coast, led by Mr. Pattullo, who is trying to set up something in the nature of a dictatorship; he is referred to as the Mussolini of that province. Then, within the inner circle of the party we have the president of the Liberal Association for Canada, Mr. Vincent Massey, who since he made a fortune from Massey-Harris implements, has retired, and is now saying that the olive branch should be handed to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and that the Liberal party should be more socialistic. Then, solidly against that view we have the present right hon. leader of the opposition who thinks that the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation should be wiped from the face of the globe. These are some slight difficulties with which the voters in this country are faced. The other difficulty, is, of course, that the Liberal government in the province of Saskatchewan will have nothing to do with what is known as the Progressive-Farmer movement, whereas in the neighbouring province of Manitoba it goes arm in arm with that movement. The old difficulties the Liberal party had were that they had in the west speakers who believed in free trade and in the east speakers who believed in protection. But in addition to the old difficulties there are the new ones I have enumerated, and we see others operating within the party. The result will be that when the electorate goes to the polls it will not be in a position to know whether the Liberal party stands for laissez-faire or old Liberalism, the reactionaryism of the province of Quebec, a dictatorship such as they accept in British Columbia; or whether they will follow those hon. members in this chamber who during their term of office secured high duties to protect the articles they manufactured. These are some points about which the voters will have to do some thinking. These are points which will be passed upon by them at the next election, and it is my guess that at that time the voters will decide that they had better stay with those they are sure about. They know where the Conservative party stands, and that is why I say that at the next general election they will turn again to the Conservative party.

On motion of Mr. Manion the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Tuesday, May 15, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

REDUCTION OF SUGAR TAX

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Unexpected weather conditions in British Columbia have advanced vegetation by three weeks over normal; in fact, our advices are that there has been practically no winter there. Within the last few days fifteen carloads of strawberries have been shipped from British Columbia to Ontario markets, and this morning we were in receipt of a telegram indicating that gooseberries were now being placed on the markets of British Columbia, grown this season out of doors. Under the circumstances it is quite clear that the reduction of the sugar tax by one cent per pound would work out greatly to the disadvantage of those who have to preserve strawberries, gooseberries and other small fruits in British Columbia, and inasmuch as it is inadvisable that the law should lack in uniformity, it is proposed that the reduction of the tax by one cent per pound shall be operative from one minute after midnight on Sunday next in order to meet that situation.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): May I direct the attention of the Minister of Marine to an item which has appeared in the Montreal Gazette concerning work in the harbour of Montreal. It is contended that a great proportion of the work is given to outsiders, nonresident in Montreal, or having resided there only a very short period. I would ask the Minister of Marine to use his influence with the Montreal harbour commission to see that as far as possible the labour available there be distributed to the population of Montreal, who are very badly in need of it.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I have not so far taken cognizance of the report in question but I will do so and see that whatever is possible will be done for Montreal, though I may add that the port of Montreal embraces both shores of the river St. Lawrence.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, May 14, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the debate is resumed, I think it would be well to give a ruling on the question of order raised yesterday by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) as to whether the amendment to the motion is in order. On April 23rd, Mr. Ralston moved as an amendment to the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, the following:

This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade. It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

On April 30, Mr. Spencer moved a subamendment and on May 7 on a question of order raised by Mr. Mackenzie, of Vancouver Centre, as to the subamendment, I held that the subamendment was not in order as it sought to deal with the question of credit which had been debated on a motion by Mr. Lucas and the matter of credit had been by consent referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce where it is being considered.

It is now argued that the amendment is not in order and for the same reasons as said subamendment was held to be not in order.

When this amendment was moved, there was on the order paper Bill 51 entitled, "An Act to Improve the Methods and Practices of Marketing of Natural Products in Canada and in Export Trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith." This bill was read a first time March 26 and on April 23, when this amendment was moved, was on the order paper for second reading. The bill provides for export trade and for regulating the export of goods from Canada. See the title; and paragraph (b) of subsection 4; and paragraph (f) of subsection 5 of section 5; also section 12, subsection 2.

On February 13, Mr. Woodsworth moved the following amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne:

That the following be added to the motion: We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will ensure the farmer a decent standard of living.

Thereupon, employment was discussed and the amendment was disposed of by the house on a division resulting in 54 yeas and 89 nays.

That amendment dealt with the question of employment generally and the amendment now before the house is to the same effect and so is not in order.

My decision is supported by the following precedents. Bourinot, page 328:

"It is, however, an ancient rule of parliament that no question or motion can be regularly offered if it is substantially the same with one on which the judgment of the house has already been expressed during the current session." The old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house."

May, 13th edition, at page 272 says:

A matter already appointed for consideration by the house cannot be anticipated by an amendment, while a notice of motion as long as it remains upon the paper whether for a specified day or not, prevents its subject matter being discussed by means of an amendment to a motion.

Speaker's rulings on the question are reported as follows:

207 H.D. 3 s 500:

Now there is a rule of the house that when a matter has been expressly set down for consideration, no hon. member can anticipate it by raising a discussion on the subject.

308 H.D. 3 s 1755:

I must point out to the hon. member that he has introduced a bill, which is now standing on the paper for the second reading, which contains a distinct reference to the subject matter of the present motion; and, as that bill is to be brought on upon a future day, the hon. member would not be in order in moving his resolution now, as he would be anticipating the discussion upon the bill.

333 H.D. 3 s 851:

The first two amendments on the paper, the first standing in the name of the hon. member for Hoxton, and the second in that of the hon. baronet the member for Cockermouth, are out of order as amendments, inasmuch as they anticipate the discussion, one on three and the other on four bills which the house has appointed for a future day, and one of those bills, I observe, is in the name of the hon. gentleman himself. The amendment, therefore, of the hon. gentleman will be out of order as an amendment to the address.

66 Parliamentary Debates, 4 s page 923:

The subject of the hon. member's amendment to the address is relative to several bills on the order book and he will have an opportunity of submitting his views to the house when one of them comes on. He cannot now anticipate discussion on a bill which is on the order book.

The same practice has always been followed in Canada, see Bourinot, 4th edition, page 320:

An amendment cannot anticipate a notice of motion on the order paper.

In this case the amendment goes further and anticipates a bill No. 51, now being considered in committee dealing with marketing and export trade.

I therefore rule that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) is out of order, as it is substantially the same as one on which the judgment of the house has already been expressed and it deals with matters already before the house.

Mr. RALSTON: For the reasons given in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and others on this side of the house who spoke I respectfully appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Anderson (Toronto High Park)
Anderson (Halton)
Arsenault
Arthurs
Baker
Baribeau
Barrette
Beaubier
Belec
Bennett
Beynon
Bourgeois
Burns
Bury Cahan
Carmichael
Chaplin
Charters
Cowan (Long Lake)
Davies
Dickie
Duguay
Duranleau
Edwards
Embury
Ernst
Fortin
Fraser (Cariboo)
Garland (Carleton)
Gobeil
Gordon
Guthrie
Harris
Hay
Irvine
Johnstone
Kennedy (Peace River)
Laflèche
Larue
Loucks
Lucas
Luchkovich
Macdonald (Kings)
MacInnis
MacLaren
MacNicol
McDade
McGibbon
McGillis
McGregor
Maloney
Manion
Mitchell
Moore (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)
Morand
Mullins
Myers
Perley (Qu'Appelle)
Pickel
Plunkett
Porteous
Price
Quinn
Robinson
Ross
Sauvé
Senn
Shaver
Simpson (Simcoe North)
Simpson (Algoma West)
Smith (Victoria-Carleton)
Smith (Cumberland)
Speakman
Spencer
Sproule
Stanley
Stewart (Leeds)
Stewart (Lethbridge)
Stinson
Stirling
Stitt (Nelson)
Stitt (Selkirk)
Sutherland
Swanston
Thompson (Simcoe East)
Thompson (Lanark)
Turnbull
Weir (Melfort)
White (London)
White (Mount Royal)
Willis—91.

NAYS

Messrs:

Beaubien
Bertrand
Blair
Bothwell
Boucher
Brown
Butcher
Casgrain
Chevrier
Denis
Deslauriers
Desrochers
Donnelly
Duff
Dumaine
Dupuis
Elliott
Euler
Factor
Fafard
Fiset, Sir Eugène
Fournier
Gershaw
Girouard
Goulet
Hall
Heaps Howden
Jacobs
Jean
King, Mackenzie
Lapointe
McPhee
Motherwell
Munn
Neill Parent
Power
Reid
Rennie
Rhéaume
Rinfret
Roberge
Sanderson
Séguin
Thauvette
Weir (Macdonald)
Young—48.

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips.)

Messrs:

Barber
Bell (Hamilton)
Bell (St. Antoine)
Bell (St. John-Albert)
Black (Halifax)
Bowen
Bowman
Boyes
Cantley
Casselman
Cotnam
Cowan (Port Arthur)
Dorion
Dupré
Esling
Gagnon
Ganong
Geary
Gott
Hackett
Hanson (York-Sunbury)
Jones
Totzke
Mercier (St. Henri)
Raymond
Dubois
Dubuc
McKenzie (Assiniboia)
Hanson (Skeena)
Hepburn
Cardin
Howard
Hurtubise
Ilsley
Verville
Ferland
Hanbury
Boulanger
Michaud
Mercier (Laurier-Outremont)
Rutherford
Perras
Veniot
MacLean

Kennedy (Winnipeg)	McIntosh
Laurin	Fontaine
Lawson	Gray
MacDonald (Cape Breton South)	Urquhart
MacMillan (Saskatoon)	Mackenzie (Vancouver)
Matthews	Moore (Ontario)
Murphy	Stewart (Edmonton)
Nicholson	Bradette
Perley, Sir George	Marcil
Pettit	Bouchard
Rhodes	Ralston
Rowe	Lacroix
Ryerson	Taylor
Short	Heenan
Smoke	Pouliot
Spankie	Ahearn
Spence	Fraser (Northumberland)
Spotton	MacMillan (Mackenzie)
Stevens	Malcolm
Sullivan	Brasset
Tummon	St-Père
Wilson	Vallance
Wright	Golding.

Mr. SMOKE: I was paired with the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. RYERSON: I was paired with the hon. member for Norfolk-Elgin (Mr. Taylor). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was paired with the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. TUMMON: I was paired with the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Pere). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPENCE: I was paired with the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. BOYES: I was paired with the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. COTNAM: I was paired with the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Hurtubise). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. GEARY: I was paired with the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. ROWE: I was paired with the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. BARBER: I was paired with the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. RALSTON: I was paired with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was paired with the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was paired with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was paired with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. VENIOT: I was paired with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I was paired with the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Bowen). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. MacLEAN: I was paired with the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. HOWARD: I was paired with the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Verville). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Bell). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Mr. DUBUC (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, this house met late in January and it is now the middle of May, so for the better part of four months we have been having discussions in the house as to the various measures which have been brought down by the government. During that time we have had a very great deal of fault finding and carping criticism, particularly on the part of the Liberal opposition. Their type of speeches might well be illustrated by the speeches delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the address, which took some four and a half hours, and the speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) on the budget, which took the better part of two and a half hours. In other words, those two speeches lasted for some seven hours, yet after a fairly thorough and somewhat painful reading of those speeches I have not been able to find one constructive suggestion advanced with the exception of the proposal by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth that we should have a refunding operation to cut down the interest rates in our country.

I wish to be entirely fair; the hon. member did make that constructive suggestion, but that proposal has been advanced by many members of this house. I think I have heard at least half a dozen members on this side deal with that matter, and that is something which all fair minded men must consider worthy of deep thought. To-day in Canada we have interest payments, if you include the Canadian National for which we are responsible, totalling $200,000,000 per annum in round figures, a stupendous burden to be placed on the backs of ten million people. The immensity of that burden can be realized even more clearly if it is remembered that it was not until 1910 that the federal revenues of the Dominion of Canada reached $100,000,000, and at that time we had a population of seven million people. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we usually understand that it is the duty of an opposition to oppose, but at the same time during periods of national crisis in this and other parliaments sometimes it has been the custom of oppositions to rise to greater heights than that. But if you, sir, or anyone else can show me anything, other than the one constructive suggestion I have mentioned, that has been advanced by the present opposition during the four years we have been in power, any suggestion which took into account their country in its hour of trial rather than party politics, I should be very much obliged.

At that, Mr. Speaker, my chief criticism of the opposition at the present time is that whether it is on the address or on the budget, in their severe criticism of us they have entirely ignored world conditions. This country, in common with the rest of the world, has been going through four years of industrial and economic crisis, the worst the world has ever known. I do not give that as a mere figure of speech; I think it is a statement of fact. We have had an unemployment problem in the industrial countries of the world affecting some thirty million people, thirteen million of them in the great, powerful, rich country to the south where, in addition, they have had thousands of banks close their doors to their depositors. Practically all the countries of Europe, and certainly all those which took part in the war, have been unable to pay the interest on their war debts. We have had Fascist dictators spring up in six or eight of the prominent countries of Europe, with a dictatorship of the proletariat in Russia, where communism and starvation have been stalking together throughout the land. Even in South America, where they have no war debts, most of the republics have been unable to pay the interest on their national debts, and away over in the far east we have had threats of war which have endangered the peace of the world. In addition to all this we have had a condition of economic nationalism spring up throughout the world, in the last ten or fifteen years, all of which makes up a chaotic picture which is painful to consider, and of which Canada has been forced to become a part.

Due to world conditions we have had our serious unemployment problem in proportion to the unemployment that has existed throughout the world. In addition we have had a drought condition throughout the prairie provinces which in Saskatchewan alone a year or two ago threw one-third of the entire population upon relief. We find that the world price of wheat dropped to such an extent that the purchasing power of the prairie provinces decreased to an amount something like $450,000,000—a huge amount for that or for any other section of the country. In addition to that they have been unable, because of the world price of wheat, to pay their taxes, and therefore the western provinces—and in this I should add British Columbia—the four western provinces in avoiding default have indeed been dependent for financial assistance upon the Dominion of Canada. Then, added to all that, is the fact, which hon. members opposite ignore on all occasions, that the chaotic condition which in a few brief sentences I have described started before they went out of power. In fact, it started nearly a year before they went out of power, because it began after the crash in October of 1929. Yet, in their criticisms of this government, they never refer to world conditions, nor do they even admit that such conditions have existed.

Our record is open for all to read. I think it is a very good one, and in a few brief sentences I am going to cover the work of this government in its term of office, which has extended about four years. In the first place we realized that economies must be put into effect in Canada, and with that in mind we put those economies into effect to an amount of something like $81,000,000 per annum, cutting down the per capita cost of government in this country from $9.60 in the year before the war to $9.03 last year. We spent large sums of money on public works; we assisted the provinces, municipalities and the railways in their work of relieving unemployment, and we gave direct relief running into a large amount of money. We lent money by tens of millions to the western provinces. We saved the savings bank of the province of Manitoba; we gave a wheat bonus to the wheat growers of the western provinces. All of these actions of ours cost the government of Canada and the people of Canada something in the neighbourhood of $180,000,000. But as a result there has been no starvation in Canada, while in the only socialistic country in the world millions starve. We have maintained sound credit not only of the dominion, but of the provinces and the railways. We have saved their credit.

Then, so far as trade is concerned, we have held our own. We took part in two imperial conferences at which, for the first time in our history, we obtained preferences, profitable preferences—profitable to us and profitable to the other portions of the empire. It is true that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and other hon. members, have criticized my right hon. leader for having bargained to get those preferences. So far as I am concerned I am proud of the fact that my right hon. leader bargained, and I am proud of the fact that for the first time in our history we were on the receiving end instead of always being on the giving end.

Then, so far as world trade is concerned we must realize that there has been a serious decrease in the trade of all commercial countries of the world. So much is that true that total world trade decreased from sixty-eight billion dollars in 1929 to twenty-six billion dollars in 1932, or about 60 per cent. Great Britain, one of the great trading nations, has had a decrease in her world trade in 1932 compared with 1929, amounting to five billion dollars, the United States six billion dollars, and Canada something like one and one-third billion dollars. So that Canada's decrease in trade, for which we have been criticized, has been in proportion to the decrease in the trade of all the other countries of the world, and of the world in general. In other words, we held our own, and last year our domestic exports went up $106,000,000 as compared with the year before, and our imports increased by $27,000,000. Yet in his speech sometime ago the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth accused us of having "shackled world trade." He accused us not only once but a number of times. He said that "Canada had begun an economic nationalism." Well, the facts are that economic nationalism and the shackling of world trade began while my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and his government were in power. As a matter of fact, the main shackling which has taken place, so far as Canada is concerned, was between the years 1925 and 1930, when a Liberal government was in power.

For example, let us take wheat. It has been pointed out many times that until 1929 wheat was allowed free into many European countries, but that in that year, the one before my right hon. friend left office, Italy, France and Germany raised the duty on wheat to 73 cents, 85 cents and 98 cents respectively per bushel. The truth is that the shackling of world trade and the economic nationalism which have taken place are due to war psychology which has existed since the war, particularly in European countries. It is due to the fact that many of those European countries have the fear of future wars, and are desirous of becoming self-sufficient so that in case of war they will be able to maintain themselves without importing from other countries. But the fact remains that so far as Europe is concerned that shackling took place in years of a Liberal administration in Canada. So far as the United States is concerned, anybody who reads political history or follows the affairs of Canada will know that between the years 1921 and 1930, when the Liberal government was in office the United States put up practically prohibitory tariffs against Canadian farm products. So much is that true, Mr. Speaker, that while in 1921, the first year of the Liberal regime, the United States imported $160,000,000 worth of Canadian farm products, in the last year in which the Liberal government held office the United States imported only $40,000,000 worth, or exactly one-quarter. And what was the attitude of my hon. friends opposite? What was the attitude of the present leader of the opposition? What was the attitude of that party when it was in power? It was unable to do anything. The leader of the opposition did not wish "to provoke the United States." As a matter of fact nothing was done by the Liberal government to increase the trade with the European countries and with the United States, or to decrease the tariffs which were rapidly being put up against the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth also saw fit to belittle the balance of trade about which, I believe, we may justly boast a little. It must be remembered that Canada's external interest payments, including dominion, provincial, municipal and corporate, amount to something more than $200,000,000 yearly. That money has to go from this country every year. That interest can be paid only in goods, or by borrowing money. But borrowing in the last few years has not been very popular or convenient. With interest being payable in goods I should like to ask the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth or in fact any other hon. member, this question: How can any debtor country—meaning a country which must pay to outside countries more than they return in interest or debts—pay its outside debts if it imports more goods than it exports? It is absolutely essential, if we are to pay such debts, that we must export more than we import. Fortunately the balance of trade which when hon. members opposite left office was very markedly against us, in fact to the extent of $103,000,000, has been changed to a balance in our favour. In other words, in 1930, we bought $103,000,000 more of goods from outside countries than those outside countries bought from us. Last year we had a reverse condition, when we sold to the outside world $152,000,000 more than we bought from it, making a total change in trade figures of $255,000,000, plus gold amounting to something like $90,000,000, most of which we also exported.

That, in a very brief way is the record of this government. But in addition to that, at the present session we have placed before the house a marketing bill, a bill establishing a central bank, a mortgage bill protecting the farmer and a public works program. Those are pieces of legislation which come to my mind at the moment. Therefore, generally speaking I submit that Canada's affairs have been handled better during this time of crisis throughout the world than have the affairs of any other country in the world, and I say that our condition at the present time is at least equal to that of any other country in the world, and in that statement I make no exception.

Does any sane man on the opposition side suggest that had the right hon. gentleman opposite been in power he could have handled the affairs of Canada during this economic hurricane in a better manner than they have been handled by the present government?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sure.

Mr. MANION: Some hon. members opposite cheer. I do not know whether they are the sane group or not. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask them this question: Could their leader or their party, had they been in power, have cured the drought in western Canada? Could they have controlled world wheat prices? Could they have stopped ultra-nationalism or economic nationalism which has grown up, and which was growing up during the nine years hon. members held office? Could they have cured unemployment? Could they have changed world conditions so that Canada would have held a better position or would have been in a better position than she has been in the past four years under a Conservative government? All we have to do is to look over the record of the Liberal party when they were in power and since they have been in opposition. In the four years they have been in opposition their whole record has been one of opposition to everything—opposition to the relief acts for weeks at a time, so much so that the western provinces on one or two occasions were unable to get their seed grain in time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: I think that in a last minute rush they permitted the bill to go through, but the western provinces had a great deal of delay in getting their seed wheat because of the opposition of my hon. friends opposite. They opposed and are still opposing the Marketing Act. They opposed the translation bill. They opposed economies and they opposed expenditures. They opposed everything. They have done nothing but find fault and criticize. They have gloated over conditions in Canada which are really world conditions, and incidentally they have denied, their leader at any rate has denied that conditions have improved in this country. They have capitalized discontent at every opportunity. They have done everything in their power even to destroying national optimism, apparently with no other object than to achieve power which they boast they would be able to do should an election be held at the present time.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the tactics of my hon. friends opposite in times of national crisis such as the present are very poor tactics. I suggest as well that their tactics of holding up every piece of legislation, important or unimportant, that comes into this house, as they have done, brings discredit on the whole of our parliamentary institutions, for which my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition is always expressing so much reverence. I throw out this suggestion not only for the present opposition but for future oppositions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends laugh, Mr. Speaker, but it is exactly the same kind of loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind with which they have opposed everything that has been brought down in this house that has been of a constructive nature. I was going to suggest that if we are to protect the interests of the parliamentary institutions in which we believe, then not only at this time but in the future we should endeavour to bring in either closure or some other method of curtailing useless debate of which we have seen so much in the present parliament.

Then, sir, what was the record of the opposition when they were in power? Their record in power was even worse I believe than their record as an opposition. They saw the trading countries of the world barring out our products, and they did nothing to prevent it. They saw the United States by prohibitory tariffs keeping our goods out of that country and they adopted the old attitude of laissez-faire, of doing nothing for fear of provoking the United States. When the crash came in 1929 they first denied that there was any unemployment, and they then took the attitude that they would not give a five cent piece for relief even if there was. So far as Beauharnois is concerned, they are still labouring in the valley of humiliation.

In smaller matters, such as the Montreal bridge, they said it would cost $9,000,000, and it cost $19,000,000. Why did they not when they were in power and conditions were prosperous throughout the world as they were, bring down an unemployment insurance measure which they boast they would support at the present time? Why did they not when they were in power establish a central bank, which now they do not dare to oppose, and which now they say they were always in favour of, but they did not do anything to establish such an institution in the nine years they were in power. They did nothing about farm credits, and nothing about Senate reform, which my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition had clamoured for. They did nothing about free trade. All these things went into the limbo of forgotten things when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

So far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned the record of hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect is to my mind the most appalling of all. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, in speaking of the Canadian National Railways, used this sentence:

> From 1922 to 1930 the average surplus available for payment of interest due to the public was $24,000,000, and the deficits began again in 1931.

That is one of those half truths in which lawyers so frequently indulge. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Bell) says, not the best lawyers. That is probably true. I do not think he would do it, but my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth did.

The facts are that between 1921 and 1930 my hon. friends opposite in the handling of the Canadian National Railways had eight years out of ten in which there were deficits so far as the interest to the public was concerned. They had a total deficit in those ten years of $191,000,000, and only in two years, in 1926 and 1928, was there sufficient earned by the railways to pay the interest owing to the public on bonds. In those two years they had surpluses totalling six million dollars. That means that they had a total deficit between 1921 and 1930 of $185,000,000 in the handling of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. RALSTON: That was after paying interest to the public.

Mr. MANION: Of course, but the interest to the public has to be paid, and most of it incidentally was built up by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend say that what I said was not correct?

Mr. MANION: No, but my hon. friend left unsaid what he should have said to make his statement completely correct. My hon. friend is very clever at that sort of thing, and he is trying to do it again now. He has a clever habit of bringing out only one or two phases of the railway question. He did it in South Oxford, and apparently with good effect. He does it everywhere he goes. He does not tell the whole truth but only one-half or one-quarter and lets it go at that. That is about as close as he got in his statement on the railway question a few days ago.

In regard to interest, let me say that when my hon. friends opposite came into power the amount of interest which the bondholders were receiving from the Canadian National Railways was just $20,000,000 less than it was when they went out of power. In other words, by permitting the Canadian National Railways to go into wild extravagances of many kinds they built up increased interest charges of twenty million dollars a year for that railway in addition to this factor, that the interest to the government was increased in the same period by $12,000,000 per annum by loans and cash advances from the government of my hon. friends opposite. To sum up, they increased interest charges to the public and to the government by $32,000,000 a year in the years between 1921 and 1931.

Mr. RALSTON: All voted for by my hon. friends.

Mr. MANION: Yes, probably voted for by your hon. friend because my hon. friends opposite had just sat back and permitted the gentleman in charge of the Canadian National Railways at that time to become such a squanderer of the people's money that nobody dared open his mouth for fear of risking his political life. There was no control whatsoever by the government or by the directorate of that day upon the gentleman who later disappeared from the management of the Canadian National Railways, for the good of the railways and the good of this country.

Hon. gentlemen opposite claim to have cut down the debt of this dominion by $257,000,000 when they were in power. That is the figure given by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, and I shall accept it. At the same time they increased the debt of the Canadian National Railways to the public by $461,000,000 so that there was actually an increase in the debt of this country of $204,000,000. Then in the preelection year of 1929 they permitted Canadian National Railway commitments of between $200,000,000 and $250,000,000 for hotels, terminals, ships and railways, practically none of which was needed by the Canadian National Railways, and which only added to the funded debt of the railway. They encouraged the wildest extravagances. They rolled the Canadian National Railway pork barrel from Halifax, where they built a hotel for my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, clear across to Vancouver and back again. They turned the Canadian National into a political machine and a political club of the most severe kind, and they nearly wrecked the Canadian National Railways, and in fact nearly wrecked the country.

That is the Liberal record so far as the Canadian National Railways is concerned during the last nine years in which hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. I say Mr. Speaker, that their record in regard to that great public utility was more appalling than the record of any other government in Canada, federal or provincial, in regard to any public utility this country ever possessed. But now I am happy to say that due to policies of economy, unpopular I admit, and of restriction of expenditure the Canadian National Railways to-day is well and economically managed. It has good officers and men in charge, and it has an efficiency which has been maintained throughout.

Fortunately business for the Canadian National as well as for the Canadian Pacific is increasing at the present time in line with the general increase in business throughout the world. During the months of January, February, March and April of this year the gross revenues of the Canadian National Railways have gone up $9,000,000 as compared with the same four months last year, while the increase in the gross revenues of the Canadian Pacific amounted to $6,000,000. Incidentally, these figures show that the Canadian National is not suffering very much by the treatment of this government. There is another matter which has not been stated before, one of importance and one which I commend particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan). The number of men working on the railways this last month is 15,000 greater than the number employed three or four months ago.

While the Liberals were in power from 1921 to 1930 they merely floated and drifted along on a world boom tide. They finally tumbled over the abyss in 1929. No signs of wisdom came from them in either the operation or the management of the affairs of this country. No preparation was made for the future when in times like that some consideration should have been given to the future. Even five thousand years ago in Egypt they prepared themselves during good times for occasional reverses. At the present time the Liberal party is predicting success at the polls but—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Hon. members opposite cheer me and perhaps that is the only cheer I will get from them. I should like to point out that the predictions in 1930 were just as emphatic as those being made at the present time and the results probably will be the same in the future as they were in the past. Hon. members are continually harping on the by-elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: They say "hear, hear." They claim that because of the by-elections we should go to the country because the results show that we do not possess the confidence of the country at the present time. What is the story of the by-elections?

Mr. McINTOSH: Pretty good.

Mr. MANION: It is pretty bad for my hon. friends. There have been ten by-elections. Five of them were politically unchanged; two we won from my hon. friends opposite, one they took from us; and they also took one from the Progressives, while the group in the southeast corner took a seat from us. So far as the Liberal and Conservative parties are concerned, we took two of theirs and they took one of ours, so we are one up on them in by-elections. I do not know what the hon. members for Shelburne-Yarmouth and Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) are laughing at because these are the facts.

Mr. RALSTON: What about half truths?

Mr. MANION: Those are absolute facts and I challenge my hon. friend to show that they are anything else. In the last one or two by-elections the majorities have not looked very good for this party. I admit that quite frankly but at the same time I contend that with the conditions we have in the world, there is a natural under-current of discontent shown against all governments when they enter by-elections.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member is not apologizing?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend should apologize for the fact that the whole Liberal party in the province of Quebec was opposed to one man in the city of Montreal who beat them by 53,000 for the mayoralty. The government in England to-day is made up of the best elements of the Conservative, the Liberal and the Labour parties. That country is muddling through to prosperous days yet in spite of the quality of the government—there is no Liberal party left with the exception of Lloyd George—whenever the government goes to the polls in a by-election they are either defeated or their majority is cut down. The reason for this is the same as the reason for the majorities in the last two or three by-elections in this country. But the hard fact remains that as far as by-elections are concerned, we are one up on my hon. friends on the other side.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has pointed out a fact which he claims to be deplorable. I admit that it is unfortunate that including our railway deficit and relief this country has had to face a deficit in the last year amounting to $135,000,000. This is a serious situation, but I would point out that practically all countries in the world of any importance have had deficits of the same kind. Last year France had a deficit of $375,000,000; Germany had one of $400,000,000; Italy one of $350,000,000; and in June, when her financial year is up, the United States expects to have one between $5,000,000,000 and $7,000,000,000. It has been pointed out that Great Britain had a surplus of $150,000,000, but it should not be forgotten that she did not pay last year the interest on her war debt to the United States, amounting to $182,000,000. Incidentally, we have paid our interest on our war debt. I state this in order to keep the record straight. In order that I may not be accused of misquoting facts, I should like to quote from the budget speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Neville Chamberlain. He said:

> Neither last year nor the year before did I make any provision for the payment of the war debt to America nor for the receipt of war debts or reparations by ourselves. In the absence of any future development, I propose to follow precisely the same line this year.

The fact remains that instead of having a surplus, the United Kingdom had a deficit just the same as practically every other country in the world. For the benefit of those who sometimes complain of taxation, it is interesting to note that the United Kingdom is the most heavily taxed country in the world. Their ordinary revenues last year—they expect to have about the same this year—amounted to $3,500,000,000. Based on population of 40,000,000, this works out at $90 per head. Our revenues amounted to $271,000,000, or $27 per head.

Mr. HANBURY: What about deficits?

Mr. MANION: The provinces?

Mr. HANBURY: No, deficits.

Mr. MANION: They also have a deficit. I was pointing out that our collections are less than one-third the per capita collections in the United Kingdom. I thought my hon. friend was referring to the provinces and I intended to mention them later on as it is only fair that they should be included in our total taxation receipts. I checked up and I find that the receipts of the nine provinces amount to something like $175,000,000. This would make a total dominion and provincial tax collection of about $450,000,000 or $45 per head as against $90 per head in Great Britain. If our revenues had been the same as the per capita revenue in Great Britain, we would have collected last year not $271,000,000 but $900,000,000. We would have had $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 with which we would not know what to do.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is that a promise?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends should remember that while the population of Great Britain is only four times the population of Canada, the revenues of that country are fourteen times the revenues of this country. Even including the revenues obtained by the provinces, their revenues are eight times as large as ours. Until lately England was considered a free trade country, but her customs collections are six times the amount of ours. Her excise is fifteen times the amount of ours and her income tax, thirty times. They collect thirty times as much in spite of the fact that their population is only four times as great. We in this country know nothing about taxation when we consider the heavy methods employed in England. It is perhaps because of that that England is on the upgrade. I say to my hon. friends who criticize us for our tariff: Is the business improvement in England because of free trade or is it because of the protection which has been afforded in the last couple of years? I am going to take the opportunity of quoting a few sentences of Mr. David Lloyd George, one of the few remaining members of the practically extinct species of free traders in England. The species is practically wiped out in this country except for the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) who claims occasionally to be a free trader. I quote from the Montreal Daily Star of April 28 a cable from Mr. Lloyd George:

> We were the first to slump. We claim that we are the first to recover. To what extent is this recovery due to our abandonment of free trade?

And again:

> Every free trader would admit that, under the conditions in which the duties were imposed, they were bound to act as a powerful stimulant to home industries that were predominantly affected by foreign imports.

And again:

> When the world crisis came the universal depression forced producers in every land to sell their goods at any price, wherever a purchaser was to be found. A country without a tariff became a favourite dumping ground. Our imports therefore tended to increase when we were offered goods we needed at the prices of bankrupt stock.
>
> Our manufacturing enterprises necessarily suffered from this eruption of cheap articles. High tariffs arrested this process and home production was bound to benefit as long as the world slump lasts—

These arguments apply to Canada just as well as they do to the United Kingdom; and in the same way it was just as reasonable for Canada to increase the tariffs of this country along certain lines, for the reasons outlined by Mr. Lloyd George, as it was for Great Britain.

To my mind, and I think in the judgment of all fairminded people in this country, this government has nothing to be ashamed of but much to be proud of. This government, sir, has brought Canada safely through an economic hurricane the like of which has never been experienced before, and, I am sure we all trust, will never be experienced again. The government of Canada now in power deserves, and I believe will get, the gratitude of the Canadian people when the time comes. Canada, as well as the world generally, is on the upgrade; all the indices point to this. Railway earnings, which constitute one of the best indices in any country, are on the upgrade in Canada. Employment has improved; farm and security prices have gone up; construction contracts have increased; automobile, steel, newsprint, lumber and power production have improved; clearinghouse records are higher, and export trade is gaining each month. I am of the opinion therefore that before the election in a year or so the people of Canada will reach the sunlit heights of full prosperity again, and when we go to the country my hon. friends opposite will come back to sit on the same side of the house as they did after the last election.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): May I first of all extend my sympathies, with those of other members of the house, to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in the sad bereavement which he has experienced.

I have just listened to a very fiery and fighting speech by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) but I am afraid I cannot enter into his enthusiasm, at least to the extent that he did, in the defence of any administration of the present system or of any attempt to make it operative. For a long time in this country, even up to the present moment, fiscal policy has been regarded by both parties as the secret of economic advantage or prosperity; that is to say, one party held that we could bring prosperity to Canada by raising tariffs, while the other party contended that we could bring prosperity by reducing them. We have now in office the party that believes in increasing tariffs, and they have been increased; and I am quite willing to admit with the minister who has just taken his seat that in the administration of affairs under a high tariff policy Canada is just as well off as any other country in the world. I do not think there is any question about that, but I add that there is no country in the world that is very well off at the present time. I would even go this far and say that so far as I am personally concerned, it seems to me that so long as we are going to continue with capitalism in Canada I would just as soon see the administration carried on by the present government as by any other government you could pick in the dominion. But I do say that I am opposed to carrying on the present system, and I do not believe that it is possible for any government to administer that system to the satisfaction of the common people.

The next point I want to bring forward is this. We have never had any experience with a low tariff in Canada. We have had low tariff parties but have never had any low tariff practice, so that we are left to guess at what would happen were we treated to low tariffs.

The main contentions of the opposition during this session have centered on two points, first on trade, involving of course the question of tariffs. The contention has been that trade means economic salvation; that tariffs when they are high prevent trade; that if the Liberal party came into power tariffs would be lowered and we should get more trade, and therefore we should have economic salvation. The next point in their contention has been that the practices of this parliament and of this government have challenged the principle of representative government. These are the two main criticisms that have been advanced this session.

I would suggest that the abolition or the reduction of tariffs in Canada would not necessarily mean a healthy increase in trade. I have pointed out that we have had low tariff parties and they have never put a low tariff into effect, so that I must deal with the speculative side of the argument, having no practical examples to follow. It may be readily admitted that the tariff is a barrier, but I contend that it is not the only barrier, nor is it the most important barrier. There is in the world to-day in every country what we may call a capitalistic surplus of goods; that is to say, there is a surplus of goods in every industrialized country of the world, over and above that which can be sold or bought at a profit price, and each one of these countries, not being able to consume at home the surplus of goods which machine production has made possible, enters into competition with every other country for the so-called world market, which has been diminishing all through the last century, and has almost reached now the complete vanishing point.

The time has come when we must insist that the Liberal party, which in its campaign for power holds out promises to the people that it will bring prosperity through tariff reductions, should tell us just exactly how much it is going to reduce the tariff if and when it does come into power. We want to know not only how much the Liberal party intends to reduce the tariff, but on what goods, or whether it intends to reduce the tariff on all classes of goods, or intends to wipe out the tariff entirely. Then we want to know in which countries such proposed tariff reductions will secure for us a market, and for what sort of goods that market will be available. Further, we want to know to what extent that market will be open to us.

These are very practical questions and if insisted on all over Canada they may force the Liberal party, for once at least, to depart from the usual practice of generalizing and making vacuous statements which may be interpreted this way or that but are always interpreted in some other way than the way expected when the pinch comes.

Another point that I want to bring to the attention of the house is that when a nation is in debt, as Canada is, that nation cannot accept the responsibility of meeting its foreign obligations and at the same time ignore the tariff situation in the world as it is. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) dealt very ably with that point a few days ago. He argued—and I have not heard anyone who has challenged him on that—that a debtor nation must export more than she imports or she will have to default. Some have argued that we can be in debt say to the United States, and export more to Great Britain, and eventually get a favourable balance in the United States indirectly through the clearing house system. But as things are to-day that cannot be done, because all nations have a surplus of goods for export, and nearly all nations are indebted to the United States and trying to do the same thing we are trying to do. I think we may readily concede this point to the contentions of the Liberal party, that goods shipped out of Canada in exchange for goods shipped in should not be subject to a tariff, these things may be, however, better arranged than by tariff policies of the old type. The C.C.F. proposes to arrange that in a scientific way through the appointment of a government board which will handle the export and import trade so that we shall ship goods out only to nations that are in a position to take our goods and give us goods in return or take our goods to apply on debts which we may owe them.

But there is a third point in connection with this contention that a policy of lower tariffs would bring economic prosperity to Canada, that is that, unfortunately for itself, the Liberal party has a record in regard to tariffs which does not inspire confidence. If that party can again prevail on the Canadian people to return it to power once more on the promise to reduce tariffs, after its long years of office in which no attention was paid to that question, then, of course, there is not much hope for democracy.

The next complaint urged against the present administration relates to the preservation of the principle of representative government. I think those who have urged that complaint, particularly with reference to some of the legislation advanced by the administration, have unfortunately mistaken the issue. I venture to say that financial monopoly has been and is a greater danger to representative government in this country than any act which was ever passed by this or any other government. But when the Liberal party was in power it had nothing to say against that financial monopoly, and even at this session of parliament not a word has been uttered that would indicate that they are in any way opposed to the financial monopoly which is in power in all countries. I would say that even the cat with the proverbial nine lives would have been dead long ago if it had been slain as often as the Liberal party affirms that responsible government has been slain in this house. I do not think that there is any reason at all to assume that the present Prime Minister and his cabinet are impairing the principle of responsible government any more or any less than the government which preceded them.

Let me invite the attention of the opposition to the real challenge to representative government. I have already mentioned the dominating influence of finance, which is not peculiar to Canada but exists in all countries. I want next to mention the action of the Liberal party itself, which is more dangerous to representative government in my opinion than any legislative proposal. While our people are in debt, while they are unemployed and discouraged, while we have many people in want, the opposition raises hair-splitting points about governmental and constitutional questions. I think that practice has done much to discourage the people of Canada in their belief in representative government, and that the more of that which goes on the less respect will be shown by the people for this house and its deliberations. Take the discussion on the marketing bill which has gone on for the past two weeks, let anyone read that discussion and then ask them how much respect they have for representative government. That is the sort of thing that is doing more harm to representative government than any marketing bill or any act which this or any other government has so far proposed in this house. The Liberal party has failed entirely to present an alternative and constructive program as a substitute for the program that is being carried out by the government in office. This government, however inefficient or ineffective it may have been in dealing with the depression, has at least at this session of parliament given an intelligent response to the situation.

Miss MACPHAIL: They took a long time to do it.

Mr. IRVINE: As the hon. member says, they took a long time, but at last they have made an intelligent response. I am not satisfied with that response, I think they should have gone very much further. Neither do I think, as I said at the outset, that this or any other government can under the present economic order prevent unemployment or poverty or debt. I do not believe that can be done by any group of men. I am quite satisfied that the solution cannot be found in any alteration of administration or any change of party or of government; the remedy lies deeper than that, in economic reconstruction on a basis which so far neither the government nor the opposition has seriously considered.

Let me point to a few major facts which concern us in Canada to-day and which should be the basis of our political and economic policy in the near future. The first is the fact of abundance. That has been pointed out from this section of the house many times during the past decade. We have in Canada an abundance of goods and we can produce more. We have potential wealth and real wealth far beyond the ability of the people to purchase. In other words, although we have abundance, that abundance is not distributed. That leads us to the next fact, that devising measures to assure distribution of these goods is the first task of any administration. The third point is that financial reform is the first step to be taken in securing distribution of that abundance. We submit these considerations as the basis of a policy different from that now being pursued by the administration or hinted at in the campaign of the official opposition.

I beg, sir, in resuming my seat, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefore:

"This house, while appreciating the unusually difficult task of the government in attempting to administer the present system, regrets the undue delay in taking necessary steps leading to the distribution of our present abundance amongst the Canadian people."

Mr. J. C. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, I think it is the sense of hon. members of this house, irrespective of party, that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on April 18, comprised a more comprehensive statement of the federal financial position than has ever been submitted on a like occasion. Revenue and expenditure, debt and taxation, liabilities accrued and accruing, obligations outstanding, both actual and contingent, are set forth clearly in a variety of statements, the reading of which gives a full insight into the financial position of the dominion. The picture had still to be painted by the minister in rather sombre colours, but he was able to intersperse touches of light here and there and so present the brightest exhibit of national affairs that has been possible in the last four years. Trade is reviving, both domestic and foreign; all indices prove conclusively that several months ago the bottom of the pit was reached and that business is steadily climbing upward. Gratifying, too, it is to learn that the dominion government has been able to support and sustain the western provinces in their time of financial trouble, brought about by crop failure, low price of wheat, and other untoward events, and to maintain its own credit at a high point.

[Mr. Irvine.]

I am for economy in public expenditure, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot close my eyes to the fact that the field is circumscribed within which to ply the pruning knife. I commend the government for having already effected substantial savings and for its proclaimed intention of making further reductions in expenditure as circumstances permit. Let me briefly cite what has been done already in the way of economy. Ordinary expenditure has been reduced from $382,827,000 in 1930-31, to $347,702,000 in 1933-34, a decrease of $35,000,000 since the present government took office. In the same two years capital expenditure has been reduced from $28,222,000 to $6,570,000, or by $21,600,000. These are large figures and I submit manifest real economy and the earnest desire of the government to escape new taxation so far as possible by retrenching expenditure. But they do not tell the whole story. Public expenditure consists of two kinds, controllable and uncontrollable, and it is obvious that in respect of the latter the power to economize is nil. In this category fall such items as interest on public debt, war pensions, subsidies to provinces and old age pensions, which in the aggregate absorb 63 per cent of total ordinary expenditure. It is in the field of controllable expenditure that a government can wield the pruning knife, and in this field a remarkable degree of economy has been effected. Look at the figures:

Controllable expenditure, 1930-1..	$217,000,000
Controllable expenditure, 1933-4..	134,000,000

In three years the cost of these services has been reduced by $83,000,000, or more than 38 per cent. It was not an easy task. It required courage to halt salary increases in the civil service, to cut down staffs, to lop 10 per cent from salaries of all grades, high and low, in the public service of Canada, and from the indemnities of members of parliament. But the national credit stood in jeopardy, and the Bennett government fearlessly attacked the problem of maintaining public credit and has successfully solved it. I sometimes wonder whether the people of Canada realize the tremendous task which confronted Right Hon. Mr. Bennett when he assumed office in 1930, faced with a world wide commercial crisis, with increasing unemployment, with falling prices, with a scale of extravagant expenditure set by his predecessor in office, with declining revenue and growing deficits. When one considers the burden laid upon the premier and the marvellous courage and ability with which he has borne it, the voice of criticism should be hushed. Certainly the last to condemn should be those who cried loudest for the expenditures which have proved our undoing.

The weight of taxation presses heavily upon all classes of the people and the recovery of trade has not progressed long enough or far enough to produce such increases in public revenue as will enable the government to reduce taxation. There has been, however, in the budget now under discussion an adjustment of taxation that will, I am convinced, meet with great popular approval. The government has lifted one-half the sugar tax that touched the pockets of all the people and placed it on the large miners of gold. That, I submit, is a case of helping all the people at the expense of very few of the people. And with business on the up-grade and federal revenues expanding, we may reasonably expect the emergency tax on sugar to disappear wholly next year.

There were two amendments before the house, the adoption of either one of which involved the defeat of the government. The first amendment proclaimed the fiscal policy of the Liberal party, reading as follows:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism, which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.

Could there be better evidence of the utter insincerity of this amendment than the fact that its mover, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) is one of the strongest supporters of economic nationalism in this house, when applied to a principal product of his native province, Nova Scotia, namely, coal. He is of those who in the words of Byron:

> Compounds the sins he is inclined to,
> By damning those he has no mind to.

In other words, economic nationalism is commendable when applied to Nova Scotia products and condemnable when applied to products of other provinces.

I deny, however, that the policy of the present government is one of economic nationalism. It is, in fact, distinctly in the opposite direction. I call to witness the empire economic compacts brought about by the persistent pressure of the Prime Minister, under whose operation Canada's trade with empire countries has been substantially increased. I call to witness the repeated declaration of the leader of the Conservative party that he does not favour high tariffs as such but only as a means of preserving the industrial life of Canada and of supplying employment to men who otherwise would be destitute.

We hear much of the distressful unemployment of recent years, due to the fall in world prices of commodities and ensuing collapse of trade. Does any sane man believe that the policy of the present government brought about this state of affairs? Every Canadian knows the world trade crisis began and was steadily increasing in intensity before the Conservative government came into office in August, 1930, and that the debacle was beyond the power of any one country to avert or abate. What government could do, this government has done. It has shielded domestic industries against the assaults of dumped goods of foreign production, and it has effected a larger measure of mutually advantageous reciprocal trade within the empire.

The constituency I have the honour to represent is largely rural, one of the finest agricultural sections in all Canada and devoted to diversified farming. Would it be to the advantage of these farmers to have their home markets destroyed by lowering of tariffs to a point that would cause the substitution of foreign made goods for those of Canadian manufacture and the consequent unemployment and loss of purchasing power? I say most emphatically no, and the same may be said of farming in whatever part of Canada it may be pursued.

The amendment submitted as the embodiment of Liberal fiscal policy calls for policies which will promote export trade throughout the world as essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada. Did the fiscal policy of that party sustain the export trade of Canada? It did not, because in the fiscal year, 1929-30, under Liberal government, that trade decreased $243,457,000, and if it be said that world conditions and not Liberal fiscal policy were responsible for this shrinkage, surely it is equally true that greatly intensified world depression was responsible for the decline in Canada's export trade in subsequent years under Conservative government. What is the salient fact? It is that our export trade of Canadian products is increasing, not decreasing. In the fiscal year ended March 31 last, these exports had a value $105,526,000 greater than the year before and $3,000,000 more than in 1931-32, so that our export trade throughout the world essential to permanent improvement of conditions in Canada is already increasing under the policies of the present government. Fall in prices accounts mainly for the decline in money value of Canadian exports in recent years, but it is a notable fact that the volume of these exports in 1933-4 was greater than the volume of exports in 1930-1.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the subject of reciprocity with the United States, especially in farm products, is still harped upon by opponents of the present government, though not, perhaps, in so loud a key as in past days. Lament is expressed that the convention arranged in 1911 by Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson was not approved by the people of Canada, and the statement made that the rejection of that convention cost Canadian farmers a vast sum of money. What nonsense! The convention of 1911—treaty, if you like—was not worth the paper it was written on, since it was terminable at the instance of the United States any day after one year's existence. It carried no assurance of continuance for a fixed definite period, and what followed in congressional action in the United States soon after the convention was signed proved beyond question that its duration would be brief. So I assert it to be untrue, and misleading the farmers of Canada, to contend that the rejection of that convention deprived those farmers of a profitable market in the United States. If you doubt me, read the correspondence between Mr. Fielding and the then Secretary of State of the United States, who carried out the negotiations.

It is true our farmers in a large part have lost the American market. In the nine months ending March 31, 1921, the value of farm produce exported from Canada to the United States was $154,560,000 and in the corresponding period this year, that value had fallen to $7,612,000, a very great decrease. But the Bennett government is not to be blamed for this shrinkage. Its fiscal policy was not in any instance the cause. Our sales of farm products to the United States dwindled because of prohibitory tariffs enacted by the congress of the United States before the Bennett government came into being. Of the 43 farm products comprised in the export trade of $154,560,000 in 1921, no less than twenty-five entered the United States free of duty and only eighteen were subject to duty, whereas to-day not a solitary product of Canadian farms is admitted to the United States free of duty. Cream and milk, cattle, sheep, wheat, flour, meats, potatoes, eggs, wool and many other farm products entered the United States without payment of tariff tax in 1921.

[Mr. J. C. Moore.]

A Conservative government was in office in Canada at that time and had been for ten years preceding. It was only after the Liberal party succeeded to office that the United States tariff against Canadian farm products began to go up until it reached its present almost prohibitory height. Do I mean to imply that because the Liberal party came into office in Canada, the United States tariff was raised against our farm products? Not at all. The American tariff was raised to protect the American farmer in his home market and for no other reason, and no person outside a lunatic asylum will contend that in view of the N.R.A. and other recovery policies of President Roosevelt, there is the possibility at this time of regaining the American market for our farm products by any action of a Canadian government.

One word more upon this subject. Reciprocity in farm products with the United States no longer has the lure to Canadian farmers it once had. They have found better markets and comparison of prices of many products of farm, field and dairy in the two countries in recent months will disclose why the farmers of Canada are much less concerned than they once were with reciprocity with the United States.

The subamendment which you ruled out of order, Mr. Speaker, came from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, commonly known as the Co-Co's. With some of the pious platitudes in the platform of that party I imagine we agree. We can agree that it is desirable to raise the price of agricultural products and other primary products, to create an increased volume of business, to abolish poverty and generally to establish utopia in the dominion. But their means to this end are less commendable, and, as the lessons of history teach, are quite futile. Reduced to the last analysis, the C.C.F. platform means repudiation of debt, and the issue of fiat money. Indeed, it is so nominated in the bond. Public borrowing is to cease. Federal, provincial and municipal governments are to pay their debts with Dominion notes inconvertible, produced by the printing press in amounts limited only by the demand for the same. The workingman is to have a full dinner pail and a capacious wallet bulging with legal tender. We are all to be made rich with paper tokens of daily descending value, and as the supply of paper making material is abundant the output of notes from the printing press can be unlimited.

Now it may be possible to make people apparently rich and correspondingly happy for a year or two by adoption of the C.C.F. monetary policy, but experience has conclusively proved that the life of gayety will be of short duration. France, Germany, Austria, Russia and the United States have all, at one time or another, embarked on the sea of fiat money only to be submerged at last by ruin. Of all classes who suffer from depreciated currency, farmers and labourers are the first and greatest sufferers.

Various causes have been assigned for the world trade depression from which we are now emerging, and various remedies have been suggested. In my opinion, the cause can be summed up in one word—war. Few realize the immensity of that catastrophe, the losses it entailed, the disorder in finance, trade, industry and social comforts that it produced. In this connection, I desire to place on Hansard an extract from the annual report of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, edited by that distinguished American, Doctor Nicholas Murray Butler, which reads as follows:

According to the best statistics obtainable, the world war cost 30,000,000 lives and $400,000,000,000 in property. In order to give some idea of what this means just let me illustrate it in the following:

With that amount we could have built a $2,500 house and furnished this house with $1,000 worth of furniture, and placed it on five acres of land worth $100 an acre and given all this to each and every family in the United States, Canada, Australia, England, Wales, Ireland, Scotland, France, Belgium, Germany and Russia.

After doing this there would have been enough money left to give each city of 20,000 inhabitants and over in all the countries named a $5,000,000 library and a $10,000,000 university.

And then out of the balance we could have still sufficient money to set aside a sum at 5 per cent interest which would pay for all times to come a $1,000 yearly salary each year for an army of 125,000 teachers, and in addition to this pay the same salary to each of an army of 125,000 nurses.

And after having done all this, we could still have enough left out of our four hundred billions to buy up all that France and Belgium possess; that is, every French and Belgium farm, home, factory, church, railroad, street car—in fact, everything of value in those two countries in 1914.

Mr. Speaker, if there be one class of persons in Canada, who, during the last four years have had the earnest solicitude of the government for their welfare, it is the agricultural class. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) himself a practical farmer, has laboured in season and out of season to improve the lot of the man on the land, the grower of grain, the breeder of live stock, those engaged in dairying, and the mixed farmer, and it is becoming increasingly recognized among these classes that he is the best Minister of Agriculture Canada has known. There was the milk investigation by the committee on agriculture of this house, which last year made a thorough inquiry into the wide spread in the price of milk between producer and consumer to the undue profit of the distributor. The report of that committee, containing a comprehensive statement of the evidence taken, was duly transmitted to the various provincial governments for such remedial action as might be taken.

The provisions of the British North America Act commit exclusively to the provincial legislatures jurisdiction in civil rights, and for this reason, the parliament of Canada could not itself apply remedies, but the way was blazed here; the unfair treatment of milk producers was revealed and the spur to provincial remedial legislation given. As a result, the government of Quebec was moved to action. All distributors of milk in that province are now bonded, and security is provided against future losses from insolvency of distributors.

This session the government has further manifested its solicitude for the farmers in the important measure known as the marketing bill. The aim of the bill is to maintain a reasonable level of prices of farm products by means of orderly marketing. The bill is opposed by the Liberal opposition on the ground that it is unconstitutional, and upon the ground also that it does away with individualism, with freedom of action, substituting therefor collective control and bargaining. Complaint is also made that certain provisions of the measure invade the provincial field and are beyond the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada.

To these objections farmers will pay small heed. What they want is a living price for their products and they will acclaim that political party which legislates to bring about this end. No one can successfully deny that, until the great agricultural classes become prosperous, Canada cannot enjoy sustained prosperity. The welfare of the manufacturers is bound up in the welfare of the farmers. Their interests are mutual, dependent one upon the other. The marketing bill is largely a local option bill. It is an instrument placed in the hands of farmers by use of which stability of prices may be brought about at a level profitable to producers. Surely it should be evident to the dullest mind that the only road to national recovery in Canada is in restored prosperity to farmers, who cannot go on much longer growing crops and raising live stock which sell for less than cost of production. The marketing bill is an earnest effort of the government to change all this, and it remains for the farmers to do their share towards giving effect to the purpose of the legislation.

After listening to so much wailing by hon. members of the opposition, I should like to put on Hansard a letter written to the New York Herald Tribune. This is dated March 16, and reads:

Canada Shows How
A Reply to President's Request for Alternatives

To the New York Herald Tribune:

In his recent speech before the representatives of various industries, the president stated that it was not fair to criticize his proposals without suggesting constructive alternatives, and that all criticisms of his plans faded away before the question: "Well, old man, what would you do?" I think Mr. President, I can best answer your inquiry by asking you first to "look at the record," of our oldest friend and nearest neighbour, the Dominion of Canada.

They have no "N.R.A.," "P.W.A.," "C.W.A.," "C.C.C.," or "A.A.A." They lack the services of General Johnson. They have not repudiated the obligations of their currency. They have not enacted, nor has their government recommended the enactment of codes, banking laws or security acts that tend to make criminals of people who have done no wrong, or subject innocent men to heavy damages.

Yet, in spite of the absence of these alphabetically designated and habit forming stimulants which we have adopted, and the other so-called "aids to recovery," to which I have referred, Canada has staged a remarkable industrial recovery.

Business there is not constantly threatened by strikes, nor in constant fear of the district attorney or the sheriff, and we read daily in our papers such headlines as "Trade in Canada gains," "Canadian Industrial Advance Exceeds All Expectations."

Now, Mr. President, my suggestion is simply this, that you eliminate the theories and follow the practical path of Canada. If you need experts to advise you how to do this (personally I don't think you do), reorganize your "brain trust" by firing the professors of economics, finance and agriculture, and get a few on modern history with field experience." If native talent is insufficient, import one or two from McGill or some other good Canadian university.

Compare this tribute to the administration of affairs under the present government given by an impartial and competent observer, with the denunciatory criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite. I know there are those who hold it to be the business of an opposition to oppose all measures emanating from the Conservative government, irrespective of their merits, but I do not think the people of Canada can approve this attitude. On the contrary, I believe the people have become impatient of petty partisan tactics in this time of stress and strain, a time when in politics, as in trade, cooperation should supplant competition, and when the best brains of all public men should be devoted to the solution of the difficulties which beset our people. There should, I submit, be a higher conception of the duty of parliamentary representatives than wanton waste of time in impeding progress of legislation or in opposing governmental measures for the mere sake of opposition, and this view I know to be held, not only by the supporters of the government but by many Liberals, who regret and who do not hesitate to condemn the conduct of their leaders in this respect.

The Right Honourable R. B. Bennett has shown good, common sense in refusing to answer attacks of the opposition, official and otherwise, which have been waged against him with increasing vehemence during the last four years. He accepts their hostile criticism as a necessary part of public service. I do not think it is any exaggeration to say that he has won the esteem of the whole country by the high level upon which he has always conducted his controversies. He has listened to the tirades against himself without complaint and in that way has been a splendid example to the world, which I believe it would be well for us to emulate.

It is reported by the Regina Leader Post that at the Liberal summer school at Port Hope, the opposition leader had been in close attendance upon all the lectures and round table discussions for the whole period of the proceedings, but in spite of his close attendance, the report states that at the end of the discussions, when everything from reciprocity to free trade had been discussed, no suggested solution was forthcoming. Yet at that meeting, where there were assembled for days what was supposed to be the best brains of the Liberal party in the dominion, with nothing else to engage their attention, they admitted, according to the report of their own paper, that there was nothing they could do to get wider markets, other than what had been done and was being done by the present government. Following this, the right hon. gentleman went through the west and left the impression that if he were in office there would be wider markets and lower tariffs. If he thinks that by such methods he is adding cubits to his political stature, I fear he will be disappointed.

For four years, the world has been out of joint—despair and woe, wide-spread trade depression, a greater degree of penury and want than ever before. But from that dire condition, Canada, in common with many other countries, is slowly emerging. She is entering into a brighter day with her system of government unshaken, her social order undisturbed, the liberties of her people uncontracted, and the spirit of Canadians unquenched. By Conservative principles and ability, directed by the strong hand and signal talent of the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, we will win our way to a new and greater prosperity than has been.

Mr. J. S. STEWART (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) moved an amendment to the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that the Speaker do now leave the chair and the house resolve itself into committee of ways and means. This afternoon I desire to direct attention to the first paragraph of that amendment. The amendment has been ruled out of order by Your Honour but there is no doubt that it expresses the fiscal policy of the Liberal party and is a public pronouncement made on behalf of that party. The first paragraph reads:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the amendment was ruled out of order and therefore is not now before the house for discussion.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): Might it not be regarded as a pronouncement with respect to the Liberal party's fiscal policy? It is a public pronouncement made by one of the leaders of the party and I think it gives the people a correct idea of just how the Liberal party itself views the problems of the day. If that is right, then the Liberal party claims the policies of this government have affected the trade of Canada; and if we grant that premise, then it must be only fair and just to arrive at the conclusion that the fiscal or trade policies of the former government affected the trade and the markets of Canada. If, during the term of office of the Liberal party, of which government the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was a member, our country lost markets for our agricultural products, then it is but fair to conclude that we were deprived of these markets through the policies of the then Liberal government. The former government must be responsible for any decline in Canada's trade as well as for the loss of markets during their term of office. Therefore I should like to direct the attention of the house and of the country to the lack of policy of the King government, to the lack of effort put forward by the Liberal government from 1921 to 1930 to hold for our farmers an export market for the staple product of the west, namely, wheat. If today we lack a market for our wheat, if any government be involved in the present wheat situation it is the government that held office from 1921 to 1930. The treatment of the wheat market problem by the former administration is a story of the lack of possession of knowledge of wheat market conditions by the members of the then government, or it is a story of the complete ignoring of those conditions, or it is a story of neglect of public duty. I think it is high time the people were told to what extent the King government is involved in our wheat problem, and of its method of dealing with this problem, which it dared not face. It is time we were told that the Liberal government did not perceive the problem and had no policy to offer for the situation. It is time we were told of a government that was weighed in the balance and found wanting in many respects, not the least of which was its attitude towards the wheat situation in 1930 which, as I say, it dared not face but left as one of the many questions to be passed on to the Bennett government for solution.

Our present wheat market situation can be explained only by reference to what transpired before 1930, and particularly by reference to the years between 1925 and 1930. From 1919 to 1925 the countries of Europe, which had been engaged in the war, strove to regain their pre-war production of food products, and by 1925 these countries were then working on a fairly normal basis. European agriculture was therfore fairly well established in 1925, and that continent presented a market picture much different from what was presented to the people, chiefly the exporters, a few years previously.

Canada being an exporter of agricultural products was vitally interested in and would be affected by any policies which might be initiated in Europe. But the King government did not appear to realize the significance of the policies initiated in the European countries, and certainly they made no attempt to warn the farmers of the wheat marketing problem which was bound to follow as the results of the policies initiated in 1925 in continental Europe.

Wheat, which is the staple product of western farmers, has for some years been Canada's greatest export commodity, and market trends in wheat have a profound influence on business conditions in this country. When we have good wheat prices business is good in Canada. The transportation of wheat has a direct influence on Canadian business, and the sale of wheat is the largest factor in our export trade. Any policies which might be put into operation which would affect wheat would be of vital interest to the people of western Canada.

From 1921 to 1930, eighty-five per cent of the world surplus of wheat was marketed in the importing countries of Europe but the outlook for that wheat market was greatly changed owing to the agricultural policies which were pursued by those countries in the first post-war years. I think the clearest picture of all can be presented through the trends in wheat acreages in Europe from 1921 to 1930, as will be seen in the following table:

Wheat Acreage—Europe (excluding Russia)

	acres
1930	72,000,000
1921	63,000,000
Increase 1921-30	9,000,000

These figures show that during the ten years of Liberal administration in Canada, from 1921 to 1930, there was an increase in wheat acreage in continental Europe of 9,000,000 acres, or an average of nearly 1,000,000 acreage per year; and to that one might add this fact, that in continental Europe they secure a substantially heavier yield of wheat per acre than is obtained in Canada and other exporting countries. Russia also had embarked on the first of her five-year plans and had announced to the world that she had adopted a policy to intensify her agricultural production through collective farming. The following table gives a report of Russia's activity in wheat:

Wheat Acreage—Russia

	acres
1930	80,000,000
1921	50,000,000
Increase 1921-30	30,000,000

[Mr. J. S Stewart.]

In so far as world trade in this commodity is concerned, one can readily see that as a result of these acreage increases in wheat there would be dislocation of wheat trade channels. The following table shows the increase in European acreage, including Russia:

Total European Wheat Acreage
(including Russia)

	acres
1930	152,000,000
1921	113,000,000
Increase 1921-30	39,000,000

This increase of 39,000,000 acres means an increase of more than one and a half times the present wheat acreage of Canada. This increase in acreage was highly significant, and a change in Canadian agricultural policy should have been put into operation to meet the changes in our wheat market which necessarily would follow. In our country the farmers were never advised what was going on in Europe. For this the Liberal government of that day must be held responsible. Canada's adjustment to the increase of European wheat acreage was to increase her own wheat acreage from 20·7 million acres in 1925 to 25·25 million acres in 1930.

Along with this great increase in wheat acreage in Europe there was another significant warning given to the Liberal government of the day in the price trend from 1925 to 1930. In the following table you will find the changes which took place in the average of wholesale prices and the average price for No. 1 northern wheat at Winnipeg for the years 1925 to 1930:

	Index of Wholesale prices	No. 1 Northern wheat
1925	102.6	109.8
1926	100.0	100.0
1927	97.7	99.0
1928	96.4	90.2
1929	95.6	89.8
1930	86.6	63.0

The foregoing table shows the definite reaction of Canadian wheat prices as a result of increased European acreage. But the Liberal government paid no attention to those distress signals.

Concerning agricultural policies in Europe, in 1925 Germany and Italy announced the inauguration of a new agricultural policy which was definitely related to the increase in their wheat production. France followed with her announcement in 1927. The purpose of these policies in these countries, which countries had imported a large amount of our wheat each year, could not be mistaken or misunderstood.

Germany in August 1925, revised her tariff in an effort to increase the intensity of German agriculture, and the exemption from duty of the most important agricultural products was abolished. Heavy duties were placed on imported live stock, and a duty of 32 cents per bushel was placed against imported wheat.

In Italy Mussolini in 1925 commenced his famous "battle of wheat," and inaugurated his new policy by placing a duty of 58 cents per bushel against imported wheat.

The 1925 policies of Germany and Italy were followed by France in 1927. In September of that year the duty on wheat entering that country was increased from 20 cents to 37½ cents a bushel.

These three countries, large importers of our wheat, adopted as early as 1925 policies which were designed, (1) to maintain domestic prices, (2) increase domestic production, and (3) limit imports from foreign countries. These policies which were put into operation in 1925 brought results in 1929. Through the increase of wheat acreage and through increased production brought about by the use of fertilizers and better methods of cultivation large crops were secured. In 1929 nature cooperated with Europe and they had a tremendous wheat yield. During the year 1929 and the first half of 1930 these three countries greatly increased their import duties on foreign wheat, as will be seen by the following table.

France—Increases

May, 1929—from 37c. to 53c. per bushel
June, 1930—from 53c. to 85c. per bushel

Italy—Increases

May, 1929—from 58c. to 73½c. per bushel
June, 1930—from 73½c. to 86c. per bushel

Germany—Increases

Dec., 1929—from 42c. to 49c. per bushel
Jan., 1930—from 49c. to 62c. per bushel
Apr., 1930—from 62c. to 97c. per bushel

These increases in tariffs were supplemented by other restrictions, such as milling quotas. In December 1929, France established a milling quota providing that millers should use 97 per cent domestic wheat in their grist. In July 1929, Germany introduced a milling quota whereby millers were required to use 30 per cent domestic wheat. Italy followed with a similar policy. These mixing regulations have been changed from time to time to meet conditions of supply and price levels.

The immediate effect of the import wheat duties levied by Germany and Italy in 1925 and by France in 1927 was to increase the domestic price levels in those countries, and we find that domestic prices were substantially higher than world prices. The following table shows a comparison of the prices paid for domestic wheat in Germany, Italy and France, with the price for imported wheat on the world market at Liverpool:

	United Kingdom imported wheat	Germany	Italy	France
1925-26.. ..	1.58	1.61	2.07	1.45
1926-27.. ..	1.57	1.77	2.08	1.82
1927-28.. ..	1.37	1.62	1.91	1.66
1928-29.. ..	1.27	1.41	1.90	1.67
1929-30.. ..	1.20	1.65	1.90	1.47

The extent to which the domestic producer in these three countries was subsidized during these five years in raising wheat is seen in the following table:

	Germany	Italy	France cents per bushel
1925-26..	+ 03	+ 49	— 13
1926-27..	+ 20	+ 51	+ 25
1927-28..	+ 25	+ 54	+ 29
1928-29..	+ 14	+ 63	+ 40
1929-30..	+ 35	+ 70	+ 27

It will thus be seen that the domestic producer in Germany received a bonus as high as 35 cents a bushel, the domestic producer in Italy as high as 70 cents a bushel, and in France as high as 40 cents a bushel. The result of these high prices in these countries from 1925 to 1930 was a great stimulation of wheat production, with the result that by the end of the year 1929-30 the imports of wheat into those countries were definitely reduced. We as an exporting country have been and now are suffering from the results of policies which were initiated eight years ago. This is brought home to us by the fact that the major part of the decline in the world trade in wheat in recent years has been due to the reduced purchases of foreign wheat by these three countries. The curtailment of imports of wheat into France, Germany and Italy is the very heart of our wheat problem. Our average wheat export, including flour, over the ten years from 1923-4 to 1932-3 was 281,000,000 bushels. Our average wheat export for the five year period from 1924-5 to 1928-9 was 310,000,000 bushels. Last year, 1932-3, our total exports amounted to 264,000,000 bushels, including flour, made up as follows:

Canadian Exports—1932-33

Destination	Amount bushels	Remarks
1. United Kingdom	103,000,000	Largest in history—about 50%
2. Orient	12,000,000	Normal
3 Other countries—
United States, B.W.I., etc.	10,000,000	Normal
4. Continental Europe	115,000,000
	240,000,000
Flour exports	24,000,000
Grand total	264,000,000

With our flour exports it makes a total of 264,000,000. About fifty per cent of the total importation of wheat into the United Kingdom was secured by Canada in that year. But in 1927 France, Germany and Italy imported 225,000,000 bushels of wheat, whereas in 1932-3 their imports amounted to only 90,000,000 bushels. There was a decline of 135,000,000 bushels in the imports into those three countries between those years. Therefore had Canada but supplied her fair share of that decline, or about forty per cent of the 135,000,000 bushels, our exports would have been equal to our ten year average.

I desire to place on record now two tables, the first showing the duties imposed against our wheat when the King government came into office and the second showing the duties imposed when the King government was voted out of power:

Wheat Duties when King Government took office
(per bushel)

Year	France	Germany	Italy
1921	20c.	free	free

Wheat Duties when King Government left office

1930	85c.	97c.	86c.

In addition, milling quotas were applied in 1929, which greatly restricted our wheat exports to these countries. The present government has been criticized for not being able to dispose of our surplus wheat, but the country should know that our wheat carry over commenced as far back as 1925 and gradually increased each year. The figures are as follows:

	bushels
1925	27,000,000
1926	36,000,000
1927	48,000,000
1928	78,000,000
1929	104,000,000
1930	111,000,000

[Mr. J. S Stewart.]

Canada will greatly reduce her carry over at the end of this crop year, and we would not have a carry over to worry about but for the legacy of unsold wheat bequeathed us in 1930 when this government took office. In 1929-30 the United Kingdom purchased large quantities of wheat from the Argentine, and in that year Canada only supplied thirty per cent of the United Kingdom wheat requirements, as compared with a normal importation of from forty to forty-five per cent from our country. But the story of Canada's exports of live stock products to the United Kingdom presents an even more tragic picture. I have here a table showing the cattle and bacon exported from 1925 to 1930, as follows:

	Cattle (Numbers)	Bacon (cwt. of 112 lbs.)
1925	110,155	1,266,861
1926	79,083	863,493
1927	7,669	503,084
1928	405	306,795
1929	....	199,466
1930	5,193	99,298

During the ten years from 1921 to 1930, while the Liberal government held office, Canada lost another market for her agricultural products; that is, the United States. The loss of this market was due to tariffs imposed against our exports by that country. First we had the emergency tariff of May 27, 1921; then the Fordney-McCumber tariff of September 21, 1932, and finally the Hawley-Smoot tariff of June 18, 1930. In 1921 we exported to the United States $190,000,000 of agricultural products; in 1930, the last year of the Liberal regime, those exports amounted to $92,000,000. So during the administration of the King government we lost a market in the United States for $100,000,000 worth of agricultural products, and the Hawley-Smoot tariff which was put into operation six weeks before this government took office completely shut out our exports to that country, so that last year they amounted to only $6,900,000.

During the years 1921 to 1930 it has been shown that Canada lost a market for from fifty to sixty million bushels of wheat, in Europe and a market for agricultural products in the United States worth $100,000,000 annually, but the amazing thing about this debate lies in the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite say this government is responsible for the loss of our markets because of the policies we have pursued. If anyone is responsible for the loss of these markets surely it must be the gentlemen who were administering the affairs of this country when the tariffs were placed against us.

I should like to summarize the points I have endeavoured to bring forward by stating that when the Bennett government took office in August, 1930, it was brought face to face with a serious condition in regard to our export markets for agricultural products.

1. During the King regime Europe and Russia had increased their wheat acreage by some thirty-nine million.

2. High import duties and milling restrictions had been placed against our wheat by France, Germany, Italy and other countries.

3. Wheat production in the countries I have named was heavily subsidized, so that our exports of wheat were sharply reduced.

4. Under the Liberal government the wheat carry-overs increased from 27,000,000 bushels in 1925 to 111,000,000 bushels in 1930.

5. In 1929-30 the United Kingdom, instead of purchasing our wheat in the usual quantities, bought Argentine and Danubian wheat.

6. Our domestic wheat market was demoralized by the piling up of surpluses as the result of the undermining of Canadian export markets during 1925 to 1930.

7. The market for farm products in the United States was closed, the last tariff changes being put into effect six weeks before the Bennett government took office.

What action was taken or what policy was pursued by the King government to meet this emergency in 1930? The Prime Minister of the day, in the speech from the throne delivered on February 20, 1930, said:

> The dominion is already recovering from the seasonal slackness evident at the end of the year, and it is not to be forgotten that the bulk of the 1929 wheat crop still remains in Canadian hands for final disposition.

Evidently the right hon. gentleman felt that it was a great asset to have in storage in Canada wheat for which we had no market and which we could not sell. Then on March 14, 1929, the Liberal Minister of Trade and Commerce said this to the country:

> The Department of Trade and Commerce is not exercised over the sale of such commodities as wheat because those commodities find their own market; but we are interested in assisting the sale of manufactured products.

But listen to this: The then Minister of Railways and Canals, Hon. T. A. Crerar, at his nomination convention in Brandon, held on June 13, 1930, is reported as follows:

> Mr. Crerar said the greatest factor in the present unemployment situation in Canada was the fact that in 1929 western Canada produced a smaller crop than in 1928. A normal crop of 500,000,000 bushels this year with other crops corresponding would end unemployment practically within six months.

I must acknowledge that a spokesman of the then government who attended the League of Nations meeting at Geneva did make a statement either in 1924 or 1926 that the government of Canada was one of the few governments in the world which had kept to lower tariffs at a time when other countries were raising tariffs against her. But when markets are falling away prompt action certainly is necessary. If the action they did take made it so that other countries increased their tariffs against us, then I say that on the face of it that action must certainly condemn them. This country has learned how easy it was under a Liberal government to lose markets, and the present government is finding out how hard it is to regain the markets previously lost.

What policies did the Bennett government adopt to meet these problems that had been left on its doorstep by the King administration? It might have followed the Liberal policy and done nothing but that would bring disaster to Canada in so far as her export markets were concerned. The other alternative, which was adopted by this government, was to face the situation fairly and see what could be done to help the Canadian people in this emergency. What was that policy?

First, an effort was made, and that policy is being followed at the present time, to restore confidence and stability to the domestic wheat market in Canada. The collective credit of Canada has assisted in maintaining an open and continuous market for Canadian wheat, and that in spite of a world surplus, and a Canadian carry-over. The farmer has been able to sell and get cash for every bushel of wheat he has hauled to market. Further, an aggressive policy to assist the selling of our wheat abroad was at once initiated, and with beneficial results. The following table shows the exports of wheat for the year 1929-30, the last year of the King administration, and the years which have followed:

Year—	Canadian exports (million bushels)	Per cent Canadian export of total trade
1929-30	186	30
1930-31	259	33
1931-32	207	27
1932-33	264	43
1933-34 (estimate)	200	36

We have sold each year more wheat than did our exporters during the last year of the King regime. Further than that, in 1932-33 Canada's shipments of wheat were 43 per cent of the total world trade, one of the largest percentages Canada has ever had, and a percentage which was surpassed only three times in the ten years when we were supposed to have free markets for our wheat throughout the world. Secondly, the domestic markets were secured for Canadian producers. Foreign produce was more or less shut out, and to-day we find that the prices received for agricultural products in Canada are away beyond the prices paid for the same products in the United States and in other countries. Then, in the third place, through the efforts of the right hon. leader of the government the Canadian farmer has been able to secure a market in the largest and most stable market in the world, namely in the United Kingdom. This has been secured for the farmers through the provisions of the Ottawa agreements, and through these agreements there has been an increase in the price of hogs and in bacon exports. To the principle of these agreements and the principle involved in the second reading of the measures to promote trade within the empire the Liberal party were opposed. I say that the results obtained through the operations of the agreements provide sufficient reasons why the public should refuse to repose confidence in the policies of the Liberal party. The people will continue to confide in and to repose confidence in the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Conservative party in this House of Commons, the gentleman who during the last four years and in the most troublesome times has presided over the destinies of Canada, a leader who stands among the greatest Canada has yet produced.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. B. F. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the task of speaking in a budget debate is not easy under any circumstances, and when one finds himself compelled to follow so many notable addresses which have already been delivered in this debate and finds that so many phases of the budget have been exhaustively dealt with, it becomes increasingly difficult. It is not without some degree of hesitancy, therefore, that I rise to give utterance to some few thoughts that I have in mind in connection with this budget.

The task of preparing the budget is not an easy one under ordinary conditions, and under the abnormal circumstances in which we find ourselves in this country to-day it is much more difficult. I have often wondered as I have sat and listened during this debate whether it would be possible for any finance minister to prepare a budget which would be acceptable to everyone. Scripture tells us that the day shall come when the laws shall no longer be written in tables of stone, but in the tables of men's hearts. I fear that that day will not come until the millennium is with us, and the millennium will have to come before any finance minister in this country will be able to prepare a budget that is acceptable to all. When that time does come, Mr. Speaker, I hope that many hon. gentlemen whose faces I now see opposite will be permitted to remain in occupation of the opposition benches.

I think this much may be said of the present budget speech, that it is a complete statistical picture of conditions as they exist. In most budgets to which I have listened there seems to have been an inclination on the part of the one who prepared it to deal only with the more pleasant features, leaving aside those which were distasteful; but in this particular case I am forced to the conclusion that the finance minister has made an honest effort to give to the people a true picture of the country's affairs. The man in the street who can add and subtract can take this budget speech and determine for himself pretty nearly where this country stands.

The duty of any government in my judgment is first to gather in the revenues of the country honestly and to maintain the public services, and to make judicious expenditures that are necessary and in the interests of the well-being of its people. At the present time it becomes necessary for the finance minister in preparing his budget to keep his eye upon the labouring man, who is always worthy of his hire; upon the fisherman, who in his weeks and months of unceasing toil and hardship finds himself on many a day and night labouring and catching nothing; upon the miner, who goes out to explore unknown territory in the hope of finding untold wealth; upon the farmer, who works early and late in order that he may receive some remuneration from his efforts and have some chance of giving an education and the necessaries of life to the family which he is bringing up. Nor should we forget those who are working in industry. We cannot pay too much regard to these people; for it is necessary and essential that the administration of affairs in this country be so conducted as to provide for the safe investment of wealth so that capital and labour can go forward hand in hand and bring happiness and prosperity and contentment to our people. With the wonderful natural resources that we possess I have no hesitation in saying that if these instrumentalities are bonded together, working in harmony and cooperation, there is no just reason why the people of Canada should not be made a happy and industrious and contented people.

At this particular time we require a government of great courage and determination. I think the very strongest opponent of the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett) will have to admit at least that he and his colleagues have displayed since their advent to power a quality of courage which is essential in the momentous and depressing period through which we have been passing. It does not take much of a man to propel a craft when the stream is smooth and he is running with the tide, but in the hour of danger when the tempest arises you need a man of courage, and fortunately for the people of this country during the past three years we have had such a man at the head of affairs.

Do not let us forget, as so many are apt to forget, that this old world in the last few years has been in cruel agony. We have been pierced with such pains as never before. We have been pierced with social pains, with economic pains, and even with religious pains, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we in this chamber, the tried and trusted representatives of the people should try to set aside the prejudices that are so common to politics and by uniting on one platform endeavour to bring about a betterment of conditions in this country which we all love so much.

I said a moment ago that in dealing with his budget the Minister of Finance had been called upon to think of the labourer. I do not believe there is an hon. member in this house who is not sympathetic towards the man who starts out in the morning with a dinner pail on his arm to try to make an honest day's wage in order that he may educate his family, shelter them and give them the ordinary comforts of life. No doubt such a man fills a common position in life, yet after all in many instances the common positions in life are just as hard to fill as are the higher offices for which we sometimes find it very difficult to get men. I said that capital and labour should go hand in hand, and I cannot for the life of me understand a man who is anxious to accumulate wealth while all around him he sees nothing but poverty. I cannot understand a man who can be happy under such circumstances.

Then I speak of the fishermen along the Atlantic seaboard, the gulf of St. Lawrence and the western Pacific. This is a class which endures real hardship and danger. They toil long hours and in many instances for small remuneration. The constituency which I have represented either in the legislature of New Brunswick or in some other capacity for the last thirty years is essentially a farming and lumbering constituency. It will be seen that I started my political career when I was rather young, as I am only a youngster yet.

I should like to submit another matter to this house, if I may be permitted to refer again to myself. A great deal has been said about by-elections and what they indicate as to what might happen in the future. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) will remember that in 1927 a by-election was held in my constituency in which a Liberal was elected by acclamation. Two years later the people asked leave to test the constituency and the result was that I was returned to this house with the largest majority ever accorded a Conservative candidate. It might be said that by-elections are not a fair index of what the people have in their minds, and I think the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) will bear me out in that statement. The victory attained by the hon. member who is now sitting in this chamber was not one to be wondered at. That constituency has always been Liberal. If hon. members will look up the records they will see that for the last ten or fifteen years the Liberal candidate in the county of Madawaska has received almost three votes to every one received by the Conservative candidate.

Mr. DUPUIS: They are intelligent people.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Even though there may be a sort of buoyant hope in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite; even though they may find it necessary to capitalize on this period of depression through which we are passing in order to try to gain the good will of the electorate, I question very much when the time comes for the people to sit down and think seriously on the question whether they will place their confidence in a party which has no policy to submit to them. I shall touch upon this feature later in my remarks.

I stated a moment ago that my constituency was a farming constituency. It runs for a distance of about 150 miles along the international boundary. The principal cash product grown in the constituency is potatoes. Under normal conditions the potato crop of the maritime provinces is valued at about $14,000,000, or twenty-five per cent of the total crop produced in Canada. The former markets for our table stock were the island of Cuba, the United States and the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. These provinces bought freely from us because of the superior quality of the product grown in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. But these markets were closed during the years hon. members were in power. The market in Cuba was closed to us by reason of the high and abnormal duties placed against this product in 1928 or 1929, shortly after a treaty agreement was made with the British West Indies by the former Liberal government. That treaty precluded the possibility of any arrangement being made with Cuba under which we could enter into reciprocal trade relations which would absorb the surplus potatoes grown in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. There are those who say that the present government is making no serious attempt to gain access to the Cuban market but if these people knew the facts as they should, they would realize that it is impossible to negotiate with Cuba while the treaty exists between Canada and the British West Indies. I do not say that that treaty was wrong, nor am I stating that the government of that day did wrong in negotiating such a treaty; I say that it was the means of shutting the door absolutely and making it impossible for us to trade or negotiate with a country which had been buying a large part of the surplus table stock of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

I am rather surprised at the attitude taken by the Liberal members in this house with regard to the farmers. I think it can safely be stated that ever since I came to this house in 1930 the Liberal party has opposed most strenuously every bit of legislation which was brought forward in this chamber to open wider markets for the agriculturists in this country. I mention first the Ottawa agreements. Those agreements were consummated after very careful thought on the part of representatives of all the countries of the British Empire who gathered here and sat around a table for days and weeks; men who were sent here, supposedly because they possessed that degree of intelligence which would qualify them for the duty they had undertaken; men who had a thorough understanding of the conditions prevailing in the different parts of the British Empire which they represented. After most careful thought and deliberation and, as well, in a spirit of cooperation they entered into certain agreements which they believed would enure to the benefit of the British commonwealth of nations.

Now what did we find on that occasion? The liberal party in this house most strenuously opposed those agreements. In spite of the fact that they had been passed in the British House of Commons in a very short time, the Liberal party in this country opposed the agreements, led by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I say this with all due respect to the right hon. gentleman—and I do respect him, I must say. I respect him because of the position which he has held as Prime Minister of this country and because of the position which he holds to-day as leader of the opposition, which is one of great responsibility and not an easy one to fill. But I do say that he and his party had very little vision when they attacked the Ottawa agreements, which were entered into, after very careful deliberation with the object of benefiting the farmers, of benefiting the lumbermen, the fishermen, the fruit growers and other producers all down the line. One could go on enumerating the different avenues of trade which these agreements were intended to assist. Yet the Liberal party strenuously opposed the agreements, and the leader of the opposition has gone so far as to say on different occasions that if the time ever should come—and heaven knows that I for one hope it never will come—when he is returned to power he will destroy the agreements. In view of the great benefits which we have derived from them in the short time that they have been in force, and what they have meant to the different industries of this country, I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to take that ground and maintain it when the time for an election comes.

Let me give you some of the words uttered by hon. gentlemen, for I have copied them from Hansard. The leader of the opposition said on one occasion that the agreements constituted a tariff wall around the empire. It was a "Tory conspiracy"; it was undeserving of any support from any quarter. Now what will be the attitude of the right hon. gentleman when it comes to a general election? Let me tell him that he can no longer go into British Columbia and preach one doctrine, into Ontario and preach another, into the maritimes and preach still another. The day has come when men can be heard everywhere over the radio; thank God for that. From one end of the country to the other we can hear the policies they are enunciating in any part of Canada and for which they are asking the support of the people. Well, the leader of the opposition claimed that the treaties were undeserving of any support. But while he was making this declaration, what did the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) say about them? He declared, as you will find if you will look at Hansard, page 352 of the session 1932-33, that we on this side of the house had "swiped the Liberal policies in broad daylight," to use his own words—and this although the leader of the opposition had just said that the policies embodied in the trade treaties were a "Tory conspiracy." When the vote was taken the ex-Minister of Agriculture voted against the treaties notwithstanding that he had uttered the words I have just mentioned. And the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee), who gave us such a wonderful dissertation on the budget a few nights ago—

Mr. BROWN: Wonderful is right.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Yes, "wonderful" is right. Perhaps the thing he dwelt upon most was the red blood that came in free of duty. He did not refer to the tariffs placed against Canada by Italy, Germany and France while his government was in power. He did not refer to the duties imposed against potatoes going into the island of Cuba. He did not refer to the Hawley-Smoot tariff, which practically amounts to an embargo against potatoes going from Canada into the United States. He did not refer to these matters of major importance, but he did discuss a few trivial things that might possibly catch the ear of the house and of the electors of his own constituency.

Mr. DUPUIS: He did not refer to fifteen cents a bag potatoes either.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), speaking of the agreements, said that there was nothing in the treaties to give any consolation to the people of Canada. That was very mild for that hon. gentleman—"nothing in the treaties to give consolation to the people of Canada." But let me go on. The genial doctor who sits in the back seat representing Wellington (Mr. Blair) said that now that he had seen the schedule farms would be for sale because there was nothing in the treaties to help the farmer; and the equally genial member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) declared that the concessions given were vague and illusory. Let me say to my hon. friend that even though the concessions granted might be vague and illusory, it is interesting to look at what has resulted from them. Let me tell him what the result has been. We have had, during the eleven months from April 1, 1933, to February 28, 1934, as compared with the same eleven months in the previous years, an increase in exports to the British Empire of 21 per cent. To the United Kingdom the increase was 20 per cent; to Australia 54 per cent; to British South Africa 61 per cent; to British India 44 per cent. Along with these increases go large increases in exports to foreign countries.

It will be recalled that during the discussion of these treaties it was said that they would make it absolutely impossible for us to maintain our export trade with foreign countries; yet I find that there is a considerable increase in exports to foreign countries, because they are fifty-one per cent higher than they were a year ago. This establishes that the claim of the Liberal party that the treaties would prevent trade with other countries is also wrong.

I think the time has come when every good Canadian is anxious to buy more from the British people and to sell more to them, and our import trade is also growing. Compare the imports for February 1934 with those of the corresponding period in 1933. What is the result? Even from foreign countries there is an increase of 41 per cent. From the United States there is an increase of 43 per cent; from China an increase of 31 per cent; from Japan an increase of 39 per cent; from Germany 51 per cent, from the British Empire 45 per cent, from the United Kingdom 41 per cent, from British India 114 per cent, from Australia 182 per cent, and from New Zealand 102 per cent. Thus it will be seen that not only have our exports increased but our imports have increased as well under the trade agreements entered into in Ottawa two years ago.

I think it may safely be said that an honest attempt has been made by the present administration to solve the problem of wider markets. Yet we have had opposition to the marketing act, which I trust will soon become the law of this country. From the very day that bill was introduced it has been met with opposition of the most flagrant kind. Let me say as one who has been engaged in exporting produce on a large scale for the last thirty years, one who has been associated with the shippers of New Brunswick and the New Brunswick Potato Exchange, that many times during that period have we felt the urgent necessity of legislation of this kind to make it possible to carry the products that the farmer was raising and ensure orderly marketing of those products. What are the objections to this act? In the first place it is urged that it involves compulsion. Well, if the compulsory features were taken out of this bill I would not give a five cent piece for it. Then it is said that these things should be submitted to the House of Commons. We have had the House of Commons here ever since confederation, we have had opportunity to submit to the house questions affecting the farmers, and how far have we got? Hon. members have talked about agriculture being the backbone of this country, but how far have they gone towards assisting agriculture? We assist the railways; we do all we can for the insurance companies and all the rest, but I charge that we have left the agriculturist alone; the attention we have given him on most occasions has been mostly lip service. Now this government have grasped the situation; they have brought down a bill, and placed it before the members representing the farming constituencies. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite how many letters they have received from their constituents taking them to task because of the opposition they have offered to this measure; it would be really refreshing to know. It may be that they will have to face the farmers. Let me say that I shall be proud to face my constituents if the time ever comes again, and show them what this government have done and are doing in an honest effort to relieve the distressed condition in which the farmers have found themselves in recent years. We hear a great deal about the distress of the farmers; let me tell you that the farmers in my constituency have been fighting with their backs to the wall for the last few years. They have had a hard time to keep their farms, pay the interest on their mortgages, pay their store bills and keep their families alive. They have not complained very much; they have not asked for bonuses. As far as bonuses are concerned I am opposed to the principle from first to last. I do not believe it should ever have been adopted in this house. Most of the provinces are opposed to that system. The lowering of freight rates to assist the farmers is all right, but when it comes to bonusing any article or commodity of which there is already a surplus it simply stimulates production and the condition is aggravated rather than helped. I trust that the time is past when governments will resort to bonusing any article of production, at least any of which we have a surplus.

Yes, our farmers have been fighting with their backs to the wall. We have in my constituency a good many farms that are mortgaged, and the men on those farms find it difficult to pay the interest on the mortgages. Some have borrowed money from the Canadian Farm Loan Board. The Canadian Farm Loan Board was instituted in 1929. The government made available to them $5,000,000 to lend to farmers, and laid down the terms on which loans should be made. I have in my files a list of the loans that have been made by that board since its inception. It is a striking thing that during the last year the loans number just about half as many as in the year before. I have only the statistics to March 31, 1933. I should like to place these on record so that my constituents at least will have an opportunity of seeing what has been done through the Canadian Farm Loan Board. The figures are as follows:

	Total number of loans
1930	1,965
1931	1,458
1932	1,049
1933	536

I know that it is a difficult matter to lend money on farms, with due safeguards. The utmost care should be exercised in making these investments. But there are provincial boards; every province passed enabling legislation to work in conjunction with the Canadian Farm Loan Board. These provincial boards appoint a superintendent or an inspector, and when an application is made by a farmer an inspection is made and a report sent to the provincial board, which in turn sends its report to the dominion board. I regret to say that during the last year or two, when the farmers of my constituency were really crying for assistance at a time when it meant to them holding their farms rather than losing them, and when they were prepared to offer satisfactory assurance that loans would be paid, the security being more than one hundred per cent, really three times the amount of loan they asked—notwithstanding all this, loans were not available. Let me give an illustration. I know one man who asked for a loan of $600 on a property that under the worst conditions would bring $2,000, and he could not obtain it. I know several instances, which I shall not take the time of the house to cite, in which the Canadian Farm Loan Board has turned down applications for loans from New Brunswick and from my constituency. I am glad to know that the government is bringing down legislation of some kind to help along this line, which shows that this administration is fully alive to the necessity of doing something tangible to assist the farmers, being the first administration to do so in the history of this country. What the farmers want is not money at seven or eight per cent interest; they want to be able to borrow money at reasonable rates, and if the banks can get money from the people at 2 or 2½ per cent they ought to be willing to lend that money at one hundred per cent profit at the most. The farmers are the people who should get the benefit of that cheap money, and until they do get that benefit I am satisfied that we shall continue to have deficits on our railways, relief bills and all these other things that would be adjusted if the agriculturists were given a fair chance to obtain that which is their due for the products they produce.

I do not want to refer at length to the tariff, but I should like to say a word in that regard. Just a few nights ago in this house the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) took the government to task because they had not relieved the farmers by removing the duty of ten per cent on fertilizer. Let me tell those gentlemen what that ten per cent means to the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We have one plant in East Saint John, operated by the International Fertilizers Company, which covers nearly four acres of ground. Six weeks ago they had a million dollars' worth of chemicals in that building, twenty-seven thousand tons of fertilizer ready to go out to the farmers of Carleton and Victoria counties and even of the state of Maine. Yet these gentlemen would have us remove that ten per cent duty and have that fertilizer mixed in Baltimore, where it was prepared before the ten per cent duty was imposed. The plant to which I have referred gives employment to a large number of men in Saint John; it is one of the most up to date plants in the world, and obtains its chemicals from many different countries. They go to Germany and France for their potash; to Chile for their nitrate of soda; to the United States and the Netherlands for their phosphate, and their sulphate of ammonia is secured in Europe as well. So you see that this is a cosmopolitan establishment. Steamers come there from time to time bringing these ingredients which enter into the manufacture of our fertilizer; the railways are given freight, and we supply not only the people adjacent to that plant but also many people in the state of Maine. If the ten per cent duty were taken off, you would find that the fertilizer would be mixed in the United States, where it was mixed before that duty was imposed.

Let me say further that when the mixed fertilizer came in from the United States it was very difficult for the farmer to know the exact value of that fertilizer, and whether it was composed of the ingredients indicated upon the bag. Now we bring in the chemicals; we mix them there by an up to date mixing process, by which they are thoroughly blended. The fertilizer is dried and put into bags, and shipped out to different parts of the country as well as to the United States. They also have a plant in Prince Edward Island, and this industry means a great deal to the farmers of that province. In the first place they know exactly what they are buying, and they do not pay $75 or $90 a ton for it, as they did originally. The ingredients are brought to Saint John and compounded there; the farmers have an absolute guarantee as to what they are getting, and they buy that fertilizer for $25 a ton.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that a great deal of fault is found with this government by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): A great deal of fault is found with the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): His opponents say he is an autocrat and a dictator.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): But I will say this, and I wonder if they will say "hear, hear". He is also a man of courage, and when the time comes I believe the thoughtful people of this country will say that he has not tried to do that which is expedient but rather that which is right. He is a real Canadian, a true hearted imperialist, and no better, nobler tribute could be paid to any living Canadian.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure members in all parts of the house will agree that the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) this year gave a very good picture of the conditions that exist in Canada to-day. The picture is one of which the country may well feel proud, and I think this government in particular can be very proud of the facts there set out.

The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Smith, Victoria) has traversed a good many matters of real importance, and I congratulate him on his efforts.

The business improvement and reviving confidence shown by the expanding revenues of the country during the last twelve months are particularly pleasing to us when we note that this upturn has been widespread, covering the length and breadth of the land. In addition, Mr. Speaker, it has been sustained during the winter season much more than has been the case in former years. Our unemployed have gone back to work to the extent of from ten thousand to twenty thousand per month; since February, 1933, 315,000 of our citizens have returned to gainful employment. The physical volume of business stands very high in Canada in comparison with other countries. Taking 1928 as 100 the physical volume of business in the United States moved from 56 to 67, an increase of 19 per cent. In Germany it moved from 64 to 74, an increase of 16 per cent. In Great Britain there was an increase of nine per cent and in France an increase of three per cent. In Canada, however, the bureau of statistics lists forty-five economic factors, according to which the figure for Canada moved from 52 to 72, or an increase of 37 per cent.

[Mr. B. F. Smith.]

In practically every line of business the same picture will be found. During the year just closed the consumption of electrical energy reached the figure of 1,795,000,000 kilowatt hours, as compared with 1,299,000,000 kilowatt hours a year ago. That indicates, sir, that there is a great deal more industrial activity in Canada to-day than there has been in the past, and that we are fast getting back to the position we once held. The increase in electrical consumption in Ontario alone during the last three years is 48 per cent.

One other feature touched upon in the budget, and which gives an indication of activities in Canada, is that of car loadings. In the twelve week period just closed we have witnessed roughly 500,000, or to be exact, 495,000 cars of goods loaded. A year ago in the same period we had loadings of only 400,000 cars. This increase is due largely to the increase in physical volume, but it is due in part also to the cooperation between the two railway companies—yes, and the cooperation between the railway companies and those manufacturers who have goods to load into the railway cars. The railways have at last awakened to the fact that they could not allow this motor truck competition to continue to grow in the manner in which it had been growing, or eventually they would go out of business. They have realized that the inflexible hard and fast rules in vogue a decade ago in railway freight operations do not obtain to-day and that if the railway companies are to stay in business those rates cannot obtain to-day. The leadership given by this government in demanding that they cooperate has gone right through the whole organization, until to-day the railways are cooperating with all kinds of industry. When they find that a certain industry is using motor trucks for the transportation of its goods they come in, examine the books of the company in question, and see whether or not they can transport the goods manufactured for such and such a price, thereby meeting the truck competition. The result has been that in the final analysis this wasteful method of transporting goods in Canada—probably I should not use the word "wasteful" but should say non-economic—which has been in use despite the fact that we have had rails and cars lying idle, is fast being done away with. The increase of 95,000 car loadings in the last twelve weeks can be attributed to the cooperation the railways are giving to those companies which have goods to transport from point to point.

Another feature worthy of consideration is that some two or three years ago—we may take February 1932 or February 1933 as an example—when commodities were probably at the lowest price levels at which they had been for many decades, frieght rates remained at the old level. The rates would not permit of the movement of low priced commodities from points of origin to points of consumption. Three years ago the railway companies were practically inflexible in the matter of rates. They would not give consideration to moderating a freight rate so as to permit the transportation of a commodity which had gone down to probably a quarter of its proper value, and because they would not permit the lowering of the freight rates they lost the freight business.

Yesterday in Toronto I witnessed an actual illustration of the change which has taken place. Goods which were bought some four years ago in the city of Kingston on account of the freight rates could not be moved to Toronto. The soliciting freight agents of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway have to-day under review the movement of some 300,000 pounds of such goods from Kingston to Toronto. They now realize that the goods in question are worth only $4 a ton, and they realize also that a freight rate of $2.95 a ton is much too high. With that in mind the two railway companies are cooperating to see if they still cannot make money on the transportation of this material, and bring about a condition whereby it would be practicable for the consumer to move to Toronto the goods lying at Kingston. What applies to the commodity in Kingston applies to the extent of a thousand tons per year to the same commodity to be moved from Kitchener to Detroit. In like manner we have examples of what is happening in Canada in connection with the movement of other types of goods, and our attention is directed to the cooperation between the railway companies who are trying to meet the difficult situation in which manufacturers of low priced commodities find themselves when they are confronted with the necessity of moving their goods not only to points of consumption in Canada but to points abroad.

It was my pleasant experience yesterday to see some messages exchanged between Toronto and London, England, the result of which will be the movement of some 500 tons of goods between now and next August, part to London and part to Liverpool. In this instance the commodity in question is one which has never before left Canada's shore, a commodity which now finds its way into the British market because business is on the uptrend in Great Britain and, secondly, because the railway companies who only two short years ago asked a freight rate of 44½ cents to move the goods from Toronto to the seaport now give a freight rate of 25 cents. Whereas formerly it would have cost $8.90 per ton to move the goods to the seaport, it will now cost only $5. That difference of $3.90 per ton on a movement of 500 tons to Great Britain controlled the decision as to whether or not this material would go to Great Britain or waste in Canada. So I say to this government that in asking the railway companies to cooperate it has been doing a good service to Canadian industry.

What applies to freight rates applies also in a measure to passenger traffic. We have had definite indications as to what has been going on in this connection. Many of us do not mind taking an upper berth if by doing so we help the railway companies to balance their budgets. The week end excursions which are again being patronized are bringing the railway companies back to the field in which they belong. I say that more and more of this cooperation and more flexibility in railway management will do much to solve our railway problems and will make more work for those who find their vocations in transportation. It will tend further to keep manufacturers out of the transportation business. I ask this: If you are a manufacturer, what right have you to have a fleet of motor trucks and go into the transport business? That is not your business. Leave the transportation business to the transportation companies. People in industry should realize that every time they patronize motor trucks they are a real detriment to Canada's railways. The staffs and organizations of those manufacturing concerns are giving too much time to transportation problems and to a business with which they are not concerned, time that could be better employed in the organization of their own businesses. Let the business man who is manufacturing a certain article stick to his last so that the man engaged in transportation may have a chance to live, and so that this country, which is now over-railroaded, will have a chance at least to come somewhere near balancing its railway budget. By an improvement in railway operations men now unemployed but who are trained in railway work would find themselves in a position to return to their vocations.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the hon. member state what commodity was sent to Great Britain?

Mr. HARRIS: Yes. The commodity was the leather scrap which is trimmed from hides when the hides are tanned and used for leather of all kinds. There is the pate, the snout, the lip, the ear, the dew claws, the shank pieces and the sinews. I could go into more detail if I were in another place. These commodities are used in the manufacture of photographic film, and that is what I had in mind in the remarks I made. The production in Canada of these raw materials amounts to nineteen million pounds a year, the consumption in Canada about thirteen million pounds a year, and the waste which is now being burned as fuel under boilers or being thrown on garbage dumps, and so on, approximates seven million pounds a year, to my knowledge. That is in answer to the hon. gentleman's question.

I was saying that the physical volume of trade is increasing in Canada. We are also pleased to note that the unemployment figures are getting less and less. I should like to put on record the figures of the international labour office showing that Canada has had a gain in employment of 21 per cent, Japan 11 per cent, South Africa 11 per cent, Sweden 2 per cent, France and Switzerland a decrease each of 1 per cent, Great Britain an increase of 7 per cent. In the United States they have had an increase of 26 per cent. I am very glad to see that increase in employment in the United States. Like others I am very anxious to see that great country prosper and go ahead even with their experimental policies such as the N.R.A., the A.A.A. and their various codes. It is vital to Canada that the United States should prosper, because we are a population of ten millions living alongside a population of 120 millions. No matter what happens over there we realize that it must have its reaction over here. But, Mr. Speaker, I like the Canadian way of going about the reconstruction of our economic system. We could not afford to carry on the experiments that they have been trying. We have been relying on our experience. We have not shaken the traditions of our people or tried to remould them into some new form in order that we might live and work out our economic salvation. You might say that we have just let things drift. Whether we did or did not, it was far safer for Canada to travel along the line of experience in the last few years than to launch into a system of experiments such as are being tried on the other side of the line. I am not criticizing the N.R.A., but I have seen the trend of Canada's business shut off from the markets of the United States by the tariffs of which my hon. friend spoke. I shall not enumerate them now. But I have seen Canada, a people of ten millions, cut off from a market which they had been supplying to the tune of many millions of dollars, and yet we have survived.

We have been criticized for negotiating a treaty with the motherland. Before I am through I am going to try to convince the house that that treaty was really worth while. I started out to say that we have stuck to the old lines of experience and tradition in the conduct of our affairs. We have avoided launching on such gigantic experiments as are being made on the other side of the line, and what has been the result? While they have their six hour day and their codes and all that sort of thing, the figures up to date show that they have not met their unemployment problem to any greater extent than has Canada. The physical volume of our trade has improved much faster than that of the United States in proportion. We have much less distress in industry in Canada than they have in the United States. Above all, the one factor which has made it possible for Canada to come through this time of stress and strain has been the imperial preference pacts.

The government in power to-day is the poorest group of advertisers that I have seen in this house since I came here twelve years ago. They do not seem to have any idea how to tell the people of Canada what they have really done for this country. They are very poor advertisers, and I say to them now that it is their duty and that of the Conservative party, as I see it, to tell the people of Canada what they have really done during the last three years.

This government has not only maintained the price level but raised it, and it has stayed away from inflation. It has raised the price level by 13·4 per cent in one year, and may I sound a note of warning at this point. In England the price level has been raised by 9·2 per cent; in Canada by 13·4 per cent, and I think that is fast enough.

One satisfactory feature of the rise in wholesale commodity prices in the last twelve months has been that the most of it has taken place in agricultural products. The average rise in agricultural products has been 35 per cent. One product in particular has been spoken about very much in this house; I shall therefore say just a word or two about it. I refer to the hog industry. For the last twenty years there has come to my office every morning a full report of what is happening in the Chicago market. Day after day during the last two years I have observed the slaughter of sows and little pigs that are not desirable for edible purposes, until the time was reached when sixteen million were slaughtered and thrown, you might say, into the ash heap. Yet in spite of that, each morning when I picked up the Chicago market reports I see that hogs are selling on the Chicago market and on the twelve western markets at from $3.40 to $3.70, $4, $4.10 and $4.30 per hundredweight, while in Canada the price of hogs has risen in one year from four cents a pound to eight cents.

I wonder if the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) is somewhere around the house. Perhaps someone will send a page after him because I am going to say something in a few minutes that he will not think is very kind of me. I will say it now. When that hon. gentleman in a speech in this paper says that not a farmer in Canada has got a copper out of the imperial trade agreements, surely he is stretching the point a little. If the farmers on this side of the border are getting eight cents a pound for select bacon hogs while farmers on the other side of the line are getting only four cents, surely those extra coppers are going to the Canadian farmer. That shows that the trade agreement has been worth while, and surely my hon. friend from Yorkton is far from the mark when he says that not a farmer in Canada has got a copper out of the imperial trade agreements. I am going to touch further on these trade agreements when he gets down to the chamber if somebody will send for him.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I want to say something about expenditure. Ten years ago, speaking from the other side of the house, I made some suggestions with regard to the cost of running this country. At that time I thought that we had too much government in this country. I feel the same way about it now. We have too many members in our municipal councils. We remedied that in Toronto during the last year by reducing our city council by nine. We have too many members in our county councils, We have too many members in our provincial legislatures. We remedied that in Ontario by reducing the numbers by some twenty odd. Ten years ago, in 1924, at page 204 of Hansard, I made the observation that I had the pleasure at that time of representing 110,000 constituents. To-day I represent only 80,000. The constituency was cut in half and later increased to 80,000 constituents. I made the suggestion that I was quite willing to endeavour to represent 100,000 constituents in this house. The civil service has been cut by 12,000, in addition to the salary deductions, and if we cut the representation in this house by half we would still be able to govern the country fairly well. When the British North America Act was passed we did not have the radio and there were no automobiles. To-day we can travel ten times as fast and reach a hundred times as many people with the same effort. A number of hon. members could do twice the amount of work they are now doing while a number are doing twice the amount they ought to do. If hon. members would cut out half the drivel they send out of this building and stop half the agitation that is being raised in the minds of their constituents; if they would work full time and serve twice the number of people, we would not be stirring up the people half as much. I am quite serious in this. We are far away from the old days of confederation, and I think there is a great possibility of cutting down the cost of government. We should try to get the people to stop leaning so much on the government. A good deal of the correspondence which goes out of this building is caused by our constituents thinking that the government can do something for them. Individual enterprise and a little sand and backbone will do more for a man than can any government. If I may be pardoned for repeating, with our motor cars and our radios and so on, with the possibility of contact with our constituents, I think each hon. member could represent twice the number of people he is now representing. We would not be bothered with the amount of correspondence with which we now have to deal and the people would not be leaning so heavily on the government.

I think we are all pleased with the trend taken by our trade balances. This balance was unfavourable by $100,000,000 in 1930 while in 1934 it is favourable by $150,000,000. I do not intend to reiterate what the hon. member said just now with regard to the increase in our trade with Great Britain, but inasmuch as the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) is not yet in his seat, I intend to answer his remarks and he can read it in Hansard to-morrow. He said that not a farmer in Canada has got a copper out of the imperial trade agreements. There are a little more than 10,000,000 people on this side of the water while there are 45,000,000 in Great Britain and 300,000,000 in India. Our trade last year increased to the tune of $50,000,000. What was that trade in? Do the farmers of this country know that Canada stands first in the British market with wheat, wheat flour and raw apples? Are these farm products? She stood first in hewn hardwood, zinc, patent leather and rubber boots and shoes. She stood second in oats, hams, live cattle, cheese and manufactured tobacco. Are these farm products? She stood second in sawn hardwood, copper and lead and writing and printing paper. She stood third and fourth and fifth in bacon, canned salmon, hewn softwood, sawn softwood, undressed leather, barley and wrapping paper. My hon. friend has said "not a copper," but I am going to try to illustrate how the imperial preference worked out for Canada last year. He does not seem to understand this matter of dollars and cents so I shall try to illustrate it in another way. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) had something similar to say in this connection. In case he does not understand it, I will try to tell it to him in another way. Before I do so, I should like to read a letter I received from Mr. Coats, the dominion statistician. This is dated May 10, 1934, and reads:

> In reply to your letter of May 9, the lumber exports which you quote are correct, as are also your deductions.

Here are my deductions. With the excess of lumber shipments last year over the year before to Great Britain you could build a twenty foot board fence reaching from Halifax to Vancouver. If the same excess were used in constructing a wooden sidewalk made of two inch planks, ten feet wide, it would reach from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I ask the hon. member for Yorkton if he can understand that. The shipments of apples under the imperial preference increased from 1,530,640 barrels to 2,983,143 barrels, an excess of 1,452,503 barrels. If a raft were constructed of barrels five in a row and placed on the Ottawa river, it would reach from Ottawa to Montreal. Perhaps the hon. member for Yorkton knows what a raft looks like when it is five barrels wide and reaches from Ottawa to Montreal. That is what the imperial preference did. A steer is anywhere from seven to nine feet long from head to tail, depending upon whether the tail is down or straight out. Shipments of steers to England have increased from five to twenty to fifty-five thousand per year with the help of the imperial preference. If the excess of steers shipped last year over two years before were tied head to tail they would reach from Ottawa to Montreal. If the excess shipments of eggs shipped last year over the year before to the United Kingdom were laid side by side they would reach from Ottawa to Halifax. My hon. friend does not understand what a copper is but perhaps he can gain some idea of the magnitude of this shipment of eggs. We have about 22,000,000 laying hens in Canada. If they were placed on this ten foot sidewalk, they would reach from Atlantic to the Pacific. If a gun were fired and they all got the notion and laid an egg at the same time, we would have the number of eggs shipped last year to Great Britain in excess of the number shipped the year before. I see the hon. member for Yorkton has not come in yet. I am trying to talk in his language, because being a lawyer he does not seem to understand what dollars and cents mean. If the cans of fruit and vegetables shipped last year in excess of the year before were placed end to end they would reach from Winnipeg to Halifax. If the copper shipped last year in excess of the year before were made into ordinary No. 14 Browne and Sharpe gauge wire, the ordinary commercial copper wire, it would make 2,074,848,000 feet of wire. It is 25,000 miles around the earth, and this wire would go around fifteen and a half times. Bacon moved from twenty, to fifty, to eighty-three million pounds. Now, if you took all the hogs which it would require to produce that bacon and put them into one corral our friends on the opposite side of the house could not possibly, during the next ten years, make as much noise as they could. If you took that same bacon in the form of breakfast bacon you would have a ribbon of rashers that would go around this world five times. Perhaps my hon. friend from Yorkton does not know anything about coppers, dollars and cents, but at least he will have some idea of the magnitude of this imperial preference, in view of what I have said.

Fifty years hence when some of you young chaps are still here—and I hope the lady member will still be here—you will read in history that in a country called Canada there had been some great achievements. You will read that an act of confederation was passed in 1867 and that later on a national policy was instituted. Still later in a great war Canada did some great things for her mother country, and a little later on in the years 1931, 1932 and 1933 certain trade agreements were initiated with that country. These will be the high spots, and there will be recorded the names of a few men. There will be Macdonald and Cartier, and probably there will be mention of the name of Laurier, the man who perpetuated the national policy. History will also record the fact that some speeches were made by some hon. gentlemen opposite who called themselves Laurier Liberals—not Hepburn Liberals or McQuibban Liberals or even King Liberals. It will also be recorded that other people made speeches—people who liked to call themselves Bennett Conservatives. And along with these achievements history will record the names of certain statesmen, among which there will be, in a bright and high spot, the name of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I am sure my hon. friend from Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) will forgive me if I do not reply to his original arguments so picturesquely expressed. I had no intention whatsoever of participating in the budget debate, and I speak only now because of a certain sense of duty that someone in this house should make a protest at the persistent and continual attacks that are being made not only upon the late government, but also upon the memory of a man who has passed away, with regard to the national railways.

Mr. McINTOSH: Let the dead past bury its dead.

An hon. MEMBER: You would like to bury it all right.

Mr. McINTOSH: It will bury you.

Mr. EULER: As a believer in the public ownership of the national railways I have always felt that they should be kept out of politics. My good friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion)—I say that sincerely and I think he will take it so—and others, both in this house and in previous meetings of the parliamentary committee on railways, have persistently made charges of extravagance with regard to the railways not only against the King government but against the late Sir Henry Thornton. These statements at the time were perhaps not refuted by some of us as strongly as they should have been. We had a motive in that. For my part I always felt that the attacks that were being made on the railways were made by some at least to discredit public ownership and by others for reasons which I need not give here.

As I say, I have always felt that the railways ought to be kept out of politics if they were to be made a success, and if apparently I trench upon politics the fight is not of my making, because politics was introduced into the debate this afternoon by my friend the Minister of Railways.

Mr. MANION: No; it was introduced by a number of others who preceded me, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) among them.

Mr. EULER: I should like the house to bear in mind that, after all, the constituent parts of the Canadian National Railways as they are now, were taken over by a Conservative government, and the heavy liabilities which we are now carrying, and the heavy interest charges which we find it almost impossible to pay, are the direct result of that action of a Conservative government in taking over the railways some years ago.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You were nine years in power; why didn't you stop it?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a part of history; you cannot deny it.

Mr. EULER: I would point to a statement I made in the house, quoting from Hansard of a good many years ago, when the railways were first taken over, when the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that at the time the Canadian Northern was taken over by the government it should have been allowed to go into the hands of a receiver and taken over at a fair price. Perhaps he was right, but apparently his party did not agree with him. But if this had been done, then probably two or three or four hundred million dollars of obligations on which we are now paying interest would not be a burden on the people.

What did we acquire in these railways? We acquired a conglomeration of four so-called railway systems—the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, which we had already had. I call it a conglomeration of railway systems. Then just as they had been taken over the Liberal party came into power, and they chose Sir Henry Thornton for the great task of welding these railway systems into one great system capable of competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I leave it to every member of this house and to the people of this country whether the work he undertook was not a colossal task. He had the duty of coordinating these different railways into one great system. He had to buy a great deal of rolling stock, because on most of the roads the rolling stock was quite insufficient. He had to buy heavier motive power, larger locomotives; bridges had to be rebuilt; and heavier rails had to be laid. And the cost was very considerable. It took hundreds of millions of dollars—regarding which there has been so much criticism—money properly spent.

to put the system into that condition in which it could compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sometimes I am almost convinced that the reason why there is so much criticism of the Canadian National Railways is that they were made capable of competing with the great Canadian Pacific Railway. Hundreds of millions of dollars were voted by this house for the purposes of the Canadian National Railways. As has been said before, our friends who are now sitting on the other side of the house and who at that time were on the opposition benches voted for these grants, and without any opposition; and I was surprised this afternoon to hear the Minister of Railways say, when he was challenged on that point, that he had never made objections to voting these large sums of money. Perhaps I am not using his exact words, but this is the sense of what he said. He said it was as much as a member's life was worth to do anything that was in opposition to the wishes of Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. MANION: Political life, I said.

Mr. EULER: All right; does it mean my hon. friend places political life above the interests of this country?

Mr. MANION: Apparently my hon. friend did when he was a member of the government that permitted the extravagance that went on.

Mr. EULER: I never admitted they were extravagances. My hon. friend said they were, yet he countenanced them.

Mr. MANION: $200,000,000 worth.

Mr. EULER: I would like to ask in perfect good nature whether that is an example of the red-blooded Canadianism of which he loves to speak.

Mr. MANION: I do not need to learn Canadianism from you.

Mr. COTNAM: Millions of ties the year before election.

Mr. EULER: I will say something about ties in a moment. Then came the depression. Everyone in the country felt the depression, the railways as all other businesses. Industrial firms had expanded at that time beyond all reason. We all thought—I think I may say that—almost every citizen of Canada, in private life, in business life, in parliamentary life, thought that we had entered upon an era that would be prosperous forever after, and we were all going to be rich and happy. And then we had the awakening, and the railways did not escape. Every industry suffered heavy losses; the railways suffered heavy losses. The railways naturally felt the depression in their revenues. They were exposed to greater difficulties than the average business was, for the simple reason that just at that time there became effective the most strenuous competition by trucks and automobiles. My hon. friend said this afternoon, and perhaps quite fairly, that the government should not be blamed so particularly for the difficulties which this country had experienced, because we had been passing through a great world depression. If he claims that justice for the government why does he not do justice in the same way to the railways? The railways suffered through the depression, and it is utterly unfair to blame the railways alone for extravagance in expansion when such blame is just as applicable to every other business carried on in Canada. The great competitor of the Canadian National felt the depression almost as much as the Canadian National itself. That of course was very largely the result of competition. I am not going to weary the house again with my opinions regarding railway competition. As I have said before, competition between the two railways of Canada is not the life of the railways but rather their death.

I want to make just one more reference to the address of the Minister of Railways this afternoon. He referred to political interference with the road while the King government was in power. He made the statement, I think, that the Liberals rolled the pork barrel from one ocean to the other and back again, and that the Canadian National had become a political club. I resent that statement. I happened to be a member of the King government in the last four years of its existence. I cannot recall a single instance while I was a member of that government when any political pressure was suggested in any respect whatsoever with regard to the running of the Canadian National Railways. I knew the late Sir Henry Thornton pretty well. On more than one occasion I asked him whether there was any political pressure brought to bear upon him, and he told me that from the then Prime Minister down he never was subjected to any political pressure by anyone in regard to the running of the Canadian National Railways. I said a moment ago I was not going to indulge in recrimination, and I do not desire to do so, but when the Minister of Railways makes the statement that the late government was exercising political pressure, patronage if you like to use the expression; that a political club was made of the Canadian National, and that the pork barrel principle was being applied, I should like to say to him and to the house that these words come ill from the mouth of the man who said in the committee two years ago that out of twenty-eight tie contracts, twenty-seven were switched by him to Conservatives.

Mr. MANION: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. EULER: It is on the record. Now I have nothing more to say. I have tried in my feeble way to defend the memory of a man who is gone, a man who, I believe, did a great service for this country. He had the defects that great men often have. But I should like to close by suggesting that if we must fight partisan battles with regard to the condition of the Canadian National, let us at least allow to rest in peace a man who while here never was properly able to defend himself, and now is not able to defend himself at all.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: He has a right to speak.

Mr. MANION: Yes, an amendment was moved after I spoke this afternoon, so I have a right to say a few words. I am going to say only a few words.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Don't you know about the amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My point of order is that the amendment moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) is not in order.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Why didn't you raise that point earlier?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A resolution was moved on the 5th of February, 1934, and adopted by the present government, the last words of which are as follows:

—in order that they may absorb the goods produced, thereby creating a more equitable distribution of our wealth production.

The government officially accepted the details of that resolution, and it was unanimously adopted by this house. I submit with great respect that the words in the amendment now moved referring to the distribution of our present abundance are merely a repetition of the resolution adopted by the house on February 5, 1934.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), reads as follows:

This house, while appreciating the unusually difficult task of the government in attempting to administer the present system, regrets the undue delay in taking necessary steps leading to the distribution of our present abundance amongst the Canadian people.

It is now alleged by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) that the amendment is out of order on the ground that the matter therein dealt with was disposed of by a motion made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) on February 5, which motion reads as follows:

Whereas there still exists in Canada an acute unemployment problem, and

Whereas it is desirable that as many as possible of these unemployed should be absorbed into the industrial life of the nation;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the necessity of reducing the hours of labour of those engaged in industry, and also increase the purchasing power of the masses of our people in order that they may absorb the goods produced, thereby creating a more equitable distribution of our wealth production.

That motion was agreed to. The principle thereby enunciated was adopted by the house. The amendment now before the house does not propose a policy or advocate the adoption of a principle; it merely regrets the undue delay in taking necessary steps leading to the distribution of our present abundance amongst the Canadian people. It is merely a statement of regret that the principle adopted in the resolution of Mr. Heaps of February 5 is delayed in its execution. I therefore hold that this amendment is in order.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the vote in the house, and I should not have risen except for the language of my hon. friend (Mr. Euler) in accusing me of attacking the memory of a man who is dead.

Mr. EULER: So you did.

Mr. MANION: I deny that I attacked the memory of any man who is dead; I did not mention Sir Henry Thornton's name this afternoon in any shape or form. I criticized the late government and I criticize them now for their absolute neglect of public duty in permitting the management of the Canadian National Railways to spend the huge sums that they spent on useless appurtenances to that railway, such as hotels, scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific—

Mr. EULER: Did you ever make a protest?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I did; I probably was not well enough posted. I was not a minister as my hon. friend was, and was not familiar with the amounts. My hon. friend who in this house and throughout the country boasts that he is such a great supporter of public ownership has been one of the deadliest enemies of public ownership in this country. He sat in a government that not only permitted but, I repeat, encouraged the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars by the Canadian National Railways that never should have been expended. He sat as member of a government which permitted hotels to be built at Halifax, at Saskatoon and at Vancouver; that permitted railway lines to be purchased all over the east and to some extent in the west; that authorized the expenditure of $50,000,000 for the Montreal terminals and of $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 for the construction of branch lines, perhaps half of which were needed, in the west. He was a member of the government which permitted ships costing $8,000,000 to be built on the Pacific coast which were never used and which are rotting at the docks to-day.

I had a right to say that the pork barrel was rolled from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I have no doubt under the direction of the government of which my hon. friend was a member. So we had the Canadian National spending these huge sums of money. There was the hotel at Halifax, which was not required at all since the Canadian National had agreed to go in with the Canadian Pacific for the construction of a hotel. That hotel was built, but a second hotel was built also, costing $2,500,000. There was a hotel built in Saskatoon costing $4,000,000, when the best that could have been expected was a million dollar hotel; that was the largest hotel that possibly could have been expected to pay its way. Then they spent $11,000,000 on the hotel in Vancouver, where no hotel was needed at all. That city is over-hoteled to-day, without that Canadian National hotel ever being opened.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend knows that hotel was the result of an agreement which was made before Sir Henry Thornton came in.

Mr. MANION: Not that hotel.

Mr. EULER: Not for a hotel, but for something else.

Mr. MANION: The so-called shadow government concluded that agreement with the city of Vancouver and agreed to build a hotel costing $3,500,000. My hon. friend and his government increased that sum until it reached $11,000,000, and the contracts were let before we came into power. They purchased railway lines all over the east, not one of which ever paid operating expenses. They built ships costing over $8,000,000 to compete with the Canadian Pacific ships, when the Canadian Pacific were not making any money. These ships which cost $8,000,000 now are rotting away because there is no work for them. In all, in these items I have mentioned, they spent at least $150,000,000 that was absolutely wasted, not one cent of which was justified, but which was merely added to the capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways. They added probably something like $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 a year to the bonded indebtedness of that railway.

But that was not all, Mr. Speaker. That was in a preelection year. My hon. friend suggests, in that high minded manner which he adopts here and in other parts of this country, that he was too honourable to permit any money to be spent on politics by the Canadian National. I say that entire amount of $150,000,000 was spent on politics. I believe I am justified in saying that the Liberal party permitted the pork barrel to roll from the Atlantic to the Pacific and back again for that purpose. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, there was an amount of $600,000 placed in the estimates of 1929 for a hotel in Prince Rupert, a little place of fifty-five hundred people, where you could not build a $25,000 hotel and make it pay. That $600,000 hotel was provided for in the estimates of 1929, and we had to stop it.

That is only part of it; all through the Canadian National Railways, when we came into power, there were ridiculously high salaries. Just let me quote some of the salaries that were being paid. Mr. Gaston was receiving $62,000 a year, and my hon. friend was a minister in the government that paid that amount out of the taxes of the people of this country. That man was receiving $62,000 a year for doing nothing that was useful to the country or to the people. Those who came to me asking that we should get rid of Mr. Gaston were the officers of the railways themselves, not Sir Henry Thornton. The officers of the railways pointed out to me that Mr. Gaston was lording it over the rest of the men, without doing a cent's worth of work for his $62,000 a year. There were other men getting from $45,000 a year down; ninety-six of them were paid over $10,000 a year. Imagine that, Mr. Speaker; there were ninety-six employees of the Canadian National Railways receiving over $10,000 annually when the Canadian Pacific had only fifty-three employees receiving more than that amount.

Then let me say a word with regard to specifications. My hon. friend put himself out to taunt me because at one time I spoke of red-blooded Canadianism. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need learn anything about Canadianism from the hon. gentleman, at any rate. Laying that aside for the moment, however, the hon. gentleman was a member of the government which permitted the late management of the Canadian National Railways to specify that forty per cent of all the material supplied for the Saskatoon hotel, the Halifax hotel, the Montreal terminals—that $50,000,000 extravagance which was absolutely unnecessary—should come from the United States. He was a member of the government which permitted the Canadian National Railways to spend $100,000 a year on club dues, which now have been cut to something between $5,000 and $10,000 a year. He was a member of the government which permitted the Canadian National Railways to spend $2,000,000 a year on entertainment account, which now has been cut to something like $400,000 a year or less. He was a member of the government which permitted the Canadian National Railways to switch accounts. They would pass millions of dollars for the construction of such useless appurtenances as the Saskatoon hotel, for example, or the Vancouver hotel; then, at the whim of some individual in the Canadian National, they would switch those amounts. They did that in 1930 to the extent of $8,000,000. He was a member of the government which permitted the Canadian National Railways not only to spend money in this country but to go down to Jamaica and start to build a hotel there, which was estimated to cost half a million dollars but which actually cost a million dollars. This hotel cost the people of Canada $270,000, and today it is nothing but a bone of contention between the people of Jamaica and the people of this country; it has been of absolutely no use to the Canadian National or to the people of this country, yet it cost us $270,000. My hon. friend was a member of the government which hired Sir Henry Thornton at a salary of $75,000 a year and legitimate expenses, which were estimated at about $25,000 annually. Yet he was a member of the government which permitted Sir Henry Thornton to draw $150,000 year after year, and at least $50,000 or $60,000 of that amount had no real basis. My hon. friend was a member of the government which permitted Sir Henry Thornton, in addition, to take over the house in which he was living, a house for which he paid $5,000 or $6,000 a year, but which, after it was taken over by the management of the railways, cost the Dominion of Canada $20,000 a year.

I have a whole list of items of extravagance here; I could go right on down the list. There is the radio, for example, which cost over $250,000 a year, but which was of no use to the Canadian National Railways. Yet my hon. friend says he was not acquainted with any reason why he should have interfered, or something to that effect.

Mr. EULER: I never said that.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend says he knew of no unfair extravagance, or political interference. There should have been political interference, if there was not; there should have been some interference to get the Canadian National back to where it is now, under economical management, which is fair to the country and to the railway itself.

Mr. EULER: Is there any political interference now?

Mr. MANION: To the extent of keeping them on an economic and decent basis, yes; there is political interference to that extent, and God knows it was needed, when we came into power. All one has to do is look at the Duff report, extracts from which I have before me. Speaking of the Canadian National under the regime of my hon. friends the Duff report says:

> Running through its administrative practices, however, has been the red thread of extravagance.

I could go on and quote statement after statement of that kind from the Duff report, which was brought in by men who were fair judges, business men who had no axes to grind and no political favours to give, men who looked over the whole Canadian National system and gave a fair-minded report. They condemn most severely the attitude of the Canadian National, and without putting it into so many words, though in some places they get very close to it, they condemn my hon. friend and his government for permitting the Canadian National to carry on these wild extravagances to the extent I have indicated.

So far as Sir Henry Thornton is concerned, I merely wish to close on this note: I have never attacked Sir Henry Thornton personally; I have attacked the extravagances of the Canadian National Railways and I think rightly so, as any man in this house has a perfect right to attack such extravagances, feeling that he has a duty to perform towards this country. If I never perform another duty for Canada I think I have performed a good one in cleaning up the mess that my hon. friend and the government of which he was a member left so far as the Canadian National Railways were concerned, and with which I had to deal after they went out of power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, after serving seventeen years in this House of Commons I am not to be silenced by a demonstration of this kind. I think I may leave it to the judgment of the house whether I have spoken very often during this or any other session. I rise now not because the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) needs any defence, but to protest against the speech of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler).

As most hon. members know, a few years ago I had something to do with exposing the extravagances, and I believe I am discreet in my language when I say that I helped to expose the graft, which were found at that time in the Canadian National Railways. Ever since, in this house and on the public platforms, I have refrained from exposing the knowledge which came to me from investigations I was called upon to make during that time. I have been content—yes, I have been willing in the interests of this great nationally owned enterprise, to let bygones be bygones, and to devote all the talents and the ability I possess to the building up of the fortifications of public ownership behind this great enterprise. But when year after year I hear charges made that we are out to destroy the national railways, and when I heard the hon. member for North Waterloo speak to-night, as he has spoken in the country in weeks gone by, and when I noted the tone in which he spoke, I believed it my duty to rise and to protest. I want to tell him and to tell this House of Commons that if hon. members want me to expose what I know and that which up to the present I have not exposed, namely the graft that was carried on in the national railways, I am willing to take the people of this country into my confidence, and to tell them what I found out.

The hon. member who has just spoken was appointed, with myself, to go to Montreal and to investigate the railway accounts. Did he go? No, he refused to go. Every member on the Liberal side of the house refused to go. In fact, only one hon. member, namely the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan), had the courage to go down there and to investigate the accounts of the national railways. I want to say here and now without fear of successful contradiction that what we found there was a disgrace to the executive of any great corporation. I have not said so before, but I am prepared to say so now either in this house or in the country.

Mr. JACOBS: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Does not the hon. member think that as a member of parliament it was his duty to expose graft, no matter where he saw it?

Mr. McGIBBON: If it is my duty it is equally the duty of hon. members sitting opposite, but they failed to do it. You would not do it, not one of you.

Mr. JACOBS: They are not detectives.

Mr. McGIBBON: You might, then have given some assistance to those who were willing in the interests of the people of Canada to play the part of detectives.

I want to go back to the beginning of the national railways question. Where did it begin? I repudiate the suggestion that it was begun by the Conservative party. I say it began first when the bonds of the Canadian National Railways from Fort William to the east were guaranteed, and again at the beginning of the building of the Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Moncton. After those two things had been done by a Liberal government, the national railways became a question for the parliament of Canada, and for no other body. You cannot get away from it. I was a member of the house when, in 1919, the railways were taken over. What did we find? It is quite true that some of the railways threw up their hands and said, "We are through." But that did not relieve the parliament of Canada from its obligations. Read the railway history of that time and see what you find. The parliament of Canada at that time had obligations amounting to $331,000,000 to which they had put their name and which they would have to pay. In addition to that the provinces had guaranteed $96,000,000 worth of bonds. In addition to that we had another $400,000,000 invested in railways like the Intercolonial. In other words, something over $800,000,000 which Canada then had at stake would have been lost if we had let the railways go into bankruptcy. It is all very well after the fact to say, "You should have done so and so," but at that time the Dominion of Canada and the provinces would have lost practically $800,000,000, had we done so.

What happened? We took over the railways. What did they cost the people of Canada? They cost about another $800,000,000, and in that we had the whole Transcontinental system, we had the terminals, we had the gathering lines and everything that is essential to a railway system. When we went out of power what happened? What happened between the day we went out of power in 1921 and when we came back in 1930? Read the Duff report, and you will find that during that period $922,000,000 of debt was placed upon the railways, through the instrumentality of the King government; $922,000,000 more was added to the debt. That is the condition with which this government was faced when it came into office. You want to know why? Well, just look at some of the railways which were taken over. Take, for example, the Gaspe railway. I am told that the year before last it cost a million dollars to take the snow off that line. What about the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway? Read the reports prevalent about that deal, where the vendors sold for $6,000,000, and only $5,000,000 reached the owners. Read those reports. Then, read the reports of the extravagances exposed in the committee which sat in this building; read about the deals in New York, the offices in that city and, as the minister suggested, the extravagant salaries. Consider the commissions on everything bought for the national railways, and the extravagance in connection with the building of branch lines. Compare the expenditures on the Canadian National Railways with those of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and you will understand how through extravagance the cost mounted up year by year. Consider the hotel competition, and the fact that the hotel in Saskatoon cost $16,000 per room. Is it any wonder it has never been opened? I placed on the committee records an agreement drawn by the late Doctor Reid, then Minister of Railways, indicating that the government of the day was exempt from all obligations in connection with the building of a hotel at Vancouver. At one time there were obligations, but through negotiations he exempted the government of the day from those obligations. Yet the building of the hotel was proceeded with, and the railways, through the government of the day, authorized a building costing $11,000,000. Is it any wonder that the national railways got into the mess in which we found them when we took office?

I want to tell the hon. member for North Waterloo that the government of which he was a member has damned public ownership through the instrumentality of the national railways for all time to come in the Dominion of Canada. I say without fear of successful contradiction that the national railways cannot be made to pay, and when I say that I am wiping off the $1,300,000,000 of Canadian government obligations. I take into consideration only the $1,253,000,000 of bonds that were put out to the public and on which we have to pay something like $58,000,000 of interest a year. In my opinion the day will never come when the national railways can break even and pay their debt to the public. It cannot be done, and I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), I would ask parliament and the people of Canada this question: Is it not time that we faced this situation as we ought to face it, as a business proposition? If we cannot do anything better let us say to the people of Canada that in our judgment these two railways should be united. I said that a year ago on the floor of this house, and I was glad to read in the press only the other day that Mr. E. W. Beatty recently made practically the same speech to his directors that I made a year ago on the floor of this house. If we can save $75,000,000 a year, as the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway says we can, as the hon. member for North Waterloo says we can, and as the late president of the Canadian National Railways said we could, why not do it? Why continue to ask the people to put their hands in their pockets year after year to raise fifty or sixty or seventy million dollars, —for what purpose? To finish paying for the national railways? No. The people do not own the national railways, and it is only a fallacy to think they do.

I remember the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) asking the late Sir Henry Thornton what value he would put on the national railways as a going concern, and he replied about sixty thousand dollars per mile. If you figure that out it means just the amount of money that we owe the public. That is all they are worth, and all we are doing is holding the bag. Are we going to continue to ask the people of this country to put their hands in their pockets year after year and pull out fifty or sixty million dollars? And remember, that does not take into account any depreciation; it allows nothing for improvements, extensions or betterments.

As I have said before, if we are going on with these roads as they are to-day, they will cost this country $75,000,000 a year for many years to come, and what do we get in return? Surely with the competition there is to-day from buses; with the competition which is in sight from the air, and with the control which the board of railway commissioners exercises, this country is sufficiently protected against a railway monopoly. Surely we do not have to spend sixty or seventy million dollars a year simply to protect this country against a railway monopoly. I say without fear of contradiction that taxation will have to be lifted from the back of the individual and from the back of business before this country can regain that degree of prosperity which we are all hoping for.

Mr. EULER: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. McGIBBON: If you do not make it too hard.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend is suggesting amalgamation, as I have done before. Would he have amalgamation under private or public ownership?

Mr. McGIBBON: I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question. I was going to say that the Prime Minister should let the people decide that question by referendum. Let them say whether they want these roads run under public or private ownership. I have no hesitation in saying that I would choose private ownership, but the people have such a huge investment in these roads that they have a right to be consulted. I would say to the Prime Minister: Work out a scheme of amalgamation. I mean more in the line of what I suggested a year ago, namely, that the government retain ownership of its own lines and the Canadian Pacific Railway retain ownership of its lines, but put them under joint operation and let the people decide whether they be under public ownership or private ownership. But for goodness' sake let us relieve the people of the heavy financial responsibility they are carrying to-day and which they must continue to carry unless something is done.

