinion had formed itself in favour of the proposition. That resolution is upon the journals of this House, not once, but two or three times. The hon. leader of the House was at one time in favour of legislating upon the question irrespective of whether public opinion was against it or in favour of it; but that, he explained afterwards-and he is entitled to the benefit of the explanation-was in a weak moment. What this House has the right to know is not the opinion of five gentlemen selected as a royal commission on the question, but the opinion of the electors of Canada. The Opposition expressed the view long ago that the public opinion of this country should govern, and that when that opinion is clearly expressed, the House of Commons should be bound by it. We have time and again expressed our opinion that the question should be submitted to a plebiscite of the people. The hon, gentleman was not willing to have that done and he hit upon the scheme of a royal commission.

entral control of the control of the

Mr. FOSTER. That policy is very definite—to obey the people when they give the order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The policy was not that we should take the opinion of five or six gentlemen, but the opinion of the electorate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is your opinion?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will give my opinion when called upon at the proper time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You are a little nervous now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not at all. My opinion is, as it always has been, that when public opinion is clearly expressed in favour of prohibition, this House ought to grant it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did you vote for it?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did vote for that proposition, and I am prepared to vote for it again. The Government had not the pluck to submit the question to a plebiscite. Instead of doing that, they hit upon the scheme of a royal commission. The commission went to Halifax, and called fifteen or twenty gentlemen to give their opinion on the subject; they solemnly recorded whether they were against or in favour of prohibition, and then solemnly printed it in a blue-book, of five or six tomes.

Mr. FOSTER. What is that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Tomes—volumes—perhaps tombs—which nobody will ever read.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You have not read them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly not; I do not want the opinion of these gentlemen at I want the opinion of the electorate. and I venture to say that this is a subject on which the electorate are quite capable of forming an opinion themselves; and the fact that Mr. A or Mr. B record themselves in favour of prohibition will not alter the epinion of Mr. C or Mr. D. If a commission had been appointed to go abroad and ascertain facts which were not within the grasp of the electorate of Canada, there might have been something to say for it. If the hon, gentleman had appointed one or two men to go to the state of Maine or some other place where prohibition had been tried, and to report its effect in those places, there might have been something to say for it. But that was a very small part of the duty relegated to this commission. commission did not go at all to the state of Maine; one or two, I believe, went; but the time they spent and the expenditures incurred was chiefly in travelling around Canada and going through the farce of taking the opinions of fifteen or twenty persons in each small town. Everybody laughed at it. The prohibitionists laughed at it; the anti-prohibitionists laughed at it. It was a scheme of the hon, gentleman who in a weak moment pledged himself to support a prohibitory law, in order to enable him to crawl out of an unpleasant position. at an expense of $90,000; although he must have been aware, before the commission started, that not one man's opinion in this House or outside of it would be influenced by the commission one iota. If the hon, gentleman had spent $90,000 in having a plebiscite taken, the House would be in a position to legislate; and the House has pledged itself, time and again, to legis-late when the opinion of the people is clearly The only possible way ascertained. which that opinion can be ascertained is by a plebiscite, and that is the one thing which the former leader of the prohibitionists declines to grant. He is willing to spend $90,000 on a royal commission, but he is not willing to spend that sum or half that amount to ascertain in an effective way what the people really want. If it were morally fair to move to reduce this vote, I would do so; but that would be unfair, because the work is being done, and we have to grin and pay for it. But we can, at least, enter our solemn protest against this reckless expenditure of money for no good purpose.

the House intend to have a digest of this evidence made :

Mr. FOSTER. Each hon. gentleman is supposed to have his own digestive faculties.

Mr. FRASER. I do not think there is enough digestive force in the House to do that, and I would recommend to the leader of the House that we should have such a digest made.

TUPPER. CHARLES HIBBERT Sir That would cost too much.

Mr. FRASER. There are occasions in which so much has been spent that the only way to get the benefit of the expenditure is by making fresh expenditure. ought to be a digest of the There those volumes. There ought to be one volume giving the names of the witnesses, and briefly stating what each one said, in order that you might nicely balance the weight of evidence, and for that purpose there should be another commission appointed, for which I That commission would willingly vote. would take the opinions of those in favour of prohibition, and those against, and weigh them, as a mechanical act, in the balance. You would arrive more correctly at a con-clusion that way, than by reading the evidence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That will be better than to do as the hon. member for Queen's did. come to a conclusion without reading it.

Has the hon. gentleman Mr. FRASER. read it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly not.

Mr. FRASER. When the hon. gentleman has come to a conclusion without reading the evidence, he has come to the conclusion now that this is a good expenditure, or he would vote against the item.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. FRASER. I understand that the commission sat as judges to hear the evidence.

Mr. FOSTER. They sat all sorts of ways.

Mr. FRASER. I believe the Minister of Finance is correct, and that his statement explains the item of sundries. But I understand that the commissioners were al-ways together in order to hear evidence, and if that be the case, I do not see how Dr. McLeod could have been twice as long engaged in the work as the others.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not surely attribute the size of his bill to the sundries.

Mr. FRASER. I would not like to say that, but I cannot understand why he has been twice as long at the work as the others.

Mr. Davies (P.E.I.)

Mr. FRASER. Does the hon, leader of He must have been doing it alone at times. and there must have been information he got which the others did not. I suppose that will account for the fact that he came to the only correct conclusion, namely, that we should have prohibition. If the others had been employed the same length of time they would have probably come to the same conclusion, but as they were only employed half the time they could only go half-way. think we have now full proof of the farcical and ridiculous character of the scheme of appointing a royal commission to find out whether we should have prohibtion or not. It is just on a par with that other commission which was appointed to find out whether we should have a revision of the tariff or not. There is only one way of finding out whether we should have prohibition, and that is by asking the people to vote. There was a good deal of artfulness in this attempt, by means of a royal commission. to lead both temperance and anti-temperance people to think that the Government were really honestly seeking for information, and the utter hollowness of the whole proceeding is now apparent to our cost. The only way to arrive at a true understanding of the public opinion is to put the question to the vote, and let the people have an opportunity of deciding whether they desire prohibition or not. The whole information obtained by this commission is absolutely worthless. call in people to give their opinion and then pass a report on their evidence is something so ridiculous that the very mention of it creates laughter, because just in proportion to the number of people interrogated, and the answers they give must be the report of the commission. But when we have to pay for all this work, it is no laughing matter. What I should like to know is this: Does the Government propose to act upon the report of the committee? The only purpose of the commission was to obtain reliable information and thus enable the Government to come to some decision. Is the Government prepared to accept the majority's report? The report is not before the House, but it has been submitted to the Government, and they must know what it is, and we ought to know whether the Government propose to be guided by the report of the majority, or that of the minority. The Government should take a decision one way or the other, or they will have to appoint another committee. I am sure the members of the House know their own minds upon this question, and would know how to vote if a vote were taken. For myself, I have no difficulty about the question. Now. $80.-000 is not a small sum.

> Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was $90.000.

> Mr. FRASER. We are so accustomed to dealing with millions in these days that a difference of $10,000 does not count.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Except when a small sum is required for the proper working of the Auditor General's office.

Mr. FRASER. A whole afternoon was spent the other day in discussing a very proper subject; and the Government with unflinching integrity and determination to save the people's money, insisted in cutting off a few hundred dollars from the expenses of the Auditor General's office. And $90,000 was thrown away upon a royal commission, which is perfectly worthless. The other day for example, a large deputation waited upon the Government to ask for aid toward a bridge to be thrown across the river here at Ottawa. But nothing could be given, for the Government had no money. Now $90. 000 was half what the deputation wanted to help in building that bridge; and we have spent that amount for a six-volume royal commission report. If all the books were brought together they would almost make a pier for that bridge, and I do not know that they could be put to a much better use. They are a combination of liquor evidence and temperance evidence, a mixture that ought to stand the fresh water here. And the saw-dust of which we heard this afternoon would gather about, making an admirable pier. In the province of Nova Scotia or in any of the provinces this $90.-000 might be put to great use. For example, in the county of Pictou where I live, $10,000 could be very well spent; and in the county I represent and in many other counties a sum of $10,000 or $5,000; yes, even $3,000 would be very acceptable. I believe the Government themselves are ashamed of this whole affair. They did not see, when they began, what the effect was to be. Now, one word more and I will end.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The end will come.

Mr. FOSTER. This must be the big end.

Mr. FRASER. There cannot be a smaller end than the Government are coming out at in relation to this commission. I commend to the House and the country the fact that this evidence has not been read by a single member of the Government; even the report has not been read by a single member of the Government. I commend to the country the fact that the Government will not say whether they will accept the report of the majority or the minoriy, and they have no opinion upon this question. Theirs is the position of Mr. Facing-both-ways. They will say to the liquor party: The majority report is in favour of you; and they will say to the temperance party: The minority report is in favour of you, and we paid your man twice as much as the others—that ought to satisfy you. The only way is to leave this question to the people. Tell the people: This is a question that affects you; and when you say that you want prohibition, you shall have it. We are not going to We are not going to except the opinion of this man or that man, but we are going to act according to the declared wishes of the people. I am glad to know—no, I should not say I am glad to know—but I am surprised to know—that the Government have no opinion on this question, and they disregard alike the opinion of the majority and the opinion of the minority of this commission.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Last session we were told by the late Premier that this commission had cost up to that time about $100,000, and that it would cost $20,000 more to complete the labours of the commission. Now we are told by the leader of the House that it has cost $90,000 altogether. I have it here in "Hansard:"

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Up to the present time the Royal Commission has cost about $100,-000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Including this amount of $18,000 for printing and translating?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes: but that sum does not include everything. There will be a vote in the further Supplementary Estimates to cover the balance.

Surely a portion of this expenditure must have been transferred to some other account. If not, how does this difference arise? We have had a great many commissions—one on the labour question, the Civil Service, Curran bridge, on the Lake St. John railway, and others. And then we had that notable commission composed of the privy councillors, forming the Star Chamber. How much have these commissions cost? When are we going to get done with having commissions-when are we going to have responsible government in this country? We thought that the question of responsible government had been fought out long ago. but now we have a government with backbone so weak that they are afraid to assume the responsibility of directing public affairs. It is time this humbug should cease and that we should be governed by a responsible Government?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Are you referring to the Ontario Government.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No. but to a Government that are not fit to wipe their shoes politically. I am referring to the Government, if they may be called by who administer name. for that being. and for the time time only, the affairs of this Dominion. I trust the day is near when we shall have gentlemen in power in this country who are not afraid to declare themselves on these questions; who will govern, instead of farming out their duties to commissions. Government by commission! In a British country! And the end of this commission has been the issuing of six volumes of evidence and more reports to come. Tons and tons of printed paper that nobody ever reads and nobody is expected ever to read. Even the Minister of Justice says he has not read it, and he is supposed to read everything.

The control of the co

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. have been too busy reading the report of the Ontario Government commission on the subject of the prisons.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You have nothing to do with that. You have your own prisons to attend to. You have as much as you will be able to attend to; and sometimes they say you get tired.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. am pretty tired now.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Sometimes they say, the hon, gentleman is overworked and that he rests for a few days, or rather he strikes. I do not know whether he strikes for a respite or what. He has not informed us, and the leader of the House has not informed us. I think it was the duty of the leader of the House, when making ministerial explanations to have informed us on this subject. Then there is another singular thing in connection with this business, and that is the discrepancy that now appears in the accounts. Has there been a shrinkage in values since last session? Are the Government not transferring a portion of this account to another commission to make the people believe it did not cost so much? Why are they going back on the statement of their leader last session? Have they transferred this to some members of their commission?

Mr. FOSTER. The Auditor General has gor it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And the Auditor General will deal with it fairly, too. The Auditor General has the courage of his opinions, anyway.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You lost $500 on contingencies.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How much did the hon. Minister lose when he went on strike? Was his salary cut off?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not a cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did he get it while his resignation was pending?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Every dollar.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When the Minister of Justice got down under a juniper tree and prayed that he might die, did the angels come and bake him a cake and tell him to live and go back and get his salary? I think the hon. gentleman has got his answer, and I do believe that if he read the evidence of this commission he would go on strike again. I believe any gentleman who would read that evidence, would go on strike. I protest against this extravagant ister. I understood there was a claim made waste of public money. It is money for which nothing can be got that would serve any useful purposes. The hon, gentlemen sitting behind the Government say that they cannot get anything. They have voted subsidies over and over, and here they come and spend this money, and then they discriminate. It is like their tariff. They give one commissioner about $3,000, and they give another about $6,000. Are they men of different calibre? Are the services of one of these commissioners worth more than those of another? Or is it possible that one of these commissioners was related to some of the powers that be?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that might be.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If we looked up the genealogical tree, which the Minister did not want us to do, we might find that that is the solution of the difficulty, that is the reason why his services were so much more Does the Minister of Finance valuable. think that his services were more valuable than does the Minister of Justice? It was stated so. There is something more than genealogy about this that we do not know. There is no necessity of going into this any further, but when the tree is shown forth. we may be able to see.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Take care you don't see double.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon, gentleman is more apt to see double than I am. I think, if we were to judge from some of his late discussions, that he has been seeing double.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. am judging the hon, gentleman now.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I was judging you last night. I do not believe you could scarcely see at all. But I do not think it is right for the Minister of Justice to sit in judgment upon me until he has the evidence. Now, I protest most seriously against this vote. believe it is an outrage. This money might as well have been thrown away. money had been given to people who want seed grain, or who want to develop any industry in this country, or if it had been given to those poor men in want and destitution in Montreal and the other large cities of Canada last winter, there would have been some justification for it. It would have been an easy thing for the Minister to defend, it would have been an easy thing for his supporters to defend. But to take $120,-000, which the late Premier said it would cost, or to take $90,000, which the present leader of the House says it will cost, and squander that money in taking volumes of evidence that are worthless trash, that will never be read, is something that cannot be defended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is another question I would like to ask the hon. Minby one of the translators for $27,000 for translating alone, which he declared was due him under a contract made between him and the late Secretary of State. I wish to know whether that claim is now before the Government, and whether any part of it has been allowed, or is included in this $90,000.

Mr. FOSTER. All that the Government owe for translation has been paid.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not ask the hon, gentleman that, I asked him whether a claim is pending.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no claim pending before me.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman not know of this claim?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is it the intention to have the report translated, or is it to be translated?

Mr. FOSTER. I think part of the translation has been made.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is it the intention to complete the translation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it will be entirely translated.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then it is the intention of the Government to complete the translation of all the evidence taken, in fact to make a complete translation of all those volumes which are about to be distributed?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon, gentleman asked if the report was to be translated, and I said it was. A part of the evidence has been translated, but only a part.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then the rest of the evidence is not to be translated?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that.

Mr. DEVLIN. I should like to ask if the balance of the evidence is to be translated?

Mr. FOSTER. A part of the evidence. I think, was translated by Mr. Montpetit, not a large portion of it. The translation was then stopped, and no more of it has been made up to the present time.

Mr. DEVLIN. Well, I supposed this amount of $8,000 is to be spent just as the hon, gentleman explained to-night. It is possible, then, that the difference between the $90,000 mentioned by the leader of the House to-night, and the $120,000, which it was stated by the late Premier the whole thing would cost, represents the deduction of the cost for translation. Am I to understand, then, that no further amount will be asked for to prosecute this translation?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think any further amount will be asked this year, at least.

Mr. DEVLIN. May I ask the leader of the Government if the contract entered into between Mr. Montpetit and the Government was fulfilled?

Mr. FOSTER. On whose part?

Mr. DEVLIN. On Mr. Montpetit's part, or upon the part of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. I understand it was fulfilled on the part of the Government, and so far as I know, on Mr. Montpetit's part.

Mr. DEVLIN. Will the hon, gentleman say what was the amount of that contract?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say what the amount was.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I accept the hon. gentleman's statement that he did not know the amount of Mr. Montpetit's claim against the Government. I would like to ask the other members of the Government whether they can join in the same statement. I am very credibly informed that a claim has been preferred, and that some members of the Government have acknowledged a claim for $27,000.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon, gentleman referred to the Secretary of State's office, and as I was the late Secretary of State, I suppose he referred to me, but no arrangement was made by me. When I came to the office, Mr. Montpetit came to me and claimed that the department had made some arrangement with him, which I could not recognize. told him that the department would pay him for what translation he had done, but that we could not recognize that any contract had been made. Mr. Montpetit did not accept that view of the matter at all. He had his own views, and claimed that he had a contract with the Government, but I found no evidence of that. I have no knowledge whatever that Mr. Montpetit has continued his claim against the Government, or still maintains that he has a further claim; although I know he was not at all satisfied with the statement I made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was the amount mentioned of the claim correct, namely, $27,-000?

Mr. DICKEY. I dare say it would have amounted to that, if he had finished his work. I presume now if he had any claim against the Government, it would be in the nature of damages for refusing to allow him to prosecute his contract.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then a contract was broken by the Government?

Mr. DICKEY. Not at all. I say that so far as I was able to judge, there was no contract at all. Mr. Montpetit did not admit that, and claimed there was a contract. I came to the conclusion that Mr. Montpetit had no claim, from inquiries I made in the department.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then no arrangements were made between Mr. Montpetit and the Government, no contract of any kind passed between him and the Government?

Mr. DICKEY. No, so far as I was able to find out, except that Mr. Montpetit was doing some translation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very much afraid from the statement made by the Minister of Finance that we have not reached the end of this expenditure, and that $8,000 is by no manner of means going to close the account. The hon. gentleman was careful to say that nothing more would be asked for this year, but he did not state that this was the last sum we would be called upon to pay, and bearing in mind what was stated last year by Sir John Thompson, it looks as if the strong probability is that $120,000, as was stated by the late Premier as the probable cost of the commission, is much more likely to be accurate than the sum given by the Finance Minister. We ought to know exactly what we are doing, we ought to know, not merely whether we have to vote this $8,000. but as to how near that will bring us to the closing of the account. The Minister of Finance must have some idea, and he ought to be able to inform the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. This closes the account for the present.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is no answer.

Mr. FOSTER. The House is not asked to vote any further sum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is neither an explanation nor an answer. We want to know what the total cost is to be. The hon, gentleman tells us that the House is not going to be asked now to vote more money. There may be another $6,000 for half a dozen more cousins—we may have $30,000 more added. The House should be put in full possession of all the information the Government possesses as to the probable cost of this commission.

Mr. FOSTER. You have it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman stated that a further sum was not going to be asked this year, but he did not deny that a considerable amount of money may be asked subsequently. I am informed that Rev. Dr. McLeod has put in a further bill. Is it true that he has put in a further claim?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no note here of any further claim.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman say, and if he does not know, will any member of the Government say, whether they are or are not aware that other claims have been preferred by Rev. Dr. McLeod?

Mr. DICKEY.

Mr. FOSTER. I find there is a further claim made by Rev. Dr. McLeod. That claim is on this basis, for payment for time for Sundays when absent from home.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And how much is that?

Mr. FOSTER. For forty-eight Sundays, at $10.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is $480 more.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Is it the intention of the Government to translate the evidence and publish it all in French?

Mr. FOSTER. I have already answered the question. No vote is being asked to print the translation in French.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Surely the Government knows its intention. Is it the intention to proceed with the translation already commenced, and print in French the volumes of evidence already issued in English?

Mr. FOSTER. The report is being translated and published in French and in English. Part of the evidence has been translated, and no further vote is at present being asked for further translation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will the vote asked for cover the expense of printing the French edition?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; of the report.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Then it is not the intention of the Government to print the evidence in French?

Mr. FOSTER. I tell the hon, gentleman that at present we are not asking a vote for that purpose.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I want your intention.

Mr. FOSTER. You have all I can give you.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It is a fair straight question, and I am entitled to a proper answer to it. If I am out of order—

Mr. FOSTER. You are not out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Then there is a fair question, and in duty bound the Finance Minister should answer it. Is it the intention of the Government to print the evidence in French? If so, another vote will be required at a future time.

Mr. LAURIER. The refusal of the hon. Finance Minister to answer such a fair question is plain evidence that the House was misled the other day by the Government when it was told that this commission would cost only $90,000—it was a direct misleading of the House. It was the more direct as it was in opposition to the statement made last year that it would cost $120,000. The other day the Minister of Finance stated, not once, but several times, that the cost of the commission would be in the neighbourhood of $90,000. Now, the hon. gentleman refuses to answer a plain question asked by my hon. friend. It is, therefore, contemplated that there will be further demands with respect to this commission than have been made so far, and it was not accurate for the hon. gentleman to say that the cost would be $90,000. The Government only asked for a certain sum this year, but evidently there are more items to come, and when the full items are in it will be found that the late Prime Minister was correct when he stated last year that the cost would be $120,000 or more.

Mr. BORDEN. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance on what ground the claim is made by Rev. Dr. McLeod that he should be paid for his Sundays. I understand that the other commissioners did not make any claim for Sundays?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will see the basis of Dr. McLeod's contention in this respect, it is that whereas other com-missioners were close to their homes and could get there on Sundays, he living so far away, found it impossible to get to his home. Being thus away from home on Sundays he was at more expense, and had to pay his own hotel expenses, whereas the other commissioners who were close to their homes were able to go there on Sundays. That is the basis of the claim.

Mr. LAURIER. Has the claim been allowed by the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Has it been disallowed by the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. No. It has been neither admitted nor rejected, but is under consideration.

Mr. FRASER. That would only be true-

Mr. FOSTER. I was asked on what grounds the claim was made. I have stated them. That statement is true.

Mr. FRASER. That would only be true in certain situations in which Dr. McLeod was placed.

Mr. FOSTER. They came to forty-eight Sundays.

Mr. FRASER. I think Dr. McLeod should have $10 for each Sabbath, and we ought to be glad that he does not charge double. If he had had the evidence in regard to certain Montreal people before him he would no doubt have charged $20 or $30 for his bill. Being a clergyman, however, he could not work on Sunday, and $10 per Sabbath is pretty steep for a clergyman or any other man. You can go to the Hotel Frontenac and get the best for that amount. Besides. a clergyman would not ride around the coun-would have his three meals quietly in Those Sunday his own room. claims have already been passed upon by the Government in the case of the derrick to which I referred, and I think that a live man is better than a dead derrick. The Minister of Finance should take the House into his confidence now, and tell us that if the translation is made the commission will cost $120,000 as Sir John Thompson stated. Is there a translation to be made? Why should not our French fellow citizens have this evidence in French? Is it not as essential to their existence as it is to ours. It may cost a few thousand dollars to translate and publish it, but what of that. The money will be expended in the country, and do not the Government tell us that we are always getting rich when there is money being spent.

Mr. BORDEN. Did Dr. McLeod receive $10 a day in addition to his living allowance on Sundays?

Mr. FOSTER. He has not received his living allowance on Sundays.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I have listened to this discussion for a considerable time, and I am much surprised to find that so much of the valuable time of the House is being wasted in this way. We know that we are suffering considerably from the heat of the summer season, and surely there is nothing to be gained from prolonging the session by useless discussion. I am surprised to find that the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) did not ask that his evidence should be translated into Gaelic as well as French. The idea of all this talk is to throw discredit upon the Conservative party in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh, hear, hear.

Sir JAMES GRANT. It is all very well for gentlemen opposite to laugh, but there is another side of the question. The Government undertook the responsibility of issuing a commission, and why did they issue that commission? Was it not to meet the requirements of the people of the Dominion with regard to the great and important question of prohibition?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Rely upon it, that it will become a vital question in this country to know how it is to be settled. I have full confidence in the manner in which the Government have acted in this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir JAMES GRANT. The action of hon. gentlemen opposite in discussing this question beyond reasonable limits is not for the purpose of showing the country that they are sincere in their endeavours to promote prohibition. No, their action is for the purtry and have a good time on Sunday, but he pose of showing the country that they believe the Conservative party in Canada in carrying out the principles of prohibition and the examination into this question, have not been doing what is right and proper.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JAMES GRANT. The Government have gone into the question honestly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir JAMES GRANT. They have got the very best men in Canada to examine into it, and if the compiling of the report which they presented cost $90,000, why should they try to make the people believe that it cost $150,000? If the Government is trying to do things economically, why should hon, gentlemen opposite find fault with them?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, hear, hear.

Sir JAMES GRANT. It is all very well for gentlemen opposite to attempt to throw ridicule on the commission, but the people of Canada are thoroughly aware of what is going on, and they know that the Government are prepared to do what is right and proper in this great issue. It is not a discussion of this kind that is going to throw discredit upon the Government, for the people know perfectly well that the expenditure was right and proper under the circumstances. It is impossible to go from one end of the Dominion to the other, to inquire into the data, to get the facts, to examine witnesses month after month, and year after year, and to present such a report, without a large expenditure. It is not by throwing cold water on the prohibition question that gentlemen opposite are going to accomplish anything. Discuss the question fairly and openly and speak out like honourable men, but do not try to discredit those who are doing the best they can for the interests of the Dominion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sure we do not want to throw cold water on the question, but we would really like to know whether the hon. gentleman (Sir James Grant) has arrayed himself on the side of the prohibitionists or the anti-prohibitionists.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. After that eloquent appeal made by the hon. member (Sir James Grant) both to the Opposition and supporters of the Government, the Minister of Finance ought to give us the information which has been asked for from this side of the House. The question is a simple one. Is it the intention of the Government to translate fully the evidence and to publish it in French? The House is entitled to that information, and I cannot see why the Minister should refuse to give it. I do not think there is a single Conservative member of this House who voted for the Royal Commission who does not feel in his heart to-day that it was a great error. That is plainly seen in the fact that not a single individual has become acquainted with the evidence that has been placed before us, and not one in a thousand will read it. What I wish to know, and I think the people of this country have a right to know it, is whether the sum of $91.184, mentioned by the Minister, will close the account, and cover the cost of the whole affair.

To cover expenses of the late Hon. Sir J. S. D. Thompson's funeral...... $25,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I very much regret that it should be necessary to criticise this item. Were it possible, I am quite sure every man on both sides of the House would greatly prefer that the amount incurred for the funeral of the late Sir John Thompson had been of a proportion which we could have allowed to pass without comment; but, having reference to the expenses that have been incurred on similar occasions before, and, still more, having reference to the details which were laid before the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals last night, I am sorry to say that I cannot acquit the Government of very grave extravagance in bringing down this vote. So far as I recollect, the total funeral expenses of Sir George Cartier amounted to only about $10,000, and those of the funeral of Sir John Macdonald to only about $6,900. am very sorry, therefore, that I must censure the conduct of the Government in allowing this amount to have been expended on the present occasion. It is a very disagreeable, a very painful thing, to have to go into a minute criticism of the items: composing the accounts before us, but I am bound to say that, on looking over them a very large number of them appear to me to be accounts which cannot possibly be defended, and I think the Government had no right whatever to use their position or to make use of the Governor General's warrant for the purpose of an expenditure such as this. We are not going to criticise this expenditure in a carping or ungenerous spirit; but there is no doubt whatever in nay mind that there was no justification whatever for a very considerable portion, at any rate, of the expenditure for which we are now asked to vote, and I am quite certain that any hon, gentleman who will peruse the details of that expenditure will entirely agree with me that it is an especially unfortunate thing, under all the circumstances, that the Government should have allowed it to go the lengths it has gone. So far as I can see, there appears to have been no sort of attempt to check the expenditure that was incurred. body would grudge, I repeat, any reasonable demonstration or any reasonable expenditure on such an occasion; but there is a measure in all things, and it does appear to me that it has been very gravely

Sir James Grant.

Mr. FOSTER. The action of the Government in bringing down this vote, which, I admit, looks, at first, like a very considerable vote, requires some explanation on the part of the Government, and it is my duty to say a word or two with reference to it. I suppose no one in this House or in the country would quarrel with the idea of a state funeral having been accorded to the remains of Sir John Thompson, dying, as he did, as the leader of the Government, and under the circumstances of his death, at home, and with the particular marks of respect and sorrow that were shown by Her Majesty and the British Government. It has been stated to-night that the funeral expenses of other statesmen in were not nearly SO That is true, and it is also true that none died under exactly similar circumstances, and that the funeral of none took place under similar circumstances. Sir John Thompson died at Windsor Castle, as we all know, and the marks of respect and regret which followed his remains from Windsor Castle to Halifax were most notable—such as were never before accorded to any colonial statesman. If we take the Government of Great Britain and refer to this particular expenditure upon the funeral of a statesmen not belonging to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, you will find that it is no inconsiderable item. I am not able to-night to state the amount of the expenditure incurred by the British Government, but no person can think of the circumstances, no one can think of the pomp and ceremony which characterized the action of the British Government in this matter without seeing at once that the cost must have been immense. From the time the body left Windsor Castle, after having been elaborately taken care of there, until it reached Halifax, there was nothing but one large bill of expense. I am not sure that $100,000 would meet the total expenditure which the British Government incurred in paying the marks of respect it did to Canada's first citizen and the leader of its Government. All that was done, and in the British House of Parliament no person, not the most rabid radical, lifted up his voice in criticism of the expenditure that took place in showing those marks of great respect and honour to the remains of a colorial statesman. And yet the expense was immense. I can imagine that a radical, that a member in opposition, might easily have founded a very strong case, as cases are founded for instance in this Parliament, against the Government. He might have objected to the immense expenditure that took place in refitting one of Her Majesty's largest vessels from top mast down to water line in order to make it a ship-not of warbut of funeral pomp and magnificence. He might have objected to the great cost incurred in recalling that vessel from a distant station to Great Britain, and to all the than he would in the case of a private inother expenses incurred so willingly and ungrudgingly in order to show that the British Government respected a Canadian who had given distinguished service to the Empire to which he belonged. I mention that circumstance simply to show that it evoked necessarily a response from the Canadian people, and that the Canadian Government simply voiced that sentiment in having funeral obsequies somewhat in keeping with the respect and appreciation which was shown by the British Government. the total amount at the most will only be $25,000. It may be less than that. total of the bills which are in, and of those which have yet to be passed upon and diligently revised, as the other accounts have been, will not exceed $25,000. My hon. friend says that great extravagance was shown. Well, it was a period when perhaps the Government was not in a position to give the most minute details for the carrying out of that ceremony. That was entrusted by the Minister of Public Works to an officer of his department. That officer went to Halifax, with instructions, I am informed, to have the ceremonies carried out in a manner consonant with the respect and regret we all felt, and we were but voicing Canada's sentiment in our wish to pay to our dead chief and honoured statesman the greatest honour and respect. From first to last, what was done? There was an elaborate draping of his native city where he was buried. The provincial buildings and public buildings, the outside of many of the churches, the inside of the great church in which his remains were to lie for an hour, while the funeral ceremony took place, were draped. You may say that it was extravagance to buy tens of thousands of yards of stuff and have that spread out so as to give some mighty token of the sorrow and regret which was felt by the people of Canada for the loss of so young, se brilliant and so honoured a statesman. Call it extravagance if you like. It was an extravagance showing in some degree, and a very slight degree, the sorrow that filled the hearts of the people. It was an evidence of their respect and their honour. that draping was one of the large items of expense. The undertakers in Halifax are men who understand their business. They were given the general order to carry out, so far as their part went, the funeral ceremony with becoming pomp and circumstance. They did that. Their bills have been largely cut down, and remain now at the figure at which they are valued by the officer of the department. We cannot carry on public funerals of that kind with the minute care and regard to detail which we can give the funeral of a private person. We may just as well recognize the fact tonight that every person who has anything to do with a funeral and state pomp of that kind does it in a more elaborate manner dividual, and expects to be paid accordingly. That bill and the bill for the draping are the two largest we incurred. Some say that the draping was carried out to too great an extent. Perhaps it was, but I am not inclined to think so. Not only were the public buildings in Halifax draped, but the Inter-colonial had its most important buildings in St. John and other places draped as well. It may be said to have been a piece of extravagance, but these members and public men and deputations from great bodies that went from the west and came even from as far as British Columbia passed down along that line of railway, and at these large stations they saw what betokened the general respect for a statesman whose funeral ceremonies were being celebrated. These two were the largest items. We will also meet the criticism that in Ottawa expenses was incurred for the same purpose. All kinds of reports have been circulated, but we may be careful about accepting these reports as true. It is a fact that in one of the churches in Otiawa, the scene of Sir Thompson's political life, the city where his labour took place, where his social functions were carried out, where his generous hospitalities were dispensed, where so many people knew him and loved him, the Government thought it would be right to have a public ceremony and they had that ceremony in a church, of course, of his religious faith. And a certain sum, about $500 or $900 will be found to have been expended there for decorations in that church.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that one of the items included in the $25,000?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I do not think any of these bills were paid.

Mr. DAVIES (F.E.I.) Is that among the details to which the hon, gentleman referred?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether it is or not. That is included in what the vote is asked for. Well, Sir, it was felt that a certain official aspect necessarily marked the ceremony here in Ottawa. The judges of the Supreme Court, belonging to what might be called his own fraternity, and all the official life in Ottawa paid their respect to his memory at the service in the church. You may say that was extravagance. possibly it was, looked at from some points of view; but it was extravagance that emanated from a feeling that has its good side, which, I think will excuse it to most of the members of this House, if not to all. Now there was another item. It was thought only right and proper that a funeral train should start from Ottawa and go to Halifax and return. Invitations, official invitations were sent out for that journey. Members of Parliament, the colleagues of Sir John Thompson himself, and adividuals more or less connected in official life with Halifax. They went. All the expenses for hauling the cars, for sleeping the persons who went and for food on the way, were paid for and appear as an item in that expenditure. These are the larger items. Of course there were trappings which marked the funeral ceremonies in that place where Sir John's remains were laid to be viewed by the people who wished to see them. These were ornate; they were ornate in the best sense; they were thoroughly in keeping with the occasion. Everybody who visited Halifax upon that occasion had but one opinion with reference to the taste and fitness of these expressions of grief which surrounded the remains in the chamber of the provincial building where they lay in state. The vault in which his remains rest was paid for, and the amount appears in these bills. That is the general character of the bills. I hope they will not be criticized upon anything like this line—that the Government took advantage of the death and buria! of Sir John Thompson to spend money purely for the sake of patronage. I have no hesitation in saying that there was not a thought of that kind in the mind of any member of the Government in anything that was asked to be carried out or that was carried out. The idea was to meet, with a fair response, the outflow of public feeling, to meet it in a manner that would show that the Canadian people had an appreciation of their fellowcitizen and statesman somewhat equal to that which the British Government itself evinced; and to do that the ceremony was necessarily marked by some pomp and circumstance. The bills are before the House. Whatever criticism is made, I hope it will not be criticism born of the idea I mentioned a moment ago, because such an idea was entirely foreign to the minds of the members of the Government and of every person who had to do officially with the carrying out of that ceremony. You may say that more money was expended than was necessary. But this much also is true, that the statesman whose death evoked such streng public feeling had during his life won such esteem as to justify the Government in an attempt to voice these public feelings at his funeral ceremonies.

Mr. DAVIES (P.F.I.) Adverse criticism of such a vote as we have proposed to us tonight is, I am sure, and will be felt by everybody to be, peculiarly distressing. Carping, anfair criticism, I hope, will be entirely absent. Judicious and proper criticism has been made essential by the inexpedient and unbounded extravagance which characterized the work in this connection that Government undertook to do. There is not a man, I believe—and that, at any rate, is a subject for congratulation-not a man who was indisposed to join in the responsibility which the Government as-John Thompson himself, and individuals sumed of granting to the late Sir John more or less connected in official life with him were invited to go upon that train to man who desired that the funeral should be conducted in any other way than a befitting and proper way. But I do not think there is a personal friend of Sir John Thompson's living in Canada to-day but will bitterly and sincerely regret that the expenditure was of so disgraceful a character as to call for the criticisms that it is our duty to make. If the late Sir John Thompson was living and a similar case came before this House, there is no other member of the House who could be found to denounce unnecessary expenditure with greater bitterness than he would. The hon, gentleman has spoken of the peculiar and tragic circumstances which surrounded the late statesman's death and the honours which were paid to his remains by the Imperial Government. Sir, every member of this House and every Canadian felt rejoiced and proud that the Imperial Government offered these honours to the memory of a distinguished Canadian. But the fact that that was done and the fact that the body was conveyed in an Imperial ship and under the Imperial flag to the wharf at Halifax is no excuse for this Government or its officers extravagantly squaudering public money. Upon this occasion, more than upon any other occasion, care should have been taken that, while the pomp and circumstance befitting the interment of the late statesman's body should be observed, no unseemly extravagance or rioting should be tolerated. Sir, the senseless display which the hop, gentleman referred to and the useless expenditure connected with it affords to my mind not the slightest evidence of any depth of feeling on the part of those who were responsible for it. The same scale of expenditure as marked the funeral of the late Sir John Macdonald, as my hon. friend suggested-some $6,000 or $8,000—should surely have been about the scale which these gentlemen would feel justified in following in the funeral of the late Premier, Sir John Thompson. Surely the position held in the country by Sir John Macdonald, the number of years he had filled his high place and all the circumstances connected with his death, justified a public funeral, justified the keeping of his body in state and the removal of it to the city where he had lived the most of his life, the city of Kingston. Practically there were two public funerals. And when some $6,000 was proposed to meet the expenses, the voice of criticism was silent. That money was spent, as we had hoped would have been the case in Sir John Thompson's funeral, and the amount was voted without a word of criticism amid the solemn silence of this House. But in view of the items the hon. gentleman gives, it is apparent that they took advantage or if they did not. they permitted those over whom they had control, to take advantage—of the unfortunate circumstances attending that interment to make it an occasion of lamentable display, of inexpedient and inexcusable extravagance.

Mr. STAIRS. If I may be permitted, I think there are some circumstances connected with the funeral of the late Sir John Thompson that ought to be pointed out to the House, supplementing what has been said by the Minister of Finance, which, I think, to a certain extent will explain the reasons why the cost incurred in connection with this funeral exceeds that of some other state funerals that have taken place in Canada. One very great difference between this funeral and other state funerals was that the others took place within a fixed and short time, while in this case circumstances made that impossible. In the case of the funeral we are now considering, the time in which the preparations were to be made was at first believed to be very short indeed. Not only was the time very short, but after a few days it became known to those in charge of the preparations, that the date itself was not certain. They did not know exactly at what date to be prepared. It was some considerable time before the date of the arrival of the ship at Halifax was finally The effect of this uncertainty was known. that the preparations for the funeral had to be rushed; and, having very little time at command, and not knowing exactly what time they did have, they could not give that careful supervision to the cost of the preparations that would have been given in any ordinary business transaction. The great object of the officer having this matter in charge, was to have the preparations ready in time for the arrival of the ship. the effect of extending the time naturally was, that as the days passed on, I presume the preparations grew, to a certain extent, and it is quite possible, therefore, that they were made a little fuller than they would have been if there had been a shorter delay. Having been in Halifax during the whole time these preparations were being made, I can bear testimony to what has been said by the Minister of Finance, that there was no attempt, I am sure, in Halifax, on the part of any one connected with the preparations for this funeral, to indulge in any extra expense in the way of providing patronage to any one at all. I also want to point out that, owing to the peculiar nature of these preparations, it was impossible for the officers of the Department of Public Works, who had charge of them, to obtain estimates of the cost of anything. It could not be otherwise. A certain amount of preparation had to be made, certain buildings had to be draped inside and outside; and when the officer went in and looked at a certain building, it was impossible for him to say what the work of draping that building would cost. As a matter of fact, I think I may almost say, that when the work was commenced, it was not known exactly what would be done, and probably as the time went on, the preparations grew. I can assure the hon, member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), that in all the preparations that were made in funeral. Halifax in connection with the everything was done in perfect taste; there was no attempt whatever to make any extraordinary or unusual display. Everything that was done, was simply continuing the honours which had already been paid to Canada and to the late Sir John Thompson by Her Majesty and by the English Govern-I think, therefore, that the general sense of the House will be that, subject to the revision which is being made, as stated by the Minister of Finance, and under which only reasonable accounts will be paid, this item in the Estimates should be passed by the committee.

Mr. FRASER. Having attended the funeral of the late Sir John Thompson, I must say that the very fact that the accounts have to be gone over and reduced, is, to my mind, the very best evidence of the extravagant character of the funeral.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). The bills were made by the most respectable lawyers in the country.

Mr. FRASER. I know that doctors prepare the occasion, but I did not know that lawyers are called in at the funeral. I was going to say that I would be the last man to object to a fitting funeral to the late Pre-Although I was in opposition to that distinguished statesman, my relations with him were of such a character that I would be the first to approve a public funeral being But the public funeral ought given to him. to have been with regard to two points: first, to his own tastes, which were simple; and secondly, the country in which we live. I must say that that distinguished statesman himself would be the first to object to the Now, I am expenditure that was made. Now, I am not setting myself up as a judge of what an occasion of that kind should cost; but I do know that the provincial buildings, where the remains lay, after $6,000 or $7,000 was expended upon them, did not look anything like as well as they would have looked with an expenditure of $1,000. Why, the light of day was excluded. When you went in there at nine o'clock, you saw 70 or 80 electric lights. Now, to my mind, I do not think that was in keeping with the occasion. But there is another consideration: $25,000 is too much to spend upon the funeral of any man in any country. Why, Sir, when Sir Walter Scott died, who was one of the most distinguished men that ever graced British letters. Lord Althorpe was asked to give him a public funeral, and what did he say? He said he knew of no man in Great Britain who ought to receive at the hands of the people a state He deprecated spending so much funeral. on one idol of clay, and he thought that the amount that would be expended upon the funeral, should be given to his widow. I think it was Fox who refused to give his assent to a vote for the burial of Pitt, but he was willing that his debts should be paid. Now, while I do not object to a proper if any charges were found to be exorbitant amount being expended for the funeral of Sir John Thompson, I do say that the expenditure of $25,000 in a democratic country like this, with only 5,000,000 of people, is setting the worst precedent that could possibly be set before the people. $25,000 on one funeral, one show, all that cloth and I have looked over certain items of the account, as other hon. gentlemen have doubtless done, and I must say I do not think some of them were in keeping. The Government should have seen that, while the display was befitting to the distinguished services of the late Premier, it was not upon an extravagant scale. What will the people think? Although I think the remarks of the leader of the House will find an echo in the minds of the people of this country, what are we to think when twenty miles of cloth were used upon that occasion, and not a dollar of credit for the cloth is to be found after it is used, so far as I can see.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon, friend will allow me. I will meet that statement at once. The cloth which was used and not damaged. in a great many cases was returned, and values struck off from the bill for that which was returned. The other materials which were not returned, and which were paid for and remained in the hands of the Public Works Department, are to be sold by public auction, and the proceeds are to be put into I am not sure whether the the treasury. bills, as they are put down there, show what has been cut down from them. No man on earth can prevent another man from making an extravagant charge, and you can only criticiso a man who pays an extravagant bill without revising it. I am not sure whether these bills were revised; I am inclined to think that they were partly revised.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) These are the revised bills.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, they are not fully revised. Experts were put on, who not only valued but measured the stuff, and the report of the experts on the measurements and on the value of the stuff was taken by the The bills will be revised upon the officer. report of the experts.

Mr. FRASER. The papers do not show nat. I think it would have been much better not only for the Government but for hon, members of the House if a detailed statement had been given as to what bills had been presented and what amounts deducted. But I desire to point out that $25,-000 is the amount required; that the total amount of the accounts sent in is $25,600, and that, therefore, there is a margin left of only $600.

Mr. FOSTER. The Governor General's warrant was asked to cover the amount of the bills, with the understanding of course that that was the outside amount, but that the bills would be carefully scrutinized and they would be reduced and only the revised bills would be paid. It is not certain that the sum of $25,000 will be required as the total, but that is the outside amount which can be required, and not until the revision is complete and payments made, will it be possible to say how much less the bills will be, but they certainly will aggregate less than that amount.

Mr. FRASER. All these explanations may change materially the amount of the bills. I am assuming that the amount of the bills is correct as rendered, because the traders are responsible men; Gordon & Keefe, A. & S. Stevens & Son, of Halifax. are responsible firms, and surely would not send in bills for more than the goods supplied. I do not see what right the Government has to cut down the bills unless they are In cutting down the bills the exorbitant. Government must accept one of two positions: Either the traders were dishonest, or the Government are adopting a cheese-paring policy in reducing the gross claim. Are they going to say that the bills are excessive, otherwise it is proper to pay the amount of the bill. To use a Scotch phrase, "On all occasions it is in the face of a corpse that a man will be honest." I would expect the tradesmen to be honest; yet it appears a great reduction is to be made in their ac-All' this shows that counts. business methods were not followed. Was there any reason for this? The hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) himself answered the leader of the House when he stated they were waiting for quite a long while, thus showing that there was plenty of time to make this arrangement as business men would do, and to order 1,000 or 2,000 yards of material according to sample and at a certain price. Do I understand the tradesmen received carte blanche to supply what they pleased without regard to price? Surely that was not the case. The truth of the matter is this: That without saying a word, as regards the officer sent down, there seems to have been this idea, spend anything. Government unfortunately made this an occasion which will not soon be forgotten in Canada. The expenditure of $25,000 on a funeral in this country is beyond all calculation too much for any man, from the Governor General down to the lowest subject. The late Premier did his duty during his life time, and the friends who went to attend his funeral, whether they were political friends or opponents, followed his remains with sorrow. But sorrow is not evinced by a great display of crape. way the mourners acted showed:

They bore about the mockery of woe, To midnight revel and the public show.

If the heart of Canada was moved it was shown more by the sorrow felt in the hearts of the people than by the gaudy show.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). That is why the people will discount what you say.

Mr. FRASER. If the hon, gentleman has any objection to offer I shall be glad to hear What I say is, that it is no indication of sorrow that $25,000 was spent and a great display made. Sorrow is only shown in the feeling of the people, and I believe that feeling of sorrow was genuine Canada, and it did more to honour the remains of Sir John Thompson than all the display the Government made. help feeling, after the explanation made, the bills are out of all reason, because one, for example, was of $1,900, reduced or being attempted to be reduced to $900, and that excessive charges have been made. Do these accounts not show that the tradesmen felt that they could charge what they liked, that the Government wished to evince sorrow on this occasion and they would see they were passed. I think the amount spent in draping the Council Chamber and in draping the church, from $7,000 to $8,000, was altogether too large, and it has set a precedent—but I do not think it will be followed-at all events it has done much harm as regards paying tribute to the memory of the distinguished statesman by expending such a large sum of money in one day. I should have much preferred if the Government had expended $5,000 or $10,000 on that occasion; $5,000, I think, would have been enough. It must also be remembered that the British Government did not spend as much as the hon. gentleman stated. There was not an extra dollar paid to the men on ship board, the ship had to be somewhere and the pay of the sailors had to go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. SPROULE. That is begging the question.

Mr. FRASER. The hon, gentleman either does not understand what I have said or does not understand the matter. I say the expenditure of the British Government was not $100,000. In fact there would be little extra payment, but when the statement was made that there was an expenditure of $100,-000. I said there was no such expenditure. I should have preferred that $5,000 or $10,-000 had been expended on Sir John -Thompson's funeral, and the balance expended in building a monument that would have remained succeeding generations of this distinguished statesman, rather have thrown away $25,000 in expenditure for one day. It did not add anything to the solemnity of the occasion, and did not tend to draw a tear to the eye or elicit a feeling from the heart for the dead statesman. In this new democratic country we cannot afford to start out in this way. Our busy life is different from that of an old country like England, although there the people have learned a different lesson during recent years. They do not spend as much now as they did. We cannot afford to make such an expenditure of $25,000 on any funeral, and it is not calculated to give us in this country that view of life and death we should entertain.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not think there is any man in the House who has a higher respect and esteem for the departed statesman than I have. I always regarded him as a man of eminent ability, a man of high and excellent character, and a man who should be highly esteem-ed in every sphere of life. You must remember. Mr. Chairman, that in discussing this question, that I intend no reflection, whatever, directly or indirectly on the memory of the lamented statesman. But we are here to-night to discuss, for a short time, the propriety of spending so much money on a burial service. Sir John Macdonald, you knew, and those of you who associated with him in political life loved him very much. He was the head of the Liberal-Conservative party for nearly forty He passed through many political changes in the country, and identified him-self with the history of Canada as, I may say, no man ever did. When he was buried, members on both sides of the House were willing that the highest honours and respect should be paid his remains. That was done, according to the estimate of his friends of that day. They had a funeral service in Ottawa, they conveyed his body to Kingston, and buried it in what may be called his native city, and which he represented in Parliament for many years. All that was accomplished in the case of the funeral of Sir John Macdonald for less than $7,000, and how does it come that nearly four times as much money was spent for the burial of Sir John Thompson? I do not charge the Government with being personally responsible, but I must say that they appear to have been defrauded out of large sums of money by neglect of duty and want of economy. I took the pains of going over the account very carefully, and I must say that I was really ashamed of some of the charges. I am satisfied that if the members of the Government, and the members who support them, went over these accounts, they would come to the conclusion that the Government was defrauded. Now, think of it. Over 35,000 yards of material were used in the form of bunting, which would make a length of over twenty miles. Think that the decoration of St. Mary's Cathedral, Halifax, cost $8,771.35, almost enough to erect a cathedral from the foundation upwards. How can such an extraordinary expenditure as that be justified? Take the item of $333.34 for lighting the provincial building for a few nights. Why, they had to make an apology at the heginning of their account to show that they had burned out some of their apparatus in securing the light required. Here is one man who draws not less than $1,228 for black material used, I suppose in decora-

Why should flowers be used to such an extent at this funeral, compared with those used at the funeral of Sir John Macdonald. This is a matter between us, and the parties charging the Government such an extra-ordinary sum. Listen to one or two of the Undertaker and his assistants, charges. for opening the casket, $10. Removing the casket from the provincial buildings to the residence of John Pugh, Esq., and again returning it to the provincial building, undertaker and his ten assistants, $100. moving the casket from the provincial building to St. Mary's Cathedral, and placing it on catafalque, undertaker, and ten assistants, $40. Remodelling two wagons for conveying flowers and wreaths and draping same in black cloth, $62.50 for each wagon, a sum sufficient to buy the wagon at the beginning. Re-painting one wagon, $80. State funeral car, complete, including ornaments, silver tassels, and silver bullion fringe plumes, and draping same in velvet and black bengaline silk and festooning with flowers, $1,500. This one item alone is nearly one-fourth of what the funeral of Sir John Macdonald cost. I might give several other items to show that the Government need not wonder, that no matter how high our esteem and opinion might be of the lamented statesman, and it is very high, we should find fault with this great expenditure. Here is another sample of the items. Fourteen pair of new knee boots for undertakers, $49. Fourteen black cloth overcoats at $20 each, $280; fourteen black hats, $56, and the chief undertaker got $25 a day, and his fourteen assistants, $10 each. Now, need I go any further to show, by these few items that this has been an extraordinary expenditure, and that if the Government had any knowledge of the matter, they must come to the conclusion that the men they appointed to carry out the arrangement, must have been extravagant in the extreme, and that they have taken advantage of the occasion to charge more for the work than they should have done. For all of which the Government is responsible and deserve censure for this extravagance and waste of public money.

Mary's Cathedral, Halifax, cost $8,771.35, almost enough to erect a cathedral from the foundation upwards. How can such an extraordinary expenditure as that be justified? Take the item of $333.34 for lighting the provincial building for a few nights. Why, they had to make an apology at the beginning of their account to show that they had burned out some of their apparatus in securing the light required. Here is one man who draws not less than $1,228 for black material used, I suppose in decorations. Work at the cemetery entrance is charged for to the amount of $249, and

I have been listening not accounted for. attentively to this debate, and so far I have heard no satisfactory explanation. I have as much respect as any one for the memory of Sir John Thompson, and I once more say I wish I had the agreeable duty to keep silent now. There is no question now as to the memory of a man I am sure we all regret; but we are face to face with such extravagances that it is impossible to keep silent about them. I do not even know if we would not be justifiable to ask at once that a vote be taken, and more, that that sum of $25,000 should not be granted. This account was but recently put before us, and I could not for my part know the details of it. I regret it. I am a Roman Catholic, and as such it becomes me, perhaps, more than my Protestant colleagues in this House, to request that we should not vote this sum now, or at least that it should be considerably reduced; for it is our duty not to allow the doubt to bear on the Roman Catholics. which would necessarily remain were we to approve of this account without any protest. Our religion is not a religion of luxury. It is a modest and simple religion, and one which does not require such gorgeous displays as were made in this case. We are willing that our religious services should be held with dignity; but we are not willing that they should be surrounded with such an extravagance as we have witnessed in this case, I will say, painfully witnessed. There is not a Catholic in the province of Quebec who, I am sure, would not but join me in condemning this extravagant account. useless for the moment to review all the items of the expenditure that was incurred. according to the accounts laid on the Table of this House. But after hearing those who spoke before me this evening, I do not know whether I should not ask, as I already stated, that this item should not pass or that it should be reduced.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) I fear the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has not seen the accounts, otherwise he would not have stated that the Catholic church was in question in this case. The Catholic church at Halifax, where the ceremony of the funeral took place, was not paid a single dollar, and excepting what will be paid to the cathedral church at Ottawa, for the funeral service held there, nothing whatever was paid to the church. At Halifax the cathedral church was made a repository. The whole church was draped in mourning. and according to those who witnessed it, it was the finest spectacle of the kind that could be imagined. Such was the opinion of all those who had the advantage of attending those funerals. Over 8,000 yards of cloth were used as hangings, but not an inch of these remained to the church. If there was any extortion or fraud, it was solely by the suppliers. I do not say that some of them did not take advantage of the opportunity to charge about 50 per cent and even 75 per cent over the price they should have asked. But the Government cannot be blamed because suppliers charged more than the market price for their goods. Mr. Coste, an officer of the Public Works Department, who had charge of the preparations in this case. did not ask beforehand the price of the cloth. as he took it for granted that the prices would be moderate, and he presumed ordinary prices would be charged. The accounts now before the House have not yet been paid. I may say by the way that, for the protection of the Public Works Department, all the hangings were measured and valued by a man having experience in such goods. The department has taken every precaution not to be defrauded. Now, Mr. Speaker, we might be reproached with having been extravagant.

I may say in English that I am ready to admit, as the Minister of Public Works is to a great extent responsible for this expenditure that we might have been extravagant. When the sad news reached this country of the death of Sir John Thompson, it was followed by an outburst of sorrow from the United Kingdom and every part of the British Empire. To give an idea of the honour that was paid in England to our dead statesman, I may say that as far as I can ascertain the Imperial Government spent as much as £50,000 sterling for that purpose. They paid for everything. The coffin must certainly have cost £1,000, and everything else Therefore. was done on the same scale. when I sent Mr. Coste down to Halifax. I knew that he was competent for the task, and I told him that he had full scope-that he could do everything that he thought was befitting to honour the memory of the great man whose death caused so much sorrow throughout the whole British Empire. Now, that we have been extravagant I am willing to admit. Perhaps the decorations were too elaborate and costly; but was I not justified, and was my employee not justified, to a certain extent, if we were carried away by the occasion, and made more expenditures than we ever anticipated? I do not think this is one of the items that should be selected in the supplementary Estimates for discussion—and for what purpose? Just to kill time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OUIMET. Well, I will state that the people of Canada will not grudge the expenditure that has been made. The people of Canada will be ready to honour other dead statesmen, and will be ready to pay another $25,000 for any man placed in the same circumstances as those of Sir John Thompson. They would be willing to pay ten times that amount to secure the services of ten men like him. Of course, these men, who have shed so many tears—sonal: but I repeat that surely the taxpayers of Canada will never grudge this expenditure, and will never blame the Government for having made it, even if you call it extravagant. I am sorry to say that the circumstances did not allow me to control the expenditure, and did not even enable the employee I sent to Halifax to control it, as he would have done in other circumstances. But every gentleman who went to Halifax came back with this feeling, that as a Canadian he was proud that Canada could do what was done to honour our dead statesman.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am rather surprised at the remarks that have fallen from the Minister of Public Works. I am sure that there is not a man on either side who would not join in an expression of sincere regret at the unfortunate demise of a man of the recognized ability of Sir John Thompson. We would unitedly join around the last resting-place of that noble statesman in expressing, both personally and on behalf of the constituencies we represent, our feelings of sincere regret and sorrow that the nation should have been deprived, in such an untimely manner, of his acknowledged ability in the very middle of his life. No person who sat in this House and recognized his great abilities, session after session, but will deeply regret that we are called upon to mourn his unfortunate and sudden death. At the same time, I am surprised that the Minister of Public Works should have given such an unlimited command to his chief enengineer, whom he sent to Halifax for the purpose of conducting the funeral arrangements. We would have no objection at all to passing, and I am very sorry this committee has not been in a position to pass, in profound silence the item for the funeral expenses of Sir John Thompson; but the Government has so far exceeded the limits of prudence in this matter, that we cannot permit the vote to pass without raising our objection to the enormous extravagance that has apparently characterized the whole proceeding from beginning to end. I am sorry that the management of the affair was committed to the Minister of Public Works. appears to have entered upon the discharge of that particular duty in a most extravagant and reckless manner. It is only another evidence of the incapacity and recklessness of hon. gentlemen opposite. We do not want for a moment to challenge the propriety of giving to Sir John Thompson that rcognition in the way of a state funeral that we think he was justly entitled to; but we do challenge the extravagance connected with it. The whole of the unfortunate affair appears to have been characterized from beginning to end by revelry and enjoyment rather than by the profound regret and sorrow that should have characterized it. I think the Opposition are perfectly decline at least, but with reluctance, decora-

Mr. OUIMET. Well. I will not be per- justified in drawing the attention of the committee to the items that have been laid before us as evidences of the Government's recklessness and extravagance. We would have liked, silently and without a murmur, to have joined in the vote necessary to meet the expenses of the state funeral; but when hon, gentlemen opposite have run riot in the manner they have done, and sacrificed the public money in the face of the straitened circumstances of the country, in the face of the deficit that has to be met this year, and in the face of all the circumstances, we are sorry, and hon, gentlemen opposite should be ashamed of having to ask the committee to consent to this vote.

> Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) It is not an agreeable task for us, that of having to protest, in the present circumstance, against the vote claimed by the Government to meet the expenditure in connection with Sir John Thompson's funeral. I wish it to be well understood that we do not protest against the State funeral given to the late Prime Minister: but we must protest against the unprecedented extravagance displayed by the Government in the expenditure of public money in this case. I was pained to hear the hon. the Minister of Public Works trying to have us believe that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) had charged the Government, in his very judicious remarks, with having caused the Catholic church to profit by a certain portion of the money expended by the Government in this case. The Catholic church, if I know anything of it, is rather opposed to such an extraordinary pomp, which is wholly unwarranted and more likely to throw ridicule. not on the church itself, but on its ceremonies. I have no hesitation in saying that very few persons will be found in this country to approve such an The hon. the exaggerated expenditure. Minister of Public Works had to honestly confess a moment ago that some goods were for this funeral which were charged 50 and even 75 per cent in excess of their trade value.

> Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) But they have not been paid.

> Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) But should we allow the Government to disabuse of the power they have to throw on all sides abulous sums taken out of the public money. Should we not protest, when the opportunity offers, against these abuses which are daily occurrences, we would be wanting in our duty. I have no hesitation in saying once more that these extraordinary expenditures, made in connection with the funeral of a man, however exalted was his position in the country, and however greatest merits-merits which we all acknowledge—cannot be warranted in the judgment of any man nor according to the spirit of the Catholic church. Why. Mr. Chairman, we often see our priests and the second s

tions even more simple than those the Government was pleased to order in connection with this funeral. For instance, I see in this account an item for $2,000 for flowers.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) You do not contend that such an amount was paid for flowers, do you?

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) This is what appears in the account.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) It was not the amount that was paid.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) I say that you should not pay the amount of this ac-We have nothing else by which to be guided than the valuation laid on the Table of this House, and the amount for flowers. in round figures, is over $1,900. Then, if you are not going to pay it, why should you claim a vote for $25,000? Are there any new frauds behind this vote? The explanation given by the hon, the Minister of Public Works are such as to have us believe this. However it may be, I think I am only discharging a duty when I say here that I have no doubt whatever that the voters in this country will all disapprove of this wild-cat Some of the gentlemen who expenditure. spoke before me have referred to the expenditure made in connection with the funeral of statesmen, just as distinguished as the one whose loss we now mourn. was rather slight compared to the one we are now called upon to vote for, the funeral of Sir G. E. Cartier, including the expenditure made in England and the crossing of the ocean to Montreal, having only cost $10,-000, and that of Sir John A. Macdonald only $8,000. And it is just at the time when the Government is unable to meet the expenditure of the country, it is just at the time when an unprecedented uneasiness is felt everywhere, that the Government chooses the opportunity to throw away money as blindly as they did in this case. I, therefore, think I will be wanting in my duty were I not protesting on behalf of the voters against such an unwarranted waste of the public money.

Mr. TARTE. What is the amount paid so far?

Mr. OUIMET. Not a cent has been voted yet. The accounts are before the Auditor General, and are to be adjusted by him, and the Deputy Minister of Public Works and Railways and Canals. These two latter departments were entrusted with the task of seeing that the arrangements for the funeral were carried out, and I hope that this sum of $25,000 will cover the whole thing.

Contribution to the Lady Thompson Fund $25,000

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Here is another item, Mr. Chairman, against which we would much like not to be compelled to protest. If the widow of Sir John Thompson should be in such circumstances that she would require this money for keeping in the community the station which she had to hold, after the high position she had occupied, for my part I would be willing to vote it without any observation. Sir John Thompson has occupied during 25 years high positions, positions which enabled him to earn, I will not say much money, but a sufficient sum to provide for his relatives during his lifetime and even after his death. are none of us rich in this country; we are all depending on our daily labour. Most of us, in order to provide for our families, when we are gone, are taking as much insurance as we can bear, and it is a rather heavy burden. For my part, I cannot understand how a man so highly gifted as Sir John Thompson was could forget that he would have one day to pass away the same as any other mortal. I do not intend to make any further remarks about this, it was a question which concerned himself and his relatives. The point I wish to make out, Mr. Chairman, is this: Sir John Thompson, at the time of his death, represented a party in which there are many rich men. A public subscription was made which included not only those who supported him in politics, but also those who opposed him. That subscription, according to reports published so far, has yielded $35,000 to $40,000. If I am well informed the personal fortune left by the late Prime Minister amounted to $12,000 or $15,-000, so that the widow of Sir John Thompson happens to be now in possession of a fortune of about $50,000. There are many amongst us who, were they to be taken from this world to-morrow would not leave as much to their wives and their children. I need not make any extended remarks with respect to a question of this kind. I only wished to make known in a few words the objection I had against this item.

Mr. LAURIER. Whilst I have no desire on this item to influence the opinion of any hon. member on this side and still less on the other side, I must say that, as far as I am personally concerned, I am altogether of the view expressed by my hon. friend from South Oxford on the morrow of Sir John Thompson's death. of the destitute circumstances in which the late Sir John Thompson left his family, my hon, friend sent his contribution to the fund, and said that if an application were made to Parliament for a public grant to the widow and children he would support I altogether share that view. It may be said that such grants are not to be viewed with favour. I admit it. It may be said that they may set a precedent I grant that, which may be dangerous. also, but in all these circumstances I do not admit that there is any precedent but that each case must stand by itself. In this matter it is unfortunate that Sir John Thompson did not make any provision for his family while living, but the fact is that his family were left destitute, and, for my part, I could not bear the thoughtwhether it would be a good or a bad precedent-that the widow of a man who gave the best years of his life to the service of the state should be left absolutely penniless or even unable to maintain the station Of course, the she had during his life. amount may be large and, perhaps it might be a little smaller, but, on this I will not dilate. I think it would be a pity, a great pity, indeed, if the widow of the man who gave his services to the state should have any cause to regret that the head of her family, instead of working for his family, devoted the best years of his life to the service of his country. I hope this will not take place, and this is the reason why I support this motion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am sorry that I cannot agree with my respected leader on this question. I am here representing a class of people, the majority of whom have not one-fifth or one-tenth part of $50,000 to maintain families just as large I doubt very as Sir John Thompson's. much if there is one member in twenty in this House who has the amount I understand the widow of the late Sir John Thompson will have. I cannot, for one moment agree that we should go to people who work from early morn to late at night to make both ends meet, and ask them to contribute to a fund of $25,000 to be given to another person who does not stand in need of it. We are given to understand, on the best authority, that she will now be worth $50,000. She has not a very large family. Her two sons are young men who ought, as I had long before I reached their age, to earn their own money by the sweat of their brow. We have the power of voting money, but I do not think we are justified in voting public money for any private purpose whatever. I believe that will be the opinion of this country, and, therefore, I move that this item be struck out of the Estimates.

I also regret that I am not Mr. MARTIN. able in this matter to coincide with the views of the leader of the Opposition. I am prepared to agree with him, that these matters should be decided according to the special circumstances in each case. I would not go so far as the last speaker and agree to the rule that in no possible contingency would a grant of this kind be proper. take the view that, even following the principle suggested by the leader of the Opposition, the special circumstances in this case are all against making a grant to the widow. Take the case of a man who had spent his life in the service of the country, who had been for many years in opposition, serving the country better, perhaps, in opposition than he might have been able to do as head of a Government or member of a govern- tune. In our country it is far from being an

In such a case I think it would be ment. proper, eminently proper, for the country to place his family in such circumstances as they would have been if the man himself had devoted his life to private gain instead But, Mr. Chairman. of to public purposes. I fail to find, in the history of the gentleman with regard to whose family this vote is proposed, any such circumstances. That hon. gentleman was never in opposition in the Dominion of Canada. He was in office all the time that he was in this House, and during all that time he was in receipt of a fair He was not many years in office; salary. he spent the most of his life, as other members of the House have done, in pursuit of his own ends. He had an opportunity of saving money, he received the benefit of a large, lucrative law practice; he was afterwards a judge upon the bench; and I fail, Mr. Chairman, to see that any circumstances exist in the history of Sir John Thompson which would justify this Parliament to do the rather unprecedented thing of granting widow such a very large sum of We learn also that the country has mouey. already made very adequate provision for Lady Thompson, and I think that fact should be considered in this connection. as I say, to differ, not only with the leader of the Opposition, but also with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as to the principles involved in this I would go very much further than the hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and support, as I propose to support, the motion that has been moved that this item be struck out, because I do not see that Parliament, under the circumstances, would be at all justified in voting this large sum of public money to the widow of a man who cannot be said to have devoted his life to public purposes, who cannot be said to have made any very large sacrifices on behalf of the Dominion, who was fairly well paid for all the time he devoted to Canada's service, and who never spent a day in opposition in this Under these circumstances, I have no hesitation at all in supporting the motion to strike out this grant altogether.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman. I very much regret having to differ in my leader's opinion, but at the same time I regret that his generous heart should have led him to support the measure before the It is sometimes very nice to be House. guided by feelings and sympathies, but I think that we ought to act here as business men. It was many times asserted, since this discussion has been started, that the family of Sir John Thompson was not in a state of destitution, far from that, that it was not even in a state of want. Families are seldom found in this country having a fortune of $50,000 at their disposal, and if I believe the current reports, the family of Sir John Thompson is now in possession of such a for-embarrassed condition. I said a moment ago. when the previous item was under consideration that this was not the time for the Government to make presents and generosities. When uneasiness prevails all over the country, when the Government itself is in a disastrous condition, so to say, it is far from being the time to make such a liberality. Moreover, why should we so much compassionate the condition in which Sir John Thompson left his family? Sir John Thompson selected his career into which he went; he practised as a lawyer during some years. Then he was a candidate and a member, and later on he ascended the bench as a justice. After that he successfully got back into politics again, and as observed by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, he ever was lucky enough to side with the ruling party. During the time he was a Minister here, he drew a large salary, amounting even to $9,-000 per year. If after all we were asked to show such a generosity towards a man who would had rendered to the country signalled services without any remuneration whatever, there would not be much to say about it, but the Government wishes the hon, members of this House to compassionate the fate of a family left in what one may state easy circumstances, the fate of the family of a man who occupied lucrative positions which he had sought for and which he had been happy to feel. It is impossible for me. knowing as I do the opinion of the voters I represent here, knowing at the same time what I believe to be the opinion of the voters all over the Dominion, to approve of such an item. I say these sums, if voted by the majority in this House, will not be approved of by the electorate, and I have no hesitation in saying that even the hon, members who are going to support the Government and vote this item will not do it willingly but with an earnest regret.

Sir RICHARL CARTWRIGHT. Having already expressed my opinion as to the question at issue, I do not propose to speak upon it at any length. Like my hon, friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), I feel that it is a matter upon which every hon, gentleman has a perfect right to vote and express his own indi-But, for my own part, I vidual opinion. am inclined to think, while I do not believe that these cases should be drawn into a precedent, that there are circumstances in the present case which very fairly justify the representatives of the people of Canada in making a reasonable appropriation for the purpose of relieving the necessities of the family of the deceased statesman. So far as I understand the case, it is this: I have been informed, and I believe on good authority, that Sir John Thompson died in circumstances which left no provision at all for his family-no provision of any kind. Now, it is perfectly true that in a great many cases it is the usual thing to say that a man should provide for the wants of his children through the medium of life insurance or through some similar method. But I would call the attention of my hon. friends to this: In the first place. I do not believe that it was possible for any man in the position of Sir John Thompson after he became Premier of the Dominion, filling the position he filled, to make any saving of any considerable amount. I might point out to my hon, friends, also, that, in all human probability, during the last ten or twelve years of his life, it would have been impossible for him in his state of health-which unfortunately was not known -to have made any provision for his family in the ordinary way by means of life insur-He was struck down in the vigour of his manhood. He was struck down under circumstances which, rightly, I think, elicited the profound sympathy of every class of the community; and I do not believe that, in this case at any rate, the people at large will object to vote a reasonable and substantial tribute from the whole people to the children and widow of a deceased public servant who, according to his lights and the best of his ability, I believe, endeavoured to serve the country faithfully. Under the circumstances, I take the responsibility of supporting any reasonable and proper proposal the Government may see fit on its responsibility to sub-As to the question of precedent, we mit. have the annual vote of $1,200 to the widow of the late Sir George Cartier, who left his family, unhappily, in somewhat similar circumstances to those in which Sir John Thompson left his family. I think that is a reasonable precedent to be followed, and therefore, for my part, I shall feel fully justified in supporting the Government's proposition.

Mr. CURRAN. If nothing had been mentioned about it, my own opinion is, that the public subscriptions would have far exceeded the extra $25,000 which this Parliament is now being called upon to vote; and I am under the impression that the subscriptions would have reached probably $75,090. Under all these circumstances and in view of the very excellent speech that has been delivered this evening in such an admirable spirit by the hon. leader of the Opposition, I am satisfied that this House will almost unanimously concur in voting this sum that is asked by the Government for the widow and orphans of the late Sir John Thompson.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. I was exceedingly glad to hear the admirable terms in which the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred to this matter; and although I was not in the House while the leader of the Opposition spoke. I understand that he referred to it in terms of equal kindliness. Sir, I hope that the hon, gentlemen who have objected to this appropriation will gracefully withdraw their objections, and that they will permit the vote to be a unanimous As the hon, gentlemen has just said, I look upon it as being impossible that any Prime Minister, any one in the position of the late Sir John Thompson, could save anything on the allowance that he receives from the country. It is expected of them that they should entertain at the seat of government, and any one who has had the experience of that hon. gentleman, or who is acquainted with the requirements of that position, will know how impossible it is for him to save on the salary he receives. I do not think that this case should be looked upon as a precedent, but, on the present occasion, looking to all the circumstances of the case, I do trust that hon. gentlemen on either side of the House who may not have been disposed to support this appropriation, will finally see their way clear to allow it to go unanimously.

Mr. FRASER. The reason given by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) compels me to vote against the proposal of the Government. If a Premier cannot save any money, then we are reduced to this strait, that the family of any man who accepts that position, unless he has provided means for them, must be provided for after his death at the expense of the country. If a Premier of this country cannot save anything as a provision for his family, then let us understand it; and then every future Premier, unless he is a man of means like the hon. member for Montreal, may expect his family to be provided for by this country. I dissent from that position entirely, and that is one reason why I am compelled to vote against There may be distinguished services rendered, and a man may put himself in such a position that this country ought to provide for him, and I would not object to a certain amount being paid per year, as was done in the case of the widow of the late Sir George E. Cartier; but in voting a sum total, and voting it on the grounds given by the hon. member for Montreal, we are practically setting a precedent for all future Parliaments in Canada in favour of the families of men who may hereafter much respect as any man in Parliament of the memory of the late Premier, but I must say that if his widow receives $25,000 because, on the salary he receives, he could make no provision for his family, then we are going to establish a precedent that every man who enters Parliament hereafter must act upon, namely, that if a Premier dies without means, then his country must support his wife and family. dissent entirely from that view. I would not like that every man who becomes Premier should feel that when he died his wife and family would be provided for by If there is no better ground the public. than that, then I must vote against this proposition. I think every man in this country should understand that he must live according to the salary he receives. Nor do I think it ought to be necessary that a Premier who receives $8,000 or $9,000 a year, should expend it in entertaining. I think it would be much better for this country that the Premier should save part of his salary, than to expend it on entertaining. If a Premier does his work well, and no man can say that Sir John Thompson did not do his work well, then let him not entertain at all. It is no discredit to a man if he does not entertain, and I do not think it is part of his functions to entertain, especially if, in doing so, he has to spend money that he ought to save for his wife and family. This is a democratic country, and we must not set up any high position of that kind. Therefore, I must vote against this grant, although I do it reluctantly. There may be a case where a Premier is suddenly called away, and where his family is left in indigence, and in that case I would support a grant. I would not like to see any gentleman holding a high position in this country dying suddenly and leaving his family in such a position that they would have to earn their own bread, but that is not the case with the family of the late Premier; and while I have the highest respect for the late Sir John Thompson, I do not think we should grant this vote.

Mr. CASEY. As this is a case on which members are voting and speaking individually, it is proper that I should say a few words to express my views, otherwise than . by my vote. I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) that the remarks of the hon. member for Montreal (Sir Donald Smith) settle this question against this grant. I do not think that the question is being put before the House upon the basis of the remarks of the hon. member for Montreal. While those remarks were well meant, and in good taste, perhaps they are not the strongest arguments that could be used in favour of the amount I do not think, we are asked to give. with my hon. friend from Guysboro' in adopting this Estimate we should be become Premiers. Now, I speak with as establishing a precedent in favour of the families of all deceased Premiers, and I should not like to give my adherence to friend from Guysboro' my hon. any such proposition. I agree with my hon. friend from Guysboro' in another sentence, however, to the effect that in a case of sudden death, and a family left in destitution, compelling them to drop out of their ordinary positions in life and earn their own bread, he would be willing to agree to a grant. It does seem to me, as it seems to my leader and to the hon. member for South Oxford, that this is one of those The provision that has been made by the general public, which I have heard estimated at $25,000, does not seem to be sufficient to keep the family with the interest of that sum, and if it is to be used as principal, it would not last very long. I cannot consider, therefore, that the family of Sir John Thompson is provided for in a manner at all sufficient to enable them to get an education, and to live, according to their previous position in life.

An hon. MEMBER. Why should they be?

Mr. CASEY. I will give my ideas on that point a little later. I see no objection to the principle that in a case of this kind, public provision should be made by this House to prevent the families of deceased Premiers from falling back entirely out of the position in which he left them. That is the statement of the hon. member for Guysboro', and I do not see how he differentiates the present case from one in which he would support such a grant.

We must remember that although the latter part of Sir John Thompson's life was passed in a high and fairly well paid position, his whole life was not so spent. He began life as a penniless young man, and by the time he reached that period when he ought to be in the best position to lay by money for his family his time was taken up principally with public duties either as a judge or politician. I am not prepared to go so far as to say that those occupations create a legal claim on the country, which we all admit he well served, not as we think on the right side of politics but according to his own views.

But I do believe long service to the country, combined with special circumstances, as to time and financial accompaniments at death, create not perhaps an actual legal claim on the country, but a case where assistance may fairly be given, and I am prepared to go with my leader in this particular case, and to say that a claim for our consideration does arise.

I must say I believe such a case arose before. When Hon. Alexander Mackenzie went out of power, when he died and left his widow not well provided for, a case arose then when it would have been particularly graceful and proper if hon, gentlemen opposite had proposed a grant to that lady in recognition of the undoubted services that her husband had rendered to the state. I believe there was a case which combined all the elements calling for a public grant much more strongly than the present case. In that case, however, such a course was not adopted. I think hon, gentlemen opposite are probably sorry they did not adopt that course at that time, but I must say that because the right course was not adopted then, it is no reason why it should not be adopted now.

As to the question of how a Premier spends his money, I do not think we are called upon to decide in this connection. I hold as a matter of fact in the present condition of the country, democratic though it be, that if the Premier did not entertain pretty freely some of those who do not agree with him in politics would be very apt to say he was a mean man, that he did not keep up the traditions of his office, and so on. An hon, member behind me says, they do not entertain this side of the House very much. There may perhaps be more truth than poetry in that remark; but at all events I say that if they did not entertain to some exent they would certainly be called very mean men. There are, however, other expenses besides those connected with entertaining. There are many claims made on the first Minister not in connection with entertainments. He has to subscribe to many funds, and I quite agree with the hon. member for South Oxford that it is very hard for a man in his position to save I must agree also with the hon. money. member for Maskinonge (Mr. Legris), who said that there are many families not in any better condition than that of Sir John Thompson, who consider themselves very well off. That may be true, but at the same time that position may not under the circumstances amount to one of being very well off for the Thompson family. From all these points of view I have come to the conclusion that in this case it is only a question of amount, and as the Government have taken the responsibility of recommending this sum, knowing it to be a delicate question, and one that would be debated in the House and that they have taken the responsibility of placing this amount in the Estimates, presumably as low as they reasonably could, knowing the circumstances of the family, I am compelled to support the stand taken by the leader, rather than that taken by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald.)

Mr. SCRIVER. It is rather an ungracious thing to oppose to any extent a vote like this, and it is very unpleasant to seem to put oneself in antagonism to the interest of the widow and the orphan; but before taking a decided stand upon this matter I should like to have a little more information than I have at my command, and I suppose those who are responsible for this item in the Estimates will be able to furnish it. I agree with some of those hon, members who have preceded me that if Lady

Thompson has at her command, or will have at her command, $50,000, she will be in a position to live comfortably and respectably, particularly, if, as I have seen stated in the public print to be the case, the education of her two sons is to be provided for by a distinguished individual. I am not going into the question of what is expected at the hands of the Premier of this country. I am quite prepared to believe that even with the large salary he receives, it would be difficult for him to save any considerable amount. But it has been stated here with considerable positiveness that the private subscription for Lady Thompson's benefit amounts to about $35,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Thirty eight thousand.

Mr. SCRIVER. And that the life insurance which the Premier had effected before his death amounted to from $12,000 to $15,000.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). That was used up in providing for private liabilities.

Mr. SCRIVER. If Lady Thompson will command about $50,000, I do not think this country is called upon to vote an additional sum of $25,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman asks for information before making his decision. I am not here to make a detailed statement as to the minute private affairs of the family; but I will say this, that the country's contribution amounts at the present time to about $38,000. The estate, after the liabilities are paid, will furnish nothing like an adequate provision for the family of Sir John Thompson.

Mr. SCRIVER. Does it amount to $12,000 or $15,000?

Mr. FOSTER. It does not amount to anythink like that. The estate, after the debts are paid, as an investment would not yield to Lady Thompson and family $500 a year. I want to emphasize also one point brought out to-night. When the death took place subscriptions were asked, and there was a wide expression of opinion in the country that Parliament ought and undoubtedly would make some provision for the family. and I have not the least doubt that that wide expression of opinion came to be looked upon as a certainty, and therefore the popular subscription was not as large as it otherwise would have been. A good deal of thought was bestowed on the amount that should be asked. The Government did not wish to be extravagant, but it did wish to supplement the means at the disposal of the family by a fair amount, because in some respects it must be remembered that the family is not one which can, in all its branches, earn its living. Sir John Thompson had a favourite and in some respects an afflicted child in regard to her physical condition, and that child remains the care of her mother. All these matters taken into consideration made the Government determine to propose a reasonable amount, $25,000, and although this country is not rich, it is rich enough to see that the family of a public man, who, according to his light and ability, did good work for his country, even when suffering from physical infirmity without our knowing it, shall not suffer want because death has stricken him down.

Mr. EDGAR. I was rather sorry to hear the Solicitor General, I am sure inadvertently, make a statement which threw almost a slur on the generous letter of the hon, member for South Oxford.

Mr. CURRAN. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. EDGAR. I am very glad to hear that. But the hon, gentleman suggested that the fact the letter was written prevented subscriptions coming in. Surely it was a pity to throw that across the House, especially when the hon, member for South Oxford in taking his present position in this matter, is differing from so many of his friends.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not meant.

Mr. EDGAR. It was an unfortunate reference, at any rate. Now, I would be very sorry to think that this vote to-night, if it is carried, for it will be carried, should be a precedent for making a grant of this kind, under all circumstances, to the families of ex-Premiers. For many reasons, I think it should not be made a precedent. But the suddenness of the death of Sir John Thompson prevented him making the provision which I have no doubt he soon expected to make for his family, and I think that the character of the disease which carried him off must, for years and years, have prevented his obtaining life in-There was another case in this surance. country of a somewhat similar character. I refer to the death of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and I am glad to be told tonight by my leader here, that on the occasion of his death, an offer was made, or at least a suggestion was made, by a prominent member of the Ministry, that the members of the Government would be glad to consider and to support a vote to Mrs. Mackenzie, if it were necessary. That, however, was declined by the relatives of Mrs. Mackenzie, because the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie died, leaving a moderate, but sufficient provision for his widow. I do not think that a case, similar to this, is likely to occur again, and I do not think that this will be a precedent which can be quoted hereafter. I would have liked to see a grant somewhat smaller, something more in the shape of the grant which was made to Sir George Cartier's widow, in the shape of an annuity, but still I do not want to vote against this, or to strike it out of the Estimates altogether.

Mr. CASEY. In view of what has been stated, I beg to withdraw anything I have said with reference to the Government not giving a grant to the widow of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I was not aware that such an offer had been made.

Mr. McMILLAN. While I have every respect for the memory of the deceased statesman, and while I believe that he was a gentleman who tried to work in the interests of this country, still, I find that his family must be possessed of $48,000 or $58,000, and considering that his sons are young men who have graduated in their profession—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McMILLAN. That has been stated. Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMILLAN. It has been stated that a majority of the people of this country would be favourable to such a vote, but I know that in the locality in which I live, that the majority of the people would not be favourable to it, under the circumstances in which the family is placed. While I feel that my own sympathy might lead me to allow the sum to pass without a vote, yet I consider that I have a public duty to perform to my constituents, and, knowing the feeling of my constituents, I must allow my private feeling to give way, and discharge my public duty by voting for the amendment of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald).

House divided: Yeas, 73; nays, 42.

Resolution concurred in.

To pay for the purchase and distribution of seed grain to needy settlers resident in the North-west Territories, chiefly in the district of Assiniboia (to cover Governor General's Warrant of $50,000)

$55,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has that money been paid, and if so, how has the distribution been made?

The money has not been Mr. DALY. paid yet. As the hon, gentleman may know, last year unfortunately a large portion of the district of Assiniboia was affected by the drouth. A number of the farmers were absolutely left without any seed grain, and, in addition to that were scarcely left with sufficient grain to meet the ordinary requirements of their household or to feed their cattle. The local government had to come to their aid by establishing relief works under which they enabled to earn enough money to keep them going. This spring, representations were made to the Government by Lieutenant-Governor, by the representatives in the Local Assembly, and by all the leading men in the Territories, that there were thousands of acres of land in Assiniboia and a portion of Saskatchewan that could not be cultivated unless the seed was pro-Although the Government were vided.

opposed to the granting of seed, the case was put in such strong light that they came to the conclusion that although they did not desire to follow the precedents created by giving seed grain to the people, that, under the circumstances, they were fully justified. Had the Government not done so, thousands of acres of land would have remained uncultivated, because the people were not in a position to get seed grain. They had not the means to purchase it, or credit to borrow, and we had to come to their aid. So far as I am personally concerned I may say that I am opposed to the Government being called upon to make grants similar to these, because I think the people in the Territories should deal with these matters the same as they do in Manitoba, and if aid is given to them, that it should be given by the Local Assembly, or by the municipalities. We had to deal with the facts as they were presented us; and, in consequence of conditions I have mentioned, the Government had to give this aid. The aid was principally given to farmers in the neighbourhood of Pense, Moosejaw, Regina and Balgonie, and a little in the eastern portion of Assiniboia. Demands were made upon us at first to the extent of $125,000; but we thought they were extravagant, and, after inquiries by officers of the department, they were cut down some 40 per cent. The grain was purchased as economically as possible, we got from the Canadian Pacific Railway half rates, and we distributed the grain through the agricultural societies. It was only given to those who made a declaration, in the first place, " that the applicant had so "many acres under cultivation, that he had "lost his crop in consequence of drought, " prairie fire, or other natural cause, or cause "beyond his control, and did not possess the "grain requisite to sow a -- number of "acres; and that he required for that pur-- bushels of wheat, which he agreed "should be sown during the present season "on the quarter-section specified." Besides making that declaration, he had to give a bond and two sureties. So that the grain has been given at a fixed price which will repay to the Government the cost of the grain, transportation, bagging and distribution; and we hold as security for it a lien upon the lands of those who have not got their patents, and a bond with two sureties in an amount sufficient to insure the repayment from those who have got their patents.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the Minister how it was that in the Regina "Leader" it was announced that it was necessary for farmers to apply to Mr. Davin, M.P., in order to get the seed grain?

Mr. DALY. I cannot answer the hon. gentleman. I shall have to refer him to the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). So far as I am concerned, Mr. Davin, the member had nothing whatever to do with the distribution, which was made at Regina, as at other places, through the agricultural society.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is aware that the Regina "Leader" announced that owing to technical difficulties, the Government were not able to communicate with the settlers, and that an application had to be made through the hon, member for Western Assiniboia.

Mr. DALY. Yes, I saw that myself.

Mr. MARTIN. The Regina "Leader" is supposed to be published and edited by the hon, member for Western Assiniboia. I regret that that hon, gentleman is not present and I would like this item to stand in order that he may have an opportunity of explaining that most extraordinary announcement. It will be remembered that a general election was supposed to be imminent and likely to take place in a few weeks; so that we can understand how very improper a statement this was to be made in a newspaper controlled by a member of this House as to the distribution of a very considerable sum of money, which had been obtained partly through the efforts of that hon. member. There could be only one object of an announcement of that kind; it was made with the intention of helping the hon. gentleman in his campaign; and I must say that the position of affairs in Western Assiniboia as the elections appeared to approach were such as to justify him in taking even the most extreme measures to strengthen his hold upon the electors. But I think this was too extreme a measure for the hon. gentleman to adopt, and that some explanation should, if possible, be obtained from him as to how he could possibly make a statement which I understand from the Minister of the Interior was entirely unauthorized by the department-which I felt quite satisfied must have been unauthorized by the department before the hon. Minister made any explanation of it.

Mr. MULOCK. Do I understand the hon. Minister to say that the expenditure has not yet taken place?

Mr. DALY. Yes; we have bought all the grain, but we have bought it on time; we have not settled for it yet.

Mr. MULOCK. Why was the grant made, in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman and the Government thought it should be made through some of the local legislatures? In this case, the proper legislature, according to his theory, would have that of the Territories?

Mr. DALY. That is my individual opinion; I am not expressing the opinion of the Government. I said I thought that in future any such grant, if made, should be made in the same manner as it is in Manitoba. The Government of Manitoba last session,

I think, introduced a Bill, called the Seed Grain Act, by which it is provided that the municipalities can borrow sums to the amount, I think, of $5,000 to purchase grain and distribute it in quantities not exceeding $75 in value to individual applicants, and that promissory notes given for it by the persons to whom this relief is given shall become a lien on their land. My idea was that similar machinery might be adopted by the Legislative Assembly at Regina. I impressed that view on the Executive, and I hope that on no future occasion will this Parliament be called upon to make a similar grant, because we give money to the local assemblies for purposes of this kind, and I think they should deal with them. That is my own individual view.

Mr. GRIEVE. What kind of seed grain was distributed?

Mr. DALY. Wheat, barley, oats and potatoes.

From whom was it pur-Mr. GRIEVE. chased?

Mr. DALY. The wheat from S. P. Clark & Co., the Western Milling Company, Brigham & James, R. D. Martin & Co., and 3.000 bushels from farmers at Indian Head, purchased by Mr. McKay, Superintendent of Indian Farms; oats from Rogers, F. Mackenzie, and others; barley from Rogers, and small amounts from farmers at York and Estevan.

Mr. GRIEVE. What price was paid?

Mr. DALY. For wheat, including sacks. 571/2 cents; for the barley, 40 cents, and for the oats, 33 cents. That is exclusive of freight.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to bring before the notice of the committee some resolutions with regard to this matter that were adopted by the Assiniboia Agricultural Society, which met at Regina on the 18th of May last. According to the Regina "Standard," the following resolution was carried unanimously and the secretary was instructed to forward copies to the local papers :-

Resolved,—That this society is pleased that the Order in Council granting a further sum of $5,000 for seed grain was passed, as it will greatly assist those who, in this district, have received but a meagre portion of seed;

That it is the opinion of this society that the attention of the Premier should be called to the following facts in connection with the distribution of seed grain:

(1) A great part of the grain, but more especially of the oats, was not properly cleaned for seed, and some cars of oats were, in fact, not cleaned at all. That large quantities of foul seeds, including wild oats, mustard, buckwheat, etc., were to be found in the grain, thus filling the country with noxious weeds and doing an incalculable amount of injury. We exceedingly recalculable amount of injury. We exceedingly regret that the inspection of the grain was conducted in such a careless manner.

Mr. DALY.

(2) The manner in which the distribution has been carried on has been very careless and dilatory. More grain was sent to some points than was required, e.g., at Calgary over two cars were afterwards sold,—thus depriving needy districts of a sufficient quantity.

Grain was distributed at many points in Eastern Assiniboia, where they had fair crops last year, in the same proportions as the most needy districts—this not being a fair manner of distribution.

Between 30 and 40 names were left off the lists by the careless manner in which the lists were revised by the Department at Winnipeg, and many men who should have received grain at one point had, owing to their names being placed on the wrong list, to travel to another, in some cases necessitating a trip of eighty miles to get the grain.

(3) On May 10th an Order in Council was passed granting $5,000 additional for seed grain, and no definite word has been received as to when the grain will arrive here. (May 22nd, no word received yet.)

Of course after that time it was too late to sow wheat, at any rate, and even oats, while barley perhaps might be sowed.

(4) We further consider that if the original appropriation of $50,000 had been carefully expended, and if only those districts actually requiring seed, had received it, that it would have been sufficient to have given every needy settler all that he required, but for the reasons already stated, many farmers have but a small acreage in, and unless there is an exceedingly good yield this season, they will most likely require assistance again next year.

Those are the resolutions of the agricultural society, a body that is particularly interested in this matter—non-partisan body—and they certainly are calculated to reflect very strongly on the administration of the department. I have heard a good deal outside of this particular report as to the very inadequate manner in which the distribution of this grain was attended to and the almost entire lack of inspection. There is nothing in the west that people are more alarmed at than the spread of noxious weeds. In the older portions of Manitoba, along the Red and Assinibola rivers, the country has been practically destroyed in certain places by these noxious weeds. The French weed, wild mustard, wild oats and weeds of that kind have become so thick that the Government have been obliged to pass laws by which the inspectors are authorized to go out and order the whole crops cut in order to prevent, if possible, the extension of this nuisance. In the newer portions of the country, where noxious weeds have not become a fixture, every possible precaution is used to prevent them being brought in. I am sure the Government could do no greater damage to a new portion such as that to which the seed grain was furnished, than to allow oats, wheat and barley to be sent there containing large quantities of noxious weeds. The amount of harm that would be done in that direction would go very far indeed to neutralize the benefits that were undoubtedly conferred upon these people.

Mr. COCHRANE. Could the farmers not clean the grain before using it?

Mr. MARTIN. No; it is very hard indeed to clean out these noxious weeds. It is almost impossible. I suppose it can be done, but it requires special appliances.

Mr. COCHRANE. Where did he get the grain?

I do not know, but I Mr. MARTIN. judged from what the Minister said that he got it at various points in Manitoba. S. P. Clarke & Co., are grain dealers in Manitoba. and there certainly ought not to have been any serious difficulty in obtaining very clean seed, indeed if these portions had been gone to where noxious weeds do not exist; and a greater part of Manitoba is almost entirely free from them. The Government should have had no difficulty indeed in getting good clean seed. Then the charge that the grain was distributed just as largely in those districts where it was not badly needed as in districts where it was, is also a serious one. I know myself that the grain which was sent to Calgary was very considerably in excess of the amount required, and I saw an advertisement in a Calgary paper, over the signature of Amos Rowe, the Government land agent, offering for sale at public auction, I think, some carloads of grain that were not required. While I agree with the policy of the department in making this advance, I certainly regret that it is possible for a society to come to the conclusion that there has been very loose administration of the money after it was granted.

Mr. DALY. I cannot for the life of me understand why that resolution was passed by the agricultural society. L.do not think it was. It may have been passed in the name of the society, but so far as my information goes it was passed at the meeting of a few disgruntled members of the society after the regular meeting had adjourned. I may say that the grain was purchased principally at the following points: Morden, Moosomin, Indian Head, Regina and Elkhorn. In such localities there are no foul seeds such as the hon, gentleman talks of. In the second. place, the grain was examined by Angus McKay, superintendent of the Indian Head Farm; Superintendent Bedford, of Brandon; and Mr. Aikman, a gentleman quite competent for that purpose. They report that there was no reason at all for this resolution, that all the grain was shipped through elevators, and that if there were foul seeds in it, they were only the seeds left there and which it was expected the farmers would take out themselves by the use of their fanning-mills as they would if sowing their own seed. It must be remembered that authority was only given on the 26th March the commissioner to make the distribution, and that fourteen days later, 95,000 bushels of grain were shipped. The grain was distributed in exactly the same manner as in previous years. No dissatisfaction was ever expressed before, and, though I cannot say that it is so, it may be possible that some of the gentlemen who complained at Regina did not have the same interest in the distribution of this grain that they had in previous But the distribution was made fairly, and all the farmers and those whose needs were made known were served, and they were not inconvenienced in any way in getting the grain. Now, as to the grain shipped to Calgary, there were 911 bushels of wheat, 646 bushels of oats, and 126 bushels of barley; and they were sold for almost the cost price, namely $859.61, and that sum was spent for a car of potatoes, and two cars of barley, which were distributed at Balgonie, and Moose Jaw. in the very districts these gentlemen complain about. As to the proportion of grain distributed in eastern and western Assiniboia, the amount distributed in eastern Assinniboia was 14,249 bushels, which were distributed east of range 10, west of the second meridian, and in western Assiniboia, As soon as my attention 71.000 bushels. was called to the resolution the hon. gentleman has read, I asked for a report from the commissioner at Winnipeg, and that was the reply I got. I do not think there is anything in the resolutions passed under the name of the Agricultural Society of Regina, because, strange to say, we have not received a complaint from any other point at which grain was distributed; and I have heard of no complaints other than those the hon, gentleman has read. The greatest possible care was exercised by the officers and the inspections were made as thoroughly as they could be under the circumstances. The best grain was got, and it was purchased at the lowest figures, and every safeguard surrounded the distribution that the officers could provide in the time they had.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. Minister say what were the exact steps taken in this distribution to reach the farmer?

Mr. DALY. Advertisements were put in the newspapers, and the secretaries of the different societies were telegraphed to to get in the names—

Mr. MULOCK. Telegraphed to by whom?

Mr. DALY. By the commissioner at Winnipeg—the names of those who wanted seed-grain. If the hon, gentleman was in the House when I made my explanation he knows that every applicant has to make a declaration—

Mr. MULOCK. I understood that point.

Mr. DALY. Every possible facility was afforded for every person who wanted seed grain to come in and get it, and they got it in the proportions they required.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. MULOCK. On a former occasion this distribution was made very largely through the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), applications having to be made directly to him.

Mr. DALY. I never heard of that.

Mr. MULOCK. It was probably before the hon, gentleman took charge of the department. I am not making these remarks at all as derogatory to the hon. gentleman's management, because I have been exceedingly pleased with the business-like character of his explanation here this evening, and I wish to emphasize my approval of the policy of making this distribution wholly through official channels, and not through any person who happens, for the time being, to represent a constituency. I understand that on the present occasion the representative for Western Assinibola -and the representative for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) for that matter-had nothing to do directly or indirectly with the distribution of grain, but that appli-cants were treated impartially, and required not political assistance or political interference in order to obtain their fair share of this grain. Is that the state of affairs?

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman states it correctly—no influence whatever.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister said that the money had not been paid. Were these grains and seed vegetables bought directly from the persons named?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the Government owes this large number of persons their respective bills.

Mr. DALY. No. The seed was bought on time, sixty days, or something like that —I cannot recall it exactly. I presume we shall have the Bills in about now.

Mr. MULOCK. It seems rather an undignified procedure for the Dominion Government to be indebted to these dealers, a dozen or twenty of them, for these small quantities of grain.

Mr. DALY. The parties were quite willing to make the bargain on those terms.

Mr. MULOCK. Were any tenders asked for, for this supply?

Mr. DALY. No; that was impossible. There was not time for that. It was the 25th March when the instructions were given. But, though tenders were not asked for in the sense of advertisements being published, the samples were put in and offers made by the different dealers, and the lowest offer taken, sample considered, in each case; and the samples were examined by the gentlemen I named.

Mr. MULOCK. When are the farmers obliged to repay?

Mr. DALY. In the fall, or not later than 1st March next.

Mr. MULOCK. Were notes taken in each case?

Mr. DALY. Not notes; bonds.

Mr. FOSTER. The matter covered by this resolution was brought to my attetion by Senator Sullivan, as he explained to me in a letter since, thinking that it was the rule to pay such items. He was ill and was at his home a portion of the time while he was ill. The law makes provision that a member of either House while he is ill here is to be paid. And the item was put in. There are, however, a good many cases which are parallel with this. Senator Sullivan was very kind about it and said that he had put it in thinking it was a matter of course, but if it were to set a bad precedent he would not press it. I propose to let the item drop.

Mr. MULOCK. I would remind the Minister that we have frequently voted sums under these circumstances to members who have been absent from Ottawa by reason of illness.

Mr. FOSTER. Not very often.

Mr. MULOCK. I can give a number of cases.

Mr. FOSTER. We have done it in some very serious cases.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not objecting to the dropping of this item, but I think that in these cases there ought to be a definite rule applicable to all.

Mr. FOSTER. That is to be the rule applicable to all.

Mr. MULOCK. The rule applicable to all is the rule laid down in the statute?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sault Ste. Marie Canal-construction.... $310,000

Mr. FOSTER. The same remark applies to this as to a previous case—there will be an item in the main Estimates upon which the discussion can come up.

Resolutions reported.

ADJOURNMENT-THE CRIMINAL CODE.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, on the reference of the Criminal Code amendments to the committee, it will be in order to suggest any amendments that are not subjects of Bills before the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think so.

Mr. MULOCK. It is not necessary to enlarge the powers of reference?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think so.

Mr. MULOCK. If it were necessary to enlarge the powers of the reference, I would ask the Minister if he would get that power.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There are several amendments other than those referred, and I think the hon. gentleman's idea will be accepted.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.05 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 14th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 117) respecting La Chambre de Commerce de Montréal.—(Mr. Lépine.)

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FORBES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, might I ask the hon. Secretary of State when I may expect a return to the order in reference to the industrial establishments of the county of Shelburne? The hon. gentleman submitted to the House a partial return, giving the industrial establishments of the county of Queen's, but not those of the county of Shelburne.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I supposed, when I presented the return, that it fulfilled the order of the House; but my attention was called to the fact only yesterday afternoon that it was only partial, and I presume that the rest of the return will be ready in a day or two.

Mr. FORBES. I would also ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he will get the report on the Fisheries?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may answer for the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that it will be ready in two or three days. It is all in type.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to inquire when an order of the House, passed on the 25th of April, regarding payments of money to Hayter Reed, will be brought down, and also the return ordered on the 26th of April in regard to superannuation?

Mr. FOSTER. In reference to the lastnamed return, all I can say is that it is being prepared with all possible despatch. I cannot tell when it will be brought down. I will inquire and let the hon, gentleman know on Monday.

Mr. DALY. As to the other return, it will be here on Monday, I think—at all events, before the supplementary Estimates are brought down.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. Minister of Finance tell me when the return moved for in April, 1894, and again in April, 1895, for correspondence connected with the Canadian Mutual Aid and Massachusetts Benefit Society will be down?

Mr. FOSTER. I will inquire and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether a return to which I called his attention privately the other day is ready? It was ordered by this House a year ago.

Mr. OUIMET. I inquired of my department without getting any satisfaction, and just before the hon. gentleman got up I was writing to my deputy asking again when the return would be ready.

Mr. BRODEUR. I wish to inquire of the leader of the House whether he intends to lay before this House the report of the inspector concerning the dismissal of Mr. Loiselle, postmaster of Ste. Angèle de Monnoir? In the discussion which took place on that matter the other day, the leader of the House promised that the report would be brought down; but it is not here yet, and I would like to know when we may expect it.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not had my attention called to it before. The House knows that I promised that it would be brought down, and I will see that it is done.

Mr. BRODEUR. When may we expect it —Monday?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose so—or later. Mr. Montague.

SUPPLY-CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

To complete Valleyfield drain...... $5,700

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to this item, the Minister of Railways and Canals has handed me a memorandum of the details. They are as follows:—

To provide for overdraft	$1,236	33
To pay Contractor Grier's final esti-	799	21
To pay Contractor Chagnon's men's back wages	2,235	58 accounts Expenses in connection therewith	1,302 126
	AT 700	~~

If there is no objection, I should like to have those details entered in the vote, as otherwise payment might be objected to by the Auditor General under the wording of the vote. I move that these details be added.

Motion agreed to, and item, as amended, concurred in.

To renew superstructure of pier at lower entrance of Farran's Point Canal...... $8,000

Mr. FOSTER. This work is provided for to the amount of $8,000, but at so late a period in the year that it will be impossible to spend that amount during the current fiscal year. Under the circumstances, and as I do not want to include it in the supplementary Estimates, I want to add that it be available for construction until 1st September 1895. Otherwise any portion carried on after the 1st July, 1895, could not be paid for, this vote having lapsed, unless another vote be brought down in the supplementaries.

Mr. LAURIER. You will not be able to close your account.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that will allow the account to be closed. I move that this item be amended by adding the words "to be available until the 1st September, 1895."

Motion agreed to; item, as amended, concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the same amendment be made to this item—that it be available until 1st September, 1895—and for the same reason.

Amendment agreed to, and resolution, as amended, concurred in.

Mr. McMULLEN. This, in my opinion, is unquestionably an extravagant expenditure, and I am opposed to it. I move that it be struck out.

Further amount required to meet expenditure in connection with the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic...... $8,000

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he would explain some words in the resolution that was before the House last night in regard to this item. There is in brackets at the end of the item, page 240 of the Votes and Proceedings, these words: "And to make it available up to the 31st December, 1895."

Mr. FOSTER. That explains itself, really. There is an item of $20,000 in the miscellaneous for the current year, 1894-95, for printing in connection with this commission. The printing will not be done when this year closes, and for any printing on that account that is done after the first of the next financial year, there will be no vote.

Mr. MULOCK. This is practically a supplementary estimate for 1895-96.

Mr. FOSTER. It is carrying on the vote to make it available up to December, 1895.

Mr. MULOCK. It is practically a supplementary estimate for 1895-96.

Mr. FOSTER. Just as you please.

To cover expenses of the late Hon. Sir J. S. D. Thompson's funeral (Governor General's warrant).....

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When this item was before the committee last night I expressed my views to the effect that I was in perfect unison with the Government in giving a public funeral to the remains of the late Sir John Thompson. I expressed also my further view as to the extravagance which, in my humble opinion, marked the expenditure connected with that funeral. I thought the amount was about four times what it ought to have been. I was quite satisfied, as one member of this House, that the same amount, or anywhere near it, which had been paid for the funeral of the late Sir John Macdonald, should have been appropriated for the purpose of the funeral of the late Sir John Thompson: but I cannot vote in silence to expend $25,000 for the purpose, when I think it is unjustifiable, and extravagant, and opposed to the wishes of the people at I, therefore, without further comment, will move, by way of emphasizing my opinion on the subject, "that the amount be reduced by the sum of $15,000."

Mr. LAURIER. This is a motion which ought to be adopted by the House. I fully share in all the remarks made yesterday by my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. There is no desire at all to find fault with the Government in giving a public funeral to the late Sir John Thompson, and I agree with every word which was spoken in that sense last evening, not only by the hon, member for Queen's, but by the leader speaks have been reduced to current mar-

Amendment negatived on division, and re- of the House. But in view of the language and the explanations which were given yesterday by the Minister of Public Works on this item, I cannot conceive how it is possible to adops the resolution which is now before the House, and to refuse to cut down the expenditure by the amount stated in the motion. First of all, it must be remembered that it was stated yesterday by the leader of the House, and by the Minister of Public Works also, that although a special warrant was obtained from the Governor General to cover this expenditure, still the warrant has remained in abeyance, and no payments have yet been made. Now, this is what the Minister of Public Works stated yesterday upon this subject, speaking in French:

> S'il y a eu extortion et fraude, c'est uniquement de la part des fournisseurs. Je ne dis pas que quelques-uns d'entre eux n'ont pas profité de la circonstance pour surcharger environ 50 pour 100 et même 75 pour 100 de plus que le prix qu'ils auraient dû demander. Mais on ne peut blâmer le gouvernement du fait que des fournisseurs ont voulu avoir plus que le prix du marché pour leurs marchandises.

> I say, yes; the Government is responsible, and is to be blamed for allowing traders to take more than the market price. The hon. gentleman says that some of them have charged extortionate prices, to the extent of 50 to 75 per cent in excess, and he says the Government are not to blame. Are we to be told that when a responsible Minister acknowledges before the House that traders took advantage of a solemn occasion to extort extraordinary prices, and he could not protect himself, and that practically the Government sanctioned it, the Government are not to blame? I do not hold that opin-I do not know the traders. I do not know whether the charges are reasonable or not, but the Minister of Public Works has acknowledged that extortionate prices have been charged, and under these circumstances my hon. friend's motion is quite in order.

> Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is wrong on both his grounds, and I will take the latter one first. He says he objects to the bills being paid and supports the proposed amendment to strike off $15,000 and reduce the amount to $10,000 unduly large sums have been charged for merchandise and wares that should have been obtained at current price, and that in some cases as much as 50 per cent additional had been charged, and therefore that we should cut down this amount from $25.000 by $15,000, and on that basis we should allow those extraordinary prices to be cut down equivalently so as to reach the current prices on those goods. The hon, gentleman is wrong on that ground, for although it is true that large prices in some cases have been charged, it is not true that in any one case they have been paid, and after the exorbitant charges of which my non. friend ket prices there will yet remain about $23,-000 at least to be paid. So my hon. friend has no ground on which to base his argument. Moreover, if this motion is passed, it will simply have the effect of saying that my hon, friend and his followers opposite when they wish to make an attack against the Government, do it at the expense of traders and merchants who have supplied wares and expect pay for them, having supplied them on the order of the Government and holding the Government of Canada responsible for their payment. If the hon, gentleman has anything to find fault with in that respect, he should cast the blame on the Government and he should endeavour to punish the Government by a vote of want of confidence, but he should not repudiate honest debts due to traders and others who have given their wares and services. My hon. friend, therefore, is entitled to move a vote of censure and find fault with the Government for their action, but he is entirely wrong on both these grounds he has taken in favour of the motion which he has asked the House to pass.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the House is undoubtedly justified in taking the course that has been adopted by the hon, member for Queen's, for this simple reason. The Minister of Public Works admits that in some cases 50 and in other cases 75 per cent more is charged than the intrinsic value of the goods supplied. No doubt advantage has been taken of the occasion. Under these circumstances, and in face of what was stated by the Minister of Finance, who declared that none of the accounts had been paid, if frauds have been attempted. as has been admitted by the Minister of Public Works, and if they exist to any considerable extent, $10,000 might cover the whole accounts. If, however, the House voted $25,000 the probability is that the entire amount will be spent in paying those accounts, and even more. Why, therefore, should not a vote be taken for $10,000. especially in face of the statement made by the Minister of Public Works, who admitted that frauds had been attempted. At another session, if it is necessary to supplement the amount, after all the accounts have been cut down to their proper amounts, the Government might ask an additional vote, but the House, in face of the statement made by the Minister of Public Works, should not vote the $25,000 asked.

Will you deal with your Mr. FOSTER. creditors in that way?

Mr. McMULLEN. The Government do wrong in pressing for a vote of $25,000 in view of the statement that has been made. No doubt $10,000 is ample for the present, and, in fact, we say that it should more than cover the total amount, but, in view of the admission made by the Minister of Public Works it should be accepted at the present time.

that $6,000 of the amount is simply a matter of account, a payment by the Government to the Intercolonial Railway, which is the property of the Government itself: and that even, according to his own estimate, only $17,000, instead of $25,000, are due to the tradesmen and others whose bills are before the House, and whose case the Minister of Finance has pleaded so eloquently and urgently. The Finance Minister would have the House understand that $23,000 were required to cover the legitimate claims of men who furnished goods or value of some kind for the purpose of the funeral. But the Minister of Public Works distinctly says that only $17,000 are required for that purpose. When the Ministers differ to that extent among themselves, they cannot expect the House to accept as final any statement they may make in regard to the amount fairly and honestly due for services required under the bills which have been laid before the House. The Minister of Public Works went on to admit that there have been outrageous overcharges in many cases.

Mr. OUIMET. I did not say many cases.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister said, that in some cases, at all events there were outrageous overcharges. Well, we have been contending that there have been outrageous overcharges, and that these overcharges have not been checked by the Government to the extent they should have been, and that we have every reason to believe they will not be so checked by the Government in the final settlement of the account, if the $25,000 asked for is put at their disposal. Like my leader, and the hon. member who moved the motion (Mr. Davies), I can see no objection to a reasonable provision for a

Mr. OUIMET. I am sure my hon. friend is not in earnest in his support of the amendment of the hon. member for Queen's. An examination of the accounts laid on the Table will show that the total amount of the accounts produced, is $33,000. That amount is proposed to be reduced to $25,000, and even to $23,000. In that amount of $25,000 is included the account of the Intercolonial, amounting to $6,000. Thus the real amount coming to tradesmen and labourers is limited to about $19,000. That sum is what we consider a fair payment for all the goods we have received, and work done; but less than that would be unreasonable. Indeed, as the Minister of Finance has said, this House should not be willing to practise economy out of the pockets of the people. I have not stated that excessive charges were made in the majority of cases, but only in certain cases, and we are not obliged to submit to them. The amount of $25,000 which we ask is a reasonable amount, deducting $6,000 that goes to the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister has made several important admissions.

public funeral, but like them I do say, that the provision proposed to be made is unreasonable. To contend, that while about $7,000 was sufficient to give a public funeral to a statesman of the eminence of Sir John Macdonald; it requires $25,000 to provide a proper public funeral for Sir John Thompson, seems to me to be absurd. With all respect to the memory of Sir John Thompson, his individuality was not built up with. and associated with, the growth of Canada to the same extent as that of Sir John Macdonald, and the reasons for a very expensive display in the one case, rather than in the other, have not been put before us, and I do not believe they exist. What we are finding fault with on this occasion, is, not that the Government have sought to do sufficient and due honour to the memory of Sir John Thompson, but that they have made the funeral of Sir John Thompson an occasion for a wasteful display for the benefit of political favourites in Halifax and elsewhere. rather than a tribute to a Canadian statesman or for the credit of the country. It is for the sake of the credit of the country that we should do honour to our great men, out of respect to ourselves. But it is not a method of showing respect for ourselves or for our great dead, to make their funeral the occasion of a party display, a party advertisement, and a distribution of the public money among party friends. The items of the accounts which were laid on the Table I have not been able to look into, any further than they have been quoted by previous speakers and put in the "Hansard," but some of them are absurd on their face, for example, 35,000 yards of material which were used for bunting cost nearly $8,800. Remember what is meant by the use of this material for the purpose of draping, let us say, a church. It simply means that the rolls of material are brought from the merchant's shop, unrolled, and hung up around the church, and when the ceremony is over they are rolled up and taken back again. Will the Minister of Finance pretend that we ought to pay the full value of the bunting in such a case as that? I am sure that even he will not contend that we ought do so. However, that bunting used only once, and scarcely at all injured in the use, is being charged for at full cost as if we had bought it outright. The expenditure for flowers, might or might not, be considered extravagant. It was about $2,and it seems to me we ought to get a large amount of flowers for I take these two items expenditure as illustrations of the whole There were expenditures for the entertainment of those who took part in the funeral which may or may not be open to criticism as to their amount, or necessity, and as to their propriety in keeping up the credit of Canada. There are accounts even for the clothing of some of those who took part in the ceremony, but to which I will not now invite attention. I prefer to limit my remarks to the main principle, that as far as appears on the face of the accounts before us, and from any explanations we have got from the Ministers, the expenditure in connection with this funeral was an expenditure for a big party celebration, rather than for the purpose of applying this money legitimately. It has not been shown to the House that the legitimate accounts which the Government ought to pay amount to more than the $10,000, which my hon. friend's resolution proposes to leave in this item. For all these reasons I am compelled to vote with my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), in favour of reducing this vote of $25,000 by $15,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am quite in accord with the motion of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). There is no reason at all for asking the House to vote such a large sum as $25,000 to bury the late Prime Minister. When we bear in mind that on previous occasions the public funerals that have been given to distinguished men have only cost $8,000 or $9,000 in one case, and in the case of the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald a little over $6,000, I think it is outrageous for the Government to come here and ask for $25,000 to pay the funeral expenses of the late Sir John Thompson. Bear in mind that not one single dollar of expense was incurred until the body was laid on the wharf at Halifax. When you look over the items you cannot help but be struck with the gross carelessness, and recklessness, and extravagance shown by those in charge. I confess that it is in keeping with all the transactions of those gentlemen opposite. They do not seem to regard the public money except as common plunder, and they think they can use it with a free hand because it is the money of the people. This House would be wrong in voting more than $10,000 for this service. The Minister of Public Works has admitted that a great many of the accounts were extravagant, and that the traders had tried to exact from the Gov-ernment from 50 to 75 per cent more for the articles they supplied, than was a fair and reasonable price. We have the admission of the Minister of Finance that not a dollar has been paid out yet, and under these circumstances it is the duty of the Government to see that these outrageous charges are cut down, and that the money of the people is not plundered. There are about 35,000 yards of black cloth charged for, a quantity which would stretch for over twenty-one miles. Surely a great portion of that is uninjured and can be returned at a slight reduction. Most of that cost from 60 to 80 cents a yard, and was only used for a short time, so that the item could be cut down in that respect. It seems that the undertakers were furnished with fourteen black overcoats at $20 each to be worn only for a few hours. What became of these coats? There were fourteen silk hats at $4 each to be worn only a few hours, and fourteen pairs of top boots at $3.50 each. These are outrageous charges. Is it to be expected that the people of this Dominion are going to put their hands in their pockets, and literally throw away this money at the whim and caprice of a few men who are for the time being governing this country? Those who had the matter in charge should receive a direct vote of censure from the House for such a scandalous waste of the people's money. Instead of conducting this funeral as it should have been conducted, in a quiet and proper manner, it was made an occasion for revelry. A gentleman told me that it was perfectly disgraceful-that he had never seen anything so disgusting and outrageous as the way affairs were conducted in the city of Halifax, without any regard to expense or any regard to the proprieties of that solemn occasion. Bills were run up in a way that the Minister of Public Works now admits was outrageous; and I say that it is the duty of this House, as the guardian of the public treasury, and remembering that this is the people's money and not our money, and that we are only the trustees of the people, to cut down this expenditure. I think $10,000 is as much as this young country can afford to bury any man; and when we remember that the expenses in connection with the public funerals of other distinguished men have not been anything like so great, I think we can well afford to pass this amendment. An enormous amount of goods were purchased and used only a short time; and surely it is the duty of the Government to see that those goods are properly returned and a due account of them made. If that is done, I am sure that $10,000 will be sufficient expenses connected with the funeral, and I will therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. FLINT. This subject is necessarily a painful one, and those who object to the appropriation are, of course, placed in a somewhat embarrassing position; because they are willing to do all reasonable honour to a gentleman whom they personally respected and admired for his integrity and his talents, and would not object to a reasonable allowance for that purpose. think the principal effect of the amendment before the House, whether it is carried in the affirmative or the negative, will be to place in the breasts of those who on any future occasion are charged with responsibilities of this character, a caution as to the extent of latitude which they allow to their The hon. Minister of Public servants. Works and his colleagues have, perhaps, to a certain degree been drawn unwittingly into a position which they themselves feel compelled to apologise for, and perhaps in their inmost hearts, to a certain degree regret. The initial error was committed by the hon. Minister of Public Works when he gave his deputy carte blanche in arranging the expenses of the funeral. That gentleman, no fore, I will support the amendment of my doubt, discharged his duty with an eye single hon, friend from Queen's.

to carrying out what he conceived to be the sentiments of his superior, and that is where the mistake was made. Neither the people of this country nor this Parliament will, I believe, support an error of that kind. In my humble view, almost every canon of good taste was violated in connection with the circumstances we have been discussing. It would have been far more appropriate taste, and far more in consonance, I believe, with the personal feelings and views of our lamented friend had the part of the Dominion been conducted with greater economy and much greater simplicity. Go where you will, and read the history of the lives of distinguished statesmen to whom the honours of the state have been tendered, and you will find that, almost without exception, they have deprecated an unwonted or undue display. In glancing through the items of these bills, we can easily see that there was a combination of circumstances, added to the lack of limit given by the Minister of Public Works, which conspired to produce this very unpleasant result. Had the Minister of Public Works really considered his duty in the matter, and what the general feeling of the country and the highest sentiments of good taste would dictate, I believe he would have said to his deputy: Let this affair be conducted decently and in order, but let there be no extravagance; insist on the most rigid application of the rules of economy, and let the outpourings of the sympathies of the public do the rest. After all, Sir, let this discussion, unpleasant as it has been, be a warning, a caution, to those at the head of public affairs, and let them not imagine that lavish expenditures from the public purse can take the place of the universal sentiment of the people. Where there is really a general regret and mourning over one who has occupied a prominent position. this will manifest itself in a way that will speak as loudly to the world of the estimacion in which he was held as all this wasteful and extravagant emblematic accompaniments of woe. They were not at necessary; and although the Government may be, to some extent, committed to pay these bills, so far as they are reasonable, yet, in voting for the amendment of my hon. friend. I am simply placing on record my protest against the course adopted by the Minister of Public Works. The people of this country will not consent to carte blanche being given to their officers on occasions of display such as this. The circumstances are very rare when anything beyond a very simple and inexpensive funeral would be required; and, although my personal feelings would tend to induce me to join in deprecating any discussion over the grave of one whom we highly respected, I believe our duty to the public and our duty to the future is higher even than our personal sympathies and personal feelings.