I was dreadfully disappointed when I read the other day Mr. Beatty's statement that only one million dollars' worth of savings had been effected through cooperation in one year, and presumably the greatest savings have already taken place. Now when we are faced with a deficit of $65,000,000 or $70,000,000 a year on account of the national railways I ask this parliament what right have we to inflict that taxation on the people when there is a remedy for the situation? I ask the Prime Minister and I ask this house to submit this question to the people of Canada in an unbiased way with the idea of consummating amalgamation of these two roads so far as operation is concerned, and let the people say whether they want it done under public ownership or private ownership.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Irvine) which was negatived on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Coote	MacInnis
Garland (Bow River)	Macphail, Miss
Heaps	Mitchell
Irvine	Neill
Kennedy (Peace River)	Speakman
Lucas	Spencer
Luchkovich	Woodsworth—14.

NAYS

Messrs:

Anderson (Toronto-High Park)	Duguay
Anderson (Halton)	Dumaine
Arsenault	Dupuis
Arthurs	Duranleau
Baker	Edwards
Barber	Elliott
Baribeau	Embury
Barrette	Ernst
Beaubien	Factor
Beaubier	Fafard
Belec	Fiset, Sir Eugène
Bell (Hamilton West)	Fortin
Bell (St. John-Albert)	Fournier
Bennett	Fraser (Cariboo)
Bertrand	Garland (Carleton)
Beynon	Geary
Blair	Girouard
Bothwell	Gobeil
Boucher	Gordon
Bourgeois	Goulet
Bowen	Guthrie
Bowman	Hackett
Brasset	Hall
Brown	Hanson (Skeena)
Burns	Harris
Bury	Hay
Butcher	Howard
Cahan	Hurtubise
Carmichael	Ilsley
Chaplin	Jacobs
Charters	Jean
Chevrier	Johnstone
Cotnam	Kennedy (Winnipeg South Centre)
Cowan (Long Lake)	King, Mackenzie
Davies	Lapointe
Denis	Larue
Deslauriers	Loucks
Desrochers	Macdonald (Kings)
Dickie	Macdougall
Donnelly	MacLaren
Dubois	MacMillan (Mackenzie)
Duff	MacNicol

McDade	St-Père
McGibbon	Sanderson
McGillis	Sauvé
McGregor	Séguin
McIntosh	Senn
McKenzie (Assiniboia)	Shaver
McLure	Simpson
McPhee	(Simcoe North)
Maloney	Smith
Manion	(Victoria-Carleton)
Matthews	Smith (Cumberland)
Mercier (Laurier-Outremont)	Smoke
Mercier (St. Henri)	Spotton
Moore (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)	Sproule
Morand	Stanley
Motherwell	Stewart (Leeds)
Munn	Stewart (Lethbridge)
Myers	Stinson
Parent	Stirling
Peck	Stitt (Nelson)
Perley (Qu'Appelle)	Stitt (Selkirk)
Perras	Sullivan
Pickel	Sutherland
Plunkett	Swanston
Porteous	Taylor
Pouliot	Thauvette
Power	Thompson
Price	(Simcoe East)
Quinn	Thompson (Lanark)
Rennie	Totzke
Rhéaume	Tummon
Rinfret	Turnbull
Roberge	Weese
Robinson	Weir (Melfort)
Rogers	Weir (Macdonald)
Ross	White (London)
Ryerson	White (Mount Royal)
	Willis
	Young—157.

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips.)

Mr. MULLINS: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. GOLDING: I was paired with the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Wright). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks before the main motion is put, I think we have witnessed something which is typically characteristic of the previous and the present governments. I refer to the sane, logical and reasonable remarks of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) as compared with the utterly partisan, bombastic and venomous remarks of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). The minister referred to the extravagance of the previous government, but I do not think there was ever anything so extravagant in connection with any government in this country as the remarks he made. It is not my intention to occupy the time of the house at any length as we are all hoping to get to a vote on the main question, but in view of the fact that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has been ruled out of order, I desire to move an amendment which I submit expresses in a very few words the views which have been expressed wherever an opportunity of expression has been afforded in recent months in any riding in this country. I submit that this amendment represents the general feeling of the people of Canada at the present time. I beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be omitted and the following be added instead thereof:

In the opinion of this house the present administration no longer enjoys the confidence of the country.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the rules of this house is that only one amendment and one subamendment can be moved to the main motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair. During the present debate an amendment was moved and declared out of order. Subsequently a subamendment was moved and also declared out of order. Another amendment was moved and has been voted upon but no subamendment was moved. I submit that under rule 49 no further amendment is permissible. If it were otherwise we might be met with amendment after amendment as votes are taken, and Your Honour would never be permitted to leave the chair. There are other reasons why this amendment is out of order, but at the moment this is my principal reason for objecting.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 49 reads:

Only one amendment and one subamendment may be made to a motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply or ways and means.

That would seem to prevent the present amendment being in order, and I rule it to be out of order.

Main motion (Mr. Rhodes) agreed to on division and the house went into committee of ways and means, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That income shall include rents, royalties, reservations and other like considerations which fluctuate according to the production from or the use of the property leased or sold.

Mr. BENNETT: This is to provide for cases in which royalties are paid and have sometimes escaped taxation. This removes any possible doubt with respect to that and provides that royalties that may be payable to individuals under subleases of properties, oil and others, on which royalties have been paid, shall be taxable as income. This is sufficient for to-night. I will move that the committee rise and report progress, passing that one resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The resolution has eight parts.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right; this is the first clause. I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If the house would give consent I would move the second reading of Bill No. 50 and Bill No. 72 in order that they might be printed and circulated for the information of the house. Bill No. 50 has been passed by the Senate. It is an act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act of 1932. It is a technical statute, and any explanation I might give would be wholly ineffectual unless the bill were before hon. members. I suggest that it would serve every useful purpose if I now moved that the bill be read a second time in order that it be printed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it intended to discuss the bill in committee of the whole house?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. In view of the discussion that had taken place in the Senate I thought that this house was more or less familiar with what had transpired and that it would serve the purpose if the bill were considered in committee of the whole house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are we agreeing to the principle of the bill before we know what is involved?

Mr. BENNETT: We are dealing with foreign insurance companies. The method is somewhat technical. It arises out of legislation that has been passed on previous occasions, and it is well known that great conflict of opinion has taken place as to the legislative jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures on the one hand and the parliament of Canada on the other. Certain decisions have been arrived at in the privy council since 1916 to date, and it is believed that this legislation will clarify to some extent the difficulties that have been experienced. I can say frankly that there is no great national principle at stake; rather is it an effort to pass legislation which beyond question will be within our legislative competence and to deal with the matters in the manner in which we believe they should be dealt with. It is complementary to a bill that follows on the order paper. There seems to be no doubt as to our right to deal with foreign companies, and the manner in which we deal with them will be prescribed in the act. Our right to deal with our own companies is conceded.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does this bill refer to foreign insurance companies or to British and Canadian insurance companies?

Mr. BENNETT: The point as to our jurisdiction to deal with foreign companies is not seriously questioned; it is only the method by which that jurisdiction is to be asserted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does this refer to companies asking for special privileges?

Mr. BENNETT: That comes in one of the statutes, the second bill dealing with Lloyds.

Mr. EULER: That is not the one which the Prime Minister is discussing now?

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is Bill No. 72.

Mr. COOTE: Is it necessary to have the second reading of the bill before it can be printed?

Mr. BENNETT: The bill has been printed and is ready for circulation, but it is not in the hands of hon. members until after the second reading has been given. That is why I suggest that it be given the second reading, so that members will be in a position to study the bill. It might be that after the house had considered the matter they might think it desirable that the bill should go to one of the committees of the house, but I do not think that will be necessary.

Mr. RALSTON: If the house gives second reading, I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that it is on the understanding that we may discuss in committee everything which we might discuss on the second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: I judged that that was what the right hon. the leader of the opposition intended by his question; I construed it as such. If the house gives the second reading, I do not propose that it should limit its right to discuss every feature of the bill, even though that might involve some question of principle.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Bennett, for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), moves that Bill No. 50, entitled an act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932, be now read the second time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the advantage in that? My right hon. friend says that it is for the purpose of having the bill circulated. Surely the bill may be circulated before the second reading. Bills are always printed and distributed before the second reading. Why the change in this instance?

Mr. BENNETT: The former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is entirely correct. The bill has to be printed in English and French before it is given the second reading. I should have said, more properly, that the official presentation of the bill for the consideration of members arises by reason of its being given second reading, and the house is then in a position either to discuss the details of the bill in committee of the whole house or to send the bill to another committee. I intended to move the bill one step forward to-night. Perhaps the language I used with respect to the necessity of its being printed was too wide.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I fail utterly to comprehend why this bill should be given special treatment, different from that accorded other bills. Apparently it is not because it should be printed, because there is nothing to prevent its being printed and circulated before the second reading, and we have not been given any details with regard to the principle underlying it. I do not like advancing the bill at this time, making in this way an exception of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The rules of the house do provide that on the second reading of a bill it is not proper to deal with the several sections. This bill is one which amends the existing sections of a statute, and the extent of the amendments is indicated in the bill. The reason it has to be printed in English and French before it is read the second time, as the hon. gentleman has said, is that members may at least see it. The principle of the bill is merely to amend and make more perfect existing legislation which was passed at a previous session and with respect only—so far as this bill is concerned—to foreign insurance companies, with respect to which the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament is unquestioned. If this were a new measure and I were asked to unfold to the chamber the principles involved in it, I would do so, but where it involves merely amendments, according to the rules it is not sound parliamentary practice to take the bill section by section and indicate at this time what is involved. If I say that the principle of the bill is to make more perfect the administration of this statute I have said all that is involved with respect to it, as any one can see by taking a casual look at it.

Mr. POULIOT: I submit that all this discussion has been completely out of order, because, sir, you were reading the motion for the second reading of the bill, and I understand that on the second reading a member can speak only once. The Prime Minister spoke several times, and other members also. I submit, sir, that this discussion is irrelevant and out of order.

Now, speaking on the second reading I have just one word to say. Lloyds will be very much surprised when they see this legislation and learn for the first time after centuries that they are called an insurance company. For the benefit of the government may I tell them that if they will glance at the Encyclopaedia Britannica in the library they will see that Lloyds is not an insurance company; it is just a club.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the hon. member permit me? He is confounding this bill with the one which immediately follows it. This bill deals only with foreign insurance companies. The next bill deals with British and Canadian companies.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his explanation. I am glad to hear that this bill does not refer to Lloyds as an insurance company; and what the Minister of Justice has just said confirms what I said before.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that the only change is that in the original preamble the words were "soliciting and securing." It is proposed to change it to "are soliciting applications for and issuing," so as to conform to the facts, namely that they are soliciting applications for and issuing life insurance policies. That is the only change in that section.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. BENNETT: This is changing one word only, as to the extent of the insurance at risk, it having been stated as "three and a quarter billions of dollars" when the other statute was passed, and now being "four and a quarter billions" or thereabouts.

Section agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, May 16, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third report of the special committee on the Civil Service.—Mr. Lawson.

First report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Harris.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to transmit to the house the following message from the deputy assistant secretary of the Governor General:

Ottawa, May 16, 1934.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the right hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, chief justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,

Deputy Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

WINDSOR, ONT.—RADIO STATION

Mr. EULER:

1. Has the radio commission leased station CKLW at Windsor, Ontario?
2. If so, what are the terms of the lease as to time and rental payable?
3. How much time daily will be allotted to the radio commission on this station?
4. Has the radio commission issued, or does it intend to issue, an additional licence in the border cities to the owners of CKLW?
5. If so, why is such additional licence issued?
6. Will Columbia chain programs be broadcast over this new station, and does the commission receive any fee for the privilege, and for what amount?
7. Who are the owners of CKLW, and of the new station which is to be established, and what is the proportion of stock owned by each, including the Columbia broadcasting chain's share, if any?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DURANLEAU:

The following information has been furnished by the Canadian radio broadcasting commission:

1. No arrangements have been made between the Canadian radio broadcasting commission and station CKLW.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. No additional licence in the border cities, to the owners of CKLW, has been recommended by the commission.
5. Answered by No. 4.
6. Verbal answer already given.
7. No information.

*LAUZON SHIPYARDS—TANKER

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Did the government have a tanker constructed at the Lauzon shipyards?
2. If so, what was the cost of such tanker?
3. When was such tanker christened?
4. By whom?
5. What name was given to such tanker?

Mr. CAHAN: I have inquired of each and every department of the government that might have knowledge sufficient to answer this question, and I am informed that no department has any knowledge of the construction of a tanker at the Lauzon shipyards.

DUNDURN, SASK., RELIEF CAMP SUPPLIES

Mr. TOTZKE:

1. In the calling of tenders for supplies for the unemployment relief camp at Dundurn, Saskatchewan, is it the practice to advertise publicly for tenders or are there lists of firms or individuals who are invited to tender?
2. If there are lists of firms or individuals who are asked to tender, who recommends the names of those who appear on the list, or how is the list compiled?
3. Is the submission of tenders confined to those whose names appear on the list?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Firms and individuals are invited to tender.
2. No recommendations from particular individuals are required. Any responsible individual or firm may be asked to tender.
3. No.

TARIFF ON DENTAL SUPPLIES

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the government received any request from the Canadian Dental Association or any other dental association in Canada in order to change certain items of the tariff affecting them since the Empire agreements came into force?
2. If so, what is the nature of the said requests?
3. When and by whom were they made?
4. Has the government considered same?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. No.
2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

LES EBOULEMENTS, QUE., DISMISSAL OF LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Department of Marine aware that Mr. Charles Tremblay (Georges), lighthouse keeper at the wharf of Les Eboulements, in the county of Charlevoix, has been dismissed by telegram?
2. Were any complaints lodged against Mr. Charles Tremblay (Georges)?
3. If so, what was the nature of such complaints?
4. Who lodged such complaints?
5. Who recommended Mr. Hector Tremblay to replace Mr. Charles Tremblay (Georges)?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. The agent of the Department of Marine at Quebec was instructed by letter 12th April, 1934, to notify Mr. Charles Tremblay that his services as lightkeeper would not be required this year.
2. Yes.
3. Partisan discussion of politics.
4. Mr. C. N. Dorion, M.P.
5. Mr. C. N. Dorion, M.P.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

VANCOUVER ELEVATOR—GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What was the amount of grain by variety and grade received into No. 2 elevator at Vancouver for the period, September 30, 1933, to February 15, 1934?
2. What was the amount of grain by variety and grade shipped out of No. 2 elevator at Vancouver during the same period?
3. What was the total quantity of screenings taken from the said grain during the same period: (a) regular screenings; (b) recleaned screenings; (c) refuse screenings?
4. To whom and at what price were these screenings sold?
5. What is the quantity of grain by variety and grade at present in No. 2 elevator?

FARM INDEBTEDNESS

MEASURE TO FACILITATE COMPROMISES BETWEEN FARMERS AND CREDITORS—OFFICIAL RECEIVERS—BOARDS OF REVIEW

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to facilitate compromises and arrangements between farmers and their creditors, to provide for the appointment of official receivers, and for the establishment of provincial boards of review and their remuneration.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

PROVISION TO FACILITATE AND INCREASE EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO FARMERS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act (R.S.C., c. 66) to facilitate and increase the extension of credit to farmers, to authorize the Minister of Finance to purchase additional bonds issued by the board, and guaranteed by the government, and to provide for supplementary advances by the board.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE—APPOINTMENT OF DOMINION FRANCHISE COMMISSIONER—PRINTING OF VOTERS LISTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the franchise of electors at elections of members of the House of Commons, and to provide for the appointment, salaries, fees and expenses of a dominion franchise commissioner, secretary, registrars, enumerators, and other employees, and to make provision for the printing of voters lists and other documents.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the expenditure of certain sums of money for the construction of and repairs to public works and for dredging and improving harbours and rivers throughout Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: On this motion—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to.

NICKEL EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct two questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). Reports of the bureau of statistics for January and February, 1934, show that Canada is exporting fine nickel to the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Japan and the Netherlands at prices approximating fifty cents per pound. The same reports indicate that during the same period Canada was exporting fine nickel to the United States at approximately twenty-five cents per pound. My questions are these: First, why is fine nickel being exported to the United States at approximately half the price at which it is being sold to other countries? Second, how does the wholesale price of nickel in the United States compare with the wholesale price in Great Britain.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would ask the hon. member to let this stand as notice of the question.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to ask the minister if he can give me some explanation with regard to the decrease in the consumption of apples, honey, eggs, fresh beef, concentrated milk, cheese, potatoes, wheat, oats, barley and wheat flour, as compared with the previous year. I take the liberty of asking this question because on May 8 the minister said that an answer would be given me in this connection.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The officials of the department have been working since May 8 to gather the information requested by the hon. member for Témiscouata. I have inquired as to the matter on a number of occasions, the last time this morning, but the work is not yet completed. We hope to have the information in the very near future. There has been a very great deal of work in this connection.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister be kind enough to tell me if it will be completed before the bill is reported by the committee?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe it will be completed this week.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With regard to the various provincial enactments that were filed by the minister last Friday, I think, I should like to ask whether the Department of Justice has examined these enactments from the point of view of their being sufficient to implement, so far as the purposes of the government are concerned, the specific terms of the legislation we are now considering.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Speaking generally we have gone over them, but they are provincial enactments. We did not draw them, but we consider that they are fairly adequate for the purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): From a cursory examination of the enactments it strikes me that there is a tremendous disparity between the different measures. The bill passed in New Brunswick, for example, is very different from that passed in British Columbia. I am wondering if the Department of Justice has satisfied itself as to the sufficiency of these various enactments with regard to their conferring ancillary power under this legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No doubt there is a great deal of discrepancy between the various provincial bills, but we have no right whatever to interfere. Believing that these measures express the views of the various provinces as to the nature of the cooperation they desire, we think the schemes under them in connection with the dominion bill now before us will be workable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In all cases?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In all cases that we have seen as yet.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask one or two questions at this point. Last Friday, referring to the milling industry, the minister told the committee that if sixty per cent of that industry in the province of Ontario desired to come under this proposed legislation the remaining forty per cent could be compelled to come under it as well. I should like to ask the minister as to the basis upon which the percentage will be decided. I assume the capacity of the mills will have to be considered. Some flour mills have a capacity of three hundred barrels a day, and that runs up to five hundred and one thousand in other mills. Then when you take the big milling companies such as the Lake of the Woods, the Ogilvie company and others, they have a still larger capacity. On what basis will that percentage be decided? Will it be on the basis of capacity?

While I am on my feet I should like to ask another question, this time in regard to the produce sold on the markets of the larger towns and cities in the province of Ontario. Will the local board have the right to say whether the farmers can bring to the markets certain products such as chickens, eggs, butter and so on, and will the board have power to say that a farmer may come in to-day but that he may not come in next week, just because they say he cannot? I should like some information from the minister in that regard.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My hon. friend's questions are alike in this respect, that each matter will have to be dealt with on its own merits on the basis of the scheme submitted by the producers themselves. If they submit a certain scheme which is approved by the provincial government then it will be a matter for the jurisdiction of that government.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister if the local board will have full jurisdiction in regard to the marketing of produce on the local markets. Will the local board have the right to say whether certain products should be marketed on a certain day?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends entirely on the scheme put forward by the producers and the powers conferred on the local board by the province.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then going back to the milling industry, from the answers given by the minister on Friday last I take it that the milling industry would be under the jurisdiction of three boards, the dominion board, the provincial board and the local board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not intend to leave the impression that such an industry would be under three boards. It depends entirely on the plan or policy they suggest. It might be provincial or interprovincial, or it might deal only with exports.

Mr. SANDERSON: That answer is all right as far as it goes, but it is still vague to me. I should like to know how these boards are to be appointed. Coming first to the local board, who appoints that board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is provided for in one of the clauses of the act. It depends upon the way in which the scheme is submitted. The business of the appointment of the board is so closely related to the scheme submitted by the producers that one could not state definitely in each case how a board would be appointed. In a general way I would say the answer would be this, that when the producers submit their scheme they have to state in that scheme how they wish the board to be appointed. It might be an election by the producers themselves. It might be that the board they would like to have set up would consist of a majority of producers, but also a certain number of people in the trade and, in connection with apples, shippers. Also they may ask for representation from a consumer body, or by one member of the government. But it depends entirely upon the plan they have evolved and wish to put into effect.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not very much enlightened. Perhaps I did not put my question in a way capable of being understood by the minister. In order to make myself as clear as possible may I ask this question: Will the dominion board have control over the provincial board and the local board, or will the dominion board have control of the provincial board and the provincial board have control of the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends entirely on what scheme is suggested. A local board may be set up to deal purely with the matter of marketing, or the regulation of marketing within the province. That might be under the provincial government. The dominion board may, under certain conditions, use and name a provincial board to carry out the plan submitted for interprovincial and export trade, while for trade within the province the regulation might be under the jurisdiction of the province. My answer may not be as definite as the hon. member would wish—

Mr. SANDERSON: I am sorry to say it is not very definite.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What I am trying to explain to the hon. member is that no person can decide until the case is placed before him. Each case will have to be decided on its own merits.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am sorry to say the minister's explanation is not very clear to me, although it may be clear to some other hon. members in the committee. Let me take the milling industry as an example. In connection with that industry there are three classes of customers, if I may so describe them. The industry has its local trade dealing in flour, it has customers in other provinces and it has a large export trade. Will the milling industry be under the control of three boards, namely, the local board, the provincial board and the dominion board? May I point out that in the flour industry orders are usually received by cable. The dealers cable price quotations, acceptances or non-acceptances. In the event of an acceptance of a shipment of flour to be sent to Great Britain, or to any other point outside of Canada, will the millers first have to consult the local board, the provincial board or the dominion board before they may close the order?

Mr. CANTLEY: Or the celestial board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on what plan they submit. They may submit a plan to regulate milling in connection with export trade, only. That would be under a local board, set up with the approval of the dominion board by the milling industry itself. If the proposition were one affecting only marketing within the province it could be under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well then, will the provincial governments appoint the local boards?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on the scheme submitted. In submitting the scheme they have to state how they wish the board selected, whether by election from their own people, the people submitting the proposition, or anly partially from those people to act along with other representatives to be selected by the province—if it is purely a provincial matter—or by the dominion if it is a matter of export.

Mr. SANDERSON: I shall put another question to the minister concerning the jurisdiction of local boards. Let us consider the local butchers who buy their supply from nearby farmers. Will they have to obtain permission from a local board before they may buy beef on the hoof for killing purposes, and to offer for sale in a local butcher shop?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends entirely under what scheme they may be working, and the scheme submitted.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well then, would the minister go just a little farther. Surely he can tell the committee a little more about the scheme, and the whole process. So far as I am concerned—and it may be my own fault—for the life of me I cannot obtain enlightenment in this matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid the hon. member has not yet grasped what the bill in this particular, means.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Nobody else has.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The bill sets out that the producers or the people interested in the formation of a local board to regulate the marketing of their products will submit a scheme which they think will work out in their own best interests, and towards the better regulation of that product. They submit a scheme, but no person now knows what the scheme may be.

Mr. SANDERSON: Not even the minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, not even the minister.

Mr. CASGRAIN: So we are voting on something we do not know anything about.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, we are not voting on something we do not know about. We are voting on something that I have endeavoured to make clear over and over again, namely that the producers themselves, by organization in so far as they may indicate should be given authority over the control and regulation of their own products. Under different circumstances different producers will submit different schemes. Those schemes will be laid before the dominion board, investigated and then laid before the governor in council or the lieutenant governor in council. But such scheme can operate only in so far as authority is given by this legislation.

Mr. SANDERSON: From the last answer the minister has given I take it that the dominion board will have jurisdiction and control over the provincial and local boards.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, not necessarily. For instance, the Fraser river valley milk producers may want to submit a scheme for the marketing of their products within the province of British Columbia. That need not necessarily be referred to the dominion board or the dominion government.

Mr. SANDERSON: One more question in regard to local creameries. Before a local creamery may make a sale of butter or cheese will it have to obtain the consent of the local and provincial boards?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends entirely on what system they may want to follow.

Mr. SANDERSON: How many systems will there be?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on the producers themselves. The producers in each locality, each province or, as in the case of live stock, in the dominion, would submit what they think would be the best way to regulate the marketing of their own products.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well then someone has to work out those schemes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, certainly; the producers submit their own schemes.

Mr. SANDERSON: And obtain the consent of the provincial and dominion boards.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If they wish to operate only under provincial jurisdiction, yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask a question pertaining to the appointments of these boards. Must the boards, either local or provincial, appointed to any scheme meet the point of view of the minister? I know the dominion board would.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not necessarily, so far as personnel is concerned. For instance, a body of producers would ask that a local board be elected to consist entirely of the producers, themselves. They elect their own board, and are responsible for the personnel of it. But the scheme must be approved by the minister, either provincial or federal, before the local board can be appointed and the scheme go into effect.

Mr. VALLANCE: Suppose the producers submitting a scheme decide that they are going to have only producers on the board and that the minister disagrees. Has he the right to set aside such a decision and say that so far as the marketing of grain, for instance, is concerned, the trade must be represented? Suppose the producers do not want the trade represented on the board; has the minister then power to say to the producers that that is not right or fair, or to give them some reason why some other representative should sit on the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is all part of the scheme which has to be approved by the minister, but the hon. member I think will agree that if a body sufficiently representative of the producers and sufficiently representative also of the production submit a scheme that is approved, the personnel of the board would not be a major point of issue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any safeguard there for the consumers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say that there are three safeguards: first, that the scheme has to be approved by the minister and by the governor in council; second, that there is no price fixing but a regulating of the rate at which the stuff goes on to the market; third, there is part II of the act which gives power to control undue charges.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The consumer would not be represented on any of the boards contemplated?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends entirely on the scheme submitted by the producers. In the first draft of the bill we had a provision for representation of producers, the trade, and consumers on the local board. It is a matter for the producers submitting the scheme to designate whether or not they wish consumers represented on the board, but I think producers have reached the stage where they fully realize that the good will of the public is essential in the marketing and regulating of their products. Personally I would say that the consumers would be more protected under this act than they are at present.

Mr. MOORE: (Ontario): Speaking on May 8, the minister stated:

I am answering the statement which the hon. member for Ontario made decrying very strenuously the principle of compulsory cooperation. I could give numerous similar examples throughout the dominion where members of a community bind themselves together because the majority feel that it would be of advantage to have compulsory cooperation. For instance, I might cite the building of roads.

Then later on the minister, referring to the member for Ontario, says:

If we follow the argument advanced by the hon. member for Ontario, I suppose he would advocate that each farmer in a community should make his own trail and build his own road to town so that he might thereby retain his own individuality and initiative.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as the farmers of my county are concerned, the county which I represent with an honoured colleague on the other side of the house, that is precisely what many of the producers of my county do. They and their fathers have built trails, out of many years of hard work and honest service—trails to their own markets. I want to know from the minister if the vote of any group of men is to destroy what they have done. They have sold, and still sell direct to the consumers. Many of them sell to the merchants. Is it possible that we are passing legislation to enable any body of producers to wipe out what they have built? May I go a little bit further?

The producers of my county are business men. I think my colleague who sits on the other side of the house will say that some of them are very able business men. Are they to be deprived of the privilege of conducting their own business? Many of them have sold their products under farm names, and those farm names stand for quality of goods, for integrity of service. Many of them have registered brand names. Are those brands to be wiped out by the vote of other producers? To me the matter seems almost incomprehensible.

The minister has taken the parallel of the road. Are these producers to be forced, blindfolded, down the common road? The other day in this house the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the wiping out of the services rendered by the captains of industry through the operation of finance, through the working of mergers. He said that we had lost the direction of five hundred men who knew industry and had been accustomed to direct it. I agree with the minister that was a very serious loss. But under this bill are we to wipe out the initiative of hundreds of thousands of farmers and centralize it in the hands and under the direction of any group of marketing boards?

In my county there are some people who will agree with the minister as to the road argument. It is a very old one. They say: the common road; then they go on and say: the common vehicle. We call them communists—the common vehicle to market. There are some men who have no horses. There are some men who carry their produce to town by carts, and others who carry it by truck. Is it proposed to have communism in our marketing vehicles? That principle has been advocated over and over again; it is now being advocated, but by men whom this government watches most carefully because they have believed and we have believed they are trying to upturn the economic life of this country.

I want to go just a little bit further. I was surprised that the minister made this statement in the paragraph which I have quoted. He said:

I think the whole principle of our democratic institutions is that the majority be given power to effect what they think is in the best interest of the community.

I want to know how far that is to go. Are we to decide these things by referendum? Are we to decide by referendum that this man may lose his trade mark, and just because he is a farmer leave it to the vote of other producers, while still preserving the trade mark of big industry? Are we to do it by elections and, if so, how are the elections to be conducted? Are we to have no say as to who is to have the franchise? I was very much surprised at the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), that we were turning over blindly, without any restriction as to franchise, the power to vote. I should like to back up what was said by the hon. member for South Perth. There are some very large poultry plants in my riding, some of them containing several thousand birds. There are men in my riding who have many, many thousands of dollars invested in farms. Are they to have just the same vote as a man who has only twenty or thirty hens and with whom poultry is simply a side issue? It may be said that this is a democratic principle and we ought to think of humanity. Shall this vote be based on the labour employed? There are men farming in my riding who employ thirty or forty men and women; are they to have just one vote, the same as the man who employs no labour? Perhaps it is unfair to ask the minister to answer right here, but it is just as unfair to pass this bill without an answer.

The minister says:

If the principle works out in practice as it does, I feel that compulsory cooperation in that form has been acknowledged as a very valuable and necessary instrument for the furtherance of our present day civilization.

I felt very despondent when I read those words. I had taken the trouble to show the minister where failure after failure had occurred throughout the world, and still he says that the principle works. I should like to know upon what grounds the miinster bases that statement. On May 4 the minister referred to Queensland as a state in which this principle had worked, and he gave a list of about fourteen agricultural commodities in connection with which it works. He then said:

But the suggestion that these cooperative methods have failed and been discarded for new methods is certainly refuted by experience and by the evidence given here.

I do not want the minister to feel that I am opposing this bill in any narrow party sense. The minister is a man of training and is at the head of a very responsible department. I should like him to go over the list he gave me and note the omissions. Wool is not mentioned, beef is not mentioned, nor is mutton. It begins with arrowroot, then there is Atherton maize, barley, broom millet and so on. Just by accident I happened to run across the figures for the production of wheat in Queensland in 1929-30. These figures show that they produced less than 3,000,000 bushels in that year. The list includes peanuts.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): My hon. friend should not laugh because the peanut industry is a very important one. I should like to show the minister how it has worked out in this industry in Queensland. A duty was placed against peanuts and the consumers were very much offended. They went to the tariff board and asked for repeal of the duties. They said they did not like the Queensland peanut; they wanted the big jumbo peanut. The Queenslander produces a little red peanut, but when the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Matthews) and myself used to go to football games and hockey matches we always liked the big jumbo peanut. I should like the minister to note the reply made by the producers to this request, because it is the reply always made by producers working under this sort of legislation. They said to the tariff board: If you keep the duty on peanuts high enough and have it sufficiently prohibitive, the consumers will soon forget there ever was such a thing as a better peanut than those we produce. That is the way it works out.

I should like to give another illustration, but I do not intend to follow the minister through the list of commodities in which he stated this compulsory marketing legislation works out in Queensland. I should like to refer to dairy products because I know the minister is particularly interested. I should like him to have his department work up the record of Queensland in dairy products. The following figures show the gallons of milk produced per cow in Victoria and Queensland over a series of years, beginning with 1920:

	Victoria gallons	Queensland gallons
1920-22	341	265
1923-25	359	244
1926-28	406	267
1929	443	277
1930	470	309

Queensland has lagged behind the other Australian states in dairy production; Australia has lagged behind New Zealand and New Zealand has lagged behind Denmark. This is what happens under compulsory legislation. When you introduce socialistic measures you introduce inefficiency.

The minister has referred to the compulsory marketing of cotton, but I should like him to tell us how that works out in Queensland. Bounty act after bounty act was passed granting subsidies of from one and a half cents to three cents per pound, but the cotton has been so inferior that the manufacturers have had to be paid to use it. That is the way it works out. The minister has submitted Queensland as an example of success in answer to the numerous failures which I cited. I stated the other day that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was one of my favourite publishers, but the minister is another one. The last issue of the Economic Annalist contains an editorial which refers to this legislation as a measure to afford relief from depression and as a means of stabilizing prices.

I wonder whether the minister would do me the honour to turn up and read a speech that was delivered by Mr. Bruce when the Dairy Produce Export Control Act was introduced in Australia, in which he referred in much the same terms as the minister has done, to the needs of the farmer and to the necessity for price stability. That was on September 17, 1924, nearly ten years ago. Have we had price stability as a result of ten years of operation of that act? I want to insist that I am not opposing this bill on any narrow partisan grounds. Frankly, I believe the minister and the government have the best intentions in the world that this bill will help us out of depression, but the experience for Australia has been that similar legislation has prolonged the depression. Again I would like to give authorities and I quote now from Professor E. Ronald Walker, Professor of Economics in Sydney university. His book, which is entitled Australia in the World Depression, was published just this year, 1934; his word ought to be good; he refers specifically to this sort of legislation and this is what he says on page 80 of his work:

> The "scattered agricultural producers" have attempted, in several cases, to remove some of their disabilities by joint action, both through cooperation to achieve "orderly marketing," and through political pressure to obtain various forms of governmental assistance. The operation of such schemes has, since 1929, had unfavourable results. Price control has increased stocks and encouraged output, even during the period of falling prices, and protections and bounties have strengthened this tendency.

I cannot imagine any stronger evidence that this bill cannot do what the minister or the farmers think it will in raising their prices and in restoring their prosperity. If it works out as similar legislation has done in Australia, it must make the depression even stronger. Continuing on page 83 of the same book, Professor Walker said:

> Yet there are two obvious ways in which the suspension of borrowing has tended to reinforce the fall in agricultural prices. First, the latter had been sustained in some cases by pools financed more cheaply because overseas loans kept the local rate of interest down—

I wonder whether the minister will pay attention to this:

> —and the collapse of the price-control schemes has been facilitated by the withdrawal of this credit.

That is not my statement; that is the statement of a professor of economics in Sydney university.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I interrupt the hon. member just for a moment?

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Certainly.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member has not read what I put on record since he left. As to his quoting from Professor Walker, in the first place I think we are all pretty well agreed that the hon. member could quote from individual opinion after individual opinion in favour of individualism; we could quote expert opinion after expert opinion in favour of cooperation and compulsory cooperation, but the basis in this case, for example, of Professor Walker's statement and deduction is on price fixing and there is no price fixing in this bill.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I doubt that very much. The statement was:

> The "scattered agricultural producers" have attempted, in several cases, to remove some of their disabilities by joint action, both through cooperation to achieve "orderly marketing," and through political pressure to obtain various forms of governmental assistance. The operation of such schemes has, since 1929, had unfavourable results.

That is a statement not in defence of individualism; it is a statement made by a professor of one of the leading universities of Australia writing in connection with Australia in the world depression. That man is not defending any principle. I will admit that I have defended and do defend individualism, but this man is a trained investigator, on the ground, seeking the causes of the depression in Australia and the way out of depression.

I doubt whether there is any need for panic. I am either right or wrong in thinking this bill, if made law, will bring about an economic revolution. It is very easy to shout "red;" it is very easy to make such statements as I have made, but will the minister tell me: What is the history of the bill? What is the history of legislation of this kind? He has made that very plain; he says:

> Queensland was perhaps the pioneer state in this system of cooperative marketing.

What was the background in Queensland? The minister, who is a graduate of the university from which I graduated, is familiar with social questions. He will remember the name of William Lane, a man who conducted in Queensland an agitation and almost brought about a revolution for communism in the latter part of the last century, an eloquent, honest, misguided man. The minister will remember the uprising that followed in Queensland and the horrors which were perpetrated. He will remember that Lane carried a group of his followers to Paraguay and there founded a new Australia, and when the tide in Queensland subsided, it left this form of legislation. Founded on communism, Queensland was the pioneer state of socialism. Mr. A. St. Ledger, a senator in Queensland, writing on the subject of Australian Socialism, pointed that out very clearly. He said:

> Socialism had its origin in Queensland. From Queensland it took its inspiration. The Worker was the press exponent of the spirit of that socialism.

The Worker, by the way was the organ of Mr. Lane.

It undertook to explain to Australia what socialism meant, and what was its spirit.

That was the background of this legislation. How did it come about? It came about for this reason: the people decided that it was a government function to fix wages. Not marketing, mind you, not first. It was a government function to fix wages. The farmers in Australia had many employees. Having passed that legislation then the government was obliged to pass legislation fixing a wage fund. This government has the cart before the horse.

Now for the benefit of my hon. friends to my left and for the information of the minister may I say that Queensland was the pioneer cooperative commonwealth. I am not an authority; it may have had its genesis before this time, but in 1905 a labour convention met at Brisbane in Queensland. Mr. Reinhold, who was a member of the legislature, moved the following resolution:

That the objective of the labour movement is the establishment of a cooperative commonwealth by the furtherance in national, state, and municipal legislation of the following principles:—

(a) In "politics," the principles of democracy. Complete self-government vested in the people, every adult standing on equality at the ballot box.

(b) In economics, the principles of collectivism. The scientific organization of labour; the equitable distribution of the product of labour by the nation, state, and municipality owning and cooperating, in the interests of all its citizens, the monopolies and large industries of the community.

That is the background of this sort of legislation. That is the birthplace. Well, there is another remarkable parallel. We have here a union of forces back of this bill. You will find the parallel in Queensland. May I again quote from Senator St. Ledger, and I think this under the circumstances is a remarkable quotation:

The public—except in Queensland—were deluded into believing that socialism was not then at any rate the real issue. The anti-socialists were divided on fiscal questions. The parties were returned again to parliament, each with its former numerical ineffectiveness. The high tariffists bid for socialism.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): History repeats itself.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario):

The socialists exacted the promise of "the new protection." In this way they won the first large instalment of the machinery necessary to begin to lay the foundations of the nationalization of all industries.

I do not want to speak at length. The minister and some of the other hon. members on the other side of the house have referred to my abhorrence of coercion, and they have intimated that I believe in laissez-faire. Well, I do to a certain extent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Only to a certain extent?

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): But when have we ever had laissez-faire? How do we know whether it will work or whether it will not? For years under all governments we have had farmers coerced—coerced, you can say, in grading; coerced in marketing. Hon. members on the other side of the house pointed out all the coercion we had had. Well, we have depression now, and we have had these coercions for years. Surely there is a difference in the object of coercion. I can see where a man should be coerced to the extent of being prevented from selling bad eggs, but it is a different thing from coercing him from selling eggs at all. I can see where I should be coerced not to take another man's property, but it is a different thing when I am coerced in the use of my own property. I can see—and I want to make it very strong—why people should be coerced into refraining from monopolies, but I do not see why a man should be coerced in the matter of the carrying the product of his own labour into the open market. These matters are, I suppose, of academic interest to us now in a way, but they are going to be very practical. I want the minister to remember that they have been very practical for a very long time in Russia. There you had cooperation. We speak of compulsory cooperation. They are under no illusions as to what it means in Russia. A. E. Malakhoff was one of the apostles of cooperation in Russia. After the revolution he was driven out, and in an interview he gave in London he made a distinction which I would have the minister bear in mind. He said:

A noble aim requires also noble means. Cooperation cannot lean on bayonets,—

May I add, neither does it lean on the policeman's baton.

—neither can it enforce its aim with the help of bayonets. It must act as an economic, cultural and organizing force.

When you introduce coercion, cooperation ceases. Something that is lovely becomes unlovely. Then when you create these producing units and give them their respective jurisdictions, you are faced with the difficulty that they had to face, and I presume they faced it honestly in Russia, when it was announced officially:

> We could not authorize small separate organizations to carry out the forthcoming exchange of goods, on which depends the welfare of the whole nation. The exchange of goods must be carried out by the state.

That is a natural consequence. The nature of this legislation is known throughout the world. It is a half way house. The cry of "control," the cry of "planned industry," retaining private property is a cry that appears to please everyone. But it will not work. I am not going to give an elaborate argument but in conclusion I should like to show in just a few words why it will not work.

What is the object of private property? We all want to own something, a farm, a factory, for production. Under our present system why do we want to produce? To make a profit. And profits depend upon prices and costs and the spread between the two. Now the planner comes in, of the state, or someone else, and controls prices or costs. A few moments ago the minister said there was no intention to control prices. I believe that is correct, is it not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No price fixing.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I wonder if I may just interrupt the thread of my argument to tell a story. Some little time ago on the train I met a friend of mine who is at the head of a very large monopoly. I charged him with being a monopolist, and I think I used the term "price fixer." He said, "We do not fix prices." I happen to know something about his organization, so I said, "I know you do not, but you do distribute territories." He replied, "Oh, yes, we distribute territories." I asked, "You parcel off the consumers?" to which he replied, "Yes." I asked, "What effect has that on prices?" "Oh," he said, "prices then fix themselves." When anyone intervenes in competition he does so with two results. Either there is no profit or there is profit. If there is profit his intervention is unnecessary. If there is no profit then eventually the producer becomes bankrupt. Then comes the cry for compensation, and in this bill you will find provision for compensation. That is general throughout the world in regard to these compulsory cooperative marketing boards. When you have compensation you must have taxation, and the higher grows the taxation on the farm or factory. Then the state takes possession. It takes a lag, and we may be deceived by the lag, but the inevitable end is state socialism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rather thought we had discussed the principle of the bill on second reading, but if the discussion of the principle is to be carried on I think perhaps something should be said on the other side following what has been said by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). It is a decidedly interesting experience for me to hear the hon. member for Ontario denounce the Conservatives for having copied the Russian plan. It is rather worth living to find that queer twist in our political lineup.

Mr. GRAY: That is just about as strange as seeing the hon. member support the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be, and for that reason I want to direct attention to the actual situation. In the past we have sometimes supported certain measures brought in by the Liberals, when we thought they were fighting for political liberty. It is curious that their idea of liberty has changed so that when we want some sort of liberty for people in the industrial field they cannot see that we are fighting for the same principle. The hon. gentleman who has just advanced these most extraordinary ideas is essentially an anarchist; I think probably he would admit that. The fact that he is a philosophical anarchist does not alter the case very much; essentially he does not believe in government. I do not know why he should have any place in the house or why he should bother about participating in public affairs.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I protest, Mr. Chairman. I have just stated that I could see the difference between coercion in selling a bad egg and a good egg.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad the hon. member for Ontario has enough intelligence to admit that degree of compulsion, but I hope he will go a little further than that. Essentially he thinks that coercion is not compatible with any degree of cooperation. I cannot think that we should quite admit that. As a matter of fact all government is based more or less upon coercion. Sometimes the coercion takes the form of physical coercion, military coercion and so on; I suppose we must admit that. Some of us would like to see governments based upon some other principle, but in the past governments have been largely founded upon a large measure of coercion and, as my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) suggests, they have been sustained by coercion. I cannot think that if they consider this matter carefully most of the members of this house could subscribe to the anarchical expressions which have just fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Ontario. Whether or not we use physical coercion we do make use of some measure of coercion in almost every department of government.

Mr. ERNST: I believe it was proposed in The Definite National Purpose; we were to have compulsory retirement of individuals and dividends at sixty-five.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I believe so. Starting with the lowest unit in our government, that is the municipal government, we find coercion. We provide such ordinary municipal services as water works, sewers, fire protection, schools, police protection and so on. These all involve coercion because all the citizens of the town must pay taxes to secure these services and must do that whether they like it or not. In our ordinary municipal affairs there is no possibility of voting ourselves out of the community. I think I gave an illustration when this matter was under discussion on the second reading. I recall very well when it was proposed to establish a water works in my own city. A great many of the citizens did not like the idea because they had pumps in their back yards, but on the whole it was decided to introduce a water works system. We brought water from Shoal lake, a hundred miles away, which involved the expenditure of a large sum of money, and this meant that the ordinary citizen had to close up his pump and participate in the new scheme, for which he had to pay. That was a measure of coercion.

Someone else mentioned public schools, and undoubtedly we have compulsory education. It may be all very well to say that parents ought to be allowed to educate or not educate their children as they see fit, but we compel people to have their people educated. At the time Ryerson introduced the public school system in Ontario a great many people spoke precisely as the hon. member for Ontario has spoken this afternoon. They said it would be a horrible thing if bachelors and others should be forced to pay for the education of the children of other people, but we have gone ahead and forced bachelors and others to pay taxes to support the educational system. The same thing applies in connection with public health. If one of my family is taken ill with an infectious disease my house is quarantined immediately, though it is my private property. The public health officer comes and tells me what I have to do with my sick child. He may come along later and tell me that I must burn the bedding; it is my bedding, but I have to burn it and I must disinfect the house in a certain way. There is coercion all along the line with regard to health services.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is not coercion; it is education.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But if I do not obey I am haled before the courts.

Mr. DUPUIS: You are likely to do it anyway.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, you have to do it; that is all coercion.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is within liberty.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, these other things are within liberty. We do not consider that we have curtailed liberty when we are all more or less compelled by our municipal regulations to do or not to do certain things. The same is true of our provincial affairs. I can recall, as a child, passing along roads which had been constructed, largely, by new settlers. When we had passed along a certain distance we had to stop at a toll gate and pay a toll. In fact, in the present provincial election campaign we are being reminded of that old practice; they are resurrecting the idea of the toll gate, but in a new sense. In those days because individuals had done service in building roads, they were allowed to charge tolls. To-day the provinces undertake to build roads over which anyone may travel, but we have to pay the taxes, and in that way we are forced to participate in the building of the roads. The same applies to other provincial services. The same is true in respect of matters which come under the jurisdiction of this house. We have built railroads across this country, and I think no one knows that any better than the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). Who could stay out of schemes for railroad construction? The railways were given charters and enormous grants, and to-day the public is being forced to pay the interest on the enormous loans and grants then made. It is a question of coercion.

We give certain privileges in the form of tariffs—and again the hon. member for Ontario surely must recognize that no one can stay out of the tariff arrangements of this country. Whether we like it or not, private business must conform to the tariff policies laid down by the government in power. Again it is a question of coercion. As someone beside me suggests, we have to pay tariffs on our automobiles, and so on. We cannot get away from the system. The same is true in our elaborate system of public works of all kinds; everywhere there is more or less coercion. And when we come to war, we know that as individuals in the last war we were not allowed to say whether or not we would stay out of the war. The whole country was dragged into it, and that without even reference to parliament. In addition, individuals were not allowed to have their own lives exempted, because compulsory conscription was brought into operation. There was conscription, which undoubtedly meant coercion.

I believe we must recognize that throughout the length and breadth of our affairs we are more or less under coercive measures. It is quite true that certain minority rights are granted. In that way it is sought to protect the rights of minorities who do not agree, to the full extent, with what is being done. But, in a general way, and in regard to most matters, we are all forced to fall into line.

Now, what is the situation in which producers find themselves to-day? I go out to British Columbia and I find that in that province there are fruit growers who desire to make a living, who have invested their capital in properties and who through a number of years have planted trees and put work on them. Now they find they have a crop to market, but they also find that the market is so arranged that they cannot possibly sell their individual crops without having some sort of cooperative scheme. They have tried voluntary cooperation, but because of certain individuals who are anti-social in their outlook they have been prevented from carrying out their scheme of cooperation. Is it strange that they should come to parliament requesting that it be made possible for the majority to obtain their will? The fact is that the majority of citizens out there feel that they cannot carry on without some sort of coercive measures. It is merely an extension into a new sphere of the ordinary governmental arrangements which we now have.

I come to the wheat growers of the prairie provinces. We talk about the liberty of the individual. Let us consider the farmer who takes his grain to one of the great series of elevators extending across the prairies. He may be a thousand miles from Fort William, and four or five thousand miles from Liverpool. He cannot put his grain on his wagon, as he used to do, and drive to the local market. That is a situation which passed thirty or forty years ago. He has to take his load to the elevator and leave it there, taking whatever price he can get. If the elevator man does not want to take it in, the farmer takes it home, and that is all there is to it.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. VALLANCE: No, he does not. The elevator man must take it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The farmer must take it away.

Mr. VALLANCE: He must take it to the elevator, if it is in storable condition.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He can take it to the elevator; the only other possible procedure open to him is to take it back home.

Mr. VALLANCE: He must take it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What possible freedom is there—

Mr. VALLANCE: The elevator man must take it if it is in storable condition.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not saying the elevator must take it.

Mr. VALLANCE: But I am saying so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am afraid my statement has been entirely misunderstood. My statement is that the individual farmer is helpless. He takes his grain to the elevator, and if there is room the elevator man will take it. But if the farmer is not satisfied with the price offered, or with any other condition, the only possible procedure open to him is to turn around and take his grain home again.

Mr. VALLANCE: Will this bill change it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, this will change it.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like you to show me where it will do so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For the moment I am speaking about individual freedom now possessed. Anyone who knows the history of farming in the west—and the hon. member who has just spoken must know it—knows perfectly well how they have been trying through cooperative efforts to improve their situation. They have realized how difficult—impossible, in fact—it was for them to act as individuals, and to get what was coming to them: hence the formation of cooperatives. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that years ago a very large number of farmers in the prairie provinces realized it was impossible to carry out a purely voluntary scheme, and advocated a hundred per cent wheat pool. For the moment I am not discussing whether or not this bill is all that it should be, but I do say that the principle of coercion is one to which we are accustomed in other spheres.

Let me take, for example, the cattle business. I live in the city of Winnipeg and know some of the farmers in that district. They have told me about driving cattle to Winnipeg, or shipping them by truck or railway, and receiving only $5 or $10 for an animal which had cost $15 or $20 to raise. Under the circumstances what could they do other than accept the price offered by the cattle buyers? It is quite true that if they had driven the beast in they could have driven it home again, but their expenses would have been too high. Under present conditions the producer is almost helpless. A buyer came to see me last year and told me that he had attempted to secure poultry to ship to the British market. After receiving an order he made an effort to obtain a carload of poultry. He travelled from place to place, from farm to farm, finally from Winnipeg to Saskatoon, and after going through some rather shady transactions and splitting his order into three or four parts he managed to obtain a carload of poultry to send to the British market. Those were his difficulties, so strong was the monopoly, and so impossible was it for him to break the monopoly which existed at that time.

I do not think we need discuss the question of tobacco, which has been reviewed before the price spreads committee. I should like to know in view of the situation which has been found to exist in Ontario what possible freedom of action is possessed by the individual grower. The fact is that we are living under a set of conditions that make remarks such as those made by the hon. member for Ontario absolutely ridiculous, more than ridiculous, because he is talking of conditions that existed fifty years ago. His remarks do not apply to conditions as they exist to-day.

The same is true with regard to his suggestion about a man having a right to his own private property. I have said in this house before, and I should like to repeat, that it seems to me the time has come when we shall have to redefine what private property is. I take it from its derivation that private property should mean those things which I can use and enjoy for myself. It has to do essentially with personal matters. But the lawyers have stretched its meaning. They have created an artificial body which they have called a corporation, and they have endowed that corporation with nearly all the attributes of an individual. They have said that the corporation can hold private property. It is an altogether unwarrantable extension of the term, and so we have these great corporations and trusts to-day holding what they call "private property." The result is that it is an absolute impossibility for me to have any effective control over my private property in the face of the strength which these big corporations exercise in the economic sphere.

We who have been accustomed to the straits in which the labour people find themselves have had this borne in upon us over and over again. In the old days a man had the opportunity to work with his own hands and sell the product of his labour, but unfortunately very few people have that opportunity to-day, for the vast number of people are working under the wages system. They are employees of someone else. They have not the right to sell the product of their own hands. The best they can do is to receive a wage, and somebody else takes the product off their hands and sells it for them, but actual producers having no voice in its sale and really having no right to say how much of what has been produced shall be kept by themselves. That is the situation that exists, and under these circumstances this idea that we are losing something of our private initiative and sacrificing our private property is all nonsense.

The same is true of free trade. It was all very well a hundred years ago to have free trade when the indivdual was producing with his own equipment and in free competition with other individuals, but we know perfectly well to-day that we no longer produce as individuals. We produce in what is essentially forced cooperation in a great factory. I say forced cooperation because in order to earn a living a man must go into the factory where there may be one thousand or ten thousand employees all working together, cooperating if you like, but it is forced cooperation under the lash of economic necessity. Well, under those circumstances it is futile to talk about competition in the old sense or about free trade in the old sense. At best it is free competition only between big industries and free trade only between huge corporations. Superimposed upon that we must remember that we have arrangements existing with regard to prices, tariffs, gentlemen's agreements, and what not. Free trade under those circumstances becomes an almost meaningless term.

Competition is the life of trade—that is what we used to be taught and we wrote it in our copy books, if I remember right, but to-day Mr. Beatty of the Canadian Pacific Railway comes along and tells us that there must be some sort of unification of administration of our railroads, that competition means waste, and I think Mr. Beatty is right, that ultimately competition does mean waste. It is a question in each particular case to decide if it is worth while to adopt a system that does mean waste. But when we have reduced our competition between the railways to competition between two systems only, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, and Mr. Beatty, a recognized authority, comes along and tells us that even that measure of competition is wrong and that we should have unification in order to eliminate waste and promote efficiency, then I say we may well ask whether we shall not have to reconstruct our ideas and bring our policies up to modern ways of conducting business.

The member for Ontario, as I said earlier, is essentially an anarchist in his thinking. He does not believe in the reign of law. He holds up the horrors of socialism. But what is socialism after all? It is simply the doctrine that the interests of society should be given precedence over the interests of predatory individuals. That is all. Surely we have reached that stage when the interests of the community at large or the interests of very large sections of the community ought to have the right of way over the selfish interests of comparatively small groups.

Mr. DUPUIS: Another camouflage for democracy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Somebody suggests that that is incompatible with democracy.

Mr. DUPUIS: I said that it is another camouflage for democracy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I take it that democracy, according to its root meaning, means the rule of the people. We have had a certain amount of the rule of the people when it comes to what we have termed purely political matters, freedom of speech, the right to vote, and so on, and I give all credit to the historic Liberal party for having won us a certain amount of constitutional freedom along that line. But there are other lines along which we have not yet attained democracy, the rule of the people. You go into any industry to-day, and industry managed by a great corporation, under a manager who is all-powerful, and will you tell me that there is any rule of the people in that industry? The rule of the people would mean that the employees are given some rights in that industry, that they have something to say about hours of labour, the wages they are paid, the profits gained, and have some share in the division of profits. That would be the rule of the people within that industry. But industry has remained outside of democracy. Industry to-day is an autocracy, and industry is suffering to-day because it is an autocracy. It seems to me that in some way we shall have to introduce principles of democracy into industry.

The same thing is true of our commerce. This committee on price spreads is simply revealing in a public way what a good many of us knew before existed, that we had autocracy in our commerce, and that under the present conditions people were suffering. I do not think we can go back to the old idea that each tobacco producer, we will say, can himself see that his goods reach the final consumer. I think that is an impossibility. Under these circumstances we have to arrange that the producers have some sort of protection, some sort of help in arranging their cooperative enterprises so as to gain the full results of their production and through the cutting out of the middle man be enabled to participate in the marketing of their products.

Mr. HANBURY: What are you going to do with the middle men?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Put them in the Senate, where some of them are.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As middle men I hope they will be eliminated.

Mr. HANBURY: Are you going to have producers only?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. I would say that undoubtedly there is a function to be performed by the man who stands between the producer and the consumer. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the splendid work that has been done by the cooperative societies in Great Britain. They have recognized the necessity of cooperation over there, and they have employed managers to carry on their business in an efficient way. They have themselves engaged in production, setting decent minimum standards of living for those engaged in production. It is quite possible that they may show us the way to carry this out.

I am criticizing this bill because it does not safeguard the interests of the consumers. Theoretically I might approach this whole problem from the standpoint of the consumer rather than of the producer but I must deal with matters as they now stand. The producers are in a very bad way and I think we are doing the logical thing by safeguarding their interests. It may be that ultimately we will have to approach this problem from the standpoint of the consumer rather than of the producer but in the meanwhile we are providing for certain minimum standards which the producer cannot obtain without some help from the state.

When I was interrupted a few minutes ago I was about to say that it seems to me that in the realm of finance we are still under an autocracy. I do not know of any better confirmation of this fact than the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) a few weeks ago when the central bank bill was under discussion. He said that if there was a difference of opinion or of policy between the government and the new central bank, the opinion and policy of the central bank would prevail over that of the Minister of Finance and the govenment. As I tried to point out at the time, that simply means that we are legalizing the autocracy which exists in the financial world. I take it that in the financial as well as the commercial world we shall have to introduce principles of real democracy. I think some of the principles which I have been trying to advocate show that I believe in democracy far more than the Liberals; that I believe in freedom far more than the Liberals, and I would urge upon them that the principles of Liberalism, the principles of freedom and the principles of democracy have to be worked out under twentieth century conditions and not under nineteenth century conditions. I give credit to the Conservatives that in this bill they are attempting to do more than the Liberals have done.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up much of the time of the committee as I realize it costs $41 per minute to conduct the business of parliament, it is not my intention to take up very much time now. I have listened to the pros and cons of this discussion; I have listened to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore), but much as I would like to agree with him, I cannot. I realize the appalling situation facing agriculture in western Canada and I am prepared to support this bill if it will assist agriculture out of the morass and mess in which it is at the present time.

A lot has been said about cooperation. At one time I opposed cooperation more than any other hon. member, but later on I became converted. I mean cooperation without exploitation. It is not cooperation when a man exploits the public by getting a good position and obtaining his pound of flesh. I want the same kind of cooperation that we had in Glasgow. When the cooperative system was first proposed there, I opposed it most strongly. I refused to sell my cattle to the cooperative but finally I found myself trading with them and I discovered it to be a really good system. The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) knows the success which has been made with that system in Glasgow and I am sure he is familiar with the stores scattered all over the city.

Mr. VALLANCE: But it is a voluntary system.

Mr. MULLINS: It is true cooperation. After I was defeated in 1926 I went to California. At that time I heard a great evangelist over the radio and this is what he said: Labour, you have a perfect right to be organized as long as the men at the head of your organization are not leading you to some place politically in order that they may obtain fat positions. Farmers, you have a perfect right to be organized, he said: I am one of you, but I think we are the biggest fools that ever went into organization. I had ten acres of walnuts near Los Angeles and every year my wife and I shook hands when we received $1,600 yearly for our walnuts. But a young man came around one day and wanted me to join a cooperative organization and since that time my wife and I have not shaken hands. I am now getting $400 per year for my walnuts while this young man draws $30,000 per year and he does not know walnuts from hickory nuts.

The same thing is what was wrong with western Canada. You had your Mr. Crerar, a gentleman who occupied a seat in this house. His company organized the farmers in the cattle business, but what was the result? The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) can tell the committee.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, I can.

Mr. MULLINS: You can tell the results when you get up to speak. What was the result of organizing the farmers in the cattle business? They engaged incompetent men and could not carry on the marketing of their products. I am going to support the minister although I will admit that at first I was afraid of this bill. I did not like cooperation in Scotland when they brought it out, but I was converted. We are living in changed times. Last Sunday morning I listened to the minister of Yorkminster church in the city of Toronto. He said that in his time there would be no poverty, the change would come about by evolution and revolution. I spoke to him about using the word "revolution" but he said: I did not mean brickbats and rifles, I meant a revolution of the heart. Things to-day are not the same as they were in the old days of fifty years ago, conditions have changed.

I can remember when I used to go into the field and ask a farmer what he wanted for his cattle. He wanted so much, I would make a bid and we arrived at a bargain. But some men have gone through the country to get the farmers to ship their products to the packer and let the packer set the price. The initiative has been taken away from the farmer. He now loads his cattle into a truck and they go to the packer's yard and the packer does the weighing, the grading and sets the price. All hon. members need to do is read the evidence given in the Stevens committee. I think the old system was the best. I admit that I liked it but I realize also that times have changed. While I am getting grey I think I have the right to measure up the situation as it is facing us to-day.

They say this is the young man's age, but I think the old days were the best. In the old days we had our pipes and were not spending $50,000,000 every year on cigarettes. We were not blowing up $50,000,000 a year in smoke. I think of the old family doctor and then I think of the specialist we have to-day who reaches into your pocket book and takes your last dollar before he operates on you. I think of the old storekeeper in my constituency of Marquette, which I am proud to represent, a purely agricultural constituency, not a single manufacture in it. I think of the little towns, smaller to-day than they were forty years ago, withering up through the new systems of buying and marketing. Those systems were wrong but I believe the system proposed will help the farmer particularly along two lines, and I want to mention them. Does the committee realize what is meant by the provision in the bill for the regulation of importation of products? I have not heard a word about this from the other side of the house. Why do hon. members opposite not speak of the way in which this measure will regulate the importation of products?

Do hon. members know that Canada is importing equal to 17,000 head of cattle from the Argentine? Do they know that there are being brought in all the old, decrepit cattle, all the rubbish of the Argentine ranges, in the way of canned meats that can be found on the shelves in our retail stores? I say: Heaven help the mothers of to-day who become can openers. I wonder whether in the ladies' college, when they were giving them their degree in domestic science, they presented them with gold-headed can openers. I think of the old times when our mothers knew how to cook a roast of beef. I have in my hand a can of meat; I took the label off it; I did not intend to bring it into the house but I may say that I bought it in Ottawa. It represents part of the product of many thousands of cattle in the Argentine. I ask those who have used this canned meat: Do you know what it is composed of? It is made of the worst class of animals on the range. I dare not mention on the floor of the house some of the animals that are inside these cans of meat, yet some mothers will open them and use the contents. I would like to go further along this line but I say to the minister that if he will put into effect that part of the bill providing for the regulation of the importation of those meats and also vegetable oils that are coming into Canada millions will be saved to the farmers of the dominion as a result.

We are bringing in cottonseed oil, with the odour taken out of it by the Wesson process, letting it go into our packing plants and be sold to the people to replace lard. Every time you eat fried potatoes, just think you are eating cottonseed oil, the product of the southern states, deodorized by a system called the Wesson system. I have before me a list of the other products that are being imported and it is appalling.

I am in favour of real cooperation and I wonder why my hon. friends opposite are opposing it. They are trying to get political cooperation in the constituency of Marquette; they want the Liberals and Progressives to cooperate. Then why are they opposing this bill? I have before me the report of a meeting in my principal town, Minnedosa, and it says "Cooperation between the Progressives and the Liberals." I would say to my hon. friends opposite in an advisory way: Go out as good, honest Liberals and contest the seat. If my right hon. friend gets those Progressive Liberals tacked on to him and he comes into power at the next election, he has my sympathy; I will come here and sympathize with him because when he spoke at Kentville, Nova Scotia, at Moose Jaw, Calgary and all over western Canada, he did not want those people tacked on to him and yet in Minnedosa my hon. friends opposite want cooperation. I may say that I cut this clipping out of the Free Press yesterday. A gentleman by the name of Linden outlines the Liberal policy at Minnedosa, but I find my friend Mr. J. Allison Glenn, who used to occupy the seat before me, he is with him and says that there should be cooperation as Liberal Progressives. That is the cooperation they are trying to put into effect in Marquette.

If this bill will go toward aiding agriculture I am willing to give it a trial. Why do my hon. friends opposite not do the same thing? If they knew the true situation on the prairies, of the struggling masses engaged in agriculture in the west, as I do, I am sure they would support legislation which is intended to help to bring back normal conditions in the west.

There are many evils we can remedy. I am opposed to the excessively high rates of interest that are being charged by the various corporations in the big cities who have exploited the poor farmer and kept him down. They have had their pound of flesh but today there is danger in sight for them. They are not going to get the same rates of interest as they charged before. Having said that much, I am not going to take up any more of the time of the committee as I do realize the amount of money that it costs to keep this house in session. I appeal to my Liberal friends—and I have many of them on the other side whom I respect very much—that they give some opportunity to the struggling masses. Never mind whether it comes from the far southeast corner of the house or not; it does not make any difference who is supporting it. At first, when I found that the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was supporting this legislation, I was afraid there was something wrong with it, because he and I have been fighting political battles for the last forty years. I would like to take his hand and let us walk in together and say that we meet on common ground. I ask my hon. friends to give this bill a trial in the interests of the struggling masses of the west as stated.

Mr. DUPUIS: Before the hon. member for Marquette takes his seat, would he be kind enough to give us a list of the products imported from the Argentine and to inform us whether since the present government took office they are being imported under the present high tariff?

Mr. MULLINS: No, they have been coming in for many years. I took this question up in 1925 when my hon. friends opposite were in power. They were bringing this commodity in then to an even greater extent than they are now. I want this stopped in the interests of the farmer, tariff or no tariff. Why should we be accepting such low prices for our cattle on account of the importations of such rubbish as this? This is put up by the Bovril people. First, the Bovril is taken out of it and then the pulp put in cans for the people of Canada to eat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) spoke at some length of the necessity of compulsion and coercion in all matters of government. May I say that I agree with him that where you have government intervention you must have behind it the power to compel obedience, but in justifying intervention, and the compulsion by which it is enforced, everything depends upon the purpose to be served by compulsion, in other words the purpose of the intervention. The hon. member has cited a number of instances which, he says, illustrate what he has in mind. He has spoken of the community in which he lives, in which a waterworks system was installed. He says that the people did not like to part with their water pumps, but they had to fall in line and share in the general waterworks plan. He has spoken about education and he said that when the compulsory school education system was introduced, a number of people did not like to send their children to school but that they had to fall in line and were subject to compulsion. With those illustrations he was on perfectly sound ground, but he forgot the reason why. He himself was in those circumstances supporting compulsion. The reason was that he was making the test the good of the community, the general good. He was requiring all classes or individuals to be subject to what was conceded to be for the good of the general community. If he and I are in agreement to that extent, I think probably I can now make clear wherein I differ from him. I personally am in favour of government regulation and government control, enforced by coercion and compulsion if you wish, where it is to assert the good of the community over the good of a class, to maintain the general interest as superior to any particular interest. That is sound ground and that is the basis, where state intervention and control has been regarded as necessary, on which the Liberal party has supported compulsion and coercion in matters of government. But what is desired here in the case of this marketing legislation as proposed is the very opposite of that. What is desired here is to assert the interest of a class, and make that interest superior to the interest of the community, to make the general interest subordinate to a particular interest. May I ask the minister this question, it will illustrate

I think what we on this side who are opposing this feature of the measure have in mind. What is the basis of all representation in this parliament? It is the basis of representation by population. The representation in this House of Commons is based upon population, the entire population in given communities. It is in virtue of that fact that we are given the right to legislate for the people as a whole. But the basis of representation with regard to what is proposed by way of regulation, in other words legislation, in this bill, is not representation by population, it is representation by occupation. That fact brings out the difference. Only those who belong to a particular occupation, in one instance one class of producers, and in another instance another class of producers, are the ones who are to draw up the so-called scheme that is to govern or control. They are the ones to determine what the scheme is to be. The scheme sets forth the regulations, and these regulations, if approved, not by parliament, but by the board or minister or governor in council, bind the whole community; also the governor in council may formulate a scheme of his own. That is where I take exception to this legislation. It does not take account of the community as a whole, nor of parliament. It takes account exclusively of the interest of one class in the community and makes that class interest superior to the interest of the community as a whole, without parliament having an opportunity either to approve or disapprove.

Another doctrine that is essential if regard is to be had to our political institutions is that of ministerial responsibility. Our whole system of government is based upon the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. But here is legislation that proposes to divorce the government all but completely from responsibility. Under its provisions, the government says, we will not make the regulations, we are not the body that is going to determine what is to be the law of this country, either in virtue of authority to make regulations under a general statute, or by enactment on our recommendation by the House of Commons itself. We are going to leave it to different special interests to make different sets of laws to suit their own special purposes. That is a vastly different thing in the way of procedure in matters of legislation from anything we have had in the House of Commons before. Reference has been made by the government to other bills that have been introduced. For example, I think the minister himself cited the honey bill passed at this session. It is entitled an act respecting fruit and honey. He said, this House of Commons passed that act, why should it not pass this? There is a great difference between the two measures. I have in my hand the act respecting fruit and honey, and what do I find? The regulations are all made by the minister who is a minister of the crown and whose responsibility is shared by all of his colleagues in the government, and the offences are all specifically set out in the act itself. One has only to look at the act in order to discover what the offences are. But with regard to offences to be created under this act, we do not know what they are. When this parliament prorogues we shall not know, no one will know what a week or a month hence may be an offence under the act. No one will know until one of these class groups, these occupational groups has been formed and drafted what, to serve its particular purpose, is to be in the nature of an offence. That is one great difference between any measure this parliament has previously enacted and the provisions of the measure which we are now being asked to enact.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he know the regulations that are going to be passed under the Fruit and Honey Act and the offences created thereunder?

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate,

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

An Act to incorporate The Bishop of the Arctic of the Church of England in Canada.

An Act to amend the Income War Tax Act (Special Tax).

An Act to provide for the deduction from compensation in the Public Service.

An Act to amend the Oaths of Allegiance Act.

An Act respecting The Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company.

An Act respecting Fruit and Honey.

An Act for the relief of Archibald Bruce Elliott Smart.
An Act for the relief of Lilac Violet Grumbell Reid.
An Act for the relief of Lily Archer Watson.
An Act for the relief of Annie Isabel Tinning Meldrum.
An Act for the relief of Lois Theresa Malcolm.
An Act for the relief of Helen Isabelle Smith Maybee.
An Act for the relief of Sybil Eileen Dyson Richardson.
An Act for the relief of Lucy Doris Cannon.
An Act for the relief of Bertha Alice Maude Maher Burke.
An Act for the relief of William James Thistle.
An Act to incorporate Thousand Islands Bridge Company.
An Act to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.
An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1935.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, the minister asked me a question at the time of adjournment; I think it was as to whether I could say, with respect to the act concerning fruit and honey, what regulations would be made under the measure and what offences were created thereunder. I have a copy of the bill under my hand, and I find that under the heading "Regulations" section 3 states:

The minister may, from time to time, make regulations—

Then follow paragraphs (a) (b) (c) and so on down to (1), each paragraph setting forth particular matters in connection with which the minister may make regulations, and setting them forth in a manner which makes clear to all hon. members and to the country what it is that is going to be regulated, how it is to be regulated and the extent to which it may be regulated. In some of these regulations there are specific limitations; for example in paragraph (a) I see:

—no such provision shall permit more than ten per cent of any lot of fruit to be under grade requirements;

That is informing parliament, which represents all classes in the community and the community itself as to the extent to which regulation may go, and the form and manner in which regulations are to be framed and carried out. But there is nothing of that kind in the proposed legislation now before us. This bill provides that some group of producers at present unknown, may prepare a scheme also of a nature at present unknown. It provides that such scheme may set forth what they propose, and wish to do or to have done, also what they propose or wish shall not be done. If that scheme is approved, then it binds the entire community and those who do not accept the regulations as set forth and which have been designated as such by the producers themselves become guilty of offences and are liable to fine and imprisonment. That is a very different thing from anything we have hitherto had.

Then I turn to the bill respecting fruit and honey in order to answer the minister's question as to whether I know what are offences under that act. I find that the bill goes farther than any other bill so far introduced in this house has gone. But on turning to the clause dealing with offences, I find its provisions in this particular are very specific. It states that no person shall do so and so and so and so, and then it sets forth in sixteen clauses the nature of offences. The offences are all specified, and this House of Commons is in a position to know, and the public is in a position to know, what is to be termed an offence. But under the legislation which we are asked to accept this house is to fix a penalty to be attached to some offence which has yet to be defined.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In this bill are not the regulations also controlled in the same general way, because they will have to be made in conformity with the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, they are not controlled in the same way, and that, as a matter of fact, constitutes one of my main objections to it. I would not take exception to what the government is seeking to do with respect to the regulating of marketing, as indicated in this measure, were they to proceed along the lines followed in the fruit and honey bill, and similar legislation, and hold to the obligation of ministerial responsibility whereby the minister himself or the cabinet would make regulations in conformity with certain general principles or rules, which regulations would have been the subject of discussion and approval by this House of Commons and be known and applicable from the Atlantic to the Pacific, regulations which would apply alike in all parts of Canada. The effect of the proposed legislation is to bring about a condition whereby in one part of the country a given set of circumstances may create an offence, while, in another part an identical set of circumstances will not necessarily create an offence at all. Regulations under this legislation may originate in many different parts of the country, and be wholly unrelated one to the other. I am of the opinion that the law of the land ought to be generally known, and no man should be put into jeopardy with respect either to his person or his property except under the law of the land. Under the legislation now before us who can say what the law of the land is, or is to be?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The house does not know now. The regulations under the fruit and honey bill never come before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes they do. The house has distinctly set out the nature of the regulations, and certain limitations within which alone the minister may make regulations, the minister being a member of the cabinet, and the cabinet being responsible to the house. I admit that to a certain extent parliament delegates its responsibilities but it is delegating them within certain clearly defined limits, and only to a minister responsible to the house.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This bill is the same in that respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, this bill goes much farther than that. It goes beyond the House of Commons and beyond the minister to any local groups of producers who may draw up a scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would draw the attention of my right hon. friend—although I do not like to interrupt him—to section 13 of the bill which states:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary for the efficient enforcement and operation of this act and for carrying out the provisions thereof according to their true intent and meaning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite true, the governor in council may do that. But I would draw the minister's attention to section 5: which in addition to what the governor in council may do says:

> (1) A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.
>
> (2) The petition shall be filed with the minister and if he considers that the persons engaged in the production or marketing of the natural product are sufficiently represented by the petitioners, the scheme shall be referred to the board with a request for a report on the expediency thereof.
>
> (3) Upon receipt of a report from the board recommending the approval of the scheme as submitted or as amended by the board, the minister may recommend the approval thereof, and the governor in council may thereupon approve the said scheme and fix the date when the same shall be effective.

Then it goes on to further details.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme will operate within the regulations set out by the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but there is no knowledge in advance, so far as the members of any community are concerned, as to the basis on which regulations are to be made, it is all left in indefinite terms to a scheme which is still to be drafted.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was answering the right hon. gentleman on the point, namely, that in one instance it was subject to a responsible minister of the cabinet, and in the other it was not. In that connection I maintain they are both alike.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit there is a great difference between parliament outlining the various conditions under which regulations may be made, setting forth specifically the offences to which penalties are to be attached, and presenting them to the public so that the conditions are known from one end of the country to the other, requiring that regulations made shall apply generally to the entire country, and that after a regulation is made it shall be published in the Canada Gazette and be submitted subsequently to parliament for further consideration if desired,—I say there is a great difference between that procedure and this proposal to legislate on a basis of schemes which, instead of leaving either the initiative or the final say with parliament, leave it in the hands of particular occupational groups to draft legislation which when approved will affect and bind the entire community. May I point out, further, that in the initiating of legislation the measure as drafted takes account only of one particular class in the community.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre used an expression of which I took a note at the time, because I thought it was significant. He said, "The fruit growers represent a majority of the citizens, and they feel that they cannot carry on." If the fruit growers were in any province a majority of the citizens, the hon. member would be more nearly right, but the fact is this, that the majority of the citizens, under the proposed legislation, have not necessarily any say whatever as to what the regulations are to be which the fruit growers are to make. The fruit growers may be far from being a majority of the citizens. They may be a very small minority, but the majority of the citizens are to be bound by the regulations that are drafted by this minority and subsequently approved by the minister. That is not the rule of the people as the hon. member expressed it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I meant by the majority of the citizens in a community. May I ask, have we not for many years in this parliament passed legislation such as the Bank Act giving very considerable powers to the bankers' association? And surely the bankers are only one section of the community. We have also given the board of railway commissioners very wide discretionary powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any law passed by this parliament that is uniform and national in its scope, specifically setting out the limitations within which particular powers are to be exercised, is something that can be defended. But this is different. It is not a national law that is being proposed under this enactment; it is not a law that is representative of the community as a whole. It is a law that is initiated and brought into being by and for those belonging to one particular occupation, one particular class of the community, and this parliament is being asked to approve in advance, and in ignorance of which its terms may be, of that law becoming binding on the community as a whole.

Mr. NEILL: Or approved by the minister alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Or by the minister alone, yes. It seems to me that you have two tendencies at work in this legislation, each of which is contrary to that underlying our system of government. You have, on the one hand, the tendency which is illustrated by Russia where the soviets make their laws, not on the basis of what is in the interests of the people as a whole, but in the interests of particular occupational groups. The occupational groups determine what is to be the law with respect to matters affecting themselves, and others are made subject to the provisions of these particular laws.

The other tendency is the tendency we see in certain countries in Europe to-day, in Italy, Austria and Germany, where you have fascism; in other words, a leader taking it into his power to make whatever law he pleases and by virtue of his authority the law made binding on the rest of the community without the approval of any representative body which speaks for the community as a whole. That is the exception I take to this legislation as it has been prepared. It is not to many provisions of the bill, not to provisions that might be drafted for the purpose of regulating marketing in a way that would assist the interests of the farmers.

Hon. gentlemen say that times are changed, that the old order is yielding place to new, and that we must change conditions. That is all perfectly true, but what we have to decide is this: What is it that we want to change? Do we want to change what is basic and fundamental in our political institutions, or do we want to change economic conditions? That is the important question to ask. Do we want to change the political system of government under which British communities are accustomed to make their laws, and substitute for it something that resembles what they have in Russia, or Austria or Italy or Germany? Or do we wish to hold to British parliamentary institutions, and whatever laws we find it necessary to make, make them at least in accordance with the practice and procedure of those institutions?

Let me illustrate concretely with respect to one clause of this proposed enactment. Under British parliamentary institutions we have always held that the House of Commons had responsibility for the control of expenditures, that the House of Commons ought to control the public purse. The method of control that has been adopted has been that of obliging parliament to appropriate moneys for particular purposes. We have had that necessity discussed over and over again in this house, the necessity of parliament controlling expenditures. We on this side have taken exception to the government's course with respect to relief measures where, on the score that there was a period of distress, the government asked for a free hand. But that was claimed by the government to be in the nature of an exception required by an existing emergency.

Here we have exactly the same thing proposed again, that the governor in council shall have the right to take out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada the moneys that are necessary for the purposes of this act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I ask a question? In the case of the Montreal harbour bridge was that $19,000,000, or whatever the ultimate cost was, voted by the sanction of parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer my hon. friend by saying that his side of the house have ever since been condemning what happened at Montreal. That is one of the reasons I would give him why an example of that kind, if it exists, should not be followed. The fact that one thing is wrong and obviously wrong, surely does not justify the government that is condemning that very thing from going ahead with the very same kind of procedure.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was just asking for information. I was endeavouring to follow the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, the minister was not asking for information. He knew exactly what was in his mind in regard to that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No. May I make myself clear? I was endeavouring to follow very closely the statement being made by the right hon. gentleman, and I thought I had not understood him in what he said because the Montreal harbour bridge seemed to be an exception. I wanted to have the point cleared, but it is clear now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point that I am seeking to make is clear, namely that there is no necessity from the point of view of serving the farmers of this country, why any legislation should be introduced into this House of Commons which involves taking away from parliament control over the expenditure which is necessary for putting that legislation into force; and when that step is taken it simply means that instead of trying to do something that is going to improve economic conditions we are taking a step which is threatening the very foundations of our parliamentary system; and to the extent to which that step is taken, we are undermining the security of farmers and everyone else.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have no desire to discuss this matter any further. I think the points to which we take exception have been made sufficiently clear; I do think, however that it is important that members should understand whither we are tending in legislation of this kind. Is it necessary, I ask again, to go the length of seeking to remove from the control of parliament altogether control over the expenditure of public moneys and to do away with our system of responsible government in order to meet certain economic conditions in the country at this time?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have we control over those economic conditions as it is now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we cannot control them without torpedoing our parliamentary institutions it seems to me that is pretty good evidence that things have got beyond everybody's ken and capacity to deal with. My point is this, that we can deal with these questions effectively in this parliament by following British parliamentry procedure, and not departing from it, and the moment there has to be a departure from that procedure there is an onus on whoever wishes so to depart to justify bringing about a political revolution in this country, because that is what it all amounts to. I do not take exception to my hon. friend's attitude. He wants a political revolution, and he avowedly says so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not say it. I have never said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not necessary to explain why not, but I have not said it.

Mr. McINTOSH: Destruction rather than evolution, that is your principle.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Never. I say I want to bring democracy into industry. I want to bring about a new social order that might ultimately involve very decided changes in our political institutions, but I have gone into that only incidentally. I have always talked of working through our existing institutions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I say political revolution I use the term in the broad sense that my hon. friend understands, not a revolution by violence, but a change in the basis on which we are now proceeding in our organized society.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask does my hon. friend wish a socialist state or does he wish to continue under a system of private enterprise? Is he not advocating every day a socialist state, which is a different state from the one we have at the present time?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am advocating a socialist state, and in the socialist state the interests of the community would be paramount. I believe that in the present state the interests of a small group are paramount.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not continue to argue with my hon. friend over words, but I think he will be the first to admit that the system which he has been advocating of what he terms socialized industry is entirely different from that which is existing in the country at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That has nothing to do with the political system.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The change cannot be brought about except by a change in the political system. That is the point I am making; in order to effect what my hon. friend has in mind, he will have to change it very much.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is my hon. friend's opinion; it is not mine.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is it not possible at the present time to withdraw money from the consolidated revenue fund by governor general's warrant?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All these things which the minister brings up are well known exceptions to the general practice and occasioned only to meet situations which are not supposed to be ordinary, and which cannot possibly be foreseen. A governor general's warrant is to meet a critical situation which may arise and which parliament could not have anticipated, a situation which may come up when parliament is not in session and which the ministry feels, because of the exceptional circumstances, can be justified before the House of Commons when parliament reassembles. According to my hon. friend's remarks, he is trying to do everything by governor general's warrants instead of by appropriations by this parliament. I do not think he could have given a better instance to illustrate what I have in mind. This legislation contemplates proceeding with respect to matters of normal business with the equivalent of governor general's warrants, rather than with appropriations of this parliament, and doing that, not because of provisions of enactments of this parliament but at the instance of groups, the numbers, and places of existence of which, are unknown at the present time. It is these violations of fundamental principles to which we take exception, and not to any desire of the ministry to get a marketing measure through. Everyone on this side is most anxious to have a marketing measure which will be of assistance to the farmers.

An hon. MEMBER: That is news to us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not news. I am sure the farmers do not want anything in the way of legislation which will mean the undermining of the power and control of parliament over the expenditures and taxation of the country. The farmers know only too well that any legislation put through, nominally in their interests, but which carries with it any such power will soon be exerted very much against them as a class in the community. That is the main objection which we have to the measure. We do not object to the purpose of the measure; we object to certain of these clauses which cannot be defended if one is to maintain our present parliamentary system.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid I do not understand the right hon. gentleman. No one is forcing the producers to accept this legislation. If the statement of the right hon. gentleman is correct and the farmers feel that this legislation is not in their interests, they cannot be forced to accept it. There is no insidious motive behind this legislation to help anyone but the producer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certain groups of persons have made requests to the government for marketing legislation, but I think if those individuals were asked if they were getting the legislation they have asked for, they would say they are not. This is a different bill altogether from what was asked for. A group in a certain community may ask for legislation but it does not follow that when that legislation is passed it is going to suit the country as a whole or all the groups of producers throughout the country. The minister has said that no one will be forced to come in, but he himself gave the best answer to this in his reply the other day. He said that should regulations become law and there were producers who were not members of the organization, they could be forced to come in. He used the word "forced" and it appears on Hansard. Is that not so?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If a certain number of producers producing a certain quantity asked to be brought into a compulsory pool, the provincial government would have jurisdiction to that extent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the minister admitted I was right when he answered my question by saying that the minority would be forced in.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Could be forced in if the provincial government so decided.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the scheme were approved.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That can be done at the present time even without this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order to illustrate what I have in mind, I should like to direct attention to one of the amendments being proposed by the ministry. Very strong exception was taken on this side to part II of the bill which left it to a particular group appointed not only to investigate conditions but to determine what was to be an offence. I am glad to notice the government has taken account of the force of the exception taken to these clauses and is proposing to make a material change which, if I understand it aright, will meet what there was in the nature of opposition to that part of the measure. The government is proposing to do away with the word "determine" and substitute the word "report." That means that when an investigation is held a report will be made by the investigators to the minister and to the government. The report will be public, and undoubtedly will be serviceable in helping to make more effective the law with regard to preventing the undue enhancement of prices or the restraint of trade which is unreasonable and unfair. It is changes like these which help to bring this legislation more into line with what we have been contending all along should be the course to be followed. The individual is afforded knowledge of the law in advance and in the matter of prosecutions is surrounded with the protection accorded by the courts to innocent parties.

If a similar change could be made with respect to part I of this legislation, whereby these local organizations might make reports to the ministry of conditions as they exist and the ministry take the responsibility of enacting legislation or passing orders in council which would be generally known and made generally applicable from coast to coast, then so far as I am concerned I would cease to have any opposition to the measure as a measure of an experimental character. But where it is left to an unkown local board to say what is to constitute an offence, while we who are members of parliament are asked to fix in advance the penalty to be attached to unknown offences, then I say we are abandoning altogether the basis upon which all legislation should rest.

What are some of the conditions which should govern in conferring power to legislate? First of all, we have the Representation Act which provides that members to have the right to legislate shall obtain that right provided only that they represent all classes in a particular constituency. There is no such safeguard here with regard to those who are to make regulations. They may be individuals; they may be a small group in a given locality, they may be a fairly comprehensive group, but all that the Representation Act stands for, in the way of representing the community as a whole, is being swept to one side. Then we have the Elections Act which provides for a secret ballot and contains provisions which must be enforced and observed before anyone can be permitted to make the laws of the land. There is nothing here in the nature of a secret ballot. It is provided that a certain group, which may be a powerful group, shall determine what is to be done. The safeguards which the Elections Act throws around the selection of those who are to make the laws are being cast to one side. Finally we have the Franchise Act—the ministry is introducing a new one this session—which provides what individuals are entitled to have their names on the voters' lists. They are to be the ones who are to determine who shall make the laws. There is no such provision here. The laws to be enacted under this measure are to be enacted by a particular group belonging to one special occupation which comes along and draws up a scheme and asks the ministry to approve. If that scheme is approved the whole thing becomes binding, on all in a particular community, but not equally in all parts of the country. As has been said over and over again, the individuals which thus meet to frame the law are only a group representing one class in a given community. While the legislation which they pass may be for their own special interest, it is for their interest as a class, but not with regard to the interest of the community as a whole. I say that no board should be permitted to deal with matters of this kind that has not on it representation of all the classes in the community, particularly the consumers, with respect to anything in which producers are interested; because it is useless to say that you can legislate in the interests of one class without affecting those of other classes as well. We all know the interests of all classes are intertwined and interwoven in a variety of ways.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Just one word in order that we may keep the record straight. Under this bill the local board has not authority of itself to set up regulations apart from approval given and the authority of the governor in council.

Public Archives of Canada

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but they prepare the scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, various schemes for various commodities and various localities.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I have in my hand a communication that was sent by the Canadian Press to the Montreal Gazette of May 14, 1934, headed: Dairy industry has big interest in marketing act.

And so forth. I quote just one paragraph:

The plan under the marketing act would be to make provision, when a butter surplus did develop, to ship this surplus to an outside market, and any loss entailed as compared with local prices would be met out of the funds of the local marketing board. Alongside this would be provided greater facilities for the storing and ageing of Canadian cheese with the idea of making it as profitable to produce cheese as butter.

May I ask the minister whether it is within the scope of this bill that if any loss is incurred by an exporter, moneys will be raised from the producers of butter or cheese throughout the whole dominion to compensate for this loss, or whether this money is to be withdrawn from the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The press statement read is not of course an official one. In answer to the hon. member for Kamouraska, the matter depends entirely on whether the butter, for example, is lifted off the market on the determination of a local board or under section 9. That is, if the butter industry were organized under this bill and they requested in their scheme—and that request was accepted—that if it were felt necessary, due to the condition of the market or the supply in the case of a small surplus, to lift that surplus off the market, those forming the association be permitted to tax themselves to absorb the loss, in that case the payment would be made only on the order of the board itself; that is, any exporter who exported butter and suffered a loss would not be paid. It would also be possible in this way: if under the dominion board or if under section 9 it was decided that action should be taken to lift a small surplus off the market, it would be possible to do that, but in that case, the money would be taken not from the dairy industry but from the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BOUCHARD: So it would be a dumping of our butter on the export market.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No answer.

74726—197½

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No answer is necessary. I did not say that it would be done. I said that it would be possible to do it.

Mr. BOUCHARD: That would be something similar to the Patterson scheme in Australia.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If adopted, yes.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 5.57 p.m.

Thursday, May 17, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury).

PUBLIC ARCHIVES OF CANADA

On the order of motions:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): On the 14th instant the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) inquired whether certain paintings had been purchased by the National Gallery of Canada, and the answer given by my colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), was in the negative.

This inquiry having been brought to my notice, I wish to inform the house that privy council order 1540, dated July 6, 1932, authorized the purchase by the public archives of Canada of two historical portraits of very special interest; the portrait of Lord Durham, painted by Thomas Lawrence, and the portrait of General James Wolfe, painted by Highmore.

I desire, for the information of the house, to lay on the table a copy of the order in council authorizing this purchase and a memorandum by Doctor Doughty, the dominion archivist, with respect to the same.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 83, to amend the criminal code (lotteries).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, this bill has for its object the amendment of section 236 of the criminal code by adding a paragraph to the list of exemptions declaring that it is not a criminal offence under the statute to conduct lotteries when they are organized by the government of a province of Canada for educational or public charitable purposes, under the laws of the legislature of such province.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*BONAVENTURE COUNTY—RESOLUTION

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Prime Minister or any member of the administration received a resolution adopted by the county council of the county of Bonaventure asking that representatives of the dominion government and provincial government of Quebec arrange for a conference with the public representatives of the county during the coming summer, to discuss matters of vital interest to all for the improvement of general conditions of the Gaspe peninsula, such as fishing, lumbering, agriculture, cheaper transportation, better market facilities for our natural products, technical schools, back to the land movement and industry generally?
2. If so, what answer has been given to this resolution?

Mr. BENNETT: I observe that the hon. member for Bonaventure is not in his place, Mr. Speaker, but I may say that these resolutions were received, as were stated by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) a few days go. Their receipt was acknowledged, but obviously no statement can be made with respect to a projected conference that would involve the consent of the provincial authorities first being obtained, and this is not an appropriate time to endeavour to arrange any such conference, as perhaps the hon. gentleman will understand.

LA MALBAIE, QUE.—CARRRIAGE OF MAIL

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the contract for carrying the mail from La Malbaie to Grand Fonds, in the county of Charlevoix, expired?
2. Have tenders been called for with respect to the renewal of such contract?
3. If not, why?
4. Has the contract been awarded to any person?
5. If so, what is the name of the new contractor?
6. What are the terms and stipulations of such contract?
7. By whom was the new contractor recommended?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Contract expires on 30th June, 1934.
2. No.
3. Not necessary to invite tenders where the expenditure involved does not exceed $200 per annum.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

4. Yes.
5. Johnny Harvey, Jr.
6. Department has authorized a new four years' contract at $200 per annum.
7. Hector Warren.

LES EBOULEMENTS, QUE., DISMISSAL OF LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Department of Marine aware that Mr. Charles Tremblay (Georges), lighthouse keeper at the wharf of Les Eboulements, in the county of Charlevoix, has been dismissed by telegram?
2. Were any complaints lodged against Mr. Charles Tremblay (Georges)?
3. If so, what was the nature of such complaints?
4. Who lodged such complaints?
5. Who recommended Mr. Hector Tremblay to replace Mr. Charles Tremblay (Georges)?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This question was answered yesterday.

CASE OF FRANK GRIGWARE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some time ago a question was asked in this house with regard to the proceedings taken by the government of the United States to extradite Frank Grigware, otherwise known as Frank Lawrence Fahey, who was residing in Jasper, Alberta. The community in which he lived, the board of trade and many private individuals made representations to the government as to his excellent citizenship and the long time that he had lived in that locality with credit and distinction to himself and to the community. These representations were conveyed to the offices of the Prime Minister and forwarded to the minister at Washington, who in turn transmitted them to the Secretary of State of the United States. I am just advised by the legation at Washington that the attorney general of the United States has discontinued extradition proceedings against Grigware. As to what further action may be taken to meet the request that he should receive a free pardon, in the light of the evidence that has been made available, has not been settled, but I desire to make this public statement expressing the appreciation of the Canadian government, and I am sure of this house and the Canadian people, for the generous attitude that has been taken in connection with the proceedings against Mr. Grigware.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): All parties in the house will appreciate what my right hon. friend has just said.

TORONTO CENTENNIAL

VISIT OF FLIGHT OF ROYAL AIR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to bring to the attention of the house a matter that was discussed shortly on March 16, 1934. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) intimated that the city of Toronto had suggested that it would be appropriate to secure, if possible, the presence of a representative flight of the Royal Air Force at the celebrations which have been planned by the city of Toronto to mark the one hundredth anniversary of its incorporation. The invitation was extended by the mayor of Toronto and transmitted, through our high commissioner in London, to His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, inviting a detachment of the Royal Air Force to attend the celebrations on July 2, 3 and 4 next.

I have pleasure in informing the house that the Royal Air Force have accepted the invitation and are sending a flight of "Fury" aircraft from No. 1 squadron, consisting of five aircraft, four officers and twelve airmen, arriving about June 20. The Department of National Defence has made arrangements to cooperate in every way possible with a view to ensuring the success of the visit.

REORGANIZATION OF MILITIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): This question does not arise directly out of the remarks of my right hon. friend, but it may be remotely related thereto. An item appearing in the Montreal Star of May 15 stated that changes are being planned in Canada's system, that there is to be a complete reorganization, that the changes contemplated are to be based on the most modern British model, to fit into a large scheme of imperial defence, and that Canadian control everywhere will be the keynote. May I ask the Minister of National Defence if anything of the kind is taking place at the present time, or is contemplated?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that announcement might be called premature. Officers of the department are constantly seeking some way to benefit the organization, and to put it on what they consider a better basis, if possible. They are working along those lines, but nothing will be done immediately. They are constantly trying to better conditions, and this is along that general line.

SUGAR TAX

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who is the acting Minister of Finance, to an article which appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette concerning the sugar tax. It reads as follows:

> Information reaching the Montreal board of trade yesterday from sources closely linked to the wholesale grocery trade was to the effect that in the coming fall the excise tax on sugar will be cut altogether by the federal government.

May I ask the Prime Minister if there is anything behind that statement?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The article to which the hon. member has referred affords me an opportunity to make some observations which I think every hon. member will agree should be made. The press of the country carries on an agitation based upon some suggestion made by someone interested in a given course of events. The result is that petitions are circulated, in many instances, which are signed and presented to governments, and then it is said that something is to be done at a given time—that the excise tax on cigarettes is to be removed, that the sugar tax is to be lessened. All this is circulated throughout the country to the detriment of the government of the country and to the administration not of this government but the administration of the affairs and business of the country.

I can only say that that story is as devoid of any foundation in fact as any story I know of could be. Yet the effect of it will be that the next thing we will hear will be that "As the tax is to come back on a given day we trust you will make provision for those who have stores on hand;" and it will continue to go on in that way for weeks. In some countries this practice has become so intolerable that they have passed legislation making it an offence to circulate false news of that kind, for reasons which I think commend themselves to every hon. member in this house. The result has been that there has been a curtailment of the circulation of this type of news. It is not news; it is rumour. And it makes no difference how many times you contradict it, you can never overtake it. There will be people in remote parts of the country who will hear about or read these articles, and they will believe that something is contemplated. Then, if some action is taken in six months or, say, next year in the budget, it will be alleged that someone had advance information in respect to it.

I can only protest, not in the name of a government, or this government, but in the name of all governments in Canada, whose task is always great, against the circulation of rumours in the public press—and especially in view of the fact that the carriage of papers through the mails of this country represents a loss to the taxpayers of Canada of, it is estimated, not less than $6,000,000 per year.

Under the circumstances I think I am not going too far when I suggest that at least those who administer the affairs of the country, whether they be a Liberal government, a Conservative government, or any other form of government, are entitled to that consideration from the public press with respect to the conduct of public business which will not allow rumours, such as that to which the hon. member has just referred, to be circulated throughout the country in reputable journals, and believed to be true.

PORT OF NATASHQUAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) whether he could dispatch an ice-breaker to Natashquan so as to clear the port of ice. I received, this morning, a telegram from the mayor, Mr. Ernest Vigneault informing me that the port is blocked with ice, that vessels cannot enter and that the citizens of Natashquan and surroundings are short of food and provisions are very low. According to this telegram, which I shall dispense from reading in full, it is a most urgent case, and a vessel must reach the port within a few days.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): I shall immediately make inquiries, and if it be possible, an ice-breaker will be dispatched to that port without delay.

JACQUES CARTIER CELEBRATION

On the orders of the day:

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of National Defence would be kind enough to inform me if his department has received from the officer commanding and the officers of the 189th regiment of Rimouski, which for the greater part was recruited in the Gaspe peninsula, a request to be mobilized during the Gaspe celebration.

[Right Hon. Mr. Bennett.]

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the department has been approached regarding that matter, and the officer commanding in the Quebec district is acting on the committee to arrange these affairs. No definite arrangement has yet been made along those lines.

COAL INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the current number of a certain weekly paper there have been published what purport to be extracts from the McGregor report in connection with the alleged coal combine. I understand that a certain number of copies of that report were printed in the province of Quebec, but they are not generally available to the public. In view of this publication I would ask whether the government would not deem it advisable to have the report of the coal inquiry placed upon the table?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member sent me a notice that he would ask this question to-day. The extract to which he referred was taken from a journal which I do not think the hon. member named; therefore I do not deem it necessary to do so. But it is another case in which an endeavour is being made to create a false impression with respect to a matter which is in the courts of the country. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) transmitted the report of Mr. McGregor to the attorney general at Quebec. The attorney general took proper proceedings; a trial was had, a conviction made, an appeal has been taken and the matter is now under advisement by the court of appeal of the province of Quebec. No public purpose could be served by doing here what the statute does not contemplate should be done, when proceedings have been taken by the attorney general on the report made by Mr. McGregor to the minister, and the government has no intention of so doing.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Railways and Canals in a position to tell the house when the special committee on railways and steamship lines will be called?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be called early next week to organize, and then the committee itself will decide when further meetings shall take place.

FREIGHT RATES ON LUMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) if he will lay on the table of the house a copy of a ruling recently issued by the board of railway commissioners and, I think, coming into force to-day or to-morrow, whereby the freight rate on lumber from the Pacific coast into the Montreal market has been reduced by something between $5 and $10 a thousand to the shipper, seriously affecting the spruce lumber market of the province of Quebec and other eastern provinces?

Mr. MANION: I have never heard of the ruling until this minute.

Mr. POWER: I have not either.

Mr. MANION: I shall make inquiries at once and endeavour to get the ruling and lay it on the table as the hon. member requests.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if he now has available the information that I have been seeking from him for some time? Yesterday he was kind enough to give me a ray of hope when he said that he hoped to have the information in the very near future. What I want is information with regard to the decrease in the home consumption of several farm products which have been mentioned several times in Hansard. I hope the minister will be kind enough to tell me, first, if we still have a local market for these commodities; secondly, the reason for the decrease in the home consumption of such products; and thirdly, the remedy, if any, which has been applied by the government to prevent that decrease which has been taking place since 1930.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret that the information asked for has not yet been completed. I am sure the hon. member will realize when the answer is brought down that there was perhaps more work entailed in getting the information than he had in mind when he asked for it, but I hope it will be in shape to be brought down at the beginning of next week, if not to-morrow.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman, and if I can be of any assistance to the officers of his department in cooperating with them I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I wish to comment—I was going to say on one of the proposed amendments, but it is rather an omitted amendment, if I might call it that. I congratulate the minister upon having had the amendments printed. I am sure that it will facilitate the passage of the bill. I assume, however, that the amendments printed are all that he proposes to introduce, and that no others will be permitted or encouraged.

I venture to point out one feature which I do not think has been touched on at all in this house up to date, and in which this bill is wholly lacking as compared with the British act, and that is in a provision as regards contracts. The minister is well aware that in big business arrangements we do not do business like selling peanuts over the counter. Arrangements have to be made months, and sometimes years, ahead. Contracts have to be entered into. It is quite a common thing especially in seasonal industries for the whole output to be contracted for before the season begins. In some cases the banks hesitate to finance the industry unless that arrangement is made. I would like to ask what effect the minister thinks this bill will have on industry as a whole if it is found that under it, it is almost impossible to contract ahead.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) a day or two ago instanced the case of a business man doing business in Brazil and wanting to make a contract. There are other cases of the same kind. For instance, a man comes along and wants to buy the whole output of a pilchard plant on the west coast of Vancouver island. Is that producer to say to his prospective customer, "I am very sorry. I would like to sell, but I cannot do it. I can tell you next October whether I shall be allowed to do so or not." The minister may have some answer to that, and I shall be glad to hear it when he speaks.

I want to give an illustration of what the British government thought essential to take care of such conditions. I refer hon. gentlemen to page 262 of the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1931, section 8, which covers two pages and a little more, and contains provisions to take care of conditions of that kind. I need not read it all. Suffice it to say that any contract entered into before the going into force of that act, or any contract entered into afterwards, provided it was not done with the deliberate intention of evading the act, is entirely taken care of. I refer the minister to the section I have quoted. In one instance it says that no person shall be liable to any penalty for contravention of any scheme in force under the act if he proves that the contravention was necessary for the performance of a contract and providing it was not done in evasion of the act. I do think that there should be some provision, and a very definite provision for that situation here because, I repeat, you cannot do business from hand to mouth. You must look ahead. Take the case of a contract for flour for shipment to the orient. Has the shipper to be put in the position where he can only say, "I do not know. I would like to do it but I have to get the consent of the board"—not of an unknown board, but of a board that we do not know the composition of, or how it will be composed, or its numbers, and we know very little about its ideas. Perhaps that vagueness is necessary on account of the dual jurisdiction, but nevertheless it makes it all the more necessary that some provision of the kind I suggest should be provided.

While I am on my feet I would like to allude to the remarks which the minister made yesterday with regard to the protection of the consumer. He said that there were three safeguards, first, that the scheme had to be approved by the minister and by the governor in council; but the minister and the governor in council are practically the same because what the minister recommends to his colleagues more or less automatically goes through except in very exceptional circumstances. So that brings it down—I do not wish to be unfair and say to the whim or caprice of the minister, but to the determination of a single minister, and that is not a sufficient safeguard to the consumer. It is not sufficient to have it left to one man whose judgment perhaps is based on insufficient information as to what is necessary to protect the consumer in that particular industry, or phase of industry, of which the minister may have absolutely no personal knowledge. If the minister has beliefs and opinions on that matter, why not put some provision in the bill for the protection of the consumer?

[Mr. Neill.]

The second safeguard which the minister claimed existed was that there was no price-fixing but a regulating of the rate at which the stuff goes on to the market. I think the two are synonymous. If not, what is the purpose of the bill? Is not the bill to help the producers get a better price? I think the hon. member for Ontario yesterday exploded that theory by showing that, if you do such and so, the price will regulate itself. If people are prevented from selling, the result must be to stimulate the price directly or indirectly.

The third safeguard to which the minister alluded was that there was part 2 of the bill which gives power to control undue charges. Well, I do not think that is a logical argument at all. That refers to spreads, not original prices. The minister no doubt was alluding to sections 18, 19, 20 and 21, which give power to investigate spreads between producer and consumer. By the way, the minister is taking the teeth out of that by his amendment when he is limiting the committee simply to giving a report of what is in their opinion an unjust spread. The committee has not now the power to determine that the spread is unjust. It is not even a definite report. It gives only their opinions. Therefore, I suppose it follows that the provisions of section 21, the penalty section, will not apply as that section derives its authority from sections 19 and 20. Although there may be some outlet by way of the Combines Investigation Act, so far as this bill is concerned its teeth have been largely drawn. The committee is to investigate what spread is detrimental to or against the interests of the public in that it is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices. This part of the bill only refers to spreads made by the middleman, to which reference has been made. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said that there was no protection given to the consumer. The prices given to the producer may be unduly high but the minister's argument is that action can be taken apparently under the Combines Investigation Act. The powers in this bill are to some degree wholly divergent from and contradictory to, the restrictions imposed by the Combines Investigation Act.

What does Great Britain do about it? There they have a consumers' committee, and this is not a committee existing only in the mind of the minister. The British act reads:

> A consumers' committee shall consist of a chairman and of not less than six other members, who shall be such persons as appear to the minister, after consultation with the board of trade and, as to one member, with the Cooperative Union, to represent the interests of the consumers of all the products the marketing of which is for the time being regulated by schemes approved by the minister.

It is a well known fact that the board of trade in England functions in a manner entirely different from our local boards of trade. The board of trade there alluded to is practically a department of government. This committee is charged with the duty of considering and reporting to the minister on the effect of any scheme approved by the minister, which is for the time being in force, on consumers of the regulated product. If necessary, another committee can be set up under the British act. This is a committee of investigation and shall consist of a chairman and four other members. That committee is charged with the duty of going into the statements made by the original committee. That committee has full power to go to any of these boards and examine their books, and so on. A report is then made to the minister. If the committee of investigation reports to the minister that any provision of a scheme is contrary to the interests of consumers or the interests of any persons affected by the scheme and is not in the public interest, the minister, after consulting with the board of trade, may by order make such amendments as are thought necessary or revoke the scheme. Those are pretty drastic powers to be carried out on the recommendation of the first committee as endorsed by the second investigating committee. The minister may then revoke the whole scheme if he thinks a consumer is getting what we call a raw deal.

If amendments such as these were introduced into this bill we would be given more encouragement to vote in its favour, but when we see the wide divergence between this bill and the protections given under the British act, it makes us wonder whether the whole thing is not just a piece of window dressing to look at, to admire and to point to rather than something that is to be carried out. I hope I am not doing the minister and the government an injustice in saying that. Why not make the thing workable and practicable? Does not the minister think that there should be some protection for existing contracts, those made either immediately before or immediately after the passing of this bill, in order to maintain the ordinary channels of trade?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall deal with the hon. member's questions as nearly in order as I can. First, the amendments to this bill are not a closed book, as he suggests. Secondly, I feel that all local boards will be anxious to facilitate all contracts rather than to break them. As far as protection to the consumer is concerned, what protection has he at the present time which he would not have after this bill is passed? The hon. member has suggested that the chief purpose of the bill is to raise prices, but I have always maintained that the chief purpose is to stabilize prices.

Mr. NEILL: The same thing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Very different. For example, under present conditions it is quite possible—I believe hon. members will agree with me when I say that it has been done—that forces outside the control of the producer and outside the welfare of the consumer may bring prices down to an abnormally low level. Stocks may be accumulated in the hands of a few, and prices raised higher than would have been possible had the flow of goods been regulated and the consumer forced to pay more than he otherwise would have to pay. Under this bill all products will go forward according to grade and in a more regular manner and prices and markets will be stabilized.

With reference to the protection given in Great Britain to the consumers: Consumers' committees are set up; they report their objections to the minister, who takes them before the governor in council, after consulting with the board of trade. Under this bill we have the power to revoke schemes and withdraw authority from the local board. We have just as much power over our local board as is given under the British marketing act. We have the power to regulate the spread between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays. At the present time there are very few ways of controlling that.

Mr. NEILL: It comes back to the fact that the minister has sole control; he can kill or he can keep alive. He may be satisfied to assume that power, but I would not care to be in his position. It is true that the bill says he can revoke, but there is no machinery provided whereby the consumer can be vocal in expressing his wrongs. Such machinery is provided for in the British act, under which there is the consumers' committee and the additional investigating committee. Where is the machinery in this bill? I may approach the minister and say that such a thing is wrong and he may or may not take action. He has no facilities for doing so. This bill is not at all compatible with the British bill, but if that is his determination—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member states that there are no facilities for taking action. What more facility is necessary than the power to withdraw, if necessary, all authority from the local board?

Mr. NEILL: I believe that is expressed in section 5, but it is expressed in a very general way. I think any minister would hesitate to destroy completely the work of a board simply on the say-so of Tom Jones. Tom Jones' complaint is not given any authority or power. He may apply to the minister and the minister's deputy may decide that there is nothing in the complaint. There is no real machinery provided whereby the consumer can express his wrongs. The only way he can speak is by personal letter to the minister.

The minister said that any local board would be glad to facilitate contracts, but I do not know why they should be. We do not know what these boards may be like. They may be flushed with their authority. They are put in power and the first thing they will want to do is to control things as much as possible. It would be a deterrent rather than a help to their operations to have existing contracts. They certainly will not be friendly and sympathetic to people who have made prior contracts. But at any rate their powers begin when the board is approved by the minister, and there will be existing contracts then. There will be no provision however to take care of them. We cannot be very far wrong if we follow the British act, not in its letter and entirety, for their conditions are different, but in its general spirit. They have a very fine sense of making laws that are workable, laws that fit in with the general temper of the people, and it is because laws meet with the approval of the vast mass of the people that they are so well observed in Britain. It is because the laws are so constructed as to afford every facility to anyone to get redress for any grievance which he may feel. I think there should be provision in this act to take care of existing contracts, before the bill goes into effect.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. While it may be true that the door is not closed to amendments, it is extremely difficult for a private member of the house to introduce amendments in committee of the whole, because the amendments have to be fitted into the entire scheme. I would however suggest to the minister that he take into consideration the possibility of incorporating in the present bill some of the features of the British scheme. While undoubtedly we are trying to protect the producers, as I said before there is no real provision for the protection of consumers. It is quite possible for example that a local milk concern might come under this board. I believe there is provision in the amendments that a board in a certain province might be brought under the operations of this act, and I can quite conceive that a group of milk producers, if they had exclusive control, might run up the price of milk so that the consumers in the city would suffer.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is right; there ought to be some way by which the consumers, through regularly organized representation, might be in a position to protest against high prices and in that way protect themselves against exorbitant charges. At the present time the producers are being very badly dealt with, but I do not think that any class in the community can be very safely trusted with exclusive and rather arbitrary power. They might very easily use such power to the detriment of the general public. It would seem to me to be a roundabout way if a few consumers had to make representations to the minister, sending deputations to Ottawa to reinforce those representations. In practice that would be an impossibility for any ordinary group of consumers.

There is another point to which I called attention in passing at an earlier stage of this discussion, and that is protection to the employees in industry. There is a very considerable number of people engaged by the fruit growers as pickers. I have every sympathy with the growers of fruit; it seems to me they ought to be protected. But I should like to see in this act some provision for their employees. Very often when a man is subject to exploitation he takes it out on his employees, and I suggest that there ought to be some protection for the latter. I think that is true in connection with the tobacco industry, about which we have heard so much. People brought in to do certain types of work are often required to live on low standards. That is also true of the beet industry. People are often employed for the season and they and their families work at such wages as enable them to maintain only a very low standard of living. In that case I have every sympathy with the producer. I do submit however that there ought to be in this bill provision for the employees, and I hope the minister will take these two points into serious consideration.

Mr. DONNELLY: I come from western Canada—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, can we have some answer from the minister with regard to the two points which I have raised?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not think an answer was necessary. I thought the hon. member wanted the points to be taken into consideration and I have made a note of them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, that is something to be thankful for; but seeing that I made a specific request, I think we should have some amendments along the lines I have indicated. We should be told whether there is any prospect of having such amendments; if not we shall have to bring in the amendments ourselves, and that is not so satisfactory.

Mr. DONNELLY: Coming from western Canada, I am interested in this bill particularly in so far as it applies to the marketing of wheat. Wheat forms probably ninety per cent of the products of the western farmer. Will the minister tell us how, under present conditions, this act when applied to wheat will help the farmer to get any more for his product? If it is going to help the farmer to get a fraction of a cent more for his wheat, then I am prepared to support it in every way.

We all know the conditions which the farmers in the west are faced with to-day. True, the farmer in the west is a little better off than he was last year. Last year when he produced a dollar's worth of commodities he lost 50 cents; to-day he does not lose quite so much, only about 25 cents. In other words, last year it cost him $1 to produce 50 cents worth of his commodities and to-day it costs him $1 to produce 75 cents worth. He is therefore just a little bit better off, but it will take a long time before he is on his feet again, and if this bill will help to put him on his feet once more I am ready to support it in every way.

Some people say that the great carryover of wheat has been all due to the Liberal policies that were in force from 1921 to 1929. They say that we lost our market under Liberal rule, that all restrictions placed against our wheat were put into effect while the Liberals were in power, and that no restrictions have been imposed since. Well, let us look at the facts. I will deal with wheat, taking a few countries, the major importing countries. What do we find in France? On July 1, 1930, when the Liberal government went out of power, the duty against our wheat going into France was 85 cents a bushel; on the 1st of May, 1934 there was a duty of $1.44 per bushel in force against us. That increase has come about under the Conservative government. For the last four or five years we have not had a crop of wheat and yet our carryovers have been piling up year after year. In Germany, on July 1, 1930 there was a duty of 97½ cents per bushel against our wheat; on the 1st of May, 1934 the German duty was $2.69—an increase piled up since this government came into power. Take Italy, which is another great importer. On July 1, 1930, the Italian duty against our wheat was 87 cents per bushel, and to-day that duty has been increased to $1.74 per bushel. Yet they tell us that no increase has been made in the duties against Canadian wheat going to other countries.

What about Belgium? On July 1, 1930, Belgium had a duty of one per cent ad valorem; to-day they have a duty of thirteen cents a bushel plus two and a half per cent ad valorem. What about Spain? On July 1, 1930, Spain had a duty of $1.10 a bushel; to-day they have a duty so fixed that the price of wheat in Spain shall always be at least $1.98 per bushel. What about China? On July 1, 1930, China had no duty on wheat; it was free. To-day the duty is ten cents a bushel including the surtax.

But that is not all. These importing countries have placed other restrictions, milling restrictions and quotas against our wheat. What do we find with regard to France? On July 1, 1930, three per cent of foreign wheat was allowed in all milling flour for domestic use; to-day no foreign wheat is allowed in domestic flour. On July 1, 1930, Germany allowed 70 per cent of foreign wheat in her flour; to-day only three per cent of foreign wheat is allowed in her domestic flour. On July 1, 1930, Italy had no restrictions; to-day they allow only one per cent of foreign wheat to be used in domestic flour.

The whole answer is that the duties and the restrictions which this government has piled up against the products of other nations have made us lose many of our markets. Let us look at what the Commercial Intelligence Journal of May 5, 1934, has to say in regard to Canadian wheat imported into Switzerland:

> Since the war Switzerland's annual imports of Canadian wheat have been close to 10,000,000 bushels. Taking into consideration its population of approximately 4,000,000, it has thus been one of the best per capita markets in the world. Under normal economic conditions this trade would continue. Switzerland has, however, found it necessary to restrict imports from countries such as Canada and the United States with which there is a heavy unfavourable trade balance, and to divert it to other cereal-producing states with whom compensation agreements can be made.

Then they give a list of Switzerland's wheat imports, which shows that during the months of January, February and March, 1933, she imported from Canada 83,015 metric tons and for the months of January, February and March, 1934, only 24,886 metric tons. The article continues:

During the first quarter of 1933 Canada supplied 67·5 per cent of Switzerland's total wheat imports. For the same period of 1934 the figure had shrunk to roughly 28 per cent, a loss of 58,129 metric tons. For the second quarter of 1934 it is reported that quota allotments will allow Swiss millers to use only ten per cent of Canadian wheat, . . .

Assuming this to be the case, only about fifteen per cent of Switzerland's total imports for 1934 will come from Canada in comparison with 47·13 per cent in 1933 and fifty-two per cent in 1932. It is not improbable therefore that Canadian grain exporters will have to face the possibility of losing a market for as much as 175,000 metric tons or 6,431,250 bushels of wheat

That is lost in Switzerland alone. That is what has caused our markets throughout the world to be lost. The other day France gave us the answer. When we had the conference in Italy, what did France say? She said that she was willing to take our quota, to lessen her milling restrictions and to reduce her duties; but she said also: "What are you willing to buy from us if we buy from you?" That is the whole answer with regard to the present wheat market.

I should like to put this question to the minister: We have a carryover of something like 200,000,000 bushels, and during the past four years our government, practically speaking, has handled all our wheat; because John I. McFarland has been buying all our wheat and selling it. You may call it options or whatever you like, but when you buy an option, at the end of the time you have to take the wheat or sell it to somebody else. John I. McFarland during the past four years has for this government been handling practically all our wheat. How much better will we be off under this bill? Will it give the farmers any more for their wheat than they are getting to-day, and if so, how can this result be reached What is to be done with this carryover? If we go under this bill, form organizations and sell our wheat, I would like the minister to tell us how this will benefit the farmers.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It gives the farmers an opportunity, if they organize under this bill, to control their own product if they feel that by doing so they will obtain any more for it. There is no necessity in my following further the remarks of the hon. member with reference to his speech on tariffs. If the farmers do not see fit to organize and it is felt that assistance can be given to the marketing of our wheat, there is power in this bill to give that assistance in the way in which it has been given during the past two or three years or in any other way that may seem fit and advantageous. My impression of the work of Mr. McFarland is different from that of the hon. member according to his statement. While he was speaking I made a note that he said that the government through Mr. McFarland was buying all Canadian wheat; my understanding is that Mr. McFarland is not buying all Canadian wheat, but rather he takes up wheat as it flows on to the market when it is felt that the price will break and the bottom fall out of the market.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to ask the minister a question arising out of conditions as they exist in a number of counties in Ontario where the farms are on the outskirts of a city and are not as large as they are in the districts in the west to which the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has just referred. The first question I would like to ask is this: Does the minister contemplate a board for each natural product of the farm?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A number of small products might be grouped together under one board, depending upon the wishes of the farmers in any one particular locality.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I understand the minister to say that the style of the board depends upon the people who are forming it in the local jurisdiction?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, they submit their plan and it, of course, has to be approved.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That means that a certain plan may be asked for in one district and a different plan asked for in every other district. Does that necessarily mean that you may have just as many plans as you have districts? That is the point that strikes me as being of interest.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If it were deemed advisable, that might occur, but I do not contemplate that it would.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As I understand the minister, it might occur that you would have about as many different plans or schemes as there were groups of people asking for plans; then you might have as many boards as these people desire. I am asking these questions for the information of the people whom I represent, because in my riding we produce many products. We start in the early spring with lettuce, asparagus and other early vegetables; we grow strawberries, raspberries, currants of various kinds, cherries, plums, peaches, apples and potatoes; we raise horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry and produce dairy products, eggs and innumerable other articles. As a matter of fact there is very little that is not produced in that fruitful section of the country. How many boards would be required to handle those various products?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would depend upon the submissions of the producers as to what they thought would be to their best advantage.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then would this be possible: In a community where, for instance, the people produce garden stuff such as asparagus, lettuce and that sort of thing, if there was an aggressive aggregation of those people naturally we would expect one board for those products. Would the minister say whether those articles would be grouped under one board or whether there would be a separate board for each article, if it were asked for?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They would make their submission, but from what the hon. gentleman has said I would gather that the people in his constituency are quite rational—

Mr. ELLIOTT: They have given every evidence of it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —and that they would give full consideration to the problems before them. Personally I feel that few if any people are better qualified in this connection than are the producers themselves. There is a difference between saying what might be possible and what might be conceivable.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then as to licences, would the minister tell us what is contemplated in that regard? I do not see that any change is proposed with regard to subsection (f) of section 4, which reads:

> —to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder.

Has the minister in mind that each individual who intends to market any product must have a licence for that product, or is it contemplated that he will have a blanket licence for all the products of his farm?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends on the producers themselves, as to what they desire. No person is going to force any producer to take out a licence or do the things referred to unless the producers express their desire to do so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I point out to the minister that this is not what the act says. It states:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power—to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board—

I take it that this means the general board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, the local board, if that is included in the scheme suggested by the producers themselves.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then it is only if the producers themselves ask for a registration that a registration will be made; is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then I would very respectfully suggest to the minister that when we come to this section it should be changed, because that is not the way I interpret it now. My hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) says it means the dominion board, and that is the way it would appear to me. Does the minister say that only one licence will be required for one farmer or that one licence will be required for each product?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is up to the producers themselves, in their own submission.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then if the people who control the production of any particular natural product, the people who are the leaders in the strawberry industry or any other scheme, ask for a certain scheme and request that everyone who intends to sell under that scheme be registered, does the minister propose that their request will be granted if it appears reasonable?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If it appears reasonable.

Mr. ELLIOTT: So if it appears reasonable to the producers and to the minister you could have a board for each of these products in a county such as Middlesex, for example? You could have these boards if they were asked for by the leading producers of each product?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think the hon. member is doing it purposely, but he seems to be following the line adopted by other hon. members during this discussion, who repeated over and over again that if sixty per cent agreed the other forty per cent would be forced in. I do not know whether or not this is for public consumption, but I know the hon. member would not wittingly do that. He is endeavouring to build up a hypothetical case with regard to leading producers. It is not contemplated at all that leading producers will be able to force their will on the other producers; it will be the majority of the sum total of the intelligent producers, as to what they think is best in the handling of their own product.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would just suggest to the minister that he would do well to listen to the argument that is being advanced rather than to the suggestions made by somebody else who is supposed to be here to assist the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I must object to what the hon. member says.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I note the objection.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My deputy, seeing me hesitate while trying to recall what the hon. member said, in order to finish my answer, supplied the words "leading producers" and that was all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want the minister to know that this is not for the purpose he has suggested, and I do not thank him or his deputy, if that is the source from which it came, for the suggestion or the manner in which it was made. Perhaps the minister will allow me to finish before he says anything further. It does not assist the discussion of a question of this kind to make suggestions like that. Surely the minister will not say that I have unnecessarily taken up any of the time of this committee, but I propose to endeavour to secure answers to the questions that are troubling me and the people whom I represent. Now, if I have understood the minister correctly, he says that if the producers ask for a local board in regard to each different product they can have it and, if the local board makes the request, it will become necessary to have a licence for the production of each product. I do not assume that the minister has any idea as to what the scheme may be in each locality, as to whether or not there will be a checkerboard scheme with as many different plans as there are boards. If that were the condition I suggest that it would be one of the most iniquitous features in connection with this bill. The farmers are labouring under difficulties enough without being asked to go and register their names, addresses and occupations with the board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I suggest that the farmers are not being asked to register, or to do anything else, except at their own request.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Under the bill as it now stands "the board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power to regulate" —and so on. That is as plain as the English language could be. Paragraph (f) of clause 4 reads:

> (f) To require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder.

I suggest to the minister very respectfully that the farmers and small producers of this country—the man who produces fifty bushels of plums, so many bushels of pears, so many barrels of apples, so many dozen eggs, so much poultry—does not want to be subjected to the inconvenience this section would impose upon him.

I should like to ask the minister whether or not it is the board which has the power to cancel licences. The bill says: "shall be subject to cancellation by the board." Is that the local board or the dominion board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board, with powers delegated by the dominion board, on the basis of the scheme set up, will have power to withdraw or cancel a licence. The other statement to which the hon. member referred, when he mentioned the farmer with a few dozen eggs or a few apple trees is taken care of in paragraph (b). That is, the local board has power to exempt certain individuals, a provision which appears in the British act.

While I am on my feet I should like to refer to something which I am sure the hon. member either misinterpreted or misunderstood. When I spoke before, I thought I made it clear that I did not think for a moment the hon. member would wittingly give an incorrect impression, but in each of his statements he used an expression indicating that leading producers could force their will on the other producers. I just wished to bring this to his attention.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What happens after a licence is cancelled? Has that man no rights with regard to marketing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say that after his licence is cancelled he would be prepared to conform to the regulations of the board, when he would see the effect of them.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a kind of chastening placed upon the producer after his licence is cancelled.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, it is compulsion to make him conform to the regulations.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh, but he does not belong to the board any longer; his licence is cancelled.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He cannot operate, then.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He cannot operate?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wish to call the minister's attention to a statement made by an eminent authority with regard to interference with freedom of the business of a country. I refer him to a book entitled The English Constitution written by Walter Bagehot. He speaks first about bureaucracy,—and if ever a bill was intended or calculated in the final result to build up a bureaucracy, I say it is this one. If the committee will permit I shall read what the author has to say in this regard:

Not only does a bureaucracy thus tend to under-government, in point of quality; it tends to over-government, in point of quantity. The trained official hates the rude, untrained public. He thinks that they are stupid, ignorant, reckless—that they cannot tell their own interest—that they should have the leave of the office before they do anything. Protection is the natural inborn creed of every official body, free trade is an extrinsic idea, alien to its notions, and hardly to be assimilated with life; and it is easy to see how an accomplished critic, used to a free and active life, could thus describe the official.

And this is the description.

"Every imaginable and real social interest" says Mr. Laing, "religion, education, law, police, every branch of public or private business, personal liberty to move from place to place, even from parish to parish within the same jurisdiction; liberty to engage in any branch of trade or industry, on a small or large scale, all the objects, in short, in which body, mind, and capital can be employed in civilized society, were gradually laid hold of for the employment and support of functionaries, were centralized in bureaux, were superintended, licensed, inspected, reported upon, and interfered with by a host of officials scattered over the land, and maintained at the public expense, yet with no conceivable utility in their duties. They are not, however, gentlemen at large, enjoying salary without service. They are under a semi-military discipline. In Bavaria, for instance, the superior civil functionary can place his inferior functionary under house-arrest, for neglect of duty, or other offence against civil functionary discipline. In Wurtemberg, the functionary cannot marry without leave from his superior. Voltaire says, somewhere, that, 'the art of government is to make two-thirds of a nation pay all it possibly can pay for the benefit of the other third.' This is realized in Germany by the functionary system."

I shall not read it at length, but it goes on to say:

The functionaries are not there for the benefit of the people, but the people for the benefit of the functionaries. All this machinery of functionarism, with its numerous ranks and gradations in every district, filled with a staff of clerks and expectants in every department looking for employment, appointments, or promotions, was intended to be a new support of the throne in the new social state of the continent; a third class, in connection with the people by their various official duties of interference in all public or private affairs, yet attached by their interests to the kingly power.

And this is the last reference I intend to make.

The Beamptenstand, or functionary class, was to be equivalent to the class of nobility, gentry, capitalists, and men of larger landed property than the peasant-proprietors, and was to make up in numbers for the want of individual weight and influence. In France, at the expulsion of Louis Philippe, the civil functionaries were stated to amount to 807,030 individuals. This civil army was more than double of the military. In Germany, this class is necessarily more numerous in proportion to the population, the landwehr system imposing many more restrictions than the conscription on the free action of the people, and requiring more officials to manage it, and the semi-feudal jurisdictions and forms of law requiring much more writing and intricate forms of procedure before the courts than the Code Napoleon.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Go on.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I believe the committee has benefited by the changes which have been made in the bill. I am glad they have been made. Many of those changes were made as a result of suggestions which have come from the committee since the bill has been before it. I should like to make this suggestion very seriously—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Has the hon. member any special change in mind which has been made at the suggestion of any hon. member opposite?

Mr. HANBURY: Why did you change them, then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My statement was that they were not changed; they were put there to clarify what was already included.

Mr. HANBURY: The whole trend of the bill has been changed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would the hon. member suggest how it has been changed; or what particular part of it. He seems to speak with authority, and with a finished statement.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps we could get over that if the minister would say that all of this discussion and all the suggestions he has received have been of no benefit to him and have contributed no assistance in the making of the changes that have taken place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The member said the committee; he did not say the opposition.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is the suggestion I want to make to the minister, and I want to make it without being offensive. He knows the sentiment among the producers of this country to-day pretty well. There is no margin of profit. As a matter of fact the general producer of natural products in this country to-day cannot get for his products the actual cost of production, just as the hon. member for Willow Bunch has said, and they are in no humour to be subjected to a lot of restrictions and limitations and supervision in the getting out of licences, and particularly the charging of fees for the service of boards that they have no voice in appointing.

Before this bill goes out of committee I think the minister would be well advised to clarify the section dealing with the number of products for which boards can be formed. Surely a man should not be subjected to membership in at least a dozen boards, a potato board, an apple board, a wheat board, a cattle board, a hog board and various other boards. He should not have to take out more than one licence if he should have to take out any at all.

Furthermore I would like to ask this question of the minister: Is it intended that the cost of setting up this machinery is to be borne by the producer or borne out of consolidated revenue fund in view of the changes that have been made in the section?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The intent is, when the local board is set up, that the cost of operation and administration will be borne by the producers. With all due respect to the hon. member, I still feel that he has not at all grasped the significance of this bill. He states that his producers do not want to be subjected to all this licensing. It is up to them absolutely to say so or not. No person is subjected.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just this concluding word. I am sorry if the minister misunderstood me. It is not up to them to say, if some other board or organization has power to compel them to come in against their will.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No other board has.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then the act must be changed from what it is now or some superior authority will have that power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me just quote, so that we may get it clear, what the minister said in this house on May 9, 1934, at page 2947 of Hansard. Speaking of the scheme I asked:

> But if it were approved and say sixty per cent had put forward the proposed scheme, would not the remaining forty per cent be obliged to enter the organization and come under the regulations?
>
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): My understanding is that if that was one of the conditions of the scheme, the remainder could be forced to come in. Hon. members opposite have been repeating themselves with their references to sixty and forty per cent. I hope those references were made only by way of illustration. I think we are all agreed that the success of any scheme under which compulsion would be necessary would be more likely if there was the highest possible percentage.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I am obliged to the minister for his direct answer. It brings out an all-important feature to which sufficient attention has not been given as yet.

I think that is as clear as can be. If a certain number, whether it is a bare majority or a number running up to sixty or seventy or eighty per cent of the producers, set forth a scheme, and it is approved, the remainder are obliged to come under it, and they will have to submit to the licensing process, submit to regulations which prescribe the extent to which they may be permitted to produce or sell or offer for sale, and submit to all the other regulations contained in the scheme whether they like it or not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When a scheme is submitted by the producers themselves these things are set out in the scheme, and each producer, if he is asked to vote, will understand what he is voting on. The dominion board will have no power to impose anything on any of the people of that region except in conformity with the scheme set up at their own request. The right hon. gentleman suggested that a bare majority might be in favour of it. Well, I have not made any different statement to-day, at least I hope I have not, from the statement which the right hon. gentleman has just quoted from Hansard. It has always been in my mind that it would be possible, if the scheme were approved by the provincial minister or the federal minister, depending upon the auspices under which it was set up, to force in the minority if in the opinion of the minister it was felt that the scheme was satisfactory, and the vote that was asked for was sufficiently representative.

Before I take my seat may I ask this question? Is it not possible at the present time without this bill at all for a provincial government, if a majority of the people demand a scheme such as one of these schemes might be, to compel others to come in under that scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is always possible for a provincial government to pass any laws it desires and to compel people to accept their provisions provided the government is in a position to get support enough to enact the legislation, but that is very different from what is proposed here. This is to allow a group of the producers in a locality to frame a scheme which will apply only to that locality, and which will oblige the other producers in that locality, who happen to be in a minority in the community, to come under the regulations set forth in that scheme.

The minister always says in his remarks: It is for the producers themselves to say. But when he uses the word "producers" he means a particular group of producers who get together to form a scheme—not the producers who are outside the circle and who may not necessarily wish to avail themselves of the scheme and fall in line with some group that has got control for the time being, or may wish in some way to further its own ends.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is not that a well recognized principle in local option?

Mr. NEILL: You yourself, Mr. Chairman, know that in British Columbia a certain group of producers did get the provincial government to pass a law of this kind. The majority decided it should govern, but that law was declared to be ultra vires in the courts.

If I caught the minister aright he said in answer to my hon. friend from West Middlesex that the dominion board had power to exempt certain individuals, just as there was such a provision in the British act. I really cannot allow that statement to go unchallenged. I have already brought out that point here, but apparently it did not soak in. The difference is enormous between this bill and the British system of exempting somebody. This bill provides that the dominion board shall have power to make orders or determinations. That is in section 4 (a). Then paragraph (b) gives the board power:

> to exempt from any determination or order any person or class of persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product.

It will be noticed that any person, even an exporter, may be exempt from the determination or order of the board. That almost invites the suggestion of favouritism. The British system is quite different. There they exempt from the provisions of a scheme certain small producers. In order to do away with the multiplicity of reports and returns they exempt the man who may have only one cow or a pig or a few hens. They set a minimum, so to speak, and state that if a man has not more than so many hens he will be totally exempt. But when they make an order it applies to everybody in the scheme, there is no favouritism. I think they state that anyone milking less than four cows or selling eggs in lots smaller than two dozen does not come under the scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Who decides that?

Mr. NEILL: It is decided by the government.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is provided for in the scheme.

Mr. NEILL: It is provided for in the scheme sanctioned by the government. In our case it is the dominion marketing board that will exempt. They are not exempting the little fellow in order to save all this trouble and annoyance, they may pick out an exporter and say that the particular order does not apply to him. Such an exemption may be worth thousands of dollars to a man. He may be loaded up with a lot of exportable stuff and an order comes out preventing exportation for a fortnight and because of political favouritism—I do not exempt any government—he may be exempted. With their ability to frame laws to give absolute justice, the British do not do it like that. When a board there makes an order or a determination it applies to everyone; everyone except the little man who is exempted from the whole scheme must comply with all orders. Look at the trouble that saves. We will have every man who owns a cow on some back lot sitting down and making out returns. I just wanted to emphasize the difference between the British system of exemption and that proposed in this bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I maintain that subsection (b) makes provision for the exemption of individuals as set out by the producers when they submit their scheme, and in that respect the provisions have the same effect as those contained in the British act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked me whether or not the principle governing the formation of these local boards at the instance of the majority in a locality was not the same principle as that underlying local option. May I say to him that I think it is a diametrically opposite principle. The principle of local option is that everyone in a community determines whether or not there is to be local option. Under this measure, only an interested occupational group determines what regulations shall apply. The correct parallel would be if local option in a given community were decided by, say, only those who were intemperate or wished to drink as they please. If only that class of people were to be given the right to decide whether or not everyone was to have the right to drink as he pleased, you would have an exact parallel. Take it the other way. If only the temperance people were to say as to whether or not licences should be granted or prohibition put into force in a certain locality, without those who possibly might hold opposite views being given a say you would have an exact parallel. It would be an interested group having authority and power to compel everybody else to fall in line with their own point of view, and that is just what is being proposed here. The only difference is that in the case of the local option illustration the reference would be to consumers whereas in this bill it is to producers.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the committee as I have stated already my opposition to this bill in so far as it refers to the fisheries and products of the sea. However, there is some enlightenment which I would like to have from the minister in view of certain amendments which have been submitted. An amendment has been submitted to section 2, subsection (e), which more specifically defines a natural product. I am informed that under the interpretation clauses, animals will include fish. The proposed amendment reads in part as follows:

—and such other natural products of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product that may be designated by the governor in council, in accordance with the provisions of this act.

[Mr. Neill.]

Am I to understand that the byproducts of the sea must be designated by the governor in council? I shall give some of the byproducts. One of the byproducts of fish is cod liver oil. A byproduct of the lobster packing industry is tamale, a very delicate and delicious product. Seal oil is a byproduct of the seal industry. Then we have the fertilizer made up of fish offal. There is fishcake for the feeding of animals. Am I to understand that these byproducts must receive the sanction or be designated by the minister before they can be marketed through a system adopted by the local board or local group?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Any scheme set up must be approved by the governor in council. I think I can give an illustration whch will provide a more direct answer than a straight yes or no. For example, a scheme is set up for animals, or, in this case, fish. Such a scheme would have to be approved by the governor in council. If there were byproducts, and the producers of those byproducts also wished to submit a scheme, there would be no additional work as far as they were concerned because their requests would come before the governor in council at the same time.

Mr. VENIOT: The producers of these byproducts are not always the original producers. For instance, the original producer or fisherman does not produce cod liver oil. The lobster packer produces tamale but the original fisherman does not. I shall not refer to the seal fishing on the Pacific coast or at other places, but considerable is done in the maritime provinces. The man who hunts the seals does not extract the oil. In the case of fishcake, the man who does the fishing sells the product to the consumer but the sardine packing industry also manufactures fishcake from the products of the fisherman. In the case of fertilizer, there is natural fertilizer and manufactured fertilizer. Herring fry are found along the Atlantic coast. If the wind is favourable these are found in windrows three or four feet high by two to three feet wide running for miles along the shore. That product is saved and used as fertilizer but is not put through any process of manufacture. Now what group will handle that? Will it be the farmer, the primary producer from the soil, or will it be those engaged in the fishing industry? With all due respect to the minister and his attempt to do what he thinks is right, I confess that I am scared that so far as the fishing industry is concerned he does not know where he is drifting; if he did he would not allow the fishing industry to go into this bill. The bill is inoperative, and before he undertakes to bring the fishing industry within its provisions I would strongly advise him to consult the Department of Fisheries. In that department there are men of vast experience, experts who have studied the industry in all its details, who know the history of fishing, who have followed up the fish from the time the fry is sent out until it is ready for the market. In the maritimes there are associations that have made a special study of the fishing industry under the direction of the Department of Fisheries in Ottawa. And let me say this for the department. Prior to my time at Ottawa, and since, I have had wide experience with the officials of that department and I can say that there are no officials in any department of the government that pay more attention and give better service to an industry than do the officials of the Department of Fisheries to the Canadian fishing industry. We have a biological institution that studies very carefully the history of the fish and reports if not weekly at any rate monthly to the department the requirements of the fishermen, suggesting to the department what should be done to encourage these men to improve their conditions, and to find markets for their product. In the department here there is an organization that indicates to the fishermen the time when the fish will school, as we say in the industry: in what sections of the country and at what dates and tides it pays the fishermen to go into deep waters to catch mackerel; and so on. From the biological office there is given to the department information which indicates the best localities for codfish, and information as to conditions on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland is also available. In the department there is an organization that stimulates the fishermen to greater efforts than they have made in the past.

Under the last government the department organized a circle of fishermen's associations, not only to study the marketing business and the curing of fish, but to instruct fishermen in better methods of attaining their ends; and all this information is in the Fisheries department. All the necessary organization exists in that department. Why then impose upon the fishermen this law that places upon them, restrictions which they cannot carry out?

I am not speaking in any political sense this afternoon. If I had politics in view I would say, "Put the bill through as it is," because it would mean my election by acclamation in the county I represent. No; I have a better perspective of the duty I owe the public, the duty I owe the people I represent, the duty I owe Canada as a representative in this house. That perspective is the good of the people I represent; I want those people protected; I do not want them hampered by a law that will mean the ruin of the fishing industry.

Let me discuss the interpretation which the minister has put on the board. The registration must be made with the federal board; the minister cannot get away from that. The interpretation distinctly declares that "board" means the federal board, and it also states that local board shall mean so and so. In section after section you will find provision for recommendations to be made to the federal board by the local board. When therefore you come down to the section dealing with registration, which is one I strongly oppose in the interests of the fishermen, why should the minister tell us that registration must be made by the local board? The bill distinctly says that the board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power to do so and so. Under "interpretation" we find that:

> "Board" means the Dominion Marketing Board established under this act.

And in paragraph (b) we find that:

> "Local board" means a board authorized to administer a scheme approved under this act.

I maintain that registration and licensing must be done by the federal board, and that is not the intention of the minister. If it is his intention that it should be done by the local board, then I say he should change the bill and make it convey that meaning. The Lord help the fishermen on the Atlantic seaboard, in the way fishing is carried on there now, if they have to observe that section which forces them to register and obtain a licence.

I have said my last word on behalf of the fishermen whom I represent, and I think I am voicing the views of every fisherman on the Atlantic coast when I say that this act is not workable. Leave us as we are under the Fisheries department, and if there is need of further power then put it in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries, and not of the Minister of Agriculture. What does he know about fishing? He is not supposed to know anything about fishing. I give him credit for his knowledge of agriculture; but when you are preparing a bill dealing with natural products and include in that bill natural products which are not understood by the department that fathers the bill, then I say it is not fair to the people I represent—and the majority of the people I represent are fishermen.

After sending this bill to the people of my constituency with a request for their opinion on it, I have received letter after letter asking me to raise my voice once more in opposition to the bill. I had made up my mind not to add anything to what I said the other day because I felt I had gone far enough; but on the receipt of these letters I felt it my duty once more to protest. I would ask the minister, before he goes any further with the bill, at any rate so far as the fisheries are concerned, to go to the Department of Fisheries and consult the deputy minister and the experts there. Let him find out what they are doing for the fishermen and then see whether in his judgment it is necessary to include fish in this bill.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, on May 11 last, speaking on the budget I was just going to broach the subject of the famous bill No. 51, when my forty minutes expired.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) by his first amendment to this bill showed that the criticism of the Liberal party was fair and justified. I shall add: if the government introduced this bill to relieve the farming class, it is because the opposition compelled them to come to the rescue of the farmers whose returns, since this government is in office, have fallen off 50 to 75 per cent. Ever since 1932, the Liberal party has requested such a measure for the farming class; one has but to refer to Hansard, vol II, session 1932-33. On November 24, 1932, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) moved a resolution in the house purporting to assist agriculture. In 1933 the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) moved a resolution in connection with a trade treaty with the United States which would have had the effect of improving the lot of the farming class. In 1934, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough again moved his resolution. It was only after being compelled by the opposition that the government decided to introduce this bill No. 51 in order to help agriculture. At first, this measure could not be sanctioned by the opposition; however, with a few more amendments, it may be acceptable.

[Mr. Venoit.]

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): To prove what little interest the government have always taken in the farming class, I shall endeavour to show how they fulfil the promises made in 1930, they promised to make the farmers happy. How? By taxing them; by increasing the duty 25 per cent on cream separators; 10 per cent on barbed wire; 19 per cent on mowing machines and binders, 17½ per cent on harrows, and 15 per cent on ploughs, by increasing the sales tax from 1 cent to 6 cents, postage stamps, 1 cent, and levying a tax on sugar. I have enumerated but a few articles, because the complete list would be too long. As we are on the eve of a general election, the government introduces this measure, hoping by these new promises to again deceive the people, especially, the farmers.

In perusing bill No. 51, it is obvious that it has not been entirely draughted by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, but under the searching eye of a dictator. Thus the two following sections have been inserted in the bill:

> 14. Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.
>
> 21. Every person who, to the detriment or against the interest of the public, charges, receives or attempts to receive any spread which is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the regulated product, shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

Not satisfied with having broken the promises made to the farmers in 1930, to-day, by bill No. 51, as sections 14 and 21 testify, the government threatens the farmers with a fine or imprisonment if they do not comply with its marketing act; it is an insult to the farming class.

In 1932, sir, previous to the Imperial Economic Conference, held in Ottawa, the farmers, seeing that their distress had increased during the two years that this administration had been in office, considered it proper to suggest to the government what they themselves thought would remedy their situation, so that it might be discussed at the conference. Almost 2,000 delegates representing the farming class of all parts of Canada met here. In order to be introduced to the government this delegation comprised both Conservative and Liberal members. An interview was requested from the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett); it was only rational. What was the reply? That is the Prime Minister was too busy to receive them. They insisted that if the Prime Minister were too busy to receive them he should be represented by his Minister of Agriculture. The reply came back that his ministers as well as himself were too busy to receive them. That is the kind of interest that this government has shown towards the farming class since 1930.

The farmers, therefore, only await the opportunity to protest at the polls against the reception given to their delegates by the government in 1932, against all the taxes levied by this administration and against sections 14 and 21 of this bill which threatens all the rights and liberty they have enjoyed since confederation.

Mr. HANBURY: If it is considered advisable, would it be possible under this bill to prohibit imports of any commodity from one province to another?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say not. It certainly is not contemplated in the bill.

Mr. HANBURY: It may not be contemplated in the bill, but my interpretation of the measure is that it does give that authority. I understand that a provincial board regulates importations into a province. I may be wrong in that interpretation and if I am, I would like the minister to correct me, but if I am not wrong, then I suggest to the minister that they would have authority to prohibit importations from one province to another. I would like to have his answer to that question.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say that they have no authority to prohibit importations from one province to another.

Mr. McINTOSH: I would like to say a few words on this bill at the present moment and perhaps say something further later on. I have listened to the discussion in the house for the last few days, from members occupying the different parts of this chamber and I can truthfully say that I think the minister ought to appreciate the fact that from the fruitful discussion that has taken place certain amendments have been brought into parliament. I hope the last word with regard to amendments has not been spoken; that the good work we have started—and I am referring to the whole chamber—in modifying this bill, in so changing it that it is a better bill to-day than when it was introduced, will continue and that through that continuing transforming process we shall have evolved a bill which will be satisfactory to parliament as a whole. I believe it would be a vital blunder for parliament to accept a bill that in reality is not what it ought to be, that is not finally approved to such an extent that it will give general satisfaction not only in the house but throughout the whole of Canada. The minister has stated that in all likelihood further amendments will be brought down.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I stated that it was not a closed book as far as amendments were concerned.

Mr. McINTOSH: Exactly. That means the same thing, and I think the minister is to be congratulated on the fact that he has allowed the amendments we have had up to the moment, and on his statement that further amendments are not out of the question. To my mind that is a very vital statement, and in essence it means that this bill will be still further modified, so that by these modifications we may hope for a measure that will be satisfactory to all parties. I do not think a measure of this kind, which so vitally affects the future of the producers, should be made a political football, and any remarks I have to make will be from the point of view that further amendments should be brought down and the bill so modified that it will be a credit to parliament and Canada.

Up to the present time I think we have had twenty-two amendments to the twenty-one sections of the bill. To me that looks very much like a new bill. If any member can state when any bill was brought into this house containing only twenty-one sections to which at least twenty-two amendments were made, I am sure we would like to hear about it.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): How many amendments were moved by the committee?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is not the point. Practically every amendment brought down has evolved from the discussion in the committee, so that question does not mean anything. The hon. gentleman is only trying to dodge the issue, and he is not going to dodge it with me. Every amendment is the result of the discussion in this committee, and no hon. member sitting behind the government is going to get away with the idea that government supporters are alone responsible for these amendments. The house is responsible; the whole assembly is responsible, not the Conservative party or the government. I am willing—and I think the minister will admit that generally this is my attitude—to give the minister all credit with regard to what he has done and to repeat that as the representative of a western riding I appreciate the amendments he has brought down.

Mr. BROWN: The amendments have not been adopted as yet.

Mr. McINTOSH: An hon. member says the amendments have not been adopted. That is true, but none the less they are important, and I believe that with further amending and clarification most of the amendments will be adopted. The minister has said that the amendments are only to clarify the bill, and that they do not affect the principle at all. Well, when twenty-two amendments are made to a bill containing twenty-one sections, with section after section of the bill wiped off the slate, I think it looks very much as though these changes may result in practically a new bill. For instance, I find that paragraph (e) of section 2, having to do with the interpretation, is struck out. The new section has been made very much clearer; new thoughts have been incorporated, and it is much more concrete than it was previously.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I want to make just one observation. I think the hon. member is getting confused as between sections and subsections, is he not?

Mr. McINTOSH: I do not think so. I said that paragraph (e) of section 2 had been struck out.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understood the hon. member to say that section after section had been wiped out.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am pointing out that subsections and sections have been wiped out, and I have given one example.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The example given was a subsection.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, and rightly so. Then we come to page 2, section 3 of the bill, and we find subsection (9) wiped out entirely.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Perhaps I was not following closely. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that subsection (e) had been completely struck out, or that it had been amplified?

Mr. McINTOSH: I will use the words that appear in the amendments that are to be found on page 3 of the votes and proceedings of Friday, May 11, brought down by the minister. There it says, "Strike out paragraph (e) of this section," and if that does not mean to strike it out I should like to know what it does mean. My point is that when you strike out a subsection you are striking out a vital part of the bill as it was brought down originally and substituting something entirely new. Therefore, these amendments are something more than a clarification of the bill.

May I go on and deal with the other amendments. The minister in his amendments says that subsection (9) of section 3 is to be struck out, and I need not read what is to be inserted. Then on page 3 paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 4 is to be struck out; paragraphs (c), (e) and (i) of the same section are to be struck out as well. Then on page 4 we have subsection after subsection struck out.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I interrupt again just to get this clear? I do not wish to follow the hon. member in all that he has said, but I would refer to paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 4, which he mentioned. The only change made in that paragraph is the word "agency."

Mr. McINTOSH: That is an entirely new idea added to that section of the bill, and that is my point. I do not see why the minister should object, because I think it improves the bill. Does the minister suggest that he does not want to improve the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not at all; I do not want the hon. member to misrepresent what has been done. That is all. I am quite willing to accept any statement that is in accordance with what has been done, but I think he is going pretty far afield in the statements he is making.

Mr. McINTOSH: I do not wish to misrepresent. I might turn the tables on the minister and say that because he is differing from me the minister is trying to misrepresent. It is the same idea.

Let me continue—I am not sure just how far I had proceeded when I was interrupted. So many sections and subsections have been struck out that one almost gets lost in the forest of changes. Anyway, I believe I had reached section 4, where it is indicated that paragraph (8) is added, following paragraph (7). Then paragraph (3) of section 5 is struck out and paragraph (b) of subsection (5) of section 5 is struck out. Then turning to page 6 of the bill we find that section 9 is struck out, section 10 is struck out and section 11 is struck out. I think these are most of the strike-outs, and this prolific "strike-out" ball game is just about over. I am inclined to believe those who say that in this lively strike-out game the bill has been entirely changed, and that we have a new bill. There is no doubt about it, we have made the bigger score—won the day.

Now let me proceed. The name given to the bill when it was introduced was:

An act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

I may say that as a member from western Canada I am wholly in favour of a marketing bill—that is, a real marketing bill, and not a political bill. I refer to a marketing bill, and nothing more. I am in favour of such a bill for the simple reason that for the last twenty-two or twenty-four years I have lived in an agricultural area of western Canada. During that time I have stood behind the farmers both on the public platform and in the press. I have stood by the farmers—the cooperative organizations of western Canada, the grain growers, the wheat pool—through that period of time, and I am not going to allow any man or party in this house to try to put me in a position whereby a continuation of that support will not be given.

Mr. LOUCKS: You should have voted for the bill then, and not against it. Why did you vote against it?

Mr. McINTOSH: I voted for the introduction of the bill. And if you will just hold your peace for a little while you will know the position I take. If you want to know why I did not register my vote for the bill on second reading, it was because I knew the bill was so utterly imperfect, that you would be forced to bring down amendments. That is the reason.

Mr. LOUCKS: You have to admit to having changed the principle of the bill.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is what I have said. Further than that I do not admit anything, so far as you are concerned.

Mr. LOUCKS: That is characteristic of you.

Mr. McINTOSH: As I said, I am for a marketing bill which will find a market in Canada or out of Canada for our natural products, or the products evolving therefrom. I am for a marketing bill for which there will be full ministerial responsibility. I am for a marketing bill which will be backed up by full parliamentary responsibility. I am for a marketing bill which will rest on the freedom of thought and action of the producers concerned, which will be built from the foundation up and not from the top down, which will be democratic and not bureaucratic. I believe the farmers are anxious to have that kind of bill, and an organization based upon that kind of bill. Then, I am for a marketing bill that is fully constitutional and that will not result in litigation later on and thereby become a source of expense to the community, the provinces, and the nation. More than that, I am for a marketing bill which will be accorded national support from the start, and will not divide the support of the producers, thereby bringing about confusion worse confounded. I am for a marketing bill, in other words, that is not a political bill, that is not a bureaucratic bill and which is not, to a great degree, based on any crumbling state socialism or fascism.

What about the bill which was introduced to this house, and about which I should like to say a word or two? The reason I was not very much in favour of it, as at first introduced, was that I could not make myself believe that the short title of the bill, namely the Natural Products Marketing Act 1934, was a correct short title. I would say that perhaps it could be better named: The Natural Products Unnatural Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Unparliamentary Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Unconstitutional Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Non-Cooperative Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Experimental Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Compulsory Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Restrictive Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Destructive Marketing Bill, or The Natural Products Unconstitutional and Uneconomic Marketing Bill. That is the reason I was not very much enamoured of the bill when it came to the house, and that is the reason I wish now to congratulate the minister upon the number of amendments which have been brought down, because those amendments have entirely transformed the bill and made a new one which I hope, with further amendments, I shall be able to support.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: By the chattering of some hon. members sitting behind the government it would seem they must think this bill is about right at the present time. That does not indicate much because even before the amendments were brought down we heard member after member sitting on the government side of the house state that the bill, which was far from right, was all right. If it was all right then, it must be much better now, and we hope it will be better still when further amendments are added to the measure now before the chamber.

Mr. LOUCKS: The principle of the bill is exactly the same, despite all you have said.

Mr. McINTOSH: No. I do not think I need say much more at the present time. I hope that amendments which, I believe, are in the offing will be brought down forthwith, because the sooner they are brought down the sooner the discussion will be over, the sooner we will have the bill remodified so that it may be generally acceptable throughout Canada. May I repeat that I think the minister is to be commended upon the many changes which have been made in the new bill before the house. If these are indicative of what we may expect in the nature of further amendments I may say that I believe there will be a greater degree of unanimity and co-operation in connection with the bill than we had at first expected.

Mr. HEAPS: I am more than pleased to witness the somewhat changed attitude of some hon members sitting to my right. It seems that now there is not very much difference between the contending factions in the committee. In fact, we have almost reached a stage of unanimity, and possibly with one or two further slight amendments the bill might go from the committee and, after third reading, be adopted as the unanimous legislation of the House of Commons. I am only too pleased to observe that I should be happy to do anything within my power to bring about unanimity. However, I have no desire in view of the statements that were made here last night and this afternoon to get into any controversy over the different aspects of this bill because it appears that controversy is almost a thing of the past so far as many phases of this bill are concerned. We are all agreed that in a measure of this kind there has to be a certain amount of compulsion or coercion, and the idea of a particular group voting for a new kind of economic council being formed is one I think that is accepted generally. Some are fearful because it will be occupational groups who will vote for a scheme under this bill, instead of the community as a whole. We are living in an age where because of economic conditions we are compelled to experiment along different lines perhaps than have been followed in the past.

I rose to point out that there have been a number of occupational groups who have come to committees of this house or to parliament within the past few months to request that councils of one kind or another be set up to deal with their particular industry. I have them enumerated here.

We have had the tobacco growers come to a committee of this house and ask for some form of council in their industry to protect the growers. We have had the furniture trade come and ask for some code, if you wish to call it that, in their industry. Those engaged in the clothing trade have also come and asked for a code. The retail merchants of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific are all wanting some form of code to give them an opportunity of merchandising their commodities on what they consider a fair basis. Then those on the farm raising hogs and cattle want some form of council in their industry to give them the protection which they have not got at the present time. Those who are engaged in the packing industry have also come to a committee of this house and requested some form of regulation to give them protection in their industry. Only within the past twenty-four hours we have had those engaged in the fruit industry come before a committee of this house asking that something be done to protect the industry by which they attempt to make a living.

Then, in milk production, already in the province of Alberta legislation has been passed for the fixing of prices, and similarly in Manitoba, and I believe that in the province of Quebec—if I am wrong I hope I shall be corrected—legislation has been passed to deal with the milk situation in that province. I could go on and say that this house on many occasions in the past has gone on record for some form of compulsion in regard to one industry or another. In 1929 when my hon. friends opposite were sitting on this side of the house they were opposed to compulsory unemployment and sickness insurance, while the Liberal party was in favour of some form of compulsory unemployment and health insurance.

We can have no legislation of any kind for the well-being of the majority of the people without some form of compulsion. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I shall not deal with that aspect of the question.

As I said before, I think we have got to the stage where we are all fairly unanimous in regard to some of the provisions of this bill. But last night the leader of the opposition made a suggestion to the minister who is piloting this bill through the committee that if certain amendments were made to part 1 of the bill such as have been made to part 2, he would be ready to support the measure. The request of the leader of the opposition was not an unreasonable one. The amendments that he was requesting from the government I believe were not unreasonable, and I am just wondering if the minister who by now has probably had time to consider that request is in a position to give an answer to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No specific amendments have been submitted, but as I have said, amendments will be considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) a question just to make clear to the committee what may be in his mind? Does he see any difference in principle between trade unions, for example, demanding the right to compel those in similar branches of trade to enter the union and to abide by such regulations as the union itself may make with respect to wages, hours and working conditions, and what is proposed here with regard to organizations of producers?

Mr. HEAPS: There is a great deal of similarity in the two. The trade unions of this country and of other countries have made it one of their cardinal principles to be in favour of the closed shop, and that is exactly the principle that is being followed, in my opinion, in regard to certain provisions of this bill except that a trade union may take in much larger groups than the occupational groups coming under this measure. But so far as the principle here is concerned, it is more or less the same principle that has been followed by trade unions for many generations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask this further question? Would it not be most unfair to the trade unions to compel their members to pay the higher prices which they may be obliged to pay for commodities, assuming prices of commodities hereafter are to be determined by occupational groups or closed organizations of producers, unless the trade unions too were to be accorded exactly the same kind of opportunity of fixing wages and other conditions?

Mr. HEAPS: The trade unions have always insisted on a fair wage for a fair day's work, and we are prepared to give to others exactly what we are advocating for ourselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman has not answered the question. I have asked whether the trade unions would be perfectly content after this legislation is passed to remain in the position in which they are at the present time, and not make any demand that they themselves be treated as regards the sale of their labour, and conditions under which they may be obliged to work in a manner similar to that in which this act proposes to treat the producer's organizations, should they be obliged to pay higher prices for regulated products.

Mr. HEAPS: I would not want to see the trade unions in an unfair position in relation to any other class, but the trade unions and working people of this country are not prepared to see the farmer giving away his stuff and compelled to live on a standard below the ordinary standard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We all agree to that.

Mr. HEAPS: The trade unionist is in this position: He is advocating for the farmer the things he has been advocating for himself for many a long year. If prices rise too high, far beyond what is necessary to recompense the farmer for his effort, we will naturally object to that, but I hope that with the forming of these occupational groups or local economic councils in particular industries prices will be so regulated that they will be fair to the producer and fair to the consumer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where is there any provision in the bill which will ensure that?

Mr. HEAPS: I do hope, Mr. Chairman, that before the bill is passed, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre stressed yesterday, some action will be taken to safeguard the interests of the consumer in that respect.

Mr. LOUCKS: I just want to say a word on the point raised by the leader of the opposition. If the producers get a higher price that will be reflected back in increased purchasing power for the labouring man. The leader of the opposition—I give him credit for sincerity—seems to be very fearful for the minority. I am a farmer. Suppose I am a minority farmer, a competitor of my neighbour, and I refuse to come in under this scheme put forward for the industry. If there is no control over me I can practically destroy the price that my neighbour farmer and the majority group of farmers should receive for their products. I do not see anything dreadful about the position of the minority at all. When I do that, to a certain extent I destroy my own price as a competitor. I depress prices and, therefore, I destroy myself. I do not see anything very wrong with this bill. If a small minority does not come into the scheme, it will receive the same price as that received by the majority. There are bound to be certain individuals who cannot see their way clear to come in but if a majority thinks there is a possibility of raising commodity prices, those prices will be raised to the minority which has refused to come in. On the other hand, if we do not do something like this everyone will be hurt because prices may be depressed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend referred to me and I hope I have not misunderstood him. His argument seems to imply that higher prices will assist in the way of augmenting purchasing power.

Mr. LOUCKS: Yes, that is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not agree with that. The rise might be carried to a point where you would not have any demand. My hon. friend should remember that there is always that danger. As far as the rights of minorities are concerned, may I say that the protection of the rights of minorities is a fundamental obligation upon parliament itself, as well as on all members of parliament. It is the particular obligation of a party that happens itself to be a minority. Sooner or later everyone comes to be in the minority with regard to something, and unless the rights of minorities are protected, liberty itself will soon disappear. I agree with my hon. friend when he says that the man in the community who seeks to lower standards and who is prepared to undersell by unscrupulous and unfair methods should be summarily dealt with, but I believe parliament itself has plenty of scope and power to pass the regulations necessary to deal with that class of persons and that kind of behaviour. I think it should be parliament and not local groups that should make the regulations that are to govern industrial and commercial practices. In a word, my objection is simply this: So far as the regulating in this measure goes, it is not initiated or even concluded by parliament. Parliament is left out of the picture altogether; the whole thing is left in the hands of local self-interested groups and with the minister or the governor in council. Parliament is ignored altogether.

[Mr. Loucks.]

Mr. GOLDING: I should like to ask the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) who has just spoken, what he considers is the final object of this bill?

Mr. HEAPS: I have been in the house for a month or so but I am sorry that I do not know just what it is. I think it is to regulate and try to help the primary producers and to relieve them of the condition in which they now find themselves. Evidently there is to be regulation and control in some way of the production and sale of the things they produce.

Mr. GOLDING: And of prices.

Mr. HEAPS: And prices as well. I should like to revert to the point I raised a moment ago. I do not intend to deal with the details of the bill but I feel that the various factions in the committee have reached a stage where there is not very much between them. I was wondering if we could not get over that bridge. Perhaps the minister would be willing to adopt the suggestion made last night by the leader of the opposition. I should like to quote his remarks which appear on page 3316 of Hansard, as follows:

> If a similar change could be made with respect to part I of this legislation, whereby these local organizations might make reports to the ministry of conditions as they exist and the ministry take the responsibility of enacting legislation or passing orders in council which would be generally known and made generally applicable from coast to coast, then so far as I am concerned I would cease to have any opposition to the measure as a measure of an experimental character.

I do not think the request of the leader of the opposition was at all unreasonable and I would like to see the government accept his proposal. Perhaps then the measure could be passed without much further delay.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not intend to raise the question of offences and regulations, but I think the matter mentioned yesterday by the leader of the opposition represents only a difference of opinion as to its meaning. I think this bill contains exactly what the right hon. gentleman referred to. Under this bill the producers would submit to the minister in charge conditions as they find them with suggestions for improvement. These are submitted to the cabinet and we act on those suggestions, or otherwise.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it the contention of the minister that what the right hon. leader of the opposition suggested yesterday is already part of the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): According to my understanding of what he said, it is.

Mr. HEAPS: Upon what does the minister base that understanding?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Upon the language of the bill.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Am I to understand that all the opposition of the official opposition hinges upon this one point, namely, that the local organizations should make reports?

Mr. GOLDING: With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). If I gather anything at all from his remarks, they were to the effect that this bill is going to regulate prices. I should like to say to the hon. member that I know something about trade unions. As a machinist, I have been a member of a union and I know something about the work of the unions. I know something about workers' conditions and I know something about the objects of trade unions. I might say that they have not always been as fair as my hon. friend represents.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are speaking about trade unions?

Mr. GOLDING: Yes. Discussing this bill yesterday, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) referred to farmers bringing in their wheat to an elevator. He pointed out that under present conditions if a farmer was not satisfied with the price offered for his wheat, he could not leave it at the elevator but had to take it home again. The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) corrected him. I should like to read the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which was as follows:

> I am afraid my statement has been entirely misunderstood. My statement is that the individual farmer is helpless. He takes his grain to the elevator, and if there is room the elevator man will take it. But if the farmer is not satisfied with the price offered, or with any other condition, the only possible procedure open to him is to turn around and take his grain home again.
>
> Mr. Vallance: Will this bill change it?
>
> Mr. Woodsworth: Yes, this will change it.

I should like to ask the minister if he wants the impression to go out through the western part of this country that should this bill go into effect the farmer is going to get just the price that is satisfactory to him? That is the inference here. Not very long ago the minister pointed out that the primary object of the bill was not to regulate prices but to regulate the marketing of products. The inference in this statement is that the bill is going to regulate prices to such an extent that the farmer will receive a price satisfactory to him. I contend there is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps it is not my position to do so, but I would point out that when you regulate the marketing of a product you will also be regulating the price. You cannot have one without the other. If you do not have a market, then you do not have a price. It may be somewhat out of place at this time, but the hon. member has referred to the unfair practices of trade unions.

Mr. GOLDING: In many cases.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, no organization is perfect.

Mr. GOLDING: You admit it.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not say that any organization was perfect, and I do not admit anything. I do say however that if the hon. gentleman were a good trade unionist he would take the opportunity of saying something in support of a measure dealing with unfair practices.

Mr. MITCHELL: I might ask the hon. gentleman this question. How would you deal with the present situation between the Imperial Tobacco Company and the growers? What are you to do about it? Where an organization overnight can cut in half the price of tobacco to the producers, unless you give the producers some opportunity to organize themselves they are lost forever. Let me say this to the hon. gentleman as a trade unionist. This year the British trade union congress will meet to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the Todpuddle martyrs when men who tried to establish trade unionism were transported to Australia for seven years. That was the birth of the organization. When the history of these times is written it will be acknowledged, notwithstanding all the criticism that may now be made of trade unionism, that the trade unions have made a real contribution to the lives of the working people of Canada and of every other country in which the movement exists. The only difference between the Kaffir in Africa and the Canadian is that one had the sense to organize and the other had not. The trade unions have been the driving force behind social change in every country where it has been exerted. I am not apologizing. We have made mistakes, because we are a human institution.

Mr. GOLDING: That was all I said.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is quite enough.

Mr. GOLDING: You admit it.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, I will not admit it.

Mr. GOLDING: You did admit it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Has the Liberal party made mistakes?

Mr. GOLDING: Yes, of course. In answer to my hon. friend, in regard to the tobacco growers—and all this is out of order—I would point out that we have a Combines Investigation Act which could have been invoked, and should have been invoked. In regard to trade unions, my hon. friend has admitted that they have made mistakes, and I admit quite frankly, as a member at one time of a trade union, that they sometimes did things that were not fair. Everyone will agree to that.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) agreed to.

On paragraph (d)—Minister.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Can the minister give us any enlightenment as to who is likely to have charge of the administration of the act? Perhaps he can tell us why in this bill he has departed from the regular practice of indicating the minister, leaving us with a guessing competition as to who the hon. gentleman is to be. It is not a principle which I will make any fuss about, but I should be glad if he would tell us why the government has made this departure. So far as I know, it has been the practice in the past always to indicate what minister would administer the act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend may assume that in all human probability the administration of the act will be under the Minister of Agriculture. However, for greater convenience and some elasticity the bill has been drafted in its present form, as it is realized that agriculture is not the only natural product involved. I do not think I am going out of my way if I say that we may assume that the Minister of Agriculture will be the man.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will accept that as satisfactory but judging from the multitude of provisions in the bill, and the claim which so many ministers could easily put in for the task, I was anxious to ascertain whether it might be the minister of mass buyings and Yorkshire geldings who would be put in charge.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (e)—Natural product.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I move that paragraph (e) be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

"natural product" includes animals, meats, eggs, wool, dairy products, grains, seeds, fruit and fruit products, vegetables and vegetable products, maple products, honey, tobacco, lumber, and such other natural products of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product that may be designated by the governor in council, in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It would be ungracious of me to criticize this, but it really is not as good as it looks. I like the list the minister has outlined as being in the main the easiest to start with. It is an excellent list and a better one than I suggested myself, but I merely indicated in a general way what I had in mind when I mentioned ten or a dozen items which could be enlarged by parliament and not by order in council as in the bill. However, we cannot expect a perfect bill and I will not press this point over much. I hope that the hon. gentleman will confine himself to this list for a year or two while others are being got ready. If he does that he will do well, because this is I take it in the main a guide to the country as to what the government has in mind with respect to the commodities that should be proceeded with first. Others can follow later.

Mr. BROWN: Before we hastily pass this list I think it should be given some consideration. On the title of the bill there was a good deal of discussion that might more properly have taken place under this clause, and it seems strange that those who spoke about certain natural products included in this list are not here now to reaffirm their objections to certain items which it contains. The thing of outstanding interest to farmers on the prairies is grain, particularly wheat. Can the minister say whether under the conditions that now prevail in the marketing of wheat there is any possibility of this scheme being put into effect in the immediate future in connection with wheat? We know that the government has entered into certain commitments with other countries with respect to the marketing of wheat, and that is one thing that might be taken into consideration. Something else that should be considered is that the marketing of wheat, as at present provided for, has developed over a long period of years. Since the beginning of the century certain grievances have arisen in connection with wheat marketing, and after a great deal of agitation on the part of the farmers with respect to some of these grievances the grain act was introduced regulating the conditions governing the marketing of wheat. That was followed by the Canada Grain Act. We would like to know whether there is any scheme that is to be put into effect that will in any way affect the operation of this very efficient body that has been created, the board of grain commissioners, a board that I think all the farmers of the west have perfect confidence in as regards its personnel. I believe the different boards of grain commissioners that have operated during the past have rendered very effective and efficient service. There was a great deal of unfair criticism against the former board. I was not by any means in sympathy with the criticisms that were directed against that board; I think they were mostly unfair and in some cases promoted by those who wished to cover up some of the mistakes that had been made by some of the organizations in carrying out the operation of selling wheat. But I think it is very important to know how this new board, if it is to be constituted, is to operate in connection with the present board of grain commissioners.

I want to state that the chief concern today is not in regard to marketing machinery in connection with our grain; it is in regard to getting markets for our grain and in this bill there is not the slightest indication of anything that will improve our markets. I know the claim has been made by those who advocate a one hundred per cent pool, that if they had only had control we would not have got into the difficulty in regard to marketing our wheat. As I stated before, any such claim as that is absolutely without foundation and absurd. I want to say this for the pools—and I have said it before—that they came upon a period of very hard times. Had the grain fluctuations been simply the normal, possibly the pools would have survived; they could not stand up under the tremendous fall in prices that took place. At the same time that does not justify those who are not only sympathetic but fanatically sympathetic toward the pools, in making the claim that they could have saved the situation if they had had one hundred per cent control. A more absurd claim could not be advanced.

I want to know from the minister just what the proposition is in regard to grain. Is there any likelihood under conditions as they prevail at present of advantage being taken, if it is deemed to be an advantage, of this bill to organize under it, or in view of the present situation is it wise, by including grain in this list, even to give the suggestion that the grain trade might be organized under the bill? As I have said already, to my mind the most important matter is not what our marketing machinery will be but where we are going to get markets for our grain and in this bill there is not the slightest indication of anything that will open markets to us. That is, after all, the point in which the farmers of the west are most interested and it is one on which they are under a good deal of misapprehension. There is undoubtedly a certain amount of support from the west for a marketing bill, but it is on the supposition that the bill is one that will get markets for our stuff. That is the thought which is uppermost in the minds of the farmers. That is true particularly in regard to grain; they suppose it is a bill that will do something towards securing markets for them, but in the bill there is not the slightest indication of anything of the kind. Therefore I would make the suggestion that in view of the present situation, grain be excluded from this bill. The government have made commitments. At the moment I am not going to say whether those negotiations that have been entered into and that have resulted in certain agreements may be good or bad; that is not the point at present. Those commitments have been made and in view of the present grain situation I suggest that it might not be wise even to indicate the possibility of the formation of a board to handle grain.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will the minister tell the committee whether fibre and flax will be included in this along with other natural products?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that they are not specifically included as the clause reads.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) expects an answer. So far as I am aware—and my opinion in this respect is not worth any more than his—I know of no immediate contemplation of the formation of the compulsory pool to which he referred; and certainly not of one that would in any way interfere with the Grain Act as it stands so far as the board of grain commissioners are concerned, but at any rate the best safeguard is this, that before any such scheme would be put forward it would have to be put forward by a large majority of the grain farmers. I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me that each farmer in the west is as intelligent as he or I and perhaps many of them are more so in ascertaining whether it is in his best interest.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I should like to say something on this subclause, but it is almost six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Just before the dinner hour, Mr. Chairman, we were dealing with section 2, subsection (e), which reads:

"Natural product" includes animals, meats, eggs, wool, dairy products, grains—and so on. I need not read the entire section. This is the amended subsection, by the way. The principle of this bill has been very throughly discussed on the second reading, and in fact I think the principle was discussed again on the short title. Heretofore I have not taken any part in the debate on this bill, and I do not believe I would have done so at this time except for the fact that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) raised the question of wheat prior to the dinner hour. The hon. gentleman rose in his place and advocated that wheat should be left outside the scope of this bill. I was rather surprised to hear him express himself in that way, but he was just expressing the views that I find recorded in a publication issued in Winnipeg called The Country Guide, under date of May, 1934. This publication contains quite an extended article, which I do not propose to read, which I believe was prepared by the board of the United Grain Gorwers, who ask that wheat should be handled separately They go on to point out why grain should be excluded from the marketing act, and when I turn to the editorial page of this same issue I find the editor expressing himself in these words:

The opinion expressed elsewhere in this issue by R. S. Law, President of United Grain Growers, that grain should be excluded from the provisions of the natural products marketing bill, will commend itself to the grain growers generally.

The hon. member for Lisgar expressed those sentiments fairly well; in fact I believe some of the arguments he advanced are quoted in this article almost as he gave them. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I come from an agricultural constituency; the occupation of my people is farming, and they grow wheat almost entirely. So when you advocate leaving wheat outside the scope of this marketing act certainly it touches the people whom I represent. During the past week or so I have received a number of telegrams, which I have before me, from wheat pool committees, wheat pool directors and one from the mayor of a town, I have a letter as well. All these communications are along the same line, and I am going to read the letter in order to set forth the opinion of the grain growers in my section of Saskatchewan. The letter is addressed to myself under date of May 7, and reads:

Dear Sir:

It has just been brought to my attention that there is a strong movement to have wheat excluded from the operations of the natural products marketing act.

The farmers in this community look with strong disfavour on any attempt that may be made to have wheat excluded from the operation of this act.

I sincerely trust we can look to you to use your good offices and influence to have wheat included—

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) William Shaw.

That is a good sample of the telegrams and communications I have received. So far as my personal opinion goes I certainly think wheat should be included with the other natural products. The hon. member for Lisgar seemed to think there might be a possibility that the board of grain commissioners would be set aside. I do not think that is likely to happen, or that the Canada Grain Act will be set aside. I believe both the grain board and the grain act will be used under the new marketing bill. For several years we have had in western Canada a wheat pool which functioned very satisfactorily until the great slump in 1929. Since that time they have not been functioning as satisfactorily or as fully. I want to state here most emphatically—and I think I am stating the opinion of a great many farmers—that the private interests handling the grain are not indispensable. A great many farmers hold the view, which I share, that private interests controlling and handling our wheat, such as the United Grain Growers, are not by any means indispensable. In other words it is quite possible for the farmers of western Canada to handle their wheat independently of any such organization as the United Grain Growers or any other private body.

In order to acquaint the committee with what transpired last year in connection with the prices of grain in western Canada I am going to quote a few statistics which I have before me. I have here the prices for No. 1 Northern wheat in Winnipeg, the closing cash prices from January 1, 1933, to December 31 of the same year. Some interesting information is contained in those figures, and I think it bears very definitely on the question raised by the hon. member for Lisgar. I am not going to read the prices for the whole year, but I am going to deal with that portion of the season when the farmers of the west had very little grain in their possession and were marketing a comparatively small quantity of the 1932 crop. I will start with May 2, 1933. On that date the closing cash price for No. 1 Northern wheat at Winnipeg was 61⅛ cents. On June 7 the closing price was 61¼ cents, so that over a period of thirty-six days the price remained fairly uniform. There were some fluctuations during that period, but the highest price was 65½ cents while the lowest price was 61⅛ cents; that was the entire spread during that period. On June 8, however, the price began to advance steadily; on that date it was 62⅛ cents. Then jumping over to June 24 we find that it increased to 69⅞ cents. That is an advance of 7¾ cents in sixteen days. Well, there is nothing very alarming about that. But on June 26,—I believe the 24th was a Saturday, and there was no market on Sunday the 25th,—on Monday the 26th, the price was 74¼ cents or an increase of 4⅜ cents in one day.

Mr. YOUNG: Why the advance?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: We will take the figures first, and then deal with the possible cause of the advance. The day following the 26th, June 27, the price had jumped to 79⅛ cents, an advance of 4⅞ cents over the previous day. Then, the following day, June 28, the price had dropped to 74½ cents, representing a slump or a decrease of 4⅝ cents in one day. On June 30, it had further receded to 72¼ cents, or another 2¼ cents down in two days. July 1, was a holiday, and the next open market was on July 3. On that day the closing price had jumped up to 79⅛ cents, or an increase of 6⅞ cents per bushel over the holiday. Then, I shall jump over to July the intervening figures. On that date the price was 83¾ cents. On July 11, the next day, it was 88 cents, or an increase of 4¼ cents in one day. On July 18, a week later, it was 94 cents. I believe that was the peak, or the highest price it reached. Here is the point I wish to emphasize: Next day, July 19, the price dropped back to 87¼ cents, or a slump of 6¾ cents in one day. On the 20th, it had dropped back to 78¼ cents, or a slump of another 9 cents. Then, on the 22nd, it was back to 73⅜ cents.

The hon. member has asked why there were increases. It would have been just as much in order to ask why there were decreases. That is what a number of farmers in western Canada would like to know. They would like to know why there were these very great price spreads in the period of the year when there was very little wheat moving out of the bins of the producers. Of course there was some wheat stored on the farms, but it was a comparatively small amount. This question might well be asked: Why were there these fluctuations in price? The reason was that the crop prospects did not look any too good during the months of June and July, and what we may call the gamblers—some people would be more modest and call them speculators—got into the grain market and, through their gambling propensities succeeded in unwarrantably raising the price of wheat. But the part which gets a great many producers of grain is that the price of wheat should go up four or five cents on one day and then, perhaps one day after, drop back five or six cents. When we realize that a spread of even one cent per bushel in the price of wheat makes thousands of dollars for those who happen to be handling it, we realize the importance of the price changes. For instance, if a trader should sell 100,000 bushels of wheat with a margin of only one cent per bushel gain he would make $1,000 on the transaction. If the spread were, as in some cases I have shown, as high as nine cents per bushel, or even five cents, one can easily realize that on 100,000 bushels a dealer would make considerable money.

But what about the grain producer? It is true that some who got into the market did make money, but I could take hon. members to a great many homes in western Canada where farmers, and others, who were influenced to go into wheat speculation or gambling lost thousands of dollars, and to many of them that loss spelt almost tragedy. The 1933 crop was not harvested during the time of the quotations I have given; it was just growing. In Manitoba it would not be harvested until the early part of August, and in Saskatchewan until the middle or the 20th of August. On August 18, the price had dropped back to 68½ cents per bushel. Here is a point worth emphasizing: On May 18, wheat was quoted at 63⅛ cents per bushel and on August 8, following intervening fluctuations, it had come back to 68½ cents. But during that three months period, despite the fact that at the end of the time there is a rise of less than five cents, there has been a fluctuation of over 30 cents a bushel.

I am bringing these points to the attention of the committee to emphasize the need for including wheat within the scope of this marketing bill. While the wheat pool is not functioning at the present time there are many farmers in western Canada who do not look upon it as a completely dead issue. It is true that in 1929 the wheat pool suffered financial reverses, but so did the private grain trade. There are men in western Canada who were involved in the handling of grain, either as private companies or private individuals, who suffered very heavy losses during the 1929 slump. The farmers in my constituency —and I believe I speak for the great percentage of the farmers in Saskatchewan—are expecting that times are going to become normal in the future, and perhaps in the not too distant future. When times become normal those farmers want the machinery at their disposal so that they may be able again to set up a farmers' marketing organization, if they choose to do so. There is no threat that they are going to do so, but they just wish to have the machinery available so that if they come to the point where they wish to organize a wheat pool and have it functioning as it has functioned in the past, they may have the machinery available for so doing.

I have made these remarks largely in answer to the expressions of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I wondered why he took the stand he did take. I do not think he is so close to Winnipeg that he needs to reflect the viewpoint of the grain trade. I believe his is an agricultural constituency, although possibly it is not devoted to grain growing quite as extensively as is my own constituency. In any case, I do not pretend to give his reasons for advancing his arguments. I wish to emphasize my own argument, namely, that the people I represent want grains included in the marketing bill, and they insist upon wheat being included within the category of grains.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) has answered my remarks on the assumption that I was opposed to the wheat pool. Nothing of the kind, I was a member of the wheat pool. As long as I was raising grain and the pools were operating I gave my wheat to the pools, and it was handled by them. I have criticized the management of the wheat pools, although there was a time when, as the Minister of Railways said the other day, it was as much as a man's political life was worth to make a criticism. The wheat pools made a mistake, there is no question about that, and all I ask of them is that they admit their mistake. The wheat pool may be the proper way of handling wheat, and I have no objection to people joining together to handle their wheat through a wheat pool. My only objection has been to an attempt by legislation to force a one hundred per cent wheat pool on the people of the west. That is a sufficient answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: I was particularly interested this afternoon when the hon. minister stated that he was still open to suggestions and that the door would not be closed to further amendments. I have an amendment to offer to the section under discussion, but before presenting it I would like to make a few brief remarks.

Practically all, if not all, the speeches made on this bill since its introduction into the house have been made with regard to agriculture with the exception of the speeches that were made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I am not at all surprised that that should be the case because, first of all, we have this bill in charge of the Minister of Agriculture, and secondly I believe practically all the demand for marketing legislation has come from agriculturists throughout the country.

Some member suggested this afternoon that this act will be an experiment in legislation. The suggestion I am going to make to the minister is that we start by dealing with one product at a time. I have recollections of the great difficulties we encountered in British Columbia before our Milk Producers Act and Natural Products Act in the province became law, and I think the government would be well advised to go a little slowly and deal only with agricultural products in the first place because if the difficulties met with are the same that we met with in British Columbia before we reached a definite conclusion, there will certainly be lots of complications in the administration of this bill throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

I am of the strong opinion that no demand has come from the fishing industry or the lumbering industry to come under this bill. Perhaps these products are being included in the bill with the idea of applying quotas to them. I do not expect that the hon. Minister of Agriculture would know a great deal of the difficulties or complications that might arise if the canning industry in British Columbia through its representatives were to ask for a board to be set up in that province. In British Columbia there are some forty-four canneries and well over five thousand gill net fishermen, most of whom own their gear and boats. The minister might say that these fishermen might get together and ask for a board to be set up, but so long as the bill provides that producers and marketers can come to the minister for a board my belief is that the marketers, the canned salmon industry, will probably be the first to ask for a board to be set up to control the product of fishing, namely, canned salmon. If such should be the case, I fear very greatly what might happen to the fishermen. The fishermen might want and did want to start a cooperative association of their own so that they could market their product. That association has not been in operation during the past year or so and were a board to be set up by the canners any movement on behalf of the fishermen for a cooperative association might very well be blocked, and the board that was acting on behalf of the canners might also control both the method of catching fish and the price of the product. I very much fear that that would not be in the interests of the fishermen.

I would ask the minister to tell me if any requests have been made on behalf of the fishing and lumbering industries to come under a bill of this kind. I know that the minister has had lots of requests on behalf of the farmers. I know that the apple growers, the fruit men and the milk producers of my province are demanding some sort of marketing legislation, but I doubt very much if any request has come to the minister from either of these other two industries, and I do appeal to the minister on behalf of the fishermen particularly to eliminate from the amendment now before the house some of the natural products contained in it, and that in particular the natural products of the sea, lake or river and forest be eliminated.

For the benefit of the committee I may say that there are some three hundred saw mills in the province of British Columbia, and I think I am correct when I suggest that probably ten of these mills produce seventy-five per cent of the total production. If the production had to be reduced by some ten or fifteen per cent I am of the strong opinion that the small mills would be the ones compelled to shut down. I urge this in all sincerity because I am not putting a hypothetical case, or setting up a straw man to be knocked down. I am stating what I believe to be the case from my experience. I maintain that so long as producers and marketers remain in the bill the danger I have suggested exists in regard to the fishing and lumbering industry, and I think the minister and the government would be well advised to consider dealing only with farm products at the beginning, and try the act out with regard to them. I doubt if any other country has gone so far at one jump as to include the natural products of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink, and agricultural products. If the act works out well for the farmers with agricultural products, which I am bound to admit do require some assistance, it might then well be extended to other industries, but I doubt if these other industries have asked for it. I would like the minister to tell me if they have.

I would also suggest that we might make better progress if we allowed the contentious clauses to stand and proceeded to consider the other ones. Will the minister consider eliminating from the amendment which he has offered the products of the forest, sea, lake or river?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not at hand any requests that have been made from either the fishing industry or the lumbering industry. There is no doubt that if the fishermen or the fishing industry do not feel that there is any need for the application of this part of the bill there will be no local board set up.

I would ask the hon. member for New Westminster to consider this other phase, if the marketing of fish, for example, or the fishing industry is everything that could be desired? Does he not think from his closer contact with the industry from his location than some of the rest of us have that it might be possible in some way for the Dominion Marketing Board to be of assistance to the fishing industry without the application of this particular method of submitting a scheme? No scheme would be set up unless a majority of the fishermen or of those engaged in the industry asked for it. So they are protected in that way.

But aside from that I gather from debates that I have heard in this house about the condition of the fishing industry, and from the suggestions that have been made to improve it that the Dominion Marketing Board might be able to be of great assistance to the fishing industry, but for that purpose the definition would have to remain as it is.

Mr. REID: Perhaps the minister has not caught my point. If you retain in the bill the words "producer" or "marketer" you make it possible for a marketer to ask for a board to be set up, as distinct from the producer who could also ask for a board and you also make it possible for a "producer and marketer" to ask for a board. There are three distinct bodies. There is the producer as a producer, the marketer as a marketer, and there is also the producer and marketer, because some products are both produced and marketed by farmers and others. I do not think the minister caught my point as to the fishing industry. In British Columbia you have, on the one hand, the producer, the fisherman who owns his own gear and boat, at considerable cost. He produces the fish and then another man or a company purchases them and markets them. I was thinking of a marketer coming to the minister and asking for a board to be set up to be distinct from the board set up by the producers. I think there is great danger in that and I doubt if such a board set up by the canners would be of any benefit to the fishermen. We now have all kinds of rules and regulations and inspections to govern quality and I do not think such a board would improve matters. I do not know whether the minister has got my point with regard to the producers, on the one hand, and the marketers on the other; the fishermen, on the one hand, and the cannery men on the other.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand it.

Mr. NEILL: I must endorse the stand taken by my colleague from British Columbia (Mr. Reid) and also by the hon. members for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) and for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and I think by two or three hon. members from Quebec. It has been asserted that hon. members on this side are attacking this bill for political reasons, an "agin the government" sort of thing, but when hon. members like the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and the others I have mentioned ask the government to delete wheat, fish and lumber from the provisions of this bill, I think it is evident that at least they are convinced that it is desirable that these industries should be left out. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) has spoken of taking our political lives in our hands; we certainly are doing that in taking this stand unless we have the backing of the industries concerned. I have not had one single request in any way, shape or form from fishermen to support this bill. The minister has said that it will not be brought into effect unless a majority of the fishermen ask for it but with all due deference I must tell him that as long as it is open to the marketers to ask for a board and get control of the industry, there will be danger to the fishermen. In addition there is the vista opened up by section 9. If I thought for one moment that the fishermen were not backing me up unanimously or at least ninety-nine per cent—I will take a chance and say a good many of the canners as well—I would not be taking this stand. The hon. member for New Westminster stated that a year or two ago the fishermen entered into cooperation but that that was no longer in existence. That was in connection with running a cooperative cannery. But they spread themselves too much and had not sufficient capital to face the depression, so the thing fell through. However, they have now cooperation of a kind I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. It is not coercion, it is not socialism or anything like that, it is something they are doing for themselves. All they ask is that they be left alone to carry out their own scheme. I should like to quote from an article which appears in the Cooperative Union of Canada. This body might be described as the C.U.C. as against the C.C.F., and I think it is a rather more practical body.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Is the hon. member speaking on the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. NEILL: Absolutely.

Mr. STEVENS: We have not heard it yet.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Mr. Reid moves that section 2, subsection (e) be amended by striking out the word "lumber" in the fourth line and "forest, sea, lake or river" in the fifth line thereof.

Mr. McINTOSH: Lumber is in the third line of subsection (e), if that is what you are talking about.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): It is in the fourth line of subsection (e) after the word "tobacco."

Mr. NEILL: In my own feeble way I am trying to support the amendment. Is there anything wrong with that? I am trying to give the reasons why the minister should accept the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The amendment to the amendment had not been regularly put to the committee.

Mr. NEILL: Has it now been regularly put?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you, I will continue. The article to which I referred reads:

The Kyuquot Trollers' Cooperative Association, which was recently admitted to the Cooperative Union of Canada, was organized in February, 1931, after a long period interrupted by strikes and price disputes with private buyers. According to a report published in the Canadian Co-operator, March, 1934, the membership in the new association has increased to 200 fully paid shareholders at $25 a share, and well equipped stations have been established at Kyuquot, Quatsino, Nootka, Ucluelet and Bamfield, covering the fishing grounds of the west coast of Vancouver island from cape Beale to cape Scott. President E. Larum reports as follows:—"We started chiefly as producers, but shortly after incorporation opened a general store on our Kyuquot and Nootka floats. We are this winter building a modern store and office at Kyuquot. Each of our members owns and operates his own boat and gear, with a value of from $1,500 to $3,000. The fishermen deliver their daily catches to the stations of the association, where they are weighed, iced, and held until transferred to the association's chartered diesel fish-packers running on schedule to the markets at Victoria, Vancouver and Seattle, U.S. The fishermen receive at each delivery a statement of the weights, and on return of the packers each received his payment according to market prices. In the three years the association has operated we have averaged a yearly production of 1,000,000 pounds of spring and cohoe salmon at an average yearly value of $150,000, with operating expenses $40,000 a year, much of which is duty on fish marketed in the United States and selling commission. The cooperative marketing of our fish proved a success right from the start, as well for the producers as the buyers. The fishermen have learnt to take better care of their fish, and have wholeheartedly given the management their support in putting a quality product on the market. Our fish is now known to be of the highest quality, and for that reason brings the highest prices."

This association has made a gallant start and has done well during the years of the depression but we are now going to unload on it the obligations and the machinery and the regulations of this bill. The minister has said that they do not have to go in, but they will have to go in if the word "marketing" is left in the bill so that the marketers can get control of a board. Kyuquot is out of touch with telegraphic communication although I am in negotiation with the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) with a view to getting some form of wireless communication installed. At the moment it has no telegraphic communication and this association will be hampered at every turn. It will have to refer to some board located somewhere else to see whether or not it can do this or that. Suppose the board is located at Vancouver and in its judgment—we cannot always impugn their judgment; it may be animated by what it thinks is in the best interests of the industry—it thinks it desirable to get the dominion board to make a rule that no salmon is to be exported from Canada. Everyone in British Columbia connected with the fish business knows that such a ruling has been the ambition of the canners for many years. They have achieved that ambition so far as sockeye salmon is concerned but they want to have it extended to all salmon. Supposing such a regulation is put into effect, what will become of these people? Under section 8 they are liable to be subjected to the control of not one, not three but five boards. Under section 8 the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, may approve of a proposal for:

> The creation of a new local board to regulate the marketing of a product already subject to regulation by one or more existing local boards, provided that the existing local board or boards approve and that the powers of the new local board can be exercised consistently with the exercise of the powers of any existing local board or boards.

There may be two local boards in existence. Under subsection (d) the minister may make another board, which makes three. Then we have the provincial marketing board and the dominion board as well. Is it any wonder that we who are trying to help these fishermen and lumbermen say, "For heaven's sake, leave us alone." The lumber and fishing industries, we know, are badly off enough. The fishing industry is in a parlous condition, but it will not be improved by making things worse along the lines indicated here, and the minister himself has indicated that he has received no requests.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not admit that; I said I had no requests before me.

Mr. NEILL: What does that mean? Has the minister had any?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Personally I have not, no.

Mr. NEILL: Well that was what I understood the minister to say. At page 2952 of Hansard he said the other day that in one instance the producers themselves suggested a certain thing, and he said he had representations from British Columbia organizers. That, however, refers to the milk and fruit business; it does not refer to the fisheries. If the hon. member for New Westminster or I were alone in taking this view it might be said that we were animated by an improper motive or by crank ideas. But when almost every man on this side of the house representing the fishing industry begs the minister to leave that industry out of the bill and not give us its blessing, he might well consider that request. Would it not be well, as the hon. member for New Westminster has suggested, to let us try it first on the dog; let us try it on the agriculturists. I hope they will pardon my rough metaphor, but they know I mean well. I do suggest however that we should begin with one industry, trying it on agriculture who have asked for it. But for heaven's sake leave the fishermen alone.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the view taken by the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni represents a pretty wide stretch of the imagination. There is nothing in the bill that will, as my hon. friend says, force this upon any group of operatives, either in the lumber or in the fishing industry. The bill is very clear in that regard; there must be a request for it from the operatives. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Neill) says, "But those interested in marketing may ask for a board."

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that is quite true. I gather from the portion of the discussions I have heard that it is perhaps dangerous for me to suggest possible cases, because they will be seized upon and distorted into my declaring that it is the intention to do this or that. But if hon. gentlemen will permit me to illustrate, without charging me with having in the back of my mind, or suggesting that the Minister of Agriculture or any other member of the government has in the back of his mind, any intention of doing this or that, I could illustrate possible circumstances where it might be highly desirable and in the interests of industry to have some body or organization that could deal with a given situation. In what I am about to say, I wish it clearly understood—I emphasize this—that I am merely giving an illustration.

On the Pacific coast we have had very serious difficulty in connection with the export of herring, owing entirely to conditions beyond our control. I do not like to discuss this matter, and I hope it will be taken in the proper way. In the orient there has been a conflict of view between Japan and China—we will be frank about it. As a matter of fact China, which is a very important market for this product, imposed a local boycott upon herring coming from British Columbia because it was alleged that, in part or in whole, they were packed or handled, or owned or marketed by Japanese nationals. Now, that quarrel has nothing to do with us, but I can assure hon. gentlemen that it created a situation which presented a very great difficulty to my own department. We had to handle it with a rather delicate touch, and I may say that it was perplexing. I can quite understand that under such circumstances the functioning of a board such as might exist under the act could very well handle a situation of that kind. In fact, I can see clearly where it might be of great advantage, without in the slightest degree interfering with the producer of herring. I will give another illustration.

Mr. NEILL: Can the minister explain how the board could handle it to advantage?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I will go a little further, but again I warn my hon. friend that I am not stating what is likely to occur; I am merely speculating, trying to illustrate the situation. In the incident to which I have referred it was necessary for us to give assurances to certain sections of the market in the orient that the goods were not packed by a certain class of people in this country. As I say, in a measure it was none of our business; but, in the interests of the industry at the coast, we felt that it was our business as far as possible to secure the data and give the assurance, and with the assistance of the different parties in the transaction we were able to do so. In that way, I think, a board such as could be erected under this act would be of exceedingly great value, because its certificate would be accepted in all probability by the country to which the goods were destined.

I will give another illustration, and I ask the house not to request me for the moment to specify. I can do so if it is considered desirable, but I do not regard it as desirable to be specific in public. I have in mind a country in Europe—there are several, but there is one in particular which I have in mind, and an important one—which has placed a specific quota on imports into its market. Now, that is not something of our doing, but something which in their wisdom they have put into execution. Now when we approach the marketing season, obviously it is desirable as far as possible to arrange with the Canadian exporter to fit into the demands of that important market. That is done to the best of our ability. It is fraught with great difficulty and many perplexities, and there is great danger that if it is perpetuated and goes on year after year, or if the quota were narrowed a bit, it might be so perplexing as to involve perhaps unfairness to some exporters as against others.

Mr. NEILL: You are referring to canned salmon.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and I would ask that I be not requested to be too specific because it is not desirable. But there again it is necessary that we should have some organization to meet the exigencies with which we are confronted because of the actions of another country. I have in mind another situation, and it is applicable to fish, where there has been a contraction of the market, but where with the assistance of a board of this kind it might be possible to encourage or to develop export. I am myself giving that some study at the moment.

I can assure the committee that I can see changed conditions with which we are confronted all over the world in the matter of trade and the admission of goods into other countries, and with these changed conditions it may become absolutely imperative that we should have other machinery than the somewhat loose methods which under normal conditions might prove satisfactory or which in the past have proven fairly so.

Both hon. gentlemen who have preceded have referred to the products of the forest. I really see very little likelihood of there being any demand in that respect. Within the last year we have been confronted with a problem in connection with one of our largest manufacturing products—I do not wish to specify. We have been confronted with a condition of absolute chaos within the industry, and again this is due in large part to new conditions which have come into existence outside the control of the government of this country. We have had no machinery to deal with the situation. We have had no powers to meet it, but, I can easily appreciate that it is quite possible we might be of very great assistance to a Canadian group who were exporting in a large way from both coasts—and as a matter of fact there has been a condition of warfare between the two coasts in this particular product. Now, a marketing authority such as might come into being under this act, at their request, could act as mediator and conciliator between the two conflicting bodies of interest.

I express my own conviction—because I quite appreciate what both hon. gentlemen have in their minds—that there is no possibility, perhaps I should say no probability of there being any onerous obligations imposed upon any group against its will by reason of the passing of this act. I cannot conceive of anything of the kind being even remotely possible. Both hon. gentlemen who have spoken rather emphasized the rights or liberties of the individual fisherman. I can say this, that with the principle that runs through this act I cannot see any possibility of anything being imposed upon any individual or class of operatives against their will. And as for there being any danger that the board might, in directing marketing, in its turn reflect or impose its will on the producer,—that is, I believe, the real apprehension in the mind of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—one could conceive of an extreme condition under which it might go to the extent of doing that. But I should say that it would be completely foreign to the intent of the bill, and I cannot conceive of such an authority doing so. Certainly if that should happen there would easily be an opportunity to deal with it at the first session following such an act.

I feel impelled to say this—and I know I carry the judgment of my colleagues—that there is no thought in the mind of the minister who has charge of the bill or in the mind of any of his colleagues that there shall be erected a board which shall, in conflict with the wish of those whose business comes under it, act in any way antagonistic to their interest. I do see however where, in this changing condition with which we are daily confronted, such a board might be very useful in both these industries.

Mr. NEILL: I appreciate the moderate tone which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has adopted and I will try to meet him in the same spirit. We agree with him entirely that the minister is animated by a proper desire in putting through this bill, and hopes and believes that nothing but good can come out of it. But when you are dealing with legislation you must contemplate, not what a minister designs and hopes and intends, but the use which other people may make of your legislation, human nature being essentially selfish.

As regards dried salted herrings for the oriental market, the minister said that the board might give certificates to the effect that the product was entirely handled by certain people, and so on. But that is done now. There is an inspection system under the Department of Fisheries and none of the product goes away without a certificate clearly indicating its quality and origin. The business is passing altogether into the hands of the orientals anyhow, and I am not particularly concerned to see that continue.

The minister was on sound ground when he brought in the question of the quota. That is above all one defence and justification and reason for the bill. If the British or some other nation say, "We will cut off your quota of meat, butter, cheese, or whatever it may be", then we must have some machinery to handle that situation; and the argument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce was at least sound in that regard. But I would make this reply to him. Canned salmon is comparatively a small industry, in the hands of a few people, and it is held almost entirely on the Pacific coast. There are only two nations that have any suggestion of a quota at the present time. Last year I believe there were some thirty-four or thirty-five canneries operating in British Columbia. There is an association knows as the Canned Salmon Section of the British Columbia Manufacturers' Association, and I think there are only twenty-one or possibly twenty-two members. So that if it developed that a certain nation was putting a quota on canned salmon it would be easy for that private association to get together and regulate the supply and they would do it in a far simpler and easier way than it could be done through a board of this kind. That, I think, meets a good deal of the argument put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I wish to give one further illustration to show why these people want to be left alone. Before I discuss that however I would refer to what the minister said in reference to lumber. He expressed the opinion that it was not at all likely that there would be any demand for a board. If he does not think that it will be asked for, and if the lumbering men have not asked for it, why not leave it out and have one trouble less for the minister who will be in charge of the act? However, coming back to the cooperative association, and cooperation is supposed to be the basis of a good deal of this act, like all business men they must look ahead. In shipping fish to the market they engage diesel fish packers running on schedule. The contract, as I happen to know, for taking this fish in the months of May, June, July and August is made the previous fall, probably in November or early in December. Next fall, if this bill is in effect and this cooperative association undertakes to make a bargain to get these packers running to schedule, what guarantee will they be able to give? Suppose they want to ship a million and a half pounds of fish next year; they cannot guarantee that they will be allowed to ship the fish to the United States or anywhere else, nor can they guarantee any fixed price or quantity. What is the packer going to do? He will insist upon something definite. He will then be told that the consent of the board will be obtained. But it is hard to get the consent of a board recently established to deal with conditions that will exist nine months in the future. Possibly they might have to go to the dominion board at Ottawa, and these men have neither time nor inclination, nor do they see the necessity for anything of the kind.

I cannot put the situation too strongly, and it is backed up by almost every representative of the fishermen in this house. Is not that full of significance to the minister? Would not some of them get up and say that in their particular districts the bill would be of benefit to the people they represent if that were really the case? The fishermen have made no request to the minister, so I wonder if he could not let this stand over and make some investigations of his own. Let him send out word to British Columbia through the acting Minister of Fisheries; let him ask the president of this cooperative association what he thinks. He is entitled to be heard. I have not his opinion on the subject, but this would affect him or at least the association which he represents. Ask the canned salmon association; they would be entitled to give their views, but do not take such extremely drastic action in connection with an industry which is peculiarly ill adapted to come under the act and which does not appear to have been considered by the men who drew it, without giving the matter serious consideration. It is quite evident that this act was framed having regard to agricultural products in the main, and it is not suited to the problem of fish.

Mr. GANONG: Mr. Chairman, in my constituency more people depend for a livelihood on fishing than on any other industry, and the fishing of sardine herring is the most important branch of that industry. The greater part of these herring go to the canning factories of Eastport, Maine, which pay only on the number of cases they can pack out of the fish they receive. Our fishermen have no chance at all to check up as to how many cases they do pack. Several times they have tried to form an organization in order to protect themselves, but with hundreds of weirmen it is easy for the factories in Eastport to persuade some of them to sell their fish on the basis of the number of cases packed, and as soon as one or two weirmen do it all the others have to follow. This marketing bill will give these fishermen the opportunity they have been looking for to unite, if they see fit to do so, in order to have some control not over prices but over the way their fish are marketed, and the quantity they have to market. To-day they may ship their fish to Eastport, and they may be told that the fish were not fit to pack or perhaps that they had to be put into fertilizer, for which they would get little return. Coming from a fishing constituency I think one of the first applications to this board will be from the sardine fishermen of Charlotte, and I would regret very much indeed to see the fishermen excluded from this act.

Mr. DUFF: In answer to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) may I say that there is no need of any such act as this, if the fishermen of his constituency wish to get together and decide where they will sell their fish, to whom they will sell them or what quantity they will sell. That can be done by local organizations in a cooperative way, and this board is not necessary at all. So far as I am concerned I am going to take only a few minutes of the time of the committee, because I have come to two conclusions. The first is that a majority of the members of this parliament are going to pass this bill, and the second is that the quicker the bill goes into operation the better it will be, because inside of two or three months the government and members of parliament, as well as the fishermen, the lumbermen and the farmers who come under this bill will be praying to God for the government to repeal the act.

Mr. SPOTTON: Let us carry it.

Mr. DUFF: That is what I say, but as I have not spoken in the committee previously perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to say a few words, because the province of Nova Scotia is interested in this legislation. I take it from what was said a moment ago by the Minister of Agriculture, who is in charge of this bill, and by his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reply to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) who moved this amendment striking out fish and lumber, that the fishermen need not come in under this bill unless they so desire. That is my first point. Now I turn to section 9 of the bill, which reads:

> Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in the said product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board to regulate such product, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of such product—

Surely if what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture a moment ago is correct, and no one need come under this scheme unless they so desire, section 9 should be eliminated from the bill. My second point is that the minister said that no fishermen need come under this bill unless they so desired and unless a majority of the fishermen asked to do so. If that is so, and the fishermen, the farmers or the lumbermen need not come under the bill unless they wish, why is it necessary to put the producers to all the trouble set forth in this bill? For instance, the bill requires any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations, not only those who wish to come in under the scheme but everyone, whether they come under the scheme or not. They must register their names, addresses and occupations with the board. My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) must laugh at that. How are you going to get the fishermen scattered from Ketchikan to the Fraser river to register? You will need an army of officials.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A census.

Mr. DUFF: You will have more than a census; you will need the election enumerators they are going to appoint next month. Then every fisherman has to obtain a licence.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only those who of their own volition submit a scheme will be asked to do so. I think the hon. member is under the impression that these things are compulsory if there is no scheme. If the fishermen of Nova Scotia submitted a scheme which they thought would be to their advantage in the marketing of their fish, it is optional whether or not there will be a poll. There might be organizations set up in which there would be no poll and no compulsion, but we will take the case which I believe the hon. member has in mind. If the scheme submitted asked that a poll be taken in order that a vote might be secured to see if a majority were in favour of such a scheme, in which the others would be forced to participate, even then it might not be a part of that scheme to have these people registered or licensed. I agree with the hon. member that in many cases it might be almost impossible to take a vote, but that would be dealt with at the outset. I wish to emphasize the fact that this registration would only come about when the scheme submitted by the producers themselves requested that this should be done. Perhaps it was not necessary for me to make these remarks, but I thought my hon. friend misunderstood me.

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps the act is not very well drawn or I do not understand it, but here is what it says:

The board shall—have power—to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence—

That is not any or all persons who come under the scheme, but all persons having to do with the product.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The word that covers what I have said is the word "regulated." It is only in connection with a regulated product, and we can only have a regulated product when a scheme is set up.

Mr. DUFF: That is in another subsection. But this paragraph (f) is not required at all. It provides that all persons shall register their names, addresses, occupations, and shall take out licences. That is certainly clear language. If the minister states he will amend that so that it will refer only to those who come in under the scheme—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Let me explain.

Mr. DUFF: I think we understand it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I am afraid not. In the same section the hon. member is reading appear the words "regulated product." The basis of the whole subsection turns on these words "regulated product," and those words apply only where a scheme has been set up.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): May I remind the committee that we are now on section 4, and that it would be preferable to continue discussing it.

Mr. DUFF: Let me go a little farther. The minister said that no fishermen would be required to come in under this scheme unless they did so by a vote. As an example, let me take the province of Nova Scotia, and ask the minister whether he will have only one local board in that province, so far as the fishing industry is concerned, or how does he propose to find out whether the fishermen desire to come in under the legislation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be for the fishermen themselves to say. If they felt that they wished to join together, in the way we have explained, they themselves would bring the matter before the dominion board, and through it to the dominion government.

Mr. DUFF: The point I am getting at is this: Does that mean that all the fishermen of Nova Scotia—or 60 per cent, or 70 per cent, or a majority—will have to decide to come in under the scheme before the board is appointed, or does it mean that every locality in Nova Scotia can vote to come in under the scheme and each ask for a local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One scheme might be submitted from a particular locality in Nova Scotia. But if another scheme were proposed, another local board suggested, and the scheme submitted to the provincial government, if it had to do with purely domestic trade within the province, I have no doubt these different groups would combine into one group. What the hon. member suggests is possible, but I would say it is not conceivable.

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid the minister does not understand the situation, so far as the fishing industry is concerned. Let me explain to him that there are at least two hundred localities or fishing ports in the province of Nova Scotia in each of which there are anywhere from, say, fifty to one hundred or more fishermen. In some cases perhaps there may be five hundred or one thousand fishermen. But, as I have said, there are two hundred different fishing localities. I understand from the minister that in each of these two hundred places the fishermen may get together and decide by their vote either to come in under the scheme, or to stay out. And if they do decide to come in under the scheme, then in those two hundred places there will be two hundred local boards and all situated in the province of Nova Scotia, and in the fishing industry alone. Is that right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They could not come in of their own volition, even if they had voted and decided to come in. Their scheme would have to be submitted to the dominion board, and through it to the governor in council. One of the conditions might or might not be that a vote would be taken. That is not the only way in which assistance could be given to the fishermen. Assistance might be given by the dominion board itself, because its jurisdiction in matters of export trade would be interprovincial. Outside of any vote being taken whatever, if on investigation or as a result of representations to the dominion board it were shown that some action by the dominion board might be taken to assist in the marketing of fish, or to assist in any other way in the fishing industry, action could be taken without reference at all to the small localities or the individual fishermen.

Mr. DUFF: The minister has not answered the question regarding these two hundred localities which may call their fishermen together and have a vote, each locality deciding to ask for a local board. These localities are scattered throughout a long coast line. For instance, they cannot deal only with one local board. If this scheme is to work they must have local boards of their own. If in each locality they vote for a local board, and to come in under the scheme, will a local board be set up?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If that is what they wanted, and if in a particular locality a condition existed as a result of which the fishermen in that locality felt that they could be assisted, their request would be given consideration and might be approved. But it would be effective only in that locality alone. If there were a number of other localities which wished to do the same thing and they organized for provincial trade, then I would say there would be no difficulty in having them so organized by having one vote to unite them all.

Mr. DUFF: If there were only one local board in Nova Scotia, so far as the fishermen were concerned, where would that local board be situated, and how would the fishermen keep in touch with the local board, or the local board with the fishermen?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If a scheme were to be set up in that particular way, it would be set out as shown here in the bill. When the scheme is submitted they will state where the headquarters are to be, the personnel of the board, how the board is to be selected, and so on.

Mr. DUFF: That is what I am trying to say to the minister, namely, that if the fishermen themselves, the government or the dominion marketing board decide there shall be only one local board—and for the sake of argument we will say it is to be at Halifax, which is fairly central—that board would be three or four hundred miles away from one part of the province, and about two hundred miles away from another part. Along that coast line, both east and west, are perhaps two hundred fishing villages and towns. I say to the minister that either he has got to have a local board in every fishing district—or practically every fishing district—or the thing would be absolutely unworkable, even if the scheme were good. That is the point.

And here is another point: Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that in fifty fishing settlements scattered along the Nova Scotia coast line the fishermen met and a majority decided to come in under the scheme. Then, in the other one hundred and fifty settlements we would suppose that the fishermen do not want to come in under the scheme; they do not meet, and they do not vote. Now then, the minister is going to set up either fifty boards or one board for those fifty settlements, which have intervening settlements not operating under any scheme. If that is done, under this measure how is the minister going to help the fishermen, so far as prices or the marketing of their goods are concerned, because the fact would be that three-quarters of the fishermen are outside of the legislation, and as a matter of fact have not asked to come under it? Only one-quarter of the settlements along the Nova Scotia coast line have asked, by their vote, to come in. That scheme, unless under clause 9 the minister forces the remaining one hundred and fifty settlements to come in, would not apply to all. How would it work if, as I said a moment ago, it is left to the fishermen themselves to decide, and if only fifty settlements out of two hundred decide to come in, the remaining one hundred and fifty deciding to stay out? The one hundred and fifty settlements would be able to sell their fish at whatever prices they wished, when they wished and to whom they wished. But under the scheme the remaining fifty operating under the local board would be put in a disadvantageous position. Could the minister tell us how he would work that out?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Again, of course, it is a hypothetical case.

Mr. DUFF: No, it is not a hypothetical case.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I take it that it is.

Mr. DUFF: Oh no, it is not, at all. It is a practical illustration from real life.

Mr. YOUNG: Hypodermic.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is a hypothetical case in that it is not an actuality now before us to decide upon. But to answer the question, those fifty have a problem before them and they would know when they submitted their scheme, and when they voted, that it was for their own particular difficulties and locality. They feel that by the fifty combining together they could improve their conditions independent of the others. It would be only on that basis, I take it, that they would submit such a scheme.

Mr. DUFF: Before the minister included fish and fish products he must have had some idea that this bill was going to benefit the fishermen. How did he arrive at that conclusion? I have had some experience in the industry myself and I am serious when I say to the minister that I do not believe this will benefit the fishermen one iota. You are only going to put impediments in the way of the fishermen selling their products.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) stated that it was the unanimous idea of the members of this house that lumber and fish products should be excluded from the operation of this act he certainly was not speaking for me. I am very much opposed to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). In my riding last year the conditions in the fishing industry were so bad that the provincial government of Manitoba held an investigation. It might surprise hon. members of this house to learn that there was perhaps over a million dollars' worth of fish produced in my riding a couple of years ago. If the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster carries it will mean that the fishermen in my riding will have no redress whatever because most of their product is exported to the United States, and therefore it must come under dominion jurisdiction.

I think that the arguments of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni are not worthy of very much consideration, especially when he says that the hon. minister may permit an order to be made that no fish shall be exported from Canada. I never heard such an absurd statement in this house. You talk about human nature and its selfishness. Well, we have a situation existing in this country at the present time where citizens of Canada who are producing the products of the soil and working in the lumber camps or in the factories or in the fishing industry are practically in a state of starvation, in a state of slavery, and yet hon. members stand up in this house and talk about freedom. I heard the hon. member for Ontario the other afternoon lighting the lamps of all the failures of the past to try and prevent this government from enacting this progressive legislation. I think we have reached a situation in this country where the Liberal party as represented by the members in this house is no longer worthy of the name Liberal, and certainly they do not represent what I choose to call freedom. Freedom of the individual to starve, perhaps, and freedom of our industries to perish. There is a situation confronting us at the present time of superlative abundance, and yet we find poverty and chaos and bankruptcy.

Mr. McPHEE: Four years of Toryism did it.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): What will it be four years from now if the people of Canada put so-called Liberals into power who know not the meaning of liberty or freedom, and who have no policy whatever. I think that any man with common sense can stand up and say to the people of this country that the true guardians of liberty and prosperity are to be found in the Conservative party and that the real Tories are over there.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What about South Oxford?

Mr. YOUNG: How is this bill going to help the fishermen?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni stands up and says: For God's sake leave us alone. I say, Mr. Chairman, For God's sake and in the name of charity let us bring some order out of this chaos. Let us try to improve conditions and make Canada a fit place to live in. I am ashamed of the Liberal party. I came to this house with a great many Liberal ideas and I still have them.

An hon. MEMBER: You are a Liberal.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Yes, a real Liberal, not a so-called Liberal, and when we describe the Conservative party of the present time we should underline the first part of the name, "Liberal"-Conservative party. It certainly seems to me an extraordinary situation when the right hon. gentleman who is leading the opposition at the present time, and who has been one of the greatest exponents of liberty, who wrote a volume of Industry and Humanity—

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. Has the hon. gentleman's admirable treatise on the parties in Canada anything to do with this amendment?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): It has a whole lot to do with it.

Mr. NEILL: It has nothing to do with it. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): On the point of order I have been of the opinion that this committee has been out of order about half the time. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): After the provincial government held an investigation into the fisheries of Manitoba it is rather strange that without any operation of law whatsoever, and simply because the government gave some indication that they would act, the fishermen got a higher price for their product.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is because we have a good government in Manitoba.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I believe it is good policy for the government to include large areas within the ambit of their legislation. I think the government should take as much power as possible. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce answered the argument of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni when he said that it was not the intention at all to do all those superfluous, imaginary things that were suggested by the hon. member. I have not taken any part in this debate before, Mr. Chairman, but as I have stood up in this house and criticized this government, I want now to stand up and commend them for really trying to do something to try to bring order out of chaos.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, are we dealing with the fishermen or with the section?

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

Mr. QUINN: Mr. Chairman, will you please read the amendment? You are taking a vote and many members of the committee do not know what it is about.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The amendment to the amendment has been read to the committee.

Mr. QUINN: I am asking that you read it again so that we may vote intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): If it is the wish of the committee I will read it again. The amendment to the amendment is that section 2, part (e) be further amended by striking out the words "lumber, and such other natural products of the forest, sea, lake or river," in lines four and five thereof. The amendment to the amendment has been lost and the question is now on the amendment.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member wants to vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The subamendment is lost.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) asked the chairman to read the amendment so that he would know how to vote. I ask that we vote again.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The hon. member did not mention voting, he asked that the subamendment be read and I read it with the consent of the committee.

Mr. QUINN: I do not require any instructions from the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) as to my duties in this committee. I have listened to the hon. gentleman tell of the trials and tribulations and troubles of the fishermen in Nova Scotia. If there is an industry in Nova Scotia or in any other part of this country which needs the assistance proposed under this bill, it is the fishing industry. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough knows that for the past three or four years the fisherman has been getting so little for his product that he finds it extremely difficult to obtain a livelihood. If this bill is only an experiment, it should be given consideration and at least a trial in order to see if the fishermen of Nova Scotia and the other provinces cannot obtain some relief from the conditions under which they now have to exist. I would point out to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough that there is an organization known as the Maritime Fishermen's Union. This organization has a large membership and it should be able to give advice to the minister who will be charged with the administration of this bill. I think the membership of this union represents the best fishermen in the maritime provinces and if any expression of opinion has been received from that organization as to whether or not a board should be set up in the maritime provinces for the purpose of marketing and regulating the products of the fisheries, I think it should receive consideration. I think if that body made a recommendation, the rest of the fishermen in the maritime provinces would agree and get behind them.

Mr. DUFF: I had no intention of instructing the junior member for Halifax as to how he should vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUFF: What is wrong with that? I heard him tell the chairman that he did not understand what we were voting on. I thought I was being courteous to him when I asked the chairman to read this subamendment again. If that were done I thought that the junior member for Halifax would understand what it was about and would know how to vote. Surely there was nothing wrong in that.

Mr. QUINN: I did not say there was anything wrong.

Mr. DUFF: You were very annoyed and you said that you were not going to take any instructions from me. In view of the courteous action on my part in asking the chairman to read the subamendment so that the hon. member could understand it, I think his remarks are gratuitous.

Mr. QUINN: I appreciate the hon. member's assistance.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend has given his views with regard to the bill. He told us one of the reasons he is in favour of it was the condition of the fishermen of Nova Scotia for the last few years. He then went on to say that if the government wanted to find out anything about this bill they could obtain information from the organization known as the Maritime Fishermen's Union. I agree with that statement and I ask my hon. friend if this union which is composed of thousands of fishermen in Nova Scotia has approved of this bill? I can tell the minister and his colleague, the junior member for Halifax, that they have not approved of it. I might tell the junior member for Halifax that a very important organization in his city, the Halifax board of trade, and others, are absolutely opposed to this bill. My hon. friend must have got the same telegram I got a month ago from the board of trade.

Mr. QUINN: I think the hon. member can interpret this bill just as clearly as I can and perhaps better. If the Maritime Fishermen's Union which is composed of such a large majority of the fishermen in Nova Scotia do not want this bill, it will not go into effect so far as they are concerned.

Mr. BARBER: There is one product which I think might be included in the original clause. The amendment submitted by the minister contains these words, "grains, seeds, fruit and fruit products, vegetables and vegetable products, maple products, honey, tobacco". I should like to see the word "hops" included after the word "tobacco". There is a large production of hops in this country and considerable trouble is being had in importing and exporting the product. I think this industry would desire to come under this legislation and I suggest it be included.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be included under the last part of the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On going through the various provincial acts I notice that the general definition of natural products is the same as that given in this bill before the amendment was submitted by the minister. Does the minister anticipate any trouble because of the varying definitions of natural products in the various acts?

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say not.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: As the subamendment has been disposed of, I shall revert to the amendment. I intend to deal with grains, more specifically with wheat. When speaking on the second reading I stated that it was my personal conviction that wheat was of such importance as to merit the appointment of a wheat board under a special wheat act. I think this should be done because of the importance of the product and the peculiar problems which arise in its marketing. I might emphasize that my desire to have it excluded from this bill was wholly conditional upon its inclusion in another act which would deal specifically with wheat. Until and unless we can have assurance that this other act will be passed and a wheat board appointed, I would prefer to see wheat where it is rather than have it left out in the cold altogether. Under the provisions of this bill at least a part of the work might be done.

As to my reasons for believing it should come under a specific act and be administered by a wheat board, the remarkable degree to which the marketing of wheat has now become state controlled will not have escaped the notice of the committee. It is no longer in the hands of the trade to market as they wish; it is no longer in the hands of the producers to market as they wish, but it has become a matter controlled largely by international agreement, by obligations entered into by the various governments interested in wheat production. More and more has that become the case until the export of wheat has become almost a matter of state policy in this and certain other countries, and it is apparently becoming increasingly so. If that be the case, as I believe it is, it is logical that the state, having assumed the responsibility, perhaps unwillingly, perhaps inevitably, of controlling that international trade in wheat, should assume the further responsibility of looking after the marketing of the wheat itself.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Now that we are back again on the prairies where we know more about wheat than we do about fish, let me read a statement which I have shown to the Minister of Justice, to find out whether I have the right relationship between cereals and this bill. The statement is as follows:

> While many farmers naturally like to see all cereals included in the new marketing act, where it is now and likely to remain, so long as we have huge carryovers and no hedging market supplied by public investors, it would seem necessary, first, for the government to establish a national wheat marketing board.

until at least the return of normal world wheat marketing conditions and normal annual carryovers.

This seems all the more necessary so long as wheat continues to be the subject of an international agreement, such as now exists between Canada and some twenty other countries. Foreign governments could not negotiate thuswise with a number of small Canadian wheat boards, even though merged, as they doubtless would be; just as Canada could not negotiate with similar local boards in a foreign country. Furthermore, small or big local wheat boards, with delegated authority from the central marketing board, could not finance their wheat marketing operations without a government line of credit or guarantee, or both, as is being done in the case of John I. McFarland's present stabilization activities on the Winnipeg wheat market.

Just at eight o'clock I showed this statement to the Minister of Justice and also to the Minister of Agriculture. My idea is to see whether I have the right relationship described in the article which I have prepared and read, between the wheat question and this bill. As I understand the matter, we are tied up with twenty countries under an international agreement and as nations can deal directly only with nations I do not see how, if this authority is delegated to a local board, such board can conduct an international agreement with a nation. Would the Minister of Justice help me out with respect to this matter?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that my opinion in regard to the matter of marketing wheat would be in any way as valuable as that of the hon. member who has put the question. It is true that an agreement exists whereby Canada is to be allowed 200,000,000 bushels of exports of wheat. I do not think the present bill in any way conflicts with that arrangement. Whatever form the arrangement has taken, whether a treaty or agreement or international agreement or whatever it may be I cannot see that that arrangement will in any way conflict with the arrangements proposed under this bill so long as the quota of 200,000,000 bushels is not exceeded.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Might I ask my hon. friend this question: As he knows, negotiations have been going on recently between the Argentine and Canada with respect to changing the quota for the Argentine. Assuming that the Argentine government, through the regular diplomatic channels, Rideau Hall and then the Department of External Affairs got into contact with Canada, would the Prime Minister refer the Argentine government to the fact that we had in the meantime delegated this authority to a local board or, if you like, a central board on the prairies, and would he say to the Argentine government, through the Governor General: I am very sorry; this authority has been delegated to a board in Regina or Edmonton. Will you consult with such board as to the new allocation of the wheat quotas? Is that what he would say, or what would he say?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would say that we would be bound by the terms of our agreement and the board would not be able to do anything which would conflict with that international agreement. As regards the matter of Argentina, while I do not profess to have a very definite knowledge on the subject, my information is that the government of Argentina has made a claim that the quota allowed to it should be increased—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thirty million bushels.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —and that the increase involved would affect the Canadian allotment to the extent of perhaps three or four million bushels.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has Russia done the same thing?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not aware of that. Therefore the claim of Argentina is not a very serious one as regards Canada but my impression as well as my opinion is that any international agreement we may have entered into or may enter into in the future would be entirely above the operations of the wheat board under this legislation, and if a question should arise as between the government of Argentina and that of the Dominion of Canada in regard to the amount of the quota, the dominion government would be the one to settle that question and it would not be referred to the wheat board for settlement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to suggest a subamendment that looks in the opposite direction from that which was defeated a few minutes ago. It seems to me that this marketing bill is somewhat anomalous in that it comes under the Minister of Agriculture. I presume that situation arises because the agriculturists have been the prime movers in requesting legislation of this character, but it would seem as if the bill includes so many natural products that it might better come under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As matters stand, however, we have a very wide range of natural products now coming under this bill. I consider the amendment is a distinct advance over the original drafting. In the original clause a natural product would not necessarily seem to have included, for example, such articles as wool, because wool is not in the narrow sense a natural agricultural product; it is one step removed from being a natural product. The same is true perhaps as regards honey, which is specified in the clause and certainly so with regard to lumber because while trees are natural products, I should think lumber is decidedly a secondary product. This second draft goes a great deal further than the original one, at least so far as a fair reading of the original draft would indicate. Now it includes the greater part of what is in the popular way styled as natural products.

Further than that, the amendment reads:

Any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product.

The question arises why the derivatives should be limited to food and drink. With the exception of lumber they are so limited. Why we should say that there should be control over lumber made of trees and why we should not give any control over furniture made of lumber or, let us say, over clothes made of wool, I cannot quite see; it seems to me to be a very arbitrary limitation. Therefore I would beg leave to extend the scope of the act by moving:

That in section 2, subsection (e) in the fifth line of the amendment, after the word "forest" there should be added the words "the mine," and in the sixth line the words "of food or drink" should be left out.

There are two suggestions contained in this subamendment. As the amendment stands we include agriculture; we include fishing; we include lumbering operations; we include the marketing of any of the products of the forest or the sea or the lake or the river. Why should we not include the products of the mine? We have our coal mines, our gold mines, our copper mines, a great variety of mines and minerals. There seems to be no reason why we should bring in general legislation covering all those other departments of our natural products and deliberately leave out the one. It may very well be that no submissions have been made by the miners. We have been told that no submissions have been made by the fishermen or by the lumbermen. It may very well be the case that the clause will not be invoked in regard to the mines. But if it is well to have general provisions that may be used if necessary in connection with fishing or lumbering, it would seem to me that all the arguments advanced for the inclusion of these industries would substantiate my contention that we should have some general provision that would apply to mining. The Minister of Trade and Commerce gave some specific examples to show that it would be highly desirable in the case of exports of certain types of fish that the government should be able to control the export. He said that this was desirable in the interests of the producers. Mines and the products of mining are in precisely the same position as fishing and lumbering and I cannot see why they should not be treated in the same way.

Therefore, as I asked before, why limit the derivatives to food and drink? If the farmer is to have his product,—fruit, wheat, whatever it may be, controlled by the board, why should the mining man not have his product and its derivatives controlled or why should the textile industry not be controlled? Why limit control to food and drink? I would take it that under this bill amended as it now stands, whiskey or beer could come under control; they are articles of food or drink.

Mr. HOWARD: They are supposed to be under control now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but they may be brought directly under control by means of this amendment. If whiskey or beer, articles of drink, come under this, why should clothing, household furniture, household utensils, not come under it as well?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Everything.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, quite so.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member is spoiling the bill now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I am not spoiling it. I am simply suggesting to the minister that as he has drafted the bill he is arbitrarily limiting it to certain kinds of natural products thereby leaving out the products of the mines. I cannot see why mining should be made an exception. All the arguments that apply in favour of the other industries being included are in favour of mining being included.

So with regard to the derivatives, since provision is made to control food and drink derivatives, I do not see why other derivatives should not be included and therefore I urge that we should strike out the limiting words "of food or drink."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon member gets mines included and those two limiting words left out, can he think of anything else that will not be included? Will there be anything left out? Will not pretty much everything conceivable be included.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend stated that the same reasons would apply to mines as to agricultural products, lumber, fish and the like. He is wrong in that impression. This is a voluntary arrangement so far as the producers go. There have been requests from the various producers of agriculture, of lumber and of fish. There has been a protest from the men interested in mining; they do not wish to be included. The suggestion was made and I think the first draft that I saw of the bill did have mines included. The reason they are not included in this bill is that the miners themselves did not want them to be included.

There may be a good deal of force in what he has urged in regard to secondary products, furniture and so forth. I have been approached personally in regard to furniture; the manufacturers asked to have that included. It would be well to let us walk before we run. Do not let us overdo the thing at the outset. This bill is a new effort in this country and I wish it the greatest measure of success, but I do not think we should overload the proposal in the meantime.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understood a little while ago the Minister of Agriculture to say that there had not been any request from the fishermen.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I said that I personally had received no request from the fishermen; I had none before me.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In any case there has not been any great pressure brought to bear from either the fishermen or the lumbermen and yet they are included. It was suggested a few minutes ago that the measure should be confined to agricultural products and the government took the ground that there was no reason that it should not include the products of the forest, the sea, the lake and so on. If we are going on that assumption, I cannot for the life of me see why we cannot extend it to include this one other group of products. It seems quite logical that they should be included.

Amendment (Mr. Woodsworth) to amendment negatived.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is one other amendment that I have been asked to move on behalf of the minister; it is a technical error in the drafting of the amendment. In the fifth line after the words "natural products" the words should be inserted "of agriculture and." It would then read:

Natural products of agriculture and of the forest, sea, lake or river.

I would move that amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Guthrie) to amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): I would like to ask the minister a question. When speaking on the second reading of the bill I drew his attention to the question of the sugar beet industry of southern Alberta. Is sugar beet included in the definition as a manufactured article of food or drink?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is included in this definition.

Mr. GERSHAW: May I ask if fodder crops such as alfalfa, hay and clover are included?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to enlighten my layman ignorance as to why it is necessary to have the last eight words in this amendement. This is different from the original bill. Power is given the governor in council to designate any other product. That is all right; I would understand it if it stopped there but it continues:

—in accordance with the provisions of this act.

I fail to find any provisions in the act providing for the governor in council doing anything of the kind. These words have been introduced in the amendment, and apparently they do not jibe with the original bill. Are those last eight words necessary, and if so, where are the provisions in the act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think there is any objection to the words; they do not mislead anybody. They give the governor in council power to add other articles of a similar kind, and anything that is done in that way shall be done in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. NEILL: I quite understand that, but it goes on to say that the designation must be made by the governor in council in accordance with the provisions of this act, and I do not find anywhere in the act any provision for the governor in council doing any designating.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I see no objection to striking out the words, though I do not think it would hurt the bill to leave them in. I would agree to strike out those words if my hon. friend so desire; perhaps it would give us wider power.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Would the minister be good enough to repeat the subamendment which he moved? We did not hear it, and the chairman did not repeat it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only additional amendment is the insertion of the words "of agriculture and" after the word "products" in the fifth line of the section.

Amendments agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Subsection (f) agreed to.

On subsection (g)—regulated product.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask just one question here. In this subsection there are three references to the word "scheme." The interpretation section does not include any definition of the word "scheme" itself. It seems to me that is the one term above all others that should be defined. Would the minister advise us what is meant by a scheme, and will he consider whether he should not include a section to define what is meant by that word?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The particulars of the scheme are explained in section 5, and are further dealt with by regulation. A scheme is simply a proposal submitted.

Mr. McINTOSH: Would not the word "plan" have been a better word to use all through the act rather than "scheme"?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was informed that "scheme" was a particularly good word for the purpose we had in mind, following the British marketing act.

Mr. NEILL: Does not the minister think there should be a definition of the word "producer"? The whole bill turns on that, and you have not a definition. There may be endless disputes about what does constitute a producer. I suppose the dictionary would say a producer is one who produces. A coal miner produces coal, but I suppose he would be classed as an employee and not as a producer. A good many questions of that kind may arise in connection with fisheries. How about a man who is working on shares; he is paid so much a ton for the fish he catches, and a certain share is taken by the owner of the boat. I submit that there should be a definition of that word.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would the hon. member show me where the word "producer" appears in the bill? It may be there, but the purpose of the bill is to regulate the marketing of natural products, and of course the owner of the product is the producer, not the hired help who assist in the work.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know that at a glance I can put my finger on the word, but I should like to know how many times the minister has mentioned it in discussing this bill. His whole defence and explanation has been that the producer will do so and so, and that any scheme will have to be approved by the producer. I think it does appear in the bill, but that is immaterial. The whole bill hangs on the meaning of the word.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If I used the word "producer" it would be simply as a short way of saying all the persons engaged in the production of these natural products.

Subsection agreed to.

Section 2 as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Dominion marketing board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, would you read the first subsection, please, so that it will be of record as to what we are voting on?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Subsection (1) reads:

> The governor in council may establish a board to be known as the dominion marketing board to regulate the marketing of natural products as hereinafter provided.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Carried. I hope that makes it perfectly clear that so far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we are in favour of a marketing bill to regulate orderly marketing. It does not follow however, that we are in favour of certain or all of the provisions of this act.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection (2)—constitution of the board.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister explain why we are appointing a board without being told how many members will be on it or what remuneration they will receive? Will he mention any board of similar importance in Canada that was appointed under these conditions? The tariff board, the pensions board, the radio commission and all the other boards were described in the measures which constituted them; the number of members was set out, together with the remuneration. In some cases we went further and defined the pensions they should receive after being in office for a certain length of time, but here it is left to the sweet will of the governor in council. They hold office during pleasure; they receive such remuneration as the governor in council may see fit to give them, and there is no number stated at all. It is at least pertinent to the scope of the bill to have an idea whether that board will consist of three or of thirty members, and I think we are entitled to know something as to the number of members and their salaries.

We might have some idea of the ability of the men if we knew what salaries they were to be paid.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of necessity this bill must contain a good many provisions of a general character, and it must be flexible. A board might be set up consisting of three persons; a scheme might be submitted by the producers of a certain product, and it might be thought of advantage to add to the board a man particularly adapted to deal with that particular commodity. As far as the salary question is concerned, as I said before every effort will be made to obtain the services of the best possible individuals for this board.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 3 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

On subsection 9—Payments authorized.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I beg to move an amendment to subsection 9, as follows—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the chairman would read the section first, so that we may have the whole information before us.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Subsection (9) appearing in the bill is as follows:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act.

Shall I read the amendment?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I beg to move that the subsection be amended to read:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary to defray the operating expenses of the board incurred by it directly, and any expenditure incurred or authorized by the board under the authority of section 9 hereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister explain wherein the amendment changes the original section.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reason for the amendment is to limit to a certain extent demands which may be made upon the consolidated revenue fund, and eliminate the possibility of local boards drawing upon the fund for direct operating or other expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree that any limitations put upon the board in the matter of taking moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund save by parliamentary appropriation in the first instance, are entirely in the right direction. But I think the minister does not go far enough, and I hope the same reasoning which has led him to limit the boards' powers in connection with drawing these funds from the consolidated revenue fund will cause him to agree to an amendment which will similarly limit the governor in council in the matter of drawing funds from the consolidated revenue fund. I do not think it is necessary again to cover the ground as to the importance of having control of all public expenditures in the hands of parliament, and particularly in the hands of this House of Commons. What is proposed by the minister now is that we shall, with regard to expenditures under the provisions of this marketing bill, adopt a course different from that which has been adopted with respect to all other measures, with the exception of the unemployment relief measures, which were supposed to meet an emergency. I should therefore like to move the following in amendment to the minister's amendment; and I hope the minister will be prepared to accept what it proposes:

That the amendment be amended by striking out the words, "out of the consolidated revenue fund" and substituting therefor the words "out of moneys appropriated by parliament."

The amendment would not lessen the amount of money available for the purposes of this legislation, but it does keep control by parliament over the expenditures which may be necessary.

May I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the estimates as presented to parliament relate to all departments of government, and that there is nothing of an administrative character for which this parliament does not make specific appropriations which are presented to parliament for its consideration in the first instance in the form of estimates, so that all matters pertaining thereto may come before the house for discussion. For example, in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture we find votes for dairying, cold storage warehouses, fruit, including a grant of $4,500 to the Canadian Horticultural Council. Then, there is an amount for seed, feed and fertilizer control, including grants to seed fairs, and also a grant of $17,010 to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association. Then there is a vote for livestock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions, and another vote for experimental farms, including investigations concerning plant diseases. There is a vote for the health of animals branch, and the administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and the Meat and Canned Foods Act. There is a vote for entomology, including investigations and inspection relating to destructive insects and pests, and so on. All these are votes for services pertaining to the Department of Agriculture over which parliament has control. With respect to all of them the government asks parliament in the first instance to provide the necessary moneys, in the form of appropriations and for that purpose gives estimates. I know the minister will say that it may be difficult to make an estimate as to how much will be required, but that is so in regard to any estimate. There has to be some basis, surely, on which the house may be advised as to how much will be necessary. And a procedure whereby money may be taken out of the consolidated revenue fund by the government and not controlled in amount by the House of Commons represents a complete departure from the principle of control by parliament over expenditure and taxation. What I have said with regard to expenditures in the Department of Agriculture is equally true with regard to expenditures in the department having to do with the forests, equally true in regard to expenditures with respect to the fisheries and mines, and equally true respecting any other expenditures for the administrative work of the federal government. Why should there be, in connection with this measure, a departure wholly subversive of the fundamental principle of control by this House of Commons over expenditures? I hope the minister will accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In answer to the right hon. gentleman may I say he has stated, and I appreciate his statement, that he is in favour of a dominion marketing board to assist in the regulating of production. Because of that I am sure he would not in any way wish to move an amendment to any clause which would limit or hamper the possibility of any assistance which might be given to an industry. He has referred to the Department of Agriculture to show how, at the beginning of each year, estimates are made as to the expenditures for the coming year. But these have to do with well-established policies, and it is a very much simpler matter to make an estimate in connection with them than it would be to make an estimate in a new field such as the one now before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe any cause or course is prejudiced at the outset when a minister finds it necessary to state that it is impossible to tell the country how much it is going to cost. After all, that is an all-important consideration with respect to all legislation. I venture to say that the minister himself, if interested in so small a matter as the purchase of a farm, for the commencement of new operations, would not think of going into such a venture or take any action in connection with it, if he did not have in his mind some estimate of the amount of money likely to be required as a consequence of his action. All business men have estimates before them before venturing into any line of business with which they intend to be associated. It is equally necessary that in the work of government some estimates should be given to parliament.

The minister has pointed out that he does not know what amount may be necessary. May I say to him that at the time of the war when expenditures ran into hundreds of millions of dollars the government of the day found it impossible to know exactly what amount would be required. Nevertheless, not once did Sir Robert Borden depart from the proper procedure of placing an estimate before parliament. He stated that in the opinion of the government, after the end of the fiscal year a certain amount would be required, a large amount, and asked for it. If the minister is afraid that he will not receive sufficient moneys to carry on the work of administration of the board let him ask for an amount which in his opinion will be sufficiently large and let us discover whether or not there are ample reasons why that large amount should be given. Surely the minister can give reasons why a particular sum of money is or is not large enough. That is all we are asking him to do. I am not suggesting that the minister shall limit or skimp in any way the amount he thinks necessary, but I do say that he should give to parliament a statement showing how much money in the opinion of the government this legislation will cost during the period of the year. If in that time it turns out that all the money is not required, the balance would remain in the consolidated revenue fund. If on the other hand there should not be a sufficient amount the minister or the government has always the privilege of having parliament vote additional amounts in the form of supplementary estimates when parliament reassembles, and if necessary parliament can be brought together at any time the government wishes. More than that, as the minister has pointed out, there are times when governor general's warrants may be used with justification. With all these provisions of which the government may avail itself, I do submit that there should not be a departure in this legislation from that fundamental principle of the control by the House of Commons over the expenditure of moneys required for administrative and other purposes and over the taxation incidental thereto.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just want to give a point of view on this. I am speaking now for myself. Frankly I think the scheme should pay its own way. I think every tub should stand on its own bottom. I believe the government should give some assistance to set the thing in motion, but it is in the best interests of the farmers themselves I believe that they pay the expenses involved in the scheme. In my judgment that will be a brake on bureaucracy. The producers will have some control over the machinery that is set in motion for their benefit. I think the government should provide the machinery for setting up the marketing boards, but it is in the best interests I believe of those who think they are going to benefit from them that they should finance them, because after all is said and done when you pay for something you have some control over the policies put into effect. I think that is absolutely sound ground on which any scheme of this description should be administered. As I say, it may be necessary to provide some moneys to set the thing in motion but once it gets established the responsibility for financing it should rest on those who are going to benefit from it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask the minister if he would give us some idea of how much is required for the purposes of this act, so we may know what it is going to involve the country in the matter of cost. First of all the board is to have the right to regulate the time and place of marketing, and so forth. Can the minister tell us in round figures what he estimates the cost of the board will be; that is to say, the salaries of the members of the board, the obtaining of premises for them and the management of their business. Can the minister give us in round figures an estimate of what that will come to?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I would not venture an estimate as to that. I see little difference in what we have here and what the right hon. gentleman himself suggests. It has been the custom in the past to overexpend almost without limit money that has been voted, and then bring down supplementary estimates to cover the expenditure. With reference to setting a sum that might seem sufficiently ample, I see no gain in setting a particularly large sum.

In reply to the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), I would agree with him if we were in normal times or if this act had been in operation and things were more stabilized than they are. The applications that we have had from a number of industries for such legislation as this have stipulated that they expect to carry the burden themselves, but there is this difficulty of the conditions through which we are passing and the difficulty of some far-flung branch of the agricultural industry in organizing and of being in more dire need of assistance than other industries that are better organized.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is an extraordinary admission to have from the minister that he has not any idea at all what the expenses of the board will be, apart from the cost of the various functions it has to discharge. We have several boards, the tariff board, the civil service board, the board of railway commissioners and the like, and in all these cases it has been possible for the ministry to advise the House of Commons as to what the likely cost of these boards would be, but in regard to this marketing board the government apparently has not any idea, and cannot even give an estimate.

Take next the functions of this board. There are several of them mentioned, and apparently the minister is going to dip into consolidated revenue fund for the moneys required for this purpose. One provision is that the board may compensate any person for loss sustained by withholding from the market any regulated product pursuant to an order of the board. Can the minister give us any idea how much will be required for compensation under that provision?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So far as the local boards are concerned that has to be done out of their own funds.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How much is expected to be done by the federal board itself?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends altogether on the conditions during the year the act is in force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister cannot give us any estimate at all, is that it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think any person could.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think there is a good deal of force in that. We do not know how this is going to operate. We cannot make a reasonable estimate. But I see no objection, if my right hon. friend will permit some change in the wording of his amendment, to our adopting it because I feel that an appropriation will have to be made by parliament this session, but I cannot name it; I cannot limit it. I cannot give a very good estimate of the amount at the present time. The amendment moved by my right hon. friend is to this effect:

That the amendment be amended by striking out the words "out of the consolidated revenue fund" therein and substituting therefor the words "out of moneys appropriated by parliament."

If he would make that read "out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament" we could accept it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly. That is entirely the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will have to bring down an appropriation this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all I had in mind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And it will be in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Moneys to be appropriated for the purposes of this act—that is quite satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "out of the consolidated revenue fund" and substituting therefor the words "out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament."

Amendment to the amendment agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I find myself in full agreement with the views expressed by my hon. friend from East Hamilton as to this act being self-supporting. That is certainly the wish of the producers. But under this amendment which limits the scope of the original act the moneys to be appropriated by parliament are strictly limited to direct expenditures of the central board or expenses in connection with the scheme to be put in operation, not by the producer but by the minister or by the government. As it reads now, the costs of all the local boards or producers organizations, all of which come directly in contact with the product, are to be borne by the product itself. That is sound, but I do believe that the financing of the central board, a state agency, and of its operations, is the smallest contribution which this country can make to a general dominion-wide problem.

There is one other point I would like to bring to the minister's attention. While I am in accord with this limitation, there is one class of expenditure which might be excluded and yet which it might be well to make, and that is this. When the producers have submitted a scheme, supposing it calls for a vote to be taken, before the scheme itself is in operation and producing money I think some provision might be made that the preliminary organization expenses, which, I repeat, will be incurred before the scheme itself has had any opportunity of functioning and producing revenue, might be met or at least advanced by the state. Otherwise it might be a very serious handicap to organization among producers who had no funds to contribute at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister's amendment now reads:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament of such sums of money as may be necessary to defray the operating expenses of the board incurred by it directly.

I assume that the words "operating expenses of the board incurred by it directly" include all expenses to be made by the board in virtue of the provisions giving the board certain powers. For example, all the expenses which would be incurred under section 4 would be expenditures incurred by the board directly. Is that not so?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is limited to section 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment reads, "as may be necessary to defray the operating expenses of the board incurred by it directly." Subject to the provisions of the bill, the board is to have the power to regulate the time and place of marketing, grant compensation, assist by grants or loans and acquire property. All of these functions will entail direct expenditures. I assume that all are covered or I would not feel that the amendment to the amendment begins to cover what I had in mind with regard to the control by parliament over expenditures. I do not want to have any doubt on that point.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think I have caught the point of the right hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I can put it another way. I assume that there is no desire on the part of the government to conceal its intention with respect to the manner in which money shall be provided for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this bill. I assume that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in accepting the amendment to the minister's amendment which I proposed meant it to be understood that this parliament would be asked to appropriate moneys for the purposes of this bill and that all the purposes of the bill would be covered by specific appropriations made by parliament, and that the government apart from the amounts specifically appropriated would not have the right to dip into the consolidated revenue fund for any purposes in connection with the administration or provisions of the bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I understand it, I would have no hesitation in answering, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister mean that there is no intention to do other than have moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As stated in the bill, in accordance with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is still involved. For example, there is a provision in the bill which gives the minister the power to start investigations quite apart altogether from the board. The minister himself may start an investigation into one thing or another. The proper method of proceeding with respect to any bill is to require appropriations by parliament for every single purpose of the bill. It is equally proper and necessary that the same method should be followed with regard to all expenditures to be incurred under this bill. I want the minister to say if there are any expenditures contemplated under this act which are to be met out of consolidated revenue funds without the proper appropriation being made by parliament?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) made what I think was a very appropriate suggestion. Nearly all organizations of the kind contemplated by this bill receive some assistance from the state in order to get started. Money must be got from somewhere in order to prime the pump. If a marketing scheme is started and the necessary majority not obtained, who will pay the costs? I think provision should be made either in the form of a grant or loan as this is the invariable practice of all the provincial governments with which I am familiar. I do not think there is any such provision in this bill. It is unfair to leave it to the initiative of a few enterprising producers to start the ball rolling. They will have to spend considerable time in organization work and then if they fail to get the requisite vote they will have to shoulder the expenses. I think it would be quite legitimate to devote a certain amount of state money for this purpose. It could be provided for in the appropriations referred to by the Minister of Justice, but I think it would have to be mentioned in the bill before an item could appear in the estimates.

Mr. NEILL: There is a provision for that purpose in the British act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will the minister think that over and we can discuss it tomorrow.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Supposing there was a demand for a scheme and a vote was taken but it was not sufficient to bring the scheme into effect, who would bear the expenses?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say those who submitted the scheme in the first place. I move the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

HUDSON BAY INSURANCE RATES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment I desire to lay on the table two copies of the fifth report on Hudson bay insurance rates, 1934, by the imperial shipping committee.

The fifth report of the imperial shipping committee on Hudson bay marine insurance rates, which is made public to-day, indicates quite clearly that the underwriters are coming to recognize the comparative safety of this route, more particularly in view of the efforts the government is making to provide adequate aids to navigation and to maintain an efficient patrol service. The committee, on which Canada is represented by the High Commissioner for Canada, has been untiring in its efforts to obtain this recognition and have succeeded in no small measure. There is every reason to hope that as shipping over this route increases in volume and the demand for insurance grows, as it inevitably will, the more or less prohibitory rates that have been in effect heretofore will disappear.

The opinion of the committee, as expressed in this report, tends strongly to the view that during the season of open navigation the risk of casualty for vessels is little, if any, greater on this route than on the St. Lawrence route, and they find it difficult to appreciate the reasons for the existing disparity between the rates for the suspension of warranty as between Churchill and Montreal. They, however, recognize that as long as the route is used by comparatively few vessels, as has been the case heretofore, the volume of insurance will be comparatively small and a single total loss would more than account for the profits of a whole season. However, the committee are glad to be able to report that the joint hull committee, having in mind the experience so far obtained and the improvement of conditions effected by this government, have seen fit to recommend a reduction of ten shillings per cent on the insured value in the rates of additional premium to be charged for the suspension of warranty on this route. This reduction is in respect of vessels fitted with gyrocompass as well as vessels not so fitted. The existing advantage of ten per cent on vessels fitted with gyrocompass is maintained.

In view of the fact that the house is greatly interested in this matter, I felt this was the easiest way to bring it to its attention, rather than to make a statement outside of the house.

HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is another matter to which I should like to refer before the house rises, that is, the date most convenient for the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 56, with respect to hospital sweepstakes. I had thought that possibly, by consent, Tuesday next would be a good day to discuss it. Monday is not a very convenient day because all members have not returned from their week-end. If we take it on Tuesday that will afford the opportunity, which it was promised would be afforded, for a free vote on the subject. If that is convenient to the house we will make that the order of business, by consent, for Tuesday next. I should be glad to know the views of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So far as the opposition is concerned, Tuesday will be as convenient as any other day.

Mr. SPENCER: This part of the house is agreeable.

Mr. BENNETT: Then, by consent of the house, I move that that be made the order of business for Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

VICTORIA DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There is one other matter which I think the house should dispose of. It has been represented to the government from some quarters that the house should not sit on the 24th. I confess I had not given it thought, but when it was brought to my attention I promised to bring it to the consideration of the house. It is not necessary to conclude to-night what action shall be taken, but when the house convenes to-morrow I shall have had an opportunity of considering it with the right hon. gentleman opposite and some other members as to whether we should sit or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will say immediately that whatever the government decides will be acceptable to us.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Friday, May 18, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement of yesterday to the effect that Tuesday next has been fixed for the discussion of the bill regarding hospital sweepstakes, may I ask if the bill standing in my name in connection with an amendment to the criminal code for a similar purpose may be discussed at the same time.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I gave an undertaking with respect to the first named, but with respect to this bill I am under no obligation. I assume there will be discussions with respect to it, and the fate of the bill to which the hon. member has referred will to some extent be determined by the fate of the sweepstakes measure. I can conceive of the discussions on the two bills proceeding somewhat along the same lines, but I regret I cannot undertake to take up the bill on that day.

BOLIVIA AND PARAGUAY

EFFORT TO STOP HOSTILITIES BY EMBARGO ON SHIPMENT OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, according to the morning paper Great Britain is heading a number of nations in a proposal to put an embargo on the shipment of armaments to the disputants Bolivia and Paraguay. I understand that in this matter Great Britain seeks co-operation of the United States. I believe that we are not shipping any armaments, but that our people are very much interested in a movement of this kind. I have wondered whether the government could see its way clear to make a statement of endorsation or congratulation of Great Britain upon the stand she seems to be taking at this time.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was good enough to indicate to me that he purposed mentioning this matter on the orders of the day. While my personal view was that we might discuss the matter on the item I had left open in the estimates under the Department of External Affairs, namely the item concerning the League of Nations, I have prepared a short statement which I shall be very glad to make to the house at the moment, and further discussions may take place when that estimate is under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We passed that estimate when my right hon. friend was not in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the house desired to discuss the matter, and I left the item for that reason. If necessary I shall provide facilities for further discussion. The Associated Press dispatch which appeared in this morning's press indicates that Great Britain has taken steps to place an embargo on the shipment of arms to South American countries. I suppose the house recalls the position of members of the League of Nations with respect to matters of this kind. Article 23 of the covenant provides that the members of the League agree to entrust the league with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon. That is the provision in the covenant of the League of Nations. It will be within the memory of hon. members that last year we took action with respect to the International convention.

Canada signed the "International convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war" at Geneva on June 17th, 1925, and, following approval by parliament, ratified the convention on May 8th, 1933, subject to the reservation that ratification shall not take effect until ratifications of the convention shall have been effective, in accordance with Article 41 of the convention, in respect of Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United States of America.

The object of the convention is to establish a general system of supervision and publicity for the international trade in arms and implements of war and to set up a special system for areas where special measures are gradually recognized to be necessary.

Some action has been taken. But as I shall presently indicate, for reasons that perhaps are well known no very effective action has been taken with respect to this matter among the nations of the world, primarily, I assume, because the convention is not yet in force, and will not become effective until four months after fourteen ratifications have been deposited by the signatory governments with the government of the French republic. So far the convention has been signed on behalf of thirty-seven countries and thirteen ratifications, including the Canadian ratification, have been received, but the majority of these are contingent upon ratification by the producing powers. Of the latter, the following have not yet ratified the convention—Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United States of America. His Majesty's governments in the United Kingdom and in Australia have made their ratifications contingent upon ratification by all producing countries. Our ratification was not dependent upon that qualification.

In February, 1933, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom suggested to the league that action should be taken under the terms of article XI of the covenant to recommend that the various governments impose an embargo on the export of arms and ammunition to Bolivia and Paraguay. On that occasion the Canadian government notified its willingness to cooperate with other nations in concerting prohibition of export of armaments to Bolivia and Paraguay. A draft regulation to be signed by the governments in favour of this step was considered by the council and accepted by all the states members of the council, including the United Kingdom. A number of states made their acceptance subject to acceptance of the declaration by a specified number of other states including the United States. The government of the latter country, however, were unable to impose an embargo until necessary legislation was passed by congress.

Yesterday, according to the press dispatches to which I referred, Anthony Eden, Lord Privy Seal of Great Britain, again brought the issue of an embargo on arms and ammunition to Bolivia and Paraguay before the council of the League of Nations, which is now in session at Geneva, expressing the hope that the council would adopt a resolution to consult the arms exporting countries as soon as possible. Press reports indicate that support for the United Kingdom government's proposal was promised by delegates from France, Italy, Spain, Argentina, Czechoslovakia and Australia, which is this year a member of the council as Canada was some years ago. The matter was postponed to a later session of the council "to be convoked as soon as possible." Press reports further indicate that a communication will probably be made to the following countries in addition to the great powers: Canada, Australia, Belgium, Chile, Denmark, Spain, Estonia, Greece, Latvia, Lithuania, Mexico, Holland, Persia, Poland, Rumania, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and Yugoslavia. No official communication has yet been received by the Canadian government.

I certainly think, as the hon. member has said, that His Majesty's government in Great Britain is to be warmly congratulated and heartily commended for the action that has been taken. I assume that it is hardly necessary for me to add that in the event of the opportunity presenting itself Canada will participate favourably in any such action as may be taken in that regard.

FREIGHT RATES ON LUMBER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) yesterday asked a question respecting an order which he said had been issued by the board of railway commissioners in regard to lumber coming from the Pacific coast eastward. I find that there has been no such order. I shall read the communication that I have received and then lay it on the table:

Referring to your telephone message this p.m. asking for two copies of the ruling of the board in connection with the British Columbia lumber rates, I have made inquiries and I find that there is no recent ruling of the board in the matter. There is, however, on file an application from the Montreal Wholesale Lumber Dealers Association, Montreal, by telegram dated the 16th instant, and from a number of other lumber associations, for suspension of the proposed reduction in transcontinental lumber rates, British Columbia to eastern Canada, to permit eastern lumber manufacturers to be heard, who claim they need similar reductions to remain in business and compete with coast lumber manufacturers; and I am enclosing, for your information, two copies of letter from the board to the Montreal Wholesale Lumber Dealers Association and the other parties enumerated, which will explain the situation.

Yours very truly,

A. D. Cartwright,
Secretary,
Board of Railway Commissioners.

I am laying copies of the whole correspondence on the table for the information of my hon. friend and others who have asked me in regard to it.

Mr. POWER: This is probably another of those press rumours to which the Prime Minister referred yesterday.

GLANDERS IN SOUTHERN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): May I inquire from the Minister of Agriculture if his department is in a position to give the house any information with regard to a serious outbreak of the disease known as glanders among horses in the province of Quebec, and particularly in the St. Johns district. Would the minister state how many animals have been destroyed, and if the situation is well in hand?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Cartier informed me that he was going to ask this question, and because of the uncertainty in the minds of many farmers I think it well to make a fairly detailed statement. There has been an outbreak of glanders in Quebec. The first traces of it appeared on November 1, 1933, in three horses imported by Guy C. Tillotson, Coaticook. Two gave suspicious reaction. They had been transported three hundred miles by truck to Coaticook.

On November 18, 1933, these horses were retested; two reacted and were slaughtered without compensation in accordance with the regulation.

On November 25, 1933, five horses from the same stable as the imported horses reacted and were slaughtered. On November 29 three horses also reacted on this owner's farm, so that the outbreak did not originate from the imported horses. Subsequently it has been found that this outbreak is almost certainly a carry-over from an outbreak dealt with three years ago in the Knowlton district, Quebec.

The disease is in a mild form. Very few clinical cases have been found and these so indefinite that suspicion was not aroused; hence glanders was not reported.

Reports of suspected glanders are received from time to time in different parts of Canada and in such cases all the owners' horses are tested with mallein. All imported horses are either accompanied by certificate or tested with mallein before entering Canada.

Immediate steps were taken to trace and test all contacts and as reactors were found this increased the work in tracing contacts from additional diseased horses.

One horse recently shipped from Alberta reacted in Quebec. When traced back its mate reacted. This case was traced back to an outbreak near Beiseker, Alberta, where opposition to giving information had been encountered which made difficult the tracing of all contacts.

This horse had not been in Quebec long and has no relation to the origin of the Quebec outbreak. All contacts in Alberta are being dealt with now.

The details as to compensation are as follows:

Compensation awarded in Ottawa records: 306 horses slaughtered, $23,316.
Compensation passed for payment, $16,980.61.

The latest information from Quebec, dated May 12, 1934, is as follows:

5,511 horses tested.
319 horses reacted.
224 infected premises.
$24,070.33 compensation awarded.

Since the outbreak developed, horses passing through the Montreal yards have been tested, the total number of horses tested being 1,783. The number of officers was gradually increased as the situation warranted. Experienced men were employed and, because of their experience, three were brought from the western provinces. The disease has been confirmed by post mortem examination and in laboratory small animals. The improvement shown during the last week to May 12 is indicated by the following figures: 476 horses tested; 3 reactors. That shows that the situation is well under control.

VICTORIA DAY ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has reached a decision as to whether or not the house is to sit on the twenty-fourth of May?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I had not the opportunity to discuss it with one or two who desired to speak about it, but this evening before the house rises I shall bring the matter to the attention of the house. I have no definite idea myself about the matter one way or the other. I would just as soon sit as rise, but it has been suggested that we should not sit.

ALGERNON LIGHTHOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. FERNAND FAFARD (L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) whether he intends to rebuild the Algernon lighthouse which was located at the Traverse St. Roch and which was carried away by the ice last spring. If so, will the work be done by day labour or contract?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, an inspection of the Algernon lighthouse was made some time ago and we though it proper to erect a temporary light on the ruins of the lighthouse in question. A definite decision has not yet been arrived at in connection with the rebuilding of it.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): May I ask the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Justice if he is in a position to give any information to the house with reference to the fire that took place and also the outbreak at Kingston penitentiary?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I would not care to say more in the absence of the Minister of Justice than that there was an outbreak of fire which did substantial damage. No prisoners escaped. The fire has been completely extinguished, and the buildings that have been destroyed will be rebuilt.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): On February 23 last I directed a question to the Acting Minister of Immigration and Minister of Labour as follows:

Has the government under consideration and does it contemplate bringing before parliament at this session any measure further to alleviate the serious conditions affecting soldier settlers throughout the dominion, especially those of the four western provinces?

Part of the answer given by the minister was as follows:

At the present time I have not under consideration any further remedial legislation.

That is, with respect to soldier settlers throughout Canada.

On April 17 last the Prime Minister made a statement to the effect that an amendment would be brought down to the Soldier Settlement Act, but in his statement to the house on May 14 no mention was made of this pending legislation. May I ask the minister if he is contemplating bringing down any amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act this session?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think perhaps I should answer that. The Minister of Immigration was not in the house when I made the statement.

It is proposed to deal with certain questions that have arisen in connection with the taxation of land. That does not affect the soldier settlers, qua settlers, at all. It is that phase of it that the minister is dealing with. I was dealing with it as affecting taxation by municipalities and the making of lands available as other lands are for tax sale when the taxes have not been paid. It has to do with that phase of it and not with the question of the settler himself.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Thursday, May 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 3, subsection (9)—Payments authorized.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to ask the minister if he can give me an answer to the three questions I have placed on Hansard in connection with the decrease in the home consumption of certain farm products?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, the information is not completed.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret that so much time is being taken to answer these questions. I first brought up this matter on March 26, when the house was in committee on the resolution. At that time I asked this question, which appears on page 1812 of Hansard:

As the government has not answered my question I suppose I am to understand that it does not intend to do any thing to improve home marketing conditions.

In fairness to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) I must say that he rose to answer my question but an hon. member on this side started to speak. I give him credit that he was willing to make some answer. I again put the figures on Hansard on May 8, nearly a month and a half afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The committee is discussing section 3, subsection (9), and I cannot see that this has anything to do with that subsection.

Mr. POULIOT: Subsection 9 reads:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act.

The purpose of the act is stated in the title, which reads:

An act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

This is a bill to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and I am complaining about the decrease in home consumption and, therefore, in sales of natural products. I submit that what I am saying is perfectly relevant and in accord with subsection (9) of section 3. Under that subsection the governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act with regard to the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada. I submit that what I am now saying is quite relevant.

On May 8 I quoted some figures showing the decrease in the home consumption of apples, honey, eggs, dressed beef, concentrated milk, cheese, potatoes, peas, oats, barley, wheat and wheat flour. I gave figures showing the spread in prices in 1933 as compared with 1930, after which there was the following dialogue between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and myself:

Mr. Pouliot: Just a moment; I am just concluding my remarks. I am sure the minister will answer.

Mr. Weir (Melfort): My understanding was that with these statistics on record in Hansard an answer would be submitted to the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank you.

That appears on page 2893 of Hansard of May 8. On the following day I asked a question of the minister which appears on page 2931 of Hansard and reads:

Mr. Pouliot: Is the minister ready to answer my question of yesterday?

Mr. Weir (Melfort): The principle under consideration in the wording of clause 9 is to confine the application of power to the creation of interprovincial and export trade.

The minister was answering another question. However, I do not blame him for that as there was a great rush of questions at that time. I thought I was very reasonable when I waited several more days. On page 3094 of Hansard of May 16, the following appears:

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to ask the minister if he can give me some explanation with regard to the decrease in the consumption of apples, honey, eggs, fresh beef, concentrated milk, cheese, potatoes, wheat, oats, barley and wheat flour, as compared with the previous year. I take the liberty of asking this question because on May 8 the minister said that an answer would be given me in this connection.

Mr. Weir (Melfort): The officials of the department have been working since May 8 to gather the information requested by the hon. member for Témiscouata. I have inquired as to the matter on a number of occasions, the last time this morning, but the work is not yet completed. We hope to have the information in the very near future. There has been a very great deal of work in this connection.

Mr. Pouliot: Would the minister be kind enough to tell me if it will be completed before the bill is reported by the committee?

Mr. Weir (Melfort): I believe it will be completed this week.

That was the day before yesterday. In the Hansard of yesterday, at page 3121, the following appears:

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if he now has available the information that I have been seeking from him for some time? Yesterday he was kind enough to give me a ray of hope when he said that he hoped to have the information in the very near future. What I want is information with regard to the decrease in the home consumption of several farm products which have been mentioned several times in Hansard. I hope the minister will be kind enongh to tell me, first, if we still have a local market for these commodities; secondly, the reason for the decrease in the home consumption of such products; and thirdly, the remedy, if any, which has been applied by the government to prevent that decrease which has been taking place since 1930.

Mr. Weir (Melfort): I regret that the information asked for has not yet been completed. I am sure the hon. member will realize when the answer is brought down that there was perhaps more work entailed in getting the information than he had in mind when he asked for it, but I hope it will be in shape to be brought down at the beginning of next week, if not to-morrow.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the hon. gentleman, and if I can be of any assistance to the officers of his department in cooperating with them I shall be very glad to do so.

I would suggest to the staff of the Minister of Agriculture that they should cooperate with the staff of the bureau of statistics. They would get the same information which I have received and which is official. The information in regard to home consumption was given to me by the bureau of statistics, and for the two items I found the price in the Year Book, while for the other items I have divided the value of exports by the quantity in order to arrive at an average price. The quantity of decrease has been multiplied by that average price for 1930 and 1933 respectively. It is very simple to work it out. If the members of the minister's staff are not strong enough on mathematics they might consult the treasury board or the mathematicians in the architects branch of the Department of Public Works, who I am sure would make the calculation for them. It is a matter of applying the simple rules of arithmetic, and it ought to be easy for them to ascertain whether the figures are correct or not. I assure the committee that it is a matter of utmost importance, because what has been discussed until now is only the external trade. The only figures in regard to internal trade are those that are to be found on March 26 and May 8, and in respect of May 8 I have been more than generous, because I have subtracted the amount of exports of butter and pork meat from the amount of decrease in home consumption of same. If the exports of butter and pork products were added to the decrease in home consumption, we should have a real idea of the decrease or the price spread as between 1933 and 1930 in connection with those two products.

I am not going to dwell very long on this matter, but this is my contention. I maintain that it is because of the loss in external trade that we have a loss in internal trade, and the loss in external trade is something fearful. Our external trade is only one-third of what it was in 1930. It may be said that it is just as true for imports as for exports. The point is that it has created a great deal of unemployment, and here we come again to the high tariff walls which have been erected around this country, which have been an obstacle to external trade, and which explain the decrease in our home trade.

Mark you, sir, the decrease in exports from Canada from 1930 until the present time amounts to over a billion and a half dollars.

How much unemployment has that meant throughout Canada? The reason there is a decrease in consumption in Canada, although the hon. gentleman presiding over the Department of Agriculture may not be willing to admit it, is that the people have no purchasing power; they have not enough money to buy apples, honey, grain, vegetables, cheese and other farm products. And it is because of the loss of purchasing power among the people that the farmers are suffering, notwithstanding that the population is larger than it was in 1930. If the population were smaller, and if the prices of farm products were higher, I would not insist on this point; I would say that the people were not buying luxuries. But these twelve articles which are mentioned there are primary farm products. The sales should be at least as much as they were in 1930. There is no excuse for the decrease, because many of these products cost less now than they did before.

From my point of view therefore it is of the utmost importance, in order that I may understand the working of the bill, to have answers to the following three questions. Have we still got our local trade in these commodities? The Prime Minister stated last year, and he repeated it time and time again, that we still have our local trade, our local market. But if the home consumption of these farm products has decreased to such an extent, can it be said that we still have our local market, as the Prime Minister stated categorically and emphatically a year ago? That is the first question.

The second question is this: What have been the causes of that decrease in home consumption? There must be a reason for it. Was I wrong in stating that the decrease in external trade, due to the high tariff policy of the government, has been responsible for a decrease in internal trade, which depends to some extent upon the purchasing power of people working in the manufacturing industries, who must have the money necessary to buy these farm products.

In the third place, if the reason is not as I suggest, what is it, and what remedies have been taken by this government to prevent that decrease in home consumption? I ask this question because up to now the discussion has been about external trade only, and I should like this government to give us an explanation so that we may see whether as a matter of fact such a relationship exists between external and internal trade.

Trade matters are very difficult. It is like clockwork. You can remove one wheel from a clock and it might work just the same, but it would be either faster or slower and would not keep time. But if you remove all the wheels from the clock how can it work? I do not want to say anything unpleasant to the minister, but I tell him here and now that I have been most patient, for these figures have been on Hansard for over a month and a half. I am entitled to an answer after all the care I have taken preparing the figures. It could be done much more expeditiously by the officers of the minister's department, and I say that if they have not these figures at hand they deserve only one thing, and that is to be put out at once. They should prepare the right information for the minister, and there is no excuse for their not doing so. They must inform the minister accurately and if they fail to do so then they are not fit for the job and should be put on direct relief. But I believe that they can do that work provided the minister will tell them seriously, "I want that information at once. It is my duty as a minister of the crown to supply every member of this house with that information, and I am telling you to bring it to me at once, because your job is at stake." If the minister would take that attitude he would find at once that the answer was, "Ready, aye, ready; we are ready."

I hope that as I have been so lenient and patient, having waited a month and a half for that information—I have not insisted before; I have merely reminded the minister that I wanted the information for my electors —he will now take proper steps to have it prepared and submitted before six o'clock to-day.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Although a great deal of this is out of order, I assure the hon. gentleman that there has been no intentional delay. Every effort has been made to prepare for him the most accurate statement possible. I had thought it would be ready for to-day, but as soon as it is it will be submitted at once.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman and take his word for that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Before the subsection carries I shall ask to have an amendment moved. I propose that subsection 9 of section 3 as amended be further amended by the insertion, after the word "necessary" in line 3, the words "to assist in the organization of local boards."

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The subsection as amended would read:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament such sums of money as may be necessary to assist in the organization of local boards, to defray the operating expenses of the board incurred by it directly and any expenditure incurred or authorized by the board under the authority of section 9 hereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister please explain how the money may be made available to assist in the organization of local boards?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This was a matter brought up in the discussion just before the committee rose last night. A scheme would be submitted, but it was pointed out that especially under present conditions, until the local board was appointed, there would be no means of raising money to carry out the poll, for instance, if that were necessary in the formation of the board. Following the principle in force in the United Kingdom, assistance would be given, if required, in the organization of the local boards.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister is amending subclause 9 of clause 3 and I understand his amendment deals with clause 9. Personally I intend to move that clause 9 be struck out.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We are amending subclause 9 of clause 3.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The authority of clause 9 is cited in the amendment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The last few words of the amendment refer to clause 9, and without anticipating what the committee is going to do, I intend to oppose clause 9 in toto and to move for its removal because I do not think it is necessary in the bill. If the minister's amendment refers to clause 9, I would ask that his amendment be allowed to stand until it is typewritten so that it may be attached to the subclause because as it was read by the chairman, it was scarcely understandable. My main objection is its reference to clause 9 which has not yet been reached by the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would suggest that the chairman read the subclause as amended and I think the hon. member will have no difficulty in following it if he has the subclause before him.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with you in being presented with amendments written in longhand, two of them to the same subclause.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Three.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I understood there were just two. This makes it a difficult task for the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): I can follow it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This was not in longhand.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My suggestion is that for clarity the subclause stand until the new subclause as amended is written out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am getting somewhat razzle-dazzled too, but I understand this amendment perfectly and I know what it means; I approve of it heartily. So far as any anticipated change in clause 9 is concerned, whatever is done when we shall have reached that clause, we can revert to this subclause of clause 3 and make it conform to the change in clause 9. We must take the bill clause by clause if we are to make progress. The only justification for departing from that procedure is when a knotty problem arises like the one mentioned by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) that is not capable of being understood. It is not a bad idea to let the subclause stand; I was going to ask that myself with respect to section 5 or section 6 or both; but this section is becoming so involved one would need a Philadelphia lawyer to puzzle it out. All the clauses that are left over to-night should be consolidated with the amendments so that we may understand them. That would be an office consolidation and it would be quite in order so as to assist us. I would ask the chairman and the minister not to forget that the amendment now moved to give organization assistance to producers is just what the growers want, and what was done in many of the provinces; that is, any new selling organization that was set up by governmental legislation was given a grant or loan to set it on its feet. This was done in the case of the Cooperative Live Stock Association; it was given a grant for three or four years to give it a start. Any measure that is sponsored by the government presupposes that they want to get the organization started and the only way to do that is to give it some initial assistance. I shall not object to the subclause standing so long as the minister does not forget it in the final redrafting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the minister if he would consider between now and the time we reach the last provisions of the bill the insertion at the end of a clause which will require a report to be made to parliament within fifteen days after its assembling, of what has been done under the provisions of the measure? Such a clause usually appears in bills of this kind, but it does not seem to be in this one. We are introducing a number of new features; this is in large part experimental legislation and I think it ought to follow other acts in the particular I have mentioned.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no objection to that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That suggestion will be carefully considered.

Subsection 9 stands.

On section 4, subsection 1—Powers of board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The committee have before them the amendments printed but not moved.

Mr. POWER: It would facilitate matters if the minister, out of all these funds he is going to get, would get a law clerk to assist the chairman of the committee, so that the minister and the unfortunate chairman may know what we are discussing. Here we are wasting half our time. We have amendment after amendment, some of them written, some of them barely thought of, and most of them a mess. The chairman has made a desperate attempt to shed light on the subject. I suggest we get a law officer, particularly to help the minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): After this praiseworthy outburst, let me say that in conformity with the wishes of hon. members the amendments that were proposed to be moved have been printed and have been before the committee for some time. In this particular case only one word is struck out and one word added to meet a particular problem in one province. Therefore I maintain that the difficulty of following this is very slight.

Mr. POWER: The matter to which I referred was the amendment to subsection 9 of section 3.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We agreed to let that stand.

Mr. POWER: The minister objects to the criticism I made, and I am going to reply. To that section there was an amendment made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) last evening. When it was read by the chairman no mention was made of the amendment. Then there was another lengthy amendment made verbally by the minister himself. The result was that the chairman was unable to follow what the minister wanted.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I submitted the amendment I moved in typewritten form.

Mr. POWER: There were three amendments to the one subsection.

Mr. DUPRE: I move:

That paragraph (a) of section 4 be amended as follows:

In line 4 add a comma after the word "quality;" strike out the word "or" and insert the words "or class" after the word "grade."

The section will then read as follows:

(a) to regulate the time and place at which, and the agency through which the regulated product shall be marketed, to determine the manner of distribution, the quantity and quality, grade or class of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

The only change is one granting the board power to direct that the product shall be sold through a certain agency. There was some question whether the former wording permitted of such direction, and, in order to avoid any uncertainty, it was suggested that the language be more explicit.