SUPPLY-COPYRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Supply.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the House goes into committee. I would like very briefly to refer to a matter in which the country takes a particular interest just now. I see by the public press that it is intended shortly to send an envoy from Canada to England to to this copyright legislation, he used these represent the Government in its discussion of the present position of the copyright question between Canada and the British Government. I would like very briefly to refer to what I consider to be the somewhat extraordinary position of Canada as a selfgoverning country on that question to-day. The Act of 1889 was passed unanimously by both Houses of this Parliament. In that Act there was a clause providing that it should not go into force until a proclamation was issued by the Government to that Now, the Canadian Government have practically treated that clause as if it meant that they should obtain the assent of the British Government before issuing that proclamation. I do not think they were right in treating that clause as having that meaning. It would certainly have been perfectly reasonable, fair and proper for the Canadian Government to have, in every possible way, informed the British Government of the object of that legislation. But it must be remembered that, under our constitution, there are two years given for the disallowance of our legislation, and I think the proper course would have been for our Government to have informed the British Government that at the end of those two years they would put the Act into force. Now, to be a little plain about the matter, I do not think the Canadian Government should assent to any executive action of the Imperial Government which would have the appearance of placing a limitation upon our right to legislate on the subject of copyright or anything else which we believe we have received under the British North America Act. To my mind the British Government might just as well try to rob us of our legislating rights regarding any of the other twenty-nine subjects for exclusive Dominion legislation mentioned in the ninety-first section of the British North America Act, as to seek to prevent us practically from legislating on copyright. What would be said if the British Government did obstruct and thwart our legislation, on, for instance, the subject of customs or excise, tariffs or duties. or on the subject of patents for inventions. or on the subject of our postal regulations, or on any other of those subjects about which we are legislating every day in Can-I do not wish to find fault with ada ? the line of discussion or the stand taken in this question by the late Sir John Thompson as representing the Government of Canada. In fact, I entirely approve of the course he took and of his arguments and contentions in favour of the rights of Canada. I am glad to be able to testify to the earnestness and the ability and the sturdy Canadian spirit which he exercised in the treatment of that question in the numerous state papers which he sent to the British Government. In fact, in 1889, in an important state paper in which he claimed the constitutional right of Canada words:

It was to his mind perfectly plain, that the people of Canada would hold him culpable if he failed to assert that this was the only interpretation under which they received the constitution, and under which they are willing to be content with that constitution.

Now, Sir, what objections have been raised to this Act of 1889? It has been claimed that we have no jurisdiction to pass such an Act, notwithstanding the apparently clear language of the British North America Act, because it is inconsistent with prior Imperial legislation on this subject embracing the colonies, but we have not admitted that to be the proper interpretation of the I am not going to discuss the but there legal question, is ล simple answer Canada from to claim, when advanced by the Imperial Government. We say to them: Admitting, for the sake of argument, your centention that there is doubt as to the sufficiency of the British North America Act to give us clear right to legislate on copyright; then, if that be so, it is your duty to submit to the Imperial Parliament promptly such legislation as, in your judgment, may be required to make it absolutely clear that Canada has the right to legislate on copyright, so that there may be no further misunderstanding on the subject. Then there are objections made to this Act also by British authors. I do not think their objections are very well founded, and I think that the agitation they have been raising is somewhat inconsistent; because these authors are very much pleased with legislation of the United recent in their favour, which is very States than the favour less in their legislation we in Canada propose to give them; and yet, while they are full of compliments to the Americans for treating them so well, they are full of denunciations of Canada for treating them so badly. However, their rights or their wrongs in that matter are mere matters of detail. I shall not discuss them here; but I am sure that the British authors whom we in Canada know so well, and admire so much, need have no fear of receiving bad treatment at the hands of the Canadian Parliament. They may depend that we shall be not only just, but generous to them; and, if there are any unfair provisions in the Act of 1889, I am quite sure that the Parliament of Canada, when they are pointed out, will promptly amend the Act and make it fair not only to all classes in Canada, but also to the British authors themselves. One thing I think we must insist upon, how-ever, and that is that amendments to the Act of 1889, and to our copyright laws, shall be sought and shall be made in Ottawa, and not at Westminster or Downing I hope that the instructions to the envoy that we are sending over there will be very definite, at any rate on that point, and that he will be instructed to hold well to the front this constitutional question; and, even if he should go into the discussion of letails, that he will maintain that they are of very minor importance, compared with the simple and fair settlement of this constitutional question. think, unless the present Government seeks to change their policy—and the policy of Parliament so far—on this question, they will maintain the position which is the only one that is proper for us to maintain in urging the separate legislative autonomy of this Dominion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House has received with high appreciation the observations of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman has followed this subject with a great deal of interest, and I remember very well that the late Minister of Justice was glad to recognize his co-operation in the efforts that were being made to secure the full recognition of the powers of self-government which Canada believes she possesses, and which has so unmistakably this Parliament shown it desires to have recognized and put beyond question or peradventure. hon, gentleman has referred to the fact that when this Parliament adopted the Act of 1889, there was incorporated in that legislation a clause regarding the issue of a erning portion of the British Empire would proclamation, until the issue of which the have prevailed ere this. The Government new Act was not to come into force: and have every reason to believe that had the he made some observation on the propriety of that course in view of recent experience, and, as I gathered from his remarks, suggested that it would have been better had we passed the Act here, and run the risk of disallowance. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think, perhaps, that the hon, gentleman has overlooked—

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I did not suggest that it was better to run the risk of disallowance by the Imperial authorities, but, after the time of disallowance, we should pass it and would run the risk of disallowance in the courts.

HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir CHARLES Even so, I submit that the hon, gentleman has overlooked an important consideration that obtained, according to my recollection, in drawing the Bill. We had to get rid of the Berne convention, to which we were parties. I think that was the great reason that led to the course we took. In a minute of Council, based upon the report of the late Minister of Justice, our case was so First, we pressed the Act for apurged. We knew the difficulties that the law officers of the Crown had raised long before as to our powers, and met these in argument. The late Minister of Justice proposed to the Government that if his argument in favour of the validity of this Act, in favour of the view that such legislation was within the powers conferred by the British North America Act, then the notice should be given, under the terms of the Berne convention, of our withdrawl; and if there were doubts in reference to our power, and the arguments of the Canadian Government did not prevail, then that the necessary powers be secured to the Canadian Parliament by further Imperial legislation. And it does seem to me, as it certainly seemed to this House when they adopted the unanimous address. that, no matter what these legal difficulties may be, the British Parliament, recognizing the intention shown by the British North America Act to give this country such large powers of self-government, should remove all difficulties at once by Imperial legislation. However, I do not, in dwelling upon that phase of the question, desire, in the slightest degree, at this important juncture of the proceedings, to suggest, even if I dared to do so, any weakness in the argument that has hitherto been pressed as to the powers we may now legally claim under the existing legislation. But the position that is given to us in this of course, is clear and apparent. Act, I am convinced that had it not been for the very extraordinary position on the part of influential bodies in England, the authors and publishers, the wishes of this self-governing portion of the British Empire would have prevailed ere this. The Government late Prime Minister not been so suddenly cut off, there might have been by this time a happy issue of the negotiations, because, having pressed with great earnestness the case of Canada in every shape and form, it had been arranged that he would consult with one of the officers of the British Government having this subject particularly in charge, on the very day after his sad death. No interview therefore of that character has yet taken place. After waiting for the further views of the British Government, the Canadian Government received an invitation to send some one to carry on that discussion in the Colonial Office, and the Government has asked Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, to proceed to England at a time convenient for all concerned. He leaves this month. He has had an opportunity of following this case, in conjunction with the late Minister of Justice, very closely, and he has also been in communication and touch with those who have much technical information in regard to the operation of the Act. I may say that all who know that gentleman will feel that the case of Canada will be well presented, and certainly his instructions from the Canadian Government will be to leave no stone unturned in impressing upon the English Government that regardless of the merits or demerits of the Bill, that is to say, regardless of the plan that it embodies, or the objections that might be made to this principle, Canada has a great desire for the settlement of this vexed question; and either the recognition of our powers, or the granting of them in the line and spirit of our constitution, is demanded by all parties in Canada, regardless of political or other considerations. But the question so far as this Parliament has dealt with it, is not one for the benefit of the authors, or publishers, or printers, or any other body of men in Canada. Of course, incidentally, they are much interested in the direct effect of the Bill; but as I take it, the question with the Parliament of Canada is one of principle, and this country will not be satisfied until the wishes that have been respectfully pressed, are acceded to.

Mr. WELDON. Before the discussion has passed away from this subject, I would like to say one or two words. From the first introduction of this copyright measure to the House, I have never been able to share the views which I think prevail largely on both sides of the House as to the competency of this Parliament to pass a law of this character. I have never been able to entertain the view that under our constitution, the granting of power under section 91 of the British North America Act to make laws concerning copyright, implied, or was a constructive repeal of, that earlier Imperial law of copyright which applied to this colony. And I would not speak as I do now-as my remarks would seem to weaken rather than strengthen the hands of that officer whom we are sending to fight our battles-were it not with the view of turning his attention, and the attention of the Minister who will give him his instructions, to the wisdom of pressing more strongly in the second direction, that is, in favour of an English amendment to the Imperial law, I mean an amendment to the English Copyright Act now applicable to Canada. If we fight on the first line where, as I think very strongly, we are wrong, and have been wrong, and if we succeed, as we very likely may, in inducing the Colonial Office to give way to our contention and accept our view, that itself would give no guarantee that the law for which we are fighting is intra vires of the Parliament of Canada. Moreover, if we should succeed in getting this copyright law pro-claimed, and if the English authors and the English publishers, who are in conflict with us, and who are opposed to the purpose of the Canadian Parliament, should enter the law courts, I have a strong fear that in the long run they would triumph, and succeed in having the law now on our statutebooks declared to be ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada. My view of provisions contained in sections 91 and 92 of the constitution, is that they are merely a partition of legislative powers between the federal authorities and the local authorities. we having one group including copyright, and the local authorities having certain other powers. If the British North America Act gave no new substantive powers to any legislative authority in Canada, that is to say, if you add up the federal powers and the local powers given by the Act of 1867, you have the sum total possessed by Nova Scotia, we will say, before 1867, and if that be true, the consequence is that the British North America Act is not a constructive repeal of the Imperial copyright law. Therefore I strongly hope that if the Minister's emissary should fail on this question of intra vires, that he will press strongly in the second direction, namely, for an amendment to the English law which will put the matter beyond all controversy. I heartily share the views that have been so often pressed upon the House by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). I think there can be no answer, in substance or on the merits, to the contention that this colony, which has the strength of a nation, and has shown great legislative capacity, should be enabled to judge of its own interests in the matter of copyright, just as it is able to judge of its own interests in the matter of patent rights.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. There is a decrease of $4,000, which is so unusual a thing as to require an explanation.

Mr. DALY. There is a decrease of seven clerks, too.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like the hon, gentleman to tell us how much the decrease really is, because if I remember rightly, some of these clerks have been superannuated, and the charge is simply transferred from the department to the superannuation account. The hon. gentleman may be able to tell us which of those are not on the superannuation list, and what is the absolute difference in the two years?

Mr. DALY. There are only eleven first-class clerks as against twelve last year. This was occasioned by the death of Mr. Mills of the ordnance branch, whose position was not filled, and the position of firstclass clerk was dropped. Of the first-class clerks three were superannuated: Mr. Hatch, who was in receipt of $950 a year, and whose superannuation amounts to $379.50. making a saving of about $570; Mr. Lacasse, whose salary was $1,000, and who receives a superannuation of $440, making a saving of $560; Mr. Pope, who had a salary of $1,000, and now receives a superannuation of $240, making a saving of $760. The superannuation allowances are $1,059.50, while the total salaries were $2,950. the total saving being $1,890.50.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of the Interior has informed the House that Mr. Mills, first-class clerk in the ordnance branch, is dead, and that his place has not been filled up and will not be filled. I call attention to this fact, that of the eleven first-class clerks now in the Department of the Interior the clerk in charge of the ordnance branch is Mr. Keyes. He was appointed in 1877; and he has had more than half of the eleven clerks promoted over his head. During the whole period he has been in office not a single censure of any kind has been entered against him. He is a most competent man, and entered the department when he was young. He was appointed by me when I had charge of the department, and the announcement that the first-class clerkship in this branch has been abolished. although Mr. Keyes continues to discharge all the duties formerly discharged by Mr. Mills who held the position, appears to me to be a rather extraordinary state of affairs. It may be attributed to the misfortune that Mr. Keyes received his appointment at my hands when Minister. I am sure of this, and I say it in this House deliberately, that there is not in the hon. gentleman's department any clerk more competent and trustworthy in the discharge of his duties than the party whom the Minister has left without that treatment, which in ordinary cases would be meted out to every party in any service, public or private.

Mr. DALY. In reply to the statement which the hon. member has made that Mr.

was appointed by the hon. member for Bothwell when Minister of the Interior, I beg to say that if Mr. Keyes was appointed by him, I did not know it. I know nothing about Mr. Keyes, except that it is stated to me that he is a first-class man. He is a second-class clerk, not, however, at the head of the list, because there are three seniors in his class. No doubt he will receive promotion in due course, as others do. In regard to appointments made to first-class clerkships, the only one made by me since I came into the department was one in the immigration branch, and in fact that is the only appointment made over Mr. Keyes' head. The fact that Mr. Keyes was appointed by the hon. member has had nothing to do with his non-promotion, because had the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Mills been filled by the appointment to it of a first-class clerk, Mr. Keyes would have been selected for the position, and so his case could not have been prejudiced in any way.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; but if Mr. Keyes had not been there the first-class clerkship would not have been wiped out. I have watched with very considerable interest and care the promotions that have taken place in that department for the last fifteen years. Nearly all those who stand in the list of first-class clerks have been promoted over Mr. Keyes' head; and even more than that, a number of those in the Department of Indian Affairs who were appointed long subsequently to Mr. Keyes, are now first-class clerks and he is a secondclass clerk. No principle of fairness or justice has been observed in making promotions in that department, and I will say more on this subject when I discuss a motion which I propose to submit to the House. I am not charging the hon. Minister personally with doing an injustice, for it was done by his immediate predecessor, but I apprehend it is the party who incurs for some reason or other the personal dislike of the deputy who suffers the misfortune which seems to be incident to positions they hold in the department.

Mr. DALY. I resent the statement made that the position would not have been abolished if Mr. Keyes had not been next in order of promotion. The fact is, Mr. Keyes was to have been promoted to that position, and it was not until the Government came to the conclusion to cut down the staff that I was unable to promote him to the position which I intended him to fill. So far as myself and the deputy is concerned, we have had nothing to do with the promotion of Mr. Keyes.

Department of Indian Affairs...... $50.495

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In discussing an item under this heading in the supplementary Estimates, I called the attention of the Minister to the increase which has marked Keyes has not been promoted because he this branch of the public service, and he promised that he would go fully into the matter when we reached the main Estimates. The hon, gentleman asks a vote of $50,495 this year. I find the expenditure last year was $48,490. Last year there were The hon. gentleman asks a vote of forty-six officers whose aggregate salaries amounted to that sum. In 1878 eight men found sufficient. whereas M.G.G $9,350 have forty-six now. Then pay whereas paid, now we $48,490. I said I did not understand very well how the increase took place, when the Indian population, I am sorry to say, had not increased very rapidly. I could understand some increase in the Department of the Interior when immigration was at its height, but if anything has been added to Indian affairs, I do not remember it. The increase looks to be so very great that I would like an explanation from the Minister. Since 1890, that is, within five years, there have been sixteen added to the staff, while within the year 1878, eight constituted the entire staff. The Minister should give some explanation in reference to this item, for the increase certainly seems to be very great.

Mr. DALY. This being an item for civil government, we do not look upon it as in connection with the Indian Affairs Department, and I am not able to give the hon. gentleman the full explanation which I will later, on items to follow. At the time he speaks of, there was comparatively little work in connection with Indian affairs in North-west or British Columbia. At that time many of the Indians were not in treaty. They were roaming all over the province, were getting their food and supplies from the buffalo, and the Government was not called upon to give them the supervision they do now. The Indians are now obliged to remain upon their reserves, and the policy of the department is to create as much individuality among them as we can and to make them as quickly as possible self-supporting. Owing to our conducting affairs upon that line, I will be able to show the hon, gentleman that the amount for destitute Indians has decreased in an immense ratio, and that now the Indians are supporting themselves more or less upon their reserves. Upon some reserves we do not furnish them with flour, and upon other reserves we do not furnish them with meat at the present time. We have erected mills, and the Indians are grinding their own flour, and not only that, but they are able to do gristing for the neighbouring farmers in the district. In other cases we have given them young cattle and bulls, and they now have herds by which they are supplying themselves with their beef. We trust that it will be only a matter of a few years when we will have the Indians all over the North-west in such a position that they will be to a large extent self-sustaining. The largest item in connection with the food supply for the North-west is amongst the

Bloods, Piegans and Blackfeet, and it has taken all these years, until two years ago, to get these Indians to give up the idea that their whole object in life was surrounding themselves with a lot of ponies. The vote two years ago enabled the department to purchase cattle for them, and now they are all crazy to get more than we can possibly supply them with. We expect that in time, instead of supplying them with thousands of pounds of beef every day, they will themselves be able to furnish sufficient beef for their reserves. The distribution of supplies to the Indians occasions a great amount of clerical work. We have adopted a system whereby it is an impossibility for any person to get away with half a pound of beef. or half a pound of flour, without that being known. A system of returns and checking has been adopted which enables us to check every cent spent on provisions. All this, as the hon. gentleman can understand, entails a large staff of officers. Then, again, with regard to Indian lands in the other provinces, it will be seen that very few of them were in the market for sale at the time the hon, gentleman speaks of. The land branch has grown very considerably since that time, and there are numerous transactions taking place in all the different reserves throughout Ontario and Quebec, which entail a vast amount of clerical work. In addition, there is the accountant's branch. where all the band funds of the different Indians have to be checked and kept, and, again, the department have gone more extensively, as the hon. gentleman knows, into the education of the Indians. schools branch which has been established. has caused a great deal of clerical work. Exception has been taken by hon, gentle-men opposite to the policy pursued by the department in relation to the education of the Indians. I presume the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) knows from his long experience of living in contiguity with the Indians of Brant, that every person who takes an interest in the Indian holds that education is the only method by which we can civilize him, and give him a fair start in life to compete with his white neighbour. Exception has taken been hon, gentlemen as to the amount money we spend upon our industrial schools. We found from that the local day schools experience upon reserves have not been satisfactory, and that whilst the children are with their parents it is very difficult to get them to attend school. In boarding and industrial schools. we have the children away from their parents, and they are being educated and taught trades and callings, and being made conversant with the ways of the white man. It is surprising, as a visit to the different reserves will show, what a great influence the education of these Indian children has had upon their parents and their home life. We cannot expect to do much with the older Indians in the North-west, and it is only amongst the younger children that we can effect any good work. The result attained in these different schools is evidence that the policy of the Government is a wise one. I have furnished myself with a considerable amount of data in reference to details, which I will give at length when we reach other items, and I think I can give him very good reasons for the increase in the staff of the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I quite understand that the question of the maintenance and education of the Indians in the Northwest will come up more properly on a subsequent item, and I am sure that not one on this side of the House, certainly not I, will object to all proper means being taken for providing for those objects. But the question I bring up now is wholly pertinent to the item under discussion. What I want to find out is why it has been necessary to increase the staff of the inside service at Ottawa, from eight officials to fortysix, and the expenditure from $9,000 to $40,000. I could understand, from what the Minister has said, that there might be reason for an increase in the outside service: but I am not dealing with that; I am dealing only with the inside service at With reference to some of headquarters. the points the hon. Minister has mentioned, I presume that the hon. member for Bothwell would be able to give us some infor-With reference to administering the lands in the old provinces, I suppose that was fully attended to in 1878; and I presume that the care of the Indians of the North-west was also attended to at that time as well as now. When we reach the items relating to food and education, we shall be pleased to hear what the Minister has to say with reference to them; but at present I am confining my attention to the item under discussion.

Mr. DALY. I am very sorry to say that I have not the information that I would like to have here to enable me to reply to what the hon. gentleman has said. I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, otherwise I would have been prepared. However, I will give him the information, and will present satisfactory reasons for the increase that has taken place from the time he mentions up to the present time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps I may be able to assist the hon, gentleman in giving us an explanation pertinent to this particular item. I find that the hon, gentleman has an organization which does not exactly correspond with the organization that existed at an earlier period. I think that the last time his predecessor was here, I asked him when the department was theoretically organized by Order in Council, and he said it was in 1883. Has the hon, gentleman had any Order in Council passed reorganizing the Indian Branch since that time?

and the second s

Mr. DALY. Not since I came in.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that the hon. gentleman has a number of branches that did not exist at an earlier period.

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). For instance, there is the accountant's branch, the land branch, and the registrar branch, which existed from the time the department was first organized; but the hon, gentleman has enormously increased the officers in these branches, and their number at present seems to me out of all proportion to what an efficient organization would require. I would like to ask what Mr. J. J. Campbell is doing in the department, because, according to the last report, that gentleman is one of the officers in the North-west?

Mr. DALY. When Mr. Reed was moved down here, and the staff at Regina was reduced, it was necessary to have persons here conversant with Indian matters in the North-west, and Mr. Campbell was brought here from Regina, and put in the office for that purpose. He has had ten or twelve years' experience in the Regina office.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. William Mc-Girr was also in the North-west. What duties has he to discharge?

Mr. DALY. With the possible exception of the Deputy Minister, Mr. McGirr is better posted on Indian matters, not only in the North-west Territories, but in Canada generally, than any other man in the service, and his duties are not confined to any particular branch. He is recognized. I believe, as one of the ablest officers we have.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. J. A. Macrae?

Mr. DALY. He is inspector of agencies.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). George L. Chitty?

Mr. DALY. He is inspector of timber. He was appointed from here. He is an Ottawa lumberman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How long has he been connected with the department?

Mr. DALY. I should judge about four years. He was there when I came in.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is Mr. J. J. McKenna, who was Mr. Vankoughnet's shorthand writer. Is he there still?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Moffat?

Mr. DALY. He is accountant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He was formerly connected immediately with the deputy as a shorthand writer. Is he there still?

Mr. DALY. Yes. I see R. B. E. Moffat is a third-class clerk; and there is also T. P. Moffat.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As far as I can make out from the report of the department, and from the Auditor General's Report, there are five officials, where there were two before. Before, there were Mr. McKenna, and Mr. Moffat, and now there is added Mr. McRae, Mr. Campbell, and Miss Taylor; and these five seem all to be connected immediately with the deputy's own work. Will the hon. Minister say whether that is so, or not?

Mr. DALY. They do the general work of the department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the accountant's branch, I find these names: Mr. Scott, Mr. Dalton, Mr. McKay, Mr. Shore, Mr. Smith, Mr. Rochester, Mr. Ross, a couple of others, and five young ladies, or thirteen in all, connected with the accountant's branch. Does the hon. gentleman maintain that thirteen are necessary where there was only one or two before?

Mr. DALY. I do, and we could satisfactorily employ two more if we could get them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do they duplicate their work?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is there a record in the department as to what these parties are doing?

Mr. DALY. I presume so, but I do not know anything about the details.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think it would be important to bring these parties before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. DALY. I shall be very glad if you will. That would be an easy way of getting them.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

DOMINION ATLANTIC RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Stairs.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to insert a clause, clause 15a, which will read as follows:—

The Governor in Council may enter into an agreement with the company providing for the commutation and release of any right or privilege in respect of a drawback of Customs or import duties under the said contract or agreement between the chief commissioner of railways for the province of Nova Scotia and William Henry Punchard, Frederick Barry and Edwin Clark, dated 22nd November, 1866, in consideration of the payment of such sum in cash as may be determined upon and mentioned in the said agreement, and the company are hereby authorized and empowered to enter into such agreement for commutation of any such right or privilege in consideration of the payment of a sum in cash, and to release and surrender such right or privilege to Her Majesty in consideration of such cash payment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

2. The Governor in Council may, upon the execution of such an agreement, by proclamation to be published in the "Canada Gazette," repeal any provision of any Act of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, or of Parliament, granting such right or privilege so commuted.

In explanation, I may say to the committee that the old company, the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, enjoyed a special privilege in relation to the drawback upon all the commodities and materials imported for the use of the railway. To be precise, their privilege was the right to a rebate of the customs duty upon materials and stores, and while the Government was most anxious not to impede the amalgamation of these different roads, speaking generally, the Windsor and Annapolis and the old Western Counties, and some other road operated in connection with that system, still it would be most difficult to administer that privilege without the The difficulty of checkdanger of abuse. ing the materials that were used for a part of the system upon which, alone, the right to a drawback under this old agreement is based, would be so great that it would be impossible to assent to any amalgamation of this kind which left the Government open to that danger. Negotiations had already been entered into, some time before this application, with the company for the purpose of getting rid of that. The amounts paid, as a refund, since 1872 down to 1894, aggregate $96,968. That is an average for twenty-three years, of $334, under the terms of that old agreement, applying only to one part of the system embraced in this When the Government endeavoured to settle this by a lump sum, and get rid of a very inconvenient arrangement, the company asked $120,000. The Government offered $85,000, and there the negotiations stood. The object of this clause is to enable the Governor in Council to carry those negotiations to a settlement, because, unless that be done, the House will see that there are strong reasons to say to the company: If you stand upon your agreement, you will be confined to the charter you now have, which enables the administration of this privilege to be carried on more easily. But if you are to take, into the one system. these other railways, the difficulties would be so great that the Government would be bound to object to the amalgamation. understand that the company did not object to that provision being inserted.

Mr. LAURIER. Why was not this brought to the notice of the Railway Committee?

Mr. HAGGART. It was.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The question was brought up, and it was understood that, in order that the passage of the Bill might not be delayed—which the Government had no desire to see—a clause should be prepared to carry out this idea.

Mr. HAGGART. I requested that the Bill might pass but intimated that before it came up in committee of the whole House, a clause should be drawn by the Justice Department which should cover the point.

Mr. TISDALE. There was another question which I raised as chairman of the Railway Committee—that the Railway Committee had not power to deal with the question, as it affected the revenue—that it must originate by resolution considered in committee of the whole House.

Mr. LAURIER. If that point is a good one, the Bill cannot be dealt with in this way.

Mr. TISDALE. I raised the point of order, as it was my duty to do so and I had the authority there. But the committee assented to the proposition that so long as the clause was put in in committee of the whole, that would be sufficient. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that under the clause he proposes the company are not bound to accept.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Quite so; but I propose, when we come to the last clause, to add another providing that this Act shall not come into operation until a proclamation has been published in the "Canada Gazette."

Mr. LAURIER. The only thing I wanted to know was whether the Railway Committee considered the matter. If they agreed to the course proposed, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. EDGAR. I was present in the Railway Committee when this Bill was discussed. It was shown that there was a rather important public issue involved as to whether the amalgamated companies should have the benefit of certain drawbacks and limitations of customs duties, which a portion of the line proposed to be amalgamated at present enjoys; and the Minister of Railways and Canals, after some discussion, said he would prefer that the Government should have an opportunity of considering how far they would, as a Government, consent to anything of that kind remaining in the Bill. As I understand the amendment, it is proposed that the privilege of drawback as to part of the line may be commuted by arrangement between the Government and the amalgamated companies. It seems to me that if that can be done, and I think it should be, it is the best way of settling the matter.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I move that the following be inserted as the last clause in the Bill:—

This Act shall not come into operation until proclamation by the Governor in Council, to be published in the "Canada Gazette."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported as amended, and read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Canadian Benevolent Society (title changed to "Canadian Sick Benefit Society.")—(Mr. Moncrieff.)

Bill (No. 49) respecting the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company (Limited).—(Mr. Stairs.)

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Bankers' Life Association.—(Mr. Denison.)

Bill (No. 39) further to amend the Hamilton Provident and Loan Society Act of 1885. —(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. S3) respecting the Eastern Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Fraser.)

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada.—(Mr. Cockburn.)

HAMILTON AND LAKE ERIE POWER COMPANY.

Mr. McKAY moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company.

Mr. DENISON. I should like to draw the attention of the House to a report of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, as follows:—

With regard to the last mentioned Bill, the committee have to report (under Rule 63) that the following powers contained in section 3, viz.:—
"to dredge, deepen and widen the said Welland River from its mouth to the point of intersection with the said watercourse and raceway with the said Welland River, and also to drdge, deepen and widen the Jordan River from the point of intersection with the said watercourse and raceway to Lake Ontario, if so found expedient for the purposes of the company," are not covered by the notice, as reported upon by the Committee on Standing Orders.

I think it is only proper that this should be pointed out to the House. The promoters of the Bill claim that the notice is sufficient, but as that is a matter coming more under the supervision of the Committee on Standing Orders than under the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, I think it only necessary to point out this fact, so that if the House thinks it necessary, the Bill can be sent back to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. McKAY. The attention of the committee was called to the matter referred to, and after full discussion the committee thought proper to pass the Bill as it was, and considered the notice sufficient for all practicable purpose. The Bill had been petitioned for by the different townships through which the power company will operate, and after the matter was thoroughly ventilated and discussed in the committee, the Bill was passed. The objections taken to it were technical.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the power to withdraw water from the river and streams had been granted by this Parliament last session to another company, and although I have not the pleasure of attending the Committee on Private Bills all the time, I gathered from what I heard there that the granting of power to this company would prejudicially affect the company previously given powers, and that such action was unfair.

Mr. DENISON. That is not the point.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But that is a matter which I consider important. I understand the hon. member, as chairman of the Committee on Miscellaneous Bills, port that notice had not been given in accordance with the standing rule. If the question is immaterial, the House may pass the Bill, and I was referring to a fact that might make it material. I ask the hon. member, as chairman of the committee. whether the Bill was opposed by another company, which claimed that their rights would be affected by those granted in this Bill?

Mr. DENISON. The hon, gentleman is correct. The Bill was opposed in the committee by another company, and one of the contentions was that it might interfere with their rights. But the point the committee made was that the application for power to deepen, dredge and widen had not been sufficiently covered by the notice, and I thought it my duty as chairman to point out this fact to the House.

Mr. WELDON. The objection taken by the company opposing the Bill was that last year we gave them a monopoly. The committee repudiated any such construction as had been placed upon their action, declared that no monopoly had been given, and said drawing water instead of one, as an the present time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another matter with respect to these companies which I think deserves more attention than it has yet received. It appears to me that when we are asked to grant, for nothing, apparently, the use of a great natural power, that it is the duty of the Government to reserve to the public the right, on making proper compensation to the parties, to reassume all these powers if, at any future time, they see fit to do so. man knows what may be the effect of some of these grants, or what may be the result if they are carried to the extent which it is possible to conceive they may be carried, in the event of subsequent aevelopments of electrical power, and forth. I have a very strong impression, myself, and I think the matter is one which the Government ought carefully to consider, that wherever any power of this kind is given, it should always be hedged and guarded in such a way that the Government of the country, on making proper compensation to the individuals, might resume the grant at any time they may see fit. I do not want to interfere with any legitimate attempt to develop natural resources, but neither should we forget that all these things are, after all, the property, not of individuals, but the property of the We have been very whole community. lax in times past about granting powers of this kind, and I think that the Government ought, in all these cases, insert a carefully prepared clause by which we should retain to ourselves the right, if we see proper, to resume the control of all these great natural powers. The matter, so far as I know, has not been discussed in any of our committees, and I do not know that it has been discussed in Parliament, but I should like to hear the opinion of the leader of the House, the Minister of Justice, and, perhaps, of the Minister of Railways, on that point.

Mr. HAGGART. If I remember aright, these powers are not natural, but artificial. The Welland stream runs in above Niagara Falls, and it is proposed to deepen this river in order that the flow of water which goes over the falls, may follow this stream. One corporation has a charter to the south of the Welland Canal. They intend to dig a channel from the Welland to where the water falls from a precipice in the neighbourhood of St. Catharines, and utilize it there. The other is to the north of the Welland Canal, and they intend to deepen the water there, up to the source of the river, and tap it in that way. They intend to divert and utilize water that would naturally flow over the Niagara Falis. purely private enterprise. Besides that, where it is in the interests of the country, they would be glad if ten persons were the Government has power to expropriate, the same as in other leases of power. But the reassuming of these things costs more than the powers are of real benefit, because we have to pay for them back again, a value which is greatly in excess of the value of the water power. Any Government will find that when they come to reassume those powers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not quite sure that that would be found to be the case in dealing with this, which is practically a power of the Niagara River. In my judgment, the waterways of the country are, in the strictest sense, the property of the whole people of Canada, and belong to us all: and while I do not desire to throw obstacles in the way of any enterprising parties who are likely to use these powers for their own advantage and the general advantage, incidentally, still, I think it should be distinctly understood that the granting of any such leases is not to confer any special vested rights, As for the resumption of at any rate. these, I grant that in many cases, it would be a very idle thing for the Government to resume them. I think we ought to have it clearly understood that in giving powers of these descriptions to private parties, they take them with the most distinct understanding that the community at large, acting through Parliament, are, at any time, at liberty to resume the rights. The companies pay nothing for these rights.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think it would be disputed that, notwithstanding this Bill should pass, Parliament could again legislate to obtain the property back. Of course, the question of compensation always comes in. It appears to me that if we are too careful, there is a danger that we might restrict very laudable enterprises in this country. That is to say, if we put in such clauses as would make the compensation slight or entirely inadequate in reference to the expenditure and interests that may grow up under these charters, it probably would defeat the en-I think we will have to rest content with our inherent powers, should it appear to be for the public good that we should take this property, always, course, giving compensation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Our constitutional right to pass such a Bill as this was questioned last session. Will the Minister express an opinion as to that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I feel very safe in standing behind the opinion of the late Minister of Justice on this question. He and the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) differed materially as to whether, in the case of these works being wholly situated within a province, we were within our powers in legislating. The late Minister of Justice took very strong ground, and outside of the merits altogether, he urged with much force, the fact that we had dealt on the assumption for so long, and that the jurisdiction had not been challenged in the courts, that he considered it inexpedient to suddenly depart from the practice that had obtained in this Parliament. That is to say, in connection with the clause of the British North America Act, whereby we obtain the power through the declaration that these works, so authorized by Acts are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. views of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) were strongly expressed against this opinion. There was considerable discussion, and if I recollect aright, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) urged that this clause did not apply to the case of a work wholly situated in one province. Sir John Thompson, on the contrary, urged that that was the only case in which the clause was an advantage, because, if the work happened to be between two provinces, only the Dominion Parliament could deal with it. and the clause would not be required at all. would not venture to say that the question was one beyond dispute. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) may ultimately be found to be right in his view, but the strong ground upon which legislation of this character stands is, that it has remained unquestioned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a Bill for a local work and undertaking, so far as the corporation itself is concerned.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is just such a Bill as that of last session.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I take the position that if the corporation is local in its nature, it ought to receive an Act of incorporation from the provincial Parliament. If it requires any franchise beyond that it may, like any other person, come here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is very inconvenient, at least.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A foreign corporation may come here and ask for certain franchises, and the argument of inconvenience cannot increase our jurisdiction. Another thing which has been decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and in that they have simply followed a wellrecognized rule, is that if we have not jurisdiction given to us by the law, no lapse of time can make that intra vires which was at the beginning ultra vires. 92 of the British North America Act says: "In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated," and amongst the enumerations is No. 10: "Local works and undertakings, other than those mentioned in the following classes." Now, this is a local work which it seems to me does not come within the classes that follow. The point upon which I differed from the views ex-was this, that the declaration standing alone For instance. does not create jurisdiction. we could not, by declaring that the street railway in the city of Ottawa is for the general advantage of Canada, transfer the jurisdiction over that incorporation from a provincial legislature to the Dominion Parliament. There is something more than that required; and when you look at the provisions a, b, and c, under subsection 10, which mention the subjects which are excepted from local jurisdiction, you will see what must be the attributes or characteristics of those local works to give us jurisdiction over them:

(a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province;

(b) Lines of steamships between the province and any British or foreign country;

(c) Such work as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution, declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada, or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

Look at the two previous subsections, and you will see what the attributes of such works must be. A work may be situated wholly within a province, but it ought to have this attribute that when it is completed it connects Canada with some foreign country or one province with another.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We would clearly have the jurisdiction without the declaration.

Mr. HAGGART. Could a provincial legislature grant a charter to a company that takes part of the water from an international river, a river dividing this province or the Dominion from the United States, diverting it from its course, and passing under the Welland Canal before it could be used?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see anything in the world to hinder it. If the hon. gentleman saw that the work was destroying a Dominion work, they might disallow the Act. They might protect a Dominion work in that way; it would be a legitimate use of the power of disallowance. But suppose that a railway in Quebec is incorporated by the legislature of Quebec, and another railway in Ontario is incorporated by the legislature of Ontario, and there is to be constructed a link connecting these two railways. This Parliament might declare that to be for the general advantage of Canada, because, when constructed, it takes upon itself a Dominion attribute or characteristic. It seems to me that, in interpreting the constitution, you are to look at the philosophy of the instrument itself. You are to treat it is an instrument of state, and to apply to it those broad rules of construction which are applicable in such cases; and a rule that be applicable to the interpretation of an instrument of this sort. I think this is a local undertaking. By dredging the rivers here mentioned and making them navigable, it may to that extent become a Dominion undertaking; but the very title of the incorporation, the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company, shows it to possess provincial and not Dominion attributes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They are made Dominion by the last clause.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where would you stop? Would you claim power to make everything Dominion?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon, gentleman claims that the declaration confers the power. I say that that declaration is only applicable when the Dominion characteristics are possessed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This Parliament has the discretion to declare them.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like as a matter of curiosity to ask the Minister of Justice how far he thinks that power should extend?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say as far as our discretion will carry it. Who is to limit it? The declaration has to be made that a certain work is for the general advantage of Canada. Opinions may differ upon the question as to what is for the general advantage of Canada. This Parliament can stultify itself in that declaration, as well as in others. We have a right to make a declaration of that kind in regard to this work if we deem it to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The rule, ejusdem generis, does not apply to the interpretation of that clause. You are to read subsection "c" as wholly distinct and separate from those which precede it.

Bill reported.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

are applicable in such cases; and a rule that might be perfectly appropriate in the interpretation of a private contract would not Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why are we constantly presented with this clause motivithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." Who is Jenkins, and what are his special qualifications that he should be appointed contrary to the Civil Service Act? I want full details with pedi-

Mr. FOSTER. The pedigree, I am sorry, I cannot give, not being an authority on matters of genealogy, and not having any particular interest in looking up the genealogy of this particular person.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will you swear he is not a cousin?

Mr. FOSTER. I may not swear under the law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will you declare to the circumstances?

Mr. FOSTER. He is my private secretary, a graduate of the University of New Brunswick, and he practised as a lawyer in St. John before he came with me in 1885 to Ottawa as my private secretary. He has been in the service ever since, having been transferred to the Finance Department from Department, Marine and Fisheries when I took hold of the Finance De-He has been at the head of partment. his class, and the proposition is to promote him to the first class, and he is not related to me in any way. I ask the committee to promote him, because I have to employ other secretarial assistance in the way of shorthand writing, and so a part of the salary, as private secretary, of Mr. K. Jenkins goes in that way. I thought it only fair that he should be promoted and made a first-class clerk, inasmuch as he loses a part of the salary which he has enjoyed the last two years, even though he is made a first-class clerk.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long has he been second-class clerk?

Mr. FOSTER. Ever since he became my private secretary in October, 1885.

Mr. McMULLEN. What increases have been made of clerks in the Finance Department in the last three years?

Mr. FOSTER. None; there has been a decrease.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there has been an increase in all the departments at Ottawa, within the last three years, of 165 clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman has noticed carefully, he has noticed that there has been a decrease in the Finance Department.

Mr. McMULLEN. I give the hon. gentleman my authority. There was a commission appointed in 1891 to investigate into and report upon the condition of the Civil Service. According to that report, there was then in the inside service at Ottawa 733 clerks. If my hon, friend will take up the report of the Civil Service and count the fund, he will find that there are now 889. I would like to know in what departments this increase of 165 has taken place?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must reollect that we are discussing the Finance Department. He put a question with reference to that department, and I answered it. It is only fair that we should take each department by itself, and it is only fair that we should take this department by itself, and not discuss the whole Civil Service on an item of the Finance Department. The hon, gentleman knows that it is not in order to do that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think this is an opportune moment to call the attention of the committee to the increases that have taken place, and I cannot-

Mr. FOSTER. But they did not take place in the Finance Department.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot see that there is any reason for these increases taking place, for there is no increase in the business done to justify an increase of 165 clerks in the inside service in three years. I have given my authority, and I challenge the Finance Minister to prove that my statement is not correct.

Mr. FOSTER. Who said it was not correct?

Mr. McMULLEN. At first you were disposed to say-

Mr. FOSTER. At first I was disposed to say no such thing. The hon, gentleman asked some questions with regard to the Finance Department, and I gave the information. What is the use of putting up a man of straw and knocking him down again?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not doing so. The Finance Minister only the other day pleaded hard times as the reason for not allowing the expenditures that were considered necessary in the Auditor General's office. He went on to show that there had been more increases in the Auditor General's office than in any other department and sought to prove that the Government had been economical in the administration of public affairs. And yet he cannot deny that 165 clerks have been added to the inside service in three years.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. But we are on the Finance Department now.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am going to discuss that; I have not reached that part of the question yet. The Minister has not explained why he has placed Mr. Jenkins in the position he has. Whenever some favourite seeks a lucrative office, the Civil Service Act is suspended so far as he is concerned, and every year we see more votes passed "notwithstanding any provision in the Civil names that contribute to the superannuation | Service Act to the contrary." We might about as well suspend the Civil Service Act at once.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) Do I understand that this gentleman is the Finance Minister's private secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) Is he a short-hand writer?

Mr. FOSTER. He is not a good short-hand writer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) The $1,400 he receives is in addition to the $600 he receives as private secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. It is rather hard that I should be expected to explain this three times to as many different gentleman. But let me explain it for the third time. Mr. Jenkins is my private secretary; he has been with me ever since I became a Minister in 1885. He is at the maximum of his class. He is a very worthy man and an excellent secretary, but I am obliged to get some secretarial work done otherwise than by him-work involving quick hand writing-and therefore I have to deduct $200 from the allowance for private secretary. In view of that, I have asked the committee to allow me to promote Mr. Jenkins to a first-class clerkship. He will then get less salary than he has received for the last two or three years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) Well, Mr. Chairman, I object to Mr. Jenkins or any other person being exempted from the provisions of the Civil Service Act and dealt with in this way. I do so because I know that there are persons in the Civil Service who have not received fair treatment at the hands of the Government. The non. Minister gave as a reason for dealing in what seemed to me a niggardly way—I use the expression not offensively—with the Auditor General, that times were hard, and said the circumstances are such that he was obliged to cut off $500 asked for extra clerks. And yet the hon, gentleman finds it possible to promote Mr. Jenkins, and to give him a larger salary than he is now receiving. The hon. gentleman admits that Mr. Jenkins is not a short-hand writer. He now receives, if he is paid the whole vote, $2,000. The Minister says that he is incapable of doing that work, so the hon. Minister is obliged to take a portion of the vote from him, but he does not propose that Mr. Jenkins shall be in a worse position than if he were com-petent, and so he proposes to give him a higher rank, in order that he may still receive the amount he is nominally charged with here—$2,000. So long as a large number of gentlemen, faithful in the discharge of their duties, sober, upright, competent, men who have been in the department for nearly twenty years, receive no promotion, I am not prepared to support this proposition of the hon. Minister.

Mr. McMullen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I listened to the hon. gentleman's explanation, but I did not understand what obstacle the Civil Service Act presents which is to be overcome by this vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Otherwise the promotion examination would have to be passed. My private secretary came in without passing the entrance examination, being eligible as a graduate of the university. He has been doing work for ten years, and, so far as concerns the step from second to first class, I should think that formality was not a matter of great importance. It is not that that he is unable to pass the examination.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman wants to promote his private secretary without obliging him to pass the examination which the Civil Service Act says shall be passed in such cases. This is a very serious step, and one that ought not to be taken except under extraordinary circumstances. I do not know Mr. Jenkins, I am not aware that I ever saw him. But if he is competent, as the hon. gentleman says. why does not he go up like a man and pass his examination? There surely could not be any difficulty about it. If he is not able to pass his examination, we should be doing a great wrong to others in the service, to his competitors or rivals, by foisting him into a position he is incompetent to fill.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is not just to the other members of the Civil Service to make a man in Mr. Jenkins' position a first-class clerk by resolution of this Parliament, so that he may draw first-class salary, although the Minister himself admits that he has not the qualifications necessary to make a private secretary. He is not a short-hand writer, and yet, notwithstanding his incapacity, the Minister asks that we make him a first-class clerk in order that he may draw $1,400, so as to make up to him the $200 which has to be taken from his allowance as private secretary and given to another person who does the short-hand work he is incapable of doing. But the secret of the whole thing is that Mr. Jenkins, I suppose, is related to the Finance Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. Call him Jenkins, don't say Jinkins.

Mr. McMULLEN. He may be Jenkins or Jinkins, but he is not entitled to the position that the Finance Minister wants to give him. If he has got the education that enables him to go before the Civil Service Board, let him pass an examination, and begin and creep up to the first position like other clerks. But where is the necessity of making a special case for him, carrying him over the heads of other clerks and giving him a first position? There must be some reason for it. Is he a good hand at keeping the scrap book for the Minister of Finance?

Mr. FOSTER. He never puts any of your speeches in it.

Mr. McMULLEN. He must have some peculiar qualification for which the Minister wants to keep him. Perhaps he gets up some of the speeches that the Finance Minister delivers in the House. He may be a very desirable assistant in that way.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps he may be.

Mr. McMULLEN. And the Minister wants the country to pay for it.

That may be; I did not Mr. FOSTER. think of that.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, I contend that the Finance Minister has no right to expect the House to sanction a violation of the Civil Service Act in this way, nor to give to a favourite like Mr. Jenkins an additional salary, putting him in the position of a firstclass clerk, and then give him the larger share of an allowance for a private secretary, $400, in addition to that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand this Mr. Jenkins is a graduate of a university, and still he has to go up for an examination. If he is qualified to pass a university, I think, from what I have seen of the examinations, that he should be able to pass the Civil Service examinations. What branch of the genealogical tree does he belong to? I presume the Minister of Finance could tell us that.

Mr. FOSTER. I could not tell.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We are not going to press him, if he don't want to tell, because he said he did not like to go up that tree himself. If it is a family matter, I do not want to press him any more. There was a time in this country when it was ruled by a family compact. I suppose this Government would like to bring that time back again. Now if there is to be an exception made in Mr. Jenkins's case—he may be a very excellent officer for aught I know-I do not see why others who have prior claims in the department, should be passed over. It is apt to destroy the morals of the department. If a university graduate is free for admission into the service without passing an examination, let the Minister say so, and let him defend it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe here that there is no less than twelve secondclass clerks at the maximum of their class, apparently. How long have these twelve gentlemen been at the maximum of their

Mr. FOSTER. Some of them have been there for a long while, I cannot say how

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, this is a point that deserves consideration. My great many of them have been in the service for a long time. I think some of them as long as twenty years, perhaps longer. A considerable number of them, I think, have been at the maximum of their class for, I should suppose, seven or eight years.

Mr. FOSTER. Some of them have, certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under such circumstances, there is no doubt that the promotion of one gentleman who has not been in the service perhaps a third of the time that they have been, and leaving them as second-class clerks, can hardly fail to create a good deal of heartburning, unless they are superior to the ordinary frailties of human nature.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they are, in that department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does appear to me that in that respect, at any rate, waiving all other questions, it is a hard thing for men who have been serving as these men have been, some of them for a quarter of a century, to see a man who has only been in the service ten years at the outside, made a first-class clerk over their heads. It must of necessity prevent, or interfere materially with, their promotion. There is only a limited number of first-class clerks in the department, and when this promotion has been made, there is no doubt that these men are put back, perhaps, for one or two years, perhaps for a longer term, before a first-class clerkship becomes vacant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is one of the results of adopting a bad precedent. Here are five or six persons, apparently, intended to be promoted or paid sums of money contrary to the Civil Service Act, and the Minister of Finance cannot very well interfere with it, because he has already set the example. It does appear to me that, unless there are very strong reasons to the contrary, this is a vote which should not receive the consent of the com-If you are going to make this wholesale sweep, and to promote these men in a single department without any regard to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, it does appear to me that there is little use in keeping that Act on the statute-book.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the Civil Service Act is going to be overridden in the way we have seen in one department, I do not see much use in insisting upon its application in another department. We have passed a Civil Service Act, which, presumably, is for the purpose of protecting the rights of civil servants, and giving them fair-play, so that favouritism, political or otherwise, shall not enter into the promotion or advancement of these gentlemen, but that in so far as posremembrance of these gentlemen is that a sible they shall be promoted on their merits.

Now, if this law is to be overridden at the caprice of every Minister for the time being, it will be a very serious thing. There may be, of course, grounds for the application of the Minister. Now, take the first name, R. R. Farrow. I understand that charges of some kind have been brought against that gentleman by one of his fellow-clerks, and I understand an investigation was held into I do not know what the those charges. result of it was, but rumours in the corridors of the House tell us that the investigation resulted in the man who laid the charge being punished, instead of the man against whom the charge was laid. I would like to know from the Controller of Customs what the charge was, who made the investigation, what the report was, and whether the hon, gentleman will lay that report before this committee?

Mr. WALLACE. The charges against Mr. Farrow are:

(a). That he improperly retained $3.30 of public money, as follows:-He received a registered letter from Sydney, N.S., on the 15th day of December, 1891, containing this remittance. He used this money, and not until the 22nd March. 1892, did he pay it to the consolidated fund. That he did not do this until warned by Mr. Dunlevie that Mr. A. C. Bleakney intended reporting him.

(b). That on the 14th October, 1893, Mr. Bristol handed him $1 to deposit to the credit of the Receiver General, but there is no further trace of this in Customs books.

(c). That large sums of money have been charged to the various ports which were paid through the contingent fund for the postage stamps taken for Customs duties on small par-cels. That these stamps are retained by Mr. Farrow, instead of being sent to the Post Office Department for redemption and proceeds deposited to credit of Receiver General.

(d). And also any charges that may be preferred in connection with defalcations of T. J. Watters.

The charges were investigated. Under the provisions of chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes, the Controller of Customs recommended that three commissioners. consisting of J. M. Courtney, Deputy Minister of Finance, W. G. Parmelee, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and F. E. Kilvert, Acting Commissioner of Customs, should be appointed to investigate and report on the conduct of Mr. Farrow in relation to such charges. That recommendation was adopted by Council; the investigation was held, and Mr. Farrow completely exonerated in connection with each charge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He was absolutely exonerated?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. In further reply to the hon. member for Queen's, I may say that the duties of chief accountant in the Customs Department are very important. The chief accountant should be chief clerk, but we are only proposing to make him a first-class clerk. Mr. Farrow's salary was $1,250, and it would be increased by the are crowded, and the Controller has had to regular increment to $1.300 were he to remain in his present position. He is acting chief accountant, and it is proposed to make him a first-class clerk, with the minimum salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the obstacle in the Civil Service Act, which the hon, gentleman is trying to overcome by this vote?

Mr. WALLACE. To make him a firstclass clerk before he has reached the maximum salary of a second-class clerk.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why is that recommended?

Because a first-class Mr. WALLACE. The law clerk is required as accountant. requires it.

How long has Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). he been in the service?

He has been in the Mr. WALLACE. permanent service eleven years, but several years previous to that he was employed as a temporary clerk.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many clerks has the Controller in his own office?

Mr. WALLACE. I have no clerks at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. I mean in the next room to yours: how many clerks are there in your immediate attendance?

Mr. WALLACE. We have three back in the room. If we had space elsewhere, I would only have my private secretary there.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many were there when the Controller came in the position he now occupies?

Mr. WALLACE. There were none. Minister of Customs, Mr. Chapleau, had his private secretary, but I presume he went out with him.

The former Minister Mr. McMULLEN. had his private secretary; now the Controller has three clerks. Is that the case?

Mr. WALLACE. No, not at all. I said there are two additional clerks there because there is no room for them elsewhere.

Mr. McMULLEN. Where were they before; was there sufficient space before?

Mr. WALLACE. A rearrangement of all the rooms has taken place. The commissioner had a room, and a room behind that for his private secretary. There was a readjustment a year or so ago, by which an additional room was taken by the commissioner and his secretary, which took away one room.

Mr. McMULLEN. I suppose this is one of the departments that is responsible for the 165 additional clerks appointed during the last three years. No wonder the rooms take some clerks into his own room where there would usually be only his private secretary.

Mr. WALLACE. There are no clerks who are not required, and they work most constantly up to ten o'clock at night, or even 12. They go there to work because the work has to be done. There is scarcely a night out of six months when they are not working till ten o'clock.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many increases have there been during recent years?

Mr. WALLACE. Some of the increases asked have been for clerks who were previously temporary clerks. We have put them on the list of permanent clerks at what are really smaller salaries than they were previously receiving, so that there is a decrease instead of an increase.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has Mr. Kilvert been appointed commissioner?

Mr. WALLACE. No; he is acting commissioner.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is he commissioner, or who is to fill the position?

Mr. WALLACE. That is not decided.

The Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. hon. gentleman has not given any very substantial reason for dispensing with the ordinary formalities of the Civil Service Act in Mr. Farrow's case. It is quite clear this gentleman has been promoted over the heads of four or five other officers, several years before the proper time. In order to do an act of that kind, there should be some extremely good and cogent reason This should not be done except shown. for very good and sufficient reasons, unless the Controller is prepared to say that none of the other officers are able to discharge the same duties, which I did not hear the hon. gentleman state. But, apart from Mr. Farrow, there are five other cases named, in which the Civil Service Act has been utterly and wholly set at defiance. Here are six men who are to be promoted, the Civil Service Act to the contrary, notwithstanding. The hon, gentleman did not give the House one scintilla of information in regard to any of these men except Mr. Farrow, and he was prepared to let the item go through without any further explanation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon, gentleman to say that he applied to Council for the appointment of commissioners to investigate the charges made. To whom did the commissioners report?

Mr. WALLACE. The Governor General in Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then there was an Order in Council passed on that report I presume.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the matter was grave enough for the Council to appoint a commission to inquire into it, that commission must have reported back to Council and the Council must have acted upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. The representative in Council of the Customs Department is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the report was sent to him. Unfortunately the Minister of Trade and Commerce is ill at Sherbrooke, and the Council has not yet acted upon the report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If this report is so palpably plain, there can be no doubt that it will be acted upon at once. I am willing to assume for the moment that Mr. Farrow is absolutely innocent, but the charge is there and not yet disposed of, and it is a most extraordinary thing to ask that this committee shall give him promotion contrary to the Civil Service Act until the Government determine that they will adopt the report exonerating him.

Mr. FOSTER. The report of the commission has not been acted upon formally, and I think it would be perhaps well that the item should stand until the matter has been disposed of by Council. We can go on with the other items.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Very well, let the matter about Farrow stand.

Mr. WALLACE. With reference to Mr. Breadner: we have not created a new department but we have enlarged the checking branch so as to have a complete check upon all the invoices and entries made at every port in Canada, and have uniformity in the rates of duty imposed at all the ports, and values made by competent and experienced men. We have promoted Mr. Breadner who is a very industrious and competent man as head of that branch. He was a third-class clerk and we ask that he be made a second-class clerk at the minimum salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What length of service has Mr. Breadner had?

Mr. WALLACE. He was appointed on the 30th September, 1884, but was in the service in the Eastern townships for about a year before that as acting collector. He was in the Post Office for a number of years before he came into the Customs Department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did he take his examinations?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, on his appointment. As to Mr. Watson, Mr. Rorke and Mr. Lafontaine. Mr. Watson and Mr. Lafontaine are appointed to this new checking branch which requires very competent and careful men. Then with regard to Mr. Bayles, he was voted this amount last year but in consequence of the words "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act" being omitted, the Auditor General would not pay it. This is simply a revote. He is a messenger and this gives him the maximum.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would seem from all this, that hon. gentlemen opposite think the Civil Service Act is a very bad thing. It stands in the way of the Government and so they ask us to adopt a rule which may exist in a country that has no law but the will of the supreme authority. They say: The Act is an impediment in our way, we wish to make certain appointments, and in order to make these appointments we seek to get the sanction of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. We could not do it otherwise.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think it ought to be done at all. You should either repeal the law or make the promotions according to law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What earthly object can there be in the public interest for departing from the law in the case of a messenger who would receive his annual increase of $40?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Bayles was appointed in 1890, and had he got his annual increase he would have received the maximum by this time. That is all that is asked for.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) What stood in the way of him not getting his annual increase?

Mr. WALLACE. The Auditor General would not pay because the words "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary," were omitted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If he was entitled to it under the law that would not prevent him.

Mr. WALLACE. He is a competent and capable man and if he got his annual increase his salary would now be $500.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why did he not get it; was he suspended?

Mr. WALLACE. No. His conduct has been excellent as far as I know.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has not explained why he did not get this annual increase. He tells years that he has been five service, that he was appointed at $350 a year, and that he is entitled to an annual increase of $30, which would entitle him to receive now $500 a year; yet he says he cannot get it without this special clause. I cannot for the life of me see where the necessity for violating the Civil Service Act comes in here, if the statement made by the Controller be correct.

Mr. WALLACE. Last year and the year before Parliament voted the increase, but the Auditor General refused to pay the and now the time has arrived when by the natural increase of $30 a year he would have the right to the maximum salary of his class, $500 a year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. gentleman has not told us why he proposed to give this man a greater increase than he was entitled to two years ago. This man appears to be a special favourite of the hon. gentieman.

Mr. WALLACE. No; the proposition was made before I came in.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see that the absence of these words would prevent him receiving the increase the law allows, the $30 a year.

Mr. WALLACE. We did not put that amount in the Estimates.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You put a larger amount.

Mr. WALLACE. We put a larger amount, which the Auditor General refused to pay on that ground.

Mr. FOSTER. It is just the arrears that are being asked for now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why did the hon. gentleman recommend that this special messenger should be singled out and paid this allowance, contrary to the provisions of the Act?

Mr. WALLACE. It was in the Estimates which were submitted to this House. He is a very good and efficient messenger.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are plenty of other good and efficient messengers in the service.

Mr. WALLACE. There are two other messengers and they receive the maximum. One has been thirty-eight years in the service, and the other has been in since 1891.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the hon. gentleman tell me why he does not, as a matter of simple justice, propose that every good and efficient messenger shall receive an increase equivalent to what he gives to Mr. Bayles ?

Mr. WALLACE. The first recommendation was made before I came in; the next year I made the recommendation again; but the Auditor General on both occasions refused to pay the money.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has been asked several times on what ground he makes this recommendation. He said a moment ago because this man was a good and efficient messenger; but that applies to many in the service. What we want to know is why this messenger was singled out?

Mr. WALLACE. I suppose it would be difficult for him to live on $350 a year. He money, because these words were omitted; remains in the office till the mail goes out at ten o'clock every night, and works long hours, and I think he is entitled to consideration.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon, gentleman's statement, if it has any value at all, is an attack upon the sum fixed by the law at which these messengers come in. He says $350 is not enough. Why does he not propose a change, and make it more? The hon, gentleman says this man is a good officer. That may be; he ought to dismiss him if he is not. Why does the hon, gentleman single him out to receive more than he proposes as a general sum to everybody in the same class for the same length of service?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose explanations have been given of all this, and as the item is to stand, we might as well proceed to the next item.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is just one question which I wish to ask with reference to this man Bleakney. It was stated that he made a charge against Farrow, and that the charge was not sustained. Has any action been taken with respect to Bleakney? Has he been suspended, and is he now under suspension?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When was he suspended?

Mr. WALLACE. A week ago or less.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was he suspended for?

Mr. WALLACE. The principal thing was disobedience of orders that I gave him.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Had it anything to do with the charge he made against Farrow?

Mr. WALLACE. That was one of the reasons, but the principal reason was disobedience of orders I gave him as to the performance of his duty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There were two reasons, then. One was being mixed up in the Farrow charge. Does the hon. gentleman say that he acted in that matter before Council had reported upon it?

Mr. WALLACE. The reason, as I said before, was disobedience of my orders.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What were the particular orders?

Mr. WALLACE. I suppose that will come up at the regular time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not wish to know what particular orders he disobeyed. I think it is sufficient for a head of a department to say: An officer disobeyed my order, and I suspended him. That was one of the reasons the hon. gentleman gave. In addition, this man made a charge of malfeasance of office against Farrow, and that has been inquired into and now stands for judgment.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not quite correct, that he made a charge. There are other matters indirectly involved in that matter which, I think, it would be better to leave for discussion when they come up in the regular way.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole item stands over until Council has dealt with that matter, and the report is brought before the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All I hope that is that the whole matter is not as mixed up as the Controller's explanation of it.

Inland Revenue Department—Chief clerk, accountant, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act.. Allowance for private secretary to Controller, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act.....

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. More contradictions to the Civil Service Act.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I wish to explain with regard to the first item. Mr. Campeau the assistant accountant, has been performing the duties of accountant of the department since 1894, and discharging them satisfactorily. Mr. Robbin died in July, 1894, and since that time Mr. Campeau has been doing the work. It was thought that he was entitled to an additional $200, when the appointment of accountant would be made in the person of Mr. Campeau, but the postponement of the promotion examination prevented that being carried out, and it was recommended that he should receive $200 in addition to his salary when the appointment would take place. A few days ago, I drew the attention of the Minister of Minister of Finance to the danger that the words "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary," would enable Mr. Campeau to receive this $200 without passing the promotion examination, which I did not intend, and which, I am quite sure, Mr. Campeau did not intend. There was nothing left but to ask the committee to reduce that vote by $200 and make it $1,800, and I asked that this be done. I may also explain with regard to the words "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." added to the item for an allowance of $600 to my private secretary, that when I first examined the Estimates, on taking charge of the Department of Inland Revenue. I was informed that the Act only made allowances for Ministers, and that Auditor General raised the point that the Controller, not being a Minister, but a member of the Government by statute, was not entitled to have this allowance voted for his private secretary. I thought the point was well taken, and not wishing to argue the point, I added these words. They are not at all. I moved that the item "chief clerk accountant," be reduced to $1.800.

Item, as amended, agreed to.

Post Office Department.....$203,205

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing but the statutory increases and some reductions.

sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that there are some nine clerks less and should like to know the reason.

Mr. FOSTER. These are old clerks, some of them over seventy years of age, whom it is proposed to superannuate, and their places will not be filled.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many have been superannuated?

Mr. FOSTER. Ten.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the total amount of superannuation allowance granted to the ten?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see that calculation made. Their names are as follows: The accountant Mr. Smithson, age 61, salary $2,600. To him succeeds Mr. Barrett whose salary is at present, $1,800. Mr. Brophy, seventy years of age; Mr. Benjamin, sixty-three years of age; Mr. Shaw, seventy-five years of age, Mr. Dunlevie, fifty-seven; Mr. McDonald, sixty-four; Mr. Burrell and Mr. Fortier, aged seventy-six. Also a third-class clerk, forty-one years of age who was superannuated on account of ill health. His health was such that he could not do any work in the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are several of these persons besides the last-named who are very little above the earliest age at which superannuation can take place, and one below it. So far as I can make out, the total amount of superannuation will be heavy. I imagine the superannuation allowances of these ten gentlemen would be about $10,000 or $12,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Not so much as that. It is to be remembered that the places of most of these gentlemen are not to be filled. The aggregate saving will be about $6,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That report has not come down yet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The superannuation report?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The report relating to the dismissed postmaster.

Mr. LAURIER. That will come down on Monday—or later.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think you can take that up on such an item as this; I do not think it is germane.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know; it may prove to be quite germane to some of these votes.

Mr. Wood (Brockville).

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes: the connection would be very clear. It is very possible some of these officials may be mixed up in this matter. I do not see that we are going to save much by this superannuation. As to those of seventy years, or over, there is not much to be said, perhaps. There is a point here which I think has been the same for a number of years, upon which I would like a word of explanation. The superintendent of the dead letter branch is a chief clerk, apparently in the same position as others who are heads of what seem to be more important branches.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that the same plan was followed in dividing these classes as was followed in the department at Washington and the department at London.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would not like the Minister to get away from this item with an erroneous impression. He seems to think it would not be well to stay proceedings because a certain report was not brought down. The hon, gentleman knows that the redress of grievances must precede the granting of supplies, and he will remember that the hon, member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) complains of a very serious grievance, and moved for certain papers relating to this department, which motion was adopted by the House, but these papers are not before us. So the hon, Minister will see that he is proceeding contrary to the rules.

Mr. FOSTER. But the hon. gentleman has put himself out of court. The redress of grievance is to precede the granting of supplies, and he has allowed us to get into Supply. So the hon. gentleman is about four or five hours too late.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the redress of grievances precedes the granting of supplies, not going into Committee of Supply. If the hon. Minister thinks he has the supply, he might ask the committee to rise.

Mr. FOSTER. But grievances are to be ventilated on going into supply. Surely my hon. friend would not try to ventilate all grievances on one item of supply. The hon. gentleman is clearly out of court.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it is the hon. Minister. The rule is that letters and papers must be in hand before the supplies are granted. The granting has not taken place.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon, gentleman may as well understand that when we come to contingencies of this department, we expect that report to be brought down—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Or no contingencies.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is a contingency you had better not deal with.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. Minister may as well understand this point. We have an order of the House calling for these papers, and we have the promise of the Prime Minister that the papers shall be brought down, and the day fixed, and if the report is not down, the Opposition must assert their rights.

Department of Agriculture..... $5,540

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is a decrease in the general item, as hon. gentlemen will notice. Increases that are shown in some of the individual items, which are statutory, with the exception of the cases of two clerks whose names are mentioned, and for whom the vote is asked, "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." Both of these clerks have been employed some years and their salaries taken from contingencies, and this vote is to transfer them to regular appointments. As to the case of M. Leyden, this clerk is in the copyright, trade-mark, industrial design, and timber-mark branch, and is an expert in that branch, especially in the copyright work; and in consequence of that expert knowledge and extended experience in that work, the department are asking for the privilege of employing her on the regular staff. T. B. Bassett is an expert in the patent branch, and has been employed for some time. This vote is to transfer him from contingencies to the regular salary list. He has been about ten years in the department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does he get an increase in salary?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; this is a reduction, I think.

Department of Marine and Fisheries..... $58,305

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman explain this increase of $4,000 or $5,000 in his department.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The increase is not quite what the hon. gentleman states; it is less than $3,400. If the hon. gentleman will take into consideration the fact that I have provided a salary for commissioner of fisheries, $2,000, and taken it from the outside vote, in which it appeared before, he will see that a great proportion of the apparent increase is accounted for. The reorganization of the department involved changes that should be explained. The first change was the retirement of Mr. Bauset, chief clerk, and the promotion to the position, of Mr. Venning. The next change was the promotion of Mr. J. S. Webster to the position vacated by the promotion of Mr. Venning; and Mr. James A. Murray was promoted from the third-class.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) Is this Mr. Webster the man who was brought down from the North-west and employed as a canvassing agent?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; that is not the Mr. Webster the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who is this M. C. Doyle, a third-class clerk at $900? Why is he mentioned specially?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is a young lady, Miss Doyle.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why is she specially mentioned in the vote?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Miss Doyle has been in the department for quite a number of years. She is getting $600, and was getting $300 additional as private secretary during the time of my predecessor. I knew the ability of the young lady when I acted at one time for my predecessor; and I was very glad to avail myself of her services in that capacity, not only as an ordinary writer, but as one well able to write letters and to prepare documents. When the transfer was made, I took my private secretary with me, having had him for a long time. I could not, in justice to him, as an old private secretary, take away a portion of his salary and give it to Miss Doyle. Therefore, I thought that it was only fair to give her half the amount, $300, because she was doing the work she always did, and doing it in the most satisfactory manner.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have practically two private secretaries.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There always have been two there. I think if the hon. gentleman will call in any morning, he will recognize the fact that there is plenty of work for both.

Department of Public Works...... $48,985

Mr. FOSTER. These are statutory increases, and a decrease of the difference in salary of a first-class clerk, $400, and a second-class clerk dropped, $1,400. Two second-class clerks dropped, $1,000. The net decrease is $2,007.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Any superannuations?

Mr. FOSTER. No, I think those are not superannuations; I think they are clerkships estimated for, but not filled.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In this department an investigation was commenced in the Public Accounts Committee in reference to some defalcations alleged to have been committed by a man named Hamel.

Mr. FOSTER. Not included in this.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It reached a certain stage before the Public Accounts Committee, and then it was understood the papers were to be referred to the Minister of Justice for his opinion. I wish to know if the Minister of Justice has given that opinion, and what it is.

Mr. FOSTER. The papers have been transferred, but whether the Minister of Justice has perfected his opinion, I do not know; I scarcely think he has.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will give the hon, gentleman notice that I will expect an answer when we come to the contingencies vote for this department.

Department Railways and Canals..... $46,712 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe in this item that there is an alteration, apparently, that a gentleman who is described as law clerk seems to have been dropped. Who was the law clerk in former days?

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Fissiault.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that for the future this law clerk is no longer to be attached to the Department of Railways and Canals?

Mr. HAGGART. No, I have a young man in the office who is in training for a barrister, and he does any work of this kind that is required to be done.

Geological Survey $49,742 50

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I would like to ask the hon, gentleman who has charge of this department with reference to the superannuation of Dr. Selwyn. Dr. Selwyn was, upon the death of his predecessor in office, at the head of his branch. I understand that he has been superannuated, and that Dr. Dawson has been appointed in his place. did not understand that Dr. Selwyn applied for superannuation, that he was complaining of failing health, or want of fitness for the further discharge of his duties. I understand that upon his retirement, if he was retired upon the number of years' service that he actually performed, there was no addition made to his period of service. would like to ask the hon, gentleman why this was so, and what rule the Government have adopted for their guidance with reference to this matter. Have they adopted the rule that upon the retirement of a public officer, no matter what may be his special fitness for his office, or the circumstances under which he retired, that the practice of adding a number of years to the period of service is no longer to be followed? Because, unless there is some specific rule adopted by the Government, where one party receives an allowance beyond that which his actual years of service entitle him, while another does not, the natural inference is that there is a reflection upon the conduct of one man, and an expression of approval of the conduct of the other as a public servant. Now, I understood last year that in the case of Mr. Vankoughnet, who was retired against his will, and while he maintained he was fit for the discharge of his duties, the Minister offered to add ten years to his services if he would tender his resignation, but because he did not tender his resignation, there was no addition made whatever. I have no doubt but what I am stating the facts with strict accuracy in this case. Was there any application made to Dr. Selwyn to send in his resignation, and was he dealt with as Mr. Vankoughnet was dealt with for a like reason?

Mr. FOSTER. Not being the Minister of the department directly interested, I cannot speak with absolute definiteness in my reply. With respect to the first question asked by the hon. member, the rule is that time is not added. There are exceptions of course to that rule as to every other rule, and the exceptions are based on two considerations. One is for eminent and distinguished services, where a man has been well qualified for his position, and he is superannuated after long service. But that would apply to very few occasions indeed. The other case in which an extension is made is, where person may not have been so distinguished as members of the class to which I have just alluded; but whose office is abolished, and it is not intended to fill it. In some cases of that kind additions have been made to the time of service. Those are the rules upon which this matter is determined. I do not remember the circumstances with respect to Mr. Vankoughnet; and as to Mr. Selwyn, my recollection is that it was understood by the Minister that Dr. Selwyn was to be superannuated, and when leave of absence was given him it was understood by the Treasury Board and Council, that it was preparatory to his retirement, and the appointment of Dr. Dawson in his place. have not heard anything of a condition imposed or promise held out that if he did so and so a certain course would be adopted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand that Dr. Selwyn was for a great many years in the service here.

Mr. FOSTER. I think he was close up to, if he had not filled up his time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Admitting that to be so, I am also informed that the first holidays during the whole period of his service occurred just before his retirement when two or three months were given to him. The hon. Minister will see that granting leave of absence to Dr. Selwyn after spending a quarter of a century in the service it was not unreasonable, and it would have been reasonable on the part of the Government, in view of his eminent services, an addition had been made to his time, for in my opinion Dr. Selwyn's case would properly fall within the rule. My impression of him was that he was a public officer, a very competent man and a very industrious man, one who discharged his duties, so far as he was individually concerned, as well perhaps as any man likely to become his successor.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I call the Minister's attention to the fact that the Civil Serivce Act is again violated in the case of the geographer.

Mr. FOSTER. Increases are not given by statute to members of the technical service of the Geological Department; but it has been the practice every two years to grant them statutory increases, and this I suppose is to give a statutory increase to this geographer for this year, which would have fallen to him last year if he had been in the service.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

CORDWOOD FOR QUEBEC CITADEL.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Choquette) asked, 1. Who held, last year, and who holds, this year, the contract for cordwood for the Quebec Citadel? 2. Were the said contracts based on tenders? 3. What is the price per cord of wood?

Mr. DICKEY. From 1st July, 1893, to 1st July, 1894, the contract for cordwood for the Quebec Citadel was held by Mr. George B. Lawrence. This year—from 1st July, 1894, to 1st July, 1895, the contract is held by the same person. The contracts were based on tenders. Under the contract for 1893-94, the prices were $6 per cord for hard wood; $5 per cord for soft wood. Under the contract for 1894-95, the prices were $8.25 per cord for hardwood; $5.50 per cord for soft wood.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SIR JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Rider) asked, 1. Have accounts and vouchers been received covering all expenses authorized by the Government in connection with the funeral of the late Sir John Thompson? If so, what is the amount? Otherwise, what amount has been received? 2. Have any claims been presented for expenses of any kind in connection therewith which were not authorized by the Government? If so, by whom, for what amount, and how much has been allowed or paid thereon?

Mr. OUIMET. The answer to the first question is, yes; the total amount of account received was $33,779.43. The answer to the second question is, no; all the work for which accounts were presented was authorized, but the prices were not in all cases acceptable, and reductions have been made that will bring the total within the amount of the vote.

LIGHTSHIP AT ST. ROCH DES AULNETS.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Choquette) asked, 1. Who has the contract for the cordwood required for the steam whistle on the lightship at the Lower Traverse at St. Roch des Aulnets? 2. Was the contract awarded on tender, and if so, when were tenders called for? 3. What are the names of parties who tendered, and the amounts of the several tenders?

Mr. COSTIGAN. As there is no cordwood used, and the Marine and Fisheries supply vessel furnishes coal for that fogwhistle, there is no such contract, and no tenders have therefore been called for.

TENDERS FOR FREIGHT SHED, HALI-FAX.

Mr. FORBES asked, 1. How many tenders, and what are the respective amounts and names of the tenderers, received by the Government for rebuilding the foundation of the freight shed at deep water terminus, Halifax? 2. To whom has the contract been awarded, and why is the work not progressing?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. The following is a list of tenders received for the construction of the foundation of the freight shed at deep water terminus, Halifax; they are tenders on schedule prices which money out the following amounts:—Theophilus Leblanc, Moncton, N.B., $7,622.90; Jas. W. McDonald, Halifax, N.S., $13,309.75; S. M. Brookfield, Halifax, N.S., $13,564.12. 2. The contract has been awarded to Theophilus B. Leblanc, Leblanc's tender has only recently been accepted, and the contract has not yet been executed.

EXPENSES OF MR. COCKBURN, M.P., COMMISSIONER AT COLUMBIA EXPOSITION.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Choquette) asked, Whether the Government had the accounts current of Mr. Geo. R. R. Cockburn, Esq., M.P., examined; and if so, were they found correct, and have they been paid in full, that is to say, $4,425?

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to call the attention of the House to the special display which is made on the Order paper, of what purport to be accounts of the World's Columbia Exposition at Chicago, by George R. R. Cockburn, Esq., M.P., but between which and any question which is asked, I can trace not the slightest connection. If advantage is to be taken of the Order paper to display, for partisan purposes, a matter of that kind, I do not know where we shall end. I should like to call the attention of Mr. Speaker to this matter.

Mr. MULOCK. There is another question just like it lower down.

Mr. FOSTER. The same applies to the other question. The bad example here has caused others to follow, and the same remarks apply to each.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot see that this question is out of order, because it refers to a public matter. But I think it is very objectionable that these accounts should be extended upon our proceedings. However, I cannot rule the question out of order.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the answer?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In reply to the hon, gentleman, I may say that Mr. George R. R. Cockburn, M.P., was appointed Commissioner of the World's Fair by Order in Council. He was given no salary, he gave his time gratuitously; but the Dominion Government paid his living expenses. The bills were sent in and were certified to by the executive commissioner, and were properly examined by the department. There were some small items in the bills as first made out which did not properly come under the heading of living expenses, and these items were deducted from the amount of the accounts by Mr. Cockburn himself, and were paid out of his own pocket. These were only small, of course. The accounts were not adjudged exorbitant, and were paid.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand, Mr. Speaker, your ruling was that you have no power to prevent these accounts from appearing. If you have not, and if they do not come within the rules of the House, I should like to ask the leader of the Opposition just now whether he would not support the Clerk, or the Speaker, and the Government side of the House, in refusing to receive such displays as these, which are not pertinent to the questions which are asked? Certainly it is the creeping in of an abuse which may have no end, and there ought to be some method by which the good sense of the House would prevent these displays.

Mr. LAURIER. If they come within the rules at present existing, I do not see how the Speaker or the Clerk can refuse them.

EXPORT OF SELF-BINDING HAR-VESTERS.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, 1. How many self-binding harvesters were exported from Canada during the year 1894? 2. The names of the different firms or companies so exporting the same, and the number of such harvesters so exported by each of said firms? 3. The average amount of drawback on account of duty paid on raw material, allowed and paid by the Government on each of such harvesters? 4. The total amount of drawback paid on all self-binding harvesters exported from Canada in year 1894?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. 3,385. 2. All exported by the Massey-Harris Co., Limited. 3. $2.97, and 9-10 of a cent on each machine. 4. Payment of drawbacks on account of the machines exported during the year ending 31st December, 1894, is yet under consideration, but the total amount would equal $10,083.91.

YAMASKA AND ST. OURS LOCKS.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Mignault) asked, How much does the Government charge vessels passing through the Yamaska lock, and how much for vessels passing through the St. Ours lock? Is there any difference in the charge, and if so, why?

Mr. OUIMET. Vessels: Canadian steam, the following sums paid for the service per ton, 1 cent each way; scow, &c., do; the said persons for their travelling sail, per ton, 1 cent each way; pleasure boats, either row or sail, 15 cents each way.

EXPENSES OF CANADIAN COMMISSION AT PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITION.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) (for Mr. Taylor) asked, Were Hon. E. G. Penny, Hon. R. D. Wilmot, B. R. McDougall, Esq., and the then Hon. Minister of Agriculture, appointed commissioners in connection with the Canadian exhibit at the Centennial Exhibition, held in the city of Philadelphia, U.S., in the year 1876? Was Joseph Perrault. Esq., appointed secretary-treasurer. 14th May, 1875. at $250 per month? Were a number of other persons appointed in connection with the said exhibition? Were the following sums paid for the services of the said persons for their travelling expenses, hotel fares, and other expenses, in connection with the said exhibition:—

Mr. MONTAGUE. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I may say that those gentle-nien, Hon. E. G. Penny, Hon. R. G. Wilmot, B. R. McDougall, Esq., and the then hon. Minister of Agriculture, were appointed commissioners in connection with the Canadian exhibit at the Centennial Exhibition held in the city of Philadelphia, U.S., in the year 1876. Mr. Joseph Perrault was appointed secretary treasurer on 14th May, 1875, at a salary of $250 per month. number of other persons were appointed in connection with the said exhibition. The mentioned were paid sums for the services of the said persons, for their travelling expenses, hotel fares, and other expenses, as shown by the return to Parliament dated 2nd May, 1879.

ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. Was any charge recently laid by Mr. Arthur Blakeney, of the Customs Department, against Mr. Robt. Farrow, of the same department, with reference to the dealing of the latter with public moneys? 2. If any such charge was made, what were the particulars of it? 3. Was any inquiry instituted by the Government into any such charge, and if so, before whom was the inquiry made, and with what result?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. Yes. 2. The particulars of the charges are:

(a). That he improperly retained $3.30 of public money, as follows:—He received a registered letter from Sydney, N.S., on the 15th day of December, 1891, containing this remittance. He used this money, and not until the 22nd March. 1892, did he pay it to the Consolidated Fund. That he did not do this until warned by Mr. Dunlevie that Mr. A. C. Bleakney intended reporting him.

(b). That on the 14th October, 1893, Mr. Bristol handed him $1 to deposit to the credit of the Receiver General, but there is no further trace of this in Customs books.

(c). That large sums have been charged to the various ports which were paid to the contingent fund for the postage stamps taken for Customs That these stamps are duties on small parcels. retained by Mr. Farrow, instead of being sent to the Post Office Department for redemption and proceeds deposited to credit of Receiver General.

(d). And also any charges that may be preferred in connection with defalcations of T. J. Watters.

3. Yes, the charges were investigated. der the provisions of chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes, the Controller of Customs recommended that three commissioners, consisting of J. M. Courtney, Esq., Deputy Minister of Finance; W. G. Parmelee, Esq., Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and F. E. Kilvert, Esq., Acting Commissioner of Customs, should be appointed to investigate and report on the conduct of Mr. Farrow, in relation to such charges. That recommendation was adopted by Council; the investigation was held, and the report is now under consideration.

THE TOBIQUE VALLEY RAILWAY.

Mr. MULOCK asked, 1. When was the Tobique Valley Railway opened for traffic? 2. Has this railway been leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway? 3. If so, what is 4. Are regular passenger rental? trains run daily? If not, what is the extent of such passenger service? 5. What is the extent of the freight service? 6. What have been the total passenger receipts, and what the total freight receipts since the opening of the line?

The Tobique Valley Mr. HAGGART. Railway has not been regularly opened for traffic, but on the 24th November, 1893. the first traffic train was run. The Canadian Pacific Railway are under agreement to lease the Tobique Valley Railway when certain conditions precedent are fulfilled; these conditions not being yet fulfilled, the Canadian Pacific Railway have never taken possession or operated the road regularly with consent of the company. The rental is to be 40 per cent of gross earnings, when possession is taken of under lease. convenience in special circumstances, the Canadian Pacific Railway have occasionally run a train to take in or bring out freight. The gross earnings for the year 1894 were twenty-two hundred dollars; so far this year there is practically nothing.

Mr. WALLACE.

RAILWAY FACILITIES IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) moved for:

Return of all correspondence, petitions, memorials, reports or documents relative to the extension of the railway system in the province of Prince Edward Island.

He said: In 1871 a Railway Act was passed by the local legislature of Prince Edward Island under which a road was built from Alberton to Georgetown. Branches were afterwards constructed from Mount Stewart to Souris, and from Alberton to Tignish. large section of the country known as the Belfast and Murray Harbour district did not at that time, apply for railway extension, and did not secure railway facilities. Railways have become as great a necessity to the people as highways were to the early settlers. The policy of the Dominion Government with respect to granting subsidies to railway has become very general in its application. Lines have been built in different sections at a large expenditure of Railways have been built public money. through Cape Breton, and elsewhere, which have proved of great advantage to the peo-ple, and have shown the wisdom of undertaking the various works. The districts to which I desire now particularly to refer are known as the East Point and Belfast and Murray Harbour districts, which requires the construction of railroads through their very thickly-settled and prosperous settle-ments. The number of people benefited would be about 23,000; the population of the districts equals fifty to the square mile. The districts through which these lines would run are highly cultivated and thickly settled. I have taken the trouble to consult the census of 1891, and ascertain the agricultural products raised there. I find as follows:-

I may here also mention that at present there is a branch line running from Cape Traverse to Emerald Junction, which connects with the down train from Summerside to Charlottetown. The Cape Traverse train lies over at Emerald Junction until the return of the Summerside train in the evening. I may say that Emerald Junction is situated in a very flourishing part of the country, and I think it would be a proper and judicious thing for the Minister of Railways to consider the advisability of running a line from Emerald Junction toward the deep water at Stanley, through this very productive sec-The train at Emerald tion of the country. idle for a part of each day, the doing nothing, and hands are it is so self-evident that it would be a paying line, considering the means of operating would be available, that I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything further on this matter. When our present line in Prince Edward Island was constructed in 1873, it cost $15,000 per mile. The difference in the cost of constructing a line at present may be inferred from the fact that some of the iron rails in the Prince Edward Island Railway cost as high as $90 per ton.

In 1873, the steel rails cost the then Liberal Government $54.81 per ton, but the present value of steel rails laid down in Prince Edward Island would be, I am told, $21 per ton. All the other outfits necessary for railway construction are now much cheaper than they were then, so that a railroad would cost much less at the present time than when our Prince Edward Island line was built. The rolling stock of the present road would be nearly sufficient for the contemplated branch lines, the construction of which I advocate. The machine shops at present in use would be amply sufficient for the increased mileage, and it would entail no extra cost for superintendence. Having consideration for these facts, there can be no doubt that a 3 feet 6 inch guage road could be built at a cost not exceeding $8,500 per, mile, or a total of $550,000 for the sixtyfive miles to which I refer. In deciding on the terms by which we entered confederation it was estimated at the time that the Canadian Pacific Railway would cost $30,000,-000, and that there would be an outlay of $8,933,333 for the enlargement of canals. It was also estimated that it would take $4,-552,148 to complete the Intercolonial. I find on looking into the Public Accounts of Canada, that instead of that there has been an authorized expenditure for railways and canals since 1873, at which time we came into confederation, as follows:-

AUTHORIZED EXPENDITURE ON RAILWAYS AND CANALS SINCE 1873 OVER WHAT WAS CONTEMPLATED.

Railways	$129,370,305 18 45,218,221 93
Total expenditure Less estimated cost of C.P.R	$174, 595,526 01
Less estimated for en- largement of canals 8,933,333 Less estimated for I.C.
R	43,485,481 69

Difference..... $131,010,045 01

As I have shown from the Public Accounts. the excess of expenditure for railways and canals over what was contemplated in 1873, when Prince Edward Island entered the Prince Edunion, has been $131,010,045. ward Island's proportion of this amount is $3,275,251, against which Prince Edward Island has received $1,196,693.09, as follows:— Amount expended on capital account of Prince Edward Island Railway, $596,693.09; amount received under 50-51 Vic., cap. 8, $500,000, being $20,000 a year, or the interest on $500,000 at 4 per cent, which we have been receiving for some years past. These two items make a total of $1,096,693.90, which, deducted from the $3,275,251.27 of over-expenditure, leaves a balance in favour of Prince Edward Island of $2,178,558. Having shown our actual claim, I will now take another method of looking at the figures. The Finance Minister, in his Budget speech of May 3rd, 1895, said:

The total net debt on 30th June, 1894, amounts to $246,183,629. Deducting from this the amount assumed by the provinces, you have a net Dominion debt, from 1867 to date, incurred by the Dominion for Dominion purposes, amounting to $136,752,881.

We have services and works representing, in connection with railways and canals, a grand total of capital expenditure of $166,369,288. Thus you will find that $28,616,407 more than has been added to the Dominion debt, has been expended on capital account for the services of the country.

I find that the liabilities of the Dominion matured or current on the same date amounted to $9.844.316. In the same speech, the Finance Minister said:

We have railway subsidies under contract of $2,257,059; also railway subsidies granted, but not under contract, amounting to $2,587,257. Then, to finish the St. Lawrence Canal system, widening and deepening the canals according to the demands presented by the Minister the other day, we must spend $6,000,000. But, as I am taking this from the 1st July, 1895, I estimate that $5,000,000 will have to be spent after that time. *

* This makes a total of these liabilities of $9,844,316. These are liabilities that are current or probable.

By the report of the Minister of Finance for 1894, I find that the sinking fund has increased by $28,758,334.19 since Prince Edward Island entered the union, as follows:—

Up to year ending 30th June, 1894. $32,356,776 65 do do 1873. $3,598,422 46

An increase of...... $28,758,334 19

Since we came into confederation, I contend that this sinking fund is even more justly included than the net debt itself. The debt might be repudiated, but the sinking fund is debt paid off, to which Prince Edward Island has contributed her share. Then there are contingent liabilities, amounting to $15,000,000, which are represented by the following:—

Short Line Railway, about	$ 2,250,000
Regina and Prince Albert Ry., about	1,280,000
Calgary and Edmonton Ry., about	1,280,000
Hudson's Bay Railway, about	1,600,000
Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway	250,180
Chignecto Ship Railway	3,412,000
Various subsidies authorized, esti-	• mated at	5,000,000

Total......$15,000,000

I may just here say that I have included the Chignecto Ship Railway, because, although the country may not be committed to the construction of that work, I believe to a very large extent, the honour of Canada is pledged to go on with it. In reference to these contingent liabilities, the hon. Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech this session, said:

We have obligations current to the amount of $6,543,400, being in the shape of subsidies to the Mr. Macdonald (King's, P.E.I.)

International Railway Company, to the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway Company, to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company, and others, which are provided for by yearly appropriation, and which amount to $6,543,400. There is also a subsidy by special Act to the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway, $250,680, and a transport subsidy to the Hudson Bay Railway of $1,600,000. These fall in the list of contingent liabilities, which, when they accrue, will be charged to railway subsidy account.

Our net federal debt and other net liabilities is made up as follows:—

Total net debt, 30th June, 1894	$246,183,029	48
Total expenditure over debt	28,614,407	00
Liabilities not fully matured, but current or probable	9,844,316	00
Increase of sinking fund since 1873	28,758,354	19
Contingent liabilities	15,000,000	00
Estimated shrinkage of assets	7,500,000	00

Total.....$335,900,106 67

The estimated shrinkage, referred to above, I arrive at in this way:

Albert Railway loan account	$	14,725	56
Fredericton and St. Mary's Bridge and Railway Company		300,000	00
Quebec Harbour debentures	3	,748,519	62
Three Rivers Harbour debentures.		81,760
Shrinkage on province accounts	3	,000,000	00

The reason why I conclude that these items are worthless is that there is a very large amount of overdue interest upon the first four items. There is also shown in the Public Accounts of 1894, the old province accounts. These old accounts, I contend, are claims that cannot be made good, and some of which, those of Ontario and Quebec, have been referred to arbitrators. I would therefore estimate about $3,000,000 shrinkage on them in addition to the sums I have mentioned, making in all about $7,145,006.15 for shrinkage of assets. Taking the total of the various sums which I have mentioned above. $335,900,106.67, and dividing it by our population in 1891, you have an average of $68.27 per head for the whole of Canada. Now, the basis on which we entered confederation was a federal debt of $50 per head. But I have shown that this federal debt now actually amounts to $68.27 per head. population of Prince Edward Island in 1891 Multiply that by the amount was 109,078. in excess of $50, or $18.25, and you have a sum of $1,990,673, or practically the same figures as I found by my first calculaton, the difference being only about $80,000. I shall now refer to the capital expenditure, and it may be well to state that in the case of the Prince Edward Island Railway nearly all the expenditures are charged to working expenses. Only one item in seven years, namely $8,300 is charged to capital account, while on the Intercolonial, during the same period, $2,339,393 was charged to capital account. This is no doubt the reason why the Prince Edward Island Railway does not niake a better showing. Our people complain very much that the Railway Department discriminates against us in the matter of freight rates. You can go from the upper either to Pictou Halifax provinces \mathbf{or} at less freight than you can to Charlottetewn via Point Duchene, notwithstanding the fact that Charlottetown is eighty-nine miles nearer to western points. I find that the local legislature in Prince Edward Island has certain idea with respect to the increase of its subsidy with which I am not in accord. In the Legislative Assembly on the 9th April, 1894, the Premier of that province proposed a resolution, which reads as follows:-

Whereas, the expectation which the Government of this province has heretofore held, that this province would receive from the Government of Canada such an increased amount of subsidy as would make it unnecessary to supplement the revenue of this province by any mode of taxation, has not been realized, although the Government looked forward to its realization in future, and it is, therefore, necessary, for the time being, by some measure of taxation to add to the revenue of the province.

With respect to this resolution, I have this to say, that I am entirely opposed to any amount being granted to the local government of Prince Edward Island until its public works are attended to. If there be anything due to Prince Edward Island-and I contend there is—it should be expended in the shape of public works. The local government, I may say, have shown themselves entirely incapable of husbanding the resources of the province and the public moneys entrusted to them. When they came into power, the province had been ruled by Liberal-Conservative Administration for thirteen years. Previous to the incoming of the Liberal-Conservative Government, my hon, friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) had imposed certain taxes on the people when he was Premier. But the Liberal-Conservative Administration, by its rigid economy, remitted those taxes, and conducted the business of that province in a manner which could not be surpassed for economy and ability by the government of any other province under the sun. It wiped out the taxation imposed upon the province by the preceding government, which was presided over by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and it carried on the administration for thirteen years, without any taxation for the most of that period, leaving a very trifling debt when they went out of power. But when into the Liberal party came power, on a land tax, a succesthey tax, a commercial travellers' tax. sion they increased the fees in the registry office, they put on other taxes, they disposed of the public lands at whatever price they could get by private arrangement, they sold the debentures of the province to the extent of $185,000; and yet, notwithstanding all this taxation, they were unable to carry on the affairs of the province without running it almost head over heels in debt. Under these circumstances, I think that in any arrangement for equalizing the debt of Prince Edward Island with that of the Dominion of Canada, the Government should most decidedly give the money to the province in the shape of public works. I shall now consider the cost of running the Prince Edward Island Railway and its present earnings, and compare them, per train mile, with the cost of the Intercolonial Railway:

By the same means of computation, the Prince Edward Island Railway cost the Dominion of Canada about $2,500,000. It will thus be seen that the pro rata burden on the people of Prince Edward Island for the construction and maintenance of the great public works, from which they derive little if any benefit, is about three times as great as the burden which the Dominion tax-payer on the mainland is called upon to bear for the Prince Edward Island Railway. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, my contention is that Prince Edward Island is entitled to material consideration on account of the large expenditures upon public works which have been made since confederation from which, on account of her isolated position she has received little if any benefit, and which expenditures were not contemplated at the time of the union. I further contend, Sir, that while the present operating of the Prince Edward Island railway shows a loss, the building of the branches I have indicated would create additional earning powers for the whole road without increased cost for operating expenses, which now amount to $53,000. I further contend, Sir, that the branches would go through a thickly-settled and productive farming country, having also, at one end, some of the best fishing coasts of the province, which, of themselves, would afford a large traffic, more particularly on the east coast, where the people would be only too glad to have the opportunity of making use of the railway having no harbour. I may also say that the southern section goes through a splendid country, fertile, well settled and prosperous, which has large productions and great possibilities. It would give easy access to markets to the people of these sections who are now obliged to haul their products great distances to market, over almost impassible roads in the few weeks in the fall of the year. But above all, Sir, while these branches could be cheaply constructed and while they would not increase the present expenditure for management, machine shops, or operating expenses, they would become profitable feeders to the main line, and, without doubt, their operation would result in turning the present deficit on the Prince Edward Island railway into a surplus.

Mr. WELSH. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat interested in this motion, for I have a very similar motion on the Order paper myself. I listened with attention and interest to the remarks of my hon. friend; but I am at a loss, from his description, to know where this railway should be built. He suggested to the Minister very plainly that there should be a branch road from Emerald down to Stanley. I agreed with him as to that; but he has failed to inform you and this House where his southern road is to be located. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that for once since I became a member of this House there has been one man supporting the Government able and willing to stand up in his place and ask for some measure of justice for Prince Edward Island. I regret that he should have made some of the statements that he did make. He cast a severe reflection upon the present government of Prince Edward Island, which is conducted upon Liberal principles; and he mented the Liberal-Conservative Government for their actions while they were in power. Well, I have often said at political meetings that if the Liberal-Conservative party had been on trial before a jury on a charge of deceiving the people, and if that offence were a hanging matter, every one of them would have been hanged long ago;
—and I am going to tell you exactly how that was. My hon. colleague (Mr. Davies) was the Premier of Prince Edward Island, and he introduced a system of equalizing revenue and expenditure. I am glad to see the Finance Minister is looking at me; for he had better try to do the same thing that my hon. friend did. When my hon. friend power in assumed the reins of Edward Island, he found there was not $100 in the treasury, and our expenditure equaled our income. He said at once: I am going to make the income and expenditure equal. So he put a tax upon the people. That new tax was not exactly agreeable to the people. The Liberal-Conservative party went before the people and declared that this was an iniquitous tax and that if they were returned to power, they would carry on the government without it. Though the balance between expenditure and revenue had been restored under my hon. friend's administration the people were quite willing to get rid of the new tax if they could, and, taking the Liberal-Conservatives at their word, they returned them to power. But they collected that tax for three years under my hon. friend's Tax Act; and after all the province was in debt. I make this declaration here, challenge contradiction—that the and I Liberal-Conservative party when in power spent over $1,000,000, and charged it to current expenditure when it ought to have been charged to capital account. Do you call that honest? No one dares deny it; for I will stake any money on the truth of what I am saying. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) speaks of the Liberal Government of Prince Edward Island using money realized from sales of land for current expenditure. Why was he not generous enough to say that the Conservative party when in power did the very same thing? I am sorry that my hon. friend frim King's could not make a speech without attempting to throw obloquy upon our friends in Prince Edward Island; because I go upon the principle that we had better wash at home any dirty linen we may have, rather than bring it up here. However, the southern railway is the question before us. Mr. Speaker, on the 13th March, 1890. my hou. colleague (Mr. Davies) made a speech in this House in the course of which he said:

I submit to the Minister that the demand I make with respect to a railway, is very small indeed. The hon. gentleman knows, for he has been in the province, that the Island is divided into two parts by a large river, and that the portion lying south of the river, embracing what is known as the Belfast and Murray Harbour district, comprising fifteen or sixteen townships, with a population one-fifth that of the whole Island, has no railway communication whatever. It has been suggested by some surveyors that, for a very small cost, a small feeder could be built, running from one of the stations on the road through these two districts of Belfast and Murray Harbour, touching somewhere near the great village of Montague, and going down from Belfast towards this Wood Islands breakwater. I believe that could be built for about $7,000 per mile, and it would not require any additional rolling stock, because we have rolling stock there already. The total cost of the branch alone, which I ask the hon. gentleman to build, would not be one-sixth of the cost of the Pictou Town Now, I submit the hon. gentleman would do well, in the interests of justice and fair-play to that little Island, for which I know he has some kindly feeling-for it benefited him some years ago-to have his engineer consider fairly that proposition, and give it his serious consideration. When we come to compare the way our Island is settled with other parts of the Dominion, hon. gentlemen will be surprised to learn that, while the population of the Island per square mile is fifty-two, the population of the rest of the Dominion is a little short of five. We are, by long odds, ten times as thickly populated as any other part of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman will see further, if he looks at the statistics, that there are very few parts of the Dominion where farming is carried on as it is I find, on looking over the statistics, that Prince Edward Island owns fifty-five head of live stock for every hundred acres of improved land, while the rest of the Dominion only owns thirty-eight head. Our field products are 108 bushels per acre of improved land, while those of the other provinces are only 61. This shows what a rich and valuable island it is. If the hon. gentleman will build that small branch from the main line to this harbour of Wood Islands, it will run through a fertile country, every inch of which is settled by well-to-do farmers, and it will be a most valuable feeder to the trunk line. No doubt the existing line has not paid heretofore, but there is this to be said of it, that it pays better than the Intercolonial Railway; and whereas the Intercolonial has a very large amount of expenditure from year to year charged to capital account, every dollar expended on the Island Railway is charged to running expenses, so that the loss is larger than it would be if the same system were adopted which is followed with regard to the Intercolonial Railway. I do not gard to the Intercolonial Railway. I do not think I have put forward a claim on behalf of the Island which is not reasonable and just. I have been talking to a great many members on both sides, and I believe the members of the Government, if they could spare the time to give this matter a little consideration, would acknowledge the justice of these claims; and I am in hopes, as far as the Minister of Public Works is concerned, that these four particular works-New London, Tracadie, Pinette and Wood Islandsthis session—not next year—will be put down in the supplementary Estimates for a sum sufficient to carry them to completion. I may not have any influence with the right hon. the leader of the Government, but he has many warm friends on the Island, as he knows-men who fight very hard for him, as I know to my cost—and if the Government would construct this branch line, their action would meet with the approval of their friends as well as opponents, and be an act of simple justice. The road would be a valuable feeder to the existing line, would not require additional rolling stock, would tend largely to reduce the deficit which year by year, unfortunately, appears in our account, would open up a valuable stretch of country, and would confer a lasting benefit on a great many people.

Now Mr. Speaker, I followed with a few words in support of the same matter. Now, it appears—and I wish my hon, friend had stated it—that they contemplate another route for this railway. From what I hear, the contemplated route is from a place called Southport, opposite Charlottetown, to Murray Harbour. Well, whatever I said in support of this branch, I will transfer in support of this route from Southport to Murray Harbour. During the nine sessions that I have been in this House, I have, year by year, brought forward to the notice of this House, as you, Mr. Speaker, and every hon, gentleman will remember, the claims of the people of Murray Harbour and Belfast, for some share of the public money. I have merely asked for the improvement of their harbour, of their piers, and their breakwaters, and I must say, with very little result. But I will say that I have to thank the Minister of Public Works, who was kind enough, on my representation that a breakwater was absolutely necessary for the prosperity of the country, to grant it, and he has done something there which is a credit to the Government, and will be of great benefit to the island, and to the Before it was built Dominion at large. the people were leaving that section, on account of having no harbour and no facilities to ship their produce, and they were going away to the States, instead of remaining to till the land. Now, they have a fine harbour there, and when my hon. friend has completed the dredging, which he has promised will be done this year, or as soon as possible, this harbour will be a great benefit to the people of the island, and to the Dominion, because it will add to the revenue. Now, I want to say a few words about another matter. My hon. friend says that the Dominion of Canada owes to the island a large sum of money. There is no doubt about that, but I do not see, in the supplementary Estimates, that the island is going to get it, so that my hon. friend need not fear that a Conservative Government is going to handle it this year. He says that this Government owes the money, but he throws out a suggestion that this Government do not pay it to the Government of Prince Edward Island in a lump sum, but give it to them in public works. My hon, friend knows that that cannot be done. If there is an amount due to Prince Edward Island, that amount must be handed over to the Government of Prince Edward Island, to do with it as they think Perhaps the Conservative party proper. may be in power when it is granted them, and perhaps not. However, I think it is in rather bad taste for my hon, friend to cast a slur on the Government of Prince Edward Island in reference to that matter, and in the manner he has done. Now, I have a very able document in my hand entitled, "Correspondence respecting the establishment of steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada." The Government at that time was Liberal-Conservative, the leader of which was the Hon. W. W. Sullivan, since promoted to the bench, a position which he well fills, and in which he does Associated with him was the his duty. Hon. Donald Ferguson, now a member of the Senate, and also a Cabinet Minister.

There were also members of the local Government at that time the Hon. Mr. Prowse, now a member of the Senate, and the Hon. Mr. Arsenault, also a member of the Sen-These three gentlemen were members of the Liberal-Conservative Government of Prince Edward Island, they are now Senators of the Dominion, and one of them is a Cabinet Minister. Well, what do they say? I was looking over their statement, and I find that a resolution was passed unanimously by both branches of the legislature of Prince Edward Island, making a claim on the Dominion Government for the amount due. I will read it:

The legislature submit that on every principle of justice this province should receive compensation in view of the immense loss and disadvantage which have accrued by reason of the failure of the general Government to provide the efficient and continuous communication guaranteed by the terms of confederation; and they, therefore, claim as due the present time—

This is over ten years ago.

—the sum of $5,000,000, to which we consider this province is justly entitled.

Now. Mr. Speaker, both branches of the legislature of Prince Edward Island unanimously passed this resolution claiming $5,000,000 from the Government of Canada. They sent as delegates to Ottawa, the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, now a member of the Dominion Government, and the Hon. W. W. Sullivan, at that time leader of the Government of Prince Edward Island. They came to Ottawa, and put in their claim, but they met with no satisfactory result, and went back to the island. I find in looking over the records that they were appointed by a Minute of Council, which I will read:

Council Chamber, 14th January, 1886.

At a meeting of the Executive Council in Committee—

Present: Hon. Messieurs Sullivan, Arsenault, McLeod, Ferguson, Lefurgey, Burns, Campbell, Prowse, Macdonald. * * *

They further recommend that the Hon. W. W. Sutherland, Premier and Attorney General, and the Hon. Donald Ferguson, Provincial Secretary, do compose the said delegation; and the committee request that Your Honour will be pleased to inform His Excellency the Governor General of such an appointment, in order that the delegates may be provided with an introduction to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies; and that Your Honour will also be pleased to ask His Excellency the Governor General to inform the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies of the appointment of such delegation.

Those gentlemen proceeded to London; they had several interviews, and also some correspondence with the home Government and also with the Commissioner of Canada, and the trip cost the colony some money for the expenses of the delegates. But we have not obtained any satisfactory results in the shape of a payment of money; the Government of Canada have not recognized the claim made, they have not seen fit to allow the matter to be settled by arbitration or in any equitable manner, and the claim of $5,000,000 remains now as formerly. We have the hon, member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) supporting the Government, and we have Senator Ferguson, a member of the Cabinet, the latter having been a delegate to London, and they occupy favourable positions in which to press our claim. I hope the senator and the hon. member for King's will see that we obtain those five millions. They are in an excellent position to advocate the construction of the Southern Railway. Last winter in Prince Edward Island, when we considered we were on the eve of an election, there were, I suppose, twenty or thirty Liberal-Conservative meetings called in my riding of Queen's, and which Senator Ferguson was the leading spirit, and at which Senator Prowse and the hon. member for King's also took part. The principal object was to advocate the building of this projected road. This is the first movement I have seen made in either branch of the legislature towards pressing this matter on the Government. The hon, member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) has brought it to the attention of the House, and I hope Senator Ferguson will also press the matter, and the Government will not treat it as it has treated other There was the tunnel mat-Island matters. ter, which has been going on for four or five years, a few holes being bored now and then. I hope that if the Southern Railway is going to be built we will soon have a statement to that effect from the Government. The people do not want to be fooled. The people became so agitated after the holding of those meetings to which I have referred at which Senator Ferguson, a Cabinet Minister, was present, that they ground heir axes and were ready to cut the sleepers. Why, they said, we had a member of the Cabinet at the meeting. have practically got the road. At what other conclusion could they arrive when a member of the Government came to the meeting and sanctioned the agitation and the resolutions passed. The people, I repeat, do not want to be fooled any longer. If this road is not going to be built, the people will know who their friends are and who agitated for it five years ago, and also who on the eve of an election agitated the district for a scheme when the Government were not honest in their intentions to carry it out. If the assurances given by one member of the Government were honest, the remainder of the Government back him up and declare that the Government will give the Island that road. The people want a fair and square answer to the question. Is the Government going to build the Southern Railway, or is their action simply to blind the people? Honesty is the best policy, and it is better for the Government to come forward and openly say what they are going to do. I will not say anything at the present time about the tunnel question, because the holes are not bored, and I am afraid we will all be bored before they are bored. I second the motion of the hon. member for King's for the production of the papers, and I hope before the session closes the gentlemen will give some satisfactory assurance to their friends in the island and to my friends that they intend to see this work completed.

Mr. PERRY. Coming from that beautiful little island which lies in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, I beg the indulgence of the House while I say a few words on this question which affects its welfare, financially and especially as regards the comfort and accommodation of the people. No doubt the hon. member for King's has made a very good claim on behalf of the people of the eastern portion of the island. Surely the hon, member has had sufficient time to look after the interests of his constituents, and to gain courage to ask the Government to do a small measure of justice to our people. I observe that the date of the notice of motion is 22nd April last, and now we are on 17th June, an interval of nearly two months, and no doubt by this time he has a paper in his pocket signed by the Finance Minister instructing him what he can tell the people when he goes there for the next election—I hope it is something tangible and that the people can depend upon it. No dcubt the Finance Minister has told him that another supplementary estimates will be brought down covering the sum required to build this road. However, the hon. member has not told the House how many miles he expects to get built, whether 60 or 160. I suppose he has told the Government privately. I suppose that Senator Ferguson. as a member of the Cabinet, knows how many miles are required. He was very busy with the hon, member for King's, when we were supposed to be on the eve of the elections, in February last. The Government in a moment of weakness, however. did not think it proper to hold the elections in March or April, and they have not yet held them. Therefore all the agitation and preparations have been futile, and the Government have done nothing. That the people have a claim for the construction of a southern branch is indisputable. They have a right to a railway, not as a claim for favours, but as a claim for what is due them. I am satisfied from what I know of that part of the country that it is prosperous, that it is well and thickly settled and has perhaps a more numerous population to the same extent of territory than prevails in any other part of the Do-minion outside the suburbs of cities. of I believe they can grow as much, and more farm produce than in any other part of the Dominion of Canada. It is also a very fine country for fishing and the shores of Belfast are swarming with fish. The peole are entitled to have that branch railway. They have waited for it for twenty years and the strange thing to me is that the scales never fall off the eyes of my hon. friend (Mr. McDonald) nor off the eyes of the Minister from Prince Edward Island who is now in the Cabinet, until the eve of the election in February last. Was it done for an election dodge?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. PERRY. No Tory will believe that but everybody else will believe it. We know that we must have an election within the next few months, and I suppose that is the reason this motion of my hon. friend has remained so long on the Order paper before he had the courage and the hardihood to bring the question before the House. Now, like my friend from Queen's (Mr. Welsh), I say: let us have no more humbugging. Let the Governmnt tell us whether they are going to build that railway or not, and let them ascertain what length it will be. The people of Belfast are not the only people who are entitled to a branch of railway. but the people of New London and Rustico are entitled to one also. Three or four millions of dollars is the proportionate share of the people of Prince Edward Island for their taxes, on the amount expended for railways and canals in this country. benefit is the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Welland Canal or the Sault Canal to the people of Prince Edward Island. hon. gentleman here says "bore a hole." Well, I believe that somebody bored a hole in the Sault Canal and that it is now leaking. In 1885, I had the honour of a seat in the local parliament of Prince Edward Island, and abler men than my hon. friend from King's (Mr. McDonald) stated then, that Canada owed us $5,000,000 on account of the non-fulfilment of the terms of confederation with the island. My hon, friend (Mr. McDonald) says "Don't give it to the Liberal Government of Prince Island, because they are not to be trusted with the money." They are thieves, he says. I cast back in his teeth that he cannot prove that the Liberal Government of Prince Edward Island has stolen money, but I can prove, and the country knows it, that under the administration of his friend, in the land office once under the care of a gentleman who holds a seat in the Senate and the Cabinet, $5,000,000 were stolen.

An hon. MEMBER. You are all wrong.

Mr. PERRY. It was $5,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Is that all?

Mr. PERRY. Well, that was a lapsus linguae and my hon. friend is guilty of a good many of them if he knows what they mean. I can tell him that in 1879, when the government of which he was a supporter, and his brother, a member of the local cabinet, took office, the Liberal treasurer handed over $49,000 to the Tory treasurer that came into power at that time. took place after that. They used for three years the assessment tax passed by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), which they denounced and upon which they got into power, and they collected $72,000 out of that tax, and they collected $87,000 as a refund from the Dominion Government on account of the piers of Prince Edward Island, and they drew $200,000 from Ottawa, robbing the province of a revenue of $10,-000 a year; they did all that, and then left the province in debt by $400,000. Is that a good record? Is that the party my hon. friends wants to entrust the money to? The hon, gentleman says the Liberal Government have sucked every drop of milk out of the land office. Well, dear knows the cow's bag was very small when the Liberals got into power, for the Conservatives stole all they could get out of it. Let my hon. friend, or any other man who represents the other side of politics, deny that if he dare. I hope that my hon, friend from King's (Mr. McDonald) will have better success with the Minister of Finance than I have had with him in relation to the tunnel. I hope he will be able to approach him in a moment of weakness, so weak that he will yield to his wishes. I would like to know now if the Minister of Finance has yet commenced boring holes in the straits. What is he doing down there? Let us have one job done first, and then we will look out for the others. We have been agitating the tunnel for the last twelve years, and let us get that under way. I would like to see that branch railway built, not for the personal accommodation of my hon. friend from King's (Mr. McDonald), or to give him strength to carry his election, because I think it would be only money wasted for that purpose, for I am sure he has no chance of coming back here. I would like to have the railway built for the benefit of a portion of his constituents who have to drag their products to market with carts or wagons, or sleighs, and perhaps some of them on their backs. They have to do that to pay the taxes which this Government has placed on their shoulders. The hon. gentle-McDonald) has not told whether this branch railway would com-mence at South Port on the east side of Charlottetown harbour, and go through Belfast down to Murray harbour. He thought it would be well to build a railway from Emerald Junction on to Stanley, but he did not tell us about the other part. I know where Stanley is, and I doubt if my hon. friend does. Stanley is in West Queen's and would be something like twenty miles from Emerald Junction.

Mr. WELSH. Not so far I think.

Mr. PERRY. Well, it is fifteen miles anyway. I have been canvassing around there, Mr. Perry.

and I generally measure the miles pretty well. If this line went from Stanley down to Rustico where the great breakwater is, then I would say that the people of Prince Edward Island would have fair inland rail-way accommodation. If we had that, together with the tunnel there would be something done for us. Now, we have had beautiful weather down there for the last two months and there have been no storms, and yet I am told that the Finance Minister has not even signed the contract nor done anything with regard to the boring. He should go on with it at once now. I have some hope that the Government of Canada assisted by Senator Ferguson from the island, who has a seat in the Cabinet, will certainly grant the request of the people in the island for this railway. We have had a delegation of three gentlemen here from the island. They were not fortunate enough to be members of Parliament and have free passes pockets like Senator their Ferguson: and as they spent four or five days here, I suppose it cost them $100 apiece. They went home, and I would like to know what answer they took home in their pockets. I would like to know what the Finance Minister, and the Minister of Railways told them they might expect. have not heard yet. Even the "Examiner." the mouthpiece of the Government in Prince Edward Island, which does not always stick to the truth, but often tells what is untrue, did not dare to say that the returning delegates had a word of comfort to tell the electors in regard to a branch railway for that part of the island. I know that my hon. friend himself does not expect the Government to build one. I know that he expects the Government to give some kind of a delusive answer that the people may believe. Unless the people are very wise, the Government will entrap them by making some kind of a promise that will probably never be carried out. But that is not what ought to be done. It would be a shame and a scandal to use the people in that way. Let the Government say at once: We will vote the money required to build a branch railway from Emerald Junction to Stanley and Rustico-that beautiful settlement containing a remnant of the expariated Acadians. Let them not wait until the eve of an election. Let them act in such a way that the country will not accuse them of trying to bribe the people by offering them something on the eve of an election. Now, Sir, I have shown that the Government, in granting a sum of money to build that railway, would only be granting what is due to the people of Prince Edward Island. The people are not coming here to beg; they are coming here to ask for rights; and the Government should look at the matter in that light. To do justice to the people of Prince Edward Island the Government should build branch lines to Belfast, Murray Harbour, Stanley, and Rustico, and put the people of those places in regard to these districts. the same position as other people in Can-I hope the Government intend to do justice to those people; and let me tell them that they will only get the support of those people by doing justice to them. I contend that outside of the offices which are at the disposal of the Government, and which must be given to their friends and supporters, everybody, whether Conservative or Liberal, is entitled to justice at their hands; but I am sorry to say that this is not always given. My colleague and myself have often asked the Minister of Public Works to make certain grants for public works on the island; but we have asked in vain, while others, who support the Government, have only to wink at the hon. Minister, and they get what they require. The people of Belfast and Murray Harbour are a mixed people, including both Tories and Liberals. They are an industrious people; they do not spend thousands of dollars to hire cabs to take them from their homes to their offices; they do not ask the Government to pay them $20 a day for living expenses; they do not ask them to pay for men to blacken their boots, they blacken their own boots; they do not ask the Government to pay for their wines and champagnes. They are too poor for these things—why? Because they are ground down by taxation imposed by the Government of Canada, and are handicapped for the want of railway accommodation to take their produce to market. I have a word to say to the senators. There are four of them representing Prince Edward Island, who are friends and supporters of the present Government, and if this matter has not arisen from them, they have a right to take up the cudgels in the other Chamber, and advocate the rights of the people they re-What are they there for? they there only to re-echo the decisions of the Government? Is there nothing for the senators to do but to look after divorce Bills? I think the tax-payers of this country are not getting the worth of the money they pay these senators. In return for the $1,000 a year they receive, they are, in duty bound, to look after the business of the country. Let me repeat that I have some little faith that the Government will yet do justice to the people of that part of the country.

Mr. YEO. I am sure if the Government and this House were not convinced before of the justice of the claims of Prince Edward Island, they must now be by the strong arguments which have been advanced by the hon. member for Queen's, the hon. member for King's and my hon. colleague. I am sorry I could not hear where the mover of the motion asked that the proposed line should be constructed. But I understand it is through Belfast and Murray Harbour districts; and I can endorse all he has said with

I feel convinced that if a railway line were constructed, it would afford very great accommodation to those districts, and it would also be a large feeder to the main line. I can say the same with regard to the line from Emerald to Stanley. That line would pass through a fine section of country, and would receive a large amount of local sup-I may say there are other parts of port. Prince Edward Island equally in want of branch lines. A branch line to Malpecque, which is a long distance from the railway line, and is the best harbour on the north side of the island, would be a great accommodation to the people, and I believe would pay. For some years there has been talk of constructing a short branch from Summerside to Richmond Bay, and I hope when the Government are taking steps to construct the proposed line through Murray Harbour and Belfast districts, the claims of this line will not be lost sight of. The line would be only three or four miles long, and it would enable the fishermen, who now have to haul their fish by road from Richmond Bay to Summerside, to ship them by rail. There are large quantities of oysters, as well as other fish, shipped from Summerside. Such a line would also enable the people who live along the shores of the bay to convey, by rail, large quantities of produce which they are now obliged to haul by teams. I may also say that in the western part of the island the people have agitated for a long time for the construction of a branch from O'Leary to the west shore, connecting the west shore with the main line. My colleague and myself have time and again impressed on the Government the necessity of constructing wharfs and piers in this locality, but so far without success, so that while the people are twelve or fifteen miles from the railway they have no means of shipping by water. I think they have a very strong claim for the construction of a branch in that direction which would give connection with Richibueto and other parts of New Brunswick, and afford them great facilities in this way. I may say I was very sorry indeed to hear my hon. friend from King's (Mr. McDonald) speak of the local government in the way he did. In fact, I have never heard him speak in this House of the local government except in the way he has to-day. I would suggest to him that while evidently he does not like a Liberal Government anywhere, especially in Prince Edward Island, he would do better to leave local matters to be fought out in Prince I am sure it cannot be Edward Island. interesting to this House to have to listen to a discussion of our local affairs. But if he does undertake to censure our local government, I would at least ask him to do so in a fair way He has said he would be very sorry to see the Dominion Government put any money into the hands of the local government. He had not the same objection to make when his friends were in power. It was all right for them to draw $200,000 from the Federal Government and to receive payment for their local works, which they handed over to the Federal Government. I do not want to say anything for or against the local government, but I would ask my hon. friend to think for a moment who compose that Government, and let him say whether they do not compare very favourably in every way with their predecessors, and whether they are not men who have just as much interest in the welfare of the island. I am sorry, Sir, he allowed his feelings to overcome him and that he spoke of the local government in the way he did. There is one thing I do not like in this raildiscussion. I do not like idea of anything of this kind being brought up just previous to a general election. My idea is this should be taken up on its merits and not be held up to the people, without any idea on the part of the Government of carrying out the promise. Reference has been made to the tunnel which was promised Prince Edward Island before the last Dominion elections and which has been hanging between wind and water ever since. I am afraid it is likely to keep in that position. I would not like to see the same thing done with reference to the Prince If the Govern-Edward Island Railway. ment are sincere and intend doing anything in that line, I hope they will come out frankly and say so. I wish I could say the same thing with regard to the tunnel, concerning which their conduct so far has been anything but sincere. If they had wished to complete the boring at the straits, they could have done so long ago, but they have made a pretense of doing so from 1892 to the present, and it is still uncompleted. I hope the Government will act differently with regard to this measure. There can be no doubt as to the justice of the claim put forward by the hon. member for King's, and I really hope the Government will deal seriously with it and give us the assurance that they intend constructing branch lines. I hope they will deal out equal justice to all and not select one particular spot and leave the others to suffer all the inconveniences under which they labour at present.

Mr. HAGGART. I have a good deal of sympathy with the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) in his complaint that large sums have been expended constructing the Intercolonial, Canadian Pacific Railway, the canals, and other public works in different parts of the Dominion, and that while these may be regarded as works for the benefit of Canada at large, still this little island receives, not even indirectly, very much benefit. On that account he claimed that there should be a larger expenditure in Prince Edward Island in return for the larger contributory share which she pays for the public works of the Dominion. There is a good deal in that argument. There is a good deal in the statement that although the whole Dominion is interested in these works, several parts of it receive no more benefit than what Prince Edward Island does. The whole heart of the island seems to be set on having more expenditure on railways. The Government have had petitions from the two senators representing that island, and from our friends supporting the Government, Messrs. McLean and Macdonald, to have certain works constructed there. We have had petitions from several of the inhabitants and other sources advocating a scheme by which, although there would be a large expenditure on capital account by extending railways in different directions throughout the island, the amount charged to income would not be increased. I may state for the information of the House in what direction the petitions are. They are in favour of a line of railway:

The last branch is intended to be a line starting from Southport going towards Murray Harbour and branching off a part of distance towards Montague Bridge, the making connection with New Perth. I was so much impressed with the scheme of the hon, gentlemen and the petitions, that I ordered inquiries to be made as to the proper expense of building these lines, amounting in the aggregate to 105 miles. My officer made an estimate of the probable cost of the construction and equipment of these roads. Not having any instrumental survey of them, he was only acting upon his judgment as to the contour of the island. He is of opinion that these roads will not be very costly. His estimate is as follows:-

parts of the Dominion, and that while these may be regarded as works for the benefit of Canada at large, still this little island receives, not even indirectly, very much benefit. On that account he claimed that there should be a larger expenditure in of cost of operating and of the earnings:—

Estimated probable amount...... $ 4,614 56 Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does that include the bridge?

Mr. HAGGART. No; it does not include a bridge; this is from Stanley. On the other hand there is $1,100,000 at, say, 31/2 per cent, $38,500. Deducting that from the profit in operating, there would be a total loss of $33,886. So that the only loss to the country, if these lines were completed, would be a little less than the interest on the cost of construction. The question then comes in whether Prince Edward Island has had its share in the expenditure of public works or whether they are entitled to this expenditure on the part of the Dominion. Speaking for myself and not for the Government; I will say that I am inclined to think that when the time came, perhaps we would be position to subsidize railways in different parts of the province, and I think Prince Edward Island should be entitled to some additional expenditure for the purpose of constructing these works which the people of the island think would be so much to their benefit.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The estimates which the hon. gentleman read showing the cost of constructing a large number of railways in Prince Edward Island may be approximately correct; I have not sufficient information to be able to judge as to that. I assume that they are correct. The hon. Minister was also kind enough to say that when the time came he would be in favour of subsidizing some railways in Prince Edward Island. But when is that time to come, does he think? Has it come now, or will it come next session, or ten years hence? Last winter the hon. gentleman's colleague went to Prince Edward Island and held meetings through this district. He was supported by one of his Senators, one of the hon. gentlemen who support the Government in the other end of this building. And, while the member of the Government was shrewd enough to hold his tongue, he was shrewd enough to get resolutions passed advocating the construction of the railroads. Without committing himself he led the meetings and the people generally to believe that he was in favour of each of them, and that he would have the influence to secure its construction. But when he was asked: Are you in a position to say that you will get one dollar for the construction of these roads? his colleague came to the rescue in a long letter saying that those who asked such a question wanted a man to be guilty of perjury by breaking his oath as a member of the Cabinet, that the Council's deliberations were secret and could not be disclosed. Here were members of the Government going all over Canada promising public works to be built; but when it came to the case of Prince Edward Island we were told: Don't you dare to ask whether the Government will propose a dollar for these works. for the member of the Government dare not express himself for fear of breaking his oath. This kind of humbug does very well among a certain class of people; but the large mass of the people of Prince Edward Island are beginning to understand that an agitation for the construction of a public work immediately preceding an election is not likely to be genuine. Now, in this matter, for years past, before every election we have had the question of the tunnel dangled before the people's eyes. Millions would be expended on the island. People were asked not to sell their farms, because the brickclay upon them would be used to make brick. But, to use a significant expression for a time monopolized by a politician down there, the tunnel scheme has been consigned long since to the tomb of all the Capulets. None now so poor as to do it reverence. But the gentlemen from Prince Edward Island who support the Government in the Senate-there are hardly any in this House-now laugh at the tunnel, and they tell the people they are going to give them railways. I fear that these petitions-if that was the purpose of those who engineered them-has pretty well squelched the railway project in Prince Edward Island. The idea of proposing a scheme for eight or ten branch railways! Why it reduces the whole thing to a farce. The agitation in Prince Edward Island for years has been for the construction of one These other branch roads were railway. subsidiary; they were hoped for in time but not immediately. The only question which these gentlemen would have devoted themselves to, had they been honestly anxious to extend the railroad accommodation in Prince Edward Island was the Belfast and Murray section containing a fifth of the population acrailroad of the island having no When the commodation at present. built it was hoped road was main would have accomthat this section modation in the near future. That was the railway that everybody was thinking about, and the hon. Minister now gets up and reads a list of railway lines all over the island. And for what purpose? For the purpose of killing out this scheme for the construction of the railway from Belfast to Murray Harbour. Then he tells us he is favourably inclined to these projects when the time comes. But he has not said that that time has come or will ever come. Now at the close of the session we start without a promise of any kind from the Government. The hon, member for King's has been like one riding a baulky horse. He has had this resolution on the paper for two months. He used to mount his steed every Monday and Wednesday and bring him to the hurdle, but then his heart would fail, and he would get the Government to allow the motion to stand. But when my hon, friend and colleague (Mr. Welsh) put a resolution dealing with the same subject on the paper, the hon. member for King's found that he had either to take the hurdle or get off the horse. And so he has decided at last to make the jump. If the hon, gentleman desired to impress the House favourably with the scheme which he has proposed, he would have done well to leave local party politics out of it. What in the world has this House or this country to do with some local squabble in Prince Edward Island, and above all, what has this House or this country to do with some feeling that the hon, gentleman entertains against a distinguished lawyer who leads the Government in Prince Edward Island. I am in hopes that that gentleman will sit in this House some he would be, I can assure and the hon. gentleman an ornament to this or any other House in which he might sit. But the hon, gentleman knows that he did not display, at any rate, a great amount of moral courage in threshing poor Mr. Peters 1,000 miles away, for the manner in which he carries on the local government: nor did he show a disposition to further the subject-matter which he professed to further in this House. Now, I regret that the hon. gentleman, in the larger part of his speech, was so inaudible that nobody could tell what he was saying. Although I sit nearly midway between the Minister of Railways and himself, he only spoke loud enough to be heard when he began to denounce the local government of Prince Edward Island, and to express the hope that the honest claims of Prince Edward Island never would be conceded to that Government while they remained in power. Sir, I think his constituents, and others down in King's County will take a note of the hon. gentleman's patriotism, and they will discover how far his patriotism and his party feelings are coincident, and how far they diverge. We have claims, he says, but don't pay them while the Liberal Premier—

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I did not say that they should not give this money to the Liberal Government, I said that they should complete the public works first.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman distinctly said that he hoped they would not give the money which was due to the island, to the local government while the Liberal Premier was in power, but that they would squander it in public works, the construction of which he would suggest; and I suppose he would suggest, in order to kill the Belfast railway, the construction of eight or ten little branches all over the island. He knows that such a proposition coming from him is well calculated to destroy that which the people of the island have much at heart. If he were sincerely desirous of promoting the construction of that road he would have had the courage to stand up here and to say: the scheme which the hon. member for Queen's suggested in 1890-91 is not large enough, and I propose another scheme. But he does not tell us where the road is to run, he does not hint what his views are upon that subject. When I brought this question before the House in 1890. I thought it was desirable, to put this matter before the Government in a business-like way. I had some consultation with a number of engineers, and I was assured by them that a branch line from Peak's Station might be built which would give the necessary accommodation and do away with the necessity of a bridge across the Hillsboro', which would cost half a million of money. I thought that line could be adopted, and the amount which would be asked for would not be a quarter of a million of money, or anything like it. But the people at large, being led by the politicians to suppose that they can get the larger road, are in favour of the larger road, and I need not say that if such a road can be obtained, it will have my hearty support from the word go. The people there have a right to it, I think. Now, I think myself that even if the construction of this road were asked upon the same grounds as the construction of other roads in different parts of the Dominion, that the Parliament of Canada would be slow to grant it. I think, just now, in view of the financial stringency of the country, with the enormous deficits we have to meet, that Parliament would be very slow to grant a large sum of money for the construction of the We know that the Government railway. have already announced their general policy to be not to subsidize or construct any pub-lic work during the present year; there are to be no railway subsidies asked for, and no sums voted for the construction of Government roads. We have not had the official announcement with respect to the railway popularly known as the Hudson Bay, but I believe the general feeling existing in this House is that the Government have determined not to proceed with the construction of that road. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Boyd) shakes his head. Well, I frankly say I hope he is wrong, I hope the Government have made up their mind not to proceed with the construction of that road. I say that a proposition to expend two and a half millions in the construction of that road at the present time would be absolutely indefensible, and I do not think the hon. gentleman will find very many of the business men in this House, who are in touch with their constituents, who will venture to endorse that project if it is brought down. However, I want to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and the leader of the House to the fact that the construction of this road—and I decline to discuss the others at present— the construction of the Southern Railway through the districts of Belfast and Murray Harbour, does not stand on the same ground on which the House is asked to The question construct roads elsewhere. is rather one of plighted faith; the question is, whether Prince Edward Island and the Dominion did not make a bargain, one of the terms of which necessarily implies giving to the island, at the present time, and under present circumstances, a larger amount of public money than it is getting Hon. gentlemen will remember that when Prince Edward Island come into the Dominion, she came in on certain terms of union, one of which expressly stated that the Government had obtained authority to expend a certain sum of money in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway; and it was upon the basis of the money which was then authorized to be spent in the construction of these two great public works, that the amount allotted to Prince Edward Island, was largely, although not altogether, given. Now, if that is so, it comes down largely to a question of plighted faith and a question of contract. The construction of the road, therefore, in Prince Edward Island, would not altogether depend upon the fact that a stringency exists in the finances of Canada, or that we cannot build roads else-. The question is, Have the people not got a right, a vested right, to the expenditure, if not in that form, then in some other form ?-and I think this is the form which, at any rate, commends itself to the vast mass of the people of Prince Edward Island. Now, my hon, friend may have said—I did not hear all that he said, for he was perfectly inaudible where I sit—I dare say he may have said that they were authorized to expend an amount of money varying from forty-four to forty-five million dollars in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Intercolonial Railway, and the canals, and the financial terms made between the island and the Dominion were agreed to upon that basis. Now, the islanders say very fairly that that agreement has not been complied with. They do not complain that the development of the Dominion has necessitated the expenditure of larger amounts of money than were contemplated at the time of union; they are raising no cry against that. They do not complain of the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the development and opening up of the North-west Territories; they do not complain even that the adjacent island of Cape Breton has had a railway constructed from one end of it to the other, and that the Eastern Extension road has been bought and paid for by the Government here. They are not raising these complaints at present, but they say: Inasmuch as you induced us to come into the confederation, representing explicitly that you were only authorized to spend 44 or 45 millions upon the Canadian Pacific upon the Intercolonial Railway, way, and upon your canals, and we came in upon that basis, if you have reorganized the whole basis upon which we came in, and if, instead of spending 44 or 45 millions you have spent 90 or 100 millions, as the case may be-I am using arbitrary figures -then surely that gives a claim, a contractural claim to compensation on the part of the island, which no honest man dare ignore. So that the question that meets us just upon the threshold of this inquiry is a question of figures, a question of facts—how much, if any, more than the sum that was originally contemplated, has been spent by the Dominion of Canada upon these three or four objects, namely, canals, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Intercolonial Railway? Now, I find by the Railway Report, page 27, that the Government expended on railways, on capital account, to the end of 1894, including 25 millions given to the Canadian Pacific Railway-and I put that on the same line as capiaccount,-the $122,373,000. sum of tal That expenditure embraces for the In-$47,500,000—I tercolonial Railway, Then speaking now in round figures. there are: Eastern Extension Railway, $1,-324,042; Oxford and New Glasgow Railway. $1,945,497; Montreal and European Short Line Railway,$333,942; Cape Breton Railway, $3,859,884; Carleton Branch Railway, $88,-410—which I think has been partly returned -Prince Edward Island Railway, $3,750,565; Canadian Pacific Railway, built by Government, $30,964,954; other expenditure on Canadian Pacific Railway surveys, explorations, telegraph lines, &c., $6,639,581; Annapolis and Digby Railway, $618,655. These items make a total of $97,077,014, to which must be added $25,000,000 as a subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway, making a total of $122,-000,000. At the time Prince Edward Island came into confederation there had been expended of this amount $30,707,000, and it was estimated there would be spent $35,-Those items make 000,000 on railways.

$65,707,000, as an amount contemplated to be spent for great public works of interprovincial importance, which the people of the island were told it was the policy of the Government to construct, and which would involve in their construction the amounts I have mentioned. That was agreed upon. and no complaint was made. But we find there has been spent over and above the $30,000,000, which had been expended in 1873, and the $35,000,000 then contemplated to be expended, a sum amounting to $56,666,-000. Well, there is no hon, member who agrees with me on the point at which I started out as to the construction of the terms of union, but must at once admit that if we made the terms of union on a certain basis and that basis has been entirely departed from and $56,000,000 expended more than was contemplated, the people of Prince Edward Island have an undoubted claim, which this Government cannot ignore. Then the expenditure of $56,000,000 was not all. In 1873 when we came into confederation, there had been expended on canals $21,266. 574. There was authorized and estimated a further expenditure of $9,000,000, making a total amount of $30,266,574. While the additional amount agreed to be expended and the amount then actually expended were together $30,266,574, no less a sum than $62,-237,296 has been expended up to the end of 1894, or $32,970,722 more than was contemplated at the time Prince Edward Island entered confederation, or the Government had authority to spend at the time it entered into terms of union with the island. What does that railway and canal expenditure represent? In round figures there was an over expenditure on rail-ways and canals beyond what was ways and canals beyond what was authorized and estimated at confederation, of $90,000,000. The thing is as plain as a pike staff, and affords further proof of the right of the island to receive compensation. If the island was benefited by the expenditure on these great public works there would be something to be said on the other side, but every one knows that so far as regards the island, justifiable as this expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway and the canal system may be from a national standpoint, tht province receives little if any appreciable benefit from the expenditure, and never will. I have spoken so far of the actual expenditure on Government railways and Government canals; but everybody knows that in 1873 the policy of subsidizing railways throughout the Dominion was not entered upon, that in 1882, when Sir Charles Tupper brought down the new policy of subsidizing private roads to be constructed in different parts of Canada, not a dollar had been spent on those private com-pany roads. Such a policy was not contemplated when the island came inthe fact, confederation. We have as shown by a return brought down in 1891, that we had granted up to that time-I have moved for a return supplementary to this to bring the expenditure down to the present year, and hoped to have had it for this debate but I have not secured it-in railway subsidies no less than $23,971,491, and up to 1891 we had actually paid out $12,243,000 of that amount. There has been expended, up to the end of 1894, in rough figures, $25,000,000 in subsidies to railways, some of them desirable, defensible and justifiable, while others may not be; but as a fact the Dominion Government have never granted a subsidy for the construction of a railway in Prince Edward Island. I find in the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals for the preceding year that out of the subsidies granted there has been paid in cash on account of them $16,000,000. I say nothing of the subsidies granted in lands, rails and loans to different companies throughout the Dominion. I prefer not to complicate the account with any of those questions, because I am desirous that those who care to look into this question shall have it presented to them in as bold and bald a form as possible, without complicating it with side issues. Leaving out the subsidies on lands, rails and loans we have $16,026,300 already paid in subsidies, and there is a large amount to pay still. What have we still to pay? The liabilities on account of railway subsidies are $8,749,271, of which every dollar will have to be met. There is a balance on the Atlantic and North-western Railway of $2,700,000. and $6,000,000 has yet to be expended on the St. Lawrence canals, of which the House was officially informed the other these items making a total υť 449,271. Adding this amount to $16,026,-300, cash payments already made, gives a total of $33,465,571, as representing the railway and canal subsidies since the time of which I have spoken. I am not going to complicate this matter with the Hudson Bay Railway, the Chignecto Marine Railway, and the Trent Valley Canal—I have left them out purposely. Summarizing briefly what I have stated, the account of the island would stand in this way: The Dominion has expended on railways and canals beyond what it told the Island Government it would expend when it entered into the terms union, of 90,000,000; the Dominion Government has expendrailway subsidies $16,000,000. was not taken into account at which that time, and then there is railway and canal expenditure for which the Dominion has become liable of $17,500,000, making a total of $123,500,000. What have our people, numbering 110,000, to do with that expenditure? Practically they pay one-fortieth of the burden, which will amount to $3,000,000 odd. It may be asked, has not the Dominion Government done anything for the island? Certainly it has. Its claims so reasonable and palpable could not be resisted, and as a matter of fact there has been an expendi-Railway, including Island on the that to carry the branch line down to Cape Traverse of $635,000 since we came into confederation, and in 1887, $500,000 were allowed on account of the island's claim; these amounts aggregate $1,135,000, which it has received out of $3,000,000 to which it is entitled. So the account would stand today if it were made up as between John Smith and John Brown, and these parties had entered into a union, so that one of the parties representing the island would have about $2,000,000 to his account. I want to put before the House the question as to what amount is fairly due to the island. It must be remembered that we were compelled to build our own railway at a cost of $3,200,-You built railways down in Nova Scotia for the people. There was the Eastern Extension Railway at a cost of $1.324,042; there was the Oxford and New Glasgow Railway, at a cost of $1,945,497; there was the Cape Breton Railway, at a cost of $3,-859.884, and there was the Annapolis and Digby Railway, at a cost of $618.655. That was a total of $7,748,078 which were spent in constructing railways right within sight of the people of Prince Edward Island; and when they stand there and say: We have had to pay every dollar for our own railway, and the people across the strait in the Island of Cape Breton and the adjoining counties have had their railways built for them, I say it presents itself to the people of Prince Edward Island as an intolerable injustice, which rankles in their breasts. I submit to the House, Mr. Speaker, that this matter was recognized by this present Government. When Sir Charles Tupper was Minister in 1887, in moving to increase the subsidies to Prince Edward Island, he said:

The attention of the Government was called to the fact, that in the arrangement for the admission of Prince Edward Island into the union, they were not in a position to derive the same advantages from the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway as the other portions of the Dominion which were in the mainland, and which were in immediate railway connection with these lands. The question was raised, that as the expenditure on both these railways was so greatly in excess of what was estimated at the time the Island was brought into the union, they ought to receive some correspond-Then, there ing consideration on that account. was the further question, that Parliament had adopted the policy of subsidizing lines of railway in the other provinces, that in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there had been considerable expenditures in connection with the construction of railways, and the Island had not received any corresponding advantage. sidies had been granted for the construction of railways in Prince Edward Island, and on these two grounds it was claimed there should be additicnal consideration given to the island.

I have just one word to add, Sir, before it upon justice, and it must be carried out to the extent of giving fair play to the people of Prince Edward Island. I pointed out to the hon, gentleman at the time, that adopting these two principles, Prince Edward Island was entitled to a compensating sum for the over-expenditure which had been incurred by the Dominion in every province, since confederation, and that there would be a million dollars, at least, to put to the credit of the Island, instead of half a million dollars. I said then: You are only postponing the day, because every representative of the Island must make the demand, the demand is fair and just, and the terms of union show the people are entitled to it. I submit that while every province in the Domoinion has received millions in railway expenditure, that the basis on which Prince Edward Island came into the union was that which I have read here, and you have spent $122,000,000 since, and we are entitled to somewhat of a proportionate part. I do not think the thing ought to be figured down to a dollar, nor is there any disposition to ask that to be done. I say that on reasonable grounds, this Dominion should pay $1,000,000, at least, for railway construction in Prince Edward Island, and then, even that would not give the Island the fair share of expenditure which she is entitled to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh), I have a few words to address to the House. In the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman said, that the Hon. Senator Ferguson had held twenty or thirty meetings in his riding, and promised the Belfast Railway; but the hon. the senior member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said, that Mr. Ferguson was too astute a man to promise a railway. He told us that Senator Ferguson had held his peace, and that others advocated and encouraged the people to pass resolutions in favour of that road. The fact is, Sir, that the people do not want any one to push them on to an advocacy of railways because they are in favour of it themselves, and the requirements of their district demand it. Mr. Ferguson was asked as a member of the Government to address these meetings on the public questions of the day, and at these meetings resolutions were passed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. (Davies) told us to-day, that it was improper to promise railways right before an election. Now, Sir, with reference to that, I may say that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) held a meeting in Murray Harbour, South, in the month of March last, is six o'clock. The principle laid down by Sir Harbour, South, in the month of March last, Charles Tupper, in 1887, is what I ask the Which was addressed by himself, which was House to adopt. That principle is based entirely a Liberal meeting, and at which the following resolution was passed. I quote from the organ of the hon, gentleman, "The Patriot" newspaper, of 14th March, 1895:

The following resolution was moved by John E. Winsloe, seconded by Henry Brehaut, sen. :

Whereas, there have been large expenditures of public money in the other provinces of the Dominion for railways and canals, in order to develop the commerce of the Dominion and to open up the North-west for settlers;

And whereas, the people of Belfast and Murray Harbour are badly in need of a branch railway to these important agricultural districts. in order to make it possible for them to ship their produce without so much inconvenience to themselves as at present exists.

And whereas, we are justly entitled to a pro-portionate share of the money expended in public works, and in view of the fact that the people of these districts are so seriously handicapped in trade, in travel under existing circumstances;

Therefore, resolved, that this meeting earnestly solicit the Hon. L. H. Davies and his colleagues in Parliament to urge upon the Government the necessity of this very desirable work, viz.: a branch road from Southport through Belfast to the deep water terminus at Murray Harbour Scuth, thence to the main line, connecting at or near Cardigan.

We therefore see that while the hon, gentleman says it is improper to advocate the construction of a railway before an election, yet at a meeting of his own party, at which he was present, that resolution was adopted advocating a road. I might further add that at a meeting held in Caledonia just previous to the last election at which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was present, he advocated a railway and promised to support a railway if he was returned. But although he made the promise at that time, the hon, gentleman, so far as I know, has never opened his mouth on the railway question in Parliament until now, when I brought forward this resolution.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are walls of adamant against me. I had no chance.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Now, the hon, members representing the county of Prince (Mr. Perry and Mr. Yeo) advocated the construction of branch railways Richmond Bay, Malpecque, Stanley, Rustico, Cape Wolfe, Elmira and Belfast; but the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said it was trifling with the Belfast Railway to advocate six or eight other branches. saying this the hon. gentleman was pitching into his own friends. At the same time, he claimed that there was $2,000,000 due to the people of Prince Edward Island from the over expenditure that had taken place on public works of Canada that were not contemplated in 1873. Yet he thinks it is trifling with the Belfast Railway to advocate a number of other small branches that would not cost altogether more than $1,100,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From what the Minister said, that estimate does not include a bridge. I may remark that the railway be useless without the construction of a bridge, and the cost of constructing a railway and foot passenger bridge would not cost ever half a million. Without this the railway would be a mockery, a delusion and a snare.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) We will take the railway if we can get it, at any rate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Without the bridges? Very well, that is your policy.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's P.E.I.) The hon. member for Queen's also asked why the tunnel was not being advocated. Well, Sir, I suppose one reason is that the hon, member for Queen's almost frightened the people out of the idea of a tunnel by the exaggerated statements he put before the House with respect to its cost. The hon, gentleman set himself up as an engineer against Sir Douglas Fox and others, who estimated the cost of the tunnel at a moderate sum, while the hon. gentleman put up the cost to about $20,000,000. That was enough to frighten the people from advocating that work. Yet the hon, gentleman and his leader are as much committed to the tunnel as the hon. members on the Government side of the House. The hon, leader of the Opposition addressed the following letter to the editor of the "Guardian," in which paper it was printed:

Dear Sir,-I have your favour of the 2nd February, instant. I hardly would have thought that an expression of opinion as to the construction of a tunnel to connect the Island of Prince Edward with the mainland should be required from me. Every man who has given any attention to the condition of things and the necessities involved by the entering of the Island into confederation, must admit that such a tunnel must be constructed, if the thing is reasonably practicable. The first requisite is to have an accurate survey and reliable estimates. I am only sorry that these were not obtained long ago.

W. LAURIER.

The Government, as we know, have placed a sum in the Estimates to test the practicability of that scheme. Borings have been conducted with more or less regularity, and with all possibile speed, so far as I can understand. Those that were more easily executed were carried out in the first season. In the next year the work was placed in other hands, and the borings, being in much deeper walter, were not carried on. The contractor. however, has not received any payment for these borings, and he will not receive payment until he has completed them; so that there is no doubt that his attention will be given to the work at as early a day as possible. Now, Sir, with regard to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways, pleased to see that he has taken the trouble to get his officers to make an estimate of the cost of the proposed lines of railway. I am pleased also to see that his estimate of the from Southport to Murray Harbour would results of the construction of these branches is favourable as to the revenues to be derived; and although I am not an engineer, yet I am led to believe that they would show even better results than he estimates. 1 will with every confidence leave the matter in the hands of the Government, hoping trusting and believing that they will see that justice is done to the people of Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FLINT moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors in Canada, except for sacramental, scienand medicinal purposes, manufacturing should be prohibited by law.

He said: I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the time of the House at any great length this evening, in the observations I propose to make upon this subject. It is an important subject, viewed from any standpoint-important in its relation to the pecuniary interests of the people, to the good order of the state and the morals of the community, and to all other matters in which the interests of the state are to a greater or less degree bound up. The question now best to diminish the admitted evils connected with the traffic in intoxicating liquors has occupied the attention of every Parliament that has existed in Canada almost from the beginning down to the present time. Of course, in the early history of the country, before temperance principles as they are now generally recognized were encouraged by organized institutions, such as churches and temperance societies, and before the principle of prohibition itself was established as a political principle worthy of advocacy, the efforts of society through the legislature were directed towards diminishing the opportunities for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Consequently, those who have looked over the history of legislation on this subject will have seen that Parliament has always been engaged, wherever it had jurisdiction, in striving to minimise the evils of intemperance and the evils connected with the liquor traffic, by diminishing the opportunities for traffic. Side by side with this there has of course gone on, as an admittedly important part of the movement, the moral education of the people, particularly the young people, in the principles of total abstinence. every person were a total abstainer, then legislation to any degree whatever would be unnecessary. But, unfortunately, in spite of the advances of society in that regard, a large proportion of the people have not been able to overcome the temptation to indulge in intoxicating liquors; and another large portion of the people, who handle considerable amounts of capital, have felt it to be to Consequently there has grown up a strong (Cheers.)

power in every province of the Dominion. strong in its material resources, strong in its claims and demands upon the sympathy of those who are connected with it, antagonistic to the moral education of the people in the principles I have alluded to, and to any legislative action whatever which looks towards the reduction of opportunities for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. It would be unwise to occupy the time of the House with quotations from writings and speeches of leading men in religious, educational, philosophic or political life in Canada or elsewhere, dealing with the different phases of this question. They have been brought before Parliament almost every session since the inauguration of the Dominion, and have been enforced in very many able, earnest, and elaborate addresses, delivered to this House, or its predecessors, somewhat in the line of this resolution before you.

That the question has taken a deep hold upon the foremost minds of the Dominion I need scarcely add. I might read a few words from the lips of our late Premier, of whose ability we were all proud, and to whom many tributes, and just tributes, were paid recently on the occasion of his sudden decease—a man careful, as a rule, in his utterances, and not supposed to be moved by any of those notions which those who are opposed to prohibition might call fanatical. I allude to the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson. A friend handed me a report of an address delivered by him in Owen Sound. in October, 1893. In the course of a political address at that place, he was asked by members of the audience, his views upon the subject of prohibition, and as many hon. members in this House have not probably, at any time, had the opportunity of hearing the views of that distinguished man upon that particular subject, I will read an extract from his speech on that occa-In answering a question, he said:

The report of the commission will certainly be demanded by the Government before the opening of the session so as to be ready for Parliament. (Cheers.) The point I cannot be explicit upon is, what I shall do upon the report of that commission, and what evidence the commission will report to the House of Parliament. I cannot do it, because I have not at this moment the slightest idea what the report will be, or even the nature of the evidence which these gentlemen I have seen scraps in the papers, have collected. but it is the first duty of every public man to in-form himself of the contents of the report, of the evidence on which that report will be based, before he even makes up his own mind as to what his duty may be with regard to it. his duty may be with regard to it. (Hear, hear.) The first question which has been asked me is this: "Are you in sympathy with the prohibition movement?" I declare I am in sympathy I declare I am in sympathy with it, inasmuch as it is a move for the furthering of temperance in this country, and to remedying the evils which the temperance community are endeavouring to abate in this country, and if prohibition can be adopted and enforced in this

The rest of the hon. gentleman's address was taken up with allusions to the constitutional controversy which is now going on, and in regard to which, I may say, he stated, in the strongest possible terms, that, in his judgment, the Dominion Parliament had jurisdiction to pass a prohibitory law. That being the opinion of the latest leading statesman of this country. I think it is well worth the attention of all those hon. members who may have doubts as to the propriety of the action which this resolution We have here the statement of one of the deepest thinkers of the Conservative party, one who felt the responsibility of his position, and this statement, though not in the identical terms or to the full extent of this resolution, is in accord with the principle underlying it. In other words. he believed the principle of legal prohibition to be a sound one, holding his mind in suspense upon only one or two points which all prohibitionists consider matters of de-Going back over the history of the question, as it has been presented by Parliament from time to time, we find the strongest declarations from other men of high political position, or who held high political positions at the time. In 1877, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, Sir John Schultz, stated in this House that:

While it was true that he did not belong to any temperance organization, yet he would always remember with pleasure that the North-west Council, of which he had the honour to be a member, had passed, early in its existence, the first prohibitory law in Canada, and the result has been that in over one-half of the Dominion the manufacture and sale of liquor had been prohibited, and with effects so good that he would like to see the experiment tried in the other half.

Now, I am aware that the result of the application of the prohibitory liquor law in the North-west has been a failure. those efforts made by who, Governor Schultz, believe in prohibition, and saw good results derived from it while it was in operation-unfortunately, those same persons were pained to see the law evaded and weakened, and finally overborne by the influence of those to whom I have already alluded as the friends of the liquor traffic. To whatever extent prohibition was a failure in the North-west, it became a failure because the law was not enforced, because those whose duty it was to enforce the law permitted infractions and violations of the spirit of the law. One of the most important infractions of the spirit of the law was the permission to use permits for the introduction of liquor into the territory. That was probably started with the design of accomplishing that exception which, in the resolution before the House, refers to sacramental, scientific, and medicinal purposes, but it was carried so far in the North-west Territories that practically it rendered nugatory the intention of the law itself. At any rate, we have here a very strong, useful expression of opinion, showing that the law worked satisfactorily and that the benefits were apparent to all who had an opportunity of observing its working in the North-west. The subject received, in the Senate, an equally strong endorsement from the committee appointed in the Senate to consider this question. In 1875, the committee of the Senate reported that:

In view of the facts recited, it seemed just and reasonable that the prayer of the petition should be granted.

And that the time has now arrived when the attention of the Government should be given to this important question, with a view to the introduction of a Bill to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for mechanical and medicinal purposes throughout the Dominion at the earliest date compatible with the public interest.

Later the matter was brought before the House by the present Finance Minister, and, in a speech which is often quoted, expressed to the fullest limit the views of the ultra-prohibitionists. Among the sentences that might be selected from that speech. I have made one or two selections, in order to show that at that time-and I see no reason to believe that his views have changed—the present Finance Minister held views upon this question as strong as those expressed by the Dominion Alliance or any other organization in this country pledged to the advocacy of this movement. After referring to the large expenditure of the country for intoxicating liquors, which expenditure, he contended, was an absolute waste and worse than waste of the wealthand resources of the country, he said:

I am within the mark when I say that the evils resulting from the liquor traffic in the Dominion have done more to retard the prosperity of the country and to sow the germs of disorder and discontent than any other probably with which this country is afflicted.

Later on, he said:

We legislate to keep up the distillery, to keep up the brewery, to keep up the liquor shops of our country, which employ altogether some 11,000 or 12,000 persons. Now, there is another class in this country, and that is the 4,400,000 and over who do not make and sell liquor. The legislation we have at present is in favour of the 11,000, but against the interests of the 4,400,000. By the legislation I propose the good of the greater number is sought, and, if it is admitted that the good of the greatest number ought to prevail, then the interests of the smaller number ought to go down.

I think these sentences convey, in a few words, the sound economic doctrine upon which this legislation is based, and that is, that, even although the minority may be temporarily compelled by the state to make some sacrifice, yet, if that sacrifice is necessary in the interests of the community, the minority must endure it; and it is the duty of the state, as representing the people of the country at large, to demand that sacrifice. I am not attempting to quote all or any considerable number of the statements or resolutions that have been passed by the House or brought before the House, but merely to select here and there what I consider to be of a representative character. In 1874, on the report of a commission, which was appointed some time previously, you yourself, Mr. Speaker, moved a resolution in these strong terms:

That the traffic in intoxicating liquors is an evil for which the laws of the country provide no adequate remedy, and that it is desirable to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal and manufacturing purposes.

This resolution was discussed in the House with a great deal of earnestness, and amendments moved. But, for reasons which do not appear on the face of "Hansard." the motion did not come to a vote. It expressed the views you held at that time, Mr. Speaker, and I have no reason to doubt that it expresses the views you still hold upon this question. In a subsequent session the House referred a proposed resolution on this subject to a committee. And that committee (a Committee of the whole House) agreed that the most effective remedy for the evils of the liquor traffic was to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. This was not adopted by the House, unfortunately, but by a committee of the House; and as it stands, it is, perhaps, as near a declaration on the subject as the House has ever reached. Unfortunately, on almost all occasions when the matter has been before the House it has been very difficult—in fact, it has been impossible—to induce Parliament to come to a straight resolution as to whether the prohibition of the liquor traffic was advisable or not. Hon, members representing various views, members who were afraid—who, although personally favourable to the principles of prohibition, were afraid the country would not support them-managed to induce the House to come to resolutions which did not speak upon the main question itself. Of course, the enormous evils of the liquor traffic are assumed as the basis of our argu-These have been demonstrated. They are admitted. The great questions which are now discussed are as to the competency of Parliament in some respects; as to the preparedness of the people to support such legislation; as to the difficulty of meeting the revenue requirements if the revenue from this source were taken away; and as to the collaberal question as to compensation to those whose business may be destroyed in consequence of the enactment of such a law, and matters of that kind. I do not propose, in the short time I have allowed myself, to deal at any length with any of these subjects, but only to deal in a general way The revenue with one or two of them. question has always been treated, by our Finance Minister at any rate, as one of comparative unimportance. Those who are afraid of prohibition, or who object to pro-hibition, with greater or less sincerity, professed to fear that the revenue would suffer so severely as to make it a choice of evils. As I say, those who have been responsible for the financial administration of the country have always intimated that they looked upon that objection as one of trifling moment. Sir Alexander T. Galt, speaking upon this subject at Sherbrooke, said:

After having a good deal to do with the question of revenue and the raising of taxation, I am quite prepared to assert before this audience tonight, that the Finance Minister who should succeed, by prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, in restoring $16,000,000 now lost to the people of this country, and wholly wasted—the Finance Minister who should succeed in doing that, and should also save the indirect loss that arises from the injury that is done to society by it—I say he will have no difficulty whatever in raising the sum of money which appears in the first instance to be lost to the revenue. There can be no doubt whatever about it.

Another Finance Minister, one helā in high regard by hon, members, particularly on the other side of the House, and held in high regard throughout the country generally on account of his stand upon the liquor question for the first twenty or thirty years (Sir S. L. Tilley), speaking in London, is reported to have made this statement:

It has been my misfortune, or fortune, having been a great many years in the Government of my native province of New Brunswick, and in the Government of the Dominion, to hold the post of Finance Minister in all these governments, and I have never heard but one opinion about the revenue question, namely, that it is of quite secondary importance, though it is, I admit, a more difficult thing with you. The revenue that we obtain in the Dominion of Canada is probably five or six millions of dollars a year, and it cost $20,000,000 to provide it for us. No Finance Minister would remain in office who would, in this day, propose a scheme for raising a revenue of $5,000,000 that would cost $20,000,000 to collect.

The figures of revenue and cost are somewhat changed from those of the year in which this speech was made, but the principle remains the same. The present Finance Minister, speaking on this question and referring to the speech I have just quoted, said:

I do not believe that there are a great many people in this country who would not be prepared for the statement that the hon. Minister of Finance then made. There are not a great many people in this country who would not fully understand that, although direct receipts from this traffic would certainly be expunged from our revenue, still the improvement in the general commerce of the country, the improvement in the general welfare and well-being of our community would be so great that the receipts in all other branches of our revenue would be increased correspondingly, and there would, practically, after the first year or so, not be any diminution whatever in our revenue from our taxpayers.

This, then, sums up far more completely than I would be able to do, the whole situation as regards revenue. The direct loss to the people is estimated by the most conservative valuators at from 32 to 35 millions per annum. The revenue from this source is about 7 millions per annum. But the enormous indirect loss has been calculated at from 135 to 140 million dollars per annum. Certainly, if any considerable portion of this could be saved to the people by the enactment and enforcement of a prohibitory measure, the small amount of revenue the country receives could be, in the language of this hon, gentleman, easily dispensed with. I have here a quotation from another eminent statesman in the same line as the one I have just read. Speaking in the legislature of Ontario, the present Chief Justice Meredith, referring to this matter, said:

You recollect that in 1893 a Bill was introduced by Mr. Marter, a member of the Opposition, which proposed to abolish the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors throughout the province. That proposition was made when it was doubtful whether the Government had the power, and the Government said that it would be unwise to do anything until the question of jurisdiction was determined, and they proposed a vote of the people as to whether prohibition of the liquor traffic should be enacted.

Pending action looking to the ultimate determination of the jurisdiction, a vote was taken, a considerable majority favouring prohibition, and as a public man, I deem it my duty and the duty of every one to bow to the voice of the people, when the majority of the people are determined.

when the majority of the people are determined. I say it is the duty of the legislature to do this; that, when it shall have been determined where the jurisdiction rests to deal with this question, it will be the duty of the Government in power in Ontario to bring in a Bill looking to the carrying into effect of prohibition.

In other words, that hon, gentleman was favourable to the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, provided the people of the province expressed in an unmistakable manner their sympathy with the movement. This question was discussed in the various local legislatures, and all. I believe, except Quebec, asked the opinion of the people upon that point, and without any exception those opinions were given in favour of a prohibitory liquor law. I know of no other way except one in which the opinion of the people could be given upon that subject, and that way of course is the more familiar one of electing representatives to this House, or to the legislature which they ask to discuss the measure, favourable to its promotion. There are these two principles, the one of allowing each candidate before the people to express his views upon the matter, and to receive support from the people accordingly as they are in sympathy with his views, relying upon his action in Parliament to represent those views; the other way is that of taking a direct plebiscite of the people. Now, we have never been able to ascertain to what extent the prohibition sentiment is reflected in this Parliament, but we have had abundant opportunity of knowing how prohibition sentiment is reflected among the people of all the pro-vinces, except the province of Quebec; and I need hardly say, in face of the figures the liquor traffic within its borders and in with which the House is familiar, that that verdict was uncompromisingly strong in favour of prohibition, and that so far as the opportunity of realizing the sentiments of the people is concerned, the House has every encouragement to go forward and express its opinion in accord with the opinion of the people of those provinces. As to the feeling of the people of Quebec, we, of course, are not fully informed; but all the opportunities that I have had of looking into the state of public opinion in that province, lead me to believe that there is a strong feeling there favourable to as complete a suppression of the liquor traffic as legislation can possibly effect. At any rate, some of the profoundest minds of the church to which the majority of the people of Quebec belong, have expressed themselves strongly in favour of the suppression of the liquor traffic by every moral and legal means within the power of the state to employ. In an article published in the "North American Review." Archbishop Ireland. of St. Paul, Minn., discusses at great length the question of the liquor traffic, and supports in strong and eloquent language the opinion of the Holy See, as expressed through Mgr. Satolli, the Papal legate, in opposition to the members of his church dealing in intoxicating liquors. I will not read the quotation, because it is very long, but I have seen in no literature upon this subject a more forcible denunciation of the evils of the liquor traffic, its demoralizing influences, and the determination of the leaders of that great church to suppress it by all the moral means within their power, than in the article by Archbishop Ireland. A great many who, in their own lines, are not bitterly opposed to the principle of prohibition, many who profess in a mild way to favour it, nevertheless fear that it would not be a practical success if put in operation. Practically speaking, they say, your position is sound; by a priori reasoning you seem to have come to a right conclusion, yet after all we do not believe that the practical results of a prohibitory liquor law would be such as you anticipate, and such as you are seeking for. Unfortunately there have not been many communities in the world in which the experiment has been fully, and fairly and thoroughly tried, but it has been tried to a greater or less degree. The state of Maine is considered the pivotal point of attack and defence in connection with this matter. In that state the principle has been applied as fully, perhaps, as it was possible to apply it in any state, except one governed under the constitution of this Dominion. The state of Maine has very large jurisdiction over the liquor traffic, yet that jurisdiction is in many ways interfered with by the superior jurisdiction of the federal authorities. But struggling with these difficulties of a higher jurisdiction in the enforcement of the law, the state of Maine has succeeded very largely in wiping out showing the beneficial results accruing from the operation of a prohibitory liquor law. In the first place. I think it will be admitted by every hon. gentleman present that the sentiment of the state, after an experience of some forty years of prohibition, is still strongly and unmistakably in favour of its continuance. Now, that shows the views which the people themselves, having the operation of the law under their own eyes, hold as to its success or non-success. Wherever an attempt has been made to repeal the law, it has failed; wherever attempts have been made to strengthen the law, they have succeeded, and the practi-cal results are before the country for its consideration. Without attempting to go into these, in extenso, I call the attention of the House to one or two salient features of success that have followed the prohibitory law in the state of Maine. Maine had a population of 661,000 in 1891, a much smaller population than that of the maritime provinces, which was 880,000; and yet the savings bank deposits in Maine in 1891-92 exceeded, largely, all the sayings bank deposits of the whole Dominion of Canada. And certainly if this is the case with a state like Maine, having, by no which resources enormous means the Providence has given to the maritime provinces, it speaks well for the operation of the prohibitory law or the series of causes which produced that great result. Maine. compared with the maritime provinces. has made a great demonstration of its wealth for from any law is to reduce the opportuniand prosperity. Comparing Maine, how-ties for violation to a minimum. I believe ever, not with the maritime provinces, in this law could be enforced and would be that particular, but with other states of the enforced in this country as well as any union, we find that while, in the order of population, Maine stands No. 30, yet, in the order of wealth, it stands No. 22; in the order of crime—another index of the results of the absence of the use of intoxicating liquors—it stands No. 36. The average number of criminals to the million in age number of criminals to the million in the United States, is 722. In the North Atlantic division of states, the number is 832, in the South Atlantic disivion, 730, in the north central division, 491; in the south central division, 842; in the western division, 1,341, whilst in the state of Maine the number is only 257, showing that compared with any group of states as divided up for the purpose of the last census, Maine is immeasurably below any as regards the criminal record. It has the smallest number of criminals per thousand in the union, except the state of Wyoming. A prohibitory liquor law does not tend to increase crime Take the growth of wealth in or poverty. the state of Maine. In 1850, the year prohibition was adopted generally, the wealth of the state of Maine was estimated at $100.000,000. It was increased in 1860 to $160,000,000; in 1870, to $224,000,000; and in 1880 to $236,000,000; and in 1890 to $309.000.000, an enormous increase, a greater increase, I believe, than occurred in any section of this Dominion, or any section of the United States, covering the same period. The state of Maine possess none of those great and varied resources which many of the other states possess. no mineral resources to any great extent. Its lumber and agricultural wealth, and manufacturing advantages are, perhaps, the main sources of wealth and prosperity in the state. But these figures tend to show very strongly that a great increase of wealth must be attributed to the savings and thrift of the population, encouraged largely by the enforcement of a prohibitory measure, which has prevented that waste, disorder, and loss that have been alluded to by all speakers on the subject of tem-That loss in Canada represents $30,000,000 per annum. directly, and, indirectly probably $140,000,000. I take the state of Maine merely as a powerful illustration of the benefits of a prohibitory liquor law as enforced in that state. Of course, I am perfectly aware that every writer who objects to prohibition, professes to find numerous instances of the violation of the law in Maine. This may be perfectly true. It is a law, perhaps, which can never be absolutely and completely enforced in any community, but in this particular it stands on precisely the same basis as every law on our statute-book. are violaters of law in every country, and probably so long as human nature remains as it is there will be such individuals; the most we can expect, or this House can ask, other law on the statute-book. of its enactment would imply that the people would obey it. We are a law-abiding people, and once a prohibitory law were on the statute-book, properly guarded and reserving rights as we understand them, it would be enforced and observed to the same extent as any other law. I trust this House will join with the majority as expressed the people. by of plebiseites which have been taken, join with the representatives of we consider to be the great moral element of the community, will join with the opinion expressed by the eminent men of whose speeches and writings I have spoken, and will say that, in its opinion, the best remedy and the only remedy for the great evils of intemperance is the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law. If this House can be induced to come to that conclusion, there will be ample time to consider the details of such legislation as might be deemed advisable to carry out the opinion of the House, and I believe that the country would support the legislature in that opinion, and would support the majority in any incoming Parliament in enacting legislation based upon this principle; and the results would be the same as they have been everywhere else and to the same extent as they crime, an increase in the savings of the people, a decrease in the disorder of the community, and increase in opportunities for development of the country in all its varied interests. The revenue consideration would, in a very short time, pass out of sight in face of the great prosperity that must inevitably follow the striking off of an annual waste of from $30,000,000 to $35.000.000. I leave this matter in the hands of the House, with the earnest hope that it will be considered apart from party feeling—I have endeavoured to keep this resolution aloof from all partisan feeling whatever-and that the House will consider the question on its merits, having in view only the general interests of the country and looking to the future of the Dominion in the light of the past. If we could have the past history of the country brought before us and could have portrayed the loss, suffering, the crime and disaster which have been caused by intemperance, and if we could look forward to the day when intemperance should be banished from the country, and when liquor should cease to be the power it has been, and unfortunately may be to-day, I believe we could have the strongest hope for the future strength and greatness of this country.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to second this resolution, and I do so with great pleasure, not only because the subject is a most important one-I think we all admit that-but because I am in entire sympathy with the resolution itself. It may be said that there is no need of speeches on this question, because it has been so often discussed in this House, but I may answer, that there are many subjects which have been discussed in this House over and over again, and which are still brought before our notice. It is necessary that this subject should be discussed, because. I think, it is of equal importance with any that can come before us. I have no intention to-night to elaborate on this question of temperance or prohibition. My discussion on the subject. I trust, will be n.oderate and fair, and I have no doubt that the members of this House will give it just and impartial consideration. I have often felt that some who advocate prohibition and temperance injure their cause by being too extreme and by denouncing those who do not agree with them. For myself, I have never indulged in denunciation of those who differ from me on the question, because I think they have a perfect right to their opinions, and if I myself am sincere in advocating prohibition. I have no reason to doubt the sincerity of those who do not agree with me. I shall ask the attention of the House for a short time to the resolution which has been brought to our notice, and, in the first place, I shall consider what is meant by prohibition. There are some who say that they have no shut my eyes to the difficulties that would have been where restrictive or prohibitory faith in prohibition, because where it has laws have been adopted-a decrease in been tried it does not absolutely prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors. Now. I wish to say for those whom I represent here, those who asked me to second this resolution, that they make no such claim. But they do claim that a prohibitory law passed by this Parliament, and enforced in good faith by the Government in power, would reduce the drinking in this country by at least three-fourths. I have no doubt that if the law could accomplish that we would consider it very satisfactory indeed. Let me ask what is the object of this resolution? To my mind, its object, is to ascertain what members of this House are in favour of prohibition, and on this ground I think the resolution is fair. The people of this country who are in favour of prohibition have a perfect right to know what members of this House are in sympathy with their views. and this resolution has been brought before Parliament with that object in view. It has been said by some that if this resolution carries, then it would be necessary for the Government to pass a Bill at this session of Parliament. I do not entertain any such idea, and I may say that members of the Dominion Alliance who advocate this resolution, and wish to bring it before this House, have no idea of any such thing either. They do not think, and they do not ask that in case of the resolution passing the House, a Bill should be introduced and passed this session. They know that that would be impossible. They know that in the time that remains of this session, it would be impossible to frame and pass such a Bill as would be requisite. Then, Sir, it is said by some that if a prohibitory law were passed, it must come into force at once, and that is made one of the objections. Well, I differ from that view also. I hold that prohibitory law were passed, it could be arranged to come into force at a certain date. It might be at the end of one year, or two years, or perhaps four years, so as to allow the country to arrange everything for the coming into force of this law. A great deal of criticism has been devoted to the Royal Commission by some who advocate prohibition. In my opinion, the Royal Commission is good for one thing at least, and that is, to show the objections and difficulties of a prohibitory law, and to serve as a guide in framing such a law. We must all admit, I am sure. that the Parliament or the Government would have no easy task who sat down to frame a prohibitory act. There are a great many defects in the prohibitory Acts which operate in other countries. the United States, for instance, and there are some good points in these Acts also. I hold that the Royal Commission gives information on this, shows the defects and shows the good points of these laws, and gives the reasons why they have failed, if they have failed. For my own part, I do not

beset such a prohibitory Act, and I want the country and Parliament to know these. I would not wish for one moment that Parliament should pass a prohibitory Bill blindly, without considering the difficulties which exist. Nothing could be worse for the cause of prohibition, and nothing could give it a greater setback than action of that kind. I shall briefly consider some of the objections to a prohibitory law. Some say the time has not come for its passage. I admit that objection has a great deal of force. but I might answer it by asking. Will the time ever come? I suppose that those who are entirely opposed to prohibition on principle and from self-interest, feel that the time will never come. There are some who very mildly in favour of prohibition, and who would like to see it put in force. if it could be done without difficulty, and they may think, and think sincerely, that the time has not come. There are some who say, that we should not be asked to vote on this question until we have had time to study the evidence brought together in the report of the Royal Commission. Well, Sir, I may safely say that if we waited until all the members of this House read all the evidence of the Royal Commission, the time never would come. But. Sir. the question now is: When will the time come, or has the time arrived to-day? There are a great many, those who are asking for prohibition, who say the time has come and that the country to-day is ripe for the measure. For my own part, I think I may say this, and say it safely—and I think all the members of this House will agree with me—that the time will have come when we find in this House a majority of the members who will vote for the passage of a prohibitory Act. If the people of this country who are in favour of prohibition remember that, and they send men here who are in see that favour of prohibition, then the time will have arrived. Another difficulty urged is the expense and impossibility, it is said, of enforcing this law. I admit that sometimes that is overlooked by those who advocate prohibition. I know that there are some in this country who have not given this subject a great deal of thought, and who yet are strongly in favour prohibition. There are of some think that everything that is necessary is for this Parliament to pass a pro-hibitory Act, and that if that were done, everything would be done. But, Sir, I hold that that would only be the beginning. that there would have to be a continual effort on the part of those in favour of prohibition to have the law enforced; that the law would not enforce itself, and that the Government, unless backed up strongly by public opinion, would not be able to make the law effective. One reason why it would be difficult to enforce this law-and it is a difficulty which no doubt exists very strongly in the minds of some-is that it is an interference with individual rights. There are some who hold that Parliament has no right to say what a man shall drink any more than it has to say what he shall eat. But I contend that we are not saying anything about what a man shall drink at all. In this resolution we are speaking of the importation, the manufacture and sale; and I think we are justified in doing that, as much as we are justified in limiting the liberty of the individual in many other respects. Then, it is said that the Scott Act was not enforced. One reason for that was that the Scott Act did not stop the manufacture, which went on just as if the Scott Act did not exist. Then, that Act was confined to limited areas. While one county adopted the Scott Act, it was not in existence in the next county, and that made it extremely difficult to enforce the Act in the county where it was in force. Then, it has been said, and I think with some truth, that it was not enforced on political grounds -that the Scott Act was an Act of the Dominion Parliament, it had to be enforced by the provincial government, and, as they did not wish to make themselves obnoxious to those who dealt in liquor, they were not very strict in enforcing the Scott Act. It is also urged that we have a long frontier. and that it would be almost impossible to stop smuggling. I have no doubt that it would be difficult, but I do not think it would be impossible. To-day there is no doubt some smuggling, but we do not find it wholly impossible to stop it, and while there might be some smuggling of liquor under a prohibitory law, I think it could be prevented to a great extent. When we have a Government and a Parliament who are in earnest in passing a law of this kind, there will be no difficulty in enforcing it. Another objection urged is the loss of revenue that would result. It is said that we would lose about $7,000,000 of revenue. Well, Sir, this is a fact that must be faced by those who advocate prohibition. I believe some overlook this fact altogether, but I hold that it should not be overlooked. Those who advocate prohibition must realize that some way must be found of making up this deficiency. I believe that in a short time a great deal of that loss would be made up by the money which is now expended on liquor being expended in the purchase of useful articles, the duties on which would go a great way to restore the deficiency in the revenue. Whether it would make it all up I am not able to say. Another important consideration to my mind, in framing a Bill of this kind, is the question of compensation. Now, I know that some who advocate prohibition utterly scout the idea of compensation. They argue that the men engaged in this business are men who are doing damage to the country, that they have been doing this constantly, and that they have no rights which we should respect. They, therefore, repudiate altogether the idea of compensation. There are other men, more reasonable, who, while in favour of prohibition, yet realize that the men who have invested all they have in this business have some rights which we are bound to respect, and that if a law is passed, legislating away their property or making it almost worthless, they should be given some reasonable compensation. For myself, I may say that I entertain that opinion; and whatever our views may be, if a prohibitory liquor law comes before this Parliament for consideration, I know that the question of compensation will be one of the points which will have to be considered. I have mentioned some of the objections urged against this measure, because I think it is only right that we should look them squarely in the face. I intend now to look at some of the benefits which would accrue to this country from prohibition. In the first place, I say it would be a great saving to the country. I hold that most of the drinking is absolute waste, and worse than absolute waste. Not only is the liquor consumed of no benefit to the man who drinks it, but it has a bad effect upon him in a great many eases. I do not say that all who drink liquor are injuriously affected by it; but I do say that there are a sufficient number injuriously affected by it to justify me in saying that the liquor consumed is not only wasted, but worse than wasted. I believe that the amount of money expended on intoxicating liquors in this country is at least $35,000,000 a year; and I hold that a great deal of this liquor would be far better taken and poured into the sewer than used as it is used. So, from my point of view, if grain were not made into liquor, and no labour were expended in making it, a great saving would be effected by the country. Another advantage is that it would lessen crime. I do not think I need argue that point at all. It is admitted by all who have studied criminal statistics that drinking is a great cause of crime. I do not say that it is the make many wives and children in this counonly cause of crime: I do not say that if we had a prohibitory liquor law and it were enforced strictly, there would be no crime in the country; but I hold that the amount of crime would be greatly diminished. have seen it stated on good authority that at least 60 per cent of existing crime results: from the drinking of intoxicating liquors. The expense of our jails, penitentiaries and reformatories would be very much reduced, and this saving would go against the loss in the revenue. Another advantage is that it would lessen accidents. A great many of the accidents that we read of in the papers, not only to life, but to property. result from the use of intoxicating liquors. I am glad to know that our two great railways in this country, and I have no doubt all the railways, take strong ground on this question, and insist that the men in their employ shall not use intoxicating liquors, employ shall not use intoxicating liquors, and they are perfectly right in doing so, They have no vote and cannot influence because of the large number of accidents which may be directly traced to that cause. Another advantage I claim for prohibition is that it would lessen pauperism. That is a point which needs no argument. If we trace the causes of pauperism in our cities and in many of our towns, we shall find that those who are dependent upon the assistance of their neighbours to get through the winter, and very often to get through the summer as well, are reduced to that condition by the use of intoxicating liquors; and I believe that if we had a prohibitory law, there would be a great deal less pauperism in this country. But another reason, and to my mind one of the strongest reasons, in favour of an Act of this kind is, that it would remove temptation from our young men and boys, and from weak men of all ages. Now it is said by some that there is no need of this because a man ought to be able to take a drink and then stop. No doubt there are men who can do that. No doubt there are many men all over the country who can take a drink when they feel like it and then leave it alone, but we cannot disguise the fact that there are many who cannot do that, and I wish to protect those from the temptations which are constantly thrown in their way as they walk up and down the street. Some men of this kind cannot go to their business without passing three or four saloons, standing there, inviting them to enter; and because this drinking habit is so common in the country because of the number of saloons waiting for customers. we have the treating habit which is the cause of a great deal of evil. If for no other reason, if there was no other benefit to be reaped from the passing of a prohibitory law. I would vote for this resolution, because if we had such an Act it would remove the temptations of drink from our young men and boys. I need not say, because I have said it already, in speaking about the increase of pauperism, that it would tend to try happier than they are to-day. We all of us know what misery has been inflicted on families by the passion for strong drink. We all know that many women suffer because their husbands are the victims of intemperance. Why do I support this resolution? First, to show on what side I am, While I do not know that I can be called a temperance crank, as some are called, because I do not denounce those who do not agree with me on this question, at the same time I can say that I am not on the liquor side but on the side of temperance always and everywhere. It is therefore only consistent that I should support a resolution of this kind. I support this resolution in response to the appeal of thousands mothers, wives and sisters throughout the country. Many a woman looks anxiously to this Parliament for relief on this question.

us by the ballot, or perhaps we would be more attentive to their appeal; but to my mind the fact that they have no vote makes myself. I have resolved that I shall not turn shall have my vote on this question. I of the most important now pending before support this resolution because I hold that the country. It is evident from the large intoxicating liquors are the greatest enemy number of petitions which have been proof religion and morality. Many a young sented to this House from time to time and man who would otherwise lead a moral, from the decisive votes which have been and perhaps a religious life, can trace his taken in most of the provinces, that there first downward step to the taking of a glass is a strong public sentiment in favour of of intoxicating liquor. If we look at the prohibition. In five out of seven provinces records of the police court, we shall find this principle was carried by a large that many who are convicted of other majority. If I recollect aright, it was crimes, that many who are found in a great carried in Ontario by something like 85,000; many disreputable places, would not have in Nova Scotia by 30.000 to 40,000; in Manicommitted these crimes if it had, not been toba by 11.000; in Prince Edward Island for the influence of intoxicating liquors, I am not a fanatic on this question, but I manimous vote of the legislature, making find no fault with those who are. I think if one might be a fanatic on any question, that is decisive, at least so far as these proit would be on this; and I can well excuse vinces are concerned. I think, in view of these facts, necessary, and I simply wish to place them it is desirable that we should get a fair and on record. I find that those who have studied square vote from this House, without any all the effects of the liquor traffic are in fencing or amending calculated to evade the favour of prohibition. It may be said that real issue. It will be remembered that in drinking has decreased and that the drink-1891, a similar resolution was brought foring habit is not what it was some years ward, but unfortunately it was side-tracked age: but I ask, who deserve credit for that? and defeated by the motion in favour of Is it not those men and women who have appointing a royal commission. And, since devoted themselves to the cause of temperance? And those are the very men and mission has completely blocked the way, women who are asking this House to pass a prohibitory Act. If it be urged that you action being taken in this House. But, cannot stop all drinking. I reply that we now that that commission is cut of the way, want our boys to grow up without incurring this habit. I believe we have some men so thoroughly slaves to this vice that even under a prohibitory law they would find some means of gratifying their appetite. But I believe that our boys and our young men would be saved from the habit; and in a few years you would have people all over the country who would have no desire to break the law. I do not know, as the mover of the resolution said, any politics in this question. If I were to consult my political interests. I would be silent, because some of my strongest supporters do not agree with me on this question at all. I advocate this principle, not from political motives, but because I believe in it. To my mind this is a question which should rise above polities. It may be said that I have great faith and great hope, but I do hope to see the day when a prohibitory law will be passed with the assistance of both parties. and then I have no doubt such a law will be effectually enforced.

I am fully convinced that if this principle is adopted and made the law of the land it will contribute immensely to the prosperity, well-being, and happiness of the Dominion.

Sir JAMES GRANT. As this question is doubtless near a vote. I desire, before that vote is taken, to express a very brief opinion upon it. In my humble opinion this is one of the most important subjects that has been brought before the House for many a day. I listened to the observation of the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House (Mr. Flint) who is the great temperance champion of this country, and also to the hon. gentleman to my left (Mr. Craig), who has also spoken fairly and squarely upon the subject of temperance. This is a matter that concerns the public generally; it is one to which every sensible and fair-minded man ought to give careful consideration. for the last forty years in the Ottawa Valley, are aware of the important changes that have taken place in the habits of the posed. Many people think that it is necespeople in that time. Twenty-five years ago, sary, in a cold climate like that of Canada drinking was a habit among our people, to take whisky in order to keep warm. and, undoubtedly, whether from not understanding the subject, or from having a greater desire to indulge in alcoholic beverages than the present generation, there was certainly far more alcohol used than is used I think a great deal of good has been accomplished by the works of such men as Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson. whose work has become a text-book hibition. in many of the best educational institutions of our country, teaching the young the of our country, teaching the young the Mr. GUILLET. I do not desire to give a effect of alcoholic beverages upon the system. People are becoming educated on assumed a position of grave importance to this subject. They are common in the system and I are given the system. derstand that alcoholic beverages have a deleterious effect upon the constitution, and to believe that they will be far better off if they do not use alcohol at all, but question. There is no doubt in any reasoncontent themselves with the ordinary beverages instead. We know very well that the Scriptures say "Take a little wine for thy stomach's sake, and for thine often infirmities." But people are not content with taking a little, and to overcome their infirmities. They are not satisfied unless they are taking it all the time. I am convinced that no legislation of this character, comlegislation of this character, comlegislation of this kind; but I think that ing suddenly upon our people, without their the whole Dominion is not prepared, and understanding it in the widest and most that, in some sections a law such as is procomprehensive sense, would be advantageous to the people themselves. When I consider the legislation in the temperance states of the United States, and when I examine the condition of affairs there, I find large quantities of alcoholic liquor are being used and this in spite of a prohibitory law. For my part, I believe that education will accomplish more than legislation. Let us educate our people gradually to a full understanding of the subject. Let us make it popular not to drink; and they will get rid of the evils of intemperance more rapidly than under the influence of such legislation as is now proposed to be inaugurat-This is a temperance age, Sir, and the people drink far less than they did twenty years ago; and when we find this radical change going on through the influence of education. why should we, by sudden legislation of this character, attempt to do away with the use of liquor altogether, as if we were going to accomplish a permanent good in that way. I do not believe that that would be the result; I doubt if there would not be more drinking than there is to-day. The falling off in the drinking habits of the people is shown in many ways. In many places where liquor was formerly sold they are closing up their bars because they cannot make money out of them any longer. In some of our largest institutions there

The question has been so fully discussed that it is unnecessary for me to speak at length upon it. I rose only for the purpose of stating my belief that the operation of the principle of education will accomplish more than legislation at this time, and, therefore, I cannot vote for pro-

They are commencing to un- the country, and I am quite convinced that it will not down, but will have to be settled. I desire to lay before the House a more practical way of dealing with this able person's mind as to the evils of intemperance. Those evils exist to a very wide extent, and they are deeply to be deplored. But I declare my belief that those evils cannot be best met by the proposed legislation in this Parliament. I am quite convinced that there are sections of posed even if enacted will not be enforced. And I hold that it would be a most deplorable thing to place upon the statute-book an Act that would not be enforced. well known that the Scott Act when it was adopted within limited areas, soon became a dead letter; that it was not enforced. Though it was the manifest duty of the local government to enforce that Act there was a conflict of opinion on the subject. Some claimed that the Dominion Government should enforce the law, and some that it was the duty of the provincial government to enforce it. But we know that it was the duty of the local government to administer the law. But the local govern-But the local government in Ontario were not in sympathy with the Act. They were deriving large revenues from the licenses for the sale of liquors in other counties, but were deprived of the revenues they had formerly enjoyed in those counties in which the Scott Act had been adopted. I think the local legislature must be ready and willing to enforce these pro-hibitory laws, or it is not worth the while for the Parliament of Canada to adopt them. In fact, this subject should be handed over if possible, to the local legislatures. If we find, when the decision is given in the case which is now before the judicial committee of the Privy Council that the local legisla-In some of our largest institutions there are millions of gallons of whisky that cannot be disposed of. And if we find all has become the opinion of many practical men who look upon this question in a common sense way, and not from a sentimental point of view-that it would be wise and in the interests of prohibition for Parliament to confer upon the local legislatures the power to deal with the question, or, if that is not possible, to obtain from the Imperial Parliament such an amendment to the British North America Act as should Parliament that power. think that would be \mathbf{a} practical way dealing with a question of this kind. Then, if the legislatures of those provinces, the people of which are prepared for the adoption of a prohibitory law, containing a majority of men who are in favour of prohibition, that same majority will see that the law is enforced. As soon as the state of public sentiment in any province demands the enactment of a prohibitory law. the same public sentiment will demand its enforcement, and the question will be entirely in the hands of the people of each province when they have arrived at that conviction. But to pass an Act here now, as this resolution proposes, to extend prohibition over this vast Dominion, I think would be unwise. It would simply place upon the statute-book a law that would soon become a dead letter, and would soon have to be repealed, and the temperance cause would be forced back many years, instead of being promoted. I think a wise course to pursue would be to adopt a resolution to-night deferring consideration of this matter until we have a decision of the Imperial Privy Council. I do not see that we can make satisfactory progress in any other way. As I said before, I think it is a most visionary proposition to ask this House to pass a resolution to-night upon which we must immediately base a prohibitory enactment for the whole Dominion. I do not think the friends of temperance who are supporting this proposition. have fully considered the consequences. If it is to be decided to-night that we must adopt such a measure, there is a revolution before this country which it is not, I am sure, prepared for, and which will involve the passing of an Act which cannot be enforced, and for which public sentiment is not prepared. I beg, therefore, to move the following amendment:

That all the words after "That" in the proposed motion be struck out and the following inserted instead thereof:—"Whereas there is now before the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council the appeal against the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; the further consideration of this question be deferred until this appeal shall have been decided and the report of the Judicial Committee thereon "e-ceived."

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the vote is taken question in the manner proposed by the on the main motion, or the amendment, I desire to say a few words and to move another amendment. The main motion beometric ment to the amendment:

The legislature of Ontario, two years ago, passed an Act to provide for taking the voice of the electors of the province as to the advisability of prohibiting the liquor traffic in that pro-The people pronounced in favour of prohibition by a large majority, yet the legislation which was promised was not introduced, but, instead, the question was relegated to the courts in order to ascertain whether the province had authority to enact prohibition. That question is yet before the courts, and until it is decided I think it would be inadvisable for this Parliament to pass a resolution saying that we will enact prohibition. I think it would be unwise, in the interests of temperance, for this Parliament to undertake to pass any such legislation at the present time. I am as strong an advocate of temperance and of prohibition as the hon, gentleman who has introduced this motion, but I do not believe in voting for resolutions simply for the purpose of making political capital out of them. When we grapple with that question, we should grapple with it in such a way as that it will promote the cause of temperance. I think, with my hon, friend who moved the amendment, that if this House were to undertake to pass prohibitory legislation now, we would injure the cause of temperance very materially. I believe that the best thing to do is to wait until the courts have decided whether this Parliament or the provincial legislatures have a right to pass a prohibitory law. The question has been in litigation long enough, and it would enter once more into litigation if this Parliament passed an Act to prohibit the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors. The question would again be thrown into the courts to decide whether we had jurisdiction to pass such an Act. Then it is to be remembered that this Government appointed a commission to investigate this whole question, from every That commission devoted a standpoint. great deal of time, and at great expense to the country, in investigating this whole question. The evidence of that commission has been laid before the House. I do not presume many members have read the evidence, or the report. I have not yet seen the report, but until that report has been presented to the House, and the members of this House and the people of this country have had an opportunity or studying it, and of examining the evidence, I think it would be unwise for us to deal with the question in the manner proposed by the Amendment to the amendment negatived.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I may say. Mr. Speaker, that if there was no appeal pending at the present moment, I would be prepared to support the motion moved by my hon, friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), a motion in favour of prohibition. But as the mover and seconder have stated that it is not proposed to interfere with the existing state of things by legislation proposed this session, that in fact no legislation is to be proposed this session, but it is merely voting on the abstract proposition, it does not seem to me seemly to vote for that proposition with the suit pending at the present time before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That being so, I am prepared to support the amendment.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do so because I think it would be an unseemly proceeding on our part to vote for an original proposition in favour of prohibition and at the same time be carrying on the suit upon the question as to whether we have the right to legislate on the subject or not. Whenever we do come to legislate on the subject if the jurisdiction is found to be with us here, I think we shall have along with that subject a number of important questions to deal with, but these will be rather for the consideration of the Finance Minister than for a private member of the House. I say, therefore, that without abandoning my views at all in favour of the principle of prohibition, if it is found we have here a right to legislate, I am at the present moment disposed to support the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Main motion, as amended, agreed to on same division.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask the hon, gentleman what he proposes to take up to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. I propose that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means, in order to get a Supply Bill passed covering the items the House passed the other night. and afterwards take up supply, and I suppose the motion of the hon, gentleman will be moved on going into supply.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to ascertain from the Secretary of State when he intends to comply with the order of the House to which I have called his attention on more than one occasion this session, in regard to the industries of the county of York. I began almost at the commencement of the session to call the hon, gentleman's attention to the default, and he has promised me, without reservation, on each occasion that at an early date this order would be complied with. I think I have been more than reasonable with him, and I rise on this occasion simply to say that if I have again to call attention to it I think he will excuse me if I do so in language not so moderate as I am adopting to-night.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In reply to the hon. gentleman. I may say that a number of these returns have been moved for, and since the matter was brought up in the House a week or so ago. I have been bringing down almost every day some returns of that kind. While I have no definite knowledge as to his return. I will let him know what condition it is in and when it will be brought down.

Report of the Commissioner of the Northwest Mounted Police Force, 1894.-(Mr. Foster.)

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the orders of the day are called. I would like to ask when the return showing the allowances to Mr. Harter Reed will be presented? The resolution ordering this return was passed on the 25th April,—a long time ago. I would also draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the return relating to the superannuation, ordered on the 26th April last, is not yet down. Are these returns likely to be laid on the Table of the House in a day or two?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not catch the subject of the first return referred to by the hon. gentleman. The second is being proceeded with, with all possible speed. In my department I have two of my best men working upon it continuously. This return, of course, calls for work from other departments besides my own, and the other departments have been asked to prepare their portion. The return will certainly not be brought down this week.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Could it not be brought down in instalments—what my hon, friend wanted first and what the leader of the House wanted afterwards?

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps we had better have all the facts at once.

Mr. BORDEN. I would ask the Minister of Public Works whether the return ordered by the House, I think a year ago, relating to Kemptville post office, will be brought down soon?

Mr. OUIMET. It was brought down nearly a week ago—the very day the hon. gentleman last asked for it.

Mr. BORDEN. I beg pardon, I was not aware of that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has any return been brought down in reference to the manufacture of binding twine under the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to allow that to stand over, as the Minister is not present.

WAYS AND MEANS.

House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 30th June, 1895, the sum of $1.-143,054.28 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolution reported.

SUPPLY-LACHINE CANAL BRIDGE CONTRACT.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, during the last session of Parliament, the Public Accounts Committee was engaged at nearly all of its sittings in taking evidence in relation to the alleged frauds perpetrated on the Government in connection with what which about $400,000 have been paid, in actual figures, $394,000. The mere recital of the facts on their face is startling, and calls for the earnest attention of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. The Minister of Railways admits—and that part is popularly known as the Curran Bridge Contract. That evidence was reported to the House at a very late period of the session. There was also an investigation before the Exchequer Court relating to the same subject in which a great quantity of evidence was collected; and there was an investigation made into the subject by the commission appointed by the Government to investigate these matters in the summer of 1893. That evidence was before the Commission on Publie Accounts in type-written form, though I believe it has never been printed in full. Towards the close of the session the House undertook to discuss the evidence which had been given before the Public Accounts Committee: but, as was very well remarked by some members who took part in the debate, sufficient time had not elapsed to enable the members of the House thoroughly to master the effect of that evidence. It seems right and proper, in view of the admitted fact that enormous frauds have been committed upon the Government, that the attention of the House should again be invited to the subject-matter, with a view to determining, in the first place to what extent these frauds have been perpetrated, in the second place the cause through which they were allowed to be perpetrated, and, in the third place, whether the guilty parties have been punished or whether any attempt has been made to insure their punishment. Now, I do not think it is necessary to enter into a minute investigation of the larger portion of the facts connected with these Sufficient for us, and for our prefrauds. sent purposes is it, I think, to take a general bird's-eye view of the situation, and I think it will be found that not only have the subordinates who have been engaged in the construction of these works been guilty of fraudulent conduct, but that the department, and the Minister of the department, are, and ought to be, held responsible by this House for these frauds.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that we were about to build a bridge over the canal in the city of Montreal, known as the Lachine Canal, of a breadth of from 225 to 250 feet, and, in the session of 1892, the Minister of Railways came down to the House and made us a statement as to the necessity of this public work. Having first stated to the House that elaborate estimates had been made by the department, he asked the House to vote $170,000 for the construction of these works, and the House took him at his word, and voted the money. Now, as a matter of fact, at the end of 1893 we found ourselves billed for accounts in connection with the work, toting up the respectable sum of about $500,000, of which about $400,000 have been paid, in actual figures, $394,000. The mere recital of the facts on their face is startling, and calls for the earnest attention of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. The of the case being conceded, a large number of references which otherwise would have to be made, are become unnecessary—that huge frauds were perpetrated upon the Government. I have before me the speech which the hon, gentleman delivered last session, in which, among other things, he says:

The whole business seems to have been one of fraud and collusion.

And, further on, he says:

So far as the department is concerned, there was nothing in the information as to the material furnished on the works, to lead the department to believe that the amount to be expended in the construction of the work would reach such an alarming sum, for I say that this amount of $394,-600 is an alarming sum, and I have no hesitation in saying that a large portion of that money is money fraudulently obtained by parties employed in the construction of the work.

So that we stand here to-day at the thresh-hold of this inquiry, with the official statement made by the Minister that in a contract of $175,000 to be carried out in the construction of two small bridges over the Lachine Canal, within telephonic communication with the department at Ottawa, and within a hundred miles or so of the capital, $394,000 have been actually paid, of which the greater part, as the Minister says, has been stolen, or fraudulently obtained from the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think "the greater part" are the words.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, I think the hon, gentleman has a right to have it accurate, and if I have in any way misrepresented the language used, I will correct it. The language is:

I have no hesitation in saying that a large portion of that money is money fraudulently obtained by parties employed in the construction of the work

And, previously he had said, "the whole business seems to have been one of fraud Now, that being the case, and collusion." I say we have a right to look to see, not only who were the parties who committed these frauds, but how far the Government were responsible; and if we find that the Government are directly responsible by having opened the door and permitted the frauds to be committed by their negligent conduct, then they have a right to be severely censured. Now, let us see, shortly, what the nature of the work was, because we have to eliminate from the discussion the whole cost of constructing the superstructures. There is no dispute about the construction of the steel superstructures, the whole cost, and the whole fraud has arisen out of the construction of the substructures. These were originally estimated to cost $82,000, and by the additional structures. depth which the department afterwards determined to make the substructures of the abuse of a power which they really have bridges that was increased by an estimate of $40.000, making $122,000. Well, Sir, the excess in the accounts rendered over what was estimated, was $312,000; and on the whole work, as I said, including the superstructures, there have been paid $394,000, of which $60,000 was for the superstructures, which I do not intend to go into very much. So here we have $334,000 paid on a small work which was estimated to cost $122,000. Now, we know very well that these estimates were very liberal. We had the opinion of Mr. Hannaford, a gentleman connected with the Grand Trunk Railway, who said that on the 24th September, he and his officials on the Grand Trunk Railway had made careful estimates upon this matter, and they estimated that the cost of the construction of the Grand Trunk Railway substructure, would be about $35.-000 to the contractor, and he went on to say that if he had the contract at $55,000. he would expect to make $10,000 out of it.

Well, now we come to the straight question: How was the work carried out, and how far was the Government responsible? Now, Mr. Speaker, right at the threshold, say that $170,000 wasconstruct a public work of this kind, and that the Government has paid $394,000; and the first inquiry is. What authority had they to pay the money? The House did not vote the money. Where did they get the authority? I say they acted unconstitutionally, and illegally. What has been the law with respect to the construction of all these public works by contract? The Act lays down explicitly that these public contracts shall be given after tenders have been called for, public tenders invited by the Minister, and that except in cases of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest, these tenders have to be called. Now, we find the hon. gentleman, in the beginning of the construction of this work, deliberately ignoring the policy which Parliament has laid down for his guidance. He was bound to call for public tenders for the construction of that work, unless he did violence to the policy of the Government, as embodied in the several Acts of Parliament we have. The Acts of Parliament went on further to declare that not only should public tenders be called for, but in order that the public interest might be sufficiently safeguarded, the lowest tender could only be passed by on the authority of the Governor in Council, being obtained to pass it by, on good grounds shown. expenditure is authorized by law unless that expenditure has been sanctioned by Parliament, except in one case, and that is a case which has been flagrantly abused by the present Government, not only in this contract, but in others. I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, because it is owing to persistent and flagrant not, and which they claim, that they have bear. Hon. gentlemen who wished to give law has laid down explicitly:

programa and a second to a support manual part of a support manual manual manual manual support of a support manual support manual manu

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure, unforeseen or provided for by Parliament, is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then, upon report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Min-ister having charge of the service in question, that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may issue his special warrant.

Well, Sir, there is no man who would be bold enough to stand up here and declare that the facts of this case come within the purview of that provision. The Governor General's warrant in this case was issued. I say, illegally. The circumstances which could justify its issue, did not exist. There was a parliamentary grant given. That parliamentary grant was given after careful estimates had been prepared by the officers of the Railway Department, after those estimates had been endorsed by the Minister, after the Minister had laid them before this House, after he had obtained the sanction of the House to his request, and the specific sum of $170,000 was voted for the specific purpose of buildthese two bridges, or rebuilding them, because they were there before. So that the department started by acting in a most unconstitutional and improper manner, thereby aiding so far as they could the wrong-doing and the misappropriation of public money. This matter has been brought before the House time and time again by the Opposition, and we have time and again pointed out that the Government improperly made use of Governor General's warrants to obtain money which they dare not ask Parliament for, and hon, gentlemen know well that if they had followed the law and come to Parliament and asked for this money they never would have obtained the sum they demanded.

But having violated the law in espect, what did they do next do next? respect. charge the department that they violated the law, the policy of the law, in undertaking to do the work in the way they did. They were bound by law to call for tenders. They were to build two little bridges, each about 235 feet long. One would suppose that this was not a work to tax the engineering ability of the officials of the department, and as a matter of fact we have the statement made that previous to the work being given out most careful estimates had been made as to its cost. The moment the Minister dispensed with the calling of tenders and began the work by days' work, that moment he began to open the door through which fraud could be perpetrated. Political influence then began to be brought to we find?

been enabled to squander public money, employment to political friends and who from time to time, in these contracts. The found they could not give this employment if tenders were called, found the door opened wide by the Minister himself by which they could pass through as many political proteges and friends as they liked, not tens or dozens, but hundreds of the political friends of hon, gentlemen opposite could be employed under this system of days' labour to an almost unlimited extent. As a matter of fact we have evidence, not disputed but admitted on all sides that this result did follow, that no sooner was the law violated, no sooner were tenders dispensed with, and the work begun to be carried out by days' labour than hundreds of men were employed who otherwise would not have been employed. and the public treasury was wronged to that extent. We have the facts embodied in the commission's report, and we have the reasons there given why the Government undertook to build this structure by days' work, and they are the most silly and futile reasons to which I ever listened. The statement was made by the chief superintendent of the canal, and the statement which the department adopted to show that it was better to build the structure by days' work, was, to use the chief superintendent's own language, "owing to the uncertainty of the mode of execution which circumstances will command." For my part I fail to understand what the meaning of that sentence is: but that is the reason given for departing from the law and building the work by days' labour, instead of by tender, as the Government is bound by law to do. reading from the third page of the commissioners' report, where there is this quotation from Mr. Parent's advice to the Government. I compared it with the document itself, and I found it a literal transcript. There was no uncertainty as to the mode of execution. The hon, gentleman stated deliberately and plainly mode of the execution. was well understood. This was not a large work; two substructures were to be built, on which steel bridges were to be placed; the work was clearly and well understood, and the most accurate estimates were made before the Government came to Parliament and asked any vote whatever for the work.

What was the next step taken by the Government? The next step was that, instead of hiring the men themselves on days' labour and keeping some check over them, they gave a private to a tract labour contractor ply labour. If the door was not sufficiently wide open to permit fraud to be perpetrated before, the Government were determined to open it wide enough this time, and so on 10th January, Mr. Parent advised the department that the system of employing a contractor to supply labour was adopted, and the department at once accepted and adopted the suggestion. What do As a matter of fact, instead of public tenders being called for they obtained names private tenders from three or four parties House stands in this position to-day, that and at that very time Mr. Kennedy, their we do not know whether there was more superintendent, had written a letter in which than one bona fide tender or not. I have he declared, that it was an outrageous thing, in my hands the report of the hon. gentle-that he could obtain any quantity of labour in my hands the report of the hon, gentle-that he could obtain any quantity of labour man's own commissioners on that point who in the city of Montreal at that time of the after hearing the evidence, which I will not weary the House by repeating, came were paying, and he waxed very pathetic to the conclusion that "There is considerable about the conduct of the Government in that fide; the competition may not have been case the commissioners say: genuine, and in reality there may have been only one tender." No one can read the evithere was only one tender, and that it was intended from the first that there should be only one tender. Government, out and out, but there is considerable say that from the evidence as to whether to give all the labour to a contractor and evidence, and I found it to be correct. I beg that by private tender. The hon. Minister, the indulgence of the House to read from the I believe, intimated that he did not know all about it; but I say in this matter at all events the Minister is as responsible as his deputy or anybody else, and any one who turns up the hon, gentleman's speech deli do n livered on 18th July last year, will find that leged. he admitted explicitly, without any reservation, that he had full knowledge of all the facts. The hon, gentleman felt there was something wrong about the transaction. He stated himself that he hesitated some time before he came to the conclusion that in the public interest a contract should be let in that way, but after proper pressure had been brought to bear he decided to do so, and it was done by his advice, and he therefore must be held responsible by the House and by the country. And what was the first step taken? They did not plunge into this thing, they approached it gradually; first only skilled labour was to be supplied by the contractor, not common labour. But no sooner had they made one breach of the law, no sooner had they overcome and violated the law than they extended the contract to cover not only skilled labour but also ordinary labour, and as I shall show, that extension is one of the main causes through which enormous frauds were perpetrated, and this extension was made after the Minister had positive and direct knowledge that the work was being carried on in a fraudulent manner. I give the House the dates. On 14th March, as I shall show afterwards, full knowledge had been brought home to the department of the disgraceful manner in which that work was being carried on, and the fact that the Government were being robbed by an enormous number of fictitious found it to be correct.

The large excess of cost above the estimate is dence without coming to the conclusion that partly due to the labour contract. The contractor obtained his labour for night and overtime at about the same rate as day prices.

The commissioner put We find by their own report that the excess this in very diplomatic language; they will which we complain of was caused chiefly by condemn their own employers, the this labour contract. Let us see what the rethey sult on that point has been. Hon. gentledoubt men will remember that there was a prosecuin tion begun against Mr. St. Louis in the city reality there was more than one tender. So of Montreal for obtaining $175,000 under that not only did the Minister dispense with false pretenses. The judge who heard the tenders, not only did he determine to do evidence, made a summary of the facts the work by days' work, but he determined which I have carefully compared with the judge's remarks. He says:

> As stated above, I believe, after studying this record, that there have been frauds committed to the detriment of the Federal Government, but I do not think that they were as large as al-Mr. St. Louis' contract was extremely favourable to him. He was allowed $4 a day for a foreman stonecutter, day time, and $6 a day for the same foreman for night or overtime; $8 for the same foreman on Sundays, and at the rate of $12 for the same foreman for Sunday overtime. He was allowed $5 a day for a double team, and $10 a day for the same double team on Sundays. He was allowed $2.50 a day for the use of a derrick, day time, $3.75 for the use of the same derrick, night or overtime, and at the rate of $7.50 a day for the same derrick for Sunday overtime, and so forth on the same scale for stonemasons, stone-It is no wonder setters and skilled labourers. that Mr. St. Louis' bills must have been tremendous, when it is remembered that the job lasted about four months and that there were at times as many as two thousand men at work in the day time and one thousand five hundred men at work at night time. The men were paid alternately every week. Mr. Michaud tells us that some of the pays amounted to $34,000, some $10,000, some $15,000, and some $20,000. In my In my opinion, the main causes of all the trouble in this matter are:

1. The exorbitant prices stipulated for labour in

Mr. St. Louis' contract; and,2. The almost unlimited number of men allowed on the said work, so numerous that they were in one another's way, and Mr. St. Louis cannot be held criminally responsible for these causes.

Now, that statement of fact is an abstract of the evidence simply. It is not the judge's opinion. It is merely an abstract of the evidence, and I have carefully compared the evidence with the judge's statement, and I

House is: Was that wrongful contract made by some subordinate in the department for whom the Minister could hardly be held personally responsible, or, was it made by the Minister nimself? The hon, the Minister felt that it was wrong. As he said himself, in his speech last session, he objected to it for a long time. He called his deputy and talked it over with him; he called Mr. St. Louis and talked it over with him, and then not only did the Minister agree to the contract, but he agreed to it after full reflection and after full discussion. Therefore, he must be held to be personally responsible. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do we then find? Who is this man to whom the Government gave the contract? The evidence has proved conclusively that he is a very strong partisan of the present Government, and has been accustomed for years to contribute to their election expenses. This man, as it appears, destroyed his books, because, as he swears himself, if he had produced the books, they would have shown how much money he has contributed from time to time towards the election expenses of gentlemen supporting the Government. During the very time this contract was under way, and when he was receiving these extravagant sums for labour he was supplying, he (St. Louis) swears that he contributed an amount which he won't mention, but which his books would have shown had they been produced, towards an election contest in Vaudreuil.

did Now, the Government what next? They had a gentleman in connection with that work, who was conwith it from its inception, whose name was Desbarats. Mr. Desbarats, as the report shows, was sent to Montreal in September, 1892, to examine the site of the bridges. The first plan was prepared by Mr. Desbarats under Mr. Trudeau, late Deputy Minister, and the second and third plans were prepared in Montreal by Mr. Desbarats and Mr. Parent. Mr. Desbarats remained in Montreal from November till the 1st of March. Mr. Desbarats was dis-missed, and why? There was no living public official in a position so thoroughly to understand those works as Mr. Desbarats. He had prepared the original plans, he had prepared the extensions, he was in a position to check them, but Mr. Desbarats had done that which was an unpardonable sin; he had interfered with the politicians who were connected with the construction of this bridge. We had here a Mr. Kennedy, a political supporter of the Government, a protege and friend of the Solicitor General, a gentleman who was appointed to his position as superintendent of the canal at the instance of the Solicitor General and Mr. Ogilvie, and a Senator whose name I forget.

An hon. MEMBER. Senator Drummond.

what I want to ask the ran had Kennedy appointed to the position. Mr. Kennedy thought he was going to have a free-hand, to run matters as he liked, to spend what he liked, and to distribute the ill-gotten gains which were to come out of that bridge as be liked; and Mr. Desbarats, as I say, committed the unpardonable sin of attempting to keep a check upon Mr. Kennedy. What are the facts? We find in the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee that on the 4th February. 1893. Mr. Kennedy, superintendent of the canal, writes a letter to the chief engineer, warning him that he (Keunedy) is in no way to be interfered with, warning him that Desbarats, the local engineer in charge. had been keeping the time of the men, and going to the time-keepers to get the time so that he might compare it with his own time and see if it was correct. And Mr. Kennedy wanted no check kept apon the time. He was going to be the absolute and uncontrolled ruler, or, as he termed it himself, "boss of that job." In this letter, which he writes on this date to the chief engineer, he said:

> I will also call your attention to the fact that the resident engineer, Mr. Desbarats, solicits his information personally from foremen or others appointed by me, in their different capacities. here now inform you, that from this date, when he requires any information, or has any orders to give or issue, they will have to be given or come direct through me, who have up to the present mapped out the programme of the work. Furthermore, I will issue orders to my men that any information or any orders received, save through me directly, will mean instant dismissal.

> Now, we must remember, in that connection, that the only check which the Government had at all upon the time of the men which was being kept in connection with this work up to that date, was the check by Mr. Des-No sooner had Mr. Desbarats himself. barats made himself objectionable to the political superintendent of the work, than within two days afterwards he received department. his dismissal from the On the 6th of February, two days following the attempt made to check the men employed, Mr. Schreiber writes to Mr. Parent a letter intimating that the subject of the payrolls has been under consideration; that the Minister has given no authority for Mr. Desbarats' salary to be increased from $105 to $150, and that he is to be dismissed. Parent writes back, protesting in the most vigorous language against Desbarats' dismissal, and pointing out reasons why he should not be dismissed. But he receives scant courtesy at the hads of the department, and Mr. Desbarats' dismissal, which was intimated on the 6th, is authoritatively announced on the 14th, and at the end of the month he leaves the work. From the date he attempted to keep a check, he was ordered off the works by Superinterdent Kennedy; and from the date the department endorsed Ken-that date Desbarats continued to perform Wellington Street bridge; but on the 24th his duties perfunctorily. Of course, he interfered no more. He was rapped over the knuckles by his superior officer, and he left! the work much against the protests of the resident engineer, Mr. Parent, whose letter will be found on page 206 of the report. He said:

I consider Mr. Desbarats' services should be retained until the work has been completed, for the following reasons:

When the question of building the new bridges was under consideration, the ex-deputy minister and chief engineer, desirous of having the plans studied under his own supervision, entrusted Mr. Desbarats with the working of those plans. Various methods were suggested and discussed between the chief engineer and myself, with Mr. Desbarats assisting. Finally the present plan was adopted as the best suited to meet the requirements.

So that Mr. Desbarats, being thoroughly posted on the details of these plans, this circumstance makes of him a most valuable assistant.

Do not lose sight, that we are at present labouring under great difficulties to accomplish the task imposed upon us.

The question of extra cost, as regards the office: boy alluded to in your letter, can be done away with, if so desired, as the office can be looked after by the bridge-master, who is close by.

Sir, the prudence and care with which the department looked after the officials down there can be judged by the fact that they objected to the pay of a small office boythey stopped up the spigot and opened the On the 13th of February, Schreiber writes to Mr. Parent in reply, stating that his arguments had no weight, and that Mr. Desbarats was to remain no longer.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir Will you read that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes:

Ottawa, 13th February, 1893.

Dear Sir,-I have your letter of the 7th instant with reference to the staff pay-list in connection with the Wellington Street bridge for January, and covering a copy of a letter signed by the late chief engineer of canals, placing Mr. Desbarats in charge of the construction of the new Wellington Street bridge, at a salary of $150 during the execution of the work.

The department does not take the same view of this matter as you do, and I quite agree that one engineer can readily attend to the giving of the lines and levels at the bridges in Montreal, and look after the Lachine drain matters, and one only can be kept, and that is Mr. Papineau.

> Yours truly, COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER, Chief Engineer.

Mr. Desbarats was then and there dismissed absolutely, and he left on the last day of February; so that however narrow the opening for fraud may have been before, it was then opened wide. Nobody was left to maintain any check whatever. Well, what took place next? The contract so far made with Mr. St. Louis had been confined to the very expensive manner.

of February that contract was extended by the department to the Grand Trunk bridge; and on page 8 of their report, the commissioners say:

On the Grand Trunk bridge there has been every opportunity given whereby the contractor for labour, or any of his employees, if so inclined, could defraud the Government by fictitious paylists and accounts.

That is not my statement or my deduction from the evidence; it is a statement from the deliberately formed judgment of the gentlemen whom the hon, gentleman himself appointed to investigate this matter. Mr. St. Louis had first the contract to provide the labour for the Wellington Street bridge. That contract was afterwards extended to the Grand Trunk bridge; and subsequent to that extension, the contract, which heretofore had been for skilled labour, was made to cover common labour as well; so that Mr. St. Louis had the contract to supply both skilled and common labour for both bridges. That brings us down to the 1st of March. Mr. Desbarats has been dismissed; the door has been widely opened for the commission of fraud; and not more than one week afterwards we find 1,300 men employed by Mr. St. Louis in tumbling over one another. The "Star," of Montreal, published an article calling the attention of the department to this outrage. It pointed out that the works were being built in a lavish and extravagant manner, that 1,300 men were being employed, and that it was a matter which the Government should look into at once. What happened? The Minister and the deputy had a consultation, the result of which was that Mr. Douglas, an employee of the Department of Railways, was sent down.

Mr. HAGGART. Did the "Star" say that the work was being carried on in a lavish and extravigant manner, and that the Minister should inquire into the facts at once?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The "Star" said that it was carried on in a lavish and extravagant manner-

Mr. HAGGART. Have you the "Star"?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; I have an ex-The Minister himself says in his statement either that he called the deputy's attention to the Montreal "Star's" article, or that the deputy called his attention to it. In either event his attention was called to the facts, and he sent Mr. Douglas down. On the 10th of March, two days afterwards, Mr. Douglas reports, confirming in a general way, without going into details, the statements made by the "Star." Hon. gentlemen will find his report at page 132 of the blue-book. He states:

The number of men employed upon the work is very great, and the work is being done in a So that on the 10th of March, Mr. Douglas confirmed the "Star's" report, and gave the Minister absolute knowledge of what was taking place, and the hon. gentleman telegraphed down to Mr. Parent to bring up pay-rolls-Why? Why, he had the wrong being noticed then that was done and very properly wanted to see the pay-rolls. What took place? Parent came up without the pay-rolls and informed the Minister that he could not get them. He said that he could not get the time from Kennedy or the pay-rolls from St. Louis. The Minister should therefore have been doubly on the alert, when his chief engineer came here, after a charge of that kind had been made by the newspapers and affirmed by the special officer he sent down to examine. When he knew that unbounded extravagance was going on, it was his duty to stop payment at once if he could not get the pay-rolls. But not a thing was done. Mr. Douglas was sent for by the Deputy Minister. Mr. Douglas was told that Mr. Parent said that the "Star" article was exaggerated, but he orally confirmed the report that the work was being carried on in a very expensive manner and that large numbers of men were employed who were not on the work. On page 134, you will see that Mr. Schreiber gave evidence in answer to questions put by one of the Government themselves, to which I will take this opportunity of calling the attention of the House:

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper asked the question: Did you, or did you not, consider that it would be in the interests of the department and the public for you to go down and settle this question between Mr. Parent and Mr. Douglas relating to the excessive number of men employed?—A. I thought Mr. Parent would reduce it to the proper proportions.

Q. You relied on Mr. Parent ?-A. I did rely upon him, certainly.

Q. What is the relative position of Mr. Parent and Mr. Douglas in the department?—A. Mr. Douglas has nothing whatever in the world to do with these works.

Q. Was he not instructed to make this special inquiry?—A. I only asked him to look things and let me know.

Q. Because you had seen an alarming rumour?

-A. Exactly.

Q. And having done that, you paid no more attention to his statements, after you had got the visit from the local superintendent? That is your position ?-A. No. the understanding was, when Mr. Parent was up here, that he would see that there were not more men employed than were required.

Q. You are three hours away from those works; you have telephonic communication with them you see an alarming report; you send a special officer. What is his work? Is he a man of Is he a man of ability, equal to Mr. Parent as an engineer ?—A. Oh, as an engineer, I don't know that he has had control of works, but for scientific work he is decidedly his superior.

Q. What is his position in your department?—A. He is bridge engineer. He makes the calculations of the strains of bridges to see whether the bridges on the various railways are up to the requirements of the Government specifications.

Q. He was one of the commissioners appointed by the Government to inquire into this whole subject ?-A. He was.

Q. You sent him down to make an investigation ?-A. He did not go down for that purpose.

He had been down before.

Q. He was plainly instructed for this purpose, was he not ?—A. Yes.

Q. My difficulty is this: you sent him and got an official report from him. You find there is a contradiction between these two men, Mr. Douglas and Mr. Parent. You say you did not consider it your duty, when he was contradicted, to examine into this work, which was done by your-self personally?—A. I did not go down directly, but Mr. Parent was up here and saw me.

Q. When did you first get the pay-rolls which would throw some light on the question ?-- A. We will see later on in the correspondence.

Q. Have you any idea of the number of men ?-A. No, I could not tell.

Q. Did you ever attempt to consider or find out ?—A. I asked for the pay-rolls several times.

Q. But, when your officers were in dispute, did you take any means to settle what would be the proper number and what was the actual number? -A. No, I should say not.

There we have a statement of what was done, and we have pretty well too the opinion given by the head of another department as to what ought to have been done. There was gross negligence on the part of the Minister of the department and his deputy—a negligence which cannot be defended. As a matter of fact, the Minister knew all about this. He says himself he knew all about it. Mr. Schreiber swears that he was in constant communication with the Minister at the time. Everything done or omitted to be done was done or omitted to be done with the knowledge and consent of the Minister himself. At the very time that this "Star" article appeared, we find a letter written by Mr. Kennedy to the Solicitor General upon this subject, which will be found on page 140 of the report. Mr. Kennedy was very much troubled about the extravagance that was going on and the scandalous manner in which the work was being conducted, and he wrote to the Solicitor General as follows:

I beg leave to acquaint you of the scandalous manner how certain things are being conducted on the Lachine Canal, in reference to the construction of works in connection with the new Wellington and Grand Trunk Railway bridges, as well as the renewal of the masonry of old Lock No. 1.

Then he speaks about Mr. St. Louis' tender. and proceeds to say:

Now, I can get all the above by the thousands at an average day's pay, without any discontent; we have also supplied ourselves with the necessary derricks capable of running the work of construction of Wellington bridge; they now want to turn all those engaged on to their list. which would increase the cost of the work 75 Imagine their trying to place pick and per cent. shovel labourers, whom I employ for $1.25 per day, at $1.87½ on his (E. St. Louis') list.

As you are, no doubt, aware, I am, and have been, working night and day, to push the work forward, and it will be too bad, when completed, to have the press crying out against the department and Government, the enormous amount of money this bridge has cost. If the hon, the Minister of Railways and Canals is cognizant of these facts, and endorses them, why, I shall accept in humble silence.

Mr. Davies (P.E.I.)

Well, the Minister was cognizant because the Solicitor General, immediately after he: got this letter, waited upon the Minister and informed him of Kennedy's statement, as I

Mr. HAGGART. Where is there any evidence of that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let me finish the sentence—as I gather from the Solicitor because Mr. Solicitor General's reply, General writes the following day in reply to that same letter:

My dear Kennedy,-I have seen the Minister of Railways and Canals, and found that all has been tendered for, including labour for the carrying out of the work of the bridge.

Mr. CURRAN. Read on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is nothing more on this point. I will give the hon. gentleman the page and need not lengthen

Mr. CURRAN. It is a very short letter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman is anxious that I should read it. I certainly shall. The point I referred to was that Mr. Solicitor General received a letter from Kennedy, the superintendent of the canal, pointing out the outrageous character of his contract and the discontent sure to arise if the work was carried on in the same He pointed out that it was being conducted in a scandalous manner, and the Solicitor General, on the very day he received the letter, went to see the Minister of Railways and Canals, and wrote the next day to Mr. Kennedy that he had seen the Minister. The remainder of the letter reads as follows:

As superintendent of the canal, you will, of course, have to certify to the accounts, and it will then become your duty to see that nothing is certified to that is not, in your judgment, absolutely correct. In the event of disagreement with any of the contractors as to the classification of work or the prices to be paid for it, you will, of course, have the matter referred at once to the Minister at Ottawa, so that you may not be held responsible in the future for the application of any false principle in connection with the nature of the work done. A question may arise as to what is skilled labour, and here you may have some conflict with the contractor; but your plan is to refer the matter to the department and guided by their decision, in which case you will not be responsible.

Mr. CURRAN. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman sees that while the Minister of Railways denied that he had knowledge of the facts contained in Kennedy's letter, we have the letter of the Solicitor General saying that from page 151 of the evidence:

he had seen the Minister, and it is inconceivable that the Solicitor General could have written that reply unless he shown Kennedy's letter to the Minister.

Mr. CURRAN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I would explain that I got that letter and came to Ottawa with it, but when I found that the contract had been extended, I thought the letter was too strong and that it would injure Mr. Kennedy if I were to read it to the Minister. I got the information from the Minister that the contract had been extended, and I wrote to Kennedy to be careful how he carried out the work and not to certify to anything that was not absolutely correct, but I did not read Kennedy's letter to the Minister.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon, gentleman deny that he went to see the Minister after he got Kennedy's letter.

Mr. CURRAN. Not at all, I have just said that I did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was all I was trying to prove, so that there was no occasion for the interruption. What will the my speech by reading the rest of the letter. House think when I tell them that the day after Kennedy wrote that letter, St. Louis and Emard came to Ottawa to settle this matter with the Minister; and as a matter of fact, on that very day, the 13th March, the contract with St. Louis was actually extended to ordinary labour. It was not until the 13th March—the day after Kennedy wrote that letter-that they extended St. Louis' contract from skilled labour to ordinary labour, and that was the cause of all the trouble. That was the thing which enabled these men to perpetrate this fraud. That threw the door wide open to fraud, and we have the letter from the Solicitor General to Kennedy telling Kennedy be careful how he certified and to throw all the blame upon the department. I believe it came out in evidence that Mr. Emard is a gentleman who had more than ordinary influence with the Government of the day. Nobody would imagine that such a contract as Mr. St. Louis had could possibly be extended from skilled to ordinary labour unless special influence was brought to bear. It was sworn that Mr. Emard was in close relationship with the Minister of Public Works-a partner, I believe-and therefore a gentleman who naturally would have a great deal of influence with the Government.

> Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to hurry on. On the 25th April, the department began to be somewhat startled at the enormous sums which they were being called upon to pay for the construction of these works. was written on that date-and I ask the attention of the House particularly to that fact -by Mr. Schreiber, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, to the Minister.

Dear Mr. Haggart,-As I mentioned to you, I was not a little startled upon receiving from Mr. Parent the pay-rolls and accounts for the month Wellington of March in connection with the Street bridges, which summed up to an enormous I at once despatched Mr. R. C. Douglas off to Montreal to look into the matter and ferret out all the information he could, and report to me the position of matters. The information he gives me is as follows :-

gan to the state of the state o

December,	January	and	February	pay-rolls, &c.					$ 79,000
March
April					110,000
Contracts 1

$382,000 Less materials, &c., to be credited to this work and to be debited to other appropriations, say and this he considers is the minimum figure that the work is likely to cost.

22,000

He goes on to point out that the excessive expenditure requires some explanation and says:

We must look for other reasons to account for the enormous expenditure over and above the estimate.

The department was now—on the 25th April -thoroughly aroused to the fact that a huge fraud was being perpetrated upon themand it is to the date that I wish particularly to call the attention of the House. On the 10th May, Mr. Schreiber makes formal report, calling the attention of the Minister to the letter of 25th April, and stating that since that date:

The investigations, then in progress, have been centinued by Mr. R. C. Douglas, and the information he has gathered leads him to believe that the cost of the work will be in excess of that amount, which is a most unsatisfactory state of things, calling for the closest investigation. Another rather startling state of affairs has come to light in connection with the Lachine Canal. I stated in my report to you above referred to-

He winds up by saying:

Everything in connection with the Lachine Canal is on an extravagant basis, if nothing more. I see no reason to change my views, and I suggest that some person or persons be appointed to thoroughly investigate all matters in connection with the expenditure during the last year.

Now, Sir, that startling state of affairs, as I have shown, was first called to the attention of the Minister of the 25th April. On the 10th May, his attention was formally called to it by his deputy, and a commission was recommended to issue. And a commission did issue; I believe the Order in Council was passed on the 17th May. Now, Speaker, what does that commission find? I do not wish to weary the House with any long extracts from the report, but I will give just two or three to show what the state of matters was at that time. With reference to the timber and lumber, the report states, page 10:

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. Henderson's tender was accepted on the 7th December, 1892. There has been charged for timber and lumber, at the contract prices, the amount of $30,914.50, and other timber and lumber, not at contract prices, to an amount of $29,-103.21, or a total of $60,017.71. Timber and lum-Timber and lumber to this amount have been certified to by the cullers and by Messrs. Parent and Kennedy. The large amount of $45,992.46 has been purchased without calling for tenders and without arrangement or written requisition of either Mr. Parent or Mr. Kennedy.

The second secon

By calculations made from the evidence and plans we estimate there could have been used of all kinds of timber and lumber about 2,594,800 feet, b.m. The total quantity charged to the bridges is about 3.613,600 feet. b.m., which leaves a shortage of some 1,018,800 feet, b.m. We cannot ascertain where this quantity of timber and lumber was used; it is probable some of it never reached the works.

From the evidence, it appears that a certain quantity of new timber was broken up and taken away by workmen, or burnt to keep themselves warm; also carted away or stolen.

With reference to the stone-cutting they reported:

The estimated cost of the stone-cutting, solely in cutters' hours for the bridges and Lock No. 1, taking the ordinary rate paid for piece-work, face measurement, would be about $6,000; the amounts rendered for wages, in cutters' hours, amounted to $39,896.04. * * * If we take double the rate, by piece-work, viz., $12,000, as an equivalent for men working by the day for the Government, and other circumstances, it still leaves an excess of cost of some-

$28,000—it is $18,000 here, but that is a clerical error-

-which cannot be accounted for, which sum would be increased by the profit to the labour contractor.

Upon the Wellington Street bridge, by the hours charged for stone-cutting at the rate of wages paid by the contractor, the cost of stone-cutting is $12,-516; the amount charged to the Government, including contractor's profit, is $16,715. by piece-work would be some $3,000. The cost

The Grand Trunk and Lock No. 1 being mixed in time-keeping, are taken together, and the cost, at the rate of wages paid by the contractor, is $17,548. The amount charged the Government, including contractor's profit, is $23,180. The cost by piece-work would be some $3,000.

Taking the entire labour account, the Wellington bridge cost $3.80 per cubic yard, and the Grand Trunk $8.50 per cubic yard, by comparing the entire number of yards on each bridge of work built and excavation removed.

Then again on page 15, we find $200,000 given as the amount the Government has been practically robbed of through the excessive cost of the works beyond what they should have cost even making allowance for the work done at that time of year and for the Government-and I must say that their allowances are extremely liberal. Then the report goes on, page 16:

The Wellington bridge structure should have cost $144,000. The pay-lists for labour alone without taking into account materials and supplies, plant and false works, amount to $151,645.

Grand Trunk bridge substructure should have cost $56,000. The pay-list for labour alone without taking into account materials, supplies, plant and false works, amounts to $139,622.

Now. Sir, they wind up their report with a summary of their findings from which. with the indulgence of the House, I will give an extract or two:

An excessive quantity of materials and supplies was purchased. The plant was unnecessarily expensive and extensive. The temporary works, or false works, were too costly, even considering the method adopted in construction, which ap-1-ears more expensive than might have been other methods of execution. The temporary works. &c.. were on a scale for works ten times the magnitude of this.

Every effort appears to have been made to consume and utilize as much timber and lumber as possible, so as not to interfere with its being continually dumped on the canal bank.

The labour force, carters, &c., was unnecessarily large and not fully occupied.
On the Grand Trunk bridge there was a large expenditure in cartage charged to the works, hauling timber and lumber long distances to the private yards of those connected with the works and others, even men paid by the Government were sent to unload and pile the stuff.

Carters and men were hidden, so that the number unoccupied would not be too conspicuous. Forty or fifty men, doing nothing in a lumber yard, their time taken by a time-keeper in the were sent with carts for lumber which should have been loaded and hauled by the con-An unnecessary night force seems to have been employed, to obtain the increased profit over day work.