Mr. REID: That is not the amendment we have before us. The amendment just read has added words to the printed amendment. There are three words which are not in this amendment.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is right, that is what I explained when the amendment was read, so that hon. members could follow it. The only change is the addition of the word "class" at the request of producers in British Columbia, dealing with the marketing of their apples on the basis of size as well as the regular grades.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is apparent that this board is going to supplement the work now done by graders.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, not at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then what is the sense of putting this into the bill? The government now have an army of these men.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The graders who are now grading will grade in the same way as they do now. This will enable producers to organize. There will be no extra grading necessary, the same grading that has been done will be done in the same way by a similar staff.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This bill certainly puts into the hands of the board the control of all this grading.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, not the control of the grading.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Because the same fruit graders will grade. There will be no grading done under the board. They will ship on the basis of grade.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then why not say so? The bill as you have it printed now will give the board power to control all grades.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not control of grading.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You have here an army of graders grading for every conceivable thing. Grades are fixed to-day. They are marketed through the agency of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Now you are going to set up a board outside of the control of the Department of Trade and Commerce, unless the minister of that department happens to be the minister in charge.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The grading of fruit and vegetables and whatever comes under this bill is now done under the Department of Agriculture, as far as agricultural products are concerned, and will continue to be done in the same way.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am quite familiar with what is being done. I am not raising any complaint, except that there is a tremendous duplication going on.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No duplication in this.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There can be. The minister will find that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There will be no duplication in grading.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I say there can be, as the bill is drafted.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do I understand the minister to say that besides the local board there will be a selling board or selling agency? Will that be distinct from the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, there will be no selling agency set up except under section 9.

Mr. McINTOSH: The local board is the only board referred to?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is there anything in the bill with regard to a democratic organization of that local board? That is for the producers to come together in what we might term free assembly—free organization, free discussion, and as a result set up the local board. Are they allowed to do that under the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will they have a vote to do that? I understand that the vote is optional.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Optional, yes, with the producers themselves, the people concerned.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do I understand that if the producers wish a vote they will have it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: As the bill reads I think it is optional with the minister to allow the producers to have a vote. I think that is wrong. I believe that as far as western Canada is concerned the local producers will want a vote, and they will want any board they set up organized in a democratic way so that it will be as satisfactory as possible to those about them and to themselves, and therefore a factor in production as well as in financing the district.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I raise the point that we would make better headway if we finished each clause by itself. Later there comes a subsection dealing with how a vote shall be taken and whether it is optional or not.

Mr. McINTOSH: All right. That will be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Perhaps I should read the substituted subsection, as amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Re-amended.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Section 4 subsection (a) if accepted as amended would read thus:

To regulate the time and place at which, and the agency through which the regulated product shall be marketed, to determine the manner of distribution, quantity and quality, grade or class of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How does the minister purpose having the board enforce the provision to prohibit the marketing of any product? How will they go about prohibiting marketing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The people who submit the scheme would have to state the way in which it will be done. Under the bill relating to fruit which has been given second reading a similar provision has been assented to by the house, which prevents the marketing of products of a certain grade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There parliament has made provision but in this bill parliament is not making any provision, and for that reason a parallel cannot be drawn between the two pieces of legislation. I am asking the minister how the board will prohibit; how will it go about the task of prohibition. Will it put a man in gaol, or what will it do, and by what authority will it act?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): By enforcing the regulations which will be set up, the same as under any other legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How will the board enforce the regulations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The same as they would any other regulation, namely by penalties, cancelling of licences or otherwise.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is that power given to the dominion board under this section as amended?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have set out all the powers which we think would be necessary to meet the different proposals which might be submitted from one part of the country, or another, dealing with the different branches of agriculture. They are set out under the dominion board with the proviso added that any of these powers which may be required may be delegated to the local board. It was felt impossible to say that each local board should have each or all of the powers set out here. That is why the plan was adopted of stating the powers of the dominion board, and the further provision that powers could be delegated where necessary to work out the scheme.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will the dominion board have power to carry out what is contained in this subsection, irrespective of the local or provincial boards?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It will be carried out through the local boards. But this has reference only to a regulated product, that is a scheme submitted by the producers themselves defining what the regulated product will be. In regulating the marketing of that product they ask in their scheme that such powers shall be given them as will permit them to put their desires into effect, and only in so far as the powers as set out in this bill allow will it be possible for the dominion board to delegate those powers to the local board.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister has said that we have no right to legislate or to give powers to a local or provincial board, so the powers we are giving under this subsection must be given to the dominion board. Under this subsection you are giving power to the dominion board to prohibit the marketing of any commodity.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The dominion board through the local board.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Through the local board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, because a scheme would have to be set up before the regulated product would come into being.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Under this legislation will not the dominion board have power to exercise its powers without any local board having anything to do with it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the case of emergency, if a scheme were set up as under section 9.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Only if a scheme is set up?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. I think I understand the hon. member's difficulty. For instance, if a scheme is set up in Ontario to deal with the marketing of grapes, the producers submit that scheme, it is approved, and the local board is set up.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I interrupt the minister. Do you mean the provincial scheme or the scheme which concerns only the province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If it has to do only with marketing within the province, yes, but I was taking the wider view which would cover all cases, provincial, inter-provincial or export. A local board is set up which asks for certain powers which would permit them to give effect to their wishes. The dominion board will then name them as its agent, giving them these powers. In that way the dominion board could exert its powers. It could not impose powers in duplication over the local board.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How can the federal board transfer its powers to the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It names the local board as its agent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is suggesting that a board given certain powers under this bill is to have power to give its power to a local board, which as yet is non-existent, to fine and imprison the citizens of the country. It may give these powers to a local board about the personnel or character of which at the present time neither parliament nor the minister has any knowledge, and will not until long after the bill is passed. If I understand the minister correctly, that is what he is saying. I do not read the section to mean that, but if the meaning is as we have been told, it is fortunate that we have found that out. As I read the section it relates to the powers of the board, and the board only. It states that the board shall, subject to the provisions of the act, have powers to do certain things. But the minister has said that among the things the board shall have power to do is the power to delegate to some other body still to be brought into existence the power in certain eventualities to fine and imprison the citizens of Canada, one of which may be simply because they offer for sale certain of the commodities they have produced. Surely the minister would not expect the committee to accept such a clause as that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the event of a violation of the regulation, the court only could enforce what the right hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does the court figure in this? This is a provision to the effect that the board shall have power to do certain things; it does not say that the courts shall have power. It states that the board shall have power to prohibit marketing. The minister has said that the way in which it will prohibit marketing is by fining and imprisoning those who contravene its orders. He goes on to say that this power of fining and imprisoning is to be given to local boards to be exercised against their fellow citizens. That seems to me a most extraordinary provision.

Mr. BURY: Are we not getting away from subsection (a) of section 4?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the one we are considering.

Mr. BURY: We are getting away from it. Subsection (a) of section 4 deals exclusively with regulating the powers of the board, that is the dominion board, and says nothing at all about local boards.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You have not read the amendment; wake up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has said it deals with the local boards.

Mr. McINTOSH: There were some amendments on May 11.

Mr. BURY: Subsection (a) of section 4 reads:

> To regulate the time and place at which, and the agency through which the regulated product shall be marketed; to determine the manner of distribution, the quantity and quality or grade or class of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

If the hon. gentleman would waken up, himself, and read the subsection he would find there is nothing in it dealing with local boards.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What does "agency" mean?

Mr. BURY: I am speaking about subsection (a) of section 4.

Mr. McINTOSH: That subsection has been amended.

Mr. BURY: I am reading the amended subsection, as the hon. member would learn if he would waken up. I am reading the amendment. Now, being awake, if he will read the subsection he will find that it deals with the dominion board, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has suggested. There is nothing in the subsection that refers to the powers of the local board whatsoever.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then may I ask why did the minister himself mention it?

Mr. BURY: I am merely calling attention to the fact that a great deal of the trouble which the committee is causing itself is caused by members of the committee wandering beyond the limits of the particular section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the minister who has wandered beyond it, and my hon. friend's criticism ought to be directed against him.

Mr. BURY: No, because the minister was answering a question that had been asked by the hon. member for Provencher and which did not come under this section at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What does the word "agency" mean in the amendment? The minister gave a different reply from that given by my hon. friend from East Edmonton, and I think the minister knows more about it too.

Mr. POWER: I back the hon. member for East Edmonton.

Mr. BURY: If hon. members will read section 4 (1) (a) they will see that it is plain that it refers to the dominion board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister a question? In his judgment what is the meaning of the word "agency" in the amendment?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Any organization or any branch of the trade that the local board may designate.

Mr. BURY: My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre may think he is very clever, but if he will just apply his ordinary intelligence to the language of the section he will see that what it provides is this: that the board, that is the dominion board, has power to regulate the time and place of marketing and has power also to regulate the agency through which the regulated product shall be marketed. That says nothing about the powers of the agency. This section deals entirely with the powers of the dominion board, and the powers of the dominion board are clearly defined as the power of regulating and the power of fixing or appointing an agency through which the regulated products shall be marketed, and so on. But the powers of the local board are not defined except in so far as they are a mere agent of the dominion board.

Mr. BROWN: I think there is need for more explanation of this clause. I agree with my hon. friend from East Edmonton that this does not necessarily refer to the local board. Indeed, up to this point of the bill we are not supposed to know that there is such a thing as a local board. This section deals entirely with the powers of the dominion board and among those powers is the power to regulate the time and place and the agency through which a regulated product shall be marketed. We have a right to know just how wide that term "agency" is. It may mean a local board as set up under this act. It may mean one of any exporting agencies. It may mean that the dominion board has power to delegate to this or that exporting firm the marketing of a certain product. If the powers of the board are as wide as that, it seems to me that we are giving the board very, very wide powers indeed. Does it mean that the dominion board may determine that a product shall be marketed through a local board, through a marketing firm that is in the regular trade, or through any firm whatever? It seems wide enough to include all of these constructions, and if it is that wide we are giving to the dominion board powers that I think should never be given by this parliament.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Lisgar is correct in saying that so far the local board has not been mentioned in this bill. This refers to the dominion board. But later when we come to the local board it will be seen that these powers can be delegated to the local board as an agency. It was simply to clear up the question that had been asked me, Mr. Chairman, that I went out of my way to give the explanation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There can be no doubt according to the minister's interpretation that this board has the right to prohibit the marketing of certain products, and that is definitely set forth in the section. If a producer is engaged in offering for sale certain products this board has authority under this bill as it now stands to tell him that he must stop producing those particular commodities. He must not even offer them for sale if that happens to be contrary to some provision which the local board may set up. Is not that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board has no power under this section to tell a man that he cannot produce.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If a man is prohibited from selling or offering for sale, which is the definition of the word "marketing," it certainly means that in the long run he cannot produce, because no man is going to produce beyond what may be sufficient for his own needs any commodity he cannot sell. Just to show the extreme to which this bill goes, I have pointed out that there are clauses in the bill which would bring a man to ruin in no time unless he happened to fall in line with what may come to be a regulation that some unknown board may hereafter make—not with what is the law of the land as determined by this parliament. The minister and some hon. gentlemen opposite have made a little fun of me because I quoted Magna Charta. I am going to quote again one clause from Magna Charta which this house had better keep in mind in all legislation, and particularly in considering this particular bill:

No free man shall be seized, or imprisoned, or dispossessed, or outlawed, or in any way brought to ruin: we will not go against any man, nor send against him save by legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. . . . To no man will we sell, or deny, or delay right or justice.

Under this section you are giving to a board power to bring to ruin an innocent producer without his having had any judgment by his peers, and you are doing this under a power other than the law of the land, under some regulation that may be made by a group of local producers. You are denying him justice, and you are taking away from him the right as a matter of justice to do what he pleases with what he himself produces. You are doing all this without sanction in the name of the law of the land. I take no exception to parliament making any regulation it deems necessary in the interests of the community at large and for the protection of producers in the marketing of their products. By that I mean a regulation that may be enforced at law and is a part of the law of the land. But I do say that this parliament has no right to countenance any legislation which will delay and deny right and justice to any citizen of this country or seize, imprison, dispossess or bring to ruin any man except by the judgment of his peers and the law of the land.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The regulations set up under this act are subject to the approval of the governor in council exactly the same as in any other act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The governor in council is not parliament, and these regulations, as the minister says, are purely local regulations. They are not regulations that govern from coast to coast. They are not the law of the land. Nothing can be the law of the land that applies, for example, only in the city of Belleville and not in the city of Guelph, or in the city of Guelph and not in the city of Belleville. That is not part of the law of the land at all. It is making a farce of law altogether.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to follow for a moment the remarks made by the leader of the opposition. I am referring to the last fourteen words of the clause, "prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality."

When the leader of the opposition objected to that the minister rather cleverly gave an illustration referring to the fruit and honey act that we passed. But that is hardly a parallel case. Under the fruit and honey act power is taken to prohibit the marketing of a product of an inferior grade.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Without wanting to lead the discussion into the next subsection, I think it will be found that that matter will be taken care of there.

Mr. NEILL: I am following the remarks made by the minister under this section in connection with prohibition. The fruit and honey act forbids the marketing of inferior grades but this section forbids the marketing of any grade, it is a total prohibition. Sometimes a homely illustration is even better than a reference to constitutional procedure. I have in mind a couple of men who go out and rent a field of ten acres from a farmer. They put in potatoes and spend the whole season cultivating their crop. In the fall when they want to sell they have to take the market price because they have no facilities for storing. They take their money, pay their rent and the remainder is their compensation for their labour. These men might be prohibited from selling their potatoes or the sale might be postponed for six months. Potatoes are not like wheat which can be carried over. Potatoes grown in certain soils must be sold quite early in the season. I ask the minister what those men are to do when they find themselves forbidden to sell the produce they have grown. This illustrates the great difference between this bill and the British act which was supposed to give us a precedent for our legislation. The British act is fundamentally based upon the encouragement of production. Mr. Elliot's ideal is to get them to produce more. If a man produces more than the market will stand, Mr. Elliot does not tell him that he cannot sell, he tells the man in Canada or the man in Denmark that he cannot ship so much. From the very nature of things, this matter is important because we are an exporting country. I should like to know from the minister what is to happen in the case of a man who has produced a perishable article and is told that he cannot sell it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think we could solve a lot of our difficulties if we read the whole of the section. The next paragraph of section 4—

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Are you reading the amendments?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am reading the votes and proceedings. It is suggested that paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 4 be struck out and the following substituted therefor. Under this amendment it is provided that the board shall have power:

To compensate any person for loss sustained by withholding from the market or forwarding to a specified market any regulated product pursuant to an order of the board; provided that no compensation shall be paid in respect of a regulated product that may be withheld from a particular market because the grade of such product is deemed by the board to be unsuitable for such market,—

There is nothing new in that.

—or because of restrictions imposed by the government or other competent authority of any other country—

I suppose that is to meet quotas—

—upon the importation of any regulated product into that country.

Mr. NEILL: That is just too bad for my friends.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think there is ample provision to meet any hardship caused by any order of the board.

Mr. NEILL: If the order is in consequence of a quota, they are sunk.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What are you going to do?

Mr. NEILL: That is what I am asking the minister; it is his legislation, not mine.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The quota is not made by this board, it is made by a foreign country. This board cannot deal with a quota imposed by a foreign country and they should not be asked to compensate for any action of a foreign country. The section provides that they shall compensate for any loss due entirely to their own action but they shall not compensate for loss as a result of a quota or something else imposed by a foreign country.

Mr. NEILL: Any restriction of that kind will almost necessarily be the result of a quota.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not necessarily.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to ask the minister to give an explanation of a case I intend to quote. I should like him to tell me how he would work out the time and place at which the regulated product shall be marketed and determine the manner of distribution and so on. Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gagnon) referred to the sardine industry in that county and pointed out that a large quantity of sardines were fished in Canadian waters and sold to American canneries. Supposing a group in the industry obtains a prohibition of the sale of Canadian-caught sardines to the American market and forced their being held for canning in Canada, what will happen? Would the board have the power to fix the price which would be paid to the fishermen by the Canadian canners once this prohibition of sale or export is in effect?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The point that seems to be overlooked is the fact that the producers themselves are given the authority for the regulating of the marketing of their own product. They do not buy or sell, they regulate the marketing of their own product. Surely no person would be as much concerned about injury to a producer as the producer himself.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member for Charlotte pointed out the conditions which existed in his constituency, and he is quite correct. Let me point out to the minister how this thing might work out. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) stated that one province had already appointed a provincial board. He did not name that province but I shall give it now—it is the province of New Brunswick. A board has been appointed there and I claim it has been sitting without authority. How is that board constituted? The natural producer is represented by a commission merchant. I am not going to say that he is not a farmer and does not know what he is doing, but the fact is that he is a commission merchant. The chairman is the deputy minister of agriculture of the province and the third member is a sardine canner. The original producers are not represented at all. I have every faith in the honesty of the members of this board, but I do oppose the principle of appointing as a member of a provincial board an exporter and purchaser of the natural products. How is such a person going to distinguish between his own interests and those of the natural producer from whom he purchases the natural products to be canned for export? This shows how this thing can be abused. I do not say this will happen with this department, but it may happen with the departments of certain governments. I believe these three men are absolutely honest but I am opposed to the principle of appointing men who are themselves interested in the export of an article while the original producer is not represented at all. Now that act passed by New Brunswick is being put into operation before the federal act is passed giving them authority to act, and they are acting in both respects, export and interprovincial trade. I am merely pointing this out to show the minister what abuses can creep in under this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When these local boards are framing their regulations, assuming that there is one producer who produces a hundred times as much as any other in the same area—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Before discussing that point, I suggest that we wait until we come to the formation of local boards; it would facilitate the passing of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: According to what the minister says, the central board will act on the representation of the local boards, and this fact makes very vital what I am about to say. Assuming that you have a group of producers in a locality asking for certain regulations and submitting a scheme to the minister, and in that locality one producer produces a hundred times as much as the others, would the majority so called be counted in relation to the quantity of the produce that is produced, or would it be according to the number of producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would be a combination of both. For example, it would state that there should be 75 per cent of the producers and 75 per cent of production.

Mr. NEILL: Where is that provided for?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under the heading of scheme submitted by producers. That is one matter that would have to be decided.

Mr. NEILL: Is it provided under the scheme to be presented that 75 per cent must be producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I said before, if we fixed any percentage of votes or of production it might be taken by the provincial authorities that we were going out of our way to tell them what they should do. Because it was felt that it might lead to objections, and because we wished leave it as flexible as possible, that was left out. A body of producers coming forward to submit their scheme might ask for a poll, or not, depending on the scheme. If they ask for a poll it is provided that they can be given one. My own opinion was that any reasonable body of men would make certain, when such drastic steps were to be taken, that there would be a percentage of producers and also of production.

Mr. NEILL: I understood the minister to say that 75 per cent was provided for; now it appears that it is only possible. If they choose to ask for 75 per cent they may or may not get it, but they do not have to. There is the difference between this and the British act, which looks after the interests of the minority.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Their problem is very different from ours. They have one government instead of ten, and it was to get over that difficulty that we dropped any set percentage, trusting that any provincial government would have as good judgment as the federal.

Mr. NEILL: I understand that. But I suggested, when I was speaking a day or two ago, that that might have been got around by the dominion government putting forward some sort of skeleton scheme to which every province would have to subscribe in the main lines if they wished the cooperation of the dominion. Without interfering with provincial jurisdiction, the minister could simply say that if the province wanted dominion cooperation they must agree to such and so. The federal government did that in connection with old age pensions. They did not enforce any obligation on the province but simply said, "If you do so and so, here is our skeleton scheme and we will do so and so"; and every province, without a great deal of trouble, saw their way to agree to the scheme. The provision made under the British act might be put into this scheme. Under the British system it has to be two-thirds of the people voting at the poll; there must not be less than 50 per cent of a vote of all producers; and there must be at least two-thirds in quantity produced. I would ask the minister whether he could not qualify the words "and the agency through which." The idea is to allow probably the milk and fruit people of British Columbia, let us say, to deal through their associations.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That was not the intent.

Mr. NEILL: Through some cooperative agency. The language is much too broad. If you say through any agency, it leaves it open to some tinpot commission agent to get the whole agency for some product in his province, and it is these things that arouse suspicions in the minds of people. The dominion board may prescribe "any" agency through which the product must be marketed. Think what that might involve. It might involve the decision that it should be done through the local board; but the board has power to delegate it to someone else. It might involve its being done through a co-operative association or a farmers' institute, or it might involve a man with political pull who has a petty agency, and it would amount then to giving him a rakeoff. I do not object to the spirit of the words but I think the minister should qualify them so that the section would not be so broad and liable to abuse.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think we have for the past three months followed pretty much the line the hon. gentleman has suggested. We started out by trying to make the bill specific enough to include all conditions, but we were forced, because of representations made and the great difference in the conditions we had to meet, to do just as he has said, namely, to set up a skeleton bill which would make it possible for cooperation between provinces and the dominion, so that one could provide for domestic marketing and the other interprovincial or export trade. I agree with the hon. member that if we had one government instead of ten that could be very easily overcome; but I think we have a perfect safeguard in the fact that the local board has to be set up by the producers themselves, and I suggest that no one would have their interests more at heart than the producers themselves. The purpose of putting in the agency was not at all to make it easy for all the products to go through a certain cooperative agency; I do not think the great body of producers themselves would advocate that. Perhaps the picture that illustrates it best is this. One farmer may be quite a large producer with a large volume of product to market. If he has a considerable volume to market he can make a better bargain with different channels of trade, because if they get a greater volume it will be less costly for them to market the product when they know the quality.

We are really making it possible, if the growers wish to organize so that they may have a greater volume, that they can have the advantage in the different channels of trade.

Mr. NEILL: Would not the words "time and place" cover that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I thought it would, and that is why it was worded as it was in the first place,—where and when the board would decide. It was pointed out to me however that "where" might be interpreted to mean for example the Vancouver market rather than the Victoria market. It was just to clear up that point that the word "agency" was inserted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is making it pretty clear that the bill as presented is the result of representations largely from special groups, groups that come from particular localities.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So that nothing that is not quite accurate may be put on record, what I intended to say was this: We made use of all known information after a careful study of the different acts in force. We felt that it would be to the advantage of the primary producers to have a marketing bill under which we could set up a marketing board. A great deal of information was then before us as to the problems with which we had to deal and in the preparation of this bill we have been in touch with private individuals, the trade and cooperative organizations, in order to add to the information that was already ours. That was the way in which the representations were made. This bill, it has been stated, I believe, by hon. members on both sides, is the result of demands made upon me as Minister of Agriculture in Regina when the cooperatives met there last summer. I am quite certain, however that the cooperatives themselves would be the last to make such a suggestion because I stated there I felt we should have competition in trade but on the fundamental principles we disagreed. After the frank discussions we had, a committee met with me in the Royal York hotel at the time of the Royal Winter fair and there again I emphasized that point very clearly, but the preparation of this bill was proceeding much earlier than the meeting that was held at Regina. We were working on a definite plan to assist in the marketing of the products of all primary producers; we gathered all the information possible from cooperative organizations and others and of course we always welcomed any suggestions whether they came from cooperatives or not. But this bill was not prepared simply to meet the wishes of cooperative or special organizations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the illustrations that have been given in the course of the discussion make clear what I am saying. Usually a reference has been made to some organization in the west; I think I am right when I say that the minister and others in speaking have usually referred either to British Columbia or to Regina or some other part of the west. There has been very little reference to eastern Canada. What would be the result were this measure to be in force to-morrow? The applications under it would come to the minister presumably largely from interested groups in western Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say not. As a matter of fact I have more requests from eastern Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might be permitted to continue what I had in mind to say, because the impression I am getting very strongly as a result of communications that are coming in to me is that while western producers feel that they may be able to assist themselves by presenting a number of schemes which will be approved by the minister, those schemes all have the effect of limiting production; that unquestionably is one of their effects.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is one point on which my hon. friend and I evidently seem still to disagree. I do not see how this bill would in any way limit production. It is simply to regulate the marketing of the product.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is only a step from restricting or prohibiting the sale of commodities to limiting production. That is the inevitable effect and it is simply playing upon words to say that regulation will not restrict production because any regulation that will restrict the sale or offering for sale or prohibit the offering for sale of commodities will certainly very shortly affect and limit production. Let us assume that some organizations in the west have their plans approved, and that they are satisfied with them but that producers in other parts of Canada have not made similar applications for similar schemes, have not similar schemes, and are free to continue to sell their commodities as they please. What will the effect of that be? I am being told by one person after another that they believe the effect of this measure will be to sacrifice the production of the west to the profits of the east; that is the impression which is becoming more and more general as to the result of this legislation. In its actual working out it will mean that the production of the west will be sacrificed to the profits of the east. I put it in that clear way so that this possibility may come clearly before the committee. I say that the possibility is there with regard to commodities regulated in any part of Canada and not equally regulated in other parts, that the production of regulated commodities may be sacrificed to commodities that are not regulated in other localities. That only brings out the wisdom of any regulations, if they are to be effective, being made by parliament, not by local groups, so that the regulations will cover Canada from one end of the country to the other. If they do not they are bound to have the effect that the production of those having to do with regulated products will be sacrificed to the profits of those who produce commodities that are not regulated.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The right hon. gentleman is surely not serious in his statement. If we consider the picture that he has in mind, it means that the western producers themselves will so act that they will restrict the production and the marketing of their goods to help the east. That is what the right hon. gentleman said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I give a concrete illustration? Supposing you have a group of producers in one part of British Columbia: in order to work out a scheme that will bring everyone into an organization—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —in one locality in British Columbia, in whatever portion of the province it may be, and assume that they get the minister to approve their scheme and he approves it, but in Nova Scotia there is no similar scheme and the producers there go on producing and selling just as they have been doing in the past. Does the minister mean to say that under those circumstances the producers in the east will not have an advantage over those in the west?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would the producers in British Columbia not be credited with having sufficient intelligence to look after their own interests in any scheme they might submit?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think what will happen under this legislation is that only a local point of view will be taken of anything done under it. The national view may fail to present itself at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are suffering under heavy difficulties in trying to get this agricultural bill through. First, it is before the worst committee on top of earth one could find—the committee of the whole House of Commons; that is difficulty number one. The bill should have been either discharged from the order paper and rewritten or else consolidated after the amendments had been introduced and before tabling. I do not think anybody can put this bill through as it stands or explain it properly. If I did not know a little about it I would be rather up the flue as regards understanding it with all these amendments and subamendments as it stands now. We have one crop of printed amendments brought down by the minister, another typed crop submitted to the chair, and there you are. As one intensely interested in this bill I hope we shall not in the melee lose any of the good things the minister has already given us in the amendments. We shall not mind if there are some more. He made a very good one to-day and it is standing; I hope he will not get huffed too much and let it get lost. His difficulties are imposed upon him by his colleagues; that is the situation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Who is guffawing now? My hon. friend knows that what I say is true.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think the hon. gentleman is really serious.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Serious! The very first criticism I had of this bill was that the government had grabbed off too much; too many fingers in the pie, too many cooks spoiling the broth. The minister has told us he has been all over Canada getting advice. That is all right, but in trying to please everyone he pleases no one. You know the old story about the fellow that lost his ass in the bargain. I say that the ministry is putting the Minister of Agriculture in a position that I have been in several times myself. I have sweat blood a number of times, but I never was properly caught except once. I venture the guess that the Minister of Agriculture, as long as he occupies the position he now does, will never be caught again with this kind of agricultural bill going direct to the committee of the whole house. That is my opinion; see whether it is not justified.

Now, might I suggest that if the minister has any estimates or anything like that to put through, he in the meantime have this bill consolidated by the Justice department; then let us start in Monday morning with a bill that we can understand. I say that as one wanting to get along, to make this as good a bill as possible, and expressing appreciation of everything the ministry has already done by way of amendment. But no one seems to be able to get a grasp of it, even the good things seem to be in danger of going in the midst of this medley. Another difficulty was embodying so many natural products in an agricultural bill as forecast in the throne speech—fish, flagpoles, saw logs, etc. At the beginning it was proposed to include minerals also. Why do they not include hydro power also? Whisky is in, and beer. Is it any wonder that the whole house is contracting legislative gastritis? We are simply biting off more than we can properly masticate. The fault is not with the minister, he is simply put up against the impossible. For goodness' sake get this bill before a smaller committee and get it consolidated so that we may know what it means and can get along. We are going to get a good bill out of it, no matter how long it takes and how impossible it looks.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not expect my hon. friend to admit it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The amendments have been printed and have now been before the committee for a week. The discussion has been going on for a week—

An hon. MEMBER: Three weeks!

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —on these amendments. Although no person perhaps has said so definitely, I think it is well known on both sides of the house and in the country that there is a very definite effort being made by hon. members opposite either to block the passage of the bill—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is not fair.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —or deliberately to misrepresent it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall take one instance. The right hon. leader of the opposition should certainly understand English much better than the average person. Why would he give the misrepresentation that was given in his first statement, of including boots and shoes? I do not think anyone would think for an instant that if he had seriously read the bill he would have given that interpretation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said it because I thought boots and shoes were made of leather and that leather had to do with cattle and that cattle are to be classed as one of the natural products of agriculture. I was speaking of derivative products.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A natural assumption.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I repeat that to meet the wishes of the committee and facilitate the passage of the bill—the greater part of the objections having come from people outside the agriculture committee—the amendments have been printed, they have been before hon. members for a week, and I see no gain in doing other than proceed with the bill no matter how long it takes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right, I am agreeable.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not think the minister should get away with the statement that he has just made, that there was a concerted effort on the part of the opposition to block this bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): On a point of order. I did not state that there was a concerted effort on the part of the opposition to block this bill—

Mr. McINTOSH: That was my impression.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I stated that in my opinion there was either a concerted effort to block the bill or to misrepresent the bill.

Mr. VALLANCE: First let me tell the minister there has been no concerted effort to block the bill, and as far as misinterpreting the bill is concerned, not even the ministry have been able to interpret what they mean by the bill. Does this government think for one moment that simply because they bring down a bill and because there are 138 hon. members sitting behind the Prime Minister, we of necessity must swallow the bill and may not offer just criticisms of it? Any criticisms I have offered I think have been quite just, and time has not permitted me yet to say all I want to say against it. The very fact that to a bill of some twenty-one sections we have eighteen amendments shows the situation. And we are not through with it yet, we are still dealing with subsection (a) of section 4. I resent the attitude of the minister in saying that anyone is attempting to block this bill. Those of us who have been taking part in the discussion realize what this bill means, and we are trying to get the best possible bill to take care of an emergency, and I believe there is an emergency at any rate so far as agricultural products are concerned. As one representing an agricultural constituency I resent the minister's statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to draw your attention, sir, and the attention of the committee to what took place just before the minister spoke. When you asked, shall the clause carry? I said, No, we will vote, and we were prepared to vote then, but the minister seeing he had not the number in the house that he wished, prepared to send his whips out and has been blocking the measure since.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, we are ready to vote now in this section.

Mr. HANBURY: You have got your instructions.

Mr. McINTOSH: Just a minute before you put that question.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is blocking now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. McINTOSH: This is no blockade. Do I understand that the body spoken of as the agency is one and the same thing as the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then the local board will have power to set up a selling agency outside of itself?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say no.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the minister then explain just what the situation is?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board may direct the regulated products through any channel of trade they see fit. As I explained in some detail a few minutes ago, if they did not have this power they would not have control of the marketing of the product in the same way that a farmer would have when he could choose his own agent.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then instead of setting up a selling board they can make use of any cooperative agency for selling purposes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the majority of producers feel that that is in their best interest.

Subsection agreed to on division.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will somebody some time before we get through with the bill decode this subsection?

On subsection (b), section 4—Exemptions.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I wish to move an amendment. I am glad the Prime Minister is here, I think he will appreciate the point. I do not think the minister quite understood me the other night when I spoke about it. I refer to the words "to exempt from any determination or order any person or class of persons" et cetera. I want to strike out the words "determination or order" and put in the word "scheme" so that it will read "to exempt from any scheme any person or class of persons" and so on. I said yesterday, and I shall repeat it, that the difference between this and the British system is enormous. The British system exempts from the scheme the small, petty producers whose enumerations, and everything else, would be a perfect curse to the department, and of no earthly use at all. They leave him out of the picture altogether, but having once passed the scheme everybody is subject to any order, as they properly should be. We do the reverse. We put under the act everybody who owns a cow, three or four chickens or a pig, and he is subject to all the regulations and forms. It would take an army to enumerate them. Then, we realize the absurdity of the thing, and under this section we take the power to exempt these people, or anyone, from any determination or order; but it means giving them each an exemption under each and every order. I object to that procedure. This is the British system as indicated in paragraph (b) subsection 1, section 6 of the Agricultural Marketing Act of Great Britain:

> Every scheme shall provide for the following matters, that is to say:—
> (b) for exempting from all or any of the provisions of the scheme producers and sales of such classes or descriptions . . .

And so on. I believe there have been only two or three schemes formulated, one of which is a dairy scheme. They exempt anyone having less than four cows. Then, under the poultry scheme they exempt anyone selling less than twenty-five eggs at a time. Exempt those people, and you save an infinity of trouble; you save a lot of people a lot of trouble, and you play the game fairly. But when I find that under this section it is possible that any producer or marketer may get exemption from any specific order, then I say the way is open to all kinds of suggestions of impropriety and favoritism, something which the minister I am sure does not want. A basic principle is not at stake, at all. This merely calls for a little common sense in carrying out the provision, and the prevention of any imputation of unfairness. I move:

> That the words "determination or order" be stricken out and that the word "scheme" be substituted therefor.

So that the paragraph would read: "to exempt from any scheme any person," and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: As the paragraph now stands the word "determination" is used because it is the complementary word to the word "determine" in paragraph (a) of section 4. It will be observed that the board is to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution, and so on. Paragraph (b) is to exempt from any determination or order. The words "determination" and "order" are complementary to the word "determine." I have followed the argument of the hon. member, but I make this statement merely to indicate why these words are used. His further argument is another matter altogether.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Although we are not bound by the British legislation, I may say that the words used there are:

> For exempting from all or any of the provisions of the scheme producers and sales of such classes or description as may be specified in the scheme or determined by the board.

It is the same as in this bill.

Mr. NEILL: No, it is not the same. In one case they exempt from the scheme altogether.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, as determined by the board.

Mr. NEILL: The class or description is to be determined by the board. The British act gives power to the board to exempt the small man. We want to exempt him, but we exempt him in the wrong way. Instead of exempting him at the fountain head, so that he will not come into the scheme at all, and then having orders made later by the board apply to all in the scheme, you are doing it the wrong way. You are bringing these little producers who produce only a few eggs a week under the power of the board, with all the forms and formalities connected with it. Then you recognize the absurdity of it and propose to exempt him under each separate order. It does not make sense, and will be a tremendous source of inconvenience and confusion. If my suggestion is not adopted, at least I will have the satisfaction of saying, "I told you so."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Does the hon. member wish a vote to be taken on his amendment?

Mr. NEILL: Put it to a vote.

Amendment negatived on division.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

On paragraph (c)—compensation for loss.

Mr. DUPRE moved:

> To strike out paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of this section and substitute the following therefor:

(c) To compensate any person for loss sustained by withholding from the market or forwarding to a specified market any regulated product pursuant to an order of the board; provided that no compensation shall be paid in respect of a regulated product that may be withheld from a particular market because the grade of such product is deemed by the board to be unsuitable for such market, or because of restrictions imposed by the government or other competent authority of any other country upon the importation of any regulated product into that country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume this compensation which is to be paid by the board will be paid out of the taxes of the people. Does the board have this power apart altogether from any ministerial responsibility in the matter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, they take it out of funds raised from the producers themselves, the local board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: From the producers themselves?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is that which the Solicitor General read the same as the printed amendment?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand the minister, any compensating to be done by this board is to be done not out of the consolidated revenue fund but out of proceeds which the producers themselves must provide.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The subsection we were discussing last night covered that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not an answer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I refer to the amendment to section 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Am I misinterpreting the minister? I wish to have it clear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would suggest that the right hon. gentleman read the clause. So far as I understand his question I believe he is right, that if the order were made by the local board the compensation would come from taxation made on the producers who set up the local board, and not from the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Supposing it was by the dominion board, and not a local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under section 9 as amended, where the dominion board acts directly it would be taken out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask a question. We will suppose the existing wheat agreement is kept in existence after the creation of this board and that Canada's export to the world market is 200,000,000 bushels. Suppose we produce 400,000,000 bushels and have an excess of 200,000,000 bushels, which this board will be permitted to market, because of the quota; do I understand now that the farmer who is compelled to hold the wheat on the order of the board will be compensated and only compensated from the tolls extracted from the 200,000,000 bushels which have been exported? Or, is there any compensation coming to him?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the hon. member would read the amendment he would find that provision is made for the condition he has mentioned. In a case of a quota like that there would be no compensation paid.

Mr. VALLANCE: The amendment contains the words:

To compensate any person for loss sustained by withholding from the market or forwarding to a specified market any regulated product pursuant to an order of the board; provided that no compensation shall be paid in respect of a regulated product that may be withheld from a particular market because the grade of such product is deemed by the board to be unsuitable . . .

And so on. Suppose I am holding No. 3 wheat, and the board decides it must not be sold. Is there any way of my getting compensation for being compelled by the board to withhold it from the market?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I take it that the hon. member is referring to the local board. If the producers themselves in the scheme that they submit wish to have that provision, feeling that it is in the interests of all, then I would say that there would be no compensation.

Mr. VALLANCE: You are going to have local boards; you are going to have provincial boards; you are going to have a national board. I take it that under this bill the national board will have control of all the products exported. It must have, as I see it. Then it must be by the order of the national board that I am compelled to withhold a certain volume of my products from the market. The local board does not have disposition of the surplus, and I do not see how it could give compensation. The minister knows conditions in western Canada just as well as I do, and I would ask him this question: Where there are no facilities for withholding the wheat, is the board going to permit me to be compensated at all events to the extent of providing the wherewithal for facilities to store the wheat which I am compelled to withhold from the market?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It might go that far or it might not. As far as the local board is concerned, that is the board for a province, if the producers themselves decide that it is to their advantage that a certain product of a particular grade should not be marketed in a particular market or not marketed at all through the ordinary channels, they might decide for or against paying compensation out of their own funds. As far as the quota is concerned, that is imposed by outside countries, that question would have to be dealt with on its merits when it arose.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is one question on which I should like a definite answer from the minister. I will put it as simply as I can because I want the farmers to know just where they are going to stand when this bill is through. If I am going to be compelled by an order of the board—I do not care whether it is the local board or the national board—to hold back certain products I have to offer for sale, the compensation that I am going to get, if any, must come from the producer. I want the minister to say whether the farmer himself who is in the scheme will have to take care of this charge by paying tolls.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If done under the local board, which would mean the producers themselves, yes; if done under the dominion board—

Mr. VALLANCE: That leads to another question. Has the local board the right to export surpluses without taking into account the central board here in Ottawa?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Except in the case of a quota I would say yes.

Mr. BROWN: It is a well known fact that many of the communications that have come to Ottawa asking that wheat be included in this scheme have come from those who have been carrying on an active propaganda in the west for wheat to be included. I think it should be understood by those who have been speaking for the pools and by the country generally just what are the implications of this bill. It is quite clear that those who have been carrying on this propaganda are not sufficiently acquainted with the provisions of the bill and all that it implies. Under the pooling system there was, of course, an understanding that when the crop was sold the proceeds would be divided equally, having regard to grade, varying freight rates, and so forth. That was satisfactory to the men who were in the pool. But it should be made very clear to them that this is an entirely different scheme, and that it does not provide for dividing up equally the proceeds of the crop. This provides that a certain proportion of the crop shall be sold at a certain time, and that at some future time if the other part of the crop is sold, if those who have withheld their crop from the market think that they should be compensated in some way, that compensation, according to the statement made by the minister, may come in the one case from the local board, in which case a charge will be levied upon the producers themselves, or in the other case from the dominion board, presumably out of the consolidated revenue fund. I just wonder how far either the local board or the dominion board is prepared to go in the way of compensation. Are they prepared, as was asked by my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), to bear the storage charges, for instance, of farmers who are compelled by an order of the board to withhold their grain from the market? A very common method of taking our wheat to the elevator is by truck, by hired truck, it may be, and have it delivered immediately to the local elevator. Under the regulations issued by the local board a farmer may not be able to deliver his wheat to the local elevator. Are we prepared to assume the cost of storage involved and all the extra costs of handling and so forth, to which the farmer will be put in case he is not allowed to put his wheat on the market at a given time? These are all questions that arise. I do not think that those who have been asking for the inclusion of wheat in this bill have considered all the possibilities that may arise in connection with this question of withholding products from the market and compensating those who thereby suffer loss. There are complications in this bill which I am sure that those who have asked for the inclusion of grain have not thought of for a moment. I am quite certain that if all these things were understood a good many of those who have been sending telegrams to members and scaring some of them almost to death would be ready to reverse their position.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This bill does provide for pooling.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of what has been said by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), I think those of us who are familiar with the wheat pool contract will agree that that to which he objects was in the contract. Time and place was in the contract but it was never enforced. There was no compensation under the old wheat pool contract, and while I may not have very much respect for this pool as it is now, I should like to keep the record straight. I think the minister and those who are interested in pooling will agree with me when I say that there is a disposition on the part of many to believe that the proper place to store the surplus wheat of Canada is on the farm. Some of these people have argued with me that such wheat is not visible, but I do not think that is the case. When you ask anyone speculating on the crop of wheat as to what is now in storage they will tell you how much is moving, how much is at the head of the lakes, how much is in local elevators and how much is being held in the hands of the farmers. I have sent a great many copies of this bill out and asked for approval or condemnation of the measure. I have received some condemnation, but after I have pointed out some of the reasons why I have maintained the attitude I have towards the bill, their feeling is a little different. I think the stand I have taken has been well justified by the fact that there are now eighteen amendments to the bill.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) seems to think that I have a misunderstanding of this matter of pooling. We must distinguish the pooling proposed to be done and that done under the voluntary system when members of the pool waited until the grain was all sold. They got an initial payment, then a second and third payment and perhaps a final payment. I understand quite well that such a thing might be carried on under this bill, but it could be done without the bill. I make that statement in answer to the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) who spoke last night. What was done under the pool system was done voluntarily, but under this bill there is a possibility of a man being compelled to hold his grain off the market and keep it on his farm. Is the cost of doing that to be borne by the producers or paid out of consolidated revenue funds? This brings up a question which did not arise under the pooling system; it introduces an entirely new feature into the problem.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is a proviso for compensation included in the British and the other similar acts which have been passed in other countries?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is something of a similar nature.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is going to be a whole lot of trouble for anyone who administers a thing like that. I know I had some hangover claims from the old food board of 1917 which we used to cuss up hill and down dale. Old claims were presented to every government since and I would not be surprised if this government is not still receiving them. Even where the parties concerned had died, their executors presented claims for compensation for money alleged to be lost through prices going up afterwards. Suppose a producer lost money by holding a regulated product off the market at the beginning of the year and then made money later on in the same year, would the gain help to offset the loss, or would he just pocket the gain and then claim compensation for the loss? This is a feature which has not yet been discussed. I understand one of the sections providing for compensation has been dropped, or the two sections have been merged into one.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Merged into one.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Make no mistake about it, the government will be loaded up with claims for compensation. The first thing that will have to be done is to set up an adjustment board, because there will be an avalanche of claims. This may be a very good section to set in motion just prior to an election; I do not know whether or not that was in the mind of the government, but I know enough not to oppose it. The government are just piling up barrels of trouble for themselves. They will never be through with it; the next two or three governments will be having these claims presented. I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) realizes, by his smile, there is something to it. Anything he can get out of this in the way of votes he is welcome to, provided his government has to settle these claims after the next election. I do not know how much evidence there is that that will be the case, but it may be the present ministry will have to handle these matters for another session.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be taken care of if their products were marketed under the pooling system, I would say.

Paragraph (c) as amended agreed to.

On paragraph (d)—Compensation for depreciated currency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would this compensation come out of the proceeds of the producers, the same as with the section above?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is the same principle.

Paragraph (d) agreed to.

On paragraph (e)—Assistance by grant or loan.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to strike out paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of this section and substitute the following therefor:

(e) to assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, processing, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product.

The word "processing" has been added.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These grants or loans are to met by the producers themselves?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is the same principle.

Paragraph (e) as amended agreed to.

On paragraph (f)—Registration or licence.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to ask a question in connection with paragraph (e). Would those loans and grants be made by the local boards?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would be the same principle as in the other section, depending upon whether it was a local board or the dominion board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That provision for the cancellation of a licence by the board means that any man's business would be in the keeping of the board. If the board made up its mind to cancel his licence he would be out of business altogether.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is if the producers themselves decide that such a regulation shall be included in the scheme dealing with their own products. I would say that a man could be reinstated; it is just a matter of imposing the regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But every producer will have to carry around a licence in order to be allowed to produce.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not to produce.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well then, to sell or offer for sale the product he has produced.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would not say it would be necessary for him to carry around a licence. It would be a matter of finding the volume of product for sale. If he were breaking any of the regulations the licence could be taken away from him.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. McINTOSH: Has the minister any information to show whether or not the producers really want to be licensed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some of them are very decidedly in favour of it.

Mr. McINTOSH: But as regards the majority of the producers, are they in favour of it or not? Can the minister answer that question from any information he has received from western Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A vote would have to be taken before one could give a definite answer to that question. Where the industry in different parts of a province has been organized however they are in favour of licensing.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do these regulations apply to anyone who is outside the organization, not a member of it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Any individual who does not join the local board does not come under the provisions of the act at all?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He does if he is not exempt and is not in an area that is exempt.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But that is the point. Supposing he is in an area bounded by the geographical limits defined in the act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the scheme submitted by the producers an area will be defined, and if, after the scheme has been approved, a poll is asked for in the submission of the scheme, the matter to be voted upon is set out. If a majority voted in favour of it—that is, a sufficient majority—then every person within that region, unless exempt as provided here, would conform in the same way as the rest.

Mr. BROWN: Let us take the milk situation in an area around a given city. Does this bill contemplate the possibility of producers within a certain area bringing forward a scheme and excluding from that market those who are not in that area?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no provision for that here.

Mr. BROWN: Is there a possibility of it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not provided for in the act, so they could not do it.

Mr. TOTZKE: There is a possibility of making a close corporation of any industry. If a certain number of producers came under a scheme of any kind, by this section, which provides for licensing, the board might prohibit any other farmer in that area from coming within the scheme and producing the particular commodity dealt with.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not within the area.

Mr. TOTZKE: The board might refuse a licence; they might say that there were sufficient producers of that commodity at the present time.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Every person who is brought under the scheme within a region where a licence must be got, except those exempt from the licence, may receive a licence.

Mr. TOTZKE: Let us suppose that in a particular area there are a hundred farmers growing a certain commodity. Licences are issued to these hundred farmers, and then the board may decide that there shall not be any more production of that particular commodity, there shall not be any more producers, and by refusing any more licences they will so limit the number of producers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have already answered that. They have no authority with regard to those outside their own organization.

Mr. TOTZKE: But that has happened in England in connection with hop production; they have refused to allow further production of that commodity. Under this section the board, by refusing a licence to any new producer, may create the same condition in Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under the British act they have authority to restrict production, but not under this act. Under this act there is no authority to interfere with people outside of those to whom the scheme applies.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely the minister does not suggest that this act is not intended to restrict production.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Absolutely.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But the whole tenor of the act indicates that purpose.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Absolutely; if you think it doesn't you are badly fooled. There is no other intent in this act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Read where it gives that authority to restrict production.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It runs all through the act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Read one section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): One would have to read a dozen. This act is for the purpose of regulating production.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Regulating not production but marketing.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Regulating the producer.

Mr. TOTZKE: Will the minister look at paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of section 4:

> To require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board . . .

My contention is that the board may by refusing a licence prevent the incorporation in this scheme of new producers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It cannot refuse a licence to anyone who is in the area to which the scheme applies. It is stated very definitely that the producer shall be licensed so that the volume he produces will be known, but the bill has nothing to do with restricting production. It has to do with the regulating of the marketing of the product.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I respectfully say to the minister that he is not right when he says that the producers wish to be licensed. I do not believe that the general feeling of producers in western Canada is that they should be licensed. They agree that those engaged in marketing operations should be, but I do not think that they are very anxious to have all production licensed, in wheat, for instance.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I say, the only way to decide it is to have a vote.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest to the minister that the penalty prescribed here is very severe. It is possible for a man, in consequence of a trivial violation of any provision of the act or of any regulation, to lose his means of livelihood. These regulations will be so involved and multitudinous and complex that a man won't be able to go out of doors and kick the cat without breaking one of them.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member know what the regulations are going to be?

Mr. NEILL: I dread to think what they will be; I have seen the act. This act reminds me of a magician I saw last week. He reached into the air and pulled out sometimes a duck and sometimes something else, and there is such a cloud of mysticism surrounding this bill that we are apt to get anything but the thing we want. If a man parks his car in the wrong place he is fined $2.50, but his licence is not taken away from him except after a series of violations of the law, and that is of far less importance than the licence of a producer. Could not the minister put in a provision making it possible to revive the licence? Is a man to suffer forever, is he to be prohibited from earning his living, because of a violation of one of the provisions of a regulation under the bill? As regards the minister's suggestion that this bill does not restrict production, may I point out that there is restriction of marketing, and if you cannot sell your product, that automatically interferes with production. However, the point I am urging is that there should be some modification here to provide that at some time or other the man who has lost his licence may get it back. Or, better still, for a petty offence let him be fined an appropriate sum. But don't take his whole means of livelihood away from him. The minister says he may get his licence back, but this does not say so. The minister has a habit of blaming the local board, but this is not the local board; it is the dominion board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not compulsory that the licence shall be cancelled, but in flagrant cases it may be. It is in the option of the board, and so long as anyone conforms with the regulations there will be no enforcement of the provision. The hon. member is losing sight of the fact that the whole basis of this will be the judgment of some primary producers in the handling of their own products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this not true? Suppose in one part of the province the producers presented a scheme and that scheme was approved, would not all under that scheme be obliged to be licensed and permitted to carry on their occupation provided only they had a licence, whereas with respect to the other part of the province in which a similar scheme had not been presented, production could be carried on by anyone in the ordinary way in which they are carrying it on to-day?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the producers so decided, and they would no doubt have full information of what the right hon. member says.

Paragraph (f) agreed to on division.

[Mr. Neill.]

On paragraph (g)—Full information and periodic returns.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to suggest to the minister that here again the point comes up of which I spoke before, of these elaborate returns being required of people who may own only a cow or a pig or a hen.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is covered in a subclause that we have already passed; they may be exempted.

Mr. NEILL: I beg to differ, and I think I have the backing of the Prime Minister. The minister has not yet grasped the simple fact that there is a difference between exempting people from single individual orders and exempting them from the operation of the whole act. This wretched man in the backwoods with one cow is going to be subject to the bill. The board may issue an order every day or every week. He has to keep himself posted on those orders, keep his ear to the ground and say to himself: Am I exempted under this order? I was on the last one but I may not be on this one. I saw a very good illustration of this in a western paper, I do not remember its name. A farmer had his team hitched up to begin operations; he was telephoning to the minister to find out whether he could put oats in the north forty acres and he was waiting for an answer. That of course is an exaggeration, but it illustrates the point. Why does the minister want to load up his department with getting returns and tabulating them from all these unhappy petty producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This does not add any work to the Department of Agriculture. This is the local board set up by the producers.

Mr. NEILL: We are talking about the dominion board; we have not yet reached the local board. We are discussing clause 4.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It does not say that they shall be licensed but they may be in accordance with the scheme set up by producers in forming their local board.

Mr. NEILL: Where does it say that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Later on.

Mr. NEILL: We are not dealing with "later on"; the minister made that statement before. We are dealing with the powers of the dominion board and it has power to require full information, and so forth.

Paragraph (g) carried on division.

Paragraph (h) carried on division.

On paragraph (i)—Real property.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that paragraph (i) be struck out and that paragraph (j) replace paragraph (i).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the reason for striking it out?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the Solicitor General gets up to read something, is it a new amendment or one before the committee in the votes and proceedings? Is he doing this just for the minister?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought at the beginning it was another stunt he was pulling off.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the reason for that that it more or less repeats clause 3, subclause 6 of the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reason was that it was not felt necessary to include that for the first year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister has that power in subclause 6 of clause 3:

The board shall be a body corporate and shall have power for the purposes of this act to acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property.

It occurred to me that paragraph (i) was a repetition of subclause 6 of clause 3.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The first reference is to the dominion board, but in the clause under discussion there are set out the powers that may be delegated to the local board, and the reason for striking out this paragraph is to prevent the dominion board from delegating those powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Clause 3 refers specifically to the dominion marketing board, and then if you look at the interpretation clause the "board" means the dominion marketing board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): But later in the bill it states that only the powers set out in clause 4 may be delegated to the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So that this was repeated for the purpose of delegation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph (i) struck out.

On paragraph (j)—Cooperation.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that paragraph (j) read paragraph (i) instead of paragraph (j).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Carried on division.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph (j) carried on division.

On section 4, subsection 2—Collection of charges.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to amend subsection 5 of this section to read as follows, and insert it as subsection (2) of this section:

(2) Whenever a scheme for regulation by a local board has been approved, the board may authorize the local board to exercise such of the powers of the board as are outlined in this section and as may be necessary for the proper enforcement of the scheme of regulation, and may at any time withdraw from the local board authority to exercise any of its powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister is presenting the amendments in a different order.

Mr. DUPRE: What we intend to do is this: the present subclause 2 will disappear as well as subclauses 3 and 4. Then subclause 5 as I read it a moment ago will become subclause 2.

Mr. POWER: Let us dispose of the striking out of subclauses 2, 3 and 4.

Mr. DUPRE: Subclauses 2, 3 and 4 will go out and then subclause 5, as I have read it, will become subclause 2. Subclause 6 will become subclause 3 and we will add other paragraphs which will be numbered subclauses 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 which I will read in a minute.

Amendment agreed to.

Subclauses 2, 3 and 4 struck out.

Subsection 5 as amended agreed to on division.

Mr. BENNETT: Subclause 5 becomes subclause 2.

On section 4, subsection 6—Board may require full information.

Mr. DUPRE: Subclause 6 will now become subclause 3.

Subsection agreed to on division.

Mr. DUPRE: Then I move that we add the following subsection 4:

(4) The board, whether exercising the powers conferred by this act or by provincial legislation, may establish a separate fund in connection with any scheme of regulation and for the purposes of such scheme may impose charges and tolls in respect of the marketing of the whole or any part of the regulated product, which charges and tolls shall be payable by such persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product as the board decides.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I ask the Prime Minister a question, which comes up in different places in the consideration of this bill? Does the Prime Minister say that the federal government has power to give to any province a power which it does not already possess under the British North America Act?

Mr. BENNETT: The question has been much discussed as to whether or not the dominion may delegate a province to act for it as agent in respect to certain matters. It cannot confer any greater constitutional powers than a province possesses under section 92 and other sections of the British North America Act, but it can, as it seeks to do here, confer upon a province certain powers to act as agent, and on the other hand the province may ask the dominion to act as agent for it for the purpose of carrying out any joint enterprise or effort. That is as far as I would go.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I ask if the view of the law officers of the crown has been taken on that all-important point, and is the Prime Minister in a position to state their view to the house?

Mr. BENNETT: The law officers of the crown have gone over every phase of this with great particularity. As it now stands, in their opinion the clauses are within the legislative competence of parliament.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do I understand from the Prime Minister that the federal parliament can delegate powers outside of the ambit of its own power?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said. I said the federal power might ask a province to act as its agent to do certain things. That is as far as I went.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the whole basis of this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) realizes that that is the general purpose. The cooperation between the provincial and the federal power arises from an understanding with respect to the exercise of their respective powers as agent for one and the other.

Mr. NEILL: Will the Prime Minister admit that the federal government cannot grant discretionary powers to the provinces? They can only carry out the orders of the dominion.

[Mr. Dupré.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite sure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) will understand that I do not desire to be disrespectful, but I do not care to express opinions of purely academic value about so complex and difficult a matter. I can only say that the clauses of this bill have been framed so as to be within the legislative competence of this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where the British North America Act gives certain powers exclusively to the dominion, does the Prime Minister construe that as meaning that any of these powers can be delegated to a province?

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is exactly what I did not say. I tried to make it perfectly clear. Section 91 deals with peace, order and good government and then states:

. . . and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section—

The federal parliament is given exclusive legislative authority over the twenty-nine subjects which follow. Then, with respect to section 92, it says that the provinces shall have exclusive power over the matters therein mentioned. What the right hon. gentleman I trust did not understand was that I was suggesting for a moment that action taken by the parliament of Canada could confer upon the provinces legislative jurisdiction which under section 92 they do not possess, or that any action taken by a province in the exercise of its exclusive powers could confer a power upon the dominion.

Mr. POWER: The intention is to have them act as agents?

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely. And there is no reason why the instrument for the purpose of effecting the will of the federal parliament might not, with consent, be a province or anyone else, or that the agent to effect the will of a province might not be the federal power or anyone it might select. That is the whole suggestion. The bill is based upon that appreciation of it. But I should like to make it perfectly clear to the hon. gentleman that I would agree with him, and I trust he does not think I am suggesting that there would be any power in this parliament to give larger powers to the provinces than the constitution affords, or that there can be a diminution of provincial powers by acts of this parliament. The statute of Westminster provides that this parliament has not power to lessen or abridge or expand the legislative powers conferred by the British North America Act upon the provincial legislatures on the one hand and the federal parliament on the other.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I then ask this concrete question? The second of the exclusive powers given to the dominion is the regulation of trade and commerce. Would the Prime Minister say that the dominion could in any way confer upon any body within a province or upon the province itself the power to regulate trade and commerce in any particular or to any extent?

Mr. BENNETT: In the case of Parsons vs. Citizens' Insurance Company the privy council held that the words "trade and commerce" in the statute, paragraph 2 of section 92, are to be construed as they have been previously construed as used in a statute passed in the reign of Queen Anne. Later, in the insurance reference following that decision, which held that statutory conditions in fire insurance policies were within the power of the provincial legislatures, the privy council held that our insurance acts were ultra vires and that the words "trade and commerce," while including insurance, did not mean any one branch of trade. That was the limitation placed upon them in the two cases. I do not suggest that the words "trade and commerce" mean that the parliament of Canada could by any legislative act confer upon the legislature of any province the power to enact legislation with respect to trade and commerce as the meaning of those words has been interpreted by the privy council. But I do say that the dominion parliament in the exercise of its jurisdiction with respect to trade and commerce can confer upon any instrument that it selects the necessary power to act as its agent in the carrying out of its legislative power under trade and commerce.

Mr. McINTOSH: Inside the area of jurisdiction?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course inside the area of jurisdiction, within trade and commerce.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 77 for the relief of Aileen Marie Thompson Robb.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 78, for the relief of Doris Jones Earp.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 79, for the relief of Jean Gordon Worden Ellis.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 80, for the relief of Mary Alice Beatrice Featherston Moxon.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 81, for the relief of Ethel Irene Probert.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

DOMINION MARKETING BOARD

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. chairman, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Immigration — salaries and contingencies, $1,239,288.

Mr. HANBURY: Before this item carries I suggest that the minister give to the committee the reason we have immigration offices in Europe at the present time.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The offices maintained in Europe are very necessary for inspectional work, medical and civil. There are people who under the regulations are entitled to come from Europe as emigrants, and those offices could not possibly be done away with because we would run into difficulties in the nature of disease, and so on.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $2,450,000.

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish to detain the committee or to trouble the minister, but I should like him to make a short statement as to the prospects of improving the subvention for coal mined on Vancouver island. There is a press record of there being a meeting with the minister of the eastern British Columbia coal people, the Alberta coal people and I think some of the eastern men who are suggesting increased subventions for themselves. I have no objection to that; that is their problem. I see it is stated in the press that so far as Nova Scotia is concerned things are shaping well for a boom year in the Cape Breton coal industry, according to the Hon. Michael Dwyer, Minister of Public Works and Mines for the province.

I will just comment in passing that the coal output of Vancouver island is going down once more. The last record I have of it is for February, when there was a decrease of 21 per cent from the same month last year. That is an increasing trouble.

The cost to the government of assistance to Nova Scotia coal mines increased from $228,000 in 1931 to $1,447,000 in 1933, and in the case of Alberta and the Crowsnest pass from $212,000 to $228,000; for Saskatchewan the cost exactly doubled. These are all substantial increases. But the amount for subsidy for bunker and export coal for Vancouver island decreased in the same period from $36,756 to $26,952. There was a bonus of one dollar per ton on export coal, but there was no movement of export coal in 1933 and practically none in 1932. It was anticipated that this bonus of one dollar per ton for export coal would produce a trade of approximately 50,000 tons. I think the Prime Minister will recall that being said to him by a delegation that waited on him, but unfortunately, owing to perhaps unforeseen and unpreventable matters, the depression and war in the South American republics, that trade has not eventuated. The trade in fact has totally disappeared. I suggest that in the case of Vancouver coal the subsidies have not been successful, or not successful at all events to the same extent as in the east, and I would suggest that the bunker coal subsidy should be raised from fifty cents to one dollar a ton. That is not very high considering that coal carried on the railways gets as high as two dollars a ton, and that the subsidy is paid on the long ton in the case of Vancouver island and on the short ton in the case of Nova Scotia coal. I know, because I have been in communication with him, that the minister has been kind enough to consider this matter, and I would just like a short statement from him or an assurance that the matter is still not finally settled, and I should like to know what hopes he has of being able to meet our views in this case.

[Mr. Neill.]

The amount would not be very great. It would even then fall very far short by something like one-third of the amount estimated to be given in the beginning.

Mr. GORDON: The subvention given to Vancouver island coal at the present time is, as has been stated by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), fifty cents on bunker coal and one dollar per ton on coal for export. When these subventions were arranged after conferences with members on both sides of the house representing the locality and with the owners of the coal mines and some representatives of labour it was deemed at that time that the assistance then granted would be of a very substantial character. The operators depended in large measure upon the coal they would be able to export from the island into South American countries. However, experience has shown that that trade did not materialize. I doubt if any coal has been exported because, for reasons that are well known to members of this committee, the assistance to that movement could not apply to the United States.

Then difficulties also arose by reason of the ships from the orient, particularly from Japan, double bunkering. That resulted in a contraction of the market for coals from the island. At the present time, by reason of the changed conditions in the coal trade, largely brought about by the operation of the laws that have come into force in the United States, it has been found desirable and necessary to give further study to these subventions, having regard to the increased price of United States coals under the N.R.A. That matter is still under review, and it is my hope that assistance this year to the coal mining industry of Canada will be maintained at least to the same extent as last year, but at a very much reduced cost to the treasury. It is obvious, of course, that by reason of the increased price of United States coal our mines will not and need not expect the same amount of assistance they received in the years past.

To the hon. member for Comox-Alberni I can state that the position of the mines of Vancouver island is at present under consideration, and if it is possible to adopt some plan that is in harmony with the amount of money available I shall be very glad indeed. But I can assure the hon. member that study is being given to the matter in the hope of providing more employment for those engaged in the mining of coal on Vancouver island.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I understand that the western operators have been down here asking for practically the same treatment on a mileage basis as is given to the movement from the east. Do I understand from what the minister now states that owing to the increased prices of American coal the government will maintain practically the same geographical limitations, but that the cost by way of subventions will be less? Is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: That is substantially the situation.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Does the minister contemplate any change in the subvention that has been given to the lignite fields of the Estevan and Bienfait areas in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GORDON: If any change takes place with respect to the Estevan field it will place the operators in the same relative position with respect to their competitors from Alberta and the Crowsnest pass as before the change. But the change that will be made has not yet been determined because the question is rather a complex one.

Mr. BROWN: Do any of these subventions apply to coal coming into Manitoba?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, the subventions apply to all industrial coals coming into Manitoba from both Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. McINTOSH: Does the movement of coal from the west extend farther east than Winnipeg or does it stop there?

Mr. GORDON: So far as railway coal is concerned, the subventions apply as far east on the Canadian Pacific as the Ignace division, and on the Canadian National as far east as Sioux Lookout, those two points being the same distance from the mines although one movement comes further into Ontario.

Mr. McINTOSH: How far west do the subventions on Nova Scotia coal apply?

Mr. GORDON: The furthest west that Nova Scotia coal has been shipped is Stratford and London, Ontario.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, representing as I do one of the important coal counties in the province of Nova Scotia I think it but due that I should bear some testimony to what has been done by the minister and by this government in recent years to increase our coal traffic as between the maritime and the central provinces. Last year we shipped Nova Scotia coal to eighty-eight towns and cities in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario to which we had never before shipped any coal. These subventions were inaugurated in 1928 and in that year we shipped 114,000 tons, while last year we shipped something over 1,400,000 tons the movement of which added something over a million dollars to the revenues of the Canadian National Railways. So far as Nova Scotia was concerned, this simply meant the difference between a lack of employment and a very considerable amount of employment for our people, and thereby decreased the amount of money necessary to be spent on unemployment relief. For these results, I desire to thank the minister and the government.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was unavoidably out of the chamber when the items covering soldier settlement were taken up and I should like to know if an opportunity for discussion will be given when the bill to which the Prime Minister referred to-day in answer to a question I put on soldier settlement, is under consideration.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think there will be any difficulty when the bill is in committee.

Item agreed to.

Fair wages and inspection, $11,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: During last winter there was a considerable movement in the town of Timmins to have the fair wages policy applied to all relief work. I think the minister knows that during the last three years the fair wage clause has not been applied to relief work in northern Ontario. This year the wages are much better, in some instances having been increased by two hundred per cent, and I should like to know if the minister has received any resolution in connection with this matter from the town of Timmins.

Mr. GORDON: I have no present recollection of having received any such resolution, although one may have come into the department.

Item agreed to.

Administration, Old Age Pensions Act, $2,000.

Mr. HANBURY: It has been drawn to my attention that no provision is made for burial of old age pensioners who die. I would suggest that the government give some consideration to this matter.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: We will leave the penitentiary item; there may be some further discussion and the Minister of Justice is not here.

MISCELLANEOUS

Advertising and publicity in the United Kingdom and Europe to be administered by the High Commissioner, $200,000.

Mr. HANBURY: This is a new item. I think it would be well to have some explanation of what it comprises.

Mr. BENNETT: I indicated some time ago that the other dominions, after the agreements of 1932, were spending substantial sums in advertising in various ways, and after discussion with the High Commissioner it was thought desirable, in cooperation with the Department of Trade and Commerce, that we should use a larger sum of money for the purpose of advertising Canadian products in Great Britain and on the continent. This represents the sum total—I wish it were a larger sum—of what we are able this year to devote to advertising our products in the United Kingdom and in that part of the continent that purchases our products.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the policy, instituted some years ago, still being carried out, of assisting firms anxious to increase their business, or is this direct government advertising?

Mr. BENNETT: This is direct government advertising of all the departments and all the services, under the direction of the High Commissioner and in cooperation with the various departments, but notably with the Department of Trade and Commerce. This grant refers purely to publicity of the government itself.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then the former practice of assisting firms has been discontinued.

Mr. STEVENS: A trial was made, and while I will not say it was unsatisfactory it was not deemed desirable to continue it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We voted $50,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. It was a laudable effort but there were so many demands that it would not have been satisfactory; in fact, it would have involved a very large sum and would not have been as effective as the method now followed.

Mr. HANBURY: Is this advertising of commodities or of services, or is it just general advertising?

[Mr. Hanbury.]

Mr. BENNETT: Those members of the house who have been recently in London will recall the advertisements of South Africa and Australia on hoardings, in newspapers and in displays of the products of their countries in various windows. This publicity involves all newspaper advertising, all display advertising and every form of publicity undertaken by the government under the direction of a head who was appointed by the previous administration and who was in charge of publicity in the United Kingdom. At the moment their activities are coordinated under the High Commissioner and the several departments make their various representations. One can now see displayed on some of the vans that travel about London the names of Canadian products. It was for that purpose that we decided to use the words "maple leaf" as distinctly Canadian. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been endeavouring to promote the use of those words as a designation specifically applicable to Canadian products in Great Britain, and the movement to which attention was directed by the press a few days ago, undertaken by the High Commissioner, to have a mission to Canada is really a form of advertising growing out of this effort to make known Canadian products. The effort, by advertising, to stimulate an improvement in quality and standardization is the domestic reaction to the effort that has been made in Great Britain and on the continent to make our products known. It includes all forms of advertising that are carried on under the direction of the High Commissioner. I only wish we could spend a larger sum. The other dominions are spending greater sums than we in advertising in Great Britain. The High Commissioner had been noticing a particular form of transport in London travelling over every part of the great city, and he conceived the happy idea of utilizing one side of these vans for the purpose of advertising Canadian products, as had been done and is still being done by our competitors in that market. Anyone who knows the excellent advertising methods adopted by the people in the United Kingdom will realize how essential it is that we should resort to similar methods to sell our products.

Mr. HANBURY: I quite agree with the Prime Minister as to the desirability of advertising, but the particular question in my mind is whether that advertising is specific or general, whether we advertise apples and other fruits or wheat or lumber.

Mr. STEVENS: It is skilfully, efficiently and scientifically carried out. The chief agent of the Canadian government, Mr. Geraghty, who has been there a great many years, is, as I think those who know him will agree, one of the most resourceful and competent advertising men we could possibly have. All sorts of commodities, bacon, apples, fruit, tobacco and so on, are advertised in the most attractive displays.

Mr. BRADETTE: The Prime Minister has referred to advertising in Europe. I think he should be more specific, because there are some parts of Europe with which we do not deal. Just what is meant?

Mr. STEVENS: Naturally, in many countries in Europe there is not much done. But there are some countries such as Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, and perhaps Germany and France, in which a certain amount is done, and in the Scandinavian countries, Norway, Sweden and Denmark, there is a certain amount done.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the minister given up advertising through the large fairs?

Mr. STEVENS: No, we still carry that on in a limited way.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would much rather see the minister spend more money in this way and drop the fair business. I never believed we got value for that expenditure.

Mr. STEVENS: Our expenditures in the fairs are limited, but there are certain fairs that are widely recognized and we patronize them.

Mr. NEILL: The minister, I thought, indicated that he was rather stressing the maple leaf as a symbol. Has Canada abandoned the use of the beaver, and does he not think the beaver would be a more arrestive symbol than the maple leaf, which is not very distinctive? To the people, say in London, a symbol like the beaver would be more arrestive.

Mr. BENNETT: The beaver is difficult to use effectively on certain types of products; in some instances it looks rather like a rabbit when it is finished up. All I can say is that after a great deal of consideration the authorities seem to think that the maple leaf brand was the best single symbol that we could take for the purpose of making known as largely as possible our products. There is belonging to a private enterprise a brand known as the Maple Leaf brand and efforts to have the matter disposed of have not yet been concluded.

Item agreed to.

To provide for salaries and expenses of the tariff board—payments may be made notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or regulations thereunder, $120,000.

Mr. NEILL: Could the Prime Minister give us any indication when we may have the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I cannot, but I should say within the next two or three weeks. The custom is to deliver judgments sometimes during term, but usually at the conclusion of it. My inquiry the day before yesterday resulted in my being informed that there were ten or twelve cases yet to be argued. As soon as the decision is made known I will communicate it to the house.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare, $12,600.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I see there is an increase in this particular grant. Is this the result of the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare taking over more work?

Mr. BENNETT: The arrangements made by the minister contemplate an extension of the services through the voluntary efforts of the organization known as the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare, which has been operating to some extent through the voluntary efforts of individuals with money supplied by insurance companies and others interested in the welfare of the people of the country, and the devotion to child welfare of substantial sums of money by these private institutions has induced the minister to consider it desirable to unite our effort with theirs as an experiment. The increased amount is a result.

Mr. BLAIR: I have before me a child welfare magazine from Alberta and it contains a protest; it states:

Protested to the Hon. R. B. Bennett, Premier of Canada, the action of the Department of Health of the Dominion government in closing its child welfare division, and assigning the work of this division to a voluntary organization, the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare. The council felt that such an action by the government was a decidedly retrograde step in the public health work of the Dominion of Canada.

While appreciating the good work the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare was doing in the child and family welfare field, it protested its action in acquiescing in the Dominion government closing its division on child welfare. The Calgary Council on Child and Family Welfare felt that instead of attempting to assume the duties of the state the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare should have been a factor in striving to develop and strengthen the work of the government along the lines so ably begun and developed by Doctor Helen MacMurchy, while chief of the Child Welfare division.

In 1926 a protest came in from the different medical councils and from the county associations because the death rate among the children in Canada was so high, and maternal mortality was also very great. Many complaints were received. Doctor MacMurchy took the matter up in 1926 when the greatest number of complaints came in, and by her efforts the rate of child mortality, which was ten per cent that year, was greatly reduced. In the last three or four years the maternal mortality has also been considerably reduced. I do not say that this is due to the activities of Doctor MacMurchy's department, but I think the work is being amply provided for by the provincial government. I do not think the work should be taken out of the hands of the Department of Health; surely, if this is a medical department, a doctor and not some person who is merely a graduate of Queen's university should be in charge of the situation. While such graduates may be extremely capable, as I believe they are, and very enthusiastic over the work—and I have no fault to find in that regard—when we come to make an investigation from a medical standpoint, surely that requires a doctor and not some graduate of Queen's university with the degree of B.A. or M.A.

Mr. BENNETT: The matter to which the hon. member has referred is one of very great importance not only to this chamber but to every citizen of Canada. Doctor Helen MacMurchy was head of a division, if it might be called by that name. She retired, having reached the compulsory retiring age. The question that the minister had to consider with the aid of the deputy and his assistant was whether it was desirable to link the activities of the department with that of the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare which had been doing the direct service. It will be remembered that the dominion does no part of the direct service, the provinces are concerned with that. And it is under the direction of the provincial boards of health that the work in detail is carried on. The federal department has no doctors that go into the homes, no medical attendants that visit the communities; but the provinces maintain their health centres and provide medical attention in municipalities and communities. The child welfare council is sustained by private subscriptions, largely from insurance companies because they are interested in the prolongation of human life and in the general welfare of the state. On the advice of the deputy minister, and having gone into the matter with care, the minister submitted that the best interests of the country would be served by at least making the experiment. It must be recalled that the major part of this money in the child welfare division was paid as salaries. The resolution to which the hon. gentleman directed attention was received by me. It does not represent, I am sorry to say, very exact knowledge with respect to the matter. Had they taken the trouble to make inquiry they would not have passed the resolution in the terms in which it was passed. The fact is that the appropriation by this house for the child welfare division was largely utilized for salaries—that is, the federal side—while the provinces were carrying on the work they were, and the child welfare council the detail work to which I have referred. This is an experiment, if you may designate any agreement of this type as such, to coordinate the efforts of the state, in a matter which is largely within the jurisdiction of the provinces, with private effort. It has been exceedingly successful and I believe will result in great benefit, much greater than could result from maintaining the word "division" for the purpose of paying a salary to an official who might be at the head of it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not objecting to the increase in the grant, because I am not at all familiar with the change that has taken place, but I know it is the only grant to organizations of this kind that has been increased. I am not aware of the additional work that is being thrown upon the officers in charge of this organization. I have sometimes wondered if it would not be well to leave these services to the provinces. But heretofore we have been making these grants.

I want to refer to No. 242, mental hygiene. There has been a paring down of this grant.

Mr. BENNETT: The ten per cent reduction, that is all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not only this year but in former years. It seems to me rather strange that the appropriation for so important a work as that of mental hygiene, with which many of us are quite familiar, should be reduced. The propaganda they have carried on is of great benefit. I do not see why that should not be done by the provinces, but we have established the principle of assisting these organizations. I do not understand why one in particular is chosen, child welfare, which is certainly a provincial undertaking, to receive an increased grant, while the others are cut the usual ten per cent that runs through all the appropriations this year. I can hardly agree with the statement made by the Prime Minister that this is of sufficient importance to warrant an increase at this particular time, if the others are to be cut down. If the others are to be treated in the same way, I have no objection.

Mr. BENNETT: If I do not interrupt, it is a lesser sum of money that is being used; this contribution, which was used in the welfare division for one purpose, namely for salaries, is now being used for the purpose of promoting the work, without any additional staff. The minister is not here this evening. I have not brought with me the correspondence, because I had not expected to be dealing with it. If the committee desires I am content that it stand in order that they may have the information.

Mr. BLAIR: I am not claiming that this grant should not be given, but I feel that looking after medical health is the duty of the provinces. The rate of maternal mortality in Canada is extremely high, 5·8 per thousand. In Italy it is only 2·7. We are an extremely barbarous country in regard to maternal mortality. In infant mortality the rate for Australia is 47 per 1,000 and for Canada, 89, almost twice as much. New Zealand is 35 per 1,000. I do not say this grant should not be given, but I do say it should be given to some medical department or some doctor who would have charge. The Prime Minister says they do not come in contact with the individual; that is true, but I have some seventy-five different books and publications of different types—not all with me—that are sent out through the provinces, especially Ontario; I cannot speak for the other provinces. These are paid for by this organization. It is said they are free, and I think that is right. The grant from this government is, I believe $3,600, while the insurance companies give about $10,000, and churches and other organizations, such as the Rotary club, also contribute until they have altogether about $30,000. This organization is operating as a federal government organization for medical health. I cannot understand how any person who was formerly a stenographer, I do not care if she is a graduate of Queen's, can take charge of a medical department. This is medical literature; it ought to be written by doctors. There are plenty of doctors in Toronto or Ottawa who are on relief, and this work should be done by medical men. I would have no objection, for that matter, if the grant were cut off entirely, because I think Hon. Mr. Robb was quite capable of looking after Ontario without any assistance from any graduate of Queen's.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am at a loss to think what better deserves our consideration than the matter which I understand we are now dealing with. In my home town of New Glasgow we have had for some years a baby clinic. That institution is visited daily by the doctors, and once or twice a week children, from a week old to three years or thereabouts, are brought there by parents or nurses and weighed and measured and records kept of their growth. The doctor gives the mother advice as to food, care and treatment. In my judgment that is a most important and valuable service, yet we talk about a few thousand dollars for it and we throw away $300,000 annually on the League of Nations without fifteen cents' worth of return to this country. I put these two expenditures before you as a matter of contrast; which better deserves the support of this house and this government and this country? Any man who gives the matter consideration must reach but one conclusion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): None of this money goes to the institution the hon. member speaks of—not a nickel.

Mr. CANTLEY: Well, we are aiding the provincial government. This is a vote in aid, as I understand it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. BENNETT: Not this one.

Mr. DONNELLY: The whole objection we have to this is the duplication of service between the dominion and the provinces. We agree that it is a very important work, but as far as the work of this department is concerned in western Canada we know nothing about it. We hear about our own provincial work, and the work carried on in the provinces, but we do not hear about the work carried on by the dominion. It may be done down here in the east, but we do not know. Who pays the salaries, who are getting the salaries, and how much is paid in salaries?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is aware that the Department of Health came into being during the term of the Union government, and the child welfare division was established. In 1928 the Department of Health was allied with the Department of Pensions. The functions of the Department of Health, federally, certainly to some extent overlap the functions and duties discharged by the provincial boards of health. But the federal body was to be a coordinating body, and ever since it came into being it has brought to this city once a year the heads of the health departments of the provinces. Here, under the direction of the deputy minister, they have met together, discussed their problems, decided upon uniformity of regulations and legislation, and, if the hon. member, who is a medical man, would take the trouble to look into the matter, he would find that the services they have rendered to this country are incalculable. It has brought about uniformity of action; it has brought about improvement in what I may term sanitation, and in public health standards. It has resulted in the formulation of uniform policies.

The hon. member who spoke about the literature distributed in Ontario, the dental clinics which operate the provinces, and the efforts made to supply prenatal care in communities far removed from the larger centres, is fully aware of the fact that the federal administration has been responsible for bringing together the representatives of the health departments of all the provinces, and formulating the very policies to which he has referred, to the end that a measure of uniformity and the best known practice with respect to these matters should prevail. The hon. member for Willow Bunch is quite correct in saying that naturally in the western provinces they come more closely in contact with the provincial authorities, but the cooperative effort that is made on the part of the federal and provincial authorities to arrive at uniform standards and to improve working conditions with respect to the development of health policies any medical officer in any of the western provinces will tell you has been exceedingly great. I know that from my own observations when I was actively associated with the work of the Red Cross at a time when they were establishing hospitals in the very remote sections of northern Alberta and British Columbia. One knows, for instance, of the work of the voluntary organization which has been meeting in this city, the Victorian Order of Nurses, founded by Lady Aberdeen. Of course, they do work for one of the insurance companies for which they are paid, but in addition to that, so far as they can, they look after the various sections of the country. And the coordinating effort of the federal Department of Health has ensured the prevention of duplication of effort on the part of voluntary organizations with governmental instrumentalities. That has been great in the northern part of the western provinces. I can only assure the committee that if further knowledge is desired as to the details of the working out of this matter, the minister, who did not know this subject would be discussed to-night, would be glad to supply it. But with respect to salaries the point is that instead of appointing a successor to the late head and maintaining salaries it was decided to use that money for the purpose of actual work with the children, as the present child welfare council has been doing.

I deprecate the statement of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Blair), with respect to the graduate from Queen's having once been a stenographer, and I think upon reconsideration he will withdraw it. Lord Russell of Killowen, one of the most eminent judges, was at one time a stenographer, and Charles Dickens, the great novelist, in his younger days learned something of it. The fact that Miss Whitton, who has undertaken this work and is a graduate of Queen's was at one time secretary to a minister in a government sitting opposite to the party now in power, and that she has not only attained a place and position in this country but certainly is recognized as one of the best known Canadian women social workers at Geneva, reflects no discredit upon her. During the last ten days she has been representing this country with great distinction in London. I mention that fact because I think upon reconsideration it will be found that if each one of us, when we have to give account for the work we have done, is able to say he has done his work as well, as faithfully and as fearlessly as she has, he will not have any cause to be ashamed of his record.

Mr. BLAIR: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say that I did not cast any reflection upon Miss Whitton because of the fact that she had been a stenographer. That was not my intention. I believe I complimented her upon being extremely capable, and it is no reflection upon anyone to accuse him or her of being a stenographer. I do think, however, that although she may be a first class stenographer or a first class graduate of Queen's, or an M.A—which I think she is—when she is taken out of that class and put into a medical department I say she is not competent. I do not think you can transfer a person from one profession to another. Neither am I speaking unfavourably of the work that has been done by this organization. Under Doctor Helen MacMurchy splendid work was done; I believe I have said that. But now the work has been taken out of her hands and put into the hands of a university graduate. I believe my sentiments are reflected by some of the leading men in Toronto. I say that this work should have been placed in the hands of a medical man who would be more likely to have a better knowledge of the work than would a university graduate who had not studied medicine or was not even a graduate nurse.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish only to correct one statement. The work was not taken from Doctor MacMurchy. Doctor MacMurchy was retired because she had passed the age of seventy years; that is the reason. But in addition to that, the medical men are still doing the work they have always done with respect to this service—possibly they are doing a little more. But the executive driving power behind it is that of the head of the organization selected and paid not by us—because we pay her nothing—but by the voluntary contributions of an insurance company which regards the services rendered as being of the very first importance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As I said before, I am not objecting to the grant, nor am I objecting to the selection of Miss Whitton. I think perhaps the society were particularly fortunate in choosing her, because she has been able to obtain an increased grant for the society from the government.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, what does the $3,000 mean, if it does not mean an increased grant? All of these are grants. I think she is to be commended for her ability to obtain an increase when others in similar positions are cut down. They all sustain the ten per cent cut, with the exception of this particular grant. I am not complaining, but rather commending her upon her ability to secure more money for the particular society in which she is interested, and I am assuming that she is doing splendid work. But I do wish to say to the Prime Minister and to the committee that the remaining grants are just as important as this one. In fact, the grant to the blind is in my opinion even more important, yet it has suffered a reduction, along with the others. That is my complaint at this time. Had this society of which for the moment Miss Whitton happens to be the representative received the same treatment I should not have had a word to say, except to express my regret that it was necessary to cut the grants. I do think they are important, and I believe that sooner or later something will have to be done for the unfortunate blind in this country. I simply want to voice my regret that this particular grant is chosen as the only one to receive an increase while all the others receive the ten per cent cut.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the observations which have been made, absolutely unwarranted because there has been no increase in the grant, I shall ask that the item stand. The point was that new services were undertaken and the money that had been used by the department in one way is now to be used to pay for additional services to be rendered under contract.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What particular grant is it taken from?

Mr. BENNETT: This sum of money that was used for salaries in the department is now being used to pay for services to be rendered. But the matter is so important in view of the statements that have been made that I cannot think it is proper for me to allow it to pass without having the documents presented to the committee. I shall therefore ask, Mr. Chairman, that the item stand.

Item stands.

PUBLIC WORKS—MISCELLANEOUS

Architectural branch—salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draftsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $63,700.

Engineering branch—salaries of engineers, clerks, etc. of outside service, $366,000.

For operation and maintenance of inspection boats, $10,000.

Maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, $23,100.

National Gallery of Canada, $25,000.

National monument on Connaught place, $100,000.

Surveys and inspections, $55,000.

Balance of expenditure for works already authorized provided amount for any one does not exceed $200, $4,500.

Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $3,000 to be expended upon any one work, $50,000—Total, $697,300.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This item was before the committee on a previous occasion when every detail was discussed but the item was allowed to stand because the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency had asked for certain information. Since then I think he has obtained the information he desired. I suggest that the item be passed on the understanding that as we have some supplementary estimates, and if the hon. member desires to ask any further question or requires any additional information, I shall be pleased to furnish it on the supplementaries.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: What would be the sense of the committee as to taking items 44, 45, 46 and 48 on the understanding that there will be an opportunity for any further discussion that is desired on any one item?

Mr. VALLANCE: I think item 44 should stand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We were promised an explanation with respect to item 44, Experimental Farms, the amount of the vote being $1,815,000.

Mr. BENNETT: We can pass items 45 and 46, if the committee thinks well of it—

Mr. DUFF: On the understanding that they can be fully discussed on any one item.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Entomology, including investigations and inspections relating to destructive insects and pests, $350,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This vote has been reduced now from year to year. One part of it has disappeared altogether, and the rest has been very seriously reduced in the face of one of the worst plagues of grasshoppers that Canada has ever seen. An item went through the other day which I thought we should have had an explanation of, with respect to plant diseases. But here we are dealing not with a plant disease but with a pest disease, and the vote for it has been shot —well, I won't say where, but it is not all here.

I saw a dramatic photograph in one of the local papers of the battle that was going to be waged against insects this year. It was well done, one of the best displays of what this government should be doing but is not doing with regard to this pest that is right upon us. There are enough grasshopper eggs in Saskatchewan now to destroy two-thirds of our whole crop if they get a proper hatching, and they are hatching to beat the band at ninety in the shade. The battle is on and all the ammunition is absent so far as this government is concerned. All the government's artillery seems to have retired to bombproof caves.

Mr. BENNETT: That is wholly incorrect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will see if it is incorrect. Let us see if the Prime Minister knows more than the Minister of Agriculture does about it. Let us see what they are doing in the United States to-day to combat this plague. Let me read to you what the battle is going to be like across the line. The government at Washington are on the ground; they are not two thousand miles from the battlefield with their ammunition reduced, as ours is in the form of these much reduced estimates now before us—less than half of what the vote was in 1931. What are they doing in Montana, Minnesota, Idaho, Nebraska and several other states? Here are the grasshopper plans of the United States as outlined at a meeting by Dr. J. R. Parker, of the Department of Agriculture of the United States, who discusses the control problem with the spring wheat millers. The item reads:

Dr. J. R. Parker, chief entomologist of the United States Department of Agriculture, who is in charge of all field work in connection with the government's grasshopper eradication campaign, met with a group of spring wheat millers in Minneapolis, March 6, to discuss the situation. He added that the house had passed the appropriation bill for the purchase of the necessary bran and other supplies but that the senate had still to act.

Here is another item headed "Grasshopper bait fund before senate committee." It reads:

Washington, D.C.—The $2,000,000 appropriation for grasshopper eradication, which is part of the general appropriation bill, was considered by the senate committee, March 5, with the probability of its approval. The bill passed the house last week. The Department of Entomology is prepared to contract for bran for making poison bait as soon as the authority is given, but can do nothing further until then.

I have not followed that up further to see what happened, but evidently the appropriation had passed one house and was likely to pass the other. That is their intention, at all events, across the line, but what are we doing here? If only our friends opposite had even pious hopes or intentions of doing something of this nature! But this government is leaving it to three impoverished provinces, which it knows are on the verge of bankruptcy, to fight the battle alone, except for advice and expert supervision. Hon. gentlemen opposite have retired into their cellar to let George do it, while in the United States the federal Department of Agriculture is out to fight this battle on the other side of the line to the tune of $2,000,000. Does the Prime Minister say I am not wholly correct?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes I do.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then get up and show me.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not quite sure whether to be amused at or sorry for the statements that have just been made by the hon. gentleman. This is a vote dealing with pests. It has no reference to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will turn on the juice so that I can hear this.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a vote for "entomology, including investigations and inspections relating to destructive insects and pests." Technically there is nothing to be learned by Canadian scientists with respect to grasshoppers. Even the ordinary boy passing through school is able to tell you the habits of the grasshopper. All that was long since known. That the grasshopper is a pest is well known. That it has worked incalculable injury in the United States is also well known. It came to Canada from the United States. As a matter of fact large numbers that are now in the western provinces came to this country from the United States. The chief entomologist of the United States has been having a meeting with the millers and telling them that one house of congress has passed an appropriation and the other house is thinking about it. That is the illustration we are given of the high standard of excellence which characterizes the efforts of a government in some other country, entirely overlooking the fact that in the country in which the hon. gentleman lives steps were taken, not to meet the millers and have a talk with them, but to deal with the governments as to how the grasshoppers were to be destroyed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What did they do?

Mr. BENNETT: They provided the money to enable that to be done. This government cannot go on to a man's farm in Saskatchewan nor can it legislate to do so. The provincial governments have sole and complete control in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. When they represent to us that loans are required and assistance should be given, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) takes the appropriate steps. I ask any hon. member from these provinces: Has he any complaint to make as to what this government has done?

Mr. DONNELLY: I will name one right now. Last fall they came through my district and started propaganda on how to kill grasshoppers. They were asked by the municipalities if they would send in feed, but that feed arrived after the ground had been frozen and no work could be done. Two carloads of oats came into the municipality after the ground was frozen up.

Mr. BENNETT: Which government was that?

Mr. DONNELLY: I suppose it was the provincial government, but you were supplying the money and they were not doing the work.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) was a little premature. The thing to do is to get the provincial government started with a campaign of propaganda for the destruction of grasshoppers in the province. The program in Saskatchewan was somewhat more intensive than the one carried on in the United States, and what is more, it was carried on in the fall rather than waiting until the spring. If the hon. gentleman who knows so much about it will inquire as to what was done by the provincial government last fall and the steps taken to supply bran and poison and preparations for the destruction of the grasshoppers this spring, he will realize that at least it is not the fault of any government if the destruction is not complete. I have before me not only the statement made by the minister as to the steps taken, but every request they have made to us for necessary assistance in order that they may discharge their duties, we have met. We have met those requests just as fully as the congress of the United States met theirs. Our scientists have been as active and the propaganda has been more intense than it was in the United States, and this was carried on last fall, not this spring.

Mr. DONNELLY: There was a great deal of propaganda around last fall, but it was all propaganda.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Propaganda alone will not kill a grasshopper.

Mr. DONNELLY: They went around and talked about what to do to kill grasshoppers, to do so much ploughing and so much work around the summer fallows in order to keep the grasshoppers out. Anyone who lives in that part of the country knows that after the middle of October you are quite likely to have a freeze-up and cannot do any work. The propaganda was started in September but the oats did not come out until the end of October or the first of November when the ground was frozen. Feed was not supplied to the people when it should have been supplied.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to clear up this matter. Are we to understand that the assistance being given by the federal government for the destruction of the pest known as the grasshopper is not to come out of this item?

Mr. BENNETT: It depends upon what the hon. gentleman means. If he means the monetary assistance given to Saskatchewan, that was not under this item; it was under the relief measures.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have in my hand the estimates for 1934-35, and these include a vote of $350,000 for entomology, including investigations and inspections relating to destructive insects and pests. In 1933-34 the vote was $399,946. I have the estimates for 1931-32—I keep them just for reference—and I find that entomology is not included with the administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. In that year the vote for entomology is $35,000 and the vote for the administration of the act, $705,000. In 1930-31 there was a vote of $675,000 for the administration of the act and $30,000 for entomology. I could enumerate many others but I should like the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to tell the committee how it is possible, in view of what the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has just said, to reduce this item to the figure it is this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is just half what it was in 1931.

Mr. VALLANCE: This year it is $350,000 as compared with $399,946 last year. What are the reasons for the reduction?

Mr. BENNETT: There are always those who think that the expenditure of large sums of money indicates efficiency and effectiveness. The fact that $750,000 was spent one year presumably resulted in the elimination of the pests and the same amount was not required to be spent the next year. There should be a reduction in expenditure when the pest disappears. That is only logic. That is why the grant for the destruction of cattle affected with tuberculosis is much less this year than it was two years ago. That is why there will be an increase in the cost because of the outbreak in Quebec to which reference was made this afternoon. The same situation has developed with respect to insects and pests. This is all educational work; the federal government does not carry on the specific operations for destruction. It makes known and brings to the minds of the people knowledge, first, the character of the pest; second, the habits of the pest; third, the methods by which the pest may be eliminated; and, fourth, educational addresses are delivered throughout the communities affected as to the threatened danger of a pest in their locality. All this has been done in this country for years, and the result is that a lesser sum is now being expended for that service. The sum asked for here is ample for the necessities of the service. It may well be that three years hence some new pest will rise up; there may be a Liberal government in power and it will be necessary to expend larger sums of money for its elimination.

Mr. VENIOT: You are confusing the governments.

Mr. BENNETT: I merely mention that in passing. Knowledge is progressive, and the educational program carried on by the federal government is for the purpose of making known to the people the dangers incident to these pests. The provinces have always had to deal with the specific destruction of the specific pest. In this instance the sum asked for is ample for the purposes sought to be achieved, but the actual destruction of the grasshoppers bears no relation to this vote. There has never been any complaint that there is lack of knowledge on the part of the people, and the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has said that a great deal of propaganda was carried on last fall. I am able to express an opinion only from reading, and my knowledge is necessarily limited. But from what I know, from reading, as to what has been done in Saskatchewan and in some parts of Alberta and Manitoba, the propaganda was I thought very intense; and I ventured to think after they related to me what had been done, and after I had read what had been done, that they had made a particularly good job in anticipation of the spring. The danger time is in the spring of the year, and every possible effort has been made by the province to meet that situation. In fact, representatives of the government came here to request an extra loan in order to deal with the situation, and within the last few weeks an extra loan was made to enable the province to cope with its difficulties, because of its lack of financial resources to carry out what it conceives to be a very necessary and important task.

I do greatly deprecate the thought that the reduction in the size of an item indicates that there has been neglect, because we hope that as the years go by what we do with respect to herds of cattle in the country will obviate the necessity of the work being done over again.

I remember that only a few weeks ago an order in council was passed in which provision was made for retesting a small section of the country where a few short years ago a very large sum of money was expended to defray the damages that had arisen by reason of the herds in that locality having been infected with disease.

The whole problem is one of education, of appreciation of the difficulties, and of meeting the situation by adequate measures which scientists have devised and made known to the people. And this vote is ample for the purpose for which it is requested. It is not my duty to be familiar with every item in the estimates. The minister will be available if it is desired; he was called away, though he had intended to remain here. I would not for a moment ask this committee to adopt an item in respect of a matter of this kind in which they thought there had been dereliction of duty on the part of the government in providing ample funds to meet the necessities of the situation.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the Prime Minister will look at the estimates he will find that he is linking together two items, tuberculosis and glanders. That is taken care of by the provision for health of animals. I do not wish to enter into any altercation with him, and I pay tribute to the staff of the experimental farms for the part they played last fall in doing the very thing which the Prime Minister says this vote is intended to accomplish, namely, spreading propaganda and educating the people. For the first time in twenty-eight years, in that part of the province in which I have been privileged to live, we have not had any such pest as necessitated anyone coming in.

Mr. BENNETT: Then no money had to be spent.

Mr. VALLANCE: And that is what I am complaining of. In 1931-32 there was a vote of $705,000 and in 1934-35 the vote is only one-half of that; though the Prime Minister, I fancy, is as well aware as I am of the fact that so far as the west is concerned the grasshopper pest to-day extends from Eagle Hills, south of Battle river, clean south to the Saskatchewan river, or between the two Saskatchewan rivers. If he tells me that less money is needed to-day to provide the necessary education—

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then if it was necessary in 1931-32 to have $705,000 I should think that double that sum would be needed in 1934-35 for educational purposes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I will have another little whack at this. I would not mind letting the matter stand until the minister comes back, but I would just as soon take a round with the Prime Minister now, especially since he has tried to discredit the statement I have made. I did not follow up the American vote, but I do know that when the Roosevelt government brings any measure in it is likely to go through, and a vote of this kind did go through last year. The states in the American union to which I have referred are like our provinces; they are right up against it financially, and when there is a plague like grasshoppers we find the American government coming to the assistance of the farmers to the tune of two million dollars. But this government retires, as I have already indicated, to its bomb-proof cave and reduces its ammunition by one-half for this class of work. We find that previously there were two sums, $707,000 plus $35,000, making over $740,000, and that is twice as much as we have for entomological purposes this year. If the Minister of Agriculture were here he would at least tell us that by a more efficient handling of the money they were able to do as much work as they did formerly with a larger vote. He has been trying to put that across and we have been accepting it, but not in toto, intimating that we did not quite accept it. But the Prime Minister has not had ingenuity enough to take that ground; instead he tries to discredit what has been done in the United States, where certain states are in the same position in this regard as our western provinces. The difference between the United States government and this government is that they came along with assistance to the tune of two million dollars whereas my hon. friends have retrenched to the extent of $350,000 for pests generally. That is the difference.

I will tell you what apparently the Prime Minister does not know. For the sake of argument we will say and it is actually so in normal times, that this work belongs to the states in the American union and to the provinces in Canada. But is there not a vast difference between voting $740,000 in 1931-32 when there were no grasshoppers and voting $350,000 when there is a grasshopper plague? The right hon. gentleman takes the ground that the reason the vote has been reduced is that the pests are receding; the less pests the less money needed. But are they receding? Does not all the evidence go to show that we are confronted with the worst invasion of grasshoppers in the history of Canada? My right hon. friend says that they are receding. Well, that is what I call stretching a pretty long bow, though not, I hope, intentionally. But he merely says something for something's sake that doesn't amount to much. If it were the other way about, $350,000 voted when there were no grasshoppers in 1931-32 and $740,000 voted now that there are grasshoppers and other pests, that would be something that one would expect. But the right hon. gentleman is right up against it for an argument. When the Prime Minister of Canada cannot squeeze out of a hole it is because he is too far in to get out. With his facility of speech he can get out of almost anything, but he cannot wiggle himself out of the difficulty he has got into now. The fact is that the grasshoppers are there by the tens of millions, ready to eat the crops. The trouble was, the poison was not there last year for the last lap. Talk about propaganda! How much propaganda will it take to kill a grasshopper? Far more than my hon. friends can spread. If you don't get the dope into the grasshopper how are you going to get rid of it? What was lacking in the fight last year was poison and a good deal of the effect of the early campaign was lost because the grasshoppers were allowed to reach the stage where they took flight, going into and beyond the region of my hon. friend from South Battleford. The more you kill when they are small the less there are in the flight season. The flight was carried to within ten miles of my own farm, and I am sure that if the grasshopper campaign had been strong enough last year their flight would not have extended half the distance it did. But in the absence of sufficient poison the grasshoppers grew and took flight, seeking pastures new. And they found them in that and other western regions. Moreover, they laid their eggs wherever they lit, and the laying was good. Yet we are preparing to fight them by reducing the estimate for entomological pests instead of giving a special vote as they did in the United States. That would have been a great battle in the time of the war if we had prepared for it by reducing our ammunition, our large ordnance, our staffs of men and our money vote, but that is the way we are preparing to fight the grasshoppers. No wonder they are thriving! They are real grasshoppers, hopping all over our prairies and developing into locusts, we are told, while our friends are sitting in this chamber reducing the estimates and claiming they are doing their full duty. If our provinces were in good shape I would not make any complaint about this, but they are in a very bad state; they cannot for lack of money do as well as they know how to do. Where is the peace, order and good government relief vote that it cannot be drawn upon? Can we not keep order among the grasshoppers as well as elsewhere? Why can we not draw on that provision in this emergency?

It has just flashed upon me that this is the way in which my hon. friends are going to reduce the wheat acreage and production—let the grasshoppers have their fling. It will be an act of God, I suppose, instead of an act of the Bennett government, that is the situation. The grasshoppers are on the prairies in such a superabundance that unless some absolute miracle happens we shall not begin to fill our quota; we shall be able easily to give possibly 50,000,000 to the Argentine unless something is done to help the provinces fight the grasshoppers when they hatch, and they are hatching now. If my hon. friends think I have not produced a case against this government, then we shall have to take a gimlet, perform a surgical operation on their craniums and pour the information into them some other way. The tell tale estimate is there; no one can challenge the figures I have given. If conditions were normal the United States government would also not be helping their states, but conditions are not normal there and they are not normal in Canada. That shows the difference between the government at Washington and ours. I have a right to protest. I am glad the Prime Minister has given me the opportunity to explain the matter while he is present, because I would not care to talk to the Minister of Agriculture in the way I have done to my right hon. friend. He is the head of the government, very much so, and I hold him more responsible than the Minister of Agriculture for the disgraceful way in which the agriculture estimates have been reduced in the last four years. I hear an hon. member opposite groaning. Well, he ought to groan. What occupation other than agriculture have we to rely upon to bring back to normal the economic welfare of this country? What estimates have been reduced more ruthlessly than those of agriculture? I do not know. Talk about economy! This is a penny wise and pound foolish policy, reducing the estimates of the one branch of our country's activites on which we rely the most, that represents one-half of the people of Canada and feeds them all in addition to what we export. Yet my hon. friends are chewing and screwing those estimates down and then pretending that they are not doing so. That is what makes me angry. They get up in broad daylight, or rather in gaslight—and it is gas that they gave us—telling us they were doing their full duty when the facts and figures deny that right to the hilt. The Prime Minister tried to discredit my statement because I gave the facts in regard to the United States up to the date stated, asking where I got the information and indicating that I did not know whether the legislation went through. I know it went through last year and there is not one chance in ten thousand that it did not go through this year. Now, if the Prime Minister wants to retire and hand things over to the Minister of Agriculture, he is at liberty to do so or to give them to anyone else he likes.

Mr. CANTLEY: The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) is not the only one who has had to fight grasshoppers; we had them in Nova Scotia forty years ago. My hon. friend opposite, the member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) will I know recall that. They were there so numerous they stopped the railway trains day after day, and that was not confined to one year. We did not then go yelling to the federal government for help; we looked after and met the situation ourselves. My hon. friend opposite has apparently reached the age and stage where the grasshopper is a burden. Why not go out and fight them as we did? He whines and demands assistance for everything that happens and blames the government for its happening. Let him get to work on the grasshopper problem and stop his growling.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That must be one of the Rocky mountain locusts we have just heard from.

Mr. BENNETT: In this evening's paper the following appears on the front page:

Are Critical Days For Western Crops

The next two weeks will be the most critical ones affecting crop prospects in western Canada. The dry weather with high winds has caused considerable top soil drifting.

Wheat seeding is practically completed and that of coarse grains well advanced. Grasshoppers are beginning to hatch in some districts, but elimination measures are well in hand. The northern empire of the Peace River reports conditions and prospects are excellent according to the weekly crop report of the Department of Agriculture, Canadian National Railways.

Mr. VALLANCE: From what is the prime minister reading?

Mr. BENNETT: From the front page of this evening's paper. "But elimination measures are well in hand." I have received no complaints in regard to elimination measures. While I am always ready and willing to assume responsibility for any acts of the government or of myself in an official capacity, I think most intelligent people who have listened to the discussion for the last five minutes will wonder just what this country is coming to. I ask this chamber: What do thoughtful people in the gallery listening to this think? I console myself with the proverb "Answer not a fool according to his folly." Age has its claims to respect and in this instance to silence. If the United States spent $2,000,000 federally to destroy grasshoppers, this vote of $350,000 multiplied by twelve would make $4,200,000, and if you divide $2,000,000 by twelve, the United States having twelve times the population of Canada, we would be spending less than $200,000, but we are actually spending $350,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is not all over the United States; it is only in certain states.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not all over Canada either, and it is over a wide area in the United States. If the United States spent on the same basis as the Canadian figures suggest, they would be spending more than $4,000,000 federally. This $350,000 is for the whole of Canada. The mistake is to assume that it is limited to a particular area. Might it not be the fair thing in dealing with a matter of this kind to ask whether any demand or request made by those affected had been refused, whether any suggestion as to assistance had been declined, whether there had been an entire disregard of an obligation that legally belongs to others but that morally, by reason of financial conditions, is accepted by the federal government? I wonder sometimes whether after the last five minutes it is realized and recognized the amount of money the dominion government has put into Saskatchewan in the last three years; I wonder if it is realized the extent to which we have been subject to adverse criticism both public and private; I wonder if it is realized the way in which we have met the situation, because we have had faith in the future of that great agricultural province whose population is some 900,000. We have cared directly at one time for as many as 300,000 men, women and children, providing them with food and clothing through the long winter days and weeks and months, and the reward given for the efforts made, not by the government but by the Canadian people, is to be traduced, abused and slandered because they have thus done. It is their money, largely from eastern Canada, supplied through the purchase of bonds, that has enabled this to be done. Is it any wonder that at times we find it increasingly difficult when in endeavouring to deal with a situation of this kind we are confronted with statements such as those to which we have listened to-night? Let us at least be fair. Here is a calamity that has come to a part of Canada which Sir William Butler spoke of as the great lone desert, the part of Saskatchewan south of the Saskatchewan river. We have had drought; we had the binder of the soil destroyed by cultivation; that great alluvial deposit was dried and ground to an almost impalpable powder that the winds picked up and threw high in the air so that the trains passing through were covered with dust. Yet the courage of the people has been sustained and maintained. Ten millions, fifteen millions, reaching into the twenties, loaned, assuming direct obligations, caring for the people—all these things have been done, and there has been no complaint of which I have knowledge that the assistance rendered by this dominion to Saskatchewan in respect of grasshoppers has been inadequate. In the face of that I put it to my fellow Canadians whether they think that exhibition and that attack is calculated to encourage those upon whose good will and good feeling towards western Canada we must rely in our time of peril. I leave that to the committee.

I say with respect to the vote for entomology that it meets every demand. I am not confusing the two votes; I used the other by way of illustration. I am perfectly well aware that the variation in the amounts of votes depends on the extent to which work is undertaken. The work which was undertaken and paid for through the relief measures in Saskatchewan during the fall results not in complaint but, in reports in the newspapers that elimination measures are well in hand. Against that we have these denunciations of individuals, of myself, of the Minister of Agriculture, alleging failure of duty, failure to understand and appreciate the situation. That is helpful! That is constructive! That is calculated to encourage those who have risked their money for the purpose of trying to assist us—and by "us" I mean those of us who live in western Canada, that being my home as well. If at times one gets discouraged after listening to the tirade I have listened to to-night, in view of the knowledge of what we have done and are still endeavouring to do with respect to that drought stricken area, who can blame us? I leave that in the hands of the committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the Prime Minister gets into his last ditch he always starts up the sob sister stuff. That is what he is doing now.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not until I am through. My right hon. friend is trying to make out that Canada was doing more than the United States. How much of this goes to buy poison? That is what the west was short of last year and is likely to be again.

Mr. BENNETT: Not one dollar of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Everything is done except the one thing necessary. They can feed them with propaganda, but they will fatten on that alone, if you don't get the dope into them. The right hon. gentleman's remarks were aimed in my direction. Slander. There is no slander. Every word I have uttered is doubly true, and proven by the records and official estimates—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —and by the statements of the hon. members for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) and Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly). The vote is now not half, less than half of what it was in 1931, and they try to make out that they are doing more. The Prime Minister has tried to figure it out so that it will look better by taking the forty-eight states of the American union and trying to make it appear that we in Canada have been giving more than they are giving over there. But the forty-eight states have not all got grasshoppers, any more than the nine-provinces of Canada have. It is just a lot of bunk that cannot be supported by anything but a whine. Think of the horses being allowed to die in the country, crops being put in with mules and cows and steers and oxen and anything that can go into a yoke or collar, and yet the elevators full of grain within a gunshot of these dead animals! Hundreds and thousands of them dying, and the elevators filled to the top with wheat that cannot be sold and that they don't know what to do with. But the animals know what they would do with it if they could get a gallon a day to keep them going through the winter, even if it is wheat. Letting them die! Supplying seed grain to put in another crop and then sitting back knowing that there is not one chance in ten thousand that the grasshoppers will not eat it all up again, and not supplying one dollar's worth of poison to help. Then my right hon. friend starts that whining that he can pretty nearly put across, as he has done two or three times this session, but he cannot to-night because the record is against him. He ought to be totally ashamed of himself. I say again what I said before, that neither the national government in Washington nor that in Ottawa would have needed to help either the states there or the provinces here if the conditions were normal, if the provincial revenues were half as buoyant as they used to be. What is needed is to provide lots of poison and lots of help to distribute it. If the right hon. gentleman cannot see it, that is only evidence that this government is about the greatest aggregation of—what shall I call them?—something that can produce a marketing bill some of which no one can understand, not even themselves.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have heard the Prime Minister on more than one occasion eulogize the people of western Canada, and I was rather disappointed to hear him to-night reminding this house of what eastern Canada has done for the west. I would like to tell him something from a different point of view. I see him smiling, but he smiles from the chair of a law office in the city of Calgary, most of the time. I want to take him back to the great open spaces where people are living 150 miles from a railroad. I want to tell him of the contribution that these people made to the making not only of western Canada but of eastern Canada. I am pleased to be able to say that in the twenty-eight years I have been there I have made my contribution, and I resent the Prime Minister's telling me and the people I represent what eastern Canada has done for them. I would like him to visualize the God-given wilderness we went into twenty-eight or thirty years ago, 100 or 150 miles from railroads, and without facilities, many of us with only an ox cart. We have built highways; we have built railroads, churches, schools, towns, villages and hamlets. We have created billions of dollars' worth of wealth, and where has it gone? Those people he talks of are sitting in those lone homesteads to-night with very little equity, if any, in what they have created, and the Prime Minister tells us what eastern Canada has done for the west. He should go out and tell them that. Where has this wealth gone? Can he tell me where it has gone? I should like him to tell the people in the west where it has gone. After all their work and privation we have to sit here to-night and they have to sit in their homes and listen to what eastern Canada has done for them. Put western Canada in the position, as I have heard him say before, where they have purchasing power, and in eastern Canada our industries will hum. Make it possible for the 300,000 farmers west of the great lakes to have $2,000 or $3,000 purchasing power, and what will happen? I am not blaming this government, but I am blaming the Prime Minister for the statement he has been trying to get across as to what eastern Canada has done for the west.

I would like to tell him about my own province. What do the other eight provinces get from the province of Saskatchewan? We have to take our coal from Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: Most of it.

Mr. BENNETT: One million tons were taken from Saskatchewan this year.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, from the Estevan field going into Manitoba. We take practically all our lumber and fruit from British Columbia. We take nine out of every ten carloads of groceries from Manitoba. We take implements of production from Ontario, and some from Quebec and the maritime provinces. Yet out of the whole production of the province of Saskatchewan Canada does not take twenty per cent, and for the remaining eighty per cent we must find a world market. Then the Prime Minister wants to tell us what eastern Canada has done for us. No, Mr. Chairman, I resent it. I have listened to him in this house pay one of the greatest tributes I ever heard anyone pay to the pioneers of western Canada, but when I listened to him remind them to-night of what eastern Canada has done you cannot wonder that I rise in indignation.

Mr. SPROULE: I do not speak very often in this house, but I think it is time some hon. members opposite should stop and realize that in Canada there are some provinces besides the western provinces. There are people in Ontario who need money just as much as the western people need it, so far as that is concerned. Only a couple of years ago we gave them a five cent help on their wheat, but never got any thanks for it. They talk about grasshoppers, and to listen to the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) one would think that there were grasshoppers only out in the west. My friend in the east told the committee that his constituency had been bothered with grasshoppers, and we have some in Ontario. But when the grasshoppers strike Ontario we look after them, and we do not complain. I believe the origin of a good deal of the trouble out in the west can be traced to the west. So far as this discussion is concerned, I do not think there should be any line drawn between the east and the west. I have a good deal of respect for western members, and particularly those sitting on this side of the house. I do say, however, that there are a great many chronic complainers sitting opposite who are not thankful to the Ontario members who sit here and do not say a word.

The Prime Minister has just finished telling about the grants which have been made. I feel sorry for the people who have to accept what might be called the dole, but I think a little more consideration should be given to the east. It seems to me that the people in Ontario and the other eastern provinces are getting very little thanks for what they are trying to do for the people in the west. I have all kinds of faith in the west, and I do say that the remarks by the hon. member for Melville were unbecoming to him; they were very much out of place. I do not intend to take up any more time, but if I got hotter I could say more about it.

Mr. NEILL: We are a long way from bugs, Mr. Chairman. I suggest you use your authority to stop this discussion, which will not help us any, and is merely setting the east against the west. We are getting nowhere. I appeal to my hon. friends to allow the discussion to drop. Such recriminations will not promote good will between the east and the west.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have listened with a good deal of indignation to what the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) has had to say. He asked what the east had done for western Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: I did not ask that; the Prime Minister told us.

Mr. CANTLEY: Well, I rather think you did, and I will tell you. In the first place, we bought it and paid for it. In the next place we built three railways to it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Who are "we"?

Mr. CANTLEY: The four original provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: The Canadian people.

Mr. CANTLEY: One railway would have been enough. Who paid for the west? I will tell you where the money came from to pay the Hudson's Bay Company. It was taken from a grant that we had to our credit in London to construct the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. VALLANCE: Who gave them that?

Mr. CANTLEY: It was contributed by the British government, and we switched it from the Intercolonial railway to buy out the Hudson's Bay Company. We gave it to you as a free gift. Now you want to talk about a return of the natural resources of your western country. There is no end to what you fellows think you ought to get. You exhibit very little gratitude—

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman will not listen to an appeal of common sense, so I ask you to enforce the rules of the house, and particularly the rule which states that we must adhere to the item under discussion. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BENNETT: We will leave the item as it stands. I desire to say only this, that the observations made by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) are not warranted by anything I said earlier. I have stood for the west in good season and bad, and I shall continue to do so. But it does seem passing strange that after all this discussion the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), whose hearing may not be acute, does not understand that this item has nothing to do with supplying poison, or anything else, for grasshoppers, and that that is provided for by loans which we have made to the provinces. No complaint is outstanding to-day by any western province with respect to any provision they have been able to secure from this government for that purpose.

We will pass on to another item, in order that the position of the western provinces may be fully defined before this committee, and so that there may be no misunderstanding as to the facts.

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to refer to one other pest we have in western Canada.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The item stands.

Mr. DONNELLY: All right.

Item stands.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the other items stand, and the Canadian National Railways items go to the select committee.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports of the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act and temporary buildings and rentals, $6,113,000.

Salaries and travelling expenses of officers of the inspection, investigation, audit, and the preventive service undervaluation services, $916,698.

Miscellaneous, including printing and stationery; subscriptions to commercial papers; flags; dating stamps; locks; instruments; express charges on samples; legal forms; legal expenses; premiums on guarantee bonds; uniforms for customs-excise officers; laboratory equipment and supplies, etc., $500,000.

Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for customs-excise secret investigation service, $15,000.

To provide for the administration of the Income War Tax Act 1917 and amendments thereof, and authority for this purpose to create positions and make appointments notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, and salary of $8,000. (Less statutory deduction of ten per cent) for the commissioner of income tax, $2,000,000.

Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice, to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for the income tax secret investigation service, $15,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I suggest that in this department one item should be allowed to stand, because the minister will remember that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and other hon. members are interested in some matters in connection with it which were left unsettled.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth asked for certain information which I can give the committee now, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He is not here and I know he is interested in this matter. I have no desire to hold up the minister's estimate. Perhaps if the item is carried on the understanding that he can bring up on any other item the matter in which he is interested—

Mr. BENNETT: We had better leave one item. These are all grouped in one vote.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I want to protest against this method of preparing the estimates. The practice is not confined to any one department but is being followed by all the departments, I presume with a desire to curtail discussion. Certainly it does not give the committee the opportunity which I think it should be given of criticizing the estimates. While you have subheadings the votes themselves do not contain very much information. This particular one is not so flagrant as some others.

Mr. BENNETT: What further details could be given than are given here?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A great many. These items are all lumped in one vote, No. 252, with very few details of an appropriation amounting to over nine million dollars. I protest once more against this method of preparing the estimates.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it not the practice followed in your time?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly not, as my right hon. friend will see if he will look up our estimates or even the estimates of his own government of former years. It is a practice that is growing yearly in the preparation of the estimates under this government. I protested against it before and I do so again.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to say, to relieve the former minister of any difficulty on that score, that the officials are largely responsible for the grouping of these items.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But the government are responsible.

Mr. BENNETT: The government bring them in, I will admit. But vote 252, for instance, generally covers all the items that are specified here, and discussion, as I understand it, ordinarily takes place with respect to each of the six or seven items that comprise the whole vote.

Sir EUGENE FISET: May I suggest to the prime minister that the best way would be to call these items separately?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I suggest.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think I should say that this vote is in precisely the same form as it has been for years. There is no change in the method of presenting it. For the information of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) I may say that there will be an item in the supplementaries upon which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth may discuss the matter in which he is interested if the committee will allow this vote to pass.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister explain how he manages to get a decrease of half a million dollars in the first item of vote 252? Half a million dollars is a very large amount to be cutting an important collection department.

Mr. MATTHEWS: This is due to reduction in staff and economies effected in overtime and general contingent expenditures.

Mr. REID: When the minister's estimates were up in March I brought certain matters to his attention in connection with a boat named the Klekane, and he told me that he would look into the matter. I wrote the minister on March 13 setting out all the particulars, and so far I have not had the courtesy of a reply. The matter is a serious one. It is a very important case, and there are many similar cases. I think I ought to have received a reply from the minister as to whether a boat registered in the United States can go back and forth between the United States and Canada, operating in United States waters one month and in Canadian waters the next. I have all the particulars here and I can give them now if the minister wishes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The last time the estimate was under consideration the hon. member for New Westminster made some reference to payment for overtime. I have that information here. In regard to the boat he mentions I have not the information here, but I shall be glad to get it and send it to him.

Mr. REID: It is very strange, Mr. Chairman. I sent a letter to the minister about the matter on March 13 last, and I have received no answer as yet. The letter gave full particulars of the case. I have a copy of the letter here which I will read. I was wondering why I did not get any reply. I thought it was because the minister was investigating the matter. The letter is dated Ottawa, March 13, 1934, and reads:

Dear Mr. Matthews:—

You will no doubt remember my asking you on the floor of the house regarding the matter of whether a vessel entering Canada from another country has to pay customs dues on the valuation of the ship and engine in the event of the vessel being registered in the United States and coming to Canada to be used for profit here.

The matter I have in mind is in connection with a fishing boat named Klekane whose owners operated part time in Canada and part time in the United States, moving back and forth according to the fishing.

It is owned by two brothers; one lives in the States and the other lives in Vancouver.

It is registered in the State of Washington as a United States vessel and operates in Canadian waters as a Canadian one, and I was informed that on account of the fact that it paid customs duties away back in 1919, I believe, it has a right thereafter to go and come as a Canadian vessel. Surely this is not correct. The vessel cannot be registered in both countries at the same time. In my opinion, at least, if a vessel is registered in Canada it remains so until it registers in another country and having done so loses Canadian registry and takes on the registry of the other country.

A great many protests have been sent to me regarding this matter and I understand that this is not the only vessel that is allowed to go and come in this manner.

[Mr. Reid.]

I would be pleased if you would have this looked into and a ruling given, and may say in closing that I am of the strong opinion that no vessel can be registered in two countries at one and the same time.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have no recollection of receiving that letter. It may have come to the department, of course, but I do not recollect having seen it. I shall certainly see that my hon. friend gets a reply.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask the minister how many employees have been laid off under the first item of this vote?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The number of employees in 1933-34 was 3,863, and in 1934-35, 3,606, a reduction of 257.

Mr. COOTE: How many ports have been closed? I see there is a reduction of $524,000.

Mr. MATTHEWS: There have been fifty-one ports closed since 1930.

Mr. COOTE: How many have been closed in the last year?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The number closed in the last year is eleven.

Mr. COOTE: It is a little hard to understand how the department can lay off enough men to get a reduction of $524,000 in one year when only eleven ports have been closed in that period. Has it been the policy to cut down the number of employees in different ports of entry in Canada?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that the vote this year is down to the minimum. In other years there was perhaps a certain amount of leeway and in some measure that accounts for the reduction.

Mr. COOTE: How much of this first item of six million dollars odd is for salaries?

Mr. VENIOT: Has the minister the statement of how much he has saved by cutting down overtime?

Mr. MATTHEWS: For 1934-35 the salaries are $5,412,083.

Mr. COOTE: I asked for the number of employees paid from that vote.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The number of employees is 3,606.

Mr. REID: A few moments ago the minister said he had a statement to make in reply to the question concerning overtime which I brought up; is he prepared to give that now?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked concerning overtime, referring particularly to the payment of overtime to full time officers while temporary men were allowed to go. There is no doubt the temporary men were what are known as seasonal officers who are taken on at a number of frontier points during the season of heavy highway traffic. Both regular and seasonal men have to be on duty Sundays and holidays, and when they cannot be compensated by being given time off they are paid the regular overtime rate of seventy-five cents per hour less the ten per cent deduction. It would not be possible to eliminate entirely the payment of overtime as there are a number of places where the additional services required do not warrant additions to the staff; therefore it is more economical to pay overtime. There has been a considerable reduction in the expenditure under this head during the past year or so, and I can assure hon. gentlemen that every effort is being made to reduce expenditures still further.

Mr. REID: I asked this question because of complaints which were made to me last year and I think the year before that seasonal men had been cut down while more overtime had been paid to those regularly employed. It did seem rather hard that those who were engaged the whole year should be taken out to these boundary points and thus deprive the seasonal men of work. I should like the minister to look into this with the idea of permitting these seasonal men to earn a little more money.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 50, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 3—Statement of condition and affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the same constitutional question arise here as arose in connection with Lloyd's and the other companies?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in the same way, as the hon. gentleman will see as we proceed.

Section agreed to.

On section 4.

Mr. BENNETT: This amendment is for the purpose of clarifying the section. The new section will read:

> Expressly authorize such attorney to receive from the minister and the superintendent all notices which under the laws of the Dominion of Canada are required to be given or which it is thought advisable to give.

This is to make it perfectly clear that there is no impingement upon the rights of the provinces with respect to matters of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this a government or a departmental bill?

Mr. BENNETT: There are some portions in which the government must assume responsibility through the superintendent of insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the superintendent of insurance in favour of the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: My understanding is that the superintendent of insurance may differ from the law officers of the crown, shall I put it that way, with respect to the respective jurisdiction of provincial legislatures and the federal parliament. With respect to some features of the bill I do not think perhaps that is a proper question to ask me. I think there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. SPENCER: Will these amendments make insurance any dearer?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I know, no.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5, 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Assets to be maintained in Canada by other companies.

Mr. BENNETT: This is simply a change in numbering; the previous section was improperly numbered.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—Inquiries to company and replies.

Mr. POWER: Why the words "or officer"?

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. gentleman knows, sometimes there have been grave differences of opinion as to whether or not the word used in connection with the company, agent or officer, amply describes the situation. We wish to provide as far as we may that it is an officer of the company who makes the declaration. I am not always able to understand just why such a clear distinction is made, but this is to meet the difficulty that has been experienced.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On section 19—Classes of hazards covered by fire certificate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is there any change in this?

Mr. BENNETT: Instead of amending the section it is repealed and a new section with very slight changes is substituted. It is no longer subject to the provisions of the subsection of the act; it is complete in itself.

Section agreed to.

Sections 20 and 21 agreed to.

On section 22—Withdrawal of certificate for deficiency of assets—fraternal benefit societies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the change here?

Mr. BENNETT: This provision has in terms been present always in these statutes, but in the renumbering last year some mistake was made with respect to these sections.

Section agreed to.

Section 23 agreed to.

On section 24.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the change ?

Mr. BENNETT: This is an entirely new section. There is a slight difference between the two but they are substantially the same.

Section agreed to.

Sections 25 to 29 inclusive agreed to.

On section 30—Penalty for non-compliance with act, etc., not otherwise provided for.

Mr. BRADETTE: I notice that the penalty is the same, but the wide difference between the minimum and the maximum is so great that I think we should have an explanation. The range is from $20 to $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will realize that there are some offences which, if committed by a company, should subject it to very drastic penalties, whereas a slight offence by an individual should subject him to a slight penalty only; and in order that each specific offence should not be described and the penalty provided, the statute endeavours to provide a minimum which in the discretion of the court may be applicable to a slight violation of the provisions of the statute. In the case of an offence by a company on a large scale there is provision for a penalty as great as $5,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is this covered by any provincial law? It would strike the ordinary layman that there is quite a wide margin. I realize, as the Prime Minister says, that there is a great difference between offences, but this seems to leave considerable leeway and it might be open to criticism.

Mr. BENNETT: The nature of the offence would in all probability govern the exercise of discretion by the magistrate or court before whom the charge was tried. There must in the very nature of things be a very heavy penalty against some of the offences mentioned in the statute. There is no change except in the form in which it is put.

Section agreed to.

Sections 31 to 33 inclusive agreed to.

On section 34.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the meaning of the words "which were vested in trust"?

Mr. BENNETT: The language used is for the purpose of more adequately conveying the meaning which parliament had in respect of it. This applies to foreign companies that are vested in trust instead of being owned in the country. This is to overcome the difficulty that arises in this country by reason of foreign companies not being literally owned but vested in trust.

Section agreed to.

Section 35 agreed to.

Bill reported.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. BENNETT: Some members who are not present might desire to make some observations, and if the bill stands for third reading they can ask to have it referred back, so I will let the third reading stand till the next sitting. I was going to go on with the second reading of the other insurance bill but it contains some matters that may give rise to considerable discussion, so I shall not proceed with it to-night.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

VICTORIA DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I promised the leader of the opposition that I would indicate to-night what the view was as to whether we should sit on the twenty-fourth, and the view apparently is that it would suit better if we did not sit on that day. On Monday I shall put a motion on the order paper accordingly.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, May 21, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

TARIFF BOARD FINDINGS

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present findings of the tariff board with respect to references Nos. 6, 21, and 34.

VICTORIA DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday next it stand adjourned until Friday the 25th instant.

That is as I intimated when the house rose on Friday last.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, owing to the continued illness of Mr. Pettit, who is still confined to the hospital, I beg to move:

That the name of Mr. Frank White (London) be substituted for the name of Mr. Pettit on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*BEAUHARNOIS CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT GUARANTEES

Mr. EULER:

1. Has the guarantee of the federal government to the banks on behalf of the Beauharnois corporation been cancelled?
2. If not, for what sum does the guarantee still hold?

Mr. BENNETT: I may say with respect to this question that the government of Canada is discharged from any liability as a guarantor of bonds of the Beauharnois Corporation, and further that when the bonds were being sold I asked the banks to add to the sale price sufficient money to enable this country to be reimbursed for sums expended on the investigation. I have received and handed to the receiver general of Canada a cheque for $43,536.35, which covers the entire sum paid to counsel and for printing and all other sums carried in the ledgers of the Department of Finance in connection with the Beauharnois investigations in the Senate and House of Commons.

*PUBLIC ARCHIVES—PURCHASE OF PAINTINGS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the government purchased for the Public Archives of Canada in Ottawa, paintings from one Ward C. Pitfield of Montreal?
2. If so, what are these paintings?
3. What amount was paid for these paintings?
4. Was the purchase price of the said paintings paid to Mr. Ward C. Pitfield himself or to somebody else for him?

Mr. CAHAN: This question was answered by documents laid on the table of the house on the 17th instant.

*PENTECOTE RIVER DREDGING

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the government reconsidered requests already made since the year 1930, with respect to dredging work to be undertaken at Pentecote River (Riverin River), on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river?
2. If so, will the government comply with such requests this year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, as to this question and the others following on the order paper down to No. 42 inclusive, which are all of the same character, I would like to give the following oral answer:

The government receives from time to time reports in connection with the various works mentioned in these questions, and a decision as to the works to be undertaken will be disclosed by estimates when approved, and by further reports to be received from the engineering department.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions Nos. 12 to 42 inclusive answered.

PAYMENTS TO J. C. MCRUER, K.C.

Mr. BEAUBIER:

What moneys have been paid during each of the years 1922 to 1930, inclusive, to J. C. McRuer, K.C., of Toronto, by the government of Canada for professional services?

Mr. CAHAN: A full return was made in answer to a similar inquiry and tabled in the house on February 19 last.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—CHAIRMAN

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. Who is the chairman of the civil service commission?
2. What is his age?
3. What amount does he receive for salary and expenses?
4. Is he entitled to a pension?
5. On what date was he appointed chairman of the said commission?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Hon. W. J. Roche, M.D.
2. Seventy-four years.
3. $7,000, less 10 per cent.
4. No.
5. October 15, 1917.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ABENAKIS RESERVATION—RELIEF

Mr. DUGUAY:

1. What sums were expended on and for the Abenakis reservation at Adonak, county of Yamaska, in the years 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929, in connection with medical care, hospital charges, relief, and other outlays?
2. What amounts were granted to the municipality of the village of Pierreville in 1930 and 1931 under the terms of the Direct Relief Act?
3. Who benefited by such relief measures, and what amount was expended in each case?
4. What merchants filled relief orders, and what did such relief orders aggregate in the case of each merchant?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

PAYMENTS TO RAILWAYS FOR MAILS AND OTHER SERVICES

Mr. McPHEE:

What amount of money has been paid by the government of Canada for carrying of mails, express, freight, and other railway services for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934, to: (a) the Canadian National Railways; (b) the Canadian Pacific Railway?

CANADIAN CREDITS AND LOANS ABROAD

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What were the total loans or credits made by Canada to other nations?
2. What are the names of said nations, the amount in each case of said loans or guarantees, and the dates upon which they were made?
3. What repayments, if any, were received from said nations, and the dates in each case?
4. What was the outstanding amount due from each nation on January 1, 1934?

[Mr. Beaubier.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BONAVENTURE COUNTY, PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. DUFF (for Mr. Marcil):

For a statement showing works authorized by the Department of Public Works out of the general fund for public works in Bonaventure county since January 1, 1934, to date.

ST-ADELAIDE DE PABOS, QUE., WHARF

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all vouchers covering expenditures for stone, iron, wood and other building materials used in connection with the wharf of St-Adelaide de Pabos, county of Gaspe, from August 1, 1930, to date.

HAVRE AUX MAISONS, QUE.—PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all vouchers covering expenditures made since August 1, 1930, to date, at Havre aux Maisons, Magdalen Islands, including work done in the channel at Havre aux Maisons, Elie Point and Basse Point, Dame du Sud and Grand Barachois.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I notice by the papers that Premier Henry of Ontario has recently made a statement that the Prime Minister has intimated to him that it is the intention to introduce contributory unemployment insurance legislation. I wish to ask the Prime Minister if such an assurance has been given by him to Premier Henry, and if so, is it his intention to introduce such legislation this session?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I cannot be responsible for what is said in the newspapers in any sense. I doubt very much whether the report accurately states what was said by Premier Henry. In common with other premiers he has discussed with me the question of unemployment insurance and it will be within the memory of the house that I made a statement as to what the result of the discussion was. Since that time the government has been engaged in endeavoring to ascertain to what extent, in view of the differences of opinion with respect to jurisdiction that existed, we could submit legislation to this house. Whether or not it will be done at this session, I am not in position to state with any degree of absolute certainty. It may or may not and with respect to that I cannot say at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in using the word "that" was referring to my remarks as an interpretation of Premier Henry's statement or to the fact that Premier Henry had made a different statement. I should like to quote the dispatch itself, as follows:

"Mr. Bennett repeatedly has told me that contributory unemployment insurance is definitely coming," Mr. Henry declared. "He said he opposed non-contributory insurance, but he always suggested contributory unemployment insurance was inevitable."

The first part of the dispatch reads:

Canadian Press dispatch, Toronto, May 18.—Unemployment insurance on a contributory basis will be introduced by Premier R. B. Bennett in the near future, Premier George S. Henry of Ontario to-day told a delegation of women representing the Toronto and District Women's Unemployment Conference who asked the government for a provincial law as well as increased food and clothing relief allowances.

That is the exact wording of the dispatch to which I referred.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my answer covered the question asked by the right hon. gentleman. What I desired to make clear was that not only had it been discussed with Premier Henry but it had been discussed with the representatives of the provinces. There was a very full discussion and there is no doubt that I said to Mr. Henry what I said in this house and to the others, that I believed it was inevitable that some form of unemployment insurance would be enacted and that it should be on a contributory basis. There was some uncertainty as to the extent to which we might proceed to overcome the difficulties with respect to the provisions of the British North America Act and, as I say, I am not in position to-day to state definitely whether or not I shall endeavour to resolve those difficulties in a way which I think might be reasonable at this session.

CONSTRUCTION CAMPS

REPORTED REGULATION PROHIBITING THE HOLDING OF POLITICAL MEETINGS

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the opposition): Could the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) advise the house what regulations have been issued by his department with respect to the holding of political meetings in construction camps. No doubt the minister has seen the report that General McNaughton has issued instructions that no political meetings are to be held in any construction camp. Before a debate on the merits of this matter takes place, could the minister kindly advise the house as to what instructions have been issued.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): I was away over the week end but I saw the report this morning. If the right hon. gentleman will allow his question to stand as a notice I shall be very glad to give an answer to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to suggest that if there is any truth in the report, perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) would agree to adjourn the house in order that there may be a debate on the merits of the question. I think this is an urgent question in view of the present elections in Saskatchewan and Ontario and with the possibility of federal elections coming on before very many months.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is quite obvious that the views of hon. members cannot be expressed when this question is answered because it is not debatable but I think I can provide a method without adjourning the house by which opportunity will be afforded within a few days to have a complete discussion. This can be done on one of the supply items.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As long as it is an early opportunity.

SILVER COVERAGE

On the orders of the day.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In view of the fact that the United States is to use a coverage of twenty-five per cent silver for currency, which action will greatly increase the market price of silver, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if the government is contemplating taking similar action.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I am indebted to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) for his courtesy in advising me that he proposed to submit this question. The opinion of the government, either with respect to this or any other matter, can be made known only as and when the proposal is brought before the house.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Friday, May 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On subsection 4.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On Friday I made the suggestion that the government should consolidate the original bill and the proposed amendments. There may be some rule to prevent this being done, but if it could be done it would be of tremendous convenience to those of us who are ordinary laymen and do not pretend to be lawyers. The minister has indicated that there are to be more amendments and if there is no rule to prevent this being done, I think it should be done. I am sure it would expedite the passing of the bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At the request of the committee the amendments proposed were printed and they have been before the committee for over a week. I do not agree that there is any difficulty in following the bill and the suggested amendments. The bill will be reprinted before it comes up for third reading.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will be all right but it will not help us much now. What is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Apparently all of section 4 was not passed. Shall section 4 as amended carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have the amendments been discussed? I do not think they have.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If any of these disjointed amendments slip through without our knowing it I think we should reserve the right to revert to them. It is something like a game of whist where you have more cards than you know what to do with, it is not like euchre. I think the chairman should have consideration for the committee in this respect. We have to keep the bill and the amendments before us and keep jumping from one to the other to see where we are. I have a proposal to make in connection with section 5 but I am afraid I will not know when we get to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are the amendments to subsection 4? My recollection is that we had renumbered the paragraphs and were discussing the addition of what would be, according to the new amendment, subsection 4.

Mr. DUPRE: A new section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I do not think that had passed.

Mr. BENNETT: When the committee rose I was speaking.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the subsection carry now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister was discussing at the time the question of jurisdiction as between the dominion and the provinces, and I had asked whether he thought that the powers granted by the British North America Act to the dominion could be in any way conferred by the dominion upon the provinces. I understood his reply to be that they could not but that the provinces might be made to act as agent for the dominion—

Mr. BENNETT: Might agree to act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes—I beg my right hon. friend's pardon; might agree to act. May I reverse the question and ask the Prime Minister whether in his opinion a power conferred upon the provincial legislature under the British North America Act could, by the provincial legislatures, be delegated to the dominion in the first place or, secondly, would the provincial governments have power to ask the dominion to act as their agent with respect to the powers given them?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt as to the right of the province to agree with the dominion that the dominion shall act as its agent or instrument to accomplish a purely provincial purpose. I am equally clear that the province would have no power to delegate part of its exclusive jurisdiction to the federal power. For instance, no one will question that the province might arrange by appropriate agreement that, we will say, a trust company should act to do certain work for it in connection with the exercise of its exclusive jurisdiction. If the dominion government were so minded it could agree to discharge these agency functions for the province at the request of the province, and there would be no doubt in my judgment as to the legality of such an arrangement. This bill contemplates that the cooperation between the federal power and the provincial power will be manifest wherever it is desirable, the federal power acting with the provincial power to accomplish a given end; and if it be necessary for the provincial power to act in cooperation with the dominion, the dominion may exercise to the full its power. It does not propose to compel the province to do it, nor does it propose to compel the dominion, but it contemplates that as an instrumentality of government the province may agree to work with the dominion to accomplish a given end, and equally that the dominion may agree to cooperate with the province—the provincial authorities; I use the word province as covering all—for the same purpose. That is my understanding of the situation, and I think such power would be exercised in a perfectly legal manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can understand that if the dominion had enacted a law with respect to some matter and under that law wished the province to act as its agent in some particular it might have the power which the Prime Minister suggests. Might I ask whether the Prime Minister would go so far as to say that the dominion, having been given power to legislate exclusively on a particular question, could confer any of that power by legislation on the province as its agent.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the courts have decided, and the Department of Justice would advise, that it is not competent for this parliament to derogate from the power conferred by the British North America Act on the provinces, nor can this parliament divest itself of its responsibility and confer constitutionally upon a provincial legislature powers which under the constitution are conferred solely upon the dominion parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has been suggested that in subsection 5 it might be well to add the words "and disburse" in the third line, so that it would then read:

... the board may authorize such local board to act as its agent to collect and disburse the charges or tolls imposed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not yet reached subsection 5.

Subsection 4 agreed to.

On subsection 5—Board may authorize local board to exercise powers.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to add the following as subsection 5:

Whenever a local board has been authorized to exercise any of the powers of the board, the board may authorize such local board to act as its agent to collect and disburse the charges or tolls imposed.

The difference between the amendment and what I have read is that we have added in the third line the words "and disburse."

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 6—Board may require full information.

Mr. DUPRE: I move the following as subsection 6:

Whenever the board or a local board cooperates or acts conjointly with any marketing board or agency established under the law of any province, the board may similarly impose charges or tolls in respect of the marketing of the whole or any part of the product marketed by or under the direction of the provincial marketing board or agency and may authorize such marketing board or agency to act as the agent of the board in collecting and disbursing such charges or tolls.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is "provincial marketing board" anywhere defined?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not defined here because that depends on the interpretation which the provincial authorities may give it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is the board authorized under the authority of the province concerned?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: How will these funds be collected?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme will indicate the manner in which they will be collected. This is perhaps the most difficult part of the bill, and that is why these amendments have been put in.

Mr. HEAPS: Difficulties may arise in different parts of the country. In some parts too much may be raised by levy while in other parts there may not be sufficient. Will there be a supervising body anywhere in control to ensure that the amounts levied on a particular industry shall be fair and reasonable?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The dominion board is the supervising body with respect to all such levies.

Mr. HEAPS: Will they act in such a way as to ensure that no particular locality is hampered?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is why this change has been made, so that it will be centred in the dominion board.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that we add the following as subsection 7:

(7) The board may utilize the fund created by the charges or tolls in connection with the exercise by it or by a local board of any of its powers or for the pooling of returns, the creation of reserves, and any necessary operating or capital expenditure, and in the case of charges or tolls imposed in respect of the marketing of any product under the direction of a provincial marketing board or agency, the board may direct that the charges or tolls be utilized by and for the purposes of such provincial board or agency.

Mr. NEILL: Is this the only reference in the bill or in the amendments to the powers proposed to be given regarding pooling of returns? If so it is very dangerous.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, there is provision for that in a further amendment under the heading of "marketing schemes."

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister mind indicating where the pooling powers are given?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Clause 5, subclause 5 of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Well, that says:

Every scheme as approved shall state—

Is that all?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is covered by amendments under that when we come to them.

Mr. NEILL: If it is covered later on, we will deal with it when we come to it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am glad that somebody as astute as is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is a little muddled on this as well as I am. I would be afraid there was something wrong with my training had nobody but myself failed to see the significance of this word "pooling." To make sure that I was right in considering it as still very vague, I submitted it to a gentleman who has some knowledge of drafting legislation as he has been engaged in that work for many years. I asked him what he thought it referred to and he said that he thought it referred to tolls; that if too much was collected in the way of tolls, they would take out of it what was wanted and turn the rest back on a pooling basis. To make the matter quite clear, why not insert "commodity" before the word "returns," and then we would know that the provision did not refer to toll returns? The minister is strong on clarification. Would he mind clarifying it by putting that in to meet the situation, because if pooling is not referred to anywhere else, it is still about as vague as it was except that the one word "pooling," is there giving us an idea as to what is meant. But it is not plain that the provision refers to commodity returns or toll returns or whatever they may be. Why be so sparing of the English language as not to insert another word there and say "the pooling of commodity returns"? I think that is what the growers want. I did not think it referred to anything else until the gentleman to whom I referred said that it meant the pooling of tolls; that when too much was collected the portion not needed was returned to the growers on a pool basis. That is not my statement, but the fact that this gentleman put that construction on the provision shows that it is not clear what is meant. I would suggest that the word "commodity" be inserted before the word "returns." That is the least possible insertion that can be made; it is the addition of only one word and it might improve matters. Does the minister think that would hurt it?

[Mr. Dupré.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So far as the meaning goes, there is no objection, but it would necessitate a new definition of "commodity," it not having been defined before, and I do not see any gain. These subclauses have been gone over very carefully with the intention of ensuring that pooling shall be taken care of.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know that.

Mr. NEILL: I must be very stupid but I cannot find in the bill anything about pooling except in the place I have just mentioned, under subclause 7 of clause 4. The minister says that we shall find a reference under clause 5, subclause 5, but that subclause deals with polling not with pooling.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme itself will set out the manner in which they want their goods regulated and the method of pooling if pooling is asked for under the scheme. Subclause 7 will enable the collection of funds to make this possible, in addition to funds for other charges.

Mr. NEILL: If this does not out-Herod Herod! Hon. members know I voted for the second reading of this bill with the idea that a principle was involved in it, but I am beginning to think it is only a theory. I conscientiously voted for the second reading, hoping that my vote would be justified in committee, but the more we dive into the bill the more difficult it is to believe it will ever be made workable. The committee has heard what the minister said. I say that the only reference to authorizing pooling is found in these words and the minister confirms my statement by saying that it can be found in the scheme if they put one in and the government approves it. The subclause under discussion states:

The board may utilize the fund created by the charges or tolls—

This enables them to levy charges on goods sold.

—in connection with the exercise by it or by a local board of any of its powers or—"for the pooling of returns."

They can take this fund created by charges, tolls, presumably one or two per cent or a dollar per ton, ordinary charges for handling, and they may use it for the pooling of returns. If they were going to use it only for some of the administrative details of pooling such as the clerical help and all that, that would be quite in line, but where is there in the bill anything else that authorizes pooling? The British act says in language which can be understood by a child there can be pooling and makes provision accordingly, and in addition says how the money shall be divided. I shall not quote it because I will quote a more emphatic act. The New Zealand Dairy Produce Export Control Act of 1923 on page 174 has this to say in dealing with pooling:

Without limiting any authority already specifically conferred on the board with respect to any dairy produce, the board shall have full authority to make such arrangements and give such directions as it thinks proper for the following matters:

(a) for the handling, pooling, and storage of dairy produce.

How are they going to deal with the money? There is half a page devoted to that. It states:

All moneys received by the board by way of levy under section 15 hereof or in respect of the sale of dairy produce or otherwise howsoever shall be paid by the board into a separate account at a bank to be approved by the Minister of Finance.

It is carefully earmarked, you notice. And it shall be applied as follows; and then you find six different claims that are to be met with this fund; first, payment of the expenses, commissions, et cetera; second, salaries; third, travelling expenses; fourth, repayment of advances made by the board to owners. That is, it is contemplated that when the producers ship any produce they may get an advance payment. The fifth provision is for the creation of a reserve fund, and lastly, after those prior claims have been taken care of, payment of the balance to the owners:

In payment of the balance to the owners of dairy produce controlled by the board in proportions to be fixed by the board by reference to the quantity and grade of the dairy produce handled by the board in respect of the several producers or other owners of dairy produce.

Is not that a very clear and concise definition? First of all constituting the power of pooling, and second, what is to be done with the money. It is not to be put in the consolidated fund, it is to be put in a fund by itself of that particular board, a trust fund practically, and then the necessary prior payments to be made and the balance to be paid to the people. Against that we have this vague statement; in this bill:

The board may utilize the fund created by the charges or tolls in connection with the exercise by it or by a local board of any of its powers or for the pooling of returns ...

That is all, it does not say what they are to do with them. It is absolutely certain that the prior section, which says that they may levy tolls and charges, means only trivial charges, does not mean confiscating the whole proceeds of the sale. So there is no provision for pooling the returns, other than the casual reference that they can utilize this—expense fund you might almost call it—for pooling returns.

There must be hon. members behind the government who if they do not care to come out in the committee might use their influence privately to rectify this, because it is going to make one horrible mess.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding was that in the scheme submitted in the first draft of the bill one of the things that might be asked for, no doubt would be in some cases, was that the provisions as to the marketing of the product would include the principle of pooling. Because certain members did not read it that way an effort has been made here to clarify it still further. With the consent of the committee, since there still seems difficulty, I would ask that subsections 7 and 8 of section 4 be allowed to stand until this matter has been given further consideration.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have been reading this amending section 7, and like many other parts of the bill it is very abstruse. In the second line you have the coordinate conjunction "or" thrown into juxtaposition with the preposition "for," thus disarranging the sense of the entire amendment. This is the worst drafted bill I think I ever read since I came into parliament. I do not think the minister had much to do with drafting it. I believe it must have grown up too hastily as it were and without giving deliberate thought to the suggestions of parties who approached the minister and the department. The minister surely did not have time to let his intellect play on the mechanism of this bill and clarify it before it got into the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you say intellect?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I was considering that there was intellectual ability on the other side of the house.

Subsections 7 and 8 stand.

On section 5, subsection 1—Petition to approve scheme.

Mr. NEILL: I have an amendment to move:

That in lines 2-3 the words "or marketing" be taken out.

The subsection will then read:

A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production of a natural product may petition ...

As it reads now a scheme may be put up by people who are engaged in marketing alone. That is highly undesirable. I am willing to go the length of including producers and marketers in one scheme, but the scheme should include producers. Under the present wording it may be put forward by marketers alone, and the producers will thereafter be coerced by a scheme formulated, put forward and boosted by marketers alone. Let us look at the British act; they never contemplated any such drastic thing. They do not even go the length of putting the producers and the marketers together. Here is what they say, "a scheme regulating the marketing of a product by the producers thereof." Nothing about marketers alone. Then in section 3, "every scheme except a substitution scheme shall require a poll of the registered producers." The marketers cannot be registered, it is only producers. Then another place; when the poll is taken it must show two-thirds of the total number of registered producers. Nothing about marketers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does not the "producer" there mean the person engaged in the curing of bacon and the making of cheese as well as the raising of hogs or production of milk?

Mr. NEILL: It may mean a producer of bacon.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is, what we know as the packing plants?

Mr. NEILL: That may be so, but I want to get away from the idea that two or three commission agents or brokers may get control of an industry. You will achieve that end if you insist on the producers being in the deal. "No person shall be entitled to vote on the poll unless he is registered." He can only be registered if he is a producer. I think that goes to the very crux of the matter. I think such a provision will do away with a good deal of the objection that has arisen in connection with fish, for example. Two or three exporters could get control of the fishing industry. I suggest this for the consideration of the minister. I am meeting him more than half way. The British act says the producers alone, I am willing to put the marketers in along with the producers, but not to leave it to the marketers alone.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think we have to give the minister credit for explaining this act as including the marketers. Since the bill came down he has made it plain all through that it is not entirely a producers' bill, it is a trade or marketers' bill also. I never saw exactly how it could be worked, I admit, but that was the explanation given by the minister, he evidently meant it to be just as it is. But I would support the suggestion just made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that it is not desirable to pretend to have a producers' marketing scheme and then have others in it in addition, as might occur as the bill stands. You will be just where you were before. I do not want it too exclusive, but I can imagine conditions such that if you let the regular trade in you will have the Old Nick to pay. I do not see how they could get along together at all. I do not think that was meant by the government at the outset, nor do I think it was meant by those who asked the government for this legislation. The producers in British Columbia and Ontario and the prairies certainly had the idea that it was a producers' marketing bill. Now as indicated it may be a marketers' marketing bill, or a bill for joint marketers and producers. We are on delicate ground here and I think we should be very careful, because if you are going unequally to yoke together two classes in a marketing scheme it will be like getting a bunch of Kilkenny cats to work together. The minister would do well to look into it further and see if he can explain what the government means. I think the bill is just now the way he has explained it, but I do not think it will work.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): The amendment moved by Mr. Neill is:

That the words "or marketing" in lines two and three of subsection one of section 5 be struck out.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In drafting the bill we have endeavoured to keep it flexible so far as possible, especially for the first year of its operation. There was one difficulty that came to our notice during the past two years and which led to this section being drafted as it is. Some two years ago a large number of representatives of creameries met with me in this connection; some of them were cooperative and some were not. I believe at that time all the larger ones were in agreement with the exception of one firm. If all the creameries in Canada were cooperative they would come under the classification of producing and marketing and this would not be necessary, but since there are some creameries that are not cooperative, without these words it would be impossible for them all to get together and submit a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of dairy products. That is just one instance that comes to my mind. I believe this paragraph was arranged in this way in connection with creameries especially, but it might apply in the case of canneries and so on as well.

Mr. TOTZKE: The creameries are producers, are they not?

Mr. VALLANCE: I really cannot agree with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) or my good friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I can see the possibility of a situation arising in connection with an organization which is peculiarly a marketing organization. We will take the hog producers. They may band themselves together to sell their hogs to a second individual or group engaged in packing. My hon. friend from Humboldt reminds me that they also produce bacon, and the question arises as to just when a hog becomes bacon. The answer is when it is cured, but I think it is to overcome that difficulty that marketers are included in this section.

Mr. NEILL: In that case you would simply have two boards, one for the hog producers and one for the bacon producers. They are both producers.

Mr VALLANCE: This may be superfluous if you are going to designate a packer as a producer. He is only a processor in the creation of bacon or ham, and I can see that otherwise you might exclude certain individuals who are engaged in legitimate business from creating the very thing that all producers desire to create. To-day we have producers and marketers in one organization, known as the wheat producers. We both produce and market. There are others outside that pool of producers and marketers who are only producers of wheat. Under this bill they may, if they choose, band themselves together as producers, but then you may have someone—a miller, if you like—come along and take my entire production. He produces flour, and he also markets flour. Are you going to argue that the whole question of marketing is unnecessary and should be eliminated?

Mr. NEILL: No, the millers can have a board for the producing and marketing of flour.

Mr. VALLANCE: Someone reminds me of the grain exchange, who buy and export wheat. I do not think there is another organization engaged in the marketing of a commodity in quite the same position as the grain exchange. The other groups are engaged in processing or marketing the pooled product of some other group, and by that very act they become producers.

Mr. NEILL: Does the hon. member say the grain exchange processes wheat?

Mr. VALLANCE: No, I say they are the outstanding example of a group not being processors of anything; they are only marketers, so this would allow that portion of the crop which is not pooled to be created into a pool through the grain exchange, if they so desired.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member has proved my case; he has suggested the possibility that the grain exchange may get control of the wheat producers.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, they cannot do that. In the old pool we had over fifty per cent of the producers, and I think they would be willing to enter into another pool. That portion that did not come into the producers' pool might come in under the grain exchange, if they desired. They may be compelled to do so, but first you must have a vote. If over forty per cent stayed out of a voluntary pool surely my hon. friend would not suggest that they would vote themselves into a compulsory pool, so probably you would have a certain percentage of the wheat producers who would not come under any scheme.

Mr. NEILL: They would have to do so; the minority of the wheat producers would have to come under the scheme if the majority asked for it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then let me ask a question. My hon. friend says we are all going to be forced in. How large will the unit be? Does he suggest that the province of Saskatchewan, because it has a large production, can force Alberta and Manitoba into such a pool without those provinces having any thing to say about it?

Mr. BROWN: We have not come to that point yet.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is a question I should like to put to my hon. friend.

Mr. NEILL: There is a saying that you cannot serve God and mammon; you cannot be a producer and serve the marketing end alone. I should think my hon. friends from the prairies would be only too glad to get away from the control of the grain exchange.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am not arguing in favour of the grain exchange at all.

Mr. NEILL: Is that not the inference, that you will allow them to come in?

Mr. VALLANCE: By your very act you are forbidding over forty per cent, under the voluntary pool, from having any say as to whether they can be pooled under some other system than that which you say they should have.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. COOTE: Just for information I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to the creameries, which he mentioned. If a number of the creameries that are not cooperative in any sense of the word but are simply private creameries got together and set up a scheme, might they be formed under a provincial board so that the scheme would only include private agencies engaged in marketing dairy products, without reference to any of them being producers in any sense?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I should say that would be possible within a certain area, if the vote included seventy-five per cent of the production.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think more consideration should be given this section; I am fully in accord with the contention of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. This act was introduced primarily to improve the methods and practices of marketing, but that was only to benefit the primary producers and not necessarily those interested only in marketing. I do not think the primary producer will be in any better position if those who are primarily interested in marketing are going to be allowed to invoke this act in their own particular interest. I think the minister should give a little more consideration to this point. It may be difficult for me to see the implications of what is involved here at once, but I think the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is a very pertinent one and should receive more consideration.

Subsection 1 of section 5 agreed to.

On section 5, subsection 2—Reference to board.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have a suggestion here, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to move it as an amendment. I anticipate that there will be a number of suggestions made, and I at least am going to make one, but not in the form of an amendment. I would like to submit it for the consideration of the minister and the government. Perhaps it could come in at the end of subsection 2, but I am not sure just where it should come in as there are so many places where it might be inserted. I will read it, not as an amendment but just as a suggestion to the minister so that if this whole section stands he can consider it:

Provided, however, that the minimum favourable vote however given expression to shall be on a range basis of from 66⅔ to 85 per cent of the vote polled.

The way the bill is now there is no mention of such a range, or indeed any percentage at all. A straight percentage of 66⅔ would not seem to be quite sufficient for some commodities. I do not think we could fix a flat percentage to apply to all commodities, and in order to have a flexibility about it, and to take away a little of the responsibility that the minister must necessarily have the way the bill now reads, I am making this suggestion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would come under subsection 3.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, if we pass subsection 2 the way it is. I have not drafted it quite properly, and I am offering it simply as a suggestion, but the way it reads is this:

Provided, however, that the minimum favourable vote however given expression to—

By poll or in any other way.

—shall be on a range basis of from 66⅔ to 85 per cent of the vote polled.

Then the minister would have some discretion in fixing the percentage, depending upon the commodity under consideration, between those two extremes of 66⅔ and 85 per cent. I would not put it away up to 90 per cent or run it away down to 50 per cent, but keep it within that range I suggest. I think that that would be preferable to having it wide open and throwing the whole responsibility on the minister. I am sure he does not want any more responsibility than he must have under this bill. He may have to decide in connection with a scheme out in British Columbia, many miles from Ottawa, just what percentage there shall be of the vote polled, whether it shall be fifty or sixty or ninety per cent, but if my suggestion is adopted the range would be from 66⅔ to 85 per cent. I would ask the minister to consider that and see if he can work out an amendment along those lines.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That will be discussed on subsection 3 when subsection 2 is passed.

Subsection 2 of section 5 agreed to.

On section 5, subsection 3—minister may recommend approval.

Mr. DUPRE: I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out subsection 3 of this section and substitute the following therefor:

(3) Upon receipt of a report from the board recommending the approval of the scheme as submitted or as amended by the board, the minister may recommend the approval thereof, or may require that a poll be taken and state the necessary percentage of voters favouring the scheme to warrant its further consideration; upon the recommendation of approval by the minister, the governor in council may approve the scheme and fix the date when the same shall become effective.

Mr. NEILL: Will you read the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DUPRE: It is the printed amendment.

Mr. NEILL: I have an amendment to offer to that amendment, if you are not going to read it, Mr. Chairman. I propose to strike out in the third line the words "or may" and to substitute therefor the words "but shall." It would then read like this:

Upon receipt of a report from the board recommending the approval of the scheme as submitted .... the minister may recommend the approval thereof but shall require that a poll be taken.

The object is to make compulsory that there shall be a poll. What is the use of talking about a thing which may or may not be done, leaving it to somebody else to decide. The whole act teems with evasions or vague possibilities of that kind. We cannot risk our whole scheme of a livelihood on the decisions that may or may not be given by a board under this act.

I shall not take time to read all the references to the sections of the British act which state that a poll shall be taken and which contain most positive and definite provisions for taking the poll. For instance, the minister has to advertise it, secure a list of the producers, and the poll "must" be taken. There are even references to carrying out the poll with the same care and finality as regards corruption as is taken under the Elections Act. That shows you how seriously they regard it.

But let us come a little nearer home, to British Columbia. We have heard references to how much British Columbia wants this legislation. I have had some correspondence with the secretary of one of the organizations out there, and I shall quote a few words from my letter to him dated October 25:

Of the general principle involved I am in favour. I understand that the Hon. Mr. Weir has had this matter under consideration for years. Why not ask him to formulate and introduce a bill into the house early next session? It could be read a first time, which commits no one to it, and sent to the agricultural committee. They could hear witnesses of various bodies and interests. If deemed necessary, they could bring in a report to the house recommending that it be stood over for that session and meantime circulated throughout the dominion and, on the representations made, the government could prepare another or revised bill to bring down in the next session with a much better prospect of passing it as non-contentious legislation.

Does not that sound like the voice of prophecy, considering that it was written last October? Here is what one of these men who is authorized to deal with the minister and who was in personal touch with the minister wrote me in reply:

First the intention is to secure legislation from the federal house.

A little further on he says:

If an act is passed similar to the British Marketing Act—

I wonder if this act is similar:

—we will then have legislation which will allow of any scheme which has been submitted to the dominion and provincial governments and received their approval or the ministers of agriculture of those governments, and after the scheme has been printed and sent out to all registered producers a poll will be taken conforming with the regulations of the act and by means of this poll an expression of opinion secured from all registered producers of the commodity involved.

Those are the men who have been cited again and again as interested in this act. The man who signs that letter is the secretary of the British Columbia subcommittee of the Canadian Horticultural Council, and I have heard it quoted in the house that the Horticultural Council was intensely pleased with this bill and endorsed it. But when I looked the matter up I found that they said, "with modifications." Let me call attention to the men who did this agitating. They had a convention at Regina, and they met the minister there. Who are these men? They were representatives of the dairy, fruit and vegetable industries; also Mr. Millikin of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. He seems to have been very prominent in it. It says:

Mr. Millikin, who is solicitor for the Saskatchewan wheat pool, recently conferred with Mr. Bennett and Mr. Weir at Regina and at the expressed wish of Mr. Weir is, I believe at the present moment, in Ottawa for the purpose of discussing the whole matter with the federal Minister of Agriculture with the idea of completing the draft of the act ...

I wonder if this Mr. Millikin is the villain in the piece, the man who drew this abortion of a bill.

The point I was going to make is that the representations come wholly from the primary agricultural industries. Do they say anything about fish or lumber? Not a thing. But I am getting away from my point. My point is this. These men from British Columbia did contemplate having a very definite and precisely worded bill, and they were prepared to sink or swim by such a bill. But here on this very important question of holding a poll this bill says that the minister "may" require that a poll be taken. There again is all of that vicious element. It makes it possible under the amendment that was wrongly passed a few minutes ago to put the whole thing into the hands of a few marketers, commission agents, it may be. Do you think they will want to take a poll? Not on your life. Do you think their scheme will suggest the taking of a poll? That is the last thing they will want to do when there is any suggestion of getting control. The hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. MacInnis) said very truly that the poll was intended for the primary producer but before we finish up with this the control will be put back just where it is at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The proviso which I suggested should really be added to subsection 2 but that subsection has been passed. As I understand it, a proviso is not numbered, it is a sort of leanto to the main section or subsection. The words "provided however" should be added to number 2. I hope this subsection will stand as there is a lot in what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) says. Referring to the complaint of Mr. Millikin I claim that the largest organization of producers of which I know in Canada, the wheat pool, should have had representation at either the Regina or Toronto meetings or any other in which they are interested, but I suppose that is neither here nor there. I think it is unfortunate to have no percentage mentioned in the bill. The minister will not have a moment's peace from one end of the year to the other if he has to be the only one to decide the percentages. Then we should decide how the poll shall be taken, by referendum, plebiscite or other means. Perhaps I should not be so much concerned in reducing the responsibility of the minister. However, if there was a range within which the minister would have a choice perhaps some hope would be given to those who are sensitive about the compulsion feature that they would come in under the higher range while the easy ones could come in under the lower, or vice versa. There would be a range which would be in harmony with the difference which must exist between the schemes proposed.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) a question. When you refer to placing them between 65 and 85, are you referring to growers or to quantity of production? Let me give an illustration. You may have a man with 50 acres of wheat, he is a producer; you may have another one with 2,000 acres, he is a producer. As it is now, being left in the hands of the minister, some recognition may be given to the volume as well as to the number of individuals.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that ought to be left to the minister and I would rather he do it than I. Someone would have to specify a franchise with ballot boxes, scrutineers and all that sort of thing. I am quite willing to leave the methods and the qualifications of the voters to the minister, but better still to the provinces. You would have to have a regular franchise and qualification for voters and all the paraphernalia, but the provinces can determine that.

Mr. VALLANCE: You would have to have qualification anyway.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They would have the term eligible, registered producer. The government are changing this bill very much and I should like to have a little of the original bill left for identification purposes.

Mr. VALLANCE: Do you want to justify your first vote ?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, but I also have some mercy on the government.

Mr. BROWN: What is the object in setting 85 per cent when the object to be achieved can be achieved just as well by setting a minimum of say 66 and two-thirds per cent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I suggest that the amendment to the amendment does not deal with this and it would be better for the committee to deal first with the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In reply to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) I might state that when the minister was reading off the list of the various groups of producers in Queensland in nearly every case they were above 85 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Could we deal with this subamendment?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am trying to deal with it. I am not supposed to be questioned by another hon. member, but I am trying to reply. Nearly all the votes in Queensland were above 85, so that that would not be an unreasonably high figure. Some of them go as high as 99.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The point now under discussion does not come up under the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HEAPS: Just how is this poll to be taken?

Mr. NEILL: If any.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment to the amendment clearly has to do with that.

Mr. HEAPS: Might I have an answer to my question as to how this poll is to be held.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Will the committee just deal with this first?

Mr. HEAPS: This arises out of the amendment, the one says "shall" and the other says "may."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): An amendment is moved by Mr. Neill that the words "or may" in section 5, subsection 3, line 4, be struck out and the words "but shall" be substituted therefor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That amendment has to do with the way in which a poll is to be taken of those who are to have the say as to what regulations are to be recommended to the minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say that the amendment to the amendment does not discuss how the poll shall be taken or the percentage of the vote, but that there shall be a poll. The only question before the committee is whether or not there shall be a compulsory poll, the question is not as to how the poll shall be held.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the subamendment I should say it would be quite proper to discuss anything that affects the particular recommendations that are to be made to the minister. If there is a poll, they will be made subject to that poll; if there is no poll, the regulations will be made in another way. It all comes back to the question of regulations. Before we proceed further it would be well for the committee to consider just where we are going in the matter of this proposed legislation. I should like to give the minister certain reasons why I think this and some other sections ought to be held over for further consideration before the committee is asked to support them. The regulations that are to be drafted and that are to become the law are to be made exclusively within the ambit of interested producers and the governor in council. Parliament does not enter into the picture at all. That is the first feature that I wish to make clear with respect to what this parliament is being asked to do. It is being asked to authorize certain interested groups combined with the governor in council to make what hereafter are to be the laws of the land. I say that that is an entirely wrong departure, that it amounts to what I have referred to before as a political revolution in the manner in which laws are hereafter to be made in this country. I do not think we ought to countenance such a step unless we are fully aware of where it is taking us in the matter of legislation.

The effort to get away from parliament is not new as other countries and other governments have been faced with similar difficulties. The parliament of Great Britain has to deal with a much larger number of subjects than this parliament, it has to deal with all the subjects which under our constitution are assigned to the provinces as well as to the dominion. That parliament has found it necessary to do a certain amount of delegating with respect to matters of legislation but in delegating powers to local bodies the parliament of Westminster very soon discovered that unless they were to depart entirely from the British constitution, to get away from the rule of law and the sovereignty of parliament it was necessary that some very clearly defined rules should be laid down within which it would be permissible for the minister to approve or disapprove of regulations, or for local bodies to be permitted to make regulations without the full approval of parliament with respect thereto. The Prime Minister of to-day has frequently directed the attention of this house to a volume which has been mentioned in the course of this debate—a work by the chief justice of Great Britain, Lord Hewart of Bury. The volume is entitled "The New Despotism." I doubt if hon. members have realized that this volume written by the Lord Chief Justice of Great Britain was written as a protest against the sort of thing we are here being asked to do at the present time, a protest so strong that the British parliament found it desirable to appoint a royal commission to report upon the whole question of delegated powers. I intend to read an extract or two from this work, and a paragraph or two from the report of the commission which submitted its findings to the British parliament, so that we may see how immediately those findings bear upon what is before this committee at the moment.

The situation as it presented itself to the Lord Chief Justice of England has been expressed by him in a paragraph in the introduction to this volume, under the title "The Nature of the Question." The author says:

> The paradox which is in course of being accomplished is, indeed, rather elaborate. Writers on the constitution have for a long time taught that its two leading features are the sovereignty of parliament and the rule of law. To tamper with either of them was, it might be thought, a sufficiently serious undertaking. But how far more attractive to the ingenious and adventurous mind to employ the one to defeat the other, and to establish a despotism on the ruins of both! It is manifestly easy to point a superficial contrast between what was done or attempted in the days of our worst kings, and what is being done or attempted to-day. In those days the method was to defy parliament—and it failed. In these days the method is to cajole, to coerce, and to use parliament—and it is strangely successful. The old despotism, which was defeated, offered parliament a challenge. The new despotism, which is not yet defeated, gives parliament an anaesthetic. The strategy is different, but the goal is the same. It is to subordinate parliament, to evade the courts, and to render the will, or the caprice of the executive unfettered and supreme.

The foregoing appears at page 10. I contend that every line of that paragraph is borne out by what has been happening in this committee since the introduction of this measure. It is perfectly clear that the tendency of this legislation is to get away from the supremacy of parliament in the making of laws, to get away from the rule of law as determining the rights of subjects throughout the entire dominion. Perhaps I had better refer to an earlier page in this volume where Lord Hewart says:

> The citizens of a state may indeed believe or boast that, at a given moment, they enjoy, or at any rate possess, a system of representative institutions, and that the ordinary law of the land, interpreted and administered by the regular courts, is comprehensive enough and strong enough for all its proper purposes. But their belief will stand in need of revision if, in truth and in fact, an organized and diligent minority, equipped with convenient drafts, and employing after a fashion part of the machinery of representative institutions, is steadily increasing the range and the power of departmental authority and withdrawing its operations more and more from the jurisdiction of the courts.

That is exactly what is proposed by this very section; it is to take away from parliament first of all the making of the law, to put the laws governing the regulation and marketing of products into the hands of occupational groups in local areas who, in order to have their regulations become law, shall be subject only to the approval of the governor in council. And such regulations are to be given their widest scope in some instances subject only to the approval of the minister. It begins and ends outside of the ambit of parliament altogether.

Now I say that legislation of the kind should not be countenanced by this parliament for one moment. It is not necessary to get away from the authority of parliament, it is not necessary to do away with the making of laws in accordance with the practice and procedure of this House of Commons, in order to give the farmers of this country or any other class what is needed in full to safeguard their interests and to improve their condition where that is possible.

I have referred to the action of the British parliament in appointing a royal commission to study the whole question of the delegation of powers. I have in my hand the report of that commission on ministers' powers. Report Presented by the Lord High Chancellor to Parliament by Command of His Majesty, April 1932. The report states that the committee was appointed:

> to consider the powers evercised by or under the direction of (or by persons or bodies appointed specially by) ministers of the crown by way of (a) delegated legislation and (b) judicial or quasi-judicial decision, and to report what safeguards are desirable or necessary to secure the constitutional principles of the sovereignty of parliament and the supremacy of the law.

That was the purpose for which the commission was appointed. Now what does this commission say as to the essentially subordinate character of delegated legislation? I would suggest to hon. members that they read carefully the entire report, but this one section bears immediately on the legislation which is before us at the moment—this section with regard to the essentially subordinate character of delegated legislation. All this legislation that is left to the local boards to be approved of by the governor in council is delegated legislation, and with respect to delegated legislation this royal commission has reported that certain safeguards should be thrown around such legislation, safeguards wholly lacking in this measure. In that regard may I read one paragraph which appears at page 20:

The power to legislate, when delegated by parliament, differs from parliament's own power to legislate. Parliament is supreme and its power to legislate is therefore unlimited. It can do the greatest things; it can do the smallest. It can make general laws for a vast empire; it can make a particular exception out of them in favour of a particular individual. It can provide—and has in fact provided—for the payment of old age pensions to all who fulfil the statutory conditions: it can also provide—and has in fact provided—for boiling the Bishop of Rochester's cook to death. But any power delegated by parliament is necessarily a subordinate power, because it is limited by the terms of the enactment whereby it is delegated.

It is a principle of our constitution that whatever laws are passed by parliament are binding, as the law of the land, on everybody. But it is also a principle of our constitution that no one may be deprived of his liberty or of his rights except in due course of law—i.e., unless he has done something which the law says specifically shall have that effect. In the absence of a common law or a statutory authority, "A" cannot be deprived of rights by an executive act of a minister; and if the minister claims to have made a regulation entitling him to interfere with "A's" rights, the courts will interfere to stop the minister unless he can show by what authority, statutory or otherwise, he has made the regulation in question.

It follows, therefore, that to safeguard the second of the two principles just mentioned the precise limits of the law-making power, which parliament intends to confer on a minister, should always be defined in clear language by the statute which confers it.

There is nothing here in the nature of statutory law, nothing that may be cited as law, to which all persons in the country will be subject. The very essence of this proposed legislation is that there shall be one law for one locality and another law for another, that the producers in one province may have one scheme and the producers in some other province another. These schemes, not if they receive the approval of parliament, not if they find existence in a statute or a resolution approved by parliament, but simply if sanctioned by the governor in council, are to become the law of the land. That is a very serious departure from anything that has been done or attempted in this parliament heretofore and I hope the minister, before he asks the House of Commons to commit hara-kiri so far as its functions are concerned and, with respect to marketing legislation, to turn over the whole business to occupational groups to be subject only to the approval of himself and his colleagues in council, will consider where that tendency, that particular step, is going to land this country in the matter of its legislative enactments.

The other day I was pointing out that in other parts of the world certain tendencies are at work which are wholly subversive of political institutions, for instance, the tendency in Russia where parliaments are ignored and the matter of legislation left to the regulations of occupational groups to determine according to their self interest, regardless of the people as a whole who may nevertheless be vitally affected by much of the regulatory legislation there enacted. There is the further tendency in Italy, Austria and Germany where one individual or a group that has authority for the moment may take advantage of that authority to say what the regulations are that are to govern. Both of those tendencies are wholly subversive of all that British parliamentary institutions stand for, and yet by this legislation we are being asked to endorse each of these two tendencies. We are being asked first of all to allow the making of certain laws to be left in the hands of self interested class groups and to leave to an interested minister to say whether or not their particular scheme is to be approved. If I wished to take up the time I could quote from this volume paragraphs which state that in any case where any matter of a judicial or quasi-judicial character is left to a minister for approval, care should be taken to see that the minister to whom the matter is left is not a minister of the crown who may by any chance be interested in the particular subject that is being brought before him. But this bill provides that the Minister of Agriculture shall be the one to settle whether a scheme affecting certain occupational groups, namely, for the most part those having to do with agricultural matters, shall be approved.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not to settle that entirely. That is subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know that, and it is a very nice way of evading the point.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That was a straight statement. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman cannot appreciate one. I was not evading anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I meant nothing offensive. The minister is a little sensitive.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not at all, except as to the use of the word "evading."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me explain what I was going on to say. Last week when we were discussing this matter an effort was made on this side to find out who was to be the minister in charge of the administration of the act, we were then told by a member of the cabinet that it was almost a certainty it would be the Minister of Agriculture. Now, when I say that the minister who is interested should not be the one to be determining the question whether a scheme shall be approved, my hon. friend says that the question of who the minister shall be is not yet determined. I say that that is evading the point. If the word is offensive, I am quite prepared to withdraw it, for I did not intend it as such.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): From what the right hon. gentleman said last, I do not think he and I are discussing the same problem. What I stated was this: I said that the question whether a scheme was acceptable or not was not settled by the minister administering the bill but was subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to accept what the minister says as to the scheme being subject to the approval of the governor in council, but the scheme has to be proposed to a certain minister, the minister administering the legislation, and it is he who makes the recommendation for its approval to the governor in council. If one were to follow the directions of the royal commission which has been accepted by the British government as governing in matters of this kind, it would be regarded as an erroneous course of procedure, to leave the determination in the first instance of matters affecting all classes to a minister who was interested more particularly in the concern of the one class which has in its hands the drafting of the scheme.

May I point out again that this scheme so-called, and all that goes with it, everything that is set forth as a regulation, is to be what we term the law of the land; it is the law that is to govern, and those who run counter to its provisions will be subject to penalties in the nature of either fines or imprisonment. How is that law to be made? Is it to be made as the ordinary laws of this country are by members chosen under some elections act with all the safeguards of the franchise and other machinery of an elections act to ensure that those appointed will represent all classes in the community? Or is it to be framed to ensure that only one class will have the say as to what the law is to be? To realize the situation you have to read only this clause: it is simply the interested class who are to make the law; no other class is to have a look-in.

What is the amendment before us at the moment? We have to decide whether there is to be a poll not of the entire producers in a community or of all classes in the community but of one interested class. In supporting or opposing the amendment the choice is to lie between whether we will countenance the making of a law with a poll rather than without a poll of an interested occupational class, namely those of the particular rather than of the general interest involved. That is something this house should not be asked to countenance. The other day reference was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to what he thought was a parallel case. He spoke of the practice followed with respect to local option and asked me whether with regard to local option the same kind of thing did not take place. I pointed out to him that under local option everyone in the area, whether he was a teetotaller or the opposite, had a vote with respect to whether the provisions of a particular act should apply in the locality concerned. The very essence of all our legislation is to see not merely that an interested group but that all citizens have a say with regard to what is to be the law. Would we leave legislation in respect to temperance exclusively to members of the women's Christian temperance unions? Assume for a moment that this parliament were to be asked to turn over to the Knights of Columbus organizations the making of laws with respect to some question which was a subject of controversy in religion. Would this house countenance that for a minute? Assume that the house were asked that a similar procedure should be adopted with respect to some religious problem only, the power to be given to the Orange lodges of this country which represent other religious groups; would we countenance anything of the kind for a moment? Let me ask the same question with regard to the Manufacturers' Association. If we were asked that only members of the Manufacturers' Association should have the right to frame what was to be the law of the land—

Mr. HEAPS: They do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they do it, they have to do it by way of getting a ministry responsible for their actions to come to parliament and present their entire proposal to the house for discussion. What I wish to point out is that there need be no discussion of a public character anywhere of the matters with which these local groups will be concerned. These occupational groups—that is the correct term to use; representation by occupation in the making of laws, not representation by population, if we include in population all classes in the community—are to frame the schemes and turn them over to the governor in council for approval; if the governor in council approves them, then they become part of the law of the land.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Might I ask the right hon. gentleman a question just on that point? I think I see his point although I cannot agree with its application. I quite agree, as he has said, the bringing in of the scheme and therefore the question of passing regulations is being confined to one class, but is it not true that the regulations will be imposed only upon that same one class and will not affect the general community as a general law would do?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You cannot impose regulations on one class without their affecting all classes. My hon. friend has been long enough in parliament to know we are all members one of another in any community so far as anything of vital importance is concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: In just the same way as the tobacco manufacturers and growers were members one of another.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend feels so keenly why does he not bring in a bill?

Mr. MacINNIS: My right hon. friend would not vote for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is he going to leave it to the tobacco growers to settle for themselves what the law is to be?

Mr. MacINNIS: It was left to them for nine years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not left to them for nine years. That special legislation may not have been introduced in this parliament to deal with that specific occupation may be true, but it does not signify that parliament was not free at any session, or that my hon. friend was not free at any session, to introduce any bill he wished and have it discussed. What we are proposing now is to do away altogether with discussion in parliament, to say that parliament shall have no voice in the matter. That is the point. Those who are supporting this measure are supporting a proposal that what is to be the law of the land, so termed, shall be something framed by interested occupational groups, and only subject to the approval of the governor in council; not subject in any way to the approval of parliament. I am not going over the ground further, but I submit that hon. members cannot, consistently with their duties as representatives of all classes in the community, subscribe to legislation which goes that far in depriving parliament of its sovereignty, and in doing away with what is rightly understood as the law of the land.

Mr. NICHOLSON: For some weeks now we have heard this general discussion regarding the manner in which the functions of parliament will be abrogated if we pass this legislation delegating the authority of parliament to some organization outside of parliament to do something that parliament wants to have done. The whole question comes back to this: Do we or do we not desire to provide means by which the primary producers in this country may get together to work out methods by which they shall get the ultimate value of the product they produce? My right hon. friend has read at length from the report of a royal commission presented I understand to the British parliament in 1932. He states that the British government has accepted the principle laid down in the report as the basis upon which future legislation might be enacted. I have before me the act finally passed by the parliament of Westminster on the 18th of July, 1933, dealing in the main with the very question that this house is now dealing with or has been trying to deal with, that is to say the marketing of agricultural produce. It is different in this sense, that in the main this act deals with importations, because of necessity the United Kingdom is largely an importer of such produce, but it also deals with the production of agricultural products of every description and the sale of these products in the United Kingdom. It provides:

> Subject to the provisions of this section, the board of trade, after consultation with the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries and with the Secretaries of State concerned with agriculture in Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively, may make an order regulating the importation into the United Kingdom of any such agricultural product as may be specified in the order, if it appears to the board, after such consultation as aforesaid,—

Now all the difference between the principle laid down in this preamble and the principle of this bill is that the board of trade acts instead of the marketing board. The minister remains the same, namely the Minister of Agriculture, with the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland. What follows.

(a) that there have been, or are being, taken all such steps as are practicable and necessary for the efficient reorganization, by means of agricultural marketing schemes or schemes under this act, of those branches of the agricultural industry in the United Kingdom in whose interests the order is made; and

(b) that without an order under this section the effective organization and development of the said branches of the agricultural industry in the United Kingdom under such schemes as aforesaid cannot be brought about or cannot be maintained;

Now who is it that puts these schemes into effect? Is it the parliament of Westminster? Do the House of Commons and the House of Lords sit and work out these schemes in detail, or are they delegated to some other authority?

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by the foregoing subsection, an order under this section may regulate the importation into the United Kingdom of the agricultural product to which the order relates, by determining for any such period as may be specified in the order—

(a) the quantity of the product, or of any description thereof, which may be imported;

(b) the descriptions of the product which may be imported.

Let us pass on—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before leaving that, my hon. friend is reading what I am pointing out is lacking in this measure, namely that there are certain statutory limitations by parliament as to what the particular board to which he is referring can do. The board is confined by parliament in the manner which is there set forth. You do not find anything in this act which sets out in a broad way within what limits the governor in council and these boards have to act.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The authority is vested absolutely in the board of trade and the minister. Now the board of trade is not parliament. It is true that the secretary of the board of trade is a member of the cabinet, as is the Minister of Agriculture, and to that degree the secretary of the board of trade and the Minister of Agriculture are the heads of these two organizations. But let me repeat what I said at the beginning; the board of trade stands in the place of the marketing board so far as this country is concerned. We have no institution comparable with the British board of trade. Read through this act from beginning to end—I am not going to weary the house by attempting to do so—and it will be seen that the powers set out in the marketing act before us, Bill No. 51 with these amendments are virtually, so far as production and sale are concerned, identical with the powers in this act passed by the British parliament on July 18, 1933.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

At this point let me say that this act of the United Kingdom gives power to limit the class and kind and quantity of every description of agricultural produce that may be imported into that country, and the marketing of agricultural produce of Canada so far as export to the United Kingdom is concerned is impossible without some enabling legislation of this character. But may I go on:

(4) Any expenses incurred under this section by the board of trade for the purpose of regulating the importation of an agricultural product into the United Kingdom shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

You notice that any expenses incurred by the board of trade—not parliament—for the regulating of importations shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament. The importation of agricultural produce into the United Kingdom is regulated by orders enforced under the foregoing sections.

Then it provides for the descriptions of the product which may be sold and the quantity. Let me come to another provision.

3 (1) The Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries and the Secretaries of State concerned with agriculture in Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively, acting in conjunction, . . . shall appoint a committee for the United Kingdom, which shall be called, and is in this act referred to as, "the market supply committee."

(2) It shall be the duty of the market supply committee—

Not the board of trade or the minister, but the committee appointed by these two, to do what?

—to review generally the circumstances affecting the supply of agricultural products in the United Kingdom and to make recommendations to the said minister and secretaries of state as to any steps which ought, in the opinion of the committee, to be taken for regulating that supply, and, in particular, to give to the said minister and secretaries of state advice and assistance in connection with the discharge of their functions under this part of this act and to report to them on the operation of any order in force under this part of this act and of any arrangements made for controlling the importation of an agricultural product into the United Kingdom.

What we are trying to do, or at least what I conceive this bill is trying to do, is to provide a means by which the exporter, the man who produces and sells his products in this country, will be given the same machinery to protect himself that the importer has in the United Kingdom. I continue reading:

The appointing authority—

And that again is the president of the board of trade—

—may pay such remuneration to the chairman and other members, and to the secretary, officers, agents and servants, of the market supply committee, and such other expenses of the committee, as the appointing authority, with the approval of the treasury, may determine.

A great deal has been said with regard to parliament delegating power to an outside authority with regard to penalties. There are penalties all through this act, not imposed by parliament itself but provided for the violation of regulations made by the board of trade, the minister, the market supply committee or any other agent. Let me read just one:

Every person who produces any article in contravention of the provisions of a development scheme made in pursuance of subsection (1) of this section—

Subsection 1 is simply the provision by which schemes may be worked out by the committees or boards appointed by the minister.

Mr. NEILL: What section is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am quoting from section 5 of the British Marketing Act, at page 483:

Every person who produces any article in contravention of the provisions of a development scheme made in pursuance of subsection (1) of this section shall be liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds and an additional fine not exceeding the value of the said article, or, in the case of a second or subsequent offence, to both such imprisonment and fines, and every person who obstructs a person in the exercise of any powers conferred on him by virtue of paragraph (c) of subsection (4) of this section shall, for each offence, be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds.

Mr. NEILL: Will the hon. member allow me to point out that he is dealing with development schemes for organizing the secondary product? It has nothing to do with the act before us.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I heard my hon. friend make that statement before. In relation to this act both the primary and the secondary product deal with the same thing; the secondary product is merely the processing of a primary product, and every particle of the powers involved in connection with primary products is extended to the secondary products.

Mr. NEILL: That is part 2 of the act, a separate part.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that perfectly. Frankly I have not been able to give sufficient time to this bill to know whether it is part 1 or part 2, but whether the bill is divided into several parts or is in only one part the principle involved is the same. The principle laid down in the act is simply that parliament delegates to an authority outside of parliament the power to do those things parliament wants done. Today the question for us to decide—I am not going to read further from this act—is whether or not parliament desires to make it possible for the primary producers in this country to get into a position they have not been in previously, by which they may market their products and receive something like a real return for them. That is the question. As you go out through the country and see what is happening, the need for something like this is driven home to you.

It has been said that parliament is divesting itself of every vestige of its authority in passing an act of this kind, which sets up some organization to do the work parliament wants done. I take it that parliament will assemble here again; the constitution compels parliament to assemble once a year, and parliament can undo anything that should not have been done. Parliament can amend this act; new regulations and provisions can be introduced when parliament meets again. All this talk of violating the constitution, tearing up the Magna Charta and all that sort of thing is simply drawing a red herring across the trail. It just comes back to this, if I may repeat: does parliament desire—as for my part I desire—to put into somebody's hands power that will make it possible for the primary producers to market their goods in an orderly fashion in order to get the best they can out of those goods? If we make a mistake in some clause or paragraph this session we can change it next session.

Let me say this, Mr. Chairman: If it is necessary to change the constitution of this country; if it is necessary to write a new Magna Charta in order that the primary producer may be protected to some degree at least, let us get busy and do it. But I do not believe it is necessary. I do not believe that any of the consequences that have been predicted are going to come about; in my judgment they have been suggested merely as a means of casting doubt and suspicion on the honesty of the minister in presenting this bill.

Mr. TURNBULL: A few evenings ago, in answer to this very same argument by the right hon. leader of the opposition, I quoted to the committee some of the sections of the wheat board bill of 1922. The answer of the right hon. gentleman was that even if those sections were in that act, two wrongs did not make one right, and he argued that even though such provisions were in some other bill that did not make them right in this bill. I will quite agree with him in that if he will agree that what he did in 1922 was wrong, but if he agrees that what he did then was wrong he will have to make his protest against 125 other acts on the statute books of this country.

I do not want to go back over the wheat board bill again, but if I understand the argument of the right hon. gentleman he says the difficulty is that parliament is not making these regulations, that they are being made by an interested class, and that other classes in the community may not be sufficiently protected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that my point is that there is a difference between statutes and regulations. Regulations are wholly secondary things, but by this act they are being elevated to the position of statutes, and that is what I am taking exception to. You cannot make the law of the land in that way.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my right hon. friend will read the Combines Act, which he quotes so frequently and in connection with which he takes such credit to himself—and rightly so—and if he will turn to section 40 of that act he will find that this section provides for regulations, not made by parliament but to be published in the Canada Gazette, which regulations shall have the same force as if they formed part of the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but in accordance with some provision of the statute. In this case the regulations are not to be in accordance with certain provisions that definitely set out the lines along which these local bodies are to regulate. They may do anything.

Mr. TURNBULL: All regulations must be in conformity with statutory law. You cannot have regulations that supersede a statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend read the provisions of this act which set forth what the regulations may or may not contain?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. TURNBULL: You never saw any section of any act setting forth what the regulations might or might not contain. It is the regulations themselves that set forth what they may contain. This act speaks generally; the regulations are for the purpose of arranging for a scheme of marketing certain primary products. They must contain regulations in that regard but no regulations ever set out in an act the details that they must contain. Parliament gives authority to certain bodies to prepare regulations which under certain circumstances become the law of the land. You have that in the Combines Act You have that in the Seeds Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has referred to the Combines Act. Is there any clause in the Combines Act where any local body may make regulations to govern only in a local district rather than a regulation that will apply to the whole of Canada and be applicable to every citizen of Canada?

Mr. TURNBULL: There is no clause in the Combines Act where local bodies can make regulations applying to local districts. Neither is there in this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes. That is the essence of this act.

Mr. TURNBULL: Will my hon. friend content himself for a moment or two? There is nothing in this act that provides that a local body can make regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is provided for in the very section that we are now discussing.

Mr. TURNBULL: It is not the local body at all that makes the regulation, and that is where my right hon. friend is going astray. What the local body does is to prepare and recommend regulations. That is all. And after they have prepared and recommended the regulations, if they are approved by the minister and the governor in council, they will become the regulations not because a local body prepared them but because the governor in council approved them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend this question? Do these regulations become applicable to all parts of Canada when approved by the governor in council or apply only to the locality named in the scheme that is presented?

Mr. TURNBULL: They apply only to the locality named in the scheme that is described in the regulations. If the regulations say that they apply only to Saskatchewan, they apply only to Saskatchewan, just as my hon. friend's regulations in the Seeds Act so provided. In the Seeds Act it was provided that certain classes of seeds could not be sold unless the people who sold the seeds were licensed by some licensing body, and under regulations not made by parliament but by somebody else. The Seeds Act also provided that certain seeds could not be imported. There was a restriction on the importation of seeds from one geographical area to another in this country. The Seeds Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1923, chapter 185 of 1927, provides by section 3:

> The minister may appoint an advisory board which may at his request prepare and recommend to him such regulations as it is of opinion should be established under this act and may make regulations prescribing
>
> (e) the geographical areas which for the purposes of this act shall be designated as Northern, Central, or Southern, to indicate zone of production for those kinds of seeds described by regulation.

Parliament is not going to make these regulations. They are going to be made by the minister himself, and he did not have to submit them to the governor in council, and he might have been a farmer at that. The Minister of Agriculture, as a matter of fact was a farmer, a self-interested farmer, as my right hon. friend suggests of the present minister, and he was going to make regulations with respect to seeds and the people who were planting seeds and growing them. There is no difference between the two. I do not say it was wrong because the minister of that day happened to be a farmer, and my right hon. friend went a long piece when he talked about the minister making regulations in a matter in which he was personally interested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is not being fair. I took good care to say that I was quoting from the report of the royal commission which considered that feature and stated that a minister of the crown who belonged to a particular interest should be very careful not to be the one entrusted with any discretionary power in regard to matters of decision under an act specifically related thereto. I was not reflecting on the present minister in any shape or form. I have just as high regard for him as my hon. friend has. I was simply stating a general principle which appeals to the common sense of every member.

Mr. SHAVER: Will my right hon. friend permit a question? Does he think it would be better to have a lawyer administer this act rather than a farmer?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The parallel would be this. If the matter were one affecting the legal profession I would say that it would be quite wrong to have a lawyer given the discretionary say in the matter at issue as against other classes of the community.

Mr. TURNBULL: I would like to know if my right hon. friend when he was quoting this statement from the royal commission report that a self-interested minister should not administer the act, was quoting it with approval or disapproval. If with disapproval why quote it at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was quoting it with approval, certainly.

Mr. TURNBULL: Now we have it. If he was quoting it with approval, then the Minister of Agriculture, if he happens to have a farm and is therefore self-interested, should have no connection in an administrative way with anything connected with the farming business. There is no escape from the logic of that, and a labour man should not administer the Labour department, as one of my colleagues suggests.

The Seeds Act provided geographical areas and zones, and the regulations were made by an advisory board. Parliament did not know what the regulations were going to be or who the advisory board was going to be. Parliament did not know who the minister was going to be for more than so long at a time. Yet nevertheless my right hon. friend's own government put the bill through in exactly the same terms that he is condemning now with such heat and such violence. What has happened since 1923 to make the change?

When we talk about restrictions on importation under this act I would ask hon. gentlemen to look at section 13 of the Seeds Act, which provides:

> No person shall import into Canada for the purpose of selling or offering for sale for the purpose of seeding any seeds which are below the minimum percentages of germination prescribed by regulation for seed of the kind, or which in any other way do not conform to the standards under which seeds or plants of the kind may be sold for seeding purposes in Canada under the provisions of this act.

It goes further and provides penalties for the breach of that sort of thing. Parliament did not know what the regulations were going to be. Parliament did not know who were going to be penalized for breaking the regulations. It was content to leave all that in the hands of the advisory board and have it O.K'd by the minister.

But in this bill we have gone further. We say that people who know a particular branch of trade they are dealing with may prepare and recommend regulations, and when these regulations are prepared they are then submitted to the minister, and if with the assistance of the officials of his department he finds that they are workable he approves of them. Then they go to the governor in council, and the governor in council speaking for the other classes of the community, representing all classes in Canada, considers those regulations that have been prepared by a class and approved by the minister, changed or unchanged as in his discretion he thinks they ought to be, and the governor in council representing the people of the whole country and the interests of all the other classes of the community approves the regulations if deemed fit. They must be approved by the governor in council before the licences are issued.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: May I ask my hon. friend if it is provided in the Seeds Act that a poll shall be taken of the interested growers before the regulations shall apply?

Mr. TURNBULL: Certainly not, but there is a provision for licensing, and a provision that no person shall:

> sell, offer, advertise, expose or have in possession for sale for the purpose of seeding or planting in Canada, any agricultural or garden vegetable seeds or plants described as a new kind or variety of such seeds or plants with a name that was not in general use for such purpose in Canada between the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, and the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, unless such person has first obtained a licence so to do from the minister.

That applies to the farmer who wants to sell these things too. He must be licensed, and his trade is restricted under the provisions of that act.

Going back to the Combines Investigation Act, there is power in that act—I am not quarrelling with it—practically to destroy a man's business upon the report of an investigating officer. It provides that when it appears from the result of an investigation made under the provisions of the act or from a number of other sources mentioned to the satisfaction of the governor in council, that as regards any article there is a combine, and if it appears further with regard to that article that the combine is assisted in any way by any tariff duty that may be in existence, the governor in council may wipe out the tariff duty altogether even though the effect might be to destroy the man's business. They took that power and it is perfectly right to have it, and they might not only destroy the business of the individual engaged in the combine, but if they took off the tariff on certain lines of goods they might destroy the business of every other man engaged in the production of those goods and who might be lawfully carrying on his business. And nobody suggested at that time that the business of parliament was being improperly taken from it or that Magna Charta was being violated or that the Bill of Rights was being overthrown or that anything was being done which parliament should not approve because the governor in council was doing it. These things must be done by this parliament if business is to be done in this country. There is no possibility of passing all kinds of bills which have the effect of regulating trade and commerce unless there is provision in those bills for regulation, and provision in those bills for regulations to be made after the bill is passed, and provision for the publication of those regulations and provision for the regulations having the force of law, although not passed by parliament but drawn up by various bodies and approved by the minister or the governor in council and then becoming the law of the land. I do not know what is the reason for all this opposition to a bill of this particular kind. This bill follows the same policy, the same practice and the same rules which have been followed in this parliament for very many years. I know hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to find a soft place into which they can fall on the third reading of the bill. They are spending their time trying to make the people believe that they are putting up a great fight to get a bill which will operate. The other day the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) said that he knew there was an emergency but he wanted to make this bill as good a bill as he could to meet the emergency. That was not what he said when he got up and declared that he was paired and had he voted, he would have voted against there being any bill at all. That is not a vote for the best bill for an emergency, it is a vote against having a bill of any kind. What has changed the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite this last week or two? Possibly the letters they have received from home; or possibly they saw the Ontario Grower with its headline "Magna Charta or forty cent butter fat." This change may be due to the statements in that paper which reported that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his two hour tirade, said a great deal about liberty, the rights of parliament, and the Magna Charta. I am not quoting his exact words, but that was their meaning. He did not give a single instance of what might or what might not be done by this parliament to benefit the agriculturist and help the primary producer; they were all forgotten. But during this last week or two, strong opposition to this bill has been put up for the purpose of making the people believe that our hon. friends opposite are curing the defects of the bill and are making it workable. Let us forget all this sort of stuff; let us forget this political stuff and let us take into consideration the fact that the primary producer has not had a show for a great many years. Let us give him a break. Let us put through this bill and see if we cannot get the prices of primary products somewhere into line with the prices of secondary products. If we can reestablish the relationship between the prices of primary and secondary products we shall have gone further to end this depression than we could by doing anything else I know of. Why not get down to business and do this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order that my hon. friend may not misrepresent what I said or what was in my mind at the time I spoke on the question of matters of judicial or quasi-judicial decisions which are made where ministers are involved, I shall read from page 115 of the report of the royal commission to which I have referred. They make the following specific recommendations with regard to judicial or quasi-judicial decisions such as would have to be made where a scheme was accepted and where all the parties to a scheme may have a voice:

> We, therefore, make the following specific recommendations:—
>
> I. Judicial, as distinct from quasi-judicial, functions should normally be entrusted to the ordinary courts of law, and their assignment by parliament to a minister or ministerial tribunal should be regarded as exceptional and requiring justification in each case.
>
> II. Where parliament considers it necessary to depart from the normal course, it should entrust the judicial functions involved in the legislation to a ministerial tribunal rather than to the minister personally. The appointment of such a tribunal may be left to the minister, but the tribunal should be independent of him in the exercise of their functions. In regard to the more important jurisdictions so set up, the Lord Chancellor should be consulted before appointments are made.
>
> Assignment to a ministerial tribunal rather than to the minister would clearly be right in any case where it appears likely that the minister (in which word we include any officer of the department acting under his orders) would be likely to be precluded from acting as a judge by the kind of departmental "interest" described in paragraph 3.
>
> Judicial functions should not be entrusted to the minister personally unless there is some very special and exceptional reason for that course and even in that event not where there is "interest" of the kind last mentioned.
>
> III. Quasi-judicial decisions fall naturally to ministers themselves and not to courts of law or ministerial tribunals. But in any exceptional case in which it appears probable that a minister may be disqualified by an "interest" of the kind last mentioned from discharging impartially the judicial functions involved in the quasi-judicial decision, parliament should consider the desirability of dividing the decision and entrusting the judicial functions to a ministerial tribunal whose adjudication would be binding on the minister when in his discretion he completes the quasi-judicial decision by administrative action.
>
> IV. Before the decision is given, whether it be judicial or quasi-judicial, each of the parties to a dispute should be given the opportunity of stating his case (not necessarily orally) and also of knowing the case which he has to meet and of answering it if he can.
>
> V. Every minister exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial function and every ministerial tribunal exercising a judicial function should give the decision in the form of a reasoned document.
>
> This document should be available to the parties.

In making this quotation I am anticipating somewhat what is provided for in some of the other sections of this bill, but which very properly come in for consideration at this moment because they have to do with the power of making and determining offences. I am bringing up the matter at once because it relates immediately to giving certain legislative powers to local bodies and then subsequently judicial or quasi-judicial power to the minister and the governor in council. There is no provision made for the protection of the rights of persons who are not of the group of producers responsible for particular schemes. They may have their licences taken away if they do not abide by decisions with respect to regulations made, and there is no opportunity to appeal or even of being heard by way of protest. There is no reasoned argument given as to why one man should be treated in one way and another man in another; the whole matter is left to be dealt with in the arbitrary fashion to which reference already has been frequently made.

Mr. BURY: To what exactly does the right hon. gentleman refer when he speaks of judicial or quasi-judicial powers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mean the power to license and to subject a man to fine and imprisonment if he does not conform to these regulations.

Mr. BURY: That is not done by the minister or the board; it is done by a court.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Long before a court can have any say in the matter, this law gives authority to a local group or to the board or the Minister or their agents to license or take away a licence. You bring a man to ruin when you take away his right to carry on his own occupation, and this is here being done before he is even accorded a right to be heard.

Mr. BURY: I am just dealing with one objection raised by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King). He states that this bill gives judicial or quasi-judicial powers to the minister, and I am asking where such powers are given. He answers that they are given because fines and penalties can be imposed upon producers for breaches of the regulations, and I am pointing out that those fines and penalties are not imposed by the minister, and that in the imposition of them the minister does not exercise any judicial or quasi-judicial function. The judicial or quasi-judicial functions that are exercised are exercised by a proper court of law in the ordinary ways of legal procedure. If his reference is to the regulations, they are not judicial or quasi-judicial; they are legislative or in the nature of legislation. They are not judicial functions at all. As the right hon. gentleman knows very well, there has been a very clear cut and intentional distinction made between the legislative functions of government and the judicial functions which are entrusted to a separate body which is independent of the legislature. As far as regulations are concerned this whole country is filled with bodies having the power to make regulations over a limited area and to those regulations are attached the sanctions of imprisonment and fines when breaches occur. The whole country is filled with just such bodies as that. One of the right hon. gentleman's great objections to this whole scheme of legislation is the fact that it is giving to local bodies the power to make legislation for the whole country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, my point was just the opposite, namely that the regulation was not made for the whole country, only for localities.

Mr. BURY: The point raised by the hon. gentleman was that it was quite improper for fines and imprisonment to be attached to breaches of regulations which did not apply to the whole country. As I said a minute ago, this country is filled with bodies to which have been given the statutory power to make regulations. They are made without reference to any minister and there are attached to them as sanctions fines and imprisonment. Notwithstanding the passage which he read from Magna Charta, people are paying fines and going to prison for breaches of laws that were never made by this parliament and could not be made by this parliament, and of regulations, that were not even made by provincial legislatures.

Mr. GRAY: Can the hon. member suggest any act passed by this parliament under which the regulations do not apply as a whole throughout the dominion?

Mr. BURY: I did not say any such thing. I said that the purpose of this legislation was to give the producers or marketers or the producers and marketers in certain localities the right to make regulations that shall govern themselves.

Mr. GRAY: That is what my leader is pointing out.

Mr. BURY: He said more than that. He said that it was a breach of the constitution that, to the breaches of these regulations, there should be attached fine and imprisonment, because there should be no fine or imprisonment attached to any law or regulation that was not universal over the whole of Canada; and I am pointing out the fact that there are statutory bodies all over the dominion which have the power of making regulations or by-laws to which by fines and imprisonment have been attached.

Mr. TURNBULL: With regard to the question raised a moment ago in connection with the Seeds Act, chapter 27 of 1923, I would point out that the regulations made by the minister thereunder are to apply in certain areas only.

Mr. GRAY: But there is a uniform penalty in the area.

Mr. POULIOT: I listened with interest to what my hon. friend from East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) said about the judicial and legislative powers of the board.

Mr. BURY: I did not say that the board had any judicial powers.

Mr. POULIOT: Very well then. My hon. friend said that the board would have legislative powers to be approved by the governor in council. I will not discuss that any further because it is admitted by the hon. gentleman. On the other hand, he assumes that the board has no judicial powers. There are some regulations to be made by the board and they are submitted to the minister for approval; the minister approves them and they become the law of the land. These regulations are passed and approved with a view to being respected, and who will see that they are respected if it is not the board? The board will have legislative power subject to the approval of the governor in council, and at the same time it will have the judicial power of imposing fines by virtue of these regulations.

Mr. DUPRE: The board does not impose fines.

Mr. BURY: The board has no power to impose fines, but it has the right, which any private citizen has, to lay a charge for the breach of regulations and the fine will be imposed precisely in the same way as it might be imposed following any charge brought for the breach of a city by-law.

Mr. POULIOT: Is there any mention in the bill that the complaints will be laid before district magistrates or justices of the peace? There is no mention of that in the bill as it is mentioned in the criminal code.

Mr. TURNBULL: Yes; the offender can be fined on summary conviction, which brings the offence before a justice of the peace.

Mr. BURY: I would refer the hon. member to section 14 which reads:

> Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence—

That is a statutory offence created by the act when it is passed.

> —and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than $25 and not more than $500, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for his explanation. According to his view, the board has legislative power—

Mr. BURY: No.

Mr. POULIOT: It has no legislative power?

Mr. BURY: The board has the power of suggesting regulations which are submitted ultimately to the governor in council, but they become law only through this act.

Mr. POULIOT: Does my hon. friend find some analogy between the regulations of this board and the regulations for example of a municipal council? It is entirely different and my hon. friend will understand why. The reason is that trade, everything appertaining to trade, comes within the purview of the parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman knows that the provinces have nothing to do with regard to the regulating of trade; this is a matter that belongs to the Canadian parliament. And there is a very good reason for that. That reason is that all regulations governing trade ought to be uniform throughout the country; they should be the same from one part of Canada to the other. There must therefore be uniformity in these regulations, and that is why trade comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal parliament. If it were under the jurisdiction of the provinces we might have nine different kinds of regulations or orders with regard to trade. It was therefore very wise on the part of the fathers of confederation when they decided that all matters relating to trade should be under the jurisdiction of this parliament. I hope my hon. friend will agree with me on that. I maintain that the government is giving away all the rights of this parliament with regard to trade. It is delegating these rights to outside bodies called boards. These boards, which by the law of the land must be under the jurisdiction of this parliament, will have these powers conferred upon them, and this I submit is absolutely ultra vires. The Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister and all the members of the cabinet realize this, and perhaps that is why we find in the last clause the provision that if one or two clauses are found to be ultra vires this shall not affect those provisions that are not ultra vires. This means that after the government submitted the bill to the law officers, they found a nigger in the woodpile; it is feared that some at least if not all the sections of this bill will not stand in the courts of the land. The government, realizing that the provisions of the bill are ultra vires, say, "If we cannot have some of the sections maintained before the courts, then we hope the others will stand on crutches." Sir, this legislation is utterly wrong, because trade comes entirely within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. Parliament is supreme in that regard. The provinces have no right with respect to trade, and when the government says that the federal board will deal with the provincial boards, it is absolutely ultra vires.

It is most dangerous because in this country there are many people who say: We do not care about the British North America Act; we shall attach no importance to it; we must change it. The Prime Minister has said to the house that we should change some sections of it. I have no objection to that provided that when he mentions the changes that are to take place, he at once states what sections he wishes to change. Otherwise people will entertain the view that the whole act must be changed; that one must pay no attention or respect to it and it must be completely disregarded. I maintain that whenever the leader of the government or any member submits to the house a proposal of any kind to the effect that there must be a change in the British North America Act he must immediately plainly mention what changes should be made and why. I stand by the law of the land as it is now. If a change is to be made it should be made first and then legislation which cannot be passed now because it would be illegal and ultra vires, might be passed if the British North America Act, our constitution, is so amended that such legislation can be passed. That is a very humble view, but it is sincere. In these times of stress and unrest, when people disregard the law, we in this house have no reason to give them any opportunity to entertain such opinions and to preach such errors, because I maintain that this is an error. The government knows this bill is wrong from a constitutional point of view, and if we on this side stand by the constitution it is because we stand by the law of the land and we want what is now our obligation, what is now the law of the country, to be respected. We want no change to be made to any law which is framed in accordance with the British North America Act until the latter act is amended so as to provide for such a change. This is very clear.

When my right hon. leader spoke about the rights of parliament I am sure that the idea he desired to convey was that in this country with regard to trade we must have only one law from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the United States border to the north, in order that all the people who have anything to do with trade may know what the law is, and that when a man from Nova Scotia wants to trade with another in British Columbia he will know the law in that province is the same as in Nova Scotia and they can trade on equal terms. But if we have barriers created in this country by boards of different kinds so as to prevent internal trade, then we shall suffer more than we do now. That is why I maintain that this legislation is wrong; and I am sure every member of the cabinet knows that, the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister more than anyone else. Why do we have to argue so long about the matter? Our stand is right; we stand by the constitution of Canada for the reasons already given. How long will this legislation last? It will last maybe two months, three months, until it is brought before the courts of the country and then it will be declared to be ultra vires. If the government appeals from such judgment to the privy council I am sure the men who sit there and the men who sit on any bench in Canada, as soon as they read these sections which are so broadly drafted, will say: This will not stand for a minute before us; this law is ultra vires. I do not want to anticipate the judgment of the courts, but my view is supported by the fact that the last paragraph of the amendments reads thus:

> 22. If it be found that parliament has exceeded its powers in the enactment of one or more of the provisions of this act, none of the other or remaining provisions of the act shall therefore be held to be inoperative or ultra vires, but the latter provisions shall stand as if they had been originally enacted as separate and independent enactments and as the only provisions of the act; the intention of parliament being to give independent effect to the extent of its powers to every enactment and provision in this act contained.

That is what I have said, and the ministry realize it themselves because they are inserting this amendment in the bill. Before they spend money to engage counsel before the courts we as one, from this side, tell them that they are wrong and must change the legislation entirely; that it will be inoperative because illegal.

Mr. NEILL: My modest amendment has rather been lost sight of in the wider range the debate has taken. We might as well return to it. The minister has not expressed his approval of it and I imagine in that case he will use his majority to vote it down. That of course is quite in order, but I am sure he is too courteous to do so without giving his reasons for not favourably considering the arguments I have advanced. We have the precedent of Great Britain persistently and definitely laid down that a poll shall be taken in all these matters. We have the precedent of New Zealand which says the same thing in very clear, drastic and pronounced language. Those, so far as I know, are the only two British countries to which we can look for a precedent in that regard and we might well do so. When I was speaking an hour ago I quoted a gentleman from British Columbia representing the fruit industry who had expressed himself as in favour of a poll being taken. Since then I have found a letter from another gentleman connected with the dairy industry in the Fraser valley, and this is what he says:

> The British act provides for the setting up of marketing schemes either by the producers or by the government itself. Either scheme must be submitted to a vote of those affected.

So it is quite evident that people in British Columbia representing the fruit and dairy industries, while not actually asking for a poll, are quite agreeable that a poll be taken of those interested in the scheme. Since then I have had some surprising evidence put into my hands. Many members especially those from British Columbia, well know that some years ago we experimented with an act of this kind under provincial legislation; it was passed on March 20, 1929, and by the way, under the auspices of a Conservative government.

Before I proceed with the question of polling, I find in this provincial act a matter that I would like to call to the attention of the leader of the opposition. I have had time to give it only a cursory inspection but in it is laid down the exact extent and limit of every power of the board. This would meet a number of the objections of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the title of the act?

Mr. NEILL: The Dairy Products Sale Adjustment Act. It is an act for the relief of dairy farmers. It worked well but it fell down because of being declared ultra vires on account of conflicting dominion jurisdiction. So that they did not give legislative or quasi-judicial powers to any of these boards; they could not go beyond the four corners of the act. Then they absolutely arrange for a poll. The poll is not exactly along the lines of the British requirement, but it does require sixty-six per cent of the persons interested. Very definitely and decidedly it requires a poll. So there you have Great Britain and New Zealand, the only two countries who have passed this legislation, though in a much simpler and more limited form, and British Columbia with their legislation, with which they were perfectly satisfied and which worked well, all arranging for a poll. I think the minister should in justice to himself and this committee tell us why he will not accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. NEILL: No, Mr. Chairman, we will stay here until summer if necessary. Surely the minister is not going to be so discourteous as not to reply to that question. Is there anything unreasonable in my request?

Mr. DUPRE: We are now on the amendment to the amendment whereby the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) wants to replace the two words "or may" by the two words "but shall."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the subamendment carry?

Mr. NEILL: No, Mr. Chairman; wait a minute.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I may say for the benefit of the committee that we have given a great deal of thought to this matter, and in our study in connection with the drafting of this bill have traversed the points that have been raised this afternoon. To compare this bill with that of Great Britain or New Zealand is not fair. The position here is different. The factor of the various provincial jurisdictions has created perhaps the most difficult problem.

Mr. NEILL: It is like British Columbia.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member refers to British Columbia. If the primary producers in British Columbia wish to submit a scheme in conformity with the provisions or conditions laid down in the Dairy Act of British Columbia—I believe that that is what he refers to—they are at perfect liberty to do it. But if in the province of Quebec the producers in dealing with their particular industry wish to take another course, and that course is approved by the provincial government, I do not see that we should set up a barrier here that might make it more difficult for the government of any province to give effect to the wishes of the primary producers in that province. We have gone over this matter very carefully. Again may I repeat that the aim has been to make this bill as flexible as possible so that the provinces and the producers therein may be free to use their own judgment to work out whatever scheme they feel is in the best interests of the producers, and that we shall be free to cooperate with that board. This bill makes a poll optional. I do not feel myself that it was necessary. I feel that under the scheme they submit they can provide for a poll or not as they wish.

Mr. McINTOSH: Under the section as we have it now it remains with the minister to say whether or not a poll shall be taken, does it not? It is not left to the producers to decide. I asked this question last week and if I remember correctly the minister made the statement that he would not object but would leave it to the producers. He left the impression with the committee that the producers were against the poll. I argued that the producers are in favour of a poll. If the producers want a poll will he refuse it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret if I gave the hon. member the impression that I felt they were not in favour of a poll. I feel that the bill as prepared, even without this amendment, left the producers free under the scheme submitted to state whether they wish the poll or not.

Mr. NEILL: May I interrupt to ask how it can be ascertained whether the producers want a poll or not unless they are given a poll?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): All in favour of the subamendment will say "aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Contrary will say "no."

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The subamendment is lost.

Mr. NEILL: The ayes have it.

Mr. HEAPS: Before the amendment is carried: earlier in the afternoon I asked who would be entitled to vote if a vote were decided upon. I recognize the difficulty of the situation that may arise when a certain group or industry wishes to come under the provisions of the act. There is nothing in the bill to define who is entitled to vote when a vote is decided upon. In the fourth line of the amendment it says: "or may require that a poll be taken." Taken by whom, of whom? There can be so many different kinds of polls and so many methods of having a vote that I think parliament has a right to know the method the minister has in mind when he decides that a vote is to be taken. For instance, it may be only the producers in the industry that will be in favour of a vote. As a concrete example take, the tobacco growers: supposing they petition the government to come under some scheme, who among the tobacco growers will vote? I cannot imagine that anyone outside those interested in the industry will be entitled to vote. I believe that under the bill now before us we are setting up a form of economic councils within industries. When the tobacco industry is being considered I do not expect the apple growers to vote. Therefore in spite of the objections that have been taken I still feel that it is proper that a particular economic group shall have the say as to the form of organization and the future course that the industry shall take.

Then will the vote be limited to Canadian citizens? In an industry you may have half a dozen different nationalities. We have no indication from the government as to that. Will companies be entitled to vote, or will it be determined, for instance, by quantity of production? In a given industry in which 500 people may be engaged, perhaps ten out of the 500 may have more than 50 per cent of the production; will those ten have more say than the rest? I think these points ought to be clarified, otherwise I would prefer to see the clause stand until something is put in to determine who shall have the right to vote when a vote is decided upon.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the beginning of his remarks the hon. member touched upon the difficulty when he said that these schemes will have to be set up under so many different conditions. The basis of the whole bill as far as these schemes are concerned is to give the producers themselves the fullest possible opportunity to set out what they think is in their best interests. They will be able to suggest the best and simplest way of taking a poll, also who will be entitled to vote, and who will be exempt. In a scheme for the dairy industry, for example, a man with only one or two cows might be exempt from its operation. I have every sympathy with hon. members in the difficulties they see here, because as I said we have experienced the same difficulties, and it is to meet these conditions that we have left the bill as flexible and open as possible.

Mr. HEAPS: I realize that in a country so vast as Canada and with so many different conditions appertaining, a certain amount of flexibility is essential in a bill of this nature, but I think we are stretching the point a little too far when we say we cannot determine here and now who will be entitled to vote and who shall come under the scheme.

Mr. LOUCKS: The producers themselves.

Mr. HEAPS: You cannot have the producers in each locality determine to what extent they are going to come under the scheme; that would be almost impossible. The regulations should be set up by parliament as a guiding principle; they should be defined here by the minister so that we may know how the thing will start. If there is no guiding principle as to how an industry shall come under the act I can see more difficulties being created for the department that administers the act than would arise if the act was changed. So I think it would be advisable to lay down in the bill certain guiding principles stating who shall be entitled to vote and so on.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that we change the word "scheme" to "sub-legislature," because these people are going to be given power to make all the laws they like.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is just one point which has not been mentioned in regard to the amendment proposed by the minister. As the minister has said, it will be largely left to the producers themselves in their submitted schemes to say whether or not a vote shall be taken and how that vote shall be carried out. This goes a little further, however; upon receipt of a report from the board recommending the approval of a scheme as constituted or amended by the board, the minister may recommend approval thereof; or in lieu of recommending approval, if he is not satisfied that those applying are representative of the industry, for example, or if the scheme does not suggest a vote, the minister may provide that a vote shall be taken. Then it is no longer a matter of the producers having said whether or not a vote shall be taken; if the minister is not satisfied that those who present the scheme are truly representative he, not the board or the producers, may state that a vote shall be taken, and he may lay down the conditions under which that vote shall be taken.

It seems to me that this clause providing for a vote is supplementary to the presentation of the scheme, so as to provide that if the scheme does not ask for a vote the minister may have a vote taken to satisfy himself that the applicants are representative of the commodity produced. In that case it might be well if some conditions were laid down as to the number of voters required, the percentage needed and so on.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to say just a word with regard to who should vote. The question whether or not that is supplementary does not help at all to solve the question who should vote if there is to be a vote.

Mr McINTOSH: We may not have a vote.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, there might not be a vote, but the answer given by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Speakman) that this is supplementary, apparently, to his mind, seemed to do away with the necessity for defining who should vote. I want to submit to the minister that surely he and his staff, the government and this house, can decide better than a number of growers in a district as to who should vote, and I think that should be done before this bill goes through. That is my submission. It may be that we are facing great difficulties, but surely it is easier for us to solve those difficulties than it is for the people in the locality to do so when they are confronted with all the difficulties and differences that may and I think are bound to arise in an attempt to work out a scheme such as this.

I just want to refer the minister to the fact that in other cases of local control we have votes. For instance, in regard to whether or not a drainage scheme shall be installed in a certain locality, a vote is taken. The legislature that gave the authority to take that vote says who shall vote. If a local assessment such as a sidewalk is to be constructed, surely no legislature would think of omitting to define who shall vote on the question of whether or not that local improvement shall be proceeded with. I think that is absolutely a parallel case. Then take the matter of building restrictions; the local legislature defines who shall vote on a question of that kind, and the same thing applies to the way the affairs of a school section are run. Do you suppose any legislature in the land ever left it open to the people who came to the meeting to decide who should or should not be the electors? There can be no question about it; if you propose to have a vote at all you must define who are to be allowed to vote. You are simply creating uncertainty and difficulty otherwise, and increasing the opportunities for friction. It may take a little time and labour, but surely this is the tribunal to decide that matter, and I think it should be decided before this bill is passed.

Mr. HEAPS: I have supported this bill all the way through and intend to vote for the third reading, but I do want to see a workable bill presented by this parliament to the people of Canada. I feel that if we adopt this clause as it reads now we will simply shelve the responsibility and put it upon some local community.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): We are on section 5, subsection 3.

Mr. HEAPS: Just prior to the adjournment we were discussing the question who would be entitled to vote in the creation of these boards for those who wish to come under the scheme. So far the minister has not been able to give to the committee very much information on that point. I regard the administration of the act as of the utmost importance. I desire to see that this measure once it is adopted by parliament shall become really effective and be of value and benefit to those whom it is intended to serve. But if the provisions respecting the administration of the act are too loosely drawn up; if the law is not placed on a proper basis, I have grave fears as to the outcome of the legislation itself. I regard the administration of the act as almost of more importance than the act itself, because the benefits the producers may derive from it depend entirely upon how the act is administered. One of the important features of the act is the creation of these boards, and naturally some importance must be attached to the question who is entitled to vote on these schemes that are to be proposed to the central authorities.

I can understand the position of the minister when he says that a certain amount of flexibility is required in the drawing up of this measure on account of its experimental nature, but undoubtedly the minister has given considerable time and study to how the act is likely to be administered and the way in which the boards are to be created, and he has not yet given the committee the benefit of his continuous research into the provisions of this measure.

Just prior to six o'clock I pointed out how many different angles there are to the question of who is entitled to vote. There is no definition in the bill itself of what constitutes a poll; at least I have not been able to discover it. Perhaps it may be done by a show of hands, perhaps by secret ballot, perhaps by mail or some other means. Up to now we have had no information from the minister as to what he regards a proper definition of the term poll.

If this clause is to operate on the basis of the method suggested by the minister it is quite possible that a meeting will be called. How that meeting is to be called I cannot say; who will be authorized to call a meeting I do not know. Let us assume for a moment that a meeting is called in a schoolhouse in some agricultural community and that seventy-five or a hundred people attend the meeting. You might well have seventy-five different opinions as to who is entitled to vote on the scheme. Somewhere a guiding principle should be laid down so that the people who come to the meeting will know for what purpose it is called; otherwise you might have a large number of men and women attending the meeting and desiring to come under the act, and then, after considerable discussion and deliberation, going away without anything definite being done. I think there should be something definite in the act in regard to those who are entitled to vote and the methods of holding a poll in certain given districts. It would improve the act considerably and would allow those whom the act is intended to benefit to meet with some knowledge beforehand of what they intend to discuss.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In that respect this act is the same as the British act, and evidently to a certain extent for the same reason. The hon. member asks why we do not state in the bill who shall vote and who shall not. It is the producers who submit a scheme after giving it careful consideration who are in the best position to recommend who shall be exempted from the scheme, and those who are exempt would not necessarily have a vote. Outside of that, every producer within the area defined would have a vote. What the hon. member is asking us to do is this: He wants us to decide in this committee who shall be exempt from the operation of a scheme proposed, let us say, by the tobacco growers of Ontario, or in connection with the dairy industry; whether a man should be exempt if he had two milk cows, or three or four; and the same thing in connection with the lumbering industry. It might also apply to the fish industry. I am sure the hon. member is sufficient of a business man to realize that it is impossible for us to take up the time of the house in this committee in an attempt to do that. This matter has been given very careful consideration and I think it will appeal to the good judgment and common sense of everyone that it would be impossible for us in this committee to go into all these matters in detail. The British act, realizing the same difficulty, deals with the matter in a similar way. The scheme submitted might deal just with export or interprovincial trade.

If it will be of any assistance to the hon. member I would say that in my judgment when the producers submit their scheme they will state in it who are to be exempt and the conditions upon which producers will be exempt. Then after full consideration they ask for a poll, and if the majority vote is in favour of the scheme, the whole scheme will be published and everything in connection with it will be known. So that the difficulty my hon. friend feels might arise in a meeting in a schoolhouse would be avoided because what they were coming to discuss would be known to everyone attending.

Mr. HEAPS: What would the minister call a majority?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I stated before, my opinion is not worth any more than my hon. friend's at the present time. That is a matter that would be submitted to the governor in council and it would depend to a certain extent upon circumstances. But I would say this, that the more substantial the majority, depending upon the conditions that are to be met, the more likely the scheme would be to proceed without difficulty. What I have had in my mind since starting work on this bill is that there should be at least seventy-five per cent of the producers and controlling seventy-five per cent of the production. As a matter of fact we have had representations by certain producers advocating eighty per cent, and they feel they would have no difficulty in getting eighty per cent to sign in favour of a certain scheme. That is one of the reasons why I decided to drop the question of percentages. If we stated sixty-six and two-thirds per cent as a minimum there would be a tendency on the part of producers who submitted schemes to say: "Why try to get any more because this is the minimum you set?" If we set the limit from sixty-six and two-thirds per cent to eighty-five per cent, those who did not want to enter the scheme would say: "Why did you set eighty-five per cent if you did not mean it?" That would make it possible for the fifteen per cent to defeat the purpose of a scheme. After full consideration of this matter my own opinion is that there would be no danger in leaving this clause as it is. We are not committed to accepting what they recommend, but in each case—the conditions are different—we will have the benefit of their judgment. As I stated before, I feel it is better to leave it open and deal with each case on its own merits.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: Would every producer in a locality have to come in on a scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He would have to come in.

Mr. YOUNG: He would have no option.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under this arrangement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If a geographical area is laid out and seventy-five per cent of the residents engaged in production in that area sign or vote for the setting up of a scheme, then the other twenty-five per cent would be forced to come in and would be subject to all the provisions. Am I right in that deduction?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, if the scheme is approved.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a beautiful scheme. I just want to see you put it into effect once.

Amendment agreed to.

On subsection 4—Conditions.

Mr. YOUNG: Will this mean that a scheme will not operate where the whole product is sold within a province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Subject to provincial legislation.

Mr. REID: That would not interfere with a natural product which was being marketed fifty per cent within a province and fifty per cent without a province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 5—Particulars.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that the words "as approved" in the first line of this subsection be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph (a) agreed to.

On paragraph (b).

Mr. DUPRE: I move that this paragraph be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(b) the proposed scheme in sufficient detail, including arrangements for a poll, if one is proposed, and for organization and administration under the supervision of the board to enable consideration of the expediency thereof.

Mr. YOUNG: Explain.

Mr. DUPRE: It is in the printed amendments.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is to conform with an amendment to a preceding subsection.

Mr. YOUNG: Who is proposing the poll, those who are going forward with the scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: They will decide whether there is to be a poll held.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They may propose it but they will not decide it.

Mr. YOUNG: If they propose a poll they will also outline who is to vote in the poll?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That will be submitted in the scheme.

Mr. YOUNG: The scheme will outline who is to have a vote and who is and is not to be brought under the scheme; is that correct?

Mr. McINTOSH: Who will decide finally whether the producers are to have a vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The governor in council.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not like this; I think it is ridiculous. If you are going to force twenty-five per cent of any population to come in under a scheme proposed by seventy-five per cent, then for heaven's sake have a poll. I propose that you strike out the words "if one is proposed" in the second line of the amendment. There would then be a poll, whether or not the minister decides to have one. Surely minorities are entitled to some protection, and I am sure they will need protection if this thing goes into effect.

Mr. YOUNG: I cannot see the use in having a poll if those who want a scheme are going to decide who is to vote. They would certainly disfranchise those whom they did not want in.

Mr. McINTOSH: My impression is that if it were decided definitely that the producers must have a poll, the danger of having a minority would be minimized. There would be a possibility that the producers would all come in. If you are going to eliminate a poll or have the governor in council say whether or not there is to be one, you will be bound to have minorities and you will be bound to have trouble.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like to know what the minister thinks of the idea of letting those who want a scheme decide who shall or shall not be allowed to vote.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Because of the disturbance I could not hear everything the hon. member said. The producers will submit a scheme with reference to a poll, and this scheme may or may not be approved. If they wish a poll, they will set out in the scheme how that poll shall be conducted.

Mr. YOUNG: It seems to me under this bill the producers could submit a scheme and decide that if a poll were taken those engaged in marketing could not vote. On the other hand, those engaged in marketing could submit a scheme and provide that if a poll were taken, the producers could not vote.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no compulsion to accept any scheme that is proposed.

Mr. YOUNG: There is no compulsion to reject it.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. TOTZKE: Would the minority of producers opposed to a scheme be entitled to a vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think there would be any necessity for that, because no scheme would be put into effect if there was any doubt about the majority wishing it.

Mr. NEILL: How do you find out?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Each case would be dealt with on its merits. For example, if a scheme were made known and the signatories were of such a number as to leave practically no doubt that it was unanimous, there would be no necessity for a poll.

Subamendment negatived.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I say this in conclusion—I have said it on more than one occasion, but it is so important that I will repeat it. The producers are in favour of a poll; there is no question at all about that. Now, if it is undisputed that they are in favour of a poll, then it follows that there must be opposition from the department or on the part of the governor in council, and I wish to know just why such opposition has been pressed to the point where a poll is refused. For instance, the producers made it perfectly clear to the minister himself, I understand, that they wanted a board voted into existence by the growers. In face of that declaration why are they not to be allowed to vote the board into effect?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): More than one opinion has been expressed and no one is in a position to say what the general view of all the producers is with regard to all the different commodities. If the submission were made in the scheme that there should be a poll, there is no doubt about it that the poll would be granted.

Mr. McINTOSH: In other words, the minister's argument is that he is not sure whether they want the poll or not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It might not be necessary to go to the expense of having a poll if we could satisfy ourselves that one was not necessary.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister can approve of the scheme without asking for a poll—under this legislation.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Paragraph (c) agreed to.

On paragraph (d).

Mr. VALLANCE: This paragraph has to do with the geographical limits. Who is to define those limits?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The producers in submitting a scheme will define the limits, as in the British act.

Mr. VALLANCE: Suppose the wheat growers of Saskatchewan ask for a poll to set up a board. Can they go beyond the confines of that province and include Alberta and Manitoba?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand the question to be this—that if a sufficient number of wheat producers submitted a scheme and wished to do so, they might include in the area both Alberta and Manitoba. That would be submitted to the provincial governments because they are the only ones, I understand, who have authority over property and civil rights.

Mr. VALLANCE: So that they could not go beyond the confines of the province.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The other day the Minister of Justice made the opposite statement. He said that anything that was interprovincial or international came under the jurisdiction of the federal authority.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Moving between provinces after the local board is set up.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Take the supposition put forward by the hon. member for South Battleford. Suppose Saskatchewan decided to submit a wheat scheme; could that scheme take in Manitoba and Alberta? Could they do it without the authority of the other two provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme to be submitted only by the Saskatchewan wheat growers?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes. Could they under this act force the wheat growers of Manitoba and Alberta to come under it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say not.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The Minister of Justice the other day said that if the marketing of the commodity were interprovincial or international it came solely under the jurisdiction of the federal authority. Could the growers of Saskatchewan come here, in the absence of any legislation by the other provinces, and force them into the scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not into a scheme for Saskatchewan.

Mr. YOUNG: Suppose Saskatchewan came forward with a scheme for all Canada. Suppose some farmer in that province devised a scheme and brought it here to take in the marketing of wheat all over Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A petition like that would not be entertained.

Mr. BROWN: A day or two ago I asked the minister whether under this bill it would be possible for a group to define a certain area around a city like Winnipeg, say, in the marketing of milk, and exclude all others from that territory. The minister answered no. Now this paragraph declares that if the scheme is to relate only to the product of a part of Canada, the geographical limits shall be defined. That would make it perfectly possible for those dealing in milk in a territory around a city—what has been called a milk shed—to exclude all others from that market.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no provision for those outside the area in which the scheme has been proposed to be shut out of the market in Toronto or Montreal, for instance. If a scheme is submitted and the geographical limits are defined, the people within that area must have combined to regulate the marketing of their products; but there is nothing in this act to give them power to prevent anyone outside that limit from marketing his product in the same market.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can the geographical limits go beyond the boundaries of any one province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A subsequent subsection deals with that point. If in Ontario an apple board were set up, and in Nova Scotia and Quebec similar boards were set up, the three might for further organization submit a scheme whereby the area could be extended to include the three provinces in one.

Mr. YOUNG: Then every scheme must in the first instance be confined to the province in which it originates.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. YOUNG: What then? The minister said a minute ago that if different schemes originated and were put into effect in different provinces, they could be amalgamated later.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: If that is so, then Saskatchewan would have to work out a wheat marketing scheme, Manitoba would work out another and Alberta another and then they could combine later. Is that the idea?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In practice I would say that what would happen would be this: instead of each of the three provinces working out a scheme, they would combine and submit the one scheme which would be uniform.

Mr. YOUNG: Would that apply to the whole dominion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not necessarily.

Mr. MITCHELL: If you had three distinct organizations in different provinces, how would they market, let us say wheat? Would they market as individual organizations, independent units, or through the dominion board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Even if they marketed as independent organizations they would all be under the supervision of the dominion board, and in such a case I would say that the three would find it to their interest to combine; in fact, their interest would suggest that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The scheme in each case would originate within the provincial jurisdiction. There might be three provincial organizations marketing the same product. They would apply to the board for authority to amalgamate the three bodies for the marketing of that product. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Correct.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs (e) to (g) inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph (h):

Mr. YOUNG: This paragraph states that the scheme shall name the chief executive officers. Does that mean that they are to appoint the men who are to do the work?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the position.

Mr. YOUNG: It is some position. I would like to have one.

Mr. BROWN: The officers are to be nominated and elected before the scheme is approved by the governor in council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No; the scheme is to state whether there is to be a chairman, or what the position is under it.

Mr. YOUNG: The words are that the scheme shall name the chief executive officers.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is it the idea that appointments to the dominion board shall be political appointments?

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate the hon. member's asking the question. I think he fully realizes that because the matter is put into the hands of the producers themselves, they should be more interested in their product than in any political appointment.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand as to the local board, but I was speaking of the dominion board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the naming of the dominion board it is needless to say that entire consideration would be given to those best fitted to serve the interest of the primary producers.

Mr. BROWN: Under the civil service commission.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (i) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6, subsection 1—Notice of approval of scheme.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest that the word "forthwith" be inserted. I have known these matters to be kept back for six weeks and they ought not to be. I will not press this to a vote. If the minister cannot see the appropriateness of it, I have nothing more to say. Surely it is wise that notice of approval should be made public forthwith.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of the bill is to introduce these schemes and to facilitate in every way the wishes of the producers who submit them. I do not see the necessity of the word "forthwith" because the whole purpose is to expedite putting the scheme before the people who are to vote on it.

Mr. NEILL: The people who are to vote on it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I mean the people who are interested in it.

Mr. NEILL: Some of the people who are interested in a product will get up a scheme and apply to the governor in council for approval. There is no vote taken. It is a hole-in-corner process from beginning to end. Then notice of approval is to be put into the Canada Gazette and the minister objects that it be put in immediately.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no objection to putting in the word.

Mr. NEILL: Then I will move that the clause read:

The minister shall give public notice forthwith—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Shall forthwith give public notice.

Mr. NEILL: I want the notice put into the gazette forthwith. I move that the word "forthwith" be inserted after the word "shall" in subclause 1 of clause 6.

Amendment negatived.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2—Scheme to have force of law.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why is the main marketing board "a body corporate" and the local board "a body politic and corporate"? What is the distinction ?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that there is much distinction in the meaning.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why should they not be made the same?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no reason why they should not. What is the other clause that declares the dominion board a body corporate?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Section 3, subsection 6, describing the board—which is the main board, the dominion board—provides that:

The board shall be a body corporate and shall have power for the purposes of this act to acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suggest that we strike out the words "politic and" in section 6.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is my suggestion.

Mr. DUPRE: To make it clearer I move:

That the words "politic and" in the last line of subsection 2 of section 6 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the object of making them a body corporate?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In order that they may have legal entity as a corporation and the usual corporate rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does that include the right of making by-laws and enforcing them by penalties?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would say it does unless it is restricted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In other words what we are doing with the producer is to make him subject first to the laws of this parliament; second, to laws passed by the governor in council; third, to regulations and laws passed by the central board; fourth, to the regulations of the local boards, which are to be laws, and in addition to all that he is still further to be subject to the by-laws which this body corporate is going to pass. He is going to be very free!

Mr. GUTHRIE: The local boards will be able to pass regulations, but subject ultimately to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will be interesting to the producer to discover where he is going to be in advance in regard to his knowledge of the law and his rights under it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A man who refuses to go into this scheme will be in a very happy position, subject to all the laws of the seventy-five per cent and liable to be sent to gaol if he infringes them, although he is opposed to the whole business.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, that is the principle of the measure.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On section 7, subsection 1.—Board to continue to have authority.

Mr. DUPRE: I move:

That subsection (1) of section 7 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers for a period of two years and for such further time as the governor in council may authorize.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before that is passed may I call attention to subsection 5 of section 4.

Whenever a local board has been authorized to exercise any of the powers of the board, the board may authorize such local board to act as its agent to collect the charges or tolls imposed;

Then:

Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.

In a former part of the act it is provided that they shall have power to exercise their authority until the governor in council cancels it. There is a conflict between the two.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is only providing a limitation of two years. Previously there was no limitation.

Mr. YOUNG: It says a minimum of two years.

Mr. DUPRE: Yes, and for such further time as the governor in council may authorize.

Mr. YOUNG: Suppose it falls down on the job and does not function the second year; what is going to happen then?

Mr. DUPRE: It disappears. When it is gone it is gone.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They stay in the scheme.

Mr. MICHAUD: Speaking of this suggested amendment, do I understand that a local board may be the provincial marketing board, constituted under provincial authority?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not necessarily. It might be so constituted and named as a local board.

Mr. MICHAUD: Suppose such a board, constituted under the provincial authority, is named by the governor in council as a local board I understand that such authority continues for at least two years. But if they are dismissed, or their powers are revoked by the provincial authority, what will happen then? Will they continue to function as a local board recognized by the dominion authority, although at the same time they have no standing under the local marketing act?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say no.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not what the act says.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is an important point. Is there any provision in the bill for such a contingency? Suppose the provincial marketing board's authority is repealed by the local house, how does the federal authority propose to meet that situation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have no power.

Mr. YOUNG: You will wait until the two years are up?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it disappears it disappears.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It remains in suspended animation.

Mr. YOUNG: Meantime what will happen to the crop?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is rather remarkable in view of the fact that you do not require a poll before setting up a scheme, but before it can be revoked you have to have a poll.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only if there is a poll when it is set up.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As you have it in the amendment a poll is compulsory befort revocation can take place.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only when it is created under a poll.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. GRAY: I suggest that the point raised by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) is one of the most vital points raised to-night. I think the amendment proposed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) should be seriously considered before the committee passes it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of the amendment was to give stability, and because it was felt that a board, especially one set up after a poll, would require two years' operation—or at any rate it would be an advantage for it to have two years—to become stable. If hon. members feel that the amendment does not add anything or is not essential, it will not be pressed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Shall the amendment to subsection 1 carry?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Unless there is some very good reason for the amendment personally I would prefer the clause as originally drawn. I think we may be involved in difficulties hereafter if we are not careful. I prefer subsection 1 of section 7 as originally drawn, unless there is some very good reason of which I have no knowledge for changing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amendment to the amendment submitted now is wholly inoperative.

Mr. DUPRE: It may be preferable to withdraw the amendment; I withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. ELLIOTT: While this is still under consideration may I direct the attention of the minister to the fact that under subsection 1 of section 7 every local board established continues to have authority to exercise its powers until such authority is withdrawn by the governor in council. Apparently that is a positive statement. The board continues to operate until the governor in council withdraws its authority. That does not agree with subsection 5 of section 4, which states:

> Whenever a scheme for regulation by a local board has been approved, the board may authorize the local board to exercise such of the powers of the board as are necessary for the proper enforcement of the scheme of regulation—

Mr. DUPRE: That has been amended.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the extent of the amendment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is now subsection 2 of section 4.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But it remains unchanged.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The change there takes away from the dominion board the power to withdraw all the powers given a local board.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then the two sections clearly contradict one another. By old subsection 5 of section 4, now subsection 2, the board may authorize the local board to exercise certain powers, and at any time may withdraw from the local board the authority to exercise any or all of those powers. That wipes it off the slate. Under the section now being considered we have something quite contradictory:

Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.

If it is intended to retain the provision in subsection 2 of section 4 giving the board the power at any time to withdraw from the local board the authority to exercise its powers, then it should make that exception in this subsection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How would it be to include the words, "subject to the provisions of subsection 2 of section 4"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But subsection 2 of section 4 gives the dominion board authority to delegate certain powers to the local board, while subsection 1 of section 7 tries to give the powers to the local board. I think the same objection we took to the amendment moved by the Solicitor General applies to the section as it appears now in the bill. The section reads:

Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.

Obviously that could only apply to that authority conferred upon the local board by the dominion board or by the governor in council.

Mr. DUPRE: I think that is correct.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid the hon. member for Vancouver Centre does not get the point I am making. Under subsection 1 of section 7 it is perfectly clear that the only power to withdraw authority from the local board is in the governor in council, but under subsection 2 of section 4 there is a similar power vested in the dominion board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not a similar power.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The board may withdraw any or all powers from the local board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: For certain purposes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is right. Now I submit that unless the amendment suggested by the Minister of Justice is included, you have a conflict between the two sections.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to revert to the point raised by my hon. friend. Subsection 2 of section 4 is the section which delegates a certain amount of federal authority to the local board, and therefore there is a positive assertion which refers only to the powers conferred by the dominion board upon the local board. Then subsection 1 of section 7 states that the local board shall continue to have that authority, which is being given to it by the dominion board, until such time as it is withdrawn by the governor in council. To my mind one is the authority creating the agency while the other is the authority asserting the actual power of the local board.

Mr. BURY: Under subsection 2 of section 4 the powers that can be withdrawn from the local board are not the powers mentioned in that subsection but any or all of its powers.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, it makes it perfectly clear that what my hon. friend has suggested is not the intention. The section states:

—the board may authorize the local board to exercise such of the powers of the board—

That is the local board.

—as may be necessary for the proper enforcement of the scheme of regulation, and may at any time withdraw from the local board authority to exercise any of its powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under the interpretation section the board is the dominion board.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; read it.

—and may at any time withdraw from the local board—

So there need be no inference as to what is intended.

—authority to exercise any of its powers.

When it withdraws from the local board authority to exercise all of its powers that local board is stripped of power as completely as it is possible to be. Then under section 7 power can be taken away only by the governor in council.

Mr. STANLEY: I may point out that the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) is not reading subsection 2 of section 4 as it has been amended. It reads:

Whenever a scheme for regulation by a local board has been approved, the board may authorize the local board to exercise such of the powers of the board as are outlined in this section and as may be necessary for the proper enforcement of the scheme of regulation, and may at any time withdraw from the local board authority to exercise any of its powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before the subsection is carried I want to object on another ground, Mr. Chairman. I raised my objection some time ago. It now reads:

Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.

The local board is obviously possessed of other authority which we in this parliament have not the right to take away from them. I submit that it should read:

Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise, subject to the provisions of this act, such powers as are expressly conferred by this legislation until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.

Mr. MICHAUD: There might be some local boards constituted under this act which received no authority whatever from provincial boards. Evidently this would refer only to such boards because they would be the only boards over which this parliament would have authority. Notwithstanding the fact that it does not say so in the section, apparently these are the boards which this section claims to control.

Subsection 1 of section 7 agreed to.

On section 7, subsection 2—Petition to revoke a scheme.

Mr. GRAY: What is a representative number, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To be determined in the same manner as taking the poll.

Mr. GRAY: Where is there anything relating to the number required to take a poll?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I said to be determined in the same manner as taking a poll.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsection 3 agreed to.

On section 7, subsection 4—Revocation or approval.

Mr. DUPRE: I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, to amend this section by inserting the following as subsection 4 and renumbering the present subsection 4 as subsection 5.

(4) If a poll was taken in connection with the establishment of the scheme, a poll shall be taken before the scheme is revoked and the minister shall state the necessary percentage of votes favouring revocation to warrant further consideration of the petition.

[Mr. Stanley.]

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection 4 as amended agreed to.

On subsection 5—Revocation or approval.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand that before a scheme can be revoked there must be a poll taken, and yet no poll need be taken to set up a scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only in case a poll has been taken to establish it.

Subsection 5 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Approval of proposals for extension, amalgamation, and new local boards.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This section reads:

Whenever the governor in council is satisfied, on the recommendation of the minister, that a majority of the persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product so require, he may approve of a proposal—

Why "a majority" in section 8 and "a representative number" in section 7? Why not, for exactness, use somewhat similar language in both sections?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): These people are now organized.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I doubt if the committee has caught the full significance of this clause. Up to now it has been the majority of the producers who have had to say whether a particular scheme was to be imposed on the minority, but this clause gives the minister power to impose a scheme on the majority without the majority having any say whatever. It says:

Whenever the governor in council is satisfied, on the recommendation of the minister, that a majority of the persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product so require, he may approve of a proposal for,—

In other words, the minister simply says to the governor in council that he is of opinion that the majority require that these boards should be extended and the scope of operation widened, and any regulation thus widened or extended becomes the law by order in council without the majority even having to approve the minister's action. Is not that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is the same in that respect as the previous one. The minister administering the act would have to be satisfied that there was a majority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This just says, when the minister believes that "a majority of the persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product so require." The minister, not the majority, settles what the requirements of the majority are. In other words, the whole purpose is gradually to slip away from the authority of the majority through local boards and give the sole direction to the minister over a majority in a large area.

Mr. BURY: Surely the words "so require" mean that positive action has been taken by the majority. It is not merely stating the minister's mind, but when the minister is satisfied that a requisition has come in from a body of people whom he believes to be a majority—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not what it says.

Mr. BURY: That is what it does say. It says: when the minister is satisfied that a majority require, and "require" means that they have put in a requisition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does it say that?

Mr. BURY: It says so in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read it.

Mr. BURY: I will read it, but I thought the right hon. gentleman had read it himself:

> Whenever the governor in council is satisfied, on the recommendation of the minister, that a majority of the persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product, so require—

I take that to mean, have so requisitioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then let us say it that way.

Mr. BURY: They cannot require without asking.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move, Mr. Chairman, to substitute the words "have so requisitioned" for the words "so require."

Mr. MacLEAN: Why not make it seventy-five per cent of a majority?

Mr. GUTHRIE: How would it do to say "have required in writing"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all right.

Mr. McINTOSH: Why not give them the vote and they will soon settle it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that for the words "so require" in the fourth line the words "have so requisitioned" be substituted. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has suggested that we should use the words "if required in writing" and that is equally acceptable if the minister prefers that his amendment should go through.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Otherwise we would have "have so requisitioned" for "so require."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I withdraw my amendment because I think "so require" is just as effective as "have so requisitioned."

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King) negatived.

Mr. ILSLEY: The difficulty I see is to determine the area within which is this majority. It does not clearly mean the majority of persons subject to an existing scheme. It may possibly mean the majority of persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product in Canada. I should like to ask the minister what this means, the majority of what persons and in what area?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In any proposed area.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why use the word "majority" in section 8 and the words "representative number" in section 7? Why not use the same terms in both sections?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): These are organized bodies representing different areas and the minister must be satisfied that the majority are in favour.

Mr. ILSLEY: That means clearly a mere estimate of the minister, because he proposes to take in any area. That area may be the rest of Canada outside of the area under an existing scheme and he must proceed then only upon the requisition of the majority of the persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product in that area. How is he going to determine whether or not the majority in that area is in favour? The answer the minister gave a while ago was that these people are now organized, but it is quite apparent that they are not organized. The majority may not be organized and there may not be any provision for having a poll.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister explain under what circumstances it might be necessary to invoke paragraph (d) which reads:

> the creation of a new local board to regulate the marketing of a product already subject to regulation by one or more existing local boards,—

We have a product which is now regulated and two local boards are being set up. It goes on:

—provided that the existing local board or boards approve and that the powers of the new local board can be exercised consistently with the exercise of the powers of any existing local board or boards.

We are to have two boards operating side by side and then the minister comes in and creates a new local board, not to take the place of the other two but to support and coexist along with them and regulate them. Then we have the provincial marketing board and the dominion marketing board. What circumstances has the minister in mind to require the need of that subsection?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I illustrate? If there is already a regulated product, say apples, in Nova Scotia, there may be a local board there and similar boards in Ontario and British Columbia. If the three boards submit a scheme and it is considered sufficiently representative of the producers, then a local board can be set up by choosing say one representative from each of the local boards already in existence. This local board would cooperate as one body, in this case perhaps for the work of export.

Mr. NEILL: Would not that be the jurisdiction of the dominion board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not necessarily.

Mr. NEILL: That board deals with exports.

Mr. YOUNG: Could there be two local boards operating in the same territory?

Mr. NEILL: Three.

Mr. YOUNG: Could there be several local boards operating in the same territory in connection with the same product?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. SANDERSON: Suppose these three local boards could not come to an agreement, what would happen then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would depend upon the circumstances and it might not be thought advisable to set up one board to amalgamate the three.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Minister may propose a scheme.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to strike out this section and substitute the following therefor:

9. Notwithstanding any other provision of this act the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in a natural product is injuriously affected by marketing conditions through the lack of a local board, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing or the regulation of the marketing pursuant to section four of this act of such product in inteprovincial and/or export trade, and the governor in council may approve of such scheme and authorize the board to administer such scheme directly or in cooperation with local boards, or through any agency which it may establish. Such scheme shall continue in force until terminated by the governor in council.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): I have an amendment moved by Mr. Stewart (West Edmonton) that section 9 be struck out of the bill. However, the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre) has moved an amendment which should be considered first, as a direct negative is not an amendment to an amendement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment which has just been moved helps to emphasize what I wish to say about this particular clause. It seems to me that this so called marketing bill is in reality two separate measures welded into one. One measure is based on some theory of economic nationalism while the other is based on some theory of economic imperialism. The one dealing with economic nationalism undertakes to bring into being a number of local boards which will have the approval of the governor in council to regulate marketing within the dominion. As we have just seen by the clause last passed, the process is to start with a local board, have it make certain regulations and then enlarge the scope of those regulations by allowing the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister to make regulations just as wide as possible We come now to a new departure. If no local board has moved in the matter and the governor in council has not taken any steps as a consequence of any local action, the governor in council may be moved into action from some other source or direction. It is this other source or direction which I think needs to be considered in connection with this section and section number 12. Section 12 gives the governor in council the power to prohibit altogether certain importations into Canada and certain exportations from Canada. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding of clause 9 is that it is designed to further not a Canadian marketing scheme but an empire marketing scheme. It is the means whereby under an arrangement that has been come to among certain gentlemen in different parts of the empire we are hereafter to have the products of the empire regulated by some central authority in London which will be either visible or invisible. The reason I feel quite so sure of my ground as I do is this. I have in my hand at the moment a marketing scheme from the imperial point of view as set forth by no less prominent an organ of the empire than the London Times. It all relates to this bill before the house and explains its imperial significance. Several editorials on the subject have in fact appeared in the Times, the first of which was published on April 3 of this year. It is entitled "Planned Empire Markets." It explains how this present bill which is before this parliament and which it says is likely to be the one to create most discussion in this house, is to fit into an empire marketing scheme whereby an arrangement for complementary production and trade is to be carried out within the empire. The editorial of April 3 was followed by another of considerable length on "The Empire and the British market." This appeared in the Times of April 25. There is another one relating to this same subject in the Times of March 14, under the title "The Empire Group", and still another editorial on May 3 entitled "Mr. Bruce's mission."

As we know, the Right Hon. Mr. Bruce is to be here next week, and I have been wondering whether one of the reasons we are not sitting on Thursday of this week, as the house has sometimes done before, and why the business of the house is being protracted as it is, is to enable Mr. Bruce and the Prime Minister of Canada and others to see what further action if any can be taken in regard to empire marketing before the question is finally determined. Let me read a paragraph or two from the Times editorial of April 3: entitled "Planned Empire Markets."

> The Natural Products Marketing bill which the Canadian government has introduced into the federal parliament seems likely to become the principal issue in dominion politics.

It is significant that the London Times had that view before the bill was discussed in this house, because it was well after April 3 before we began the consideration of the measure here. The measure itself was introduced only on the eve of the Easter recess and not given second reading till some time after. The editorial goes on to say how the bill is likely to be received. I quote:

> It provides the framework within which they can organize their own marketing scheme, the success of which will depend upon their capacity for effective cooperation. The wide sweep of the measure has come as a surprise in Canada, and has caused some alarm among business men, especially among those engaged in buying and selling commodities. On the other hand, it is welcomed by the farmers, who are principally concerned, and it appears that most of the provincial governments are ready to cooperate by passing the necessary supplementary legislation. Canada depends upon her primary production, and most of her farmers, like those of Great Britain, seem to have become convinced by recent experience that unlimited competition is incompatible with security.

Then it says that this bill is avowedly modelled on the British measure, though there may be certain features taken from the American experiment in economic planning. It then proceeds:

> If it becomes law and is put into effective operation, Canadian farmers will be organized on the same lines as the British, and the discussion of common problems and the arrangement of satisfactory conditions for mutual aid will be proportionately easier. A similar development seems likely in Australia. Mr. Bruce's experience in London has convinced him more than ever that the economic salvation of the commonwealth, and indeed of all the British countries, depends on the pursuit by the governments of the empire of a concerted policy in trade and production, and not by the governments alone, but also by the leaders of agriculture, industry, commerce, and finance. If however, these leaders are to conclude effective agreements with one another, it can only be as the responsible spokesmen of organized bodies representing the different sections of the national economy.

There you will find the real reason for this bill. It is not the local marketing features that will be really significant as this measure begins to be operative, but the extent to which the production and trade of this country are to be made subject to some enonomic empire planning scheme of which so far as Canada is concerned no one but the governor in council himself will have precise knowledge. Under this section parliament is asked to leave in the hands of the governor in council, without discussion in this house, the scheme which is to govern in regard to production and trade in Canada, a scheme which through the agency of empire government is to form part of a concerted policy in trade and production. It is time that we considered carefully what this government may do with respect to imperial marketing schemes before allowing the government to have the authority given it by this proposal.

I could quote from the other editorials I have mentioned to show that the whole matter is one that has been carefully thought out in London and is undoubtedly worked out in different parts of the empire through the cooperation of interested parties. What I wish to take exception to is not that the ministry should have a plan of empire marketing, if that is what they deem to be desirable, but that they do not come forward and state frankly that such is their policy. I take exception to the fact that under the guise of a bill which purports to regulate production and trade in the interests of the farmers of Canada, the farmers may find themselves eventually in the position where they must discover that unwittingly they have been supporting some thing which gives the governor in council in Canada the power to prevent altogether the exportation of some of their products and equally the power to prevent altogether the importation into Canada of commodities which they may find it very much in their interest to have imported. That is the really serious aspect of the bill, and I submit it is a consideration of which this house should take very full account before it sanctions the passing of section 9.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I must congratulate the right hon. gentleman on his very vivid imagination. I have read the section twice since he began speaking to see whether it was really the clause he had in mind, the clause we drafted in this bill. Behind the drafting of this clause there was certainly not the idea which the right hon. gentleman suggests. I stated, when speaking on the second reading of the bill, that the purpose of this provision was to deal with any emergency, if such were considered to exist, in the marketing of any agricultural products, or to deal with a product that could not be regulated as readily as others—for instance, live stock, which, because of the great range of the country over which it is scattered, creates a difficult situation, with which the dominion board or local board could not deal as it could with other commodities. If we had had last fall the power granted under this section, I believe that to a very considerable degree the difficulty that was experienced in the marketing of cattle would have been met at perhaps no cost whatever to the government.

Mr. YOUNG: How?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some 38,000 head of cattle, many of them not finished for the market, were thrown upon the market with the result that the price of cattle that were suitable for the market was forced down, although no one got any gain thereby, neither the farmer who sold the cattle, because they were not fit for sale, nor the packer, because they were not fit to be slaughtered for food. It might have been easily arranged to have these cattle, by means of a system of credit or by some arrangement in conjunction with the provinces, moved to districts where there was sufficient feed. The farmers in those districts might not have enough money, but if they had been given assistance in the purchase, in the form of credit, they could have marketed their product to much better advantage than they did.

Another instance in which this might be used to a greater extent is illustrated by the experiment we carried out this past fall in the shipping of feeder lambs and ewes from ranges in the west to the farmers of Ontario. It has worked out very satisfactorily. Under present arrangements these ranchers will ship the lambs to the stockyards and pay local freight. Then there are additional charges, handling charges in the stockyard and also the losses that come from keeping stock like that for a number of days in conditions to which they are not accustomed. Then they are bought, loaded and shipped to Ontario, as in this case they might have been, and another local freight is charged. They are shipped to Toronto and left there where further charges are made upon them. Then there is another local freight charge to the farmers in Ontario. I believe that would not happen if that particular industry were organized, but until it is, that is one instance in which I think the marketing board would take the lambs from the ranchers in this way and as we did take them, with one local freight to the farmers in Ontario who wish lambs for feeding, not only saving the farmer a great deal of actual outlay but bringing the lambs to them in better shape. The same thing might be done by the dominion board being the connecting link, if that were necessary, between the provincial marketing board in Alberta or Saskatchewan and the one in Ontario.

Similarly as regards our cattle, it would have saved many dollars to the Ontario people and also to the western people if the cattle had been contracted for under supervision and with a guarantee of quality and grade to the Ontario farmers, and shipped directly rather than through the stockyards, where, no matter what care is taken, farmers have in many cases experienced losses from haemorrhagic septicaemia.

Also with regard to coarse grains a great deal of regulatory work could be done until the industry had an opportunity to organize. At the same time a case like this might arise: In 1930 or 1931, when we were forced to ship our cattle to the United Kingdom and it was necessary, in doing so, to put before the old country farmers the best type of cattle we had to export, there did not seem to be any action taken by private individuals to make such shipments and I was able personally by calling in five or six of the largest ranchers in the west to persuade them even to take a loss, if that were necessary, to fit up certain boat loads of cattle of that type to ship to the feeding farmers in the old land. The ranchers felt at the time that they were going to lose a good deal on this shipment, but as the matter turned out their cattle met with such approval in the old land they netted back to the ranchers in Calgary and Moose Jaw considerably more than they were offered before the cattle were shipped. In that case it was possible to carry that out by making that arrangement. I believe it would have been better if we could have continued to make such trial shipments to the old country, and especially if we have reason to believe they wish live stock of a certain type—and I will take live stock because I have been dealing with it—this board could make points of contact in this way more advantageously than could be done by a great deal of advertising such as is being carried on by other countries.

The same procedure might be carried out in regard to other countries where we felt that we could establish new channels of trade. In that connection I might say that there is and has been for the past two or three years quite a good possibility of this, but no advantage seems to have been taken of it because no person has before him the picture as a whole. I have reference to the demand that could be created in the United Kingdom for malting barley, barley of the malting type. We put on an exhibition there and our barley met with the highest approval by the old country maltsters. They made inquiries but found that no uniform supply was coming forward. Manitoba, Saskatchewan and northern Alberta are particularly well adapted for the production of this kind of barley. I use this simply for an illustration. If we could follow up this exhibition that has been put on from year to year for at least four years—because it had been put on before I took over the portfolio I hold—we could assist very much and perhaps start a new trade to be handed over, if the industry itself did not become organized, to private interests. I can assure the committee that in drafting this bill nothing could have been further from my mind than the suggestions thrown out by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: To my mind clause 9 particularly as amended is one of the most important clauses in the bill and the only clause through which a certain phase of the farmers' marketing difficulties can be met. I much prefer the amendment brought down to the clause as printed in the original bill. In the first place the scheme as suggested under the new clause 9, confined as it is to interprovincial and export matters, as brought forward by the minister himself or by order in council will not come into conflict with the regular local or provincial boards. That, in my opinion, will avoid a good deal of confusion, but there is one phase which is dealt with under the amendment and which I believe is one of the most important in the whole picture. We have referred in the house before to those small exportable surpluses of so many types of farm products which, although small, are able to smash and disorganize the entire domestic price. It is sometimes impossible for the average exporter to get rid of this surplus by exporting it, because he could do so only at a loss, and because the prices in outside markets during certain periods of the year are lower than the Canadian price. The result is that those surpluses remain here and disorganize and bring to chaos the domestic price, even though they amount to perhaps only five per cent of the whole. Where such a situation exists, not only is the minister empowered through order in council to bring into effect a scheme to take care of export matters, but the dominion board is, under this amendment, empowered to act as that exporting agency or to appoint an exporting agency. In other words, it provides the machinery through which this small exportable surplus, be it cattle, hogs, dairy products, eggs or what not, may be taken off the domestic market, thus stabilizing it; and if and when losses are involved by export it will provide that the entire trade may contribute to make up those small losses. That to my mind is very important; without it the bill would fail of at least half its purpose. I heartily approve the amendment as brought down.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I regret that I have to disagree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) with regard to the amendment. I think there is ample provision in the bill for the board to handle all the matters that were outlined by the minister in his short statement in connection with the original draft and the amendment. I cannot conceive why the minister wants to interfere with the board to which he has given such powers and why he wants powers beyond those of the board, if that were possible, and I do not believe it is. In my opinion the board has ample powers to do every mortal thing suggested by the minister. Why have dual jurisdiction? Under the bill the board is given power to do anything. In the eighth section the board itself provides that it may extend the geographical limits of any territory to take in, if necessary, even the whole of Canada. Then the minister comes along with clause 9 and suggests that in addition to all these powers the minister shall have power over all the matters he has outlined to the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I make one suggestion? Clause 8 is entirely different from clause 9. In clause 8 organizations have already been set up and the product has been regulated. Section 9 deals with the products that have not been regulated in that way. So we could not extend the area under section 8 to include that of a product that is not already regulated.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Section 8 extends the geographical limits.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There would be no geographical limits in that case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Assume it is a regulated product. Now the minister wants power to go beyond that. The board have power, or power can be delegated to the dominion board, to do any of the things suggested in section 9. That is why I am moving for the striking out of the section. All these powers can be exercised by the board. But the minister rather adroitly suggests in the amendment that it shall be not interprovincial but export and import trade. I take very strong exception to sections 9 and 12. I do not see that they are required. What I object to in this bill is the compulsory features of the whole thing. You are going to force twenty-five per cent of the producers in a given area, if seventy-five per cent of them agree or think they agree—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not by section 9.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am speaking of the prior sections.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I thought we were discussing section 9.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So we are; I am referring to them in connection with section 9. Twenty-five per cent of the producers are liable to be forced into a scheme no matter how much they object, if one is set up; they are going to be subjected to all the provisions of this bill. I do not know anything that will cause more friction in a community than an attempt to do that kind of thing amongst neighbours. I have lived in a rural community all my life and I know how far it will go. But when you follow that up and say, no matter how you may sugar coat the pill, that you are going to take complete control, no matter how laudable the object may be, even if it be to save a delicate situation such as was mentioned by the minister in connection with live stock, he will find that whoever is in charge will land in a very sorry position. I am quite in accord with all the assistance the government can give to the marketing of live stock, but I am utterly opposed to compulsion of any sort, and here we have it in its worst form. For that reason I move that section 9 be struck out.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Compulsion in section 9?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would ask the hon. member to state where there is any compulsion in section 9.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the minister will read the section as it is proposed to amend it:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of this act the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in a natural product is injuriously affected by marketing conditions through the lack of a local board, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing or the regulation of the marketing ...

Take that in connection with section 4.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister kindly explain why in the revised section 9 it says "propose a scheme for the marketing or the regulation of the marketing," whereas in section 4 it is confined to regulating the marketing. Does it convey the possibility for instance of buying wheat? It is certainly different from section 4.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the short statement I made as to what was intended in this particular section I said the words "for the marketing" were put in for that reason, because power would be required here other than that of regulating the marketing. The word "marketing" was added to give power to the dominion board in cases such as this to buy and sell if necessary.

Mr. NEILL: The minister considers that this section gives him power to buy and sell? Then I suggest that we do not need any of the other sections.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think it necessary to answer that statement of the hon. member. The cases are altogether different. If the producers wish to organize themselves for the regulation of the marketing of their products, the rest of the bill gives them power to do so. This section gives to the dominion board power to deal with emergencies in such cases as I mentioned and many others before the product is regulated or comes under a scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to what the minister may have had in his own mind in the drafting of the bill I naturally accept entirely what he says. But that is not the important matter for this House of Commons to consider in enacting this particular clause. Others may see in it quite a different purpose and possibility. What I want to make clear to the minister and the committee is that under this clause it is quite possible for the governor in council on recommendations of the minister to put into operation any scheme that they please, and any scheme for the marketing of any product, according to the definition of the marketing bill, as it is, includes buying and selling shipping for sale or storage and offering for sale. And in connection with natural products we must take the definition given in the bill, which is, any product of agriculture or of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product; and so on as further amended in committee. It simply means that if for example there were in London an empire marketing board, and that board wished to regulate trade within the empire in such a way that all of a certain product should be bought from one part of the empire rather than any other country, or that the products of Canada should be sold to certain countries rather than others, the minister would under this section have it entirely within his power to recommend such a scheme to the governor in council and the governor in council to set the scheme in force.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think the right hon. gentleman wishes to give the interpretation that I took from what he said. Section 9 does not give power to the dominion board to do that with reference to any product, but only products that are not regulated as set forth in the act previously. For example if the Nova Scotia fruit growers organized an export board of their own under this bill, then the dominion government would not have authority to act under section 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad the minister has drawn the attention of the committee to that fact. All that is needed in connection with a regulated product to do what I have said, is the power given under section 8 which with respect to any regulated product enables the governor in council to make regulations as widely applicable as he pleases. Then if it were desired to work out some inter-empire marketing scheme, where a regulated product did not happen to come before the board, the minister himself might deal with products not regulated, and draw up his own scheme and make it apply. It is quite apparent that the two sections are to be read together, and together they will give the minister power to regulate all products of this country. That is a power which should not exist in any board.

Amendment carried on division.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): There is a motion by Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) that section 9 be struck out of the bill. That I must declare out of order, because it is a direct negative.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Provincial marketing board.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to strike out this section and substitute the following therefor:

Whenever a scheme or regulation relates to an area of production which is confined within the limits of a province, the governor in council may authorize any marketing board or agency established under the law of the said province to be and to exercise the functions of a local board with reference to the said scheme.

Mr. MICHAUD: I presume that the provisions of section 10 relate to the powers conferred on the board by section 9. For the sake of clarity and uniformity throughout the act would it not be preferable to use the words "whenever a scheme of marketing or regulated marketing" instead of "whenever a scheme of regulation"? Unless this has a different meaning from what it appears to have I should like to make that suggestion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of this section is to make it possible to cooperate with provincial boards set up under the jurisdiction of a province. It has nothing to do with section 9.

Mr. MICHAUD: Throughout the act the words "marketing" and "regulated marketing" have been used, but in this section the word "marketing" is omitted. Is that for a particular purpose or do the words "scheme of regulation" apply to a different matter?

Mr. SANDERSON: I want to ask the minister the meaning of the words, "the governor in council may authorize any marketing board or agency established under the law." What is meant by "agency established under the law"?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In Ontario they have a marketing board already established. There might be a local board set up in Ontario or Nova Scotia under a scheme similar to this, and the governor in council might name that board as its agency. This section is solely for the purpose of making it possible to have the greatest possible cooperation between the provinces and the dominion marketing board.

Mr. SANDERSON: Does the minister mean that some agency might take the place of the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. GEARY: Look at section 4 (j).

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not asking the hon. member for Toronto South.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I thought I had explained that the term "agency" used here might be taken in a broad sense to include provincial schemes of marketing that would fit into the whole picture of the regulation of marketing, and we might name that provincial body as our agent. As I said before the whole purpose of this section is to provide for the fullest cooperation between the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is it the intention of this section to enable the dominion board to cooperate with the provincial boards with regard to marketing only?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, the regulation of marketing.

Mr. MICHAUD: To cooperate in the regulation of marketing? That is what I am trying to have inserted in the act, because those words have been used in conjunction with each other all through the act, and it may lead to ambiguity if the same phraseology is not maintained.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Board may act under provincial legislation.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that this section be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

11. The board may exercise any power conferred upon it by or pursuant to provincial legislation with reference to the marketing of a natural product and may authorize a local board to exercise any such power.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

On section 12, subsection 1—power to restrict importation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this is the worst section of the whole act; the others have been pretty bad, but this section gives the governor in council power to do what it pleases with the trade and commerce of the country, and incidentally therefore with the production of the country. Certainly this is a usurpation of the rights of parliament, as complete as anything could be. Let me read the section:

12 (1) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product, and the governor in council shall have power to make regulations to provide for the licensing by the minister of importers, or otherwise to enforce any order made hereunder.

(2) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette,—

(a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence;

(b) prescribe the forms of such licences, the terms and conditions thereof and the persons who shall have authority to issue the same;

(c) impose penalties for breach of any such order or regulation or of any licence issued thereunder, and, generally, make such provision or authorize the doing of such acts or things as may in his discretion be deemed necessary or expedient for giving full effect to any orders, regulations or licences made or issued hereunder.

In a word, Mr. Chairman, if that section began with the words "the parliament of Canada" I would have no exception to take to it. Then we would have power in this parliament to say whether or not any, and if any, what restriction of trade should take place; whether or not the imports of this country should be restricted and, equally, the exports. I do submit that the constitution of this country, the British North America Act, gives no such power to the governor in council, and it cannot be construed that because exclusive power is given the federal parliament to legislate on matters of trade and commerce this parliament can take those powers in their entirety and transfer them to the governor in council. Let me read section 91 of the British North America Act:

It shall be lawful for the Queen—

Not the governor in council.

—by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the clases of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

2. The regulation of trade and commerce.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is only this parliament that can pass laws for the regulation of trade and commerce to the extent of restricting exports and imports, and under the constitution parliament has not the power to delegate that right of legislation to the governor in council. Much less has it the right to interfere in matters that come exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The provinces have exclusive jurisdiction to legislate with respect to property and civil rights; surely they have some say with regard to the licensing of the citizens within the provinces who are carrying on their ordinary vocations and occupations. This section states that at the instance of the governor in council any producer in Canada may be obliged to take out a licence before he can sell a product or offer it for sale. That comes to the same thing as not being allowed to produce, because if a man is not permitted to sell or offer for sale the things he produces very soon he will cease to produce without a licence. A producer becomes liable under this section to a penalty of fine or imprisonment at the instance of the governor in council for pursuing what up to that moment has been his only source of livelihood, his only occupation.

Surely it is not necessary to go further than that in order for hon. members of the committee to see why they should vote against this clause. I have pointed out wherein I believe it is wholly unconstitutional, and with respect to this section, I should like to repeat what I said with regard to section 9, namely that I believe one of its purposes is to enable the governor in council to regulate the trade and commerce of this country in a way that will serve, if its policy is one of inter-imperial trade rather than world trade, to force the trade of the country into inter-imperial lines and to restrict world trade in other directions if necessary to accomplish that end. A policy of that kind up to the present has resulted in the trade of this country being diminished in very considerable proportions; to carry it further would destroy altogether what little trade still remains.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I should like to say just a word in regard to the constitutional question urged by my right hon. friend in the remarks he has just made. Surely section 91 of the British North America Act, which he has read in full to the committee, is in itself a complete answer to his constitutional objection. By that section the parliament of Canada is given exclusive jurisdiction to legislate in regard to the regulation of trade and commerce. This bill proposes to regulate in some respects the trade and commerce of this country, and in particular the export and import trade. In all constitutional discussions that have taken place since confederation, since the British North America Act was passed it has never been questioned that matters of export and import trade which constitute our dealing with foreign countries are specially within the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament.

Parliament proposes in the bill now before the house to regulate the export and import trade and commerce of this country as defined in the bill. Parliament is the power which is legislating in this matter. If this bill is passed parliament merely enacts that the imports and the exports of the dominion may be regulated as provided in section 12 of this act. There is no attempt to take away, to alter, or to limit the power of parliament. The whole bill is drawn with the idea of utilizing the legislative jurisdiction which this parliament undoubtedly possesses under section 91 of the British North America Act which my right hon. friend has just read to the house. I cannot see anything in his argument. I think this measure is strictly in conformity with the constitution. If my right hon. friend's argument is sound our whole bill falls to the ground.

I think that anyone who appreciates section 91 and considers this bill in the light of it must absolutely conclude that this particular section number 12, is within the jurisdiction of this parliament.

The questions of jurisdiction which have caused some difficulty in regard to this measure are not in regard to the regulation of trade and commerce as it pertains to exports from and imports into Canada, but I will grant you that it has not been the easiest thing to draw a line of demarcation as between dominion and provincial jurisdiction in the preparation of this bill. We have realized at all times that we were steering between Scylla and Charybdis, Scylla being the federal jurisdiction and Charybdis the provincial jurisdiction. But we believe we have been able to steer a course which does not infringe upon provincial jurisdiction on the one hand, or upon federal jurisdiction on the other. But in regard to exports and imports the question of provincial jurisdiction does not arise. I think that is perhaps the clearest thing in the bill, and it lies exclusively within the jurisdiction of the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With all due respect I submit that the Minister of Justice has not answered the point that I made. Let me give an illustration. Would the Minister of Justice say that if to-morrow the governor in council were to decide to prohibit the importation into Canada of any article that may be regulated under this act, no matter what the article may be, and no matter what the volume of it may be, the governor in council would have the power to do that constitutionally?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, if this act passes. Section 12 gives us the constitutional right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then what we are doing in this act is to divest parliament altogether of any further say as to what is to be prohibited in the way of importations into Canada and as to what is to be prohibited in the way of exportation from Canada, and turn that power over entirely to the governor in council?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are not divesting parliament of any right. Parliament is conferring upon its own creature, the executive of this House of Commons, special powers with regard to export and import trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is turning the whole position wrong side foremost. The executive is intended to be subject to parliament, not parliament to the executive. This is making parliament subject to the executive. It is reversing the whole system of responsible government. It is seeking to take away from parliament the right it now has to regulate trade and commerce and invest its creature, as the Minister of Justice says, the executive, with this right. The minister assents; he says, yes. I say that that is contrary to all parliamentary practice, and contrary even to the pretence of responsible government, and no one knows that better than the Minister of Justice. If the intention had been to allow the executive to do as it pleases with the trade and commerce of the country and with taxation, the constitution would have been so drafted; but the constitution was expressly framed to give certain rights to the House of Commons, the Senate, and the representatives of the crown combined, which were to be exercised by them exclusively, and in contradistinction to the executive or any other body. Those three constituent elements of parliament were to participate in any exclusive power which is given this parliament under the constitution.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They are participating now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not doing anything of the kind, with all due respect to the minister. What the argument of the Minister of Justice amounts to is this, that all this parliament needs to do to free itself of its obligation to legislate is to say by an act that we are assigning to the governor in council power to make the laws set forth in the British North America Act and exclusively assigned to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the same reasoning. What is the difference? The Minister of Justice says it can be done with respect to all legislation respecting trade and commerce. Then why not with respect to all legislation respecting public debt and property? Why not with respect to the raising of money by any system of taxation? Why not with respect to borrowing money on public credit?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We do that now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One sees in a moment to what an absurdity the whole constitution of the country is brought when the government asserts a power of that kind. It is a device to take away completely all the control of the executive by parliament, to take it away in regard to the regulation of trade and commerce, and if in connection with trade and commerce with regard then also to taxation, because no fiscal policy could be kept within the control of parliament if the governor in council is to be free to do what it pleases with respect to legislation on these subjects.