There was a wholesale classification of skilled labour, whereby the most common and cheapest class of labour was charged as skilled. These are some of the reasons for the excessive cost of Other reasons may be adduced which are not so fully supported by evidence. In the time-keeping, the sheets of unbroken days of the pay-lists excite surprise. For this condition of affairs and the results now known the Department of Railways and Canals holds the local officers responsible, as occurring under their supervision, recommendations and reports. the other hand, the local officers hold the department equally responsible.

Now, this House will have to determine whether the department has not to share with the local officers in this responsibility. There is no doubt at this time of day as to the truthfulness of the report of these commissioners made on the one point of the stuffing of the pay-lists, and the hundred and thousands of men who were returned as employed but were not employed at all. We have the evidence since which was given before the Public Accounts Com-mittee, and in the investigation before the on page 459, and we have the evidence of are Frigon, on page 307; and on these two points the facts are put beyond doubt. I self admits, in his speech need not take up the time of the House year, and about which there can be no with reading the evidence, but it is amus- possibility of doubt, were stuffed, and were ing to look at the returns made by Doheny of the number of men which he checked as being employed on the works, and the number of men which St. Louis claimed for in his pay-lists. You will find them vary-Where he reports forty-eight, a charge will be made for 108; where he reports none, a charge will be made for sixtythree; where he reports eight, a charge will be made for sixteen. &c. The same evidence was given by Doheny, but I need not trouble the House by reading that. Frigon's evidence you will find tabulated on page 307, but you will have to go through the evidence for half an hour to get what is there tabulated. When I speak of Doheny's evidence as being found at page 459, I also speak of it as being tabulated on that page. On this point, I will read the conclusion of the Minister himself, from Hansard of 1894:

I obtained information that the Government had been defrauded in the pay-rolls-that numbers of men who had no existence, were put upon the pay-rolls; that 50 or 69 men, or perhaps double the number actually at work, were returned on the pay-rolls by Mr. St. Louis, when, in fact, Mr. Doheny stated the number actually employed was far less than the number he returned, and it was only in the Public Accounts Committee the other day that I was able to get from Mr. Frigon's evidence, that the return made by the contractor to the Government for the horses and carts employed on the work was far in excess of the quantity and time actually employed on the work.

So that there cannot be the shadow of a doubt as to the facts reported upon by the commissioners themselves in reference to the labour, and the timber, and masonry; nor can there be the shadow of a doubt as to the fact of the returns having been stuffed, and that hundreds and hundreds of men have been charged for that never worked there at all. But if that is so, there can be no doubt where the responsibility should rest. The question I am now asking is, how far the Ministry are responsible for the money they have lost.

Now, I ask the House whether the Department of Railways, having the means of knowledge clearly placed before them of the existence of these frauds, acted in a way to conserve and preserve the public interests? What did they do? If you turn to page 451 of the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee, you will see a tabulated statement showing the dates when the pay-lists were returned to the Government, and the dates they were certified by the chief engineer. The March pay-rolls were certified on 24th April, and 28th April. The April pay-rolls were certified on 24th August. But I am concerned chiefly with the pay-rolls for March, the We have the evidence of Doheny, fraudulent pay-rolls—the pay-rolls which now admitted to he fraudulent -the pay-rolls which the Minister himmade false, and were fraudulent. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Minister authorized the payment of these pay-rolls at a date when there can be no possibility of doubt that he had the means of knowledge that they were fraudu-On the 24th April, a cheque issued for $74.777 in payment of the March pay-Well. Sir, as a matter of fact, that is the very day. I believe, before Mr. Schreiber had reported to the Minister that the thing was being carried on in this disgraceful way, and that an investigation must be This cheque for $74,777 was issued on the 24th April, and I charge the evidence is beyond peradventure that the department were at that time in full possession of information given to them by Mr. Douglas, their special appointee. He had made an investigation, he had reported from time to time, and the situation was so very grave and so very serious that the Deputy Minister was calling the attention of the gentleman got to that? Some days afterwards, on the 29th April, five days after the letter was written, they issue another just two days before the Minister applied for the royal commission was issued. and I think two days before Mr. Schreiber's official letter was written. demanding the appointment of a commission, they paid out $8.393. Well, what posshould this amount, figuring up about $90.-000 odd, have been paid to this man? The Government were then thoroughly apprised of the fact that wrong had been done there, that frauds had been perpetrated. that they would have to appoint a commission to ascertain their extent, and who was responsible for them: and I say it was indefensible in the Minister, at that time, to have authorized and sanctioned the payment of this money.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman would be astonished to learn that the Min-

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman, of course, is entitled to his explanation, and I suppose he will give it. I am calling his attention to the fact that on pages 451. 452, and 454, are the identical cheques with the dates and amounts, which were issued by his department in payment of these pay-rolls. I call his attention to the fact that on the 25th April, he had been notified by his deputy-

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman must not beat around the question. hon, gentleman was saying that the Minister authorized the payments of these amounts at these particulars dates.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Of course, I do not know the working of the department, but I would assume that if there was a public from that day the Minister was bound to work being done under the direction of the hon, gentleman, and if information from a special officer appointed to examine into the work, had brought to his knowledge the fact that the work was being carried on in an extravagant and fraudulent way, the hon, gentleman would have stopped all further payments. I will assume that common business rules would have dictated I should have thought the department would have said in the meantime: A large sum of money is claimed by these people, but, after what we have seen of the way they have been doing the work, there is reason to believe that frauds have been committed, and the best thing we can do is to stay our hand until we find out. But I was leading up, when the hon, gentleman interrupted me, to the fact that on 10th May the report to Council in favour of the appointment of a royal commission was issued. Surely, on the 25th May the Minister should have stayed his hand and Minister to it, and demanding a royal com- not made any more payments on these conmission. Now, what defence has the hon, tracts. The hon, gentleman nods his head in assent. Then how can he defend his action, when I find that on 27th May there was a cheque issued to Mr. St. Louis for cheque for $9,000; and on the 8th May, $66,000? Here is a royal commission issued on the report of the Minister demanding an inquiry into huge frauds that were apparent on the face of the pay-lists, and were brought to the attention of the Minister, and an official is seat down to investigate; and yet. even after a royal commission has been issible excuse can be offered for that? Why sued his deputy pays $66,000, and on 6th June, nearly a month after the Order in Council for a reyal commission had been issued, there was a further payment made of $39,000. So here is $99,000 in cash paid to fraudulent contractors after a royal commission had been issued to ascertain the extent of their frauds. I do not think you can parallel that in the history of responsible government in this or any other country. The hon. Minister practically says that because he has not personally handled the money or benefited by it, or been a party to the frauds, he is not responsible. If that ister never sanctioned anything of the kind, is the case, then we do not want responsible government or responsible Ministers. For what purpose do we want Ministers? Parliament votes money in order that it may be spent under the supervision and direction of responsible Ministers and departments, and if Parliament acknowledges the plea that Ministers can keep clear of responsibility by merely saying that the action was taken by the deputy, if this plea will hold after the fact of negligence has been shown and acknowledged, we might as well bid farewell to responsible government altogether. Without going into the details and facts admitted on all sides. without going into an explanation of the changes made in the contract. I affirm that from 8th March, when the "Star" newspaper published the article calling the Minister's attention to the facts, exercise unceasing vigilance. When he sent down Mr. Douglas to make a report, and he made a report confirming, in general terms, the "Star's" published charges, the Minister was doubly bound to exercise super-When, on 25th April, his own deputy reported in the terms I have read, that the condition of affairs in Montreal was such as demanded a public inquiry by a royal commission, the hon. Minister was bound by every rule which guides men in public life, to exercise unceasing vigilance with respect to the expenditure of public money, and to determine that those men who were accused of fraudulent practices should not dip their hands any further in the public treasury till the charges were investigated. I have shown that the hon. Minister abandoned all business rules which should charactorize the action of the department in connection with this work, and I have shown enough to justify the charge made by his own commissioner, "that the door was open wide to give the contractor for labour or any of his employees, if so inclined, opportunity to defraud the Government by fictitious pay-lists and accounts." I cannot put it any stronger, I need not put it any stronger-it is the severest language of condemnation which can be used. In summing up this matter, we find that for work which should have cost $122,000, accounts were rendered to the amount of $430,000, being an excess of $312,000, and on this claim, $394,900 were actually paid, of which $334,-000 was on substructure. The vote of Parliament for $170,000 was evaded by the device of a Governor General's warrant, and while authority of Parliament had been obtained to spend on that special work $170,-000, the Government illegally and unconstitutionally used the Governor General's warrant, by which means they expended $394,000. We find that the Public Works Act was ignored deliberately so far as tendering was concerned. We find that the contract, which, in the first instance, was loose and against! the public interest, was afterwards extended; to the Grand Trunk Railway, at a time when the Minister knew the contract was a bad one for the country. We find the door was opened wide for the perpetration of frauds, as the Minister's own commissioner reports. We find a superintendent was appointed by political influence, who threatened all who stood in his way with instant dismissal; that other officials engaged in the work stood in hearly dread of the superintendent, on account, as they expressed it, of his political influence with the Solicitor General and other supporters of the Government. We find that false pay-rolls were certified, whereby enormous sums of money were stolen. We find that men appropriated money wrongfully to their own use, as was reported in the commissioner's report, and that those men had gone scot free. We find that an honest engineer, Desbarats, who attempted to stop this carnival of extravagance was itemediately removed from his position by this political superintendent, Kennedy. We find $170,000 was obtained from the Government by false pretenses, and paid out after the Government was so satisfied about the frauds that they had issued a royal commission. Uader these circumstances. Parliament had a right to assume from these two facts that the Government should have done something to punish the perpetrators of these wrongs. Last year we had some of the Government supporters acting upon the statement with which the Minister closed his speech setting forth the intentions of the Government. "Let us hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may," said the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). He was going to prosecute all parties to the fraud; he did not care how high they might be, or who they might be; he demanded that criminal prosecutions be instituted against all these persons. And the Minister wound up his speech by saying:

The evidence is hardly printed yet. I intend to bring the whole matter under the consideration of my colleagues, when they have time to consider it, so that we may see what is to be done for the purpose of punishing those who have been guilty of frauds which I have not the slightest doubt have been perpetrated on the Government.

What have the hon, gentlemen done? With the exception of one prosecution instituted against Mr. St. Louis, which has fizzled out, not an attempt has been made to punish any one of those men who have been engaged. I regret to say successfully engaged, in a huge conspiracy to defraud this Government. We have lost our money, we have lost it under circumstances for which I hold the Minister must be held politically responsible in this House. He was bound to exercise twenty times the vigilance he did, he was bound to exercise the same business knowledge and tact he would have used if he had been carrying this out as a private contract, and he did nothing of the kind. but he threw the door wide open for the perpetration of these critices, which he now admits and condemns, but which, if he had exercised proper vigilance at the proper time he might have stopped. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move in amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"it appears from the report of the commissioners appointed to investigate the facts connected with the construction in the year 1893, of the two bridges at Montreal across the Lachine Canal, that in the building of the substructures for these bridges the estimates for which were $122,000, the Government has been already actually defrauded of about $160,000, while claims for large amounts for labour and materials alleged to have been supplied are still unpaid.

That the construction of such substructures was carried out by the Department of Railways without calling for public tenders, without proper supervision or check, and with a reckless abandonment of business rules which invited and encouraged fraud and wrong-doing.

That after knowledge had been brought home to the Minister and department of the reckless extravagance which prevailed in the construction of these bridges, no real or effective attempt was made to ensure an honest carrying on of the work, but on the contrary enormous sums of money were, after such knowledge, improperly paid to contractors and others, and the door was left wide open for the perpetration of fraud upon the Government.

That although the evidence discloses the names of many persons who were parties to these frauds, no attempt has been made to punish any of them criminally except St. Louis.

That under these circumstances the Minister of Railways is responsible, and deserves the severest censure of this House, for negligence, inefficiency and gross mismanagement in connection with these works, and for the losses the country has sustained."

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat-(Mr. Davies), as is usually his wont has been very vigorous in his declamation and very eccentric in his facts. However, long usage has accustomed him to that, as it has likewise accustomed the House. Before Parliament met there were rumours that a general election was to be brought on, and in the province of Ontario particularly, Reform orators from every platform promised, aye, not only promised, scandals if the Government called the House together, a carnival of corruption-if I may cull that term from the vituperative vocabulary of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)-a carnival of corruption never before known in the annals of any other country. Now, Sir, sixty days have elapsed since the commencement of the session and from the first day until now, this is the first, of what may be known as a scandal against the Government. It is quite true that hon, gentlemen opposite have whistled to keep up their courage. It is quite true that upon one occasion they introduced an innocent lamb from the fold in the person of the Auditor General, but, I think, after being made the scapegoat of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the prayer of the Auditor General from this out will be: Save me from my friends. The other day in committee, they thought they started a hornet's nest, and they made an attack on a reverend gentleman in the person of Mr

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman cannot refer to anything which took place in a committee, the proceedings of which have not been reported to the House.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I think if I am debarred from referring to it, I am quite certain we will never hear of it in this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been out gunning, but they have succeeded in bringing down only very small game, and so to-day the hon, member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has laboured very hard, and it must indeed be a labour, in endeavouring to dress up anew this matter for the House. He has served up as a cold joint what the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave last year as a hot roast, and consequently it has fallen very flat. Then, Sir, there has been such a paucity and such a dearth of scandals, that the Liberal party in western Ontario are openly declaring that the Opposition are going to pieces, and so, a week ago the managing editor of the "Globe" was despatched to Ottawa, and that gentleman in a very long editorial has endeavoured to prove to the satisfaction of his readers. that the Government is actually departing into evil again, and he rehashes a number of charges that some hon, gentlemen must have heard of probably in their boyhood, and it is promised that these shall be the startling questions to be submitted to the electorate. Now, Sir, some of these charges are very venerable with age; some of them are hoary-headed. There is the Langevin Block scandal, whatever that was, for I must confess myself to be in ignorance of it although I have heard it referred to here once or twice. There is their old friend, the seizure of the provincial licensing system. I hardly know what that refers to unless it was a Bill introduced about twenty years ago, by the hon, member for North Simcoe (Mr. Mc-Then, there is the Rykert timber limit scandal, so ancient that most hon. gentlemen have doubtless forgotten it, and then they refer to the North-west rebellion. And so the members of the Opposition have gone through this category, and have found at the bottom of the list, the Lachine bridge scandal, which has been resurrected once again and made to do duty for them. Now, I never heard it contended by the Minister of Railways, or by any person on behalf of the Government, that in this matter everything was right or proper. Last year I spoke on the question, and I then stated my opinion, and I believe it still, that wrongdoing has been committed, but that in this connection the Minister of Railways is not guilty or responsible. It will be necessary to give a history of the facts in connection with the matter, because of necessity we must not rely upon what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has stated, inasmuch as he has not at all adhered to the record. It is true, as he tells us, that $170,000 was in the first instance voted by Parliament for the erecting of these two bridges. That is a well-known fact, but it is equally within the information of the House that later on it was decided by the Department of Railways and Canals, to increase the depth of water in the canal which necessitated a largely increased expenditure for the bridges. It was announced here in the House last year-and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) knows very well-that it was never contemplated that these bridges could have been built for man that he was removed for political rea-$170,000; but on the contrary, that it had sons falls to the ground when I state the been decided to increase the depth of navi- fact that Mr. Desbarats was not dismissed gation from 14 to 24 feet, and then the from the service, but was simply transferred estimate was made that the bridges would from that work to another. This is a cost in the neighbourhood of $230,000. At sample of how the simple facts compare first it was contemplated that the works with the distorted statements the hon, genshould be carried on in the fall of the year. tleman submits to the House. The hon, and for obvious reasons it is plain that gentleman goes on and tells us that this the work could have been done cheaper at that time than during the period the from first to last; yet when you read the letter of Frances. Howwas afterwards carried out. representations ever. owing to made ! by the mill-owners, and the large interests along the line of the canal, it was decided that, instead of proceeding with the work in the fall of the year, it should be postponed until a later period; and so in the month of March following the work was undertaken. At the outset a great difficulty was met with, and one not contemplated when the specifications were drawn up, and the estimate cost put at $235,000, that was, any reasonable person that instead of his the necessity of removing a large quantity? of ice from the Lachine Canal. That, ac-fully attended to. cording to the evidence of Mr. Desbarats. involved an expenditure of some $40,000. So that, taking the two bridges together, their cost, according to the evidence of Mr. Desbarats, who was a trained official of the department, should have been at least some $270,000. Now, the hon, gentleman insinuates that from the outset of the whole transaction there was fraud and evidences of fraud; and as a proof of this he states tive I consider a mystery, he (Mr. Parent) issues that Mr. Desbarats was removed from the specifications, asking for rates for the supplying works. If the hon, gentleman confined himself to the facts of the case, and did not wander off so freely into the regions of imagination, he would find in the first place that the whole charge of the works was committed to Mr. Parent. We find that on the 23rd of December, 1892, instructions were addressed to Mr. Parent for his guidance; and these instructions say: that he had full charge of the staff, and was held responsible for the economical and efficient conduct of the work; that all orders in regard to the work should be given through him; and that he was to be careful to report frequently to the department as to the manner in which the work was being carried on. Now, the hon. member is in this position: he has either stated what he knew was not consistent with the facts, or he has placed a version of the facts before the House not knowing the whole truth. Half truths are very dangerous things; and while the hon. gentleman has led the House to believe that Mr. Kennedy was in full charge of the work, the fact is that Mr. Parent was in charge of the work and continued in charge of it until his suspension. The hon. gentleman afterwards insinuated that Mr. Desbarats was removed from the works for political reasons, and said that he was an efficient officer. Nobody contends, so far as I know, that Mr. Desbarats was not an efficient officer; but the statement of the hon. gentle-the letter of Kennedy, it is plain that from the outset he was acting in every possible way to secure the exercise of economy and to protect the rights of the department. Then, the hon, gentleman turns round on another tack and says that when Kennedy does tell the truth to the department, the department sets all his remonstrances at naught. Let us read this letter of Kennedy. and see what his complaints were; and the reading of the letter will. I think, convince representations being disregarded, they were Kennedy's complaint. which is to be found in his letter of the 12th of March, printed on page 140 of the evidence, is in reference to a matter that had been disposed of by the Minister, and in a manner which, when the facts of the case are known to the House, will be seen to be quite satisfactory. The principal points in that letter of Kennedy are these:

Without consulting any one, and for what moof foremen, derricks, stonecutters, stonemasons, double and single teams and skilled labour, from Mr. E. St. Louis, the successful tenderer.

Now, I see nothing wrong in this in the man who was in charge of the works, who had written instructions from the department to issue the specifications in reference to the hiring of labour. Then, the hon. gentleman says that the labour was hired privately, public tenders not being invited. That is not in accord with the evidence, a reference to which will show that in the first instance tenders were asked for the labour, but that the prices, for reasons best known to the acting engineer, were not considered satisfactory, and tenders were called a second time. Then, some four persons put in tenders, with the result that the tender of Mr. St. Louis, being the lowest, was accepted. It may seem strange that there should be this tendering for labour, because the hon. gentleman insinuates that that was part of a deep-laid plan to work wrong-doing. To my mind, the explanation of the Minister given last year was not farfetched or unfair. In a large city like Montreal, there is more or less danger of strikes-that organized labour will make its power felt; and it is not infrequent that railway contractors, having large contracts on hand, hire from one person a large number of men for employment on their works. In one case, which was referred to before the committee, 6.000 men were employed in that way. When Mr. Parent, the acting engineer, represented to the Minister that labour was being hired in that way, the Minister was not at first favourable; but when Mr. Parent pointed out that there was a liability of strikes occurring, that the work was to be pushed on with the greatest possible despatch, and that a great many men were to be placed on the work at one time, he agreed that the labour should be hired in the manner in which it was. scale of prices was adopted. Mr. Kennedy, in his letter, a portion of which, I believe, was quoted by the hon, gentleman, speaks of the prices paid as being unduly high. The hon, gentleman would lead the House to believe that unskilled labour was paid $1.89 a day. That is not the fact. It is quite true that Mr. Emard came to Ottawa and saw the Minister in reference to a dispute as to the price paid for labour. It had been agreed that axe men and pick men were to be paid at the rate of $1.89 a day. To that the Minister demurred, and a compromise was effected at $1.50 a day. Now. I do not think that any one will object to that as a fair rate of wages to be paid to men who had often to be at work in water. So that from the outset there was a strict surveillance kept by the Minister over the matter. On the 8th of March the work was commenced. At first it was not contemplated that it should be completed in forty days. However, as there had been one postponement of the work, and as it was necessary in the interest of the shipping that it should be completed at an early day, forty days was fixed as the which it should be comp time within which it should be completed. As a consequence, a larger number of men As a; were employed than was originally contemplated. It is quite true that on the 9th March the attention of the Minister was drawn to the matter. It is quite true that on the 12th March. Parent, who was in charge of the work, was summoned to Ottawa, and saw the Minister, and on inquiry being made, some 400 men were dismissed, and some hundred teams. Then Mr. Emard came to Ottawa and the new arrangement was made. The work was then progressing and Mr. Parent was in charge. It is quite true that Mr. Desbarats had been sent to another work, but Mr. Kennedy was act-ing in a subordinate position, and with the assistance of five or six time-keepers. the Government thought they were perfectly secure in their position. Not only had there been very little money spent on the work then, but the major portion of the material was on the ground, and ready to be used; and so we find on the 1st April the sum of $170,000 had been spent on the work which was well under way. On the 14th April, Mr. Douglas went to Montreal and made a report. He reported that another $100,000 would be required, in addition to the $170,-000 then expended, to complete the work. and tools of that kind.

That would bring it up to the cost, as originally estimated, when the expense of clearing the canal of ice is taken into consideration. On the 1st May, further bills were placed before the department, which brought the costs over $300,000. The Minister of Railways then went down and personally inspected the work. That was on the 12th April. Up to that time, the work had been progressing, and progressing favourably, and on the 19th April, when the Minister saw the work himself, it was pretty well under way. Afterwards, on the 25th April, Mr. Douglas, still acting under the advice of the Minister, still closely watching the work, had other bills presented to him. It is true that the work has cost over $360.000. The hon, gentleman urges that the Minister of Railways should not then have paid the bills. That is for the Minister himself to explain, but this I do believe, that, in the view of subsequent events, in the view of matters afterwards to be dealt with, owing to the increased cost of what is known as the coffer-dam, and other works which Mr. Desbarats, in his evidence, said would cost $6,000, and which cost some $60,000, in view of some theusands of dollars expended in removing icein view of all this expenditure, not contemplated, there was a legitimate and honest expenditure in the work of over $300.-000. The hon, gentleman dwelt at great length on the point that the Grand Trunk Railway had offered to build this bridge for $70,000, from which he argued that the two should have been built for $149,000. But the hon, gentleman failed to tell the House that the Wellington is a much larger and wider bridge than the Grand Trunk bridge, and that the Grand Trunk Rail-way never offered to build a bridge for $70,000. There is not a tittle of evidence to prove that they ever made such an offer. but there is evidence to show that the Government, time and again, asked the Grand Trunk people if they would build the bridge. In proof of that, let me refer the House, not to the hon, gentleman's own statements, but to the statement of Mr. Hannaford, the engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway, as shown in Mr. Schreiber's evidence:

Therefore, the two amounts together would be $70,000 for building the railroad bridge complete; but he suggested, that, as it was then so late in the season, the fact being, that the quarries were all closed and derricks dismantled and everything in a state of repose for the winter-

It was then on the 28th December.

-Mr. Hannaford suggested, that the Grand Trunk Railway, if they undertook it, should do it for the Government by day's work, so to speak; that they were to show their expenditure, the payrolls, the name of every man, and also the cost of all the materials they used, and that, in addition a reasonable sum was to be put on for the cost of superintending, the use of plants, steam derricks.

And when the last application was made to Mr. Hannaford, his reply came in these words:

No, the season is so far advanced that we hesitate to do it; but we will do it for you, and we will charge you what it costs.

Now, there is the statement of Mr. Hannaford himself-not offering, as the hon, gentleman alleges, to do the work for $70,000, but, on the contrary, positively refusing to do it at any price, except on the terms that the Grand Trunk Railway should be permitted to go on with the work, to hire their men, that the Government should pay the men, and the bills as placed before them. and that the Grand Trunk Railway should then have, in addition, a profit of 15 per cent on the amount. That is vastly different, so that their contention that $70,000 was what the railway bridge should have cost remains outside the question altogether. As I have said before, the Wellington bridge was much more expensive, and the cost was greatly enhanced by the season of the year in which the work was Hon, gentlemen opposite, however, have seized upon this matter as they seized upon it last year, and I have little doubt that their reason for bringing it up before the House when they did was in order that it might have some effect in the prosecution instituted in Montreal against They knew that the first prosecution had ended. I regret to say, in the dismissal of the case by the Police Magistrate. They knew perfectly well that another prosecution was being brought before the Grand Jury, and they hoped to have the matter discussed in the House before that prosecution took place before the Grand They hoped to hear the statement the Minister that the prosecution from would be carried on to the bitter end, and they hoped to be able to go to Montreal and placard that statement, and in that way endeavour to excite a certain amount of animus against the Government, and a feeling in favour of St. Louis. Not that they have any love for St. Louis, by any means. They cannot conceal to-day their mirth at St. Louis' dismissal. They live on political pabulum of this kind, and have brought this amendment forward as a matter of rejoicing and nothing more. They hoped to defeat the action of the Government in any respect or case. Why should not these hon, gentlemen do this? They have had an example. They know that in the Mercier case, their old friends were all acquitted by reason of the active part they took in the criminal proceedings. That is why this matter has been introduced in the House, and another reason is because of the perfect paucity, on their part, of anything to bring before the public. What is the position of the matter from the first? It is not, as the hon. gentleman has recapitulated, that the Minister of Railways did an unlawful, unauthorized, or illegal act. There had been authorized by the vote of Parliament, an expenditure of $170,000, on a basis of fourteen foot naviga-The principle had been affirmed by the House that two bridges should be built. and I say it was within the province of the Minister, when it was afterwards shown that it would be a mistake to build the bridges and have the substructure of such a depth that nothing drawing over fourteen feet could pass, to decide that a change should be made. The principle had been affirmed that the two bridges should be built, and that $170,000 should be expended. on the basis of fourteen feet navigation; and the only change was in making the substructure deeper to meet the requirements of navigation. Where is the wrong-doing in that? Hon, gentlemen opposite started out with the charge that from the outset every means had been employed to defeat the ends of justice, and that the Government had placed on the works men wno were untrue and unfaithful. But Kennedy was never in charge of the work. was in charge from the first, and the hon. gentleman should be fair to the Minister. If there has been any wrong-doing by Kennedy, he was not the man in charge of the work. As to the bugbear of Desbarats having been removed, there is nothing in that. If the hon, gentleman had taken time to read the letter, he would have seen that Desbarats was only transferred from one position in the department to another. and a man named Papineau engaged in his place. It is true that Desbarats had prethe plans and specifications; surely the hon, gentleman will not contend that the man who may act as draughtsman must, of necessity, act as clerk of works. So as to this removal nothing wrong is shown to exist. As to the material, there is no doubt that tenders were called for. As . to the labour, a sufficient reason, I believe, had been alleged why it was hired as it was. As to the day labour being taken unfairly and dishonestly, denial is given to that from the fact that on the first occasion tenders were sent in, the department, not believing them satisfactory, called for second tenders; and in open and fair competition, the lowest of four tenders was accepted. Now, Sir, I have gone over the points in the evidence to which the hon, gentleman has referred, and I have endeavoured to set him right. I do not contend, and no one in this House will contend, that there has not been a waste of public money. But this must be borne in mind that in every great work, and especially in this case in which the bridge was built at a time not at first contemplated-that is, in the winter instead of in the summer-there are often unexpected causes arising which enhance the cost. See how the great public works undertaken in Ontario have swollen in cost. The legislative assembly building in Toronto was at first expected to cost half a million, but before the completion of the building the statement that owing to the manner cerned. in which the work was constructed; owing to the fact that it was undertaken in winter, at a time not originally contemplated, the cost was increased, in his opinion, to three times as much as originally estimated. I have no doubt he gave that as his opinion wait till I come to itof the cost in order, perhaps, to palliate his: own wrong-doing, if he had been doing wrong. But, if there is such a great difference of opinion as to what the work should have cost, when the whole facts are laid before the public, instead of this being a be found to be not much more than $100,000. I do hope and trust, despite the fact that it will be a cause of serious annoyance to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Government may be successful in a civil action it has instituted. I regret that this man, St. Louis has escaped. The hon, gentleman for Queen's (Mr. Davies) appears to take much consolation out of it, and I suppose he and his friends should be tendered our congratulations on their satisfaction. This only I have to say: I am prepared to vote against the amendment offered, for it is manifest that the Minister of Railways was not cognizant of wrong-doing and that he was not guilty of gross dereliction of duty. Occupying as he does the position of head of one of the largest spending departments in the Government; being engaged, as he was, in the onerous duties thrown upon him by a session of Parliament, it was not to be expected that he should have given his undivided attention to that matter. In the administration of a great department a certain amount of trust must be reposed by the superior in his subordinates. Mr. Parent was an old officer of the department, a man who had grown old in the public service and who had a reputation to keep up. Mr. Kennedy, no doubt, came well recommended to the department. The instructions given as to how the work should be carried out were clear. Though there has been wrong-doing, and I admit that there has been, still the Minister is shown to have taken all the precautions he could and to have acted honestly and above board in all his doings; and he should not be blamed for any wrong-doing on the part of others.

amount has been increased to $1,200,000, that Mr. GIBSON. The hon, gentleman who increase being in great part owing to has just taken his seat has undoubtedly changes in the plans. I believe that in matters; made the best that could be made of the of this sort there should be strict super-brief that has been given him. But it is vision; and, so far as the Minister is con-evident that he has no practical knowledge cerned from first to last, I cannot see any of the work; for if he had, I am sure he other aim on his part than to have the work would never have made the speech he has fairly constructed, to have the work honestly made. He denies the statement made that constructed and to keep within the limits Mr. Hannaford offered to do this work. He of the original plans. I do admit, and it should have consulted the evidence taken seems reasonable to admit, that these before the Public Accounts Committee, when amounts were unduly swollen and should he would have found that Mr. Hannaford not have been paid. But the Minister was stated under oath, which statement I have justified to a certain extent in the evidence under my hand, that he offered to do this of Mr. Desbarats, whose information was work. So that disposes of the hon, gentle-volunteered to the department. He makes man's case, so far as Mr. Hannaford is con-

> Mr. HAGGART. The hon, gentleman is mistaken, there is not a word of truth in his statement.

Mr. GIBSON. If the hon. Minister will

Mr. HAGGART. But you made a statement which is not correct.

Mr. GIBSON. I will read the statement later if the hon. gentleman will patience. Mr. Hannaford undertook to build waste of $150,000, the amount will probably the substructure of the Grand Trunk bridge for $35,000 and the superstructure for $35,-000, in all $70,000. And, in the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee, Mr. Hannaford stated that he was willing to supply a bridge containing 15,000 pounds more of iron than the bridge built by the Dominion Bridge Company, and now in use by the Government, including that in his $35,000 estimate. At page 272 of the evidence you will find the statement made by Mr. Hannaford:

E. P. HANNAFORD.

Chief Engineer.

Montreal, 24th December, 1892.

Now, Mr. Hannaford was asked by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, what was the depth of navigation, and Mr. Hannaford's answer

These estimates were made for 19 feet. That is Mr. Parent's plan.

The evidence goes on:

By Mr. Bergeron:

Q. Is that 19 feet navigation ?—A. 19 feet navi-It was a Government plan. gation.

By Mr. Gibson:

Q. So you arrived at that estimate from the Government plan, and you say that your estimate of $35,000 for masonry and $35,000 for superstructure, a total of $70,000, that when you made that estimate on behalf of the Grand Trunk Railway, you were satisfied there was a profit of $10,000 for the Grand Trunk Railway Company ?-A. I was satisfied there was, if the season was decent.

Q. And the work could be done under those circumstances, providing they gave you sufficient time to work, for $60,000?—A. Yes, $60,000 or $70,000. It could have been done for my estimate. I felt that my estimate was a very high one for the substructure.

Q. Now, Mr. Hannaford, supposing that you had been obliged to go four feet further down, how much would that have added to the cost of the substructure ?—A. Another 4 feet in addition to the 19, well, I should have had to do pumping and all that. Altogether, I should say $8,000.

Q. $8,000 additional to have taken down to the depth the Government took it down themselves? -A. I don't know that, sir. You see the Government and any government would do the same. You don't want to have 22 feet to pump; you Nineteen feet is as want to sheer off a little. much as would carry one of the Allan line vessels.

Q. Supposing the Government had decided, after you had taken the work, to have gone down to the 22 feet, you still think that you could have done it for $8,000 additional, and that the Grand Trunk would not have lost anything?—A. I think, as the matter turned out; I think that the whole thing could have been done for $70,000. I made up my mind, after the work was done, in May, 1893, that the work would have been done, and that we should have done it at a saving of $10,000.

So you see that although the hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat, claimed that all this additional cost to the country was on account of the Government sinking the channel four feet deeper than was at first intended, here you have the evidence of Mr. Hannaford, who is quite competent to judge upon these facts, that so far as the Grand Trunk bridge was concerned, he was in a position as chief engineer to say that he would undertake the work for $8.000. And after he had seen the work done, he still says he could have done it for the $8,000 extra, and the country would have saved $10,000. My hon, friend to the left of me says it was a bigger bridge. course it was a bigger bridge. It weighed 15,000 pounds more, and was worth $6,000 more than the bridge the Government put in, and it was a bridge that was to be turned by steam, whereas the present bridge is turned by hand. Neither the present bridge nor the Wellington bridge are finished, and probably never will be. Now, my hon, friend spoke about the quantities that would be required on a large work of that kind, and the different kinds of material that would be required. Well, we have a statement made by Mr. Desbarats, who has been spoken of so highly to-day, that in the estimate made by him for the construction of these works, and he provided everything so far as he could foresee as an engineer, 550,000 feet board measure of all kinds of timber was all that was needed for that work. I would like that hon. gentleman, before he goes away, to explain to me how it comes about that according to the report of the Government's commissioners there was charged for 3,613,600 feet board measure, and the Government commissioners say in their report that there could have been used in that work only 2,594,800 feet board measure. Now, where are the 1,018,-800 feet paid for and not used?

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman say it was paid for?

Mr. GIBSON. According to the Government's report. You will have a chance of explaining how much you paid for, and how much you have not paid for. There is one thing, however, that is clear. These men made up accounts for 3,600,000 feet of lumber, of which over a million feet cannot be found; and it was given in evidence last year that 450 pieces of timber 12 inches by 12 inches, from 25 to 30 feet, were or stolen in taken away night one from the banks of the Lachine Canal, and has never been heard of since. I have not heard that the Minister of Railways nor the Solicitor General have been looking for the culprit who took that timber. The hon. gentleman spoke about tenders being applied for, and that all kinds of work were done under contract. Sir, the commissioners' report contradicts that statement to this extent. that $45,992.46 worth of timber was delivered and paid for that never was contracted for at all. That does not bear out the statement that everything was done under contract. You can see that in the report of the commissioners, page 11:

A large amount, $45,992.46 worth, has been purchased without calling for tenders, and without demands or requisitions from either Mr. Parent or Mr. Kennedy.

Now, my hon. friend stated this afternoon that Mr. Kennedy was not in charge of the work. Sir, Mr. Kennedy was in charge of the work, as appears on page 327 of the evidence:

By Mr. Haggart:

Q. You went up to Ottawa ?—A. Yes.

Q. And why didn't you go to the department and make your complaint?—A. Because I was stopped by Senator Drummond and Mr. Curran. and I said here on Friday that I was sorry often that I did not carry that out, and Senator Drummond expressed himself since that he was sorry I did not carry it out, which I hope the "Star" paper will put that in. If I had been discharged then, I should not have been in the position I am to-day. I should have been a free man.

If Mr. Kennedy was discharged, he must have been employed at one time or another, because on page 295 of the same evidence, we find:

Q. Would you kindly explain; we want to have the truth, that is all we want ?-A. That is what I want to give, as far as possible. That interview was held between Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Ogilvie-Mr. Curran was also present-in Mr. Trudeau's office. What took place between them at the interview I don't know. Then Mr. Curran and Mr. Ogilvie came to me in an adjoining room, and Mr. Ogilvie informed me that Mr. Trudeau would be highly pleased if I would accept the appointment of overseer of the construction of the Wellington bridge. I said that I would, conditionally. He wanted to know what those conditions were, and I told him that the conditions should be, that if I was to be held responsible for the construction of the Wellington bridge, that I should have full charge, that is to say, having all the men employed directly under my charge, having full control of the men, the plant, That is to say, material and everything else. the placing of the plant in the proper place and having the material necessary to do the work. Mr. Ogilvie made the remark, "Never mind the conditions, it will be all right." I said, "It may be all right now. It is better to take precautions now. It will save trouble later on." Mr. Curran said, "Kennedy is right; he should stipulate conditions, and they should be allowed him, or ne should not take charge of the work;" but Mr. Ogilvie overruled both Mr. Curran and I. He or he should not take charge of the work;" also stated that Mr. Trudeau did not see how Kennedy could be remunerated for taking such a position, which was outside his official duties, and they preferred doing it thus in order to ensure those interested in the waterways having double interest of getting it finished. I said I did not care anything about that.

That shows conclusively that the desire of these parties was not only to put Mr. Kennedy in a position of trust, but to put him over Mr. Parent, the engineer. It was quite evident throughout the whole investigation that Mr. Kennedy occupied the principal position, because he did what he pleased and carried out what he pleased, without consulting Mr. Desbarats or Mr. Parent in any way whatever. Then, my hon, friend spoke about the number of men employed. We were told that no one kept the time. That was evident. Thousands of hours were charged that were never put in. Some of the men were recommended, not for their fitness, but because of some political influence they could use in the neighbourhood of Montreal, where they lived, for we find that at one of the examinations conducted by Mr. Tarte, Mr. Kennedy said they were recommended by different parties, that quite a few were recommended by Mr. Ouimet, and that a number were put on, whether Mr. Desbarats or Mr. Parent required them or not, on the order of Mr. St. Louis himself. The Minister said there was no undertaking between Mr. St. Louis and himself regarding the change of pay made when employed by the Government and by the contractor, from $1.25 per day when in the Government employ to $1.50 when in the employ of Mr. St. Louis. I find in the evidence given by Mr. St. Louis, when under examination, he said:

Q. So that the official arrangement was, that all of these men could be paid $1.50, that you should get that for them?—A. By an understanding with the Deputy Minister and Mr. Haggart, I was to get $1.50 a day for all labourers working with pick and shovel.

Four hundred men were employed by the Government at $1.25 per day, and these, the moment they were turned over to Mr. St. Louis, were considered to be worth $1.50 per day. The hon, member for Simcoe laid great stress upon the expense involved in removing ice from the canal basin. But it must be remembered that thousands of yards were removed unnecessarily, they were removed by horse and cart while machinery which was standing idle, although under pay, was on the work by which the ice could have been brought to the bank and the carts thus easily filled and they would have been able to take much larger loads than when filled at the prism of the canal. From the beginning to the end of this work there was nothing but extravagance. There was no order or system, and even no official time-keeper. The only time-keeper employed was one who was supposed to act for the Government, but he acted for Mr. St. Louis as well. In the matter of carting alone, we find that $12,700 were paid for which no work was done. The hon, member for Simcoe spoke about the Wellington Street bridge being a much larger structure than the Grand Trunk bridge. I tell the hon, gentleman that the Wellington Street bridge did not cost as large an amount, even though it is a more Comparing labour hours extensive work. charged to both bridges, from February 1st to May 6th, during which period the same class of work was executed, and during which period there was more than treble the work done upon the Wellington bridge:

16,305 The overtime and night hours of the masons on the Wellington bridge is 28 per cent of the total hours charged; on the Grand Trunk bridge it is 48 per cent of the total hours charged. The night work of masons on the Wellington bridge terminated on the 1st of April; on the Grand Trunk it is charged until the 19th of April, while eviderce shows that the masons worked at night at the commencement only of the laying of masonry on the Grand Trunk. An inducement to increase the night hours can be menuoned: the contractor paid the same wages for night as for day. The profit, according to the contractor's account, for a mason per day would be 82 cents, for the night $2, and if skilled and ordinary labourers are classed as masous, the profit would be much greater. For a rough comparison of cost, the total cubic yards of all classes of work built and removed on both bridges may be taken, and compare the cost of cartage relative to the work done on each bridge respectively. Although this comparison does not refer to the number of yards carted or to the actual cost of carting per cubic yard, still it answers the object in view. Upon the Wellington bridge the cost of cartage, per cubic yard, is approximately 78 cents, while on the Grand Trunk it is $1.80, or nearly 2½ times that on the Wellington. I might here say that, notwithstanding the fact that the whole of that stone could have been brought in by the Grand Trunk Railway from Terrebonne quarries, a distance of 22 miles, thereby saving the cost of teaming, simply because Mr. St. Louis could not make any profit out of railway transportation, he was given the privilege, or at all events assumed it, of carting the whole of the stone from these quarries. It was shown that $12,700 had been expended on teaming, when none of it was necessary. The evidence showed that teams were employed in the morning. A man came down with his team and entered his name as being at work for the day, then he went up town and resumed his regular avocation and returned on the following morning and entered his name again, and in this way the Government paid improperly thousands of dollars. The scandal eventually became so great that even political friends of hon. gentleman opposite called the Government's attention to it, and asked them to look into the facts, and then the Government were obliged to appoint a commission, and that commission, notwithstanding the fact that it was appointed by the Government, came to the conclusion that the work was carried on in a most extravagant manner, that carelessness was manifestly displayed in every de-46,358 partment, that there was no practical supervision, that every man was allowed to do as he pleased, and men were put on where they were not required, that men were allowed to carry lumber from one side of the yard to the other and take it back the following day, that thousands of feet of lumber were brought from Henderson's yard at night without any supervision, and the only check exercised was that the men on the following day were asked who brought it down. In this way there was no practical check on the work, and the Government were obliged to accept the charges of the lumber dealers whether they were right or wrong. I cannot add anything to the report made by the Government's own commissioners. In conjunction with that I may say that this recklessness extended over all the other works upon the Lachine Canal. found that these men were doing work for the mill-owners along the line of the canal; that timber was charged for in excessive quantities, and that in one case, a box drain was said to contain 356,000 feet of lumber, which was charged for, while the actual quantity in the work was less than 19,000 feet, board measure, or, to be more accurate, 18,714 feet. The commissioners say:

> A large amount of plank has been charged to the "box drain," 356,081 feet, b.m., of this only 18,714 feet, b.m., was used in the work. It is shown from the evidence of Mr. T. H. Trihey, that, of the plank above mentioned, 220,000 feet, b.m., was never purchased or delivered, though the account for this quantity of timber is certified to by Mr. Kennedy and other canal employees. The lumber purchased consisted of some pine deals, pine timber, and a number of pieces of oak. Not being able to charge the quantity of oak purchased to the box drain, a portion of it was invoiced as pine, to an amount equivalent to that originally charged for the oak. The account was originally rendered as oak, and, at the request of the superintendent of the canal, was changed to vine.

> In the account (A-1) there is charged 220,000 feet of pine plank, instead of 37,448 feet of oak which was delivered, and which is not yet used, and is a raft in the canal.

> So far as appears from the evidence, only the value of timber actually sold to the department was paid for; there does not appear to have been any necessity for buying the oak in the autumn of 1892. Besides this transaction, there is charged to the box drain an account of Henderson Brothers for 48,942 feet, b.m., of plank, which was delivered subsequent to the date on which the repairs to the box drain were made, and consequently could not have gone into that work. This system of management might lead to the fraudulent manipulation of accounts.

> The account made up for material and the work done amounts to $4,223.15; a much less sum, probably under $500, was expended upon the box drain, for which an appropriation of $5,000 had

and the contract of the second
I may say in this connection, that in the evidence of Mr. Desbarats, he states he ordered the following materials namely, bracing for piles, 44,160 feet, board measure; rear waling, 3,960 feet, board measure: oak waling, 19,167 feet. None of this timber was ever put on, and to-day the tops of the piles in the Lachine Canal is without waling, either outside or inside to protect the Government works from the vessels crowding against them. The Government, instead of claiming the work to have cost a certain sum of money, should have finished the work before they came to Parliament to state that it was complete. The work is not complete. We were to have a bridge opening and closing by electricity, but the day I went down there to examine it, instead of a motor being in use. I saw five or six men working at it, and taking five minutes to open it, and five minutes to close it. Instead of the work being of such a character that the Government of this country should feel proud of it, the Minister of Railways, his chief engineer, and every official of the department connected with it, ought to feel ashamed at leaving the work in such an unfinished condition. It does not speak well for the Minister or his chief engineer that they should squander $400,000 on these two bridges without having the decency to make the job complete. Unless I am greatly mistaken, it is as unfinished to-day as it was when the water was let into the Lachine Canal. I repeat, again, that this House ought to condemn the Minister and his department for allowing the work to remain in its present condition.

Mr. MASSON. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, it is quite unnecessary to occupy the time of this House is going over the details of the expenditure on these bridges. We had them all before the House last session, and we have them all printed in the report, not only of the commissioners, but of the Public Accounts Committee of last year. It is admitted on all hands that the bridges cost a great deal more than they should have cost, and that the cost was largely increased by reason of frauds committed on the Gov-The manner in which ernment. frauds were committed has been thoroughly investigated in the courts. It has been shown that, to a certain extent, there were unquestionably stuffed pay-lists, and other frauds of that nature. It has also been clearly shown that the 1,018,000 feet of lumber, which the last speaker has so eloquently referred to, was delivered and in some way cannot be found. All these are admitted facts, were admitted by the Minister last year, and in the discussion of the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Davies) it is unnecessary to occupy the time of the House in gonig into the details. There is no question between the Minister and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) on that point. Both parties admit that there there should be. However, the amendment charges that the Minister and his colleagues are responsible for that loss. Now, in fixing responsibility upon the head of any department, whether it be a department of Government, or whether it be a department of any business or financial concern; the circumstances connected with the fraud, the manner in which the fraud was perpetrated, and the duties that the person at the head of the department had to perform, have all to be taken into account. The circumstances under which this work was let were of a very exceptional character. The building of these bridges across the Lachine Canal had to be done in the winter time, so as to interfere, as little as possible, with navigation, and it had to be completed in a very short time, in order not to interfere with the mill-owners who took their power from the canal. For that reason, their construction was delayed until the Some preliminary work was done before the close of navigation, but the real construction was all postponed until the That necessarily caused a winter time. largely increased cost. Any person will admit that work of that kind cannot be as cheaply carried on in the winter time as in the summer months. Now, as to the manner in which the work was done. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has charged that the law was broken, that the statute was over-ridden, that the rules which should govern public works were entirely set aside, that it should have been let by contract, and was not let by contract, and that the whole thing was a sham, done on purpose to aid political friends, and to get political capital. Whatever evidence the hon, gentleman has for this broad assertion, he did not favour the House by reading it. Such deductions as he draws are principally from his imagination. Now, what are the facts? That the superstructure was let by tender, that the material was obtained by tender, that in each case the lowest tender was accepted, that the labour was obtained by tender.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not by tender.

Mr. MASSON. Yes; there were four tenders, and the lowest was accepted.

Mr. MULOCK. Not for all the labour.

Mr. MASSON. First, for the skilled labour. Now, the hon. gentleman says there was no evidence that these were bona fide tenders. There is no evidence that they were other than bona fide tenders.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What does the commission report?

amendment of the hon member (Mr. Davies) it is unnecessary to occupy the time of the House in gonig into the details. There is no question between the Minister and the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) on that point. Both parties admit that there was large expenditure over and above what York says it was not for all the work that tenders were asked. It was for skilled labour first. As to the manner in which the ordinary labour was subsequently obtained from the same party, that is a reasonable matter for comment by hon. gentlemen opposite. As the work progressed it was found desirable that it should be controlled in this way, and it was done. I do not think there is anything in the charge that there was overpayment for the ordinary labour. It is said that the rate was increased from $1.25 to $1.50. We have it in evidence that the superstructure was advertised for, that it was let by tender, and that the lowest tender was accepted. We have it also that the material was advertised for-

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. MASSON—and that the lowest tender was accepted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman persist in that statement that the material was advertised for? If he does, I challenge that statement. There were private tenders applied for to a few parties only.

Mr. MASSON. Well, put it that way, large number of tenders were put in, and the lowest was accepted. The labour was called for by tender, four tenders were put in, and the lowest tender was accepted.

Mr. MULOCK. I challenge the hon. gentleman there. Surely he must know that the report of the commissioners shows that no tenders were asked for the skilled labour for both bridges, but only for the one bridge.

Mr. MASSON. Tenders for skilled labour were asked for, and tenders were put in as follows:-

The tender of St. Louis, being the lowest, was accepted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is replying to the statement I made and is endeavouring to show that I was wrong; but he must know that there was no public or private call for tenders as regards the Grand Trunk Railway bridge.

Mr. MASSON. Tenders being called for the larger work, if they were extended to the smaller work, the hon, gentleman surely cannot object. The engineer recommended this method of employing day's labour instead of having the whole work done by contract, so that in having the work done in a hurried manner and at that particular time, there would be no loss to the millowners and no interference with navigation. Another reason that weighed with the Minister for obtaining the labour from one person instead of employing it generally, was that it would be easier in that way to contend with strikes which would be very apt to arise, owing to the large number of unemployed persons in the winter time. However, all these reasons operating on the minds of the Minister and his officers resulted in the arrangement being made. The work was commenced and proceeded without any excitement until it was almost entirely completed. The hon, gentleman has given the estimates of the work actually done in the various months. That hardly shows the matter as it would appear to the Minister from time to time. No doubt that was part of the scheme or conspiracy which was entered into to defraud the Government, and certainly that conspiracy was not the work of one man only, but there must of necessity have been a number of men engaged in it. Part of that conspiracy was that private tenders were applied for; a to keep these statements back. In the various months the following progress estimates were sent in: August, 1892, $48.85; September, $29.10; October, $60.50; November. $117.11; December, $3,597.19; January, 1893, $10.118.24; February, $23,716.56; making a total up to the 1st of March. 1893, of $37,687.85. At that time a great deal of the werk was reported done. On the 1st March, Mr. Parent reported:

The cut stone for the centre pier of this bridge -the Wellington Street traffic bridge-may be considered on hand, there being only a few coping stones still required. The two abutment piers are also far advanced, there being over two-thirds of the stone ready to build with; 36 stone-cutters, on an average, are at work for this Steam and hand derricks, pumps and bridge. temporary bridges are in position ready for work when the water is taken out of the canal on Saturday next. So far, the Dominion Bridge Company has not commenced to work, but they seem satisfied that they will have all in good shape for the opening of navigation on the 1st May next.

Such was the report of the engineer, Mr. Parent, at that time. Now, ten days afterwards, some suspicion having been excited that the pay-rolls were too large, through an article which appeared in the "Star." Mr. Douglas was sent down to make inquiries. On the 10th March, 1893, he reported as follows:—

On arriving in Montreal on the 5th instant, I found that the plate-girders at both ends of the swing bridge had been broken and carted away, the rails torn off the swing span. It appears that some of the officers of the Grand Trunk Railway had agreed to a suspension of traffic, expecting to be compensated by the Government for extra cartage. To this arrangement Mr. Hannaford was not a party. By a letter appended from the superintendent of the Grand Trunk Railway, it is stated that the probable extra cartage will amount to $384 per day; the importance of establishing traffic at the earliest moment is manifest.

An arrangement, appended, was made with the Dominion Bridge Company to ship the present swing 22 feet or more east, erect the plate-girders, bolting together the bracking, the Government to pay one-half the expense. An agreement was made with Mr. Hannaford to shift the tracks to meet the new alignment, the Government to pay the expense. Before leaving, I saw the swing bridge packed up preparatory to moving, and expect the traffic to be resumed by next Monday.

The number of men employed upon the work is very great, and the work is being done in a very expensive manner.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON. The hon, gentleman read to the last line which I have just read, but he stopped there. I shall read a little further:

The water has been partially drawn off the levels; the cofferdam is not yet finished. Progress has been made with the excavation of the four abutments. Derricks have been, and are being, erected. The work is being rushed; the results may be satisfactory, but the bills will be large.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair,

After Recess.

Mr. MASSON. When you left the Chair. Mr. Speaker, I had just read the report of Mr. Douglas, dated the 10th March, 1893. Before reading the same, I had shown that the progress receipts received to the 1st March, amounted only to the sum of $37,-687.85, and that during the first week in March an article had appeared in the Montreal "Star" calling attention to the number of men apparently engaged on this work and to some alleged extravagance in connection therewith. I had called attention to the fact that the hon. Minister and his deputy sent Mr. Douglas to make inquiries, and I read the full report of Mr. Douglas except a few of his closing remarks to which I may refer later on, for the purpose of showing that according to that report, he did not find any fraudulent pay-rolls. He did not even hint at such a thing. I call attention to this particularly, because of the remarks of the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. | Mr. Douglas's report.

Davies) who, after referring to Mr. Douglas's report and to the date on which it was made and to the circumstances under which it was called for, alleged that the Minister had, in that report, knowledge of fraudulent pay-rolls, and yet had made several large payments. It is clear that in that report there is not even the suggestion of any attempt to defraud, much less of the existence of fraudulent pay-rolls. It is true that Mr. Douglas did say that the work was being rushed, that the result might be satisfactory but that the bills would be large. Now, every person connected with contracting or who has any knowledge of the carrying on of large contracts, knows that the necessary result of rushing work is to increase the size of the bill. The facts in the case justified the work being rushed. It was for the purpose of rushing the work that a departure was made in the manner of building the substructure; and the amounts referred to by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) were based upon doing the work in a reasonable time and season and not upon doing it in midwinter in the space of a few months, in order to meet the emergency so as not to interfere with navigation or the working of the mills. Now, while that report of Mr. Douglas is certainly one that should necessarily have put the officers of the department on their guard against the expense being increased too much through the rushing of the work, Mr. Douglas closed his report by saying that if no accident occurred the Grand Trunk bridge would be finished in time, but that he had his doubts about the road bridge, but he would be better able to judge in a fortnight. So far from that report being such as to necessarily cause alarm, it was calculated to allay alarm. If the reports were true the bills were going to be large because the work was being rushed, but he does not say that it was being rushed too fast because he closed by saying that while the one bridge would undoubtedly be ready he has his doubts about the other, and would be better able to tell within a fortnight. Therefore, so far from the report of Mr. Douglas being of a nature to excite alarm and to throw the responsibility of all payments made thereafter upon the Minister, it was calculated to quiet alarm. The hon, member for Queen's loves to roll these expressions under his tongue-hundreds and thousands of men not employed. but on the rolls. But the hon, gentleman speaks from information received more than a year afterwards, and certainly there is nothing to justify the suggestion that knowledge of the "hundreds and thousands of men not employed, but on the rolls," had come to the Minister. There is nothing to justify the conclusions to which the hon. member seeks to drive the House, that the Minister should be held responsible for all payments that were made after he received I have called attention to the fact that up to 1st March, progress estimates had unquestionably been kept back. We find that shortly afterwards, during the first half of March-I do not see that the exact date has been given-another progress estimate, amounting to $29,-826.26 came in. Now, that being but little larger than the one preceding it, even with the report of Mr. Douglas before them. there was nothing likely to cause alarm. But when, in the early part of April, another estimate came in for $102,000, and later, another, for $155.383,62, the fact that they were so large necessarily did cause alarm. The latter of these two was received in May; and on 17th May, shortly after the receipt of this latter progress estimate, an Order in Council was passed appointing a commission of investigation. Now, the hon, member for Queen's with the material obtained by that commission before him, nay, more, with the material obtained in the Exchequer Court, and with that obtained in the investigation before the Public Accounts Committee a year or more afterwards, seeks to condemn the Minister for not acting in accordance with that information on 10th March, when he had only Mr. Douglas's report before him. Now. this commission, acting under the Order in Council of 17th May, 1893, commenced their They found it very difficult to labours. obtain information. The evidence they took is before the House, and it fills a volume of nearly three hundred pages. But, in all that mass of evidence, what evidence is there of fraudulent pay-rolls, what direct evidence is there of any conspiracy to de-fraud the Government, or of any actual case of fraud? All the commissioners can report is a suspicion. They do not pretend to say that everything is all right; they report their suspicions, and they refer to the pay-rolls as being such as to lead one to believe that they had been stuffed. But it takes them a long time to get that evidence, and the report is not made to the Minister until the 19th January, 1894. But the hon, member for Queen's holds the Minister responsible as though he had had this information before him in all the payments that he made from April onwards. There was nothing in Mr. Douglas' report to justify the stopping of payments, there was nothing, until this report of 19th January. 1894. was laid before the Minister's mind, that would justify the stoppage of payment; and the only actual case of any importance, directly reported, is that of the 1,018,000 feet of lumber, referred to by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson). is true that payments were made, that large payments were made; but the House must consider the circumstances under which they were made. This work had been rushed, it had been rushed for a purpose, and it was being finished within the time allowed. Labourers had been employed, and the Government would have assumed a grave responsibility by refusing to make the payments necessary for the payment of the wages of these men. There are hon, members of this House was contend that the Government must be held responsible for the payment of the wages of labourers engaged on public works, even when they are engaged under contractors. Would this House justify the Minister of Railways and Canals if he allowed these "hundreds and thousands of men," as the hon. member for Queen's says, to go unpaid? It was certainly necessary that the Government should see that at least sufficient money was paid, to pay the labourers who had been engaged upon the work. large sum was retained long before the perpetration of these frauds had been ascertained. I have no wish to detain the House in going over the facts with which hon, members are well acquainted, but I would point out when these frauds were actually discovered. As I have said, they were not discovered by the commissioners-the commissioners only suspected that there was something wrong, and that there should be further investigation. The Minister cmployed detectives to assist the commission, and still nothing was discovered. Mr. St. Louis brings an action which is tried in the Exchequer Court, and there the fact is revealed that, for some reason or another, certainly imputing fraud, he had destroyed his books. That called for an adjournment and for further investigation there. And at that stage of the proceedings a letter was received from the person. Frigon, who writes to the Minister a private letter proposing to make revelations. On receiving that letter, the Minister of Public Works has Frigon subpoenaed before the Public Accounts Committee. And there starts a new inquiry, a new drift in the evidence; and there the real nature of the frauds is discovered. Now, that is after all the payments are made: that is after the Government has refused to pay any more; that is after action has been brought by this Mr. St. Louis for the balance he claims is due him; that is after the Government had set up a claim for money they had over-paid. All these things took place long after the payments, and it is not right to impute to the Minister of Railways and Canais, knowledge of these frauds at the time the payments were made. However, the Minister's suspicions had been roused, and he had taken every means in his power—appointing a commission, employing private detectives, and so on—for the purpose of finding out the facts; but it was not until this late date that the facts were discovered. As the hon, member for Queen's properly puts it, the question really is: How far is the Minister of Railways responsible? How far is the Government responsible? If you could bring to them knowledge of this fraud when they made the payments, if you could bring to them knowledge of the fact that the pay-rolls had been stuffed, that they were fraudulent, and that after that knowledge came to them the payments were made. then there would be some excuse for the argument of my hon. friend that the Minister should be held responsible. Now, as I said before, with the knowledge we now have, the matter is certainly bad enough, but there is no excuse for making it worse than it is, no excuse for imputing motives. and no excuse for attaching more responsibility to the Minister than the circumstances of the case demand. I can make a reasonable excuse for hon, gentlemen opposite. They have been snapping at phantom baits so long, they have made so many mistakes snapping at something which they found to be only a shadow, that when they do get something that is tangible, something that they can close their teeth upon, I do not object to them taking all the pleasure out of it they possibly can, and rolling it over and over as a sweet morsel under their tongue. But I do ask them to be honest in setting forth the time and the circumstances under which the knowledge came to the Minister, and when responsibility should begin to attach to him. Now, a great deal has been said as to the amount. I do not think that so far as this question goes, the amount is at all material to the argument. Mr. McLeod, in his evidence before the Exchequer Court, makes his estimate at $225,-000, of which $65,000 was then being sued for by Mr. St. Louis, and $160,000 the Government was then claiming to have repaid. Now, as to the action of the Government in prosecuting Mr. St. Louis, and the state-ment that other men should be prosecuted, I think the facts are too well-known to require repeating. The Government did strike at the man whom we all agree, I think, was the principal offender, the originator of the conspiracy, perhaps the one who profited most by the conspiracy. He has been sued for the recovery of the money in a civil action, he has been prosecuted before the courts, so far as this Government had power to prosecute him. As to the result of the prosecution, that is certainly one thing for which the Government cannot be held responsible. If the grand jury chooses to ignore a bill, that is a provincial matter, it is under the control of a provincial prosecutor, and if, either by a blunder of the provincial prosecutor, or by the perverseness of the grand jury, a bill is ignored, the Government certainly cannot be held responsible. Now as to the other parties who might be held responsible, I do not wish even to insinuate that any of the officers who have been named, are guilty of wilful misconduct. That there has been carelessness on the part of those immediately in charge, no person can deny. Mr. Kennedy gives his excuses, Mr. Parent gives his excuses, other men give their excuses, and from their own stories, they are all honourable men, innocent men, illused men. But while not wishing to insinuate, much less charge, direct and wilful corruption on the part of any ere of them, I do think that they all are responsible for a certain amount of carelessness. A good deal might be said in the way of throwing responsibility upon the Deputy Minister, or the chief engineer. but I, for one, object to making a scapegoat of any official. I think that the Minister has done an action worthy of praise when he has refused to let his chief engineer be made a scapegoat on this occasion. Before taking my seat, I will refer to some remarks that fell from the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson). I will not follow him in reading the report: I will not follow him in repeating what is well known, that there was an acessive expenditure, that there were frauds perpetrated. That has been admitted from the first, was admitted last year by the Minister, although at the time the evidence was not as complete as it is now. But the hon, member for Lincoln attempted to make a point against the Minister of Railways by referring to the evidence of Mr. Hannaford. He made the assertion, an assertion made in this House last year and then refuted, an assertion that was not borne out by the evidence, that Mr. Hannaford had offered to build the bridge for $70,000 on behalf of the Grand Trunk Railway. But Mr. Hannaford in his evidence is very particular to say that he did not make any such offer. and when the question was put to him if he did make the offer on behalf of the Grand Trunk Railway, he said distinctly that he did not, and instead he produces the offer that was made. Now, the offer that was made is in the form of a letter. I will not trouble the House with reading that letter, for it speaks for itself. It is an offer to do the work according to the season of the year. They would do the work and charge for the labour; in other words, they would put themselves in the position of Mr. St. Louis, and they would employ the labour, they would keep the time, and they would charge 15 per cent for their trouble. That was really the offer, but it was not an offer to build the bridge for $70,000. It is quite true that Mr. Hannaford makes an estimate of $70,000 as the amount for which the bridge could be built. It is true that he says, after the thing is done, that he could have built the bridge for that sum. But it is no new thing after a contract is let, and after the work is done, for people to get up and say that they could have done it for a great deal less than it cost, and could have made a handsome profit out of it. That is a common thing, and for whatever the statement is worth, Mr. Hannaford made it. But he did not say that the Grand Trunk Railway had ever offered to do it. He would not offer to do it, because he knew Mr. Schreiber to be a hard man; he knew that Mr. Schreiber exacted that the work should be well done, that he was a man who would keep the contractor's nose down to the grindstone until the work was properly completed.

he would undertake to build the bridge in a certain manner, keeping track of the time and the expenses, and adding 15 per cent for the trouble. That really is the essence of Mr. Hannaford's statement. The hon. gentleman has gone further, and said that it was for 19 feet navigation. He is justified in taking that position, because Mr. Hannaford uses the expression of 19 feet, but the real plan was for 18 feet, which means of course a little more on the sill. The engineer gave the estimates in detail for that work. Afterwards the advisability was considered of increasing the depth, and these estimates are given in the report: 18 feet navigation with old abutments partly taken down and rebuilt. $103.934; with superstructure, $168,-286, or in round figures, $170,000. Another estimate was made for 18 feet navigation with abutments carried down, and another estimate for 20 feet navigation. The cost for 20 feet navigation was estimated at $138,000. Then there is an estimate for 22 feet navigation, which was the one on which actual: estimates were given, the amount being $151.648. There are other certain small matters, of which the details are given. These estimates show a very great difference, ranging from $170,000 to $250,000 for the work to done including the superstructure. have in contradiction of the carefully prepared estimate of the engineerin-charge, the bald statement of Mr. Hannaford that he would have done the extra work for $8,000. The hon, gentleman enlarged and grew eloquent on the fact that 1,018,000 feet of lumber had disappeared, and he, following the line laid down by the hon, member for Queen's, sought to charge the Minister with having knowledge of that when Mr. Douglas made his report, although as a matter of fact, the first official notice he had was in January following, or over ten months after Mr. Douglas's report. I do not consider it necessary to consider the position of the various parties, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Parent and others in this matter. Mr. Parent was spoken of as overseer, and we find he objected to being overseer of the Grand Trunk Railway bridge. What were his reasons for wishing to be relieved of that position might be explained by him, but it showed that he suspected trouble, and on the recommendation of the engineer he was relieved. In closing, I would briefly resume the position I take, which is that the nature of the work, the time within which it was completed, the fact that it was not to interfere with navigation, that it was to interfere as little as possible with the use of the water-power, all these are points that must be taken into consideration as justifying the nature of the contract. In addition, we have the distinct recommendation which the Minister, as stated by the hon. member for Queen's, was apparently loath to act upon, that it should be done in this exceptional in a large measure to labouring men. manner. These are the circumstances which, It is certainly, I think, too much to ask that

He would not enter into a contract, but in the opinion of the officer, demanded that the work should be done in this exceptional way, and the recommendation of the officer, after being fully considered by the Minister. was adopted. Then in judging when the responsibility of the Minister began in regard to payments made on account of the contract, we must consider the manner in which the progress estimates came in. That is a very important feature of the case. To my mind it shows that in the very inception of the arrangement some person was there laying a plot to defraud the Government, to make unjust gain. We find the returns were kept back, as shown by the reports which came in of the amount of work done at certain times, and on 1st March when the "Star" article appeared, only $37,000 had been reported in progress estimates, and about the same time $29,000 more were reported. The smallness of those amounts justified the Minister in not attaching, perhaps, weight to the "Star" complaint and exposure at the time. The Government are, of course, so accustomed to hear charges of corruption made against them and complaints as to the manner in which they are carrying out work, that comparatively little attention is often paid to newspaper articles. Then there is the fact that this House was in session, and the Minister engaged in his Parliamentary duties and extra duties connected with the session. so that he had little time personal supervision of the duties of his office. But admitting the Minister's duty to look after the duties of his office and to scrutinize them and prevent any possibility of stuffing the pay-rolls or anything of that kind, what opportunity had the Minister up to that time to make even an investigation? Then the "Star" article appeared, and the Government took action appointing Mr. Douglas to make an investigation, and his report was duly made, which instead of inspiring alarm allayed it, for it shows that the work was being well done although ex-pensively done. Further progress estimates were received, and the Minister refused to pay some of them because they were beyond the appropriation made, and then as the appointment of a commission appeared to be justified, a commission was duly appointed. As to the labour of that commission, the volumes published show the evidence taken. and that even with the aid of a detective the commissioners were unable to put their finger on any act of fraud except in regard to lumber, although they expressed suspicion as to the manner in which the pay-rolls had been made up, these facts certainly showing that there was nothing to prove that the Minister had knowledge of these frauds up to the time of that report. In considering the large amount of payments made, and especially those made to Mr. St. Louis, respecting which frauds were alleged, it must be remembered that those payments were made

On the out attempting to defend the Minister of contrary, the prompt action taken by the Min-Railways. I surely thought the Minister of ister when the first article appeared in the Finance, as leader of the House, would have monthly progress estimates coming in; his of Railways, but I faucy he begins to think mission, before any question was raised in in a little while, and that one bridge is Parliament, commands the respect of this enough for any man. So, when he is done House and of the country. The appointment defending his own bridge scandal, he also of a commission of inquiry was a voluntary act on the part of the Minister before any House has withdrawn from the scene, for political party in this House had brought the matter up, and the energetic manner in which he pressed that inquiry is something we ought to commend rather than to condemn.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, for the number of years that I have sat in this House I have never witnessed such a pitiable exhibition on the part of the Cabinet Ministers. One of their confreres is charged with a neglect of duty, and with a political disgrace, the equal of which has never been heard in this Chamber, and not one of them rises to defend it. I thought there might be some member of the Cabinet who had manliness enough or gratitude enough to defend the unfortunate position that the Minister of Railways has got into. If no one else, then the Secretary of State, who owes his position to the Minister of Railways, if he owes it to any man, should be willing to honour his progenitor to the extent of getting on his legs and saying a word in his defence. But no, the Secretary of State fights shy of this case, and does not defend the Minister of Railways. I presume that the Selicitor General is disposed to treat the Minister of Railways after the fashion that the Minster of Railways treated his own constituents. The Minister of Railways told us, with regard to the Tay Canal. that he had just as good a right to have public money spent in his constituency as any man in the House, and I suppose the Solicitor General now says to the Minister of Railways: My boy, I have you in a hole this time; I have got the money spent in my constituency; I have just as good a night to have the public managed and a sight to have the sight to have the sight to have the sight to have the sight to have t right to have the public money squandered there as you had to squander it in the county of Perth. The Solicitor General is prepared to justify the extravagance in connection with the Curran bridge on the same principle as the Minister of Railways justified the expenditure on the Tay Canal. I did expect that the Minister of Public Works might have something to say in defence of his colleague; but I suppose that that hon. gen-the Government should take the responsitionan has come to the conclusion that by bility of keeping these hundreds and thout the time he gets through defending his partsands of labouring men out of their daily ner's and relations he will have enough wage, until, by a long process of investigation attend to. He will, no doubt, have was mixed "Star." and immediately upon the large said something in defence of the Minister prompt action. I say, in appointing a com- that he has a bridge of his own to defend will have his hands full. The leader of the he is not in his seat, and so the Minister of Railways is left largely alone without any man to take his part. They put up the hon, member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to defend him. That hon, gentleman told us of some things which the "Globe" had foreshadowed, but he said that he did not know anything about them. I am prepared to admit that confession of the hon, member (Mr. Bennett) to be quite true, but I am sure that, if everything he does not know were written, it would fill books. I contend, Sir, that this is a case which deserves the serious consideration of every member of this House, and if, on the eve of a general election, the majority of members are prepared to condone the scandalous extragavances and inexcusable neglect which has characterized this whole thing from start to finish, then they deserve that the electorate of this country should spew them out of their mouths. Are we going to allow Ministers of the Crown to quietly wink at and to allow extravagances of this kind to be perpetrated, and money stolen under their very eyes. The Minister of Railways knew that this work was going on in Montreal, three and a half hours' train journey from his office. but he did not attend to it. If there is a political meeting to be attended three or four hundred miles away, the special car is at the command of himself and his friends; but here within a short distance of Montreal, with his engineer at his elbow, with his full office staff at hand, and understanding the fact that he had reason to know that wrong-doing was going on, notwithstanding the announcement of the Montreal Star" that the enormous number of 1.300 men were engaged on that work, he neither went down there or sent his engineer, nor any officer from his department to find out the facts. Then, Sir. when the judge came to deal with the whole case as to how the money had been stolen, he pointed out in his decision that the contract was so loosely drawn that the stealing was virtually provided for in the contract, and that there was no difficulty in the way of this fraud.

After full and careful investigation, the that these things might happen. judge pointed out that these irregularities the estimate, I said to our people: were actually invited by the terms of the going to be a margin of perhaps $10,000. contract. Now, Sir, any person who will decision of the judge and the royal commission ef the report must come to the conclusion that from the beginning to the end of this whole transaction there has been gross neglect of duty on the part of the Minister of Railways. For him to attempt to saddle the responsibility upon the officers of his department would be unjust to those officers. The others of every department are under the direction of the head of the department. If the head of the department commands them to pay attention to a certain contract, it is their duty to do it; if they are not in-structed to attend to it, it is not their duty to do it. The Minister of Railways does contract, and it was then that the Grand not appear to have given instructions on Trunk Company proposed to do the work one single occasion to look carefully on by days' labour, and to keep a proper acthe progress of that contract, and the manrer in which it was being carried out. The Lon, gentleman who last spoke said there was no necessity for making the case worse than it is. Well, I question if any one could I do not think it would be possible to show more clearly and distinctly the gross neglect and guilt of the Minister; of Railways in connection with this case than it is shown by the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee, and; by the finding of the royal commission. Still, hon, gentlemen opposite are evidently disposed to treat the matter lightly-to took at it as an incident in the political history of this country which will, in time, face out of the public mind; and I suppose that some Minister will get up and give us an answer, quoting some ancient history. When it became necessary for the Secretary of State to defend the National Policy, he went back four hundred years; and, in this case, some Minister may go back and hunt up some little scandal like the Neebing Hotel, or the Fort Francis Lock, or the steel rail contract, and cite it as a kind of excuse for the Curran bridge, by trying to prove that two blacks make a white. We are accustomed to that kind of argument from hon, gentlemen opposite. When they get completely cornered, they always try to creep out of the difficulty in that way. The hon, gentleman who last addressed the House said the Grand Trunk Company had never offered to construct the bridge for Well, we have the sworn evidence of Mr. Hannaford as to that, and this is what he states:

CONTROL OF THE PARTY OF T

By Mr. Lister:

Q. But $70,000 would have covered substructure, and superstructure, and everything else?—A. Yes, sir, and the only difference between us and the Government was this: I did feel, and feel to-day, that the estimate of $70,000 was too high. I wanted to clear myself of it; I put in the estithe day before Christmas. It was a large estimate. There were several large very large estimate. items in it, but I knew, being an old Montrealer,

He would have taken the contract for $70.-000, and would have made out of it. $10.-000 for the company. The Minister of Railways, in the person of his chief engineer, waited upon Mr. Hannaford in his office, and asked him to make an offer. Hannaford did put in the estimate of $70,-000, and there was no reply. The chief engineer never asked the Grand Trunk Company to go on with the construction of the work until months afterwards. That was in December. In February, when the canal was frozen, and the material for building structure. and the superstructure, the had been taken away, the department proposed to give the Grand Trunk Company the count of the number of men employed upon it. Now, when the statement appeared in the Montreal "Star," with regard to 1.300 men being employed, did the Minister go to Montreal, or send his chief engineer to find out what was wrong? No. They telephoned for the pay-rolls: but nobody went down or attempted to inspect the work in order to ascertain whether the statement made in the "Star" was correct or not. But the chief engineer admits that Mr. Stewart was going down to Montreal, not on that business, and he asked him to pass by the work and take a note of what he saw, as to the manner in which the work was proceeding, the number of hands employed, and so on. Well, he did that, and he conveyed his impression to the chief engineer on his return. even then, neither the hon. Minister nor the chief engineer went down to look at the work. On the 25th April, the Minister signed a cheque for $74.777. It has been clearly proven that the department, at that time. had information that the work was being extravagantly done: but that did not deter the Minister from paying the money. or cause him to make any inquiry before signing that cheque, and hading it over to the contractor. Some time after the commission was appointed the Minister also sanctioned the payment of $99,000. Surely he must have known, when the commission was appointed that there was evidence of wrong-doing; there never would have been a commission if there has not been such evidence. But in the face of the revelations that had been made in the press, and otherwise, he was quite willing to pay over this $99,000. Now it appears that there was a dispute between Mr. Parent and Mr. Kennedy as to which of them was in charge of the work. Kennedy claimed absolute control and Parent was chief engineer in charge. However. Kennedy appears to have taken the leading part and to have challenged the right of Parent to interfere with him in the discharge of his duties. I have looked over some of the items in connection with the report, signed by the commission that investigated the whole question, and in the face of all the points set out and substantiated in this report. I cannot understand how hon, gentleman opposite can have brass enough—even knowing their willingness to defend almost anything—to attempt to defend the extraordinary extravagance connected with this whole job from start to finish. In looking over the report, it is quite clear that irregularity after irregularity existed, that injustice after injustice was committed, and that extravagance upon extravagance was the rule. Men hired during the day and paid double during the night, and the contractor also making double rates. In this report I notice that in one of the clauses the commissioners say:

There are a number of cheques remaining in the department unclaimed. The cheques cashed at the bank were endorsed by Kennedy, and the time-keepers witnessed the marks of the men in whose favour they were made.

Such transactions have been going on up to the present; and yet with all the evidences of irregularity from day to day, St. I cuis is the only man who has been put under arrest. We have had the Government on several occasions declare that they would lay their hands on all the culprits and that punishment to the full extent of what these men deserve would be meted out to them. Up to the present, however, we have had none put under arrest, except St. Louis, and he has been relieved by the grand jury from the charge preferred against him by the Minister of Justice. Previous to that he had been relieved by the police magistrate from the same charge, so that to-day there is no one under arrest. A few years ago, when the Minister of Justice was stating to the House the condition of the proceedings in the criminal prosecution against St. Louis, he gave as a reason why no other men were arrested that he did not wish to proceed against men whom possibly he might require in another capacity, until such time as the case against St. Louis was disposed of, or in such a shape that justice would be meted out to him. St. Louis is now free, and there is nothing, I presume, that the Government intend doing with regard to him. Why is it some of the other culprits have not been arrested? Where are the men who are guilty of irregularities? Where are the men who professed to witness the marks to cheques of men who never had an existence? It has been shown that cheques were made out payable to men who never received either the cheques or the money, and those cheques were cashed through the pretended marks of these men being witnessed to. The marks of men who were able to sign their names were witnessed to on cheques, and the money drawn by others than those to whom the cheques were payable. I would like to day and night, or two men, working twenty-know why the guilty parties in these cases have not been arrested. Again, when you take the number of hours of labour on these two bridges, which are only a few yards apart, you find that on the bridge which required the least labour the greatest number of hours is charged. The total number of hours charged on the Grand Trunk Railway bridge was 618.929, and on the Wellingtor bridge, which required the greatest amount of labour, the number of hours was 572.786. This clearly shows that the contractors took the greatest advantage of the looseness with which the Wellington Street bridge was managed during construction, in the first place, and then took every advantage that they possibly could in putting up the Grand Trunk Railway bridge. Had they another bridge to build they could have, under the looseness that characterized the whole inspection from beginning to end. doubled the amount. The commissioners again say:

Time-keepers are charged as foremen or mechanics. Some of the clerks in Mr. St. Louis' private office are entered in the Government paysheets and received their wages out of the public money.

Men in the office of St. Louis, who were not engaged on the work at all, were entered on the Government pay-lists, and paid out of Government money as skilled labourers. I wonder if the men who sanctioned this gross piece of robbery can be found. Surely they can be detected and brought to justice. We have many other such evidences of recklessness. The commissioners report:

On the Wellington bridge the cost of the cartage per cubic yard is, approximately, 78 cents. while on the Grand Trunk Railway bridge it is $1.80, or nearly 2½ times that on the Wellington.

Then, the contract for labour, according to his accounts for the Grand Trunk, would have a profit of 50 cents a day upon a single cart, and $1.75 upon the same at night.

Again, the commissioners, say:

If we calculate in like manner the cost of labour per cubic yard for work done, skilled labour on the Wellington bridge amounts to 57 cents per cubic yard; on the Grand Trunk Railway, $1.69; ordinary labour on the Wellington bridge, $1.20; Grand Trunk Railway, $2.80.

Again, the commissioners in their report,

The percentage of night work for skilled labour is: on the Wellington bridge, 16 per cent; on the Grand Trunk Railway, 36 per cent. Of ordinary labour for night work on the Wellington bridge, 18 per cent; on the Grand Trunk Railway, 38 per cent. Of foremen for night work on the Wellington bridge. 20 per cent; on the Grand Trunk Railway. 44 per cent. The contractor for labour, paying $3 a day for a foreman and the same at might and the same at night, would receive $1 profit for day work and $3 profit for night.

So that owing to the loose manner in which the contract was let, St. Louis was able in this way to take out of one man, working four hours, no less a sum that $4. This evidently not ready to share the responsi-was the way the money went owing to the bolity of this Curran bridge matter. The losseness in which the contract was let. I hon. Minister of Justice was not in either. looseness in which the contract was let. I can very honestly commend to the serious consideration of hon, members before recording their vote, a careful perusal of this report of the royal commission. It is unquestionably a report that should be carefully considered, because hon, gentlemen opposite are prepared to assume the responsibility of sustaining the Minister of Railways in this transaction which, in my opinion, is a most unforunate and indefensible one. I regret exceedingly, in the interests of the people, that this House should be called upon to pass upon a transaction of this kind, which bears from the start to the thrish such evidence of recklessness and want of ability and disregard of the public I believe that the people hold interest. strongly the opinion that gentlemen opposite have not among them, men of the ability, the foresight, the extendexperience and knowledge edable them efficiently to conduct the affairs of the country. I contend that the Cabinet, as now constituted, has made more mistakes than any other Cabinet for This affair of the Curran many years. bridge is one of some years ago, but it does not stand alone; there are many affairs of a similar nature. Upon the Opposition is cast the responsibility of exposing these transactions. Hon, gentleman may think that it is pleasant for us to expose these wrongs; but I can assure them that it is most unpleasant. We would much prefer that such things did not exist; but as these scandals exist year after year, and session after session, we cannot but expose them, in order that the public may be informed, and that they may understand the incapacity and reckless disregard of the people's interest which characterize the administration of gentlemen opposite. We have had a good many of these scandals, and we earnestly hope that the day of better things will soon dawn, when public affairs will be handled by men under whose administration there will be no more Curran bridge scandals. The country is sick, and has reason to be sick. of these scandals, year after year, and session after session. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I notice, is looking very wisely at me. He was not in the House when I was drawing attention to the fact that no member of the Cabinet had been ready to rise and defend the Min-

We did expect him, at least, to rise and defend his colleague, because he has political stamina enough to defend anything. But, Sir, he has not risen. The Minister of Finance, as I said before, has his own bridge trouble, and that is quite enough for him. We have had a good many of these bridge scandals, but I can tell hon, gentlemen opposite that it will take a stronger and a longer bridge than any they have built to carry them over the difficulties they will have to face when they go to the country. I notice the Controller of Customs appears to be amused, and claps his hands. No doubt he expects, after the next throw of the dice, to occupy a front place. I know that he has felt very uncomfortable in the chilly air outside the Council Chamber. He would feel much more comfortable to be inside and to be allowed to give his advice upon the handling of public matters. Well, I believe, honestly, notwithstanding, as I admit quite frankly, that I have no very exalted opinion of the hon, gentleman's abilities, that a Council consisting of men even of the very limited ability of the Controller of Customs would be able to do considerably better than the Cabinet now existing. I do not desire further to detain the House, but I say in closing that I hope every elector of this country will read for himself the debate upon this question, and will study the report of the commission on the Curran bridge, and I hope that every elector will go to the polls and record his vote under the convictions he is sure to come to after reading that report, and thus we shall get rid of bridge and other scandals.

Mr. McLENNAN. I have listened to a great deal about scandals since I have been in this House, and have been forced to the conclusion that if these scandals were taken away from the Opposition they would have very little left. The hon, gentleman who preceded me spoke of the other Ministers not supporting the hon. Minister of Railways. The Hon. Minister of Railways is quite able to take care of himself. So much is said about details that are not interesting that, as I have no wish to tire the House, I will deal with the matter as briefly as I can. Gentlemen opposite speak of the cost of the Curran bridge. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) told us that an estimate was made by Mr. Hannaford after the work was completed. We have often heard of these estimates made after the work is completed. The hon, member himself talked a good deal about the extravagance of the Government in connection with the Kingston Dry Dock, yet he himself put in a tender for that work amounting to $100,000 more than it actually cost. I think it ill-becomes him under such circumister of Railawys. The hon, gentleman is stances to make such charges. As I understand, the cost of the Curran bridge was about $430,000; and the estimated it appears in the public records was about $250,000. In the first instance, it was a depth of 14 feet, then they wanted a depth of 18 feet, and finally a depth of 22 feet. Now, the excess of the amount over and above the $250,000, is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $180,000. $63,000 of that was never paid Mr. St. Louis, he sued the Government in the Exchequer court, but failed, and this money has never been paid to him. Then the Government brought a criminal action against Mr. St. Louis in which, I understand, they have failed. But the Government are preferring a claim against him for $143,000, to be tried in the and there every Exchequer Court. is reason to believe that the Government will recover from Mr. St. Louis, any amount that he was paid over and above what was justly due him. If the Government could recover this $120,000, that will even things up, and will cover the amount of $180,000 which was the excess over the estimated cost of the bridge. Now, I am not going to pretend that no fraud has been perpetrated upon the Government; I am not going to try to screen any one. I think if a man does a wrong, he should be punished, and believe that was the feeling of the Government. They wanted this man punished, and they brought criminal action against him. They have already successfully resisted his claim for $63,000, and they are now trying to recover this $143,000 from him.

Now a great deal has been said about the cost of this work, and the wages. Any for that fraud. You can no more blame him man who has been in the habit of doing than you could blame the general manager work must understand that circumstances of a bank for the misconduct of one of his may alter the rate of wages. For instance, submanagers at a branch of the bank. We if you are working in water, or in an un-know that bank managers have perpetrated comfortable place, you have got to pay more frauds, and left the country, taking with wages to keep men there. In the next place, them all the money they could lay their every hon, gentleman knows that it is more hands on. Does the fact that a subordinate expensive to do Government work than it bank official has committed fraud, reflect is to do work for a private individual, or a upon the honesty or the honour of the private contractor. People take every possible advantage of the Government. Then regard to the pay sheets and the estimates, we must remember that much of this work we know that on public works, men are had to be done at night, and had to be rush- usually paid once a month. This work had ed through hurriedly, and there is no doubt to be put through, I believe, in two or three that it cost a great deal more than it would months, as it was necessary that the water have cost if it had been done in the should be let into the canal on the 1st May. daytime. Again, as was pointed out a short I believe the last pay-sheets before time ago, when work has to be done in a completion limited time, and hurriedly; when it is absolutely necessary as in this case, that it be is 12 days before that work was suppushed through as fast as possible, it is posed to be completed, and before the canal also necessary to put on additional plant, had to be opened. Until the Government got and a large number of men, and no these pay-sheets, they could not possibly be others way; but that is always the case when they did get them, the amount upon when you have to put on a larger number of men than would be necessary if you had a longer time in which to do the work. I can where the work had to be put through in a hurry. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had taken several years in which to do that work, instead of doing it in the short time in which they did accomplish it, they could have done it for two-thirds of the money that it has cost them. But very properly they decided to push the work through as fast as possible in order that they might utilize the part of the road already constructed, for the construction of the rest of the road, and in order that they might get some benefit for the money they had already expended. such circumstances the work cost them more, and it always must cost more to do work in haste than when you have plenty of time. In connection with this bridge a large quantity of ice had to be removed, and it is sometimes more expensive to take out ice than it is to take out rock. No man going there after the work was done, can have the slightest idea of the amount of ice that had to be removed, and the amount of labour that it required to do it. The hon, member for Queen's says there was a fraud perpetrated, and he asks who perpetrated that fraud, That is a very proper question to ask. But is there one hon, member in this House who can say that any Minister of this Government ever perpetrated a fraud since they have been in power? Is there any member of this House who can honestly bring a direct charge against any of the Ministers of having perpetrated a fraud upon the country to the extent of one dollar. is it possible for the Government to watch these large gangs of men? I say you cannot blame the Minister of Railways and Canals the last pay-sheets were put in on the April for the month of March, when they did get them, the amount upon these pay-sheets appeared reasonable and not alarming, considering the amount of the estimate for doing the work. I underspeak from my own experience with a constant that on the 18th April, there was only tract on the north shore of Lake Superior, $13,541 put in for labour. If there was only $13,541 returned for labour, everybody will alarming admit that that was not an amount. It was not an amount calculated to arouse suspicion. Now I must say that I think the conduct of the Minister of Railways in his department has been all through of the most economical character, and it illbecomes hon, gentlemen opposite, especially, to attack him on the ground of extravagance. For instance, if we take the Intercolonial Railway, when they were in power, there was a deficit in connection with that road of over half a million dollars a year, but the present Minister of Railways has managed that road so economically that the deficit has been wiped away. The fairest way to deal with a matter of this kind is to make an equitable comparison. I am not anxious to present anything but what I believe to be correct, and I will endeavour to furnish facts which will bear out my statements. Hon, gentlemen opposite have spoken of neglected duty, political disgrace, and so on. I have here a list of contracts let between 1873 and 1878, and I wish to show the dates on which they were let, to whom they were let, and how they were let. I propose to read a few extracts from the report of the Royal Commission on the Canadian Pacific Railway. This is in regard to the first contract; I cannot go into the whole matter at length, but I will deal with the first contract, which was let very soon after they came into power, and there is no reason why they should not be as honest then as during the balance of their term of office. I now refer to the contract for telegraph line north of Lake Manitoba. That line was built, and the money was practically thrown away. The country never got the benefit of one dollar of the expenditure, and the only men who received any benefit were the contractors, and those engaged in the work. After giving the contract to build the line, and finishing it, the Government paid so much for its maintenance during five years, and received no return whatever from I quote from the examination of Mr. Trudeau, Deputy Minister of Railways:

62. Upon what subject was your first contract? The first contract was for the construction of a telegraph.

63. At what date was the contract made?—On the 17th October, 1874.

64. Have you the contract here ?—I have.

65. Give me the names of the contracting parties ?-The contract was between John W. Sifton. of the city of London; David Glass, of the same place, and Michael Fleming, of the town of Sarnia, under the name of Sifton Glass & Company.

78. Was the section 1, the telegraph line, the subject of the first contract?—It was.

79. Please read from that statement the name of the person who makes the lowest tender ?-R.

Fuller, of Winnipeg.

80. Does the work include only the construction of the line, or the maintenance as well?—The tender is for work of two kinds, construction and maintenance.

81. What is Mr. Fuller's tender for the construction?—The rate per mile is $155; for the gross contract, $38,750.

82. What is his tender for maintenance?—$6,000 per annum.

83. For how many years ?—Five years.

84. Then, for construction and five years' maintenance his whole price is how much ?-$68,750.

85. Who makes the next lowest tender ?—H. P. Dwight, of the North-west Telegraph Company.

86. How much does he ask for construction ?-$225 per mile; $56,250 for the contract.

87. What is his offer for maintenance for five years ?-$30 per mile per year.

88. Was there any estimate of that in the aggregate?—Yes, $7,500 per annum.

89. Then, that is equal to $37,500 for the maintenance; what is the gross amount for the construction and maintenance asked by Mr. Dwight? -$93,750.

90. Who makes the next lowest tender ?-Waddle & Smith, of Kingston.

91. What is their price for construction?— $106,250.

92. What is their price for five years' maintenance ?-$3,000 per annum, $15,000 for the five

93. Then, the gross amount for construction and maintenance for five years is how much ?-$121,-250.

94. Who makes the next lowest tender?—Sifton, Glass & Fleming.

95. What is their price for construction ?-$107.-

. 96. What is their price for five years' maintenance ?-My recollection of it just now is, that this was a subject of correspondence.

97. Have you the correspondence ?—I have not. 98. Have you the original tender made by Mr. Fuller ?—I have. (Exhibit No. 2.)

99. Have you the original tender of Mr. Dwight?

-Yes. (Exhibit No. 3.) 100. Have you the original tender of Waddle &

Smith ?-Yes. (Exhibit No. 4.) 101. Have you the original tender of Sifton & Glass ?—Yes. (Exhibit No. 5.) 102. In this tender of Sifton, Glass & Co., there is no allusion made to maintenance of the line? -No. 103. You say that was a subject of correspondence; have you any correspondence amounting to a tender for that branch of the work?—At present I am not able to produce that original correspondence, but I believe I can do so at a future time.

104. These are the gentlemen who got the contract ?-Yes.

105. Was there, so far as you know, any objection to Mr. Fuller's character ?-No, there was none.

120. In addition to the prices called for by tenders, some terms as to time of completion were asked for ?-Yes.

121. What terms did Fuller offer ?-He offered to complete it within the year 1874.

122. What was Dwight's offer on that subject? -Dwight's offer was to complete it on the 1st of September, 1875.

123. What was the offer of Waddle & Smith?— Five hundred miles a year.

124. What was the offer of Sifton & Glass ?-Tocomplete it against the 22nd of November, 1874.

125. Do you know whether the contractors asked for an extension of time?—They did.

126. When ?—In a letter dated the 9th of July, 1875.

127. How long did they ask for ?- They stated that it would be quite out of their power to complete the work by the time named in their contract, and they asked for an extension of time up to the 30th October, 1876.

128. Would you look at the contract, and see if is the same as that named in their tender ?-The time named for the completion in the contract is the 30th October, 1875.

129. That is nearly a year longer than the time mentioned in the tender ?-Yes.

130. So that the contract gives them better terms than the tender calls for on that subject?

133. Then the next lowest tender was from Waddell & Smith. Do you know if they were willing to take the contract?—I can only infer from the fact that they tendered that they were willing to take the work.

134. Your opinion is that they were willing ?-

135. Have you any means of knowing now when tenders were to be received by the department for this work?—The advertisement said up to the 22nd of July, 1874.

136. Look at the tender of Sifton & Glass, and say what time that was received by the department?-There is a stamp on it marked July 22nd.

137. Is that the last day named ?-Yes.

138. You find that stamp on part of the envelope attached to the tender?—Yes.

139. And from that, you are of the opinion that it was received on that day ?-Yes.

140. Is it the practice to attach portions of the envelopes to all the tenders ?-Yes, as much as we can.

141. Is it attached to Fuller's tender ?-I do not see it in Fuller's contract.

142. Is there any envelope showing Dwight's tender was received for Section 1 ?-It has none.

143. Has Waddell & Smith's ?-No.

144. Are you aware of any special reason for attaching the envelope to the tender of Sifton & Glass ?-There is no reason.

145. Do you notice any alterations in their tender from the tender as it originally stood?-There are.

146. Are they to reduce the price or raise it ?-

They reduce the price.

147. In what respect? Will you state it in each instance as it was originally, and as it was altered ?-It was originally written thus: "In our estimate we placed the wood line from Fort Garry to Winnipeg River, and from Fort Garry to Fort Pelly at $529." This is altered to "$492.00 per Pelly at $529." This is altered to "$492.00 per mile"; also, "the prairie land within a distance of 250 miles of Fort Garry at $209 per mile" was changed to "$189.00 per mile."

Hon, gentlemen will see that the Liberal Government changed the tenders of their friends after they received them.

148. In the document which you produce as the tender which reached you on 22nd July, do you find any positive offer for Section No. 1?—No.

149. That document is in effect a tender for the whole line ?-Yes.

150. I think they mention there the rates for this particular section upon which they base their offer for the whole line ?-Yes.

151. Is that the only allusion to Section 1 in the document ?-Yes.

152. Can you tell by that portion of the envelope attached to the contract where the letter was mailed ?—No.

153. Where is the letter dated from ?letter is dated at Ottawa on the 22nd of July.

154. What is the post mark on it?—There is no postmark on it at all.

155. Then there is no evidence here with the

the time named therein for completing the work document that it passed through the post office? -No.

156. Have you not yet obtained any of the original correspondence with Sifton, Glass & Company, as to the maintenance of the line?—Yes, but I have not yet assorted it.

157. Can you give any reason why Waddle & Smith did not get the contract in preference to Sifton, Glass & Fleming?—Waddle & Smith were offered the contract for section No. 5, but they failed to procure securities.

158. When did that happen? When did they fail to procure securities?—Section No. 5 became contract No. 4 later.

159. You say that the contract for No. 5 was offered to Waddle & Smith, but that they failed to give security.-Yes.

They tendered for No. 1, and not for No. 5. There was very light bush on the contract they tendered for, and very heavy bush on the other. Naturally, they would not take No. 5 at the prices of their tender for No. 1, and, as a matter of fact, a very much higher price was paid for that sec-tion afterwards to other contractors, Oliver & Davidson, friends of the Government.

160. When was it known to the department that they had failed to give security ?-On the 21st of October, 1874.

161. That was the reason for passing over their tender and giving the contract to Sifton, Glass & Fleming ?-Yes.

162. What is the date of the contract to Sifton, Glass & Fleming ?—The 17th of October.

Thus they did not know they were not going to give security until the 21st October, or some days after the contract was awarded to Sifton, Glass & Co.

180. If you look at the contract of Sifton, Glass & Fleming, can you not say whether they are to get anything more than $20,000 for five years' maintenance?—They ask, "with profits."

181. Have you any reason to know how the persons who tendered for this work considered their prices to be affected by the privilege of taking profits ?-Yes.

182. How do you understand that it effects their offer? Do they offer to take more or less on account of getting profits ?- They will maintain it for less, if they are allowed to take profits.
183. How much less?—Waddle & Smith made it one-half.

184. Then on the same basis Sifton, & Glass would want $32 per mile without profits?—Yes.

185. How much would that increase the aggregate of the offer of Sifton, Glass & Co. for construction and maintenance?—$20,000.

186. What would make their whole tender?-

$147,850 without profits.

222. Will you read from Sifton, Glass & Co.'s tender those words which make any offer to build. without relating the special conditions; I wish to ascertain whether his offer to build relates only to the line as a whole?—He says: "We, the undersigned residents of the province of Ontario, make the following proposal to the Government of the Dominion: —We will do the whole of the work along the whole of the proposed line, including all the sections thereof, and comprising the finding of the material for and the erection of the telegraph line, the clearing of the roadway, the preparation of the pack trail, and all other matters pointed out in the advertisement and information for parties proposing to tender."

223. Is there any other part of that offer which points to the building of that section 1 alone ?-No.

224. Did it happen that persons offering to build the whole line, specified the time at which they could finish particular sections of it in any case? It did.

225. Then the mention of particular times for finishing particular sections is consistent with the fact that the tender relates only to the whole line?—Yes.

226. The certificate you produce, dated 7th August, and signed by yourself, Mr. Fleming and dated 7th Mr. Braun, relating to the opening of tenders, shows different particulars as to the several tenders? Will you explain what was meant to be shown by that, generally? Was it intended to convey the substance of each tender as it relates to each section ?-Yes.

227. Give me the name of the first person on the list who tenders for the construction of section 1 ?-Allan McLean.

228. Does he name a price for construction?—

229. Give the next name for the construction of section 1 ?-H. P. Dwight.

230. Does he name a sum for the construction? -He does.

231. What is the next name?—Parmelee; he names a price.

232. What is the next name ?-McKenzie, Grier & Co.; they give a price. The next is Waddle & Smith; they give a price. The next is Humphrey & Co.; they give a price. Next, W. G. Taylor & Co.,; they give a price. Next, Mitchell, Macdonall & Gough; they give a price. Next, the Electric Light Co.; they gave a price.

233. What is the next name for the construction of section 1 ?-Sifton, Glass & Co., without a price.

234. What is the next name ?-George P. Drummond, with a price. Next Rocque & O'Hanly, with a price. Next. Thompson, with a price. Next, a price. Next, Thompson, with a price. Next, Jocelyn, with a price; and last, Fuller, with a price.

235. You say that this was intended, on the 7th August, to give to the department the substance of each tender as it related to each section ?-Yes.

236. Was it intended to show that Sifton, Glass & Co. had named any price for section 1 on the 7th of August ?- There is no price shown.

237. You took part in that document?—Yes.
238. Did you intend to show that Sifton, Glass & Co. had named any price?—No; it was not intended. 239. That was after the time for receiving tenders had expired ?-Yes.

240. When was it first regarded by the department that they had made an offer to construct section 1?—The tenders, after they were opened, were referred to Mr. Fleming for his report, and on the 10th of August he reported and stated that "Sheet No. 1 shows that there are fifteen proposals for section No. 1, Fort Garry and Fort Pelly."

241. Does sheet No. 1 name Sifton, Glass & Co.? -It does.

242. Then, on the 10th of August, for the first time the department understood that Sifton, Glass & Co. had tenders for section 1?—That is the date of Mr. Fleming's report.

282. Have you any original papers from Sifton & Co. as to the terms upon which they would maintain the line ?-I have not, but I have a copy of a letter from Sifton & Glass to Mr. Fleming, dated 30th October, 1874, to the following effect:

of July last for the construction of the Canadian Pacific telegraph, or any section thereof, the average price per mile for woodland was to be $629 per mile, and for prairie $259 per mile. We estimate that there would be 1,485 miles of woodland, which at $629 per mile, would be $934,065, and that there would be 705 miles of prairie. which, at $259 per mile, would be $182,595-in all $1,116,660. Our whole tender for the whole work, was $1,290,000, the difference between the two sums, namely, $172,340, being our tender for maintaining the working of the line for five years. Any portion of the work now awarded to us should be based upon this calculation which we estimate at, say $16 per mile per annum. Contractors are to maintain the work and receive the profits of the line.

"(Signed) SIFTON, GLASS & CO."

313. Why was it considered to accept the tenders which were accepted for $225,100, instead of this increased offer at $216,000?—Because the acceptance of Mr. Fuller's tender involved a change in the amount.

314. Is that in your department held to be a reason for refusing a contract, if a man adds anything to his first tender after it is sent in ?-The practice is that a tender should not be altered after it is sent in.

315. Do you mean that the department will not recognize them if they are altered ?-No.

316. That is the general practice?—Yes. 317. And do you give that as a reason for this lowest offer having been refused-because it involved an alteration after the tenders were received ?-Yes.

218. Do you know any reason why this should apply to the second contract, and not to the first contract? You will perhaps remember that in the month of October there was something added to Sifton, Glass & Co.'s tender-$16 a mile for maintenance ?-I am not sure that it was added in that way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have established by the evidence of their own Deputy Minister, under oath befor a Royal commission, the manner in which the Liberal Government were letting their contracts. They refused to accept the lowest tenders in order to bestow favours upon their political friends, and allowed changes to be made in the tenders after they were opened in order to give their friends contracts. According to the evidence given by the Deputy Minister, it would appear, from paragraph 282, that the first offer was very much larger than that mentioned in paragraph 147. Sifton & Co., in their letter, say, according to their tender of July last, that their price for wood land was $629 per mile, and for prairie $259 per mile, and that any portion of the work now awarded to them should be estimated upon In the statement in parathis calculation. 147, where the prices have been graph changed after the tender was sent in, which must be another offer, wood land at $529 per mile is altered to $492, and prairie $209 was changed to $189 per mile. Even this was a very much higher tender than others put in by good and responsible men, as the evidence will show. I have no time to go into details of all the contracts let by them, but we have every reason to believe that the "In reply to your letter of this morning we beg to say that according to our tender of the 22nd same course was pursued and the contracts

In all there were forty-seven contracts let without tender, representing a total expenthey are justified in the charges they have made against this Government in that rediture of $3,604,800, or an average of $76,697.87 for each contract. This shows that

hon. gentlemen who talk so much about this Government having work done without

The spect. I have also a statement here of contracts awarded by the Mackenzie Government to other than the lowest tenderer with most extraordinary recalling for tenders had better look at home asons given for during so. On the 4th of and consult their own consciences to see that June, 1874, a contract was let at $410 above the lowest tender; on the 29th of June another was let at $12,330 above the lowest tenderer; another was $2,617 above the lowest tender; another $32,255 above; another $367 above; another $200 above; another $1.478 above; another $975 above; another $267 above; another $9,091 above; another $10,578 above; another $6,343 above; another $5,944 above; another $3,600 above; another $15,489 above; another $54,030 above, and so forth. In all these contracts the excess over the lowest tender amounted to $169.017. Many of the reasons given were of a very flimsy character indeed, and in many cases not such as would justify the action of the Government. In many cases the reason given was that the party had another contract; but if he had, he would certainly be better prepared to carry out the additional contract because he would have the plant and appliances for doing the work. It is certainly no reason to deprive a man of a contract because he has another one, though it may certainly serve as an excuse. Now, I have another list here of the contracts which without any reasons given were let to others than the lowest tenders. I will just give the percentage of excess of the different contracts which were accepted, and which were higher than the lowest tenders. They were as follows:—14 per cent, 19 per cent, 129 per cent, 46 per cent, 74 per cent, 31 per cent, 230 per cent. This last is the British Columbia penitentiary. The tender was, in the first place, $42,000, and they let the contract at $97,000; 150 per cent increase. 16 per cent, 114 per cent, 20 per cent, 16 per cent, 30 per cent, 10 per cent, 25 per cent, 35 per cent, 38 per cent, 178 per cent, 104 per cent, 6 per cent, 49 per cent, 30 per cent, 22 per cent, 25 per cent, 20 per cent, 15 per cent, 21 per cent, 133 per cent, 79 per cent, 66 per cent, 12 per cent, 9 per cent, 16 per cent, 7 per cent, 27 per cent, 26 per cent, 5 per cent, 10 per 6 per cent, 5 per cent, 33 per 9 per cent. There were many other cent, 49 per cent. contracts let to other than the lowest tenderer, which I will not mention, as the reasons assigned appear to be satisfactory. It appears that the Curran bridge, through the misconduct of some parties who were inclined to be dishonest, cost $180,000 more than the estimates; $63,000 of that has not and the Government have paid, been taken a suit to recover the balance. I have also explained the difficulty and expense of doing such work at night, and in a hurry. No one who understands work of that kind will dispute the fact that it is more expensive when you have to do it at night and in a hurry. But let me draw your attention to the extravagance of hon. gentlemen opposite. I will show you that there has been more blundering and incapacity on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite in their short term of office, than this Government has shown during the six-teen years it has been in power. Take all the money that was expended on this water stretch scheme, in working upon a fad of that kind to build a road to the North-west, which every man, woman and child in this Dominion knows was the most stupid scheme that any statesman ever attempted to place before the country. Our expenditure on surveys alone for the water stretches, was as follows:—

1875		474,529 89
1876	• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •	791,121 19

The Mackenzie Government were prepared to build a road connected by some ten or fifteen portages, where you would have to make two transfers on every portage. That would be a nice road for the people of the North-west to take their wheat over, and for settlers to take their effects in by. years I have mentioned about $3,000,000 was thrown away by hon. gentlemen opposite on surveys connected with a scheme that has been condemned by every sensible man in this House and country. If we add the money which was paid afterwards, but which was not chargeable at that time, and was for work done during those years, the amount would be considerably over $3,000. Then there are the unused telegraph lines north of Lake Manitoba, which cost about $1,000,000, and the money spent in surveys west of the Red River which must have cost another $1,000,000. I happened to be in the country when this work was going on, and I know what was being done. You gave the contractors money for building the work and then you gave them money to maintain it, and they put the profits in their own pockets, and the country never received a dollar The line was from all that expenditure. condemned and abandoned. Now, as to the Pembina branch. The contract was let to Mr. Whitehead. He took the contract for one item only, the excavation of the roadbed. He was told not to build the bridges, as they would be built at a future time, the reason given being that they might rot before they were needed. If that was the reason, it must be admitted that it was a foolish thing to spend the money of the country to grade a road that they had no intention of building for many years—and they did not build it for many years. Further, the price for that excavation was 22 cents per yard. Nearly a half of the contract was paid out for off-take ditches to drain the road. The contract, in the first place, was 22 cents a yard; but for the off-take ditches, which he got without tender, the Government paid

Total.....$2,934,319 87

45 cents a yard. Any man who understands anything about such work knows that it is simply what is called "casting." throwing out the soil on the sides of the ditch instead of hauling it and distributing it and making a road; and if 22 cents was the proper price for excavating a roadbed, this other ought to have been done for 10 cents per yard. I am satisfied you could get it done in that country now for 8 cents a yard. That shows the manner in which hon, gentlemen opposite managed public affairs while they were in power. If one of these hon, gentlemen should follow me, I would like to hear him justify this expenditure; I should like to bear him justify the expenditure of $3,000,-000 on these water stretches, and $290.951 on the Fort Francis lock, and many others which are too numerous to mention. Take the amount lost on the Curran bridge-which does not reflect upon the Minister or upon the Government-and deduct it from this $290,000 that was thrown away in the Fort Francis lock and you will have a substantial amount left without going any further. So that the people have not suffered much as compared with what they suffered under hon. gentlemen opposite. The Minister never tried to hide the fact that a fraud was perpetrated upon the Government. I do not dispute that there was a fraud. Such things will happen in public business as they happen in private affairs. Merchants are often deceived in those they trust, and lose money thereby. Many financial institutions suffer through the misdoings of those they employ. In this case no opportunity of knowing there was these how works were going on. The pay-sheet of March only came in on 18th April; and how could it be possible for the Minister to know what these pay-sheets contained until they were placed before him. No man who understands this class of work can speak honestly and conscientiously and charge this Government with doing anything but what was fair and square and right in the matter; and, as soon as they found out the wrong-doing, they prosecuted the parties they considered to be guilty. Now, there has been a great deal of scandal. I am not tired of it because it is doing us any harm. But I am convinced that the people of the country are tired of it; and I can tell gentlemen opposite that if they have nothing to dish up to the farmers and electors of this country but scandal, they will be left far behind when the test comes. But scandal seems to be the whole stock-in-trade of the non gentlemen opposite. When they have a scandal they are happy; you can see them smile all over their faces. They like to have something to blacken the character of the leading men of the country; something to bring disgrace upon the country in which they live, at the same time bringing disgrace and discredit upon them-selves. Men who are sent here to legis-late in the interests of the country should take a higher stand than this. I do not think it is proper for any man to make scandal-mongers were put to death. people now are getting more charitable. I am very glad they are, for otherwise I should be called upon to mourn the fate of these gentlemen. I hope hon, gentlemen will adopt something of greater benefit to themselves and to the country than these scandals. I can tell hon, gentlemen that the people are sick and tired of it; they won't read it; they won't have it. Gentlemen opposite will never have the slightest chance of being looked upon with favour by the electors unless they get something more substantial and more useful to the country to talk about than scandals.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) opened his speech by stating that the Minister of Railways was quite able to take care of himself. So I should have supposed, but, upon this occasion, it is manifest that the hon, gentleman quailed before the task. In fact, the indictment presented to the House this afterneon by my hon, friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) was such that the hon. Minister implicated nor any of his colleagues dared to say a word in his or their own defence. True to their record when brought face to face with the consequences of their acts, they have called upon their followers to come to their rescue, and what we have heard from their followers this afternoon is absolutely in keeping with the attitude which has ever been maintained by these gentlemen. They have been loud in their declarations that they would stamp corruption from their ranks as soon as it was shown to exist, but ever when they have been brought face to face with the task they have failed to make good their pro-Every one remembers the pledge given to the people of Canada by the late Prime Minister, with solemn words upon a solemn occasion-when a corner of the mantle had fallen which had preserved the secreey of transactions of the great spending department of the Government, and when the people stood aghast at the revelaabout the Quebec graving dock, Victoria graving dock, the Langetions block. and other great Sir, we have not forgotten the pledges which were then made by the late Prime Minister when, on a solemn occasion, he promised to the people that all offences would be investigated, and that all offenders would be punished. Well, Sir, he ignored that pledge, and the conduct of the Government to-day is the latest evidence we have, after a good many others, however, that that pledge was made simply to re-assure disquieted public opinion, but never was intended to disturb those who had perpetrated the offences, and still less to dis-turb the party which had profited by those offences. Even after that pledge was made, a specialty of raising scandals. In the old the Government showed on the floor of this days in Scotland, I believe, witches and House what we were to expect from them from West Lambton (Mr. Lister), from his place in Parliament accused and impeached the Minister of Railways, charging him with grave offences in connection with the construction of the section B of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and when the Government invoked, nay, did not invoke, but invented, a statute of limitations in order to prevent the light of day from penetrating into that dark record. So it was then, and so it was afterwards when, in the session of 1893, my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) charged the Postmaster General with having fraudulently appropriated $100,000 of money which had been voted by this Parliament to aid the construction of two railways, the Lake St. John Railway, and the Temiscouata Railway, and when, notwithstanding the pledge which had been given by the late Prime Minister that all offences would be investigated, the Government at once stepped to the front in order to prevent and baulk an effective investigation before this Parliament, the great court of the nation. And later on, in the session of 1894, when the hon, member for West Ontario showed to the House that, even with that imperfect investigation which had been granted, it had been proved that the Postmaster General had appropriated $25,000 of those moneys, though not, of course, taking them out of the public treasury, but all the same moneys coming from the Parliament of Canada, and had distributed those moneys, with the aid of two fellow-members of this House, in several constituencies of the country; and when the hon. member for West Ontario showed, also, that similar offences, and had been tried, convicted, and sentenced; and when he pointed out the fact that the prosecuting counsel had stated that there were members of Parliament who were involved in that transaction, and when the hon, member for West Ontario asked Parliament to mete out, though in a minor degree, some measure of the same justice which had been meted out to the lesser offenders, then the Government came again to the front, came to the rescue of the accused, so that he was enabled that minute to repeat and assert upon the floor of Parliament, being so situated, he would do the very same thing again. Now, Sir, to-day, very same thing again. when it is shown and proved that a similar transaction to all these has taken place in the Department of Railways, one of the transactions with which, unfortunately, the people of Canada have become familiar, one of those transactions which invariably result disastrously to the treasury, most beneficially to the Government and to their friends, again the Government-not by themselves: they have not had the courage to stand up so far and defend their conduct—but they put up their friends behind them to say when, in the session of 1891 my hon. friend | that they dare not meet it directly, but they attempt to meet it in a circuitous way. We have just been told by the hon. gentleman who last spoke that there are motives behind all this. Well, I will not motives behind all this. Well, I will not comment upon the language of the hon. gentleman. I will come to the facts at once, and what are they? It is not denied by those who have spoken to-day on this occasion, it is not denied by any of the ministerial members who come to the resuce of the Minister of Railways, that there has been a great wrong committed in the con-struction of these bridges to the detriment of the people of Canada. It is not denied that there has been pillage most impudent, it is not denied that there has been corruption. open, flagrant, shameful; it is not denied that the country has been defrauded to the amount of nearly $200,000; and the defence for all this is that, although this be true, the Minister of Railways is not responsible, he is a victim, not sinning, but much sinned against. Well, Sir, I take issue with that statement, and I charge here before these hon. gentlemen, that if there has been pillage most impudent, if there has been corruption, open, manifest and shameless: flagrant. country has been defrauded the nearly $200,000, it is due altogether to the fact that the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Railways has openly designedly violated the law of his depart-Sir, we know something of the methods which were employed in the good old days in order to replenish the party treasury at the expense of the Dominion treasury. We have known, under a famous investigation, how it was that tenders, plans, specifications, were manipulated, altered, arranged, re-arranged, figured up, figured down, so that the contract might fall into the hands of a favourite firm of friends who, however, paid deep for the privilege, and who had to put their hands into their pockets and contribute hand-somely for charitable purposes, according to the pious expression which was invented for the occasion. I do not charge against the Minister of Railways to-day that he manipulates tenders in that way, but what I charge against him is that he dispenses with tenders altogether, he dispenses with the law altogether. Here is the law upon that subject, the law of his own department:

The Minister shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the construction of all works, except in cases of pressing emergency, in which delay would be injurious to the public interest, or in which, from the nature of the work, it can be done more expeditiously or more econmically executed by the officers and servants of the Minister.

Now, I ask, Why were not the provisions of the law carried out in this instance? Why were not tenders invited? Was it a that there has been no wrong whatever committed, for which the Government is it a work of pressing emergency that it had responsible. Sir, the indictment is so strong been in contemplation for years, and in the work of pressing emergency? So little was session of 1892, in the month of May or April, the hon. gentleman had taken an appropriation of $170,000 to carry on this very work. Now, will it be pretended that from the nature of the work it could have been more expeditiously or economically performed by the officers and servants of the Minister? Why, Sir, no one will pretend that. In the face of the result, such a pretension would be ludicrous. There was no reason for it. In the whole correspondence we have had upon this subject, the only reference which is made to the manner in which the work had to be carried out, is found in a letter of Mr. Parent, the resident engineer in Montreal, of date, 18th October, 1892, which is in these words:

I would advise the Government to build a substructure by day's work, owing to the uncertainty of the mode of execution which circumstances will command.