The Minister of Finance brings in his budget. He has a certain tariff policy imposing certain duties with respect to commodities coming into this country. What is the sense of parliament going to the trouble of enacting what the duties are to be and expressing its opinion thereon if the day after parliament prorogues the governor in council is to have power to prohibit the importation entirely of these commodities into Canada? And that is the power that is being given here.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that there could not conceivably be a more complete reversal of the whole relationship of the executive and parliament or a more complete subversion of the rights of parliament and its control of trade and commerce and its control of taxation than is to be found in this section.

Mr. NEILL: I am not qualified to deal with the constitutional issues involved, but I appreciate what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) says with regard to difficulties between dominion and provincial jurisdiction. He compared it very aptly to holding a course between Scylla and Charybdis. I only hope he will not find that instead of choosing a course between them he has countenanced a bigamous relation with both, which would be disastrous.

I want to take this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to bring forward a matter that has not been given the consideration it should have received in this house. Under this section the question of contracts and treaties arises. I hope the Minister of Justice will give me his ear for a moment. I dealt with the matter the other day at page 3121 of Hansard. I pointed out how impossible it is to conduct business to-day anywhere to any extent worth appreciating without making contracts and engagements ahead over a long period of time, for months and in some cases years ahead. Men may want their goods delivered at some far distant portion of the world and will ask: "Will you deliver such and such"—it may be telegraph poles, for instance, which have to be wintered or summered six months —"eighteen months from now?" Or a man may want fish or paper delivered in a certain place at a certain time and he often wants to make a contract for a long period ahead. A hundred instances might be given of these contracts arising to facilitate any form of marketing. But when this bill is passed they would hesitate to involve themselves in contracts because of the many penalties that may be involved. For instance, a ship pays a heavy demurrage each day that it is detained, and when men do not know under what obligations they may be under to some board when the particular time arrives, they will hesitate to make a contract. Take the case of a contract for flour to be shipped perhaps eighteen months or more ahead. The only answer the minister gave to my remarks the other day was this. He said:

> I feel that all local boards will be anxious to facilitate all contracts rather than to break them.

But it is not a question of local boards wanting to facilitate contracts. Here are contracts in existence. When the boards come into existence, are they going to take no notice whatever of those contracts?

Let me show what they did in Britain. This is a parallel case because, of course, the same situation exists there. I refer hon. gentlemen to page 263 of the British Marketing Act, 1930-31, containing eight separate subsections. I cannot read them all, but section 8 provides carefully and clearly how all these contracts are to be taken care of. A man is not to be liable to a penalty for contravention of a scheme if what he does is in pursuance of a contract. I quite accord to the minister a desire to promote trade and commerce in Canada but I cannot understand how he can leave out such an obvious thing as that.

Again, no man knows better than the Minister of Justice how involved this is with the question of treaties. We certainly have over a score of treaties with other countries. Here is what the British act says. Section 3, which appears on page 475 of the 1933 act reads:

> In deciding whether to make an order under this section—

That is the section where you have regulated importations of agricultural products—

> —and in settling the terms of any such order, the board of trade shall, among other considerations, have regard to the interests of consumers of the product to which the order relates (including persons who purchase that product for the purpose of subjecting it to any treatment or process of manufacture)—

We have taken no notice of that.

> —and to the effect which the regulation of the importation of that product into the United Kingdom is likely to have upon commercial relations between the United Kingdom and other countries; and the board shall not make such an order unless they are satisfied that it is not at variance with any treaty, convention or agreement for the time being in force between His Majesty and any foreign power or between His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and the government of any other country.

Obviously that includes any other British country. When we consider our trade relations with Great Britain under what we call the empire agreements and our trade relations with Africa, Australia and so on we should have regard to this matter. However, we seem to be going at this bill, so to speak, wide open. It is just like a horse that has run away with its rider; it takes everything in its course until it comes a smash. There is no regard or provision for these two important questions, treaties and contracts. The minister is reported as saying that in drawing up this bill he had in mind that it should be sound, simple and practicable. I leave it to the committee and I think we can leave it to the country as well to decide as to whether this bill is sound, simple or practicable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My right hon. friend has stated that this measure is a negation of parliamentary practice and likewise of the principles of responsible government. As far as responsible government and parliamentary practice is concerned I think the outstanding model for this parliament is the practice of the parliament of the United Kingdom. Does my right hon. friend realize that chapter 31 of the Regulation Act passed in 1933 by the British House of Commons provides:

> Subject to the provisions of this section, the Board of Trade, after consultation with the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries and with the secretaries of state concerned with agriculture in Scotland and northern Ireland respectively, may make an order regulating the importation into the United Kingdom of any such agricultural product as may be specified in the order, if it appears to the board after such consultation as aforesaid—

That so and so has happened. What about the power of parliament in regard to trade as practised in the British parliament? What about the negation of the principles of responsible government? Our British model has done likewise. What about the charge of infringement upon the right of taxation by interfering with imports upon which taxes are raised? The parliament of the United Kingdom has passed an act authorizing the Board of Trade to do the very thing which we propose under section 12 of this bill. It will be said that the powers of the British parliament are plenary while in Canada our powers are governed by the provision of the British North America Act. I submit that under that act this proposal is constitutional in every respect, but so far as the charge that we are abrogating the principles of responsible government is concerned, I say we are following the British model adopted by the British parliament in 1933. So far as the criticism that we are infringing on the right of the House of Commons and the Senate in regard to taxation on imports is concerned, I say that the parliament of Great Britain is doing the same thing. It has authorized the Board of Trade to do what ordinarily would be done by the House of Commons and the House of Lords. The British act has been our model in preparing this legislation, but we cannot go as far as the British act goes in every respect. We have followed the example of the British parliament so far as parliamentary practice and so far as the principles of responsible government are concerned, and we have kept within our constitutional rights under the British North America Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) read the section but he carefully avoided saying anything about its main provision which is that what is therein set forth shall be subject to the provisions of that act. If the Minister of Justice will read the provisions of the act he will find that the parliament of Great Britain has taken good care to protect its rights in many particulars.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I fail to find it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No such clause can be found as this section.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To what clause does my right hon. friend refer?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To section 12. It does not say "subject to the provisions of this act," it reads as follows:

> (1) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product, and the governor in council shall have power to make regulations to provide for the licensing by the minister of importers, or otherwise to enforce any order made hereunder.
>
> (2) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette,—
>
> (a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence;
>
> (b) prescribe the forms of such licences, the terms and conditions thereof and the persons who shall have authority to issue the same;
>
> (c) impose penalities for breach of any such order or regulation or of any licence issued thereunder, and generally, make such provisions or authorize the doing of such acts or things as may in his discretion be deemed necessary or expedient for giving full effect to any orders, regulations or licences made or issued hereunder.

That is all that is to be found in that section. There is no qualifying or limiting of the conditions. Absolute power is given to the governor in council, and it is power in no way subject to any provisions elsewhere in the act or to any provisions of any other act. This parliament simply declares that the governor in council is to have the power to restrict trade, both import and export. More than that, the governor in council is to have the power to issue licenses and to tell any man, whether he be an importer or an exporter, that he cannot carry on his occupation without a licence issued in accordance with the terms laid down by the governor in council. I say that you cannot find a parallel to that in any legislation in any part of the world, except in those countries which have abandoned parliamentary institutions altogether and have gone in for dictatorships, whereby an authority which corresponds to that which the governor in council in this country is rapidly becoming makes the law and everybody is obliged to follow it without representatives of the people having any say one way or the other. That is the position to which we are being reduced in this parliament, and the Minister of Justice cannot deny that. I say that this parliament has no right to enact and it ought to decline completely to countenance any measure which will remove from parliament and transfer to the governor in council, local boards, general boards or any other body the control over trade and commerce and all matters relating to tariffs and the taxation incidental thereto. That is what we are doing under this section as it stands. This section does not follow any model deserving of imitation, it is laying down a procedure which would not be countenanced for one minute in the British House of Commons.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The British act does not say "subject to the provisions of this act."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend read it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Pardon me, I did not. What I said was "subject to the provisions of this section," that is, section 1. There is no provision in that section which refers in any way to the powers of parliament or gives parliament any power or control. That section places the whole control with regard to regulated imports in the hands of the Board of Trade.

Mr. NEILL: After reference to the agriculture supply committee and two ministers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Board of Trade is not parliament, and I am talking about the House of Commons and the House of Lords. The British act divests absolutely the House of Commons and the House of Lords of any control and places the control with regard to certain imports in the hands of the Board of Trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certain imports—what imports?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Certain regulated imports. Under this act we have placed the power in the hands of the governor in council on the advice of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In connection with any and all imports and exports.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The objection I take to the section is along another line than that suggested by my leader. This is just the finish of a number of acts of this government by which they have usurped the power of parliament. It is probably the most flagrant attempted yet, but they are improving. They started in first of all, under the guise of an effort to meet the serious conditions in the country, by taking authority under "peace, order and good government" to spend the public money without designating any particular sum. I have never heard of the British House of Commons doing that; in that respect this government excels the British parliament. This government has led the way. Now I do not know why hon. gentlemen opposite require this section. The Minister of National Revenue has the power, wrested from this parliament, to impose almost any taxation he sees fit in restricting imports. He cannot do much with exports, so that may explain section 12. He can however interfere in a very definite way with imports. I do not see why you need any reference to imports here at all. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has raised the question as to what will be done with the treaties. I was wondering when the minister was discussing this section what he would do about Australian wool, which is more or less under an agreement. It is a natural product that comes into Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will respect our treaty obligations.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, you will. I should not think it would be necessary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps not for you, but for us it is.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the Minister of Justice will look at some of the orders put through he will find that the government does not respect its treaty obligations.

Mr. POWER: What about the tariff board?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They have no treaty with the tariff board. The minister, I say, may impose any duty he sees fit under the regulations and provisions which he will enforce, so I do not think you need to be alarmed about imports. It may be true that they want to do something about exports and will regulate the entire trade of the country, under the control of this government. However, I am not very much alarmed about it because I think the time is coming rapidly when the government will not be regulating anything, and I do not think it can come too quickly. Before the country is absolutely ruined I hope that something will happen to regulate this government to the place where they belong—I should not care to say where, because I do not wish them any warm reception. I do say however that if section 9 might be required—and I cannot conceive under what circumstances it will be required—section 12 is an abortion; it is not required at all, and you can operate without it. All that is required is simply to delegate the matter to that minister who is already doing his best to prevent imports from coming into the country. And as to exports, they will take care of themselves; no one will buy from us because we do not buy from them. That is the unhappy position in which Canada finds herself. I am not going into that now, but I will take half an hour some day and try to put on Hansard a record of some of the things that have happened to us under this department in connection with our trade. So far as I am concerned I propose to vote against this particular section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to place on record the position to which the trade of this country has fallen under the restrictions already imposed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite groan because they know only too well what is coming. With regard to total imports and exports, under the liberal administration the total import and export trade of Canada in 1928-29, the year before we went out of office, amounted to $2,360,000,000. Under the present government, in the last fiscal year, 1933-34, the total trade had fallen to $886,000,000, or a fall of 60 per cent.

Mr. SULLIVAN: What about the total world trade?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may give that. It will be found that so far as Canada is concerned world trade has been sacrificed to trade within the empire, and that without a considerable increase in empire trade. That is why I deem it necessary to protest as strongly as possible at this time, when it is known that the policy of the present administration is one of furthering inter-imperial trade at the expense of world trade. I must protest strongly against giving this administration further power to restrict the world trade of this country as is here proposed by giving the governor in council if they so desire, the power to oblige every importer and exporter to secure a licence before he may import or export, or failing so to do, to be subject to a penalty.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has at hand the information I have requested in regard to the decrease in home consumption.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell the settlers who have been suffering in these hard times that hon. gentlemen opposite merely laugh when I speak of the misery of the people. I will tell the farmers of this country everywhere—everywhere I speak, in any province—that when I mentioned the decrease in home consumption of farm products many hon. members on the government side sneered at me. I will tell them that every time we plead their cause in the House of Commons there are gentlemen on the other side, supporters of this government, who laugh at us.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you ask Taschereau?

An hon. MEMBER: Or Eddie Cantor.

Mr. POULIOT: Rubinoff. May I ask the minister whether he has those figures?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret very much that we have not that information completed. We are particularly anxious to go into it in detail so that the hon. gentleman will have the advantage of all possible information in connection with the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister has no excuse for an answer of that sort. I wonder whether it is because, when I rose on a former occasion to ask that very question, the Prime Minister told him not to give it. Is that why he has not already given me that information? The hon. gentleman has no excuse for not having that information. If he has it there is no reason why it should not be given to the house. I ask for it not for myself but on behalf of the farmers of the country. They are entitled to the information and I hope the minister will get it. If he does not produce it it means that he pleads guilty in answer to the figures that have already been put on record in this house and which will be used on every occasion. I do not wish to be unpleasant to the hon. gentleman; I am as lenient as anyone can be. But I have a right as a member to have complete information from the minister on these important matters. Why have we a staff in the department if they are all dumb and cannot answer questions which the minister asks them on behalf of the member for Temiscouata? He asked those questions on behalf of his electors, on behalf of the farmers throughout his constituency. We have a right to know why there has been such a decrease in the home consumption of farm products. How did this happen? How is it that the Canadian people are eating less than formerly? Is it because they have no money to buy anything? Is it because they have less purchasing power on account of the decline in exports due to the tariff walls that the government have erected around this country? It is most important for us to have that information and to have it now. If we do not have it now, it is because the minister refuses to inform the committee as to the terrific consequences of the policies of the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: If any more members make jokes like that when I am speaking about the distress of the farmer, it will be my duty, although it is repugnant to me, to name them in order that it may be on record that this and that member on the government side have laughed at the misery of the farmers who are at present unable to sell their products.

May I ask this question of the Minister of Agriculture, for the last time and in all earnestness, on behalf of those whom he represents in the cabinet, on behalf of the humble farmer who lives far out in the wilderness, on behalf of that formerly prosperous farmer who has also become humble and poor on account of the policies put into force by the government, and also on behalf of the poor unemployed who may live in Halifax or other cities and who have no money with which to buy apples, cheese, wheat flour, honey or any other delicacies? Why do they have less money? Why are they unemployed? For the full information of the committee and in order to bring back confidence from the corner where she has been hiding herself for such a long time, may I ask the minister kindly to tell us what steps the government have taken in order to put a stop to the decrease in the home consumption of farm products? The minister is apparently in a good mood to-day. The bill has advanced; we are now at clause 12 and we are nearing the end of our study of the bill. The committee will be rising in a few minutes; these are the last clauses. If the figures for which I have been asking are given to the committee, it will be possible for me to ask additional questions to complete the small amount of information which will be given to me by the minister. May I for the last time ask him in all fairness, in all sincerity, in all kindliness, to reconsider his decision and to show that he will be able to administer the legislation. At the head of such an organization is needed a man of ability, of decision, a man who knows his business and who is prepared to have his orders respected, not a man who tolerates that his staff shall answer him when it pleases them. The man who is needed is one who has authority as head of his department, a man who is listened to and obeyed. Therefore I ask the Minister of Agriculture, who is surely endowed with all those qualities: Why does he not show now that he is that able man; that he has authority in his department; that his staff listen to him and when he wants information, he gets it immediately? I am sure he has it; if he does not have it in his coat pocket, he has it in his vest pocket. Let him be kind enough to give that information to the committee for the benefit of the farmer, for the benefit of the unemployed and for the information of the whole country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I wish again to assure the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that there has been no desire to withhold this information from him. I am sure, if he appreciates the amount of work entailed by the questions he has put on Hansard and also the work the staff has to do apart from that, he will believe we have made every effort to bring down this information. By the middle of last week I thought we should have had it by last Friday but there were still some points it was difficult to clear up. Our whole desire has been to submit to him the best statement in answer to the questions he has put. So far as withholding the information until this bill is passed, is concerned, the information has, so far as I can see, no bearing on the bill because this legislation has to deal with the regulation of marketing. It is not necessary for me to refer to his suggestion, which I think was almost entirely out of order, that the Prime Minister had suggested we should withhold the information from him. I am sure every hon. member realizes that the Prime Minister has too much work to do to be concerned about such matters as that.

I regret that the leader of the opposition, when he was making his statement in regard to restricted trade since 1930, did not take a little time to make the picture more complete and accurate and to point out that in one year alone, 1929-30, while the right hon. gentleman and his party were in power, by just one act the United States restricted our exports to them to the extent of 250,000 head of cattle. That was the extent of our exports to that country in 1928-29, and by the tariff they placed against our cattle it was impossible to send any there in 1929-30.

Similarly with reference to our trade in milk, cream and butter going to the United States from the eastern part of Canada, during the right hon. gentleman's tenure of office through action taken by the United States our trade was restricted in one year to the extent of sufficient milk, cream and butter to be the equivalent of 52,000,000 pounds of cheese. That was the restriction of trade that took place before this party came into power. One could deal at length with restrictions in trade caused by action taken by other countries in regard to our wheat, but I feel that the facts have been put on record so often it would be a waste of time to deal longer with them.

One more point. There are some twenty-five or more countries at the present time that restrict their trade on the basis of quotas. We are living in a real world, and have to act accordingly. If, for example, the United Kingdom should decide to-morrow that we should not ship there in one year more than 20,000 head of cattle, how are we to deal with such a situation unless we have powers? That would be beyond the control of this government. The same thing might take place with any one of the twenty-five or more countries that have placed restrictions on imports. Everything would be haphazard if we had not power to restrict exports in dealing with countries that have imposed quotas. If the restriction that I have suggested were imposed by the British government as to live stock, what would be the effect? Every cattle exporter would try to ship every head of cattle he could at the earliest possible time, thereby tending to lower the price, and the result would certainly be injurious to our live stock industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Should the governor in council decide to require licences of importers and exporters of certain commodities under this section, would any importer or exporter who carried on business without a licence be liable to fine or imprisonment?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If that were one of the regulations he certainly would be liable to penalties under the act, otherwise it would be ineffective.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any provision in the bill which would give importers in those circumstances a right of appeal to any body, to show cause why they should be granted a licence where one was refused them? I can see none in the bill. As it appears to me, what the government does is to say who are to get licences. They are evidently to appoint an army of officials to distribute licences, but there is no provision made for appeal by a man who may feel that his livelihood is being taken from him simply for having no licence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I want to hear from the minister on that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I feel that no answer to that is necessary. Any importer could appeal to the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister says that no answer is necessary. There is no answer possible that I can see in defence of that. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been taking refuge behind the assertion that there is to be due process of law before a man is put into gaol or fined for violation of the act. I am drawing attention to the fact that a man may be ruined in his business before any question of law comes up for consideration, simply because he knows he will be liable to fine or imprisonment unless he has a licence. Yet there is no provision in the act for appeal by any importer or exporter who has been denied such licence. I say that simply exposes a man to the risk of complete ruin at the instance of an arbitrary ministry. The ministry has arbitrary power to grant these licences, which can be done only through the creation of a bureaucracy which will operate through the power of fine and imprisonment. Surely that kind of thing is not going to help orderly marketing in this hitherto free dominion so far as production and trade are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GERSHAW: Before it carries—I assume it is going to carry—I should like to ask the minister what he has particularly in mind in connection with this section. He did mention something about the cattle industry. I have in mind the beet sugar industry. Only fourteen per cent of the raw material used is grown in Canada. Would that be the kind of import he has in mind in connection with this section? I know that great expectations have been aroused on the part of many interested. What had he in mind in that regard?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That might be dealt with under this section if sugar were a regulated product.

Mr. RINFRET: Before this clause carries—and personally I hope it will not—I wish again to register my protest against this bill. I choose this clause as the occasion for my observations because I think it is one of the worst features of the bill. When we were dealing with the short title we expressed the hope that the government might bring down amendments that would improve this measure. They have brought down a series of amendments which may have improved it in certain particulars, but I think the sections we have been considering to-night, especially 9 and 10 and this one, are very bad indeed. A short time ago there was an interesting but perhaps too short debate on the constitutional aspect of this question. It has been contended that the regulation of trade and commerce belongs to parliament and that by this section there is an abandonment of that regulation. To that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) replied that if parliament has this power it has also the right to delegate it. I shall not discuss the technical point involved, but whether that is right technically or not it is certainly against the very spirit of the pact of confederation so to do.

Let us see how that will apply to another matter. Suppose when the Minister of Finance brought down his budget, instead of saying: We shall reduce the tariff on this item and increase it on another, and have special taxation of so much per cent, he should instead merely do as is done in this bill and say: We claim from the house the power to increase or reduce the taxes on any item we please during the year, without specifying the government's intention in the matter; that would certainly be contrary to the principles of confederation and responsible government. But what is not being done in the budget because it would arouse the whole country is to be done by this bill.

I know many importers in Montreal who are exceedingly disquieted by this bill. This section says that the governor in council may, by order or regulation, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product. We saw a few evenings ago that natural products as dealt with in this bill mean practically everything produced in the country. The bill provides that the governor in council may make regulations for the licensing by the minister of importers. Now here is a man who has established a business in Montreal or elsewhere—perhaps it has been in existence for many years, having been handed on from father to son—dealing with the importation of goods into this country. Import trade has met with great difficulties during recent years, as everyone knows. There have been wide fluctuations in the exchange values of moneys between different countries, and changes in the customs law which have been exceedingly complex and sometimes different between one office and another. By this bill an importer is threatened with the possibility that one day he may find in his mail a letter informing him that the governor in council, which means the government confronting us now, has decided that he is no longer to carry on his business, for some reason concerning regulation of marketing of the product, but that his competitor is to be given a licence to continue. Mind you, if he does not at once accept that impossible situation he is liable to be gaoled. A moment ago there was a discussion as to whether this act is similar to the one that has been passed in Great Britain. I think this difference has been made clear, that in Great Britain there is no pact of confederation, and that the Board of Trade is practically part of the government. But I will go further and say that if this has been done in Great Britain it is just as wrong as it is in Canada; that is my point of view. This government has not the right to inform an importer that because a board wants to market a product in a certain way he may not carry on his business. The government has not the right to do that, and parliament should not give the government that right.

I may express the hope now that this clause will not carry. This is one section that should have been amended. Here we have a long list of amendments; it has become the practice of this government to present a bill and then, a few days later, to present another in the form of amendments entirely changing the original measure. That has made very difficult the discussion by members of the opposition of any measure that has been brought down by this government. The principle is clear in this case, however; no amendment has been proposed. Here we have section 12, by which the government claims the right to restrict importations and to inform any importer that he must shut up his business. If he does not do so he may be put in gaol. I protest very strongly; I repeat that whether this is done in England, in Russia, in Germany or in Italy, it is wrong, and representing in a Canadian parliament a part of the Canadian people who are anxious to enjoy freedom of trade I do protest as vigorously as possible against the adoption of any such section by this parliament.

Mr. RALSTON: If this clause has any virtue at all, Mr. Chairman, its only virtue is the effrontery and brazenness with which it puts on record the fact that parliament is going to surrender its power over trade and commerce in this country. I submit to you, sir, that the more one reads the section the more one is convinced that the government cannot have considered its effect before bringing down this measure.

In the first place, imports are restricted so far as they interfere with the marketing of regulated products, but the power to restrict exports is not limited to products which are regulated; it is confined only to natural products. That is to say, the export of any product in this country, whether or not it is the subject of a scheme, can be regulated by the governor in council by means of a licence. I submit, as has been submitted by others, that this is not the sort of legislation to which this parliament should readily assent. I recall that under section 3 (e) of the N.R.A. in the United States provision is made for certain restrictions by the president with regard to the importation of products which are the subject of codes under that act, but even there the president is not given power to limit the importation of the products which are the subject of codes unless there has been first a reference to and hearing by the tariff commission with opportunity given those who are importers to present their case. As I recall it, there is provision for thirty days' notice as well. Where is the tariff board in this country? Two years ago the government passed the Tariff Board Act, and I understood that act was passed for the purpose of giving importers—and I suppose under this act it might apply to exporters as well—an opportunity of appearing and presenting their case, showing how the proposed regulations might affect them. The tariff board has been constituted, but there is no provision whatever here for any appearance before the tariff board by anyone interested. The governor in council may sit in the east block and make a regulation limiting the export, and may put an embargo on the importation, of any product which is the subject of a scheme. On the other hand they may sit there and require a licence for the export of any natural product, whether or not it is the subject of a scheme.

I submit that one cannot protest too vigorously in the name of the importers and exporters of this country, and those interested in international trade, against this wide and, as I said before, brazen attempt to withdraw from parliament and from the representatives of the people the right to regulate trade and commerce.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not carried, and I may as well tell hon. gentlemen opposite that with but five minutes to adjournment it is not going to be carried to-night. If the minister wishes to move that the committee rise and report progress, well and good, but this section is not going to be adopted, without further discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing added to the discussion by describing statutes as brazen, nor is anything added by threats. It is nothing new to limit exports.

Mr. YOUNG: We did that in the fall of 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: For years the customs act has provided that there may be an embargo against human food under certain contingencies, but the power of delegation was settled by the privy council in the Apollo Candle Company vs. Powell case, in which the power to exercise a discretion by the equivalent of a minister of customs in Australia met with the very same argument that this house has listened to for hours to-night. It was said that this was delegating to somebody else power which the statute conferred upon parliament, and the privy council said—as one would expect, and as has been accepted ever since—that it is competent for parliament to delegate its power to any official that may be named for the purpose of giving effect to the will of parliament, whatever it may be.

Mr. RALSTON: That is a question of policy.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a question of policy; it is a question of law, as to whether the power can be legally delegated. The question of policy is as to the product to which it shall apply. The question of law is whether, under the constitution, it did or did not apply, and the courts held that the power was there, that it was inherent in the exercise of the functions of government. The long argument that has taken place to-night about substituting somebody for parliament has been long since abandoned and forgotten. It is so old that I am surprised at its being dragged out here at this time.

That principle has been acted upon by governments in this country; it was acted upon by the government of the right hon. leader of the opposition. The question of the principle is not measured by the size of the commodity with which it deals. I have not interposed in this debate; I do not desire to do so, but the other evening I listened to a very long and tedious argument with regard to the question of taking money out of the unappropriated consolidated fund. Just for the amusement of it I looked at section 7 of the Old Age Pensions Act, and that section provides that all the money this country pays for old age pensions shall be paid out of the unappropriated consolidated fund. That act was passed by the government of my right hon. friend. So, you see, the question of a principle is not measured by the number of commodities that it affects or the extent of its application; the question is whether or not the principle is legal and sound, and all the extravagant language that has been used does not detract from the fact that every principle contained in this bill has run the gamut of the courts and has been established by decisions of the court of last resort in this empire, the privy council.

Mr. RALSTON: The courts have not decided it to be good policy.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of the application of the principle has been decided. Whether or not that principle should be applied to given commodities is a matter for the government of the day to submit to the house, and the government of the day has submitted it. The principle is settled. I say once more to this committee that from the first paragraph of this bill to the last there is not a single principle that has not run the gamut of the courts and been determined by the court of last resort to be a valid exercise of the federal power.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has parliament nothing to say about it?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; the question of the commodities to which it refers; the question of the submission by the government of its policy within those principles is covered by the statute submitted.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 22, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CHIGNECTO CANAL

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house the report of the Chignecto canal commission. This is made up of part one, the commission's findings; part two, the surveys and estimates; part three, the extent and scope of the commission's investigation and also a number of appendices and maps which are applicable to the findings.

CONSTRUCTION CAMPS

REPORTED REGULATION PROHIBITING THE HOLDING OF POLITICAL MEETINGS

On the orders of the day.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked me a question regarding the camps. I have been endeavouring to obtain some information on this subject but have not succeeded as yet. By to-morrow I shall be able to give a definite answer.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The minister states that he has not been able to obtain the necessary information but will give an answer to-morrow. I ask the minister if the matter of holding political meetings in construction camps under the control of the Department of National Defence is not a matter of policy which the minister himself must determine rather than anyone else? Could he not say now that within certain limits it will be permissible to hold meetings in the camps in an orderly and proper manner?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The question has several sides to it and I want to go into the matter very thoroughly. By to-morrow I shall be able to give a definite answer.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HEENAN

On the orders of the day.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, during my absence from the house on April 24 the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) made a statement which will be found on page 2513 of Hansard. In referring to myself he said:

In the month of March of that year—

That is, 1930—

—he drew $520 sessional indemnity, $700 for expenses, and as Minister of Labour he drew $1,200, making a total of over $2,500 for that one month in 1930.

I have waited for nearly three weeks to try to catch the hon. member in his seat, but I have not been successful. I had hoped to make a correction while the hon. member was present, but I do not think the matter should go any further. I just want to say that that statement is not true.

SILVER COVERAGE

On the orders of the day.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, further to the question asked yesterday of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as head of the Department of External Affairs. I should like to know if any negotiations have been carried on between this government and the President of the United States.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I take it the hon. member is quite familiar with what transpired at the economic conference held in London and with the agreement which was signed by Canada, the United States and other silver producing countries. The action now being taken by the United States affects its domestic policy and what action may be taken by this country, if, as and when that policy is made effective by legislation, is a matter I cannot anticipate. At the present moment we are following with great care the action which has been taken but obviously I can take no further steps at this time.

FREIGHT RATES ON LUMBER

On the orders of the day.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): A few days ago the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) asked me if I would obtain a ruling supposedly put out by the board of railway commissioners dealing with freight rates on lumber coming east from British Columbia. I made inquiries and the board informed me by letter that they had issued no such ruling. However, having seen several references in the press to lower rates I made further inquiry of the board and I find that they neglected to inform me that the railways had already filed a reduced rate with the board. In fact, I think that rate was in effect at the time they told me they had made no ruling. They were technically correct in saying that they had made no ruling but I am at a loss to know why they did not inform me that lower rates had already been put into effect. I did not wish to be accused later of misleading either my hon. friend or the house.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): The minister will correct me if I am wrong but I understand that under the act the railways have authority to make a rate similar to the water rate without consultation with or application to the board. Technically the board of railway commissioners were correct in the statement they made.

Mr. MANION: The railways have to file it with the board but they do not have to get a ruling. I did not know of their decision to lower the rates and I did not want to give any misleading information.

FUEL OIL CHARGES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to a matter which has come to my knowledge within the last few days. There are certain companies which supply fuel oil throughout the country, such as the Imperial Oil Limited and the Champlain Oil Products Limited. Last year the Champlain Oil Products Limited, which was then operating under the name of the Lasalle refinery, quoted a price of eight and a half cents per gallon for a winter supply of oil, while the Imperial Oil quoted ten cents per gallon. This year the contracts made by these two companies, the Imperial Oil and the Champlain, are at the same price in each case, 9½ cents. I have asked these people if either of these companies would quote a lower price, and I was given to understand that there would not be any lower price than 9½ cents. I do not know whether this is a combine or whether there has been a bargain or arrangement made between these two companies to keep up the price at a certain fixed level, but if such a thing as that does obtain I would ask the minister if it is the intention of the present price spreads committee to conduct an investigation into the matter.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The suggestion of the hon. gentleman is obviously that a combine exists. Now the Combines Investigation Act provides a very simple method of inquiry. All that is required is for six citizens, I think it is, who feel they have a grievance, to make their complaint, and then a preliminary investigation is held. I would suggest that my hon. friend consider making an application in that way. So far as the committee is concerned I am not in a position to make any statement about its intentions in regard to an investigation at the present moment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I think that some other business and the prices they charge are being investigated by that committee and I do not think in those cases any complaints were made under the Combines Investigation Act. For instance, the rubber industry is going to be investigated by that committee and the tobacco industry is being investigated, but I do not think any complaints were laid in either case under the Combines Investigation Act.

EMPIRE DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Prime Minister has any undertaking been given by the Canadian government to the British government with regard generally to an empire defence policy, and particularly with regard to aviation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The answer is no.

HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES

BILL TO LEGALIZE LOTTERIES WHEN CONDUCTED BY PROVINCES

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo) moved the second reading of Bill No. 56 with respect to hospital sweepstakes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I think under existing conditions I should in the first place express on behalf of the members of the house as well as those outside who are in favour of this measure their appreciation of the action of the Prime Minister in allowing this question to be debated and allowing each member to vote on a measure of this kind according to his own best judgment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Obedient servants.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Hon. members on the other side of the house seem to be surprised because they can vote the way they like.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And you too.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): The bill before the house is identical in form with the bill rejected by this house a year ago. The purpose of the bill is to empower the attorney general of any province to authorize a committee to conduct sweepstakes or lotteries within the province for the benefit of hospitals.

The committee will have full powers of regulation over all angles of the sweep. There is no possibility of private gain.

I think that all will agree that hospitals generally are in dire need of additional sources of revenue. The principal sources of hospital revenue in the province of British Columbia are provincial grants, municipal grants and pay patients. Provincial and municipal governments have been obliged materially to reduce their grants and the number of patients unable to pay their bills has increased. Voluntary subscriptions have always been an infinitesimal source of revenue for the operation of hospitals in Canada.

Under existing legislation, all lotteries not authorized by parliament are illegal. The only lottery so authorized is the distribution by chance of works of art of voluntary associations.

I deem it unnecessary to dwell at length on the moral issue involved. In regard to this feature public opinion is strongly divided. Those who are convinced it is wrong to engage in any form of gambling are not likely to alter their opinions by any arguments that I may be able to adduce and those who see no harm in gambling are just as unlikely to be convinced to the contrary.

The fact that a similar bill was twice rejected in another place before it was finally passed with a majority is evidence of changing opinion on this subject.

The premier of Quebec has definitely declared that he favours the enactment of a measure of the character of this bill. In the city of Vancouver in 1932 a plebiscite was submitted at the time of the municipal elections and the vote in favour of the principle of sweepstakes was 25,735 for, 9,777 against, or a majority of nearly three to one in favour of the principle. The question submitted was:

> Are you in favour of legalized sweepstakes, to be operated under the direct control of the British Columbia government for the benefit of hospitals within the province?

The British Columbia Hospital Association, which includes practically all the hospitals in the province, is on official record as in favour of sweepstakes for the benefit of hospitals. The union of British Columbia municipalities requested the provincial government to submit the question to a plebiscite at the time of the general election. I also understand that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada has expressed itself as in favour of a measure of this kind.

Some indication of the revenue available for distribution can be obtained from the result of the Irish lotteries. As a result of a royal commission on lotteries and betting appointed by the British government, this is now a matter of official record and the figures which I will give to the house are taken from the final report of that commission.

The review covers the first eight sweeps in the Irish Free State hospital sweepstakes. I do not propose to give the revenues derived from each of these sweeps but will bulk them into one lump sum for the benefit of the house.

The total subscriptions, including sellers' commissions, amounted to £27,122,490; sellers' commissions £4,520,413; sellers' prizes £274,352; expenses £1,907,921; stamp duty £678,382, and by the way the stamp duties have only been levied on the last three sweeps; received by the hospitals £4,880,131; prize fund £14,861,292.

Summarized the results are as follows:

Sellers' commission	£4,520,413
Sellers' prizes	274,352
Other expenses	1,907,921
Stamp duty	678,382
	£7,381,068

A summary of the distribution of the total amount of money received is as follows:

	Per cent
All expense	27.22
Prize fund	54.79
Hospitals	17.99
Total	100.00

I want the house to understand that that refers to only the first eight sweepstakes. Another one has been conducted since then, but I did not think it fair to submit it along with the official record. It is, however, easily available to hon. members. Might I just at this point make this remark: The amount of money that has been handed to the hospitals for their benefit and upkeep is 17·99 per cent of the total amount received. That is a pretty fair proportion out of the total to be distributed; it would be a pretty fair proportion for any commercial organization and I do not think any fault should be found with the hospital sweepstakes on that account.

In my humble opinion, one of the strongest arguments in favour of the bill is the fact that the existing prohibitory legislation does not prohibit. The present law, both in Canada and Great Britain prohibits the sending of lottery tickets through the mails. It is a matter of conjecture how much money goes out of Canada for foreign lotteries, but there is the record of the royal commission of the British government of the approximate amount which went from Great Britain to Ireland. For the first eight sweeps the commission estimates this amount was £18,745,000, or 69 per cent of the total. It is therefore clear that existing prohibitory laws do not prohibit. A statute which is ignored and violated by a large number of citizens brings all laws into contempt. I need only cite the evils which flowed from the violation of prohibition laws. One commentator on this condition in the United States stated that "fathers and mothers had taken to making their own whiskey in order to protect the young people from being poisoned by the product of the bootlegger." Postal regulations prohibit the use of the mails for sending lottery tickets and collecting the money realized, but the practical application of these regulations would indicate no serious attempt to check this practice. If tickets are found in the mail they are detained and destroyed; there is no penalty on either the sender or the receiver. If money is found in the mails being remitted to the manager of the sweep, it is returned to the sender.

The reading of the report of the royal commission indicated that when prosecutions were instituted the penalties imposed were farcical, indicating that cognizance was taken by the authorities of public opinion and that the practice was general. The imposition of small penalties had the effect of discouraging the administrative authorities from taking further proceedings.

Restriction should be relaxed and authority given for the carrying on of regular and honest lotteries as indicated in the bill. A lottery is to the ordinary citizen what horse racing is to society. Surely it cannot be said that lotteries are a more pernicious form of gambling than horse races and we legalize horse races. It is well known that all kinds of gambling are indulged in and that it is impossible to prevent this. Society has its horse racing and gambling is carried on in almost all clubs. Speculators have the stock markets and exchanges for gambling in stocks and shares. These resorts are not available to the plain, every day, citizen and I contend that it is harsh discrimination that the day labourer on the farm, forest, mine, or high seas, is the only one who is to be legislated out of the opportunity for indulging in this mild form of gambling. I maintain that many of these labourers will not miss the five dollars which they will possibly spend in a year in legalized and controlled lotteries; a very large percentage of those who roam the silent places to search for minerals, or who live by the chase, would assist hospitals in this way and it is probably the only way in which they would ever think of contributing to these worthy causes.

Thirty governments sponsor lotteries. Practically all governments, except Japan, England and the United States conduct honest and respectable gambles for charitable or patriotic purposes and take in the form of taxation generous parts of the sums contributed.

France, in 1933, after September 20, sold $140,000,000 worth of tickets. From the total received 40 per cent is used by the government for pensions and farm relief and the sums provided for these purposes amount to something like $50,000,000. Panama lottery tickets are sold everywhere in the United States and those purchasing the tickets contribute to the support of the Panamanian hospitals.

The Mexican government operates a successful and honest $20,000,000 a year lottery, out of which its hospitals benefit to the extent of $3,500,000 per annum. Spain has a $25,000,000 Christmas lottery, the largest in the world. Cuba, Italy, and all South American governments also indulge in this mild form of gamble. The German lotteries authorized by the government provide funds for unemployment relief. Sweden devotes the profits of its lottery to the support of literature, art, drama and music.

There seems to be some concern in the minds of some people lest the sale of tickets will corrupt the morals and illegally separate the earner in various occupations from his money; that the range rider, the prospector and the trapper would be despoiled and defrauded. In my opinion, these very people would be quite generous in support of lotteries and would welcome the opportunity of contributing to the support of hospitals with the added incentive of the possibility of drawing a prize. The amount wagered by this class would not be large, probably not more than five or ten dollars per annum. Surely the expenditure of this amount will not seriously affect the individual or his dependents. I think the permission of a sweep will give to the ordinary citizen the privilege that the grain exchange, the stock market, or the race course gives to those who patronize them. The practice can hardly be condemned on the ground of gambling because even if it be admitted that it is gambling pure and simple, why should it be prohibited when gambling on horse races and stock exchanges is allowed.

I contend that the honestly conducted lottery is the humble worker's opportunity of playing the stock market or taking a flier on the races. I summarize the following reasons for the enactment of this bill:

1. Because almost every country indulges in lotteries.

2. Because the prohibitory laws do not prohibit.

3. Because substantial amounts of money are sent out of the country to benefit various worthy institutions in other countries.

4. Because existing prohibitory legislation is ineffective.

5. Because existing restrictions are out of harmony with public opinion.

6. Because the bill presented provides for honest administration and absolute control.

I might add that I have under my hand copy of a resolution which I shall read, and which was passed on several occasions by the Trades and Labour Congress and submitted to the government on Tuesday, February 14, 1934. The resolution, which is short, reads:

> Recognizing that sweepstakes and lotteries conducted under various subterfuges are prevalent throughout Canada, we again reiterate our request of last year that legislation be enacted making legal the conducting of sweepstakes under government supervision and control.

It is said that this resolution represents about 200,000 tradesmen residing in the Dominion of Canada.

It might also be interesting to inform the house that just before entering the chamber to speak on this subject I was handed a book of tickets for a lottery in Quebec. These tickets are being circulated this very day in the city of Ottawa. It is well known to every hon. member that not only Ottawa but a number of other cities in the dominion are being flooded with just such stuff as this. This is illegal but still it is being done.

Therefore, I say in closing that I think it is only right, that it will be a proper precedent, to legalize the establishment of lotteries in this country. So I have pleasure in moving, seconded by Mr. Gagnon:

> That the bill be now read a second time.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) and second his motion for the second reading of this bill. In doing so I am not committing myself to the support of any and every section of the bill or precluding the possibility of offering amendments; I merely desire now to approve the principle underlying the proposed legislation which as hon. members know has for its primary object to remove from the criminal code the prohibition of the organization and operation of lotteries in Canada. Nor need I emphasize the fact that a member who on second reading supports a bill is not closing the doors on the possibility of amendment. It is a truism to assert that the bill may be changed and modified before it becomes law. In order therefore to make my position clear, I confine my remarks to the propriety of amending the criminal code in order to legalize lotteries, and now refrain from commenting further on the present bill, which has been so very intelligently explained by the hon. member for Cariboo.

My hon. friend has stated that the people of his native province of British Columbia are in favour of setting up lotteries to help hospitals, as the same state of things now prevails in Ireland. As a matter of fact the mover of the present bill in the Senate, where it has been carried by a substantial majority, also comes from British Columbia.

May I give some reasons which apparently guided my hon. friend from Cariboo when he asked me to move the second reading of this bill? In the province of Quebec where I live, there prevails a strong sentiment in favour of lotteries. Newspapers of all shades of thought are overwhelmingly insistent that if the federal government is reluctant to permit or conduct national lotteries, at least the provinces may be given the power to organize, control or permit the organization and operation of lotteries within their borders. During the last session of the Quebec legislature a bill was passed unanimously by both houses in favour of the setting up of lotteries within the limits of the province. I did not at first intend to read the bill, because I understand that the secretary of the province, Mr. David, has sent to every hon. member of this house a booklet printed in the two official languages and containing: (a) a copy of the bill, (b) copy of the speech delivered by Mr. David when he introduced the bill, and (c) copy of the speech made by Mr. Taschereau, the premier of Quebec. But in view of the fact that at least one hon. member of this house has not deemed it wise to read the bill for reasons which he made known to the newspapers, I think I ought to read the bill, which is as follows:

An act to authorize the organizing of a lottery for educational and public charitable purposes.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

His Majesty, with the advice and consent of the legislative council and of the legislative assembly of Quebec, enacts as follows:

1. The lieutenant-governor in council may organize a lottery called "Lottery of the province of Quebec," and determine the duration, drawings, conditions and manner thereof.

2. The proceeds from the lottery, after deducting the amounts fixed for the prizes and those required to pay the expenses of organization and of selling of tickets and the other incidental expenses, as well as the salaries of the officers and employees appointed under section 3, must be employed exclusively for educational or public charitable purposes carried on in the province and designated by the lieutenant-governor in council.

3. The lieutenant-governor in council may appoint the officers and employees necessary for the carrying out of this act.

The remuneration of such officers and employees shall be fixed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act (revised statutes, 1925, chapter 10).

4. The lieutenant-governor in council, pending the collection of the sums derived from the lottery, may authorize the provincial treasurer to advance, out of the consolidated revenue fund, the moneys required to pay the expenses of organization and of selling of tickets and the other incidental expenses, as well as the salaries of the officers and employees appointed under section 3.

A special account of such advances must be kept in the treasury department, and the proceeds from such lottery must be used first for their repayment.

5. The lieutenant-governor in council may enact, amend or repeal regulations concerning all matters connected with the organization of the lottery, and with the carrying out of this act, not provided for by section 1.

6. The power given to the lieutenant-governor in council by section 1 shall be exercised only if a lottery of the nature of that contemplated by this act is not prohibited by a statute of the parliament of Canada.

Moreover, such power shall not be exercised if the parliament of Canada authorize the Canadian government to organize a general lottery in the whole of Canada, for purposes similar to those contemplated by the preceding provisions.

7. The provincial secretary shall be charged with the carrying out of this act.

8. This act shall come into force on the day of its sanction.

The bill I have just read has been passed unanimously, as I said, by both houses of the Quebec legislature. An address has also been voted by both houses of the legislature and sent to Ottawa. The hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) on April 23 last deposited some documents on the table of the house which are: (1) copy of Bill No. 41 which I have just read, (2) the letter from Mr. David to the Hon. Mr. Cahan, which is as follows:

Dear Sir,

You will please find enclosed copy of a resolution that was passed recently by the house, concerning lotteries in the province of Quebec.

Athanase David,
Secretary for the province.

And (3), resolution relating to Bill No. 41 entitled An Act to authorize the organizing of a lottery for educational and public charitable purposes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I have just read Bill No. 41, I do not wish to take time to read the resolution, which as you may surmise is along the same lines as the bill I have just read. It may be amusing to hon. gentlemen opposite that it should happen that one of Mr. Taschereau's opponents is in this house supporting his views with respect to lotteries. However, since the bill I have just read has received the unanimous support of all members of the Quebec legislature irrespective of party affiliations, I think I may go so far as to say without showing any lack of humility that I am in a measure voicing the public opinion of the province of Quebec, which is certainly strongly in favour of amending the criminal code to legalize lotteries.

However, I shall say frankly that in Quebec we believe this bill does not go far enough. If it is a sound principle to permit the setting up of lotteries to help hospitals, why should it not be as sound and reasonable to organize lotteries to help universities and other educational and charitable institutions? The principle is the same, only the mode of its application varies, and that can be adjusted by the legislature in order to prevent fraud and assure a substantial measure of relief not only to hospitals but also to universities and similar institutions, which are now, on account of the crisis, in dire distress. My hon. friend and desk mate the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge (Mr. Barrette), who as every one knows is not only a good friend of the farmers but also a great friend of the university of Montreal, has already drafted an amendment to this bill which he intends to move if it is accorded second reading. I understand that by his amendment he will try to have this house support the principle that lotteries may be established in some provinces in order to help universities and other educational or charitable institutions. Is it necessary that I should state how strongly I would like to help my own university of Quebec, as well as the hospitals of my home town?

At all events, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that we ought not to let this session conclude without thoroughly studying the principle of lotteries which, as you know, has been carefully investigated by the Senate who, for the last two years, have adopted by a substantial majority bills similar to that now before the house. I do not know of any group of men in Canada who, more than the members of the Senate, are opposed to extreme measures of a revolutionary or extravagant character. Surely the members of that chamber represent the moderate and respectable views of sound thinking, conservative Canadians who are afraid of revolutionary measures. Do hon. members of this house desire to let the people believe that they possess more wisdom, more common sense and more judgment than the members of the Senate possess?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. GAGNON: I leave the answer to the conscience of each and every member. A lottery is not a modern invention; it is not the creation of a decadent civilization. If you go back into history you will find that lotteries have flourished in almost every European country. I found a book written in 1933 by Mr. Pierre Coste, a Frenchman who is an expert on lotteries; from that book I extracted some notes, which I should like to pass on to the house. Lotteries seem to have originated in Rome under the republic before the Christian era, but took a greater importance with Augustus and the following emperors. At the time, they were part of the entertainments and festivals organized in the capital of the world.

Lotteries, in the modern sense, are to be found in Italy before the end of the 15th century. Lotteries for the benefit of churches and charity are met with as early as 1519 in Belgium. The first lottery authorized by the state in France took place in 1539. They spread quickly and were used for all kinds of purposes; for the construction of hospitals as early as 1658, just as in Ireland; for Paris fire stations in 1701, for the royal military school in 1757. Then the state stepped in and inaugurated its first official lottery in 1717 to redeem the state paper certificates. From that time on, many state lotteries were organized with great success, and in 1776 a permanent state lottery was established and functioned almost regularly until 1832. During its last thirty years, it produced an annual profit of $3,000,000. Since that time, after temporary exclusion, occasional state lotteries were instituted and this year a state lottery was run with great success and will be renewed next year.

In England, state authorized lotteries appeared as early as 1569. Later the state stepped in for its own benefit and from 1709 to 1824 the government conducted annual lotteries by which large sums were raised averaging yearly, between 1793 to 1824, about $1,500,000. Now the only permanent state authorized lottery in England, outside of charitable lotteries, is the Calcutta sweepstake.

Lotteries have been popular in almost all countries, Austria, Holland, Germany, Sweden, Switzerland and even China. Now several countries have made lotteries a state monopoly, like Italy, Spain and Prussia. The most important lottery in the world is the "Christmas Gordo," at Madrid. In several cases the state owned Italian lottery is supposed to have brought in as much as $20,000,000 a year.

A few moments ago, when I referred to the Senate, I heard some of my colleagues express a doubtful opinion about the wisdom of that body which gave a substantial majority in favour of the present bill. May I tell them that when I said that in England the state organized lotteries for the benefit of the state I was not colouring the truth at all. I would refer those who are learned in common law to one of the greatest legal minds of all times, Mr. Blackstone, and invite them to read his Commentaries on the Laws of England, volume 4, page 164, where the following will be found:

> As state lotteries were for many years found a ready mode for raising the supplies, an act was made, 19 George III, chapter 21, to licence and regulate the keepers of such lottery offices. They were, however, suppressed altogether by 4 George IV, chapter 60.

Then Blackstone continues:

> It was found necessary to pass a special act for the protection of those laudable associations generally called art unions, having for their object the promotion of a taste for the fine arts, and accordingly by 9 and 10 Victoria, chapter 48, any voluntary association constituted for the distribution of works of art by lot is to be deemed legal provided it be incorporated by charter or the deed constituting the association and its rules have been given, submitted to and approved of by a committee of the privy council.

Then through you, Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to the house: If it is moral and legal in England to conduct lotteries for the benefit of art unions why should it be immoral or against the law to conduct lotteries in Canada for the benefit of hospitals? I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Saturday Review of December 5, 1931:

> Millions of dollars are going year after year out of Canada to war veterans in Newfoundland, to hospitals in Ireland, and to the winners of the Calcutta sweepstakes in England.

There is but one argument against sweepstakes or lotteries, and it is that it would encourage gambling. That we admit would be a cogent reason why they should not take place if it were possible to encourage gambling, but, fortunately or unfortunately, gambling has already reached such proportions that to talk of its encouragement is as ridiculous as it would be for a nigger to complain of the effect of the sun upon its complexion, and we venture to suggest that if sweepstakes were legalized not one single man, woman or child would for that reason start gambling for the first time. . . . Moreover, those who are foremost in opposing the legalization of sweepstakes are by no means above the holdings of "lucky dip," and such like gambles, in their own churches and chapels. . . . For the first time for many years, we have a House of Commons alive to realities and determined to get something done. Leave it for the government to legalize lotteries for certain specific objects. In this way not only will some good work be carried on officially but our country will not appear quite such a fool in the eyes of the world.

It is not only gentlemen from the province of Quebec who support this bill. A few days ago I received a letter from the Good Fellowship Association of Toronto, which reads:

Dear Sir:

> At a meeting of this association it was decided to send the enclosed circular as to why we think you should support the sweepstake bill coming before parliament. It seems impossible to stop our people from taking a chance; then why not have it run fair and straight under government control and put a stop to the bootlegger who is making himself rich in running illegal sweepstakes. The social service at their meeting yesterday asked you not to pass the sweepstake bill. They evidently do not wish the money kept in this country and prefer sweepstakes being run in the illegal way now being done.
>
> Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia are overwhelmingly in favour of the bill and we have had no reports from the other provinces.
>
> Thanking you in anticipation of your kind support.
>
> Yours truly,
> C.Q.M.S. J. Carroll,
> Secretary.

Enclosed in this letter was a resolution which contains some very good arguments in favour of sweepstakes, and I may say that this association is supposed to include in its membership many distinguished citizens of the province of Ontario. It is true that the royal commission in England reported not very long ago that a revival of lotteries in that country was undesirable. It does not necessarily follow however that we ought to adopt the same policy in Canada. In this connection I need only quote such opinions as I have indicated, the opinion quoted from the Saturday Review and those of gentlemen from the province of Ontario and elsewhere.

Some fifteen or twenty years ago a great wave of public sentiment or opinion swept the whole of the North American continent against the sale of intoxicating liquors. One could not obtain a single glass of wine without exposing himself either to fine or to imprisonment. Surely no hon. member in this house will seriously contend that the standard of morals in Canada or in the United States was higher during the prohibition regime. I have no hesitation in stating that the regime of prohibition is the regime of hypocrisy, and one which generates abuses and which does not lead to any social or moral regeneration. The Volstead Act, which was accepted in the United States in 1918 was repealed by almost all the states of the American union. I am proud to state that in the Dominion of Canada my native province has initiated a policy of state control of liquor which has been accepted by all the provinces, successively. Hon. gentlemen opposite may claim credit for having initiated the policy. I state however that the idea was one which was accepted in 1893 by a caucus of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, when the Hon. L. J. Pelletier, then secretary of the province and member for Dorchester, and later Postmaster General, moved that a policy of state liquor control be accepted. It has been stated that owing to the opposition of the late Cardinal Taschereau this policy was not put into force in Quebec. Be that as it may, but while the Quebec policy may have had and may still have defects in the main it has been recognized as being based on a sound principle, and has proved to be beneficial to the state. In our province millions have been derived through the state control of liquor, and that money has been spent to help charitable and educational institutions.

May I now come to an aspect of the matter which to me seems amusing. I refer to that which I term the hypocrisy of the prohibition regime. In 1924 I spent a few weeks at Murray Bay, which is situated in the beautiful county of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain). During that summer I happened to meet the former President Taft who, as hon. members know, was in 1924 Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and who for many years during the summer months had been a resident at Murray Bay. One of his secretaries happened to be living in the same hotel as I was, and in the course of conversation directed to a discussion of the evils of the regime of prohibition he stated that when he wanted liquor in Washington he used to call his bootlegger over the phone. I leave it to your sense of humour, Mr. Speaker, to ascertain whether or not a law legalizing prohibition may be surely and effectively put into force in the United States of America when the secretary to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court simply has to phone his own bootlegger when he wants liquor. I leave it to your good judgment, sir, to determine whether such a regime is better than a regime of state control of liquor such as that now flourishing in all the provinces of Canada.

Now, sir, it seems to me that if lotteries are properly supervised and controlled by the state they could not be more harmful to society than would be the sale of liquor. I shall not go farther in my attempt to establish that the principle of lottery is sound, and that it is not conducive to immoral consequences. If we agree on that proposition how are we to proceed to legalize lotteries? Opinions on this point are divided. I share the views of those people who state that if in Canada we legalize lotteries we ought to keep them under our own control and organize a national lottery, the proceeds of which in a time of emergency should be used for national purposes. Some hon. members, however, believe that we ought to use them to relieve unemployment, and others hold the view that it would be better to use the proceeds from lotteries to help hospitals or other charitable or educational institutions.

May I in this connection refer to what was said by Premier Taschereau of Quebec when he spoke in favour of the bill before the legislature of that province. He said:

> I would prefer, as far as I am concerned, that we have one great Canadian lottery under the direction of the Ottawa government. We wish Ottawa to create a national lottery like that in France. That would be better than having a lottery in each province because with provincial lotteries there will be competition between them, and we don't know where that would lead. Whereas if we have a national lottery under the auspices of the federal government, I know that apart from being also honestly conducted, the profits will be divided between the provinces on a population basis to be used for charitable and educational purposes.

I have quoted those words to indicate that the Quebec legislature has studied the problem on a rather high plane. Mr. Taschereau concluded his speech in the Quebec Legislative Assembly in using such words as the following:—

> If Canada is unwilling to set up a national sweepstake, let Canada permit the provinces to act as they please.

I know of no reasons why parliament should prevent the provinces from organizing lotteries within their own borders, if in fact no national lottery is set up. We must not forget that of whatever mind we may be in our opposition to the principle of the establishment of lotteries, tickets for the English, Irish and foreign lotteries are being sold everywhere in Canada, notwithstanding the provisions in our criminal code. Strange to say, I know an hon. member who sits not very far from me who, I have no doubt, will speak against the present bill and who, nevertheless, has in his pocket a ticket on the English Derby to be run on June 6, 1934. I respectfully invite him to show his ticket when in a few minutes he rises to oppose my views.

Every year millions of dollars of Canadian money go abroad to relieve foreign institutions. Our money goes to Ireland, to Calcutta and to all places where there are sweepstakes. You cannot, by any arbitrary provision inserted in the criminal code prevent a man purchasing a ticket on the Calcutta or Dublin sweepstakes any more than you could prevent him having a glass of beer or wine under a prohibition regime.

May I now say only a few words with respect to the bill introduced by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain). I would have no objection to voting for his bill which, in all respects, I prefer to the present one. On the other hand, I think we ought not to divide our forces. We ought to unite on the principle of the present bill which embodies the whole matter of sweepstakes. After the house voted in favour of the principle of provincial sweepstakes we could deal with sympathy with my hon. friend's bill.

At this point I wish to refer to the remarks of Premier Taschereau in the Quebec legislature. He spoke as follows:

> At the same time, this article of the criminal code makes an exception, and I wonder who suggested it. It permits Canadians to take part in lotteries held in London under the auspices of the Art Union. It is not permitted to spend one dollar in Canada for a lottery, but millions may be spent, even to the last dollar, for lotteries in London. I have enough national pride to believe that we can do the same thing here.

I merely quote what Mr. Taschereau said in order to show that if an amendment to the criminal code was passed in 1900 permitting lotteries for English art unions it was not because of the Conservatives, because that measure was enacted under the initiative of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Liberal leader in the Senate. He voted to legalize sweepstakes in Canada to favour the art unions in England. I refer the house to what Mr. Dandurand said in 1932, as reported on page 48 of the Senate Hansard. He said:

> The Senate in 1900 passed a bill that restricted lotteries to those of the Art Gallery Association of London and one or two others, which I succeeded in having exempted. Those were the only exceptions from the operation of the criminal code.

If hon. friends opposite during the next elections want to make the people believe that we are not true Canadians because Canada favours the art unions of Great Britain, I hope they will remember that the father of that offspring was the Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the leader of the Liberal party in the Senate.

I think I have said enough to make known the views of my province with respect to lotteries. However, I should like to advance another argument in favour of a national lottery for national purposes. I have as my authority an article by Mr. Richard W. Scott which appeared in the Saturday Night of May 5, 1934. This is entitled "There's Money in State Lotteries." I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note that we in Quebec are always pleased to be enlightened by Toronto when the occasion arises. The subtitle reads, "Here's an idea we could borrow from France, where state lotteries are used to reduce the national debt, satisfy the urge to gamble and actually promote thrift." The article reads:

> The first English state lottery so far as can be ascertained was floated in 1569.

Mr. Scott then proceeds to explain that for almost two hundred years England continued to organize lotteries for the benefit of the state. He states that the usual method was to sell large blocks of tickets to contractors who in turn retailed them to the general public. Mr. Scott then goes on to explain what takes place in France. He says:

> France, always the great realist among the nations of the world, recognized very soon after the war that she must raise money in hitherto unheard of quantities and recognized also that even her thrifty people whether for good or evil enjoyed nothing so much as a gamble. France was already in the gambling business to the extent that she licensed gambling casinos, as we do race tracks, and took, again as we do, a "cut" on the total amount bet. What then was more reasonable than to ask her citizens to gamble directly with the government by means of a state lottery? France asked and her citizens accepted the invitation with almost unexpected enthusiasm. The French plan is here described because it seems most probable that if Canada does turn to the lottery in a desperate effort to restore her finances we shall adopt something similar to it.
>
> Marianne is nothing if not practical. Are her people of a saving nature? Then encourage them to save. Do they also want to gamble?

Then combine saving with gambling in such a way that both will serve to give the government an ever-increasing supply of ready cash. It would seem to be impossible to combine these three desiderata but that is exactly what France has done and everyone, at least in that country, is satisfied with the result. In brief, France satisfies the great French appetite for an absolutely safe savings scheme by selling low denominational government bonds and, by linking a lottery chance with each bond, satisfies also the inherent desire of nearly every human to "take a chance."

The essential point of the scheme is that the bonds are charged in the government's accounts as bearing interest of (for example) four per cent, but instead of being paid at this rate bondholders receive only three per cent on their capital and the other one per cent is used as prizes given to holders of bonds which are determined by lot. Thus everyone is pleased. The frugal peasant is given a gilt-edged government bond priced within his slender means, the gambler has a chance to win ease and comfort even while saving his money, while the government finds a ready market for its bonds at an interest rate that is pleasantly low.

However, let us leave France and try to apply the scheme to Canada. Is it workable and if so how would it work? The best way to answer these questions is to set up a concrete example. Let us suppose that the government desires to raise $50,000,000 at a very low rate of interest and decides to apply the French premium-bond plan to a loan of this amount.

Instead of following the old practice of issuing bonds in denominations of $500 and multiples at 4½ per cent, most of which would be bought by banks, insurance companies and a few rich individuals, the government would issue one million bonds with a par value of $50 each bearing interest at the rate of three per cent per annum and set aside a further one per cent of the principal each year as prize money.

Each bond would bear a serial number and once each year the government would determine by lot which bonds won prizes. In the case of a $50,000,000 issue, for example, this prize money would amount to $500,000 yearly which might be divided something like this:

1 first prize	$100,000
1 second prize	50,000
1 third prize	25,000
10 fourth prizes at $10,000 each	100,000
100 fifth prizes at $1,000 each	100,000
100 sixth prizes at $500 each	50,000
750 seventh prizes at $100 each	75,000
963 prizes total	$500,000

Such a scheme for dividing the prize money is of course only advanced to show one of the many ways in which it could be done. It is not in accordance with the French plan which gives many and smaller prizes, but would, I think, appeal to those of us who now waste thousands a year in a vain effort to capture the capital prize in the Irish sweeps.

I advise hon. members to read that well-written article which is very enlightening on the utilizing of lotteries for the conversion of a national debt. It seems to me that the system used in France could be adapted to Canada. As has been pointed out by Mr. Scott it combines the gambling and the sane investing elements and is not at all against public morals in the broader sense of the word. I am entirely in favour of the setting up of a national lottery for national purposes but if this principle cannot be accepted by the majority of this house, then I ask hon. members to permit the provinces to act as they see fit within their own limits. It is for these reasons that I gladly support the bill sponsored so cleverly and intelligently by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser). The province of Quebec is very happy to support the views of the sympathetic population of the beautiful province of British Columbia.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, when freedom of action was given to hon. members on both sides of the house in connection with this bill it apparently included freedom of speech because there was so much noise in this section of the chamber that it was almost impossible for us to follow the speeches of the proposer and seconder of this bill. If I repeat anything that has been said by these two gentlemen it will be just too bad for me. I followed the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) in the historical exposé that he gave of the question of lotteries, and I agree with all the facts that he stated, but I go further than he did and say that the origin of lotteries or sweepstakes, as the modern name is, is to be found in the old Egyptian days when the peasants were given land to cultivate and the instruments with which to cultivate it through the means of lotteries. The Romans started their festivities with lotteries, and from Rome the practice was extended to France, where many public buildings were put up from the proceeds of lotteries. Churches, hospitals and public institutions were built with the moneys derived from these lotteries. We can go on down through the centuries and find that lotteries have continued to exist through all that time.

The Mississippi Bubble, under Law, was a lottery. You put your money in and got nothing out. Coming down to more modern lotteries, the Louisiana state lottery played quite an important part in the history of the United States. This lottery was founded after the Civil War. Two carpet-baggers went down to the state of Louisiana and mulcted the population of that state and of the whole United States. I was only a child at the time, but I remember that the men of my family, my father and my uncles, used to buy tickets in this lottery. But it was not under government control and the abuses became so great that the statute authorizing it was repealed, and the lottery organization took itself to Honduras where it only existed for a very short time.

I have found in one of the American magazines an article giving the history of modern lotteries. The most important is given as the Dublin Irish hospital sweepstakes, based on three famous horseraces each year, the Derby at Epsom Downs in June, the Grand National at Aintree in March, and the Cambridgeshire at Newmarket in October. The total annual prize money approximates $22,000,000.

At Paris there is the French national lottery. Public drawings are held in the famous Trocadero theatre. The first prize amounts to about $300,000. The total revenue is estimated at $110,000,000, of which the government receives $45,000,000.

At Mexico city there is the national lottery for public benefit which has existed for more than a century. Drawings are held on thirty-eight Fridays, forty-four Tuesdays and forty-six Sundays throughout the year. The prizes amount to about $15,000,000, and Mexican hospitals, homes and charities receive about $20,000,000 each year.

At Calcutta, India, the Calcutta sweepstakes are run by the Royal Calcutta Turf Club, based on the Derby run at Epsom Downs in June. The first prize is approximately $300,000.

At Havana, Cuba, the Cuban national lottery is conducted by the government. Prizes are drawn three times each month, with special drawings at Christmas and on the anniversary of the presidential inaugural. The receipts are estimated at $30,000,000. The first prize is sometimes as much as $100,000. The awards are never published.

The principality of Liechtenstein has a sweepstake based on the Lincolnshire handicap run in England in March. Over $250,000 in prizes was announced.

Madrid, Spain, holds a lottery three times a year, and at Chrtismas the great prize, sometimes as much as $2,000,000, is drawn. Prizes are not announced. It might not be uninteresting to the house and it will certainly serve the purpose of my drawing to a conclusion the few remarks I have to make in this matter if I quote from this article a few words in connection with the organization of the Irish hospital lottery:

This lottery was organized by Mrs. Lanigan O'Keefe of Dublin, generally recognized as the "mother of the Irish Sweepstakes." She conceived the idea back in 1930, when the hospitals of the Irish Free State were in such desperate financial straits that it looked as though many of them would have to close their doors. Mrs. O'Keefe had been cogitating the possibilities of a lottery for some time. The National Maternity hospital, in which she was interested, was foremost in her mind; but since the other hospitals were in equally bad financial shape, and since there were no anti-lottery laws on the statute books of the Irish Free State, she visualized the lottery on a larger scale.

By an act of parliament passed by the Dail and ratified by the Seanad in June, 1930, the Hospital Trust, Limited, of Dublin, was established for the express purpose of organizing and managing a series of sweepstakes to be based on the three great English racing meets, the Grand National at Aintree, the Derby at Epsom Downs, and the Cambridgeshire Handicap.

Their success was almost instantaneous. Managed and promoted by an efficient business organization, and conducted under strictest government supervision, the Irish Sweepstakes soon became the byword of the English-speaking world, and there was a market for the tickets in every portion of the globe.

Even in the United States, where the embargo on lottery tickets is strictly enforced, it has been impossible to keep tickets for the Irish Sweepstakes out of the country.

In 1931, £5,000,000 in prize money was distributed (approximately $22,000,000), and over £1,800,000 (about $7,300,000) was distributed among the thirty-eight hospitals participating. It is estimated that the complete figures for the year 1932 were almost double these amounts.

So that now, three times each year, we have enacted in the Mansion House in Dublin a scene which rivals even the romantic drawings of the Calcutta sweeps in its halcyon days. From all over the world, the counterfoils of the lottery are collected in the headquarters of the Hospital Trust, and then conveyed by a lorry, surrounded by an armed guard to the Mansion House where the drawing takes place.

An Irish Sweepstakes drawing has been called a press photographers' delight, so colourful is the setting. The millions of counterfoils are first separated and shuffled in an electrically operated air-blasting machine. Then they are loaded into the cars of a miniature railway, operated by pretty young colleens.

The railway cars are driven up to a huge steel cylinder, eighteen feet long and four or five feet high—a modern conception of the old lottery wheel. The counterfoils are dumped into this wheel and the twenty numbered holes, through which some of them will ultimately be drawn, are locked.

The names of the fifty or more horses entered in the race are printed on small slips which are rolled up and put into a smaller octagonal glass wheel. Then everything is set for the big drawing.

Under the supervision of the Chief Commissioner of Police and the Free State officials, an aperture in the cylinder is opened and a nurse withdraws a counterfoil. The number, name and address are read aloud and noted on the official records. Then, from the smaller cylinder, another ticket bearing the name of a horse is drawn and assigned to the holder of the counterfoil. When tickets for all of the horses entered have been drawn, the smaller "consolation" prizes are raffled.

News cables flash the news of the drawing over the world, and within a few short hours there is jubilation in some thousands of homes that is outweighed only by the unrecorded disappointment of millions of other ticket holders whose counterfoils never emerged.

Mr. Speaker, the question of lotteries in Canada is regulated by article 236 of the criminal code, which has already been referred to, and the sum and substance of which is that lotteries are prohibited throughout Canada with possibly two exceptions, the first being that lotteries organized for church purposes where the prizes are under fifty dollars are permitted, as well as the lotteries of the Art Union of London to which the hon. member for Dorchester has referred.

I heartily concur in the remarks made by the hon. member when he cited the opinion of Hon. Mr. Taschereau, Premier of Quebec, that it was too bad that all this money should be allowed to go to an art union which does not belong to our country, throwing out the idea that it would be better to have this money remain in Canada.

The bill at present under discussion had a stormy career in another place. It was defeated, I think, on two occasions; last year it was accepted there but defeated in this house and it now comes before us in its present form. The question of how this bill is being received in Canada has been dealt with by previous speakers but there is no doubt as to Quebec being in favour of the measure because the provincial legislature unanimously adopted the principle and the documents showing this to be so have been laid on the table of the house. In other provinces considerable support has been given to this bill. In another place the sponsors of it came from British Columbia. The city of Vancouver has passed resolutions favouring sweepstakes and I have before me a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen, under date of March 13, 1934, which states:

The Vancouver city council has endorsed the Senate bill which would legalize sweepstakes and to-day decided to memorialize parliament to the effect that Vancouver ratepayers had voted favourably on the proposal in a plebiscite.

I have been receiving from Ontario numerous communications both for and against this bill. In that province the sporting spirit exists to such an extent that only last Saturday some 22,000 people were present at the running of the King's Plate; this was a very good attendance and I think we may take it that the sentiment in Ontario is, at least to a certain extent, in favour of this legislation. In the other chamber a very able speech was delivered by a senator from Manitoba who expressed the opinion that his province was in favour of the bill. I have not heard what the opinion of the maritime provinces is, but I think we may take it that public opinion throughout Canada is generally in favour of something along these lines being done.

As has been stated, there is no doubt that sweepstake tickets are being sold throughout this dominion, in Ottawa and other cities. Keeping on the statute books an unpopular measure is a very dangerous state of affairs for any country. We know the situation that existed in Canada a few years ago when prohibition was in force in different provinces. In Quebec we had a certain measure of prohibition but seeing the unpopularity of such a law the local government changed it and brought down the measure that at present exists in our province. In other provinces where prohibition formerly existed to a greater or lesser extent, they followed the footsteps of Quebec and the laws that are now in force throughout the country are popular. I recall very distinctly that when the present liquor law of Quebec was put on the statute books great apprehension was felt regarding the family. It was feared at that time that those public places where drinking was allowed would bring this habit into the family; that in family circles drinking would become an habitual affair and that great harm would thereby result. The history of the law in Quebec shows that nothing like that has happened because the people of our province are in favour of the law being an open and frank one.

The history of prohibition in the United States is so recent that there is no necessity to refer to it but we all recall the appalling conditions that existed there prior to the repeal of the Volstead law. Bootleggers, hijackers, racketeers, were running rife throughout the country and conditions became so terrible that horrible crimes were committed like the abduction and murder of the Lindbergh child and the abduction of that young girl of six years, June Robles, in Arizona, who lived in what was practically a grave for about nineteen days. Such conditions were the result of this unpopular law. To-day in Canada we know lottery or sweepstake tickets are being dealt in openly and one reason I am in favour of this measure is that the law will be an open one; that it will meet with the approval of the people and that under it we may do legally what is now being done illegally.

Another point that I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members is the present provision in the law as to the informer who lays a charge against the holder of a winning ticket in a lottery. The law as it stands now gives to the informer against the holder of a winning ticket the right to claim his winnings. It seems to me that this is an obnoxious clause in our law, and no matter what happens to this or any other bill of a similar kind that may come before the house, this clause should be repealed, this provision wiped out and if the public think it necessary to make such an enactment against a winner in a sweepstake, the money so forfeited should go, not to the hypocrite who lays the information but to the state. In effect the law has no result, because as soon as a person is informed that he or she has won a prize in a sweepstake, that person's cousin, uncle, aunt, or brother or someone else lays a charge against the winner, the winner is haled before the courts, judgment is given in favour of the relative, and this money instead of going to the winner goes to the person who is acting in collusion with him or her. Another feature of existing conditions is that those who purchase these sweepstakes tickets do not know whether the tickets they purchase are good or false. There are very many false tickets issued. If this law is passed, the operation being under government control there will be no such abuses in that particular as now exist.

Briefly summarized, the benefits to be derived from this law are that no doubt great benefit will accrue to the hospitals, for that is the aim of the law. I, like other hon. members from the province of Quebec, am in favour of an extension of the law. It should apply to charitable and scholastic institutions. Figures were given as to the profits accruing to the Irish Free State for the years up to 1931, but Premier Taschereau in his speech before the Quebec legislature, which has been sent to members of the house in book form, and which arouses so much ire on the part of the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan), says that Sir Thomas Tait computed the amount accruing to the Irish Free State as $50,000,000 for the year 1932. These figures have been verified by competent authorities. In his speech in the Senate, Senator McRae dealt thoroughly with this point. It was computed that twenty-five per cent of the proceeds were turned over to the hospitals. The proposer of this resolution gave the figure as 17·99 per cent but the figures I have enable me to say that in 1932, 25 per cent was turned over to the Irish Free State. Twenty-five per cent of $50,000,000 represents the handsome sum of $12,500,000, which that country derived from the sale of tickets for sweepstakes for its hospitals.

There is another point which has also been dealt with by other hon. members who spoke, which is that there is so much money going out of the country. There is the drainage of money, the flight of capital to other countries. Hon. Mr. David in his speech in the Quebec legislature referred to that feature. He said:

> I would be happy to be able to cite figures in this house to show what amounts yearly leave Canada and the province of Quebec through the purchase of tickets on lotteries of all kinds. I cannot give these details for the excellent reason that those concerned with the lotteries are not anxious for that kind of publicity. However, I do know that one agent of one of the greatest lotteries operated, which I may be pardoned for not mentioning, declared to one of his subagents that he had sold 120,000 books, ten tickets to the book, at $1 each ticket, which means $1,200,000 through the hands of one agent. An article by Howard McLellan in Readers Digest will give the house considerable information on the question of money being drained off by foreign lotteries.
>
> A recent declaration of the postal authorities at Washington attests the fact that lotteries alone have drained off three billion dollars in the last three years from the people of the United States. This does not include American lotteries which operate without the government knowing or being able to stop it.
>
> In the state of New York and in New England ticket sellers dispose of tickets to the value of $8,500,000 per month. In one instance seventeen million dollars' worth of counterfeit tickets were seized.
>
> In a town of ten thousand souls in the United States it was found that 112 local lotteries were operating. In another town, one of ninety thousand in New England, two-thirds of the population played the lotteries daily.

The paragraph ends by stating that in a great number of the states the principle of government lotteries is being accepted in order to put an end to this exploitation of the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it must be borne in mind that this tax would be a voluntary tax. No one would be obliged to purchase tickets for the sweepstake, and those who are not in favour of this sort of expenditure will not have to go into it. It might be borne in mind also that the winners of the large prizes will have to contribute their share to the public treasury through the income tax on the winnings they receive. As for the arguments against the bill, it is stated for one thing that it is economically unsound, that it distracts the people from the common duties of life. But surely the purchase of one ticket a year would not bring about such a condition. People do not buy these tickets with the absolute idea that they are going to win, the chances are too heavy against them. These chances are known. Tickets are bought more in a spirit of amusement than anything else. I am not one of those who believe that the purchase of a lottery ticket is a sinful practice. That is my opinion and I am entitled to it as much as those who believe that such a purchase is at least reprehensible are to theirs. Another argument against permitting sweepstakes for hospitals is that it will tend to withdraw voluntary support. But the obtaining of additional moneys from the public in this way can but add to the efficiency of such institutions. Already grants of public moneys are made to them, in addition to private contributions and bequests, and surely public-minded citizens who help hospitals in such a laudable manner now will not let themselves be deterred from continuing their beneficence. In these hard days of depression the hospitals will profit and benefit by this extra contribution, and I am sure they will be in favour of any extra money coming into their coffers.

In the report of the royal commission on lotteries and betting, issued in 1933, the British Hospital Association declares itself to be not in favour of the amendment of the law affecting public sweepstakes for the benefit of hospitals, for the reason that only two-fourteenths of the money went to the hospitals while seven-fourteenths went in prize money and five-fourteenths to sellers and for overhead. As I said a moment ago these figures have been contradicted by eminent authorities; after due investigation it has been clearly proved that twenty-five per cent of the money went to the hospitals. The figures concerning the money that went in expenses and overhead have been contradicted also. In any event a large number of employees must be hired in connection with a sweepstake, and their employment would give a certain amount of relief to different governments in the saving of public money expended in the form of unemployment relief.

I remember when illegal lotteries were operating in the city of Montreal. It was only in isolated cases that any ill effects were discovered so far as the youth were concerned, and one of the main arguments of the opponents to this bill is that the legalization of sweepstakes will have a disastrous effect upon the youth of the country. These lottery tickets were sold openly in the city of Montreal, and at that time I was only a young boy. It did not affect me then; if that were the only sin I had charged against me I would be very glad. Numerous countries operate lotteries, including France, Ireland, Germany, Italy, Holland, Spain, Portugal and Mexico, and it has not been shown that the standard of morality or the social life in these countries has been lowered by this custom. In a general way it has been admitted throughout the world that games of chance, when carried on under proper conditions, in moderation and with honesty, should be tolerated.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and for the reasons already given and to be given by other speakers, I am in favour of this bill and will vote for it.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, very briefly I wish to state my position with regard to this bill. I cannot vote for it because, after careful study, I believe it to be ultra vires of the parliament of Canada. This parliament has jurisdiction in criminal matters, and we enacted section 236 of the criminal code dealing with lotteries. When we enacted that section dealing with the criminal aspects of the creation and administration of lotteries, so far as provincial lotteries are concerned, I think we exhausted our legislative jurisdiction.

By this bill the parliament of Canada purports to authorize the attorney general of any province to authorize a committee created by himself to organize a sweepstake for the purpose of raising money for the benefit of one or more hospitals within such province. I should like some hon. gentleman to inform me where, under the British North America Act, we acquire jurisdiction over the attorney general of a province which would permit us to authorize him to create a committee to raise money for certain provincial purposes. I do not think that power exists within the four corners of the British North America Act. Section 92 of that act provides:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—
>
> 7. The establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

This bill deals with the raising of money for provincial hospitals; as I understand it that is the principle and policy of the bill, yet the raising of money for such hospitals, for their establishment, their maintenance and their management, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislature of the province. Therefore I personally raise my objection to placing upon the statute books of Canada a bill at least four-fifths of which I believe to be beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament.

If I may be permitted to do so I should like to examine section 3 of the bill. This section contains twelve paragraphs, by which we authorize the attorney general of the province to authorize a committee to organize a sweepstake for the purpose of raising provincial funds. Under the authority of the attorney general we authorize this committee to specify the hospital or hospitals to be benefited; to specify the person or persons to whom the moneys to be applied for the benefit of the hospital or hospitals shall be paid; to specify the event or events upon which the winner or winners of the sweepstakes shall be determined; to specify when the sale of tickets may commence and when it must cease; to specify the price of tickets; to specify the form and contents of the tickets; to specify what portion or what amount out of the proceeds of the sale of tickets shall be applied for the benefit of the hospital or hospitals, what portion shall be applied for defraying the expenses of the sweepstake and what portion shall be paid in prizes; to specify how many prizes there shall be, and so on. Certainly all these provisions are beyond the authority of the parliament of Canada when dealing with the raising of funds for a provincial purpose.

Mr. GIROUARD: Do I understand the Secretary of State, (Mr. Cahan) to say that this matter comes within the provincial jurisdiction? If so, is my hon. friend of the opinion that the provincial governments have the right to legalize sweepstakes for charitable purposes?

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed certainly I will not omit some consideration of that point. It is my personal opinion that the legislature of the province of Quebec, when enacting the measure which was enacted with the unanimous approval of the house of assembly and the legislative council, was acting within its exclusive legislative jurisdiction except for one aspect, namely that by section 236 of the criminal code the parliament of Canada has declared that the organization, maintenance and operation of lotteries is illegal and is a crime except for one or two conditions which are imposed by way of exceptions to that measure. Therefore, if we are to approach the real issue it appears to me that it can be approached only by some such amendment to the criminal code as that proposed by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain).

Mr. CASGRAIN: Thank you.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: The amendment suggested by the hon. member if I may be permitted to refer to it, declares that "lotteries organized by the government of a province of Canada for educational or public charitable purposes, under a law of the legislature of such province" shall be excepted from the operation of section 236 of the criminal code. If this were a question of the House of Commons authorizing national lotteries to be created and maintained by the government of Canada for all Canada, I certainly would vote against it. I believe there are very strong objections to the organization and maintenance of national lotteries, and sitting as an hon. member of this chamber and dealing with a national question I am bound to exercise my judgment as to the moral or immoral effects of the proposed legislation. But our ideas of morality differ—as between individuals in this house they differ; as between the people resident in the different sections of the dominion, they differ, and I have always hesitated to enact criminal laws which declare to be criminal certain acts which a large body of people in the country regard as legal, moral and defensible. Therefore I think this bill in a rather clumsy fashion, if I may say so, endeavours to usurp provincial jurisdiction. But with regard to whether this parliament should except from the operation of the criminal code lotteries, organized under the law of a province which was passed unanimously by both houses of the legislature of that province and which are to be carried on directly by the government of the province for two provincial purposes, namely hospitals and education—with regard to that principle may I say that if such a measure should come before this House of Commons, I could not give my vote in favour of declaring that to be criminal which the whole people of the province as represented by the unanimous vote of the legislature, have declared to be desirable and moral. Therefore, on that issue if the bill introduced by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay comes before the house for decision I think my position is clear. Unless I hear some very strong objection which, up to the present, I have not heard, I think I should have to except the provincial law from the operation of the criminal code, and to that end would vote for the measure. So far as any personal request of mine may have force and effect in this chamber may I state I think it most desirable that an opportunity be given by the house to the consideration of Bill No. 83.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister permit me to say that I have already asked the Prime Minister for that permission.

Mr. CAHAN: I am simply asking that it be granted, that is all. I am not surprised that the hon. member finds it rather embarrassing to have my support for any suggestion he may make.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am rather proud.

Mr. CAHAN: At the present time however I am simply speaking for myself and recording my views. I certainly cannot vote for the bill before the house because I consider it to be only so much waste paper and that, as an act of parliament, if the constitutional question were raised, it would prove ineffective and inoperative. If this bill purported to authorize a national lottery to be carried on by the government of Canada I would oppose it, but I am not prepared to declare that which in the opinion of the whole province in which I reside, as indicated by their representatives in both houses of its legislature, is moral and virtuous, is nevertheless criminal, and should be prohibited by the criminal law of this country.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to a discussion of the bill I purpose moving the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman):

That the word "now" be left out, and the words "this day six months" added at the end of the question.

I have listened with interest to the debate thus far, and the opinions put forward by the mover and seconder of the motion for second reading. The mover has said that this bill represents a mild form of gambling, and the seconder assured us that the province of Quebec is very strongly in favour of the measure—

Mr. BOURASSA: Not all of it, please.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And British Columbia also.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The statement of one hon. member was that a very large section of opinion across Canada was back of the bill, and I say that in that statement he is not correct. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) reviewed the history of lotteries in England. I noticed however that he did not follow that history all the way through. He began at the right date, namely in the year 1569, in the days of Queen Elizabeth. She had to have money to pay for her expensive wardrobe and to keep up expenses of a very extravagant court. Having exhausted means of taxation for raising money she resorted to lotteries, and as he intimated lotteries were kept up in England for a period of about two hundred and fifty years. Large sums of money were raised at times to support the national government. But the time came when the people of England, which had then become the United Kingdom of England and Scotland, including Wales, thought that from a national viewpoint it would be better not to have lotteries. In the year 1823 the sale of lottery tickets was made illegal in England, and in 1826 lotteries were finally abolished. So that from 1826 to the present date there have not been lotteries in England. It is true that a few years ago, following the heavy expenditures necessitated by the war, and the desire on the part of some people in the United Kingdom to raise much needed moneys, there was an agitation on the part of a minority again to resort to lotteries in England for purposes of raising money. This suggestion was perhaps put forward because of the situation existing in the Irish Free State where lotteries have been in vogue since 1930. Because of this agitation the question came before the parliament of the United Kingdom. The Britisher with his traditional carefulness and caution did not rush immediately into the establishment of a system of lotteries. He took a sensible course and on June 4, 1932, the British parliament appointed a royal commission composed of twelve members under the chairmanship of Sir Sidney Arthur Taylor Rowlatt. This commission was designated "to inquire into the existing law and the practice thereunder relating to lotteries, betting and gambling and cognate matters and report as to what changes if any were desirable and practicable." This commission held a number of meetings, it called witnesses and took evidence from persons representing the following organizations: The police of the metropolis, the chief constables of various cities, the Jockey Club, the National Hunt committee, the National Greyhound Racing Society, the hospitals, the British Charities Association, the Church of Scotland, the Scottish National League Against Betting and Gambling, the Salvation Army, the police courts, the Christian Social Council, the Charity Organization Society, the Post Office, the Scottish and Welsh Football Association, the Gaming Laws Reform Association, the newspapers, the National Bookmakers' Protection Association, the National Sporting League, the Association of Municipal Corporations, the Convention of Royal Burghs. Sir Josiah Stamp also appeared before the commission. They made their final report on June 1, 1933, which reads in part:

Lotteries. General conclusions. The institution of large lotteries in this country is not recommended. Such a step is undesirable in itself and unlikely to assist very materially in suppressing the sale in this country of tickets in lotteries promoted elsewhere. If it should be decided to permit the institution of any large lottery in this country (a step which is not recommended), the least objectionable form of lottery is a state lottery for the benefit of the exchequer.

The existing general prohibition in this country of all lotteries, whether promoted here or abroad, should be maintained, subject to the exemptions referred to below, and the law against foreign and illegal lotteries should be strengthened.

That is just part of the report made by the royal commission. Following up that recommendation I find the following article in the press under date of March 27:

Severe Blow to Irish Sweepstakes
British Government Publishes Terms of New Betting and Lotteries Bill

London, March 27.—A severe blow to lotteries such as the Irish and other sweepstakes is embodied in a new government betting and lotteries bill made public to-night.

The bill would make it illegal, in connection with any lottery in Great Britain or elsewhere, to print, sell, advertise, distribute tickets, or print or publish any description of a lottery or any list of prize winners or winning tickets in one.

The bill would make illegal bringing sweepstakes tickets or any other matter connected with a lottery into this country and would prohibit sending abroad by agents in this country the counterfoils or any money derived from the sale of lottery tickets.

That is the manner in which the United Kingdom has dealt with the agitation for the reestablishment of lotteries. The parliament of the United Kingdom represents a population of approximately 45,000,000 people of the Anglo-Saxon race and I think we in Canada with a population of a little over 10,000,000 might follow the experience and practice of the United Kingdom.

Reference was made to the United States by a previous speaker but unfortunately there is nothing in that country to substantiate the establishment of lotteries in Canada. Back in the eighteenth century they did have lotteries in the United States. Practically every state in the union engaged in some sort of lottery for the raising of money. They raised money for church purposes, for the building of bridges, to help poor people whose buildings had been burned and for almost every conceivable reason. In 1777 the United States congress attempted to raise money for national purposes by this method. In 1833 a society was formed to point out to the inhabitants of the United States the evils in connection with lotteries and in the following year, 1834, legislation was passed which prohibited the practice of lotteries in all the states and territories of the United States. The last state to engage in lotteries was Louisiana but in 1890 an act of congress was passed forbidding the use of the United States mails to this lottery. The lottery was then moved to Honduras but because of corruption and crookedness it has not been a success since that time. Since 1890 there have been no lotteries carried on in the United States territory. The Encyclopædia Britannica states that lotteries were suppressed in Belgium in 1830, in Sweden in 1841 and in Switzerland in 1865. It states that lotteries were made illegal in Alaska in 1899, in Hawaii in 1900 and in Porto Rico in 1902. Japan, a country of almost 65,000,000 people, forbids lotteries absolutely.

Perhaps the strongest argument advanced at this and at the last session is the experiment of the Irish Free State. This comparatively small country with a population of about three million people started this experiment on June 4, 1930, when they passed the Public Charitable Hospitals Act. That legislation was to expire automatically on July 1, 1934, but I have been unable to obtain any information from the library as to whether it has been extended. If it has not been extended the act authorizing the present lottery will expire on July 1 next. I was surprised to hear the sponsor of this bill state that the receipts accruing to the hospitals in the Irish Free State were only 17·99 per cent of the total moneys received. The hon. member attempted to convince the house that that was a very good proportion. He calls it good business when less than 18 per cent of the proceeds finds its way into the coffers of the hospitals. I fear the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) was not very sincere when he stated that that was good business. That percentage is just a little lower than what I had figured out myself as I had it in the neighbourhood of twenty per cent. The magazine "Truth" of London for June 14, 1933, states that out of a total of £3,101,321, only £387,665 got into the coffers of the hospitals. That figures out to about twelve and a half per cent. The reason why this percentage is so small is the tax of one-half imposed by the Irish Free State on the amounts available for the hospitals. The Irish Free State took one-half of the receipts and gave the hospitals the balance, which amounted to 12½ per cent.

Mr. BOURASSA: Who got the 75 per cent?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: It went in prizes, expenses, advertising and such like. It was distributed over a large area, no doubt. I have just been looking at the experience of other countries in connection with lotteries.

There has been nothing said here in connection with the moral side of this question. I recognize the truth of the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) that what might be a moral idea to one is not so to another, that what one person might consider a moral wrong, another person might look upon as being quite morally correct. The good old Book itself tells us that "the love of money"—not money—"is the root of all evil." Money of itself is not necessarily an evil, but the Book does say that the love of money is the root of all evil. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that right there we touch the underlying cause and desire for sweepstakes legislation. There is an inordinate desire on the part of a number of people to get money. They have perhaps an inordinate love for that root of all evil. They desire to get the money without working for it, and so they take a long gambling chance in the hope, though the hope is perhaps only one in two hundred thousand, that by investing two or three or five dollars they will get a great amount of gain. Of course that is gambling, and it seems to me that that is something that this parliament of Canada should not encourage. The fact that an occasional person does gamble is not an argument that we should throw the doors open and make it legal for such persons to gamble and for others to join in with them. That would surely be moving in the wrong direction. That good old Book that I quoted from tells us that "righteousness exalteth a nation," and this practice of gambling and its encouragement by this parliament would be the very antithesis of righteousness. Nineteen hundred years ago an event transpired outside the city of Jerusalem which is an outstanding event in world history. At that time those who were the enemies of the Man of Galilee took part in a lottery. We are told that they divided his clothes among them, but for his coat they cast lots. They were the enemies of the Man of Galilee; I would just like to stress that point. I am not saying that all who take that view are His enemies, but on that occasion that is what happened. His enemies cast lots for His garment. That perhaps is why we have religious organizations such as the Presbytery of Ottawa of the United Church of Canada passing a resolution along this line:

> That this presbytery of Ottawa of the United Church of Canada desires to register a considered and emphatic protest against the sweepstakes bill recently passed by the Senate of Canada, and soon to be submitted in the House of Commons.
>
> We are confident that the responsible representatives of the Canadian electorate in the House of Commons will reject this measure.

The Archbishop of the Anglican church has spoken similarly. In his charge to the members of the Synod of the Anglican diocese of Ottawa—I quote:

> His Grace Archbishop J. C. Roper declared himself emphatically as being opposed to the legalization of hospital sweepstakes in Canada. Sweepstakes have promoted widespread gambling which is already too prevalent, the Archbishop of Ottawa and Metropolitan of the Ecclesiastical province of Ontario stated.

The Anglican Synod in another resolution also endorsed the strong stand taken by Archbishop Roper against the legalization of sweepstakes and lotteries for hospital or other purposes. A great many similar resolutions could be read to the house, Mr. Speaker, but those perhaps are sufficient.

Instead of this chamber following along the lines suggested and legalizing all sweepstakes, it seems to me it is time for us to make a little more restrictive the prohibitory legislation in regard to lotteries. We might perhaps take a leaf out of the report of the British commission and tighten up the legislation in regard to the advertising and newspaper publicity given to lotteries, with its tendency to educate public opinion in favour of lotteries.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have perhaps covered enough points in connection with this matter, and I now move the amendment which I have submitted to you. May I have the amendment read, Mr. Speaker?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Sullivan): It is moved by Mr. Carmichael, seconded by Mr. Speakman, that the motion that this bill be now read a second time be amended by leaving out the word "now" and adding the words "this day six months" at the end of the question.

The question is on the amendment.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the opinion I humbly wish to express is my personal opinion only, and I shall be very short. I want to speak in favour of the principle of this bill. It has been said of lotteries that they are a tax on all the fools in creation. That in my opinion is the best argument to demonstrate that every lottery, if well conducted, must be a success.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech delivered a few moments ago by my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael), and I noted what he said on the expense and abuses of lotteries. I do not deny his statements but it must be remembered that, all told, from fifteen to twenty countries already have lotteries which seem to be working satisfactorily. May I remind my hon. friend from Kindersley that the profit from the French lottery, for instance, was more than $140,000,000 in one year. Sweden has a lottery, so have Panama and Mexico. Spain has a $25,000,000 lottery. We find lotteries also in Cuba, Belgium, and Italy, where the lottery brings in a profit amounting to $40,000,000. Germany recently organized a lottery to take care of unemployment. There are state lotteries also in Czechoslovakia, Turkey and a few other countries.

Coming to the British Empire, we have the lotteries in the Irish Free State and in India. Once lotteries were permitted in England, and even now under a new law they are tolerated on a small scale, although with many restrictions. We find lotteries in New South Wales, whose one hundredth lottery was drawn recently with a total profit of $7,500,000. Australia has its state lotteries which have enabled the Australian government to provide baby clinics, child welfare centres, and dental services for children and the unemployed.

Gambling in lotteries does not differ very much in principle from gambling on the stock exchange or in cards or on races and as Senator Molloy said humorously a few weeks ago in regard to this bill: "This is a poor man's bill. It gives him his stock exchange, his grain exchange and his mining exchange."

I do not wish to comment on the valuable opinion of such a distinguished jurist as my colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). What he has said must, I think, be considered very carefully. Could we not though find a way out of the problem by abolishing the restriction in our criminal code in regard to the subject of lotteries?

Should we refuse any province the right to raise new revenues to take care of its hospitals or charitable institutions when that province unanimously makes such an appeal? I think such a request should be granted and the benefit should be extended also to universities and other educational establishments. If, as the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) said a moment ago, the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge (Mr. Barrette) comes along with an amendment to include universities and other educational establishments, I shall be very glad to vote in favour of it.

By clauses 4 and 5 of this bill the operation of sweepstakes would be limited within the province which decides to conduct such sweepstakes.

May I congratulate the mover of the bill, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) and the seconder, the hon. member for Dorchester?

I suggest that lotteries might be considered as a special measure which can be justified by the abnormal conditions through which we are passing?

May I venture one suggestion: Let us try this for one year only?

Like the premier of Quebec and the hon. member for Dorchester I would prefer a federal lottery by drawing of lots. We should have one federal lottery and not a multiplicity of provincial ones. For instance, the federal government might allow a lottery to take place once or twice a year, the profits to be retained in part by the federal exchequer, the other part to be distributed among the provinces on a per capita basis and the provinces to distribute those moneys as they deem advisable. I do not think many provinces will refuse their share on the ground that lotteries are more or less immoral. If this bill does not pass—I do not know what is ahead of us—might not the following suggestion be considered?

(a) A referendum on lotteries to be held this summer by the federal government.

If the referendum, as I surmise it will be, is favourable to lotteries:

(b) A national lottery by drawing of lots, not depending upon the result of races here or abroad could be held by the federal government in the fall—and if it is successful, a second lottery could be held next winter or next spring—the proceeds to be divided among the federal and provincial governments. As a consequence the federal and provincial coffers would be all the richer by an amount varying between $20,000,000 and $40,000,000.

To sum up, I am in favour of lotteries:

1. To keep our money in this country and to cause millions of dollars from other countries to come into Canada.

2. To take to a certain extent the place of taxation. I should call a lottery the best mode of taxation. It is a voluntary or self-imposed taxation.

3. Because it would stop this general disobedience to our laws, something which to my mind is depressing and dangerous.

4. As a temporary measure and an expedient in these abnormal times to bring millions into the federal and provincial exchequers.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I want to express the hope that the stand taken by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), although very commendable, I am sure, from many angles, will not confuse the issue before the house. We are dealing with a bill to permit the establishment of lotteries. This measure may not be perfect; it may stand amending when we reach the committee stage, but the government has very readily given the house an opportunity to pronounce not so much on every detail of this bill as on the question of lotteries in general.

My first word is to express the hope that when we vote on the amendment and the second reading of the bill we shall vote for or against the establishment of lotteries, leaving to the committee stage the objections raised by the Secretary of State. He has not convinced me that the bill is not proper. In the first place, it does not deal so much with the maintenance of hospitals as with authorizing provinces to establish lotteries. They might do this for another purpose. When we reach the hospital clause, we might change that altogether, but I repeat that the main purpose of the bill is to authorize the establishment of lotteries and this should not be lost sight of. The Secretary of State has also sought to show that there might be a conflict with the criminal code. The bill as drafted and passed in the Senate covers that feature of the matter. In clause 2 there is a reservation which is quite clear; it states:

Notwithstanding any law to the contrary and notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any other act.

Then we have clause 8 which states:

The provisions of the criminal code respecting betting, pool selling, bookmaking and lotteries, shall not apply to any hospital sweepstakes authorized under the provisions of this act.

Therefore it seems as if the objections had been foreseen by the Senate and had been dealt with, but even if they had not been dealt with properly, may I express the hope that these objections do not confuse the issue when we have to vote on the amendment and on the second reading, and that the house shall register its vote for or against lotteries which is the main purpose of setting this day for a discussion of the bill at present before us.

We have already had exhaustive speeches on the bill by the proposer and seconder and other members, and many figures have been quoted. I do not intend to set a rule for the house but I shall set a rule for myself and be content with presenting in a few sentences the arguments which I think are in favour of a measure of this kind.

In the first place I do not see that there is anything immoral about a lottery. Everyone is free to dispose of his money as he sees fit. It has been argued that life itself is a vast gamble. Whether you invest your money in trade or the stock exchange or any other avenue of activity you certainly take a chance, and I do not think there is anything wrong in principle in placing a little money in a lottery. I will go further. In years of depression such as we are going through there is something to be said in favour of allowing a poor fellow to introduce into his life that element of hope and ambition that comes to him by placing a little money in a lottery. Naturally it is only a small proportion who will win, but there is something, I say it very seriously, in having everyone enjoy for a little while the hope of gaining something. If they do not succeed this time they may try again. We should not seek to establish life and social activity on the basis of everyone getting so much a week and having no hope of improving on that. I have stated my views on several proposals of this kind since I have been in the house. I think it is very much like betting or things of that kind; the individual should have the enjoyment of his money, even being free to lose it if he chooses, provided he is not defrauded and provided that the contract, whether it be a lottery or something else, is properly controlled by the state.

It has been shown that many countries have established lotteries; in fact the debate has been in part an interesting course in history, from Egypt and ancient Palestine up to this day. The substance of what we have heard this afternoon is that there is certainly nothing wrong with lotteries so far as the principle is concerned, because quite a large number of countries have tried it. Some have kept it, others have not; but the fact is that lotteries have been experimented with by so many countries in so many different times in our history that we may well argue that there is nothing wrong about the idea and that it is worth trying. At the present time we have them in the British Empire, as has been stated by former speakers, especially in Ireland. We all know that, because there is hardly a member of this house who has not got a friend with a ticket on one or two of these British Empire lotteries in his pocket; the Irish and the Calcutta sweepstakes have been very popular. So far as I am concerned I have none and do not intend to buy any until it is legalized; I do not want to be misunderstood as to that. But the fact that these lotteries exist in certain countries is certainly an argument in favour of them.

I hasten to the last part of my speech to make good my promise at the beginning. There are two special reasons which should favour the establishment of lotteries at the present time. The first is the great need of money by all our public corporations. Taxes have reached the limit; you cannot indefinitely increase income or excise tax or any other tax of the kind. I have been through a municipal experiment which convinced me that money is needed in many fields of public activity, yet we do not know where to get it. There is not the least doubt in my mind that there are still many people in this country who evade taxes in one way and another; the character of their business permits them to do that, it being such that the government cannot lay their hands on it. They are the gamblers, and the very people who will buy lottery tickets and buy them in large quantity.

Then as has been said, the purchase of lottery tickets is a voluntary contribution. The contention that part of the money is lost and does not reach the desired end is in my opinion not a valid argument. That condition you have everywhere where money is collected for charitable purposes. Even under the system of the federation of charities, which has become very popular in our large cities, a percentage of the amount collected must be set aside for the collection and administration of the funds so obtained. And what about the euchres, concerts, banquets, all these activities for so-called charitable purposes, in which sometimes seventy-five per cent of the receipts is spent on the very evening they take place? You cannot hold any of these things without most of the money derived being spent on the very evening, and perhaps only fifteen or twenty per cent remaining for the original purpose; yet we subscribe largely to them. With a lottery, even if you have to set aside a considerable percentage for prizes and cost of administration, a large proportion will be left to go to the institutions to be benefited, as has been shown in the countries that have made the experiment.

Then there is another argument, perhaps an even stronger one. It is the one that was advanced in favour of doing away with prohibition—the fact that prohibition—in this case of lotteries—is not being obeyed by the public. It is not popular, and as has been said, you cannot enforce a law against popular opinion. I am told on reliable authority that millions of dollars go from the several provinces of Canada, I think from all provinces, for the purchase of tickets in lotteries held in other countries,—the Irish sweepstakes, the Calcutta sweepstakes, and the national lottery in France when it is in operation. So that the question for us to decide to-day is not so much whether we are in favour of lotteries; for we have the lotteries with us. They may be illicit, but the public authorities are powerless to prevent people from patronizing them. So what we have to decide to-day is whether we want a Canadian lottery, or the continued support in Canada of the Irish or Calcutta lotteries. That is my viewpoint. That is one of the reasons why I shall vote against the six month's hoist and for the second reading of the bill.

I just want to add this. I might have preferred a national lottery, as mentioned by the Hon. Mr. Taschereau in his speech and by several hon. members here to-day. It would probably avoid the objections raised by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). But as we realize that several provinces probably are not as much in favour of such a lottery as others, I think it would be more consistent with the spirit of confederation to pass a bill which would allow every province to deal with the matter as it wishes. If Quebec wants a lottery, under this bill it could establish one. If British Columbia wants a lottery it could establish one. If some other province does not want a lottery it does not have to follow suit. For all these reasons—and I will not extend my remarks; I promised they would be brief—I shall vote against the amendment and in favour of the second reading. I hope that notwithstanding the several objections raised by hon. members, including the Secretary of State, the issue will not be confused in the minds of hon. members. Let us vote on the second reading for or against the establishment of lotteries; then if the bill passes, as I hope it will, we can amend it in committee and make it as good as possible.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take only a short time, but I want to put myself on record as being absolutely opposed to this bill. We have had enough gambling all over Canada in the past, and to me it is not right to get money in the way proposed by this bill. I am a life governor of a hospital; we do not want any such money included with our donations. I do not care whether the proposition comes from Louisiana, Quebec, Italy, Germany, or any other place; it is not legitimate money, and God knows that Canada has had enough gambling. We have seen gambling on the stock exchanges, that is what put the country in the position we find it in to-day.

A short time ago I went into the northern part of my constituency to visit some of my old friends who operate small farms there. They have made homes for themselves away from the temptations of the stock ticker and out of reach of the lures of high pressure salesmen of watered stocks and lottery tickets. There I discovered a people who have found economic security, who have time to read good books and to meditate on what they see in the daily newspapers. It needs people of that kind to build a country, and you will not get anywhere by gambling. It is known that many cases of want and poverty throughout this country have been caused by speculation, by people wanting to get rich too quickly. I am sorry that I must take issue with my hon. friends, but I have decided that money obtained by gambling in stocks or the buying of lottery tickets is not good money. I know we have sent millions of dollars to New York and other places, but that does not make it right. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has sent me a note; some time I will talk to him about the subject to which he refers.

I am absolutely opposed to this bill; I cannot support it or anything like it that will affect my constituency and my province and country. In this letter from the Good Fellowship Association of Toronto I see no reference to the province of Manitoba, for which I am thankful. The signer of that letter is an old pioneer from Manitoba, now a resident of Toronto; he has asked me to support this bill. I am sorry that he signed the letter, and I am sorry that I must refuse his request. I think we have had sufficient experience in this country to know what results from speculation and gambling. All you have to do is go down the street and sit in the offices of the stock brokers and watch the ladies who are carried away by speculation. Those I mentioned when speaking the other day were not mothers or homebuilders. They have been carried away by speculation and gambling, and anything we can do in this house to correct that situation should be done. I would say that the man who is peddling tickets around this building should be put out. I have seen a man selling sweepstake tickets in this House of Commons. I have never bought one; I do not want to get money in that way. The only way to get money is by hard work, and the sooner Canada gets rid of the gambling spirit and buckles down to work the better it will be.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two points I should like to emphasize. I quite agree with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) that in the speculative transactions on the stock exchange, the grain exchange and the mining exchanges we have the same reprehensible practices that are denounced when we come to so called gambling. Further than that, it always has seemed to me an extraordinary thing that we should exempt race track gambling from the criminal code and that lotteries held for charitable purposes should be excluded as well. It seems to me that if gambling is anti-social in its character it is not improved because the gains go to church purposes, and on the other hand it does not seem to me that the man who can afford to go to a horse race should be able to gamble while the poor little fellow who cannot afford to go should be penalized.

There is one other matter on which I agree with those who have introduced this bill; that is with regard to the present regulations. I think it is absolutely abhorrent to all justice and decency that we should give the prize to an informer. I hope that at this session of parliament that provision of the criminal code will be changed. If there is anything wrong with gambling the prize should go to the state and not to the "hypocrite," as someone has called him, though I think that term is inadequate to describe him.

There is a very interesting question that has been introduced, and I think perhaps the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) was not quite fair in his presentation of the case. Undoubtedly people differ greatly in what they think right and wrong. The hon. gentleman rather laughed at those who believe in prohibition; he was rather inclined to resent the superior morality affected by some people who denounce certain practices of which he approves. Well, there are two sides to that question. Just for the purpose of illustration, because I do not want to discuss the question, let me point out that a very large number of organizations in western Canada, some of them very reputable women's organizations, to-day are pressing for the right to disseminate birth control information. You cannot say that those people are immoral, yet I venture to say that if I were to introduce a bill making it quite legal to disseminate birth control information there would be a decided protest from a large number of the members of this house on the ground that such a practice would be immoral. Or again, supposing Alberta asks for general legislation permitting sterilization of the unfit, are hon. members in this house, some of whom have spoken in advocacy of this measure now before us, going to take the ground that if Alberta wishes to do that she has a perfect right to, no matter whether or not the rest of the country wishes to introduce measures of that kind. I think hon. members must remember when they are making the plea that certain sections of the country should have the right to any action they wish, whether other sections wish it or not, that that argument may be turned against them, and will be turned against them before very long.

I believe it was the hon. member for Dorchester who said that we might be able to do legally what is not being done legally to-day. The hon. member stated that the regime of prohibition was a regime of hypocrisy. Well, again, I would say that with regard to birth control and some other matters reprobated by certain sections of this house, under the present regime there is being done illegally that which, if certain parts of the criminal code were rescinded, might be done legally, and that the present regime is indeed a regime of hypocrisy.

I should like to point out that once we start in this direction there is no line to be drawn. If these moneys could be used to help hospitals, then also they could be used to help universities. If they are a good thing to help universities, I do not see why we should not carry on the whole business of government in that way. There is no end to it; I think that is a correct statement. We might organize ourselves on a vast lottery scheme. In fact, I do not know why it should be desirable for any of us to go on trying any longer to make an honest living. Why should not everybody get into this game? There is really no line which could be drawn. It is useless for us to go back and talk about the example set by the Egyptians and the Romans. They did a host of things which we would not countenance to-day, and I do not think that those precedents are any argument in favour of the introduction of a system of sweepstakes into this country.

Further than that, in passing I should like to protest against upholding the action of the Senate as action which necessarily we ought to follow. The reference may have been made facetiously, but speaking seriously I must say that I refuse to admit that the Senators are any wiser than the members of the House of Commons. We are asked in the bill to permit the raising of money by sweepstakes in order that the sick may be cared for. God pity the sick if we have to come to this way of looking after them. It is said that this is a voluntary tax. That is the very reason I am opposed to it. We are also told that it is the poor man's chance to gamble. This bill means that the poor man is going to be taxed in an involuntary way to support, first, our hospitals, and later on our educational and perhaps our governmental institutions. I do not believe in that procedure. I am irrevocably opposed to that principle. If any man should be taxed it is the man of wealth who ought to be taxed to look after the poor and the sick. There is not the slightest doubt—

Mr. ST-PERE: That same chap may make big bets.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but that is another matter. I say he ought to contribute his tax in a legal manner, and not in this casual way, to the care of the sick. I think that when we put these matters on such a basis we are off on the wrong line altogether. Even the Solicitor General—and this appears most strange when we realize that he is a member of the government—went the length of suggesting that because of the present emergency we should raise some of the governmental expenses in this way. Well, I knew that the government was in a bad way. I recognize the fact that last year and again this year the government had to borrow money in order to balance its budget, but I did not realize that it was quite so badly off that a member of the government would have to rise in this house and state that we should go into the gambling business, and that that is the only way left to raise money to carry on the affairs of government.

The most fundamental objection I have to this kind of legislation is essentially that it is an encouragement of the propensity to get money for nothing. It is not merely a question of taking a chance now and then. We must understand that if we get something in this way, someone else must go without; it comes out of the pocket of someone else. I was very glad to hear the note of reality introduced by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). After all, we in this country come of pioneer stock. We have been told that the way to gain wealth is by honest toil. Surely we have been brought up to believe that. I quite frankly admit that the greater part of the wealth in this country has not been gained by honest toil. I say that under the conditions which are being revealed in the committee on price spreads we are learning that a great deal of wealth has been built up through the possession of special privileges of various kinds. No doubt that is only too true, but at the same time I should like to cherish the old tradition that the way to gain wealth is by honest toil. One hon. member went so far a few moments ago as to say that he thought it was a splendid thing that occasionally the ordinary poor man should be given a chance to make a bet, in order that he might possibly get something in life worth living for. It is that kind of thing which leads me to protest against a measure of this kind. I say we ought so to organize the industrial life of Canada that in the ordinary course of events the ordinary working man would get a chance to make a decent living, without having to resort to the off chance of getting something through gambling operations. That is the real point.

Mr. ST-PERE: There is a difference between betting and gambling.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall let my hon. friend explain it.

Mr. ST-PERE: I will explain it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish to point out one fundamental difficulty with this kind of thing. I do not wish to discriminate between rich men and poor men. If the rich man has a right to gamble, most assuredly the poor man has the same right. But I do say that this kind of thing is being introduced in order that the poor man will be placed in the position whereby involuntarily he will be taxed, and further that a very small proportion of the taxation will go to the ostensible purposes for which the legislation is introduced.

There is the even more serious consideration, that we are diverting the minds of our people from real values in life, and emphasizing the view that it is only those who can get something for nothing who can get on in the world. I should like to see the labouring man adopt some other means of attaining the good things of life than by taking a remote chance, and paying five cents, ten cents or a dollar for some sort of a ticket. I should like to see it possible for a man adequately to care for his family, or for anyone who may be in the hospital, without resort to any such method as this. I should like to see it possible for any man to have an automobile, if he wishes to have it, without having to place his little bit of earnings into some such scheme as this.

For those reasons I must support the amendment providing for six months' hoist.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 16, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Mr. Davies.

HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES

BILL TO LEGALIZE LOTTERIES WHEN CONDUCTED BY PROVINCES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fraser for the second reading of Bill No. 56, with respect to hospital sweepstakes.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I desire to make a few observations on the bill now before the house—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but private bills have not all been disposed of.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is a private bill.

Mr. CASGRAIN: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), although to-day has been fixed for the consideration of Bill No. 56, this bill has been considered all afternoon and I understand it will be considered again after nine o'clock. But there is another bill standing in my name, Bill No. 83, to amend the criminal code, which should be called for discussion until nine o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Bill No. 56 was considered this afternoon by special consent and it has now been reached in the ordinary course of business under the heading of private and public bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My point of order was that we would automatically revert to the consideration of Bill No. 56 at nine o'clock, but that this should not deprive the sponsor of Bill No. 83 of the right to take advantage of the hour allotted to private bills.

Mr. BENNETT: We have reached this bill and we are going ahead with it. Special facilities were provided for its consideration before nine o'clock, but it has now been reached in its place as a private bill. We are proceeding with the discussion of a bill which is rightfully before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: My ruling is that Bill No. 56 has been reached in due course and is now properly before the house. As to whether the discussion will continue after nine o'clock is a matter of consent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I desire to make a few observations with regard to the bill passed by the Senate intituled, "an act with respect to hospital sweepstakes."

At the outset may I say that I do not propose to discuss this measure from the moral point of view; any remarks I may make will deal with the legal and economic aspects of the proposal. I realize that a formidable constitutional objection was launched against this measure this afternoon when the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) elaborated the matter. I do not propose to touch upon that phase of the matter although I realize the objection is a formidable one. To my mind the legal and economic aspects of the proposed measure present very grave difficulties. After giving the matter the very fullest consideration which I could bestow upon it I have come to the conclusion that it is not a bill which should be advanced in this house, and I for one, expressing only my own opinion in regard to it, am prepared to vote for the amendment moved this afternoon that the bill be not now read a second time but be read this day six months.

It is true that his bill to authorize sweepstakes in the Dominion of Canada has come to us in what I might describe as a seeming garb of righteousness. It relies to a marked extent upon the charitable atmosphere which the sponsors of the bill have sought to create around it. We are all aware of the old saying that charity covers a multitude of sins, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that the charitable element has been dragged into this debate for the purpose of giving the measure a more favourable status in the opinion of hon. members of this house.

[Mr. Speaker.]

My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) this afternoon, in an able speech, supported this measure. During his remarks I noticed that he quoted from a very ancient verse in regard to lotteries which I think I might quote in full. He quoted but a single line of the verse. It is a verse from an old song composed by Henry Fielding the great novelist and playwright in the year 1732. The verse runs thus:

> A lottery is a taxation
> Upon all the fools in creation;
> And heaven be praised,
> It is easily raised,
> Credulity's always in fashion
> For folly's a fund,
> Will never lose ground,
> While fools are so rife in the nation.

There is, as a matter of fact, a long and interesting history in connection with the subject of lotteries. This afternoon the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) referred to one biblical incident which is related in the New Testament, but I think one is safe in saying that lotteries in one form or another have existed in the world since the earliest days of civilization. It may be of interest to know that in the Book of Leviticus, in the sixteenth chapter you will find this: "And Aaron shall cast lots for the two goats; one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scapegoat." Again in the Book of Numbers, chapter 26, we find that Moses divided the lands on the west of the Jordan between the Israelites by lot.

Those are very ancient precedents for lotteries. Certainly lotteries existed during the early days of the Christian era, and spread throughout Europe during the middle ages. I do not think they were seriously considered in England until the days of Queen Elizabeth, when the first great lottery was launched under the name of the Queen's lottery, and a tremendous effort was made by all officials of the kingdom to make that lottery a success. Special proclamations were issued by the Queen commanding all the knights of the shires, the lords lieutenant and magistrates to further the sale of lottery tickets for the Queen's lottery. That lottery was to provide money for the improvement of harbours and matters of that kind. It was launched with the idea of raising £200,000, a very considerable fund in those days, but it happened that only about one-twelfth of the tickets were actually sold. Some 34,000 were disposed of at ten shillings apiece. The result was a tremendous disappointment to the people of that day. But, nothing daunted, lotteries seemed to spring up in Great Britain with great regularity in subsequent years.

There followed the Virginian lottery in 1615 to aid the settlers in Virginia. In 1635 there was carried through the London Aqueduct lottery, to carry water to London. But in 1699 an act was passed for the suppression of private lotteries. The lotteries which I have heretofore named, with the exception of Queen Elizabeth's lottery were all in the nature of private lotteries.

Then in the United States lotteries took serious hold on the populace. There were a great many lotteries. Even Yale held a lottery in 1750 to assist the building fund of Yale university. Again in 1772 Harvard sponsored a lottery to raise $18,000 for Staughton Hall in connection with Harvard university.

Lotteries, however, definitely passed from private control after the statute was passed in Great Britain in 1699. After 1699 the only authority to carry on lotteries in Great Britain was vested in the government itself. Other lotteries were strictly prohibited. For a number of years, from 1694 to 1768, a regular system of state lotteries was instituted in England, and there were conducted during that period no less than 126 of these state lotteries, with prizes and annuities attached to the sale of British consols. This practice continued until the year 1820. At that time I fancy, from what I have read, the government itself became somewhat alarmed over the situation which had arisen, through the operation of state lotteries. They began to feel that lotteries were economically unsound. It was also realized that lotteries were in their operation somewhat demoralizing on the populace. In the year 1823 the system of state lotteries was formally abandoned in Great Britain and the Lord Chancellor announced that after the year 1823 only one state lottery should be permitted. They were then to cease.

In the evidence taken before the British royal commission during the past year on the subject of lotteries, gaming, betting and the like, one of the witnesses examined was Sir Josiah Stamp, who is certainly recognized as one of the leading economists of the world. In his evidence before that commission he refers expressly to the language of the Lord Chancellor in the year 1823 when the announcement was made that no more lotteries should be permitted in Great Britain. Sir Josiah Stamp said in his evidence:

> The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that, although he had condemned the lottery, he was going to have just one more. Somebody got up and said, surely he could make up his mind to end this moral pestilence: that was the word he used. That stuck in my mind, many years ago, when reading it.

I think it is clear that the experience of state lotteries in Great Britain was anything but satisfactory. The operation of lotteries had resulted in the moral degradation of the people and economically lotteries were not considered to be sound.

From that time forward lotteries were not permitted in Great Britain. In 1836 an act was passed to prohibit the advertising of foreign lotteries. In 1837 the Art Union of London organized a society for the disposal of works of art and were permitted to conduct small lotteries for that express purpose. That act was further enlarged by an act passed in 1846 and as a result the Art Union of Great Britain and the Art Union of London are still permitted to carry on small lotteries notwithstanding the provisions of British or Canadian statutes against lotteries in general.

The question of what is a lottery has come up for decision in England on a number of occasions. Doctor Johnson in his dictionary defines a lottery as follows:

> A lottery is a distribution of prizes by chance.

But the definition of a lottery which has been adopted by both judges and the recent commission in England is that of the American lexicographer Noah Webster, who defines a lottery as follows:

> A lottery is a distribution of prizes by lot or chance.

And this definition has been expressly approved in the leading law case on the subject, the case of Taylor and Smetton, the judgment being given by Mr. Justice Hawkins who was an authority in regard to such matters.

Since 1824 no legal lotteries have been conducted in England except in regard to art unions. The sale of tickets for foreign lotteries, including the Irish sweepstakes, has certainly given rise to a feeling in England that perhaps the law should be modified, and a demand has arisen in very influential quarters for some amelioration of the situation, some loosening of the law in respect of lotteries; demands have been made from time to time in the British parliament for amendments to the present law. Many bills have been introduced but none of them have successfully passed through the British house. In 1933 the British government undertook to make a very full and complete inquiry into not only the subject of lotteries, but betting, gambling and cognate matters, and the commission issued on that occasion was very broad and comprehensive in its terms.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I ask whether the commission also included stock exchanges?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to read the commission so that my hon. friend will have full information. The commission consisted of some ten persons, and the chairman named was a very able English judge, at that time retired, the Hon. Sir Sidney Arthur Taylor Rowlatt. He had associated with him nine distinguished commissioners. The commission reads as follows:

Whereas we have deemed it expedient that a commission should forthwith issue to inquire into the existing law and the practice thereunder relating to lotteries, betting, gambling and cognate matters, and to report what changes, if any, are deemed practicable.

The commission held a great many sittings. It summoned before it men and women of standing in almost every rank and calling. The evidence taken covers between six and seven hundred printed pages. I do not profess that I have read it all but I have read a great portion of it. Some one hundred and seventy witnesses were summoned, including bankers, merchants, shipping men, railroad men, members of the various religious denominations, prison officials, race track operators, proprietors of racing stables, many of the leading racing men of England, bookmakers, representatives of all lines of sport where betting is permitted. I think every kind of gambling was considered by the commission, and men representative of the various business and sporting interests appeared before it and gave evidence. The conclusion of the commission, if I read it correctly, is to the effect that lotteries constitute a menace to public welfare and are economically unsound. The report of the commission is lengthy, but there are certain parts of it that deal expressly with the question of lotteries, and what we are concerned with at the present time is the views of the commission in regard to the single subject of lotteries. The report sets out at length all the enactments which have ever been passed on the subject by the parliament of Great Britain; it gives a very good historical resumé of the operations of lotteries from the days of Queen Elizabeth down to the present time, and the conclusions of the commission in regard to lotteries are to be found on page 143, section 495. The commissioner's conclusions on this matter are as follows:

1. There is no justification for assuming that there is a sustained or insistent demand in this country for this type of gambling facility.
2. The demand for the legalization of large public lotteries in this country is based upon insufficient appreciation of the difficulties and disadvantages involved.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

3. It is doubtful to what extent an authorized public lottery in this country would put a stop to the sale in this country of Irish sweepstake tickets. It is clear that even if such a lottery were to be authorized, special measures would still have to be enacted to deal with the sale of tickets in lotteries promoted outside Great Britain.
4. The existing law in regard to the sale of tickets in lotteries promoted abroad proved unworkable owing to special causes. There are several measures which can be adopted to bring up to date the law against the sale of foreign lottery tickets, and to make it effective.
5. It is much easier to authorize large public lotteries in this country than to put a stop to such lotteries once they are started.

The commission in its report also finds that there is little or no objection to what it terms small lotteries and it makes no finding as against small lotteries. It deals with small lotteries in section 499 as follows:

We considered the further question whether very small lotteries or prize drawings, in which members of the public generally are invited to purchase tickets, could be exempted from the prohibition of lotteries. It would in any event be necessary to confine the exemption to schemes which complied with the following conditions:—

1. that the scheme is promoted by some institution of a permanent character conducted for purposes not connected with gaming, wagering or lotteries;
2. that the proceeds of the scheme are devoted to some charitable or philanthropic object;
3. that no profit accrues to any person from the promotion or administration of the scheme, and that no commission is paid in respect of the sale of tickets;
4. that no administrative expenses are allowed in connection with the scheme except printing, stationery, and postage;
5. that prizes are in kind and limited in value;
6. that the price of the tickets is limited in value to a few pence.

The commission concludes that there is little or no objection to lotteries of this kind.

Mr. GRAY: Does it mention the art unions?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In many places it does and makes a special exception in regard to art unions in favour of the system now in vogue being continued.

In regard to lotteries for charitable purposes, particularly in aid of hospitals, the finding, if I read it aright, is against the proposal. It points out, as my hon. friend the promoter of this measure in the house did today, that out of the enormous amounts raised by the Irish sweepstakes only between seventeen and eighteen per cent is ever expended upon hospitals. The balance goes in commissions, expenses and one thing and another; so that out of every dollar only eighteen cents goes to the charity. The report states that the associated hospitals of Great Britain annually receive by way of private donation £15,500,000, between seventy-five and eighty million dollars, and the report points out that if sweepstakes are permitted in aid of hospitals in Great Britain private donors will probably cease to subscribe as heretofore and these institutions will be left for their support at the mercy of those who operate sweepstakes or lotteries for hospitals. Our finding of the commission is that the amount given by private donors will probably fall off from time to time. It points out that private donations to the Irish hospitals in the last five years have fallen off by fifty per cent, and that such will likely be the case in regard to the hospitals of Great Britain if they are allowed to become dependent on funds received through the operation of lotteries.

The commission has brought in certain findings in respect to the criminal law of Great Britain. The law in Great Britain in respect to lotteries is very ancient, some of it going back to the days of the Stuart kings, but most of the prosecutions, when prosecutions take place, are under the acts of 1802 and 1823. But strange to say there is no place in British legislation where any penalty is imposed upon the purchaser of a lottery ticket. In Canada we penalize the purchaser of a lottery ticket under the provisions of the criminal code.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You try to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no penalty under the laws of Great Britain unless a prosecution can be sustained under the old act of 1802 which describes such a man as a rogue and vagabond. There have been a few prosecutions under that old statute, but it is now proposed, in a bill passed by the House of Lords, to adopt practically the same clauses as are found to-day in the criminal code of Canada in respect to lotteries. In England they have, I think, gone one step further than we have. I agree with the comment made this afternoon by some hon. member, I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), disapproving very strongly of that clause in our criminal code in respect to lotteries which provides that any person may sue for and recover the amount of the prize from anyone who has succeeded in winning a prize.

Mr. DUPUIS: Still more immoral!

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree that this provision is not an appropriate clause in our criminal law. In the British bill provision is made for the forfeiture of any such prize to the crown. I think such an amendment would be most appropriate in the law of this country.

I am aware that there is criticism, which has been urged this afternoon in support of this bill, to the effect that our present law does not prohibit the operation of illegal lotteries in Canada. I am sorry to say that there is much truth in this statement. Hardly a week passes that I do not receive in the Department of Justice from some part of Canada advertising literature, tickets and the like, in regard to some so-called lottery which is being operated in some province of Canada. In my opinion many of those which are sent to me are absolute frauds; there is in fact no lottery. It is merely an advertising device to obtain money under false pretences. When these tickets and circulars arrive in the Department of Justice I send them to the various provinces where the operations are said to be carried on, because the house will understand that in Canada the administration of law, both civil and criminal, is under the jurisdiction of the various provinces and not of the federal government. In provinces in which the mounted police have jurisdiction, as they have in six of the provinces of Canada, I place these documents and tickets in the hands of the mounted police. In the other provinces where the mounted police have no jurisdiction I simply forward them to the attorneys general of the provinces. I have heard it stated that convictions resulting from prosecutions under the provision of the criminal code are very difficult to obtain; that few convictions in respect of lotteries are obtained; that there is little sympathy on the part of the magistrates of the country with prosecutions of that kind. I can hardly believe such a situation exists, but I think a little more effort on the part of the provincial authorities might bring a far better enforcement of the law than we have had in the past. The attorney general of Manitoba has been very active in regard to the suppression of illegal lotteries which have been carried on in the city of Winnipeg. In Winnipeg they have sweepstakes on the various horse races; they have sweepstakes on football matches; they have sweepstakes on the weather and on every conceivable subject. In conversation with the attorney general of the province of Manitoba last January he instanced a number of prosecutions which had been successfully maintained in that province, but he said that the problem was one of great difficulty. In Ontario I am aware that some convictions have been obtained in the last few months. In Ontario it has become very common to raffle articles of value, contrary to the provisions of the criminal code. Our criminal code provides that in case of any church or charitable bazaar, articles of small value which have not been sold but have been offered for sale during the bazaar may be raffled, but it places a limit on the value of those articles of $50, and the raffle can take place only with the consent of the municipal authorities of the place where the bazaar is being held. I know that perhaps all over Canada, certainly in Ontario, the favourite subject of a raffle or sweepstake is a motor car. I understand that these cars, costing from $800 to $1,000, are raffled almost weekly throughout Canada. All these raffles are contrary to law. I would suggest that we give consideration to an amendment to the criminal code to increase the penalties for breaches of these sections of the law. The law to-day in respect to the purchaser of a lottery ticket provides for a penalty of only $20. I think that might well be increased, if the law is to be enforced. On the other hand we might also improve the lottery sections of the criminal code by providing that any prizes won in the sweepstakes or lottery should be forfeited to the crown and not allowed to go to the informer.

I am only expressing my own views in regard to the whole subject. I would advise anyone who really takes an interest in this question to glance through the evidence which was submitted to the royal commission in England and to read the whole of the report made by that commission. It is a very interesting report; it is good reading, and much of the evidence is of very great value. But the only conclusion that I can come to after reading it as fully as I have been able to do and giving it the best consideration I can is that it is the deliberate conclusion of the commission which conducted the inquiry in England that lotteries are economically unsound and in their operation degrading to the community.

For these reasons, which I have stated thus briefly, I propose to vote against this measure.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, as I have a bill on the order paper called Bill No. 83, an act to amend the criminal code (lotteries), which very likely may not come up this session, I think it is my duty to tell the house how I intend to vote on this bill.

I am somewhat in the position of the hon. members for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) and St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), and I can also make my own most of the arguments that have been brought forward by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré). At the present time we have in this country so many lotteries that are operating apparently illegally and taking so much of the money of our good Canadian people that it should be our duty to try to make the best of it and induce our people to keep their money at home. This was one of the arguments advanced when the bill was brought up in the Quebec legislature, and I think we should all give careful consideration to the measure passed unanimously by both houses of that province.

When the present bill was introduced I examined it with some care, and to my mind it did not seem to go far enough in order to reach the object I had in mind, that is, to help our educational and charitable institutions. I also had some such doubts as were expressed this afternoon by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), who said that it would not help us to put this measure on our statute books because we might create some problems in connection with the legislatures. At the same time we are not removing the impediment that exists in the shape of section 236 of the criminal code, which prohibits lotteries with the exception of those especially mentioned in the exceptions. For that reason I brought in Bill No. 83, which provides that the exemptions should include lotteries organized by the government of a province of Canada for educational or public charitable purposes under a law of the legislature of such province. I do not suppose I could say that the entire population of Quebec favours such a bill; undoubtedly there are some who, with my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) might object, but I think this house should take cognizance of the fact that both houses in Quebec were unanimous in support of the provincial act to which reference has been made. I think the criminal code should be amended in order to make it possible for a legislature, if it saw fit so to do, to pass a law organizing a lottery on its own account and conducting that lottery on a proper, equitable and just basis, using the resulting money for educational or charitable purposes.

For some time past there has been some agitation in the province from which I come because the government discovered that many sources of revenue were drying up. Succession duties were bringing in less money; other taxes were very high, and the government could not increase the taxes or find new methods of taxation in order to bring in the money needed for charitable and educational institutions. It is well known that the university of Montreal recently was in great need of money, and that for some time it was feared that it would have to close its doors for lack of sufficient funds to carry on. I believe if this bill passes it should be amended, as was suggested by my hon. friend from Dorchester and other hon. members. If they have in mind the amendment mentioned in the bill which stands in my name and to which I have made reference, I shall be glad to support that amendment. At any rate I think I am safe in following my hon. friend from St. James in voting for the bill itself, because I think it contains a principle to which the hon. members of this house should adhere. In voting for this bill I think we are doing something for the common people and at the same time helping our religious, charitable and educational institutions.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on this bill from a little different angle than that from which it was approached this afternoon. I am more concerned with the possibilities for good, with the amelioration of the sufferings of humanity and the lessening of the economic wastage of the human machine through the instrumentality of this bill than I am with the methods or the disputed morality connected with it. That, sir, is my first reason for supporting the bill. My second reason is that I am no respecter of persons or classes, and whether we like it or not this practice is legalized in Canada to-day. During this very day, and within the last few hours, at the Woodbine race track in the city of Toronto sweepstakes or their equivalent have been operated. That practice is made legal by a vote of the House of Commons and the Senate of this country. On my way to Ottawa yesterday I was very much interested in a leading editorial which appeared in the Toronto Mail and Empire, containing a description of the opening of the Woodbine track. If I may be permitted to intrude upon the time of the house for a few moments I should like to read that very beautiful description:

Toronto is again off to the races. The Woodbine track, at Saturday's opening, was thronged with people from all classes of society. In the members' enclosure one encountered most of his friends from this city and many from outside places. Everybody seemed to be there, including His Excellency the Governor General, Lady Bessborough, Lieutenant Governor Bruce and Mrs. Bruce, Premier Henry and Mrs. Henry. The public enclosure was as tightly packed as a box of sardines. From the grandstand the spectator looked out over acres of headgear wedged closely together. The crowd is said to have been the largest in four years—that is to say, since the onset of the depression. We thus have fresh proof that the community is recovering from the economic crisis, and that it is still much given to the sport of kings.

The scene was as brilliant as ever. There were the packed enclosures, the beautiful greensward, hemmed in by the fine oval track and the waters of lake Ontario, with the famous Nova Scotian Bluenose running before the fresh breeze off shore. The custumes of the ladies and the scarlet tunics of the Royal Canadian Dragoons lent colour to the brave show. Sunshine prevailed for most of the afternoon, and the crowd was in festive humour as it enjoyed the opening events of the season's sports.

That, sir, is what is legalized to-day by the parliament of Canada and enjoyed by the people of this country. I am not complaining; I have enjoyed it many times myself and I hope to have the privilege of enjoying it again in the future. But, sir, on the very next page of the same issue of this newspaper, published in the city of Toronto, I read the following:

For keeping a common gaming house in Alexandria park, William McQueen and Nathan Rensler were each fined $100 and costs by Magistrate Browne in Saturday's police court.

McQueen, described by the magistrate as the goat, was sentenced in addition to fourteen days in gaol without any alternative. Austin Ross, defence counsel in the case, said all betting operations for a week would be transferred to the Woodbine where there are plenty of silk hats and silk stockings.

I rise to protest against discrimination in the rights and privileges of our people. Inside the walls of the Woodbine or of any other race track in Canada you may, if you wish, go, bet your last dollar, and take the consequences. I am not defending that practice. But outside of those walls, if you dare to imitate the habits and customs of the rich who frequent the race tracks you may be treated as these men were treated, namely, receive sentences and terms in gaol. That is one reason I support the bill now before the house.

I say to the people of this country that they must either cancel the privileges which in this house have been granted to the rich, or grant equal privileges to the man who is able to bet only one or two dollars on the races. Betting on the sweepstakes is to-day a fact. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are paid annually in bets, and all that money is going out of the country. I should very much prefer to have the money stay in Canada, if it must be spent, than to have it go to foreign countries. The bill simply states that if they wish and if they are willing to take the responsibility the provinces may do so and so. I do not know why the House of Commons should hold a club over the provinces, as a father would hold a stick over his child, and say, "You cannot do so and so because you are not capable of managing your own affairs." I should prefer regulated evils to unlicensed evils. In handing this privilege to the provinces we are not taking a stand either for or against betting. We simply say to them, "This is your privilege, and under the law of Canada we give you the right to exercise the privilege which as integral parts of the dominion we think you should have."

But I have not risen to speak on that aspect of the bill. I say quite frankly that that feature of it does not interest me. I am not interested in gambling or in sweepstakes, and I have very little interest in racing, although in times gone by I have had race horses. I have risen to exercise the privilege granted me to-night in this great sounding board of federated Canada to draw to the attention of the people of our country the greatest wastage this country has ever known or will know, namely the economic wastage of the human machine. I believe if the house and the country will listen to me for but a few moments I shall be able to prove that we are not conscious of the extent of that wastage. I shall be very brief, and shall attempt to outline in but a moment or two the hypothesis upon which I predicate my remarks. I refer to the value of human life. According to those who have spent time, money and talent working out values of human life we learn that a child at birth is valued at $10,000. At fifteen years the person is valued at $14,150; at twenty-five years, $32,000; at fifty years, $17,510; at sixty years, $8,500 and at seventy years, nothing. Predicated upon those valuations I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the great wastage this country is suffering every year, and I shall point out that by the expenditure of certain money there is the possibility of saving vast sums of money.