This suggestion was apparently adopted at once, and that is why I blame the Minister of Railways. Sir, he not only violated the law, but, in view of the event, he committed a most lamentable error of judgment. It was not only a crime, as Tallyrand said, but it was worse than a crime, it was a blunder. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say that he followed the opinion of his engineer. But the hon, gentleman as the head of his department is there to correct the opinions of his engineer when those opinions are erroneous. The hon, gentleman is there to exercise his own judgment and see that all works are properly carried out. The hon. gentleman does not hesitate, if it suits his convenience, to set aside the opinions of his engineer. We have a famous case in the Cornwall Canal, where the hon. Minister condemned the opinion of the engineer and set it aside, and his engineer at that time was no less a man than Mr. Page; also he set aside the opinion of his predecessor, who was the late Hon. John Henry Pope, and he cancelled the contract, on which work had been done already and on which the department had already paid $125,000, and for the cancellation of which the Government had afterwards to pay $29,000. On that occasion the hon, gentleman did not hesitate to set aside the opinion of his engineer, and so it is no defence to say that on the present occasion he followed the opinion of his engineer. Moreover, I am ready to admit that as regards matters professional and matters technical the Minister should hesitate before he set aside the opinion of an engineer. But this was not a matter professional or technical, it was a matter on which every man could exercise his judgment as well as an engineer. Let me again call the attention of the House to Mr. Parent's letter:

I would advise the Government to build a substructure by day's work, owing to the uncertainty of the mode of execution which circumstances will command.

What was the uncertainty of the mode of Mr. Laurier.

execution? What was the uncertainty to command that mode of execution? No one has been able to say what the uncertainty of the mode of execution or the commanding circumstances were, because it is impossible for any man to give a satisfactory expla-nation. Perhaps we will be told that the work had to be done on the canal in the winter, that the water had to be drawn off and the work carried out within a certain time. But every man remembers very well and knows that the same Lachine Canal was deepened by the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, and work was done under contract and not by day's labour, exactly under the same commanding circumstances, and there was much less difficulty the hon. Minister to overcome was encountered by the Mackenzie Gov-So it is ernment at the time. evident that no reason existed why the present Minister should not on this occasion have complied with the requirements of the law. There was no reason that I can see, unless possibly there was the contemplation of immense plunder in store for those who manipulated the work which would allow Mr. St. Louis to come out and make a handsome contribution for charitable purposes. But strange to say-no, not strange to say, for it is in keeping with the invariable conduct of this Government-no sooner had it been decided to out the contract by day's work than the decision was violated in the most important particular. The Minister for reasons of his own would not give the work by contract, but decided to carry it out by day's labour; and in December one of the officials, Mr. Kennedy, asked for private tenders to have the work carried out by contractors so far as furnishing labour was concerned. The hon, member for Grey (Mr. Masson) took some pains to say that the work had been let by tender. But it must be borne in mind that even in this particular the letter of the law was not observed, because the law says that all tenders shall be asked by public advertisement, but here it was not so done, but simply private tenders were asked. Mr. Kennedy wrote three or four letters to three or four different parties, presumably friends, and the result was that at the end of January Mr. Parent reported the fact to the department, and recommended the adoption of the tender of Mr. St. Louis, who happened to be the lowest tenderer. Here are the words of Mr. Parent:

I beg to submit to your consideration an abstract of tenders sent in by contractors for the supply of labour required for the construction of the masonry pier of the Wellington bridge, &c.

Although the tenders show eight items, it is most likely that only stonecutters and masons will be called for, as it is the intention to furnish our own labourers, derricks and teams.

This mode of procuring skilful hands, from contractors for a work which has to be done within a limited time, is considered the safest and to minimize the risk of a strike at a critical mement, as these men are almost constantly employed by the contractors and are paid weekly by them, and can be better controlled by those who employed them the year around.

This letter was communicated to the Minister by the Deputy Minister, as it is in evidence. It is not in evidence that the hon. Minister took any exception to the fact that tenders had been invited privately instead of publicly. I absolve him, however, from that at the present moment. give him this credit, that his good sense rebelled at first against the proposed contract. I give him this credit again, that he rebelled against the entering of this contract. which was of an unheard of character. Mr. St. Louis was sent for, Mr. Parent was sent for, and the latter official repeated the explanation he had given in his letter. at the evidence of Mr. Schreiber at page 109 of the evidence. He is answering a question put by the Minister of Railways:

Q. What came next?—A. On the 10th, Mr. Parent forwarded abstracts of tenders for labour. Q. Yes?—A. Upon receipt of these, I took them in the year. Year examined them, and you asked.

in to you. You examined them, and you asked, if it was not rather an unusual course to pursue; that you had never heard of its being done in that way before. I said, yes, it was rather unusual, although I had known cases where it had been done.

Then he went on to mention that he sent for Mr. Parent. He continues:

He thought it would be the most economical He said the contractor for the labour way. would have nothing whatever to do with the men after they were once upon the work; that he or Kennedy would requisition for a certain number, and the contractor would be bound to send them. That would end his business with them. Government would have their time-keepers keeping the time, the pay-rolls would be made out in his office, and, as a further guarantee, he said, the pay-rolls, before being paid, would be certified to by the time-keepers, Mr. Kennedy and himself. The Minister asked me, "What do you think of Under these circumstances, I said, I did not see any great objection. Then I recommended The moment I recommended it, I became reit. spensible.

I have said, and I repeat that I give credit to the Minister for the good sense he showed at the first blush in hesitating to enter into such a contract; but he was carried away by promises, first that there would be proper supervision, and next by the suggestion stated in Mr. Parent's letter, that this would avoid the possibility and danger of a strike. The fear of a strike seems to have warped Minister's judgment. It is human to err-it is human to make mistakes. But did it occur to the hon. gentleman whenever he had a decision in his department or elsewhere to make, that possibly there might be snow storms in July, that water would run up hill, or fish would live in air, or birds would swim? It would be as sensible for him to entertain any of these suggestions as to imagine a strike in Montreal in the winter of 1893. The hon, gentleman is aware that the great National Policy has brought to the city of Montreal hundreds and thousands of men every winter, who parade the streets of the city asking for work for the strong arms which God has given them. A strike in Montreal! Why, it is on record that every morning at the works there was a scramble and jostling of men to secure work. A strike in Montreal! It is in evidence that out of thousands of men walking the city every day there was opportunity afforded for picking out men on account of political recommendations. There was such a scramble that instead of there being any danger of a strike, the opportunity was afforded for some patronage to be exercised by the Minister of Public Works, the member for Montreal East, and some other gentlemen. Listen, upon this point, to the evidence of Mr. Kennedy:

Q. Do you know how the men were engaged?—A. I myself engaged most of the men in connection with the Wellington bridge.

Q. Was it not necessary to have a recommendation to be engaged ?—A. Well, as for the labouring men, there were few recommendations received, but as for the stone-cutters, there were quite a number.

Q. By whom were they recommended ?—A. By different parties. Quite a few were recommended by Hon. Mr. Ouimet.

Q. Give us all the names of the people who recommended them ?—A. I cannot, speaking from memory.

Q. You will certainly find some other names in your memory?—A. Other names?

Q. Yes, surely. There were dozens of letters.
I am sure.—A. Here are a few letters which I found straying around; a few men were recommended by Mr. Lépine.

Here is a sample of some of these letters in favour of men who were clamouring for work when the Minister supposed they were going on strike:

Q. Read the whole list?—A. These are orders sent from St. Louis' office for the reason that stonecutters would come there and say to our foreman, and often to myself, "Mr. St. Louis has sent us to cut stone." We would put them on, and then St. Louis, in going to the sheds, would ask why they were at work. He said he had not sent them, and so it was agreed to send an order from himself to our foreman to have such and such a man put on.

The Chairman (reading).—These are the orders. "Please give some work to the bearer, Joseph Delfourne, stonecutter, and oblige

The other recommendations are as follows: Stanislas Gervais, stonecutter; Adélard Labelle, Ovila Jany, Charles Lavigne, J. B. Major, Hor-midas Larin, F. Jobin, Léon Cardinal, Ed. Cérat. Napoléon St. Louis, M. Norbert Sénécal, J. B. Lanière, Napoléon and Adolphe Trudeau.

Here is one which reads as follows: "Please give some work to Napoléon and Adolphe Trudeau, stonecutters, both strongly re-commended by the Hon. J. A. Ouimet, Minister of Public Works. They must work without fail even if you are obliged to dismiss two present stonecutters, some one whom you do not care for.

"Yours very truly

"EM. ST. LOUIS, "J.A.A.M."

And, Sir, this was in the face of the fear of a strike! We are told that it was because the hon, gentleman was afraid of a strike that this contract was entered into. Mr. St. Louis was the contractor, and supplied the labour, and, at the same time. he used the recommendations of the Minister of Public Works in order to get employment for these very men whom he engaged to work for the Government. I can well understand the advantages which Mr. St. Louis had. Mr. St. Louis was making high profits, and although the tenders had been asked simply for masons and skilled labourers, by and by Mr. St. Louis set up the pretension that by his contract he was to furnish, not only skilled labour, but ordinary unskilled labour as well. Mr. St. Louis argued: Certainly my contract includes ordinary labour, because ordinary labour is skilled labour, men skilled with the shovel and the pick. I cannot see, Sir, how, according to the tenders, the very ingenious construction of Mr. St. Louis should have been accepted. The tender says:

Abstract of tender for the supply of "skilled" labour for building the new Wellington Bridge pier, and renewal of masonry on Lock No. 1,-Foreman, stonecutters, skilled labour, double teams. &c.

Mr. St. Louis pretended that his contract gave him the privilege of putting on men who simply used the pick and the axe as they were more skilled in that than others, and he claimed $1.871/2 cents a day for each of them. It is in evidence that the Minister of Railways compromised with Mr. St. Louis, and agreed to give him for these skilled men with the pick and the shovel. $1.50 per day each, although that kind of labour was not within the terms of his contract. And for the labourers for which Mr. St. Louis received $1.50 a day, he paid as he himself says, $1.10, $1.15, and $1.25. He made a profit on every unskilled labourer working there of 25 cents, or 35 cents, or 40 cents a day, and that was not upon one man, but at least on from ten to twelve hundred men for almost every day during six weeks or more. This was a profitable contract to Mr. St. Louis, and we can understand, under the circumstances, why he was ready to contribute, as he afterwards did, for "charitable purposes." One of the reasons of the hon. gentleman for entering into this contract was that there should be supervision, and as Mr. Schreiber, in his evidence, said:

The Government would have their time-keepers keeping the time, the pay-rolls would be made up in his office, and as a further guarantee, the pay-rolls before being paid would be certified by the time-keeper, Mr. Kennedy, and myself.

When you hear that one of the reasons which induced the Minister of Railways to agree to this unheard of contract was that be supervision, would there should imagine that upon one of the bridges the Government had no time-keeper at all? It may be said, as was hinted this afternoon by some of the followers of the hon, gentlemen: The Minister could not know what was going on. Well, first of all it was the business of the Minister to know what was going on, and I go further and say, that he had evidence of what was going on, as my friend beside me (Mr. Davies showed this afternoon. The letter of Mr. Kennedy, and the reply of the Solicitor General to that letter is most conclusive on this subject. Mr. Kennedy wrote on the 12th of March as follows:-

I beg leave to acquaint you of the scandalous manner how certain things are being conducted on the Lachine canal, in reference to the construction of works in connection with the new Wellington and Grand Trunk railway bridges, as well as the renewal of the masonry of old Lock No. 1.

Without consulting any one and for what motive, I consider a mystery, he (Mr. Parent) issues specifications, asking for rates for the supplying of foremen, derricks, stonecutters, stonemasons, double and single teams, and skilled labour; Mr. E. St. Louis was announced the successful tenderer. Now, I can get all the above by the thousands, at an average day's pay, without any discontent; we have also supplied ourselves with the necessary derricks capable of running the work of construction of Wellington bridge; they now want to turn all those engaged on their list, which would increase the cost of the work 75 per cent. Imagine their trying to place pick and shovel labourers, whom I employ for $1.25 per day, at $1.87½ on this (Em. St. Louis') list.

One of my friends beside me read that this afternoon and the Minister said: How could I know it, but my friend was able to point out at once the answer of the Solicitor General wrote:

My dear Mr. Kennedy,

I have seen the Minister of Railways and Canals and found that all has been tendered for, including labour for the carrying out of the work of the bridge.

Therefore, Mr. Kennedy's complaint was taken to the Minister and apparently the Minister answered: Well, what is there to complain of; everything has been done by tender and there is no more to do about it. Sir. there is more than that also. It is in evidence that the Solicitor General on the same day wired to Mr. Kennedy, after he had received a telegram from Mr. Kennedy that he was coming here:

Don't report to the department before you see me.

Kennedy was on his way to Ottawa, was met at the station as he says himself by the Solicitor General, and by Mr. Senator Drummond, and instead of going to the department to acquaint the department, still more of what was going on, he was sent back to his work, and the same system continued, and St. Louis was able to plunder the department even after the notice of the Minister had been brought to this fact by Kennedy one of the supervisors of the work.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Kennedy was sent back under pain of dismissal.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes. Kennedy was sent back under pain of dismissal. Under such circumstances, is it possible for the Minister of Railways to say that he is altogether free from blame in this matter. Sir, there was one way only by which the hon, gentleman have freed himself from It was to show that his good faith has been taken by surprise, and he could have shown this only in one way; that was, by prosecuting, and prosecuting severely and without fear, all those who have been guilty of cheating the Government in this matter. Last session, when this matter was brought before the House, the Minister stated that he would prosecute all offenders, just in the same way that the Prime Minister some few years ago stated that all offences would be investigated and all offenders punished. Today the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) stated that for his part he regretted very much indeed that there had been no prosecution in this matter. Does the hon. gentleman regret it so much? Has he no compassion for the Minister he is now supporting? Has he reflected on the consequences of a prosecution in this matter? Does he not know that the air of a prison is not conducive to the health of prisoners? Does he not know that if there had been a prosecution, there would surely have been a conviction, and somebody would have been sent to jail? And does he expect that a different measure of justice would have been different measure of justice would have been tractor of the Quebec government for the meted out to Mr. St. Louis from what was construction of the Montreal court-house;

General to Mr. Kennedy, and the Solicitor meted out to certain offenders a few years ago? Does he believe that if the air of the prison was not conducive to the health of those parties, the health of Mr. St. Louis would have been jeopardised in this instance? The Government were wise in not prosecuting, because if they had done so they would have brought trouble upon themselves; they would have had to release Mr. St. Louis after conviction, and it is far more easy to release him before a conviction. More than this, Mr. St. Louis is charitable towards this Government, and he is discreet in his charity-he does not let his left hand know what his right hand doeth; if it is necessary to burn his books in order to conceal his charity towards the Government, he will go that length. But the Government had to do something to save appearances, and accordingly, in the month of October, a complaint was lodged against Mr. St. Louis. and it took six months to dispose of the preliminary investigation. Well, Sir, if it takes six menths to dispose of the preliminary investigation, Mr.St.Louis can rest assured that he will never answer for his trespass before doomsday. I do not hesitate to say, and I say it in the presence of the Minister of Justice, that the prosecution of Mr. St. Louis was a farce, and nothing else. I cannot conceive that the Government ever had any intention of securing a conviction against Mr. St. Louis, for this reason: that the prosecution was carried on, not by senior counsel, but by junior counsel only. Was it conceivable, when Mr. St. Louis was defended by the best legal talent the city of Montreal could afford, Mr. Geoffrion and Mr. MacMaster, that counsel of equal eminence were not engaged on the other side? I have certainly nothing to say against the junior counsel who conducted the case for the ment. Far be it from me to say anything against his honour or his character or his reputation as a lawyer. I would not forgive myself if I said anything here that would redound to the disadvantage of that young But, Mr. Speaker, even if that lawyer. young gentleman were an Erskine, he could not have coped successfully, in such a case as this in which so much was involved and there were so many details, with the eminent counsel opposed to him. It was absolutely indispensable under such circumstances for the Government to have senior counsel of weight and authority before the court, to share with him the responsibility of the case. The result was, as might have been anticipated, that Mr. St. Louis was acquitted by the presiding magistrate. The Government were not satisfied with that, and they very properly attempted to present an indictment before the grand jury. But, Sir, there the virtuous government of the province of Quebec came to the rescue of Mr. St. Louis, and I can understand their doing so. Why, at this very moment Mr. St. Louis is a conand the court-house of Montreal is like Penelope's shroud—what is done upon it during the day is undone during the night; and it will never be finished. It has been going on for five years, and it seems to be no more advanced to-day than it was five years ago. I am not surprised under such circumstances that the virtuous Quebec government should have come of St. Louis; and rescue Mr. they asking for security commenced by costs. Security for costs from the Dominion of Canada! The Attorney General of the province of Quebec actually asked the court that the Dominion of Canada, before presenting that indictment before the court. should give security for the costs to be in-curred in the case. Well, Sir, it is true, we have a deficit of $5,000,000 and over this year; but I hope it has no yet come to this, that the Government of Canhave to find bondsmen to ada meet liabilities. their Although the credit of the Government is not as high as you and I might wish it to be, still, for my part, I would be willing to trust them for all the liabilities they may incur, though I have not much confidence in them. The Government this year introduced into the Senate an insolvency Bill, though I understand they have since withdrawn it; but they have not done so, I am sure, with the expectation that they would be the first victims of such a law if it were put on the statute-book. Well, the grand jury threw out the indictment, and the result is that to-day Mr. St. Louis is as free as he ever was, to go on contracting with the Quebec government, or with the Dominion Government again—for some day it may come to that. Sir, the some day it may come to that. Sir, the more you look at this transaction, the more you become convinced that it is fraudulent from the first to the last. The fact is that fraud is oozing from every detail of it. The whole of that transaction was conceived in iniquity and carried on in iniquity-conceived and carried on in order to give to the friends of the Government the power out of their ill-gotten gains, to come to the rescue of the Government in matters electorate. No other conclusion can be drawn. If this were the only instance, for my part I would not insist upon it; we might pass it over. But this is not the only instance. I call upon the hon, gentleman to show me a contract of any magnitude which has been carried out within the estimate since the present Government came into office. During the last fifteen years there has not been a contract let by this Government which has not cost 25, 50 or 100 per cent more than the estimate. If this were an isolated case, we might say that it was the result of an accident; but when we see the same thing happening on every occasion, it is evident that this result is not brought about by accident, but by design. We have been told the matter? Is that the only answer we are to hear on this and similar occasions-"you have done the same thing?" I care not whether these offences are perpetrated by one side or the other side, though I do not admit that Mr. Mackenize was ever guilty in any such respect; I say that so long as these things continue, it is impossible for this country to develop as a country. I do not pretend to pose here as a purist-

An hon, MEMBER. Hear, hear,

Mr. LAURIER-but I do pretend to pose a patriot. I called to hon. members opposite to apply their sneers to their own friends and to see that such transactions are not repeated by recording their condemnation of them on this amendment. This is the spirit in which It is not in the we approach this case. spirit of revenge spoken of by the hon. member for Glengarry. Nothing certainly was more foreign from the idea of my hon. friend who moved this amendment, and moved it in a speech which was marked, above all things, by calmness and judicial tone. It is in that spirit that we on this side approach this case, and it is in that spirit in which it ought to be approached also by hon, gentlemen opposite.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down seems to be particularly anxious to know why I did not reply to the attack of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) before this, or why no other member of the Government rose in his place to answer the series of attacks which have been made in support of the amendment, and the hon, member intimated that perhaps it was because there was no defence to the accusation made against me. I notice that the amendment is not an attack upon the Government, nor upon the department, but a personal attack upon me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

HAGGART. It is an to hold me responsible personally for all the acts and for all that has occurred with reference to the Curran bridge. The very words of the resolution point directly to the Minister of Railways, as corrupt and in-capable and guilty of all the charges that can be made in connection with this matter. The hon, member formulated his charge under a certain number of heads in which he was followed by hon. gentlemen opposite who spoke after him. The first attack is this: that I let the contract contrary to the law of the land, contrary to the principles which had been laid down by this Parliament, again and again, and which ought to guide every Minister in letting contracts. It came with very bad grace from the leader of the Opposition to state that I had been a transgressor of that law. Does he forget that he was a member of a to-day that the former Government has ministry, the leader of which and Minisbeen delinquent. What has that to do with ter of Public Works, without assigning any reason even to his own colleagues, let contracts again and again in violation of the Act, and the very words, in which the hon, gentleman accused me of violating the law of the land, he could with much greater force apply to the Government of which he was a member. Does he not know that that Government, again and again, gave contracts to parties who were not entitled to them. Does he not know that without even going through the form of asking for tenders, they gave contracts without deigning to assign any reasons to this House or even to their own colleagues for the letting of these contracts. I am aware that that is not a sufficient excuse for a Minister of Railways if he has violated the law. But I have violated no law. In recommending the awarding of the contract as I did, I recommended it for reasons that I gave in my memo. to the Council, and it was awarded on an order of the Council. I recommended the awarding of it for the reasons given to me by the chief of my department and the engineers at the head of the particular work in question. The hon, gentleman has made this debate an excuse for resuscitating some old attack against me. He proceeded of my connection speak with sec-What does the hon, gentletion B. man know about that? Does he know that I ever had any interest or connection with that contract? Will he or anybody else get up and say, on his honour as a member of this House, that I was interested in that contract? Has he not had my solemn denial, as well as the affidavit of an hon. senator, that I was not the contractor or had the slightest interest in or connection with it. If he or any one else will make the statement that I had, I will give him all the investigation he likes for the purpose of inquiring into it. Then the hon, gentleman asked why I should not set aside the opinion of my engineers in reference to the manner in which contracts should be carried out. Did I not override the opinion of Mr. Page in reference to Cornwall Canal? Yes I did in reference to the building Sheik's Island dam, and in doing I followed the advice of the engineers connected with the work, the engineer of my department, and the board of engineers who inquired into it. And I leave it to any one competent to judge whether the change that I made in that work was not for the benefit of the country and an improvement in any engineering point of view over the work as constructed prior to my occupying I do. The the position which leader of the Opposition makes another It is one of those general and charge. vague ones which hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of making. It is the general charge of corruption and incapacity. I have been a member of this House for the last twenty-five years. I remember when Joseph Howe, Sir John Macdonald, D'Arcy McGee and a lot of the most brilliant and most eminent men that ever occupied a seat in the Government of this country had to meet charges made again and again by the Opposition taunting them with incapacity, with not being fit to occupy the positions they held, and that is always a charge which the Opposition makes. That is a charge which they invariably fall back upon when they have no policy, when they have nothing to go to the country on. It is the old trick practiced by the lawyer who has a bad case, of finding fault with the opposing attorney. That charge has been again and again reiterated in this House. In every speech hon. gentlemen opposite make, they reiterate it. There is another serious charge which the hon, gentleman made. He said that there is no contract which has been carried out by this Government which does not exceed the estimates. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be more precise and tell us those which do exceed the estimates. I venture to state that he cannot mention one which does. I would ask the hon. gentleman does the expenditure on the Sault Ste. Marie Canal exceed the estimate?

The second of th

Some hon, MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. The expenditure on the Sault Canal, for building this work, will be about $500,000 less than the estimate?

Some hon, MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. And every other work over the contracts for which I have had control, as Minister of Railways, except the Curran bridge, has cost less than the estimates.

Mr. LISTER. Not one is within the estimates.

Mr. HAGGART. I make that statement, and I state, moreover, that the deputy head and engineer in chief of my department made the statement upon oath before the Public Accounts Committee two days ago in reference to the Sault Canal—and the hon. member for Lambton was listening to him. And the hon. gentleman now says that the expenditure will exceed the estimate.

Mr. LISTER. The hon, member for Lambton did not listen to him, the hon, member for Lambton was not there. But I will tell the hon. Minister that the estimate made under the Minister preceding him, Sir Charles Tupper, is exceeded by over a million dollars.

Mr. HAGGART. The estimate of the department for the completion of the Sauit Ste. Marie Canal, as sworn to by the deputy minister before the Public Accounts Committee, was $4,000,000—

Mr. LISTER. Not at all.

Mr. HAGGART--and it has been constructed for about $3,500,000. And a similar statement can be made of the other works two new bridges at that point. in my department.

Mr. LISTER. It exceeded the estimate --

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon, gentleman to keep order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order. The hou. Minister is entirely out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order, and I will be heard, or the Minister shall not get a point further. I ask your ruling upon the point I raise, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Minister of Railways is out of order in referring to what took place in a committee of the House which has not yet reported to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. Minister is certainly out of order in the reference he makes.

Mr. HAGGART. Your ruling is perfectly To justify what I correct. Mr. Speaker. nave stated, I committed the unpardonable fault, in a parliamentary sense, of referring to what occurred in the committee of the House which has not yet been reported to the House. The facts, nevertheless, come to my knowledge from my own department, which perfectly justifies me in making the starements I have made, independent of the evidence given. In order to a perfect understanding of this whole affair, I will supplement some of the remarks I made last session. The hon, leader of the Opposition twits me with not speaking before. As I have stated, I devoted more than an hour of my time last session to this natter, and if an election does not come on before another session, I suppose we shall have the charges repeated again. It will be necessary for hon, gentlemen opposite to change their base of attack, in order that they may have new material for discussion. We shall likely have a motion this time covering section B, or the Tay Canal, and some of the other antiquated stuff that has done duty with hon, gentleman for a number of years past, and with which they vainly hope to satisfy the people for the deficiency of their fiscal policy. I shall devote perhaps more time than I would like to at this late hour of the night to a statement in reference to this bridge. In the autumn of 1892 it was decided by the Government to respond to the carnest solicitation of the board of trade and the people of Montreal to replace two bridges, known, I believe, as the Wellington bridges, one used for the Grand Trunk Railway, and the other as a foot passenger and traffic bridge across the Lachine Canal. On account of the congested state of the Wellington Street bridge, occasioned by the enormous traffic, which had increased rapidly between these sections of Montreal.

Estimates of the probable cost were called for from Chief Engineer Trudeau, who was at the head of the department, and he estimated that for an 18-foot navigation the bridges would cost $170,000.

Mr. MCLOCK. For the two bridges?

Mr. HAGGART. For the two bridges. On being requested to state what would be the extra cost for the two bridges with substructures for a 20-foot navigation, he added $40,000, making $210,000. The charge was made by the hon, gentleman who introduced the resolution that I had deceived the House as to what the cost of the bridges would be: that I had made a statement to the House which had led them to believe that the bridges could be built for a certain sum, and had afterwards entered into a contract in a most unjustifiable manner supplemented the vote by a Governor General's warrant. I will deal with that point afterwards, but in the meantime let me confine myself to the question of the cost of the bridges. It was decided that the substructure of the bridges should be increased in depth for the purpose of affording a 20foot navigation on the Lachine Canal at this point. The chief engineer, Mr. Schreiber, in discussing the matter with the superintending engineer, Mr. Parent, made a mistake, and instead of saying that it was to be 22-feet depth of water, necessitating putting the substructure to a depth of 24 feet, he said that the intention was to carry out the work for a 22-foot navigation, which would necessitate putting the substructure at a depth of 26 feet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.L.) Oaly one of them was put to a depth of 26 feet.

Mr. HAGGART. It does not matter. They built the substructure of these bridges for a 22-foot navigation, that is to say, at a depth of 26 feet. What I want to get at is that the additional cost, through a mistaken statement of the engineer, as estimated, was $13,000, making a total estimated cost of $223.000. Another condition as to the building of the bridge was that the canal should be unwatered on the 15th December. Every one who knows the city of Montreal, knows that a great number of important manufactories are situated along the Lachine Canal, and those who know the facts in that regard, will be able to estimate the injury and loss to the manufacturers and the workingmen of the city which would follow the stopping of these establishments. There was a meeting of the manufacturers held in the city of Montreal, when they urged upon the department the necessity of building the bridges in the speediest possible manner. I gave instructions to Mr. Parent, who was superintending engineer, to find out what was the quickest possible time in which the bridges could be built. The information I received from these gentlemen was that it was decided by the Government to build the water could be taken out of the canal on the 1st of March, and the whole work completed by 1st May. Then my instructions to the chief engineer were to see the super-intending engineer of the canal and instruct him that all materials for the canal were to be obtained by tender, and that every precaution should be taken in order that the work might be pushed energetically upon the canal being unwatered. In October I may state incidentally, the superintending engineer of the canal was given full charge of the work, he was instructed that he was responsible entirely for the work to be done upon these Under those instructions, then, the work was commenced, the material was furnished, and everything was in readiness for unwatering the canal on the 8th March. One of the charges made by hon, gentlemen opposite is that labour was supplied by tender. The instructions to the officers were, at least the instructions that were communicated to me before they were sent, were that all materials furnished to any canal in the Dominion, or any public work under my control, was to be obtained by tender. The officer in charge of the canal at Montreal, under instructions, as he stated, from Mr. Trudeau, asked for tenders for the skilled labour for doing this work. Hon. gentlemen who followed the evidence before the committee must see that the report of the superintending engineer of the canal to my department was that the work could be done by the labourers connected with the canal, with the assistance of what skilled labour might be required, and which he advised me to obtain by tender. Tenders for this labour were asked for, and five tenders were received. Mr. St. Louis being the lowest. The superintending engineer forwarded an abstract of the tenders to the department directed. I declined, as :35 he was the hon, gentleman said, to act upon it at It was the first time I ever heard of labour being supplied by tender, but he assured me it was the proper way. One of the reasons he gave for supplying skilled labour by tender in the city of Montreal was that skilled labour, being mostly under the control of certain contractors in that city, there was less liability of strikes, and that the proper plan, as the Government, of necessity had to complete the whole of that work within two months, was to secure labour from some contractor who would be responsible to see that we were furnished with the kind of labour required. His statement to me was that if a strike should occur delaying the works (which would be much more likely to occur if the Government hired the men for a few weeks than if supplied by a contractor who employed them the year round), it would be an awful calamity, not only to the navigation, but to all the manufacturers along the Lachine Canal, if the work was not finished by the 1st of May. By the evidence of the gentleman. I agreed to that plan. I accepted the advice of the superintending engineer, and of my deputy, that the skilled labour required for the work should be furnished by tender. Is that a crime? Is that something for which the Minister, who is more than anything else the political head of the department, should be impeached by a motion in this House, he having acted upon the advice of the superintending engineer of the canal? The hon, gentleman asks, Why did I extend the tenders? I shall deal with that afterwards. The hon, gentleman has not charged that the amount which was allotted to skilled artisans for the purpose of doing this work, was extravagant, or was higher than the rates usually paid for such work. leader of the Opposition says, Oh, you gave $1.50 to men who were working at shovelling out ice from the water, you gave them 15 cents per hour. That labour was supplied by Mr. St. Louis for $1.10, $1.15, and $1.25. The deputy head of the partment was told by the superintendengineer that $1.50 per day was ing for not too much good labourer \mathbf{a} employed on that canal, and myself that in my section of the country no man would engage in any work of that kind for a less sum than was awarded by the Government for that work. The price was a fair one for the labour which those parties performed. At that time, as everyone knows, the House was in session, the House was in session from January to the 1st April. all this work of construction was March 8th and about done between 1st of May, and yet hon. tlemen opposite say that the Minister of Railways should have a supervision over the work. What the Minister of Railways is responsible for is to see that the parties under him honestly fulfil the duties which are required of them. who had charge of that work, the superintending engineer of the canal, was reported to me to be an efficient engineer. I knew he had been thirty years in the service of the Government, and I knew that the party who was under him as superinwas tendent of the canal an active and energetic man, fit to take charge of work of that kind, and see that it was properly carried out. Hon. gentlemen posite intimate that the duty of the chief engineer is to have an active supervision a personal supervision, of every railway and canal in the Dominion. No member of this House is foolish enough to suppose that it was his duty to do so. It is his dury to act according to the best of his knowledge, and to see that the men under him are efficient, and able to perform the work which the Government require to be done. Had he not a right to suppose that a man who had been thirty years in charge of the canals, and a man like Mr. Kennedy, who was the superintendent of the Lachine Canal, were able to supervise a work such as the building of these two bridges?

ats, one of the officers in charge, was rehe was removed because he prevented Mr. St. Louis from carrying on his corrupt practices, and that the Deputy Minister and the Minister of Railways winked at his removal for that reason. Let me tell the hon, gentleman that the superintending engineer of the canal, and the assistant engineer under him, Mr. Papineau, were perfectly capable engineers, and were quite sufficient for the purposes of supervising such a work. It was a work involving the expenditure of about $200,000, and an engineer could sit on a stone and see every bit of the work that was going on. It was a work that any engineer could supervise, and yet the charge is that Mr. Desbarats was dismissed because he was interfering with Mr. St. Louis in corrupt practices against Mr. Desbarats was not the Government. dismissed.

Mr. TARTE. He was.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman states what is not so. Mr. Desbarats was removed and afterwards sent to fill an important position on the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Schreiber wanted some one to supervise the work of construction on the Cana-Railway in the Rocky Pacific Mountains, and Mr. Desbarats was sent out there for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was not the ground stated in his letter of dismissal.

Mr. HAGGART. He was removed from Montreal and placed in charge of a work on the British Columbia section of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There was no intention of dismissing him. No charge was made in the department against Mr. Desbarats, who was a very active and efficient officer, and on account of his activity and efficiency he was charged by the chief engineer with the responsibility of superintending some work on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The letter at the time stated that his services were no longer required.

Mr. HAGGART. At that particular work. Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The department did not agree to continue him there, although Mr. Parent stated it was necessary.

Mr. HAGGART. In regard to the labour contract, I may say that the instructions I gave at the time to the superintending engineer were that the labour was to be obtained by requisition by him on the works, that no labour was to be employed unless it was absolutely requisite, and that the party should be dismissed immediately if they were not found efficient, active and suitable. Two charges have been made, and they have been made not against the hon, gentleman says that Mr. Desbar- my department but against myself personally: The first was, that I ordered work moved because he was too officious, that to be constructed in a particular manner instead of inviting tenders publicly and letting the work; the next was that the labour contract was not such as was in the interest of the country. I may have been mistaken in regard to the contract, the chief engineer of my department may have been mistaken in regard to the best mode of the employment of labour, and that it should not have been obtained by contract. Is that a serious charge to be made in this House and to be embodied in an amendment to go into Committee of Supply—an error of judgment, perhaps, committed by me because I accepted the recommendation of the chief engineer of my department and of the superintending engineer of the Lachine I am not supposed to possess Canal. sufficient technical knowledge to act on these matters. It would be sufficient justification for me at any time if, instead of exercising my judgment, I simply accepted the advice of my department. If the officers of my de-partment act wrongly, if frauds are com-mitted on the Lachine Canal or elsewhere, if parties steal and commit fraud, if there was collusion between the officers of the department, the time-keepers and the contractors for the supply of labour for the work and the Government is thus defrauded, am I responsible? Is the deputy head or the chief engineer of the department responsible? All they can do when they find out that such crimes have been committed is to see that the parties receive just punishment. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) made a further charge against me-that after the time I knew that irregularities had been committed, Mr. St. Louis was paid money. The first time I knew that extravagant expendiutre was being made was in a report made by Mr. Schreiber on 26th April. I never certified to payments, nor is a single payment certified to by myself. Since I have been in the department the Minister has not certified to payments, and the same is the practice in the Department of Public Works. The Minister does not know of payments being made. It is quite a mechanical process. The accounts are certified to by the chief engineer in charge or superintendent of the particular work, they come to the superintendent engineer in my department, and if they are within his knowledge he also certifies them; then they go to the Auditor General, and he sees that the vouchers in regard to the work are perfect and complete. I am not aware of a single account having been paid, either by the Minister of Public Works or by the Minister of Rail-ways. The parties are paid by cheques of the department or of the Auditor General. and the party who supervises the works and certifies the pay-rolls is responsible as to the payments and the Auditor General checks them to ascertain if they are in order. The only time the attention of the Minister is drawn to a certificate is when the estimate is exceeded, and then the reason is given. The hon, member for Queen's said, why had any payments been allowed after the 26th April? I did not authorize a single payment to be made; there were no payments made by my authority after the report of the chief engineer; there were no payments made on the chief engineer's certificate after that time. The against me is a personal one, that the Minister is responsible for the amount. The Minister is not responsible for the amount. If he had supervision for the payment of moneys, he might be responsible. If I saw every amount paid, the different. but the would be hon. tion gentleman knows I am not responsible, and that no payment was made by my authority after 26th April. After the assurance I have given him he will relieve me of all responsibility. The first charge was that I violated the statute by not letting the work by public contract; the next charge was that by gross mismanagement I let a contract for labour when the department should have employed the men, and that there was no proper supervision of the work. Is that a charge against me, that I did not properly superintend the work? Another charge is, that after all the facts came to my knowledge, payments were made, even when I knew there was corruption in the transactions between Mr. St. Louis and an officer or officers in charge of the works. I had no knowledge of any such charge; officers of my department had no knowledge anv frauds being of committ-They thought there was extravagance, but that was the only statement made to me. Mr. Douglas, an officer of the department, stated to Mr. Schreiber that the work was being extravagantly conducted, Mr. Schreiber informing me that from the reports there was an excess of expenditure over the estimated cost. I never suspected fraud until some time after the commission was appointed. When the commission was appointed all it was able to discover in the shape of fraud was that certain lumber and timber charged for was in excess of the quantities to be found in the works. But there was no evidence in the department of fraud; and as the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson) stated, the first evidence in our possession in respect to fraud was when we got possession of Mr. Frigon, who gave evidence before the Public Accounts Committee. Then there is the sworn information and the definite information obtained by Mr. Schreiber on 10th May, 1894, and the only evidence was that of Mr. Frigon. Did I conceal it? No. It was contained in a private letter, which was communicated to me. I placed no reliance on it. Nevertheless, I took the opportunity, the Public Accounts Committee being in session, of bringing the witness here and making inquiry as to whether the charges made by him were correct or not. When I found there was evidence to sustain the charge I furnished the information to the Public Accounts Committee and immediately afterwards forwarded the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee to the Department of Justice, and my instrucwere persons tions to prosecute all who had committed fraud on the Government and do everything possible to bring them to justice. bring them to justice. I might go into details and criticise the whole of the evidence, if the hour were not so late: I have prepared a brief which would take about one hour to read in regard to the evidence given before the Public Accounts Committee. The charge has been made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) that we had an offer to build the Grand Trunk Railway bridge for a fixed sum, and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) repeated the statement. He stated positively to this House, and so did the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that Mr. Hannaford had offered to build that bridge for $70,000, and that he could have saved $10,000. Mr. Hannaford never made an offer to build the bridge for $70,000. We were most anxious to have the work completed with the least possible delay, and one of the reasons of the delays was on account of the negotiations going on between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway, with reference to the Grand Trunk Railway Company building the bridge. They kept the negotiations for building the bridge open, but came to no definite conclusion, until at last a letter was received from Mr. Sargeant, manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, offering to build it, charging the Government the actual cost, with a fair percentage added for superintendence, &c. Here is the evidence of Mr. Hannaford with reference to that:

By Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper:

Q. You referred to an offer by the Grand Trunk to do the work for a certain sum. Was that in writing, or are you referring to a conversation? --A. I am referring to the general manager's letter of the 29th of December, 1892.

Q. Have you that letter ?—A. I have a copy of

Q. I would like to have that letter ?-A. It is written by Mr. Seargeant to Mr. Schreiber, dated 28th December, 1892.

"My dear Sir,-Your predecessor has written us with reference to the railway bridge across the canal here, which has to be rebuilt in connection with the proposed public bridge. not much time to be lost in proceeding with the work, which I understand it to be the wish of the Government this company should undertake.

Mr. Hannaford estimates the cost of the superstructure for the railway bridge at $35,000, and that it may take a similar sum to construct two new masonry abutments, leaving the centre pier as it is, and constructing additional crib-work and piling protection around it. The present rest piers will require to be removed. Thus the superstructure and masonry, together with the cribwork and piling, for the railway bridge complete may cost $70,000, more or less. "I beg to suggest that, considering this work has to be carried out in winter and the spring, when the days are short and the difficulties are great, that the fair and proper course will be to charge the Government the precise cost of the work. adding a reasonable amount for plant and superintendence, and that payment should be made on account as the work progresses, on the certificate of the Government engineer.

"That seems a fair course of the course of "That seems a fair arrangement, and I shall be glad to know whether it is approved in principle."

Q. Have you any other letter relating to the offer to do the work ?—A. Only that of the 28th.

Q. Is that the letter in which you say they are willing to take the work and do it for $70,000?—A. Yes.

Q. That is the construction you put upon this letter?—A. Yes, that is the construction we put upon it.

- Q. What particular portion do you think—might I trouble you to read it—It seems to me they merely give an opinion as to its costing that amount, but state only a readiness to do it for whatever it will cost, keeping an account?—A. Quite so.
 - Q. Not an offer to do it for $70,000 ?—A. No.

Q. Was there ever any such offer made?—A. To do it for $70,000? No, sir. We offered to do it in good faith.

There is an answer to the statement of the hon. member for Wellington, that the Grand Trunk Railway offered to build the bridge for $70,000. But the hon, gentleman only quoted a portion of Mr. Hannaford's evidence. The fact is that the department never received any offer from the Grand Trunk to build it for any stated sum. The only offer was the offer of the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, to undertake the work for what it might cost, with a percentage added for superintendence, use of tools, derricks, &c.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They were willing to do that in the month of December.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was no offer whatever.

Mr. HAGGART. There is not a word of any offer to that effect. That is the only letter and the only offer ever received from the Grand Trunk Railway on the matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) 'The hon, gentleman, will see it stated in Mr. Hannaford's evidence just below where he is reading. In reply to Mr. Lister he said he was willing to build the work for that amount, if he had got the work in December.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Hannaford never made an offer at all. Mr. Hannaford was the chief engineer of the Grand only When he talks about Railway. doing the job or anything of the kind he means in reference to the Grand Trunk Railway. What he did was to estimate the cost of the work, report to the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, and any offers as to building or construction, Mr. Hannaford had nothing to do with it. It was Mr. Seargent who was concerned in the case. The hon. gentleman must know it, and ought to know it, and he must know that this questioning and this letter came out immediately after the cross-examination of Mr. Hannaford. There is no evidence at all which shows that Mr. Hannaford offered to do the work for $70,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon, gentleman pardon me for calling his attention to the evidence at page 291:

By Mr. Lister:

Q. Is that true?—A. Not as Mr. Schreiber would call completed, because he is just and upright, and keeps people, as old Silas Wegg says, "With their noses to the grindstone." He keeps them flat. Mr. Schreiber would have said: "You did not finish that bridge, sir." I said: "No, Mr. Schreiber, I will tell you what I will do. I will have the bridge ready for navigation on the 1st of May, and let the Grand Trunk jump on me; they will jump on me enough, if it not ready for the railway." I would have taken the contract for $70,000, and have pocketed $10,000 for the company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That does not say he offered to do it.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has only read what the hon, member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) read some time ago. He knows that Mr. Hannaford is not in a position to do any work of that kind. Any one who knows anything of the relations between the Grand Trunk Company and their chief engineer, knows that we were not dealing with Mr. Hannaford at all. We were dealing with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) stated broadly, that one of the charges that he made against the department, and particularly against the Minister, was that an article appeared in the Montreal "Star." that that article showed that there was corruption and extravagance, that it warned the Minister that there would be an inquiry. and that if the Minister got that warning why did he proceed in the manner he did. The hon, member knows that there was no such charge as that made in the "Star." I will take the trouble to read the whole of the article, and I will show that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies's) statement was without a scintilla of foundation in reference to the charge he made:

An army of men, a forest of derricks, pick-axes swinging on every side, huge blocks of ice being hoisted in the air and carted away, pile drivers pounding down great timbers into the earth, busy workmen and rushing horses, noise bustle, piles of earth and deep excavations, temporary stone-yards on every side—stand on Wellington Street bridge, and all these are what will surround the spectator. A few days ago the neighbourhood around the bridge presented its usual wintry appearance, to-day work is being pushed forward on every side, and the scene is a regular hive of industry. The work for the new roadway bridge and the Grand Trunk bridge has commenced, and has to be complete before the opening of navigation, hence all this rush and activity. Twelve hundred men are working with all their might and main, and the locality has being completely metamorphosed. It was last Thursday that the operations were commenced, and they will be continued day and night without intermission till the work is completed. On both sides of the canal, above and below the old bridges, the excavations are being made for the abutments. Wherever there is room to swing a pick there is a labourer cutting away the earth. Teams stand above the excavations and cart away the dirt as rapidly as possible to a dump about half a mile distant. A temporary bridge has been erected across the canal just above the old bridge for the use of the workmen. In the canal, on the ice, scores of workmen are engaged in cutting up the ice, which is hoisted up by a big steam derrick and carted away. Some of these blocks are of enormous size. One taken out yesterday measured in cubical contents 256 feet, or in weight above 23,140 pounds. A couple of hundred yards above the bridge a temporary scaffolding is erected right out into the canal. There will be another derrick on top of this, which will be used for getting rid of the surplus material from the bottom of the canal. Some of the water in the canal was let out on Tuesday night, but about four feet still remain in the canal. It was found impossible to let all the water out till the ice above the bridge had been removed, as otherwise the ice would have formed a dam at the bridge and retarded the work. The staff was divided into two gangs of 600 men each and work will go on without intermission. Thirtyfive electric lights have been put up to enable the night work to proceed. The masonry for the superstructure has to be completed by April 15, but it is hoped to have everything ready before that time. There was almost a fatal accident at the works on Tuesday. A labourer named Victor Chalifou, while at work on the Grand Trunk bridge fell through into the water. He had sunk for the second time when a foreman named Trudel caught him by the hair and pulled him out. Besides the 1,200 men engaged on the work there are 100 single horses, 50 teams. 14 derricks, and 2 steam pile-drivers. The new roadway bridge will be about 160 feet west of the old one. new Grand Trunk bridge will occupy the same site as the old one. These two bridges were built with three piers in the water, two abutments, and a pivot pier each. The new bridges will have only a pivot pier each. The ends of the swing girders will rest on the abutments, which will give a much greater waterway for navigation, and do away with a good many yards of costly masonry. The new railway bridge will cross the canal at an angle. The extreme length between abutments will be 253 feet 6 inches; width over all, 14 feet, with a head room of 21 feet 6 inches. The new roadway bridge will be constructed with two electric train lines, two carriageways and two sidewalks, the latter each 5 feet wide, outside the trusses. The width over all will not exceed 48 feet, with a total length between abutments of 232 feet 3 inches, and a clear head room of 18 The contract for the superstructure has been awarded to the Dominion Bridge Company, of Lachine, who have undertaken to erect the railway bridge for $26,000, and the roadway bridge for $34,000. The masonry and excavation are being done by day work, while Messrs. William Hood & Son have the contract for the piling. The abutments will be 15 feet wide and 68 feet long at the bottom, sloping to 97 feet long for the roadway bridge and smaller for the railway bridge. Mr. E. N. Parent, superintendent engineer of canals in this district, is chief engineer of the work, with Mr. Edward Kennedy, superintendent of the Lachine Canal, chief foreman.

and managed manual for a particle approximate programming a finite of a contract of the contra

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say that it did.

Mr. HAGGART. I will take the hon. gentleman's statement when he says that he did not say that, but I understood him to say that the article in the "Star" had pointed out the corrupt and expensive manner in which the work was being carried on, and warned the department that an inquiry would be made into the expenditure. Is not the article in the "Star" altogether complimentary? The only inference of another kind that the Minister could draw was that there were too many men employed on the work for the amount of space they had. My attention was called to the statement that there were 1,200 men and 100 teams employed on the work, and I stated to Mr. Schreiber that that was too many men, and he agreed with me. He addressed Mr. Parent on the subject, and Mr. Parent's statement in reply was that the number was greatly over-stated. Was I not to rely upon the statement of the superintending engineer of the work? He further stated that he had discharged over four hundred men, and I forget how many teams.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon, gentleman pardon me? I did not say that the "Star" charged corruption. What I said was that the "Star" stated that 1,300 men were employed, and that the department had been informed that the expenditure was conducted in a lavish and extravagant manner. I quoted that phrase from the records. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the letter of Mr. Schreiber, of the 10th of March, addressed to Mr. Parent, in which he says:

I earnestly trust reports which are current, that the work at the Wellington Street bridges is being conducted in a most lavish and extravagant manner, are greatly exaggerated statements of the actual facts.

So that the department was informed that the work was then being carried on in a most lavish and extravagant manner. That is all I stated.

Mr. HAGGART. I understood the hon. gentleman to attribute that statement to the article in the "Star," but if he will look at his speech in "Hansard" to-morrow, he may find that I am mistaken, and he is right. As soon as that article appeared in the "Star," the hon. gentleman is right in saying that Mr. Schreiber wrote as follows, to Mr. Parent:

Dear Sir,-I earnestly trust the reports which are current, that the work at the Wellington Street bridges is being conducted in a most lavish and extravagant manner, are greatly exaggerated statements of the actual facts. You Now that I have read the whole article in will bear in mind that the responsibility in the will be judged by results. My instructions to you are to prosecute the work with vigour, to ensure its being completed by the 1st of May, proximo, having due regard to economy, but I see by the public press it is stated that you have one thousand three hundred men at work, a number immensely in excess of the requirements, and quite sufficient to retard the progress of the work by being in one another's way.

The superintending engineer's attention was called to the matter by this letter. He was ordered to come up immediately and report upon the work, and he reported that the statement made in the "Star" as to the number of men employed was greatly exaggerated, and that a great reduction had been made in the number of men and teams employed. Then, the hon. gentleman states that I ought to have had knowledge that the expenditure was in excess of the The superintending engineer of the canal was the party who made the estimate. He made it in my office, and I questioned him as to the amount required for the building of the bridges. I had the plans prepared and brought before me, and I understood that the amount which I had stated to Parliament was sufficient to cover the expenditure on the bridges during the year; and, when cross-examined before the Committee of Public Accounts, Mr. Parent himself admitted that it was his duty to inform the department as the excess of the expenditure over the There was no information in estimate. the department on the subject; the deputy had no information, and the chief engineer had no information until late April, when it was too late to correct it. The hon, gentleman shakes his head. What evidence is there? I will be compelled, in order to put the non. gentleman right, to quote from the evidence, although I do not like to trouble the House at this late hour with reading at any length. The amounts paid for labour were as follows:-

November		$ 2,544
December		3,307
	• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •

Those were the amounts which were paid on the labour pay-rolls up to the 28th April. They do not show at all that the account would be likely to be exceeded. The chief engineer only gave his certificate of approval for payment of the pay-rolls up to a par-There ticular day. was no evidence the department, there was no means which I could know at the time by expenditure was being that the Yet the hon, gentleman will move ceeded. an amendment and charge me personally with being responsible for the excessive expenditure over the estimate. There was no information in the department by which I could be aware of the excessive expention the cause of the heavy expenditure. The hon. gentleman cannot show I have done all that man can do. To hold by the evidence taken before the Public Aecounts Committee that the department could have been in any way informed, or that the Minister could have been informed, that the estimates for the building of these bridges before the 20th April, 1892, had been exceeded or would likely be exceeded. Yet the hon. gentleman will get up here and solemnly, in those ponderous tones in which he displays his eloquence, not only on pay-rolls, but on everything else—speaking with partisan heat instead of making, in a judicial manner, clear, concise and precise statements, as he ought to do when attacking the head of a department, who, he knows, may have been led into error by the reports of his officers-tries to hold me personally responsible, although he knows that I did everything possible to ferret out the wrong and punish those who committed frauds upon the department. How different is the action of the hon, gentleman opposite from what the leader of the Opposition would do in England. If frauds were committed there in the Ordnance or the Supply Department, would there be any charge brought against the officers of the department? If the system of audit or the system of management proved wrong, would there be any charge made against the political head of the depart-ment? No, not one member in the House, no matter how bitter an opponent he might be against the Government, would impugn the honour of the department, without the most grave and serious reasons. He would not impugn the honour of the head of the department, but would assist in every possible manner, if he were on a committee for the purpose of investigating the evils, in discovering and punishing those who were guilty of the frauds, instead of making political capital out of them for the purpose of damaging the reputation of a Minister of the Crown. It is too cowardly, too mean a manner of making capital in the country-gentlemen without a fiscal policy, withanything on electorate of out which to approach the electorate of the country, trying to fix a scandal or a charge of corruption against a Minister, without a tittle of evidence to support it. Not attacking the department, not attacking those parties who committed the wrong, not attacking them at all-no, but trying to atone for their lack of policy, trying to get some credit in the country, by an attack upon the honour of the Minister who is at the head of the department. The hon, gentleman knows that there could not have been any knowledge of these frauds in the department. I appointed a commission for the purpose of inquiring into the expenditure, and I determined that the guilty parties would be punished if there was any wrong-doing. police inspector of the Intercolonial to ferret out wrong if wrongs existed. I did all I possibly could for the purpose of getting at the department responsible because the contractor for a particular work, a work in charge of a superintending engineer in a distant or even near part of the country, perhaps under the eyes of the engineer-inchief at Ottawa-to hold the department responsible because the resident and superintending engineer allowed fraud to be com-mitted between the party supplying the labour and the time-keepers whose duty it was to check and see that the contractor received nothing but the hopest time; hold the head of a department or the chief engineer responsible, is anything but fair. All the head of the department could do, when fraud was committed and when the superintending engineer was not efficient in the performance of his duty, was to discharge him and every other person found guilty. This was done in this case. It was my duty to see that every person who committed a fraud was punished if possible. I have done that, and I have insisted that my department shall do it; and if it be possible at all. I will see that the parties who committed the frauds are punished. I have done everything I possibly could to recover from those who received money they were not entitled to, the money thus wrongfully received. I do not believe that any officer in my department at headquarters was negligent of his duty in any respect, but that he did all he possibly could for the faithful performance of his duty.

Mr. MARTIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That the adjourned Debate on the motion of Mr. Foster for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Davies in amendment thereto, be made the first order at the next sitting of the House this day, after questions to be put by members.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that my hon. leader has agreed to this. I am sorry, because there are many Bills on the Order paper for Wednesday, the only day now left for private members. I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance whether he proposes to give the private members another day, say Tuesday, to make up for the am ask-Wednesday. Mr. Speaker, I ing the Minister of Finance a very proper question. My impression is that this motion has been assented to without consideration of the Order paper; and I do not think it is fair to private members that the motion should be carried. There are many matters on the paper that are of very considerable interest and importance, and I ask the Finance Minister, in all fairness now, whether, if he deems it necessary that this debate should proceed de die in diem, whether it is not fair that proper compensation should be made to the private members.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the motion we have been debating to-day is a very important one, involving want of confidence in the Government; and, after consulta-tion with the leader of the Opposition, it was agreed that it should go on de die in diem until it was finished. It is so important a motion that I think we must dispose of it before we can go on with other business. It was in the line of that idea that the agreement was made. It does take from private members, Wednesday, which belongs to them, but there are Mondays and other Wednesdays which will still be private members' days. I could not make a promise, of course, to give a Government day in return for this. It may have, however, the effect of making me a little less strenuous in asking for an additional day for the Government. That matter I will be very glad to consider.

THE REPORT OF THE REST OF THE

Mr. McCARTHY. Is the motion in order, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, a motion of this kind, strictly-speaking, would require a notice. But it has been the practice ever since I have been in Parliament, when a question affecting the Government, I may say a question in which the Government was involved so closely as the question before the House, for the House to agree to the passing of the motion.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was not asking what the House ought to do, but whether the motion is in order. If the motion is in order, as both leaders have agreed to it, of course there is nothing to be said; but if it is not in order, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Rule as to the practice of the House for the last ten years.

Mr. SPEAKER. If there is objection made to it, of course I shall have to declare the motion out of order.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do object to it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend had better consider that objection.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have considered it. It is well known that the Order paper is loaded down with Bills, and at this stage of the session, if there is to be any possibility of pressing these Bills it must be tomorrow night. Of course, I am quite willing to agree to the motion if the hon. leader of the House thinks fit to exchange days.

Mr. FOSTER. I doubt very much if my hon. friend will forward even what is upon the paper for to-morrow by taking an objection against the general sense of the House. I would have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to make Monday next a day upon which the Bills could be taken, instead of the motions. That would have the effect desired. Again, I would ask my hon. friend to consider his objection.

Mr. McCARTHY. So far as I am concerned, I would be willing to accept the offer. I do not know if it will suit all hon. members. I have nothing upon the Order paper myself.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the motion is put with the unanimous consent of the House?

Mr. MULOCK. I did not intend to raise a point of order myself; I only intervened in the discussion to the extent of asking the leader of the House, whether, in assenting to this motion, he could not see his way to giving hon. members another day in return for the one he was taking. I do not think the hon. gentleman is making much of a concession now.

Mr. McCARTHY. You will move the motion with regard to Monday, afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER. We will arrange for that, yes.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to: and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 19th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

Mr. Foster.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 118) to amend the Fisheries Act as respects the salmon fishery.—(Mr. Costigan.)

MR. SUTTON AND THE ROYAL CANADIAN DRAGOONS.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Mulock) asked, Was the officer commanding Her Majesty's forces in Canada consulted in regard to the appointment of Mr. Sutton to the Royal Canadian Dragoons? If so, did such officer recommend Mr. Sutton for such appointment or express any opinion either in favour of or against Mr. Sutton being appointed? If so, what was the nature of such opinion?

Mr. DICKEY. There is nothing on record in the department to show that the officer commanding Her Majesty's forces in Canada was consulted in regard to the appointment of Mr. Sutton to the Royal Canadian Dragoons.

ATLANTIC AND SUPERIOR RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Flint) asked, Has the Government guaranteed, or does it propose to guarantee the interest on the bonds of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company, issued or to be issued in London, as stated in the following telegram to the Montreal "Gazette" of June 17th inst. :-" London. 15th.—Robinson. June Fleming and Company, London, have invited applications for £500,000 first mortgage 4 per cent 20-year bonds of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway, being part of the authorized issue of £4,000,000. price is 99. It is stated that the Government of Canada has guaranteed the interest on the bonds for the period of their currency and that the coupons will be so endorsed.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government has not guaranteed, nor does it propose to guarantee, the interest on the bonds of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company issued, or to be issued, in London. What the Government has done is this: It has agreed to accept from the company a sum of money as a loan for which it will pay 3 per cent interest, the sum of money so loaned and accumulated interest to be paid as directed by the company, and the company's direction will be that it be paid to the coupon holders of its bonds. As to the character of the road, the quality of the road, or the scheme in any way, the Government takes no responsibility and makes no guarantee.

Mr. LAURIER. What sum of money do you loan?

Mr. FOSTER. £300,000. The Government receives the money and pays the interest.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Flint) asked, Is it the intention of the Government, in case it undertakes to guarantee the bonds of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company, to compel the said road to purchase the South Shore Railway between Montreal and Sorel and to use the same as a portion of its line, or is it the intention of the Government to permit the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company to build a road between Montreal and Sorel parallel with the said South Shore Railway?

Mr. FOSTER. As the Government does not undertake to guarantee the bonds, so far as this transaction is concerned, it makes no conditions with the road.

Mr. FOSTER. They will be brought down.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. LISTER. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that it is impossible to make any progress in the Public Accounts Committee owing to the action of the Government and its supporters on that committee. This House has been in session for more than two months-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LISTER. What is the point of order? If it is necessary to move the adjournment of the House, I will do so.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House. If the hon, gentleman desires to ask a question, he may, perhaps, be allowed to do so.

Mr. LISTER. I wish to state the facts.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman must not introduce controversial matter.

Mr. CASEY. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I second the motion.

Mr. LISTER. I desire to call the attention of the Government and the House to the fact that Parliament has been in session more than two months, and the Public Accounts Committee, up to last week, was called together only once a week, and, of course, hon, gentlemen will know that the daily sitting of that committee is only two The result is that it is almost impossible to make any progress. As a matter of fact, the business before the committee is of a most important character, and the conduct of the Government, or the friends of the Government in that committee, and the member of the Government who presides at that committee, and controls its proceedings, is simply scandalous.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman is guilty of two breaches of parliamentary rules. In the first place, he is out of order in referring to something that has taken place before a committee, the proceedings of which have not yet been reported; and, in the second place, by describing the conduct of a member of the House as scandalous. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that term.

Mr. LISTER. I withdraw the word "scandalous," and substitute the word "improper," if that will suit the members of the House. At all events, my object is to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the committee is not able to get along with its business, that it has met only once a week till last week. Last week it held Will the papers be two meetings, and this week it has held one meeting, and no meeting is to take place until next week. The House will, no doubt, prorogue in two or three weeks, and so it will be impossible to have more than three or four more meetings. In that case, no satisfactory progress can be made by the committee with the important investigations with which it is charged, and it will not be able to bring them to a close. It will be impossible to make any report, or to make any statement as to the results of the labours of that committee. I feel that this committee is entitled to hold more sittings, because it can sit without interfering with the business of the House, and, in the public interest, and in every interest every effort should be made that the work of the committee should not be interfered with or delayed, but that its work should be helped along and brought properly to a close before the House prorogues.

Mr. OUIMET.

I think the question Mr. LAURIER. brought up by the hon, member to the attention of the House is one which deserves some attention at the hands of the Govern-The hon, gentleman makes a comment. plaint which is in the nature of a public He has stated that the Public complaint. ts Committee meets only once a The leader of the House must ad-Accounts week. mit that for such a committee to meet once a week it is impossible to have the work which belongs to it properly done. hon, gentleman should say what reason there is why the Government should not favour such a motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Such a motion as what?

Such a motion as made Mr. LAURIER. by my hon. friend now, that the committee should meet more than once a week.

Mr. FOSTER. It does meet more than once a week.

Mr. LAURIER. It does not.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon, friend does not attend that meeting, and he is speaking simply by hearsay, and as usual is badly informed. Since the committee was first called together. it has met almost twice a week.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. If it did not meet there was some reason which presented itself to the committee, and I have never heard any strong objection taken in the committee to the meeting time being fixed as it was fixed by the committee. The hon, gentleman refers to some person who as a Minister presides over the committee. No Minister presides over it or presides at it. When there is an attack made on a department, the Minister of that department is there and is alert to see that justice is done; but it is a wrong impression to give to the House or to the country that some member of the Ministry presides at that committee and acts improperly. There is no improper action. The committee guides its own action, and arranges for its own meeting time, and the subjects it will take up. Although I am not going to say as to what takes place in committee, I do make the assertion that there is no trouble at all in arranging this matter in the committee itself.

Mr. LISTER. You were not there this morning?

Mr. FOSTER. I was.

Mr. LISTER. You were only there part of the time.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite so. I have a right to be in and out as I may please and not simply as the hon, gentleman thinks I ought week, and the Finance Minister, on behalf of the Government, assented to it; but from various causes the agreement has not been carried out. This week we only meet once, as on several other occasions, and after a division to-day we adjourned until next Tuesday. It is utterly impossible, Sir, to carry on investigations to any purpose if we are going to interpose a week between each meeting of the committee. It would be better to have no Public Accounts Committee, and let the country know that there is no intention of carrying on investigations, than to meet at intervals of a week apart. I can conceive no sufficient reason why the Committee on Banking and Commerce and the Committee on Public Accounts should not meet at the same time. It does appear to me to be trifling with the House that the committee should meet only once a week. particularly at this period of the session, and while important investigations are going on. No human being can hope to get through any investigation at the rate of two hours per week. In 1891, the committee met week after week, three or four times in succession, and when there is anything of importance going on, exertion ought to be made by the Government to see that this committee, which is supposed to investigate important public questions, should meet at least two or three times a week, particularly at the latter part of the session.

Mr. HAGGART. The committee does not meet twice this week because there is a meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee to-morrow (Thursday), and belong members to both committees. Besides. Banking the and Commerce Committee occupy the same room the Public Accounts Committee. Now, on Friday there is a meeting of the Railway Committee. The principal charges to be investigated before the Public Accounts Committee are charges against my department, and I should be present, but it is absolutely necessary that I should also be present at the Railway Committee on Friday, and assurance has been given by the Government that the committee will meet regularly twice a week until the end of the session. The hon, gentleman knows that that is as much time as the Minister at the head of a department such as mine can spare.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What the hon. gentleman says may be partially true, but we have got to look at the result which is surely to follow the adoption of the course which the Government have taken in this matter. A very important matter is being investigated before the Public Accounts Committee, and that investigation has dragged out over four meetings. The committee only sits for two hours. It is now apparent to every member that unless we meet oftener and sit longer, that investigation cannot be concluded, and when my hou, friend seeks to have more frequent meetings for the purpose of It was proposed we should meet twice a concluding this investigation and reporting to the House, we are told that the committee is not to meet until next Tuesday. I think we have a right to bring the question before the House, or otherwise the action of the Government the result of frustrating will have inquiry. remember very well that some years ago the Public Accounts Committee met every day to conduct an important investigation, and when it was found necessary, the committee sat concurrently with the House. We have Mr. Thompson, an engineer, before us, and his examination is not concluded, and other important witnesses are waiting from week to week. It is perfectly plain that by sitting for only two hours each week we cannot conclude the inquiry if what we all hope is realized, that the House will prorogue at a reasonably early day.

Mr. FOSTER. I know it was stated across the floor in the early part of the session that the committee would meet twice a week. That has been the endeavour, and in the main it has been done. Very good reason is given why the committee only meet once this week. I would suggest that as the committee is to meet twice per week afterwards, and hon, gentlemen opposite are anxious to get through their investigation, they might come at 10 o'clock in the morning and have two meetings of three hours each per week.

Mr. LAURIER. All right.

Motion to adjourn the House negatived.

SUPPLY-LACHINE CANAL BRIDGE CONTRACT.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Mr. Davies in amendment thereto.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the greater portion of the remarks of the hon, member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and of the hon member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), in connection with this motion were directed to the cost of the work. Excuses were put forward by them why this work should have cost more than the estimates provided for. I may say at once that so far as any arguments as these are concerned, they may be eliminated entirely from this debate, because the figures given by the commission appointed by the Government, as to what the cost ought to have been, taking into consideration all these various circumstances referred to by hon. members, are the figures which are accepted by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and are the figures which I shall accept. No question arises in this debate as to whether the sum of $200,000 which these gentlemen estimate as being the proper amount for the work, and as the amount the bridges should have cost. Making all these allowances, as to the ice, as to the limited time, as to the contract for labour, the commission estimated that the work should have cost $200,000. It might have been urged on this side of the House that a fairer estimate was that of the en-gineers Casgrain and Roy, who were ap-pointed to look into the matter carefully. and who came to the conclusion that the work should have been done for $141,000. But that ground is not taken, and therefore the greater portion of the remarks of those two hon, gentlemen, as well as a large portion of the remarks of the hon. Minister himself, had no reference whatever to the charge made in the resolution before the House; because that charge is not that the work cost more than it was estimated to cost, but the charge is that gross frauds were committed on the Government in connection with that work, and that the hon. Minister of Railways is to blame for those frauds. The first matter at the opening of this work in which the Government went wrong was in a gross violation of the statute law of this Dominion as to the letting of the contract. It is provided in section 13 of the Public Works Act:

The Minister shall invite tenders, by public advertisement, for the execution of all works, except in cases of pressing emergency, in which delay would be injurious to the public interest, or in which, from the nature of the work, it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly plain that this was not a work of pressing emergency. because the money for it was voted fully a year before the work was commenced. The time chosen for the work was that which seemed to the department most suitable, and there was every opportunity for preparation; therefore that exception is eliminated. The other exception is "from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department." Now, no pretense is made that that could be done, and that course was not adopted; the work was not executed by the officers and servants of the department. In direct violation of this section, no tenders were invited by public advertisement. The hon. Minister attempts to answer this charge by saying that Mr. Mackenzie in his day frequently violated this statute by letting contracts without tender. I defy the hon. Minister or any of his supporters to produce a single instance, in which Mr. Mackenzie, while at the head of the Public Works Department, violated this section—a single instance in which he let a contract without inviting tenders by public advertisement, unless the contract came clearly within the two exceptions provided for by the section. But that statement, even if it were true, would be no answer, as the hon. Minister himself admitted, in this case. He endeavoured to say, however, that he had observed the section—that he had invited tenders, and that the work was done only after an Order in Council had been passed. Now, there seems to be an idea on the part of this Government that almost anything can be done by an Order in Council—that no matter how much any particular action of the Government is in violation of the statute law of Canada, an Order in Council will cover it up. Of course, an argument of that kind needs no answer. An Order in Council is absolutely worthless unless that Order in Council has authority in the law, and an Order in Council permitting the Minister to do this work by inviting tenders, not by public advertisement, but by private notice, is an Order in Council which is perfectly worthless, and which affords no defence whatever for the hon. Minister for this pre-liminary violation of the law in connection with this disgraceful affair. But even after this Order in Council had been passed, what was the course of the Government? In the commissioners' report, at page 6, an account is given of the manner in which the tenders for labour were obtained. Hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the hon, member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) attempted to maintain that tenders had really been invited for labour, and also for material. As to that the commissioners report:

On the 15th December, 1892, Mr. Kennedy invited tenders privately for the supply of skilled labour. Two tenders were received, addressed to Mr. Kennedy, one from Turner & Co., and the other from E. St. Louis, both dated the 20th December. From the evidence it appears that these tenders were sent to Mr. Parent, the superintending engineer on the 20th December, 1892, who, considering there was not sufficient competition, asked for other tenders, also privately. Two new tenders, addressed to Mr. Parent, and dated December 20th, being of the same date as those addressed to Mr. Kennedy, were received, one from John R. Rose, and the other from J. E. Trottler, a former clerk of Mr. St. Louis.

The commissioners say as to these tenders:

There is considerable doubt whether these tenders were bona fide; the competition may not have been genuine, and in reality there may have been only one tender.

Now, Sir, the hon. Minister goes on further and makes an appeal to the labour sentiment in justification of this contract. He says: "It is true, I did allow a contract to be awarded to Mr. St. Louis for the supply of labour without any form of tender; and further, without any attempt to investigate the matter, I allowed Mr. St. Louis' contract to be applied to the Grand Trunk bridge, it being only for the Wellington bridge in the first instance." A question arose. Mr. St. Louis claimed $1.87½ a day for all kinds of labour which he furnished. and the Minister eventually settled with him for $1.50 a day; and the hon. gentle-man makes an appeal to the labouring peo-ple, saying: "I did think then, and I still think, that $1.50 a day is not an unreasonable amount to pay to those men many of water." Is that the fact? Did the hon. gentleman ever agree that $1.50 a day should be paid to the labourers employed on this Did he ever take any action by work? which the labourers on this work should get $1.50 a day? Was the question whether a man working up to his waist in water was to be fairly paid ever considered by the hon. gentleman? No, because the $1.50 was not to go to the labourers; it was to go to Mr. St. It has been shown, as a mat-Louis. ter of fact, that these poor labourers worked up to their who waists water in this nasty work, actually ceived from Mr. St. Louis $1.10, $1.15 and $1.25 per day, while St. Louis received $1.50. Even on the settlement that was finally made with St. Louis, he claimed that he was entitled to $1.87½ for all these labourers. A settlement was finally made on the basis of $1.50 for ordinary labour; but in the final the only kind of ordinary labourers who were paid for at this rate were those that actually used a pick and shovel. No matter how ordinary the labour was, no matter if the man was carrying lumber, or doing any other kind of ordinary labour, Mr. St. Louis received $1.871/2 for each one of these men unless the man actually used a pick and shovel. So we find that, at the very outset, the Minister of Railways, knowingly and intentionally violated the law of the Dominion. We find that at the very outset he allowed this contract to be made which was of such great advantage to Mr. St. Louis; and I desire to point out that in the criticisms we make of the amounts which had been stolen from the Government, we allow as profit, legitimate under the circumstances, the whole amount of St. Louis' contract at $1.871/2 for each man, and at $1.50 for each pick and shovel man. All the steals that we criticise were over and above that. All these amounts which the commission find the Government have been defrauded of, are over and above that-all these amounts for men that never worked, for time that was never put in, and which were simply straight frauds upon the Government. Now, the hon. Minister said that he had never conducted a public work, except this, in which the estimates had been exceeded. That statement was met by one on this side just the opposite, namely, that no public works on which the hon. gentleman or his department had been engaged for years had been constructed for anything like the estimate. I do not intend to go into that matter at length, but desire to point out that in this very matter we are discussing, the original estimate, as shown by the report of the commissioners at page 4, was $122,000, and the actual cost, according to the bills rendered, $430,225. This is for the substructure. The Government actually paid for this work, which they estimated would cost $122,000, $334,000. There are just one or two matters, which whom had to work up to their waists in perhaps have not very much to do with the question, but which I may refer to briefly as the hon. Minister brought them in. The hon. gentleman referred to the charge made against him in connection with section B contracts, and he threw out a very bold challenge to gentlemen on this side—offering to have a very full investigation if any hon, member here was bold enough to make an explicit charge against him. With regard to that, let me call attention to the records. In 1891, the hon, member for West Lambton stood up in his place and made the following charge, which it appears to me, if I understand the English language, is as explicit and clear as it is possible for a charge to be made:

That Jas. Frederick Lister, Esq., the member representing the electoral district of West Lambton in this House, having declared from his seat in the House, that he is credibly informed, and that he believes that he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence:—

by satisfactory evidence:—
That in the year 1879, Messrs. Alexander Shields, John James Macdonald. Alexander Macdonell, James Isbester and Peter McLaren entered into contract with the Government of Canada for the construction of a portion of the C.P.R. between Port Arthur and Rat Portage, known as section B.

The said contract and the work in connection therewith were completed by the said contractors to whom they were a source of great profit.

ors, to whom they were a source of great profit.

During the whole period covered by the said contract, the Hon. John G. Haggart, now Postmaster General, and a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council for Canada, was a member of the House of Commons for the South Riding of Lanark, and is still such member.

That the said Hon. John G. Haggart became and was beneficially interested in the profits of said contract which accrued to the share thereof standing in the name of the said Peter McLaren, and has received large sums out of the said profits, and has otherwise derived direct and substantial pecuniary benefits therefrom.

That charge was not investigated, and for what reason? On the plea that too long a time had elapsed to justify its examination. But the hon. gentleman to-day, four years afterwards, comes forward and boldly offers to have an investigation if the charge is renewed. The hon, gentleman is very bold. Possibly he knows that now evidence which could have been had at that time could not be obtained. What other possible conclusion If it is proper to-day, must we come to? on a charge being made, to have it investigated; if the hon. gentleman is prepared to have his connection with the section B contract investigated to-day, why was he not prepared four years ago? With regard to the question under discussion, I intend as briefly as possible to draw the attention of the House to those evidences of frauds which appear all through the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee and set forth in the report of the royal commission. I shall draw attention to those evidences of fraud, with the avowed object of inducing the House to believe that the fraud was intentional from the beginning, that the Department of Railways designedly allowed such circumstances to exist as to enable those persons who were in a position to profit from those frauds to commit them and obtain the profits. I shall endeavour to show that all along, from the commencement of the work, the Minister of Railways had information at his command which would have enabled him to learn perhaps not the exact frauds, not the exact persons who were committing them, but beyond the possibility of doubt that these frauds were going on and that the Government was being robbed day by day. I propose to show that apparently the hon. Minister refused and neglected to avail himself of those opportunities of investigation at his command, and allowed the whole of the work to be completed under circumstances which he knew at the time were such as to give every opportunity for fraud. I propose to show that he knew, at the time that these circumstances were being availed of for the purpose of largely enhancing the cost to the Government, and that after the work was completed or nearly so, the hon. Minister knowingly allowed that work to be paid for. I propose to show that he knew that those frauds were being committed, and that the work had cost through them this large amount in excess of what it should have cost. The motion of the hon. member for Queen's is a fair one, under the circumstances, and one which should be adopted by this House. In the very first instance, we work placed in the hands find this Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Kennedy was an officer of the department. The hon. Minister and his deputy knew, or should have known, the character of Mr. Kennedy. They knew, or should have known, the record that Kennedy had made in the department, and whether he was or was not a man fit to take charge of the work when the work was to be done by day labour. Let us see, then, what Mr. Kennedy's record was. The commissioners at page 19, referred to the fact that after Mr. Kennedy became superintendent of the canal the amount spent for repairs had enormously increased. The following are the figures :-

From	1879	to	1881,	cost of repair	s	$42,000
do	1882	to	1884	do		54,000
ФĎ	1885	to	1887	ф		61,000
do	1888	to	1890	do		65,000

Then we come to Mr. Kennedy's time:

1891 to 1893, cost of repairs$155,000

-or more than double as much for any similar period. Then the commissioners show us, at page 22, that the record of Mr. Kennedy in relation to the purchase of supplies and material was a record of extravagance. This refers to the time prior to the construction of the bridge, when Mr. Kennedy was in charge of the canal:

The purchase of supplies and materials was extravagant, especially timber and lumber, which covered the banks. During 1892 and part of 1893 the timber and lumber supplied to the canal amounted to $417,116; of this amount, Henderson Bros. supplied $83,163. During the same period the timber and lumber charged to repairs amount to $42,098, the balance was charged to special appropriations of income and capital. There seems to have been a mania on the part of the management for purchasing timber and lumber.

This is the man whom the department deliberately put in charge of this work under the circumstances I have named. The next point we have, to which I have alluded was that the construction of the work was undertaken, in violation of the law, without tender. And it having been determined to construct a bridge by days' labour, the labour was contracted for. The reason given for this was that there was fear of a strike. I shall not delay the House to go over the ground with regard to this matter covered by other speakers, but I will say that a more absurd excuse, a more ridiculous excuse, could not have been given. As the commissioners point out, this suggestion is not borne out by the evidence. The fact is that no facts were given to show that there was danger of a strike; and, so far as I can see, there appears to be no more reason to think that a strike would occur when the work was in the hands of the Government than when it was in the hands of a contractor for labour. It is a very strange and a very suspicious circumstance, when we look at that large quantities of lumber billed as the result, and it bears very strongly upon the charge made that that contract should not have been entered into. Because it can be fairly said, Mr. Speaker, that if that contract with Mr. St. Louis for labour had not been entered into, the chief portion of the huge fraud committed in connection with the construction of this bridge never could have occurred; because it was in stuffing the pay-list, it was in getting from the Government a large amount more than he paid. that Mr. St. Louis was able to defraud the Government out of $170,000, according to their charge against him. The next matter that I draw the attention of the House to in support of the resolution is that Mr. Desbarats was dismissed. Now, Mr. Desbarats was an engineer, in the employ of the department here, who was sent down to Montreal to look over the work and prepare plans for it. He was sent there while, as the department knew, Mr. Parent, the superintending engineer of the canal, and Mr. Papineau his assistant were there. The very circumstances which in the end were put forward as a reason for the dismissal or withdrawal of Mr. Desbarats from the work existed at the time he went to the work. But, in the meantime, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Desbarats had proved himself a man different entirely from Mr. Kennedy, a man who proposed to do his duty. And, as it was intended that fraud should be committed upon the Government in connection with this work, and as this was a man who stood in the way of the commission of those frauds, he was the man who must be removedand, accordingly. Mr. Speaker, he was removed. Up to the time he left, at the end of February, only a small portion of the work had been done; but already we see from the evidence the work of fraud had commenced. In Mr. Desbarats' evidence, page 65, he states that Mr. Kennedy was bringing upon the ground a great deal more lumber than was required under his specifications. Now, it will be remembered that in the end the commissioners report that over one million feet of lumber was paid for by the Government more than went into the work; and already Mr. Desbarats had found that out, had objected to it and had sought to check it. Again, he says, Mr. Kennedy refused to furnish him the timelists. This was on the 18th February. It was part of his duties, as he understood them, to check the workmen upon the work in order to see that the Government were not paying for more labour than was actually done. While it might not have been strictly his duty to keep the time, he considered that as engineer-and I think that the House will believe that he was rightit was part of his general work of superintendence to see the time as furnished to the Government was correct. Mr. Kennedy deliberately refused to furnish him with these time-lists. Again, at page 73, he states furnished never was delivered upon the works. The bill was put in presumably, but the lumber was never furnished. As I have stated. Mr. Desbarats prepared the plans. He referred to a very significant fact when he said that the number of men breaking stone for 50 yards of concrete was most extraordinary. He observed this and drew Mr. Kennedy's attention to it. Again, we find that both Mr. St. Louis and Mr. Parent told Mr. Desbarats that he was being removed through the influence of Mr. Kennedy. Now, the hon. Minister of Railways says, with regard to Mr. Desbarats' removal, that he was never dismissed, that he was changed from this work and sent to British Columbia. Now, Mr. Speaker. that is in direct contradiction to the evidence, the evidence of Mr. Desbarats himself. At page 77 of the evidence, Mr. Desbarats says:

Q. You told Mr. Schreiber nothing about it ?-A. No. I did not see Mr. Schreiber till after I was dismissed.

Then, at page 75, we have from Mr. Desbarats a circumstantial account of how he was dismissed and what was said to him and done to him by Mr. Schreiber:

Q. And was the letter you received from Mr. Schreiber the first information or intimation that you were no longer required on that work?— A. There was a letter from Mr. Parent inclosing a letter from Mr. Schreiber to him.

Q. Stating that you were dismissed or relieved, which?—A. Stating that I would not be required on the work after the end of the month.

Q. Your instructions when you went to Montreal, were to go back to the office ?—A. To go back to the office when I was through with the work on the Wellington bridge.

Q. The intention was at the time you were appointed that you should continue in Montreal until the completion of the work ?-A. Yes.

Q. When you received that intimation you went back to the office ?—A. Yes.

You saw Mr. Schreiber in his office?-

Q. And asked for an explanation ?—A. Yes. Q. What did he say ?—A. I think I ju stated that. Do you wish me to repeat it?

O. That you were made it?

Q. That you were no longer required at the works, that they could get along without you ?-A. He said he thought the staff in Montreal could do the work.

Q. Yes; now, Mr. Papineau wasn't on the staff?—A. Oh, yes, he was on the canal staff.
Q. He was on the canal staff?—A. Yes.

Q. Was he removed from that and put into your place?—A. No, I think he continued on the canal staff, but was appointed to do my work, the work I had been doing.

Q. Did you ask Mr. Schreiber for further work ?—A. I did.

Q. What did he say ?—A. He said he did not see that there was anything just then.

Q. Is that all he said ?—A. Well, I don't remember. He may have said something else, but that is what remained in my mind.

Q. After your interview ?—A. Yes.
Q. That was all ?—A. That was the substance of it.

Q. Did you ask him whether you would get further work or not ?—A. I told him I wished for work. I asked him if anything turned up, if there was anything coming, if there would be a chance of my getting work, and he said there might be. He said there were several works going on, and there might be work for me later on.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that effectually disposes of the statement made by the Minister of Railways that Mr. Desbarats was not dismissed from this work, but that he was removed to other work in British Columbia where he was required. dismissed from the work. He came up to Ottawa and was told that there was no further work for him to do, that there were some other works going on, and that if anything turned up, he would be taken on again. Then the next matter to which I will refer is the fact that there was no check whatever kept upon the time of these men for which the Government was paying \$1.87½ a day to Mr. St. Louis. At page eight of the commissioners' report, we are told by this commission, appointed by the Government, that Mr. St. Louis furnished time-keepers for the Government; that Mr. St. Louis, who had a contract at so much a day for furnishing men for this furnished the time-keepers also Why, Sir, could you imagine a looser contract than that? Could you imagine a wider door thrown open to fraud? a man would be less than human, it would be a temptation that scarcely any man could resist, to take advantage of the circumstances when he was told: Here is a Government with plenty of money. You are getting $$1.87\frac{1}{2}$ per day for every man that is employed on this work, and you may keep the time as well. Send as many men as you like, put into the account what time you like, and you will be paid \$1.87½ per day. Is that an evidence of careful supervision? Is that an evidence that the Government were determined this work should be carried on in a business-like way? Is it not a corroboration of the charge made in the resolution of the hon. gentleman? Mr. St. Louis' time-keeper, Mr. Villeneuve, was also an official of the Government, and he was also receiving his pay month by month from the Government. And while it would appear to Mr. Schreiber, or to any other person going upon the works and finding Mr. Villeneuve as a regular employee of the canal staff, attending to the time, that he was doing so in the interest of the Government, we find he was not working for the Government at all, it was no part of his duty as a Government official to keep that time, but he was entirely employed and paid by Mr. St. Louis, although at the same time receiving his monthly salary from the Government as well. find that the officers who were supposed to keep time for the Government, Mr. Doheny and Mr. Coughlin, did not keep time, but that they signed the time-lists as a mere We find upon the paymatter of form. rolls that were produced before the commission, the name of Doheny as stone measurer, and one looking at the pay-roll would naturally conclude that this was an official of the Government who was certifying the But Mr. Doheny tells us that he never intended to certify the pay-rolls, that he knew nothing about it, and that he put his name there as a matter of form: and he thinks there were some other accounts attached to that pay-roll for which he was certifying. We find by Mr. Coughlin's evidence, on page 421, that he never had anything to do with the Grand Trunk bridge, that he never took any part in it, but that the time-rolls were brought to him and he was requested to put his name down there as certifying they were correct, and he did so. On page 353 of the evidence, we are told, also, by Coughlin that the other time-keepers all knew, as this work was going on, that the time that was going into the Government and that was being certified to by the department at Ottawa, was not at all the correct time. but that the pay-rolls were fraudulent and stuffed. Now, in reading over the report of the commissioners, it is evident that they were impressed with the magnitude of the fraud that had been committed in connection with this work. It is rather strange. also, that the Government should have selected as one of the commissioners, Mr. Douglas, who was sent round there several times during the progress of the work to learn whether matters were going on satisfactorily, but he was never able to find out anything until the work was almost complete. Keeping that in view, this particular fact deserves comment, that Mr. Doheny, the time-keeper who appeared before the Public Accounts Committee, and gave them the data showing how Mr. St. Louis' time-lists were fraudulent, although he was before the commission at Montreal. and while he had all this information on his hands ready to give the commission, he was never asked the question. One would think that a commission, appointed to investigate this matter, would very soon have come to the conclusion, as this commission say they did, that these time-lists were probably fraudulent. Now, if this commission, thinking that the time-lists were probably fraudulent, had the time-keepers before them, one would expect that the very first question they would ask these timekeepers would be: Were the lists sent into the Government the same as the lists you kept? But when Doheny was before the commission he was never asked that question. Mr. Frigon, who appeared before the Public Accounts Committee, and who gave detailed evidence as to the fraud in connection with these lists, was in Montreal, but he was never called before the commission at all. Then the sixth point to which I wish to allude is that the officer who was chiefly responsible to the Gov-ernment, Mr. Parent, is shown by the evi-dence to have been, during the progress of the work, all the time intoxicated. At page 322, Mr. Kennedy said:

Q. You told us the other day that Mr. Parent was in a semi-state of drunkenness while the work was going on? Is that so?—A. Yes, sir. I have asked Mr. Parent as early as ten o'clock in the morning about information on the work to know how I would do certain things, and he said he had taken too many drinks that morning. He could not talk business, he was too drunk.

Again, at page 315 it is stated that Mr. Parent was drunk all the time, and that he was nearly the whole of the time in the company of Mr. St. Louis. Mr. St. Louis' business, instead of working up to his waist in the water, as it has been suggested that he was doing, for $1.50 per day, appears to have been to keep Mr. Parent in that state of drunkenness which rendered him unfit to overlook this work. We find from the evidence that Mr. Douglas, the departmental official who was sent down there from time to time to check these men, was also drunk. At page 323 we have Mr. Kennedy's evidence as to Mr. Douglas:

Q. Then, I understand from the evidence that Mr. Douglas, the engineer, was in the habit of going down to inspect the work once or twice a week?—A. Well, he made a visit from Ottawa to Montreal about the beginning of March, and he came down there about the middle of April and remained there until after my suspension. Q. How long would that be ?—A. About five or six weeks in my time.

Q. Did he see what was going on ?—A. He did, and he added very much to the iniquity and debauchery himself.

So I find, Mr. Speaker, all these circumstances to which I have alluded. But I desire to direct attention of the House for a few moments to the knowledge which, according to the evidence, the Minister of Railways possessed, of these frauds from time to time. In the first place, I have alluded to the facts that the Minister authorized this labour contract, without which the principal part of these frauds could not have been committed. There were two classes of fraud. First, in connection with the paylist, by which the Government were called on to pay men large amounts over and above the sums to which Mr. St. Louis was legitimately entitled under his contract. There was another class of fraud, that which arose from lumber and material being charged to the Government although it was never furnished for the works. It appears from the evidence that the Minister of Railways also assented to the manner in which the lumber contract was let. It is there shown that Mr. Schreiber laid the proposition for lumber contracts, simply asking for private tenders, before the Minand the Minister agreed to it. ister. Then we have the fact that no sooner had the work commenced, on 8th March, the Minister had his attention than "Star." in the called to the article That article stated that 1,200 men were employed on the work, that the work had to go on day and night until 1st May. The Minister admits, and it is scarcely necessary to take up time to argue it, that it was plain information to him that matters were not right. He could see at once that 1,200 men cculd not possibly be employed on such a work with any regard for economy. might be looked at in this way: The wages of 1,200 men at $1.65 per day, which was less than the average price paid, would amount to $1,980. The same amount for work at night would bring up the expenditure to $3,960, and $1,040 was less than the teams cost that were employed, and these items bring up a total daily expenditure of $5,000. The work commenced on 8th March, on 9th March the "Star" article appeared stating that 1.200 men were employed, and on 10th March this article was brought to the attention of the Minister. The employment of 1,200 would mean the consumption of $5,000 per day of public money on that work for labour alone. The original estimate for labour was $30,000. If a fair amount is added for increased depth of navigation, the total amount of labour for the work, according to the engineer's estimate, should have cost not more than $40,000. Not more than eight days would be occupied at this rate, of which the hon. Minister was informed, in consuming this amount of $40,000 for labour. The "Star" article was brought to his notice, the Minister immediand the second s ately took action, and a letter was written to Mr. Parent by Mr. Schreiber. Mr. Parent was told to come to Ottawa and bring the pay-list with him. Mr. Parent came the pay-list with him. Mr. Parent came to Ottawa; he did not bring the paylist. According to his evidence, he told Mr. Schreiber that the reason he did not bring it was that Mr. Kennedy would not give it to him. The real trouble in this matter was the fact that Mr. Kennedy was in charge. I do not suppose Mr. Parent lent himself knowingly to these frauds. He appears to have been placed in a position where he was incapable of attending to the work. The responsibility and opportunity for fraud were entirely in the hands of Mr. Kennedy. If he had done his work and guarded Government interests, there would be no fraud; and yet we find the Minister had noticed at this early day, when the work had been only two or three days in progress, that Mr. Kennedy was deliberately refusing to obey the orders of Mr. Parent and withholding from Mr. Parent and Mr. Schreiber information which would have enabled the department to have at once put an end to fraud; but no remonstrance was addressed to Mr. Kennedy, no effort was made to induce him to guard his work and furnish this information. The Deputy Minister, not satisfied with what had been done, sent Mr. Douglas down to the work, and he reported that the work was being extravagantly conducted, that there were more men than there should be; yet nothing was done. Mr. Kennedy was left in full charge and allowed the frauds to continue in collusion with Mr. St. Louis, nothing whatever was done although the Government had explicit notice from Mr. Douglas in regard to the truth of the "Star" article. At the same time we have this additional peculiar information. On 10th March Mr. Parent wrote to Mr. Schreiber and told him that Mr. Kennedy had not time enough, and indeed objected to take any control or supervision of the Grand Trunk bridge. Upon the Grand Trunk bridge the great bulk of frauds were committed, and yet on 10th March the Minister had clear and explicit notice by Mr. Parent that Mr. Kennedy did not intend to exercise any supervision over that work. So we are not surprised to find in connection with this labour matter that so many men were allowed to remain there, no efforts being put forward by the department or Minister to bring Mr. Kennedy to time and compel him to perform his duty and take the oversight of his work. We are not surprised that while the Wellington Street bridge was to cost $144,000 the payments for labour amounted to $151,000, $7,000 more than the whole cost should have been. We need not be surprised that on the Grand Trunk Railway bridge, which should have cost altogether $56,000, accord-the total cost of the bridge. We find at page 151 that Mr. Schreiber remonstrated with Parent, and told him that the only way he could exercise any supervision was to have weekly reports made, and he must obtain them. Mr. Parent said he could not get them. because Mr. Kennedy refused to supply him with the necessary information. There again, we have ample notice given to the Minister, and information that whatever Mr. Schreiber learned with respect to these matters was communicated to the hon, gentleman. The Minister of Railways told us in his speech last session that he had a great deal of anxiety with regard to this matter, and that Mr. Schreiber kept telling bim from day to day that he would learn all about it as soon as he could get hold of the payrolls. They found they could not get hold of the pay-rolls, and why? Because this Mr. Kennedy deliberately refused to part with them. The next point, and the point which appears to me conclusive as to the knowledge of the Minister of Railways as to the frauds, was his deliberate payment of money after he was in possession of all the facts, which justified him in suspending Mr. Parent and Mr. Kennedy and ordering a royal commission to investigate. Why, Mr. Speaker, what would be thought of an ordinary business man who was having a work done for him who found out that the work had cost double what it should have cost, and was put in possession of information that in all probability fraud had been committed in connection with the accounts for that work; what would be thought of the man who under those circumstances would pay the money for the work in full, and then set about to investigate the matter afterwards? That is exactly what the Minister of Railways did in this case. On the 27th March, the pay-roll for February was received. After repeated efforts on the part of the Deputy Minister, Mr. Kennedy was finally induced, or rather Mr. St. Louis saw fit to send in his accounts against the Government for the month of February. It will be remembered by the House that there was no work done on the superstructure in February, and that what was done was simply preliminary work in getting ready the material and stone-cutting. Two payrolls were received on the 27th March, the first amounting to $11.879, and the second amounting to $4,169, or a total of about $15,-000. That is, one-half the original estimate of the engineer for the labour necessary to complete the whole work, was done in the month of February before the work actually commenced at all. That of itself was ample notice to any business man, and to any man claiming the astute business knowledge that the Minister of Railways claims and that his friends claim for him. I say that was most ample notice that there ing to the engineer's estimates, the pay-lists alone amounted to $139,000, nearly three times as much as the engineer's estimate as to these pay-rolls and they were paid in due course on the 30th March. On the 7th of April a letter was sent to Mr. Parent by Mr. Schreiber, asking for the pay-rolls for March. On the 13th April a telegram was sent to the same effect, and then on the 14th April the letter from Mr. Douglas was received. This letter is practically the information upon which the commission was issued, and on which Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Parent were suspended. A portion of that letter reads as follows:—

As I wired you to-day, from information given me, the expenditure on the Wellington Street and Grand Trunk bridges, as per pay-lists and accounts for March, which will be forwarded by Monday evening next, will amount to about $132,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the original estimate was $30,000 for the labour necessary for the work; $15,000 were paid for February, and on the 14th April, when the pay-rolls were being held back, and it was necessary to take the extraordinary course of sending down a special officer to obtain them, that officer reports that they will amount to $132,-000, or four times the original estimate. The work was then going on, all this fraud was going on, all these men were tumbling over one another on the works; lumber was being brought there and carried back again and charged for; and on the 14th April Mr. Douglas informs the department in reference to the enormous cost. The Minister tells us that after he got the information he allowed no one to be paid, and that no money was paid after that except this $15,-000 on the February pay-roll. In his speech last session, at page 6327 "Hansard," the Minister says:

Up to the 28th April, the only money paid for labour in connection with this work was $13,541. I say, that on the 14th April, Mr. Douglas gave the information to the department, on the strength of which, on the 25th April, Mr. Schreiber writes to the Minister as follows:—

Dear Mr. Haggart,—As I mentioned to you, I was not a little startled upon receiving from Mr. Parent the pay-rolls and accounts for the month of March in connection with the Wellington Street bridges, which summed up to an enormous figure. I at once despatched Mr. R. C. Douglas off to Montreal to look into the matter and ferret out all the information he could, and report to me the position of matters. The information he gives me is as follows:—

December, January and February pay-rolls, &c., in round figures	$ 79,000
March	132,000
April	110 000
Contracts for superstructure	61,000

Less materials, &c., to be credited to this work, and to be debited to other appropriations, say......

22,000

This he considers is the minimum figure the money under circumstances such as I have work is likely to cost. Then on the strength of that, on the 10th May the Minister suspends Mr. Parent and Mr. Kennedy. Now. let us see when it was that this payment was made? At page 451 of the evidence, we have a statement put in by the Minister himself, or his deputy, showing when it was the department received the accounts and when they certified to them. The actual payments were made after that. have no doubt at all that it takes probably a week to get through the ordinary red-tape of the Auditor's office and for the cheques to issue. The cheques are made several days after the certificate of the engineer. I have already alluded to the February paylists received in March, which carried on their face quite sufficient evidence of fraud, But when we get to the March pay-lists, we find that there was one pay-list for $73,-013 certified to by the chief engineer on the 24th of April, another for $10,129 certified to by the chief engineer on the certified April, another for $7,263 28th 28th April, and another the $2,491 certified to on the 26th April. making a total of $92,897, every cent of which was certified to by the Department of Railways and Canals, and paid after the 25th day of April, after the receipt by the hon. Minister of Mr. Schreiber's report drawing his attention to this information, from which any shrewd business man would at once conclude that if there had not been fraud, there had been such a case as required, in the words of the Deputy Minister, the clesest investigation before one dollar of the public money of Canada should be allowed to go into the hands of Mr. St. Louis. Then, what does the hon. Minister do? I could understand some Ministers of the Crown who have from time to time graced some of the departments, and have been put there on account of their ability in some other direction, and who make no pretense to business knowledge, saying that they knew nothing about this matter, that it was a departmental matter, that they had left it to their subordinates, and that it had gone through in the ordinary way; but I submit to this House that the hon. Minister of Railways is not a man who can avail himself of a plea of that kind. If there is one member of the Government for whom the claim has been put forward that he is a shrewd and capable administrator of his department, that member of the Government is the hon. Minister of Railways. It has been urged that he has made a business success of the Intercolonial Railway—that he is the first Minister who has been able to run that railway without a deficit. Most extravagant claims in this respect have been put forward on his behalf; and he comes here and tells us that the Minister never certifies to these accounts, and puts that forward as a reason why this man St. Louis was allowed to put into his pocket $100,000 of the people's detailed. After paying the money, the hon-Minister makes the most elaborate provisions for locking the stable door. After St. Louis had got the money, then the Minister said, "I will investigate this matter." But. Mr. Speaker, the case is worse than that. Of course, it is not necessary for me to point out that the hon. Minister's excuse for not certifying the accounts or knowing anything about them in the ordinary routine. The non. Minister amounts to nothing. knows very well, and it was pointed out to him by the hon, member for Queen's, that it was his duty, as soon as he got the information contained in Mr. Schreiber's letter of the 25th April, to take immediate steps to stop the payment of these accounts. He did not do so; he made no effort to stop payment. The hon. Minister knows very well that long after the commission were appointed, and while they were at work taking the testimony, in addition to this $92,800 which was authorized to be paid by the direct authority of the hon. Minister himself, another sum of $105,000 was paid out by the Government of Canada to Mr. St. Louis. Let me inquire for a few moments into the circumstances under which that payment was made. In referring to that, the hon. Minister says: "I understand, that this resolution is a charge against me personally. In answer to that I wish to point out that that $105,000 was not allowed to be paid by me personally." He should have come out boldly and told us the fact. What is the fact? The fact is that that $105,000 was paid out by the department in the absence of the Minister of Railways, by the order of Mr. Mackenzie Bowell, now Premier of this Dominion, who was then acting Minister of Railways. But that is no excuse whatever for the hon. Minister of Railways. He cannot plead in answer to this charge, that the wrong was done by Mr. Macketzie Bowell, because if he had done his duty, if he had taken the ordinary precautions which a business man would take under the circumstances, and had issued an order that no further money should be paid until the matter was investigated, neither the acting Minister of Railways nor any other gentleman coming into the department would have paid the money. But the matter was put to the acting Minister of Railways in this way-that the only question in dispute between the department and Mr. St. Louis was the question of over-time; that Mr. St. Louis was claiming that he was entitled to be paid for his night work at overtime prices; that the department were disputing that claim; and that this $105.000 was due to Mr. St. Louis, according to his account, over and above the $60,000 which was held back for overtime. I have no doubt that the acting Minister. not knowing anything about these other matters to which I have referred, thought it was fair and reasonable that Mr. St. Louis money was kept back to meet the disputed claim for overtime. I say that much in order to be fair to the acting Minister of Railways, although it must be pointed out as a very peculiar circumstance that an acting Minister of Railways should come into a department and authorize the payment of $105,000 on pay-lists which were never certified to by the chief engineer, but which the chief engineer distinctly refused to certify to. In Mr. Schreiber's evidence, at page 164, will be found just what was done in regard to that matter:

Q. I would like to know the position as to the amount that you have certified, and the amount you have not certified ?—A. I have certified to $124,035.85.

Q. What is the amount claimed?—A. The amount altogether is $271,085.09.

By Mr. McMullen:

Q. And the amount paid ?—A. The amount is $229.035.82, but of that $229.035.82, $124,035.85 was certified by me and $105,000 was paid on account on the order of the acting Minister.

And the statement on page 451 shows that this $105,000 was never passed by the Deputy Minister. So we have this most extraordinary position of affairs: that the Minister of Railways had on the 10th of March full notice that matters were being conducted in a most extravagant manner, in a manner sufficient to eat up all the appropriation in seven or eight days; that that went on from time to time; that the only reason full information did not come to the department was the deliberate refusal of Kenredy to furnish the necessary information; that on the 25th April, the Deputy Minister reported to the Minister that the amount spent on the bridge was so large that the matter required the fullest and closest investigation; that after the 25th April, amounts aggregating to $92,897, which had been passed by the engineer, were paid out to Mr. St. Louis, with the knowledge and concurrence of the Minister of Railways; that afterwards, a commission was appointed on the 17th May, and sat for the purpose of investigating into the whole question; that Mr. St. Louis went to Ottawa, accompanied by Mr. Emard, the law partner of the Minister of Public Works, and succeeded in getting from the Acting Minister of Railways, $105,000 more for accounts which Mr. Schreiber had deliberately refused to certify. This amount was paid out by the Acting Minister of Railways overruling the chief engineer, and while the matter was under examination by the commissioners. How can it be contended that the Minister of Railways is not to blame for these frauds upon the Government? He had every opportunity of stopping them, and of refusing to pay the money until it was proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, that the money was due. Under these circumstances, it was no doubt the duty of the Minister of Railways to say should be paid the $105,000 as long as enough to Mr. St. Louis: I will not pay you a solitary dollar until you prove your claim against the Government in a court of law, until you show that this work, which is costing us more than double what it should cost, was really done, until you show that the labour you pretend to have furnished was really furnished. But the hon. Minister chose to take the opposite course, and he comes here and says he knew nothing about it, that the custom of the department is for him not to certify to the accounts, and that the accounts went through in the ordinary way. So much for that. There is this additional point, that since then the matter has been investigated by the Public Accounts Committee, that it was brought before the House in the dying days of the session, when many members had left, and, consequently, there was not a full discussion upon it. but that the Minister of Railways satisfied the House, to a certain extent, at the time, by making the most solemn pledges that these malefactors would be prosecuted and, if possible, punished. Have the Government carried out their They waited until October, and pledges? began a prosecution against St. Louis. That prosecution was not successful. They afterwards indicted Mr. St. Louis before the grand jury, and that was not successful; and I gather from the statement of the and I gather from the statement of the judge before whom that preliminary inquiry was conducted and from the action of the grand jury that both the judge and the grand jury concluded that it was the Government who allowed the stealing to go on, and they refused to send to prison Mr. St. Louis for taking the opportunity extended to him by the Government of making that steal. That is the conclusion they came to, and I must say that that is the effect which the evidence has upon me. It does seem to me that Mr. St. Louis. when he took advantage of the opportunities freely extended to him by the Government-and you must remember what kind of a man Mr. St. Louis is. He is a man from whom the Government is in the habit of asking for favours; he is a man on whom the Government are in the habit of calling, from time to time, for the necessary funds to carry on election contests. What did Mr. St. Louis say? He said that he was in the habit of supplying the Government with campaign funds, and, consequently it was perfectly proper for him to take advantage of these opportunities extended to him by the Government. and let the Government furnish him from the public treasury sufficient money to make these contributions without himself being out of pocket. That is the conclusion of the judge who tried this case, and of the grand jury before whom Mr. St. Louis was indicted. That is the way in which the department has carried out its pledge. Here are a number of men shown to have been guilty of the grossest of frauds-Mr. Kennedy, the chief of all of them, and these different time-keepers; and here is the solemn pledge given to Parliament by the Minister of Railways that they would all be The Government waited until prosecuted. October, and selected the one man who, it would appear, the Government, from the beginning, intended should avail himself of the opportunities of getting hold of public moneys. They selected him and failed in their prosecution. Will they explain why they have not proceeded against the other men? Will they explain why they have not prosecuted Kennedy, and the different time-keepers? A year has gone by, and no effort has been made to proceed against these other men. When the Government do come to proceed against them, if they ever do, we will find, no doubt, that the evidence will not be available. I have only a word or two more to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not suppose this discussion is at all pleasant for hon. gentlemen opposite. I am very sorry for that, but the Opposition is not responsible for these facts. They occurred under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite. It, however, is the duty of the Opposition, when circumstances of this kind are brought to the knowledge of Parliament, to discuss them in this House, and if that discussion is unpalatable for hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sorry for them. I have only a word or two more to say with regard to this matter. The Minister of Railways, in concluding his remarks, reprimanded my hon, friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) for the manner in which he had approached this subject. He conceived it was the duty of the hon. member for Queen's to overlook any connection that the Government may have with charges in a matter of this kind and to aid the Government in hunting out the fraud, and punishing the delinquents. The hon, gentleman referred to the practice in England. He asked, could it be imagined for a moment that the Opposition in England, when frauds have been committed upon the Government, would think of attacking the head of the department? I must admit that they would not, because the circumstances are entirely different in England from what they are in Canada. I regret to have to make that admission, but when the hom gentleman brings the matter forward it requires a little discussion. Such a charge would not be thought of in England, because such a thing as a Minister of the Crown using his position for the purpose of obtaining for his party campaign funds coming indirectly from the treasury of the country has. I am thankful to say, never been known. But is that the case in this country? Let us recall for a moment the session of 1891. Can any member of this House imagine the revelations that were made in 1891 with regard to the Government of this country A CONTROL OF THE PROPERTY OF T

Britain: can any member imagine the fact I had been allowed to gerrymander the conproven with regard to heads of the depart-stituencies in Quebec district as you have ments here being true of the heads of departments in England? We know, however, that the Conservative party has been carried on upon these lines-that it is the duty of every member who is elected as a supporter of a Conservative Government, to support that Government in every matter that they may bring forward, because no matter how bad it may be in itself, it is still greater calamity to Canada that the Liberal party should come into power. That is the doctrine that has been inculcated for years: that was the doctrine that was inculcated by Sir John Macdonald, their great statesman. Would it be possible to imagine in England a state of affairs similar to that proven to exist in the Connolly-McGreevy matter? Can we imagine Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Balfour ordering the prosecution of men who had been guilty of departmental fraud, and then, after the culprits had been sent to jail ordering them to be released because men in office, after all, were just as guilty as they? And can we imagine that in England, after all this had occurred, the Government would adopt as its candidate in its constituency one of these very men, and that he would be re-elected to Parliament as a supporter of the Government? Why, Mr. Speaker, the policy and practice of the English Government is diametrically the opposite of the policy and practice of the Conservative party in Canada. It is unblushingly acknowledged that this is the policy of the party. Why, Mr. Speaker, the principle upon which the Government is conducted was set forth, I must say in a manly way. I must say in an able way, I must say in a clear and definite way. in this House last session by the hon. Postmaster General. The Postmaster General pointed out that he had taken $25,000 from Senator Ross as a subscription for political purposes; that $25,000 Senator Ross obtained from a certain railway company, it being a portion of the money given to them by the Dominion Government at the instance of the Conservative party.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Where did you find that?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think there is any doubt about that. Mr. Speaker. The hon, gentleman came out fair and square and said: I had a perfect right to that $25.000; I would do it again.

An hon. MEMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. He understands, and he is quite right and manly and straightforward in stating it that that is the principle upon which his party is conducted. He says: In the province of Ontario you were allowed to keep yourselves in power by gerrymandering the constituencies. I asked for a similar privilege for the province of Que- | the Department of Railways and Canals, being equalled in the Parliament of Great bec, and if that had been granted to me and done in Ontario, I should not have had to go to Senator Ross for $25,000 to use in carrying this election. Such facts as these, Mr. Speaker, make it the unpleasant duty of the Opposition in this House to discuss matters of this kind when they come before us in the spirit in which I have discussed them rather than in the spirit in which they are discussed in England. If it were true in Canada as it is in England that the heads of departments refused to use their positions for their party interests in the way I have suggested, then politics in Canada would occupy the same plane as they do in England. Were it not for the policy of the Conservative party in using the construction of every great public work to obtain campaign funds for elections; were it not that even in connection with fiscal questions they have adopted a policy through which they are able to extract large sums from interested individuals in return for favours granted to them; and if it were not for this gerrymander, to which the hon. Postmaster General referred, the Liberals in this House would not be to-day condemning the Government for their extra-vagant administrative acts, but they would long ago have been in power in this Dominion.

> Mr. CURRAN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, devoted his peroration to the hon. Postmaster General and some other gentlemen he has alluded to in connection with the charges which have already been investigated. It is not my intention to say anything more in that connection than that the hon, gentleman and others seem to imagine that by reiterating the same thing over and over again they will get the people of Canada to believe that even after the investigation that was held into the charges against the hon. Postmaster General before a tribunal which was marked by its severity, there is still some basis for their assertion. Before that tribunal not only the subsidies of this Dominion, but those of the local legislature, even those granted by the municipalities were investigated, and it was shown, that after adding all together and adding still further the amounts paid by the directorate, the contractor of the road had paid out of his own pocket over $400,-000 in building the road. And yet it was out of the Dominion subsidies that this $25,000 was alleged to have been paid. No man, I believe, who wishes to look into the matter impartially can come to any other conclusion than that the charges against the Postmaster General were entirely with-Now, I foundation. wish to say few on this occasion, not \mathbf{a} words much to take part in SO cussion with regard to the conduct of as because the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and my hon, friend the leader of the Opposition, referred to me in one or two particulars, in connection with which I wish to say a few words. The hon. member for Queen's told us that this subject had been brought before the Parliament of Canada last session, at the closing hours of the session, that the evidence had not all been printed, and that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had not perhaps laid this case before Parliament in as perfect a manner as he could have done had all the evidence been printed. But I will say this for the hon. member for South Oxford, that in presenting his case he came straight from the investigation before the Public Accounts Committee, that he had also before him the printed evidence that had been taken before the royal commission in Montreal; and if there had been anything in that evidence that reflected upon any member of Parliament, outside of the Department of Railways and Canals, that hon, gentleman would have noticed it, and would have brought it before the House. But from the beginning to the end of his speech last year, that hon, gentleman, who, I will say, does not strike below the belt, although he is not afraid to meet his opponents face to face, there was not one charge brought against me such as was launched yesterday against me by the hon. member for Queen's. Now, Sir, I wish to refer to these matters. I wish to bring out how they first originated, how they subsided, how they were wiped out, and how the hon. gentleman now seeks to revive them. What, then, was the first connection I had with this matter? The hon. gentleman insinuated that the political appointment, as he called it, of Mr. Kennedy, was a great crime on my part. Now, all I have got to say with regard to the appointment of Mr. Kennedy, is this: that as member for Montreal Centre it was my duty to lay before the Department of Railways the name of a gentleman to fill that office. But I did not act on my own motion. There are documents which show why and how I acted, that it was not upon my own recommendation that this appointment was made, but that it was made on the recommendation, not merely of Senator Drummond and of Mr. W. W. Ogilvie, president of the Board of Trade in Montreal, but of such prominent gentlemen of that city as Mr. McLennan, of the Forwarding Company, Mr. Thompson, also of the Forwarding Company, the Hon. Senator Murphy, and a host of other gentle-men, who sent to me strong recommendations in favour of Mr. Kennedy, whom I did not know personally at all, but whose father I knew. I placed these recommendations before the Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and he said then and there that whilst these recommendations were very good in their way, it was necessary that men who were skilled in public works; and therefore Mr. H. J. Beemer, Mr. Parker, and a host of public contractors well throughout Canada, sent in recommendations for this gentleman. But more than that, Even after all these recommendations had been sent in from public men and from contractors, the hon, gentleman who was at the head of the department, sent down word that Mr. Kennedy was to report himself at Mr. Parent's office, there to undergo an examination to see whether he was fit for that position. Under all these circumstances. then. Mr. Kennedy was put in charge of the canal at Montreal. He belonged to a good family, he had been working for Mr. Beemer and for other contractors, he had been carrying on public works, and managing large numbers of men. Mr. Parent, in speaking of him in this very investigation, said that he was a man of great energy, and of great pluck; and Mr. Schreiber, in his evidence, also said that he was a man with a great deal of snap, and was able to push a work forward successfully. man on the canal from Montreal to Lachine has signed his papers, certificates showing that during testimonials, time be was in charge of the canal, he had managed it well. It is true, my bon. friend from Lincoln mentioned that in the evidence before the commission it had been shown that he had been guilty of this one fault, which was certainly a very serious one that he had substituted pine for oak in the charges to the Government, that he had appropriated money for oak which should have gone for the purchase of pine, and that he had sent in the accounts in that manner. But it is proved beyond doubt by Mr. Trihey that in the whole of that transaction the Government did not lose one dollar, that not one dollar was added to the price of either one article or the other. Therefore, I say that it is not now, when the man is down and has been discharged from his office, it is not now, after he has been removed from that position which he had held for some years, that an unfounded charge of fraud should be levelled against him. I, for one, will say for him that, at all events, outside of this bridge business, he acted as an honest and efficient officer in the management of that canal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the hon, gentleman differs from the commissioners, who say the contrary in their report?

also of the Forwarding Company, the Hon. Senator Murphy, and a host of other gentlemen, who sent to me strong recommendations in favour of Mr. Kennedy, whom I did not know personally at all, but whose father I knew. Macdonald, and he said then and there that whilst these recommendations were very good in their way, it was necessary that there should also be recommendations by known that the bridge had been spoken of for several years before it came Parliament. An agitation had been going on for a long time. At first there was a scheme for making a tunnel there. The Hon. J. H. Pope suggested it, but owing to opposition from the west on the ground that a tunnel would throttle the canal at its opening, and might thereby prevent enlarged navigation, the tunnel scheme was abandoned, and the policy was changed to constructing a bridge. Well, we had first of all a vote for $25,000. but there was nothing done that year. The next year we had a vote for $45,000, but nothing was done. But the agitation was going on all the time, and I kept incessantly making representations to the department of the need for a bridge, owing to the great danger that existed to both life and limb at that point. There was a large traffic, as well as a good deal of travel, over the old bridge, and I was afraid that some fine morning we should wake up and find that a terrible accident had occurred at that point. Well, finally the present Minister of Railways, in the session preceding the investigation of which we are now speaking, promised that if he could get a grant of $170,000, this bridge should be built, along with the required improvements in the Grand Trunk bridge adjoining. Now, with regard to the management of the work, the fact is that I took no part whatever in having Mr. Kennedy put there as superintendent. I had no interest in that. Mr. Trudeau, who was then Deputy Minister of Railways and spoke to me one day and said that Mr. Kennedy was doing his work admirably, but that there money to pay him for doing this particular work, and that he should not be asked to do it. Mr. Trudeau had been putting it off year after year, and I was afraid he was going to throw me off for another year, and I said: I do not think Mr. Kennedy will object to take up this work and do it without pay. or at least, to run his chances of getting paid later on. Well, that was all that for occasion. When it was announced by the press of Montrael that the Governgoing on with ment was this in the months of December or January, there was a great deal of excitement. The public press came out with the statement that 7,000 men were to be thrown out of employment, that the canal was to be unwatered, and the mills would stop. A public meeting was called in the office of Mr. W. W. Ogilvie, and a discussion took place with the object of ascertaining if this work could not be carried out in the spring, by adding one month to the month that was always taken for unwatering the canal. At that meeting it was suggested that Mr. Kennedy should be entrusted with the superintendence of the work under the supervision of Mr. Parent, and Mr. W. W. Ogilvie and myself were appointed a deputation to come to Ottawa to lay before the department the views of the meeting, and have the time changed and the work carried on during the two months of spring. During our conversation with the Deputy Ministerwe never saw the Minister, and Mr. Trudeau was then alive-he again mentioned that Kennedy would have no pay for that work, and it would be unfair to put it upon him. If Mr. Trudeau had told me what I afterwards discovered, that he would have preferred to place another man there as well as another engineer, as he did in the case of Desbarats, the position would have been different. Kennedy had no interest in going there and get not a cent for it; he undertook the work, and that was all the responsibility there was about it. During the whole time the bridge was under construction, what connection had I with it? In the first place, I never visited the work but once during the time it was going on, and that was on a Sunday when I happened to be in Montreal during the session. never recommended a man for work. was requested to join this Government by Sir John Thompson at the latter end of November. I came up here and was sworn From November till the end of December I was actively engaged in preparing for an election in my constituency, should one come on. I was elected by acclamation in the end of December. I came here to my office, Parliament opened shortly afterwards, and by that means I escaped, what naturally would have been inevitable. giving letters to many persons, because if I had been in Montreal no doubt people would have come to me, as they would to any other member of Parliament, and ask a recommendation for work. Nobody came to me. In the whole course of the investigation and in the hundreds of pages of evidence printed there is not one tittle of evidence from any source to show that I ever exercised any patronage of any kind. I gave a letter of recommendation to Mr. O'Connor, who had opened a lumber yard in Montreal, but he never sold so much as a box of matches to the department. The hon. gentleman said:

The moment the Minister dispensed with the calling of tenders and began the work by days' work, that moment he began to open the door through which fraud could be perpetrated. Political influence then began to be brought to bear. Hon. gentlemen who wished to give employment to political friends, and who found they could not give this employment if tenders were called, found the door opened wide by the Minister himself by which they could pass through as many political proteges and friends as they liked, not tens or dozens, but hundreds of the political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite could be employed under this system of days' labour to an almost unlimited extent.

That does not apply to me or to any act of mine. I had no political patronage there, and I sought none; and I challenge that hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman, when he talks about political superintendence of that canal to show from the beginning to the end of this evidence that I ever exercised one iota of influence, political or otherwise, in connection with either supplies to the canal or as to men employ-ed in carrying on the work. Mention was made yesterday by the hon. member for Queen's, and also by the leader of the Opposition, to a letter which was handed to me by Mr. Kennedy's father in the city of Montreal. In that connection, I merely want to say this, that surely hon. gentle-men in making out this case, which, accord-ing to their own words, is "oozing at every pore," might have deemed it unnecessary to make a statement which they would have seen by reading the evidence that was before their eyes, sworn to by me before the commission in Montreal, could not be made out at all events as a charge against the Minister of Railways in this matter. I gave my evidence before that commission, and, regarding that letter, I swore that I had not shown the letter to the Minister. I distinctly stated in my evidence:

In fact, I think I did not; but I spoke to him about its contents, and more particularly about this contract for hiring labour. He said the labour had been tendered for. I said I was not aware of it. He said, yes, it is, and Mr. St. Louis is up here about the difficulty you spoke of with regard to the classification of the labour.

I had never heard a word about the labour contract until Mr. Kennedy approached me I said: "I do not believe it; in Montreal. send me a letter." He sent his father with a letter, which is printed in evidence. read it on the cars, and saw it was a most intemperate letter, that it was written by a man labouring under very great excitement, and I thought he had probably exaggerated, and, at all events, he felt sorely vexed. When I came into this House in the evening I went to the Minister's seat and spoke to him and asked about the contract: and when I found that the contract had been made, and everything carried out, I admit, frankly here, whether I made a mistake or not, that I felt that this was an imprudent letter, that since the contract was a fait accompli, and everything had been carried out, since the Minister had made the contract, or his deputy had made it, it would probably be a very poor service to render Kennedy to show that letter, which was such a reflection on the conduct of the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear. hear.

Mr. CURRAN. I do not know whether that is a sign of approval or not, but I state the facts as they are. That was the reason, and no other, because I thought it would be injurious to Kennedy, why I did to certify to every piece of work done, that he must be careful to certify to nothing which was not absolutely correct in his judgment. I sent that letter with those instructions, at the same time telling him what had been done, and what I thought it was his duty to do. That was what took place with respect to that document. I imagine if hon. gentlemen opposite had been able to make anything more out of it, they would have done their best to do so. page 2976, the leader of the Opposition, in the debate, when speaking in connection with the statement that Kennedy had telegraphed here after having received that letter. said:

One of my friends beside me read that this afternoon, and the Minister said: How could I know it, but my friend was able to point out at once the answer of the Solicitor General to Mr. Kennedy, and the Solicitor General wrote:

My dear Mr. Kennedy,—I have seen the Minister of Railways and Canals and found that all has been tendered for, including labour for the carrying out of the work of the bridge.

That is true, just as I have stated it.

Therefore, Mr. Kennedy's complaint was taken to the Minister and apparently the Minister answered: Well, what is there to complain of; everything has been done by tender and there is no more to do about it. Sir, there is more than that also. It is in evidence that the Solicitor General on the same day wired to Mr. Kennedy, after he had received a telegram from Mr. Kennedy that he was coming here.

"Don't report to the department before you see me."

Kennedy was on his way to Ottawa. He was met at the station, as he says himself, by the Solicitor General and by Senator Drummond, and instead of going to acquaint the department, still more of what was going on, he was sent back to his work, and the same system continued, and St. Louis was able to plunder the department even after the notice of the Minister had been brought to this fact by Kennedy, one of the supervisors of the work.

Now, under all the circumstances, would it not have been fair that the hon, gentleman (Mr. Laurier) should have stated what did take place. Why did he not say, that I had shown in my evidence, and that Mr. Schreiber had admitted, that when I received that telegram I went over to Mr. Schreiber's office and I informed him that Mr. Kennedy was coming up, and Mr. Schreiber turned around to me and said: If he comes up here he should be dismissed. I felt a little annoyed at such a reception, and, seeing the condition of Mr. Schreiber's mind, seeing that all these contracts had been made, seeing that the contract had been extended, I felt that if Mr. Kennedy came up here, that he would be dismissed from his office. I met Mr. Drummond at my office a few minutes afterwards, and he told be that he had also received a telenot show the letter. But when I found the contract had been entered into and extended I wrote to Kennedy a letter, which has been read, stating that it was his duty of the same effect as the one I had received. We both met Mr. Kennedy, we advised him not to do as he said he intended to do, namely, give up the work. We told him it would never do to give up the work then, that he must carry it out to completion, and not leave the navigation of the country closed on the 1st of May, which would have cost millions of dollars to our trade. We induced him to go on with the work. I regret I did not allow Mr. Kennedy to go to the Deputy Minister, and let the results be what they might, they could not be worse than they are, so far as poor Kennedy is concerned. I am very sorry indeed he did not go to the department then and see the Deputy Minister. In that statement which my hon, friend the leader of the Opposition made, he would seem to throw on to Senator Drummond and myself, the imputation that we prevented this man from going there in order that Mr. St. Louis might "carry out his plundering." as he says, the same as before. Mr. Speaker. that statement was made before. It was published in the press of the country. I was attacked by newspapers, and I waited until I got a newspaper which had the courage to come out straightforwardly and say what it meant about it. That newspaper was the daily "Witness," of Montreal. It undertook to state in print, that I had conspired with the Minister of Public Works to have this contract made, and that it was made for the purpose of getting funds for election purposes in the general The Montreal "Witness" stated that I, conjointly with the Minister of Public Works, made friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, so that we might get up this election fund. Well, I was perfectly ready to meet them. I brought them before a court of justice in Montreal, and I compelled them to make this declaration, which I now have the pleasure of reading to the House:

STATE OF THE PROPERTY OF THE P

In an article published in July last reflecting upon the excessive amount of money expended by the Government on the construction of the Curran Bridge, the name of Mr. Curran, M.P., was menioned, the question being asked: Whether Mr. Curran and the Government were anxious to spend the money and build the bridge in order to make friends of the mammon of unrighteousness so as to be ready for the next elections. It is scarcely necessary to say that there was not the slightest intention to suggest corruption against Mr. Curran, and we should regret very much if our remarks could be construed so as to reflect upon that gentleman's character.

That settled the business so far as the press was concerned then. I am satisfied that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition would not state that I had conspired either with the hon. Minister of Public Works, or any other hon, gentleman in this House, but that was his insinuation, and I repudiate it now, and I challenge any gentleman, no matter who he may be, to say that there is in this evidence, or that he can produce any evidence to show that I was connect-form or manner whatever. Now, the next point, and the most serious charge, was made by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). He went on to speak about the dismissal of Mr. Desbarats, an act which dismissal of Mr. Desparats, and the I, for one, certainly exceedingly regret, in connection with this contract. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) at page 2902 of the "Hansard" states in almost plain words, that I was instrumental in having that young man removed from his position. That was a most extraordinary statement for the hon, gentleman to make. He says:

Now, what did the Government do next? They had a gentleman in connection with that work, who was connected with it from its inception, and whose name was Desbarats. Mr. Desbarats, as the report shows, was sent to Montreal in September, 1892, to examine the site of the bridges. The first plan was prepared by Mr. Desbarats under Mr. Trudeau, late Deputy Ministrand ter, and the second and third plans were prepared in Montreal by Mr. Desbarats and Mr. Parent. Mr. Desbarats remained in Montreal from November till the 1st of March. Mr. Desbarats was dismissed, and why? There was no living public official in a position so thoroughly to understand those works as Mr. Desbarats. He had prepared the original plans, he had prepared the extensions, he was in a position to check them, but Mr. Desbarats had done that which was an unpardonable sin; he had interfered with the politicians who were connected with the construction of this bridge. We had here a Mr. Kennedy, a political supporter of the Government, a protege and friend of the Solicitor General, a gentleman who was appointed to his position as superintendent of the canal at the instance of the Solicitor General and Mr. Ogilvie, and a Senator whose name I forget.

An hon. MEMBER. Senator Drummond.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, Senator Drummond, Mr. Ogilvie and Solicitor General Curran had Kennedy appointed to the position. Mr. Kennedy thought he was going to have a free hand, to run matters as he liked, to spend what he liked, and to distribute the ill-gotten gains which were to come out of that bridge as he liked; and Mr. Desbarats, as I say, committed the unpardonable sin of attempting to keep a check upon Mr. Kennedy, No sooner had Mr. Desbarats made himself objectionable to the political superintendent of the work, than within two days afterwards he received his dismissal from the department. On the 6th February, two days following the attempt made to check the mer employed, Mr. Schreiber writes to Mr. Parent a letter intimating that the subject of the pay-rolls has been under consideration; that the Minister has given no authority for Mr. Desbarats' salary to be increased from $105 to $150, and that he is to be dismissed. Parent writes back, protesting in the most vigorous language against Desbarats' dismissal, and pointing out reasons why he should not be dismissed. But he receives scant courtesy at the hands of the department, and Mr. Desbarats' dismissal, which was intimated on the 6th, is authoritatively announced on the 14th, and at the end of the month he leaves the work. From the date he attempted to keep a check, he was ordered off the works by Superintendent Kennedy; and from the date the department endorsed Kennedy's action as against Desbarats, from that ed with these contracts in any shape or date Desbarats continued to perform his duties:

perfunctorily. Of course, he interfered no more.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) insinuates the accusation that the very moment Mr. Desbarats undertook to check this work, the political superintendent, through his friend, and protector, the Solicitor General. and others, had him removed. Why, Sir. in the course of the evidence that was brought out before the Public Accounts Committee, we had this matter disposed of beyond peradventure, and the hon. gentleman knows it. He must have heard it or read it, because it was one of the points brought prominently before the public, and on which newspaper articles were written. We have the letter of Mr. Schreiber, on page 119 of the evidence, in which he gives as the reason for Mr. Desbarats' removal that there was an engineer there who had nothing to do, and that therefore Mr. Desbarats' services were not required. I then asked him:

Q. Before you leave that. Was that the first move made with regard to Mr. Desbarats' removal ?—A. On the 6th, the letter previous to that, yes.

Q. And you heard the evidence of Mr. Desbarats here ?-A. Yes.

Q. Did you hear what he stated with regard to influence having been used towards having him removed ?—A. I did.

Q. Was there any foundation for that whatever? -A. Not the slighest, as far as I know. Not the slightest, in any way whatever.

Q. Did any person of those mentioned—myself, Senator Drummond, W. W. Ogilvie, or any other person, interest himself in any way, directly or indirectly, by word of mouth, correspondence, or in any other way, induce you to remove Mr. Desbarats ?—A. Not in any way whatever that I ever heard.

By Mr. Haggart:

Q. Or from me ?—A. Or from you either.

So, we have this sworn testimony, given before the Public Accounts Committee, that no interference ever took place either by me or by anybody else. I could not have done any such thing. I knew Mr. Desbarats' father; he had been an old college mate of mine, and an old political supporter; my relations with him were most intimate, and I would be as likely to injure my own son as to injure Mr. Desbarats' son. Such an idea could not enter my head, and when I heard of his removal from the works, I said I was extremely sorry for it. He was a young gentleman I had the highest respect for, and I had always been friendly with his family.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CURRAN. Mr. Speaker, before recess I was dealing with the charge that I had attempted in some way or other to tion he held upon the Lachine Canal bridges, and I quoted from the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee to show that not only had I not done so, but that nobody whose name had been mentioned, and no one in authority, had interfered with Mr. Desbarats. I was pointing out the unlikelihood of any such course on my part, and I also expressed my regret that such a removal should have taken place. But, Sir, that did not prevent those who were seeking to inflict an injury upon me from continuing their work, and certain newspaper correspondents in Ottawa undertook to publish in the press of Montreal the statement that the young man in question had been removed at my instigation, because, as they alleged, he had been interfering with the superintendent of the canal and had been preventing him from having his own sweet will. Under these circumstances I was very much delighted indeed to find one of the public journals making this allegation in such a way as to enable me to have the matter investigated before the "La Patrie," of the city of Montreal, made this charge against me, and I lost no time in giving the publishers of that paper an opportunity of proving their charge, if they could do so. If they had any information that had not been brought out before the Public Accounts Committee, no matter where they could obtain it, I wished to give them the opportunity of stating before the public of my native city what that information consisted of. I took an action for libel against them. I had notice of that action served upon them, and in due course, on the 22nd of June, 1894, the following article appeared in "La Patrie"—I shall first read it in French, and afterwards I will read an English translation of it:-

Dans le numéro de la Patrie du 9 courant nous avons publié un article intitulé "Pont Curran" dans lequel nous avons commis une injustice envers l'honorable M. Curran, solliciteur général du Canada.

Au cours de cet article basé sur un rapport d'Ottawa, nous avons dit que l'honorable M. Curran s'était occupé de faire destituer M. Desbarats, ingénieur au canal de Lachine, et nous avons appris depuis que ce rapport était absolument faux et que l'honorable M. Curran n'avait rien dit ni fait contre M. Desbarats.

L'article en question a été écrit sur des informations

L'article en question a été écrit sur des informations dénuées de fondement. M. Curran est un adversaire politique que nous désirons traiter loyalement. L'honneur de nos hommes publics doit être mis à l'abri d'attaques mal fondées et c'est un plaisir comme un devoir pour nous de remédier autant qu'il nous est possible à toute injustice que potre article a pu causer à l'honorable Sollicit sur tice que notre article a pu causer à l'honorable Solliciteur général tant personnellement que comme représentant du peuple.

In our issue of "La Patrie" of the 9th instant, we published an article under the heading of "Curran Bridge," in which we committed an injustice against the Hon. Mr. Curran, Solicitor General of Canada.

In the course of that article, based on a report from Ottawa, we stated that the Hon. Mr. Curran had undertaken to procure the dismissal of Desbarats, engineer at the Lachine Canal. We have since learned that this report is absolutely false and that the Hon. Mr. Curran neither did nor have Mr. Desbarats removed from the posi- said anything to the detriment of Mr. Desbarats.

The article in question was written upon information absolutely without foundation. Mr. Curran is our political adversary, and we wish to treat him loyally. The honour of our public treat him loyally. men must be safeguarded from unjustifiable attacks, and it is a pleasure, as well as a duty, for us to remedy as far as it is possible all the injustice that our article may have caused the Hon. Solicitor General as well personally as in his capacity of a representative of the people.

That caused a cessation of those malicious attacks for the time. I seized upon the first opportunity when an allegation was made that I had something to do with a contract, of the existence of which, at the time it was made I had not the slightest knowledge, to bring the publisher to an account. As I stated in the early part of my discourse, a certain newspaper having made the allegation that I had sought to create a political fund for election purposes. I brought the newspaper to time at once for the libel, and procured the apology which I read to the House this afternoon. It was not long until once more, without justification, without the slightest tittle of evidence, these insinuations were again revived. The report we have here—a book of several hundreds of pages—shows that the investigation was most thorough. Yet every attempt to connect me with this scandal signally failed. Despite all this, the charges were again revived. In the Toronto "Globe," after a length of time, various items appeared, and at the time the city of Ottawa was receiving our delegates from the sister colony of Australia, when it was important that those gentlemen should go back with a good opinion of our public men, and a favourable impression of our country, there appeared in the notes and comments of the "Globe," referring to the Canadian delegates, a paragraph stating that the delegates would not want to share in paying any bill certified to by Mr. Curran of the The man who wrote that must bridge. have known that I had nothing to do with certifying any bills for that or any other bridge. It was a malicious fabrication. I did not see it myself, but a friend of mine. Mr. Gorman, of Ottawa, a lawyer, undertook to write to the "Globe" con-cerning this and other scandalous attacks made upon me by that journal. Mr. Gorman wrote as follows:-

I beg to respectfully protest against the insinuations in two separate items of your " Notes and Comments" in yesterday's paper, against Hon. J. J. Curran, Solicitor General. In the first item, you say, in speaking of the colonial delegates, that they will not want a share in paying the bills certified by Mr. Curran of the bridge; and in the second item, you speak of the "Curran scandal." in the same category as the "Caron-Langevin scandal." The apparent object is to lead uninformed people to believe that Mr. Curran has had some connection with the boodling in the erection of the Wellington bridge at Lachine, which is commonly known as the Curran bridge on account of its being built obtained the passage of the grant for its construction. Now, it is well known that Mr. Curran had no connection, directly or indirectly, with the building of the bridge or the certifying of the hills in connection therewith, and that, while the exposures that have been made of the misappropriations and overcharges are, and may properly enough be referred to as the "Curran bridge scandal," it is neither true in fact nor fair to Mr. Curran to speak of them as the "Curran scandal," nor to refer to that gentleman as "Mr. Curran of the bridge." I trust that your usual sense of honesty in dealing with political opponents will prevent any such unfair insinuations in the future.

The "Globe," in reply, said:

In justice to Mr. Curran and the "Globe." we think it well to do a little more than Mr. Gorman asks, and to say that we have no desire to connect Mr. Curran's name with the bridges in any way that would mean discredit to him. The works have acquired the name of the Curran bridges, but, now that a scandal has arisen in connection with them, it would be only fair not to continue to connect his name with them. At the same time we hold that the entire Government of which he is a member, is responsible for the loss to the country.

That was a statement vindicating me once more, and made from the most important journal published in the Liberal interests in Ontario. Wherever I was able to lay my hand upon a charge, whenever I could bring the thing home to those who made it, whenever I had the opportunity of coming face to face with the man who made it, or the newspaper that published it, I was anxious that the matter should be fought out before a jury of our countrymen, that the miserable innuendos and covert accusations made in various quarters, should be dispelled and settled forever. I have shown you, Mr. Speaker, that, so far as I was personally concerned, I have, on every occasion, sought to vindicate my character, and I think I have suc-In this connection, I will merely ceeded. say, that I have been in public life now a considerable number of years. I have sought from the beginning to meet in every way any charge fairly made, and have stood up here on account of the attempts made, again and again, to make it appear that with reference to some of the employees on the works in issue to-day I had been unjust towards them on race grounds, or was actuated of an honourby motives unworthy able man. I trust that I can face my part fellow-men in any other of the Dominion, and appeal to them say whether, in my career, I have not always been a peacemaker, whether I have not always sought to cement together the people of this Dominion in one harmonious whole, whether be they English or French. or to whatever race they may belong, I have not ever sought, by every means in my power, to make our people feel that this is our Canadian home, and to instil into the youthful mind the generous aspirations which make a great and happy people.

Mr. TARTE. The motion of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) asks the representatives of the people to censure the Minister of Railways and Canals for the wrong-doing committed in the execution of certain works on the Lachine Canal in 1893. The wrong-doings are admitted on all hands. They have been admitted by the Minister himself, but he puts in a plea that he is not guilty, because he is not responsible. Well, I want to ask: If the hon, gentleman in whose department the works have been executed is not responsible, who is responsible? Sir, not many years ago, quite a different doctrine was upheld in this Parliament. In 1891, the Privileges and Elections Committee held a very important inquiry in which I took a certain share. There was a report made, and accepted by the hon. gentleman himself, and in this report I read as follows:-

The charges against Sir Hector Langevin, as already intimated, having been as above set forth, the committee would observe, that in the course of the investigation an effort was made to connect him with the wrong-doing of others who have been reported against as directly connected with fraudulent conduct.

Your committee, therefore, report, that the evidence does not justify them in concluding that the Minister knew of the conspiracy before menticned, or that he willingly lent himself to its objects.

Well. Sir. the report was made, as I have pointed out. The Minister, in spite of the fact that he had been exonerated to the degree I have just indicated, was obliged to step out of office, and he has since remained out of office. I want to know what is the difference between that case and this. We are face to face with the admission that wrong-doing has been committed. But the Minister pleads that he is not directly conrected with it, that he has not been a party Now, there is a letter written by Mr. Parent to it, that he had no share in it. constitutional doctrine is that every Minister is responsible to this Parliament. There is no other possible doctrine. that, the whole Government is responsible to this Parliament. But the Minister, after having set out with an unconstitutional plea, gives us another plea. He says: I did everything I could to ensure the due completion of the work: I have employees under me in the department to whom I gave the strictest possible orders, and when I found they were guilty of wrong-doing, I dismissed them. Sir, in 1891 some of the employees who were found guilty were discharged, but that did not prevent the Minister being discharged also. Is it true that the Minister is not directly, as an administrator, responsible for what took place? I do not want to be unfair to him; quite the reverse. But the facts are there. I claim that the hon. Minister and his department undertook to direct and supervise the works themselves. Great stress has been laid upon the fact that Mr. Parent had been for thirty years an employee of the Govfor ernment, and had always been an honest and efficient officer. Mr. Parent was the superintending engineer of our canals-Beauharnois, St. Ours, Lachine and Chambly. When these Lachine Canal works were decided upon, it was arranged and agreed that Parent should not have charge of the works. Who then had charge? The man in charge was an officer specially appointed by this Government. I think the hon, Minister of Railways and Canals, although be may have followed the investigation closely. has forgotten a good many of the facts in this case. If you look at page 50 of the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Conunittee, you find that Mr. Desbarats, who had been appointed resident engineer in charge of the works in October, 1892, made the following statement to the committee:

Q. By whom ?—A. By the chief engineer before I left here, and by Mr. Parent in Montreal, that Mr. Kennedy, the superintendent of the Lachine Canal, was to act as purchasing agent for the works and was to act as overseer and general foreman—to have charge of the men-of their distribution and of the general arrangement of the men on the works, and to supervise them.

Now, Sir. if you look at page 195, you will find the following stated by Mr. Parent:

Q. What did take place ?—A. Well, I told you, first of all, that Mr. Kennedy organized the whole thing, as overseer of the works. He was overseer, and had been appointed specially by the Government to that effect, and he organized his own staff.

At page 196, Mr. Parent testified as follows:

- Q. Was he appointed on your recommendation? A. No, sir.
- Q. Do you know who recommended him ?-It was Mr. Curran, I believe, the Hon. Mr. Curran.

to Mr. Kennedy on 28th November, 1892, which reads as follows:

Dear Sir,-I am directed to inform you, that, as superintendent of the Lachine Canal, you are requested to act as overseer in connection with the substructure of the new bridge across the Lachine Canal to replace the old one at Wellington Street. You are requested to assume the responsibility of performing said work with the least possible interruption or impediment to traffic or water power. You will make all necessary arrangements for purchase or hire of the material and plant required, engage the necessary labour generally, and superintend the execution of the work in accordance with the plans and directions which will be furnished you by Mr. G. J. Desbarats, engineer in charge of construction, with whom you will consult as to all matters of detail. All more important matters should be submitted to me for approval.

E. H. PARENT.

To E. Kennedy, Esq.

Further in his evidence, Mr. Parent says:

Q. When it was decided to build the works on the canal, did you recommend Mr. Kennedy as the overseer for the same works ?-A. No, sir.

On page 197, in the course of Mr. Parent's evidence, the following appears:

Q. In Mr. Curran's evidence, page 249, I find the following words, given in Montreal, before the commission:—"When he went out in the passage, we met Mr. Kennedy, and he said: I don't want to undertake that work as a contractor, or something of that kind. Mr. Ogilvie said to him: That is all right now; you take charge of the work, and you put it through and have our water back in the canal by the 1st of May, and you will make a name for yourself."

Again, at page 198, still continuing Mr. Parent's evidence, the following is reported:

Q. As a matter of fact, did Mr. Kennedy take full charge of the work?—A. He did.

Q. Did you appoint the time-keepers?—A. No; Mr. Kennedy appointed them himself.

Q. Did he make any report to you about these appointments?—A. No; only in conversation.

Q. Was it not your duty to ask for this ?—A.

Well, I did ask and never got anything.
Q. You say that you asked and never got anything ?—A. I never got any information that I On several occasions I wrote to Mr. asked for. Kennedy to keep me posted on everything that was going on. He said he had no time scribble.

The Minister claims that he is not responsible, that Mr. Parent was in full charge of the work. Well, Sir, if hon, members of the House will kindly listen to what I am just going to quote from Mr. Parent's evidence, they will be able to estimate the value of the hon. Minister's contention:

Q. You received a letter from Mr. Kennedy, which has been produced here, in which he complained about Mr. Desbarats, and stated that, if any man dared to report to him or to anybody else except to himself (Kennedy), that that man would be dismissed immediately?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Pid you report that state of affairs to the Well, Sir, in face of such evidence, is it possible to claim that Mr. Parent was in charge of the works? As a matter of fact he was not in charge of the works. Mr. Parent acted, there is no doubt about it, the part of a weak man. He was guilty of a great deal of weakness, there is no possible doubt about it. He allowed himself to be overpowered, and that circumstance should be taken into account. He was dismissed from his office. Now it seems to me the Minister should not have made, under these circumstances, the accusation against him that he did. But, Sir. Mr. Kennedy was so much the boss of the work, he was so much the master of the whole thing, that he dared to write a letter in which he threatened every one who would not obey his orders, with instant dismissal. That letter has been read, it will be found at page 140, but I want to call attention to it again because the Solicitor General has given it a version that I cannot agree with at all. In that letter Mr. Kennedy writes:

I beg leave to acquaint you of the scandalous manner in which certain things have been conducted on the Lachine Canal.

the Solicitor General had admitted having received that letter, but he says he did not communicate the letter to the Government. Well, we must take his word for it, but it seems to me he has been very imprudent in giving it. Ιf he was not exactly a member of the Government, he was at any rate very near being one. He has to-night spent an hour in saying: "What had I to do with it." In face of his own admission that he was made cognizant of the fact that a scandalous state of things existed, how can he say to-day: "what had I to do with it"? Sir, he is the most responsible member of the whole Government. in my opinion. He was bound in honour to take that letter to the Minister, but he did not do it. He says that he kept the letter to himself for fear that poor Kennedy might be ill-treated. Let him be responsible be ill-treated. be responsible Not only was what he has done. Mr. Parent not in charge of the works, but I say that the Minister himself took charge of the works. An engineer was appointed to the works, as I have said, in the month of October, 1892, Mr. Desbarats. He had previously been engaged in making the plans for the works, in which he spent several months. He was appointed by Mr. Trudeau, and went to Montreal, but it was not very long before he quarrelled with the ill-treated Edward Kennedy. The evidence on this point, I think, is deserving of some attention. If you turn to page 67, you will find this:

Q. Had you any difficulty in checking this time, and when did that difficulty arise?—A. About the beginning of February. Up to that time I department here in Ottawa?—A. I did, verbally.
Q. To whom?—A. To the chief engineer, and, I believe, also to the Hon. Mr. Haggart, that I arranged with Mr. Kennedy to receive every day the lists from his time-keeper, showing the number of men on the works, and what work they were employed at. After that time he wrote Mr. Parent refusing to furnish me with the lists of time any longer.

Q. That is up to the 18th of February?—A.

About that time; the beginning of February.

After that I received no further lists from his time-keepers, and I went around the works and got an idea of how many men were on the works, but I had nothing to check. I never saw the list. I did not check his list.

Q. Had you any conversation with Kennedy personally about this matter of checking the time-lists ?—A. Yes, several times.

Q. Why did he refuse ?—A. He said he was in sole charge of the work; he said he was wholly responsible for the execution of the work, and he did not wish anybody to come and interfere on the work in any way with him.

Can the English language state a fact any clearer than that? Then, again, we read on page 69, in answer to Mr. Lister:

Q. How did they get disagreeable ?—A. Because he objected to my going around. Anything he did on the work he was always objecting that I was interfering with him, that he had full control and nobody should be allowed to interfere with him. What I considered my strict duty, he objected to as interference in his work.

Again, I ask can anything be clearer than that? Well. Sir. it was claimed last year, as it has been claimed this year, by the Minister and his friends, that Mr. Desbarats was never dismissed from the work. I do not want to detain the House very long on that point, but still it seems to me that it is so clear that he was dismissed, that it cannot be honestly contradicted. Let us take Mr. Desbarats' own evidence. He surely knew how he was treated. On page 74, we read:

- Q. When you were relieved or dismissed, were you relieved from the employment of the Government altogether?—A. Not at that time. My instructions, when I went down to Montreal, said that, when I would be through with my work at Montreal, I was to come back to the department at Ottawa. When I received my notice of being relieved on the Wellington Street bridge, I supposed I was to come back to Ottawa. I came back at the end of the month and reported to Mr. Schreiber, and he informed me I was out of employment.
- Q. You were actually dismissed; my use of the word was correct? You returned thinking you were only changed from the Lachine Canal to employment here. When you came home, you were relieved altogether?—A. Yes.

Q. How long did you remain out of the Government employ?—A. About a month.

- Q. Then you went to British Columbia, did you?

 —A. Yes.
- Q. You have had employment from the department ever since, and now ?—A. Yes.

By Mr. Tarte:

- Q. How long had you been employed before?—A. I had been in the Government employ about fifteen years.
 - Q. Nothing against you at all ?—A. I think not. Q. No complaint at all ?—A. No complaints.

Well. Sir. the letters and the dates connected with the dismissal of Mr. Kennedy, are very interesting and important. I pointed out a moment ago that the trouble between Mr. Desbarats and the ill-treated Edward Kennedy began early in the month of February. The trouble arose because Mr. Desbarats. as he says, wanted to do his duty, he wanted to check the time-lists, he wanted to have an account of everything that was going on. Mr. Kennedy wrote to Mr. Parent, on the 4th February, a daring letter, in which he said that every man that would report to any one else than himself, would be immediately dismissed. What took place on the 6th, two days after Desbarats' reply to the ridiculous charge made against him by Mr. Kennedy? A letter was written by Mr. Schreiber. The letter was read last year. but it deserves to be read again this year. It is as follows:-

Ottawa, 6th February, 1893.

E. H. Parent, Esq.,

Supt. Engineer, Lachine Canal, Montreal.

Dear Sir,—The subject of your pay-rolls in connection with the Wellington Street bridge has been under consideration, and it appears that the hon. Minister has given no authority for Mr. Desbarats' salary being increased from $105 to $150 per month, and I am to return the pay-roll for correction, and I am further to ask who employed an office boy, and by what authority it was done?

The work of looking after the Wellington Street bridge should be done from your office without extra cost.

Yours truly.

COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER.

On the same day, 7th February, Mr. Parent answered that Mr. Desbarats had been appointed to the position by Mr. Trudeau, and Mr. Parent adds that Mr. Desbarats is absolutely necessary to him. On the 9th Mr. Parent wrote again, stating that in the condition of the work, Mr. Desbarats is an essential and necessary man. Here is what took place then. On 13th February, Mr. Schreiber wrote:

The department does not take the same view of this matter as you do, and I quite agree that one engineer can readily attend to the giving of the lines and levels at the bridges in Montreal, and look after the Lachine drain matters, and one only can be kept, and that is Mr. Papineau.

As a matter of fact, from the very day that Mr. Kennedy made a complaint against Mr. Desbarats, that engineer was dismiss-In face of these facts, how can ed. hon, gentlemen opposite say that Mr. Parent was in charge of the work? I say he was not in charge of the work, nor was Mr. Desbarats, but the work was in the hands of Mr. Kennedy, under the direct supervision of the Minister and his department. The department did more than that. After having dismissed Mr. Desbarats, they sent down one of their leading officers. Mr. On 16th February, Mr. Douglas Douglas. was in Montreal and examined the work. and made a report. It cannot be disputed that the Minister took charge of the work

But the Minister pleads that he has done everything possible to punish the So far, the Government guilty parties. have not been very successful. The Minister of Justice has made very violent speeches in the House, but his speeches and actions have not had very great effect. He has actually charged a judge in Montreal with miscarriage of justice. I ask if the miscarriage of justice does not rest with hon, gentlemen opposite? In 1891 we were face to face with a similar condition of There was wrong-doing discovered, and there were guilty men. Prosecutions were instituted in Ottawa. Why was When Mr. St. Louis not prosecuted here? it was announced that Mr. St. Louis was going to be prosecuted, we ascertained by the public press that some of his friends visited Ottawa and represented that it would not be fair to try St. Louis here. They preferred to have him prosecuted in Montreal, because Ottawa is not a safe place for guilty men. The Government know that here the Ontario Government can interfere, that they did so in the McGreevy, Connolly and Langevin transaction. There was no fear, however, they thought, in Montreal, far from it. I do not want to brand Mr. St. Louis as a guilty man-he has been found not guilty, and we must take the verdict as it is, but, at the same time, we must look at the facts as they are. I want to know who the guilty parties are, if there are such, as the Minister says, and why they have been dealt with in a different way. It has not been, so far, explained, and, in fact, it cannot be explained except in this way, that the Government did not want their political friends to be exposed as they had been exposed in the past. The Minister of Justice failed in Montreal, and why? I know something about this case, living in Montreal, and having followed this case closely before the There Public Accounts Committee. been a widespread feeling that Mr. St. Louis has been singled out as one among a lot of parties of being guilty. It is said that the Government have been looking for guilty men. I am surprised they have not read with more care the report of their own commissioners. There is Mr. Kennedy, who has a career and a past. What do we find at page nineteen of the com-mission's report? That in his dealings with the Department of Railways and Canals, Mr. Kennedy had been guilty of fraud to a pretty large extent before his connection with this work on the Lachine Canal. What does the report say?:

A break occurred in the banks of the canal in June, 1891, a short distance above the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge near Lachine. The repairs were made by the lockmaster, Enright, and his men; the time was given by Enright to Baillairgé, on his visits to that part of the canal, as the custom was. Baillairgé did not himself see the work executed.

For this break, the amount of men's time furnished by Enright was $39.44. In addition, there was the cost of procuring stone for this repair. The pay-list for the time, as furnished by Enright, was prepared in the usual way. Subsequently, Mr. Kennedy ordered Baillairgé to make another pay-list for the break, inserting names of men working on other parts of the canal, which increased the amount to $582.69. According to Enright's evidence, the riprap of the bank had given way for 15 or 20 feet on each side of the canal. The value of the work done was about $100.

Here is a party who is known to hon, gentlemen opposite. They are looking for guilty men. Here is a clear case. I have seen officers dismissed and punished for a great deal less than that. Let us go on:

A break occurred in the canal bank at the Montreal woellen mill, just above St. Gabriel lock, which has cost $15,209.78, less $980 worth of timber used on Wellington bridge, and some material left on hand. An appropriation was made for this work, amounting to $17,000.

Three thousand dellars has gone into the pockets of somebody whom we do not know. The Government should have inquired into that. Well, Sir. that report is full of evidence against Mr. Kennedy. Here is one charge, for instance:

A large amount of plank has been charged to the "bex drain," 356,081 feet, b.m.; of this only 18.714 feet, b.m., was used in the work. It is shown from the evidence of Mr. T. H. Trihey, that, of the plank above mentioned, 220,000 feet, b.m., was never purchased or delivered, though the account for this quantity of timber is certified to by Mr. Kennedy and other canal employees.

What have the Government got to say to that evidence, which has not been contradicted by anybody? Here is a case of clear stealing, just as clear stealing as the one of one and a half million feet of timber from the canal. I say one and a half million feet, but there is more. If there was a proper and careful examination into the amount of timber' that was used in the Lachine Canal it would be found that it did not amount to more than 500,000 feet. There may have been two million feet of timber stolen, but we do not know where it is and nobody has been punished yet. I do not want to pronounce Kennedy, any more than any other man, guilty before he has had his trial. But I can explain to the hon. Minister of Justice why he has not succeeded in the prosecution. It is, first, because he has not chosen the place he should have chosen, and secondly, because he has caused public sentiment to believe that he prosecuted only one man and made an exception in favour of other men. A great deal of useless talk has been indulged in during this debate. We have been told by gentlemen opposite that on other occasions wrong-doings have been committed. There is no doubt about that, but as the leader of the Opposition has properly en san allemant (in). Le le p. Lange representation and the product of the produc asked: What have we got to do with that? Sir, if the Curran bridge stealings have been rendered possible, it is because the Government have set the example of forgiving the guilty men in the past. We had a great inquiry here in 1891, and the whole House was unanimous in declaring that the guilty men should be punished, but what did actually take place. The guilty men were found guilty, they were put in jail, but not for a very long time, and they were reprieved after a few weeks of suffering. They were civilly proceeded against by the Government to recover $600,000, and the Government after having waited for two or three years, has settled the case without receiving any money. It has been proved, and it has been admitted, that the men who had been unanimously declared guilty of fraudulent transactions by this Chamber were deep in the very councils of hon. gentlemen opposite. When it was announced that an election would take place in Quebec West, we saw the hon. Postmaster General, who in former times may not have had the same friends, going down to Quebec and advising with his friend Mr. Nicholas Connolly as to the best means of choosing the best candidate for that constituency. In face of such a state of things. and when the doors were wide open in the Lachine Canal works under the contract, the people who were tempted to steal said to themselves: After all, $1,000,000 were in finding some newspapers which had 1891, the been put in jail, but they remained there I would remind him that the Montreal only for a short time, and they have been elected to Parliament since. They naturally concluded that if for $1,000.000 stolen there lenge the hon, gentleman to meet. The was only to be got three months in jail, it Montreal "Herald" has stated that the hon. would be very much less for stealing a Solicitor General is responsible for every-quarter of a million, and they set them-thing that has taken place, and it has exselves to try. The Governhonest men and the honest men are the ment, for their own political purposes, overthieves. Yet, Sir, knowing the public opinion powered him and appointed Kennedy in his of my province as I think I know it, I state here on the floor of Parliament, that if we had a general election to-morrow the Government would be wiped out of existence, and even Conservatives admit that I speak the truth. There is an end to the defiance of public opinion. The Government have a powerful press, but as long as our voices are strong enough to go from county to county. we will be able, I hope, to cope with the subsidized press of hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Speaker, the hon, the Solicitor General has passed a great deal of eulogy upon himself. I do not want to interfere with the good opinion he has of himself, for he assuredly believes that he is the purest man of the pure Government we have today. He has boasted that he has brought actions for libel against newspapers that were criminal enough to mix his name with the Curran bridge. Well, Sir, those bridges have been named, not by us, but by public sentiment: The Curran bridges. As a matter of fact they are the Curran bridges, and for this reason: The hon, gentleman may have got from some newspapers some lines that have pleased himself, but there is a fact that he is not able to destroy. He is the very man who appointed Kennedy to the supervision of the work, and I charge him with lack of courage and manly feeling, in that he should have closed his speech by sayin: About the merits of the case, I have nothing to say. He had only findings about himself to give to the House. Well, Sir, the merits of the case are known; it is a scandalous transaction, and the merits of the case belong to a large extent to the hon. gentleman. Minister of Railways and Canals is constitutionally, and in a parliamentary way, responsible; there is no doubt about that. The whole Government are responsible for this transaction. But the man who is directly responsible to public opinion in Montreal is the hon. Solicitor General himself. He says he has taken an action for libel against newspapers. He has been very lucky guilty men have rot time to argue the case with him. But "Herald" has been threatened by him, and it has answered with a plea which I chal-Now, Sir. my main was not to defend Parent, rising a because his cannot be weakness place. One hon, gentleman has said that there was not merely one guilty man, but a conspiracy. Well, I ask if that conspiracy would have been possible if that man Kennedy, who signed all the pay-lists, had not been there. He put his name to every document, and when Mr. Desbarats wanted to see them he objected—why? Because he wanted to defraud the public treasury. And, Sir, the hon. Solicitor General has been mean enough to rise in his place and accuse Parent when Kennedy is the real culprit. I say that if any man should be proceeded against criminally, it is the hon. Solicitor General himself, because the man who hides

What his conduct has to do with the matter we are discussing, it is hard for me to conceive. Nor do I intend to discuss the guilt or innocence of the hon. Solicitor General, or whether he should or should not be placed in the pillory. Nor do I intend to discuss the details of the work, a discussion for which my knowledge and experience unfit me. But, Sir, I intend to give a reason for the vote which I shall give on the present occasion. The question before us resolves itself into two parts. We are asked, in the first place, to pass a vote of want of confidence in the Government and to change the position of parties in this House; and in the next place, we are asked to condemn the hon. Minister of Railways. In regard to the latter, it is now, I believe, this very day, just 680 years since Magna Charta was passed, and a principle of English law as old as Magna Charta is that no man shall be placed on his trial twice for the same offence. Now, Sir. what is the case here? Last session we had a resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) almost identical with the present one-reciting the same reasons for coming to almost the same conclusion, with this difference, that instead of condemning, as this resolution does, the Minister of Railways personally, it condemned the Department of Railways and Canals. Now, a question of parliamentary law has been. I think, needlessly raised by the hon. gentleman who last spoke, and by some other hen, gentlemen. It is contended, as though anybody doubted or denied it, that a Minister is responsible for his department and the officers of his department. Why, Sir. nobody doubts that every Minister is responsible for his department and the officers of his department. Not only that, but nobody doubts that the whole Government are responsible for the Minister as long as he remains a member of the Government, and they are inferentially responsible for his department. Therefore, there is no question as to the position in which the hon. Minister of Railways stands here to-day. He stands here as a member of the Government, and in the assailing him hon. members are doing two things: they are wantonly raising an issue that was really a crime is just as guilty as the man who raised in regard to the hon. Minister last commits the crime; and the hon. gentleman year, and are attempting to put him on trial a second time, and they are challengernment just as they did last year. And, Sir, my hon. friends on the Opposition side of the House, in challenging the confidence of Parliament in the present Government, seem to me to be very imprudent. They assure us-we heard it but a moment ago Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not in- from the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), whose accents are still vibrating in very ably treated in the this Chamber—that they are about to cross this debate. For instance, to the other side of the House. So that this motion brings before us this issue: are we prepared to say that we will dismiss the men who now occupy the treasury benches and allow some of the men on the Opposition side to take their places? Not merely are the Opposition guilty of the imprudence of challenging a comparison with the present Government, but the hon. member for Wellington went the length of picking out some members of the Government and saying that they were not of the stature that statesmen should be. He forgets that by saying that he raises the question: What sort of men would be put in their places? Not neerly do they challenge a comparison of that sort, but the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), with a temerity that would not be unwonted with him, or with an ignorance that would be reprehensible in a man of his experience, said that he defied anybody to produce a single instance in which the late Alexander Mackenzie had let a contract without a tender. Why, Sir, I will reply to his challenge at once, and give him an instance where he let a large and valuable contract without Not only that, but tender. give him instance after instance where he practically let contracts without tender. I can give instances where he let contracts without having Orders in Council for them. as he was bound to have by statute, for he did not let them to the lowest tenderer. If we have to go into questions of that sort. I rather think that in the end the issue between the present Government and the possible Government our friends would give us, if we were to let them into power, would be so stated that from the point of purity. which is one of those raised in the speeches, though not actually in the motion before the House-our present Government may defy comparison. And from the point of view of efficiency, which is raised in the motion before the House, I do not think we should gain an advantage by the change. When hon, gentlemen in the Opposition ask us to put them on the other side of the Speaker, the question arises: Will they give us an abler and more honest Government? There are two ways of coming to a conclusion. We can either look to their past and judge by that what would be their future; or we ean lock at them as they are, and pick out from among them the men who would be-guarantee there that if we let the Reformers into power we should have an abler and more honest Government? Not at because since they obtained office in 1873, man after man of first-class eminence has passed away from them, but none have come into this House to take their places. Mr. Dorion, one of the greatest men Quebec has produced, a great statesman, a great jurist—where is his place to-day? Has it been filled? Mr. Blake, one of the greatest men Upper Canada has produced--his place, too, is empty. The late Hon. George Brown-where is the man to fill his place? Tom Moss, a great jurist and a man of real genius, who adorned these benches in 1874-75, in the early days when the Reform party came here flushed with victory—how is his place filled to-day? What has happened is this, that man after man in the foremost rank of the Reform party has, in the lapse of time, fallen out; and although I grant that statesmen still remain in that party, they are the statesmen who sat side by side with the men I have mentioned; and the places of these men. so far as their ability and capacity is concerned, are as empty to-day as if the constituencies they represented no longer returned representatives.

Mr. SCRIVER. As empty as they would be if they had returned Tories.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not at first catch what my hon, friend said, and did not understand that he was making a witticism, and the next time he does so, I would ask him to pass me over a little note of it, so that I should be prepared for the joke. come back across the House and look to the past of the Tories. Great men have fallen away from our ranks, eminent men have departed from us. but the same thing could not be said of the Conservative side of the House as I have said of the Reform side. Other men have come in, able, brilliant, gifted men: and I see some of them on the treasury benches and some on the back I see future statesmen, men who are jurists of distinction here today, and men who will be well capable of taking the positions of the great men who have passed away from the Tory ranks; so that. Sir. if we apply that test, we should not be ready to give power into the hands of our opponents. But let us go a little closer. When I consider the part which an Opposition has to fill, I cannot help seeing how little our friends to the left of the Speaker make of it. Year after year, as I sit here. I observe that they make no impact whatever on the ranks of the Conservatives and no impression whatever on the House, and add blunder to blunder. This last motion of the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) is one of their latest. and also one of their crowning blunders, because he has made it patent to the whole come Ministers of the Crown. If we go to Dominion to-day that the Opposition has the past, what do we see? Do we see a nothing new to bring forward, and has to hark back to the old motion of last year in order to make believe that they have some scandal to bring against this Government. I am reminded sometimes, when I look round on my friends in the Oppositionbecause I am very close to them-of the celebrated scene described by one of the old Hebrew prophets. The prophet is led to the borders of a great valley of dry bones. and the spirit says to him: Son of man, can these bones live? Now, Sir, what happeneä? A miracle was performed. Flesh came to the bores and gristle to the limbs, and they stood up, an exceeding great army. But the prophet who, on that occasion, brought that about, because he was told to propincy to the dry bones, had an advantage which I should not have if I were told to prophecy to the dry bones that I see around me. I will tell you what advantage he had. The great writer goes on to describe the immense valley of dry bones, and says here the description would in no sense anply—they were exceeding many; but he goes on to add-and then the description applies -lo! they are exceeding dry. So if you make a comparison between the Grit Government in posse, and the actual Government of the Conservatives of to-day, admitting that we have had great losses, admitting that some of those who have taken the places of the men who have passed away could not have the same amount of experienceadmitting that we may see gaps and miss a grandiose figure here and there, yet we have a Government that has the confidence of the country.

Some hor, MEMBERS, Hear, hear,

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, it has, as you will see by and by, and it may be that a very short time will give that grandicse and venerable tinge which marks some of the Goveriments of the past. My hon, friend (Mr. Seriver) feels so truly that what I am saying is sound that he looks pleased.

Mr. SCRIVER. I wonder what it all has to do with the question.

Mr. I/AVIN. I will show him what it has to do with the question. This is a motion of want of confidence in the Government. If I vote for that motion, I vote for turning out this Government. But, to use very vulgar language but very forcible, I want to know, if I am going to throw out the water I have, what sort of water you will give me to replace it. If I help to turn out the men now in office, what men will you put there? If I were to descend to the method of discussion followed by the hon, member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) I might discuss, personally, these hon, gentlemen. But I am not going to be personal. I respect my col-leagues in this House of the Grit persuasion as well as those of the Tory creed. Take the leader of the Opposition. Wheword falls from my lips concerning him except such as expresses my appreciation of his charming character and exquisite urbanity. Sir, every one of us on both sides of the House honours the leader of the Opposition. Nevertheless, I am not sure, with our rugged and robust Tory conception of what the leader in the Dominion of Canada should be that he is quite the figure for Romeo. I might go on indefinitely, and consider the fitness of these hon, gentlemen. For instance, I suppose the hon. member for North Wellington would be in the Ministry. And he would be a graceful figure. I suppose he would be Minister of Railways. Or if we had a department for superintending the department of the Auditor General, he could be placed there. But after you have taken away one or two striking figures, you have a very poor crowd to march through Coventry with. Let us go back a few years. We were challenged by the hon, member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) to produce a single case in which a contract was let by the Mackenzie Government without tender. Sir, I turn to the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Commission, contract No. 11—steel rails. This contract was the result of offers by Messrs, Cooper, Fairman & Co., without competition. Now, Sir, I turn to page 207 and I find:

The evidence shows that there was no such rise in the market price of rails as that which, in Mr. Cooper's letter to Mr. Buckingham-

Secretary to Mr. Alexander Mackenzie.

-of the 14th January, is stated to have taken place, and no such advances in Mr. Cooper's letter of the 29th December, 1874, to Mr. Mackenzie, was mentioned as probable after New Year. Mr. Mackenzie stated-

I shall have to refer to this again, as it bears upon another point of the controversy.

-- that in awarding contracts, his "decision was invariably not only in concert with, but in acquiescence of the views of the department," in consequence of which statement Mr. Trudeau, who had been the deputy minister at the time of this contract, was recalled.

That contract was one that was let without tender. Turning to pages 190 and 195, I find reference to contract No. 8. Notification had been made by Mr. Braun, the secretary of the Department of Public Works, and in regard to that, the chairman of the commission says:

This notification is made as if Cooper, Fairman & Smith had made more than one tender on behalf of the Mersey Steel and Iron Company, which was not the fact.

I want to call the attention of the House to what is here told that they received the contract, not merely without tender, but in a surreptitious manner:

In this and in many other instances throughout the contracts concerning steel rails and bolts ther before his face or behind his back, no and nuts and transportations, it appears that an understanding existed from time to time between this firm and the Department of Public Works, beyond that which is conveyed by letters or paper The tenders above set out as made on record. by Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., relate to de-livery at Duluth, Thunder Bay, French River, Liverpool and Vancouver, none of them being named in the advertisement as places at which delivery would be accepted. After the tenders were received, Mr. Fleming describes the effect of some of these tenders in his schedule of the 19th November, as if it was then expected that the department would entertain them, though no competition had been invited except for delivery at There was, in fact, not more than Montreal. one tender in the name of the Mersey Company. The other tenders were by Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., in their own name, and were not for delivery at Montreal.

The proceedings which followed this notification of the 2nd December, show that it was thereby intimated, that not only the offer made in the name of the Mersey Company, for 10,000 tons to be delivered at Montreal, but also the offer of Ceoper, Fairman & Co. for an additional 10,000 tons, with a price for delivery at Duluth and French River, was accepted, though no competition had been invited for the points thus named by Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., and the Messrs. Perkins, Livingston, Post & Co. had made an offer of delivery at the same points, Post & Co. had lower than that of Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s tender.

According to the above-mentioned letter-

I am still reading from the same judgment, page 193.

--of the 4th December, 1874, Mr. Fairman, of Cooper, Fairman & Co., intended to leave Montreal for England, and in his evidence before us he stated, that he was in England, and heard from the president of the company that they would not execute the contracts as sent to them; but he knew of no authority from the Government which permitted a new one to be executed , in a different shape.

We find that a tender made by Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., in their own name, for delivery at points other than those at which competition had been invited, was accepted, and that its terms were included in a proposed contract with the Mersey Company for 20,000 tons of rails; that the Mersey Company refused to comply with these terms and elected to execute a contract for the rails alone, without the accessories named in the tender on which the contract was based; that the action of the department throughout the negotiations with Cooper, Fairman & Co., concerning maters connected with this contract, was calculated to give, and did give, that firm an undue advantage over other competitors in subsequent transactions; that, in obtaining this contract in its final shape, the contractors—the Mersey Steel and Iron Company-got no undue advantage, and that in awarding it the department purchased the material covered by it at the lowest available offer.

And all through, Sir, you will find that this Cooper, Fairman & Co. firm, in which there was a person of great interest to the Prime Minister gets an advantage every time, and that in this case it got a contract for 5.000 tons of steel rails without any competition whatever. Now, at page 177 is the finding

The comregarding contracts 6 to 11. mission says:

The evidence leads us to the following conclusions:-That a large portion of the 50,000 tons now under consideration, was purchased without any defined view as to the times at which they would be wanted, and without reference to those times, but solely upon the ground that the rise in the price of rails was to be expected;

That such purchase was made by direction of the Minister of Public Works, without the authority of an Order in Council.

Now, if you turn to the Act you will find that the Minister ought to have had an-Order in Council for doing what he did:

That the said purchase was urgently recommended by Mr. Fleming, the engineer-in-chief, for the alleged reason that the rail market was not likely to be thereafter so favourable to purchasers as it then was;

That the Minister adopted without question the view of Mr. Fleming upon the probable future state of the rail market.

And later on:

That, if the foundation of Mr. Fleming's re-commendation had been inquired into, he could not have done sufficient to induce an ordinary business man to purchase on speculation at that time steel rails at the price paid for these.

It is fresh in our memory how much was lost by this transaction, and here is a diagram pointing out how all these rails, most of them not needed, that were brought there at great expenses, were bought at a price of between £10 and £11 a ton and left to rust at Thunder Bay and at Vancouver. They were bought in a falling market, which went down to between £5 and £6 in 1878. The calculations of the amount that this country lost for ever in consequence of that steel rail transaction, on these five contracts, have been made again and again, and exposed before the people. I have shown that some of these contracts were made without tenders, replying to the challenge of the hon, member for Winnipeg Martin), and I have indicated a state of things that was extraordinary. I remember well with what a surprise it came upon me. I did not belong to any party at the time. So far as party politics in this country was concerned, my mind was a tabula rasa. But I remember that when this Government got into power, before the sense of newness in their ministerial clothes was gone, they had entered upon an orgie of corruption whose rank offense smelt to heaven throughout the Dominion. I knew something then of politics generally, and I moved by spontaneous indignation wrote an article in one of the periodicals of the time, assailing the Mackenzie Government. I remember the article was quoted in the "Mail" newspaper and attributed to Mr. Goldwin Smith. I suppose because they thought it would add to its effectiveness rather than gifting me with the style of diamond point of that and subjected this country to the loss of a gentleman. Scarcely had they come into power when they had lost the confidence of Canada, partly because of their corruption. which developed rapidly, but partly also because of the glaring incapacity which characterized every step of their administration and every movement of their policy. So that when they challenge our confidence in the present Government by a motion of want of confidence on a still scent like this. we have a right to go back to the past, and to look into the future; and if we go back to the past and look to the possibilities of the future, and compare the conditions of both sides at present, I do not think we will be ready to change an efficient Government for a possibly inefficient Government such as the Opposition would give us. Now, there is one point connected with the details of the conduct of the Minister of Railways that I want to bring forward. The Minister of Railways is condemned because he took the advice of Mr. Schreiber in calling for tenders for labour. It certainly was an extraordinary advice, and as the leader of the Opposition pointed out in his speech, the Minister of Railways seemed himself to have been staggered by it. Sir, I suppose there are two propositions that can be laid down in regard to the deference that a Minister should give to the officers of his department. In a department like that of Railways, or Public Works, in any department where scientific men or experts are employed. I think we may lay down the proposition that on any scientific question, on any question where expert knowledge is necessary in order to form an opinion, the Minister ought to defer to the officer who has the requisite expert or scientific knowledge. In the next place, where it is a pure business question upon which a man unskilled in science, not an expert, can form an opinion as well as any scientific man or any expert, then we may expect, and we ought to expect, that the Minister shall give us his own judgment. We do not look to the officer then, we do not look to the expert or the scientific man, but we look to the Minister, and we are entitled to his opinion. But, Sir, are hon, gentlemen opposite, who followed the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, in a position to condemn the Minister of Railways or any other Minister if he deferred absolutely to the advice of an officer of the department, even on a business question? Let me read to you what Mr. Mackenzie said when examined on that question. It is found on page 169:

Mr. Mackenzie was asked what appeared to be the reasons in support of the view that the price of the day made it expedient to buy on this occa-He said he knew of none except the fact, and being asked what that was, he said the price had reached a lower point than it had ever reached, and that Mr. Fleming thought it likely on earth made you buy the rails, then? He made answer that he supposed it was the price, it was thought the price was good; although in 1868-69 and 1870. rails had gone down some 300 per cent lower than they were at that time.

Having bought this 50,000 tons of steel rail

An hon. MEMBER. You had better go back to 1850.

Mr. DAVIN. But you don't see the argument. The argument is this, that if in previous years they had gone much lower than they were then, it was an absurd thing to buy 50,000 tons of steel rails that you did not want at a price three or four times higher than they were before. As a fact, we know that they were lower; and he was asked the question why he did this? Now. one of two things. I am not going to reflect on Mr. Mackenzie, I respect his memory. I am not going to be guilty of the conduct of those barbarous ages that exhumed men and gibbetted them afresh. I am not going to men and do anything of that sort : but I say that we are discussing a great question here in which the fate of the country is involved, and we have to speak plainly. One of two things, either there was corruption or inefficiency in the purchase of this 50,000 tons of steel rails. When pressed on this point, he said:

He knew of none except the fact, and being asked what that was, he said the price had reached a lower point than it had ever reached-and that Mr. Fleming thought it likely to rise. The tenor of his evidence was, that throughout this matter he leant upon Mr. Fleming's judgment concerning the state of the market, and its probabilities in the future, and being asked whether he had not deemed it expedient to inquire into Mr. Fleming's reasons more deeply than merely by hearing what was his conclusion, his answer was: "Well, of course, I adopted his reasons." Mr. Fleming stated that he had no doubt that he had said to Mr. Mackenzie: "You cannot purchase too many rails at that price."

Which of course was not correct:

So here we have the late Prime Minister of the Reform party stating that in committing this extraordinary act of folly, or this extraordinary act of corruption, he was guided absolutely, although it was as much a business transaction as weighing out a pound of sugar, by the advice of his officer. Now, applying that to the Minister of Rail-What the Minister of Railways did was to take the advice of Mr. Schreiber on a matter of a quasi business character, but | also on a matter that an expert could best speak of. And when he said to Mr. Schreiber that this way of getting labour seemed to him a most unheard of way, that he could not understand it. Mr. Schreiber told him, as you will see by the evidence, that it was a common way, that it was well-known. and that it was the best way of getting the million dollars for ever, he was asked, What anxious that the work should be rapidly done, and if he had refused in that case to be guided by the advice of his officer on a quasi business and a quasi expert transaction, and if the work had been delayed. might fairly condemned. he he that if you are to justify Mr. Mackenzie at all then you must triumphantly justify the Minister of Railways. Unless you are going to condemn Mr. Mackenzie as absolutely guilty or absolutely imbecile you must acquit the Minister in taking the advice of Mr. Schreiber of the least possible fault of judgment whatever. I will go thus far into the transactions to deal with the letting some work without tenders. Section 13, of chap. 36, of the Revised Statutes, says:

> The Minister shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of work, except in case of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest, or in which, from the nature of the work, it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department.

That last part if we wish to use colloquial language, lets out the Minister entirely from the sweeping condemnation that in regard to this one matter was brought against him by the hon, member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). But in regard to steel rails, and contracts which were given to tenders two or three steps higher than the lowest, what are we to say of the late Premier of the Reform party, when in the very next section of the Act we are told that under such circumstances you must get an Order in Couneil, which he did not get. So that unless hon, gentlemen opposite are prepared to condemn the late Reform Prime Minister, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, they cannot in these two points condemn, nay, they are bound owing to their adoration of the memory of that able man, on these initial stages of these unfortunate transactions, to endorse the present Minister of Railways. Let me say one word as to why mainly I have been impelled to speak on this matter. I have shown there is nothing new in the present motion. It is practically the same as the motion brought forward last year by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I marched out of that door, and did not vote on it. I would not vote want of confidence in the Government.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly, I would not vote want of confidence in the Government, and I would not vote approval, with what light I had, of the transactions that had taken place in the Railways and Canals Department. Why do I rise to-night and speak. and speak as strongly as I can against the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)? I will tell the House why. It is not merely that there labour. The Minister of Railways was is nothing new in that motion-aye, there is something new. There is a good deal of truth in what the hon, member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said, that this is a rehash of the joint of last year. But there is something new and spicy in it, and that is the spice of personal malignity. I say this, that the fact that I see personal malignity against the Minister of Railways is chiefly the reason which has impelled me to come here and protest against this attack.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I hear a derisive cheer from the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Mc-Mullen). That hon, gentleman and his political kin will by and by get up and talk of being British subjects with British traditions. Where will you find in the history of the British Parliament a case in which a man has been arraigned once in Parliament, and Parliament has acquitted him, as this Parliament acquitted the Minister of Railways last year, and then cowardly, meanly, pettily and impotently, a member starts up and makes a similar charge, only more personal, an impotent sting in a malicious hand—and that is all it is.

Mr. CASEY. Allowing the hon, gentleman all poetical license, I think the words cowardly, maliciously, and meanly are unparliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the words, cowardly, and maliciously, are applied to an hon. member, they are certainly out of order.

Mr. DAVIN. From what you know of me, Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say it is impossible that I should apply those terms to any member of this House. I applied them to the sting, I applied them to the motion, and if applying them to the motion is out of order, I will endeavour to get some chromatic phrase which will express my meaning, and I certainly withdraw anything that is unparliamentary.

Mr. CASEY. I say that those words applied to the motion apply to the mover. You cannot call a motion cowardly, and the term must be applied to the mover.

Mr. DAVIN. Is the hon, gentleman going to make a speech?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman is discussing, I suppose, a point of order.

Mr. CASEY. And the other hon, gentleman will please keep his seat. For the credit of the House we must not permit these words to go on our records as permissible, and as such as may be used in debate. I must ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on this point.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not quite catch the point attempted to be made by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey), nor do I quite understand the distinction which the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. limits and not because it mattered at all what the hon. gentleman Davin) has drawn between language applied to a motion and to a mover of a motion.

Mr. DAVIN. The easiest way is to withdraw everything unparliamentary. I make a clean sweep; the smallest fringe or dust on the wing of a single phrase that is unparliamentary is withdrawn. I will go further and pronounce an eulogy on the hon. member for Queen's, and say that in the courage displayed in his motion he is only equalled by the diginity of his demeanour in debate; and in regard to the hon, member who called me to order, he is the Rupert of debate of the Reform party. He enters in where angels would fear to tread, although there is nothing angelic about him. To return to our mutton, as the French say: I say, Mr. Speaker, that the chief reason that impelled me to take part in this debate was that this is a personal attack. The motion is accepted as a vote of want of confidence by the leader of the House. We cannot get over this, that it is not merely an attack on the Department of the Minister of Railways, as was last year's motion, but it is a personal attack, and it is very hard indeed to eliminate from a personal attack made, after sleeping over the subject for twelve months, with nothing new now introduced, the element of malice, and I recur to the statement I made, that under British law no man can be put on his trial twice for the same offence. The Minister of Railways was put on his trial last year and he was acquitted, and it is a paltry thing as it is an impotent thing, and I conceive it capable of being regarded, although I am afraid to regard it as malicious, for fear of being unparliamentary, but a merely vulgar mind might regard it as malicious to come forward at this hour of the day to make a personal attack on the Minister of Railways. But Minister of Railways the can laugh. Government can laugh at it. and the It is not merely the last but it is the greatest of the many tactical blunders that have been made this session by my hon. friends of the Opposition. From the word go, Ichabod has been written on everything they did. The stars in their courses have fought against Sisera. They have made mistake after mistake, and I repeat, this is their crowning blunder, for it is an evidence to the people of the country that they have nothing to give them now but scandal, and that in the way of scandal they can only give them cold mutton.

Mr. CASEY. I must acknowledge the compliment paid me by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) that I have the courage to rush in where angels fear to tread, but I never knew before that angels had any special timidity about treading on the hon. gentleman's corns. I must say that my interruption of the hon. gentleman's speech was purely for the sake of preserving the precedents of the House, and not because it mattered at all what the hon. gentleman might be pleased to term, the conduct of this side of the House. But, Sir. what I rose for on this occasion was to consider. rather the remarks of the Minister of Railways, than those of the poet of East Assiniboin.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order now, as it is a case of order. Is that a proper way to refer to an hon. member. I think he should refer to the hon, member for West Assiniboia, and I ask the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SI EAKER. The hon, gentleman (Mr. Casey) must refer to the hon, gentleman (Mr. Davin) by his constituency.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to apologize, Sir. I am aware that in alluding to the hon, gentleman as a poet. I not only did what was unparliamentary, but what might hardly be considered true. I therefore, in the most unreserved fashion beg to withdraw the statement that the hon, gentleman (Mr. Davin) is a poet. I intend. Sir, rather to discuss a business matter now.

The Minister of Railways, at the close of last night's debate, condescended to answer on the question of his responsibility in this matter, and that is the only point I care to discuss. I rather sympathize with the poor man who had found himself in such a false position. He (Mr. Haggart) told us in the most lamentable voice that it is a great pity that attacks should be made upon him, and that he is the last man who has anything to fear, or to be responsible for, in these transactions. He admits, as he admitted last year, that the whole affair is a clear case of steal, but he says that the blame That is the should not be laid on him. question which the House has to discuss.

We all know that it was a case of steal.but we want to know who was responsible for allowing this steal, and we hold that the Minister of Railways, and the Government of which he is a member, are responsible, not only for permitting these steals, but as we believe, for arranging things purposely so that this stealing should be possible. We believe that the facts of the case show that arrangements were made to make stealing easy, possible and convenient, and that the stealing was done by Mr. St. Louis for the purpose of making the application, which it was proven afterwards he made of that money, of contributing it to the election fund for the province of Quebec. The accusations against the Government are that they allowed Mr. St. Louis to steal this money for the purpose of having it put into the hat for the election.

ways say in regard bility? He save Now, what does the Minister of Railny in regard to his responsi-He says that this is an attack, not upon the Government, nor upon him. In that he is mistaken. If he will read the resolution he will see that it is an there is a course open to the Minister to ment, and therefore, upon the Government of which he is a member. He says:

It is an attempt to hold me responsible for all the acts and for all that has occurred with reference to the Curran bridge.

Certainly it is the intention to hold the Minister responsible for what goes on in his department. The Minister denies the charge that he violated the law by letting the contracts otherwise than by public tender, and he says:

In recommending to award the contract as I did, I recommended it for the reasons I gave in the memo, to Council, and it was the Council that approved of it.

But the Minister must be responsible for his recommendation to Council, and his recommendation was to take a course that is contrary to law. This work was not let by public tender, but by private tender, in a manner which appears to us to be highly suspicious. The Minister refers to section B, and he challenges attack upon that point. He said:

If he (Mr. Davies) or any one will make the statement that I had any concern with the Section "B" contract, I will give him all the investigation he likes for the purpose of inquiring into it.

In answer to that, it is sufficient to say that the year before last when the charge was made on the responsibility of a memof this House, the Minister fused to submit to $\mathbf{a}\mathbf{n}$ investigation. His boast now in regard to it is, therefore, very hollow. The Minister also says that the charge now made in the amendment is vague and general, and is merely a charge of incapacity and inefficiency. I think the boot is on the other foot. The charges are very specific, and the only defence that has been made is that of abusing the attorney for the prosecution on this side of the House. Now, let us come to the gist of this poor gentleman's complaints, and the sad way in which he calls for the sympathy of the House. He says:

If the officers of my department act wrongly, if frauds are committed on the Lachine Canal or elsewhere, if parties steal and defraud, if the supply of labour is conducted by a process of collusion between time-keepers on the work, am I responsible?

Well, T should certainly think he is responsible. He says, in effect, if my engineers allow people to steal, if the of friends the Public Minister insist upon Works stealing with assistance of the engineers of this department, am I to be responsible? Well, Sir, I am very sorry for it. but I am afraid he is responsible. If he cannot prevent stealing by the friends and relatives of another Minister, if he cannot induce the officers of his department to prevent such stealing. attack upon him as head of the depart- remove all responsibility. Let him resign his place as Minister of Railways, and he will not be responsible any longer. But if he, as Minister of Railways, is not responsible for the things which were going on in his department, I do not know what the meaning of responsible government is. The Minister further said:

Is the deputy head or engineer of the department responsible? All they can do is to find out what crimes are committed and see that the parties receive just punishment.

Is that all they can do? Is it all the Minister of Railways can do-to find out crimes after they are committed and then secure the purishment of them? I hardly think so. I think it is his duty to prevent these crimes.

In common with the House and the country I fail to see where the punishment comes in. It has not lit on Mr. St. Louis, nor has it lit on the engineers who allowed these frauds to be committed, beyond their dismissal; and I say that until the guilty parties have been punished, the Minister of Railways must be held responsible, even on his own contention. Then the hon, gentleman goes on to give a: lot of explanations. He says:

Since I have been in the department, the Minister has not certified to payments, and the same is the practice in the Department of Public Weiks. The Minister does not know of payments being made. It is quite a mechanical process. The accounts are certified to by the engineer in charge of the particular work, they come to the superintendent engineer in my department, and, if they are within his knowledge he certifies them to be correct; then they go to the Auditor General, and he sees that the vouchers in regard to the work are perfect and complete. I never saw a single account paid, either by the Minister of Public Works or by the Minister of Railways.

He never saw a single account paid; he never inquired into the propriety of paying a single account, and he says he is not responsible if this money is wasted or stolen in the most glaring manner under his very eyes! But he finds a scapegoat. He knows that some one is responsible, and, as it is not the responsible Minister, he says:

The parties are paid by cheque from the department, and the party who is supervising and checking and is responsible as to the payments is the Auditor General.

Therefore, this vote of censure ought, I suppose to be directed against the Auditor General, and not against the responsible Minister of the department! Mr. Speaker, I hope it will not be unparliamentary to call such an argument as that puerile. If it is. I will say it is very childish to ask us to believe that the Auditor General, whose only business is to see that the payments are kept within the estimates and are made for the accounts for which they are voted. is responsible for such a waste of public money as occurred in this case, and that the Minister in actual charge of the work is not responsible. He refers to the fact that the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I..

were paid after the irregularities had been made known to the department. It is not disputed that the moneys were so paid; but the hon. Minister's only excuse was that he did not know about these payments, that he did not know that anything was wrong until after the commission was appointed. If he did not know that anything was wrong or suspected, why did he appoint a commission? And he goes on to say that he did not know much about it even after the commission had reported.

Well, Sir, with all due deference to the hon, gentleman, if he did not know that money was being stolen in the most flagrant manner after reading the report of that commission, I must say I do not think he is fit to fill his position as Minister of Railways. But I am satisfied that the hon, gentleman did know. Knowing his business capacity, I am satisfied that after reading the report of that commission he must have known that corruption was going on, that money was being stolen, and yet he permitted the payments to be made. He must have known that those payments were being made, and he did not issue orders to stop them. Then, said the hon. Minister:

The charge against me is a personal one, that the Minister is responsible for the amount. Minister is not responsible. If he had supervision of moneys, he might be responsible. If I saw every amount paid, the position would be different; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) knows I am not responsible, and that no payment was made by my authority after 26th April. After the assurance I have given him, he will relieve me of all responsibility.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that he will or that the country will. The hon, Minister may throw the blame upon whomsoever he likes; but after his acknowledgment that he did not know what was being done with the public moneys paid under this contract, that he did not know of the corruption that was going on--and even his statement in that respect must be qualified in some degree by the report of the commission—the country will believe that he was responsible for permitting what he did not perhaps directly It may be that the Minister authorize. thinks he has a defence which he does not like to present to the House. It may be that he feels that he has been unfairly used by some of his colleagues; it may be that he thinks that the relatives of one of his colleagues were getting rather too rich a thing; it may be that one of his colleagues managed. by some side influence, to get a better thing for a relative of his than the Minister of Railways was aware of at the time. It may be that he feels ill-used on that account, although he does not like to say so in the House. There again, is the remedy. If he thinks he was not treated as he should have been, as a member of the Cabinet, he can resign or insist on the resignation of his colleague. If he does not take this course, he is responsible. His reiterations in that respect will not save him (Mr. Davies) had charged that the moneys from the consequences of what has taken

The hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says that this charge is being pressed with personal malignity on this occasion. I fail to see any trace of it in the motion itself, or in anything I have heard during the discussion. There is no such motive in my mind; I have no personal malignity against the Minister of Railways, and no malignity against the Government. But if responsible Government is to mean anything in this country, it is the duty of the country's representatives to see that open stealing cannot exist in connection with a department without the Minister in charge being held responsible.

Mr. MULOCK. Many explanations have been made of the matters complained of The last one advanced by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was somewhat an echo of that of the Minister of Railways, namely, that a Minister of the Crown is not to be held responsible if it can be shown that he has acted upon the advice of his department. The hon. member for West Assinibola pleaded that ferences to the then Minister of Public as an excuse, and he further gave as another defence that the Minister had already been acquitted by the vote of this House last session. But, forgetting immediately that if the vote of this House were a discharge, that principle should apply to the predecessors of the Minister of Railways, he proceeded to review the political career of the late Liberal Government, and cited offences charged against that Government, and for which it had been tried, not only by the House, but by the country. Charges made nearly twenty years ago, passed upon

The departments, no charges would be brought hon, gentleman proceeded to give us his description of the men in office, and he was very profuse in his admiration of his col-leagues on the right of the Speaker, for-getting that a short time ago, likewise from his place in the House, he had exhausted his extensive vocabulary in giving expression to his contempt or, at all events, to his opinion, in no respectful manner, of the character of the Cabinet, which he described as a Cabinet of antiques. And we all remember how graphically he described the character and position of one of those high officials on the treasury benches-the Controller of Customs. To-day, however, words fail him in depicting how brilliantly they fulfil his ideal of everything that is required to form an ideal Cabinet. He told us that he did not believe a Minister of the Crown should be held responsible for an act of his department, when he acted upon advice. In 1891, there was a motion offered to this House with regard to the transaction known as the Connolly-McGreevy affair. That motion, moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) contained the following paragraph with reference to the letting of public works:

end to the thinking man appropriate and a first of the party of the company of th

In addition to the foregoing reasons, the House has no hesitation in recording its opinion that, judged by the well-known constitutional rule which makes a Minister responsible to Parliament for the administration of the department over which he presides, the late Minister of Public Works, irrespective of the considerations dealt with in the last preceding paragraph, cannot be absolved from his ministerial responsibility, and in that regard merits the censure of the House.

What was the opinion of the hon, member for Western Assiniboia on that question? He never indulged in anything but superlatives, and for that proposition, three years ago, he had nothing but words of admiration. He said:

I had myself prepared an amendment, but when I saw that prepared by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I thought it was a better one than mine. The question whether the Minister is guilty is a small one compared with the immense issues at stake.

After making further uncomplimentary re-Works, he said :

The motion of my hon. friend from Simcoe is the best, and I intend supporting it.

But he always halts and fails to perform. He reverses the example of a former member who considered his opinions his own, but his vote his party's, the hon. gentle-man from Assiniboia considers he owns both his opinions and his votes. After declaring that he would upport the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), he took to his heels and failed

In 1892 the Government represented to Parliament; expenditure of about $175,000, and Parliament was called upon to place that amount. at the disposal of the Government. The facts are that we have already expended $594,000 upon that work. I do not propose to cite controversial evidence or to make statements that I think can be, in the slightest degree, challenged. Therefore, in seeking to ascertain beyond controversy the amount lost, I will accept only the evidence offered by the defence. I consider it as a serious objection that the Government should have asked Parliament for $175,000 representing that that would be the total charge upon the country, and that that amount should have grown to $394,000 at least. actually paid out to date, with an unsettled claim for $60,000 or $70,000 more. The hon, terial and labour that could possibly be regentleman for Glengarry (Mr. McLellan) quired for the work. There has been paid certainly dealt a most severe blow against out upon that work in cash $394,000. Taking this Government, which has been in office the outside estimate of the cost of the work for so many years, for he said they were $260,000, and we have an admitted loss to honest at the commencement only. If that the country of $134,000, even if the country be se, this Government has been falling is never called upon to make good the claim still outstanding and in litigation. Therefere, in discussing the question as to how this country came to lose $134,000, it is not necessary to refer to the expenditure in connection with the investigation into that loss Trials have taken place, suspected persons that it was necessary to rebuild a couple have been brought to trial, not only once of bridges in Montreal, which involved an but twice, and have been acquitted. According to the reasoning of the hon, member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) the moment there was a failure of justice, and one of these accused persons was acquitted, the Government must never again attempt to secure justice against them. In discussing this question, as I said, I do not intend to use controversial testimony, and therefore will simply quote from the records of the Government themselves. What were the steps taken in order to secure the performance of the work? The resolution charges the Minister of Public Works with having disregarded business principles. No public tenders for the work were demanded, either for supplying material or for supplying labour. The best that could be said is that tenders were privately invited from half a dozen persons in the city of Montical for the supply of a portion of the labour for one of the works, and that not the chief work. No tenders were invited for a large portion of the material—the lumber that went into the work. Over $45,000 worth of lumber was bought by private purchase without competition. Parliament voted the money for this work in May, 1892. The Government ought to have known at that time what they wanted; and yet we do not find that they have any definite plan matured for carrying out the work until about a year afterwards. First they proposed to have the canal deepened to 14 feet. After having had estimates upon that basis, they changed their specifications to 18 feet. Then, after wasting valuable time and getting into the middle of the winter they changed the estimates again to 22 feet. Now, I ask any business man if that showed any great business aptitude in regard to public works? Not only were they changing their plans, which ought to have been more or less matured when they asked Parliament in the previous year for money, but they undertook the performance of the work at a very advanced period of the winter. Now, it should be borne in mind that this work was not a work of any pressing recessity. It had been asked for for years, it was simply become necessary in a relative degree, because of the increasing traffic in that district. But there was nothing urgent that it should be carried out in the winter of 1893 unless all the plans and arrangements had been completed for completing the work in an economical and effi-Nevertheless, the Governcient manner. ment seem to have neglected every business precaution and every business principle for performing the work in a reasonable way. Instead of commencing the work as soon as navigation closed about 1st December, they lost valuable time, and it was not until the second week of March, less than two months before the opening of navigation, that they began active operations. Now, Sir, having privately invited tenders for a small portion of the required labour—and the commissioners doubt the bona fides of the competition-this extraordinary plan for performing the work was assented to. I read for the information of the House, something which has already been read once but which will bear reading again, to show the sort of bargain which was made by one of the departments and ratified by the Government. I quote from the judgment of Judge Desnovers as to the terms on which this contract was made:

Mr. St. Louis' contract was extremely favourable to him. He was allowed $4 a day for a foreman stonecutter, day time, and $6 a day for the same foreman for night or overtime; $8 for the same foreman on Sundays, and at the rate of $12 for the same foreman for Sunday overtime. He was allowed $5 a day for a double team, and $10 a day for the same double team on Sundays. He was allowed $2.50 a day for the use of a derrick, day time, $3.75 for the use of the same derrick, night or overtime, and at the rate of $7.50 a day for the same derrick for Sunday overtime, and so forth on the same scale for stonemasons, stone-setters and skilled labourers.

Weli, Mr. Speaker, I am able to understand why there is an extra allowance for a man working at night or on Sunday; but I have never yet been able to discover any reasonable explanation for allowing $7.50 for the use of a derrick on Sunday, which derrick was only worth $2.50 for a week-day. The judgment of Mr. Desnoyers goes on to say:

It is no wonder that Mr. St. Louis' bills must have been tremendous, when it is remembered that the job lasted about four months, and that there were at times as many as two thousand men at work in the day time and one thousand five hundred men at work at night time. The men were paid alternately every week.

Then, after stating something which does not apply, the judge goes on to say:

In my opinion, the main causes of all the trouble in this matter are:

1. The exorbitant prices stipulated for labour in Mr. St. Louis' contract; and,

2. The almost unlimited number of men allowed on the said work, so numerous that they were in one another's way, and Mr. St. Louis cannot be held criminally responsible for these causes.

Now, how much did the Minister know of what was going on? And what really did go on. How did this loss occur? Judge Desnoyers says it was largely through the improvident bargain made for labour. In the month of May, 1893, the Government issued a commission to inquire into all these matters, and when the mischief was done. when the money was lost, the commissioners entered upon their investigation. The three McLeod. commissioners were Mr. Vannier and Mr. Douglas, Mr. Douglas being an engineer in the Department of Railways. They all agreed upon their findings, and they all signed the report, a copy of which I have in my hand. But not to weary the House, I will only quote a few passages from their finding, setting forth what in their judgment are some of the causes that have led to this large loss of money. On page 6, the report says:

On account of Mr. St. Louis' contract only calling for the supply of skilled labour, in addition to mechanics, and not including ordinary labour, as understood by Mr. Schreiber (vide his letter of 6th March, 1893), an arrangement was made between Mr. Schreiber and Mr. St. Louis on 14th March, 1893, to add to the contract that class of labour, at the rate of 15 cents an hour, a price recommended by Mr. Parent. Mr. St. Louis, in his evidence, stated that he did not agree to furnish all ordinary or good labourers at the above rate, but only "pick and shovel" men, the ordinary labourers were skilled labourers, and should be paid 18½ cents per hour, being the price in the contract for skilled labour.

Well, this is a new doctrine that the word "skilled labour" is to be construed as Mr. St. Louis construed it, and as the Government construed it, as including all other than men who were able to handle a pick and shovel, so that a messenger, or a man who attended to a cart, or did any other work except pick and shovel work, was to be treated as a skilled labourer. Then on page 8, as to the mode of constructing the work, the report goes on to say:

The force was larger than necessary, and was not fully occupied.

Then further speaking of Mr. Kennedy, the Government superintendent:

He acknowledged that he had too many men on the Wellington, &c., stated that there were too many of all classes of labour on the Grand Trunk, on account of their being no head.

On the Grand Trunk bridge, Mr. St. Louis was allowed to furnish the time-keepers, foremen,

Said, has been lost, removed, and no doubt will ultimately have to be paid for by this country. Now, the Government invited tenders privately for some of this lumber, no

Time-keepers are charged as foremen or mechanics, whose rate was higher than is paid to time-keepers. Some of the clerks in Mr. St. Louis' private office are entered in the Government pay-lists, and received their wages from public money.

What supervision did the Government exercise over the employment of the men? The report says:

The only oversight or check of the number of men and time which Mr. Kennedy provided on the Grand Trunk was to send one of the Wellington time-keepers by day, and another by night, to count the number of men, without any attempt of classification or hours of work. It is acknowledged this account was not regularly made, or only three or four times a week, no record of it, although demanded, was produced before the commission.

No time-keepers for a force amounting at times to 2,000 men, and to 1,500 at night. Comment is unnecessary. Then the report goes on to say:

Although there is no direct evidence of fraud, other than a few possible cases, which the contractor stated were probably errors, naturally occurring in making up extensive pay-lists. Nevertheless, on the Grand Trunk bridge there has been every opportunity given whereby the contractor for labour or any of his employees, if so inclined, could defraud the Government by fictitious pay-lists and accounts.

Then on page 9, the report continues:

The evidence showed that, outside of the original bill of timber, and especially in the temporary and false works, a large quantity of inferior timber and lumber was invoiced at tender prices, spruce, hemlock and pine culled deals, hemlock, cedar and spruce timber not of the value of tender prices.

Now, it is to be borne in mind that this work was performed in the city of Montreal, within a short distance of the city of Ottawa, where the chief engineer of railways had his head office; that there was a telephone from the seat of operations in Montreal to almost the very chair of the Minister of Railways, and that there was every opportunity for the Minister and every one of his staff, at all hours of the day, to communicate with the work. The report goes on to speak of the timber, and here a most extraordinary state of affairs is revealed. 3.600.000 feet of timber are charged against the Government for practically temporary work. 3.600,000 feet, I am told, if loaded upon cars, would require 360 cars, at 10,000 These 360 cars feet per car, to carry it. These 360 cars would reach between two and three miles. If that lumber were to be extended upon a surface, it would cover some 80 square All this was required to crect some acres. temporary workshops and shelter for the men during the time the work was to be About one-third of this, it is to say: carried on.

said, has been lost, removed, and no doubt will ultimately have to be paid for by this country. Now, the Government invited tenders privately for some of this lumber, no doubt describing in the classification the kind of lumber. But there was no provision to show that they got the kind of lumber that was tendered for, and upon this point the commissioners report:

The temporary buildings and other false works, platforms, &c., were built on an extravagant scale, and it does not appear that provision was made for the greater portion of the temporary work in the bill of timber and lumber furnished those tendering for the supply.

The method of culling and delivery of timber was not satisfactory. The culler's books have not all been procured, and the carters' delivery tickets have been lost and destroyed; some of the accounts are certified by a culler who knew little about them, and who had left the work some time before.

Carts were sent for timber and lumber on nights and Sundays, when there were none of Henderson's employees in the yard to check the quantity taken. There was nothing to prevent timber and lumber being taken for private uses or carted twice before the cullers; the amount charged to the Government for material taken nights and Sundays, is said by Mr. Henderson and his foreman, Labelle, to have been obtained from the cullers and others at the bridges the next day. * *

The large amount of timber purchased for so small an amount of work is extraordinary. There are only two characters of the work in which it could be used in the permanent works, and in the false or temporary works.

By calculations made from the evidence and plans, we estimate there could have been used of all kinds of the timber and lumber about 2,594,-800 feet, b.m. The total quantity charged to the bridges is about 3,613,800 feet, b.m., which leaves a shortage of some 1,018,800 feet, b.m. We cannot ascertain where this latter quantity of timber and lumber was used, it is probable some of it never reached the works.

Making a calculation in another manner, taking the quantity of timber remaining on the banks, which was used in the temporary works, and adding to this quantity a liberal allowance for that portion wasted, used up or stolen, together with the timber and lumber in the permanent works, the sum of these quantities deducted from the timber purchased, leaves a shortage slightly greater than the quantity found in the previous calculation.

From the evidence it appears that a certain quantity of new timber was broken up and taken away by workmen, or burnt to keep themselves warm, also carted away or stolen.

Then the report continues:

Some of the timber and lumber was hauled in Government carts from Henderson's yard (240 loads), which should have been delivered by the contractor.

These are some of the facts the Government's own commissioners ascertained as showing how the great less occurred. Then, as to the improvidence of the bargain made in regard to the employment of stonemasons and stonecutters, the commissioners go on to say:

The estimated cost of the stonecutting solely cutters' hours for the bridges and lock No. in cutters' 1, taking the ordinary rate paid for piecework, face measurement, would be about $6,000; the amounts rendered for cutters' hours amount to $39,896.04. Of this sum the contractor for labour would have paid his men, at the rate established by evidence, about $30,060, if the pay-lists were correct.

Yet we are to be told that a blunder like this, involving on this one item alone a loss of $30,000 is not to be charged against The report goes on to say: anybody.

If we take double the rate by piecework, viz., $12,000, as an equivalent for men working by the day for the Government, and other circumstances, it still leaves an excess of cost of some $18,000, which cannot be accounted for, which sum would be increased by the profit to the labour contractor.

Upon the Wellington bridge, by the hours charged for stone-cutting at the rate of wages paid by the contractor, the cost of stone cut is $12,516; the amount charged to the Government, including contractor's profit. is $16,715. The cost by piecework would be some $3,000.

Yet this is not to be regarded as a gross mistake, although it invovles a heavy loss to the country. The report contines:

The Grand Trunk and lock No. 1, being mixed in time-keeping, are taken together, and the cost, at the rate of wages paid by the contractor, is $17,548. The amount charged the Government, including contractor's profit, is $23. 180. The cost by piecework would be some $3,000.

If the Government adopted ordinary business principles, and had got the work for this one item down in a business-like way by contract, then the commissioners would not have found that instead of costing $3,000 it cost, in consequence of the method adopted by the department, no less than $23,-There is a railway from the quarry where the stone was procured to the bridge works, and we all know that haulage by rail is infinitely cheaper than by team; yet in this case cheapness was not to be regarded, there was no one looking after the interest of the country, so the stone was hauled twenty-two miles from the quarry by team. The Commissioners say on this point:

The contractor for labour, according to his accounts for the Grand Trunk, would have a profit of 50 cents a day upon a single cart, and $1.75 upon the same at night.

In addition to the necessary carting, carts and men were sent long distances to haul old wood to the yards of those connected with the works and others. It is probable that a considerable amount of cartage charged to the Government should have been paid by the contractor or others.

That one suggestion shows how negligent the representatives of the Government were of the public interest. The report goes on to say:

The Wellington bridge substructure should ave cost $144,000. The pay-lists for labour have cost $144,000. alone, without taking into account materials and supplies, plant and false works, amount to $151,-

The Grand Trunk bridge substructure should have cost $56,000. The pay-list for labour alone, without taking into account materials and supplies, plant and false works, amounts to $139,-

The excessive cost of the work is to a great degree attributable to the cost of the Grand Trunk bridge, even when compared with the cost of the Wellington bridge. On the latter the evidence showed that there were more men than necessary, there was a great amount of loafing and idling, an excessive cost of cartage, stone being carted from Terrebonne, a distance of about twenty miles, with a railway siding running into the quarry and available to carry the stone at a much less rate; carters idling, sent with an unnecessary number of men to load and carry lumber, an unnecessary number of foremen, and general extravagance in the conduct of the works.

On the Grand Trunk these charges were all operative to a much greater extent; besides, there is the unexplainable cost of stonecutting, of masons' hours, of cartage, of other labour, and the unusual classification of skilled labour, the large percentage of the lafter compared with ordinary labour, for all of which a large amount of money has been charged in the labour accounts.

Taking into account the entire number of causes mentioned, there still remains a large balance, for which we can offer no explanation, if the pay-list for labour or the time-keeping are not fictitious.

Then the commissioners draw certain conclusions, as follows:-

Taking items of work which have cost large sums, one of these-masonry: There were responsible contractors at the date when the rough stone was contracted for, who would have supplied the dressed stone on time and without delaying the work, at less rates than the Government could have done it by day's labour, even if there had been no labour contract which increased the cost, considering the manner in which the stonecutting and time-keeping was done. Masons are not occupied during the winter, and could have been easily obtained at a set rate by the Government without a contract.

During the season when this work was executed there is very little cartage to be done in the city of Montreal, a number of master carters, as well as others, had no employment for their horses and carts, and would have been only too willing to accept a fixed rate rather than have their horses idle. This was exemplified by evidence of carters worked on Sundays and nights at day rates.

One of the reasons of the heavy and unnecessary cost of cartage was due to the number of horses and carts unemployed at the season when this work was built.

For ordinary labour, the evidence shows that during the winter season there is always plenty of labour available, there were also many peo-ple thrown out of employment by the shutting down of manufacturing establishments on the canal during the progress of the work.

Skilled labour, such as carpenters, &c., is generally plentiful at that time of the year.

Yet we are told the explanation of this singular mode of procuring labour was the danger of strikes. Then the report goes on to say:

Mr. Mulock.

An excessive quantity of material and supplies were purchased. The plant was unnecessarily expensive and extensive. The temporary works, or false works, were too costly, even considering the method adopted in construction. which appears more expensive than might have been other methods of execution. The temporary buildings, &c., were on a scale for works ten times the magnitude of this.

The second secon

Yet nobody is to be held responsible for these temporary works being of such magpitude. The report goes on to say:

Every effort appears to have been made to consume and utilize as much timber and lumber as possible, so as not to interfere with its being continually dumped upon the canal bank.

The labour force, carters, &c., was unnecessarily large and not fully occupied.

On the Grand Trunk bridge there was a large expenditure in cartage charged to the works, hauling timber and lumber long distances to the private yards of those connected with the works and others, even men paid by the Government were sent to unload and pile the stuff.

Carters and men were hidden so that the number unoccupied would not be too conspicuous. Forty or fifty men doing nothing in a lumber yard, their time being taken by a time-keeper in the yard, sent with carts for lumber which should have been loaded and hauled by the contractor. An unnecessary night force seemed to have been employed, to obtain the increased profit over day work. There was a wholesale classification of skilled labour whereby the most common and cheapest class of labour was charged as skilled.

Further on the report says:

For this condition of affairs and the results now known, the Department of Railways and Canals holds the local officers responsible, as occurring under their supervision, recommendations and reports. On the other hand, the local officers hold the department equally responsible. Here a supporter of the Government says that it is St. Louis that is responsible, and the Crown says St. Louis is not responsible. The report goes on to say

The general management of the canal has been characterized by great extravagance. Appropriations having been exhausted for repairs long before the end of the fiscal year, accounts have been withheld, and not forwarded by the superintendent for long periods after the material was delivered, apparently waiting for some appropriation to be available.

Labour and materials were charged to appropriations voted for another purpose.

The purchase of supplies and materials was extravagant, especially timber and lumber, which cover the banks. During 1892 and part of 1893 the timber and lumber supplied the canal amounted to $147.116; of this amount Henderson Bros. furnished $83,163. During the same period the timber and lumber charged to repairs, amount to $42,098, the balance was charged to special appropriations of income and capital. There seems to have been a mania on the part of the management for purchasing timber and lumber.

There is to some extent, and it is possible, material and supplies properly chargeable to the canal proper, were charged to the bridges. The store-keeping was more than bad, the store-keeper incompetent, the certificate of accounts a farce. There was no proper system of delivering or receiving supplies, nor books of entry or delivery, ing on the point:

nor any proper check of material or supplies used. We are of opinion that the canal staff, as well as the system of management, require a thorough reorganization.

J. EMILE VANIER. ROBT. C. DOUGLAS.

There is evidence about which there is no controversy, and I have not read, nor do I intend to read any evidence that is controversial. That represents the manner in which the work was performed, that is the judicial finding by the authorities sent by the Government themselves. That state of affairs began on the first week of March, and it continued at an increasing ratio until the work was completed on towards the 1st day of May. The question now arises, first of all: Had the Minister of Railways any knowledge of these methods, and if so, what knowledge? Now, at the very commencement of the work, on the 9th of March, the Montreal "Star" published an article referring to the method of carrying on the work, and that gave him notice. It was read in the House last night by the Minister of Railways, and it so warned the Minister that he called upon Mr. Douglas to make a report. Mr. Douglas went to Montreal, and he came back, and on the 10th March he reported the work as being done in a most extravagant way. Mr. Schreiber, the Minister's Deputy, was notified of this report, and on the 11th March he telegraphed to Mr. Parent, the local engineer in charge, to come to Ottawa and give an account of his stewardship. Mr. Parent came. Mr. Schreiber, the deputy head, asked him if the charges referred to in Mr. Douglas's report were correct, and he answered that Mr. Douglas's report was exaggerated. Mr. Schreiber then called in Mr. Douglas, and he then told Mr. Douglas that the accuracy of his report was questioned. Mr. Douglas gave his version again, and it ended in Mr. Schreiber coming to the conclusion that Mr. Parent's centradiction was incorrect, and that Mr. Douglas's report was correct. I call the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. Schreiber swore before the committee investigating this matter that when on the 12th of March he found a conflict of testimony between Mr. Douglas and Mr. Parent, he came to the conclusion that Mr. Parent was wrong and that Mr. Douglas was right. That was on the 12th March when this work had just begun.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon, gentleman the reference to the proof of that statement: That Mr. Schreiber believed Mr. Douglas in centradiction of Mr. Parent.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, I can verify that. On page 135 of the evidence given before the Public Accounts Committee-I will not take up the time of the House by quoting what went before-but here is the evidence bearBy Mr. Davies:

Q. Were you satisfied that Douglas was telling you the truth or that Parent was telling you the truth ?-A. I was satisfied that Douglas was telling the truth. I was satisfied that Parent would remedy anything that was wrong.

He was satisfied that Douglas was telling the truth, and that he had not given an exaggerated description of the character of the operations that were then going on. Now, the Minister of Railways, it is fair to lows: assume, knew of Parent's statement, and he knew that Mr. Schreiber had, as it were, adjudicated on the matter in the way mentioned, because it was by order of the Minister of Railways that this inquiry was made.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Could I interrupt the hon, gentleman?

Mr. MULOCK. Not at all, I invite questions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER WIII the non, gentleman read five or six lines more of the examination of Mr. Schreiber by Mr. Davies, because I think the whole statement varies perhaps a little the line he dweit on.

Mr MULOCK. cross-examination by Mr. Davies:

By Mr. Davies:

Q. On the same point, I would like to follow that question with this: You evidently sent Mr. Douglas there to make a special report, because in your letter of the 10th you write Mr. Parent: "In the meantime I anxiously await the report of Mr. Douglas, who has been down to Montreal and visited the works."

Q. Therefore, he had gone with your knowledge?—A. He had not gone for that special pur-He was down there in connection with the superstructure, and I gave him his instructions to see what was going on.

Q. You were aniously awaiting his report ?-A. Yes.

Q. And you got his report ?—A. Yes.

Q. You got his report confirming in a general way the statement made in the "Star"?—A. In a general way, yes.

Q. You telegraphed for Parent. Parent came up and denied it. Did you see Douglas and ask him for evidence in confirmation of his reports? -A. Yes, and I saw Douglas on his return, and he stated the same as that.

Q. Were you satisfied that Douglas was telling you the truth or Parent was telling you the truth? -A. I was satisfied that Douglas was telling the truth. I was satisfied that Parent would remedy anything that was wrong.

Q. Although he contradicted, in general terms, this statement of the number of men employed?

A. He said it was very much exaggerated. Q. You took no steps?—A. He was the one in charge and the one I relied upon.

Is that all?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the point.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Schreiber was satisfied that Mr. Douglas had correctly reported him, and had not exaggerated state of affairs at the works. That was not the only notice the Minister had, for I was about to say that we must assume that all that transpired between Mr. Douglas and Mr. Schreiber was communicated to the Minister, because the Minister had directed this inquiry. But another officer at the works, Mr. Kennedy, the superintendent of canals, also becoming anxious, writes on the 12th March to the Solicitor General as fol-

Mr. Mulock.

I beg leave to acquaint you of the scandalous manner how certain things are being conducted on the Lachine Canal, in reference to the construction of works in connection with the new Wellington and Grand Trunk Railway bridges, as well as the renewal of the masonry of old lock

After referring to certain details he goes on to say:

Without consulting any one, and for what motive I consider a mystery, he (Mr. Parent) issues specifications, asking for rates for the supplying of foremen, derricks, stonecutters, stonemasons, double and single teams, and skilled labour; Mr. E. St. Louis was announced the successful tenderer. Now, I can get all the above by the thousands, at an average day's pay, without any discontent; we have also supplied ourselves with I will read the whole the necessary derricks capable of running the y Mr. Davies:

work of construction of Wellington bridge; they now want to turn all those engaged on to their list, which would increase the cost of the work 75 per cent. Imagine their trying to place pick and shovel labourers, whom I employ for $1.25 per day, at $1.87½ on his (E. St. Louis') pay-list.

As you are no doubt aware, I am, and have been, working day and night to push the work forward, and it will be too bad, when completed, to have the press crying out against the department and the Government, the enormous amount of money this bridge has cost. If the hon, the Minister of Railways and Canals is cognizant of these facts, and endorses them, why, I shall accept in humble silence, but I trust and hope that under the present successful appearance of the progress of the work, nothing nor any one shall be allowed to intercept me to the finish.

Trusting you will give this your immediate attention.

> I have the honour to be, sir, Your obedient servant. E. KENNEDY, Supt. Lachine Canal.

Here Mr. Kennedy, who had been for a lifetime the trusted officer of the Government in charge of this special kind of work, writes to the Solicitor General informing him of the scandalous manner in which certain things are being conducted. Solicitor General very properly takes cognisance of that information at once, and brings it to the knowledge of the Government. He told us to-day from his seat in the House, and his letter in reply also told the tale. On the 14th March, 1893, he replied to Mr. Kennedy as follows:-

My dear Kennedy,—I have seen the Minister of Railways and Canals and found that all has been tendered for, including labour for the carrying out of the work of the bridge, &c.

Now, the Solicitor General did not put the case quite properly in that letter. He said that all had been tendered for. Even admitting that all had been tendered for, did that mean that the work was to be carried on in the reckless manner that Mr. Kennedy mentioned, that Mr. Douglas mentioned, that the "Star" newspaper hinted at? The fact that labour and material had been tendered for did not mean that labour or material should be extravagantly employed or wasted. Then, Mr. Kennedy, not being satisfied, and anxious no doubt for the public interest as well as for his own reputation, determines to come up personally to the fountain head and see the Minister, and on the 16th of March he telegraphs to the Solicitor General in these words:

And the state of t

Will arrive in Ottawa to-day per 3.30 p.m. Canadian Pacific Railway train. Want to see you at Russell House, 4 p.m., without fail; important business. E. Kennedy, Superintendent Lachine Canal.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that it was a most unfortunate thing for the Minister of Railways and the Government and the country that Mr. Kennedy was not allowed to continue his journey; but he gets an answer from the Solicitor General in the following language:—

Do not report at department until you see me.
J. J. CURRAN.

Now, why did the hon. Solicitor General send that telegram? He has told us to-night. He says that on receiving Mr. Kennedy's telegram to the effect that he was coming to Ottawa, he went to the department to see Mr. Schreiber, he reported Mr. Kennedy's intended arrival, and Mr. Schreiber ordered Mr. Kennedy to remain on the works or he would be dismissed. What does Mr. Kennedy say on that point? He was examined before the commission, and he swore as follows:—

Q. You would not like to admit that you have no political influence ?—A. At the present time I have no political influence.

Q. But in the old days?—A. In the old days I think I had some. I was entitled to a little. But, in answer to your question as to Parent, I want to inform you that Mr. Curran, Solicitor General for Canada, the member for Montreal Centre, in whose district and constituency the work was being carried on, when I complained to him, he came up here to Ottawa and I telegraphed to him that I was coming. He went and interviewed Mr. Schreiber, and told him that Kennedy was coming here. He was told by Schreiber, that, if Kennedy came, he would discharge him.

Q. What were you coming for ?—A. I was coming here to make certain explanations as to what was going on.

Q. And complaints?—A. Yes, and Mr. Curran, with all his influence, was told to go home and mind his own business, and so was I.

Q. Mr. Curran was told that ?—A. Well, he was not told that exactly, but he was told that, if Kennedy left the work and came up to Ottawa, he would be discharged.

Q. Did he tell you that he told Mr. Schreiber what he wanted to come up for ?—A. Yes; with regard to the labour contract.

er en en la companya de la companya

There, Mr. Speaker, we have it in evidence, not only that men were anxious to furnish information to the Government, but that the Government were themselves standing in the way and refusing to allow a trusted servant to come here in the public interest and supply that information. So the expenditure goes on. Then, last session, the Minister of Railways, addressing the House on this question, said:

The chief engineer, about the 12th of April, sent Mr. Douglas down to Montreal to investigate, and on the 14th of April he reported so far as he was able to ascertain, the amount of the pay-rolls, &c., for March and the first week in April to be about $177,000, and that there would probably be a further expenditure of $100,000 by the 1st of May.

There we have it that on the 14th day of April the Minister of Railways had information from Mr. Douglas that the pay-roll for March and April would amount to no less than $277,000, leaving out the cost of material and the $60,000 which he knew the country would have to pay for the superstructure. What ought to have been the course of the Minister of Railways on receiving that information? Surely at that stage he ought to have visited the work himself to satisfy himself from actual observations what was going on. Did he do so? No. If the Minister were in the House. I would bring to his attention a manifest error which he made in his speech last night. On the 19th April the Minister of Railways did inspect the work. He saw what was going on. On the 25th April, Mr. Schreiber reported to the Minister. I will read his letter:

Dear Mr. Haggart,—As I mentioned to you, I was not a little startled upon receiving from Mr. Parent the pay-rolls and accounts for the month of March in connection with the Wellington Street bridges, which summed up to an enormous figure. I at once despatched Mr. R. C. Douglas off to Montreal to look into the matter and ferret out all the information he could, and report to me the position of matters; the information he gives me is as follows:—

the to de tollown.
December. January and February payrolls, &c., in round figures	$ 79,000
March	132,000
April	110,099
Contracts for superstructure	61.000
Less materials, &c., to be credited to	$382,000 this work, and to be debited to other appropriations, say	22,000
_	$360,000

And this he considers is the minimum figure that the work is likely to cost. When the estimate made by Mr. Trudeau, the then chief engineer, and Mr. Parent, the superintending engineer, early in 1892, is considered, namely, $150,000 for 16 feet navigation, and $40,000 additional if a depth of 20 feet of water was given, making in all $190,000, the excess of expenditure requires Mr. Parent explains that the some explanation. excess of expenditure is due to the large amount of ice which had to be be cut up and carted away; to the frozen condition of the excavation, to the breaking away of the coffer-dam on two occasions, to the solid frozen condition of the crib and other obstructions which had to be removed, and, as I understand him to say, to political interference. Superintendent Kennedy attributes it to all the causes named by Mr. Parent, excepting the latter, of which he makes no mention. I, however, am of the opinion that, whilst these latter causes may have contributed to an increased cost, that we must look for other reasons to account for the enormous expenditure over and above the estimate. Mr. Douglas is now in Montreal looking into the matter and endeavouring to keep expenses down to reasonable proportions. In the meantime, liabilities have been incurred for wages, materials, &c., to meet which a Governor General's warrant is required for $200,000.

I may state that this excess of expenditure over the estimate was not foreseen by me, and even now I am not in a position to explain it to my satisfaction, but I will have the matter carefully looked into and endeavour to get at the bottom of it. So far as I have had the opportunity of observing, everything done in connection with the Lachine Canal is on an extravagant basis, if nothing more.

That is the statement of the confidential deputy head. What should the Minister of Railways have done on the receipt of the Should he not have stopped the payment of money? Surely that letter was a warning. Nothing was done, however, and on the 10th May, a commission was issued. Here I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to an extraordinary delay. The Deputy Minister, Mr. Schreiber, on 10th May advised the issuing of a commission. A week elapsed before it was issued, and it was not until the 29th May that that commission was put into the hands of the commissoners, and not until nearly $150,000 had been paid out to the contractor, who was afterwards said to have obtained the largest portion of it by fraud. The last claim made before the issue of the commission was for $66,000, and that was paid on the 27th May. There had been a recommendation for the commission on the 10th May, there had been an order for it on the 17th May, and that commission was held in abeyance until after $66,000 had been paid on the 27th May. The Order in Council appointing the commission, was dated the 17th May, and after it was issued and before the commissioners met, this large sum of $66,000 was paid on account of the claim suspected at least of being fraudulent and the genuineness of which was to be the subject of inquiry. I find after the inquiry was began, namely, on the 6th June, $39,000 more was paid on account of these alleged fraudulent and overcharged accounts, making a total of $179,170.87 paid to Mr. St. Louis between the 24th April and the 6th June. From the 10th March. when the Minister of Railways had notice.

until the completion of the works, no step whatever was taken to guard against loss or wrong-doing and a mere inquiry is directed to take place after the loss has been sustained. I think we are entitled to ask the Minister of Railways, with all these notices before him, why he did not personally examine the work. If every one of his officers had agreed to give him one particular version, if all the evidence was of one character, then we might be more likely to be lenient in our judgment. But in this particular case he had ample notice to put him on his guard. Mr. Schreiber knew there was conflict of testimony. The department knew well the extravagance that was going on, and there was every reason to suggest to the Minister the necessity for personally informing himself. What is his explanation for not having himself awakened to a sense of his responsibility and personally investigated these works long before he did? If he had gone to these works on the 1st April, when they had only been in full swing for about three weeks, he would have been able to a large extent to stop this mischief. but he only went on the 19th April and made an official visit. What is his explanation? Let me read from the speech which he delivered last night. He seems to have had an extraordinary idea as to his responsibility. If his deputy gives him certain advice, he is not to act upon it. Last night, speaking of the contract for labour, this improvident contract for labour, which is the cause of the greater portion of this loss, the hon. Minister said:

I may have been mistaken in regard to the contract, the engineer in charge of my department may have been mistaken in regard to the employment of labour, and that it should have been obtained by contract. Is that a serious charge to be made in this House and to be embodied in an amendment to go into Committee of Supply—an error of judgment, perhaps, committed by me because I accepted the recommendation of the engineer of my department and of the superintendent of the works. I am not supposed to possess sufficient technical knowledge to act on these matters. It would be sufficient justification for me at any time if, instead of exercising my judgment, I simply accepted the advice of my department.

Now, Sir, if that were to be sanctioned for a moment in this House, if it were admitted that it was a sufficient defence on the part of the Minister if he could show that he had acted on the advice of his deputy, then all ministerial responsibility would be at an end. In that case we should be extending to the Ministers of the Crown the doctrine that alone protects the sovereign, "the king can do no wrong." Then each member of the Government would be placed upon a pedestal beyond the reach of criticism: he would be enabled to take shelter behind subordinates who are not in any sense responsible to the people. I will at the very commencement of these frauds. | quote further from the hon. Minister's defence for not inspecting the work, which. I think, you will find is no defence:

The first time I knew that extravagant expenditure was being made, was in a report made by Mr. Schreiber, on 26th April.

I have given some evidence that is not quite consistent with that.

I never certified to payments, nor is a single payment certified to by myself.

As to the point of certifying, I say it was the hon. Minister's duty to actively interfere in order to prevent the money going out, instead of, after all this notice, merely acting, as his own statement shows, a negative part in not certifying to enable the money to go out. Then he says, speaking of the labour contracts:

The price was a fair one for the labour which those parties performed. At that time, as every one knows, the House was in session; the House was in session from January to the last April, all this work was done between 8th March and about the 20th April, and yet hon, gentlemen opposite say that the Minister of Railways should have a supervision over the work.

Now, the Minister of Railways here suggests that because this House was in session he could not superintend this work, his time being occupied here from January until the last of April. That is his excuse for not giving his personal attention to this transaction. I want to acquit the hon. gentleman in advance of any intention of mis-stating the facts; but I may tell the House that in the session of 1893, the session to which he alludes, the House pro-rogued on the 1st April. And yet from 1st April to 19th April, the day before the whole work was practically complete, according to his statement, he never visited the work. He offers, as an extenuation for not visiting the work and informing himself as to the facts that he was engaged attending to his parliamentary duties-that is the inference to be drawn from his statement-and yet the House had prorogued three weeks before. So, whatever may be argued as good ground for extenuation, he has struck the wrong explanation in the statement he has made. The fact seems to be to give it the mildest colour-and I desire to do that—the hon. Minister appears not to have appreciated his proper position in connection with the expenditure of public Now, Mr. Speaker, I apologize for having occupied so much of the time of the House at this late hour; but I think I have made good the statement I made at the beginning that I would simply use evidence that could not be successfully contradicted. I have shown that, even taking the most favourable view of the case, $134,-000 has been paid out without any possible justification. I have shown that that expenditure took place inside of two months; that during the whole of that period the responsible Minister had constant, almost ment. Hon. gentlemen have attempted to daily, information that there was extravagance if not worse in connection with the work, that most unbusiness-like methods were adopted, and these things themselves culminated in producing an impression on his mind and the minds of his colleagues, resulting in a demand for a public investigation. And yet, with all those warnings, it never seems to have occurred to the Minister to take the first step to prevent wrong-doing. and to protect the public treasury. This is an extraordinary state of affairs, particularly in view of the sums so paid for labour:

24th April	$ 74,777 45
29th April
8th May	8.393 42
27th May	66,000 00
6th June	39,000 00

being part of the expenditure of $394.000. And after abortive attempts to bring an outsider to justice, we are told when we come here, to the court of last resort, that we must not call the responsible Minister or the Government of the day to account. am reminded that these last two payments, amounting to $105,000, were made after the pay-sheets had been discreditby the chief engineer by his re-il to certify them. And one defence fusal to certify them. And one defence of the Minister is that he had nothing to do with signing the cheques or taking active steps to cause the payments to be made, but that the payments simply followed the presentation of vouchers. I think. Sir, that after a warning like that, a clear duty devolved upon the responsible head of the department to take active steps to prevent loss. Whatever may be the proper remedy, it is too late in the day of responsible government to tell us now that no Minister of the Crown can be held responsible under such circumstances for this loss to the country, for this loss to our public reputation. for the discrediting of our system of public works, for the general demoralization that appears to have existed in the Railway Department of this country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, we have had what I will venture to call a rambling discussion upon one of the most extraordinary motions that has ever. under any similar circumstances, been proposed in this House, or any Parliament existing under the British constitution. It has been most difficult, as your experience, I am sure, will show, to confine the debate to any of the many serious questions that have been raised. Under the cover of this motion there has been an extraordinary, if not unprecedented, attempt to centre upon one man only all the responsibility for many matters and many incidents absolutely beyond his control, with many responsibilities that were never supposed to rest upon the shoulders of any one member of a Govern-

AND THE RESIDENCE OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PROPE that are not in any wise before this House. Hon, gentlemen have given their opinion upon the conduct, for instance, of the litigation, and I venture to say that not five gentlemen in this House, either to your right or to your left, have taken any pains to inform themselves upon the exact state of facts in regard to this question. Last session we debated many of the incidents that have been referred to in this blue-book. A large part of the evidence in that bluebook was before this House, and upon that evidence the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) considered that he was warranted in attacking the Department of Railways from head to foot, and incidentally the Government as a whole. And this Parliament, as has been well said, after hearing the Minister of Railways on this subject, were satisfied with his statement, the acknowledged in regard to that thefts, in regard to the acknowledged frauds. in regard to the evidence of negligence, here, there and in many particulars, which every member of this House regretted, which members of both sides of your Chair did their best to ferret out-the House, I say, was satisfied with his pledge that he would have all that information, and such information as could be acquired by him, sifted, dealt with, and the offenders brought to justice. Now, 60 days after the beginning of this session, a motion is sprung upon us to reconsider, to rediscuss and to debate again the facts as they are contained in that blue-book. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether from anything that has happened in this debate, there is a single hon, gentleman able to rise now-and I will cheerfully give way to him, the member, for instance, who has charge of the resolution, is welcome to interrupt, the leader of the Opposition is welcome to interrupt and to say that he knows now what has been done by the Minister of Railways and Canals in pursuance of the pledge which he gave to this tween the members on the treasury benches House as to the course he would pursue in view of the evidence that had been taken by a committee of this Parliament. there a single hon, gentleman opposite who can now tell me that he has taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the facts and circumstances that have occurred since that statement was made in this Parliament? I pause for a reply; I would welcome an answer. I think the Minister of Railways is entitled to some answer at the hands of hon, gentlemen opposite. If there is one man there who can tell you what has happened, what steps have been taken, what men have been dismissed, what men have been prosecuted, what men have been punished in connection with the admitted steal. the admitted fraud, he certainly has not yet spoken in this debate. Silence now is significant, and it is to my mind of the greatest importance. Sir. I say here, speaking for myself, having closely followed this debate, having some regard for parliamentary pro- to carry out their designs and their pur-bring before you considerations of facts cedure, having a little knowledge of the procedure of parliaments like ours, that if the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) believed he had a case, believed he had anything like a case, that warranted the strictures in the resolutions that are now in your hands, he was a good enough parliamentarian to appreciate that he could make his position doubly strong by laying grounds for this indictment, and by asking in a parliamentary manner for all this information-and there has been much since the discussion on this subject took place last session-to be put on the Table of this House. to be put in the hands of members to your right and to your left; and then I grant you the Government would be on its trial, on its trial anew if you like; and there would be some reason for this old subject. being threshed out again, instead of taking up the time of the House uselessly to debate a question of this character twice over upon the same information. do I mean by that? I mean What the gist of the case as that against us is that a fraud upon the Crown was perpetrated, that a crime was committed, that a loss of money occurred through the fraud and through the crime; and following hotly upon these facts, that are not in dispute, the hon, gentleman, forgetting all parliamentary procedure, all pre-cedent in a case of this kind, all sense of fair-play and of dignity of debate, all the advantages of a free and full discussion, rush pell mell forward and say: We charge you with all that responsibility, and having proved a fraud and a theft, we asperse your motives, we impute to you a design that all this should take place, because one of the men charged with the crime and the misdemeanour, was a friend, was a member of your own ranks, was a man who made a very awkward statement in evidence, and we infer from all that that this was nothing less than a huge and abominable job beand those who have been accused of crime. But there is a very important hiatus in that case, and I say it lies upon hon, gentlemen opposite to show, not in debate, not on the statement of this gentleman or that, no matter whether his position be important or unimportant in this House, but it lies upon any hon, gentleman attacking this Government, so far as their position has been affected since the debate on this subject occurred last session, to lay bare in a proper manner the facts that have occurred since then. I say that this House not in a position at the present moment to sit in judgment on the conduct of the Government so far as they were bound, and undoubtedly they were bound by the pledge of the Minister of Railways, to deal with all and sundry persons who are in any respect guilty of abetting crime, or by whose conduct those persons who have robbed this country were enabled poses. But instead of obtaining the information, how atrociously unfair, if I may use the expression, has been the position taken by the hon, gentleman who has moved the resolution and the leader of the House. Why, they have travelled not over this blue-book only, they have distorted the evidence in that book, if I might be permitted to say it. almost shamelessly. They have given part of a witness's statement and part of a sentence even which might convey a certain meaning, and they have hurried on ever 30, 40 or even 100 pages to patch up and make a case. How desperate was their position when, after the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) had misrepresented. not wilfully. I believe, the evidence that was taken in the Public Accounts Committee, the leader of the Opposition rushed to his rescue, knowing but very little of that evidence, as is plain from the speech he delivered in this House, knowing very little of the facts within his command and with which he could have made himself familiar if he had tried, and began to asperse in the most unfair and unprecedented manner the character of a member of the bar of Quebec, of the bar of the city of Montreal. He charged, without having any information that was in the possession of this House, the gentlemen entrusted with the Crown case with negligence, with being a party to one of the greatest frauds that the Government could perpetuate, because by innuendo if not directly that charge is made against my department, if not against the Government, that we had played with the criminal prosecution, that we had got a junior counsel weakly to present the case to the court and the end of the whole thing was a failure. and further that that failure was anticipated if not sought and desired. What had that to do with the judgment of the House which this House is asked to pass against the Minister of Railways and Canals? Suppose I or my predecessor had so far forgotten the traditions of the Department of Justice and the position which gentlemen filling that office had occupied, as to stoop to that nefarious and abominable conduct in carrying out the admitted instructions of the Department of Railways and Canals. what had that to do with the inquiry this House is asked to make into the character of a member of this Government who is particularly singled out in this debate and in this resolution? How is it that these statements. made without a shadow of foundation, these statements that involve an unfair slander of a man occupying a dignified position in an honourable profession, are into this debate, and hurried quickly hurried into it? How is it that the leader of the Opposition ventured to asperse either the character of the department I presided over or the character of the gentleman whom he called a junior counsel at the bar of Montreal, when he evidently did not take the trouble to acquaint himself with the fact that instead of a junior counsel being engaged in this matter there were three counsel, two of them senior counsel at all events and beyond dispute at the bar of Montreal, and a gentleman whose character and integrity has never been challenged, so far as I am aware, either in this House or out of it? Does he pretend to tell me that Mr. Bisaillon is not a man fit to be trusted in a case of this character? Does he pretend to tell me that Mr. Hall, of Montreal, is not fit to conduct a prosecution of this character before a magistrate? Does he pretend to tell me that the junior counsel. Mr. Sharpe, for he is junior only of the three counsel, a man whom I would not call a junior counsel, and I do not think the members of the bar of Montreal would term a junior counsel in the sense the hon, gentleman meant to apply, is not himself and alone without assistance in every respect able to conduct a case of the character that was pressed against Mr. St. Louis? The hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) sits in this House. He, as the hon, gentleman says, is an eminent member of the bar of Montreal. and he referred to the hon, gentleman's He also referred to Mr. Maceminence. master and his eminence at the bar, and I venture to say that neither of these gentlemen, nor any member occupying a position of respect at the bar, would sneer at Mr. Sharpe. I venture to tell the hon, gentleman, and to tell this House, that it is not fair to say that Mr. Sharpe is an ordinary member of the bar of Montreal.