Mr. MULLINS: Is not the hon. member making a mistake when he refers to people of seventy years? I should think a man is just reaching maturity at that age.

Mr. McGIBBON: I suppose I should apologize to those who have reached that age, but statisticians say that their value to the country is nil. I should like now to draw the attention of hon. members to the wastage I have mentioned.

Statisticians tell us that two per cent of our population are continuously nil. That two per cent at a reasonable salary, which I have put down as $1,000 per year, indicates an annual loss through preventable sickness of $180,000,000. I submit that that is a considerable sum, especially when we realize that a great deal of this loss could be prevented. We have continuously ill 54,000 adult males and 54,000 adult females, making a total of 108,000. Taking an average wage of $2,500 for the males and $1,000 for the females we have an annual loss or wastage in earning power due to sickness of $189,000,000. If we add to that, as we must, medical care and hospitalization at $19 each per year we find we have another $2,052,000 added to the wastage.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member proceeds further I must call the attention of the house to the fact that the time allotted for the discussion of private and public bills has expired, and unless consent is given we must proceed to consideration of the orders of the day.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked, and I think the house granted, that the orders of the day should not be proceeded with until this bill had been considered. Therefore the order of business now properly before the house is this bill, from the Senate, which was to engage the attention of the house, by consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to be very brief. I have every consideration for my audience and realize that they have been bored all day with this debate. I am trying however to approach the matter from a different angle, in order that in the near future something may be accomplished. May I for a few moments deal with facts in connection with preventable death. I am speaking about preventable mortality, and shall endeavour to put into dollars and cents the facts in connection therewith.

There is a preventable infant mortality in this country of 15,000 per year; there is a preventable mortality from diphtheria amounting to 12,000 per year; from cancer, 5,000; from influenza, 5,000; from diabetes, 700; from typhoid, 450 and from scarlet fever, 325. If we apply the tables which I gave the house a short time ago we will find that this represents a wastage of over $380,000,000. If this is all totalled up it will be found that the yearly wastage amounts to over $800,000,000. This is the value of the loss of efficiency in industry through sickness and preventable deaths. I ask the house to think what that means to a country the total expenditure of which is only $400,000,000 or $450,000,000.

A great part of that $800,000,000 could be saved and that is why I rise to impress upon this house the possibilities offered to this country through being able to obtain a little more money for proper hospitalization and treatment. What is the good of our saying that this will cut off grants? There are practically no private grants for hospitals to-day.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Donations.

Mr. McGIBBON: Donations have fallen practically to zero. In a moment I shall read a letter which I received from the president of the Red Cross in Ontario to the effect that they can get no money with which to carry on their work. In times past I have gone to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to ask that the Indians in the north be looked after. Those Indians run wild just like the cariboo and the deer; they suffer and die by the scores, yes by the hundreds and thousands, from tuberculosis and other diseases. They receive no care or medical attention and hospitalization. Why? Because the people who have the responsibility have no money. The federal Department of Health looks after the health of ten million people but this government votes only $500,000 per year for that work. I know the British North America Act stands in the way; the provinces say they have no money, the municipalities say the task is impossible and the federal government say it is not their obligation. When some institution comes along and says they will raise so many million dollars per year for hospitalization, when I know that hundreds and thousands are dying from want, when I know that hundreds and thousands are suffering from disease and the country is losing the vast sum which I indicated, something over $800,000,000 per year, then I say if we cannot get money from the municipalities, from the provinces, from the federal government or from private donations, why not accept it from those who are willing to go out and get it for us? I do not think there is any legitimate answer to that. I have heard none. The betting on sweepstakes is going on anyway and we need not try to be moral about it. We are not one bit better or one bit worse; all that we are asking is to turn this money into channels which will save the health and lives of the people of this country.

Let me show the house some of the possibilities. In 1880 the average span or expectancy of life was forty years, but to-day through medical science and medical care it has been raised to nearly sixty years; I think the correct figure is 59·2 years. That means that an additional fifty per cent of time has been added to the lives of the people; approximately twenty years of life has been added to the lives of ten million people. Based upon reasonable earning powers you then get a figure which my arithmetical ability can hardly reach. And we have not yet attained the limit. It is recognized to-day that seventy years is not an unreasonable expectancy of life for the people of this country to reach even in our day and generation. If proper finances were supplied to the organizations which are working for the extension of human life, the results would be staggering. It has been estimated that $2.50 spent through the proper channel would increase the expectancy of life from five to seven years. What is gained? You spend $2.50 and you get the income of a man or woman for from five to seven years. This offers the greatest possibility for increasing the wealth of this country which can be obtained through any channel of government activity. Yet the municipal, provincial and federal governments are absolutely dead, not only to the possibilities of the future but to the wastage of the present. I should like to read a little article which appeared in the Manchester Guardian. This was written under the name of "Artifex." It reads:

> Whereas the publication of the names of the winners in a recent Dublin sweepstake occupied a whole page of a London newspaper on two consecutive days, the same space in every issue extended over four and a half years would be needed to publish the names of those who won nothing.

What is the good of our trying to fool ourselves? These things are going on right under our eyes and hundreds of thousands of dollars of Canadian capital is being sent out of the country every year. Canada is just that much the loser.

If I may intrude further upon the time of the house I should like to read a letter which I received last year from the head of the Red Cross in Ontario. I do not think I need dilate upon the good work this organization is doing. It is an institution which stands alone in this country. It is the friend of all governments, both in peace and in war, but above all it is the friend of the sick and needy. It pushes its outposts back to the frontiers; it looks after the crippled, the sick, the halt and the blind, but it has to go out on the streets of the cities in order to gather its money. This is a letter that I received last year when this bill was up for consideration in this house:

Dear Dr. McGibbon:

At a meeting of the Canadian Red Cross (central council) held in Toronto on Thursday and Friday last the question of where the money was coming from to carry on Red Cross work was given very serious consideration. What with the grants from the government being cut down very materially and the inability of the patients to pay for their hospital care promptly, if at all, the revenue has been cut down quite a substantial amount.

The need for hospital care is even greater now than in the past, possibly due to the state of affairs in the country at large. Our Red Cross outposts are going to suffer a great deal unless we find some new means of procuring funds, and this can hardly be expected from those who have been contributing in the past, because many of our subscribers have had their salaries reduced, others have lost in various ways and still others are out of employment entirely. In addition to the above, the government have found it necessary to increase taxation. to many of whom it will mean that they cannot contribute to the Red Cross and other charitable work.

The question of sweepstakes was brought up at the central council meeting last week and the statement was made that millions of dollars were sent out of Canada each year in connection with one sweepstake or another. One delegate present, who is in a position to know, stated that two hundred and ninety-eight thousand dollars had left one office in Montreal in the last sweepstake.

Think of it—$298,000 from one office in Montreal in the last sweepstakes. The letter goes on:

It was rather surprising out of a group of about thirty delegates present that there was very little objection raised at the suggestion made to have the Red Cross Society of Canada handle a sweepstake for the hospitals. This may come as a surprise to you and may not at the start appeal to you. However, in asking several persons for their opinion of the subject since last Thursday, it has been rather surprising to find that while some were against the proposition on the start, when they learned the facts of the needs, they were inclined to favour the idea.

I do not want to weary the house by reading more. The letter shows that the central council of the Red Cross Society of the great province of Ontario has come out in favour of this bill. Why? Because the thing is going on anyway, for one reason; but mainly because they cannot get the money they require to carry on the great work which has been delegated to them and which they are interested in and want to perform.

The debate on this bill has gone on all afternoon and this evening, and I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to encroach further upon the time of the house. But before sitting down I want to appeal to members of the House of Commons and the people of Canada to consider the great wastage of over eight hundred million dollars per year that is going on in this country, a large part of which could be saved, and in the light of that not to put any unnecessary obstructions in any channel through which funds may pour into the coffers that will help this society to bring peace, comfort and happiness to the great bulk of the people of Canada.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, this question of public lotteries is by no means a new one, even in this country. I spent some hours recently in the new archives building in Halifax, the capital of my native province, and while browsing about I saw there the original copy of a proclamation of the lieutenant governor of the province of Nova Scotia, dated September 21, 1781, one hundred and fifty-three years ago. That proclamation reads as follows:

Sir Andrew Snape Hamond Knight Lieutenant Governor and Commander in Chief in and over His Majesty's province of Nova Scotia and its dependencies &c &c &c.

To Henry Newton, Jonathan Binney, James Brenton, John Cunningham and Charles Morris Junior Esquires.

Greeting

Whereas by an act passed in the last session of the general assembly of this province entitled "An act for raising the sum of £1 500 by a lottery for the building a public school in Halifax," it is therein enacted that certain able and discreet persons shall be appointed managers and directors for putting into execution the said act, I have therefore thought fit with the advice and consent of His Majesty's council to appoint you the said Henry Newton, Jonathan Binney, James Brenton, John Cunningham, and Charles Morris Junior, and you are hereby appointed managers and directors for carrying the said act into execution, according to the full intent and meaning thereof, and according to the orders and directions therein contained. And any three of you the said Henry Newton, Jonathan Binney, James Brenton, John Cunningham, and Charles Morris Junior, shall be a quorum for ordering and directing all manner of matters relating to and concerning said lottery, as aforesaid

Given under my hand and seal at Halifax, this twenty-first day of September, 1781 in the twenty-first year of His Majesty's reign.

A. S. Hamond.

By Command of the Lieutenant Governor,
Richard Bulkeley.

Harking back to the beginning of history and bible times, apparently the lot was appealed to to decide many questions, problems and undertakings, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said a few moments ago. After the exodus the land of Canaan was apportioned by lot. Then in Proverbs, chapter 16, verse 33, I note "the lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord."

The Minister of Justice referred to the Art Union drawings of their pictures, several of which are to be seen in my native town.

These drawings are supported by public favour and no one has ventured to stop them. The Minister of Justice also referred to raffles of small articles. His idea apparently is more law and more law and more law.

My friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) this afternoon said and quite truly, that our ideas of morality differ. Sometimes it occurs to me that some of my neighbours are seemingly righteous overmuch and desire to lade men with burdens too grievous to be borne. Be that as it may I shall probably be told that weak men and some poor men speculate who cannot afford to do so. That is quite possible. Some men drink to excess, but shall all men who are temperate therefore be debarred from enjoying one of the good things of life or what has been described as one of the gifts of God?

Life from the cradle to the grave is a venture, a lottery. Marriage, I submit, is the greatest possible lottery of all life's ventures, where by the way I was particularly fortunate in winning a capital prize. But I note that my chief, the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) and also the leaders of the other two major parties, have shown in that matter, all three of them, a lack of enterprise which I venture to think as they grow older they may regret.

If I understood the Secretary of State this afternoon, he said that the provinces had exclusive jurisdiction in this matter. But I note that section 236, subsection 3 of the criminal code, reads:

> Every sale, loan, gift, barter or exchange of any property, by any lottery, ticket, card or other mode of chance depending upon or to be determined by chance or lot, is void, and all property so sold, lent, given, bartered or exchanged, is liable to be forfeited to any person who sues for the same by action or information in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Fancy, Mr. Speaker, the mentality of the man who conceived and drafted that section of the act which makes appeal to the meanest instincts of the lowest of mankind, the informer, who at all times and among all civilized peoples has been the object of disgust and detestation, motivated by the meanest of all vices, avarice and greed. I submit that restrictions which to be effective rely on such legislation are beyond the pale of any decent civilization, and that that subsection which I have just read should be removed from the statute book of Canada.

In a recent issue of the London Times I note an article entitled "A national lottery" from which I will quote as follows:

> A sweepstake is a gamble indulged in by a great number of people who never bet or gamble in any other way, and the excitement of the remote possibility of gaining a prize of much greater value than the stake enables them to indulge in the harmless recreation of anticipation three or four times a year, and so relieve the monotony of lives which would otherwise be very dull indeed. This struggle for the relief of such monotony is only a natural impulse, the repression of which by legislation will cause a great deal of resentment and attempts at evasion by otherwise perfectly law abiding citizens.

Why should this house not admit the existence of this natural and, in my opinion, innocent impulse? Nothing, in my judgment, is to be gained by legislation looking to the repression of this comparatively harmless recreation, for we are all gamblers; it is only a question of degree and I believe there is no cause for heroics in discussing this particular matter.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the question before the house, the second reading of this bill to legalize sweepstakes, has undoubtedly been ably presented by those who are in favour of the measure and their arguments have been set forth very clearly. No doubt the viewpoint which they hold is one that is held by many people in Canada. I differ, however, from that point of view, and I think it is incumbent upon me to present to the house a point of view that I know to be held by a very large number of Canadian people.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) upon not living up to his promise when he undertook to speak against this bill. He said that he was not going to discuss the moral aspect of it, but I am happy to say that he did and that he placed himself on record as believing that this measure would lead to the moral degradation of the people. It is that point of view that I shall present perhaps more strongly than the economic point of view, although like the Minister of Justice I hold very emphatically the opinion that the economic consequences of such legislation as is proposed in this bill would be disastrous to the Canadian people.

The bill now before the house comes to us from the upper chamber, a body that is animated by no partisan or sectional interests, a body that is supposed to represent the mature judgment of the Canadian people. We are not, however, necessarily governed by the opinion of the upper house, although the fact that this bill has been passed by that chamber entitles us to treat the legislation with a measure of respect. I trust, therefore, when I see fit to dissent from the conclusion reached by the other chamber, I shall not be deemed wanting in respect to that eminent body, but if I should seem to be so wanting I trust it will be understood that I consider the question before us of more importance than simply the preservation of the amenities of debate.

The bill under discussion is important also for the reason that it comes with the endorsation of one of the provincial legislatures. Naturally, when a bill comes so endorsed it is incumbent upon the members of this house to pay due consideration to the recommendations of that body. This is a confederation of provinces and the action of the province must of necessity be given consideration. When a province indicates its desire to deal with questions that it believes to be entirely in its own interests, we have a right, if the unity of confederation is to be preserved, to pay attention to its demand. On the other hand, if we are to preserve harmony in our confederation, no one province has a right to force upon the dominion a condition of things that is abhorrent to a great number of its citizens, and unless very strong reasons can be advanced for accepting the judgment of Quebec as governing the attitude of this house, I maintain it is the interest of the great majority of the Canadian people that should determine the matter. Perhaps we will give more consideration to that question when the bill proposed by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) comes before us.

The bill now under discussion is important because it proposes a new departure in financing of public undertakings. Hitherto our public institutions, our social organizations, have been maintained by voluntary contributions or by public taxation. It is now proposed that they should be maintained by lotteries. Many and various schemes have been devised to pull us out of the depression. Some of these are avowedly experimental and the experiments will very likely be cast aside. But this is a new proposal; it is proposed that we take a chance on getting out of the depression by establishing an institution for taking chances.

Before dealing with the arguments that have been advanced in support of the bill I should like to make some reference to an attitude that has been taken in some quarters toward those who have been opposing this measure. I rather hesitate to do this, but at the same time in view of statements that have been made in certain sections, I think it is desirable that we should call attention to the matter. Objection has been taken to the fact that the Social Service Council has made representations to parliament in regard to this question. The Social Service Council is a very eminent body; it is described as the federal council of churches and other organizations for the promotion of social welfare. I see that three out of the four leading officers are clergymen. I should be the first to resent any attempt at clerical domination of parliament; I believe a church controlled state and a state controlled church are equally inimical to the well being of Canada, but that is no reason why a body such as the Social Service Council should not make its representations to parliament just the same as any other organization might do. What have we received? We have recommendations from the Good Fellowship Association and another from the National Sweepstakes Petition Association. Another comes to us anonymously. We receive these petitions and we treat them as we see fit, but we acknowledge the right of these people to come to parliament and present their views. There is no reason why the Social Service Council or any other body of a public nature should not present their views to parliament without being told, as practically they were in one quarter, to mind their own business. I hope, Mr. Speaker, I am not wanting in respect for other people's opinions. When a man says in regard to this bill that it provides for simple, unadulterated gambling, and sees no moral or economic evil consequences in that, well, I can respect his honesty of conviction, much as I regret that any person should hold those views. But when he brings forward arguments to support his position, when he advances reasons why we should pass this bill, we have a right to examine his arguments and reasons as to their validity and see whether they are sound.

In the meantime I wish to express my own conviction that the effect of this legislation would be to undermine the moral and economic well being of our country. I agree with Horace Greeley who said many years ago that the darkest hour in any young man's life was when he first thought he could make a dollar by any other means than squarely earning it. Undoubtedly there are many factors that have combined to bring about the present depression, but I think we will all agree that one of the chief factors was the gambling craze in stocks that swept over the country in the years preceding it. The get-rich-quick craze has been that bane of our civilization. The message that ought to go out from this parliament to the young men of Canada should be not to seek wealth and satisfaction without rendering a proper equivalent; that true prosperity depends on the exercise of the old virtues of industry and thrift; and we ought also to send out to them the message that this parliament considers it its duty so to frame legislation to give men of industry and thrift a chance to reap their proper reward.

I got into conversation the other day with a man I hoped would be sympathetic with my point of view, and I was rather surprised when he indicated otherwise and spoke of this bill as providing a chance for the poor man to indulge in a little gamble. He said there are not very many rich men who would indulge in it in this form, but this would give an opportunity to the poor man. Here we touch again the economic question. Is it wise for us in these times of hardship and distress to encourage men to take a chance on sweepstakes? Is it wise for us to encourage men who ought to be spending their money in providing for the wants of their families, men who are perhaps themselves on relief, to spend the few dollars that may come into their hands in buying sweepstake tickets? After all, Mr. Speaker, let us put this matter to the personal test. I say to any business man: Would you put in a position of trust any young man that you knew to be a bettor on races, any young man that you knew to be continuously putting his money into sweepstakes? Would you do it in your own business? You know perfectly well you would not put in a position of trust a man who is addicted to the vice of gambling.

The argument of provincial rights has been advanced. That is perhaps one that will not be given as much weight to-day as it would have been given thirty years ago, for we are beginning to recognize that one of the fundamental weaknesses of the British North America Act is that it puts within the jurisdiction of the provinces many things that might more properly be dealt with by the federal government. However, that is a matter that perhaps we shall be able to deal with more fully when we come to the other bill which will probably be before us.

Another argument which I do not think has any weight or validity is that we should extend the opportunities for gambling because we already have gambling institutions. I do not propose to justify any discrimination between rich man and poor man, but if any one thing is wrong, as evidently those who use that argument concede there is a measure of evil in this practice, it is no reason why we should wipe out discrimination by extending the privileges to the poor man. Let us rather curtail the privileges of the rich. Then the argument is advanced that because we have betting on horse races and make exceptions in regard to certain things, we should open the door still wider. For my part I am opposed to all those exceptions. Someone says: What about stock gambling? Well, let us remember that the transfer of stocks from one man to another is not necessarily an evil—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What about gambling in wheat?

Mr. BROWN: The selling of wheat is not necessarily an evil. I am willing to concede that evil practices have grown up in connection with the stock market, and the wheat market if you like. But that is not the question we are dealing with; we are dealing with sweepstakes, lotteries. If any hon. member wants to bring forward a bill to get rid of the evils connected with the stock exchange it will receive my hearty support. It is a matter of regret to me that some of those who are opposed to this bill will even admit that there is validity in that argument. I regret that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), not only this year but last year and the year before, referred to that argument as something that tempted him—he did not use that expression this year, but last year he did—almost tempted him to vote in favour of the bill. Why will the hon. member give countenance and encouragement and comfort to the enemy by even suggesting that there is validity in that argument?

But the argument upon which the supporters of this bill mainly rely may be stated thus—it was urged this evening by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley): all life is a gamble; we are constantly taking chances; farming is a gamble; business is a gamble; we are never sure of anything; therefore why should we not take a chance on the turn of the wheel or the throw of the dice or the drawing of a ticket out of a hat?

Mr. CANTLEY: I did not say that.

Mr. BROWN: That, I say, is the general argument that is used in support of this bill. To my mind no argument could be more fallacious. It springs from a mind unwilling or unable to discriminate between two things that are essentially different. Of course life is uncertain. We may make our plans only to find that be they never so carefully laid something over which we have no control prevents their accomplishment. That fact has been the theme of some of our greatest writers, it is not only the wise men of this generation who have discovered the uncertainties of life:

Man proposes, God disposes.

There is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will.

But, mousie, thou art no thy lane,
In proving foresight may be vain;
The best laid schemes o' mice an' men,
Gang aft agley,
An' lea'e us nought but grief and pain,
For promised joy.

Go to now, ye that say to-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city and continue there a year and buy and sell and get gain, whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow.

Well, these are admitted facts, but I protest against this profound truth being prostituted to the support of this bill. Surely the fact that we know not what a day or an hour may bring forth does not justify the passage of this bill. There seems to be some uncertainty in the minds of men as to what gambling is; the term is used so loosely and applied to things which are not gambling in the proper sense of the word. A recent letter appearing in one of the newspapers stated:

In your issue of January 24th appears an editorial entitled "What is Gambling?"

The question has often been discussed, but I venture to suggest to you a definition. Gambling is the taking of a risk which serves no purpose. Speculation is the taking of a risk which must be carried by someone. If I go out to the races and bet on a particular horse, that is a gamble. There was no reason why my money should be risked upon that venture. If, however, I buy ten thousand bushels of May wheat in the month of December and carry it to April before I sell it I am taking a risk which must be taken by somebody. The farmer, the miller or the merchant must carry the wheat until the date at which it can be used.

There is, I think, a clear distinction between these two classes of risks. The speculator helps in the adjustment to the probable. The gambler is a disturbing factor in the operation of the speculator. The gambler is not necessary; the speculator is.

I entered into conversation with the writer of that letter, and he wanted to modify that definition to some extent by saying that the risk should be taken by some person competent to take it. I am not going to say just how far I agree with that statement; probably I would dissent from it in some particular, so it must not be taken as an expression of my own views entirely. However, there is a thought there which I think we might properly consider when we think what gambling really is, and that is that in some of the risks we take in life there is a definite purpose. What about the farmer? We are told loosely that farming is a gamble, but it is not. The farmer sows his seed in the ground. He knows there is a possibility that one man may sow and another reap; he knows there is a possibility that one man may sow while no one reaps. Unfortunately that has been only too true during the last few years in the west, but the farmer has a definite purpose in view, and that purpose is to provide himself and his family with food, using the surplus above his own wants to provide himself with other necessities of life. The definite purpose behind the activities of that man is to feed the world, and if men had not been prepared to take these chances in life we would still be naked savages running through the woods and there would not have been any advance in civilization.

That is true also of the trader who sends his ships over the seas. He does not know whether they will ever come back to him, but the fact that he does send out his ships in order to bring back goods tends to the advancement of civilization. Men go up into the stratosphere; they take chances, but they want to advance the sum total of human knowledge. Commander Byrd is spending a winter in the Antarctic; he is taking a chance and risking his life, but it is in order that he may secure fuller knowledge in regard to some phenomena that are not well understood to-day. What about our doctors? Many a doctor has risked his life in order to increase human knowledge in regard to disease. Sometimes doctors have allowed themselves to be infected with disease, knowing that they took a chance; they did so in order that they might advance the sum total of human knowledge and be able to render, with that knowledge, a service to humanity. Yet there are people who would put an action of that kind on the same plane as buying a sweepstake ticket. Surely there is no similarity between the two acts.

We have had the question of insurance brought up in the other house. We will take fire insurance as perhaps the simplest illustration of the principle. What is a mutual fire insurance company? It is an organization of men who have associated themselves together in order to help each other in case of misfortune. That is carrying out the Christian principle that ye that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the marketing bill.

Mr. BROWN: I have tried to keep my remarks from becoming partisan, so I will discuss that phase of the question another time. I said that a mutual fire insurance company simply carries out the Christian principle that ye that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, that the fortunate ought to help bear the misfortunes of the unfortunate. Perhaps the principle is not seen so clearly in regard to other insurance companies; nevertheless the underlying principle of insurance is that the strong shall bear the infirmities of the weak. Yet we have the argument advanced that this is on the same plane as buying sweepstake tickets. In any case actuarial calculations so far as possible have eliminated those risks.

I have advanced some reasons as to why I think this bill should not be supported. I am quite ready to concede that there are some sections in the present criminal code that might very well be changed. I am quite at one with those who urge that the very obnoxious clause concerning the disposal of the prize won in a lottery should be wiped out. I think perhaps it will be recalled that last year, when the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) introduced a bill dealing with this subject, in speaking on the second reading I indicated that if the bill went to committee I would bring in an amendment wiping out that clause and providing that the prize should go to the state. I am glad to know that this proposition is now heartily endorsed.

I feel strongly on this question, Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of its effect upon the morals of our young people. I have said already that we ought to tell the young men of this country that the true source of prosperity is not in taking chances by pulling a ticket out of a hat or in any other form of chance, but that thrift and industry in the end will bring their reward. While it may be and is true that there are things in life which we cannot control, nevertheless it is largely true that men within themselves are able to determine their own destiny, and that is the truth we ought to emphasize.

> Out of the night that covers me,
> Black as the pit from pole to pole;
> I thank whatever gods there be
> For my unconquerable soul.
>
> In the fell clutch of circumstance,
> I have not winced or cried aloud;
> Under the bludgeoning of chance,
> My head is bloody but unbowed.
>
> It matters not how strait the gate,
> How dark with punishment the scroll,
> I am the master of my fate;
> I am the captain of my soul.

That is the message to give to the young men, and not to tell them to take a chance, life is a gamble; therefore let us eat, drink and be merry, and make no effort to advance our own welfare and control our own destiny.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in the debate, but after listening to the remarks of the mover (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo) and the seconder (Mr. Gagnon) of the motion for second reading, it seemed to me that they left the impression with the house that the province of British Columbia is favourable to this legislation. I fail to discover any evidence to that effect. It is quite true that a plebiscite was taken in the city of Vancouver, on which occasion I believe ten per cent to fifteen per cent of the citizens of that great city voted for sweepstakes. That is the only evidence we have from the province of British Columbia that this legislation is desired. The government of British Columbia has not intimated that it requires this measure in order to carry on the financing of some of the institutions of that province.

I am not going to touch upon the historical aspect of the matter, nor shall I deal with the moral side of it. The last speaker (Mr. Brown) has dealt with those particular phases of the question. The hon. member who seconded the motion for second reading stated that a man who was sitting very close to him and who would quite likely oppose the bill had in his pocket a sweepstake ticket. I am not guilty. I have not a sweepstake ticket in my pocket, but I have bought tickets on raffles; I have bought the odd ticket on sweepstakes and have taken chances on the horses, with the same results which thousands of others have experienced. All I got out of it was just the kick.

Hon. members supporting the bill claim that the adoption of this proposal is necessary in order that we may secure funds to finance our institutions, particularly our hospitals. I was amused when, referring to this bill, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said it was clothed in the garb of righteousness. Perhaps that is the reason this measure is entitled the Hospital Sweepstakes bill. In British Columbia we have met with difficulty in financing hospitals, a difficulty which has been experienced in other parts of Canada. We have had difficulty in financing other institutions. During the last three years the churches have had difficulties; educational institutions have had difficulties, governments have had difficulties and individuals have had difficulties. Hospitals are not the only institutions which have had trouble in financing. But we have passed through the most difficult stage in our history, and so far we have been able to maintain our institutions. The courage and sacrifice of the Canadian people have met the situation; they have rallied to the support of their institutions with great credit to themselves and to their country. I believe I am voicing the opinion of the people of British Columbia when I say that they are prepared to continue to make sacrifices and to carry on, rather than to resort to legislation of this kind.

There is just one other point to which I should like to refer. The argument has been made by several hon. members that under the present system money is leaving the country, and that for that reason we should step in and set up machinery to carry on sweepstakes, lotteries and gambling, so that the money may be kept in Canada. I question whether there is much force in that argument. The question before us to-day is not that of setting up Canadian sweepstakes and thereby shutting out the purchase of tickets on the Irish and other sweepstakes. That is not the question before us. If the house passes this measure and establishes a system of lotteries, and if it sets up machinery and spreads propaganda are we going to keep in Canada the money which is now going to sweepstakes and lotteries in other countries? Hon. members will recall that only a few years ago the question was raised in the Irish Free State as to what proportion of the moneys received ultimately went to the Irish hospitals. The parliament of the day in the Free State issued a report in which it was indicated that only 20 per cent went to hospitals; that eighty per cent went to prizes and expenses connected with carrying out the sweepstakes. I noticed that the mover of the resolution stated his figures indicated that the hospitals received only 17.99 per cent of the proceeds. At the time about which I have spoken there was a movement in the Irish Free State to increase the amount to be given to the hospitals. It was urged: Why all this effort in the name of charity when the hospitals receive only 20 per cent? The suggestion was made that they should get at least 33 per cent. The proposal was turned down, and why? The reply was that big prizes are necessary, and that unless big prizes are offered as inducements a large fund cannot be collected. Therefore it was indicated that it was necessary to keep the prize moneys as large as possible and the charitable donations as small as possible.

Let us apply that argument to the argument urged to-day to the effect that by instituting a system of lotteries in Canada we would keep the money in the country. We will suppose that the canvasser would be authorized under this legislation to go out and undertake to sell $2 or $2.50 tickets on a sweepstake the prize money of which, in the smaller provinces at least, might not be more than $2,000 or $5,000. The purchaser who has been in the habit of buying tickets would say, "Why should I buy a ticket in this sweepstake costing me $2.50 and offering only a small prize, when with the same money I can buy one in the Irish sweepstakes with prizes running up to $150,000?" The fact that a sweepstake is authorized in one province would only mean that another province would have to try to keep within its borders the money likely to be spent upon such an enterprise, and would have to introduce sweepstakes of its own to appeal to its own people. Therefore in every province of the dominion sweepstakes would be organized from time to time and tickets would be sold with the result that the whole country would go sweepstakes mad, and there would be great competition. The value of prizes would necessarily have to be enlarged and commissions to vendors increased. The first of the two results would be that the larger provinces of Quebec and Ontario, with their greater population, would be able to offer greater prizes and would draw the money from the smaller provinces. There has been special reference to British Columbia; in fact I believe the sponsor of this measure in another place based his whole argument on the situation obtaining in British Columbia. The second result is that the money would pour from British Columbia to the eastern provinces because of the larger prizes to be offered there, and the main object of my hon. friend who is fathering this bill, that of aiding the hospitals in his own province, would be defeated.

Is this an opportune time to resort to a lottery system in this country? I was surprised to hear an hon. member state this afternoon that he considered it was. We are just recovering from a world wide depression, a world wide gambling debauch which brought upon us untold suffering and widespread ruin, and I believe the adoption of such a system as is proposed by this legislation would not mitigate but would tend to increase our troubles. I regret that I cannot support the bill sponsored by my colleague from British Columbia.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, as one of the corporal's guard that supported the principle of this legislation last year, I feel it is necessary to take a few minutes to give my reasons for supporting it now. Many arguments have been put forward why this bill should be opposed and many have been put forward why it should be supported. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) made the observation that it was revolutionary in character. I always thought that playing poker might be illegal but I never thought it was revolutionary.

Mr. GAGNON: I never said that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Some hon. members have found fault with the intent of this bill which is to supply needed money for our hospital system. I believe the responsibility for that system should rest upon the state alone. It should be the responsibility of the state to supply the necessary means to carry on this system. I believe that hospitals stand in the same relationship to the community as our schools stood one hundred years ago. One of the great social problems confronting this country is the placing of our hospital system upon a sound basis rather than having it rest upon the giving of voluntary subscriptions. My experience has been, and I speak in a broad way, that those who should support our hospitals on a voluntary basis do not do so.

I listened with attention to the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and while I admit that there may be some soundness in his argument I think he should have carried it out to its logical conclusion. If sweepstakes are economically unsound, so are race tracks, so are stock exchanges, so is the gambling which takes place in the wheat pits, so is the gambling which takes place in real estate and so are the raffles carried on by many organizations in this country. I think it would be a fair observation to make that possibly the present government is gambling in not having an election this year and deciding to wait until next year when times might be a little better.

I am sure the sincerity of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) cannot be questioned. He said that this bill would develop the desire to get money. He said money was the root of all evil.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: No, the love of money.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the same thing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MITCHELL: All right; have it whichever way you want. He said that this legislation threw the doors open to gambling. I wonder if he realizes that at the present time, as far as the broad aspect of gambling is concerned, the door is wide open. I think it is fair to say that we have even lost the key. A practical and realistic view should be taken of a question of this kind, and I do not think it is the business of this house to produce angels. If that is the yardstick by which we must be measured, we have not been very successful. In my opinion the soundness of any legislation is reflected in the effect it has upon the enforcement of other legislation. We might as well admit that innumerable sweepstakes are taking place in this country to-day under various subterfuges. I think it is far better to recognize that fact and regulate things rather than to allow them to pass almost unnoticed.

I do not intend to put myself on the high moral plane upon which some hon. members have placed themselves. I do not gamble, because I think a man who gambles is a fool, but like most hon. members, at the present time my wallet is filled with drawing tickets. The first game of people who have drawing tickets to sell is the member of their particular constituency; he is the first man they hunt up. Under these conditions I do not see how I can vote conscientiously against a bill of this description.

I think most hon. members miss the important thing in buying a drawing ticket. It is not the desire for gain, as has been expressed here, because the chances are very small; it is the thrill which the average man gets out of buying a ticket. Why should we deny him that thrill? One gets so few thrills in life, it is worth something. It is like a woman buying a hat. The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), the lone lady member of the house, is not present so perhaps I may continue. Most of us men folk think that most ladies hats do not look very much, but if a woman gets a thrill out of buying one, surely it is worth something.

This bill has the endorsation of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, which discussed the matter thoroughly and came to the conclusion that it was far better to recognize a condition that existed than to turn a blind eye.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I assure the house I shall take but a very few moments, but I desire to justify the vote I intend to cast on this bill. My first instinct was to vote against the bill, and although I have tried to reason with myself and sell myself this proposition, I must admit that I have failed. This is why I want to explain the position I am going to take in voting against the bill and in favour of the amendment.

When it was first mentioned that everyone would be free to vote on this question just as he pleased, I thought I could vote without speaking on the question at all, but owing to the very strong and extended newspaper campaign that has been conducted in the province of Quebec I find it impossible to vote on this measure without first giving an explanation.

It has been stated in the press of the province of Quebec that a large majority of the citizens of the province are in favour of this bill, and the same opinion has been expressed this afternoon by members from my own province who have already spoken. I must say that I cannot endorse that opinion. I have not received a single letter from any of my constituents in favour of this bill or asking me to support it. I am afraid that some members from the province of Quebec have been more impressed by the newspaper campaign than they should have been, and not so much by the sentiments of their constituents as they have had occasion to consult them, as no doubt some have. I was home last week-end and had occasion to meet several people from different parts of my county; I asked those whom I met what their opinions were of this bill, and not one of them told me he was interested, and not one asked me to support the bill.

Another reason why I cannot support the bill is that if we were to have sweepstakes I am strongly of the opinion that the matter should be under federal control. Two members this afternoon, the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) and the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), said that it was not a question of having or not having lotteries, that lotteries were here and we had to deal with them, and that as we had them it was better to legalize them than to let them be conducted illegally as they are now. But is it as sure as all that, that if this bill passes we shall not have as many lottery tickets sold illegally as we have to-day? Subsection 2 of section 5 of the bill reads:

> Agents or solicitors for the sale or promotion of sweepstakes tickets shall not be authorized or appointed in any province in Canada other than the province within which the sweepstakes is authorized.

If two or three or five or six provinces take advantage of this law, should the bill pass, in what position would we find ourselves in a province which did not take advantage of the law? Do hon. members believe that agents will not offer for sale in the province of Quebec, for instance, if it did not take advantage of the law, tickets from the province of Ontario or the maritime provinces or any other province which did take advantage of it? I believe that if this bill passed we would have more illegal tickets sold than we have to-day. But even if that were not the case, if the situation should remain as it is to-day and as has been described by several hon. members this afternoon and to-night, with illegal tickets now being sold anyway, is that any good reason why we should add one more to the evils already existing? In my opinion we should rather try to restrict the present evils.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I would take only five or ten minutes, and I shall conclude as briefly as possible. There is one other aspect on which I should like to say a few words. I am strongly of the opinion that was expressed by an hon. member who has just spoken, that to adopt this bill and to have sweepstakes would be to set the worst possible example and be a most unfortunate inducement not only to our youth of from fifteen to twenty years of age but even to younger children. Judging by the experience of other countries, if sweepstakes are legalized in Canada I think we shall see every schoolboy and schoolgirl trying to save five cents in order to be able to buy a sweepstakes ticket. To my mind that is contrary to the principles that ought to be put into the minds of our youth.

Another aspect on which I want to touch is the religious one. It has been advanced by many, and I have been told by many, that the Catholic church favours sweepstakes. It is not for me to say whether they do or do not, but I do believe that a man can buy a sweepstakes ticket without committing a mortal sin.

Going a little further, the hon. member for St. James said this afternoon that there is nothing immoral in lotteries. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that that opinion is not in conformity with the teaching of several eminent members of the church, and if I may be allowed I should like to quote one of them. We all know him in Quebec. Every year the Catholic church authorities invite eminent preachers from the old country to come to Montreal and Quebec and preach in their churches. This winter the Reverend Father Doncoeur from France preached the lenten services in the Notre Dame church in Montreal, and during a retreat for the men of Montreal he made these remarks which I quote from one of his sermons. The quotation was in French, but I have had it translated and I think the translation is accurate. Reverend Father Doncoeur said:

The divine commandment is that one must earn one's bread by the sweat of one's brow, and it is an act contrary to the moral law to organize sweepstakes.

This is in a few words what the Reverend Father Doncoeur stated last evening at the third conference of men's retreat at Notre Dame church. Money earned without an effort is not honestly earned, he added. The French workers of past centuries were well aware of this; they were only satisfied when the work they had done, for a stipulated amount, was almost perfect. They then took pride in the money thus earned honourably. The eminent preacher recalled that on his departure for Canada the sweepstakes organized by the French state were taking place. Millions were distributed, even five millions to one person.

I suppose that means francs.

Money earned without work! What disorders thrown upon society! For a few favourites of chance we have seen unfortunate people lose their minds.

God's commandment, the preacher repeated, is to earn one's bread by the sweat of one's brow. Speculation is the great evil of modern society. One desires to earn money without an effort. Nothing is more contrary to the moral law and harmful to society.

This reverend priest was invited by, and certainly had the approval of, our Catholic church authorities in the province of Quebec. Therefore, although as I said before I do not think this is a dogmatic question and I believe everybody is entitled to vote as he thinks best for or against this bill, I say that those who claim that the Catholic church has been favouring and fostering this legislation are not altogether correct. For these reasons and a few more that I might have advanced had I had time, I am going to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael).

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this discussion but I should like to make one or two observations. I agree with the remark made this evening by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) that if this bill is passed and becomes law, it will keep in Canada a good deal of money that now goes out of this country in payment of tickets for sweepstakes. But in my opinion—and I speak only for myself—if this bill becomes law and hospitals are permitted to raise money by means of sweepstakes, the matter will not end there. This is only the thin end of the wedge; requests will be made to this and future parliaments for all kinds of societies and associations to have the right and privilege to issue sweeptakes tickets.

I can well understand the attitude of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) although I do not agree with the arguments that he advanced in favour of this bill. He is a medical man, practising his profession, and I can quite understand that he is in favour of raising money by this means for grants to hospitals; but in my opinion, if the hospitals of this country are going to depend on the money that is received from a source such as this, they are not building on a very sure foundation. If this bill passes and becomes law it will be the means of reducing contributions that are now going to hospitals from private and other sources, and instead of being a benefit to hospitals I believe it will be a detriment. He has, however, voiced his opinion in that regard: I do not take issue with him on that but I do not think he is right in his argument.

This afternoon the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) brought up a point that to my mind was rather peculiar, especially in regard to this particular bill, because there is an air of mystery about this legislation. Last session a similar bill was introduced in another place and passed and came into this chamber where it was defeated. Again we have the same or a similar bill originating in another place and coming to this chamber. Last year the bill was defeated by a very large majority, and I am of opinion that public sentiment in this country has not changed from last year and that there is no demand for this legislation. The hon. member for Dorchester said: Why have any hypocrisy in regard to this matter? We had better make it legal.

Mr. GAGNON: On a point of order, I never said that this bill was a hypocritical measure.

Mr. SANDERSON: I did not charge the hon. member with saying that. What he did say, if I heard him correctly, was that we had better have legislation than have any hypocrisy in regard to buying sweepstake tickets. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GAGNON: If my hon. friend will permit me, he is still incorrect. I said that the regime of prohibition of alcoholic liquor in the United States and Canada was a regime of hypocrisy and I confined my remarks to the prohibition of alcoholic liquor.

Mr. SANDERSON: The point I want to make in regard to the hon. member for Dorchester is this: I think he said something about hypocrisy this afternoon in regard to purchasing sweepstake tickets.

Mr. GAGNON: No.

Mr. SANDERSON: If he did not say so, very well, but he at any rate implied that. Even if he did not I want to say that since

I have been a member of parliament there has not been another piece of legislation introduced into this chamber about which there has been more hypocrisy than this bill, for the reason that it is camouflaged and linked up—

An hon. MEMBER: The marketing bill.

Mr. SANDERSON: An hon. member says, the marketing bill. For the moment I do not want even to mention the marketing bill; I will confine myself to this measure. This bill is camouflaged with the word "hospital" and under the guise of "hospital" it is supposed that gambling will be legal for the Canadian people so far as raising money for hospitals is concerned. I should like to know who is behind this bill. What combination of interests in this country is behind this legislation and hiding behind the question of subsidizing and making contributions to hospitals by this method? It has been stated to-night by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie)—and I think it is correct—that about only eighteen per cent of the money contributed through such sources as this, sweepstake contributions and prices for tickets, reaches the destination to which it is supposed to go. What becomes of the other eighty-two per cent? I will admit that some proportion of it goes for the prizes, but beyond that it is nothing more nor less than a racket. And it will be a racket in this country if this bill passes the house. Let me say that I am not pretending to be on any high moral plane in regard to gambling, but any hon. member of this house who has been a member of the banking and commerce committee this session and has listened from day to day to the evidence given before that committee by the general managers of the banks will remember that in almost every instance they have said that the world condition and the condition in which we find ourselves in Canada to-day is largely due to gambling. And this bill, to my mind, has to do with nothing more or less than legalized gambling. If the bill becomes law it will be the beginning of more extensive legalized gambling, and gambling is a disease. I am not going back to ancient history to prove that because I want to deal with present world conditions and present conditions in our own country. It is a disease. Once you get the germ it is pretty hard to shake it. If our young men and young women, the rising generation of this country, are told that it is legal for them to spend their money, to gamble in sweepstakes for the maintenance of hospitals—and if they have not got it themselves they will borrow it or get it in some way—you are to my mind building on a wrong foundation for the future of this country.

So I cannot support this bill. It is possible that I might favour some kind of bill for sweepstakes. I am not going to spend the time to say what kind of bill would suit me; I am not absolutely opposed to the sale of sweepstake tickets, but I am opposed to the sale of sweepstake tickets under the guise of contributions to hospitals.

I am sorry if I have delayed the house at this late hour but I wanted briefly to put myself on record, and I hope if it comes to a vote to-night that the bill will be defeated.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only about seven or eight minutes—

An hon. MEMBER: Cut it in two.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It seems to me most strange that at this time we as a deliberative body composed of some 240 members supposedly capable of leading our electors and others in any direction for the general benefit of our country should be actually engaged in discusing the pros and cons of affording greater facilities for gambling, of which surely in all conscience we have too many already in Canada. That to me is an amazing thing. And then the reasons given! "The prohibition of gambling does not prohibit." Does the prohibition of murder prohibit? And because it does not would you abolish the law against murder? What arrant nonsense people talk. Does prohibition of anything prohibit? It never has and never will prohibit entirely, but it will not mend matters to open the doors wider and let them go to it. The hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) of whom I think so much, is in favour of it because it gives him a thrill! Would he carry that to its logical conclusion and say that all thrills should be sought and encouraged? The murderer is given a thrill. The man who breaks into a bank gets a thrill because he beats the law. There is a thrill in getting past the law. But that is a dangerous doctrine to follow. There are thrills and thrills, and there are some that we must avoid if we want to escape the penitentiary. I expressed the view last year that I was proud of the fact that all our leaders in both chambers were against this kind of thing—sweepstakes legalized. They are not very audible about it to-night, and that may be the part of wisdom as leaders, but I know where their hearts are. I know where they were last year, and I have no reason to believe that they are anywhere else this year. I am proud to think that even if their leadership is not very audible or visible it is nevertheless there. Who could listen to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), especially one sitting on the other side, and not be moved with the desire to follow such leadership in a matter of this kind? I have no desire to be thrown in contact with my hon. friend any more than is necessary, but I am not going to shy away because he leads, do not make any mistake about that, especially in a matter of this kind. I have had the opportunity since coming to Ottawa of having for nearly nine years under the Department of Agriculture had the supervision of race track gambling. I do not suppose there is any race track gambling in any part of the world conducted more decently than it is in Canada, if it can be conducted decently. It is supervised by the police. I know the example that form of gambling is to so many; I recited it last year, and I am not going to repeat it. Nor am I going to talk much longer, only to make one other remark, about regulating gambling.

We have heard a lot about regulating. Can you regulate a rattlesnake? Can you regulate poison? Can you regulate many of these vicious things for which the only cure is—well, something else much more drastic? Restrain it more by circumscribing its activities; penalize it more if possible, instead of opening the doors to it. I am astonished at the so-called arguments used, especially those relating to hospitals. Yet, Mr. Speaker, there are many good men who do it—that is the misfortune of it; if it were only the scalawags that liked gambling it would not be so bad, but the world is full of good men and women who engage in it; there is no question about that. But that is all the more reason that those of us who see it otherwise should make our views stoutly known.

I do not think my ten minutes are up yet—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Seven, it was to be.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then I will shorten it. When I think of the high and upper source from which this bill has come I am reminded of the old but true saying that "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." If I had a hundred votes, yea, a thousand, they would all be recorded against this gambling bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It devolves always upon whoever happens for the moment to lead the house, when a matter is under consideration that is not party or political in the broad sense, to make a few observations upon the question which is to be dealt with. In January of this year a discussion took place between the premiers of the provinces and members of the federal executive regarding lotteries and sweepstakes. The government indicated to those present that an opportunity would be given, without any whip being used or any control exercised from a party standpoint upon the members, to express freely their opinion with respect to the matter in hand. I have only this to say, that as far as my personal view is concerned I am unalterably opposed to this legislation and shall vote that it be given the six months' hoist. I shall not dwell upon the reasons which induced me to arrive at that conclusion. Suffice it to say that recently, 1932 to be exact, a book was published by a very well known author in which the whole history of lotteries was reviewed at great length and the reasons given why it was found essential in 1823 to pass a statute by which lotteries were made illegal in Great Britain. The law became effective in 1826. In France they passed an act by which lotteries were made illegal; it was not until more recent times, in fact not until the days of Clemenceau and Briand, that the act was amended, and it was only in 1933 that the present provisions of the law were enacted by which state lotteries were made legal.

My reading induces me to believe that the lotteries which began in a small way in England in the sixteenth century, the proceeds of which were utilized to build the British museum, to establish the colony in Virginia, to carry on operations of a public character in connection with the payment of the debt and to raise public money, were in the very nature of things frequently, if not always, surrounded by conditions which could not be supported. This book, Lotteries and Sweepstakes, by L'Estrange Ewen, published in 1932, reviews every lottery in Great Britain from the beginning until the end, and the various chapters dealing with the history of this question certainly are worth reading from any possible standpoint, whether of the history of the race, of its tendencies, of its instincts, or of the development of public morality. However you may look at it the fact is that this book is intensely interesting as the history of three hundred years or more. The conclusion at which the author arrives is one to which I think attention might be directed. I have the fullest sympathy with those who do not share my opinions; they have their reasons for their views and they sustain their convictions on grounds which doubtless they think quite as strong and as cogent as any reasons I could give as to why I do not support this measure. At page 353 of this book I find these words:

The determination of whether an action is right or wrong is dependent upon the setting up of a uniform standard of morality applicable to all classes in all circumstances, and as the moral theorists have not yet come to agreement on that matter, no attempt will be made in this practical volume to determine in which category of human endeavour participation in a lottery falls. It will be agreed by most students of moral science that the majority of actions upon which personal advancement depends contain elements which may be deemed vicious by the most exacting critic, and, disregarding the views of visionaries, it will be conceded by everyone that it is impossible to eliminate all incentives to evil without at the same time destroying many possibilities for good.

That is the conclusion at which the author arrives, to which I think most of us will agree. There is no absolute rule of right or wrong with respect to this particular matter. Each man must answer that question in the light in which he reads the evidence of the past and the history of days that are no more. That is the only way in which he can arrive at a conclusion, but when I am asked to exercise my vote as a member of the House of Commons of Canada to say that we shall legalize that which has brought the misery to the human race that games of chance and lotteries have brought, I propose to exercise my vote against any such thing. I cannot throw the weight, the prestige and the power of the state into legalizing these lotteries. Here is the epitaph that, after centuries of effort in Great Britain, was prepared by Hone with regard to lotteries, when they ceased to have legal existence in Great Britain:

In Memory of
THE STATE LOTTERY
the last of a long line whose origin in England commenced in the year 1569, which, after a series of tedious complaints, Expired on the 18th day of October, 1826.
During a period of 257 years, the family flourished under the powerful protection of the British Parliament:
the minister of the day continuing to give them his support for the improvement of the revenue.
As they increased, it was found that their continuance corrupted the morals, and encouraged a spirit of Speculation and Gambling among the lower classes of people;
thousands of whom fell victims to their insinuating and tempting allurements.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Many philanthropic individuals in the Senate,
at various times for a series of years, pointed out their baneful influence without effect
His Majesty's Ministers still affording them their countenance and protection.
The British Parliament being at length convinced of their mischievous tendency,
HIS MAJESTY GEORGE IV,
on the 9th July, 1823, pronounced sentence of condemnation
on the whole race;
from which time they were almost neglected by the British Public.
Very great efforts were made by the Partisans and friends of the family to excite
the public feeling in favour of the last of the race, in vain:
It continued to linger out the few remaining moments of its existence without attention or sympathy, and finally terminated its career unregretted by any virtuous mind.

My reading induces me to believe that every condemnation contained in that epitaph is supported by ample evidence. If I were to sit upon a jury I would have to find that the evidence against lotteries far outweighs any support that can be found either in the past or in the present. To argue that stock and mining exchanges constitute gambling may be and probably are correct to some extent, but to ask the state to establish a lottery, with various annuities and prizes to be awarded to those who are successful in the draw, it seems to me is but to offer one more incentive to the growing tendency not to realize the obligation that rests upon one and all to make some contribution, by real work, to their own fortunes and to the state.

I need not dwell upon the matter at length. What I have said so frequently I repeat, that on the balance of testimony as I see it and read it, and from what I can ascertain from the effect and influence of games of chance upon the minds, the thoughts and the habits of men; from the pernicious influence and the insinuating tendency to induce men to cease to work, as is pointed out in Palgrave's Dictionary of Political Economy, quoting from a well known statement made in the House of Lords by the Earl of Chesterfield of that day, the effect is ruinous upon the individual. From the moral standpoint; from the standpoint of the attitude of the individual towards society, towards his fellow and towards his country, I have no hesitation in saying that the evidence seems to me so complete that any jury of twelve men should find against lotteries, whether they be state or otherwise.

To introduce the hospitals into the matter of course is something that does credit to those who are anxious that our philanthropic institutions should be maintained. I happened to be in Dublin the day after one of the drawings took place. I know it is true that large sums of money went into that lottery from various parts of the world; it is true that we can advance the narrow argument that by this means we may keep in Canada or in one of the provinces substantial sums of money that might be utilized for some useful purpose. But if we established nine lotteries in Canada under the provisions of this act what would be the effect upon the people of this country? I do not believe there are ten men in this chamber who will say that at this time we should establish a national lottery in Canada. Therefore if we should not establish a national lottery, whether for hospitals, for the state or for any other purpose, can we justify the establishment of lotteries in a single province or in all nine provinces for any purpose that may be named? If we establish lotteries in three provinces and not in the other six what will be the result? The money from the six provinces will go to the three provinces, and so far as that is concerned it makes no difference whether it goes to the three provinces or somewhere else, in view of the way in which the money is expended, since only eighteen per cent of the total takings go to the hospitals which are used as the bait to secure the support of the public.

For these reasons, without reviewing the matter at length, I can only say that I must record my vote in favour of this bill being read this day six months hence, and I do so with as strong a conviction as I have ever held upon any public question in connection with which I have had to make a choice.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the house is anxious to vote on this measure before eleven o'clock, and for that reason in what I have to say I will be very brief. In a word, I find myself in entire agreement with the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). My convictions in the matter are quite as firm, as profound, and as sincere as are his own. I have opposed similar measures when on previous occasions they have been introduced, and on this occasion not only do I agree with the arguments presented by the Prime Minister but in addition I hold to the view expressed this afternoon by the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) that this particular measure is ultra vires.

I was somewhat surprised to see that one other member of the ministry seemed to take a different view with regard to the all important matter of jurisdiction. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite will not wonder that hon. members on this side feel they have reason for the doubts they entertain at times as to the certainty and unanimity of view existing in the ministry itself on questions of constitutional procedure and jurisdiction.

May I say of this particular bill with respect to hospital sweepstakes, the hospitals themselves do not wish to have the measure passed. I have in my hand a copy of an official letter addressed to the Prime Minister by the Secretary of the Canadian Hospital Council, of which body the right hon. gentleman himself is honorary president. In this communication very strong reasons are given as to why the House of Commons should not pass this particular measure. I shall not take the time of the house to read the communication. I need only say that it sets forth in no uncertain terms many of the arguments which have been presented to-day.

As the Prime Minister has said, the principle to be decided with respect to this bill is as to whether or not this house shall endorse legislation which tends to further gambling practices. I believe, in private, gambling should not be encouraged between individuals, and I hold there are even stronger reasons why those who have to do with the shaping of public opinion should not further or countenance any measure which, by statute, would publicly encourage gambling. At this particular time in the affairs of our country and the world I feel there are additional reasons why parliament should frown upon any course of behaviour which is likely to make for more in the way of uncertainty in the lives of our people and the affairs of our country. What we require in the affairs of individuals and of the nation is less of uncertainty and more of certainty; less of instability and more of stability; less of reliance on chance and luck, and more reliance on judgment and effort. There is no doubt that much of the distress of the times has come about through excessive speculation during periods of prosperity, and far too many people, with respect to their own affairs, have got into the habit of relying upon chance and gambling in one form or another rather than upon prudent action and reason.

One feature in particular I very much dislike about this measure is that it attempts to effect under the guise of what is laudable something which is otherwise indefensible, a tendency with respect to legislation which is becoming far too general in this House of Commons. We have witnessed the same kind of procedure with respect to not a few other measures. Relief measures introduced to assist the unemployed have been made the means of enabling the government of the day to do away with that control which parliament should at all times have over taxation and expenditures. To meet the alleged necessities of an emergency, the government has taken to itself power to enact almost any measures in the name of peace, order and good government. Other measures, such as the one nominally to regulate marketing, have in reality to do with the restricting of imports and exports. We have had titles introduced in this country, for the purpose we are told of fostering loyalty; in reality they serve mostly to satisfy the weakness of human vanity. This measure introduced in the name of charity in order to assist hospitals, as a matter of fact, is simply the thin end of the wedge of an effort to increase possibilities of gambling, a tendency which at any time should not be encouraged by legislation.

Therefore I am in entire agreement with those who have opposed the measure, and shall most certainly vote for the amendment to give it six months' hoist. If by any chance the amendment should not carry, I shall vote against the bill itself.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Carmichael) which was agreed to on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Anderson (Toronto-High Park)
Anderson (Halton)
Arthurs
Baker
Barber
Bell (St. John-Albert)
Bennett
Blair
Boucher
Bourassa
Bowen
Bowman
Boyes
Brown
Bury Butcher
Carmichael
Casselman
Charters
Coote
Cowan (Long Lake)
Dickie
Dorion
Duranleau
Edwards
Elliott
Factor
Ganong
Garland (Carleton)
Geary
Gershaw
Gobeil
Golding
Gray
Guthrie
Hackett
Hanson (York-Sunbury)
Hay
Howard
Ilsley
Irvine
Johnstone
Kennedy (Peace River)
King, Mackenzie
Lacroix
Loucks
Lucas
Luchkovich
Macdonald (Kings)
Macdougall
MacInnis
Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre)
MacMillan (Mackenzie)
Macphail, Miss
McGillis
McIntosh
McKenzie (Assiniboia)
McLure
McPhee
Matthews
Moore (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)
Moore (Ontario)
Motherwell
Murphy
Myers
Neill
Peck
Perley (Qu'Appelle)
Pickel
Plunkett
Ralston
Reid
Rhodes
Rogers
Ryerson
Sanderson
Sauvé
Shaver
Simpson (Simcoe North)
Simpson (Algoma West)
Smith (Victoria-Carleton)
Speakman
Spence
Spotton
Sproule
Stanley
Stevens
Stewart (Leeds)
Stewart (Lethbridge)
Stirling
Sutherland
Taylor
Thompson (Simcoe East)
Thompson (Lanark)
Totzke
Tummon
Turnbull
Verville
Weese
Weir (Melfort)
Weir (Macdonald)
White (London)
White (Mount Royal)
Willis
Wright—105.

NAYS

Messrs:

Arsenault
Baribeau
Barrette
Beaubien
Belec
Bell (St. Antoine)
Bertrand
Boulanger
Bourgeois
Brasset
Casgrain
Chaplin
Davies
Denis
Deslauriers
Desrochers
Donnelly
Dubois
Dumaine
Dupré
Dupuis
Fiset, Sir Eugène
Fontaine
Fournier
Fraser (Cariboo)
Gagnon
Girouard
Hanson (Skeena)
Harris
Heaps
Jean
Laflèche
McGibbon
McGregor
Maloney
Mercier (Laurier-Outremont)
Mercier (St. Henri)
Michaud
Mitchell
Morand
Parent
Perras
Power
Raymond
Rhéaume
Rinfret
Roberge
Robinson
Ross
St-Père
Séguin
Stewart (Edmonton West)
Stitt (Nelson)
Stitt (Selkirk)
Tétreault
Thauvette
Veniot—57.

Mr. MacLEAN: I was paired with the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was paired with the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. RUTHERFORD: I was paired with the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MULLINS: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SMOKE: I was paired with the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Motion (Mr. Fraser) as amended agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 23, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the fifth report of the select standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I wish to lay on the table copy of order in council P.C. 1042 dated May 21, 1934, ordering that the printer's copy of all departmental reports, complete in revised typewritten form, either in English or in the French language shall be delivered to the King's Printer on or before the first day of July in each and every year.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): On behalf of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) I desire to lay upon the table copies of orders in council passed under the relief act, and also to lay upon the table the findings of the tariff board with respect to fruits and vegetables.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MEDICAL OFFICER, R.C.M.P., REGINA

Mr. McPHEE:

1. Was Dr. Guest of Regina, Saskatchewan, appointed medical officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Regina?
2. If so, what was the date of his appointment?
3. How long has he served?
4. Has he been retired; if so, when?
5. Is he in receipt of pension for said service?
6. If so, how much?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. Yes.
2. 27th February, 1931.
3. Three years.
4. Yes, on the 27th February, 1934, as he had reached the age limit.
5. No, but he was granted three months' pay as gratuity.
6. Answered by No. 5.

LOANS TO ROUMANIA

Mr. McPHEE:

1. How much money was loaned by the Dominion of Canada to Roumania: (a) by direct loan; (b) by merchandise purchased by the government of Canada and charged to Roumania?
2. When was said loan made?
3. Was said loan granted by order in council?
4. If so, what is the date of same?
5. Has any of said loan been repaid?
6. How much is now outstanding on said loan?

Mr. RHODES:

1. (a) Nil; (b) $20,449,083.94.
2. 1919.
3. Yes.
4. P.C. 690 of April 2, 1919.
5. By agreement effected in 1922, the loan, which under the original terms would have been due in 1924, was funded and Canada received $23,969,720 of 4 per cent Roumanian bonds due in 1968.
6. $23,969,720, representing principal amount of loan and $3,520,636.06 of interest arrears consolidated as of December 31, 1922. Interest arrears on bonds, $838,932.50.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. GOBEIL:

For a copy of the schedules of works approved by the federal government under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and the Relief Act, 1933, for the federal constituency of Compton, showing the accounts received with respect to each schedule, the dates on which such accounts were reecived. the dates on which payment of same were made to the province, and, in the case of municipal works, the dates shown on the accounts as that on which they were received by the province from the municipality.

Mr. GOBEIL:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Labour and the provincial authorities of Quebec concerning the non-payment of those employed on relief works being carried out by the province prior to the receipt by the province of the federal government's share.

ST-CELESTIN, QUE., POSTMASTER, DISMISSAL

Mr. DUBOIS:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, letters, petitions and other documents, respecting the dismissal of Mr. Eloi Girard, postmaster of the village of St-Celestin, county of Nicolet.

ONTARIO ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I have a question which I desire to ask the Prime Minister. I have noticed that the Postmaster General is advertised to speak to-morrow night in the town of Hawkesbury in the county of Prescott, province of Ontario, in support of the Conservative candidate in the provincial election. My question is this: Is it the policy of the government that ministers of the crown shall move from one province to another to take part in provincial elections—for instance, a minister from the province of Quebec coming into the province of Ontario?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The question requires no answer.

Mr. SANDERSON: On a question of privilege, I asked a question of the Prime Minister and I did not catch what was said. Did Your Honour rule it out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a question that could be put to the government. Members of the cabinet are free agents to speak as they choose.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is Your Honour speaking on behalf of the government?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is frivolous.

CONSTRUCTION CAMPS

WITHDRAWAL OF REGULATION PROHIBITING THE HOLDING OF POLITICAL MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): With regard to the question asked the other day by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) regarding political meetings in camps, I might say that in October last year, at the time of the provincial election, in British Columbia a regulation was established that there should be no political meetings held in the camps. To the best of my knowledge no complaints were received from any party with regard to that regulation. When the provincial election in Ontario was called the same regulation was in effect and letters were sent out to the superintendents at the camps so stating. Now the situation in Ontario is that the provincial government also have camps, and I find on inquiry that they have not any similar regulation; they permit meetings in the camps. Under these circumstances it has been thought wise to withdraw the regulation that was issued by our department and to permit the same state of affairs to exist as prevails in the provincial camps, so that meetings will be allowed. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) came to the department on Saturday to present the case and he was assured that he would be given every courtesy at any camp that he might desire to visit.

Mr. TOTZKE: Does the same rule apply to Saskatchewan?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The same would apply to Saskatchewan.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does that rule apply to all political parties?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): I would like to know from the ministry if it is the intention of the government to undertake public works and especially to give contributions toward public road building under the Unemployment Relief Act because last year many municipalities asked for federal contributions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I be permitted to put my question? Last year many municipalities asked for aid—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: Am I in a British country or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is asking a question of the government, will he proceed to do so? This is not the time for debate.

Mr. DUPUIS: I was about to put the question.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member has put the question and I was about to answer it. The question is very simply answered. Any negotiations with respect to aid given to municipalities in regard to public undertakings, roads, etcetera, must come through the provincial governments as heretofore.

Mr. DUPUIS: What will be the attitude of the federal government if a provincial government decides to build public roads?

Mr. BENNETT: The decision will be made known when the applications are made, and to the government, not to the hon. member.

Mr. DUPUIS: Many applications have been received from the provincial government and no decision has yet been made.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bury in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I ask the Secretary of State whether he intends to propose any amendments to this bill? We were led to believe by the fine speeches that were delivered by some of the ministers and supporters of the government that amendments were to be introduced. Is that the intention?

Mr. CAHAN: I was not aware that any suggestion had been made to the minister that amendments to this bill should be made on his motion. The bill passed the house by a majority of fifty-seven and was referred to a select committee. That select committee has reported the bill as it stands.

Mr. POULIOT: On this point, may I say that the vote was taken with the understanding that we could make proper amendments to the bill? I was asked by my leader to sit on that committee which was composed of seven members. The senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and I were the two Liberal members; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) represented the independent parties in the house, and there were four Conservative members. What the senior member for Ottawa and I did in this matter was to try to get the best available information about the translation business. May I say how much we have regretted the fact that the Secretary of State left the committee when we asked him to stay there in order to answer some questions that we thought proper to ask of him?

Mr. CAHAN: May I interrupt the hon. member? That statement is entirely without foundation in fact. I was not a member of the committee. I appeared before it for the purpose of making one statement as to the responsibility the government assumed with regard to the translation of the speech from the throne. Having made that statement I left the committee and was not requested by it to return.

Mr. POULIOT: I have much respect for the Secretary of State and he knows this more than anyone else.

Mr. SPOTTON: That helps.

Mr. POULIOT: I have great compassion for those who live under the same roof as the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) because if he snores as loudly as he breathes, no one could sleep where he was.

I was saying that I have much respect for the Secretary of State and I admit that he came to the committee to make a statement; that he made it and that afterwards, as he says, he left. While he was still in the committee room I said: "Please stay here because I have questions to ask you." Nevertheless he left. I said this in an audible voice.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not a member of the committee. I am a minister of the crown. If the committee wishes to hear me I will attend. I was summoned on a similar occasion before the Senate committee and I attended, but I do not recognize the hon. gentleman as the voice of the committee. There is the ordinary procedure to be followed.

Mr. POULIOT: This shows us the way we have been treated in that committee. Everything that came from either the senior member for Ottawa or myself was entirely disregarded. What I said to the hon. gentleman was that I wanted to ask him for some information as a member of a committee appointed by this house, and what is forgotten now is that the committee on the civil service, of which we were members, was not a committee of the government, which is itself a committee of the house, but was a committee of the house; and to that committee the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cahan) came as the member for St. Lawrence-St. George. He did not come as a minister of the crown; for in the committee every member of the committee is equal to every other member. For instance, to make a comparison, the price spreads committee is headed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), but he does not sit there as a minister; he sits as a private member—

Mr. CAHAN: I was not a private member; I was not a member of the committee at all.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but I wanted you as a witness.

Mr. CAHAN: Why did you not ask them to summon me as a witness?

Mr. POULIOT: It was superfluous to summon the hon. gentleman when he was right there. He was on the spot. I asked him as a favour—not as a favour, but I thought it my duty to tell him that I wanted to ask him for some enlightenment about the statement he had made—

Mr. CAHAN: You may ask the question now. We are in committee of the house, and you are entitled to ask it.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I am relating what happened, and what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has just said confirms exactly and absolutely what I said before. Therefore he was wasting the time of the house when he rose to contradict me, because he has just corroborated what I said. Now, sir, the hon. senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and myself have taken our duties most seriously.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: We have been searching for truth, and we got it drop by drop, while I was abused by the chairman of the committee and by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) who spoke about the duplicity and simplicity of the member for Temiscouata. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman), who was then the acting chairman of the committee, found those words so unparliamentary that without any request from me he had them struck from the record. Then when I was mentioning to the committee that one of the recommendations that had been made by the committee two years ago—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: Is there some barking? My hon. friend from Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud), with whom I fought the last campaign, said we were going to the dogs; well, I hope the bill will have the same fate. When I mentioned in that committee the fact that two years ago one of the recommendations of the committee was to superannuate the three civil service commissioners I wondered how it happened that the chairman of the commission, whose superannuation had been recommended by the committee, is still enjoying his job. I did not understand why the government had not complied with that recommendation of the committee. One reason for that recommendation of the committee two years ago was that the chairman of the civil service commission was too old to sit there. Two years have elapsed and yet he keeps his job, while two others have been superannuated. Also as a French Canadian and a French speaking member of this house I felt it very much that although one of the civil service commissioners is French speaking an order was passed by the commission that the commissioner who should come before the committee to give evidence about translation was not the French speaking civil service commissioner, who was supposed to have had some experience in translation, but another gentleman. For him I have great respect; he has shown great ability while giving evidence in the committee; it is my duty to give praise to whom praise is due. Nevertheless as a French speaking member of this house I resent very much the fact that the civil service commission decided that the man who was to give evidence on translation was not bilingual, while another civil service commissioner was. I regard it as an outrage on the French speaking members of this house. I submit this dilemma to the Secretary of State, who has the responsibility of reporting to the house about the civil service commission; either Mr. Potvin, the French speaking and bilingual civil service commissioner who has been a translat-"or", as the chairman of the committee would say, and was a distinguished civil ser-"vant", as the chairman would say, is competent or he is not. If he is competent, the civil service commission has no excuse whatever for not sending him to the committee to give explanations about the matter of translations; if he is incompetent, the government have no excuse for having appointed him to such a high post. I shall be glad to see how the Secretary of State escapes that dilemma. As one of the French speaking members I told the committee that the chairman should have been superannuated, instead of giving instructions to send to the committee another gentleman who was not bilingual. The chairman of the committee said he would not let me abuse anyone. Is that parliamentary? Is that the way the chairman should treat one of his colleagues who sits with him at the committee table? I resented that so much that after having fulfilled my duty by sitting on the committee until the bill was through I have to-day sent to my leader my resignation as a member of the committee, telling him that I would sit there no more; I said that in the committee this morning.

I have no complaint to make about some other Conservative members, such as the hon. and genial member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman). He is a gentleman and it is very pleasant to sit with him. I will say the same thing for the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) and for the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Laurin). It is right to tell the truth; I am here to report what has been done in this committee and all the trouble that my distinguished colleague the senior member for Ottawa and myself had in this committee while we were seeking for truth. In fact, sir, we have found a flat denial of what was said by the Secretary of State in the house and in the Senate committee; a flat denial!

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman accuses me of a false statement in this house he should refer to the statement, because I am prepared to stand behind every statement that I knowingly made in this house in respect to this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I will tell the truth to the committee of the whole, even if some hon. members do not like it. They may take that tip and they may be sure that I will not follow the example of the Prime Minister in 1930, but I will fulfil my promises. Well, sir, now we shall see what has been said by the hon. gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no, don't open that!

An hon. MEMBER: Did you bring your lunch?

Mr. POULIOT: I have here the evening Citizen of April 26, 1934. The same statement appeared in the Journal. This, sir, is not a comment of a newspaper on a debate in the house, but it is my only available report of what the Secretary of State said in the Senate committee.

Mr. CAHAN: My statements in the senate committee were reported verbatim by the reporter of the senate committee, and by that report I would be prepared to stand, but I am not prepared to stand by whatever appeared in some newspaper report. I do not know to what the hon. gentleman refers, but there is a stenographic report of what I said in the Senate.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Can we get a copy of this report?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no idea.

Mr. POULIOT: Has the Secretary of State a copy of that report?

Mr. CAHAN: No, I have not.

Mr. POULIOT: I have one. I shall read it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member may not refer to a report of the Senate committee.

Mr. POULIOT: May I not quote the report in this committee when I am challenged by the Secretary of State?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That does not make it in order.

Mr. POULIOT: Will you please refer me to the rule which says that I may not quote evidence given before the Senate? What about Beauharnois?

Mr. CAHAN: The evidence given before the Senate committee was not in relation to this bill. I am responsible to this house for what I said in this house with respect to this bill, and I said that so far as I was aware those statements were accurate. I do not think there is any member on either side of the house but has respect for my integrity in respect of speaking the truth.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right, but does the hon. gentleman contend that he is responsible only for what he says from his seat in the house and that he takes no responsibility of what was said before the Senate committee?

Mr. CAHAN: That had no reference to this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Did not the hon. gentleman, while before the Senate committee and speaking with regard to the translation business, say that the establishment of a bureau of translations would mean a saving of from $75,000 to $80,000 a year by the elimination of resetting and other work now necessitated through revisions and corrections, and that the work of the printing bureau would be speeded up?

Mr. CAHAN: I certainly did not state that or anything to that effect; I pledge my honour to this house that I did not do so.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. gentleman permit the production of a stenographic copy of what was said before the Senate committee?

Mr. CAHAN: I simply pledge my honour to this house that I did not say that.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I move, seconded by Mr. Chevrier, that the committee rise and report progress until the Secretary of State has tabled his own evidence given before the Senate committee.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: Here we have evidence of the way we have been treated before the committee, and in the same kaiser-like fashion the members of the government who sat on that committee took their instructions from a member of this house in his capacity as minister of the crown—I mean the Secretary of State—although he had no authority because he was not a member of the committee. Am I to take it, then, that the reporters of the Citizen and the Journal, who asserted the same thing in their newspapers, are both liars?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman is bound to take my statement in denial. I have pledged my honour that I did not make a statement to that effect in this house or before the Senate committee, and so far as this debate goes I insist that the hon. gentleman retract that statement.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not make any statement; I asked if the Secretary of State meant that the reporters of the Journal and the Citizen were liars, or that they had imagined these things.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member could not have asked that question without implying that the statement—

Mr. POULIOT: No.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Just allow me to finish. The hon. gentleman could not have asked that question without implying that the statement of the Secretary of State was not true.

Mr. POULIOT: On a point of order, sir, before you give your decision I ask you for a chance to explain my case, just as I would ask in a court of justice. You, Mr. Chairman, are an able lawyer, and will understand the situation. I wish to explain it point by point. I asked if the reporters of the Journal and the Citizen—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Is the hon. member debating my ruling?

Mr. POULIOT: I am not saying that; I am showing how I might have put it if I had been out of order. If I had suggested that the reporters had been correct in imputing that language to the Secretary of State, following the flat denial of the hon. gentleman it would have meant that the Secretary of State was a liar, but I have not used those words. Had I done so I would have withdrawn them at once, because I would have been out of order. But if in accordance with the rules of the house, which I know by heart, I say this, does not the Secretary of State mean that those two reporters are liars? If he says yes, it means that the hon. gentleman is telling the truth and the reporters have lied. And therefore—

Mr. CAHAN: Just a minute—

Mr. POULIOT: That is the question.

Mr. CANTLEY: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: What does the hon. member for Pictou know about these distinctions which go far above his head?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I understand the hon. member's point. It is not a question of the Secretary of State having to answer. The point is this: Does the hon. member for Temiscouata charge the Secretary of State with having made a false statement?

Mr. POULIOT: No, not at all, no. I did not. I said that there was something wrong somewhere, and if the Secretary of State is right the reporters are wrong.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The Secretary of State has nothing to do with the reporters, but he has to do with the charges suggested by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I made no charge.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Well, if the hon. member for Temiscouata is not charging the Secretary of State with making false statements, that is all we need to know.

Mr. POULIOT: I never did.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): All right.

Mr. POULIOT: And I will tell you right now, sir, that my idea is not to cause trouble to the Secretary of State, but to give him a chance to explain, to rise to a question of privilege and to speak. I regret that he has not done so before this. I regret that he has not said, "I am credited with this and that statement; I deny them absolutely, and they are utterly false."

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I will not permit the hon. member, without retaliation, to repeat his deliberate statement that I have falsified the facts either in this house or in any other place.

Mr. VENIOT: He did not say that.

Mr. CAHAN: I say now that when I was asked in the Senate committee to make a statement with regard to the matter they had in hand, namely the cost of Senate translation, I said what I had said in the House of Commons. I had my previous statement before me when I made the statement before the Senate committee. The words may have been different, but what I said in this house and that which I adhere to, appears at page 982 of Hansard as follows:

Now it was ascertained by one of the committee under the control of the treasury that the setting up in type of these corrections made in the text after it had been set up in type and sent for revision—not all French, but a great deal of it, some of it being in English—over a series of years, in wages in respect of the resetting of that type, after it had been first set up in the printer's text, varied in cost from $75,000 to $80,000 a year during a number of years preceding 1933; and in the first ten months of 1933 the setting up of such changes as those I have mentioned cost $52,000.

That is the report made to me over the signature of the comptroller of the treasury and some others on the committee. That is the statement I made in this House of Commons and the purport of the statement I made when I was questioned by the Senate committee with regard to the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right, sir. Now let us read what Mr. Bronskill said at the sitting of the civil service committee held on May 9 of this year. Mr. Bronskill is the accountant of the printing bureau, and also a representative of the treasury. His examination is, in part, as follows:

Q. Would it be possible for you to tell the committee the cost of author's alterations and the cost of typesetting due to errors in translation?

A. Well, I do not know quite why you refer to translation. So far as we are concerned, it is an author's alteration that is a change in the proof made by the author. The cost of that for the year 1933-34 is given at $58,000.

Q. Yes. Well, it is pretty hard to tell how much of that money is due to translations—to French corrections or English corrections?

A. It would be very difficult.

Q. You say it would be very difficult?

A. Yes.

Q. And therefore, it is all put together?

A. Yes.

Q. Without knowing exactly what amount is due to the corrections of the French groups and the corrections of the English groups?

A. That is correct, sir.

Q. Has it not come to your knowledge that very often there are also mistakes of the typesetters which are corrected by the author?

A. They would be errors in typesetting which have been overlooked by the proofreader of the printing bureau?

Q. Yes.

A. Which would be noticed by the reviser—the author?

Q. Yes.

A. That might occur.

Q. But the proof is read first at the printing bureau and revised there?

A. Yes.

Q. And that costs something, naturally?

A. Naturally.

Q. And is that charged to author's alterations or composition?

A. No, sir; it is charged to office corrections; it is included in the composition.

Q. And those author's alterations represent the cost of that revision at the printing bureau?

A. Yes.

Q. And that cost is charged to each department?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Without any distinction with regard to French or English?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Therefore, no one can say that that cost of author's alterations, $58,000, is due to translation?

The answer was "No," but it is not here in the report of the committee; it was struck out. When Mr. Bronskill appeared before the committee the following question was asked: "Therefore, no one can say that that cost of author's alterations, $58,000, is due to translation?" And he said, "No." It is on record in the Ottawa newspapers and anyone can see it, but it is not in the report of the committee. It has disappeared. I wonder if the type fell when the matter was typeset, or if it is a reporter's clerical error. My ears did not deceive me when I heard Mr. Bronskill make the answer, and my eyes did not deceive me when I read the report in the press. But I cannot read the answer in the report of the committee, because it is not there. Mr. MacInnis said afterwards:

To mistakes in translation?

The Witness: That is quite true. It must be taken together as both English and French.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

That was the evidence which was given.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not inconsistent in any way, shape or form with my statement to this house.

Mr. VENIOT: The less you say of that, the quicker this bill may get through.

Mr. SPOTTON: Is that a threat or a promise?

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for North Huron should remember that David killed Goliath with a small stone. There is absolutely no reason for this bill, Mr. Chairman, and I shall have an opportunity later on to show that this bill is just as much a waste of time for those who drafted it as it was a waste of time for those who took the time to study it in committee because all the enlightenment that we have received on this bill has been of no use. This bill is just as much out of place in these very times as was the discussion about titles or the discussion about sweepstakes or the amendments to the Indian Act and the Migratory Birds Act. This is futile legislation.

At the first sitting of the committee at which this bill was studied I asked the committee to give me the opportunity of going to the civil service commission and seeing the files of the translators. That opportunity was given to me by a majority of the committee, and I am thankful to the committee for that. I went to the office of the civil service commission during the Easter recess and I spent two or three days at that office perusing those files and also perusing file number thirty-three of the civil service commission. I shall refer to what I saw there.

I was prudent enough to ask Mr. Bland, one of the civil service commissioners, if there was anything confidential in that file and he told me no. If he had said there was anything of a confidential nature in that file I would not have insisted upon seeing it, but I had full liberty to peruse it, and I will tell you, sir, of what I saw on those few sheets of paper, and I am sure that the hon. Secretary of State will not deny a word of what I am going to say. I am not going to spend any time reading what I read there, but it is engraved upon my memory and my memory does not fail me. I do not suffer from amnesia.

The first letter, Mr. Chairman, is a memorandum sent by the Clerk of the House to the Prime Minister in February of last year—not this year—about the translation business. The matter was examined at a sitting of the council and then left aside until the right hon. the Prime Minister left in June for the economic conference, and then he handed the whole thing over to the Secretary of State asking him to kindly see to it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I have been listening for half an hour to what the hon. member has been saying and I cannot see that it relates in any way whatever to the bill before the house. For some considerable time there was a matter that might possibly have been brought up on a question of privilege or something of that kind, and another matter that might have been brought up in some other form relating to what was said to the hon. Secretary of State, but now the hon. member is off on an examination of certain files in the office of the civil service commission. That is not directly related to the bill, and I ask, Mr. Chairman, that you exercise your authority in keeping us somewhere within sight of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, in answer—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think there is any answer required.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, we live under Stalin now apparently; we are in Russia. I do not see how the hon. gentleman can preach freedom of speech and ask for the repeal of section 98 when he will not allow a member of this house to answer him on the point of order that he raised.

Mr. ST-PERE: He is a Tory.

Mr. POULIOT: I am much disappointed in him because personally I had a different idea of him, but notwithstanding section 98 I believe I am fully entitled to answer the hon. gentleman on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Will the hon. member address himself to the point of order?

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, sir. My answer, not to the point of order, but my answer to that is this. Naturally I have something else to say. I am speaking about the conception of the bill. I am speaking about how it originated in order that the house may understand why we have this bill now before us, and I believe everything should be discussed from Alpha to Omega, from A to Z, and now I am at A.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I wish not only to speak to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but the hon. member for Témiscouata has proceeded to refer to certain confidential inter-departmental correspondence evidently between the Prime Minister and myself, and between deputies of other departments, which he happened to see on a file in the office of the civil service commission where he attended and inspected documents. These certainly have not any reference to the merits of this bill, and cannot be referred to in this debate unless they are brought down and laid upon the table of this house.

Mr. POULIOT: In answer to that, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I ask you to rule on the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Before you rule, Mr. Chairman, I have to answer Stalin.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The first point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the hon. member for Témiscouata is, I suppose, answering it.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, but you know—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I would ask the hon. member to make his answer.

Mr. POULIOT: I am just as patient as a lamb, Mr. Chairman. Let me put to you the position I am in. It is most difficult and I wish to explain it to you, and after I have done so I am sure you will agree with me. But it is a delicate matter, because I have to discuss the whole thing.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the hon. member cannot reply to the point of order raised by the member for Winnipeg North Centre I shall have to hold him out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not speaking to the bill now; I am speaking to the point of order exclusively, and my position is the more embarrassing because I am arguing with one of the most eminent lawyers—I mean the Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to the question as to whether he is speaking to the bill in what he is saying.

Mr. POULIOT: Pardon me, sir.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has spoken more than forty minutes anyhow.

Mr. POULIOT: No, because the Secretary of State interrupted me and spoke.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I rule the hon. member out of order; he has not been able to show that he is speaking to the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: You did not give me an opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has had ample opportunity in the last ten minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not compare you, sir, to the gentleman who was chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I must ask the hon. member very quickly to make his answer to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What is the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The point of order is that the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has not been addressing himself to the bill; he has been speaking on matters altogether apart from the bill, matters having nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I suggest that the point of order is a dual one. On the one hand the hon. member who raised the point of order suggested that the hon. member for Témiscouata was discussing a matter that was unrelated to the bill. I do not think that point of order is well taken because, as the hon. member for Témiscouata explains, it deals with the inception of the bill, the first steps that were taken to bring this bill before us. On the other hand the Secretary of State referred to the other point, which is, I understand, the fact that the hon. member for Témiscouata referred to a departmental file to which he is not entitled to refer. Now which is the point of order? We want to know before we are able to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The member for Winnipeg North Centre raised the point of order that the member for Témiscouata was out of order because he was not speaking to the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the section before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We had this point ruled upon several days ago in connection with the marketing bill. We discussed every single possible development of the marketing bill under the title, and that is a very well established rule of procedure in this house.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I am not questioning that but I am questioning the relevancy of the argument of the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: You did not hear me. I am most courteous to all members—

Mr. VENIOT: On the point of order. There are two points of order before the chair. In the first place I am going to discuss the point of order raised by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, but before doing so I wish to point out that the Secretary of State was himself out of order in raising the point of order he did as against the hon. member because there was a point of order before the chair to be decided. Now let me come to the point of order raised by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the matter being discussed by the member for Témiscouata is not relevant to this bill. Let me point out that the committee that examined and investigated this bill has reported and its report contains—what? It contains all the evidence taken in connection with this bill. The hon. gentleman is therefore perfectly in order in dealing with anything in the evidence that pertains to this bill, and in discussing the evidence.

Mr. DUPRE: The member for Témiscouata was speaking about a file he had read in the offices of the civil service commission.

Mr. VENIOT: I am coming to that; that point of order was raised—

Mr. DUPRE: It is on this question that the point of order has been raised.

Mr. VENIOT: That point of order was specifically stated by the Secretary of State. The first point of order was, "We have been listening"—those are the words—"We have been listening for over half an hour to the discussion of matters not relevant to this bill."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): May I intervene. The point of order raised by the member for Winnipeg North Centre was that after having listened to the member for Témiscouata for half an hour on matters which he, the member for Winnipeg North Centre, considered out of order, he would ask a ruling on that point. Then the member for Témiscouata opened up another subject, dealing with a file in one of the departmental offices—I think I am correct in saying that—and the point was that this was out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: In that regard—

An hon. MEMBER: Give your decision, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VENIOT: We have some privileges here and we are going to exercise them, and you have not enough strength on the other side to put me down; let me tell you that. I will listen to the chairman but not to members opposite directing me as to how I should act. The member for Témiscouata made the statement that he asked of the committee the privilege to go and examine files in the offices of the civil service commission, and on that privilege being granted he went there. He said he discovered certain things, and I submit that he has a right, if those things appertain to the inception of this bill, to deal with them. But I would go a step further. I want to be fair in this matter and I will say that if those files are departmental secrets, privileged reports between officials of the department and the minister, and should not be used on that account, then the member for Témiscouata has no right to use them. I will go that far.

Mr. CAHAN: May I interrupt the hon. member? A motion was made in this house to bring down that correspondence; the matter was definitely referred to and came before the house. The Prime Minister objected that it was correspondence between departmental officers and the house decided that it should not be brought down.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not discussing the Secretary of State's statement in that regard. The first point of order taken referred to the action of the member for Témiscouata in referring to these files, and that point of order was not well taken because he had the privilege and the right, granted him by the committee, of examining those files.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That assumes that the committee had power to give him the right to examine those files as a private member of the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: They had the power to give him that right, but I do not say that they had the power to give him or did give him the right to discuss the contents of the file in this house.

Mr. CAHAN: In the report of the committee and in the evidence there is no statement that the hon. gentleman was authorized by this select special committee to exercise such a right. I understood he went of his own option.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I will tell you first of all that I am not a sneak. The hon. member for Dauphin is here; the senior hon. member for Ottawa is here; unfortunately the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is not here nor do I see the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg; but the hon. member for Vancouver is here. We were all members of the committee and any one of them can tell this committee of the whole that when the matter came up before the committee at a sitting of which there is no report, no official report, I told the committee I wanted the civil service commission to send all files with regard to translators, all files that the civil service commission had with regard to translators, without any exception.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the hon. member now speaking on the point of order? He has already spoken two or three times on it.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, you know very well that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has no knowledge of law. You are a lawyer and I am addressing you as one.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Will the hon. member keep to the point?

Mr. POULIOT: It is not my fault. I would like to have the hon. member gagged, but I cannot.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Keep to the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am most courteous to every member who gives me a chance to explain my point, but now I am a real martyr.

Some hon. MEMBERS, Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I receive arrows from all sides.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member must speak to the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: What I say to you, sir, is that I appeal to my colleagues who were sitting with me at the committee table and who are now present in the committee of the whole. If I do not tell the truth now it is up to them to rise and say that I am wrong. As I have no written evidence of this phase of the matter I have to ask for their evidence and recollection. I took the trouble to study the matter carefully and I asked the committee if it had any objection to my suggestion. What was the resolution of the House of Commons appointing the committee of which I am a member? It is dated February 16, 1934, and it reads:

That a select special committee of this house be appointed, to consist of seven members, to be hereinafter named, to inquire into and report upon the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act as amended, with instructions to inquire into and report concerning the repeal or amendment of any of the provisions of the said act or the substitution therefor or addition thereto of other provisions, as the committee may deem advisable, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time to this house.

I suggested first to the committee that the whole file should be brought before it and some objection was made on account of the fact that the file was quite voluminous. Then I suggested to the other members, in order to save time, that while the bill was still in committee I be permitted to go to the civil service commission myself, and during the Easter recess I went there to peruse those files in accordance with the power which I was given by the members of the committee My colleagues will admit that. I said that it was important to get at the origin of this bill in order to know for what purpose or how it originated.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the hon. member has dealt with the method by which he came to know the subject matter of the files, I am prepared to give my ruling. It is this: That whatever may be said as to the power or right of the committee to requisition those files, I hold that the mere fact the committee said they had no objection to one of their number seeking to get inspection of the files, does not make those files official records of the committee and does not make the information that he privately got from the files official records of the committee. Therefore I hold that references to the files are out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: May I tell you this, that the civil service commission—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Is the hon. member arguing the ruling?

Mr. POULIOT: No, but I ask you kindly to reconsider your decision.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): No, I understand the hon. member's point perfectly. He wished to have the files brought before the committee. The committee did not see its way to requisition the files. The hon. member asked the committee whether it would have any objection to him personally inspecting the files. The committee said that it had no objection; at least, so the hon. member himself said; there is no record of it in the report.

He states that the committee intimated that it had no objection to the hon. member seeking to get inspection for himself of the files. I hold that that does not make his knowledge of the files official knowledge of the committee on which this house can act.

Mr. POULIOT: May I read an extract from the report of the committee? Would I be in order to read an excerpt from the report of the standing committee?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That is, of the special committee?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. I will give the date The report, which is printed, is before the house.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): What bearing has that on my ruling that the hon. member was out of order in bringing those files into the discussion now? I rule him out of order in that respect and in addition he has spoken for more than forty minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: I have been interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I have ruled on the point of order and that is disposed of.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With your decision as it stands, based upon the facts as you have placed them before the committee, I cannot quarrel. If those were the facts then your decision would stand, but as those are not exactly the facts in regard to the matter, then of course your ruling cannot stand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): All I will say to the senior member for Ottawa is this: I took the facts and I stated them to the committee precisely as the hon. member for Temiscouata had stated them to the committee and to me and on the facts as stated by him I hold him out of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I put the facts—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): No, the hon. member cannot do so. The hon. member for Temiscouata has stated his facts and he is out of order on his facts. In addition, he has spoken for more than forty minutes and, I will have to ask him to take his seat.

Mr. POULIOT: On a point of order—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has had tremendous latitude from this committee.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Not on a point of order but on a point of honour I would like to—

[The Chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Do I understand that the hon. member is raising a point of order?

Mr. BOUCHARD: No; I am speaking not on a point of order but on a point of honour. I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State who, when the bill was first introduced into the house, gave very fragmentary evidence to prove that the speech from the throne so often referred to first by the hon. member for Temiscouata, later by me and by a few other hon. members, was well translated. He read just two letters. I regret very much that at the time I did not ask the Secretary of State to table the letter that he read from an eminent man, as he said, Canon Emile Chartier, vice-rector of the university of Montreal. He read the letter which was an approval of the translation of the speech from the throne.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If I may interrupt the hon. member, I hardly think he is in order in discussing a matter arising out of the speech from the throne in connection with this section.

Mr. BOUCHARD: With due respect to your decision, Mr. Chairman, I think that I am as much in order, in referring to that in answering the Secretary of State as was the Secretary of State himself. Then to-day, in answer to my assertion, I am confronted with the authorities—I do not call it evidence—the two authorities that were quoted by the Secretary of State. I am here to defend my own position.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Is the hon. member purporting to answer part of the speech of the Secretary of State on the speech from the throne?

Mr. BOUCHARD: No, I am not referring to the matter contained in the speech from the throne, but just to the translation of it, as we are discussing to-day a translation bill. The Secretary of State resorted to his "gratuitous" friend to translate the speech from the throne, and I charged him with two things. First, I would point out that in his own department there is a very able translator, a man who stands high in the literary world, and therefore the Secretary of State could have got a proper translation from him. Secondly, I said that it was not proper for the Secretary of State to entrust that confidential work to his "gratuitous" friend who had not been sworn to do this work and to pass over the man who had been sworn as a civil servant. In answer to my contention, instead of bringing the facts before this house, the Secretary of State just quoted two letters. In the case of one not even the name of the writer was disclosed; Pierre Lefort is the pen-name of Paul de Martigny. For the moment, I do not discuss this letter. Then I come to a letter written in approbation of the translation of the speech from the throne by the vice rector of the university of Montreal. I think any hon. member, looking into this matter without putting on a second pair of glasses might have written the same letter. But what I am complaining about is this. I wrote to the writer of the letter and his answer was to the effect—I shall not quote the letter—that "if I had read the whole letter I would not have written mine." To-day I would like to know the whole content of that letter. I think this committee is entitled to know that, not on a point of order but on a point of honour. I think in fairness to the gentleman who wrote this letter we should have the whole of that other letter. We should know at the same time whether this letter was invited, was called for, or was just sent on the spur of the moment by the one who signed it. Therefore I ask the hon. gentleman if in support of his evidence and of his authority, he will give us the full text of his letter. If he does not, in order to defend my contention, I shall have to put before this committee and before the whole country the kind of translation that was made of the speech from the throne.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before that question is answered, may I ask what clause of this bill we are discussing?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): We are discussing clause one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I raise a point of order. "This act may be cited as the Translation Bureau Act." Any discussion of that clause must be relevant to the clause, and the only thing that could be relevant would be a suggestion that the title is incorrect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I submit that I am correct.

Mr. VENIOT: That has not been the practice in this house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a different thing. I know that this session in the discussion of the marketing bill we wandered over many features of the bill. But I think there should be some limit to this discussion. The rule is very definite. After passing that clause, which is a purely formal clause, if this discussion is to take place it should be on clause 3 or clause 4. Why not proceed with some regularity? When we come to clauses 3 and 4 I have no objection to the discussion broadening out.

Mr. POULIOT; Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by Mr. Chevrier—

The CHAIRMAN: (Mr. Bury): I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Justice is finished.

Mr. POULIOT: I would not interrupt him for a kingdom.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quite in agreement with the Minister of Justice in wishing to expedite the discussion of this bill, but I cannot for a moment agree with his contention. It is one of the best known rules that in discussion of the title—

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is the preamble that the hon. member is thinking of. Look at rule No. 58.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We had on the marketing bill—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I know we wandered all over the lot there. Look at standing order No. 58, subsection (2).

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Does any other hon. member want to speak on the point?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection 2 of standing order No. 58 reads as follows:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has everything. This first clause merely designates the title of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But under the title we can discuss every feature of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: It is only a few weeks ago, Mr. Chairman, that I raised that specific point of order, and the ruling was against me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The discussion on the marketing bill proceeded on very broad lines. I will say that it is quite possible that if the discussion takes place now it may not take place in connection with some other clause, but my experience is rather that if it takes place now it will take place again. I am trying to limit the thing. If we get to clause 2 or clause 3 the discussion would be relevant. But I am sorry to say that the practice has become very general during this session that on a clause containing nothing but the title we go over the whole bill line by line.

Mr. NEILL: What I was going to say did not refer to the marketing bill but another. I have forgotten what it was, but I raised the same point of order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think you were right.

Mr. NEILL: And the chairman said we were not allowed to talk all over the lot.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If no objection is raised the discussion may proceed, but I am raising the point of order as an objection.

Mr. NEILL: I did object, and the ruling was against me.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I think the point of order is well taken. The committee has fallen into the practice of carrying on in connection with the first clause the same broad discussion as the house would in a debate on second reading, dealing with principles and everything else. I hold that the objection taken by the Minister of Justice is correct.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore, sir, I move, seconded by Mr. Chevrier, that the title of the bill be changed to "The uncalled for bill."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I hold that the motion is ridiculous and not serious.

Mr. POULIOT: The bill itself is a joke.

Section 1 agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

On section 3—Bureau for translations.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This afternoon we have had an example of what took place a number of times in the committee. I think the best way to place the situation before hon. gentlemen is to make use of the words used by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) when he spoke the first time this afternoon, when he said that he saw no reason why any amendments should be made because this bill had been given second reading by the house by a majority of fifty-seven. In other words, if you have a majority it is always right, whether it be right or wrong, provided the majority is in favour of those, for the time being, who are sitting to your right.

In my estimation this bill was conceived in sin and born in iniquity. Apparently the reason for its introduction was that it would improve efficiency and result in a considerable saving of public funds. This bill was referred to the committee, and the evidence taken by that committee has been tabled. There is not a tittle or particle of evidence in the whole of that volume to the effect that this bill, if it becomes part of the law of the country, will result in improved efficiency or in a considerable saving of public funds. Nothing was brought before the committee to warrant reporting the bill here. No case was made out at all; nothing was said in favour of the bill. I need not labour through the evidence, but I defy any member of this house to read it from cover to cover and find anything that would warrant the adoption of this measure. In opening the discussion the minister is reported at page 984 of Hansard to have said:

—send it to a special committee where these matters may be inquired into and where it may be ascertained whether it is for the convenience of the Commons and in the public interest that a parliamentary translators' branch should be so organized.

There is not a particle of evidence to substantiate that. Then at page 985 the minister continued:

There is no desire to force an innovation upon the House of Commons against its wishes—

Oh, no; maybe not. When you have a majority of fifty-seven you can speak in that way.

—but we are asking that the facts be elicited before a special committee and duly considered, and that those who are employed in the translations of the debates of the Senate and the House of Commons—

And so on. Then we had further words of wisdom from the paternal lips of the minister at page 1280, when he told the translators and others that they had better break up their coterie and stop their propaganda, though I was unaware of any coterie and did not know of any propaganda or lobbying. After that do you think it was easy for those people to come forward and place their claims before that committee? From that time on I decided that I would not call any of them because I was afraid by so doing I might jeopardize their positions. Again at page 986 the minister said:

—and sent to a special committee, which will have full liberty to inquire into every interest which may be thought to be prejudicially affected by the terms thereof.

We had an example this afternoon as to how points of order were raised and we were—I was going to use the word "railroaded" but that is not parliamentary. There may be no desire to force this bill on the House of Commons or to force it through, but nevertheless it was put through the house on second reading, and it is quite evident that the same spirit animates the Secretary of State at the moment. The minister also said, at page 985:

I think it is in the interests of good government that those who have any representations to make should appear before that committee where their representations will be received.

Seven witnesses appeared before that committee, and in a moment I will go over their evidence. Everything they said was received, but they might as well have stayed at home. Six of the witnesses were absolutely against the bill; one was not even asked what he thought about it. The minister said such representations would be received; they were received, and they have remained between the covers of that volume. In the first place, as the evidence will disclose, there was no reason why the minister should have brought in this bill to begin with. In the second place it was quite useless; it was simply a smoke screen, purely and simply camouflage to send the bill to that committee. I am not going to say how it was done, whether it was in a special way or some other way; I am not going to make any insinuations, but there is no reason why the bill should have been sent to that committee because none of the observations made or suggestions offered was received. If a bill goes to a committee and is carefully studied, when it comes back it is either proven or not proven; there is a reason for the bill or there is no reason for it. The minister is also reported at page 985 as having said:

—it is the opinion of the government that a reorganization such as that proposed in this bill will place translators from French into English and from English into French on a higher plane in the public service.

The minister had the right to make that statement provided he could substantiate it, but there was no evidence adduced before that committee to the effect that any such thing will result if this bill becomes law. There is nothing in the bill itself that can be linked up with this gratuitous statement by the minister, which has not been supported by the evidence. As I shall show in a few moments, time and again in that committee I asked for someone in authority to say how this bill would work out, but the door was continuously and hermetically closed. There is no evidence as to how this will work out. The minister also said:

It will avoid duplication of translation services and research work in relation thereto.

No wonder some of the hon. gentlemen sitting to your right supported this bill; they took the minister's word for it, but there is nothing in the evidence to show that it will work out that way. The minister might as well have spoken in Timbuctoo for all that statement is worth. Then he stated further:

It will ensure the effective cooperation of all officers and employees in the existing translation services.

There was not a tittle of evidence to that effect before the committee—nothing at all. These are the words:

It will ensure the effective cooperation of all officers and employees in the existing translation services.

That was not shown before the committee. What were we there for? The minister did not do anything towards sending anyone to explain how the legislation was going to work out. The chairman did not call for any witness to say that these things were going to be done. To-day we are in absolute and utter darkness as to how this unwarranted bill will work out, if it ever becomes law.

Mr. DUPRE: May I interrupt the hon. member. He had the right to call any witnesses and to get any information he desired.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of course I had the right.

Mr. DUPRE: Why did he not do it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of course I had that right.

Mr. CAHAN: And you did do so.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister gives the right, on one hand, but in the other hand he holds a club over their heads. The minister could say to them: You had better cooperate gently, and cooperate with those who are doing you some good, because otherwise you will hear from us.

Mr. BOUCHARD: He put a sword over the translators.

Mr. CHEVRIER: On the other hand the Solicitor General is saying that I had the right to call witnesses. I reply to him that I desisted from calling that kind of witnesses. Then, further, this was not my business, and I had nothing to prove in the case. The minister has said that it will work out in a certain way, but certainly there is nothing to show that it would work out that way. His words were:

It will establish coordination and uniformity in the proper use of technical terms.

The evidence is exactly the other way. Then:

It will improve the means of acquiring expert knowledge and competency.

Again, the evidence is the other way. In that connection I shall turn to page 54 of the evidence taken in the committee. Following a statement by the chairman the report continues:

Mr. Chevrier: No, he said that he had the benefit of nine expert translators in parliamentary work.
The Chairman: Well, he would still have.
Mr. Chevrier: There are no other parliamentary translators outside of the House of Commons.
The Witness: There are not.

Mr. DUPRE: At what line is that to be found?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry I have not the copy of the evidence before me; I am reading excerpts from Mr. Carbonneau's evidence. Then I asked:

Q. So that the only experts that you need in parliamentary translation are the parliamentary translators?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. So that it would be of no benefit to you if the others are left where they are because you would not have the benefit of experts due to the fact that they are not parliamentary translators?
A. I am opposed to that dual regime.

The answer is that he is opposed to a dual regime. That is the only evidence we have on the point, and it is in flagrant contradiction of the statement made by the minister in the following words:

It will improve the means of acquiring expert knowledge and competency.

Then he goes on to state:

It will promote the advancement of those employed in this very essential branch of the public service.

Why did he not add on another hundred or one hundred and fifty of these gratuitous assertions? Then:

It will tend to remove all discriminations in working hours and working conditions.

That has not been shown, and there is no evidence of it. Yet, the bill is reported. Then the minister states:

It will promote . . . the contemporaneous publication of public documents in both English and French for the use of parliament and of the public.

The only tittle of evidence in the record shows that that could be done without the aid of this bill. None of the experts whom the minister had at his disposal came to say how it could be done—and yet we report the bill. The evidence on the point as to how it could be done at the present time is to be found at page 48 of the evidence taken before the committee. Mr. Carbonneau, the head translator in the blue books branch, is reported as follows:

It is further submitted that in view of ensuring a simultaneous issuance of both versions, the following measures should be taken:
1. Annual reports or other periodical publications should be prepared a little ahead of the ordinary time and the compilation of data and drafting of such reports should be accelerated in some cases.
2. These reports should be sent for translation in typewritten form when all corrections have been made.
3. A list of reports and returns to be tabled each session should be prepared, fixing certain dates for the guidance of all departments in sending their annual reports for translation.

That could all be done now, and without this bill. I have asked time and again as to how the bill would work out. At page 78 my statement is reported:

I would like some one in authority to tell me just how this bill is going to work out.

—and I pleaded with the chairman. At page 84 I am reported as follows:

I cannot see how this bill is going to achieve that, but if somebody shows me how, then all right.

I would have supported it. I begged to have some one in authority tell the committee how the bill would work out. At page 90 I asked Mr. Bland the following question:

Supposing that the bill passed as it is, then there would be a superintendent, what would happen to the various staffs here, would they be disturbed and taken away from where they are?

And Mr. Bland replied:

That is a matter that would not be decided until the superintendent had made his report.

The minister said they would never be touched. Well, there is the possibility that they will not until the superintendent makes his report. At page 91 I am reported to have said:

I agree that there are certain things that might be improved, but unless I know just how that is going to be done I am not going to buy a pig in a poke.

I wanted to see how the bill would work out. I pleaded and argued, but the minister did not do anything. Let us turn to the promise made by someone else. At page 1229 of Hansard the Minister of Marine is reported as follows:

The house is the sole guardian of its own privileges, but it is never prevented to waive them from time to time in the interest of a more efficient conduct of public affairs.

However, there is nothing in the bill to substantiate this; nothing to prove that the pious wishes of the hon. Minister of Marine may some day be realized, if this measure is enforced. I was going to state: why could not the Minister of Marine, he, a beacon of light, have given us some information in respect to this report?

He adds:

It is an extraordinary thing that not one of them cared to suggest any improvement that might be brought into the present system.

But the hon. minister made no such suggestions to the committee; he did not even make an appearance. We suggested improvements; however, they were rejected.

The minister continues:

Is there one member in the house who will maintain that the present system is perfect?

No, I am not one of those who contend that the present system is perfect. Yet, between a system which is known and another which is not, people prefer the former to the one which the government wishes to establish by this bill—be contented with this one for fear of having a worse one.

Let us see what the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) has to say. He points out the advantages which this bill will provide:

In my opinion, the advantages to be derived from this bill will be to secure the simultaneous publication of the French and English versions of all documents.

Not a word is found in the provisions of this bill to show how this can be attained or if it be even possible.

The second advantage we find in this measure, is that it defines and specifies the responsibility in connection with the translation.

Again there is no proof of this, absolutely nothing can be found in the bill to justify this contention.

Third advantage: this measure will improve the translation.

One may say so or may hope so, but can it be proved?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Text): It is a pious wish.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation):

Fourth advantage: a better distribution of the work.

Again there is nothing to substantiate that such a contention may be realized if this act is enforced. Those who might have set off this feature did not appear before the committee, or if they came they forgot to light their candle.

The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) expressed himself as follows, page 1225 of Hansard:

(Text)

We have voted on bills before which have gone to committee and come back in a state hardly recognizable. Why should it be otherwise with this legislation?

And I said I hoped this bill would come back in a state hardly recognizable.

Does the hon. member for Dorchester recognize his bill? Are his hopes and wishes as regards the maintenance of salaries embodied in the bill—

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): He was even confident that it would be so.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): —in order to safeguard the hours and holidays of certain translators? The hon. member must be quite disappointed. However, the bill had to pass and it did. We are no more at Verdun. "They shall not pass!" They passed.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) said this:

The translators of the debates of this house and the Senate work under great pressure; they work long hours and cannot during the period of their service enlarge their acquaintance with languages and their evolution. This is necessary to the skilful performance of their task. Men of broad culture and a profound knowledge of both languages are absolutely essential to the proper carrying out of the work of translation. I suggest——that it is necessary that these translators should have some leisure in which to cultivate and develop those characteristics so essential to their work. By making the position attractive a higher level of native talent and educational attainment will be secured which will assure to the houses better translators and better translations. It may not be possible to allow these translators six or seven months of inactivity each year but the spirit of the spoken word can be translated into another language only by men who have seized that spirit and who have a knowledge of literature, art and those things which go to make up culture. For these reasons, on behalf of the translators of this house and of the Senate I bespeak special treatment, not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the translation of those debates which it is their primary duty to translate.

Here is another pious hope:

There, Mr. Chairman, is a wish expressed in language well worthy of the subject, but its musical tones and depth of feeling struck deafened ears. Its pleading accents struck a heart of stone. It was as seed falling on a barren rock, and I extend to the hon. member for Stanstead in his great disappointment the expression of my most sympathetic condolences. But this bill had to pass.

Now I come to the evidence. There were six or seven witnesses. The first one was Mr. de Martigny. His biography will be found in the evidence. He had not gone very far in his evidence when at page 22 the chairman ruled he was no expert and no more questions were put to him. So he did not say whether he was in favour of the bill or against it.

The second witness was Mr. Omer Chaput, at page 60 of the evidence. He is described as head translator of the bureau of statistics. He said at page 61 of the evidence:

Take in the morning, for instance, it takes me fifteen minutes to give one stenographer three thousand—

That is three thousand words; he is talking of translation:

—and it takes me another fifteen minutes to give another stenographer three thousand, and after that they go and type it and I take my own typewriter and do some myself.

At page 62 he says:

I am no common man. . . . No translation is difficult for me.

He is in favour of the bill.

The third witness was Mr. Hector Gerin, chief of the debates translation branch of the House of Commons and he was decorated only yesterday, I think, by the Royal Society and given the degree of doctor of laws. At page 30 here is his appreciation of this bill:

On the whole, it seems desirable that present conditions be maintained, if at all possible. . . . Otherwise, the efficiency of this important public service would be made to suffer.

At page 33 he says:

For myself I would be in favour of maintaining the present system as it is.

And again at page 33 he says:

No, I have no suggestions to make.

Then as to the superintendent of the proposed bureau he said at page 34:

I do not see how it would work. We are getting along pretty well, much satisfied with it now, and we are improving all the time.

Then the chairman steps in at page 38 and puts this question to Mr. Gerin:

Q. Then, Mr. Gerin, may I take it this way, you are giving me the objections which you see to the establishment of a bureau, and, may I take it that you see three objections or possible objections, one, the interference with the hours and conditions of work now established for the translators; two, possible interference with salaries; and three, possible interference by the new superintendent in the method or means adopted for accomplishing of translations?

A. Yes.

There was a further question by the chairman:

Q. You cannot see anything else at the moment?

A. The only thing is, matters were going on pretty well we thought as they are now, and we do not wish to change the status or administration of the office.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Then he talks about the superintendent:

Well, that general supervision, I would be afraid of it for my part.

The fourth witness was Mr. Hector Carbonneau, at page 42. He is described as chief of the general translation branch, House of Commons. He submitted a typewritten statement in which he showed conclusively I think that in the last year seventy per cent of the work done in that branch had been work relating to the House of Commons. He closes his evidence with this:

In the discharge of their parliamentary duties, especially during sessions, when they are so often working under high pressure, our translators have to keep in close contact with the Clerk of the House and committee clerks with whom they have to consult almost daily. When committees are sitting, they are often asked to translate into English evidence given in French, which is to be printed simultaneously with the English text. They have also to consult witnesses and counsel. Committee reports are generally tabled at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and are generally handed in for translation about one hour before this. Quite often these reports must be translated and then typewritten with several carbon copies. They cannot be delayed and, therefore, the translators must be immediately available. They must also be close to their source of information and have free access to all parliamentary papers, both recent and old, and to the library of parliament. As officials of the house they are part of the machinery of parliament and should be able to avail themselves of these privileges. Almost daily they need information of some kind or another and it must be obtained at once. On account of the very special and urgent character of their duties, they could not be centralized outside of parliament without their work being seriously hampered. I would therefore respectfully suggest that the branch be maintained as a parliamentary technical service for the translation of committee proceedings and evidence, estimates and budget resolutions and other related documents, in a measure commensurate with the requirements of parliament.

Here is a case as neatly put as any case can be put! Yet notwithstanding that, we have a report brought in in favour of this bill. Mr. Carbonneau also at page 53 answers the following question:

Q. Well now, if you had a central bureau of translation, and instead of having the cooperation of nine other men in addition to yourself you had the cooperation of 90, it would still be beneficial for the purposes of cooperation would it not?

A. Well, it might, but that has always been the trouble to divide up the work in a single bureau; it has always been a great trouble to obtain perfect uniformity especially when the work is being distributed in parts.

He also said:

I am opposed to that dual regime. . . . In a parliamentary and departmental translation service, one is an obstacle to the other. They do not work out well together.

I come to the next witness, Mr. Oscar Paradis, K.C., at page 110. He is chief law translator of the House of Commons. Here is his evidence:

By Mr. Pouliot:

Q. Just one more question, Mr. Paradis: as you are one of the chief officers of the House of Commons, may I ask you if in your belief the centralization of translations would improve the translation of laws as it is done now?

A. Well, in my humble opinion, it would mean the disorganization of our office completely.

Mr. E. H. Coleman, K.C., the Under Secretary of State, gives his evidence at page 155. He refers to a memorandum that had been submitted under the signature of Mr. Mulvey:

By Mr. Chevrier:

Q. In this memorandum of September 1, 1931, I read:—

"It is understood that all departments of the government are now equipped for the translation of French."

That was when a sort of central bureau was set up for the translation of foreign languages.

At page 155 I said to Mr. Coleman:

In this memorandum of September 1, 1931, I read: "It is understood that all departments of the government are now equipped for the translation of French."

Mr. CAHAN: That was not in Mr. Coleman's time. That circular that went out was dated September 1, 1931.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, that is what I said; it went out in 1931 and it appeared in a file that came down to more recent date. I found that memorandum there, that all departments of government were equipped for the translation of French. Then I put this question to Mr. Coleman:

Q. I presume that that meant the Secretary of State's department was equipped for that. Has there been any change in that?

A. Not to my knowledge, Mr. Chevrier.

Mr. CAHAN: He had no knowledge of it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Coleman will like the way in which the minister speaks of him. He had better take it up with him.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting the intent or purport of what he did say.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister always tries to wiggle out, but he leaves a lot of wool hanging around the shrubs. The superintendent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Mr. Darling, at page 174, gives this evidence:

By Mr. Pouliot:

Q. Would it be possible for you to have your confidential work done by a central bureau of translation?

A. No, I don't honestly think it would be. I must be honest about that. I don't think it would.

Then Mr. Coolican, acting deputy postmaster at the time, gave this evidence at page 176:

By Mr. Pouliot:

Q. And is it necessary for you to have these men within the department?

A. We have a centralized translation branch within the department, which we consider should be retained there because of the technical aspect of the post office work with other administrations.

By Mr. Chevrier:

Q. You have that centralized staff within the department?

A. Yes, we have it there for the purpose of seeing that important circulars or instructions to the public, or technical regulations are standardized, and are not done by any individual in any division.

Here are eight witnesses who appeared before this committee. One gave no evidence. In regard to one, the committee has been able to appreciate the value of his evidence—I make no comment on his honesty; he is a good man. The six others are against the bill. Yet we report the bill.

Now, as to the cost of translations, some others will deal with that. Personally I have endeavoured by every possible means at my disposal to reconcile the statements of the Secretary of State with those of Mr. Bland and others, but I cannot do so. The Secretary of State has said here and elsewhere, and he will not deny it, that it cost between $75,000 and $80,000—

Mr. CAHAN: What cost?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Errors in translation.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not said that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then I will let the minister hang where he is. If he says he did not make that statement I have to take his word but I can only leave him with his conscience.

Mr. POULIOT: You leave him in good company.

Mr. STANLEY: Very bad.

Mr. CHEVRIER: According to Mr. Bland it cost $58,805 and two days later the secretary comes in and says it cost between $75,000 and $80,000. At any rate I have endeavoured to find out how much it did cost.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say errors in translation; I said corrections in both French and English.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The record speaks for itself; I will not waste time over words that are in print. I will not attempt to enlighten the minister because if I did he would not listen. I have tried to find out how the $58,000 odd could be distributed, but the officials from the printing bureau who came could not tell me. When the statement is made that such errors cost $58,000 odd, items should be given to show how that cost is made up. But to this day I have not been able to get those details. The minister himself calls these errors in translation, then—

Mr. CAHAN: Where did I call them errors in translation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: All over the place. Mr. Shipman says that he cannot give any information with reference to that. I leave the minister just where he is; I will let him stew just where he is now.

There was another matter brought up before the committee and the minister engineered that. He started it in the house when he brought in a sheaf of photostat copies of something or other. These have been exhibited all over the place; we have had a demonstration of photostatic copies and a lot of static about those copies. I will not say much about those copies, but I do not like the atmosphere in which they were made, nor the way in which they were employed and brought out. At page 198 of the evidence we find the following:

By Mr. Pouliot:
Q. The shipping bill has 548 pages?
A. Yes.
Q. And the printing bureau has brought here ten pages of photostat?
A. Yes.
Q. How was that selection made, and why?
A. I cannot answer that.

Then I asked:

Q. Now then, can you tell me what proportion of good translation you did not produce?
A. Well, I cannot answer that.

Yet they go around with a photographic outfit of some kind, taking everything that is bad, and the minister revels in that. To get through with the evidence, I asked Mr. Bland, at page 27, the following:

Q. Mr. Bland, do you think that it is wise to appoint a translator into one of these technical positions without a very severe and most exacting test as to his capabilities of filling that position?
A. I think the best method of selecting the best available translator is by means of a severe technical examination.
Mr. Chevrier: I agree with you.

At page 75, in answer to myself, the witness made this statement:

I do not think it would be an efficient move to remove a specialist from his own particular work.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Then at page 76:

It is an easy matter to move a clerk; if a department needs three or four extra clerks for a rush period it is not a difficult matter to secure these clerks and move them over, but it is not as easy to move them in the translation service.

That is what Mr. Bland says, and he knows his business. I would rather take his word than all the gratuitous assertions of the minister.

Of all the promised benefits and fandangoes dangled before our eyes by the minister in order to help this bill none have been substantiated. The evidence, in both quantity and quality, has been overwhelmingly against this bill. But might is right though it be wrong. The Minister of Marine, the Solicitor General, and a few others on the government side have repeated the same things complacently after the Secretary of State and even after the hon. member for Labelle, who has said that in his life he has said many silly things—and under the rules of the house I must accept his word. Of course, he has never worn the cassock nor the toga but he speaks ex cathedra to those who have. All these gentlemen have said that this bill unquestionably extends the rights of the French language.

Mr. DUPRE: Why should the hon. member attack the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) when he is not present?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not going to be spoken to in that way. If the hon. member has anything to say let him take his hand away from his mouth, stand up and say it and I will sit down and let him speak. If he does not want to say anything, let him keep his peace.

My hon. friends say that this is an extension of the French language. If they are so sincere about it, I would rather see it in print than hear it said. Let them move an amendment. Let them put their hands on this King Tut's grave, this holy of holies. Let them inject into the bill something to show that it is really an extension of the rights of the French language. I know the minister will squirm; he is sitting on hot coals. He knows well what I mean. He dares not do this, neither do they, yet they say that this is an extension of the rights of the French language in Canada. Why talk that way? The other night a question arose of the necessity of amending the British North America Act. Because that act is a pact entered into by certain provinces, the Prime Minister on that occasion well and ably said: You cannot subtract from it; you cannot add to it; you cannot do anything with it unless it be by the unanimous consent of the contracting parties. In that case as our rights are to be found within the four corners of that act, how can this bill enlarge those rights? I leave my hon. friends to that unmerciful but righteous judge—history.

Before I sit down I want to move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscouata:

That section 3 be amended by striking out after the word "service" in the eighteenth and nineteenth lines the words "and both houses of the parliament of Canada," and further by striking out in the twenty-fourth line the words "debates, bills, acts and proceedings."

I do that because I want to keep this bill as much as I can within the four corners of the British North America Act. I say that under section 133 of that act the records and journals of both houses of parliament must be printed in French and in English; that the acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both languages and that those are within the custody of the house and as such they remain here. I therefore move my amendment that certain words be deleted accordingly.

Mr. BOWMAN: I had not intended saying anything in connection with the bill before the committee and might not have done so had certain statements not been made in connection with the proceedings which took place when the bill was before the select special committee of the house on civil service. I was not in the chamber when the debate opened, but as I came in I heard the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) complaining of, I think, the rather arbitrary attitude of the chairman. I do not think the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) needs anyone to defend his actions in this house. His courtesy, genial disposition and ability are well known to all hon. members. He performed a real service for parliament in 1932 in acting as chairman of the same committee, at which time a unanimous and rather important report was brought down to this chamber.

The next chief complaint made by the hon. member for Témiscouata was to the effect that when evidence was called from the civil service commission, Mr. Bland was specially requested by the committee to appear on behalf of the commission and that the French member, Mr. Potvin, was not so called. May I draw attention to the fact that Mr. Bland has been in the civil service for a great number of years and that his appointment, I think in 1933, to the civil service commission resulted from a unanimous report of the select special committee on civil service of the year 1932. On the other hand, Mr. Potvin is a recent appointee, and I do not think there is any question that his knowledge of matters pertaining to the civil service is not comparable with that of Mr. Bland But might I point out further that Mr. Potvin did appear before the committee and had the hon. member for Témiscouata any questions to ask him as to the matters under discussion or consideration, he had full opportunity so to do.

This bill which I think hon. members will agree is pretty simple and clear in its contents purports simply to set up a bureau for translations with a superintendent in charge. I would just call the attention of the committee to the fact that the special committee sat from March 7 to May 9 once every week and I think during one week twice, to consider this bill. Without making any comment I would say that the committee had possibly ten, twelve or fourteen sittings on this bill alone and at those sittings every opportunity was given for the submission of evidence in the form of either written statements or material or oral evidence given by witnesses produced before the committee. I can hardly understand why the senior member for Ottawa should say that the door was closed. As a matter of fact the door was left wide open and full opportunity was given for anyone to appear before that committee and make such representations or statements as they deemed desirable. Mr. Bland did appear before the committee on several occasions. He submitted statements and was also subject to oral examination, and any evidence which hon. members opposing this bill were desirous of having produced was available to them by simply calling any witness they desired and questioning that witness on any point. The hon. senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) is an able lawyer. I am rather surprised at the attitude he takes in connection with the evidence. After all, the government of the day have taken responsibility for this bill. And any evidence that was adduced before the committee would, I presume, be given with the idea of showing that the bill is not workable or that it would not be of benefit if passed. I do not purpose traversing the evidence, it is there, about 200 pages of it, it has been made available to all members of the house and it speaks for itself. A discussion on the bill took place in the house, lasting for a week or ten days, if I remember correctly, and nothing is to be gained by traversing ground which has already been gone over. As far as I am personally concerned I have no hesitation in giving my own opinion, after listening to the evidence, after reading the debates that have taken place in the house, that the putting into effect of this bill, the coordinating of all translation services in one bureau under the direct charge of one man, will mean a very substantial saving to the country, will mean improved efficiency, and better service and a more even load in the printing bureau.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Have you any evidence of that?

Mr. BOWMAN: I think there is lots of evidence in the proceedings which you have before you, taken as I say by the committee in sittings which lasted from March 7 until May 9. And may I say that in that record there do not appear one or two hundred photostatic copies of corrections in translations and galley proofs which were submitted to the members of the committee, some of which were presented to the house when the Secretary of State spoke. One thing that struck me as a member of that committee who attended pretty regularly was the fact that there was not brought forward a really sound objection to the proposal. If you scan the whole evidence, even that which the senior member for Ottawa went through so carefully a few moments ago, you will not find any substantial grounds for opposing the measures which this bill proposes to put into effect. As I said, during sittings which lasted over two months anyone having any objection to the bill or any criticism of the way it would work out was given full opportunity to attend before the committee and give his or her reasons against the bringing into force of this measure. But in my opinion no witness appeared before that committee who gave any substantial or reasoned grounds why the bill would not bring about an improvement in conditions as they at present exist. I am personally convinced that the adoption of this bill, the putting into effect of the measures it proposes, will mean a substantial saving and improved efficiency in the service.

Before I take my seat I would like to acknowledge the courtesy and helpfulness extended to me by all members of the committee during the sessions at which it was my honour and privilege to act as chairman.

Mr. VENIOT: In rising to address myself to the bill now before the committee I wish first to make one reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman). In closing he said that no substantial ground was shown in the evidence to oppose this bill. May I reply to that by stating that the evidence as presented by the senior member for Ottawa, read over very carefully by myself, the evidence taken at each session of the committee, does not contain one iota of substantiation of the reasons presented by the Secretary of State for the introduction of the bill.

Having said that may I refer to some things that may appear somewhat personal. I do so for the purpose of laying the groundwork for the criticism that I am about to make in connection with the changed situation that this bill will bring about in the matter of translation.

The Secretary of State in his evidence before the Senate referred to his experience in the printing business. I took it that he based the argument for the introduction of this bill on some experience he had gained while engaged to some extent—he did not say to what extent—in the printing business.

Mr. CAHAN: That had no reference at all to this bill; it had to do with a reduction of some $700,000 in the annual cost of the printing bureau.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman dealt with translations all through his statement; I have it here word for word, so it cannot be contradicted. I am not relying on newspapers or on rumours; I have a certified copy of the evidence taken before the Senate committee. All through that evidence the Secretary of State did not forget to show up that terrible cost of translation corrections. In his statement before the Senate committee he did not take the responsibility of using his own words; he placed that responsibility on a committee of investigation that had informed him or somebody else. He gave the direct evidence that the committee had reported that because of this system of translations, because of faulty translations and because of authors' corrections, bringing about the resetting of type and corrections both in the galley and on the page form, $75,000 to $80,000 could be saved annually. It cannot be contradicted that he made that statement, and I will deal with that cost later on.

Having said that much I now come to what I referred to as a personal matter concerning myself. The Secretary of State must not think he is the only member of this house who has had experience in the printing business; I too have had that experience. With all due respect to the hon. gentleman I may say that my experience has been a million times greater than his.

Mr. DUPRE: Make it two million.

Mr. VENIOT: I could make it two million, and I will allow the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre) to make the computation himself. From the age of eighteen years and six months until practically the age of sixty I was actively engaged as a printer. How do you like it?

Mr. DUPRE: Make it four million.

Mr. VENIOT: The Solicitor General says "make it four million," Tory-like, always extravagant. No, I am satisfied to leave it at one million, and I think even the Secretary of State will admit that I am not exaggerating. If I am going to criticize the costs in connection with these corrections I want this committee to know that I am basing my criticism not on hearsay but on knowledge and personal experience over a period of some forty-two or forty-three years. In the parlance of the printing trade the beginner is called the printer's devil. I served in that capacity; I occupied all the other positions in the printing trade, setting the type, running the presses, doing the job work, proof reading corrections on the galley and on the page, editorial work, assisting in translating, correcting translations and having to do with everything pertaining to errors in the printing trade. I want to tell my hon. friend that to-day I could go to the printing bureau and hold up my end with the best of them at the trade. If it is necessary to set the type by hand I can do it. If it is necessary to set it by linotype I have had a certain experience in that work.

Mr. DUPRE: Is this an autobiography?

Mr. VENIOT: This is not an autobiography at all; I am merely telling my experience so that when I come to deal with the assertions made in regard to the extra cost, and the manner in which the blame is placed, the committee will know the foundation for my criticism. More than that let me say to the Solicitor General—and I am not saying it in any boastful fashion—that if the director of public printing when before the committee investigating this matter failed to designate the difference between the cost of authors' corrections and the cost of faulty translation I can give him a lesson in that. I will go into that bureau and take the speech the Solicitor General may make in reply to me; I will set it in type and send the proof to him. If he makes the speech in French there will be no translation, but if he makes the speech in English and there are corrections in the translation I will make those corrections in the galley or on the pages when they are made up loosely, and I will give him the exact cost covering every minute spent in the correction of those errors.

I claim that the evidence given by officials of the printing bureau was not fair evidence. They need not attempt to tell me, with the experience I have had in calculating the costs of printing, that they cannot designate the difference between the cost of authors' corrections and the cost of faulty translation. That is nothing but real buncombe. When they make that statement I say—and I challenge contradiction—that they are stating what is not true.

Mr. DUPRE: One good thing this bill has done is bring out the modesty, ability and capacity of the hon. member.

Mr. VENIOT: One thing this bill has done also is to show up the stupidity of the Solicitor General in interrupting the hon. member for Gloucester. I see I am getting under the collars of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Solicitor General is getting ticklish; he is wobbling in his seat. As I drive home the knife, as I intend to drive it home before I get through, he will be even more wobbly.

Now let me get down to this statement. I have referred to the costs mentioned by the Secretary of State. The senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) referred to those costs also, but he left out one point; he forgot to ask how it was possible for the Secretary of State to go before the Senate committee on April 26 and make the statement dealing with the $80,000 extra when only the day previously the director of the printing bureau over which my hon. friend has control stated before the Commons committee that $58,805.25—they were very particular—was the most they could make that extra cost.

Mr. CAHAN: The explanation is very simple; it was in the three years previously that the cost ran, according to the statement of the comptroller of the treasury, from $75,000 to $80,000. In the particular year referred to it had been cut down as stated.

Mr. VENIOT: The director did not say it was cut down; he said in 1933 it cost $58,805.25: If that statement was true what can we say of the statement that he made under oath—and I believe they were under oath; at least it was tantamount to an oath —to the effect that they could not furnish a detailed statement distinguishing between authors' costs on corrections and faulty translation costs? How was it that when Mr. Bland was asked a question, which he referred to the director of printing, as to whether he could tell what was the cost to each different department that had translations to do and corrections to make, the answer was that the printing bureau has nothing at all to do with the costs of translations? That is quite true, but that was not what the question was aimed at. It was aimed at the extra cost of the faulty translations, and that extra cost is calculated by the printing bureau and submitted to each department.

When the director of public printing made that statement before the House of Commons committee Mr. Bland added the remark that unless 20,000 boxes containing the reports were overhauled it would be impossible to give the details. At the same time, the Secretary of State when making his statement before the committee in another place was asked whether these extra costs were charged up to each department. He replied, "Yes, and the extra cost accounts are submitted every month." Yet Mr. Bland and the director of public printing, when asked how the amount of $58,805.25 was arrived at and charged up to each department, said that they could not do it unless time were taken to overhaul 20,000 accounts which had accumulated from different departments. I am pointing out these discrepancies to show that something is rotten in the state of Denmark. Where the fault is or where the rot begins, I do not know. But it will take one with a greater knowledge of medical science than I have to discover the source of the ailment. One feels sure that the Secretary of State, in one instance, gives his version of it, and the man from whom he is supposed to obtain details—

Mr. MYERS: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. MYERS: According to the parliamentary guide the hon. member is now seventy-one years of age. He was nine years Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: He was not.

Mr. MYERS: He was in the Mackenzie King government for nine years.

Mr. VENIOT: He was not, so you had better take your seat.

Mr. MYERS: It is four years since the Conservative government took office, so that the year before he became Postmaster General he would be fifty-eight years old. Would he explain whether or not he was an active printer during the time he was collector of customs of New Brunswick and premier of that province.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I was an active printer during the time I was collector of customs in the province of New Brunswick; I was superintendent of a printing office which was under the direction of my brother.

Mr. MYERS: And yet the record is not quite so clear as you thought it was.

Mr. POULIOT: To understand the work of a printer one must be able to read.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not mind the record in the Parliamentary Companion being a year or two astray, and it would not make any great difference if my statement as to my experience were a year or two out. I said I had covered from thirty-five to forty years in the printing business, and I stand by that statement. Before I became premier of New Brunswick I was Minister of Public Works in that province, and at that time was still interested in the printing business. There was still a job printing office running in the town of Bathurst under the direction of my brother.

Mr. MYERS: Thanks for the explanation.

Mr. VENIOT: And let me say this, that I base my experience as a printer partly on the fact that in connection with my work I have printed many departmental reports for the provincial government. I base my comments on this question of cost on the long experience I had in making up printing costs, and the establishment of printing presses not only in New Brunswick but also in Nova Scotia at the time of the starting of the old Pictou News. Hon. members opposite may be interested to know that the first type I ever set was set on the Pictou Standard, and the next was on the Moncton Transcript. I came back from Moncton to Pictou and helped to organize the mechanical end of the old Pictou News.

Mr. CAHAN: You did not change your politics according to your employment, did you?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not need to. The Moncton Transcript was Liberal and the Pictou Standard was Liberal.

Mr. CAHAN: It used to be.

Mr. VENIOT: It was at that time. It became Tory only after the Powers got hold of it. J. J. Power, whose brother had charge of the press, afterwards became one of the leading lights, politically speaking, in the city of Halifax.

Mr. CAHAN: You must admit that the hon. member for Pictou and I have had some experience in Nova Scotia.

Mr. VENIOT: And so have I. I have had experience at least relating to myself. I know that when I first became connected with the Pictou Standard it was not a Tory organ, but became so later on.

Mr. QUINN: What does the hon. member say became Tory?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Guthrie and Mr. Manion.

Mr. QUINN: I will tell you something about Power, if you want to know.

Mr. VENIOT: Now, let me go a little further—

Mr. QUINN: Don't talk too much about Power.

Mr. VENIOT: Will you say that Power was a Liberal?

Mr. QUINN: Yes, he is to-day.

Mr. VENIOT: Then you are contradicting the Secretary of State.

Mr. QUINN: He changed his politics three times.

Mr. VENIOT: He had charge of the Pictou Standard when I worked on it. The Secretary of State has said that he is a Conservative, and you say he is a Liberal. You are contradicting one another. Keep it up, boys; it will soon be a case of dog eat dog, if you keep on going.

Now, sir, let us come down to the method adopted in reaching the cost involved in faulty translations and authors' errors or changes. The original in English is first sent to the printer, and the printer puts it into type. After it is put into type the proof is taken off the galley. The galley proof is read by the expert proofreader in the printing bureau. It is then submitted in page form, or perhaps in galley form, to the author. Any errors which the author discovers and which have not been discovered by the printer are marked by him. If he chooses to change the original phraseology, he does so. I am referring not to the debates of the Senate or the House of Commons but to public reports and so on, laws printed in English and translated into French, or bills appearing before both houses of parliament. If the author sees fit he may make changes in words or even sentences or whole paragraphs. It then goes back to the printer, who in turn makes the necessary changes as outlined in the author's list of changes. Let me point out here, sir, that in all the arguments which have been advanced touching upon the cost of authors' changes, or changes in faulty translation, not one word is to be found touching the cost of the changes made in the original English text. After that takes place the French translator is handed the printed matter from which he translates. Then it goes to the printer just the same as the English version. When it comes back to the translator and is looked over by him he corrects any faults he may discover. He may change the phraseology, a word here or a sentence or a paragraph. But what do I find peculiar in that? At the very moment a change is made it is photostated and held up as evidence to show that this extra cost is attributable in most part to faulty translation.

Let me give an example or two to show how it works. Everybody knows that the Canada Shipping Act was in bulk when it was submitted to the other chamber last session. That bill went before a committee of that chamber and it was changed by its author and by others who were not the authors but who made suggestions. The changes made in that bill were enormous. But before the bill went before the Senate committee in English it had been translated into French. When the bill was before the Senate committee it was found that in many respects it was unconstitutional, that clause after clause of the bill could not apply. The Senate therefore threw out most of that bill and left it over to this session when a new bill was framed and submitted to that chamber. But all these changes that were made in the English version in 1933 naturally brought about changes in the French translation, and those changes were all charged up to faulty French translation. They were photostated, but no photostat was ever taken of the changes made in the English version of that bill.

This session I find that that bill is again before the Senate. There have been no less than two different editions of that bill this session. The first that was presented to the other chamber this session was so faulty in its construction in English that they had to call in new lawyers from British Columbia which cost two, three or four thousand dollars, and lawyers from Montreal, Ottawa, and elsewhere, in order to redraft the bill. After it was redrafted it was submitted in English and in French to the Senate. Again they had to bring that bill down to something nearer perfection, and all the changes that were made in the English version in that bill necessitated similar changes in French. Yet I find that that is one of the items that is charged up to the extra cost of faulty French translation in the preparation of that bill. That very bill has been photostated and paraded about this country to show how faulty translation has taken place in the French translation of the documents and debates of this house.

Mr. POULIOT: Shame, shame.

Mr. VENIOT: I say, Mr. Chairman, that that is unfair not only to the members of the translation staff but to the minister himself who is in charge of the printing bureau. It is most unfair that the impression should be created that the translators are either negligent or unfit for their duties. And to prove it they hold up a photostated copy of that bill extending to four or five hundred pages and say that that is a sample of the French translators' work, when as a matter of fact every change that was made in the French translation belongs to the category of authors' corrections in the English version, and not in the French.

Mr. POULIOT: They cannot answer that.

Mr. CAHAN: May I say to the hon. gentleman in regard to the photos I produced before the committee of the Senate that not a single change in French translation was due to a change in the original English.

Mr. VENIOT: But you took mighty good care not to produce any photostated English changes. The hon. gentleman cannot say that there were not numerous authors' changes. I can show them another Senate bill, letter B of the Senate, now before that house. I have a copy of it here. That bill has been changed in its English construction three different times since it was submitted to the Senate and every time a change was made in the English construction a change had to be made in the French translation, and every such change in the French translation was charged up to faulty translation.