Mr. LAURIER. I said nothing against Mr. Sharpe.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman says that he said nothing against Mr. Sharpe. But I am in the judgment of this House whether he did not refer to the fact that against the able counsel on the other side we had placed the case of the Crown in the hands of a junior counsel at the bar of Montreal. This assertion is unfounded, it is contrary to the fact.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That assertion is so contrary to the fact that it would raise the indignation of every fair-minded man in this House. I will not press the vindication of the character of Mr. Sharpe—I was prepared to do it. I understand the hon. gentleman withdraws any insinuation against the ability or standing of Mr. Sharpe at the bar in Montreal.

Mr. LAURIER. I am within the memory of the House: I did not say a word yesterday derogatory to Mr. Sharpe as a member of the bar, but I said the Department of Justice should have had a senior counsel associated with him. And so I say now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I fain believe that the statement of the hone gentleman is in line with the statement he made yesterday, and which gave rise to my own honest and fervid indignation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

. . . .

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I care not for the jeers of hon, gentlemen opposite on this subject. I have forced the hon, gentleman to abandon one position he took in this debate, that we had played with the case against Mr. St. Louis.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon, gentleman can read word for word what I said yesterday. I dare him to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
The hon, gentleman's statement is there, and mine is there, and Mr. Sharpe's reputation is beyond any possible damage by the statement of the hon, gentleman. But let me pin the hon, gentleman down and follow him. The hon, gentleman now says his charge was that we should have had some other counsel associated with Mr. Sharpe. Why should we have done so? Was Mr. Sharpe not able to conduct that case properly and efficiently before the magistrate in Montreal? Does the hon, gentleman say no now, or does he remain silent?

Mr. LAURIER. I say certainly, that in a case of that nature it is unprecedented that a single counsel should have had charge of it. That is what I say now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And now the charge is not that he was a junior counsel, but that he was a single counsel. Sir, it was not a single counsel that was employed. The member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) who sits near the leader of the Opposition was in this case, and if he consults him he will find that Mr. Sharpe was assisted by two eminent counsel of the Bar of Montreal.

Mr. TARTE. Not before the magistrate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They argued the case before the magistrate, and I am surprised that the interruption should come from the hon. gentleman from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). Was the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) following this case very closely in the court?

Mr. TARTE. Pretty closely.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, I have in my hand the report of the case, and the report of the argument of Mr. Bissaillon before Mr. Desnoyers, the magistrate. I say that if the hon, gentlemen opposite had exercised common decency either to the Government or to these gentlemen of the Bar before they criticised the conduct of that case, and before they dragged that case into this discussion to prejudice the position of the Minister of Railways, they would have obtained the notes of the evidence, and the notes of the argument of counsel which were taken. I do not hesitate to say that the evidence, and consideration of the Grand Jury at the then

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

I have read it, reflects upon Mr. Sharpe the greatest possible credit. I do not believe that the case against Mr. St. Louis could possibly be put stronger than it was put by Mr. Sharpe, assisted by Mr. Bissaillon and Mr. Hall, two Queen's Counsels. have the evidence, the House is welcome to it, and there is no attempt on that side of the House, nor on this, to show that these men bungled that case in one single particular. The hon, leader of the Opposition himself, not many days ago, agreed with me that the magistrate was the man who had blundered, not the counsel for the Crown. He will not defend the judgment. and no man in this House has yet ventured to defend, or to agree with the opinion of Mr. Desnoyers, even on the case presented in the decision of Mr. Desnoyers himself. The Bar has universally condemned that judgment as unsound. The facts which the magistrate recites as proved before him afforded no justification for the conclusion. and that being so, I think it would be better if the leader of the Opposition had remained in the blissful ignorance, or confessed that he was still in the blissful ignorance that he was, on June 6th last, when he said that he did not know who were the prosecuting counsel. Now, this is June 19th, and the hon, gentleman (Mr. Laurier) spoke on June 18th. From whom did he obtain the information. I would like to know, that we had only one counsel, and that a junior member of the Bar. Did he obtain it from the hon, member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion)? I challenge him to obtain the slightest confirmation of the statement which in any way reproaches the Government for the manner in which this case was followed up. Let us be fair. read the papers. We may not believe all of them, but what do they all say in the district in which the prosecution took place? Do they say that it was a namby-pamby prosecution, or that it was a fraud, or that it was not pushed or pressed? No: on the contrary, they state, and it is felt by many, and it has been stated even in this debate, that the Government prosecuted Mr. St. Louis. An attempt has been made to create sympthy for the accused, and the attempt has largely come from the ranks of hon, gentlemen opposite, and yet, in this debate, and in the city of Ottawa, we are told now, that we were not in earnest, and that we did not press the prosecution. Sir. as I say, no man has given facts upon which that statement can be founded. No man who makes that statement can have followed the steps that were taken by the Crown, both before Mr. Desnoyers, and when Mr. Desnoyers failed to deliver the judgment which the Crown thought should have been delivered by them, under the laws of the country, and with the assent of this Parliament, and as promtly as it was permitted them to do so, bringing that case under the next assizes in the city of Montreal. But counts; and, forsooth, I was acting, as I all this has been brought into the debate. thought at the time, and as I believe now, The conduct of the Department of Justice as I had a right to act, in probing these has been impeached. For what purpose, matters to the bottom, just as the various and how was it relevant? If there was a members of the British Parliament, whether strong case against the Minister of Railways and Canals, why travel outside that amendment, which points with malignity-I might say if it were in order—which points at any rate in the most direct manner to the Minister of Railways and Canals. Members on the other side of the House seem impatient in this debate to get to sence of checks to protect the British treathat feature of the discussion. They pass sury; and yet you will go through "Hanin the most hurried manner over all questions of Government responsibility, all questions of crime of civil servants, and all questions as to how the Government has dealt with either negligent or criminal servants. They hurry over all that. Indeed, they hurry over the question or policy that is involved in the letting of the contract. They do not ask the decision of the House directly and squarely upon the policy of the Government, for it was the policy of the Government that that work should be let in the way it has been explained to have been let. That is not referred to in this resolution. It is drawn in like a hundred other things to bias and to prejudice the members of the House. Neither do the members of the Opposition refer in this case to whether the Government has done concerned. I do not necessarily do so. It all that it should have done in regard to the parties directly concerned with this loss of public money. Let me give an illustration which will be a homely one to this We have discussed several times the question of the administration of the fishery bounties, which refers to a department I once presided over. Hon. gentlemen have said that by means of a bad system, and that means of lax administration, gross frauds were perpetrated upon the Government, and I have admitted, time and again, that bounty money has been stolen, that gross frauds were perpetrated, and that, in some particulars, the machinery for the administration of the bounties needed repairing and improving. Has the House, does it intend, has it yet impeached me? Does it intend to follow up that subject, for, if, on the statement of facts put forward in this debate by hon, gentlemen opposite, the Minister of Railways is to be impeached because money has been stolen in connection with his department, because the checks in connection with the administration were not perfect, and cause of other incidents: then certainly must go into the dock with him; and yet my crimes preceded his; my supposed defects and shortcomings were all before his. Why single him out? There has been no beating about the bush in regard to the case of either of us. The facts have been brought out, as the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said, many of them by myself in the Committee of Public Ac-

Conservative or Liberal, probed the departmental scandals of 1883 and subsequent years in England. You will find volume after volume-I have three of them at my feetcontaining evidence of gross fraud, evidence of departments overreached, evidence of officers negligent, and evidence of the absury; and yet you will go through "Hansard" from 1883 down to this date in vain to find a resolution of this character, aimed at the political head of any of the departments concerned, or any speeches designed to fasten upon him responsibility for crime. outrageous crime, that is admitted by every member of Parliament. Our whole trouble to-day is that, rightly or wrongly, with all the case that could be made by the officers of the Crown, we have not been able to bring the guilty parties to justice-that, in the face of what we believed to be the clearest of evidence of crime, we have not been able to put the man against whom we believed the evidence was the strongest, even on his trial. And when I say that. some have suggested that I asperse the administration of the province or the district is possible for us all to do so. It is possible that if we met with an experience of that kind once or twice or thrice, we might seriously consider whether there were any other steps that could or should be taken. But nevertheless, the fact of the whole matter is that, because we have no criminal in the dock, because we cannot go on further with all these details in a court of law, hon. gentlemen are driven back to attack the Government of the day and to ascribe to the Government and its members, particularly the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, a fell plot that this crime should be perpetrated so that contributions should come to the pockets of candidates of the Conservative party. And to exhibit the utter lack of candour and the utter absence of fair-play on the part of hon, gentlemen opposite. I will allude to a statement made over and over again by hon. gentlemen who ought to have known better-and some I believe must have known better. They referred to the evidence that Mr. St. Louis gave in regard to his books and the reason they were destroyed-lest they should commit or implicate some members of the Conservative party; and much of the case against the Minister of Railways and Canals has been built up upon that foundation. If these hon, gentlemen had taken the course which should have been taken before this debate was sprung upon us, if they had asked for the evidence given before the Exchequer Court and before the magistrate, they would have found that Mr. St. Louis 3035 gave three explanations why he destroyed his books, all of them inconsistent, all of them contradictory, and only one of them, that the one given before the Public Accounts Committee, of the nature they have referred to. One reason, for instance, that it was his invariable custom to destroy his books in connection with a particular transaction after that transaction was over, has not been referred to. Neither was the other reason which was given in the Exchequer Court. I mention that only to show, if it be proper to say so, the political venom that lurks beneath some of the suggestions that have been made in order to implicate the Government in what all admit to be crime. Take the criticism of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and the evidence given by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in regard to these details. What do they relate to? They relate to fraud, to trickery, to deception, to stuffed pay-lists, to all kinds of false pretenses; and if the case stood there, that the Government, knowing of that, had done nothing, the case would be grave indeed against this Government or any Government. But what information, I ask again, has any hon, gentleman in this House on which to base a case against the Government? Do they pretend that they can make one solitary elector in any part of Canada believe that under a Liberal Government or under a Conservative Government. under the present Government of thirteen or fifteen men, you could guarantee the people of this country against fraud and iniquity on the part of men employed by the Government? Such a proposition has not been made, and I submit that such a proposition must be made and must be sustained before the House can support the resolution now in your hands. This attempt to fasten upon the Government with a jump the responsibility for admitted fraud, can-not succeed under these circumstances. You must lay your ground better. Any hon. gentleman who wishes to follow this matter up must put in the hands of this House further evidence than lies on this Table in order to convict the Government or any member of the Government of wrong-doing. Follow up that trial; follow up the evidence; give it a fair discussion; and if you find that the Government, after it has had the opportunity to inform Parliament of what it has done and the reasons for its conduct, has not gone far enough, has not punished severely enough or prosecuted vigorously enough, frame your resolution on these lines, and then this or any other Government under similar circumstances will have a fair cousideration, a fair trial, and must stand or fall according to the merits. But I press again that there has not been fair-play adopted in this case—that prejudice has been imported from every quarter in order to make the case, which was discussed admittedly lamely by hon, gentlemen opposite last session, a little stronger this session.

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

Now, I have referred to the manner in which the hon, gentleman who has charge of this resolution undertook to present it to the House. Nothing in my judgment could have been more unfair than for him to have put such a resolution before the House after the line of examination adopted by him in the committee. He has stated that we are responsible. He is charging us with the responsibility of men whose responsibility we may either adopt under the constitution under which we live or whom we may punish and for whom we may no longer stand responsible. In the committee, in 1894, this was his idea of the case; he is examining one of the witnesses, I think, Mr. Parent, and he asks:

Q. You had a large number of men under your control; in a certain sense you were responsible.—A. Yes.
Q. Owing to indifference or negligence of some of those men the country was robbed of $200,000?—A. The work cost more than it should

I put it to any hon, gentleman, lawyer or layman, as to the idea that induced the hon. gentleman to put that question. The responsibility, and I think correctly then, was put upon certain specified men. There is a certain staff with certain duties, and you may look in Todd and Bourinot or any authors on this subject. and you search in vain to find that any government, under the British constitution, has ever been held responsible upon evidence of that kind. Mr. Desnoyers, the magistrate who. forsooth, was referred to in this case, though his judgment has not been approved of by hon, gentlemen opposite who have spoken, was referred to as a prop for their case, and may therefore be quoted by me with regard to the result of the evidence. When the case was argued before him, this conversation occurred. Judge Desnoyers said:

There is no doubt in the record that there has been a big steal committed somewhere in the name of Mr. St. Louis, and I would like to see where I am to find conclusive evidence. was to his benefit and particularly to his knowledge that such was done.

By Mr. Sharpe, of Counsel for the Crown-I understand from Your Honour's opening remarks on the question of there having been a robbery against the Government, the record has satisfied you that such is the case.

Mark, if you please, the result of this evidence put in proper form, not the higgledy piggledy collection of testimony contained in that book, one haif of which, I venture to say, would never be received in any court of law in Christendom, but evidence sifted and put in proper form before the magistrate on whom the hon member for Queen's leaned when he comes to prefer his indictment against the Minister of Railways. Sharpe said he understood then that he considered that a fraud had been committed upon the Government, and the court replied:

that, that there has been stealing going on." hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) who under the same system as testified to by has this resolution in charge, made in 1894. Mr. Schreiber. Where was of a contract. They say not a word against there theft committed? Under the eyes of Mr. Trudeau, whose standing and integrity the department? In the department? The whole thing real, whether that system has not obtained occurred on the work under men whose in the construction of private works or character had never been impeached in this works of corporations. I am told that it was; Parliament or anywhere else, who had but without searching for evidence of any served the Government, most of them, kind from these scientific men, these experts, almost for a lifetime, who were in every men of every other profession than engineer-respect to be relied upon by the Minister ing, hasten to give their opinion now that that as they were by his predecessors. And now was not one of the works in relation to because this has occurred we have a number which the opinion of the officers and advisers of very wise men-there are always such to of the Crown should have been followed. be found—who have very little experience, And, if the Government were to fall on that judging by their own statements, in ground, if the Minister were to lose his managing men saying that there were not standing on that ground, what would be proper checks. What checks have been sugther position of Minister after Minister in gested? Was it suggested by any one that the Imperial Government? How about the Deputy Minister, the chief engineer of railways and canals, whose character cannot? be attacked under a motion of this kind, framed as it is, should have taken up his abode at Montreal, or that the Minister of Railways should have left this Parliament and given personal supervision to the work. No. and what I complain of is that not a member opposite has been fair enough to say that, under ordinary circumstances, he would not himself have done differently. The hon, member for York states it is a very simple job, a very ordinary $176,000 transaction. Well, the Minister did what every Minister since 1887 has done. He relied on his officers whom he thought competent in connection with these works. The of the Opposition, for a moment, thought this was a very simple thing tooso simple that he began to give a construction to a statute which had never before been given to it. He said it was so simple a job that there was no reason for it to come within the exception of the statute which prescribes the powers of the Minof Railways in the construction public works. The leader of the Opposition referred to section 11 of the Act relating to railways and canals, which provides:

That the Minister shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of all works, except in cases of emergency, in which an appeal would be injurious to the public interest, or in which, from the nature of the work, it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the Minister.

"Yes. I think there can be no doubt about Where was the hon, gentleman when the works on this canal were carried on previous Now, then we start with a statement of the to the construction of the Wellington bridge still this system. And I would appeal to memthe Ministers who are responsible for the construction of ships that, after having been built, are almost as speedily condemned? How about Ministers responsible for supplying the army with bayonets that will not stand the slightest use? How about Ministers whose departments have been investigated time and time again in reference to other matters, and who have sheltered themselves, and sheltered themselves properly, behind the advice of experts, I have heard one of the late leaders of this Government state without quarrel in this House and without any difference of opinion being expressed-I refer to the late Sir John Macdonald-that in reference to matters pertaining to engineering, he went by the advice of the engineer. The hon, leader of the Opposition blows hot and cold in this matter. He wants to indict the Minister cf Railways one year for departing from the advice of his engineer: he wants to indict him the next year for following that advice. That is another evidence of the desire, the intemperate desire, of these l.on. gentlemen to snap a verdict from the country on this matter while not putting the whole case before them. If there was a member of this House-I was not here in his time, but I have read something of the discussions during the time ne was a member-who stood by his engineer and was not ashamed to shelter himself behind his engineer's opinion, it was the late Prime Minister of the Reform Government. Mr. Page, the engineer in that department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And he was attacked for it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon, gentleman agree that he should have been attacked? The hon, gentleman knows that he resisted that, and now he would like to take a different position.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But your argument—

HIBBERT TUPPER. CHARLES Sir That is only one part of my argumentto show how inconsistent these gentlemen are. But God forbid that it should be my only argument in a case of this kind. Now, to show, again, how this case was pressed and unfairly pressed by the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies), I would remind the House that that hon, gentleman referred to the date of 14th March as the time when the extension of the contract took place in favour of Mr. St. Louis, and he said that the fictitious pay-sheets were known about that time. That was a slip of the tongue, but what an important slip of the tongue. I could not believe that the hon, member for Queen's would intentionally make that statement. The hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) who is in his seat, and who followed this evidence closely, knows that that statement is not correct. March 14th is the beginning of the critical And we have Mr. Schreiber's evidence that the first time that he smelt fraud was on 10th May

Mr. McCARTHY. 10th May?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. HIBBERT Yes, I gave the page last night. Mr. Schrei-He called an ber suspected extravagance. officer in whose integrity he had confidence. in whose integrity he had no reason to doubt, to investigate the matter, and, after that, visited the work. I do not propose in this debate to deal with any question not before us. I hold myself free to come to any conclusion as to the chief engineer, or any man under him. I hope I made clear to the House when I began to criticise this resolution. I am dealing with this attack upon the Minister of Railways, pure and simple. I want to show how unfairly the hon, member for Queen's pressed the case against the Government-or against the Minister of Railways, it is the same thingwhen he referred to these fictitious paysheets, and indicated that they were known at so early a period. The hon, member for North York went through the report of the commission to-night paragraph by paragraph and he knows that there was no evidence on which even a commission could come to a conclusion that these fictiveus of Mr. St. Louis it has been one of the most difficult things to establish to the satisfaction of the court. Indeed, from the result in the court we can infer that it was not satisfactorily established. Now. Mr. Speaker, the statement was dwelt upon by the hon, member for Queen's that no one was left to keep check upon these men. No reliable man, if you like; no man who proved worthy of his trust, if you like, but there is not a tittle of evidence that a single man was put there because there was a suspicion that he would connive at wrong-loing or irregularity—not a single one. Up to the moment when these men were left in charge of the works on the canal, there was not a single particle of evidence to show that the Minister should have been on his guard lest these men should prove dishonest. There was a staff, an ample staff. Why, if there had been more there would nave been a howl on the Opposition benches at the gross extravagance of this Government in putting so many men on this work. There was Mr. Parent, a man of twenty years' experience as an engineer; there was Mr. Papineau, a man of high class, and other officers of the department. They were all certified to by the chief engineer as fit for the work. And are you going to drag Ministers down to this, that we are to try every statement that an engineer makes; are you going to hold us responsible for every officer you place at our command? Or, on the other hand, shall we not be given the privilege of believing these men when we have no reason to distrust them, of believing these heads of departments who are put there to assist and advise us in regard to these A more monstrous proposition could not be imagined than that we are to doubt the representations of, say a man like Mr. Schreiber, as to whether there were enough and proper men in charge of a work of this kind.

Mr. MULOCK. What is a Minister for? Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A Minister is for other purposes than that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir CHARLES Hon, gentlemen opposite are hilarious at They have extraordinary opinions of their own, and when they ask a question, they seem prepared, in a most extraordinary manner, to express derision before an answer is given. I say that a Minister of the Crown is warranted in believing every officer in responsible position in his department, in acting upon his advice if the subject be a technical one, in accepting his statements if they be made officially; and where the Minister's responsibility comes in is whether on that advice, and on those statements he exercises a wise discretion. and where he finds that advice false or the statements untrue, whether he still retains that officer, whether he again seeks that engineer calls upon him and tells him of officer's advice and continues him in his place. This is not the point that has been alleged.

| This is not the point that has been alleged. | Solution of the men—at least that is my recollection. |

Will the Minister allow Mr. MULOCK. me to put a question to him? On the 12th March, 1893, Mr. Schreiber interviewed Mr. Parent, and he reported the interview to Mr. Douglas. There was a conflict of testimony between Mr. Douglas and Mr. Parent as to the alleged extravagance. Mr. Douglas had reported to the Minister and to the deputy the fact of the extravagance. Mr. Schreiber knew this conflict, and deemed it his duty to consult Mr. Douglas again, and he came to the conclusion that Mr. Douglas's report as to the wild character of the work, was not exaggerated. He discredited Mr. Parent and he credited Mr. Douglas. Now, does the Minister say that in view of the Deputy Minister having come to the conclusion that Mr. Douglas's report was correct, the Minister was not obliged to act upon

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir The hon, gentleman hardly does himself justice. I recollect he made that point in his speech, and he repeated the same argument that the hon. member for Queen's has mentioned. But the hon, gentleman has paid me a poor compliment if he did not listen to me when I went into that inquiry to-night, and when, in opening my argument, I approached this question entirely apart from the question of whether the conduct of the chief engineer was reproachable or irreproachable. I did say that his integrity of character and his ability as an engineer, had not been impeached in the debate. That was creditable to him. I believe I am warranted in saying that he is a gentleman for whom the Auditor General has a high regard, and many hon. gentlemen in this House will agree with me that there is no more painstaking officer in the service of the Government. Now on these grounds that officer's character has not been put in issue in this debate. I have approached this question perfectly free to have one opinion or another about the different officers; but I say that before this House can sit in judgment upon us as to how we have dealt with A, B, C, D, and others, they must in fairness ask us to give them information in due form, instead of in this irregular manner across the floor of the House. But in regard to the department to which the hon, gentleman refers, this is Mr. Schreiber's explanation, which has not been given to the House. The hon. member for Queen's referred to the "Star" article. It was shown later on in the debate that he had not fairly represented the "Star." There had not been this charge of gross extravagance, but a reference had been made to the extraordinary number of men on the works. Now, this is all the Minister of Railways knows about it, this is all he was bound to know about it. His chief these rumours, and tells him that, having called up Mr. Parent, he has dismissed some 500 of the men-at least that is my recollection of the evidence; and sitting at his desk at that time, clothed with all the responsibility you can fairly put upon him, is there any hon, gentleman who thinks he should have done differently? Is there any hon, gentleman who thinks he should have said to his chief engineer: I do not think you are capable of looking into this matter, I do not think you or Mr. Parent are capable of informing me on this subject, and I must go down to Montreal myself? As we know the facts, and as they have come out in committee, and as it has suggested itself to a great many of its members, it would have been a grand thing if we could have all gone down to Montreal and taken the pay-lists and compared them, and have checked the whole thing over. But I say there is no company, there is no corporation in Canada, there is no Government on the face of the earth, that pursues such a system, and they never will, otherwise they would not be able to carry on their business. It is absolutely and physically impossible. And how about the staff? Would the member for North York be surprised if I told him where the misplaced confidence was put? That staff at Montreal, I am told, consisted of these old officials and others, every man Jack of them a Liberal to his backbone. Only one solitary Tory was found amongst these men, and I am told that man was removed.

Mr. MULOCK. Who was the Tory you removed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, you have told us that Mr. Desbarats was removed from the works.

Mr. MULOCK. You say you removed Mr. Desbarats?

CHARLES HIBBERT Sir TUPPER. You said "dismissed," and again you press the case unfairly against the Government. It has been alleged that we took Mr. Desbarats, and because he was an honest and intelligent man, we dismissed him from the works in order that fraud could run riot. Why was the hon, gentleman not candid enough to give us Mr. Schreiber's explanations on oath, that Mr. Desbarats was removed because he was not required on these works? Why were hon, gentlemen not candid enough to tell us that if he had remainedhe could not have helped us in the least? Why did they not give his evidence from his own mouth where he tells us that as regards the stuffing of the pay-lists, they did not come in his line at all? But that is where the great fraud occurred, as hon. gen-The hon. member for tlemea all know. Queen's says that the question now is: How far are the Ministry responsible? I have already said that so far as this House is aware, so far as the information goes, every pledge made by the Minister of Railways last session has been fulfilled. Not a statement has been challenged. No one has asked. who had been dismissed, who the men were who have been punished for the undoubted frauds and wrongs committed. Now, the leader of the Opposition contended that it was the business of the Ministry to know all that was going on at the works. Well, Sir, I contradict that statement as a matter of principle. I do not propose to let the House believe that I am cognizant, or ever will be cognizant, of every thing that is going on in my department. I am at the mercy to-day of probably hundreds of men hon, gentleman forgets it. in reference to the expenditure of every dollar that has been voted to my department. I do not propose to admit that it is my duty to go and inspect everything that is done. If I had opportunity, it would be a pleasure to be in a position to say that I had gone, and seen, and I know. But that is not a duty that I have to discharge, or that the country expects me to discharge. They put at my disposition, as they put at the disposition of the Minister of Railways, able, and expert, and technical officials. Those officials are charged with certain duties, the Minister directs the policy, and if misconduct occurs he is bound to take the responsibility of either approving or reproving the conduct of that official. An official's conduct should not come before the House directly, but it comes through the channel of the Minister. Now, I was surprised at the leader of the Opposition, who has achieved a reputation in this country not altogether discreditable to a public man, having gone out of his way to utter what I do not hesitate to term a most unfair slander against the reputation of the late leader of this Government, Thompson, I propose to give Thompson's words as an an-Sir John Thompson. Sir John the calumny. I suppose swer to best period of the hon, gentleman's speech on the Wellington bridge was with reference to the case of the release of the prisoners from custody, and as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is in his seat he will appreciate the reference I will make to "Hansard" of last year. The leader of the Opposition was sufficiently unfair to insinuate that Mr. St. Louis, if convicted, would have to be released, so it was easier to release him before his conviction; and he referred to a case which not only particularly affects the late Prime Minister, but which, as the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knows, particularly affects the Governor General in the most direct manner possible, for if there is any way in which His Excellency has power of an absolute character in this country that subject relates to the prerogative of mercy. There are two gentlemen in this city Dr. Church and Dr. Wright—no member on the Opposition side of the House has ever ventured to asperse their character-and if their statements be true, because on those statements Sir John

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

Thompson acted, his action was the only action that could be taken on the line of the precedents in this country since we had responsible Government and on the line of precedents that obtain in England. I well remember how the hon, member for York was sat upon by the late leader of the Government. I remember that not only such was the case, but on this subject his lips have been sealed ever since.

Mr. MULOCK. You do not know anything of the kind.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The

Mr. MULOCK. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. will give the hon, gentleman the words of the well deserved rebuke and snubbing he received from the late leader of the Government.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen may jeer as much as they like, but another subject, just as irrelevant as this is to the subject under discussion, after Sir John Thompson had sat down, the hon, member for York used bold words, so bold and so absolutely without warrant that I am not surprised to find that to-night he is oblivious of the fact he ever uttered them. He stated in regard to the First Minister:

He chose to go outside of this motion, for what reason I do not know, to say he was not ashamed of anything connected with the criminal prosecution or anything that followed it. Well. I am ashamed of what followed, and I think the time has come when the hon. Minister should explain what followed and why he gave the advice to His Excellency which led to the prostitution of the administration of justice in this country. I may say with regard to his action in that matter, that his predecessor, the late Sir John Macdonald, whose political actions did not always commend themselves to my judgment, during his long career in public life, never once was known to have disregarded the purity of the bench or to have done anything to interfere with the administration of justice.

and later on—this is the promise which he has never fulfilled:

I will continue to bring it up until he justifies his action or stands convicted before the country of having prostituted justice.

The hon, member praises Sir John Macdonald in the lifetime of Sir John Thompson. He would now praise Sir John Thompson, who is dead and gone, in the life time of the leader of the present Government. But Sir John Thompson was alive and he made a statement which sealed that hon, gentleman's lips from that time to this.

Mr. MULOCK. It did nothing of the kind. Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then it ought to have sealed them. It ought also to have sealed the lips of the leader of the Opposition, because a more unfair and unwarranted statement was never made. in my opinion, than that made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. That is your opinion, it is not the country's opinion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir John Thompson said:

Let me make a very short statement in answer to the irrelevant and abusive attack of the hon, gentleman. I have only to state, without going into details, that he has made this attack by insinuations time and time again, and has not been man enough to challenge my conduct in that matter on any occasion when I had an opportunity of answering him in this House. But he is that description of man who can make these dirty insinuations at the close of a long debate on an entirely different question. I have only to say to him-

I call the attention of the House to these words, for every hon, member is aware that on the subject to which I refer the late leader of the Government was an authority accepted the country over:

-that he can search the records of my department, whether under Sir John Macdonald or his predecessors or successors, and he will find in no case has an application for elemency been refused, under the representations that were made and put on the Table of this House in the case of Messrs. Connolly and McGreevy.

That was his statement, and it is one of great importance and significance. It was a challenge to a debate, but the session was allowed to pass.

Mr. MULOCK. It was at the close of the session.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir John Thompson died, and sixty days of this session have elapsed before any one has had the audacity to arise and by implication besmirch the character of that statesman in the most atrocious manner it could possibly be done, because if there is a word of truth in the statement that came from the lips of the leader of the Opposition, nothing worse can be said of a public man than that he made political abuse of the prerogative of mercy. And that distinguished statesman in his lifetime made this challenge to a fair, open and manly discussion, with the papers on the Table, and no hon, member rose to enter the lists with him and engage in a discussion.

Mr. MULOCK. On the last day of the session.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, on the last day of the session; but after his last words had been spoken and his lips were closed then an hon, gentleman manages to obtain sufficient courage to rise and make a charge which if true, reflects upon Sir John Thompson's character in the most Then the hon. serious manner possible.

this in passing, said that Mr. St. Louis escaped justice because others had assisted him to steal. That is his construction of Judge Desnoyers's decision and the finding of the grand jury; and I leave him to settle that question with the tribunal over which in that particular, we have at present no control. Then the hon, member for L'Islet, and I think he is the only hon, member in this House who would make the suggestion and insinuation, asked why Mr. St. Louis was prosecuted in Quebec; while we brought other offenders to the province of Ontario. I never heard that this question was ever asked by any one else, and I do not think the hon, gentleman will be able to quote any leading member of the House as favouring that suggestion. In the case to which he referred there was a prosecution ordered by this Parliament. In the other case there was a departmental prosecution pure and simple. That is one distinction, and I leave it to the judgment of the House whether the hou, member for L'Islet would not have been one of the first to harangue the electors if we had dared to bring a member of his race to the province of Ontario to try him on that charge.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh. oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. am not surprised that hon, gentlemen should give vent to derisive cheers. The thing is almost too ridiculous to criticise, and I would not have made the remarks if the hon. member for L'Islet had not made the suggestion. Now, Mr. Speaker, 1 see the hour is advancing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The debate has been long, and from the remarks that greeted that observation the debate has been too long, and too unprofitable. I believe, to many of the men who started it. I fancy that no man insinuates that I have been too long.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. Mr. Speaker, the taunt was made from the other side that we would not speak from the treasury benches. I have avoided as much as I possibly could—to the great detriment of the case of the Minister of Railways-reference to the evidence. But I do say, that this amendment, as it stands. cannot, in my opinion, be supported by any fair-minded man. I say that it is unfair to challenge the conduct of a Minister of the Crown in the absence of any evidence as to the steps that he has taken since he made his last important utterance in the Parliament of this country, which utterance was that he would deal with each and all of the individuals that were concerned in these serious crimes. Nothing but my desire to avoid wearying the House prevents me-it member for Winnipeg, and I only refer to is not necessary that I should do so-going into the steps that have been taken. When hon, gentlemen are seized of that information, which can be obtained in the usual way, then the questions that have been debated under this motion will be germane to the resolution, but at this stage of the debate I do not consider they relate to it in any way whatever.

Mr. Speaker, I trust, Mr. McCARTHY. Sir, that I should pay sufficient regard to the feelings of my fellow-members, and cerrainly I shall consult my own feelings better, if I fulfil the promise which I now make. that my observations shall be very brief, as brief as they possibly can be on so important a question as the one which is now under consideration. I do not like, on this oceasion, to give a silent vote. The charge is not one impugning the honour or integrity of a member of this House, although there has been an attempt on the part of the Minister himself whose conduct has been impugned, as well as on the part of the Minister of Justice to divert, as it were, the attention of members from the matter which we are now considering, and to make it rather appear as if the attack were of a If the charges were personal character. of a personal nature against the Minister of Railways and Canals he would not be sitting here now. After he made his explanation, according to our rules, he would have been compelled to withdraw from the House. The charge against him is with reference to the manner in which, according to the responsibility which is due to this House, he has fulfilled the duties pertaining to his im-Upon the main features of portant office. the history of this most unfortunate transaction, there is now practically no dispute. and if I summarize them briefly, it will be merely for the purpose of making plain to the House the argument I shall attempt to adduce based upon these facts. It will be remembered, Sir-perhaps we shall never forget it after this discussion, and after the different circumstances attending it—it will be remembered that it was in the first place proposed and suggested that the works in connection with these bridges should be done for a total sum of $170,000. that amount we may at once eliminate the cost of the superstructure as to which no difficulty has ever occurred, and as to which no complaint has ever been made. We have not merely to deduct that $73,000, but we have also to deduct a further sum of $15,-000, which was rendered unnecessary because of the arrangement subsequently made that the canal was to be unwatered. We therefore get a sum of $82,000 as the estimated cost of these works, to which I am called further to add-although, perhaps, the amount is liberal-the $40,000 for deepening the works, and enlarging them, which was estimated by the department, and by the different engineers who were examined before the two inquiries into this matter.

We have the estimated sum, therefore, of the cost of the operations of these works, about which the difficulty has been caused. To that—because I desire in this to be perfeetly fair-to that, the commission added a further amount, owing to difficulties that occurred during the progress of the work. I have read the evidence, and I have endeavoured to understand it so far as one can without hearing it, and I am not quite satisfied that the commissioners arrived at the proper conclusion in this addition which they made, but I am not going to occupy the time of this House at this period of the discussion with any criticism on that. The conclusion I have arrived at is not determined by questions of that kind, and will assume that the commissioners were right, and that this work might possibly have cost in the neighbour-hood of $200,000. I will pass by all these questions which have been debated on both sides, and to which the speech of the Minister of Justice has been mainly directed, and acquitting, so far as I am personally concerned and so far as it is necessary to consider here, the Minister or his department of any preconceived scheme to allow this robbery to take place, and treating the matter on the most favourable possible basis that it can be treated for the Minister, I will see to what conclusion any man, having regard to his responsibilities, must reach. Let me give the dates. In the first place, all these circumstances of suspicion were certainly not unreasonably urged in this House, because from the extraordinary incidents that occurred, no doubt, this steal from the public treasury was rendered possible. Take the matter to which the Minister tells us he demurred, that is, the hiring of skilled labour in the first place. We know perfectly well that if it had stopped there, Mr. St. Louis' ultimate transactions could not have obtained the magnitude which unfortunately for the country they did. But the Minister was weak enough afterwards, without any apparent reason, and against his better judgment, as he now tells us, to apply the contract for the hiring of skilled labour to labour of all classes and kinds, including ordinary days' labour. Undoubtedly this led very largely to the unfortunate transactions which has caused so much discussion in the country, and which is no doubt destined yet to attain considerable proportions before the people of this Dominion. Then, we pass from that, because after all it may be said, as I think I hear the Minister of Justice say, that that is but a small question or a nice question. It may or may not be so. Whenever the Ministers are pressed, I notice that they have a habit of falling back on their engineers; and whenever the Ministers do anything right, as, for instance, in the case of the Intercolonial Railway, we hear nothing at all of Mr. Pottinger or Mr. Schreiber or the officers of the department, but the credit goes to the Minister of Railways. So that it is always heads I win, tails you lose.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon, gentleman is referring to a conversation which I had with the Secretary of State, and which I intended to be private, I said that this question of what was skilled labour was considered a very nice one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would tell the hon. member for North Simcoe that each time the Minister of Railways has spoken of the Intercolonial Railway, he has given great credit to his engineers.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not going to be diverted at this hour of the night to any further statement in regard to that. probably all know what has occurred. While the Secretary of State may say that the Minister of Railways has given credit to his engineers. I do not think the Secretary of State will say that that has been his own practice, because he has blown the trumpet for the Minister of Railways on that account on every platform throughout the Dominion, without reference to any officers of the department. Now, Sir, at this hour of the morning, and after all the discussion that has taken place, I am going to deliberately avoid every criticism with reference to the conduct of the work. I can appreciate, and I hope I am fair enough to give sufficient weight to, the argument which has been urged that it is not perhaps possible or reasonable for a Minister to have minute charge of all the works of his department, and that it would be unfair and improper to hold the Minister of Railways responsible for what occurred on the works at Lachine, providing, of course, that upon the facts coming to his knowledge he took the course which as a Minister of the Crown he ought to have taken to relieve the country, as far as it was possible to relieve it, from the loss which had occurred. But, Sir, we arrive at the date when it seems to me it is impossible for the Minister to shield himself any longer or any further behind his engineers or the officers of his department; and, in order that that may be made clear to the House, let me give the accounts as they were presented at the time when the Minister himself admits that he became aware that great extravagance had been committed, namely, on the 24th or the 25th of April. Now, the Minister of Justice to my surprise stated that the Minister of Railways had no knowledge of any fraud until the 10th of When I heard that statement, I thought I must have misread the evidence very much indeed, as well as the argument put forward by the Minister of Railways himself when he practically conceded that on the 24th or 25th of April he had ample and complete knowledge of the fraud that was committed at Lachine by this man St. Louis. Upon that point there ought to be no dispute; and, as conclusive evidence, I give a letter written by the chief engineer of the department—though it is not by any means the first notice of what was going on at Montreal that had been brought to the Minister's attention; and let me ask if after that it can be pretended that the Minister of Railways had not adequate knowledge. I am not speaking merely of implied or imputed knowledge, but I am speaking of positive knowledge which the Minister had as to the cost of this work above the estimate, which was first $122,000, and which was afterwards swelled to $200,000, when this letter of the 25th of April was received by him:

Dear Mr. Haggart,—As I mentioned to you, I was not a little startled upon receiving from Mr. Parent the pay-rolls and accounts for the month of March in connection with the Wellington Street bridges, which summed up an enormous sum.

So that before the 25th of April the matter had been mentioned by the chief engineer, and mentioned to the Minister:

I at once despatched Mr. R. C. Douglas off to Montreal to look into the matter and ferret out all the information he could, and report to me the position of matters, the information he gives me is as follows:—

December, January and February pay-rolls, &c in round figures	$ 79,000
March
April	110,000
Contracts for superstructure	61,000
Less materials to be credited to this	$382,000 work, and to be debited to this work, and to be debited to other appropriations, say......

22,000

And this he considers the minimum figure that the work is likely to cost.

Against an estimated expenditure of $170,-000 and the $40,000, making altogether $210,-000, because in this sum the contract for superstructure was also included. He goes on:

Superintendent Kennedy attributed all to the causes mentioned by Parent, except the latter, of which he makes no mention. When the estimate made by Mr. Trudeau, the then chief engineer, and Mr. Parent, the superintending engineer, early in 1892, is considered. namely, $150,000 for 16 feet navigation, and $40,-000 additional if a depth of 20 feet of water was given, making in all $190,000, the excess of expenditure requires some explanation. Mr. Parent explains that the excess of expenditure is due to the large amount of ice which had to be cut up and carted away; to the frozen condition of the excavation, to the breaking away of the cofferdam on two occasions, to the solid frozen condition of the crib and other obstructions which had to be removed, and, as I understand him to say, to political interference. Superintendent Kennedy attributes it to all the causes named by Mr. Parent, excepting the latter, of which he makes I, however, am of the opinion that, no mention. whilst these causes may have contributed to an increased cost, that we must look for other reasons to account for the enormous expenditure over and above the estimate. Mr. Douglas is and endeavouring to keep the expenses down to reasonable proportions. In the meantime, a Governor General's warrant is required for $200,000. Now, I start with that point. I deliberately pass by all the other inquiries. I am not! concluding, I do not desire to conclude myit is well to leave these matters which are in controversy to one side and to come exactly to the question about which there can be no dispute. At that date, all that has been paid to the contractor was $14.717.45. That was the payment of the January and February pay-rolls, and it had been made in March. So that at the date we have now come to, the 24th or 25th April, there had been of this sum which the Government seem to boast has been stolen-and because stolen they think they are free from all responsibility—only the amount of $14,000 paid out, which, there is but little doubt. Mr. St. Louis was honestly entitled to receive. But in the face of this document, in the face of this notice, coupled with the other matters to which reference has been so repeatedly made, the Minister of Railways, on the 24th March ordered the payment-I do not say he signed the cheques. because he says he did not-but he permitgive to this contractor a sum, which was not paid until the 28th, of no less than $74,-777.43. On the 29th April, another cheque was signed but not actually handed over until 5th May for another sum of $9,000, making an amount of $83,777, a large portion of which was evidently obtained by false pretenses, deliberately and designed-ly paid over in the face of the statement made by Mr. Douglas that these works would cost nearly double the sum estimated by the engineers of the department. Referring to page 451, according to the exhibit which the Minister filed, and as to which there can be no dispute, the accounts for labour in March were as follows:— $73.013.13; $10,129.78; $7.263.64. These accounts had been received by the department on the 18th and 24th April, and had been examined on the 24th and 28th April. and certified to by the chief engineer on the 24th and 28th April. I may be told that the working out of a department, chief engineer, the head of the department, willing to admit that if the on the 24th and 28th, and you will observe: that some of the accounts which were paid by cheque dated the 24th do not appear to have been certified to until the 29th. But is that an excuse which we have any right to accept? I shall not, at the moment, do more than just make that observation, because what I say I can say in one sentence when I make the whole statement which I propose to lay before the House, and which has been so ably laid before it by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin).

now down in Montreal looking into the matter this letter was written on the 25th April. whatever doubt there might have been at that time ripened rapidly into conviction; and before the early days of May had gone by, the chief engineer and deputy of the department had become abundantly satisfied, from what he had heard from Mr. Dougself as accepting the argument put for- las and what he had seen and known, that ward by the Minister of Justice. But I think gross frauds had been perpetrated. There is no question as to that. I will not do more than refer here to the interviews between Mr. Schrieber and Mr. Douglas. which took place on the 24th April and the 10th May. Upon the 10th May Mr. Schrieber reported to the Minister that frauds had been committed, and that by reason of these frauds it was necessary there should be an investigation, and he recommended the appointment of a commission. In the face of these conclusive facts, as to which there is no dispute, passing by all the doubtful matters: admitting that the Minister was not wrong in letting the contract out by day work, admitting that he did not violate the act of Parliament, giving him the benefit of all that doubt-let us say it was not wrong to hire skilled labour. let us say it was equally justifiable to engage ordinary labour, let us say that those notices which were brought to him from time to time were not of any moment and ted his chief engineer and deputy head to not calculated to put him upon his guardwhat are we to say when, after the 10th of May, the department of which the Minister of Railways is at the head paid out public money to a man, respecting whose conduct they had issued a committee of inquiry to assertain whether he had stolen money or not. Let me give the dates. On the 8th May, by cheques on the 11th, $8.393.13 was paid; on the 27th May $66,000 was paid; on the 27th May by a letter— I do not see a cheque signed, put among the exhibits but the letter is here at p. 175-another $1,000 was paid; on the 6th June, $39,-000 was paid to this contractor, at the very time the Governor in Council had issued a commission of inquiry on the ground that frauds had been committed. I confess I cannot imagine a case stronger I fully admit that a dethan that. head cannot be held partmental for all the details sponsible the Minister certified to the correctness of these accounts of Railways and Canals puts in charge of these works competent and proper men to see to the performance of contracts he does all that in him lies so far as that goes. But, Sir, where it has been ascertained by his own departmental deputy that frauds have been committed, he takes again responsibility when he authorizes the payment of the money. Because the only fraud up to that time was in the demand that was being made. Why, Sir, I do not wonder at the police magistrate of Montreal after all this prosecution, after listening to the eviknow now that after the 24th April, after dence coming to the conclusion that it was impossible to hold this man guilty of having. Did he take the slightest means to protect obtained money under false pretenses. What is the money he was alleged to have obtained under false pretenses? The $8,000, the $66,000, the $7,000, the $39,000 paid by the Minister of Railways, paid certainly before he had the report from his commission, but after he knew of such irregularities that he actually caused a commission to be issued to prove and establish the facts. If I understood the Minister of Justice, and if I took down his language correctly, he says that the important point upon which. hangs the responsibility of the Government, is what has been their conduct after the facts had been brought to their knowledge; I: agree with the hon. Minister: I think that lity which, as I understand, rests upon Minis a fair statement of the responsibility, and I am quite willing, for my part, to deal with Sir, according to the constitution we have them on that ground. Sir, can there be any nothing to do with the officers of the departquestion about it? I believe the fact isand I want to state it though it makes no. difference, as I think I shall be able to show from a constitutional point of view-that some of these payments, I do not know how many, were made upon the authority of the acting Minister, the present Prime Minister. But I do not suppose the Minister of Railways wants to shirk his responsibility by saying that the misconduct was that of Certainly, according his present chief. to every rule and principle governing the relation of Ministers to their parliamentary head, he was bound, on resuming the duties of his office to accept responsibility for all that had been done in the interim by the acting Minister. But, Sir, I have not stated the whole gravamen yet. Why, Sir, these accounts when they were paid actually had not been authorized by the Deputy Minister or even checked over. So we have the fact that the Minister of Railways as to part, and the Prime Minister as to the balance were paying out the moneys of the country for accounts that were not checked by the proper officers, and in the face of the information we have all heard about and because of which they thought it necessary to ask for an inquiry. Sir, I am not going to occupy time with a further statement of the argument. If upon this simple statement of undoubted and undisputed facts I am doing wrong in voting for the motion in amendment now in your hands, I must accept the responsibility. To my mind it would be impossible for any man who understands the facts and who understands the responsibilities which the Minister bears to the representatives of the people, whose money has been stolen, to do otherwise than record condemnation of the Minister's action in this matter. I impute nothing to him personally, but I ask him what steps did he take, when he handed over his department to the charge of the Prime Minister, warning him not to make these payments. What did he do when he knew that this man was demanding and clamouring for his money and the Minister himself was going on a summer jaunt?

the treasury by leaving instructions that no money was to be paid out until this matter had been investigated? There is no evidence that he did anything, that he took the slightest precaution. The hon. Minister followed this case through the Public Accounts Committee at every step, urging everything that could be urged in defence of himself and his department; but, from first to last, he has not pretended that in any sense he sought to protect the public treasury in respect of the payments made during his absence, for which he is responsible on every ground. part, I put the question upon these grounds, and I draw attention now to the responsibiisters of the Crown, and upon them alone. ments; we have no right to censure them. The gentleman responsible to us is the political head, and he is bound to keep his de-I do not mean to say partment in order. that if he shows that he has been circumvented, and that he has done all that a reasonable man could do, upon the knowledge being brought to him in order to save the public treasury from spoliation, I do mean to say that under these circumstances he should be held responsible. But what I do mean to say is that we are bound to call him to account, and upon him rests the responsibility of establishing to the satisfaction of this House and of Parliament that he has taken proper means to prevent such robbery as took place in this instance. seems almost too ridiculous, after this man has been used for false pretenses and the law has been appealed to to recover the money paid over, that it should be clear that the money was paid with a knowledge of the facts. It may be that the Crown cannot be bound in such matters by the action of its officers, but if this were the case of a private party, it would be a hopeless thing to attempt to recover money paid out under such circumstances as in the case of this money paid to the contractor, much less would the party receiving it be held guilty as a criminal in the courts of the country. there seems to be some doubt as to this question of responsibility. Let me give the House a recognized authority as to the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament for the conduct of the officials of their department. In the work of the late Mr. Todd, vol. 1. page 628, he says:

As a necessary consequence of the division of the Civil Service into political and non-political officers, and of the acknowledged supremacy of the members of the Administration over all the subordinate officers, it is required by your parliamentary system, that every branch of the public service should be represented, either directly or indirectly, in the Houses of Parliament. This duty is performed by the political heads, who are themselves solely responsible for every act of administration, down to the minutest details of official routine. Having entire control over the public departments, they are bound to assume responsibility for every official act, and not to permit blame to be imputed to any subordinate for the manner in which the business of the country is transacted, except only in eases of personal misconduct, for which the political chiefs have the remedy in their own hands.

and the supplementary of the s

HIBBERT TUPPER. CHARLES Sir Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to find that that meets with the approval of the Minister of Justice. Nobody can deny that that is the proper constitutional rule. Now, Sir, I am not holding the Minister of Railways responsible for the wrongful acts of Mr. Kennedy, or Mr. Parent, but I am holding him responsible for the acts of Mr. Schreiber, done upon these different dates, when this money was paid out; because there is no pretense that these payments were not made under and by authority of the Minister directly. ard with his knowledge, and there is no pretense that Mr. Schreiber has been repudiated. The Minister of Justice argued that the department could either adopt or repudiate the acts of its subordinates, and until the department took that course, the Minister could not be held responsible. there is no pretense here that Mr. Schreiber, in making these payments, was not acting in accordance with the authority and instructions of his departmental head. Now, I refer again, upon the same point, to this work of Mr. Todd, at page 215 of the second volume, and I will draw attention to a discussion which took place in the House of Commons in England as to the impropriety of Parliament in any way interfering with departmental officers:

Recent administrative reforms, however, have all tended to reduce the proportion of the political element, by recognizing the supreme authority and responsibility of the parliamentary chief of each department; he must be held accountable for all the weakness or inefficiency of all his subordinates, and every member of the Ministry must share with him in their responsibility.

Having thus secured an adequate responsibility for the efficient administration of the whole public service, by means of the control which is exercised by Parliament over Cabinet Ministers, Parliament should carefully abstain from any direct interference with the subordinate officers of Government.

Then I read again from page 217:

But, under any circumstances, responsibility for the actions of subordinates should always be fixed upon their political heads. If Ministers find the (permanent) officers of the departments do not work well under them, then it is their duty to devise some remedy for this inconvenience; but the responsibility should not be divided; it should be imposed only on those that are able to respond for themselves in the House. And then an instance is given:

Thus in 1873 the Committee of Public Accounts reported unfavourably of the financial administration of the Post Office, and expressly disapproved of the proceedings of Mr. Scudamore, the second enormous cash balances on hand to a particular service, without the knowledge of the treasury, or the authority of Parliament. But in a debate in the House of Commons upon these transactions Mr. Gladstone observed that Mr. Scudamore's conduct might be very properly animadverted upon in a report of a committee, but that he was not a fit subject for the censure of the House.

These last words being Mr. Gladstone's:

It is the political officers of this House who stand between the permanent officers and its censure, and if the House is bound to take the utmost care to avoid the cardinal error of treating the permanent servants of the Post Office as proper objects of parliamentary censure.

Then we deal only with the head of the department, and we deal, so far as I am concerned, simply with the matter as to which, as I have said repeatedly, there is no controversy and no dispute. But, says the Minister of Justice, this matter was brought up last session and underwent a discussion; and he pleads now, though the plea is a novel one to me, that the promise of the Minister of Railways that he would prosecute all these offenders, was accepted by this House in satisfaction of the delinquency of the Minister himself. Well, it is an ingenious defence, but it is wanting in any authority; it stands alone upon the argument of the Minister himself. But I deny, that because, during the closing hours of last session when only 110 members were present, before the papers were fully printed. before it was possible to digest these accounts, this question was brought before the House, that the House is not now as free as it ever was to consider, and more deliberately, as we are doing now, and to determine, what we should do, and what we should say with regard to the political officer who is charged here with the offence. But, Sir, if I were to venture upon any criticism with regard to any subsequent ecnduct, which I do not think at all either adds to or takes from the offence which. in my judgment has been committed by the Minister, I should ask how it is that the party who stole in the early part of 1893, that was reported upon by this commission some time in the month of January, 1894, was never prosecuted until the month of October, 1894. Now, Sir, has there any excuse been given for that? All the facts had been collected by the commission. They needed no collecting, they needed no grouping, they were all in the department, and from the early part of 1893, in the month of May or June, when the money was paid. not a step is taken until the month of October in the following year, when, hounded on by public opinion, hounded on by the comments that were made, by myself among others, upon the extraordinary fact that no attempt had been made to prosecute this criminal, as I think we may call him, the department commenced a prosecution in the month of October, which terminates seven secretary of the department, in appropriating | months afterwards in the month of May.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. would mention this fact, that the commission | seems to know more about it than I do. did not suggest any evidence of crime.

THE PROPERTY OF THE CONTRACT O

Mr. McCARTHY. Then where did the evil have to do so. dence of crime come from?

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir Later on.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, all I can say is that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice takes a very charitable view of the case. If that commission did not show that there had been crime, then I do not know where or how you are going to find it.

Mr. MULOCK. Did not that commission suggest fictitious pay-lists?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Frigon, who was the first witness of crime. was not heard before the commission, but before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. It was the first direct evidence, if you like, but surely you do not wait to prosecute criminals until you get direct evidence, and if this man Frigon had never turned up and made a clean breast of it, surely it would not be pretended that no prosecution would have been commenced.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. think we ought to wait until we get evidence before we prosecute.

Mr. McCARTHY. All I can say is that I do not think that any subsequent conduct in the slightest degree removes the censure or makes in favour of the Minister himself. Now, Sir, I dislike very much to comment upon the conduct of the police magistrate of Montreal. I observe by the public press that the outspoken terms in which the police magistrate of Montreal was referred to here by a much more important member of this House than I am, the Minister of Justice himself, have met severe condemnation at the hands of the press and also the Bar of the city of Montreal. Now, I cannot pretend to say what the practice is in Montreal, but I think you will search all through the criminal practice in England, as well as in any other Englishspeaking community, to find a case which. on a preliminary inquiry, was dragged out to the length to which this inquiry was extended in Montreal. Why, I should have thought with proper management-and I am not desiring at all to reflect upon my fellowmembers of the profession who were engaged in the case, because, as I say, I do not know what their instructions were-but I do think with proper management that case could have been presented to the police magistrate in one or two sittings, and that in one or two sittings he ought to have been able to say whether a prima facie case was made out for trial.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. beg to say that you know very little about the case.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon, gentleman

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. McCARTHY. I never heard in all my experience, and it is a good deal longer and wider than that of the hon. gentleman, of such a case, and I challenge the hon. Minister to show when an investigation before a magistrate of a charge of obtaining money on false pretenses, was ever permitted to drag along such a length of time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman never conducted a case in Montreal before Judge Desnoyers. And I say this, that while my experience is not as great as that of the hon, gentleman, it does not enable me to furbish up a case where a magistrate ever allowed so many continuances and adjournments, against the wish of the Crown, as Judge Desnoyers allowed. The hon, gentleman will not charge the Crown with not pushing the case. W_{e} pushed the case, but the magistrate had control.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not charge the Crown or the Minister or those in charge of the prosecution with not pushing the case; I merely comment on the fact with which we must all be astonished. But this I say, that the case against the Minister has been enormously strengthened by the double fact, that the magistrate having heard the case argued at length, and not only listened to arguments but read factums, deliberately came to this conclusion that there was not even a prima facie case, although he was satisfied that the department and the country had been defrauded by this man St. Louis. And why? I suppose because the money was paid to him, as I have pointed out, with knowledge on the part of the officers of the department of the suspicious circumstances; because the money was paid to him deliberately. And not only did the magistrate stand justified in his own estimation and by his own reasoning, but the grand jury-and I suppose they were not affected with the same mania for listening to cases—were able to dispose of it in two days.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The witnesses would take two hours.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Minister probably thought that the grand jury would take six or seven months. The grand jury also decided that there was no ground for sending the man for trial. If the grand jury did not see a case made out for sending the man for trial if this money is gone, as it is, unless perchance it can be recovered by a civil suit now being brought-and certainly I should think that very doubtful if the Crown is not in a better position than a private individual would be when the money was duly paid with all knowledge of all the circumto do, what are we to say? Are we to say that there is no man responsible?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Allow me to say that the partner of the hon. gentleman speaking believes we will obtain the money in the civil suit. He is engaged by the Crown in obtaining it.

Mr. McCARTHY. differ from my partner as to whether the: money can be obtained or not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He knows the facts better than you do.

Mr. McCARTHY. I hope he will be a little more successful than the hon, gentleman's representatives have been in Montreal. only say this, and I do not hesitate to say it, that if it was not the Crown that was a party to the suit, for there are technical rules to the effect that the Crown shall not be prescribed by the dishonesty and negligence of its own servants in seeking to recover money. I venture to state, on the little reputation I have, that the money could not be recovered. If the Minister of Railways paid this money to St. Louis with knowledge and notice of the facts, if I know anything about the rules of law which govern the reways.

Surely the hon, gentleman can read the language of the statute and decide whether there is any I have no desire to ground under either of the clauses to do what he did in this case, and whether this was a work that could be done more expeditiously by days' labour than by contract.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The engineers thought so.

Mr. McCARTHY. They did not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They advised so.

Mr. McCARTHY. You will not find it in the record, or I stand corrected. The work could have been done just as expeditiously by contract. It plainly indicates what was the motive for revamping the old charge which was thrashed out during a former session, and with reference to which I wish to emphasize again the very strong. point made by my colleague (Sir Charles And sixty days have passed, and all the Hibbert Tupper) an old charge threshed out a year ago and with reference to which no nery of their investigations, and all the comnew information has been asked for, and no bined energy and vigour of their intellects new information is available before this put together, have been exerted in finding House. It is a charge upon which the Government and the Department of the Minister of Railways were put upon their defence the House these new charges which should last year, and after all the information and the arguments that could be based upon it were brought before the House,-than which we have to-day no further information—the House by a majority of more than two to one, exonerated the Government and repudiated the charge which was made against them. Now, Sir, the charge is brought up again, as I said, without additional evidence and without additional information having been asked for. I can quite well see how members of the Opposition would have a case to come before the House again in reference to this question, if they had enlarged it in the line of the statement made last year by the Minister of Railways; that as far as he and the Government were concerned, any officials of the Government, any officials in connection with this transaction who have been proved guilty of collusion, of fraud, or of conspiracy in order to have the money of the Government taken away from it wrongfully; that they should be punished, and that he would see that they were punished. If the Opposition had asked to know how far that pledge had been carried out, and had called for evidence with reference to it, and upon that evidence had based, and well based, a

But after sixty days have passed, and the session is in its dying hours, they are forced to go back to an exploded charge of years ago. Now, Sir, that is well worth taking into account, and I mention it for what it is worth, and it will be found to be worth something before this House and the country as well. There is something more. Let us take a reasonable view of the matter even on their own lines. Can you not distinguish, and ought you not distinguish between extravagance, and fraud and corruption? Ought you not, and must you not distinguish between negligence, and conspiracy in these matters? Take the charges as they have preferred them, and as they have pursued them, and up until this 27th day of May, that has been spoken of by my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy); although in this after light which investigations have thrown upon the whole matter it is easy to see that frauds have been committed and that mal-practice has taken place: yet. Sir, up to that 27th day of May, when these last large payments were made, I say that from the records of the officers of the department and from the knowledge of the Minister himself, and from all the sources of information that he had, there now, to put their hands continually behind was nothing to justify the Minister or them for the old, wornout armaments of the Government in supposing that frauds scandals upon which they seem to rely for were added to extravagance in the con-coercing the electorate. It is one thing to duct of that work in the city of Montreal. draw the electorate by the power of your It was well known at that period that expolicy; it is another thing to try to coerce travagance had marked the work; but it them by this line of canvass: "Oh, you was not well known, and there was no in- ought to turn out these men whose policy formation upon which either the depart-tyou believe in, because of the scandals, and ment or the Minister or the Government perforce, of necessity, put us in office." Let could go which would justify the charge hon, gentlemen get something that will which is brought to-day, that in the face of draw; let them get a positive policy that acknowledged and well-known frauds and will appeal to the electorate of Canada, and corruption, we yet made these payments, let them leave this policy of simply trying It is easy to see it a year after the time, to frighten and scare and drive the electors when these frauds have been exposed, and when this whole matter has been set before the country in the full light of day, and by whom, by what agency, Sir? Did the Minister wait until a charge was preferred in Parliament and a committee was asked for? Did he wait until he was forced to investigate the matter? Granted that the premise of their whole attack was right. and that this was a preconceived machinery for giving public money into the hands of political favourites, to come back again for purposes of election, would the Minister have prosecuted the very favourite he is charged with paying the money to, and prosecuted him before he was forced to do so by a strong public opinion making itself known in this House? Is there any more conclusive argument to brand their whole assumption as false than that,—that there was no such delay or procrastination, and that the Minister himself and the Government were the parties who put into operation the machinery which exposed the frauds. and that they went as far as they had power to go through the machinery of the courts towards the punishment of the main individuals who are acknowledged to have taken the money. I hold that to be an argument which sensible men will take cognisance of and have some regard to throughout the country; and they will contrast that course of action with the charge, which is hurled without a shadow of proof, that a corrupt motive existed from the very first. Sir, it is really wonderful to watch the processes of this wonderful Opposition, who spend a large portion of their time in taunting this side of the House with a lack of ability and capacity, and spend the rest of their time in trying to hatch scandals, when both portions of their time-if they would take a little bit of advice from myselfwould be put to much better use, and would bring them a much richer political harvest, if they would give a liftle attention to the state of the country, and put themselves into a position of accord with the spirit and needs and wants of the country, and evolve something that could be dignified by the name of a policy, which, when it was given to the country, would carry the electorate by the force of a positive advantage. Then these gentlemen would not have, as they do frauds have been unearthed.

by imaginative scandals, and scandals once, twice, three times evolved—vamped up and put forward as new; warmed-up cabbage to feed the intelligent electorate of the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, for anything but extravagance, there was nothing but the symptoms and the gradually evolved information patent to the department, up to the 27th of May; and I come now to speak for a moment as to the only point of strength. whatever strength there may be in it, which was placed before the House by my hon friend, which has not been dealt with by those who have preceded me in this discussion. On the 25th of April, he says, leaving all previous circumstances out, the responsibility of the Minister began without doubt, because at that time he certainly had a knowledge of the frauds that existed. He bases that statement upon a letter written on that date by Mr. Schreiber to the Minister and upon the statement made in the letter that Mr. Schreiber had spoken of the matter to the Minister before the day on which he wrote the letter. The hon. gentleman read the letter, but it hints at nothing more than extravagance. Mr. Schreiber does not say, neither does he detail in the least possible degree, any signs or anything at all to reveal corruption or fraud. Later on, on the 10th of May, the evidences of extravagance and of bad management had reached that point when it was thought advisable to appoint a commission, and a commission was appointed. But, Sir, I speak I think within the knowledge of the Minister of Railways and of those who followed the matter, when I say that even at the time of the appointment of the commission the last thought that came into the head of the Minister was that that commission was for the purpose of unearthing frauds that existed in the development or the conduct of these works. It was supposed that the commission would show extravagance and mismanagement on the part of the officials. and may be something worse than mis-management; but, Sir, that it was to un-earth the frauds which were afterwards and by a different process found to exist, was not within the knowledge or the mind of the Minister then, however patent it may now, a year or more after the That com-will find, on reading its report that the commissioners themselves, after all methods and means had been employed in their investigation, were yet but slightly advanced on the path of fraud or corruption, though they did find indubitable evidences of extravagance in connection with the whole management, and lack of capacity, if we go no further, on the part of officials who had been long in the service and who were trusted by the Minister to oversee and carry on this work. When did paid and that certain bills to the amount of the evidences of fraud come out? Sir, at the Minister's own initiative and by the result of his own action, evidence was brought before the Public Accounts Com- then existing, what more reasonable than to mittee which showed that frauds did exist, say: If labouring men have done their to whom was due the fact that this was brought out? Hon. gentlemen eppesite occupy a different position with reference to this than they have occupied in some other charges that they have made previously against this Government, where they themselves unearthed the wrong, and where they could see that unless they had unearthed that wrong, it would never have been unearthed or would have been allowed to sleep. But in this case the merit attaches to the Government, in the very line of policy that the late Sir John Thompson laid down and the pledge he gave that wrong-doing would be ferretted out wherever it existed, if it could be brought to the light of day. It was the Minister and the Government itself who set the machinery at work, who | Montreal and at the department aggregatunearthed the frauds and collusions that existed, and who brought to the knowledge the state of things that existed in the con- not so. duct of that work. Now, my hon, friend says that on the 27th May these frauds existed and we had knowledge of them. There, I think he is wrong. He might say that the Minister had knowledge that extravagance had existed. On that date, $66,000 was had existed. paid. Let us take a reasonable view of the payment under the circumstances, at the time, with the knowledge that existed on the 27th May, and, mind you, without the knowledge that we to-day possess of fraud and wrong-doing. Under the circumstances as existed then, it is difficult for us to disassociate ourselves from the knowledge that we have at present; it is difficult to put ourselves back to the quantum of knowledge and the exact circumstances as they existed then. But let us reasonably and fairly do that, and on the 26th May, when the payment was made, what were the circumstances? Extravagance was known to have characterized the work. How great the extravagance was not known, and only a shadow of the truth, as it existed, had begun to make itself felt in the department. All that was known was that extravagance existed, but to the existence of fraud at all, there was not the fringe of suspicion.

Not a fringe of suspicion of its labours and made its report; and you fraud that could be based upon anything to justify action existed, under the circumstances as they were known at that time. What did exist? Pay-rolls, certified to by whom? By the men who had to certify to them in the first instance. By the resident engineer and superintendent in Montreal, where the works were carried on. Pay-rolls. signed in due order, aggregated at that date about $174,000. What was done? the representations that labour remained un-$170,000 were lying in the department, the payment of $66,000 was made. When that payment was made, with the information work and are asking for their pay, and are suffering for the want of it, is there anything unreasonable, when there is $174,000 of certified bills unpaid, which surely will keep the department safe, in making an advancement payment of $66,000, leaving $111,000 unpaid.

> Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon, gentleman allow me to correct him? I am sure he does not wish to mislead the House, but he is quite wrong in his figures. The amount then certified by the engineer of the department was $137,000 and the payments were $111,000 unpaid.

> Mr. FOSTER. On the 27th May, 1893, there were unpaid pay-rolls returned from ing $174,855.49.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, pay-rolls, duly certified to and regularly returned by superintending engineer Parent, and also superintendent Kennedy and chief time-keeper Cloughmin. My hon, friend must not ask to correct me in a statement I did not make. The statement I have made was that $174,-000 of pay-rolls was certified to by the men who must certify to them in the first instance, and were lying in the department at Ottawa when the $66,000 payment was

Mr. McCARTHY. That $174,000 includes all the pay-rolls which came in during the whole summer. It is the aggregate sums which Mr. Schreiber says he did certify to. If the hon, gentleman will look at the table, he will find that the three pay-rolls in at the time amounted to $137,000, and upon this $66,000 was paid and $7,000 and $39,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not talking of any certificates which were or were not given at the department at Ottawa, but simply of the pay-rolls sent up from the city of Montreal and certified to by the resident engineer and superintendent. I am bound to take the information I have at hand. I now come to the 6th June when my hon, friend says an additional $39,000 was paid.

May, when $7,000 more was paid.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a small amount compared with the total, and I am simply dealing with the two large amounts. On the 6th June, $39,000 more were paid. The payment made at that time, according to the information which I have, was made for the sole purpose of going into the hands of poor labouring men who had earned their money and were without their pay. That consideration was brought before the department, and upon that consideration $39,000 more were advanced.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The evidence was to the effect that the money paid to the poor labouring men was paid by Mr. St. Louis out of the money he borrowed from the bank, and this money you were paying was only to recoup Mr. St. Louis.

Mr. FOSTER. That may have been the statement, but the statement I have made is that which was made to the Minister at the time.

Mr. Mcc \RTHY . It is not in evidence. Mr. FOSTER. I want again to impress upon the House-from electors of my own, who came and re-presented that they had been working on the Wellington Street bridge not on the Lachine as the hon, member for Simcoe, (Mr. McCarthy) stated. A great many of my electors in Lachine and in the county. represented that they had been working and they had not been paid, that they had been waiting some months without being paid. And I went to the members of the Government and represented that these poor men should get their pay.

Mr. FOSTER. My information is that this money was paid to the men themselves, that the representation was so made to the on both sides of the House to put theinselves back to that date and in a condition to say how the action struck them at the portant thing. If the authority which gave the order for the payment of $66,000 and: of $39,000 had had at that moment before him, the information which the House and the country has to-day neither of those sums would be paid. But we must take the circumstances into account. Now, Sir. the that always appeal to a department or a government. When labouring men who have done their work, done it in good faith, earned their pay and are suffering for the want of it, ask that they shall get that which they have earned—that always appeals strongly. Now, Sir, that was the appeal that was made, and the $39,000 was paid out. But it was paid out with the idea | the face of it deserves to be punished, will

Mr. McCARTHY. You pass by the 27th that there still remained $60,000 or $70,000 certified to by the engineer in Montreal, and, without a knowledge that frauds were practised, the conclusion of a man would be that if we still keep a balance of this amount it surely would be enough to cover extravagance which we know to have existed, and may be frauds which might be found to exist. That is the way it would strike me, and I think that is the way it would strike the House and the country. Now. Sir, I do not wish to prolong this debate. and I am not going to prolong it much further. What I say is simply this: Taking the common sense view of the matter, this is one of the things which occur in every country in the world and under every government of the world. That Government has never yet been modelled, and I doubt that the Government ever will be modelled which will be safe from malpractice in the administration of its appropriations spread over a large extent of country, under the supervision of multitudes of men between whom and the primal authority there must be a bond of faith and of confidence, but between whom and the primal authority there cannot be the bond of that personal knowledge which will make confidence ab-Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I solute and secure. These things take place have personal knowledge upon this matter in every country. But, when such a thing takes place in our own country, unhappily we have an opposition which leaps over every circumstance that intervenes, to the conclusion that the Government knew of abetted it, and that it instance of corruption is it. and another which the Government must domned. Sir. the Minister last year made a pledge to this House that the matter would be ferretted out and that punishment would be meted out to the officials who were guilty of wrong-doing. That pledge is now being carried out by the Minister. Not one single scrap of information has been asked for by this House with redepartment. And again I ask gentlemen ference to that subject. That, however, does not affect the truth of what I say that the Minister's pledge in that respect is being carried out and will be carried out, and that time, without the subsequent knowledge in this whole matter, so far as any official that they gained. I think that is an im-connected with the department or the management of these moneys is guilty of collusion of fraud, of malpractice, he will be dealt with by the Minister and by the Government. That includes not only officers in Montreal but officers in the department here in Ottawa. The Government has been pledged by Sir John Thompson; the Gov-$39,000 was paid out under circumstances ernment has been pledged by the statement of the Minister of Railways last year, and the Government stands further pledged, if further pledge is necessary, by myself speaking for the Government here to-night, that in this department and in every department no stoppage of justice be allowed and that no case of negligence, corruption, collusion or fraud, which upon

Mr. Speaker, I hope we have heard the last of this matter put in the light in which hon. gentlemen have put it. I hope we have heard the last of this to-night. Why must it be always taken as a cardinal principle whenever the least wrong is found out whenever the least extravagance or the least fraud is found out in the carrying out of the work of the Government, that a charge must be hurled against the Government that it is because of collusion on the part of the Government and because of corrupt motives on the part of the Government? Cannot we discuss these things upon their merits, upon the evidence that is given, and come to the conclusion that that evidence warrants, and if there is laxity or negligence, say so? But is it necessary as a first point that everything that comes up must be branded as another scandal, as another act of corruption? The genesis of a scandal, as it develops on the other side of the House, is an interesting thing for hon. gentlemen on this side to follow. I have had some little experience in that myself, and after this session, in Reform newspapers and on Reform platforms, there will be another scandal added to the list, that is the Foster bridge scandal, because in the county of York a certain transaction took place-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You had better wait, and you will hear more about it.

Mr. FOSTER. I know I shall, and I mention it to-night to show the almost insane monomania that possesses hon, gentlemen opposite, in taking up every transaction, no matter what it may be, and if, in a business point of view, they do not approve of it, if some point of management does not commend itself to them, they immediately elevate or degrade it into a scandal, and attach

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think if the hon, gentleman deserves credit for nothing else, certainly, in the light of the facts which have been recorded, not only in respect to this comparatively trifling matter but with respect to all the acts and conduct decessors for the last sixteen years, and notably since the commencement of this Parliament, the hon, gentleman deserves credit for being the man in all Canada who possesses the most unlimited fund of assurance when he wonders that my hon, friend, with the facts before him, with the knowledge of the characters of the men with who he is dealing, proved in every possible shape and shown upon our records, and where gross frauds are proved to have occurred, where large sums of public money are admitted to have been stolen, when the chief thief concerned is a near relative of one of his colleagues, and a prominent contributor to the funds of the Conservative party—when he wonders, I say, that my hon, friend, under these circumstances, thinks it not unlikely that there was some collusion and corruption. Now, I am not on the present occasion going over all the surrounding circumstances which amply justify any deduction my hon, friend might be pleased to make. I propose to deal very briefly indeed with what I cannot call the arguments, but what I may call the evasions, which have been presented to the House by the hon. gentleman in dealing with the speech of the hon, member for North Simcoe (Mr. Me-Carthy). And first of all, the hon, gentleman alleges that this thing was tried before. Sir, this thing was not tried before, because we had not anything like the evidence that is now in our possession. Last year it was our duty to show to the country and to Parliament that gross frauds had been committed in connection with this same Curran bridge. We proved that up to the handle. and we compelled the Government to admit all the facts which were stated by me. We compelled the Government to get down on their knees and plead that they were not responsible, and to make a promise, which they have utterly failed to redeem, that they would have justice and judgment done on the offenders. Now, this session, with fresh evidence, my hon. friend comes forward and proves conclusively that there was such gross misconduct on the part of the head of the department, as rendered it all but impossible that fraud should not have been committed. That is the charge which is made to-day; that is the charge to which neither the hon, gentleman nor his colleague the Minister of Justice, have up to this

Why, Sir, the hon, gentleman alleges that it was an absurdity to suppose that there was any ground for suspicion of fraud as late as May, 1893. Well, if there was no ground for suspicion of fraud, why did the hon, gentleman resort to the extraordinary expedient of issaing a royal commission? Is a royal commission, one of the most extraordinary and exceptional instruments at the disposal of the Government, iuvolving always a large expenditure from the public chest-is that issued on vague suspicion, or no suspicion at all? Is that issued simply because he thinks a little more money than was necessary may have been expended in earrying on a public work? Sir, it was a grave step, it was a step which the Government were not justified in taking at all I admit that they were justified in this casebut they would not have been justified had there not been a strong suspicion of serious irregularities, amounting to crime almost, occurring in connection with this same bridge. Sir, he told us that the thought of fraud was the last thing that entered into the innocent mind of the Minister of Railways, that it was the last thing that he could think of as likely to occur under the circumstances which have been narrated to Well, Sir. us several times this evening. knowing something of the Minister of Railways, when he heard there was $132,000 spent in labour bills in one month, on a work the total estimate for which ought to have been less than $40,000 for labour, should say it was not the last but the very first thought that would have entered into his mind, or at least, into of any reasonable and the mind telligent man. The hon, gentleman tells us that the whole merit of the discovery of these frauds belongs to the Government. Why, Sir, the Government are there for the purpose of preventing fraud, for the purpose of preventing extravagance, for the purpose of seeing that the money with which the country entrusts them, is properly expended. The Government knew at the time of issuing that commission, that three times the money that had been voted by Parliament, had been expended, and they tell us that under such circumstances there is great merit if they discovered that this money was improperly expended. The hon. gentleman shelters himself under the plea that it was the kindly consideration of the Government for the poor labouring man that induced them to pay all this money out in direct defiance of every rule and every regulation that ever was framed in any department, governing the expenditure of public money. Sir, they knew that they were not paying that money into the hands of labouring men; they knew they were paying it into the hands of a poliing it into the hands of a political friend who, as I have said before, was in old times an exceeding liberal conmoment interposed the slightest effective was the reason, and not any regard to the public interest, that such a pressure was brought to bear upon them to induce them to pay these sums. They were not protecting the workingmen, they were using the workingmen, or their pretended regard for the workingmen, as an excuse for these abuses. Now, I do not wish to go over the ground that has been so well traversed by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and the hon, member for North Simcoe. But I call attention to this fact, that the hon, gentleman has not refuted one single argument brought forward by either of these two hon, gentlemen, and more particularly by the hon, member for North Simcoe. He has not disputed the fact that so far back as the 14th April, facts were brought to the knowledge of the Minister which showed conclusively that there had been scandalous wrong doing in connection with this expenditure, which showed most distinctly-and mind you that was a fortnight after Parliament had risen-that all the money that Parliament had put at their disposal had been spent twice over, and that there were huge claims coming forward which ought to have been investigated at once. Sir, he has not pretended to offer any excuse, either, for the payment of $74,000 on the 24th April, for the payment of $9,000 on the 29th April, or for the payment of $8.300 on the 8th May. Nor has he pretended to account for this; how after allowing a royal commission to issue, he then proceeded to pay a further sum of $112,000. Nor did he offer one scintilla of explanation of the fact that the great majority of those latter payments, all of those latter payments, I believe, were not certified to by the departmental deputy. I turn to the list furinshed by the Government itself, and that list shows clearly and distinctly that all those latter payments were made in utter defiance of the fact that they had not been certified by the chief engineer. What excuse have the Government for that action? What pretense have they for dispensing with the ordinary precautions, as we know they did, putting it on the lowest ground, they being aware that the most extreme extravagance marked the carrying out of this contract, for deliberately departing from the rules of the department, for deliberately overriding the chief engineer, who was too honest a man to certify to these accounts. It was their bounden duty under those circumstances to have declined to pay any further sum, at all events until this commission had reported. If this commission had found that there were considerable sums of money fairly and honestly due to innocent parties, then perhaps the House might have taken a more lenient view than it at present takes of this transaction. But the Government did nothing of the kind. It disregarded all the usual precautions, and it took advantage. improperly took advantage, of the power to tributor to their corruption fund, and that obtain a Governor General's warrant. That warrant was issued within a very few days or weeks after Parliament had risen. Parliament did not rise till the 1st of April, and there must have been in the department at the time ample evidence that considerable further sums would be required. Had the Government attended, as they should have done, to their business, had the Minister attended to his work, as he should have done, he would have known before Parliament rose that he would require large sums of money in order to complete the work, and he had no business and the Government had no business whatever to abuse that provision for the purpose of paying $220,000 which Parliament had never authorized. Sir, the hon, gentleman tells us he hopes that—and no doubt he is sincere in that-he will not hear anything more of this matter. disabuse his mind in that rewill gard. There is not the slightest doubt that had he not been a political favourite, had he not had friends in high places, had he been a poor ordinary of-fender who had stolen $5. Mr. Emmanuel St. Louis would be adorning the cell of a penitentiary in some part of Canada. I do not at all agree that the hon. the Minister of Justice would not be justified when he found the Government could not obtain justice for some reason in Montreal, in seeking a change of venue. It is hard to say which will strike the public mind worse the present occasion, whether evidence brought before us of the utter incapacity with which the Governchosen to administer has their affairs, or the miscarriage of justice which has taken place, or the huge theft of public money that occurred—I hardly know which of these will deserve the severest condemnation at the hands of the people of the country, unless perhaps it should be the defence which Ministers considered it was not beneath them to put forward in excuse of those but with every single solitary precept of frauds. The department pleads that it could not help itself, the department sitting at Ottawa with ample time to prepare itself and obtain all possible knowledge that could be obtained as to what was required for these public works, the department was so helpless and knew so little, and is so inefficiently administered, in this regard at all events, that they cannot prevent, under their very eyes, $200,000 of public money being stolen. There is no use in the hon. gentleman pretending that we exaggerated the amount, because the Government are now suing St. Louis for $175,000, alleged to have been obtained by false pretenses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Were I pleading before an impartial court I the bench would agree with it. What are we asking? We are asking that after it has of by the deliberate misconduct of the Minister at the head of the department or the acting Minister, whoever he may have been, the present Premier, I believe, that those men have entirely misapplied this money from the purpose for which it was intended, and that they paid this money with full knowledge that the most gross extravagance had been committed, and with full ground of suspicion that gross fraud had been committed, censure shall be passed on the man who is constitutionally responsible to us for this loss of the public funds. Sir, if there ever was a case to which it was fully and clearly our duty to call the attention of the country, and to hold the Minister, with the new evidence we possess, responsible for the action taken, it is the present case as set forth in the motion of my hon. friend. and I venture to say, as I cannot, at this hour, go into further details, to the hon. Minister opposite, whether he knows it or not, even among hon, gentlemen behind he will hardly find a dozen, except of those who have some very strong personal reason for sustaining the Minister of Railways, who do not feel that his conduct on this occasion has been utterly and entirely at variance, I will not say with all constitutional principles.

Mr. McNEILL. I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, to prolong this debate by attempting to discuss the question. But before I record my vote I should like to ask the members of the Government, whether or not it be the intention to bring to justice some of these people who have been concerned in this abominable fraud which has been discussed here to-night? There has been an attempt, as we all know, to bring one of these men to justice, but that attempt has failed. I wish to know whether any further attempt will be made?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the House will permit me. I have no objection to stating very frankly to the hon. gentleman, that the Crown has met with a very extraordinary disaster in the prosecution of one against whom we had what we believed the most conclusive evidence, and it is a knew that criminal proceedings have been question as to how far we can proceed taken and this civil suit. However, the evidence against them is not so strong, by any means, as the evidence against St. Louis was. I have a report on all these question and there is not a paper that I have that the House is not welcome to. I stated frankly in the House the other night, that so far as I was individually concerned, I was prepared to advise the Government that with the experience we have had of the present prosecution it was idle to press the weaker cases.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, I say it seriously. It was idle to press in the same tribunal the weaker cases. The instructions, and the intentions of the Government, are as I have stated.

> Mr. LAURIER. The hon, gentleman stated a moment ago (the Minister of Finance stated it several times also), that we do not know the steps which have been taken by the Government for the prosecution of the criminals. We infer therefore that something has been done. The only thing we know of is the civil suit against Mr. St. Louis, and the Minister of Justice tells us that Mr. St. Louis is sued for much more than he owes.

> Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. am delighted that the hon, gentleman has asked me that question. All he knows is that a civil suit is taken against Mr. St. Louis, and with the statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals last session that certain steps would be taken against all implicated in this wrong doing; at the end of this protracted debate the hon. the leader of the Opposition says: He only

CHARLES HIBBERT That is a very serious punishment to some people, and I think it would be very serious as the hon, gentleman would understand to a man who had been in the service for twenty years. That is what I had reference to when I said that no member had taken the trouble to inquire as to what had been done with the responsible parties.

Mr. LAURIER. The prosecution is dismissal.

CHARLES HIBBERT Surely the leader of the Opposition understands the statements I have made: that it is idle, in my opinion,-I frankly said thatto proceed against the minor criminals, when we cannot secure a conviction against the man towards whom the strongest evidence pointed.

Government intend to proceed against the Premier who was acting in place of the Minister of Railways, and also, if they intend to take action of dismissal or otherwise against Mr. Schreiber? That would clear the way for me to vote intelligently.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 119) respecting the Shore Line Railway Company (from the Senate).—(Mr. Gillmor.)

Denison,

IRRIGATION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 120) respecting the utilization of the waters of the North-west Territories for irrigation and other purposes.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the nature of the amendments proposed?

Mr. DALY. The first amendment relates to section 1. As it stands the word "agent" means the registrar of land titles. It is proposed to amend the section so that people will be able to go to a Dominion lands agent, instead of having to go to the registration office, which, for instance, in the territory affected is in Calgary. There is a Dominion lands office, at Lethbridge, which will be nearer at hand for some people. The next amendment is in regard to section 4. Under that section in the original Act the use of water, except where the contrary is specified, is vested in the Crown. It is contended that this might interfere with navigable and floatable rights on any of the rivers, and the amendment proposed is to re-The next amendment is move that doubt. to subsection 1 of section 7. It is provided at present that any person who desires to use water-rights subsequent to the passage of the Act shall obtain a license, and that such license shall be obtained on or before The provision as it stands 1st July, 1895. is compulsory, and refers even to people requiring water for domestic purposes. The amendment is to make the Act not to apply to water for domestic purposes, and also to extend the time for obtaining licenses, by people authorized to use the water, for another year. The next clause is in reference to the application for license. Under the present section men living on their own farms are put to great expense, because the Act provides that they shall file certain plans and give certain notices, and the experience of one year has shown that this entails on property-holders too much expense and trouble. The amendment will simplify that matter, especially as regards filing plans. The next subsection refers to the same matter. Under the present Act the maps, plans and book of reference must be signed and certified to by a duly qualified Dominion lands surveyor. It is thought in connection with the small ditches on individual farms to be unnecessary that the plans should be signed by a surveyor, but these may be submitted to an officer of the department, and if certified as correct, that will be sufficient. This amendment will relieve farmers or individuals from the expense of obtaining the services of a Dominion land surveyor.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. FOSTER.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRE-SENTATION ACT.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 121) to amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, Chap. 7. respecting North-west Territories representation.

Mr. LAURIER. In what particulars will the Act be changed?

Mr. DALY. The effect of the amendment is this: Under the present law the qualification of a voter at Dominion elections in the North-west Territories is that he shall be a British subject, 21 years of age, a resident of the Territories for 12 months prior to the issue of the writ, and a resident of the electoral district for 12 months prior the writ. This Bill the issue of to that law by providamend seeks to ing that the qualifications should be identical with the qualifications of a voter for the local assembly, namely, that he should be a British subject, 21 years of age, and that he should have resided for twelve months in the Territories and three months in the electoral district. There is a further provision altering the oath to meet that.

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot help congratulating my hon, friend that he is coming to sound principles gradually.

Mr. DALY. It is the franchise that was laid down by this House some years ago.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved for leave o introduce Bill (No. 122) to amend the General Inspection Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to amend section 19 of the General Inspection Act by substituting the section that I have framed for subsection 2 of the Act, and also by adding an additional subsection as subsection 4. The purpose of the Act is to more completely regulate the inspection fees charged by the grain inspectors throughout the country. This subject was brought to the attention of the House by the hon, member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) some weeks ago. I then stated that the whole question had been engaging the attention of the Government, and that it was the intention to introduce legislation upon the subject during the present session. Owing to the rapid development of the export trade in grain, the fees collected at certain terminal points have been rather in excess of what would meet the requirements of the service. This is so only in two places, Port Arthur and Montreal. In what may be considered as normal years, and under normal conditions, the fees which were payable as salaries to the inspectors were not more than should be payable, having regard to the important and responsible duties devolving upon these inspectors. The Bill provides that the Governor in Council may make such disposition of the fees, at any of the places where inspectors are appointed, as may to them seem right and proper. The amendment proposes to provide greater facilities for entering the elevators and examining the books kept there for the purpose of showing the quantities of grain exported, and all other particulars that may be necessary. I may say that the elevators are owned by private persons and not, as is supposed by some, by the Government. This amendment is to render clear any doubt that might exist as to whether the Government had a right to examine the books belonging to the elevators. We have had no difficulty in doing that heretofore. I may add that the fees collected in all other places outside of the two points I have mentioned, are not excessive, and I doubt whether the service could be performed for anything less than the amounts that have been so received as remuneration. It must not be forgotten that in all matters of inspection, the policy of the Government has been for many years not to appoint salaried officers, the reason being obvious, that in years when the export of grain amounts to little, then the salaries to officers might form a tax upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The fixed policy has been to pay by these fees, and it is not intended to depart from it. But it is intended to so regulate the fees that when they reach a sum beyond what is considered right and proper for the officer to receive, then the surplus may be disposed of in such a way as the Governor in Council may think proper.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish I had drawn the attention of the hon, the Controller to an apparent discrepancy between the returns from Fort William and the amount of wheat which. according to reports, ought to pass through the elevators there. I understand that the gross receipts of that office are somewhat less than $10,000 a year. The fees amount to about $1 on a car of grain, and according to that there could not have been more than six millions bushels of wheat passed through the elevator and inspected at Fort William. The report in the newspapers, given to grain merchants, presumably by the Canadian Pacific Railway, shows that we exported something like twelve or fourteen million bushels from Manitoba. I would suggest that it would be well for the Government to get reports from the Canadian Pacific Railway as to the number of bushels they haul, and check the returns from the inspectors in that way.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has suggested just what I have stated. The elevators beall the wheat that goes into the elevator is inspected. It is not. All the wheat that is inspected is checked and carefully looked into, and I am bound to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway has afforded our officer every facility for verifying the report of the inspectors. In fact, since the hon, gentleman referred to it, I have taken the pains to send Inspector Morrow, of Toronto. to verify the report. The salary of the officer in question is far less than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) supposed when he was addressing the House before.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT.

Mr. OUIMET moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 123) to amend the Public Works Act. He said: This Bill is to provide for the sale by public tender or public auction, of public works or property that are no more required for public purposes.

Mr. LAURIER. Can the hon. gentleman at this moment inform the House what kind of property he intends to cover by that; whether it is plant or machinery or estate?

Mr. OUIMET. Old plant, machinery, furniture, and property that is no more used as public property for the public service. At the present moment we have in Hamilton, for instance, an old building which used to be a custom-house, which we advertised for sale; and the question has been raised whether the Public Works Act authorizes us to sell it. Of late, authority has always been obtained by Order in Council. In order to get rid of the doubt which has arisen, I introduce the present Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION ACT.

Mr. OUIMET moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 124) further to amend the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. He said: When the Act to readjust the representation in this House was passed two years ago, a mistake was made in the description of the newly constituted county of Berthier, and by that mistake the north-east half of the township Joliette which used to belong to the county was merged into the new Joliette county of Berthier; and, as the description of the old county of Joliette was not amended, this half township now belongs both to Joliette and Berthier. That part of the township of Joliette together with the other part and the township of Courcelles now form the parish of Ste. Emilie de l'Energie. This Bill is introduced to declare long to private parties. The hon, gentleman that the whole parish of Ste. Emilie de evidently makes a mistake in supposing that l'Energie shall belong to the county of Joliette. When the electoral lists for the counties of Joliette and Berthier were revised last year, the revising officer in the county of Joliette did not make the electoral list of that part of the township of Joliette, but left it to the revising officer of Berthier. My first intention was just to place things in the same state that they were before, but it became very difficult to do that, on account of one single list having been made for the whole. Having consulted the parties interested in the matter, and especially the hon. member for Berthier, it was thought that the best way to get out of the difficulty would be to return to the county of Joliette all that part of the township of Joliette which was taken away, and also the town-ship of Courcelles, that is, the whole of the parish of Ste. Emilie de l'Energie. further provided in the Bill that the list which has been prepared by the revising officer of Bertheir shall serve for the county of Berthier until a new list is made.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES COM-MISSION.

Mr. GILLIES asked, Have the commissioners of the joint convention of the Governments of Canada and the United States completed their investigation into the subjects submitted to them to report upon? If so, does their report suggest that an arrangement be entered into between both governments preventing purse-seining, seining and trawling beyond the three-mile limit upon the Atlantic coast? If the work of the commission is not yet concluded, when is their report expected by the Government?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. The joint commissioners have not yet completed their investigations of the subjects submitted to them for report. 2. The points of inquiry are covered by the convention, but, as the investigations are not yet completed, no reports on these subjects have been anticipated. 3. Nor could the department at present intimate any probable date for receipt of the report by the Canadian Government, which must in the first instance, either jointly or severally, be submitted to Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States.

POST OFFICE OF LAURENTIDES, P.Q.

Mr. CARROLL asked, 1. Has the Government purchased or bought from Ovide Brien or any other parties a building for the purpose of placing therein the post office of Laurentides, county of L'Assomption? If so, when, and on what terms and conditions? 2. Has the Government taken any steps, and if so, what steps to have the said building repaired and fitted to serve as a post office?

Mr. OUIMET.

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Brien's building has not been purchased, but an expenditure of $350 has been made to fit it as a post office, so as to secure adequate postal accommodation for the people of that important town.

PROHIBITION COMMISSION.

Mr. BORDEN asked, What was the total number of meetings held by the prohibition commission? How many of said meetings were attended by each commissioner? Have all the commissioners received pay for the meetings attended by them?

I would ask my hon. Mr. FOSTER. friend to put that in the form of a motion for a return. The information is not in the office, but we have written for it, and will receive it by the time this motion is through.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. FERRY asked. Who has the contract for supplying cedar sleepers for the Prince Edward Island Railroad? Was the con-How many tenders tract let by tender? were received, and from whom? What was the amount of each tender? What is the quantity contracted for? Was the lowest tender accepted, and how much do the sleepers cost per thousand, delivered at Summerside, P.E.I. ?

Mr. HAGGART. J. D. Windsor, New Mills, N.B., has the contract. Yes, the contract was let by tender. Five tenders were received, as follows, for cedar ties:

J. D. Windsor, New Mills, N.B., 30,000 at.. $0.211/2 Warren Taylor, Salisbury, N.B., 6,000 at. 0.2214 Sumner & Co., Moneton, N.B., 15,000 at. 0.2314 Sumner & Co., Moneton, N.B., 15,000 at. 0.2314 I. & R. Young, Tracadie, 3,000 at..... 0.30

Thirty thousand were contracted for. lowest tender was accepted, and the sleepers cost $215 per thousand, delivered at Summerside.

MR. GEORGE WALLACE.

Mr. FRASER asked, Is George Wallace, of Woodbridge, Ont., now, or has he at any time been in the employ of the Government? If so, (a) when was he employed? (b) For what length of time? (c) What remuneration did he receive, and (d) what was the character of his employment?

Mr. WALLACE. He was, but is not now, in the employ of the Government. He was employed from 9th April to 16th June, 1893, at Brockville and Quebec, in rearrangement of a vessel, at $3.50 per day; from the 1st to 31st of October, 1894, as an acting special preventive officer of customs, assisting special officer Belton, at $2 per day; from the 1st April to latter part of May, 1895, as an acting special preventive officer of customs, assisting special officer Belton, at $2 per day.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution (p. 2815) reported from Committee of Ways and Means, was read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 125) for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required to defray certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 30th June, 1895, and for other purposes relating to the public service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the order for second reading of Bill (No. 44) respecting commercial treaties affecting Canada be discharged. He said: After the discharge, I want to move for leave to introduce a Bill as a substitute. The Bill which is on the paper is general in its provision, the idea having been to make it applicable to all treaties that may take place hereafter. But, after thinking the matter over, we have concluded that it is better to pass a Bill relating to this particular treaty alone—that is, the French treaty.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not know that the change the hon. gentleman contemplates is altogether an improvement. As I understand it. the Bill which the hon. gentleman is going to introduce is to be limited to the French treaty. As a consequence, in any future treaty we may have to negotiate, the same difficulties may arise as arose with regard to the French treaty. Unless the hon. gentleman has strong reasons for going back on what should belong to Canada at present, I cannot conceive that the measure he is going to introduce will give the same satisfaction.

Bill withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it will give most perfect satisfaction. What we are really dealing with is a treaty which has been made and ratified by Parliament, and what we are going to ask the House to do is to pass the legislation which is necessary with respect to that particular treaty. I did not suppose I would meet any criticism from my hon, friend, when I was not asking powers for the Governor in Council, in the way of proclamation, as to treaties not yet made. Parliament is always here, and it is impossible for us to have a treaty without the sanction of Parliament; and when sanctioned, we can, in the same session, provide for what is necessary with regard to It would be better to make that treaty. each enactment refer to the particular treaty at that time in hand. I move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 126) respecting commercial treaties affecting Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SALARIES OF JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS.

Resolution (p. 2180) reported from Committee, on a certain proposed resolution respecting the salaries of judges of the provincial courts, was read the second time and concurred in.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) vincial courts, was read the second time and judges of provincial courts.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEVELOPMENT OF SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 74) further to amend the Act to ercourage the development of sea fisheries and the building of fishing vessels.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman please explain.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I gave an explanation when I introduced the Bill. I will read a memorandum which briefly sets forth the object of the measure:

The object of this Bill is to give certain fishery officers standing power to take evidence under oath, when making inquiries into alleged fishing bounty frauds. At present, when a case of alleged fraud is reported and referred to the Inspector of Fisheries for inquiry, such officer is, in many cases, unable to get at the facts, because of the unwillingness of parties connected with the irregularities, or of those in possession of the facts, to tell the truth. It often happens too, when parties do give information with regard to alleged fraud, which, they say, they are prepared to prove if called upon so to do, that they refuse to substantiate their statements when called as witnesses. If the officers had the power to get evidence under oath, these difficulties would be removed, and better results would follow the prosecution of such cases. Chapter 114 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, as amended by the Act of 1889, provides for the appointment of a commissioner to inquire into matters of this kind, but, as frequent complaints of fraud are made, it would be necessary, under this Act, to go to Council for a commission in each case, and considerable delay often follows; while the proposed amendment to the Bounty Act would enable the officer to proceed, once a complaint is made, to obtain the facts under oath without delay.

At present our fishery officers are given the power of justices of the peace for the investigation of cases of infraction of the fishery law. But now, when questions of fraud are to be inquired into, in order to take evidence we must go to the Governor in Council and ask for the issue of a commission. The Heuse will easily understand the inconvenience of this course. This simply extends the power of the fishery officers so as to authorize them to take evidence in cases of fishery bounty frauds.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, considered in committee and passed.

On motion for third reading.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Bill is read the third time I would like to make an inquiry regarding a matter which I did not quite catch when we were in committee. This Bill confers these powers upon "any fishery officer." What class of officers is included in that term? Is there a definition in the statute which would show what class of officers is included under that term?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The inspector would naturally be selected wherever possible, but this is not always possible.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What other officers, what other persons than the inspector might be selected under this clause? I heard the hon, gentleman's explanation and I think the object he has in view is a good enough one; but I think such an inquiry ought to be entrusted to men of a certain intelligence. I think it likely that that class would be indicated by the expression "any fishery officer." but that term might also include men of a class not fitted to conduct such inquiries.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The only answer I can give to the hon, gentleman is that the department will select only permanent officers, the inspector by preference. But there may be cases where it would be inconvenient and unduly expensive to send the inspector. We must ask Parliament and trust the department to exercise a wise judgment in these matters.

Motion agreed to; read the third time and passed.

DOMINION NOTES ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 22) further to amend the Dominion Notes Act, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is there any section of the Act requiring a return to be made to Parliament showing the extent to which the power conferred by this clause is exercised?

Mr. FOSTER. The returns are published every month in the "Gazette." This Bill is simply to remedy a defect in last year's legislation.

Mr. Costigan.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Incidentally, you might tell us how the defect occurred.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS.

House resolved itself into committee on resolution (p. 2165) respecting judges of provincial courts.

(In the Committee.)

HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir CHARLES There is practically no change. This is really to remove a doubt and settle a question which occurred to the mind of the judge who is affected, that is the judge of the maritime court, and to put him in the position which he desires to be in. He himself has suggested doubts, as a local judge in admiralty-and the same with all the other judges in admiralty—one being that there was no mention of the maritime court of Ontario. He was left as judge of the maritime court, that position was not affected, but when we constituted the admiralty jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, and provided that the local judges be judges in admiralty, we simply provided that the judge of the maritime court should be the judge in admiralty. In all the other provinces the judges in admiralty courts come within the terms of the Superannuation Act, and this is to bring in the maritime court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see how any one Parliament came to put the local judges in vice-admiralty on superannuation. How did they get an ordinary local judge in admiralty on superannuation?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Section 14 provides for that.

Mr. McCARTHY. How does that apply to judges of maritime courts in Ontario?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The doubt that arose was whether the judge of the maritime court, who is the local judge in admiralty in Ontario, was on the same footing as all the other local judges in admiralty, and as the maritime courts had not been specially mentioned, the object of this is to remove that doubt by putting after the words "vice-admiralty" in the present Act, the words "the maritime court of Ontario," because he discharges the same duties.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What statute contains that subsection 2 that you are amending by adding the words "maritime court of Ontario"?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Section 14 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was not that passed before we established vice-admiralty courts at all?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When those courts were established, and the local judges in vice-admiralty courts were appointed, was any provision made to bring them under the Superannuation Act, this new class of judges?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Under the provisions of that Act they remained entitled as judges in vice-admiralty. Then the Act constituting our admiralty court, threw upon those courts these duties, and so the judges in admiralty in other provinces were mentioned as such, and the judge of the maritime court in Ontario was empowered to do the work of the local judge in admiralty in Ontario. So it stands in this position, that we have assumed all along that they were on an equal footing as to the superannuation, but the judge of the maritime court in Ontario expressed his fear that there was a doubt through his not being considered as coming within the meaning of the Act as a local judge in admiralty, but merely as judge of the maritime court authorized to do the work of a local judge in admiralty. There is no reason, as it seems to me, for distinguishing his case from that of the other judges who do the same work.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I quite agree with the hon, gentleman that there would be no reason for distinguishing a judge of the maritime court of Ontario from the local judges of the vice-admiralty courts in other parts of the Dominion. But the assumption he draws is directly at variance with that which I drew. I understood from our Revised Statutes that the judges of the old vice-admiralty court came within the Superannuation Act, but when the new Admiralty Act was passed in 1890, I think, and the Exchequer Court was made an admiralty court with local jurisdiction and local judges, the salaries of those men were entirely altered and largely increased, but no provision, that I recollect, was made bringing this new class of judges, with their increased salaries, under the Superannuation Act. My impression was, and remains so up to this time, unless the hon, gentleman can show semething to remove it, that it was not the intention of Parliament that these local judges should be brought within the superannuation clauses of that Act at all. If that impression is correct. I certainly see no reason why we should put them on now. On what ground? They do not do a large amount of business, they receive salaries which, in my humble judgment, are a very good compensation for the work they do, but I am not going to quarrel with their salaries. But that they should get an additional compensation, which I never understood up to this moment they had got, is semething that I cannot agree to at present. I quite agree with the hon, gentleman that there is no reason why the maritime court judge should be accepted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We can take a discussion on that general question, which, of course, was one I did not intend to deal with, on another stage of the Bill. But I may point out to the hon, gentleman that it seems to me at the moment there was a good reason for this legislation, because otherwise we would have affected the positions of those judges unfairly. They were judges in vice-admiralty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was our Exchequer Court in admiralty established in 1890?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In 1891. They were judges in the vice-admiralty court, and by law they had a right to superannuation quo ad their salaries as judges in vice-admiralty; and I take it that the British Parliament, in transferring the jurisdiction of their courts within the purview of the Canadian Parliament, would not seek to alter their standing and say to them: Under the Imperial system you were regarded as entitled to superannuation, but now that we are going to deal with you, we shall cut off that right. I think that in that particular they have vested interests.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, no; and I tell the hon, gentleman why. The old vice-admiralty judges were Imperial officers, and held their position by Imperial patent. Now. when we introduced the new Exchequer Court Act, and appointed new judges of the new court, we also subdivided the districts. if I remember aright. For instance, in the old time there was one vice-admiralty court for the whole province of Nova Scotia. I think the late Sir Wm. B. Young was the vice-admiralty judge, and he discharged the duties for the whole of the province. His jurisdiction was large, his duties were onerous, and a great many cases came before him. His successor, now Chief Justice McDonald, also filled the same position, and my recollection of it is that when we established our new courts of admiralty in connection with the Exchequer Court, we subdivided this district and appointed a number of smaller judges.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We made these judges local judges under the Exchequer Court. There is an appeal to the Exchequer Court, and the judges who formerly exercised the jurisdiction of the court of vice-admiralty exercise the same jurisdiction as local judges in admiralty. Take the Quebec judge in admiralty, he has no other judicial function, and there would be this curious position if the law was not as it is, that a county court judge would be entitled to superannuation and a judge in the vice admiralty court would be entitled; the second reading I will consider the points to nothing. There was no reason for that raised and if necessary have them discussed. distinction when both had served in their responsible positions for fifteen years.

Materia Agrico (n. 1975). Ser of the control of the

Mr. McCARTHY. I had the impression that the judges of our maritime courts were not entitled to superannuation before the Act was passed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. think the hon, gentleman is right; but the judges of the vice-admiralty court are. is the point being made. When all these judges were made local judges in admiralty the construction was given that they would come within the general clause of the old Act, and as it seemed they were on the same | Bill? footing, and there was no dispute that the other judges have a right of superannuation, it was proposed to make the whole matter clear by this Bill. This simply places the judges in the admiralty court in Ontario in the same position as other judges in that: province.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon, gentleman will see I was right in my contention, as I find by the Act of 1891. There was introduced a isdiction of the old admiralty court was vested in the Exchequer Court, and it was declared to be the admiralty court for the Dominion of Canada. Then we vested the jurisdiction formerly resting in the vice-admiralty court in the court of Exchequer, and in the fiftyfifth section of the Act power was given to the Governor General in Council from time to time to constitute any part of Canada an admiralty district for the purposes of the Act and to provide for the establishment of a court therein. So these local judges in admiralty may be very petty judges, they may be appointed for a county. The Government for the time being may take the county of Cape Breton, Richmond or Inverness and establish a court in each county and appoint a local judge in admiralty. I do not think Parliament ever contemplated that petty: judges of that kind should come within the provisions provided for superannuation of judges of the superior court. The old Act applied to judges of the vice-admiralty court, Why? Because the position of a judge was equal almost to the judge of the superior court, and the jurisdiction was co-extensive with the province. I ask the hon, gentleman, if he has not given consideration to this point, to think it over, for I doubt whether it ever was the intention of Parliament to extend the superannuation provision to judges whose jurisdiction may be coterminous with the county and who may not have a case before them for five or ten years.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No doubt that is a matter of great importance, and I approached the question only from

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

Mr. McCARTHY. What is the salary?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. $600 in Ontario.

Resolution concurred in.

THE LOBSTER FISHERY.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 91) to amend the law respecting the lobster fishery.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon, gentleman state what he proposes to effect by this

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not propose at the present time to discuss the merits of the Bill, and I may say that the principle is generally accepted by all the lobster canning establishments. Two principal changes are proposed. The first is with respect to the marking and stamping of packages. Great trouble and inconvenience have been complained of by the packers in regard to the system of marking as carried out, because Bill to confer upon the Exchequer Court adit must be remembered that after all this miralty jurisdiction within Canada. The jurisdiction within Canada. The jurisdiction within Canada. it must be remembered that after all this to adopt a more simple method, and one which appears to meet with the views of the trade. Instead of having a package labelled with the name of the manufacturer, the place where it is put up and the year, it is proposed to adopt a label to be attached to every package simply declaring that they are Canadian lobsters and that they have been nacked in the proper season. It is provided in the Bill that every case shall contain such label before it is allowed to be shipped from the premises, and penalties are provided for the non-enforcement of the law.

> Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the stamp to be put on the tin?

> Mr. COSTIGAN. On the case containing the tins.

> Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The present law requires, I believe, that the stamp shall be on the tins.

Mr. COSTIGAN. On the packages. The change proposed is in regard to the kind of label to be used, and it is now to use a simple label proposed claring that the contents are Canadian lobsters packed in the proper season. The next change is with regard to the fees charged for these licenses. I might give extracts from reports I have received from leading factors, especially in the lower provinces, all agreeing to the principle of issuing a license, and, in some cases, suggesting that a very considerable fee should be charged. That was considered by my predecessor in dealing with the matter. the point of view I have indicated. Before looked to be a generous offer on the part of the large factories to say that high fees should be paid by them, but it might mean, also, that it would tend to close up the smaller factories which could not afford to pay that high price for the licenses. The receipts from these licenses may be estimated at about $6,000 a year as the Act is now. I do not propose to lose any revenue by the change suggested. There may be rather an increase, but I propose to redistribute that. The change I make is, that instead of fixing a fee of $10 for every license as is the rule to-day, I propose to put a license upon every hundred cases packed, so that the large packer will pay in proportion to the amount of business, and the smaller packer pay in proportion to the extent of his industry. The principle I take it is not disputed, and from the best advice I can get, I think the regulation so that the packer who packs ten hundred will work fairly well in practice.

Mr. FORBES. It does not take effect this year?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No. because the fees are paid in this year, and we cannot make it retroactive. My officers have calculated that we are pretty certain to receive the same revenue, or perhaps a little more. The object of the Bill is to distribute the fees more equally on the persons who get the licenses.

Mr. YEO. It is very unfair to make the smaller factories pay as much as the larger ones, and in that respect the change is a proper one. Is the label to be put on at the stations where the lobsters are packed, or at the port of shipment?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The labels are to be affixed at the place of packing, and before removal. There is a clause which provides that where there are several packing establishments, that they may be removed from one branch of a packing establishment to another, which will be considered the shipping point. There will be no export without this label being attached.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FRASER. The schedule makes no reference to the number of cases, and how is the Minister going to arrange that? The Act does not provide for any maximum quantity as referred to in the schedule. Where is the schedule of cases that are to be used, and what is the fee? It may be 100 cases, or a thousand cases, but the fee is $10.

Mr. KENNY. I should think that would depend upon the application. A man would apply for a license to pack so many cases,

Mr. FRASER. It is $10 for any number of cases. One man would pay $10 for five hundred cases, and another for 20,000 cases. There is no scale.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). As I understand it, it covers any number of cases up to the year 1896. After 1896, then 810 will have to be paid and a sum additional for a certain number of cases?

Mr. FRASER. Even in that case there would have to be an alteration made in the Bill.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). Yes, I think so.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course, the Bill sets forth that the license fee is $10 for this year, but that after the 1st day of January next it shall be at the rate of $2 per 100 cases, cases and the small packer shall pay just the same rate. The schedule is only used to continue the license for this year; but I will ask permission to change the Bill, so that it may be clearly understood that after the 1st of January next the fee shall be $2 for each hundred cases.

Mr. FLINT. Suppose a packer applies for a license to pack 1.000 cases, and after he has packed that number of cases, he wants to go on packing more. I see no provision here to enable him to get a new license or to have his license renewed.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That has been consider-We fix a certain rate per hundred ed. cases, so that the fee may accompany the application for the license. If the door is opened too wide, the result would be that with an application for a license to pack five hundred cases the fee would be sent for that number, and the packer would then consider that he had the right to go on and pack 5,000 cases, and the department would have to collect the balance of the fee. We do not want to do that. If the packer expects in good faith to pack 1,000 cases, his application should be forwarded for that number of cases; and then, if he finds that he is going to exceed that number, he has only to notify the department.

Mr. PERRY. I understand that on the 15th of July the close season will be in effect on the coasts of Prince Edward Island. Therefore I contend that the Bill will be useless this year, so far as the Island is concerned. But I protest against this license fee altogether; it is wrong to compel the packers to pay one cent. These people have hard times enough to carry on the industry of packing without being compelled to pay this tax. It is a direct imposition upon these poor people, meant to cripple the industry they are trying to carry on. I say there is no statesmanship in this kind of thing at all. If it is wrong to exact $10 for a license in 1896, it is equally wrong to exact it in 1895; I say it is wrong in either year. In and he would recite that in his application. the name of the fishermen and the packers of the lower provinces. I protest against this upon them.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am very sorry that the hon, gentleman thinks that this Bill is all wrong-that $10 is too much, and that $2 is much more revenue is the hon, gentleman too much. I know the warm sympathy going to get? which the hon, gentleman has for the fishermen of his province: but he should remember that this Parliament has declared in any great increase. of a license, and the favour Act The Act operation to-day. in force to-day requires the payment $10 a year for a license, and the present Bill proposes that on and after the first day of January, 1896, the fee shall be at the rate of $2 per 100 cases, or fraction of 100 cases. As to the poor fishermen, while I cannot go the length the hon, genleman wishes, instead of their having to pay $10. I ask that they may have to pay not more than $8, or $6, or $2, according to the privilege they enjoy. The hon, gentleman says this will only come into force next year. That is true, but if I do not ask Parliament to pass this Bill now, next year we will find that we are too late again. I propose that the Bill pass now. so that it may take effect as early as possible. You could not make it take effect at once, because you would have to return money to some people who have paid too much, and collect from those who have not paid enough, and I should not like to undertake that task.

Mr. FORBES. There are certain regulations as regards the marking of cans. Does that affect the law as it is to-day?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes, that goes into effect the moment this Act passes. The. portion that does not go into effect at once is that regarding the license fees.

Mr. FRASER. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman was careful about that. How

Mr. FRASER. The bon, gentleman says he has calculated the number of cases put up last year, and this fee is graded on that number of cases. Assuming the same number would be put up this year, will the amount collected be about equal to what was collected under the $10 fee?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. PERRY. I see a clause under which a man who only packs 100 cases may pay $10 as well as the man who packs 1.000 cases.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In order to give hon. gentlemen time to study the matter and become enlightened on its peints, I would suggest that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want the hon. gentleman to consider, before we again meet in committee, whether it would not be well to introduce into the Bill that was promised by his which cessor, and which, in my opinion, is a vital point of the lobster season-that is to have a close season arbitrarily fixed, and which cannot be extended by the Minister. As it is now, our lobster fisheries, in the opinion of those whose opinion I value very highly, are being absolutely destroyed by the extensions which are made of the time from twenty to thirty days beyond that prescrib-Mr. FRASER. I think the Minister will ed by law, during which extension lobsters of a very bad quality are caught and thrown upon the market, and the whole catch of business.

> Mr. COSTIGAN. That is a very important subject.

Mr. YEO. It is absolutely necessary in some parts of the island that an extension of the time should be given. For the first Mr. FRASER. It would be impossible for these men to apply for a permit to remove the lobsters on every occasion, and it will be impossible to carry this regulation out.

Mr. FLINT. I wish to ask the hon. Minister one question. Is there any regulation or arrangement by which these licenses can be obtained from the fishery inspectors in the counties, or must the application be made direct to the department here?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Applications must be made to the department.

Mr. FLINT. It would be worthy the consideration of the Minister to see whether he could not supply the inspectors with these licenses, so that that delay could be a voided.

Committee rose and reported progress.

High Commissioner's salary...... 11,143 59

Mr. McMULLEN. We want to get some explanation with regard to the duties performed by the High Commissioner during the past year. I have not seen his report among the blue-books brought down. would like to know also what the hon. Minister of Finance anticipates will be the results of the efforts of the High Commissioner in relation to immigration during the past year, and whether, from the experience thus far and considering the increased drain upon the resources of the people, it is considered wise to continue the office in the shape in which it now is. I think we should have some extended explanation with regard to the duties undertaken, the services rendered by the High Commissioner and the hopes of results from this office for the future, before we are asked to continue this expenditure for another year.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has had the fullest explanation of this item for a number of years past. It is the same item as for the last eight or ten years; and if my hon. friend will only do me the favour to look at the "Hansard" of three years ago, he will read there all that I could possibly tell him now, and this will have the effect of avoiding the loading of this " Hansard" with a similar explanation. At that time I went into an exhaustive statement of the duties performed by the High Commissioner and his staff, in every particular. It is a stated department and is being conducted exactly the same to-day as it was then. The work of that department, as my hon, friend knows, is the carrying out of the varied duties that fall upon the High Commissioner as the representative of Canada and of Canadian business in the of London and at the seat of the British Government. The item is in every respect for the same services as have been estimated for as in years past. The principle of the establishment of a High Commissioner's office has been approved over and over again, and I do not imagine that my hon. friend wants to lead the House into a long discussion as to the principle underlying the appointment of a High Commissioner. That is interesting enough in its way, but after the exertions of a sitting lasting until four o'clock in the morning, possibly it is not such-I do not know exactly what term to use;—but, at any rate, it is not conducive. I think, to any great pleasure or any great flow of spirits. Another year we may get at this item in a fresher condition, when I shall be very glad to go at length into the matter and give my hon, friend all the information he demands. And, on the other hand, if his fond anticipations are realized, and he sits here clothed with ministerial responsibility, he will have the great pleasure, of continuing the same policy and of giving in the main, the very explanations I have given.

Mr. McMULLEN. No doubt the hon. Minister thinks it a very opportune moment, when we are all pretty well stupified with a sitting lasting a whole night and not disposed for any long discussion, to light upon this item. No doubt he hopes by that means to get it through without much criticism, though from past experience he has come to the conclusion that if we were in a fitter condition for debate, it would cost him six hours of discussion before he got it through. Notwithstanding the statement the hon. Minister has made, we know, with regard to this office of the High Commissioner, that we have been led from year to year to hope that additional duties would be performed so as to make the good results bear some proportion to the money that the department costs the country. We know that the establishment of the office was urged upon the House in the first place by Sir John Macdonald on the ground that he had not the slightest doubt that the High Commissioner would render services to Canada as financial agent that would repay the country more than double the amount of money it would cost. Under that very great inducement, it was that Parliament first assented to the establishment of the High Commissioner's office. When the Finance Minister went last to London to make financial arrangements, he reported to this House on his return that he had not been able to utilize the High Commissioner as financial agent whatever; that he had to make his arrangements with the Bank of Montreal. I notice that the High Commissioner does render some service. When we send across lecturers for the purpose of addressing meetings of people in Great Britain on the subject of immigration to Canada, the High Commissioner is a handy man to secure a vote of thanks and to make a very glowing and flattering report of the eloquence of the lecturer and the able manner in which he presented the claims of Canada, just as he did in the case of the reverend gentleman of this town who went across last year. The High Commissioner took a very active part in moving a vote of thanks and in having that gentleman well noticed in the papers. He performs duties of that kind admirably, but I do not see anything else that he has done to warrant a country in the financial condition in which Canada is to-day continuing an office of this kind that costs $25,000 a year, when we consider everything connected with it. When we had this matter before the House last year we had a very extended discussion on the $2,000 additional for contingencies. see that item is still included in the vote we are asked to pass. It was suggested last year that if it was really thought desirable that the High Commissioner should have his salary increased to $12,000 instead of $10,000 it ought to be put in the shape of an addition to the salary and not continued lar promotion examinations, and if they have in this form. That point was pressed upon the Minister last year. I would like to know if he still continues to hold the opinion that nation takes place. That is once a year. the salary should be $10,000, and that this $2.000 should be continued to be voted as contingencies as before, and if he thinks that that course should be continued from year to year.

Mr. FOSTER. It is so put down in the Estimates this year, as my hon. friend will see, and we do not propose to make any change during the present year.

Post Office Department-Amount required to pay those officers of the Savings Bank Branch engaged in the balancing of and computing interest on depositors' accounts, to June 30th, 1895......

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Postmaster General is not here, but I will say to the Minister of Finance that I see no reason why these officials should not have the depositors divided into classes, as was done in the savings bank, so that that information could be readily available. They ought to have all these things duly classified. I do not ask for too many classes, but some such division as I suggested or was asked for the other day, would do, three classes.

Mr. McMullen.

Mr. FOSTER. I will bring it to the attention of the Postmaster General.

Amount required for salaries of Board of Examiners and other expenses under the Civil Service Act.....

$2,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the reason of the large decrease this year?

Mr. FOSTER. We dispensed with some of the expenses. The intention is to have two examiners instead of three, to dispense with the secretary, and to appoint one of the clerks who is at present in the Secretary of State's office to do that work, and to do it completely under the control of two commissioners. So that we will save the salary of the secretary and the salary of one of the commissioners. Reductions have taken place in the item of rents of rooms, and other outside expenses, which make the $2,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In all other respects is the examination to continue as at present?

Mr. FOSTER. No change.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand some of the examinations have been dispensed I understood there had been a prowith. motion of quite a number of parties in the Civil Service, and that an opportunity for examination had taken place, but that in other cases, the parties have been refused promotion on the ground that they could not be examined.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course we have the regunot passed them, they may not be able to be promoted until the regular promotion exami-But no promotions have been made without promotion examinations.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand that a promotion examination ought to have taken place which has not taken place.

Mr. FOSTER. I think every regular examination has taken place. There may have been an application for a special promotion examination, which was not granted.

Contingencies—Department of Militia and Defence

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) $1,500 for clerical and other assistance, seems to me an enormous sum in a department like this.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is a decrease of $350.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I should imagine that in a department of that kind the regular officials would do all the work. I can understand that in some of the other departments extra clerical assistance would be required, but in a routine department such as the Militia Department, it would appear to an outsider as an unnecessarily high amount. I think it could be cut down to $1,200.

Contingencies-Department of Secretary

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is an item of $1,600 for clerical assistance. Now, in this department, of all others, where the work is absolutely routine, I do not see how so much clerical assistance is needed.

Mr. FOSTER, My hon, friend must take the estimates as a whole. He will find that when the Secretary of State comes with his main Estimates, there is a reduction of $8.-000 or $10,000. I went over the matter with him, and we agreed that he should have this amount for temporary clerical assistance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I notice there is an increase in the number of employees of from 19 to 40 since 1877.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in the temporaries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The amount has increased from $35,000 to $53,000. But 1 am pointing out that there is an enormous increase in the permanent staff. I think that staff could be cut down two-thirds.

Mr. FOSTER. The staff is to be cut down.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That being so, there ought to be less necessity for voting this sum.

Mr. FOSTER. The Secretary of State will give good explanation from the main Estimates.

Contingencies-Department of Printing and Stationery...... $5,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What department is that?

Mr. FOSTER. That is under charge of Mr. Dawson.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That department used to be under the control of the Secretary of State.

Mr. FOSTER. It is now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the figures I gave of 19 clerks instead of 40, those of that department were included.

Mr. FOSTER. We have a large printing bureau now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, but still the old duties are to be discharged, and the Minister will see that those duties represent a certain amount, so that leaving out the extra work arising from the Printing Bureau, the Secretary of State's Department has doubled in expense.

Contingencies-Department of Indian Affairs

Mr. McMULLEN. Why is such a large sum required for clerical assistance in connection with Indian Affairs?

Mr. DALY. It is partially owing to reof State..... $5,900 turns asked for by the hon, gentleman himself. In addition, the Auditor General has imposed extra duties on the department, which necessitates clerical assistance at different periods of the year.

Mr. MII.LS (Bothwell). Of course it is possible to arrange the work in a department in such a way that it may be doubled or quadrupled. In 1878 there were eight clerks, besides two extra clerks employed, and the cost was less than $10,000 annually. Last year there were 52 clerks employed, at a cost of $54,880. There is no justification for that expenditure. I propose, however, to discuss the whole subject on a motion, of which I have given notice.

Contingencies — Department of $7,000 Works

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the Minister received any report from the Department of Justice with respect to a matter in examination before the Public Accounts Committee, regarding an officer suspended for alleged misconduct?

Mr. OUIMET. I was informed by the Minister of Justice that the department yesterday sent their report to my department. It has not come before me yet, but will probably do so to-morrow or the next day, and I will let the hon, gentleman know the re-

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the individual in question received any portion of his pay?

Mr. OUIMET. No; he is practically dismissed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The rumour has got abroad that he is receiving $2 per day.

Mr. OUIMET. In the case of employees not on the Civil Service list suspension means dismissal, because they are only paid by the day, and the moment their services are dispensed with their pay ceases.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the hon, gentleman to say that this person has not received any pay.

Mr. OUIMET. Not to my knowledge. I am quite convinced he has not.

Contingencies—Department of Agriculture. $16,500

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any real reason why the Archives Branch should be continued, and is it really necessary? Does the Minister propose to make any change in regard to it?

Mr. FOSTER. It is intended to continue the Archives Department. It is a department with which we cannot dispense. It is doing most excellent service in the matter of collecting and arranging old historical documents from the libraries of London, Eng., and Paris. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman is such an iconoclast that he A CONTRACTOR OF THE CONTRACTOR wishes to do away with the service altogether, although he may desire to criticise it. The Archives Branch has been for a long time under the Department of Agriculture, and there is no reason why it should not continue under that department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Objection has always been taken to the place where the branch was located as being very inaccessible. It should be in the vicinity of the library, and if the library were larger it should be there, but there is no room for it. At all events it should be in some position convenient to this building, so that it may be easy of access to members who desire to consult the documents. A few years ago it was in the basement of the western block, and a man visiting there might as well go into a prison.

Mr. FOSTER. It is evident the hon, gentleman has not visited the branch lately. It has been removed to the new building, and the quarters are fairly convenient, and indeed good. It is in the basement.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it is a scandalous place in which to keep books.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think Mr. Brymner would allow anything of that kind to go on.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. genand tleman his colleagues have lowed for someit to $\mathbf{g}_{\mathbf{0}}$ on Books become mouldy and moth-eaten there, and covered with rust spots which will in a little while render them of no use. You spend thousands of dollars in making copies of documents that are inaccessible except in certain quarters in England, and after you have spent a large sum of money you put them where they soon become worthless. That is a very mistaken course to take, and it would be infinitely better they should be in a second or third story where there is air and light, than be put in a basement.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) is right, if that be the condition of things, although I think he has painted it a little darker than it is. The Government is now taking under consideration the whole matter of the archives of the Hitherto there have been three divisions of the archives and records. Some of them in the Privy Council Department, some of them in the Secretary of State's Department, and others in the Agriculture Department, and the Government is taking into consideration the amalgamation of those three, so as to avoid a duplication of work and separation of records. The whole matter will be considered and I hope we shall be able to put the archives in a better position than they are. It is quite true that such valuable works should be kept where they can be easily consulted by literary men, and the best possible quarters given them. It is the intention of the Government to take the whole matter up and to see if better conditions cannot be made in connection with the whole of the archives.

Mr. SCRIVER. I am very glad to hear what the hon, the leader of the House says in regard to the intentions of himself and his colleagues, but I know that the road to a certain place is paved with good intentions.

Mr. FOSTER. We are not going there.

Mr. SCRIVER. I hope not.

Mr. DAVIN. But you would like to send them there.

Mr. SCRIVER. No. I would not.

Mr. DAVIN. I mean metaphorically.

Mr. SCRIVER. No, not even metaphorically. I consider the language used by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) none too strong in regard to the manner in which these valuable books are now housed. Having visited that place as I have done several times, I confess I am surprised that such intelligent men as the members of the present Government, and men who I may say take a deep interest in matters of such great importance to this Dominion as the proper preservation of the archives, have not done something other than has been done to house these books in a proper way. I may say, if it would have any influence to encourage the Minister in the course he has promised to take, that some distinguished literary men who have come here from the States, and have asked almost in the first hours of their visit to see the place in which we keep what they admitted are documents of rare inportance and value; I have heard them express wonder that we should keep these books in such an apartment. I learned to my surprise and my regret that it was seriously proposed to transfer the books from the cellar in which they are, to the basement of the Langevin block, and I am told on good authority that that would be glad to hear the Minister speak so encouragingly about the matter. I do hope that some arrangement will be made which will provide a creditable place for keeping these documents, and not only a creditable place, but a place in which a man like the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the members of the House generally can consult the volumes. Before taking my seat, I wish to say a word by way of bearing testimony to the admirable manner in which Mr. Brymner is discharging his duties. He is the right man in the right place.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SCRIVER. Mr. Brymner ought to be sustained in every reasonable way in his efforts to take care of the books under his charge.

Mr. DAVIN. I echo the gratification with which my hon. friend (Mr. Scriver) has heard the remarks of the Finance Minister, and plate a policy that would lay the foundation of a national museum where these valuable documents and archives would be properly kept.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I call the attention of the Minister to some remarks made by Dr. Marmette, in connection with the place where the archives are housed. In the book published of the Royal Society's transactions this year, he says:

It is much to be desired that the Government: soon take measures to provide the department with accommodation more suitable for a library, already so important in the way of manuscripts and printed books. The three small rooms set apart for the archives are already so encumbered that we are at straits to place the new collections that we are constantly receiving. Indeed, the dampness of the quarters, which are situated in a basement, is injurious not only to the health of the staff, but also to the preservation of the valuable documents which are under its care.

The council adds this recommendation:

The council hope that the Government of the Dominion will soon find itself in a position to provide suitable accommodation for books and manuscripts collected at such large expense, and so invaluable to the country, and indeed to the world at large. If it were possible to build a national museum worthy of the Dominion, then a section of it could be properly devoted to this service. In the meantime, care should be taken to prevent any damage or deterioration to these valuable manuscripts, and to enable the staff to make the best possible arrangements for purposes of reference.

I do not propose to discuss the question of a national museum in the present state of the finances, but both these suggestions will, I am sure meet the approval of the Finance Minister, and ought to be adopted. utmost care should be taken to prevent deterioration of the manuscripts, and in addition to that the best possible arrangement should be made to facilitate reference to them.

Contingencies-Department of Trade and $3,000 Commerce

Mr. McMULLEN. This seems an exorbitant sum for clerical assistance in that department.

Mr. FOSTER. This department has a very small permanent staff, and there is a good deal of clerical work in preparing commercial returns of all kinds. That cannot be done without help. The permanent establishment of the department is kept very small, and it is intended to keep it small, so that it is necessary the work should be done by temporary clerks.

should have Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought that in the institution of a new department like this, a new departure would be made and economical principles begun at least.

Mr. McMULLEN. We vote $54,000 for I think that the Minister ought to contem-clerical assistance in all these departments over and above the ordinary staff, and it appears to me that the Government could cut that down if they tried. I am sure that there is not a return prepared in the Department of Trade and Commerce, or at least I do not remember of any order for a return in that department this session.

> Mr. FOSTER. My hon, friend is wrong. If he will look at that item, he will see that the $3.000 includes both sundries and clerical assistance, while in the case of the other departments these two items are separate. So that, taking that into account, this is a small sum compared with what many of the other departments get.

> Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course, this is merely a branch of a department. The Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue are now under the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and you have $6,-200 for clerical assistance in this department.

> Mr. FOSTER. That is scarcely a fair way of putting it.

> Charges of Management $164.150

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I asked for some information.

Mr. FOSTER. I have the information here. What we have done is to add $150 to Mr. Pope's salary, making it $1.950, $100 to Mr. Leitch's, and $100 to Mr. Loughran's.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think Mr. Leitch deserves better treatment than that. He has been for many years in that office.

Mr. FOSTER. I will look at that matter again.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice an increase of $2,500 in the item of commission for payment of interest on the public debt. I would like to know where the principal portion of this money goes?

Mr. FOSTER. It goes to our agents in London under the terms of the contract entered into in 1892, by which terms my hon, friend will remember we saved a large amount as compared with the preceding arrangement with Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co. The increase arises from the increased amount of the transactions. Sinking funds increase every year, and consequently the brokerage increases.

Administration of Justice-To pay two Official Arbitrators $1,000 each..... $2,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought these official arbitrators were done away with?

Mr. FOSTER. One was done away with. He died.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought the Exchequer Court judge did all the work now.

$1.500

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. These are assistants whom he may call in. They are referees of the judge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They are not 'ad hoc' referees, but nominees from year to year?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I fancy they are about as much use to the Exchequer Court judge as the masters in chancery were to the Chancery Court judges. They took up a great deal more time to dispose of cases than the judges, and in fact, they were a capital scheme for putting fees into the lawyers' pockets.

Circuit allowances, British Columbia.... $7,500

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why is this sum so large, when Manitoba has only $2,500? That appropriation, it seems to me, arose from the condition of things that existed before there were any facilities for travel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is owing to the very heavy expense of travelling over large portions of country, where travel is difficult, and the expenses are great.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the hon. gentleman any statement to show the distances they have to travel?

Mr. FOSTER. The Cariboo district is an immense district.

Mr. DALY. They have to travel 300 miles by stage.

Travelling expenses of judges, weekly sittings of High Court of Justice at London and Ottawa.....

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have introduced a new item for the travelling expenses of the judges from Toronto to London and Ottawa for the purpose of holding weekly sittings. I have no opinion to offer as to the propriety of holding weekly sittings, but if we pay $1,500 a year for these two cities, that system may be extended to other cities in Ontario, and the question presents itself whether we will not require to have resident judges in these places. Otherwise, we may have to pay considerably more than $1,500 a year, as once you establish the principle, you may have to apply it to other important towns which will claim the same privilege.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I have already explained to the House, we agreed with the Ontario Government that in these particular cases we would ask a grant for this expenditure in order to facilitate the conduct of the work. The hon. gentleman fears that this may lead to an extension of the system, and heavy expenditure, but all these cases must depend upon local conditions. I do not think any other parts of the country could make the demand unless the circumstances were similar. I believe this system is giving great satisfaction to every one concerned in the conduct of business by the wiping out of dockets and preventing arrears of cases.

Supreme Court of Canada..... $21,050

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is one point want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice with respect to the Supreme Court, and which we may as well have talked of first as last. The manner in which the reports are issued to the profession does not reflect any credit on some one-I cannot say where the fault lies. Those gentlemen who take the reports from England know that every month the English reports are published, and they have the reports of the Courts of Appeal almost up to date. In the case, however, of the Supreme Court of Canada, some of the judgments given two years ago are not reported at all. I am not going to charge the reporter or the assistant reporter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think it is the fault of the reporters.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I know the fact is discreditable to some one, and is giving intense dissatisfaction to the profession. It is most unjust to those who live a thousand miles away from Ottawa, and cannot come down here to learn what the judg-We cannot find out what the ments are. judgments of the Supreme Court are on points in cases pending in our local courts, and which must necessarily be governed by the decision of the higher court. Minister of Justice should take measures to inform the reporters that the reports must be out almost simultaneously with the decisions. They are no good when they are published only two or three years later. In England these reports are published monthly; and with the exercise of a little vigilance I am sure that could be done here. If the fault, as it is hinted, lies with the judges, if they keep back their judgments, we ought to know it. We ought to know where the blame lies, and have it put on the proper shoulders. I hear the complaint generally expressed in the portion of the Dominion from which I come that the manner in which these reports are published is most unsatisfactory.

Mr. WELDON. I rise to endorse the complaint made by my hon, friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). The view he expressed I have heard frequently expressed in similar terms. In the nature of things, there is no reason why the profession in our province should have to wait so long to get the Supreme Court reports. As the hon, member has said English reports you can find in the May Publication cases reported which were decided February or March in the appellate courts, while here you have sometimes to wait a year and a half to know what is decided in the case. If the fault is with the judges, I hope that pressure may be applied by the Minister of Justice to obtain greater speed in publishing the reports. The present practice is very unsatisfactory with the profession, very unfair, and not at all necessary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. understand the importance of the suggestion, and I know that the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken understand some of the difficulties that present themselves in dealing with a question of that kind. have no doubt that this discussion will reach the proper quarter. We have control over the reporters, and it is only fair to them to say—for I have heard something this before—that they do their work efficiently and quickly, and if all the judges were as prompt as the Bar desire, if the judgments were delivered and handed down at once to the reporters, I am sure there would be no complaint. But I have heard it stated that the judges consider it their privilege to hold over their notes, after giving judgment, before finally handing them to the reporters for publication. shall, so far as I am able, endeavour to lay in the proper way the views of the House before the Supreme Court, and I hope that something different from the present practice may result.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there is a sum set down for travelling expenses for the judges of the Supreme Court. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. CURRAN. I understand this is for the judges ad hoc—for the judges of the Supreme Court when one of them takes a place in the Exchequer Court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see how that can be. Is there any provision in the statute allowing that? If the judges of the Supreme Court have jurisdiction to exercise Exchequer Court powers it must be by virtue of a statute.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This must be a mistake. I think this must be for the Supreme Court judges before the introduction of the Exchequer Court Act—there was an appeal from the sitting judge to the Supreme Court. This must be a continuance of an appropriation that was voted under different circumstances.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before we continue this vote the House ought to know what it is for.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I confess it. I will get the information before the item comes up on concurrence.

Mr. McMULLEN. My reason for asking the question is that there is an increase of $250 in the item this year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The object of that increase is this: Parliament has always provided for painting the portrait of the Chief Justice of Canada. just as in the case of the Speakers and other dignitaries. That rule, of course, applies to the present Chief Justice as to his predecessors, and the additional $250 is for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has anybody been appointed in Mr. Duval's place?

SIT CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER, No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You intend to fill that place, of course?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes; that is necessary to the complete organization of the court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As to the item for printing, binding and distributing the Supreme Court reports, I see you are asking for an increase of $1,750.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was found necessary on account of the cest of printing. This is wholly in connection with the publication of the Supreme Court reports.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope that as we are voting $1,750 extra we are going to get better service next year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A great deal of that comes back to us.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not much.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Some of it.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the House having sat to so early an hour this morning. I have no doubt all are very tired, and I think it would possibly meet the wish of the House if we were to adjourn and have a good night's sleep before to-morrow's work. I move, therefore, that the House adjourn.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 21st June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE presented third report of the select committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates, as follows:—

The Committee recommend that the services of Mr. A. N. Montpetit, a member of the staff of translators of the Debates, be dispensed with from this date.

SHORE LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. GILLMOR moved that Bill (No. 119) (from the Senate) respecting the Shore Line Railway Company be placed on the Order paper for second reading on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that Wednesday's Order of proceedings, under Rule 19, be made the Order of proceeding for Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance when we may expect the return in regard to superannuation. The hon, gentleman has a motion on the paper on that subject, and I would like to know if we are to have the return before we are asked to take action on that motion.

Mr. FOSTER. It will not be ready for some days yet. They are working consecutively at it in the department, but it is a very large return.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to inquire when I may expect the return with regard to Hayter Reed.

Mr. DALY. I think I shall be able to let the hon, gentleman have it on Monday. It is all ready.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to call the Government's attention also to a return ordered on the 29th of April, showing the sums of money paid to members of Parliament outside of sessional indemnity, mileage, &c.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Finance again whether he can say anything with regard to the time when the returns I asked for on the 26th of April will be brought down. These returns are of great interest, not only to myself, but to all the British Columbia members. It is now two months since they were asked for, and I cannot see why they have not been brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. I am informed by the officer of my department who has charge of that, that it will take about ten days yet.

ing certain expenses of the public service, for the financial year ending the 30th of June, 1895, and for other purposes relating to the public service (Mr. Foster) was read the second time.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 92) further to amend the Insurance Act (Mr. Foster), was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

Mr. EDGAR. These are comprehensive changes, and I think they should be explained.

Mr. FOSTER. I did explain them, but probably the committee does not remember the object of the Bill. A change was made in the Act last year, fixing a certain date at which the statements of the companies doing business in Canada, and the statements οť business outside those doing When it came Canada, were to be in. to be practically worked out, it found that it was physically impossible for the British companies, whose business extends over the whole world, to get their statements in at the date fixed in the Act. In some cases the society or company did not hold its annual meeting until either later than the date or so late that it was impossible to get the statements in in time. So that we found ourselves face to face with this difficulty: on the one hand, the impossibility of these companies getting their statements in at the dates fixed, and, on the other hand, the imposition by the Act of penalties for any dereliction in that regard. The difficulty was one that could only be cured by legislation. The penalty was a money penalty, and also involved the withdrawal of the license or the cancellation of the license fee. The whole matter brought to my attention and that of Council, by the superintendent, and referred to the Treasury Board, and the Government took the responsibility of waiving the penalty for the time being and not cancelling the licenses, and promised the companies interested to introduce legislation by which they could get their returns in at the times stated in the Act. The change made here does not interfere at all with the working of the Insurance Act and the obtaining of proper information for publication in the report which is laid before Parliament and the country. Practically, it does not make the report much, if any, later than it would otherwise be.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does not interfere with provincial companies?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does not require any license from them when they are doing business outside of their own province?

Mr. FOSTER. These clauses do not affect the provincial companies at all.

On section 4.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a section for a different purpose. The effect of it, if it is passed, will be to make it necessary that insurance companies based upon the assessment plan shall conform to the Insurance Act in this respect as well as in other respects with regard to which they have already conformed to the Act. That will, in effect, render the deposit of the amount fixed by the Act necessary before they shall It is a receive licenses to do business. change the necessity for which has been making itself felt more and more. It is very strongly recommended by the insurance department; and, considering the congested state of insurance on this plan, and, having due regard to the security of policy-holders and also to the fact that no very great hardship is imposed upon the companies, inasmuch as the deposit bears interest, and becomes a fair investment, it is considered highly necessary and advisable that this provision should be adopted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister will see that the expression used is geographical, and ought to be jurisdictional. It says: "Companies incorporated or legally formed in Canada." It ought to be "incorporated or formed under the authority of the Parliament of Canada." The hon, gentleman will see that the expression in the Bill is wide enough to include insurance companies in the provinces, with which we have nothing to do.

Mr. FOSTER. The clause sets forth just what is intended—that all assessment societies, whether incorporated by a province or under the authority of the Parliament of Canada, shall be included.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We cannot give ourselves jurisdiction; we may simply invite a lawsuit.

Mr. EDGAR. The section in the Act relating to the assessment companies reads as follows:—

Any such corporation or association may be licensed by the Minister under the provisions of this Act, to transact business in Canada upon depositing with him fifty thousand dollars.

The first part of the section which explains what such corporation is, says:

The provisions of this section shall apply to corporations or associations incorporated or legally formed elsewhere than in Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of life insurance upon the co-operative or assessment plan.

Subsection 2 makes the provisions of this section apply to outside companies.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This makes it apply to those as well as inside companies.

Mr. EDGAR. Inside companies, whether provincial or not?

Mr. FOSTER. Outside companies have already to make a deposit. That is already provided by the law, and the intention is to make it apply to domestic companies incorporated under provincial charters, if they ask for a Dominion license. When they do, they come under the Dominion Act.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not dispute the correctness of this legislation unless that it is pretty sure to prevent any more assessment companies applying here for incorporation. There was a discussion in the Banking and Commerce Committee, at which the leader of the House was not present, in which this question was pretty well threshed out. I known that in one case in which application was made by an assessment company for incorporation, when told that this would be applicable, they will drew their application. I rather think that will be the case altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. It will introduce caution, no doubt.

Mr. EDGAR. Whether desirable or not. that will be the effect. Assessment companies of course have not the same facility for raising $50,000 as stock companies have, and this will stop their applying in future, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. There will be no scarcity, if it does stop new ones coming in, for there are a great many now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This will give the Government jurisdiction over companies incorporated in the province. I do not know exactly under what condition that would arise. In the next place, I do not see upon what grounds the Government can claim to exercise jurisdiction. In the Parsons case the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that a local legislature might make regulations fixing the conditions upon which any company incorporated outside the province, shall undertake to transact business within the limits of the province; but I do not know under what authority, or in what way, this Parliament should undertake to exercise that sort of jurisdiction over an insurance company of any province, unless in the Territories, because if a company incorporated by one province undertakes to exercise jurisdiction outside the province. but within the limits of Canada, it would be exercising jurisdiction within the local geographijurisdiction $\mathbf{a}\mathbf{s}$ well as the cal area of some other province. do not see where, except in the Territories, where they would come under the jurisdiction of this Parliament at all; and so I do not see how the hon, gentleman going to make this portion of legally operative so far as local insurance companies are concerned. Indeed, I think it is extremely doubtful whether he could make it operative with regard to foreign companies; for it seems to me that whenever a foreign company comes into Canada it undertakes to transact business, except in the case of the Territories, within the limits of some province, and then the rule laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Parsons case would apply to such companies. I do not know, except the Territories, any area in Canada in which the provisions of this Act is to operate, with regard to foreign companies or even with regard to local companies; and it seems to me that it would simply invite a contest in the court, whenever any company had any interest in calling in question the authority the Dominion is claiming to exercise.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend does not understand the measure but has taken the wrong view with reference to it. There is no interference with the jurisdiction of any other body. There is already an Insurance Act passed by the Parliament of Canada, and any company asking to come under the provisions of that Act and to exercise the right of insuring in our country under that Act must submit to its conditions. An insurance company can be incorporated in, say Ontario, and confine its business to that province without coming under these provisions of the Act in this regard; but if it makes application to do business in the Dominion and wishes to come under this Act, it must comply with the conditions and make the deposit of $50,000. But no company need do this unless it likes. chooses to get the benefit-for it is a real benefit to a company to be able to say that it is operated under the Dominion Act and under the supervision of the Superintendent of Insurance—it must comply with the provisions of the law. But the whole matter is purely voluntary; there is no force exercised, no compulsory jurisdiction. If they wish to do business under our law, we lay down a condition that they shall make a deposit which will be some fair guarantee of stability. With reference to what my hon. friend said as to the effect of the measure, there can be no doubt that unless there be a certain amount of strength to an assessment company, it will feel that it is not able to make the deposit; but, on the other hand, probably it would be better if that element of caution were introduced and the policyholders given the added security that, at least, for every society that did business in that way, there was a certain amount deposited with the Government which could fairly be looked upon as security for his policy to the extent it went. It will probably Mr. Chairman—the hon. member for South have the effect of inducing some not to come into the field; but it is no bar to a really well-founded and worthy assessment company which wants to do business for the benefit of the insurer rather than itself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Heretofore our practice has always been, with respect to these Bills amending the Insurance Act to send them to our own Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think we did that last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I think we ought to have done so. The original Bill was discussed in that committee, and so were the subsequent amendments.

Mr. FOSTER. The original Bill was.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the subsequent amendments were also referred to that committee. There are a number of gentlemen on that committee who are specially conversant with these subjects, and I think it would be a great pity, in the case of this Bill, to depart from the ordinary usage of referring it to that committee.

Mr. FOSTER. It is so simple a Bill.

RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. practically very little discussion to any profit can take place here. A man cannot understand these things well without having the Act before him and going over these amendments with some care. If the hon, gentleman has any reasons for objecting to sending the Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, I would suggest that he allow it to stand over a short time, so that the various parties affected may be communicated with.

Mr. FOSTER. I find that last session the amendments were sent to the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I have no objection to following the same course in this case if the House thinks it advisable. As to the first part, it is simply a matter of detail and is not important at all. second does involve less simple considerations.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not disputing the character of the Bill; I am pointing out that it is practically impossible to consider such a measure unless one has the opportunity of doing it with the statute before him, and of hearing the opinions of the parties who are concerned; and, for that reason, I suggest sending this to the Banking and Commerce Committee. There are quite a number of points that cannot be taken up here without very great waste of time of the House, which points are worth considering. I daresay that the Bill is a good one, but I think we had better adhere to our former practice.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I may say,

Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) not having been able to attend many of the meetings of the Banking and Commerce Committee may not be aware—that the principle involved in this section has been discussed in that committee on at least two, and perhaps three, Bills that have been before the committee; and in two of the Bills that are passed, this principle has been incorporated—that is, requiring the $50,000 deposit. So far as I can judge of the opinions of members by the discussions in that committee, they are fully in accord with this section.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not prepared to dispute that this is a very good Bill. I daresay it is. All I say is that I think, in view of our regular practice, this Bill had better go to the committee. The interests affected are very large, as the hon. gentleman knows. I forget how many hundreds of millions the Finance Minister stated as the amount of life insurance in Canada; and, while I am fully in favour of taking every possible precaution to secure the policy-holders, I would rather also have these matters carefully considered, which we certainly cannot do now to any purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. Only that the principle is so simple a one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the application of the principle is not always so simple, as the hon. Minister knows. I should feel obliged if the Minister could see his way to sending this Bill to the committee. It is true, as stated by the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee (Mr. Wood, Westmoreland), that I have not attended the meetings. But that was because there was no such Bill as this before the committee. Had there been I should have attended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee has stated, this principle has been discussed several times by the committee during the It may be that the inpresent session. terests are of such vast importance that it would be desirable to solicit the opinions of others than those who have come before the Banking and Commerce Committee, but there can be no doubt that the committee have carefully considered the principle. The general consensus of opinion in the committee. I agree with the chairman in stating. is that this principle should be embodied in the general Act, and not left to be discussed upon the separate Bills respecting various societies as they come up from time That was the conclusion reached by the Banking and Commerce Committee. But my hon, friend suggests there may be interests involved which have not been presented to that committee, and which may perhaps induce the Minister to refer this Bill back.

Mr. MULOCK. The matter of insurance le-companies with every possible safeguard. gislation at the present time, I think, is in a Lu the Banking and Commerce Committee somewhat unsatisfactory condition. We have a great many varieties of applications for corporate powers to enter on the insurance business, and there appears to be little or no uniformity of practice in regard to granting these powers. Now, some years ago the same element of uncertainty existed in regard to other important corporations. The time was when banks had separate charters with separate powers. The same remark applies to the loan companies. For many reasons it is inconvenient and undesirable that companies which are large enough to be grouped together and constitute a considerable class, should have different powers. It is embarrassing to the management, it is an embarrassment to the public, and it is embarrassing to the courts. If all companies of a certain kind, and engaged in a certain kind of business, say, banking and commerce, for example, have the like powers, a decision by the courts with respect to one applies to them all. In 1870, I think, a general Act was passed providing for uniformity in regard to the charters of banks, and so, later on, a general Act was passed under which loan companies could be incorporated and acquire corporate powers under the general Act, and thus uniformity was provided for in regard to the powers of loan companies. But no such legislation has taken place in regard to insurance companies, probably of all the companies the most entitled to careful consideration at the hands of the Government. There is no class of the public that has a better claim upon the consideration of the House and the country in respect to the powers, and the workings, and the strength of the company that they are dealing with, than the life insuring public, and yet there is probably no class of companies to-day engaged in business that in my opinion has received so little wise attention at the hands of the legislator as have insurance companies. To-day each company has its different powers. One company has power to invest its trust funds in securities that the court would not allow trust funds to be invested in, and others have more restricted powers in regard to investments, and there is no uniformity, in fact, ir respect to their powers; so that the state of insurance companies is not, I think, wholly satisfactory. It is idle to put down insurance companies as trading companies. having similar business dealings with their customers. An insurance company is a trust company. The insured deposit money year after year, in the expectation that after the expiration of a certain number of years, or an uncertain number of years, that fund, or an equivalent to it, will be forthcoming for the benefit of the insured, or of the beneficlaries in the contract. So many years elapse between the contract being entered into and the benefit being claimed by the beneficiaries, that you cannot be too careful in surrounding the management of these

I have frequently called attention to this view, and I do so now believing that it is a question that is entitled to be dealt with by the Government, to be taken up as a Government question, and that the House ought to be advised by the Government in respect of a general scheme under which companies may be incorporated, if you like, as loan companies, by letters patent and their powers be made part of a general Act. At present everything is more or less haphazard. A short time ago the late Premier gave his attention to this matter, and he announced, if I remember rightly, that insurance companies were to be restricted hereafter in respect to the classes of invest-The matter came up in regard to the application of one important company for certain powers to invest funds. That attracted attention—to the matter, and to some extent perhaps has attracted the attention of the committee; but as yet there has been no good come out of it, there has been nothing but agitation. So it looks to me now that whilst the drift of the committee is in the right direction, yet it has not assumed form and shape. I submit therefore that whilst this is a move in the right direction, strengthening the company, yet the matter is sufficiently important and sufficiently urgent to be dealt with, if you like, after a policy has been suggested by the Banking and Commerce Committee, or by the Committee of the whole House. At the earliest possible date, I think it, is the duty of the Government to present a scheme dealing with this whole question.

Name of the contract of the co

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to the matter going to the Committee on Banking and Commerce and coming from them in the usual way, as I find that has been the course adopted heretofore. But at this late period of the session, and there being practical unanimity of opinion with reference to what is being done, is it necessary for us to go through that form? Might it not be as well to let the Bill pass now?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We cannot get it before the committee unless we send it there.

Mr. FOSTER. We would have to report progress, and then send it to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I think it would be as well to let it go now, as long as there is no practical objection. I want to say to my hon, friend that no interests can be prejudicially affected. It does not have a retroactive effect. It is simply for those who apply hereafter.

Mr. BOYLE. It is altogether unnecessary to send this back to the committee, except as a mere compliance with a recognized practice. The opinion of the committee has been had on two previous Bills, and so strong is the sentiment with regard to this matter that wen if there were no legislation of this character, the Banking and Commerce Committee, as at present constituted, would insist that such provision be incorporated in any Bill coming before them as would constitute the same protection to policy-holders as the Bill now before the House contemplates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not disposed to raise objections to the Bill itself. I merely want to consider it. Do I understand that these clauses—I do not see any special provision to that effect—only refer to companies hereafter applying?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; the last clause only refers to companies which come up hereafter. The other sections simply relate to the time of giving in the returns of the companies doing business outside of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the hon, gentleman remembers that we had a good deal of discussion as to the way in which these various statements were made out.

Mr. FOSTER. That has not been altered in the least, except in the time when the statement shall be presented to the Insurance Department. No change at all has been made in the condition or character of the statements.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The rest of the clause is ipsissima verba as in the fermer statute?

Mr. FOSTER. Exactly the same.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What alterations have you made as to the dates?

Mr. FOSTER. The alteration in dates has this effect: What they call for is that these statements should be made 15 days after the general meeting of these societies in Great Britain. That will bring in the most of them about the 1st May, others it will in bring earlier than that. Of companies interested, the names which are set out, the great majority of them will, under this provision, make their returns in May, and only three or four will be later, they sending in their returns in

Mr. EDGAR. I think there is no doubt that the Banking and Commerce Committee have this session considered the matter pretty fully, and it seems they seem to have formed an opinion on section 4, which is the only material one in the Bill. In view of the work before the committee this session, which I hope is now very near its close, the Government are somewhat to be blamed because they did not bring down this legislation earlier, so that it might have been referred at an earlier date to the Banking and Commerce Committee and before private legislation occupied the whole time. I suggest that if further legislation on this subject is proposed it be brought down at an earlier date, because there are interests, perhaps not private interests of parties holding policies, and policy-alone, which view the insurance law as holders are compelled to submit to those very important, and they cannot be heard | changes, although they have not been a in the House except by button-holing members, whereas if legislation was brought down earlier in the session the Bill could be immediately referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee and its provisions argued out before the committee instead of through the ear of the Finance Minister or the Inspector of Insurance.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not object to that and passed. principle.

Mr. EDGAR. There is a provision, section 43, which provides that the Act shall not apply to benevolent societies although they do life insurance business. There are some societies doing an enormous life insurance business in this country which call themselves benevolent associations, and they are absolutely without inspection of any sort or kind by the Government. There is a difference of opinion as to the meaning of a benevolent association. An interpretation is given by the officers of the department, but some people think it does not comply with the terms of the Act. There should be some provision for Government inspection of benevolent societies which do life insurance business, and I hope the Government will consider this question, and if they submit another measure, will endeavour to deal with that aspect of the insurance question.

Mr. SPROULE. I fully agree with the statements made by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). One of the greatest needs of the time is the enactment of some uniform law which would control insurance companies or organizations, whether regular companies, benevolent associations or assessment companies. At the present time there is a disposition all over the country to devise new societies; such societies are floated in large numbers every We have taken our cue from the United States. Many of these societies are short-lived and do injury to the persons joining them, because in many cases the people obtain no returns and are prevented from joining other and regular companies. This would be a good time, when the insurance law is being amended, to devise some uniform law that would control all these societies, and, in addition, would make all of them subject to inspection, and compel them to make annual returns to the Government, so that people may know on what principle they are being conducted. We should also take away from the societies the power they imagine they possess of making by-laws that invalidate contracts entered into by people insured in those organizations. Certain by-laws will control their operations this year, for example, and a number of people will be induced to enter the association. Next year the by-laws will be changed to the detriment of the interest party to them, before the evil assumes too great proportions, and we are compelled to go through a similar experience to that which the United States has passed through. The law should be amended so as to control all these companies or organizations doing insurance business, no matter on what lines.

CHARLES HIBBERT THPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 129) to amend the Act respecting judges of provincial courts.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GENERAL REVENUE FUND-NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

House resolved itself into committee to consider resolution (p. 2573) respecting the General Revenue Fund of the North-west Territories.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DALY. I may explain to the House that this Bill is required, from the fact that in 1887, at the request of the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories an Order in Council was passed providing that all the fines collected for infractions of the liquor law, amounting to about $5,000, should be paid to the Legislative Assembly for their use. The Order in Council profor their use. The Order in Council provided simply that the fines for the infraction of the liquor law should be paid over. At that time, this sum was in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor, and it was ascertained subsequently that it included penalties under other Dominion statutes. The Auditor General raised two questions: First, that the sum mentioned included other moneys than those collected; and. second, that the Order in Council was not retroactive, and only referred to moneys subsequently collected. This Bill is necessary in order to legalize the handing over of these moneys to the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. LAURIER. Is it referred to in the Report of the Auditor General this year?

Mr. DALY. No. It is a communication we had from the Auditor General, who requested this legislation.

Mr. DAVIN. There are no sums to be paid now.

No; the money has all been Mr. DALY. paid, and this Bill will be to confirm it.

Resolution reported.

SUPPLY-ATLANTIC AND SUPERIOR RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to have a little more explicit understanding, if possible, than is afforded by the answers which the Finance Minister gave to certain questions the other day about the Atlantic and Superior Railway Company. He stated, in reply to one of my hon. friends (Mr. Flint), that the Government had agreed to guarantee an issue of £500,000 sterling on their first mortgage bonds. As I understood him, the money had not been paid. Has it been paid?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the general principle, I think the attention of the House might very properly be directed to it for some little time. This company, as I understand, proposes to issue £4,000,000 sterling first mortgage bonds. Now, according to the statement made here, it would appear that they propose to have recourse to the expedient of depositing £300,000 sterling in the hands of the Government at 3 per cent, for the purpose of inducing the Government guarantee £500,000 of 4 per cent securities for a term of twenty years. In that case they will have to pay a very heavy sum, and get very little for it. Of the £500,000 issued, they will only get £200,-000 available, and, as they lend at 3 per cent, and propose to borrow at 4 per cent, they will have practically to pay £11,000 a year for the privilege of getting hold of £200,000. Now, the point which I want more particularly to call the attention of the House and the Finance Minister to is this: The Minister declares expressly that the Government have not guaranteed, and do not propose to guarantee the interest on the bonds, but, at the same time it is perfectly certain that these people endeavour to make the English investing public believe that the Government of Canada have examined this matter, and that they have or consideration guaranteed a certain part of it, they will endeavour to float. I make no doubt, the whole £4,000,000 if they can, on the strength of the guarantee of some £500,000. Now, unless this road has been constructed to a sufficient extent to warrant the issue of £500,000 first mortgage bonds upon it, it strikes me that the Government are in very great danger of being placed in a most invidious and awkward position in the eyes of the English investor should this loan, or a large part of it, be issued and placed on the English market, and should it afterwards fare as a good many other of our railways have fared and go into default. It cannot escape the attention of the Government, and particularly of the Minister of Finance, that a good many persons, in the English press, and in the English Financial Journal, have been commenting of late very severely upon Canadian railways, and in particular have been commenting a good deal upon the fact that the Government was mixed up with some of these-which I need not particularize, but some of which will, no doubt, occur to the memory of all parties—and have apparently endorsed the schemes, and that by reason of their endorsation a number of English investors have been induced to place their moneys in securities which have proved utterly and entirely worthless. It does appear to me that while the Government incur no financial risk, so far as this particular transaction is concerned, yet, that the Government are in considerable danger of injuring the credit of the country at large if this Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway should prove to be an improvident or ill-considered undertaking. I do not think, Sir, that the benefit we would receive from borrowing £300,000 sterling at 3 per cent, is at all, for one instant, to be weighed in the balance with the injury which would accrue to the credit of the country if a sum of three or four millions of pounds sterling is floated on the English market, under the supposition that the Government of Canada had looked into this matter, are satisfied with it, and have given their guarantee to it. No doubt that the statement made by the Finance Minister will be reported in the English journals of high class, and will attract some temporary attention. knowing something of the way in which these matters are floated in England, I can see very considerable danger of a great many persons being taken in, provided always that this company is not a company of first-class standing. I do not know myself sufficient of it to pronounce either pro or con, but the point which I understand and which, I think, the House should understand is this: there is a very considerable danger, indeed, of our credit being compromised if we guarantee a small portion of this loan, and if that is made use of as a means of floating a much larger one. This is a thing on which I should be very glad to hear the policy of the Government. It does not appear to me that it would be at all desirable that we should go into the business of becoming a sort of trustee for railways which we may, or may not, approve of. Of course, in the case of such a guarantee as was granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that was a matter in which the Government of Canada had every opportunity to look into all the details, and were themselves, so to speak-I cannot say exactly large subscribers—at any rate, they were large donors to that road. But, apart from that-in a case where the Government is merely doing this, apparently as a sort of financial speculation-I doubt exceedingly the desirability of allowing our name in any shape or way to be mixed up with a company which at this present moment I fancy is largely in the air. I should like to know if the Government have any information as to the extent of the road which has been constructed up to date; because if no sufficient portion of this road has been constructed and is in actual operation, it does appear to me that our connection with it may be placed in a very ugly light before the English investing public, and that we may have cause to regret, and very seriously regret, we have allowed ourselves to appear in any sense or way as guaranteeing even the interest of a comparatively small portion of this four million pounds sterling. If the whole amount were guaranteed by us, I would see much less objection to it; but guaranteeing one-eighth, and one-eighth only, does appear to me to be a very hazardous proceeding-I will not say questionable proceeding, for I suppose the Government have some reasons for it which the hon. gentleman has not stated in his brief answer to the question of my hon, friend. I do not want to make a motion on this matter; but I do think that as a question of public policy the attention of the House and of Government should be called to the use which may be made by unscrupulous promoters of just such a transaction as that which is detailed in the replies to these questions; and I think the Minister himself and his colleagues will see that they should give a great deal of consideration to it before undertaking to guarantee even a small fraction of a loan of this kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection at all to the matter being brought up in the way in which it has been by my hon, friend. The facts of the matter are really all contained in my answer to the question which was put by the hon, member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) the other day. The Government does not guarantee this road or the scheme which is being promoted by the company, or by the gentlemen who are interested in the company, in any way. So far as my department was concerned, this was simply looked at from the financial side. The arrangement that I did ultimately make was that if these gentlemen would deposit a sum of £300,000 when we wanted the money and the necessity arose for making the loan, we would take that deposit, we would allow them 3 per cent interest upon it, and we would pay the principal and the accumulated interest, to themselves, or to the trustees, or in such manner as they wished. Their idea was to issue £500,000 bonds at 4 per cent, and their wish was that the interest and the principal should be paid no hesitation at all in saying that this is out to the holders of the bonds, and that open to criticism; and it is in relation to is the direction which the negotiation took. | that I make the statement that it is not

So that, in plain language, it is simply this: if they deposit with the Government £300,-000 of bonds, the Government will allow them 3 per cent interest upon that amount, and will pay the accumulated interest and the principal to the holders of the bonds, the calculation being made, of course, as to the amount to be deposited, so that the principal deposited and the interest which accumulated would be sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds that were issued at 4 per cent, during the currency of the bonds. So far as Canada is concerned, I see nothing at all objectionable in that matter. simply some thing like the sale of an annuity or the taking of a loan upon advantageous terms; but when the company's bonds are sought to be issued in a market outside of Canada, where probably the same information does not exist that exists in Canada, I can quite see that it is open inferentially to the objection which my hon, friend states, and upon which he founds his criticisms. So far as I am concerned, I have taken every means of putting the exact state of the affair before the British public. And as my hon, friend says, it has been taken up and is now thoroughly well known on the market, and has been for some time. So that all those who look into the scheme must look into it on the simple point of view of the scheme itself, on its merits, without any idea at all that it is guaranteed, so far as the scheme is concerned or the road is concerned, by the Government, or that the Government has any interest in it whatsoever. They simply raise, by whatever means they can, this amount on deposit with the Government, which the Government accept as a loan, to be paid out to the bond-holders. My hon, friend wanted to know whether that was a policy which the Government would adopt. I can frankly say that it is not. It is a transaction which does not mark by any means a policy laid down by myself as Minister of Finance. This is a transaction standing itself. Ι have no hesitation saying further, if I agree to accept money on the same considerations in any other case, it will only be on the condition that the Government have sufficient interest in the project to thoroughly look into it and become sure of its bona fides, and accept a loan or deposit on equally favourable conditions. In the meantime, I think no harm whatever or danger, can result. I can quite see that investors who are not 'au courant' with the London market, and who invest through their solicitors or brokers and the like, and who have not the same facility for understanding all these things, might be led to a conclusion not exactly right, if the prospectus were in any way flavoured on account of the deposit made or interest paid in any way. To that extent, I have a part of the Government policy, and, as far as I myself am concerned, I would not follow out a like transaction except upon the conditions I have named.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the money deposited yet?

Mr. FOSTER. My information is that it is not deposited.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon, gentleman has laid much stress on the statement that this transaction is not to be considered as part of a policy, but he has failed to give us any reason why it has been adopted by the Government. The fact that this transaction is not to be construed as a policy is conclusive that it is not of a character to meet with general favour. I quite understand that if the character of the road were such as to command general approval and confidence. if the line were built, or if there was capital visible at the back of the line, or other evidence of solvency, the Government might not have objection to introduce such a transaction. But nothing of the kind is known. I do not know that the company will have any money except what it can collect on its bonds. Under the circumstances, the only objection is that the investing public may be led into an error by the fact that the Government has entered into this agreement. There is the danger that the British publie may be drawn, by this deposit, into another of those wild schemes which have made colonial securities time and again stink in the British market. The hon, gentleman has said that he has taken every precaution to have the investing public made aware of the conditions upon which the Government have accepted the deposit of that money. I am not aware that he has done anything of the kind, because, according to the statement in the press several weeks ago. all that was made known was that the Government had simply accepted the deposit. I am not aware that he has taken any measures to make the public aware of the character of this particular transaction. If he has taken any other steps, he should inform the House and the public what those steps were.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going to enter into a discussion concerning the financial standing of the company itself. I know nothing against the standing of the company or its bona fides, or the project which they are carrying out, which involves the working of a large railway connection. I have nothing at all to conceal from the House and the public in this matter. It arose in a very simple way. The promise that I made to accept such deposit is now before the House. It was made some time ago, and I looked simply at this point, that we needed money and that the rate of interest on a temporary loan to the Government would be 4 per cent, and that, if this deposit were made, we would be getting the money at 3 per cent. I looked at it simply from the point of view of a transaction beneficial to Canada at that time. It was in that view that I agreed to it; and having agreed, I did not go back on my scheme, but stood ready to supplement it. So far as regards the means taken to make the exact facts of the case known, I have conducted no canvass against the company, and have taken side neither with the objectors nor the promoters of the scheme. That was not a part of my business, as I viewed the transaction; but I have been careful to have stated in the most influential quarters in London just exactly the position of the Government. All the financial papers in London have leading hat statement. It is current property among all the financial men in London. When my hon, friend says that harm might come through investment, he only referred to what we might call subsidiary investments. The promoters, the financial men on 'Change in London, who are the first in these matters to carry them through, know all the facts.

Mr. CASEY. I think the last remarks of the hon, gentleman are the most important he has made in connection with this matter. He tells us that he has himself made no investigation as to the standing of the company, that he is not concerned in discussing its standing with the House, that his promise was made in consequence of temporary scarcity of money, and that he accepted this proposal because he could obtain money thereby at 3 per cent, instead of going on the market and getting a temporary loan at 4 per cent. His statement is that for the sake of a difference of 1 per cent on £300,000, or $1,500,000, he has taken a step which, he admits himself, may have a very serious effect upon investors in a company of which he does not profess to know anything. I think that is a very serious statement to make. He tells us that he has had the whole matter explained in the leading financial journals of London, and that therefore the first takers of this stock, the floaters of loans of this kind, are in no danger of It may be true, as he being misled. stated, that the danger. if any be · to arise, will the secondary chasers. But surely it is the secondary purchasers, of all others, whose interests we should have in view in an affair of this kind, so far as the interests of any purchasers are concerned. The large financial firms of London are generally able to pro-They generally know tect themselves. enough of such schemes to invest carefully and wisely; but what is pointed out from this side of the House, and what the hon. gentleman himself admits, is that the transaction will enable the first takers of the stock, those who float the company in London, to pass it off upon individual investors, who will look upon it as stock issued with a Government guarantee.

It is not merely the interest of investors. however, which is concerned in this question. but the financial standing of the Canadian railways, and the honour of the Canadian Government. If it turns out that even to this extent the Government has been mixed with a road which may prove to be of the character of the Caraquet Railway, into the sad and disgraceful particulars of which I need not enter now, the honour and credit of Canada will suffer, and the reputation of Canadian railways as borrowers will suffer. It will begin to be believed that the Canadian Government guarantee is something that may be bought by railway promoters in the way suggested by the hon. Minister. Any railway may come to the Government, when the latter is hard up, and by making a deposit with it, obtain what such a recognition can give, and enable the stock to be passed off on unsuspecting investors as a stock with a guarantee from the Governnot only of the bonds but of the soundness of the company.

There is, still further, a third danger just as great. The hon. Minister said that this is a good investment; that is in the nature of selling an annuity, or effecting a loan on favourable terms. It seems to me that it would be a very dangerous power to leave in the hands of the Government, to allow them to negotiate for the sale of annuities or for loans without the special authority of the House. What is the case? The hon. Minister has been able to borrow $1,500,000 without giving any notice to the House or any account of it to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend need not pursue that further. All the power was had in that respect and nothing not customary has been done.

Mr. CASEY. If this has been customary, I am sorry to hear it. I do not say that anything illegal was done; but I say there is a laxity in our control over the hon. Minister, if it be the fact that he is allowed to sell an annuity in this manner and make loans of this nature without making any statement to the House and without declaring his policy of making such loan or selling such annuity. It is usual, when the Government wishes to sell annuities to ask authority to do so, and I think that should have been done in this case.

Then, as to the nature of the transaction itself, a comparison of the amount and the amount of bonds deposited secured shows that the transaction is what is called in financial circles a very shady one. What is the company professing to borrow? £500,000! Of that amount they are going to deposit £300,000 with the Minister, out of the principal and interest of which he has guaranteed-what? Repayment of the bonds? No, Sir. Payment of the interest on those bonds. In other words, on the face of the transaction, three-fifths of the amount borrowed, even if this loan could be floated at par, is to be devoted to paying interest upon the whole of the principal. This, on the face of it. I think, is as shady a scheme as has ever been brought to the notice of the House. It is of so peculiar a character that I think the Minister was bound, as a matter of duty to look into the case to find out who the promoters were-which, no doubt, he knows -what their means of carrying on the railway are, where the railway is located, and other things which the Minister professes not to know. But he probably does know, and no doubt he will tell us, who the promoters of the road are, who the moneyed men in it are, and what are their prospects of raising this money otherwise than by floating these bonds. Nothing has been told the House of any means possessed by these parties of obtaining this money except by floating these bonds, three-fifths of the face value of which—which will be more than three-fifths of the proceeds—is devoted to the payment of interest. I think it is a sad thing for Canada that it should be known in England that this Government will mix itself up in any way with a company which proposes to pay interest on bonds out of the money received from the sale of those bonds. I think this feature is sufficient to condemn the whole transaction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Minister of Finance has stated that he has taken care not to commit the Government in any way to recommending this company to the favourable consideration of English financiers;—that all the Government have done is to agree, in case loans are made to this railway company to the extent of £500,000, to take £300,000 of that money at 3 per cent interest and to pay it out to the bond-holders according to the arrangement which the company may have made with the parties who succeed in raising the money, the Government is getting a loan of £300,000 at a very moderate rate pecuniarily, but it seems to me that after all the country would be paying very dear for money so obtained. I cannot conceive of the Government making such a promise without being morally held before the English people as approving of the enterprise itself. How is it possible for the hon, gentleman to promise to accept the deposit of £300,000 from that company without leading the parties in England who have this money to loan to the conclusion that it is a reputable company, one worthy of credit, and one to which the parties who are making the advances may safely lend their money? In my opinion the Government cannot escape a certain responsibility, and, that being so, I think it a most unfortunate thing; and it seems to me that it would be in the interest of the country that the hon. gentleman, even at this late day, should withdraw from the arrangement which he has made. No money has yet been received vanced to the Government; and it is still open to the Government, it seems to me, in the interest of the country and for the sake of preserving the honour and credit of the country, to decide to have no connection with the company. I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, how the hon. Finance Minister can take the position he has done, how he can say to himself or to anybody that it does not matter to him what the character or standing of this company is. He says: The character of this company may be very good, or it may be very bad; I wash my hands of all responsibility for the company's acts. say that the hon, gentleman cannot say that; the hon. gentleman cannot say that in the interest of Canada; because if the company becomes bankrupt, if the people who advance this money lose it they will hold the Government of this country responsible-they will say: The Finance Minister, by offering to accept this money from these people, led us to believe that it was a reputable company, a solvent institution. one engaged in a rational and proper enterprise, an enterprise that can and will pay the parties who advance the money for the purpose of carrying it on. That is the position the hon. Minister at this moment takes. and it is a position which ought not to be taken. It would be infinitely better to go upon the London money market to obtain such money as the hon. gentleman needs in the public interest and to pay more for it, if that is necessary, than thus to obtain this money upon the terms upon which parties who are undertaking to promote this railway enterprise offer the money to the Government. I think that the hon. Minister has not given an explanation that will satisfy the House or the country with regard to the connection of the Government with this There is but one straightforward course for the Government at this moment, and that is to notify the parties that the Government will not receive the money. will have nothing to do with accepting of money on deposit or of payment for its use.

a displacement production of the control of the con

Mr. EDGAR. There is another feature of this case which I have no doubt the Minister of Justice has fully considered and which he will be able to explain to the House. While the Government has, of course, power to borrow this money as the Finance Minister has said, I would like to know whether the railway company has power to lend the money. Has the railway company charter powers to be a banking institution as well as to build railways? If it has not special provision in its charter authorizing it to collect money from shareholders or bondholders and to loan that to anybody, to invest them in this way and not for the purpose of constructing the road, then I say the loan is illegal. The company cannot make such a bargain; any bondholder or shareholder of the company could restrain them from mak-by the company; no money has been adding it. I assume that the Minister of Justice has carefully looked into this matter and can give us chapter and verse of the powers of the company which authorizes them to loan their capital in this way. I should think also that the Finance Minister-speaking from another point of view-would be able to tell us how the £500,000, the interest upon which the Government practically guarantees, is to be issued. Is it to be issued before the road is constructed, and how much per mile of constructed road is to be covered by it, or is the section usually insertin railway charters to be acted upon, authorizing the railway company to issue bonds on the portion constructed or under contract for Surely the construction? Minister Finance has considered that point too. Then, looking at it in another way, the Minister of Finance says this is a transaction very much like the sale of an annuity. Well. what authority has this company to act as an agent of Canada for the sale of Canadian annuities? That is what it amounts The Government is constituting this company, in that point of view, its agent for the selling of this annuity. The company advances its money to the Government, and the Government says: We will create an annuity fund which you can use and sell for us. Then another thing occurs to me. The Minister of Finance says that the leading financial men in London will understand all about this business. Well, we all know that it is not the money of the leading financial men in London that buys bonds of this kind; we all know perfectly that a house there may take up a loan, but it issues circulars, and advertisements, to all its clientèle over the country, and invites little investors all through the country to subscribe for this loan; and what would these know about it? Will there be in the prospectus that will be issued there, a full statement that the Government does not know anything at all about the merits of this scheme, does not know where it begins, and where it ends, or whether it is productive or ever will be productive? That is what the Minister tells us to-day. He is very frank about that. But will the prospectus that is to be put out as a decoy, with the name of Canada on it, to get money from the investors all over England—will the prospectus say this? I think this is a very serious thing, indeed, and will be injurious to the credit of Canada unless it really turns out to be an exceptionally successful enterprise; and even if it does, the risk and danger that is being assumed by the Government, is, I think, entirely uncalled for in this case. Then I would like to know who the board are. Who are the great financial men? Who is the official with whom my hon. friend the leader of the House made the negotiations? To whom has he yielded this extraordinary concession? There must be an individual in the case, there must be some-body controlling this projected scheme with whom the Minister has made the arrangement which he says he feels himself bound to carry out. I hope he will give us that information. It is very important for us to know that, and I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in hoping that it is not too late for the Government to withdraw altogether from what I think was a very improvident and rash undertaking.

Mr. KENNY. I do not know how regular this discussion may be, but both sides of the House must recognize its importance. As I understand the question, certain gentlemen who were promoting a railway, approached the Minister of Finance, and intimated to him that they desired to float, in England, bonds to the extent of £500,000, and that they wished to deposit in his hands £300,000 in money, on which they expected to receive 3 per cent interest, and asked the Government to be responsible to the bondholders of this company for the interest and the principal.

Mr. LAURIER. Not the principal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The interest for twenty years.

Mr. KENNY. Well, undoubtedly that is an arrangement which is liable to very great abuse, and I am quite sure that the Government would recognize that, and exercise the power with very great discretion. Nothing is more sensitive than credit, and to-day, happily, the credit of Canada stands very high in the English market. It is our interest, it is the interests of the Government, while sustaining its own credit, to help that of every commercial and financial association in the country, and I fear much that the power to issue bonds, with a Government guarantee for the interest in the hands of unscrupulous men, might be used in a manner which would result disadvantageously to Canada, by misleading the investing public in England. Now, as regards the brokers, and men who are interested in stocks, they can always protect themselves, they are always sufficiently well informed. But what we want, or any people want who are borrowing money on the English market, is to have a security, is to have a bond, which will be accepted confidentially by the general investing public. We do not desire to have our bonds only floating in the hands of brokers; it would endanger our chances of placing Canadian railway bonds succesfully hereafter, if such an arrangement as this with the Dominion Government fell into the hands of unscrupulous men. Therefore, I say that I regard this debate as a very important one, and in the exercise of the power conferred upon them by Parliament, this Government and every Government should exercise very great caution.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am pleased to hear the remarks of the hon, gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) whose financial standing is so high in the Dominion, and who stands at the head of one of our leading banks. I am glad he has seen fit to take part in this discussion, and to express himself in the manner in which he has done. I followed him closely in his remarks, and I think those remarks have received the closest attention of the House, and, I am sure, ought to have great weight with the Government. Now, we must remember that this country is a borrowing country, has been so in the past, and must be so for many years to come. It has large resources which have to be developed, and to develop these resources it will be necessary for us to resort to the money markets of London. Therefore, it is of the greatest national importance that so far as Canada is concerned, it should only lend its name, even if it lends it indirectly, to schemes which it can morally as well as legally endorse, schemes which we are prepared to encourage or to promote; and the utmost care should be taken that the name of Canada should not be associated even indirectly with those schemes which are known as wild-cat schemes. Now, what is the scheme we have before us now? I think the name of this railway is the Atlantic and Lake Practically, it is a Superior Railway. scheme to construct a railway from Gaspé to Lake Superior, a railway which is going to parallel, partly the Intercolonial Railway, partly the Grand Trunk Railway, and partly the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, I do not want to make very strong assertions, but from what I know of the scheme I will venture to say that there is not a financial man in Canada who, unless he had ulterior objects in view, would invest one dollar in that scheme. It is what is popularly known, whether correctly or not, as a wild-cat scheme. I have talked with a great many men, some of them having knowledge of the subject, and I have never met one man yet who looked upon it as a feasible scheme, feasible in the sense that it will ever be a paying scheme, either directly or indirectly, directly to the share-holders, or indirectly to Canada. The pro-moter, I believe, Mr. Armstrong, a gentle-man well known in this House—I do not know that I am doing wrong in mentioning his name-is a gentleman whose profession is that of a railway promoter. is at the head of this scheme, and he goes home, associated with other gentlemen, some of them, I believe, whose financial standing is not bad, and hopes to be able to float this loan of £500,000 upon the London market. Now, it must be perfectly plain to everybody that as three-fifths of the loan borrowed is to be deposited in the hands of the Government, there will be but a small sum left, and he has no reasonable hope, with that small portion, of constructing that road; it cannot be done. I was pleased with one or two of the remarks of the Minister of Finance. He said that he was not in a hurry to repeat this financial operation again. I think he is aware by this time, to put it mildly, that he did not take sufficient precautions in the matter. Surely he did not take sufficient means to ascertain whether this scheme to which he was lending, in an indirect way, the name of Canada, was a bona fide scheme, or whether it was a bad scheme. Well, I respectfully submit to the hon. gentleman that that is what he should have done, and that, under no possible pressure, should he have been induced to lend the name of Canada to a scheme unless he was assured that it was a bona fide and respect-That seems to be a perfectly tion. I understood the hon. able one. proper position. gentleman to say that he would not go into a similar scheme again. I am pleased to hear that, so far as it goes; but if there is any means by which he can withdraw from the position to which he has been committed, I think the general sense of the House would say that those means should be adopted. So far as the great financiers on 'Change are concerned, they are pretty well able to take care of themselves, they will inform themselves pretty well as to the exact position of the Government. But, as has been explained by my hon. friend behind me, they are not the class of people who really invest their money in these bonds. The loans are drawn from the widows and clergy throughout England, from people and who have small sums of money to invest, and to my mind it would be a deplorable national event if those people invested £3(0,000) or £400,000 in a scheme which Parliament will not venture to say is bona fide, which in all human probability will turn cut a wild-cat scheme and fizzle, but to which we have, if not directly at all events indirectly, lent our support and countenance. The point taken by my hon. friend is one which the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Justice should answer. This company was incorporated with certain powers. All Acts of this class passed by Parliament contain provisions that the money borrowed shall be devoted to certain specific purposes, the specific purposes being in this case the building of the line; and the company are not allowed to be bankers and to lend three-fifths of the money proposed to be borrowed. If the company have not that power, it should be sufficient and ample reason for the Government withdrawing from the present position, which is a very invidious one and calculated to do financial damage to Canada in the future.

Mr. MULOCK. Although the Minister of Finance suggests that there is no risk run by the Government, yet I venture to say that this transaction may result in direct financial loss to the people of Canada. The Government lends itself to a scheme which may turn out a most unfortunate one, at least to the investors. The Investing public of England are asked to take up £500,000 of bonds to be issued by this company. I presume the deposit with the Government will be made up entirely out of the contributions to the loan. The company in the first instance will deposit nothing unless they float this loan, and £300,000 of the £500,000 is to be placed in custody of the Government, and on its receipt the Government are to endorse the coupons for 20 years. That is the bait with which to catch the unwary investing public in Great Britain, the capital is to be put in jeopardy, and at the expiration of 20 years, when the coupons have all been paid, what security is there for repayment of the principal? The Minister says, none. What does the company say, then? This amount of £500,000 is part of a total capital, according to the scheme, of £4,000,000. It may result in the ultimately unloading on the British public of a very large sum, and when the interest, which it is proposed the Government shall guarantee has been paid the English public, if the loan is successful, then when the principal is in danger, the scheme being without bottom to it, the investors will no doubt make an effort to hold this country liable. The Finance Minister says probably, in his mind, there is no legal liability. Right, there is no legal liability. But what do we know is going on now in regard to other transactions? The Government endorsed the Chignecto Railway scheme. Their endorsement was not to continue if the scheme was not carried into effect on or before a certain day. The English public invested a large sum on the faith of the endorsement of the Government. The time has run by, and the Government have escaped legal liability. But what do we see going on now? In England measures are being taken to induce the Canadian Government to extend the liability, and a portion of the Canadian press has stated that it would be most dishonourable for the Canadian Government not to renew the liability. What happened in regard to the Caraquet Railway, whose securities were endorsed by the Canadian Government. By the substantial aid given and the false credit given, the English people were induced to invest their money in these enterprises. In the case of the Cara-quet Railway a meeting of bondholders was held in London, and a resolution passed that the action of the Dominion Government in endorsing this scheme had been the direct cause of inducing the English people to invest in those securities and put their money in the enterprise. They found themselves trapped into the scheme by the Government bait, and their money was lost unless the Government came to the rescue. If the Government does not come to the rescue, what is the effect on the English investing public? There is nothing, as the hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said, to lead to trouble. The sooner the matter is more sensitive than capital, and to impair our credit is to cause a direct loss to the Canadian people. We are borrowing in the English market constantly, we have two hundred millions of English money borrowed and the Canadian people are constantly obliged to renew the bonds, and if our credit becomes impaired and weakened, if an idea prevails that the finances of Canada are in weak hands and there is not the very best judgment exercised on our part in carrying out projects and in avoiding schemes not in themselves justifiable, we shall have to pay for it in the shape of increased interest. That is a direct result of loss of credit, and I trust the Finance Minister will at once withdraw the name of the Government from all connection with this road. Let me remind the Minister that already there is colour given by the press to his connection with the scheme. On 17th June the Montreal "Gazette" published a despatch from London, to this effect:

It is stated that the Government of Canada has guaranteed the interest on the bonds for the period of their currency, and that the coupons will be so endorsed.

That is, however, only with respect to £500,-000, while the prospectus published in the same paper speaks of a total loan of £4,000,-000. The ordinary investor will certainly think that the Government of Canada, before endorsing those bonds, had investigated as to the sufficiency of the company and come to the conclusion that was safe to endorse them. does not say that the endorsement is procured, because of the cash to make good that endorsement having been deposited with the Government. The prospectus being silent as to the reasons for the endorsement, leaves it to the investing public to conjecture in many ways, why the Dominion Government chooses to guarantee the interest for twenty years. If it were possible to write upon every coupon, and in every newspaper, and to bring to the knowledge of every possible investor, the fact that this Government does not know whether the enterprise is an honest one or likely to be a profitable one or not, and that the endorsement was simply given because money to make good that endorsement was deposited with the Government, perhaps the Government would escape moral responsibility. But, here the Government is giving a fictitious credit to the scheme by endorsing the interest, and the fact that there has been deposited the money with which to endorse it, is being withheld from the public. The transaction is one of such importance that it is due to the House, and due to the credit of Canada, that the Minister should recede at once from the transaction and withdraw the pledge that has been given. It was an unwarrantable pledge and an unjustifiable pledge, and one that is sure, sooner or later, fact of Government aid being granted to the rectified by our withdrawing from all intermixing with the scheme, the better for the Minister and the better for the credit of the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is unquestionably a very important matter and it is a good thing that it has been discussed in this House. If the entire sum intended to be placed upon the London market was £500,-000 and that under their charter they could issue no further sum. I do not see that any very great evil could arise. But, from the fact that they have power to issue £4,000,000 it appears to me as if the Government were to a certain extent placing themselves in a position to be morally looked upon as bound for the interest on those bonds on account of which they have received no deposit.. Every year schemes of this kind are placed on the market to get at the money of English investors. So far the credit of Canada has been fairly well maintained. However, the Finance Minister is aware that the "Investor's Review," published in London, has indulged in very severe criticisms within the last six months on certain investments in Canada. It behooves us to be very careful as to what the Government should lend the credit of the country to. If Canada wants money it would, in my humble opinion, be far better to borrow in the ordinary way at the ordinary rate, than to secure a small sum in this way at a low rate by lending countenance to a company that is yet in a very questionable position. doing so, it may possibly enable that company to impose upon the English investors to such an extent as to cause another unpleasant reflection upon Canada as a borrowing country. It is very fortunate that this matter has been brought up by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and if it has not yet gone too far for the Minister of Finance to retrace his steps and allow those who are trying to promote that scheme to adopt some other means for floating their bonds, I think it would be very much better that the Minister should withdraw from the guarantee, so that we may be saved from the disaster that possibly might occur in the course of a few years, of this developing into a huge swindle on the English investors. We should guard against repeating our experience in the case of the Caraquet Railway and Chignecto Ship Railway. These things are undoubtedly an injury to Canada. Although the country is not bound to pay these in-vestments, after all, everything of that kind causes a certain amount of suspicion and creates a feeling of distrust with regard to the country's credit. We cannot afford at this moment to further intensify the feeling of distrust which does exist on account of worthless bonds that have been placed on the London market and sold with some show of being good investments owing to the schemes by the Dominion and the provinces. I hope the Finance Minister will be able to reconsider this whole question and to withdraw, if possible, from the position he has taken.

Mr. McALISTER. Mr. Speaker, if hou. gentlemen opposite who criticise this road so severely and call it a wild-cat scheme, were aware of the facts connected with it, and knew the country through which the road passes, they would not speak as they have done. True, it is an opposition line; at least it will be run largely in opposition to some of the existing lines, but at the same time that is no reason why the road should be denounced. We know that the terminus of this road, formerly called the Baie de Chaleur, is in one of the finest outlets to the Atlantic, and therefore is certainly deserving of some favourable consideration. The part of the road already built has been operated last year and it more than pays expenses, without having any connection with the other roads at all. I do not think that the road will be in opposition to the Intercolonial Railway. On the contrary, it will be a feeder to the Intercolonial Railway, and will bring it traffic, rather than divert traffic from it. We know that Gaspe and Paspebiac are nearer to Europe than any other port along the eastern coast of Canada, and therefore in summer time particularly it will be the shortest route to Europe. This road forms a very important link in what Mr. Fleming called the "short route to Europe." The road from Metapedia, where it branches from the Intercolonial Railway, continues to Gaspé, a distance of about 200 miles, and all along the coast it runs through the most fertile country. Not only that, but it runs through perhaps the finest fishing districts of Canada, and for the short time a portion of it has been in operation it has been developing trade very materially. If it forms connections with the other roads and obtains communication with the Pacific coast, we cannot help its running in opposition to other lines, and if it is a paying scheme, which I think it will, that is no reason why it should meet with opposition in this House. As one of the representatives of that part of the country, I cannot in justice to myself sit here and listen to the hard language that has been used towards this road without stating what the facts are. It is a scheme that has not only a fair, but a bright prospect before it, and if it is built, I have no doubt that it will be found to be one of the most successful, and perhaps, one of the best paying roads in the Dominion.

Mr. FLINT. The hon, gentleman, in his personal anxiety for the success of this enterprise, has perhaps misapprehended the line of most of the criticisms made on this side of the House. Those who object to the Government's attitude with regard to guaranteeing the bonds of this company, are not necessarily hostilely criticising the enterprise itself. All they ask is that it be allowed to stand on its own bottom, and make its way in the world, if it requires credit, upon its own merits. What we complain of is that the Government, by guaranteeing under these circumstances any proportion of the bonds proposed to be issued by the company, are giving that company a false credit in the minds of a large portion of the investing public, and thus tending to injure them as well as to a certain degree the credit of the company itself. Now, I think this procedure will in the end bring upon the Government themselves no small amount of embarrassment; because there are a large number of enterprises of this kind that will be encouraging to cling to the skirts of the Government, and ask Government to take some part of the funds they may raise by way of loan, and guarantee the interest on a certain proportion of the bonds, not to exceed the amount the Government may have at any time in hand. If this is to be the policy of the Government with regard to schemes of this kind, then I think Parliament ought to take into its consideration very seriously whether it will endorse that policy. I have not made a study of this question so far as to know whether there are any other outstanding undertakings of the same kind; but it does strike me, as it has struck other members who have spoken, that this is a very dangerous course for the Government to enter upon and one which ought to be viewed with very great distrust; and if the Government have not gone too far to retreat, I think they ought to take the first opportunity to withdraw from a position so greatly fraught with danger.

The second secon

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to inform the hon. Minister of Justice that I have here the charter of the company and the amendments of last session, by which he could point out the powers this company has.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman is a lawyer of such good standing that I think I need not do more than suggest to him what unfair treatment of this company or any other company it would be at such a juncture to have their powers discussed, in a discussion which, while interesting on the main question, is not of that character to make the opinion of any hon, gentleman in regard to their powers very valuable, while it might contain an element of danger. I confess that I am not prepared to discuss the borrowing powers of that company at the present moment.

Mr. EDGAR. Their lending powers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Nor their lending powers either. I think it might involve questions which would require far more consideration at my hands than I would be able to give them in a tion has been very fully discussed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have here the last statement of the earnings of the Baie des Chaleur Railway for the year ended 30th June, 1894, by which I find that with a total mileage of 80 miles, the earnings were $921 for passenger traffic and $957 for freight traffic, the total gross earnings for the year being $1.890. The proportion which the net earnings bore to the total working expenses was 72 per cent; that is to say, they were 27 per cent worse than nothing. I do not want to pursue the discussion further than just to say this: apart from other considerations, and wholly and entirely on public grounds, I think the Government would do well to look into this matter closely, and reconsider it before the arrangement is implemented.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. might state to the committee, in reference to the subject of judges' travelling expenses, which was discussed yesterday, that I have found out from the registrar of the court, that that is, as was suggested by some hon. gentleman, simply carrying forward the old grant which existed before we had the Exchequer Court. A small item was paid last year, owing to the fact that Judge Fournier, being at or near Quebec, went into the city and heard and disposed of a motion by consent of both parties. The item may be struck out on concurrence.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is this Dominion police force? Where is it located?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It has the usual strength, there is no reduction, and the headquarters of the force are at Ottawa. The details are all given at page H-16 of the Auditor General's Report. There is an inspector, four sergeants, twenty constables at $1.65 a day, three at $1.50, and eight at $1.25.

What are the salaries Mr. McMULLEN. at Ottawa, $2,272?

On that item there is a decrease of $4,000, including other articles, such as bedding.

> Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe a reduction of about 25 per cent in the item of tobacco. While we do not want, in the slightest degree, to make the prison an abode of luxury, I would like to know how this reduction has been made.

> CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We propose gradually to discontinue that item altogether, as it is a practice which has crept in, and which it is not desirable to encourage. My officers are of the opinion that it would be wholly in the interests of the prisoners to abolish it altogether. We are reducing the allowance to the old prisoners, and not continuing it to the new.

Mr. DAVIN. As the Minister just says, he uses tobacco, it would be well if the Finance Minister in such cases as spoken of, were to give him a quid pro quo.

Mr. DEVLIN. The Minister just stated that there were no complaints against the warden.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. would not be understood as saying that there have not been, for I do not know. None have come to me since I became Minister of Justice, but I have not sufficient gentleman's question very fully. The agent knowledge of the previous records to say gets general instructions, and, unless the knowledge of the previous records to say definitely that there were none.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do I understand the hon. Minister to say that supplies are advertised for for the whole year?

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Sir Yes.

In what way are Mr. McMULLEN. tenders called for?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They are advertised for in about forty newspapers.

Mr. GRIEVE. Perhaps the Minister can tell us at this stage the facts as to the binder twine manufacture in the penitentiary. On the 3rd June, I moved for a return showing the quantity of twine manu-

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. have no recollection of that return being I suppose it was moved for moved for. It could not be prepared in the department, so word was sent to the officers of the penitentiary and they are preparing the re-It will be ready for the hon. gentleman before many days.

Mr. GRIEVE. Is the hon. Minister able to tell us how much twine has been manufactured for the present season?

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have manufactured an average of fortyfive tons a month.

Mr. GRIEVE. At what price is the twine to be sold at this season?

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The agent is now on the road taking orders. The prices vary. It would be rather inconvenient, and I think detrimental to the public service if I were to answer the hon. committee presses for the information I would rather not go into details. If the committee presses the matter, I would not feel warranted in withholding the information; but I would put it to the hon, gentleman, whether it would not be better to ask that question after the season is over.

Mr. GRIEVE. I ask the question, be-Mr. DEVLIN. I read in the newspapers cause I understand that the twine is being sold to the farmers for delivery at the railway stations. If so, I cannot see why the department should not give the information to the farmers.

> I understand that a Mr. McMILLAN. great deal of the twine is being contracted for in large quantities. But I know, as a matter of fact, that quotations have been given for the twine manufactured in Central Regarding that twine, the farmprison. ers are in possession of the information as to what it is being sold for, and if the twine from the penitentiary is to be sold in small quantities to the farmers, they should know at the first possible moment what the price is to be.

> Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. have not objected to give the information. The instructions to the agent are that the twine is to be sold in any quantity demanded, small or large. Our agent has instructions, while not unduly competing with others or lowering the price in an unfair way, to protect the farmers from any combination in the trade, and to these lines he is endeavouring to keep.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you sell at cost price?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With a small margin. The guide in selling is, while not lowering the regular price, to ascertain, as nearly as possible, what the price is, or ought to be, and to keep to that, even if those engaged in the trade take a different course.

Mr. GRIEVE. I cannot understand why this information should be withheld. There is hardly a newspaper in the country but is advertising the price of twine as sold in the hardware stores. If these parties are giving the price as a matter of information, the department should not withhold the facts regarding the price of the goods they offer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no attempt to withhold the information, but I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question, because the prices fluctuate. Even the agent could not give the answer. His instructions are not to embarrass the trade, but to follow the fluctualtions of prices.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are in the combine.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. we are trying to prevent a combine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The proper business-like way would be to sell at a reasonable advance on the cost of manufacture. It seems to me that in the case of a Government manufacture, there are difficulties in entering into a sort of union with the various individual manufacturers, and that the actual cost of production to us would be the proper standard.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may tell the hon, gentleman that the other manufacturers are feeling much aggrieved in connection with the work that we are now doing, showing that we are not parties to any combination.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think that every farmer in the country is entitled to know what the prices are that the Government charge for twine, so that he may know whether to purchase from the Government or elsewhere. The withholding of this information is the tirst step on the part of the Government to entering into a combine with the private manufacturers. The Government have no right to withhold that information from the farmers. They should manufacture twine for a fair amount above the cost of production and the raw material, and they should not hesitate to let the farmer know the exact price at which the twine is to be sold.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman will see what a very unpleasant business this commercial enterprise is going to be for the Government. It is almost impossible to please any one. We started in with the view that we would be able to employ the convicts in some kind of labour while they remained in the penitentiary, so that they might leave it better than they came to us. The hon, member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who has just spoken on behalf of the farmers, will sympathize with us when I tell him that to-day I have seen two letters from farmers who are interested in the binder twine business established by the Patrons, and who are complaining that we are selling twine too low to the farmers.

Mr. DAVIN. Is any of this twine being sold in Manitoba and the North-west Territories?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is.

Mr. MULOCK. May I ask whether you are selling it below cost, that is, making it with prison labour and underselling free labour?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not put in that way, nor on that ground, and it would not be correct if it were so put. The letters to which I have referred do not make any complaint on that ground. They simply say that we are selling below the price charged by the establishment that is run by the Patrons of Industry.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister whether the price realized for the Kingston Penitentiary twine covers all the cost of manufacture, putting in the labour as free labour, taking interest on the capital as if it were a private enterprise?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will tell the committee the result of last season's operations. We put in plant at a cost of $41,000. The operations began last spring. Sales to the extent of 120 tons were made, the value being $15,400, at 6½c. per pound. The profits realized on this was $18 per ton, convict labour being estimated at 50c. per diem per man. Thirty-seven convicts were employed.

Mr. MULOCK. In ascertaining that profit, did you charge for capital invested in buildings?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. MULOCK. You have to take into account what an ordinary manufacturer would have to take into account.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We did not take the buildings into account, we took the machinery into account, just the $41,000.

The vunprise
It is

Mr. MULOCK. Is that the rule adopted in the department with regard to all manufactures? Take, for example, woodenware. Some two or three years ago the woodenware manufactures of the Eddy Company and others presented a petition to this House complaining that you were underselling them in the market. On that occasion, the Government came to the conclusion to sell all their output of woodenware to those in the trade, or only to market it, at a proper 50c. per day for convict labour? Does the cost, as if it were manufactured by private enterprise. Now, that arrangement is still the price of the plant? in force, I understand, with regard to the Sin CHARLES HIRRI output of woodenware, and perhaps other manufactured products of convict labour. Are you applying the same principle in the sale of binder twine?

Many and the confidence of the control of the contr

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. I am applying the principle I have just mentioned. We estimate only on the labour and the cost of machinery.

We might find ourselves Mr. MULOCK. handicapped, as we are in other industries. and we might find ourselves selling at a profit that would not meet the wishes of the farmers at all.

Mr. GRIEVE. How is that output this year compared with last year?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is larger this year. We had only two months last year, and we used up nearly all. We sell for cash.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any truth in the report that the Binder Twine Company of Brantford proposed to come to any understanding with the Government with regard to price, so as to form a combine both with your company and with the Canada Cordage Company?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. have heard nothing officially of the subject. The letter of which I just spoke of was a private letter, and not addressed to my department. I saw a letter expressing great indignation that we were selling the twine too low.

Mr. SPROULE. I inferred that they had, as it was rumoured that they had applied to the Canada Cordage Company, and also to your company to enter into a combine, and I thought it would be interesting to the country to know whether that was true?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. have nothing official.

Mr. McMULLEN. Were there any losses made last year in the sale of twine?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. $640 is all that is owing, and suit has been brought for that. We did sell on credit last year. But we collected every dollar, which is doing well, considering the finances of the country. This year we only sell to the trade.

Mr. McMULLEN. In arranging the price of twine this year, have the Government had communication with other manufacturers of twine?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. | pay the freight in carload lots to all points. Mr. Mulock.

Mr. McMULLEN. What has been the basis of your estimate for the cost of twine this year? Is it the same as last year, that is, taking the price of the raw material and Government count anything upon interest on

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and we take the labour at 50c. per day.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do you allow any reduction in the way of machinery?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. And after putting all these items together, you fix the price of twine at a certain figure?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, keeping in view the market price.

Mr. McMULLEN. It was generally understood, when the manufacture of twine was begun in Kingston and Toronto, that the object was to place twine in the hands of the farmers at the lowest possible price, and of course we are anxious to find out whether that intention has been carried out. Now, counting 50c, per day for convict labour, there is of course a very small remuneration, and if twine is sold for that price. I suppose the users could not find much fault. Has there been a fall in the price of raw material, or has it increased?

TUPPER. CHARLES HIBBERT There has been a fall.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then in regard to the stock carried over, we shall have paid more than it would cost now?

HIBBERT TUPPER. CHARLES Sir Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then the price is based on the cost of the raw material?

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We got the raw material this year for this year's business.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there not a specified rate at which binding twine is to be sold to farmers east of Windsor?

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no fixed price. We do not want to paralyze the market. As there are other industries of the same kind, our safe policy is to keep the cost as low as possible, but not to unnecessarily affect legitimate business, except when an attempt is made to raise the price and injure the farmers.

Mr. McMILLAN. That does not interfere with other parties. I hold that farmers residing at a distance should have the same opportunity to purchase the product as farmers situated in the locality where the industry is carried on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to inquire of the Minister if any correspondence had taken place with the management of the Brantford binding twine factory. I understood the Minister to say there had not been. I should like to inquire whether he was called upon by the manager of that concern, because I understand he was in the city and that he had interviews with manufacturers of binder twine elsewhere with a view to get the price advanced so that more money might be made out of the industry.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He did not call on me.

Mr. DEVLIN. I understood the Minister of Justice to say that this year the business was being carried on on a cash basis.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said that, but I afterwards corrected my statement, and said it was on the same terms as the trade.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is it true that Mr. Rogers, of Manitoba, is a heavy debtor to the department?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER4 We are suing Mr. Rogers for $600, balance of an account which amounted, I think, to about $4,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. Has there been communication or interview in any manner between the manager of the Brantford binding twine factory and the Government with respect to binding twine?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not with me.

Mr. McMILLAN. Has there been with any member of the Government, or any official?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not able to tell you what happened with other members of the Government.

Mr. McMILLAN. We have a right to know whether such an interview was held with any member of the Government. It is a serious matter if the Government is going to enter into any combine, even with the Patrons of Industry.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. GRIEVE. Before the committee rose at six o'clock, I was trying to get a little information with regard to the value of this binder twine, and the prices during the present season. I must confess that I did not receive very much encouragement in that respect. Perhaps the Minister will be able to give me some idea of the quality of the twine; whether it is to be mostly manufactured out of manilla, or sisal, or mixed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Partly from pure sisal and pure manilla.

Mr. GRIEVE. What is the difference in price between the manilla and sisal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I cannot give the hon, gentleman that off-hand.

Mr. GRIEVE. How many feet will run to the pound?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am afraid these questions are too cecanical for me.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that in a letter I have received from the manager, he tells me that of the two brands of twine which they make, the Maple Leaf, pure manilla, will run 625 to 650 feet to the pound, and the Beaver brand, 525 to the pound. This brand has 60 per cent of manilla in it.

Mr. GRIEVE. I would like to have further information with regard to some of the twine shipped to Manitoba last year; a quantity of which I understand is still unpaid for. Has the gentleman who purchased that twine given any security to the department for the payment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not that I know of.

Mr. GRIEVE. That seems a strange way of doing business. It is peculiar that the Government should ship twine by the car load or half car load to agents in Manitoba who have no responsibility themselves. I understand that this Mr. Rogers is nothing more nor less than a political wire-puller. It seems strange on the face of it, that the Government should ship out twine in that manner to a man of that kind. I think the experience of members of this House is that as a general rule the people who are hangers on of the Government and political wire-pullers are not that class of people whom they should trust in such a way. I suggest that the Government should be more careful in future and get security from persons to whom they ship large quantities of twine.

Remove and sales as a series of the series o

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. think the hon, gentleman is going pretty far in saying this gentleman is a political wire-puller. He is a man of business, and on the $1.700 worth of twine which bought, $600 is due. On the total sales of $15.400, most business men would think it was pretty good that only $600 remained uncollected. I think every dollar of the $600 will be collected in due course. As to the circumstances under which this was done, I am not in a position to say, but from what I know of the gentleman I would think that it was in the ordinary course of business. Suit has been brought for the recovery of the $600.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the Government know anything of the financial standing of this man, and whether there is reasonable ground to hope that the amount may be collected.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This man is still in business, and I have no reason to believe we will be unable to collect the $600. On the contrary, I have every reason to believe the money will be collected all right.

Mr. FRASER. I think there will be no trouble about it, because a gentleman who is able to put up at a first-class hotel ought to be good for a little amount like that. He is now in Ottawa, right beside the Government, and I have no doubt if they asked him for a cheque he would give it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have asked him by way of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. FRASER. That is circuitous.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But very effective if he has the money.

Mr. FRASER. I am afraid the gentleman will resent such measure as that. What I rose to say was, that I am altogether opposed to this method of the Government doing business. I do not believe they have any right to engage in work of this kind. It is no answer in the world to say that another Government did it. I do not think it is one of the purposes of Government, and I am satisfied that cheap as the Government get the labour, it will be found in the end that they will make nothing out of it, because those who purchase will understand the circumstances under which the goods are produced. Unless there is cash paid on delivery, it will be found that somebody will be getting into the Government. If the Government go into making binder twine, why should they not make boots and hats and everything else? It is logical to think that they might do so. I do not believe that to go idle, but I do say that convict labour should not enter into competition with the ordinary business of other citizens. course this kind of thing naturally grows out of the protective system. It may occur where they have no protection, but it is the twin sister of the whole system, and I hope, the machinery is worked as soon as the Government will stop down. that kind of business altogether. The Government is putting itself into competition, just as the Ontario Government did, with private citizens. This is not the business of the Government, and the Goverriment will find that it will not pay them. I want to enter my protest against it, as I believe it is not in the best interests of the people of the country.

AND DATES AND AND AND A STATE OF THE STATE O

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, member for Guysboro' is a little late in the day with his protest. It would have been more timely when Parliament appropriated the money for establishing this business.

Mr. FRASER. I did it then.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then why say anything about it now?

Mr. FRASER. Simply because you must raise your protest continually.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon, gentleman thinks there is anything objectionable in the principle, surely the Committee of Supply is not the place to discuss a question of that character. There are no doubt various views entertained of the principle of the Government entering into business of any kind, either in connection with the penitentiaries or otherwise: but the hon, gentleman will remember that the common consent of this House was given and no serious challenge offered, to the proposition made by the Government at a time when binder twine was selling at nearly three times its price to-day, and when the farmers of the country felt that they were in the hands of a monopoly that was crushing them. Not only with the almost unanimous assent of this House, but with the assent of the farmers from one end of the country to the other, the Department of Justice brought down a proposition that was not only of great benefit to the farmers of the country, but that solved to a great extent that most difficult problem of how the state could employ prison labour; and I say with deference that this is hardly the time, when that business is in progress, to discuss the principle. If the opinions of hon. gentlemen have changed, and they seriously object to the business, it is in their province to challenge the sense of the House in regard to it, and if possible prevent the Government going any further; but while it is the duty of the Government to carry on the business, of course they must get the necessary supplies for doing so, and the other questions men who are sent to jail should be allowed which have been put in reference to the conduct of the business are alone, I think, relevant at this stage of the Supply Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We had a discussion on this subject many years ago, and I remember very well on that occasion, when the former Prime Minister, Sir John Macdonald, sat on this side of the House, he was very much opposed to the Government in any industry any engaging of the products of which would come into competition with the products of the ordinary labourers of the country. I did not subscribe to that view then, and I do not subscribe to it now; but I cannot help noticing one observation made by the hon. Minister of Justice in reference to the monopoly in binder twine. Why, Sir, the Government of which he is a member put a very high protective duty on binder twine in order that the poor fellows throughout the country who are engaged in that business might be enabled to live by the operation. Then the Government entered into competition with them, and the hon. Minister has discovered that the manufacturers of binder twine enjoyed a monopoly and were really engaged in fleecing the farmers by the prices they charged. In the employment of prison labour, there are, of course, two things to be considered—in the first place, how far you can avoid entering into active competition by labour that costs very little with those who have to pay for the labour they employ; and, secondly, how you can best train men who have been idle, and who have been offending against the ordinary laws of honesty, to earn an honest living after they have served their time in the penitentiary. If you are to qualify a man to discharge duties for which there is no market, the training you are giving him will be of no practical advantage. You are to take care that the training you give him will be of some use to him, will command a market price in the community at large. With regard to the question of competition. there is this fact to be borne in mind, that if the men who are confined in the penitentiary were out, they would be entering into competition with somebody, if they were honestly earning their living. If you put them at work in the penitentiary and thus enable them to pay for their keeping there, I do not know that you are doing the public any serious injury. If you are training a man to be a carpenter, or a shoemaker, or a tailor, and he is enabled by means of his labour to pay the expenses of keeping him in the penitentiary, how much more is his labour coming into competition with the labour of others than if he were outside the penitentiary honestly engaged in the same trades in earning his living? The product of his labour is entering into competition with the product of the labour of others as much in the one case as in the other. If he were outside of the penitentiary and engaged in active em-would not seek to run him out of the country. You want more people in the country than are here at present if there is a market for the products of their labour, whatever they may be. A man is sent to the penitentiary because he will not labour, but is endeavouring to live at somebody else's expense; and surely you do not want him to live there at somebody else's expense in a still greater degree than before. You want him while there to do something towards earning his living; you want him to be as light a charge, if he is to be a charge at all. upon the public during his confinement as he would be if he were enjoying his freedom and earning his living as an honest man. So. I think the question we have to consider is how we can employ the labour of those confined in the penitentiary in a way that will be the least burdensome to the tax-payer. If we make the penitentiaries self-supporting, so much the better; to that extent the community will be relieved of taxation. If the suggestion of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) were adopted, that the prisoners be employed on public works, perhaps that would be found to be the most useful way of employing them. If they were employed at making colonization roads, or on other public works, in such a way that they would not escape from the control of the state, that might be found to be the least expensive way of employing them. But the important thing to be kept in view is to make the institutions in which they are confined self-supporting, and to give plenty of work to those people who are not disposed to work voluntarily.

Mr. TAYLOR. Like the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I have never favoured employing convict labour to compete with free labour. But at the time the manufacture of binder twine at the Kingston penitentiary was established, the cry among the farmers that they were being ground down by a hugh monopoly, the Cordage Company, convinced Canadian me that if such a thing existed and it could be broken up by the employment of prison labour, the sooner that could be done the The same thing would follow today if prison labour were not employed making binding twine for the benefit of the Canadian farmer, for I am credibly informed, and am satisfied I can prove it, if a commission were granted, that a combine exists to-day between the Patrons of Industry binder-twine manufactory, and the Canadian Cordage Company, so that our farmers would pay much more if it were not for the work of the Kingston penitentiary. I understand that the price of the Patron article to the farmers was 6½ to 7 cents per pound, while I know that the other is sold and delivered at a much less For that reason, I am quite willing price. that the - nitentiary should continue to turn out binding twine for the purpose cf ployment, you would not complain, and you keeping the combine between the Patrons of Industry and the Cordage Company from overcharging the farmers, as they certainly did to a certain extent this year, and would do to a very much larger extent were it not for the industry at Kingston.

Mr. FRASER. At the time this vote was first taken, I protested against it, and I will continue to protest against it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Challenge the sense of the House.

Mr. FRASER. It is all very well to talk about challenging the sense of the House when the hon, gentleman has a machine majority at his back. I am not saying this particularly of the hon, gentleman's Government, but any Government with a majority at its back is going to carry the items of appropriation. Are we to challenge the House on every occasion when we dissent from an item in Supply?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On every point of principle.

Mr. FRASER. Why, there is not a principle underlying a single appropriation, so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned, which might not be challenged.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is extreme.

There is not an appro-Mr. FRASER. priation which is not a violation of some principle. So far as the hon, member for Bothwell is concerned, I am at one with him in believing that these people should be made to work, but they should be kept employed on Government work, and not enter into any particular business, because if they enter into one you cannot object to their entering into others. My hon. friend says that were it not for the Government manufacturing binding twine, the farmer would not get it so cheaply, and he says that it was in the interests of the farmers that this prison factory was started. Now! he says the farmers have joined in a combine with the very parties whose exactions they ask to be relieved from.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not the farmers.

Mr. FRASER. The binding twine company in the interests of the farmers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not the farmers.

Mr. FRASER. Then the farmers are divided into two classes—those in the binding twine industry, and the other farmers?

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. I thought that protection was intended to lower the price of articles, but here we have the extraordinary argument made that protection to an industry raises the price, and that on account of the very protection given the binder twine industry, the Government has to enter the lists in order to cheapen the price to the farmers. I have never heard from hon, gentlemen opposite such a pitiful give-away of the whole question.

Mr. DAVIN. What has that to do with the question?

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman would like very well if we were to abstain from discussing the question in this way. What is the question? An hon, gentleman says that there was a combine which had to be put down in this way. Another hon. gentleman says that the price is so high this had to be done. The very existence of the works at Kingston depends on the state of things I am now discussing. If that be the state of things caused by protection, we had better find out what other businesses in Canada are conducted in such a way. and where we find that, by the existence of a combine the articles manufactured are made dearer, we should then start a prison factory in order to cheapen them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Take glass.

Mr. FRASER. Yes, I wish the hon. gentleman would run our glass works, which he knows are worthless, and which were killed by his policy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You are getting a dividend.

Mr. FRASER. No, I am getting nothing. I will sell the hon. gentleman my shares, and guarantee to get him all the stock at 10 cents in the dollar, so that he will have a margin of 90 per cent on which to start glass works, and then let him try to break the combine which his protection has formed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The glass works are there yet.

Mr. FRASER. Yes, and the hon. gentleman can have the whole thing for 10 cents in the dollar.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The business is still being carried on.

Mr. FRASER. I beg the hon, gentleman's pardon; they are not doing a single thing. A couple of citizens are doing a little business.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I saw more than two citizens at work.

Mr. FRASER. There are two citizens carrying on a little glass work, but the glass works in which the company put their money are not doing anything.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Your company is one of them. Your company is doing something.

and the state of t

the works in the interest of the poor glass-blowers, and of the people who buy glass from the combine in Montreal. Are the people who buy lamp chimneys to be treated differently from the farmers? Why should they? If the Government can enter into competition to give the farmers cheap binding twine, why not enter into competition to give the people cheap glass? Logically, the same argument that hon, gentlemen opposite apply in the case of binding twine should apply in every other case where there is a combine; and that only proved that the Government have not the right and are not acting wisely in carrying on a competition in any business.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the hon. gentleman has discussed the question fairly. He ought to know that if there was a combine, as it was generally believed there was, lessening the duty on it would not make binder twine any cheaper, because the combine exists in the United States as well. You might take off the duty altogether, and not lessen the price. The prices are fixed by consultation with the manufacturers in the United States, and, therefore, it was thought desirable to commence operations for the purpose of lowering the price of binding twine for the Canadian farmers. That could not have been accomplished by taking the duty off. But when half the duty was taken off, I remember correctly, there was no material reduction in the price.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes there was.

Mr. SPROULE. I speak from my own knowledge, because, two months after half the duty was taken off, I bought the goods myself at the same price as they had been sold at before. The parties selling twine through the country sold it at no lower price than before the reduction of duty. The cry then still was that the duty was too high, and, for the purpose of satisfying the farmers-because this was a commodity in which they were vitally interested, especially those in Manitoba-the Government were induced to commence the manufacture at Kingston where they could use the prison labour. There are two features of this case to which special attention has been called. In the first place, the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) objects to this manufacture because it brings the prison labour into competition with the same kind of labour outside. But the employment of prison labour in any line will do the same. The hon. gentleman says: Why not employ them in public works? But who constructs our public works? Do not the workingmen of the country? If you employ a prisoner to do the work which can be done by one who is not a prisoner, to that extent you compete with free labour.

Mr. FRASER. But we should save the money we have to pay for the labourers.

Mr. SPROULE. But are you not saving the money now just the same? You are making these men practically earn their living, and if they do that, the Government have not to pay for their living. Where, then, is the difference? It is not very long ago since these men were engaged in making brick, and that was complained of as competition with free labour. They were put to making boots and shoes with the same result. To employ these men at any labour is to compete with labour outside, and you might as well engage them in this as in anything else, for there was a crying need for the production of cheap binder twine. Whether it was the result of the monopoly or of some other cause that we do not understand, the price was high, and there was a strong demand from the farmers that the Government should do something to reduce the price of this product. The Government did something and the price of binder twine has been reduced? What do we hear from those interested in the other concerns? Take the manufactory established the Patrons of Industry in Brantford. Some time ago one of the head men, I have forgotten whether it was Mr. Mallory, the grand worthy president, or Mr. Currie, speaking in my village, stated that he could prove that the Patrons had done great good to the farmers. He said that some time ago the farmers had been paying exorbitant prices for binder twine: Patrons started a factory and had succeeded in bringing the price down to the lowest point it had reached in the history of the country, and, notwithstanding that, they were making a large profit by it. And, on the strength of that, he tried to induce others to take stock in the company. I am credibly informed that afterwards, the same parties. Patrons of Industry binder credibly informed twine factory, applied to the Cordage Company to arrange prices at which twine should be sold, practically to make a combine so as to keep their profits up. Then the Government said: We will give this twine to the people at the lowest price it can be manufactured for, to show that there is a reasonable profit in the manufacture of it and when other companies, whether the Patrons of Industry Company or the Cordage Company or others, are selling above a reasonable profit, we will keep our rates and will turn out enough twine to compel these people to keep the price down. And that was the result. Sir Oliver Mowat did the same in Toronto. I say he was right in doing so. He employed prison labour only, and I contend that there is nothing wrong in that. There is not a farmer in this country who will say that there is anything wrong in that. And even though it does bring prison labour into competition with labour outside that is not reasonable ground for objection, because the same argument will apply to the employment of prison labour in any line with a view to making the prisoners selfsupporting.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was glad to hear the Minister say that the farmers had been fleeced by the Cordage combine. How often, as I remember, when we spoke of the high duty increasing the prices, were we told that the farmers paid no higher than they would pay if the duty was removed. I must say this, that I am under the impression that this Government would never have taken up the manufacture of binder twine but for the action of the Ontario Government. That Government started a factory in the Central prison, and they were followed by the Government here at Ottawa. I believe that these prisoners should be kept at some sort of labour. I understand that in the Central prison and at Kingston they were engaged for a long time in making brick. But, for some cause they were deprived of the means of continuing that work. It then became necessary for the Government to find some other employment, and this was established in order to furnish employment for the prisoners and to break up the combine. The combine has been broken up, and I hope the Government will never be a party to fixing prices under any other combine with the Canada Cordage Company, the Patrons of Industry or any other, and if these others attempt to form a combine, I hope the Government will keep the price down and so make a combine useless. In answer to a question that I asked, the Minister stated that nobody had interviewed him as to prices, but I gathered from what he said that it was within his knowledge that something had been done, some communication received from the president of the Cordage Company in Brantford, or some member of the Cordage Company; and I would ask him if it is within his knowledge that such was the case. Has any communication been received by any member of the Government respecting the price of cordage.

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was the communication to which I referred the complaint that our prices were too low. This was from the Patrons of Industry cordage establishment, but this letter was not addressed to me.

Mr. McMILLAN. There was a letter addressed to some person?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. believe so.

Mr. McMILLAN. That was all I wanted to know-the Patrons addressing the Government here wanting to enter a combine with the Cordage Company and the Government to put up the price.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And we would not do it.

Mr. HENDERSON. So it would appear that the effort to increase the price to the | 650 feet. As a matter of curiosity, to-night farmers came from the farmers themselves. But there is no evidence whatever, there is not even an insinuation, that the Government has in any way acceded to the request of the Cordage Company at Brantford to form a combine. Now, to my mind, it is clear, even after all that we have heard about cheap labour and the manufacture of binder twine in prisons, that binder twine can be made as cheaply by independent as by prison labour. In 1893 the Brantford Company, whose president, I believe, is a Mr. Stratford, sold about 800 tons of binder twine. Of this quantity they manufactured about 380 tons. They bought from the Central prison about 186 tons, and from the Consumers Cordage Company about 234 They supplied their consumers, the farmers throughout the country with twine, and many of the farmers did not know but that they were receiving twine manufactured in Brantford. No doubt this company in Brantford sold at a profit what they bought from the Consumers' Cordage Company, and yet it was sold as cheap as the Central prison twine at Toronto and the twine they had made themselves. This is conclusive evidence that the price at which twine can be made by independent labour, with its greater skill, the ability of private companies to buy material at lower prices, their closer knowledge of the markets, is quite as low as that at which it can be produced by prison labour. I approve very much of the policy of the Ontario Government and the Dominion Government in manufacturing this article. I think a very fair statement was made by the Minister just this afternoon when he said that, while the Govern-ment had no intention of embarrassing the regular trade, they intended to use this manufacture as a means of preventing an undue inflation of the price. I think that the whole enterprise of the manufacture of binder twine in the Central prison at Toronto, and the penitentiary at Kingston, can be justified on that single statement. Now, with regard to the value of the twine and giving the price in the House. I am very much interested in that question. I would like to get it, but I realize that perhaps the Minister of Justice is not justified in making a price for twine, as we know it is quite impossible to give any general answer to that question unless we had a sample of the twine before us, and knew the number of feet per cwt. He might give us a quotation of 5 cents or 6 cents, but unless he knew the weight of the twine, he would have no idea of its value. I believe in Kingston they manufacture two different qualities of twine. I have seen them, and in my judgment they are very fair qualities, and are very good twine. One of them, I understand, is a pure manilla. and the other is a mixture of sisal and manilla. One of them is said to measure 525 feet to the pound, and the other one.

after six o'clock. I measured a quantity of twine, and had it weighed, and I verified the fact that it measured 640 feet to the pound. Now, the better twine, to my mind, is always the cheaper twine for the farmer You may say that one twine is worth so much, and another one is worth so much, but unless you produce the twine and show the quality of it, no information whatever can be obtained from the mere quotation of price. Therefore, it would be misleading perhaps to the House, and misleading to the farmers, and perhaps be an injury to the good object we have in view, if a price were to be cited. I understand, however, that any farmer or any business man in the country can ascertain the price by writing to the proper party in Kingston and getting it in the ordinary business way.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister of Justice if he could tell us what is the gross amount received for the sale of binder twine manufactured in the years 1893-94?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was none manufactured in that year. 1894-95 is the first year. We manufactured only two months last year. As I have already told the hon. gentleman, the total amount received was $15,400 for last season, and there are $650 still owing.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon, gentleman will look at his report of the penitentiaries for the year ending 30th June, 1894, he will find on page 3, under per capita cost of convicts of the Kingston Penitentiary, binder twine, cash expenditure, actual cost for 1893-94, $24,997.63. I want to understand how it is that you did not get back your actual cost.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the machinery.

Mr. DALY. Look at the first column.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister said that $41,000 was expended for machinery. The machinery was put in in the spring of 1894. Was it paid for in the fiscal year closing 30th June, 1894?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I could not tell you off-hand.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like to ascertain that, because it is material. The contract was made with Mr. Connor to have the work all completed in the spring of 1894.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The amount was paid in 1893-94, and that is what makes that amount of $24,000.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman will find on the same page an item for $48,000. That is additional machinery. Now, where is the item for $41,000, which the hon. gentleman gave us before six o'clock.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Between those two items, additional machinery and $24,000.

Mr. MULOCK. But this statement should be made in a way that will explain itself.

or which the matter of the second second and all the second desired as the second of t

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose it would be more satisfactory.

Mr. MULOCK. Here is a distinct contract made for putting in this binder twine machinery, and that contract was for the sum of $40,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It cost $41,000 to put it in.

Mr. MULOCK. The contract was $40,000, and that was to include putting it in. Will the hon, gentleman explain what the extra $1,000 was for.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon, gentleman will wait I will find all these things from the Auditor General.

Mr. DALY. On page H-21, the hon. gentleman will find the particulars.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What number of men are employed in the penitentiary work?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Thirty-seven last year, over forty this year.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I understood the Minister to say that this industry had solved the question of prison labour?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said it had tended to solve the question.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It was for that reason I thought that all the prisoners must be employed on that work.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon, gentleman misunderstood me. I meant to say that this assisted in solving many of the problems which surround the difficult question of prison labour; but the whole question has certainly not been solved, for this work occupies a comparatively small number of the prisoners at Kingston, where there are nearly 500 men.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It was for that reason I made the remark.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If I said so, it was not what I meant.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How do the authorities arrive at the price to be charged for twine in selling it? Do you add the cost and the charge for labour and interest on investment on machinery, and then add a profit?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think in deference to the committee I must draw the line there. I have answered that question at least twice. I must insist on new questions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps as the hon. Minister is a legal gentleman, it may be worth while to furnish him with a precedent. One of his father's most energetic supporters made me repeat an answer to a question thirteen times over.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. gentleman has not yet answered a question I put to him. He simply said it would injure other persons.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I can now give some more information.

Mr. MULOCK. How many tons of twine were sold?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have answered that question four times, and I will not do it again. Let us have new questions.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon, gentleman can take any course he likes. The Minister has stated that this twine is sold at cost. He has expended, according to the Auditor General's report, at least $24,969, I call his attertion and the attention of the committee to some figures. On page 3 of the Minister's report for the year ending 30th June, 1894, there appears a heading "cash expenditure, actual cost 1893-94." which does not warrant him in assuming that it is part of the capital put into plant, but is the cost of manufacturing twine. There is an item, "binder twine, $24,997.63," entered as cost of manufacturing the twine. The hon, gentleman acknowledges that all the twine that was manufactured was sold, and that the gross amount received from sales was between $15,000 and $16,000, either received or receivable. That leaves a shortage of $8,000 or $9.000 less than the cost.

Sir Richard Cartwright.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There may be a confusion as regards the season of the year.

region of the Control
Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon, gentleman tell me the number of tons he sold and on which he realized?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. One hundred and twenty tons, as I have told the hon. gentleman before.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon, gentleman did not tell me anything of the kind.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I told some hon. gentleman opposite. At the end of the year we had 360 tons, and also some raw material.

Mr. MULOCK. What authority is taken to have binding twin sid on credit?

Sir CHARLES I BERT TUPPER. It is done on the authority of Council.

Mr. MULOCK. Was there an authority of Council for the sale made on credit to Regers?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am speaking of this season. I do not know what authority was obtained last season; it must have been done by the head of the department.

Mr. MULOCK. In regard to the sale to Rogers, can the Minister say by whose authority the sale took place?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the authority of the Minister and of the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. Then there would be some evidence furnished as to his credit?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was not in the department at the time.

Mr. MULOCK. Would there not be a report from Kingston?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose sales are made direct from Kingston?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. A purchaser would apply to the authorities at Kingston, and the authorities there would have to communicate here, if the sale was made with the authority of the Minister. Is there anything on record here?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We know that the man is being sued. I think the hon. gentleman has mentioned that subject for the tenth time to-day. Perhaps it is due to the fact that the man who is sued is in Ottawa and has been around the buildings; and it might make him a little uncomfortable to be talked about all the afternoon. These are the cold facts: that the man has not paid and suit was brought.