Mr. POULIOT: Shame, shame.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me come a little nearer home. Take the marketing bill before this house. That bill contains twenty-one clauses and there have been from eighteen to twenty amendments. The bill was printed originally in English and then in French, and no fault was found with the translation. The bill was then submitted to this house and certain amendments were suggested. The Minister of Agriculture withdrew the bill for a time in order to submit certain amendments, and as I say from eighteen to twenty amendments have been submitted in English and translated into French, and not a word of fault has been found with the translation of those amendments.

What do we find now? Some of the amendments have already been reamended, and when the bill comes again before the committee with all the changes that have been made in it we shall never know it for the original bill. All the changes that have thus been necessitated in the French translation of that bill, following it up until to-day with the eighteen or twenty amendments attached to it, will be charged to faulty translation, instead of placing the blame where it rightly belongs, on the Minister of Agriculture for not having the bill prepared in a proper way in the first place.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 25, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

INQUIRIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 84, to amend the Inquiries Act.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is merely to extend the operation of the Inquiries Act to international commissions that may desire to take evidence in Canada subject to the control of the governor in council.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SILVER COVERAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that under the agreement entered into regarding silver at the last economic conference; that Canada has agreed to purchase 1,671,802 ounces annually for four years and that every indication would seem to be that the price of silver is on the rise, will the Minister of Finance say whether Canada has purchased her portion agreed to?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I understand that a similar question was put to the Prime Minister the other day. I can, however, say to my hon. friend that the purchase of silver in conformity with the London agreement will be carried out strictly in conformity with the terms of that agreement.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Is there in the estimates an item providing for that expenditure?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend knows full well there is no such item in the estimates.

Mr. YOUNG: I am disappointed.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The agreement was not ratified until after the estimates had been submitted.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOTT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): On a question of privilege, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) as reported in Hansard at page 3275 had this to say on the orders of the day:

> Hon. Peter Heenan (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, during my absence from the house on April 24 the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) made a statement which will be found on page 2513 of Hansard. In referring to myself he said:
>
> In the month of March of that year—
>
> That is, 1930—
>
> —he drew $520 sessional indemnity.

I said $620, not $520. He continued:

> I have waited for nearly three weeks to try to catch the hon. member in his seat, but I have not been successful. I had hoped to make a correction while the hon. member was present, but I do not think the matter should go any further. I just want to say that that statement is not true.

I have no desire to do an injustice to any hon. member. If that statement is not true, I wish the hon. member had given the correct figures, because his total personal expenses for 1929, exclusive of his sessional indemnity and ministerial salary, were $9,291. His total personal expenses from 1926 to the end of his term in office were $16,691.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 4, respecting the Bureau for Translations —Mr. Cahan—Mr. Bury in the chair.

On section 3—Bureau for translations.

Mr. VENIOT: When the committee rose on Wednesday afternoon I was discussing clause 3 of the bill. I wish to direct some further remarks in connection with it in addition to those I have already laid before the committee. As I want to be quite correct in the statements I shall make, and as I intend to offer some suggestions in an attempt to better conditions in the printing bureau in regard to the translation of debates, I shall speak somewhat closely to the notes that I have made. It has not been my practice to read my speeches but I consider this question so important that any suggestions or criticisms I may make should be along definite lines, distinctly understood, and having a basis of correctness.

With that object in view I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that when this bill was up for second reading I stated that the minister could solve the difficulties he had encountered without the introduction of a bill of this kind. At that time I made my suggestions, suggestions which I considered constructive. Those suggestions are to be found in the speech I delivered on March 6 as reported in Hansard at pages 1242-3. I shall read those suggestions again, or rather repeat them. I said it was not fair to criticize a measure unless one was prepared to submit something constructive, and I suggested the following:

> Let me, sir, offer some suggestions. First, have it arranged that each department shall have departmental reports ready before the fall of the year and handed to the translators before the English text of the report is printed. At present what do we find? Departmental reports in English are handed to the translators in many cases only after the English edition has come from the printing bureau. This suggests one way of avoiding the tardiness that has worked itself into the printing of the reports. Matters should be so arranged that these reports shall be given to the French translators as soon as the English version is complete, or, better still, as twenty, thirty or forty pages of the copy are completed and certified by the proper authorities, those pages should be handed over to the French translators. It would then be found that the French version would be ready to go to the printer within two or three days after the English version is ready.

Then I went further and said:

> It has become an almost universal practice among ministers of the crown—I am not going to include myself in this category; for when I was in the government these reports were ready in time—to delay sending to the printers until the fall of the year the reports for the year ending the previous March 31st. If the minister would issue an order that these reports must be ready soon after parliament prorogued, say the last part of July or the early part of August, there would be no further cause for complaints about tardiness in the printing of those reports.

Further on I made a third suggestion: Do not pass documents to persons outside the service for translation, and fourth: do not allow young bilingual clerks and typists to handle the translation of any documents.

Then fifth:

With reference to the debates of the commons, see that a typewritten copy of the English transcript is handed to the Commons staff of translators just as soon as the English reporters can furnish it, and have the French translators begin translating when they receive that typewritten copy. Instead of doing that, what happens?

And then I go on to explain what happens.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I find that an order in council was passed, I think on May 21st, and laid on the table here last Wednesday. When I was speaking on Wednesday I did not know that that order in council referred to this matter, I learned it the next day in reading the press. Reading that order in council carefully I find that two or three of the most important suggestions made by me on that occasion are included in the document. I am going to read the order in council. It is not necessary to encumber Hansard with the whole of it but, I shall take that part that refers to the point I wish to make. After certain whereases it says:

That in order to maintain the efficient operation of the printing bureau and to reduce its costs to a satisfactory basis, it is necessary to insure that the supply of printer's copy for printing all departmental reports and documents shall be balanced uniformly throughout the fiscal year;

That, as the printing bureau is subject to extraordinary demands during the session of parliament for printing and binding the debates and proceedings of the Senate and House of Commons, it is essential for the economic operation of the printing bureau that the printer's copy of all departmental reports to parliament, usually known as "blue books," should be made available to the king's printer, in both English and French, as early as possible after the close of each fiscal year;

That the Secretary of State is reliably informed that the federal government of the United States peremptorily insist that the printer's copy for all reports of the several departments of that government shall be available for the printer within three months after the close of their fiscal year; and

That the adoption and strict enforcement of a similar regulation by the government would provide continuous work for the printing bureau uniformly from month to month throughout the fiscal year, and thereby afford constant and continuous employment for the employees of the printing bureau, curtail the excessive cost of overtime night work during the session of parliament, considerably reduce the general expenses of operation of the printing bureau, and enable this department of government to provide an adequate and more satisfactory service at considerably less expense;

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that it shall be the express duty of the deputy heads of all departments of government to insist that the printer's copy of all departmental reports, complete in revised typewritten form, in either the English or the French language, shall be delivered to the king's printer on or before the first day of July in each and every year;

Now, Mr. Chairman, right here I shall—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. VENIOT: No, Mr. Chairman, I have spoken little more than five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he spoke half an hour on Wednesday.

Mr. VENIOT: I ceased then. In committee of the whole I think I can discuss an item more than once.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. gentleman has a right to speak again. The whole question is whether his speech this afternoon is a continuation of his speech on Wednesday. If it is not, then the position is that any other hon. member of the committee to-day could have risen to speak the moment the committee was called to order. But the hon. member rose as of right to continue his interrupted speech.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CAHAN: Before the hon. gentleman continues I wish to state that when he made his suggestions—

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think this is in order; I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The question at present is whether the hon. member is correct in his view that the rules of committee permit a speaker whose speech had been interrupted by the rising of the committee from its previous sitting, when he resumes his speech at the next sitting in committee, to consider that he is recommencing another forty minute period.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It is a new speech.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I think that is a matter which the committee ought to settle.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not resuming; on Wednesday I finished what I had to say then.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Rule 58 provides that the standing orders of the house shall be observed by the committee of the whole so far as may be applicable. In my opinion, though I am prepared to hear members of the committee on the point, a member who has spoken in committee one day has no right to resume his speech in committee the next day, and to consider that he is commencing a new speech.

Mr. POULIOT: Will you please give me the rule and the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Rule 58, paragraph 1, page 157 of Beauchesne:

The standing orders of the house shall be observed in the committees of the whole house so far as may be applicable—

Mr. POULIOT: But it continues:

—except the standing orders as to the seconding of motions and limiting the number of times of speaking.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That has nothing to do with it. We are not limiting the number of times of speaking at all. This is a simple question as to whether a member of the committee has a right, after having spoken for say thirty minutes on the previous day, to take up another forty minutes when the committee resumes the following day.

Mr. POULIOT: Then you establish a new jurisprudence.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not adjourn the debate on Wednesday. If I had adjourned the debate I think the ruling would be quite right.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The answer to that argument, I think, is that it is not necessary to adjourn the debate; the debate adjourns itself at six o'clock.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Rule 58, which you have just invoked, reads:

The standing orders of the house shall be observed in the committees of the whole house so far as may be applicable—

It is well understood that there are a number of rules observed in committee that do not prevail when the house is sitting as a house. In the house no hon. member has a right to put a question to another hon. member except by consent. When the committee is sitting the same rules that prevail in the house apply to a certain extent, but while in the house no questions are allowed, in committee of the whole frequent questions may be asked and answered, so this must be taken mutatis mutandis. Under those circumstances I submit that the forty minute rule of the house cannot apply to the sittings of the committee of the whole. It might be said that the moment the hon. member is interrupted in committee of the whole, immediately his forty minutes is completed and then he can begin all over again. I stood up, and the Secretary of State stood up and interrupted the hon. member.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would not that be the best way to settle it? He has been interrupted; let him go on.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order—

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): With the consent of the committee the hon. gentleman may continue, but this is a question that ought to be settled.

Mr. POULIOT: If the committee has to settle it I should like to speak to the point of order for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): There is no need to debate it now; the hon. member has the consent of the committee to go on.

Mr. POULIOT: You have said that the point ought to be decided, and I want it to be decided now. Rule 37 states that no hon. member shall speak for more than forty minutes during the course of any debate. That rule applies in the house but it does not apply when we are in committee of the whole, because rule 58 states that the rules of the house shall be observed in committee except the rule limiting the number of times of speaking. We are not debating now; we are discussing. In the house we debate; here we discuss, and the Minister of Justice understands that difference very well.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I cannot follow the hon. member's argument, but with the consent of the committee the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) may proceed.

Mr. VENIOT: Thank you. I was referring to the order in council and the provision contained therein with regard to the printing of departmental reports. I find that this order in council contains my first suggestion in full, and that it also includes suggestions two and five in substance. Suggestions three and four, which referred to giving translations to clerks and sending translations outside are not referred to in the order in council, and I can understand why it was not necessary to do so; those matters can be arranged by the different departments without the authority of an order in council.

The part of the order in council which refers to the method to be adopted in reference to the translation of departmental reports could be applied with equal force to the production and translation of parliamentary debates, both of this chamber and of the Senate. At page 979 of Hansard for February 27 of this year, in giving reasons for the introduction of this bill the Secretary of State said:

> —I was informed, as the minister responsible for the administration of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, that the publications of French translations of public documents were frequently so long delayed as to impair, if not to destroy, their usefulness to the government and to the public.

This statement could leave but one impression, that the delay was due to the translators. When I spoke previously I pointed out how and why this delay was caused. I now find that the Secretary of State must have convinced himself that I was right; he must have looked more fully into the matter, if I am to judge from the order in council that I have just read. This order in council now places responsibility for the delay where it properly belongs, on the various departments of the government and not on the translators. The responsibility for this delay now having been placed on the proper shoulders I hope the Secretary of State will not continue to blame the translation staff.

According to the hon. gentleman, however, we have still another evil; that is, the too great cost for changes that have to be made in type after the translation has been handed to the printer. I have gone into this matter already and have attempted to show that this extra expense cannot be attributed to faulty translation in such large measure as the Secretary of State suggests. If there are errors attributable to faulty translation—and no doubt there is some faulty translation—it cannot be helped in the ordinary course of events. Such faulty translation must exist, to some extent, but there is a remedy for it. All the hon. gentleman has to do is add to the present order in council another suggestion I intend to make, and I want the Secretary of State to give very careful consideration to it. All he has to do is to add to the present order in council the provision that instructions be issued to each department to the effect that no translation shall be sent to the printer until such translation has been revised by the person responsible for the correct translation. This revision is to be done when the translation has been typewritten, and not after it has been put into type. If this is done, the galley proofs will come back to the translation branch of each department, and be returned practically as a clean sheet. Then the government would further avoid the necessity of furnishing to the translators a loose-page proof. The latter, in itself, will save considerable delay as well as considerable extra cost. That is not being done to-day and the system should be changed in order to bring about the procedure which I am now suggesting. All the Secretary of State has to do is to add the instructions to the present order in council, or have placed in the order in council instructions to the effect of those I have just stated.

But there still remains the author's changes. If, after the galley proof has been submitted to him, the author has made no changes in the English version, there will be no changes made in the French translation. But if the author's changes have to be made, then one may definitely know what those changes are, and what the cost has been in making them. The minister could then quite easily distinguish the charges to be made for errors by authors or errors in translation which, evidently, according to the evidence given before the committee of investigation they are not now in a position to do. I claim that they should now be able to do so. I claim, further, that it is at the present time an easy matter to do so. If it is not done and has not been done in the past, it is because the work of the printing bureau has been carried on in a loose manner. Of course, I am not blaming this government any more than any other government for that condition.

I wish further to point out how unfair some of the criticism made by the Secretary of State has been. Before doing so however, let me say that if in the first two or three years in which he was in charge of the department he had obtained the passage of the order in council tabled last Wednesday, he would not be confronted with the worries which now assail him, and under that order in council, which I claim is the keynote to a solution of the difficulty, we would have a system established. I state that under it there could be established a system which, with the additions I have indicated, would give satisfaction to all concerned, and thereby avoid the necessity of introducing this bill.

On May 9, I find that Mr. F. G. Bronskill gave evidence before the civil service committee, and it is indicated in the evidence that he is the accountant of the printing bureau.

In answer to a question by Mr. Chevrier touching upon the question of errors in translation he said—

Mr. DUPRE: At what page?

Mr. VENIOT: I have not the page, but I copied the evidence exactly as it appears in the official report. Mr. Bronskill's reply was:

Well, I do not know quite why you refer to translation. So far as we are concerned, it is an author's alteration, that is a change in the proof made by the author. The cost of that for the year 1933-34 is given at $58,000.

Then, in reply to some other questions he said, in substance:

It would be very difficult to tell how much of that money is due to translations,—to French corrections or English corrections.

Then he was asked the following question:

And therefore, it is all put together?

—referring to the $58,000—and the reply by the witness was "Yes." Then comes the following question:

Without knowing exactly what amount is due to the corrections of the French groups and the corrections of the English groups?
A. That is correct, sir.

In the face of such answers from the accountant of the printing bureau surely the Secretary of State cannot blame hon. members for casting very grave doubts on his statements made at various times and places as to the very heavy cost brought about by changes in type due to faulty translations. I feel the Secretary of State must have been led astray by someone in whom he had great faith, because I do not believe that he would wittingly, himself, commit such an error in regard to the cost of translations. Apparently the official merely guessed, and gave the minister the result of such guess work. Now that they have been driven to separate the cost of errors by authors and errors by translators they cannot do so, and the minister has been left to bear the brunt of the criticism. Is it not time that the minister disciplined the printing bureau? He must now know that the—

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Bronskill is not under my jurisdiction as Secretary of State, as the minister having charge of the printing bureau.

Mr. VENIOT: He is the accountant of it.

Mr. CAHAN: He is an accountant in the Department of Finance. I do not know whether he has been there three months or six months.

Mr. VENIOT: He is in the printing bureau.

Mr. CAHAN: He may be there now, but I do not know how long he has been there. He is not under my supervision.

Mr. POULIOT: He is an able man.

Mr. VENIOT: Before the committee, as one of his qualifications he stated he was the accountant of the printing bureau. Is it not time that the minister disciplined the staff of the printing bureau—not only Mr. Bronskill but the whole staff? The witness before the committee said he could not distinguish the difference in cost between the corrected French translations and authors' errors. I think it is time that this gentleman was told it is his duty to do that, and that if he does not do it someone else may be obtained who will do it. I would advise the minister to apply his knowledge of organization to the accounting branch as well as to the directing branch of the printing bureau.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no control over it.

Mr. VENIOT: No control over the printing bureau?

Mr. CAHAN: Over the accounting.

Mr. VENIOT: I said direction, as well as accounting.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no control over the accounting.

Mr. VENIOT: But I have added to the word "accounting" the word "directing."

Mr. CAHAN: I have it, and I have exercised it.

Mr. POULIOT: It shows the absurdity of centralization.

Mr. VENIOT: Following the question of the unfairness which I claim has characterized the criticisms by the Secretary of State on this matter of faulty translations let me come to another point in connection with which I believe he did not do justice to himself or to the matter under consideration. I refer to the evidence given by the Secretary of State before a certain committee. I find Mr. Cahan saying, "I can show you instances of French translation of Senate work that did not come out until a year after the meeting was held." The minister seems to be obsessed by French translations; it seems to be his bête noire. But he does not say a word about delays in printing English versions.

Then an hon. senator took up the cudgels apparently for the translator or for the cost of translation. What do we find? The senator said, "Until this year we did not have much cause for complaint in respect to the French translation of Senate proceedings, but this year the government cut off our money for translation, and we have no translation."

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: In reply to that Mr. Cahan said, "I did not know that."

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: I am surprised to find an astute minister, such as the Secretary of State, giving such a reply. Some discussion then took place as to the difference in cost between having documents printed by the printing bureau and by outside printers, and what do we find? Senator Sharpe said:

Senate translation in French costs for 85 copies $4,519 on the average but that work can be done outside for $2,760.

I want those figures to be noted, and also what follows:

Hon. Mr. Cahan: I have no doubt it could be done for that if clean proofs were handed in. But look at the way the proofs come to us. Here are specimens.
Mr. Sharpe: Surely clean proofs would not be responsible for so much difference in cost.

Senator Sharpe was quite right. Clean proofs could not account for one-quarter of the difference in cost referred to by him.

Mr. CAHAN: I will show you the difference in a few moments.

Mr. VENIOT: I hope the minister will bring along a little better evidence than what has so far been produced because he has not yet convinced the members on this side of the house, nor has the committee been convinced I am sure from the evidence already produced before the investigating committee, that there was any necessity for this bill.

Then we have the statement of the hon. the Secretary of State at page 982 of Hansard of February 27 of this year. He said:

Now it was ascertained by one of the committee under the control of the treasury—

I want this to be noted:

—that the setting up in type of these corrections made in the text after it had been set up in type and sent for revision—not all French, but a great deal of it, some of it being in English—over a series of years, in wages in respect of the resetting of that type after it had been first set up in the printer's text, varied in cost from $75,000 to $80,000 a year.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, in the face of that statement I have just quoted we have been unable to ascertain what was the cost of the corrections of the French text as distinct and separate from the rest. Apparently the committee under the control of the treasury had ascertained that in detail or no such statement could have been made by the Secretary of State. Why has not the report of that committee been brought before the civil service committee of this house so that it would be in possession of the facts? It is no answer to say that the civil service committee had the opportunity of asking for that report. It is no answer to say: You could have examined the witnesses, because the names of the members of that committee have been completely hidden from this house. We do not know who the members of it were, or who was the person who made the report to the governor in council.

Mr. CAHAN: The names are on the records of this house.

Mr. VENIOT: But that report was never submitted to the civil service committee.

Mr. CAHAN: The names of that committee were reported to the house.

Mr. VENIOT: They are members of the council, are they not?

Mr. CAHAN: They were not.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not see their names on the records of this house. I would like to see them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister time and again has said that that was a privileged report.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. The hon. member was asking about the names of the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What is the use of handing out names if you cannot discuss the report of that committee?

Mr. CAHAN: He said he could not get the names and I said they were on the records of this house.

Mr. VENIOT: I hope the hon. gentleman will produce them. Why is the report of that committee not now before the committee of the whole house for our consideration? Why keep it back from this committee? It should be produced and laid on the table so that this committee would have the opportunity of looking into it and seeing how and when and where the committee based their charges of extra cost against translation and against authors' corrections. We have a right to ask for that, Mr. Chairman, and the minister should produce that report so that we may judge whether this bill is the remedy for all the difficulties that have been specified by him. We should know what the reasons were for the introduction of a bill such as this.

Now I wish to touch upon the work of the printing bureau as done by unilingual and bilingual operators. As I understand it—I may be astray but I think I am correct—when the departmental reports in English are sent to the printer the whole staff of operators, unilingual and bilingual, are put to work upon them, and in that way the English edition can be rapidly got out because the whole staff is working on it. But when the French translation from that English edition is sent to the printing bureau for putting into type the employees who do that work are bilingual employees, only, not unilingual and bilingual as in the case of the English edition, and that is the reason for the accentuated delay in the issuing of the French editions of these reports.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the hon. gentleman speaking of bilingual compositors or translators?

Mr. VENIOT: I am talking of linotype operators and compositors. I say that the French translation of the English version is handed to the bilingual operators to be set in type and they have to rush that work through notwithstanding that they were able to devote all the time that was required to carry on the unilingual typesetting and linotype operation of the English version.

But, Mr. Chairman, if my proposition is accepted and the two versions are submitted simultaneously in English and in French—by simultaneously I do not mean to say that the English and French versions should be ready at the same time, but the French translation of the English version could be submitted fifteen or twenty pages at a time, and then you would have the operators in the bureau continuously employed and the minister would not be beset by the problems confronting him to-day in trying to keep the whole staff regularly employed. Further, he would be in a position to do away with all this rush work and would be able to have a timely regulation of the work carried on at the printing bureau. That is impossible under the present system. He must change that system in order to do it. The change I suggest would result in a saving to the government and in the work being done efficiently.

I come now to the question of the cost of corrections. I have studied this matter very carefully. I do not wish to repeat what I said on Wednesday and go into this whole question again, but when I was speaking on that day I was not speaking in any boastful way as some hon. members opposite sought to imply. I have the experience which enables me to deal with questions of this kind, especially as to cost, and I think I can direct the minister to a proposition which would enable him to ascertain definitely where the cost lies and how the matter should be treated in the future if he wishes to avoid these extra costs.

First of all I claim that we have a right to know, and if the printing bureau cannot give this information they are not worthy of holding the positions they hold, and as well it would be interesting for this committee to know the definite cost of corrections in faulty French translation which have to be made after setting the copy up in type. We should also be informed as to the exact and definite cost of making authors' corrections in type and putting the material in proper shape in English and in French. Let me direct the attention of the committee to the fact that the law bills submitted to the House of Commons and to the Senate contain more author's corrections in English than in French. There are no corrections in French unless the author of the English text is forced to correct. To correct what? The faulty construction of the bill which he has prepared for the government. The committees of this house are authors because changes are made and bills are brought back to be reprinted. Everything which pertains to these changes must be eliminated from the original bill and the changes correctly inserted. In this way the changes in English are the sole basis of the extra cost of changes which must be made in the French text.

Mr. CAHAN: That is far from the case.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not far from being so. The only extra cost which can be attributed to the French text is the revision of faulty translation which has been discovered. I admit that there has been some faulty translation but the printing bureau should be in position to distinguish between the cost of faulty translation and the cost of corrections in French due to author's errors and changes made by the committee of the whole house and other committees. I am convinced that the costs of these changes in legislation and so forth will amount to at least fifty per cent of the $58,000. I challenge the Secretary of State to produce to this committee one account which will disprove the statement I am going to make. I challenge him to produce an itemized and detailed statement of the cost of corrections because of faulty translation. If that is done I know he will find that that which can be properly charged to faulty translation will not amount to ten per cent of the $58,000. I make that statement without fear of contradiction.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. VENIOT: At least ten minutes of my time has been used up in the discussion of points of order and so forth. It will take me only about three minutes to complete what I have to say and then I will speak no further on this bill. You will be saving time by allowing me three or four minutes.

I have dealt with the extra cost entailed by authors' corrections and corrections in faulty translation, I have made suggestions which were considered to be sufficiently of a constructive nature to warrant inclusion in the order in council, I have submitted further constructive suggestions to-day which I am sure would be effective if applied, but I have still a further suggestion to make. In view of the strong opposition to this bill as expressed in the house and in the press, in view of the fact that several heads of departments such as the acting Deputy Postmaster General, the assistant director of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the chief of translation of debates have not approved of the changes contemplated, in view of the fact that the order in council which has just been passed will, if put strictly into effect, meet the major difficulties with which the minister is faced, would it not be well for him not to force this bill through but take one year in which to work out the suggestions contained in the order in council? In that time a fair trial could be had and if the suggestions contained in the order in council did not prove effective, then this measure could be put into effect.

Mr. CAHAN: Due I suppose to his experience in the printing business, the hon. member has made some suggestions which are more or less valuable. I only regret that he did not use his experience for the benefit of my predecessor in office as then I would not have been overwhelmed with the difficulties which I now face.

Mr. VENIOT: The question never arose.

Mr. CAHAN: With respect to the suggestions which he made in the house on March 6, 1934, I made the following statement which appears at the top of page 1242 of Hansard:

> I fully agree with what the hon. member has said so far.
>
> [Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: Why did you not put them into effect?

Mr. CAHAN: They have been embodied in an order in council but the provisions of the order in council are inadequate to overcome the difficulties with which I have been confronted. If the hon. gentleman thinks that I have not given attention to the printing bureau then he is very much mistaken.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not wish to leave that impression.

Mr. CAHAN: The mere cost of printing, binding and lithographic work plus the cost of paper for the year ended March 31, 1930, amounted to $2,482,851.95. For the last year for which accounts have been made, that is the year ended March 31, 1933, these operating costs of the printing bureau amounted to $1,709,494.49. That is, a reduction in the operating costs of the printing bureau of $773,-357.46 had been effected.

Mr. CHEVRIER: How much of that was wages?

Mr. CAHAN: A great part was wages but I am dealing with the operating expenses of the printing bureau and have shown that in three years they were reduced by $773,357.46.

Mr. POULIOT: If you decided to print nothing, there would be no costs.

Mr. CAHAN: With regard to the purchases by the stationery department for the various departments of government and for this House of Commons, great care has been taken. No order for $500 or over has been made without competition, and in many cases of which I have known where the amount was less, the same holds true. All competitive bids have been submitted to the governor in council and approved by order in council. The expenses of this department for the year ended March 31, 1930, were $1,435,414.39, while for the year ended March 31, 1933, they amounted to $1,001,833.30. The reduction in the operating expenses of the stationery branch during a period of three years amounted to $433,581.09 additional.

Mr. CHEVRIER: How much in the way of wages is included in that?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not talking about wages; I am talking first about the management of the printing bureau. Therefore, on those two branches, first the operation of the printing plant, and, second, the stationery branch, there has been a reduction by the year, comparing those years, of $1,216,938.55, and that reduction has not been made without considerable attention and careful supervision. The hon. gentleman has challenged me to produce a single case which shows excessive cost of corrections in the French text of translation after those translations have been sent out as being the final printer's proof to the printing bureau.

Mr. VENIOT: I know the hon. gentleman does not wish to lead the committee astray.

Mr. CAHAN: No. He said: Give me one case, and I am giving it.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I did not. I did not say one case of faulty translation. I admit there were faulty translations.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member said: Give me a case in which the cost was excessive. He said that it would not be over five or ten per cent.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister must not put words into my mouth.

Mr. CAHAN: If I am not correct, I will be glad to be corrected.

Mr. VENIOT: I asked him to give me one case showing the distinction between the cost of faulty translation and of authors' corrections.

Mr. CAHAN: I am giving it.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister is not giving it.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member please wait and hear what I have to say before he criticizes? When I was summoned before a committee of the Senate, this was due, as I understand the matter, to the fact that an hon. member of the Senate had found that the cost of printing the Senate debates in French was excessive. He had taken the French Hansard as printed, revised and bound, sent it to a representative printing establishment and asked what would be the cost of printing, publishing and binding that Hansard. The cost as shown in the Senate accounts for the French Hansard was $4,915.46. That was the figure that the hon. senator presented to me, and he said: How do you justify charging against the Senate $4,915.46 for work which I find a representative printing establishment is prepared to do for $2,760? That was the problem presented to me. In the printing bureau throughout the years, in every job so-called that comes in, the actual cash cost of making corrections, whether in French or English, is kept and charged up to the cost of the departmental work. The difficulty before the select committee was that the printing bureau was asked in a day to go through several thousand accounts and pick out those items of costs of translators' corrections to present to the committee, a task which it was said was impossible in the length of time which was given for doing this. The committee of the commons it will be remembered, sat from time to time for two months and a half to consider the bill which is now before the house.

I was able to produce to the select committee of the Senate the actual items of the charge made against the Senate in that case. This deals with the Senate debates of 1932-33 and the French edition, revised and bound. The details of the cost of printing cover 584 pages including index, and the number of copies required for the Senate was eighty-five. In the Senate there was not a revision from day to day of Hansard and no French Hansard was issued from day to day there as is done in the case of the English Hansard of the Senate and of the House of Commons. Therefore, when the French translator of the Senate began his work, it was after the English edition of the Senate Hansard had been published, revised, printed, bound and given out. The translation evidently began in September, although parliament had prorogued in the previous July.

Dealing with this case, while I would like to be allowed to put a tabulated statement on Hansard, I will read it. The composition in the Senate, after there is a completely revised English edition printed, bound, published and distributed, was as follows:

Composition:
Hand work	$ 888 66
Linotype work for entire edition	1,531 28
Monotype for headings	55 28
Translator's alterations	2,250 83

That is, the corrections in the translator's copy, after it had been sent to the printing bureau, put into type and then sent back, read by the proofreaders of the printing bureau so that the actual French copy as received was sent back in type, the text in type having been compared, cost $2,250.83.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the minister say why I did not get those figures in the committee?

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose the hon. member did not ask for them. I was not a member of the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The record is complete and replete with my demands for it.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not know the hon. member asked for it.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The minister knows he is dealing with an exceptional case.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with this case. It may be exceptional in some respects, but it is not so very exceptional. I will deal with it fairly. Those are the facts that were put up to me. If the hon. gentleman had sat in my office and been told month after month except in cases where I have been abroad on public business, as to the excessive cost of these corrections in translations, photographically placed before me when I complained of the excessive costs of the bureau—

Mr. BOUCHARD: The minister knows these are exceptional and he knows why. He knows the translator was overworked.

Mr. CAHAN: I showed the house many photographs exhibiting translators' corrections.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister showed no photographs of the English corrections.

Mr. CAHAN: There are no corrections in the English edition that I have seen as bad as that.

Mr. VENIOT: They are bad enough in some cases.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister is right in saying those that he has seen; but the English ones were not shown to him.

Mr. CAHAN: They were not shown to me to demonstrate the cost of French corrections.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There was a happy selection.

Mr. CAHAN: They were shown to me because it was repeated to me from time to time that the cost in the printing bureau was higher than the same printing could be done in places outside the printing bureau.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the minister was not fully informed.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no printing establishment in Canada that can do its work more economically than we are capable of doing ours in the printing bureau.

Let me revert. The other items in the details of cost of printing are as follows:

Press work	$102 40
Binding	71 85
Paper	15 16

This makes a total cost of $4,915.46.

Of that entire cost almost one-half, namely $2,250.83 was due to the actual cash paid out in the re-setting in type of page after page. And more than that, the hand work which is shown in composition includes the work after the linotype corrections are made and the metal form comes from the linotype machine. There is certain handwork in picking out the incorrect type from the old galley of type and putting in the new. And part of that hand work, costing $888.66 is due, not to the linotype, but to picking out the old type and putting in the new after the linotype corrections have been made. That is a very long and continuous operation, in view of the quantity and extent of the changes made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But might I ask—I think the minister will be fair—

Mr. BOWMAN: Let the minister go on.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I want to be fair to him on this occasion, although in his estimation I may not have been as fair as he would like on other occasions. He submits this particular case, he knows I am aware of it—

Mr. CAHAN: Please allow me to finish.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does the minister submit this as a fair sample of what is done usually?

Mr. CAHAN: It may have been an unusual case in this respect, but you see the same thing time and time again with regard to those French translations.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the minister is not fair on this occasion I will cease to be fair to him.

Mr. POULIOT: You cannot cease to be fair.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member does not know anything about the operation of the printing bureau except what he is told by interested parties.

If the copy received from the French translators in the first instance had been correct we would have saved at least $200 on the handwork and $2,250 in resetting translators' alterations, making a total saving of $2,250 on this whole job. If this extra cost of alterations in the printed text could have been avoided the entire cost of the French Hansard for the Senate debates would have been reduced from $4,915 to $2,465.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And the minister knows how it could have been done.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly, it could have been done if we had had charge of the translation.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Order. I must ask hon. members not to interrupt the minister without his consent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let the minister be fair.

Mr. CAHAN: I am stating absolute facts. I do not wonder the hon. gentleman does not relish them after some of the statements we have heard in this house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, it is not because—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the minister wants to go into this case I shall go into it with him.

Mr. CAHAN: I am simply replying to a challenge made from the other side of the house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Watch where the chips fall.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not particular about chips. If this house or this government think I am not administering my department efficiently they are welcome to my portfolio on any day of any week. I have given to that department the very best of my experience in business life; I have given it my wholehearted attention night and day since I have been there.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister is just as fair as bad weather.

Mr. CAHAN: In this case the cost suggested is the estimate of an outside printer, who made his estimate having a revised and bound copy of the French Hansard before him, basing it on the actual cost of composition without corrections. They estimate the actual cost of doing it in a first class establishment in Canada, without their profit, as $2,760. If it had not been for this faulty translation which had to be corrected, the cost of the printing bureau would have been $2,465. Now I wish to go further.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is far enough.

Mr. BOWMAN: Plenty, I would say.

Mr. BOUCHARD: That is just one case.

Mr. BARRETTE: One at a time.

Mr. CAHAN: Take the English edition of the Senate debates, in order that you may have a fair comparison. The unrevised English edition of the Senate debates for the same session, of which 1,015 copies were printed and issued daily, cost as follows:

Composition:
Hand work	$ 684 07
Linotype	1,058 91
Monotype	50 77
Author's alterations	1 23
	$ 1,794 98
Press work	211 36
Binding	91 33
Paper	132 43
	$ 2,230 10

But for the revision of the Senate Hansard in English, members of the Senate who speak in English—and they all speak in English—were allowed to make such corrections as in the House of Commons members are allowed to make for the revised edition. For the final revised edition all these forms have to be reset in another way for printing, and the cost was:

Composition:
Hand work	$ 449 64
Linotype	56 10
Monotype	2 45
Author's alterations	694 41
	$ 1,202 60
Press work	146 39
Binding	171 49
Paper	58 01
	$ 1,578 49

That is the total cost in respect of the entire revised edition of 362 copies printed and bound for distribution. So if you take the cost in the Senate of issuing the English Hansard from day to day to the extent of 1,015 copies, including the entire cost of the revisions, the reprinting and the binding of the English edition for the permanent bound edition of 362 copies, the total cost of both was only $3,808.59. Therefore you find that although there were only 85 copies of the French edition, which was the one and final edition, both the English editions, the daily and the revised and bound edition cost only $3,808.59 compared with $4,915.46 for the single French edition.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will the minister allow me a question?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Would the minister look at the other end of the question, not only from the printer's point of view but also from the writer's point of view, and see what it costs for the staff for the English edition and the staff for the French edition.

Mr. CAHAN: Staff where?

Mr. BOUCHARD: I mean the staff of translators, editor and proofreaders.

Mr. CAHAN: I am trying by this bill to procure efficient translations, and I hope it will go through.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I hope not.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it should receive the unanimous approval of this house. When a minister of the crown is made responsible for translations he will have the opportunity of seeing whether the translators do their work with efficiency and competency.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is apparent that they do now.

Mr. CAHAN: Therefore I say that this extra cost of the French edition of the Hansard, with respect to which as a member of the government I was summoned to give evidence before that committee of the Senate to which reference has been made, was due solely to the inefficient work of the French translators of the Senate in preparing their copy for the printer.

Mr. CHEVRIER: How many translators are there in the Senate?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no more knowledge than the hon. gentleman has.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I must ask hon. gentlemen to keep their seats and not interrupt without the consent of the minister.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then may I ask the minister to say how many French translators there are in the Senate, if he knows who was responsible for the translation with which he has just dealt, and where that gentleman is to-day?

Mr. CAHAN: I can only say that the name on the printed text for corrections is given, but more than that I do not know.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister dare not say who the gentleman was who did that work.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. gentleman wish me to give the name? I know what the French proof discloses—

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister is on very thin ice at the moment.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not on thin ice; for more than three score years I have learned to walk on thin ice or thick, and I find that if one relies on a truthful statement of the facts it carries him over thin as well as thick ice. That is my reply to the challenge that has been made. I dislike to name officials—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then be fair.

Mr. CAHAN: I will leave it to the house to decide. Time and again hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to the incorrect and inefficient translations from English into French of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of this session of parliament. Before this house I have not done otherwise than assume the responsibility on behalf of the government as being responsible for that translation. I should like to say now, however, that despite the insinuations of hon. gentlemen that this translation was made somewhere outside by some incompetent translator—

Mr. CHEVRIER: It was a good thing it was done outside.

Mr. CAHAN: —I say that translation was made by one of the chief translators of the House of Commons, and every bit of condemnation which hon. gentlemen opposite have heaped upon that translation is so much criticism in condemnation of one of the heads of the commons translating branch, which is under the control of the House of Commons and not of the government. Now if you insist upon having the name I am prepared to give it. Every bit of condemnation that I have accepted and for which I have assumed responsibility as the member of the government responsible for the administration of the Department of the Secretary of State. I have borne rather than reveal to this house how incompetent, in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, is one of its chief translators, though he had two or three associates and a total staff of ten to consult with in making that translation.

There is nothing covert or concealed in this bill. We have done everything we can to place the printing bureau on a satisfactory and unprecedentedly efficient basis, and we are carrying out that purpose. Hon. gentlemen opposite must know that for the first time in many years a member of the French-Canadian race has been placed in charge of that bureau, and I must say that he has co-operated in every way to carry out the reforms I have suggested. But I cannot complete those reforms so long as translations are in the hands of appointees over whom the government of this country has absolutely no control. Therefore the time has come when, if the government is to assume the responsibility of producing French and English versions of departmental reports and other governmental documents on time, to satisfy the demands of hon. gentlemen opposite, to satisfy the demands of the whole body of the French-reading public in Canada, to satisfy the demands of those departments which do business with foreign countries where the language is French, I say it is absolutely necessary that the government should assume the responsibility of organizing this translation bureau as a part of the civil service of the country, so that those there employed shall be placed under ordinary civil service regulations and have, as such civil servants, all the advantages and privileges that accrue to the civil service of this country. That is my sole desire. I have no desire at all to criticize. Hon. gentlemen have done that to the greatest extent; in criticizing the translation of the speech from the throne they have criticized the men who are now doing the translation work for this House of Commons.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, I have not regretted that, with regard to some of these officials, I have shielded them as long as I could. The provocation offered by hon. gentlemen opposite has continued to the point where to shield them from such criticism is no longer possible. But when this translation bureau is organized under this proposed act those men who are employed in this service will have the full advantages of occupying positions already recognized in the civil service, and an honest and efficient effort, impartial to the extreme, will be made to that end by the civil service commission and by the superintendent to be appointed by the civil service commission, under such direction as it may be necessary for the minister to give. There will be no fear and no favour. Men who are competent will receive their just advancement and be maintained in their positions, but we will expect that when translations come from the new bureau in fair copy for those employed in composition at the printing bureau, this copy will have been so revised by the chiefs of the bureau as to render unnecessary these large unnecessary expenses now incurred, which are not only an expense to government but a still greater expense to the administration of the printing bureau, because until those faults, if I may call them that, are remedied and overcome it is absolutely impossible to maintain an efficient administration of the printing bureau or of the translating staff.

Mr. MacINNIS: As one of the members of the civil service committee to which this bill was referred, after it had received second reading, I think it would be in order for me to say a few words, not because my remarks may have any effect in reducing the opposition to the bill, but because I believe some other hon. members will agree with me in what I am about to say.

First of all I should like to touch upon the statement made on Wednesday by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) when he stated that he had been abused by the chairman of the committee. I do not believe that was a fair statement to make. I had the honour to serve on the same committee in 1932 which differed only in the fact that in the present year the hon. member for Témiscouata sat in place of the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). So far as I am concerned this year the chairman could not have been more fair than he was. I wish to make this statement because I believe that in matters of general principle I agree more with the hon. senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and the hon. member for Témiscouata than I do with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) who acted as chairman of the committee. I wish to state, however, that I could not wish to sit on a committee headed by a chairman more fair than the hon. member for West York has been.

Part of the report of the committee which sat in 1932 read as follows:

> Item No. 12: To promote economy and efficiency in engineering and mapping services or any other services which can be centralized, your committee recommends to the civil service commission that a careful study be made of such government services with a view to amalgamations thereof.

It appears to me that this bill has been brought down in conformity with the recommendations made by the 1932 committee.

Mr. BOWMAN: Unanimous recommendation.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. And I believe that all hon. members should accept a bill such as the one now before them in the spirit in which it is brought before the house. That is, we should not bring in racial or language considerations any more than we should do so if it were a question of amalgamation and coordination of the various engineering services of the government. We would not ask whether an engineer were French speaking or English speaking; all we would require would be that he must be efficient, and we would govern ourselves accordingly. I believe that hon. members on this side of the house who sat on the committee would do well to consider the matter from this point of view.

Mr. BOUCHARD: We do.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am very doubtful. However, I shall accept my hon. friend's statement as one of fact. Since this bill has come before the house I have talked to quite a number of translators, and I am satisfied that their only objection to the bill is that it may interfere with their tenure of employment or might interfere in some way with the remuneration they now receive or with their position in the government service.

Mr. GAGNON: With their vacations.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not see that that need necessarily be the case. I have enough faith in the generosity and fairness of the Secretary of State to believe that he will see to it that if after the bureau of translations is put into working form certain translators are not required, some other positions will be found for them without any loss of remuneration or any loss of the considerations attached to their service. I believe that this position, which I have described, can be read from their evidence.

The senior member for Ottawa read some of the evidence given before the committee; I shall proceed to read some more and go a little farther on some of the points he raised. I turn to the evidence of Mr. Gerin, chief of the debates translation branch of the House of Commons. The chairman of the committee asked the following question:

Then, Mr. Gerin, may I take it this way, you are giving me the objections which you see to the establishment of a bureau, and, may I take it that you see three objections or possible objections, one, the interference with the hours and conditions of work now established for the translators; two, possible interference with salaries; and three, possible interference by the new superintendent in the method or means adopted for accomplishing of translations.
A. Yes.

The hon. member for Ottawa did not read the next question, which is as follows—

Mr. DUPRE: Will the hon. member give the page?

Mr. MacINNIS: Page 38. The next question is this:

Would that summarize the situation?
A. Well, I suppose it would, yes. I don't see anything else.

That in my opinion is the crux of the whole matter. Surely that should not be sufficient to hold up a measure which has for its purpose efficiency in the organization of government work. I am in favour of the bill—

Mr. CHEVRIER: It looks like it.

Mr. MacINNIS: —because I am in favour of efficiency and order in the government service. Neither the government nor the country nor, most of all, the employees, have anything to gain from lack of efficiency in any government service. I feel quite satisfied that it would pay the government and the country to pay those people for whom they have not sufficient work to keep away from the service altogether so as not to demoralize others who are working. For these reasons I am in favour of the bill; I trust that we may organize a bureau and that the civil servants now in the translation services will not be hurt in any way by the organization which will take place.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member who has just taken his seat has expressed some of the sentiments I feel with regard to the civil service. Taken as a whole, it is a competent body. The hon. member has said that this bill will tend to increase efficiency in the translation services. The hon. member, who sat on the committee, has always been fair. I believe I must say that he was one of the most assiduous and impartial members, and I pay him that tribute. I think he must admit, however, that there is not one tittle of evidence in the record to show that this system will by any means conceivable or inconceivable improve the present situation. If the hon. member is fair he must admit that the whole of the evidence is against the contention he has put forward, namely that the bill if put into effect would increase the efficiency of the translation services. Further, there is not a particle of evidence before the committee that the translations to-day are not of the highest standard. There is not one solitary, single complaint in the whole of the evidence to show that the standard of translation from French into English or from English into French—but particularly from French into English—is not of the highest order. There is not one complaint about the translators of the House of Commons. There is not one particular complaint about the translators, whoever they may be, in the other chamber, and I do not think it is fair simply to say that if this bill goes into effect it will increase the efficiency of the service. I say to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, just as I said to the minister the other day, that this is simply a smoke screen, a pure piece of camouflage. So evident is that, that I take it from the lips of the hon. Secretary of State himself when he said that this bill must go through and will go through.

Mr. CAHAN: If the government can put it through. It is a government measure.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh yes. It is the most wonderful example of Toryism that this bill shall go through and must go through with the benign complacency of those who sit to your right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOBEIL: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Certainly.

Mr. GOBEIL: Will you tell the committee what you mean by camouflage. Camouflage for what?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not here to give my hon. friend lessons in English. The dictionary is there. If my hon. friend wants a lesson in politics I will be quite ready to give it to him.

Mr. GOBEIL: Substantiate your statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The dictionary is there.

Mr. GOBEIL: As usual.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not here to teach my hon. friend his letters. I say, Mr. Chairman, that here we have the evidence that this bill must go through. The Secretary of State has said it and he has repeated that the government stands or falls by this bill.

Mr. CAHAN: Efficient administration is impossible without it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. gentleman say how many times since confederation a bill has gone to a committee of this house and has been studied at seven or eight or twelve meetings, and after six out of eight witnesses have testified against the worthiness of the bill, it has come back to the house without any amendment, although amendments have been repeatedly proposed? Will the hon. gentleman say how often that has occurred? It has not occurred in this case even after the pious wishes expressed by outstanding members from the province of Quebec sitting on the other side of the house that this bill might come back from the committee in an unrecognizable form. Yet it has not. And now those same gentlemen sitting behind the minister will complacently and benignly help to put the bill through.

I want to be fair to the minister. He has a knack with his stubbornness and his one-track mind of starting off on what he thinks is the main line and then running off into sidings. Then when he gets to the bumper he gets sort of worried when he gets it right between the eyes. I did not start him off into the siding. But now he realizes, and particularly do those who sit behind him, the position in which this bill places them. Unfortunately the minister is determined that this bill will have to go through. I want to be fair to the hon. gentleman, although he has been far from fair. I do not mean to say he did it intentionally, but sometimes he opens the throttle a little too wide and gives himself a little too much speed and oversteps himself.

Mr. DUPRE: What is not fair is for the hon. member to say that the Secretary of State is not fair. The hon. member knows just as well as anybody else that there is no man more fair than the Secretary of State, and the hon. member should not say anything to the contrary.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What is fair and what is not fair is a matter of appreciation, and it would be well for the hon. Solicitor General, for whom I have a very friendly feeling, that he should mind his own business. The Secretary of State can well look after himself. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that he is not on the pampas now but in the House of Commons. The hon. gentleman says that the first gun speaks the loudest. There are no gay caballeros around this chamber and we are not going to be intimidated by any talk of that kind.

Mr. DUPRE: Oh.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the Solicitor General wants to say anything, let him stand up and make a speech, but let him not interrupt me like that.

Mr. GOBEIL: Small stuff.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It fits the subject.

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend knows that time and again he has interrupted.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman never opens his mouth except he puts his foot in it.

Mr. DUPRE: The hon. gentleman is indeed very fair.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Secretary of State has said that the English edition of the Hansard in the Senate runs to 1,115 copies and that the cost is $3,808.59. I think those are the figures he gave, and that the French edition, of which he said there were only eighty-five or a hundred copies, cost $4,915.46. Now when the Secretary of State boasted in the Senate that he was an old printer, he must have known that you can print one hundred copies for a certain price and that when you order five hundred copies you can get it at a relatively lower price, and five thousand copies at a relatively lower price still. When he compared eighty-five copies with 1,115 copies, he was not fair in that regard. This includes the cost of translation.

Mr. CAHAN: The costs were the total costs and not the relative costs. The statement I made is absolutely correct and cannot be controverted.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman is wonderful on the comeback but he always starts wrong. He has always something up his sleeve. He never makes a cleancut statement to start with. He has not been fair again when he talks about this thing that happened in the French translation. That is not fair. The hon. gentleman knows that there is nobody who wants to go into that less than I do. I do not want to go into this special and particular case. He knows why he does not want to go into it and why I do not want to go into it, and he is not fair. He is neither fair in his comparison nor fair to the individual.

Mr. BOWMAN: You be fair. Give us the facts. Let us have the facts.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will accept that. Will the Secretary of State appoint a special committee or someone—not the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil); he would not understand anything—but I will take the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) or any other hon. member on the other side of the house except the member for Compton. There is a certain expression in legal phraseology that rhymes somewhat with Compton —non compos mentis.

Mr. CAHAN: I think you should call the hon. member to order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I cannot hear half the time because so many members are interrupting.

Mr. CAHAN: His suggestion that a member is insane is not quite a proper statement. It is a breach of the privileges of this house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would be the last one to do that. I said the name reminded me of something. I did not apply the expression to him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You implied it very distinctly.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the Secretary of State in answer to the challenge of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) will appoint anyone on that side of the house except the hon. member for Compton to investigate—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. GOBEIL: He would not act on your suggestion anyhow.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Les confitures sont assez bonnes pour vous.

Mr. GOBEIL: Elles sont trop bonnes pour vous.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. Secretary of State would appoint anyone to investigate this particular piece of translation that happened in the Senate, and it was investigated as the hon. member for Dauphin would do it, I would be perfectly satisfied to let him look into it and place the responsibility where it should be placed, so that we could have an end to these insinuations and innuendoes all over the place. If the hon. member for Dauphin goes into that and places the responsibility for the translation of these French debates I would be satisfied.

Mr. BOWMAN: Unfortunately we do not know to whom the hon. member is referring. If he would tell us what the facts are perhaps we would know more about it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will make it plainer. The Secretary of State referred to a certain piece of translation in the Senate debates. The hon. member for Dauphin can read my answer in to-morrow's Hansard and he will then know that I am not misquoting the hon. gentleman. The hon. member will have an opportunity to see that I am not misquoting. Then the hon. member may be appointed but I would be most sorry because any one who has placed upon his shoulders this responsibility may find that the party in question may be some one who in later days has received recognition at the hands of those who sit to the right of the Speaker. I think it was very small potatoes on the part of the Secretary of State to bring up that matter in the way in which he did. That is just why I told him that if he continued in that strain, I would not care where the chips fell. I did not mean that I was going to say anything against the character of the minister but I said that if he wanted to know where the responsibility lay, let him go just one step further.

Mr. CAHAN: Whom is the hon. gentleman charging with being responsible?

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is he driving at?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister said something about this order in council. It was discussed in committee as to whether or not it was possible to achieve this thing without this bill. I think it was clearly established at page 82 of the evidence that it was not absolutely necessary to have a bill of this kind in order to achieve simultaneous translations and to have the reports printed and tabled at the same time. At one point in his evidence before the Senate committee, the minister said:

We could balance the work as between summer and winter if the government and parliament would take certain measures to ensure that all blue book printing, departmental printing and the translation of these public documents were done early after the close of the year on March 31. They all relate to a year that ends on March 31. I can see no reason why nine-tenths of that work, most of which is done in English, could not be prepared by June or July.

What is the use of this bill? The minister goes on:

—but in any event I can see no reason why the returns should not be prepared in most instances early in April and put into typewritten form.

There is no particular reason for this bill. Then he goes on:

If that were done the printing bureau could be kept busily employed during the summer, when it could work efficiently. Under such a plan the bulk of the printing would be done in November or December, and all the blue books would, in compliance with the law, be laid upon the table of the house in the first few days of the session.

Then the Hon. Mr. Griesbach asked:

That seems reasonable. Why has this not been done?

Hon. Mr. Cahan: Well, obviously no one person has the power to have it done. But the government, having control of the various departments, could by order in council direct that the work be done in that way.

Hon. Mr. Murphy: And that of course would entail the cooperation of all the ministers at the head of the various departments?

Hon. Mr. Cahan: Yes, Senator. You know how it is, it necessitates the cooperation of fifteen or sixteen ministers.

Hon. Mr. Murphy: I had to get it on several occasions. It was accomplished but not on the first venture.

The minister loves that word "cooperation." It is a sacred word with him, provided the cooperation is such that everybody cooperates with him. He never endeavours, he will not and does not endeavour to cooperate with anyone in any particular. At that time this was done by order in council. It has been done by order in council and it was shown in the committee that there was no necessity for this infamous bill. Yet the minister says that it must be put through.

I want to refer to just one more subject on this particular section. There is no doubt that the minister has effected reductions in the printing bureau, but I do not think that demonstrates any great wisdom. Any one could reduce costs by putting 158 people on the street. But I know what the minister is going to say. He has said it already four or five different times, and if he said it seven or eight times he would use the same words. He will tell us of what he did between Christmas and New Year's day. He uses that as a sort of flame of charity, he uses it to ask for help or coordination. It is perfectly true that the minister has brought about these reductions, but this is what he said before the committee:

We have, as I shall point out in a moment, reduced the staff very, very materially.

Anybody could do that. Then later on:

We have reduced the staff very, very considerably. Up to the close of the last fiscal year we have reduced the staff by 158.

And then in answer to the Hon. Mr. Sharpe, he said:

—and other notices are outstanding for further reductions.

Then he goes on:

Those reductions included the retirement of a very considerable number of persons.

Then further on:

Taking the period from March 31, 1933, to October 17, 1933, the reduction of staff effected a saving of $118,382. The saving effected by the reduction of working hours was $56,530. In addition, I undertook to lay off employees in the operating department, which effected a saving of $85,477.

I submit that under these conditions it is with very poor grace that the Secretary of State says that all these reductions have been achieved when something like $260,000 or $270,000 of the reduction refers to wages and the reduction in staff of 158.

Mr. POULIOT: The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) has told me that he is ready to answer questions, and I have one to put to him. However, before putting this question I should like to make a preliminary reference. On July 6, 1931, a question came up concerning the right of a minister to change an official letter into a confidential letter. Referring to the delay which had occurred in the tabling of certain documents I said:

I have no objection to delay provided no official letters are marked private in the meantime.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) then answered.

I think the language of my hon. friend might be described, as I heard an hon. gentleman say a moment ago, as an outrage. Notice must be taken of that language at once.

Then the Prime Minister continues after a short dialogue.

Mr. Bennett: That is such a reflection on the honour of members of the government that I must ask Your Honour to direct the hon. gentleman to withdraw it unreservedly.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member would be well advised to withdraw that remark, and I ask him to do so. I did not catch what he said; he was interrupting when I went on to the next order of business and I called him to order. The remark is certainly an insinuation that the Minister of Marine marks letters "private and confidential" when they are asked to be produced, and no such insinuation can be allowed to go unchallenged.

Again:

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that implication.

Again:

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw the insinuation.

Mr. Pouliot: There is no insinuation in that, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The words were open to that interpretation and to no other. I must insist that the hon. gentleman withdraw the insinuation.

Further:

Mr. Pouliot: I did not make any reflection in regard to the past; I said what I wanted for the future.

Mr. Cahan: Withdraw.

Mr. Pouliot: I do not wish to be disagreeable to any hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Pouliot: Is it a crime to mark a letter "personal"—

Mr. Speaker: That is neither here nor there. My request is that the hon. member withdraw the insinuation, that the Minister of Marine marks letters "private and confidential" after they have been asked for by way of a return to the house. It is a most unfair insinuation to make.

Then I withdrew. I had to withdraw twice because I said that I hoped the Minister of Marine would not mark as confidential official letters that he had received.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): What has this to do with the bureau for translations?

Mr. POULIOT: I wanted to put the preliminary before my argument.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): What bearing has what the hon. member is now saying on the bill to establish a bureau for translations?

Mr. POULIOT: Here we have arrived at full speed at the junction. I have been patient to-day; I might have argued on a point of order. Yesterday the Secretary of State rose to a point of order arguing that I should not quote letters that in accordance with the authorization of the special committee I had seen in the office of the civil service commission. That point of order has not been decided by the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The point of order was decided; it was decided on Wednesday that the hon. member had no right to refer to those files in this discussion in committee. The hon. member will have to confine himself to clause 3 of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Then, Mr. Chairman, will you please tell me at what page of Hansard of Wednesday you gave a ruling on the point of order raised by the Secretary of State?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I gave a ruling on Wednesday that that particular file could not be used in the discussion on this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I hold I did.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I appeal, sir, to the Speaker, I move, seconded by the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), that the committee rise and report to the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member is forgetting that the chairman is not now ruling on a point of order. He is stating a fact that within his own knowledge took place on Wednesday. The hon. member has no right of appeal from what the chairman has just said. He has a right of appeal from any ruling made by the chairman on a point of order. This is not a ruling on a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I maintain that the ruling you gave on Wednesday was on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Afterwards the Secretary of State raised another point of order which has not yet been decided by the chair. Now I ask you, sir, either to give your ruling on the point of order raised by the Secretary of State or to give me an opportunity to submit the whole matter to the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I make a statement of fact that on Wednesday the question of the right of the hon. member to refer to that particular file was discussed in the committee and I made a ruling that it could not be referred to. That is a statement of fact which I make now; I am not going to make another ruling on the same point to-day.

Mr. TURNBULL: May I point out the ruling is reported in Hansard at page 3332, where the chairman said:

The Chairman (Mr. Bury): If the hon. member has dealt with the method by which he came to know the subject matter of the files, I am prepared to give my ruling. It is this: That whatever may be said as to the power or right of the committee to requisition those files, I hold that the mere fact the committee said they had no objection to one of their number seeking to get inspection of the files, does not make those files official records of the committee and does not make the information that he privately got from the files official records of the committee. Therefore I hold that references to the files are out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): There was more than that, if I may say so. The senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) agreed with the ruling but requested leave himself to restate the point for ruling in a different form from that in which the hon. member for Témiscouata had stated it and I refused to allow him to restate the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore, as it is useless, I shall not insist any more on that except to say that this bill is a dream baby.

As I do not wish to be disturbed while making an argument which may last a few minutes—

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member kindly excuse me? I have received a long-distance telephone call.

Mr. POULIOT: Certainly. I shall wait until the hon. gentleman returns, to ask him the question.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member will find sufficient to say.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to make an argument that this bill is most uncalled for. What I desire to state to the committee is in accordance with the exhibits filed in committee and with the evidence given by Mr. Bland of the civil service commission. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, at this point, because I do not wish to be disturbed when I am speaking on that, whether I shall be in order to discuss those matters?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member may discuss any matter that is relevant to clause 3 of the bill. If he goes into what is irrelevant to clause 3 of the bill, I shall call him to order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And to the amendment that has been moved?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Yes, and to the amendment.

Mr. POULIOT: There are several lines of arguments that may be taken with regard to this bill but the first point is to see how the translation business is going on at present, how the translation is done. If the members of the committee will look at the back of report No. 5, page 156, they will see a list of 45 units. In some of those there are no official translators. Is that because no translations are made there? No sir. The reason is obvious—I would ask that the Clerk of the House do not disturb the chairman of the committee while I am addressing the committee, he is mumbling loudly and he disturbs me. There are 45 units. What I was saying when I was disturbed by the mumbling of the Clerk of the House is this, that there is a distinction to be made between translators de facto and the people who are called translators in the estimates. In all departments apparently there is some translation done, but some of it is done by people who are not officially called translators. For instance we have the biological board, which comes under the Minister of Marine, with no translators. Apparently the work is done by the translators of the Marine department. The Canadian pension commission, no translators, but the work is done by the translators of the department. For the Canadian radio broadcasting commission there is no report about translations made. That work is probably done by Mr. Maher who is the bilingual commissioner or Mr. Landry, the bilingual secretary of the board. The chief electoral officer is Mr. Castonguay. There is no translator there; the work is done by Mr. Castonguay who is bilingual and his bilingual staff. In the civil service commission Mr. Potvin is bilingual and he must have some bilingual assistants. Extra work is done outside, and the lack of supervision is due to the fact that the translator of the civil service commission was superannuated and has not been replaced. Then the exchequer court is a special case. One of the judges is bilingual and the other is English-speaking, therefore there is no necessity for having an official translator. The work is done by the staff, and the judgments, as you know, Mr. Chairman, because you are a distinguished member of the bar, are printed in the language in which they are given, either French or English. External Affairs, one translator. Farm loan board, no translator. The Department of Finance has no translator except one who is engaged on the railway work; it is curious that a translator who does some work on account of the Department of Railways and Canals does not come under the jurisdiction of my genial friend the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), but of his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). This is wrong and should be remedied. For the government contracts' supervision committee there is no translator. For the Governor General's secretary's office the translation is done by the staff. Department of Insurance, no translator. International joint commission, apparently no translator. Department of Justice, translations in the official languages are made by Mr. Fontaine, one of the officials of the department, an able bilingual gentleman, and the foreign correspondence is done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Library of parliament is like the exchequer court; one of the librarians is bilingual and they have a bilingual staff, therefore there is no necessity of having translators there. In the national research council the work is done by the staff. The pension appeal court work is done by the Department of Pensions, they have no translator. In the Department of Public Printing and Stationery the work is done by the staff. The Solicitor General is bilingual, he has a bilingual staff and does not need a special translator. For the supreme court the situation is the same as that in connection with the library and the exchequer court. Mr. Justice Rinfret and Mr. Justice Cannon are bilingual and they have a bilingual staff, therefore there is no necessity for translators. The tariff board has no translators but the work is done by the Post Office Department.

In those 19 units the work is supposed to be done within the staff, there are no translators. In the other units there are some translators. This gives a general summary of the situation. According to the answers which have been sent by every branch there are no translators in the library of parliament, where there are two librarians, one being bilingual, and no translator in the government contracts supervision committee. There are some self-sustaining departments with regard to translation; by that I mean departments which do not send translation outside. One of them is the archives, where excellent work is being done by two translators. Then in the department of the auditor general, who is also bilingual, they have one translator, and the work is done there. For the superintendent of bankruptcy the work is done by the staff, none sent outside. In the Department of Fisheries they have one translator who does the whole work including the annual report. For the Governor General's secretary's office the work is done by the assistant secretary. Indian Affairs has one translator, they do all the work within the department. The Department of Marine have one translator, they do all the work within the department. For the national research council the work is done by the staff, none sent outside. The Department of National Revenue and customs and excise has three translators, no work sent outside. Public printing translation is done by officers of the department, no work sent outside. The Privy Council have one translator, no work sent outside. Public Works department has three translators, no work sent outside. Soldiers' settlement board work is done by a bilingual member of the staff. Trade and Commerce and bureau of statistics, all work is done in the department, except for a few pages of the blue book last year, but this is an exception. When I asked the Department of the Secretary of State to tell the committee if all the translation was done within the department the answer was, "No information on file respecting translation done by another department and outside the government service." In the patent and copyright office they had also one translator. It means, sir, that in all those branches the work of translation is so organized that all the work is done within the branch.

Let us see which departments have to depend on other departments for the translation of foreign correspondence. From September, 1931, to date the Department of Agriculture sent ninety-two foreign letters to the Department of the Secretary of State. The Department of Labour sent three letters during the same period, though the Secretary of State's department say there were six. From the Department of Mines one hundred and eight pages of text were sent to the Department of the Secretary of State, but there is nothing in the report of that department about it. The Department of National Defence sent seven letters, and they sent ten pages outside to be translated. In 1932 the income tax branch had eighteen forms and forty-two pages translated by government translators, and in 1933 they had twenty-two forms and forty-one pages translated by outside translators. It is wrong for the Department of National Defence and for the income tax branch to send their work outside the service; that work is most confidential, and the translation should be done within the service. Occasionally the pension commission sent foreign matter to the translators of the Department of the Secretary of State and the Post Office Department. In 1932-33 the Department of Pensions and National Health sent one hundred and fifteen foreign letters to the Post Office Department.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in addition to what I have already said, we have the departments of agriculture, labour, mines, national defence, pensions and national health and the income tax branch and pension commission having their translation in both languages done within each of these departments, and only a small amount of foreign work is sent outside the service. As a consequence those units are also self-sustaining. Then, with regard to the Department of External Affairs, in the last two years that department sent twenty-four foreign letters to the Department of the Secretary of State and forty-seven pages to the House of Commons. That is a very small amount. In the Department of the Interior the head translator had to deal with ten thousand items in two years, and he sent two hundred letters and ten articles to the Department of the Secretary of State, though that department gives the amount as fifty-five letters and certificates and four hundred and twelve pages of technical matter. In 1932 that Department sent one hundred and forty-one pages and in 1933 they sent one hundred and thirty-two pages to the blue book branch of House of Commons, in addition to ten or fifteen legal documents to the law branch of the House of Commons. Formerly there were many translators in the Department of the Interior; there was no reason why all should have been dismissed with the exception of only one. In his evidence Mr. Bland said that in this department there would be enough work for two translators, so one man from the blue book branch should be sent to the Department of the Interior to assist the translator already there. That is the first department of all those I have mentioned that is not self-sustaining, and that is so because there are fewer translators engaged in the work. It is very easy to remedy that condition. One must be fair; the translator in that department must be given some assistance.

It seems unfair that some translation work done for the Department of the Interior should be charged to the House of Commons. There is no reason why we should pay for the work done for that department. The estimates of the Department of the Interior show a reduction, but on the other hand there is a proportionate increase in the estimates for the House of Commons. This is absurd; the work should be charged to the department for which the work is done.

Now let us consider the work done by the blue book branch of the House of Commons for the civil service commission. The reports of 1932 and 1933 were translated by that branch. This is wrong. The translator of the civil service commission was superannuated, and the position has not been filled. Mr. Bland told the committee that there would be enough work to give employment to one translator within the civil service commission, translating the official reports and revising the corrections. Why is that not done? Those publications of the civil service commission, advertisements of vacant positions and so on, should be done very carefully. They go all over the country, and they should be well done. It is necessary that they should be revised, and in addition there is no reason why the civil service commission should send its work to the House of Commons. If some money is to be voted for the civil service commission I have no objection, provided that it is charged to the civil service commission and not to the House of Commons. The audit board should see to that, because it is a discrepancy in accounting. The money should be charged to the department for which it is expended, and I take this opportunity of directing the attention of the government to that point.

Then there is the Department of Finance, whose translation work is done in a very stupid way. Some of it is done by the Post Office Department and some by the blue book branch of the House of Commons. There was a Mr. Lorans who was a translator in the Department of Finance; he died, but the position has not been filled. According to the evidence given by the deputy Minister of Finance, in 1932 there were 246 pages and 925 pieces and in 1933, 348 pages and 1,100 pieces, plus forty references of the tariff board, sent from the Department of Finance and the tariff board to the House of Commons and the Post Office Department for translation. This is absurd; the Minister of Finance should have his own translator, and the work of that department should be done by a man who is familiar with that work.

Then let us take the report of the Post Office Department. According to the deputy minister they have translated 1,300 pieces from the Department of Finance and 900 pages from the tariff board per annum during the last two years. Do you see, sir, the absurdity of refusing to replace the dead translator, and sending some of those translations to the department headed by the Postmaster General and other work to the House of Commons? The Minister of Finance should have the guts to have some estimates for translating services in his own department. It would be possible for a translator to look after tariff board translations and translations for the Department of Finance. The superintendent of insurance also is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. The farm loan board also comes under his jurisdiction. Do hon.

members not think that there would be enough work in these branches I have indicated to employ the services of one translator, and to justify the Minister of Finance bringing forward an estimate for a salary equal to that received by the dead translator who has not been replaced? In that way the work would be done within the department. The work could be done by a translator of the blue book branch who by order in council and according to law could be transferred. Not in 1932, but in 1933 the Department of Immigration sent only ten pages to the blue book branch. Therefore we must conclude that this department is self-sustaining, so far as translation is concerned.

Then there is the board of railway commissioners. In 1931 a report of 131 printed pages was sent to the House of Commons, and in 1932 the house received a report of 72 printed pages from the board. In 1932 the Department of Railways and Canals sent a report of 212 pages to the House of Commons and in 1933 sent a report of 92 pages. While the Minister of Railways formerly had two translators in his department he has now only one.

Mr. MANION: They never translated blue books. They are translators for correspondence, and that sort of thing, but not for blue books.

Mr. POULIOT: Even if they did not translate reports, I say it is a bad practice, because the reports of the Department of Railways and Canals should be translated within his department, as the reports and publications of the Department of Finance and other departments are translated within those departments. I should like to see my hon. friend come to the house with a supplementary estimate providing for the salary of one of the translators in the blue book branch, so that that amount might be charged to his department. I should be glad to vote the amount, and in my opinion it would be more proper to have the translator in his own department than to have a messenger going hither and thither from the west block to the house carrying work to be translated outside the department.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest to the hon. member that if we did that we would have to hire, the year round, a translator to do only one job which would take a matter of two or three weeks, at the most.

Mr. POULIOT: Before that there were two translators who seemed to have enough work to do.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MANION: They did not; that is why we let one go.

Mr. POULIOT: There were two translators on the board of railway commissioners and two translators in the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. MANION: I have nothing to do with the board of railway commissioners. They are an independent body, and with the exception of putting their report before the house I have nothing to do with them.

Mr. POULIOT: But at the same time, as to a certain extent they come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Railways—

Mr. MANION: No, not at all.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, even if they do not come under his jurisdiction, I say that the kind of translation done by the board is about the same kind as is done in the Department of Railways and Canals. I think the minister would admit that. In my view it would be normal to have one translator added to the one now operating in the Department of Railways and Canals in order that that department may have two and in order that the translations may be made by persons who have real knowledge of the railway business and are familiar with railway terms. That work could be done much better, much more quickly and with better results. Anyway, I have submitted my request and if as a result the minister brings an estimate before the house indicating compliance with my suggestion, I shall be very glad.

Fifty pages were sent to the House of Commons blue book branch in 1932 by the Department of Trade and Commerce, statistics branch. That is an exception, because as a rule they do their own work. Only an occasional translation is done for them by the blue book branch. In connection with the Department of Justice, in the year 1932-33 three reports of the superintendent of penitentiaries were sent to the House of Commons. Letters in foreign languages from convicts are sent to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and are not translated in the east block. Most of these departments, with the exception of the Department of Finance, the Department of Railways and Canals and the board of railway commissioners, are self-sustaining so far as translation services are concerned.

The following units are self-sustaining: Agriculture, Archives, Auditor General, Superintendent of Bankruptcy, Fisheries, Governor General's Secretaries, Indian affairs, Marine, National Research Council, National Revenue, customs and excise, public printing, Privy Council, Public Works, Soldier Settlement Board, Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, Labour, National Defence, Income Tax, pension commissioners, Pensions and National Health, External Affairs, Immigration, statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, with the exception of the superintendent of penitentiaries, the Department of Justice, etc.

The civil service commission is not self-sufficient. The others which are not self-sustaining are the Department of the Interior, where the number of translators has been too much reduced; the Department of Finance, where the dead translator has not been replaced; the Department of Railways and Canals, and the board of railway commissioners, where the number of translators has been reduced.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at length in this discussion, because I believe I have already stated my views with regard to this bill. To anyone who may express surprise at our opposition may I say, first, that we do not know exactly how the bill would operate. I do not see any ground for such a bill either in Canada or outside of Canada, and I believe the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) would have been much wiser had he given us his reasons for introducing the measure.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I might remind the hon. gentleman that that was settled on the second reading. It is now a matter of the contents of clause 3.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I will come to that.

Mr. VENIOT: He has the right to go on.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): He has not.

Mr. VENIOT: It was granted on Wednesday.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the committee granted the right to a general discussion on the short title clause, such concession certainly does not apply to every clause of the bill.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Clause 3 provides that there shall be a bureau under the minister to be called the bureau for translations, and it is to that clause I am speaking. I usually do not abuse my right to speak in this house, and I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that you interrupted me when I was just making a few preliminary remarks on this bill.

As I was saying, I do not see any ground for the centralization of the translation services. Here in Canada if you will look back over the past, you will not find in the record anything in favour of this measure. Look over the rest of the world, more particularly at the experience in Switzerland and Belgium, and you will find that centralization has not produced the effect in those countries that was expected of it, and now they are returning, more particularly in Switzerland, to the system of decentralization.

This bill seems to have been born in the dark like a mushroom, and to my taste it has not even the flavour of a mushroom. When we ask for reasons the minister gets up and speaks, as he did on two previous occasions, of the printing necessities, as if translation were to be subordinated to printing. That, as we say in French, is "mettre la charrue devant les bœufs,"—to put the cart before the horse; for translation, which after all is a form of writing, and not an easy form, perhaps indeed the most difficult of all, cannot be subordinated to the printing bureau. I do not see why the minister insists upon the necessities of the printing bureau. He went on to give examples. I have always thought a great deal of the fairness of the minister and I was surprised this afternoon when he referred to a very exceptional case where a man who was overworked and had the assistance of some temporary employee without any experience in that particular work turned out to the printing bureau under very difficult conditions a translation which I must admit was not in proper form. But that was very exceptional. It was a case in the Senate, moreover, where we have no jurisdiction, and we have not all the data to deal with it. It does not give us a real picture of the translation services in general, and I am surprised that the minister resorted to that kind of example. When we were pressing him for the author of the translation of the last speech from the throne we were turned down and the minister said that he was shielding someone. I happen to know this man myself. I think very highly of him, and it is not his fault if there were perhaps sixty mistakes in the translation of the speech from the throne. He was perhaps overworked. But it does show one thing; it is an argument against the centralization of translation. How can you expect a man, even a chief translator, to be a master in all kinds of translation? A translator who is working on penitentiary documents will be able to translate such documents very well, and a translator from the Department of Railways can be expected to translate well a report of the Department of Railways, and so on. But the very fact that this speech from the throne is the worst piece of translation that one can witness does not indicate that the translator himself is a poor translator. On the contrary, it indicates that centralization is very unwholesome. Referring again to the speech from the throne, the minister said that he wished to shield the author of this piece of translation, and in order to confute my hon. friend from Témiscouata and myself, he quoted a letter signed by a pen name. Then in almost the same breath he read another letter, but only in part. Well, Mr. Chairman, when the opposition is asking for information I think we are entitled to get all the information the minister has, and if he had given all the information that was in his possession or had taken the trouble to inform the committee as to the nature and purport of this bill in its working out, perhaps the opposition would not have been so great. But we know nothing whatever about it. We do not know how it will work. We are asked to make the change without being given the facts.

I admit frankly, as I have admitted previously, that a little more coordination is necessary in the different translation offices. So much is that the case that the translators themselves of their own initiative some time ago formed a society called the Technological Institute, where they discuss questions concerning their occupation. That body might be strengthened, or the chief translator in each of the departments might be united in a sort of federation comprising all the departments, with a view to bringing about a further improvement in translation.

But I resent more than anything else the argument which the minister used and the comparison he made between the translation system and an accounting system. The minister who introduced this bill was unable to have a proper translation made in his own department, and any time that he resorted to the gratuitous services of a friend he never came back with the best piece of work, as has been demonstrated. The minister now comes and says that he wants to organize the translators in all departments. We do not know if he intends to bring all these translators into one office where one translator will be doing one job and then a few hours afterwards be asked to do another job. I should like to impress upon this committee the impossibility of any man translating the work of any department unless he is closely related to the activities of that department. New words come up every day and he must be able to follow the technique of the department. In Switzerland instead of looking for mere translators they look for expert scholars and men of great technical ability. These men are part of their department, promotions are open to them and they know just what are the necessities of their department. That is the only way in which there can be good translation. We do not know if there is to be a bureau in which all translators will be coordinated or if there is to be just a bureau comprising them all.

There is another point upon which I should like to touch for a few minutes. It has been a long established tradition that the translators of the Senate and the House of Commons should be segregated and receive special treatment. They are responsible for their work to the Speakers and to the two houses. Does any hon. member who makes a speech feel it is fair that the translation of that speech should be in the hands of the government? Is it fair that the government should take the responsibility of translating my speech? Is it fair that the translation of my speech should be in the hands of my opponents? The translators of the House of Commons live side by side, so to speak, with the members. They know not only the different idioms used but they know the idiosyncrasies of the different members. If I have any complaints to make, I make them to the Speaker, and I take full responsibility for the translation of my own speeches. Otherwise I am in the hands of the government. Many hon. members who spoke gave us some hope that a special branch would be established for the parliamentary translators but now we have this bill without the slightest intimation that this is to be done. We should like the minister to be more precise. We should like him to take into consideration the suggestions made from this side of the house and the recommendations made by his colleagues, such as the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) and others. If he had listened to those suggestions and amended the bill accordingly, he would not be witnessing the strong but sincere opposition we are making to-day.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house met at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

ANCIENT FORESTERS' MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 28, to incorporate Ancient Foresters' Mutual Life Insurance Company—Mr. Bell (Hamilton)—Mr. Bury in the chair.

Sections 1 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—All assets of fund (e) vested in company, subject to mortgages or liens.

Mr. NEILL: Apparently this company has existed for a long period as a fraternal society. I would like to ask the hon. member in charge of the bill whether any provision is made for taking care of liabilities incurred under its fraternal operations. Has it received the approval of the insurance department and has it gone through the private bills committee?

Mr. STIRLING: I am afraid I cannot answer the hon. member's question in detail other than to say that it was before the banking committee and was passed there without amendment. It has the approval of Mr. Finlayson, superintendent of insurance. The main purpose of the bill is the changing of a fraternal insurance company into a straight line company.

Mr. BENNETT: I made inquiries along the line of those of the hon. gentleman, as to whether the superintendent of insurance had approved, and the bill will stand for third reading until the next sitting so that it may be quite clear that he has. I am informed that he has, as the hon. member has said.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations—Mr. Cahan—Mr. Bury in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, shortly before the committee rose, when you told me I had spoken forty minutes I was just outlining the self-sustaining departments in accordance with the reports which have been sent by each deputy to the civil service committee, and before which Mr. Bland of the civil service commission was examined. There is one department which has been left aside, which is self-sustaining in regard to translation, and which does some work for other departments, namely the Post Office Department. It does work for other departments, including the Department of Finance, although it sends some foreign letters to the department of the Secretary of State. Therefore all departments of this government are self-sustaining except the following: In the civil service commission, where a translator and chief examiner have been superannuated and not replaced—in that department there is no one to revise the proofs of the publications or revise the translation after it is made. In the finance department the same thing; there was a translator, Mr. Lorans, who died and has not been replaced, and now part of the work of the Department of Finance and of the boards under the jurisdiction of that ministry is done either by the Post Office Department or the blue book branch. Therefore, sir, the only way to remedy what is wrong in the producing of translations in the Department of Finance is to replace the translator who died. That new translator could do the translation work for the finance department, the farm loan board, the insurance department and also the tariff board. There would be plenty of work for him.

In the Department of the Interior there were six or eight translators before, and there is only one at present. The work he has to do is the work of two good men. According to the report of the acting deputy minister he had to deal in the last two years with ten thousand items. He had so much to do that he had to send some of his work to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and to the blue book branch. Therefore the Department of the Interior would be self-sustaining with regard to translation if one translator were put with the translator in charge there at present to assist him in his work. If that were done there would be no necessity for a central bureau. The Department of Justice is apparently self-sustaining except for the penitentiary branch which sends its reports to the blue book branch for translation. It seems to me there is enough work in the Department of Justice to employ one translator, who would be in charge of the reports of the superintendent of penitentiaries and so on. In the railway board there were two translators, but one of them is dead so that there is only one left. In the Department of Railways and Canals there were two before, and there is only one left. So of those four translators there are only two left. Some work in that department is sent to the blue book branch also. Would it not be wise to have another translator in the department who would do the work without its being sent to the blue book branch? That department would then have three translators instead of two, and the whole work of the Department of Railways and Canals and of the railway board, which is the same with regard to translation, would be done satisfactorily under the jurisdiction of the minister.

In the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there is a curious situation, according to the evidence of Mr. Darling, who appeared before the committee. The translator, Mr. Arnoni, has not passed the civil service examination but is kept there because he knows the common language, not the elegant, classical language which is required of the translators, but he speaks the language of the common people, and it has been stated in the evidence that this is what is wanted for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They just want the ordinary, common language for the use of that branch. But there is much work which is sent to the Department of the Secretary of State. For instance from September, 1931, to January, 1933, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police sent to the Department of the Secretary of State 23 Danish letters, 45 Dutch, 114 German, 324 Italian, 24 Norwegian, 1 Portugese, 10 Spanish, and 18 Swedish, a total of 559 letters. In the year 1933 they sent 2 Danish, 70 Dutch, 2 Flemish, 235 German, 292 Italian, 34 Norwegian, 27 Swedish, a total of 662. Therefore although there is some foreign translation done in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police it is not a self-sustaining department with regard to foreign translation.

If we consider all the outside units of the service we see that to remedy any complaint, not which has been made but which might be made with regard to translation, the only thing to do would be to transfer one translator from the blue book branch to the civil service commission, one to the finance department, where both translators have not been replaced; one to the Department of the Interior, or to give a chance to the translators of the Department of the Interior who were supposed to have the preference by virtue of an order in council which was passed at the time, and who are now without work, one of them; one to the Justice department, and another one to the Department of Railways and Canals. It means that the whole question might be settled by taking five translators from the blue book branch and sending them to five different departments to fill the vacancies that have been created through the death or superannuation of the translators formerly there, who have not been replaced. This is a very simple suggestion I am offering to the Secretary of State. I know that my remarks this afternoon were very dull; I do not pretend anything to the contrary, but this question must be decided in accordance with facts. There is a relative truth in everything, and my colleague the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and myself have tried to discover that truth. So I take the liberty of offering this suggestion piping hot to the Secretary of State.

Now there is something else. The only departments that are not self-sustaining are the civil service commission, the Department of Finance and the boards under that department, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Justice with regard to penitentiaries, the board of railway commissioners and the Department of Railways and Canals. That is all. I wonder if the Secretary of State intends to change the entire system of translation because the government has not seen fit to replace translators who have died or been superannuated, in consequence of which some departments have preferred to send their work to the blue book branch here. This seems rather absurd. In addition there are the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of the Secretary of State. In that department the routine work of translation in French and English is done by the ordinary staff; the only translator in the department apparently is proficient in foreign languages but is not familiar with French. This is why the hon. gentleman had to go outside his department for the translation of the speech from the throne.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it was wrong to have that translation made by anyone on the House of Commons staff; it was a mistake for the Secretary of State to ask the clerk of the house to look after that translation, for this reason: This is a constitutional matter; before the speech from the throne is delivered by His Excellency it is not a parliamentary paper. It is a document which belongs to the government, and which is supposed to be kept secret until it is read by His Excellency. Therefore it was most discourteous to His Excellency to have that speech read by a civil servant of the House of Commons before it was read by His Excellency. I regret that this happened. I know what is coming, from the smile of my hon. friend the Secretary of State—

Mr. CAHAN: No doubt the Secretary of State should be confined to the tower for that.

Mr. POULIOT: The Secretary of State may say it has been done before. I admit that, but previously it was done for $25, because the gentleman who did the work wanted that amount for doing it. This is the kind of petty graft of which I complain. Before the $25 was asked for and paid the speech from the throne was translated by the clerk of the privy council. It is a document that belongs to the privy council, and it might be properly translated by that gentleman, who has a fair knowledge of both languages. That is how it should be done. I do not say this in an offensive way to the genial Secretary of State, but I should like him to observe the old constitutional custom that the government shall keep the speech from the throne secret—I mean within the council —until it is delivered by His Excellency. There has been a good deal of criticism with regard to that faulty translation, for which the hon. gentleman cannot blame any translator of the blue book branch, because that work was delivered to him by the clerk of the House of Commons, who was responsible for it. If there had been even one mistake in that translation it should have been corrected before it was handed out.

There is one other thing which I regret very sincerely. The hon. gentleman is sufficiently familiar with the French language to know that there are even constitutional mistakes in that speech; he knows very well that it is not His Excellency who summons parliament. So I regret very much, as a member of this house, that the government has taken full responsibility for that translation, which is erroneous. I am sure that in his own heart my hon. friend regrets having done so. How can the government come here with a scheme for a bureau of translations when they took responsibility for the seventy-five mistakes that we find in the two pages of the French translation of the speech from the throne? Let us say that to the electors of St. Lawrence-St. George, the electors of Ottawa, the electors of Rivière du Loup or those of any other constituency; one should ask, "How can the government bring in a piece of legislation to preserve the rights of the French language in Canada while they take full responsibility for seventy-five mistakes in the two pages of the French translation of the speech from the throne? Where is the logic in that? It is most extraordinary. I cannot conceive how an eminent lawyer and statesman like the Secretary of State can accept such a responsibility, not only on behalf of himself but also on behalf of his colleagues in the cabinet, both English and French speaking. I am sure the hon. gentleman will reconsider his statement in that connection. Surely the government will drop that responsibility some day, but until it is done may I say how deeply I feel what he has said. There may be a clerical error, or two clerical errors, or three clerical errors, but those errors could be corrected. Who can take the responsibility for an error without being exposed as an ignoramus? The hon. gentleman is not an ignoramus; he is a most learned man. Why is he so stubborn about this matter? Why does he not drop all responsibility? He knows very well that in all the questions I have put with regard to the correspondence which passed previous to the drafting of the bill I have been as courteous and as respectful as one could be. He knows that, and he cannot deny it. I need not go over those facts; I need only say that I have too much esteem and respect for him to do anything which would not be proper in the circumstances. I have been just as fair as anyone could be, and there are things I would never have done if the hon. gentleman had not said to me, "I have no objection, personally, to your doing this." He knows that.

I am through with this part of the discussion. I should now like to show to the minister that the trouble with the translation business comes from the fact that the translators who have died or who have been superannuated have not been replaced, and that this has happened in only a small number of departments. For that reason it would be very easy to mend those stockings—yes, very easy. I turn now to a body like the Senate, an independent body—a body so independent of the House of Commons that only yesterday Mr. Chairman refused to let me read a statement which the Secretary of State had made before hon. senators. It is a body entirely separate and distinct from the House of Commons, and it has its translation of Senate debates made in the House of Commons by the parliamentary translating staff who are paid by the House of Commons. Where are we going? We have seen the near amalgamation of railways, the centralization of banks, the centralization of translators, the centralization of farming—everything in this country will be centralized. Why? There is no reason for it. Things worked well before; the Secretary of State had no complaint about the way translations were made. When we were discussing this point before the committee and I was asking some questions about the qualifications of certain witnesses, the chairman told me that we were not to study the quality of translations but that we were to consider only their production.

I come now to the famous order in council to which reference has been made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) and by the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). If I am wrong the minister will correct me when I state that the purpose of the order in council is to have the work ready on the first of July, three months after the expiration of the fiscal year, and to have all translations sent to the printing bureau right away. This is the text of this recent order in council.

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the recommendation of the Secretary of State is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that it shall be the express duty of the deputy heads of all departments of government to insist that a printer's copy of all departmental reports, complete in revised typewritten form in either the English or the French language shall be delivered to the king's printer on or before July 1, and in each and every year.

And that if this order is not complied with in respect of any annual departmental report the deputy head of that department shall communicate in writing to the Secretary of State for Canada the reasons for such delay and its probable extent so that the work of the printing bureau may be adjusted accordingly.

The king's printer came before the committee, and what figures did he give in connection with these annual reports? I have before me a statement under the heading, "Department of Public Printing and Stationery" and the subheading, "Summary by months of number of pages of copy received at the printing bureau for printed reports indicated in 'List of reports and returns to be made to House of Commons' during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934." In the month of February, during the session, the information before me shows that 103 pages in English were received. In March there were 75 pages in French. In April there were 30 pages in French, and 1,000 pages bilingual. In May there were 85 pages in English, 700 bilingual, making a total of 785 pages. This was during the session, at a time when the debates of the Senate and the House of Commons and when all papers of the house were published. Then afterwards, in June, there were 440 pages in English, and 835 bilingual, making a total of 1,275. In July—here it comes, during the summer; the printing is much higher—in July there are 1,310 pages of English, 140 of French, 865 bilingual making a total of 2,315 pages. Then the following months are indicated as follows:

	English	French	Bilingual	Total
1933—
August	597	546	1,454	2,597
September	309	343	1,130	1,782
October	460	13	1,156	1,629
November	1,095	659	875	2,629
December	...	1,381	20	1,401
1934—
January	308	790	250	1,348

That is not so bad—and these are only the annual reports of the departments. These figures indicate that after the session there were the following pages printed: In June, 1,275; in July, 2,315; in August, 2,597; in September, 1,782; in October, 1,629; in November, 2,629; in December, 1,401, and in January of 1934, 1,348. If all the work is delivered on or before July 1, there will be no work afterwards for the printers.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member is in error in one respect. A great deal of that was for departmental reports for the year previous.

Mr. POULIOT: I wonder if the Secretary of State has read the evidence of the king's printer. I am sure he has not read Mr. Patenaude's evidence before the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: I have seen the returns for four years, and I am more familiar with the matter than is Mr. Patenaude himself, who was appointed only last October.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: Well, that is pretty hard on the king's printer, because he was in the printing bureau when the hon. member was practising law in Montreal.

Mr. CAHAN: The king's printer was in the printing bureau, but in an entirely different capacity, namely that of controller of purchases.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to be unpleasant to my hon. friend the Secretary of State, and what he now says I receive in a very cool way. I must say, however, that I am more impressed by his intelligence than by his learning in printing. I think his intelligence is much greater than his knowledge of printing. I do not say that to offend him. It is simply my sincere belief.

There might have been delays in the delivery of translations, but it is very easy to have that remedied. I think the hon. gentleman is fair enough to concede—I am sure he will—that the departments in which there is the least trouble about translation are as a rule the departments in which the high officials, the deputy or his assistant, are bilingual; that in those departments the work of translation is much better and much more quickly done than in departments where the high officials are unfamiliar with both languages. That was frankly admitted by Mr. Bland in his evidence. If the hon. gentleman will read the evidence he will see that Mr. Bland time and time again admitted that in the departments where the high officials are bilingual there is no trouble about translation, and if there is any delay in the delivery of reports it comes from the fact also of the centralization of annual reports in the blue book branch. That is a great mistake.

Now I offer another suggestion to the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: Does it have reference to this bill?

Mr. POULIOT: The first one had reference to this bill, I think. If the hon. gentleman does not appreciate the work that my friend from Ottawa and myself have done it might be just as well to stop the argument right away and leave him with the whole responsibility, if he is going to adopt the attitude that was taken the other day by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who said that he did not want any reply. I hope the Secretary of State does not assume that he is infallible. If he does, it is a great mistake. When a great man admits that he can be mistaken he is all the greater for that.

Mr. CAHAN: I am anxious to see the hon. gentleman improve in stature immediately by admitting that on his own behalf. I have seen no evidence of any suggestion that his judgment was fallible.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I have to start again what I have been saying since a quarter past eight o'clock. My hon. friend has received some suggestions. They may be worthy or unworthy. I do not pretend to be infallible but I have offered the suggestion that some of the translators be transferred from the bluebook branch to departments where translators have not been replaced. That is one suggestion that I believe was quite pertinent, and I have offered it to the hon. gentleman with great pleasure.

There is another suggestion that I wish to make. Why does he not amend the printing bureau act by placing one man under the jurisdiction of the king's printer, whose duty it shall be to see that the reports, not only annual reports but the whole translation business, is divided up and delivered at such times that the printing bureau can work all the time?

Mr. CAHAN: That is just what we are taking authority to do by this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: No, no. The aim of this bill is to synchronize the translations, which is absurd; it cannot work. But what is necessary is to give assistance to the king's printer who has charge of the printing for all the departments. Instead of passing an order in council like the one to which reference has been made, why does not the Secretary of State amend the printing bureau act in order that the king's printer shall have an assistant who will regulate the delivery of translations? That could very easily be done.

Mr. CAHAN: Under the Public Printing and Stationery Act the king's printer can have all the assistance he requires. There is no difficulty; he has all the assistance he requires.

Mr. POULIOT: Then what is the necessity for this bill?

Mr. CAHAN: To provide for the translation. He is not a translator.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it to improve the quality of translation?

Mr. CAHAN: That is possibly one phase of it, but only one phase.

Mr. POULIOT: Leaving that aside for the moment, I will ask the hon. gentleman one question. Is not the only purpose of this bill the regulating of the delivery of translations?

Mr. CAHAN: Not only in regard to the regulation of delivery but the improvement of the translation services generally, putting them under a responsible minister of the crown whose duty will be to answer to the government and to parliament in respect of those services. At the present time there is no control over a large body of these translators.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the translators stay where they are now or will they all be put together in one bureau?

Mr. CAHAN: They may be members of one bureau, and yet different members may occupy different rooms in this building or some other building where some of them may be located. At the present time, the treasury department has what you might call an accounting branch of that department but its employees are not only to be found in one building but in several buildings.

Mr. POULIOT: There is a great difference between accounting and translating.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman has said that they are different sciences.

Mr. POULIOT: I have not said it yet.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh yes, I have heard it several times. I heard it four or five times when we were discussing the second reading.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not speak on the second reading.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. BOUCHARD: As this bill is liable to change the status of the parliamentary translators, will the minister see that the same guarantees are made as were given previously under section 62 of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. CAHAN: What is that section?

Mr. BOUCHARD: It reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be held to curtail the privileges enjoyed by the officers, clerks and employees of the Senate, House of Commons or Library of Parliament with respect to rank and precedent, attendance, office hours, or leave of absence, or with respect to engaging in such employment during parliamentary recess as may entitle them to receive extra salary or remuneration.

I have in my hand a list of the civil servants who enjoy parliamentary privileges. In the Senate there is the committee and the general branch, as well as the debates. In the House of Commons we have the law branch, the journals branch, the parliamentary papers branch, the private legislation branch, the debates branch, the members' stenographers branch and so on. I shall not read all the list but I ask the minister if the translators are to be the only ones to be deprived of the privileges which have been enjoyed so far? Are other branches, such as the debates reporters and so on, to be left with these privileges?

Mr. CAHAN: The employees now employed in the translation service will come under the Civil Service Act and be amenable to that act throughout the year, subject to such holidays as may be recommended by the civil service commission in view of any special or onerous services which they may have to render while parliament is in session. The other branches are not the subject matter of this bill but in order to bring about the effective performance of services by the branches referred to by the hon. gentleman some provision may be made with regard to them. This bill deals with translators and I cannot promise what other changes may be suggested by the government at some future date.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, can the exhibits which were filed with the committee be read in this debate?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Nothing can be read that is not relevant.

Mr. POULIOT: I mean the exhibits which were tabled in the civil service committee when this bill was before it, referring particularly to those filed by the king's printer?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Nothing can be read that is not relevant to clause 3.

Mr. POULIOT: The exhibits must have been relevant.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Not necessarily. Some may be relevant to one clause, some to another and some to no clause.

Mr. POULIOT: This is in connection with the bureau of translations. I just want to read the following letter:

Auditor General
Ottawa, October 2, 1930.

Dear Sir:

Salary Increase to Mr. Sherwood,
Chief Accountant

I am in receipt of your letter of the 29th ult. in which you state in reference to my letter of the 26th ult. regarding increase of Mr. Sherwood's salary as Chief Accountant, House of Commons, to $4,000 approved by the Internal Economy Commission, that the decisions of the Commission are not subjects of reference to the Treasury Board.

Obviously you have misinterpreted the last paragraph of my letter of September 26th last respecting a reference to the Treasury Board.

I had no intention of conveying to you that I would be obliged to refer the decision of the Board of Internal Economy in the case of the salary increase to Mr. Sherwood to the Treasury Board.

The reference to the Treasury Board which I mentioned was, as I pointed out, to be made under Section 41 of Sub-section 2 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act in which the Auditor General is directed to report to the Treasury Board any case in which a sub-accountant has expended money out of the proceeds of any accountable credit beyond the amount for which there is legislative authority.

The payment to Mr. Sherwood of a salary at the rate of $4,000 a year comes within this statutory direction, as the only legislative authority governing Mr. Sherwood's salary, that I am aware of, is contained in a recommendation of the Civil Service Commission approved by resolution of the House of Commons May 11, 1928, in which the Compensation rate is given as $2,700, $2,820, $2,940, $3,060 and $3,120.

I presume you will not contend that the Internal Economy Commission has power to override a salary rate so established even in anticipation of a probable revision by the House of Commons favouring the action of the Commission.

I do not conceive it my duty to question the "rights, privileges and immunities of Parliament" and there was no intention or desire to do so in my letter of the 26th ult., but when a clear case of the violation of Section 41 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act comes before me I regard it my duty to observe the direction therein provided.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) Geo. Gonthier,
Auditor General.

A. Beauchesne, Esq.,
Clerk of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

And the answer is as follows:

House of Commons
Ottawa, October 4, 1930.

Dear Sir:

In reply to your letter of the 2nd instant, I beg to say that subsection 2, section 41 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act does not apply to payments made by the House of Commons. With the exception of section 35, as I pointed out in my letter of the 29th ultimo, no part of that statute has the remotest application to moneys voted for the expenses of parliament.

We would be quite justified in not allowing you to audit our accounts. The resolution giving you that authority was sessional and not permanent, and it lapsed at prorogation. You are now "permitted" by our Commissioners of Internal Economy to make this audit, but you certainly exceed your rights when you claim that you can report our payments to the Treasury Board which has no jurisdiction over the expenses of parliament.

Your action in following such a course after you have been notified—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Might I ask the hon. member from what he is reading?

Mr. POULIOT: From a letter which was tabled in the committee by the king's printer.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Dealing with what?

Mr. POULIOT: Dealing with the rights of the House of Commons with regard to the treasury board.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That is not relevant to section 3.

Mr. POULIOT: It is one of the exhibits. Can we not read the exhibits filed by the king's printer? The exhibits filed looked like a haystack.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): All that can be read is something that is relevant to clause 3 of this bill. Otherwise the hon. member could read every exhibit and every piece of evidence that was given.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not going to do that because it would be most boring to you and to the committee. I have only seven more lines to read and then I will be through. I shall not read any more exhibits which were filed by the king's printer. The letter continues:

Your action in following such a course after you have been notified that the Commissioners of Internal Economy have passed on a certain matter is tantamount to denying their authority and placing them under the authority of the Treasury Board, and you are thereby questioning the rights, privileges and immunities of parliament.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) Arthur Beauchesne,
Clerk of the House of Commons.

Geo. Gonthier, Esq.,
Auditor General,
Ottawa, Ontario.

I shall now give the story of this exhibit. It is not mine; it belongs to the committee and I will give it back to the committee. I am sorry the acting chairman is not here this evening. The photostat copies which were filed looked like a haystack; I thought it was August and that a farmer was coming in with a load of hay. When I saw this one I was a little curious and I started to peel the banana. Underneath these two letters—I have read the last one—I found this one which passed between Mr. Georges Gonthier and Mr. Beauchesne. These letters are marked in white.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Will the hon. member keep to clause 3 of the bill? He is quite out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not and I shall explain why. There was a waste of money and this is what we complain of. Even in the exhibits which have been filed by the committee we find an extravagant waste of money in typesetting done for nothing because afterwards—

Mr. CAHAN: Let me call attention to the fact that apparently those so-called exhibits, so far as I can see from this side of the house, were exhibits of bad translation and of corrections made in the galley proofs of those exhibits, the contents of which have no reference whatever to this or any other matter before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not insist on that; I am through with it, but I wanted just to show that even the pure can make mistakes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member does not need to discuss that under clause 3 of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not insisting.

Mr. GAGNON: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman ought not to have read those letters because they do not deal with the subject matter under discussion. Moreover, the hon. gentleman has read a letter supposed to be written by the clerk of the house. I do not know the hon. gentleman's purpose, but surely he has attempted to cast a reflection on the clerk of the house, a gentleman who ought by all means to be kept out of the debate. If, sir, you had understood the French language, what the hon. member read in French, you would have ruled the letter out of order, and I humbly ask you so to rule.

Mr. POULIOT: What can be done about the past? It is done; we cannot change it. I did not do this, sir, to play a trick on you; I wanted only to show the committee what kind of exhibits we had and why there is a waste of money at the printing bureau; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I must ask the hon. member to confine himself exclusively to clause 3.

Mr. CAHAN: As the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) has said, this quotation which the hon. gentleman has made from the contents of documents which have no relation to the printing bureau and no relation to any subject under discussion should be struck out of the report of this debate. It is becoming intolerable that hour by hour this irrelevant discussion should be proceeding at a cost of more than a thousand dollars an hour.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It costs $1,500 an hour to run this house of assembly.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): We know it is costing that much and only nine members of the official opposition are in the chamber at the present time.

Mr. POULIOT: I say this once and for all to the Secretary of State: I am ready to discuss matters with him but I shall stand for no lectures from him. Moreover, the cat came out of the bag when the hon. member for Dorchester spoke.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the hon. member is going to speak further, will he confine himself to clause 3 of the bill, or I must ask him to take his seat.

Mr. POULIOT: I was saying just a moment ago that the House of Commons and the Senate are two independent bodies. You will admit that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That has nothing to do with clause 3 of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes it has and I will tell you why. It has because downstairs we are doing the work of the Senate in regard to translation. I think it has something to do with the bill. It means that someone, I do not know who, has taken the responsibility of putting the bill into force before it is passed. As a member of parliament who has made some study of parliamentary rights and British customs I complain about the infringement on the old traditions; they are completely disregarded.

Mr. DUPRE: Will the hon. member permit me a remark? The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) said this afternoon, I think, that this order in council could have been passed without any bill at all; therefore there is no infringement.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not say that. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. I did not say that the order in council could have been passed without this bill. I said that if the order in council has been passed when it should have been passed there would have been no necessity for this bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: If one more member says "carried", the discussion will last until Monday or Tuesday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right.

Mr. QUINN: At $25 a minute.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a question of that; it is a question of knowing whether we are to change the whole translation business to give the clerk of the house more superannuation than he otherwise would have, a higher salary than he is now receiving. Is it not true that the whole thing has been started by Arthur Beauchesne, the clerk of the house, and that he has made the memorandum on which the bill is based in order that he may have a higher salary?

Mr. CAHAN: I utterly deny that statement, and the clerk of the house should be protected here instead of being criticized ungenerously and in a discourteous way. He did not originate this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Did he not draft a memorandum on which this bill is based and was he not the first to write to the government in February of last year to ask it to investigate the matter?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member cannot raise that point on this clause. The principle of the bill was adopted by the house on the second reading. These are all matters that have to do with the principle of the bill and while the hon. member may feel very strongly against the principle, it is now beyond his power to attack it.

Mr. POULIOT: But we might come to an agreement. If the Secretary of State refuses to pay attention to what I have said so far, may I appeal to him as a lawyer of high standing? It may take me twenty-five minutes, and afterwards I shall have very little to say on the bill. I would like to point out to him some of the statutes concerning the various departments and their constitution. I took the trouble to go through them and if he agrees to give me a last opportunity to appeal to his legal sense and constitutional knowledge, the committee will afterwards have a chance to vote on the amendment.

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose I cannot object if the hon. gentleman wishes to read the revised statutes, but it would perhaps be more interesting to us if he would read the bible or some romance. To read the revised statutes relating to the constitution of some eighteen or twenty departments is altogether irrelevant to the question before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I maintain, sir, that it is relevant, and I wish to inform the hon. gentleman, even if he refuses to be informed, that in virtue of our laws the only authority in the department is the minister, and the one who comes after him and who has delegated authority by this house is his deputy or the assistant deputy. But they both come under the jurisdiction of the minister, as the hon. gentleman should know.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not quite as ignorant of the revised statutes as the hon. gentleman would imply.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sure the minister has known them, but he must have forgotten something since he has sponsored this bill. In each department the minister is the head; he has authority in his department and is responsible to the House of Commons. There can be no dual authority; that is absurd, and the hon. gentleman knows it. When we asked Mr. Bland in committee: Suppose translator A is in such a department; the deputy minister of that department rings for him, and at the same time the superintendent of translation rings for him, whom shall he obey? "It is a very embarrassing dilemma." That was his answer; he could not answer that dilemma any more than the hon. gentleman can answer the dilemma I put to him Wednesday with regard to Mr. Potvin of the civil service commission. There will be that conflict of authority in every department if this translation bureau comes into existence.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I call the hon. member's attention again to the fact that the principle of the bureau of translation has been established by the house, and that he must confine himself to the particulars of clause 3; otherwise I shall have to fall back on standing order 40, section 2, which gives the chairman of the committee power to tell him to take his seat.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry I have not my hat here, because I would take my hat too.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): There is an amendment proposed by Mr. Chevrier:

That clause 3 be amended by striking out after the word "service" in line 18 the words "and both houses of the parliament of Canada." And further, by striking out in line 24 the words "debates, bills, acts, proceedings."

Mr. CAHAN: We cannot accept that amendment.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Before the section carries as it stands I want to move another amendment. May I say to the committee that although I have a certain number of amendments it is far from my intention to speak at length on each of them, as apparently they will be defeated as quickly as I can move them. I shall, therefore, make no long speech in presenting them. But may I say in answer to the hon. gentleman who interrupted a moment ago that if on this side of the house there are but nine members of the official opposition and some thirty-three on the other side, on this side it is not quantity but quality.

Mr. DUPRE: How modest: First prize for modesty.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Therefore it takes only nine of us to look after thirty-three on the government side. I move now:

That the following be added as subclause 3 to clause 3:
All departmental reports and other documents or statements which it is the duty of any officer or department of the government to lay on the table of the House of Commons shall be issued and printed in the two official languages of the dominion and shall be deposited simultaneously.

The amendment speaks for itself.

Mr. CAHAN: That adds nothing to the bill. It deals with the publication of departmental reports, not with the question of a translation bureau. We have by order in council provided that these reports shall be prepared, and now we are only waiting to have a bureau created which will see to the translation of them, and be responsible not only for the translation but for the printing.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the question is put—

Mr. BOWMAN: On a point of order, surely the proposed amendment is not an amendment to the clause before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It is not an amendment; it is a proposal to add a new subclause, which in my opinion has nothing to do with the bill. The bill is for the setting up of translation machinery, whereas the subclause purports to enact a regulation which will be binding on the department as to the form in which its reports are to be issued. I hold that the amendment is not a proper part of the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: That makes no difference; as long as it is offered I think it is your duty to submit it.

Mr. BOWMAN: Speaking to the question before the committee I submit that the amendment is not in order because it has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: That makes no difference.

Mr. BOWMAN: I ask the chairman to rule it out of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May we hear from some of the Quebec members on this subject?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It has been called to my attention that there is a rule that no new clause can be added to a bill until the whole bill has been passed by the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is not a new clause, it is a subclause.

Mr. BOWMAN: Once more, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I know where the shoe pinches; I can see the opposition.

Mr. BOWMAN: That is the exact purpose of the introduction of the amendment. I submit that the amendment has nothing to do with the bill or the principle of the bill; it is an entirely extraneous matter, and I therefore ask that it be ruled out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the number of the regulation on which you are going to rule?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It is rule 778 found on page 223 of Beauchesne:

In the commons all the clauses of the bill are considered before any new clauses are brought up and added to the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But this is not a new clause; it is a subclause.

Mr. VENIOT: Read on.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury):

But this practice is not rigorously followed and the committee is generally guided by what is most convenient in each particular case.

Mr. POULIOT: Who is the author who says that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to a point of order, the only book that should be referred to is the standing orders of the House of Commons. In that book by Beauchesne there are quotations from May and English authors which are absolutely irrelevant. I hear a mumbling now; it disturbs me, when I am addressing the chair, to have the clerk of the house mumbling to the chairman. What I have to say is very simple. Beauchesne's book is very deceiving; he quotes English authors as well as Bourinot, and he gives too much importance to May even when May comes in conflict with the regulations of this house. Very often I have noticed that the information given by the clerk of the house is absolutely erroneous.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Is he a saint? Am I committing blasphemy?

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to direct your attention, Mr. Chairman, to rule 781, which states:

An amendment must be relevant both to the subject matter of the bill and the clause to which it relates.

Further it states:

—it must not be beyond the scope of the bill—

I suggest that this amendment is clearly out of order under that rule.

Mr. POULIOT: This is not a rule of the house. I know how it is done, with scissors, pepper and glue; that book is only a compendium of clippings. The book itself is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the hon. gentleman will allow me—

Mr. POULIOT: And the author of it is a perfect—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Paragraph 778, which I read, is from May—

Mr. POULIOT: That is exactly the point.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Will the hon. gentleman restrain himself and keep order?

Mr. POULIOT: You confirm what I say; it is May, not a Canadian authority or a regulation of the house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When the chairman is delivering his judgment on a point of order hon. members should keep quiet.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): My ruling is that the subclause is not relevant to section 3 or to the bill, which deals with a bureau of translations. Shall section 3 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is quantity against quality.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 4—officers and employees may be transferred.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I want to move—

Some hon. MEMBERS: This is quality.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am trying to be as nice as possible. I may be uncouth in my own way, but I can match anyone on the other side if they give me the start. I am a poor starter but a mighty good follower. I now move that section 4 be amended by striking out, immediately after the word "service" in the third line, the words "including all employees of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada"; and further by striking out immediately after the word "documents" in the sixth line the words "debates, bills, acts, proceedings"; and further, by striking out immediately after the word "correspondence" in the seventh line thereof the words "including the translation into either the English or French language of the debates and proceedings of the Senate and House of Commons." I do this in a last, evidently futile, endeavour to save the remnants that it may be possible to save in this bill of the rights and prerogatives of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Mr. CAHAN: These amendments are exactly similar in terms to the amendment just rejected by the committee, if I followed the hon. gentleman correctly. Therefore I would simply say that it is the same motion over again and cannot be accepted.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let the chairman rule.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That was my impression when I heard the amendment, that it was simply a repetition of the amendment proposed to section 3, which was rejected.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do this because I am in the court of appeal at the present time; I expect that this bill will go to the high tribunal, and I am laying a foundation for a better judgment.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Before the section carries I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that section 4 be amended by adding at the end of subsection 1 thereof the following:

But nothing in this act shall be held to affect the present status of the translators of debates, acts, bills or proceedings of the Senate or the House of Commons.

Mr. CAHAN: We cannot accept this amendment, because the object of the bill would be entirely defeated if the amendment were accepted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): In my opinion the fact that the committee has rejected the first amendment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Vote on it.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have a further amendment to offer to section 4. This is a matter of legislation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If hon. gentlemen will only listen I think we will get along much faster. Do not let anyone on the other side try to put sand under my sleigh or chains on my wheels, because that will not work. I am not one of those who can be intimidated. I now move that section 4 be further amended, because evidently this has been left in the hands of some expert draftsman who knows all about the various laws and statutes that this bill will prejudicially affect. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscouata, that section 4 be further amended by adding immediately after the last word in subsection 2 thereof the following:

Subject, however, to the provisions of section 50, the Civil Service Act, 1918, and also subject to section 21, the House of Commons Act, chapter 145, R.S.C., 1927, and to section 2 (c) of the Superannuation Act, 1924.

For the enlightenment of those who know nothing about this but who are prepared blindly to vote down the amendment I should like to explain the matter. The Civil Service Act clearly states that no employee shall be transferred from a position in one department or portion of the civil service to a position in another department or portion of the civil service, except upon the request of the respective deputy heads. Section 4 of this bill says that from time to time the minister may designate translators and have them transferred from one branch of the service to another.

Mr. GAGNON: What section is that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 50 of the Civil Service Act, which is chapter 12 of the statutes of 1918. This section of this bill is also in contravention of section 21 of the House of Commons Act, chapter 145 of the revised statutes of 1927. Section 21 provides:

If any complaint or representation is at any time made to the Speaker for the time being of the misconduct or unfitness—

I point out to the committee that if the superintendent of translations is to be the man in charge of translations, in the last analysis he will be the one who will pass upon the fitness or unfitness of any clerk, and a translator is a clerk.

—of any clerk, officer, messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons, the Speaker may cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person.

2. If thereupon it appears to the Speaker that such person—

A translator—

—has been guilty of misconduct, or is unfit to hold his situation, the Speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger or other person has been appointed by the crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the governor general, and if he has not been appointed by the crown, suspend or remove him.

Now then, if you turn this over to the superintendent appointed under the Civil Service Act you immediately transfer it from under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker, and I say that you cannot do it.

Mr. VENIOT: Not without amending the act.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924, section 2 (c), is as follows:

"Civil service" means and includes the several positions in or under any department, branch or portion of the executive government of Canada and, for the purposes of this act, the Senate, House of Commons and library of parliament, but saving all rights and privileges of either house in respect of the control or removal of its officers, clerks and employees;

And so on. I say that this clause of the bill is in absolute violation of three sections of the existing law. If now in this blind and stubborn way this bill has got to pass, at least these sections should be respected, and I move accordingly.

Mr. CAHAN: This bill provides for the creation of a new bureau, and parliament by passing the bill will create a new bureau under the Civil Service Act, to which all relative clauses of the Civil Service Act will apply. That provision is made in the bill. The last phrase in section 4 of the bill reads, "—and such officers and employees shall thereafter be subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act."

Mr. CHEVRIER: But may I point out, with all due deference to the legal knowledge, training, perspicacity and acumen, politically and otherwise, of the minister, that the Civil Service Act has nothing to do with this special provision.

Mr. CAHAN: Because we are taking away that special privilege which gives six months' holidays on full pay to certain of the civil servants, a privilege which no others enjoy.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I ask the minister why he penalizes only one class of employees in the House of Commons?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is bad enough to penalize one class; I do not wish to have others dragged in.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The minister is penalizing one class, and seems to be proud of it. If he counts the hours that the translators spend at their work, the days and nights, he would find their holidays are perhaps not more than one month more than the ordinary holidays in the civil service.

Mr. CAHAN: They will certainly enjoy less exhaustive hours under the regime proposed by this bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I suggest that the words "enjoy less exhaustive hours" are not quite right. I do not know anyone who enjoys "exhaustive hours" —"suffers" would seem to be the word.

Mr. GAGNON: I do not think the hon. member for Kamouraska is quite right. I am in agreement with him when he states that the translators who work under heavy pressure perform a very difficult task, and under those circumstances ought to have their vacations. But I do not think, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to pass a special amendment to the act, because if the hon. member will read section 62 of the Civil Service Act he will see that civil servants are fully protected so far as their vacations are concerned. This section reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be held to curtail the privileges enjoyed by the officers, clerks and employees of the Senate, House of Commons or library of parliament, with respect to rank and precedence, attendance, office hours or leave of absence, or with respect to engaging in such employment during parliamentary recess as may entitle them to receive extra salary or remuneration.

I have just heard the Secretary of State say that under this new bill all the translators who will be under the jurisdiction of the bureau for translations will remain civil servants and thereby will remain under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Act. Had not the minister said so, I should have certainly agreed that section 62 of the Civil Service Act ought to remain in full application.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I am glad the hon member understood the minister to give that answer. I put the question an hour ago and I have not yet received an answer.

Mr. CAHAN: I simply say that under the Civil Service Act the civil service commission, after examination and investigation, recommends the extent of the holidays or vacations which shall be enjoyed by the civil servants. I stated to the committee that the civil service commission on my recommendation, if I were the minister, would recommend with respect to those employees doing translations during the session that they have ample privileges of vacation following the session, at which times their exhausted energies might be restored.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I quite agree, and sincerely and honestly I believe I should be prepared to accept the word of the minister that he would make such recommendation. But I am one of those people who believe that words fly but writings remain. The minister may be full of good intentions today, but I would much rather see it in the statute. Further than that, as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) has suggested to me, there is a certain place where it is very warm and which they say is paved with good intentions. I am afraid that under this bill that is the way the translators will be going. If this bill comes into effect there will not be a single section of any law behind the civil service—superannuation, House of Commons, or any law respecting civil servants who may be engaged in translation work, which will be respected. Of course the minister will do anything he likes with it. He may just tear it up, from one corner of the book to the other. And as for section 62, to which the hon. member for Kamouraska referred, and in which because of the supposed answer given by the Secretary of State the hon. member for Dorchester found solace—well, that is all piffle. The law to-day is that these people have certain rights and privileges, and the minister states that if this bill goes through they will come under the operation of the Civil Service Act. Undoubtedly they will, but that is not the answer. The hon. member for Dorchester has shed tears on the second reading, and he now gets up and sheds more tears for these poor translators. He wants to do all he can for them, but he says he has no fear now, after what the Secretary of State has said, because they will be under the civil service commission and therefore they will get their holidays. But they will get no more holidays than the Civil Service Act allows them, and unless the minister changes the law they will be entitled to only three weeks a year.

An hon. MEMBER: How many do you want?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is the fact, notwithstanding the good intentions of the minister. He cannot lead me to believe that because he expresses these pious wishes he means anything more than what I have said.

Amendment (Mr. Chevrier) negatived.

Mr. CAHAN: The amendment is defeated; shall we carry the section?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): All in favour of section 4 as it appears—

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Appointment and duties of superintendent of bureau.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This section cannot carry in its present shape. I move that the following be added after the word "translations" in line 21 it refers to the superintendent of the bureau:

—who shall be thoroughly conversant with the two official languages of the Dominion of Canada and who shall be the holder of degrees conferred upon him by one or more Canadian universities.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the amendment is carried may I say, Mr. Chairman, that it does not go far enough because the superintendent of the bureau should not only be familiar with the two official languages of this country but should be familiar also with Danish, Dutch, Flemish, German, Italian, Latin, Norwegian, Portugese, Spanish and Swedish. And that is not all. These are the languages that are translated in the office of the Secretary of State. But in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there are other languages to be translated. There is not only German but Esperanto, a very great language; also Russian, Ukrainian, Polish, Czechoslovakian, Yugoslavian, Bulgarian, Croatian, Yiddish and Hebrew. The Russian language is also translated in the Post Office Department. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the superintendent of the bureau for translations should not only be thoroughly familiar with the two official languages in this country but be familiar with all these other languages I have mentioned in order to be able to check the work that is done by the translators. Not only that, but he should have several eyes, certainly more than two, perhaps more than a dozen, perhaps even a hundred eyes, in order to compare the translated matter with the text. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the quantity of publications that comes out of the mouth of the bureau each year represents in bulk ten cubic feet. Let us be generous and say nine cubic feet of all sorts of publications.

Mr. MYERS: What has that got to do with it? We have listened to enough of that stuff.

Mr. POULIOT: It shows the absurdity of the scheme. My hon. friend could not digest nine cubic feet of printed matter; therefore I shall not address my remarks to him but to the other members of the house who will at once see the absurdity of the proposition. Here we have a mass of printed matter so large that my arms are not long enough to show its width or depth in height.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. QUINN: It must be the Hansard of your speeches.

Mr. POULIOT: But there is something in my speeches; that is the difference between my hon. friend and me. Here we have this mass of nine cubic feet of printed matter representing tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of pages. How could one man with only two eyes read all that when we allow him eight hours for sleeping and perhaps two or three hours for eating and walking around a little in the daytime? Even if he works thirteen hours a day no ordinary man with two eyes could read nine cubic feet of printed matter in the time at his disposal.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member is not speaking to the clause or the amendment. Both clause and amendment propose that there shall be such a man, and the amendment moved by the senior member for Ottawa proposes that he shall have certain qualifications. The hon. member for Temiscouata is not speaking to either the clause or the amendment; he is speaking to another proposition.

Mr. POULIOT: On a point of order, on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the first thing proposed by the senior member for Ottawa is that the superintendent shall be fully conversant with both official languages. I say that his amendment does not go far enough because he should also be conversant with all the other languages that I have mentioned. If the chairman will not allow me to show before this amendment is voted on the amount of work which the superintendent will have to do, I shall have to defer my remarks until after the vote. I am making them now in order not to be under the necessity of making them afterwards. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that my remarks are perfectly relevant to the amendment because the superintendent will have to read not only the French text but also the English text and compare them both; and how can a man compare the English and French texts of all the publications that come out for each department on a wide variety of subjects, not only all the annual reports but all the weekly publications and all the monthly publications? It is absurd to expect the superintendent to read this nine cubic feet of printed matter in the French translation, and if he compares the French with the English version it will mean that he will have to read eighteen cubic feet of matter and compare them. How he can do all that is beyond my understanding.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman. It is obvious that the superintendent of the translation bureau must be familiar with both official languages of this country, and so far as I am concerned I can give a guarantee that no man will be appointed to that position who does not have knowledge of both official languages. The civil service commission that appointed any other man would be untrue to its oath of office. The regulations which are to be made hereunder will certainly provide that the superintendent must be bilingual in one sense, but I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman further and guarantee that he will know German, Italian, Swedish, Chinese, Japanese, Yiddish and all the other languages mentioned by the hon. gentleman. The suggestion to that effect is utterly ridiculous and not worthy of the consideration of the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Again we have the promise, the assurance of the minister. Now if the minister is prepared to help out a friend he does not simply say, I will help you some day, or, I will sign a promissory note. Why not come across with the cold cash? Why not put it in writing? Why not put it in this bill?

Mr. CAHAN: Simply because to do so is an insult to the intelligence of this house. We do not put in the printing and stationery act that the superintendent shall know both languages, and yet no civil service commission would dare appoint a superintendent of printing, dealing with the printing of both languages, who did not have a knowledge of both languages which is absolutely necessary. One of the essential qualifications for this position is necessarily a knowledge of both languages.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would rather be insulted by the written word of the minister than by his courteous promise.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just one question to ask the Secretary of State.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Hurry up.

Mr. POULIOT: I hear the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) telling me to hurry up.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I stand with my minister on that.

Mr. POULIOT: The fact that he is in favour of this bill makes me more fearful about it because we know what his attitude is towards the French speaking people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): If the hon. member would stop this horrible burlesque, this circus, and let us get through, things would be better. We are here for business and not for this kind of nonsense.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member is for the bill, then I am against it. I am not obstructing this bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No!

Mr. POULIOT: I hear an echo from the other side. Would the Secretary of State be kind enough to inform the committee just what will be the duties of the superintendent? Is he to check the translation work in every department?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think I need answer any such silly question as that. This will be an organization of which the superintendent will be the executive head. He must have a knowledge of both languages and he will have under him employees to carry out the different duties. I am the head of my department but it is not necessary for me to read the thousands of letters which come into the department.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his answer. I see the whole scheme; there will be no change, everything will still be under the control of those who now have control. On top of it all will be a fat job for a man who will put his feet up on his desk and put a big cigar in his mouth. This man will be paid a large salary at the expense of the poor people who have suffered a cut of ten per cent. This man who will do nothing will receive a high salary at the expense of all.

Amendment (Mr. Chevrier) negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Appointment and duties of superintendent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am rather anxious to safeguard the rights and prerogatives of the House of Commons, although other hon. members may not be. I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) that the following words "and to the Speakers of both Houses of Parliament with regard to the translation done for the Senate and House of Commons be added after the word "year" in line 26. This section reads:

An officer to be called the superintendent of the bureau for translations shall be appointed under the Civil Service Act, who shall hold office during pleasure, and whose duties shall be to supervise and control the bureau under the direction of the minister, and to report annually to the minister with regard to the work of the bureau during the preceding fiscal year.

With my amendment, he would report also to the House of Commons and to the Senate in connection with the translation pertaining to those houses.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot agree to this amendmen, which is that the superintendent should report to the House of Commons over the head of his minister. It is the duty of the minister to see that these reports are laid on the tables of both houses, and the minister will do that. I will not be a minister in charge of a bureau of my department whence a report is made over my head by a superintendent of the bureau.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amendment refers only to the translation work of the House of Commons and the Senate. I think that is fair.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister will report to parliament regarding the whole work.

Amendment (Mr. Chevrier) negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Regulations.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I beg to move that the following be added as subclause (3):

No such regulations with respect to the translators engaged in work required by the Senate or House of Commons shall come in force unless approved of by the Senate and House of Commons.

This section reads:

(1) The minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may make all regulations which are by him deemed necessary or expedient for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

(2) Any such regulation so approved by the governor in council in pursuance of this act shall be of the same force and effect as if it had been enacted herein.

Then my amendment would follow as subclause 3. I might point out that by its complacent manner and because of some feeling of friendship, the house is divesting itself of some of its most sacred rights and privileges. Hon. members on the government side are doing this simply to allow this bill to go through holus bolus. I have never before seen such a demonstration of complacency and willingness to be divested of rights and privileges. We on this side have sat true but hon. members opposite have complacently agreed to divest themselves of the rights and prerogatives hitherto enjoyed. Because of this complacency and this desire to have this bill go through, the day will come when members of parliament and senators will have no more rights and privileges than the man on the street. I know the answer that will be made, the one which has been made time and again by hon. members opposite. They will say that the men who heat this building are in the Public Works department, that the elevator men are in the Public Works department and that the charwomen are in the Public Works department. That is true, but does that make things any better? It may be very well for this to be done with certain classes of work but when it comes to translation and to looking after the acts of parliament, the debates and the votes and proceedings, we are going one step too far. I say to my compatriots from the province of Quebec: The day will come when they will repent of having voted away some of the rights and privileges enjoyed under section 133 of the British North America Act. That section states that the acts of parliament, the votes and proceedings and the records of this house shall be printed both in English and in French. Hon. members are permitting certain things to be taken away from under the jurisdiction of the Speaker, of the clerk and of every hon. member of this house. Complacently, benignantly and with great accommodation they have allowed these rights to be taken away from this parliament.

Mr. GAGNON: I rise to a point of order. Ever since this afternoon the hon. member has been persistently insulting hon. members from Quebec by stating that they were complacently voting for the ministry.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There has been no opposition.

Mr. GAGNON: The hon. gentleman added a few minutes ago "purely for political recommendations."

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, I said "accommodation."

Mr. GAGNON: Well, that is worse. I submit that those words are unparliamentary because they impute motives of cowardice to the Quebec members on this side, and I ask that the hon. gentleman be requested to withdraw those words.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. member thinks I have imputed cowardice, that is not the meaning of the word I used. I know the English language if he does not, and the word does not mean that. It means exactly what "accommodating" means, and it does not imply any cowardice. If the hon. member thinks that is what I had in mind, then he is wrong because I did not have that in mind at all. "Accommodating" means something else and if he does not know what it means, let him go back to Oxford and learn. As the poet says of a little learning:

> Where shallow draughts intoxicate the brain
> But drinking deeply sobers us again.

Mr. GAGNON: The hon. gentleman has more experience than I have about drinking.

Amendment (Mr. Chevrier) negatived.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to on division.

On section 7—Oaths.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Clause 7 refers to a special oath that the translators must take. Every man or woman who enters the civil service has to take an oath of office. The employee takes an oath of allegiance and it is in force during the time of employment. I say that the oath prescribed in clause 7 is a direct insult to the integrity and the loyalty of the civil servant who enters the service and takes the oath of loyalty. Now he is called upon to take this very special oath. I move that the clause be deleted.

Mr. CAHAN: Every civil servant has to take a special oath.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister knows better than that.

Mr. CAHAN: If this clause is struck out, then the governor in council has the right under the law of the land to impose the form of oath and the same form will be imposed over again. But time and time again during this debate it has been suggested that a bureau for translations could not be relied upon to keep secret the official secrets which came into its hands. If I remember correctly the same suggestion was made with regard to the bureau of Public Printing and Stationery. That was one of the first arguments and we have met it by placing in this bill the form of oath to be taken. Those who are in the bureau for translations at least will be under the compunction of their conscience if they allow information to leak out.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Before you reach clause 8, sir, I want to move that the following be added as section 7 (a):

> In the case of officers, clerks and employees, who at the date of transfer to the bureau, were officers, clerks and employees of the civil service of Canada, the salaries to be paid to such officers, clerks and employees so transferred to such bureau, shall be at rates not less than the rates which such officers, clerks and employees were receiving in their former position.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot accept the amendment because these employees enter the civil service and under the Civil Service Act as employees of the bureau for translations at the same salaries as they now have. Adjustments will be made afterwards from time to time.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Before you proceed to clause 8, which is the clause dealing with the date upon which this legislation shall come into force, you ruled that an amendment that I had moved as subclause 3 of clause 3 was not in order and that I would have to wait until the bill had been considered in order that I might move it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I understood that with the consent of the committee it was subsequently put. Every amendment that was brought before the chair has been put and lost.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I agree, provided Hansard shows that, but I now want to make it absolutely certain; I do not wish to be prejudiced, but I should like to see it in Hansard to-morrow. My understanding was that your ruling was that my amendment was out of order because it was not a material part of the clause and that I should have to wait until the bill had been disposed of.

Mr. BOWMAN: I think the hon. member is quite right. The clause was ruled out of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It was ruled out of order because it was not brought up at the proper time.

Mr. CAHAN: Because it was utterly irrelevant to the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: For the time being.

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I now move it, and the committee can rule it out of order again, because it seems that everything has to be ruled out of order. In order that there may be no mistake about the matter, there is an expression of opinion I want to see in this measure. I now move that there be added as section 7 (a):

That all departmental reports—

This would be the amendment which I left with you, sir, some time ago.

—and other documents or statements which it is the duty of any officer or department of the government to lay on the table of the House of Commons shall be issued and printed in the two official languages of the dominion, and shall be deposited simultaneously.

That is the last amendment I have to submit; it is the last cartridge out of the last trench. But I do that as a last hope of providing a safeguard, of having something in writing that will somewhat ease the feelings and the minds of those who feel that it is much better to be insulted by the written word of the minister than to take his gratuitous promises.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): May I ask the hon. member for his amendment in writing? Every amendment here is endorsed by the clerk "lost on division." My recollection is that every amendment was put.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Put it again to save time.

Mr. BOWMAN: The amendment just read by the hon. member was ruled out of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Because it did not come at the proper time. Now is the proper time and I submit it again.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I call attention to rule 778 on page 223 of Beauchesne. It was under that you ruled it out.

Mr. CAHAN: No, under rule 781.

Mr. VENIOT: I quote 778:

In the commons all the clauses of the bill are considered before any new clauses are brought up and added to the bill.

Under that and under 781 you ruled that the amendment was out of order. I take it that, all the sections having now been disposed of, under 778, the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) can now come with his amendment. Rule 778 gives him the right now to move something additional.

Mr. CAHAN: This subject is already dealt with in the bill itself, section 3, which reads:

(1) There shall be a bureau ... the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the parliament of Canada and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament, or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports ...

[Mr. Chevrier.]

They shall collaborate and act together. To add to that that I must bring down these reports simultaneously is to impose a condition that sometimes would be very difficult.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is exactly the point. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has said time and time again that the cat would come out of the bag. There is the cat out of the bag now. The hon. gentleman all through the discussion of this bill has repeatedly said here and elsewhere that the purpose of this bill was to bring down simultaneously French and English documents. Now he crawls from under; now he says he will take no responsibility for doing that. I have got him where I wanted him. That is what I wanted, an admission of this kind. I know this bill means absolutely nothing. I have to pay respect to legislation that emanates from this house; I have to observe it as the law, but this bill will mean nothing more than a dishonoured cheque.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Order. May I ask the hon. senior member for Ottawa to come and show me which of these is the particular amendment he now wishes put? It is agreed by the committee that the amendment be submitted now, whether it was submitted and lost before or not.

Amendment (Mr. Chevrier) lost on division.

On section 8—Enforcement of act.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the Secretary of State when this bill will come into force, and will there be any provision in the estimates in that regard?

Mr. CAHAN: The time of its coming into force is within the decision of the governor in council. If they act on my recommendation I shall recommend that the bill be brought into force as soon as the preliminary organization can be carried out, probably within a short time after the prorogation of parliament.

Mr. POULIOT: Now may I ask one last question, the very last of the Solicitor General? How is this bill a recognition of the French language?

Mr. DUPRE: I have already stated in the debate on second reading what I thought of the bill, and every argument I have heard from the other side has convinced me that the bill is good and necessary.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a word on that—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon gentleman is out of order. We are dealing with clause 8.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Entomology, including investigations and inspections relating to destructive insects and pests, $350,000.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister has any information regarding the experiment being carried out in the Fraser valley in regard to the health of animals. I understand the department have rented a certain farm and are conducting tests in connection with a number of cows there, and I wonder if the minister has any further information.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The work is still going on; no definite conclusion has been arrived at. I shall be glad to have the information up to date sent in the form of a letter to the hon. member, because I know he has been especially interested in the matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Two rather interesting orders in council were tabled here the other day, which indicate that $500,000 in the one instance and $1,500,000 in the other have been loaned to the Saskatchewan government for relief and grasshopper control. The Prime Minister said this had been done several weeks ago, and I think the committee is entitled to an explanation. This matter was brought up last Friday, and the recommendation to council may have been prepared on Saturday. At all events it went through by Monday at the latest, according to a statement in the Regina Leader made by Premier Anderson, which says that $500,000 has been loaned for grasshopper control. That is dated Tuesday; the announcement was made last Monday, so the orders in council with respect to this $2,000,000 must have been passed after the discussion last Friday, though the Prime Minister said that considerable amounts had been granted for the same purpose two weeks ago. I have examined or have had examined every order in council back to January, and I have not found any order in council earmarked for grasshopper control; anything that has been done has occurred since the discussion. I think the Prime Minister owes the committee an explanation.

Mr. BENNETT: Half a million dollars had been expended in connection with grasshoppers long before the discussion took place in this house last Friday. The government of Saskatchewan requested that we make them an advance, and they secured their money from the bank, because at the moment there were other provinces in the same position. So when the order in council was prepared and put through part of the money had been obtained from the banks, and we were paying the money when we were in the most convenient position to do so. There has been an additional loan of $750,000 to Saskatchewan since that time. The truth is, that their revenues have been disappointing, while the revenues of some of the other provinces have been larger than was expected.

So far as the grasshopper matter is concerned, as I said the other evening we had arranged to make a loan. It happened that at the very time we were discussing the matter here a telegram was in transit from the west saying that they now had expended the full half million dollars and asking if it would be convenient for us to forward the money, which we did on the following day. The other sums were for general purposes, some of them for our share of relief for which we were obligated under an agreement made last year. We extended the time for works that were partly completed and continued to pay direct relief on the basis of the agreement of last year for the months of April and May. The Minister of Labour advised all the provinces by telegram that we would continue to make relief payments for April and May on the same terms as provided by the agreements of 1933.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): These recent orders in councils are for loans, of course?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, except with respect to relief, where we have the obligation under the agreement. The others are loans, as the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I think the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) must have been sound asleep for the past year or so. Otherwise he would know that we have had a grasshopper plague out in the west and that we have the most complete organization for fighting it that ever existed in the Dominion of Canada. I think this committee should know what is being done. Our farmers have been thoroughly educated during the winter months; winter classes were held all over the province because our agricultural department discovered there were sixteen million acres of land infested with grasshopper eggs. The educational campaign was led by the entomological department of the university of Saskatchewan, with which is associated the entomological branch of the federal government. We have a very intelligent department out there, notwithstanding my hon. friend from Melville, and all our municipalities were thoroughly organized to fight this plague; they have held mutual councils regularly.

Some people call these pests grasshoppers while some call them locusts. I believe locusts is the biblical term, but I never use that term. If anyone has ever faced this plague, as I have faced it, they would know it is something that must be faced in a very heroic manner and I am very glad that this organization of which I speak has been carried on quietly with the assistance of the Minister of Agriculture. There is no doubt about the assistance that has been given by the federal department, nor is there any doubt about what the agriculture department of the province of Saskatchewan has done and is doing to-day. There is no doubt about what the municipalities are doing, so we need not be afraid that we will not do our part, the hon. member for Melville to the contrary notwithstanding. The hon. gentleman can find all the fault he wishes; I do not care. We are going to fight this plague, and we will succeed. The best news I have heard from Saskatchewan in five years was the news that recently, in the country from which I come, copious rains have fallen. The five year drought has been broken, and nothing will do more to destroy these grasshoppers than the rains which have fallen in the last few days. I hope my hon. friend from Melville will rejoice with the rest of us that Saskatchewan is at last coming back.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not been closely following this method of doing business, but I gathered from the Prime Minister that this money had been expended previously. Was that correct?

Mr. BENNETT: Our advices were that the money had been expended to the extent of half a million dollars.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been spent in the preparation campaign? The grasshoppers are just hatching now.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it had been spent in providing poison for their destruction.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This was for the late winter campaign?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

[Mr. W. D. Cowan.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was when the poison was supplied. I will tell you what I believe; it is that if there had not been a discussion last Friday no order in council would have been passed for this amount of money. How did the amount happen to be $2,000,000, exactly the amount being spent in the United States to which I drew attention last Friday? Do you think I will take that as a coincidence? Two orders in council passed totalling exactly the same amount as the amount I mentioned had been allotted by Washington. The government got busy the very next day and passed those orders in council. That is what happened. You do not think we were born yesterday, do you? I know, and I knew when last Friday the right hon. gentleman said that these moneys had been spent, or had been paid, or agreed to be paid some two weeks before, that he was just stringing this house, that is all.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. That remark must be withdrawn. The hon. gentleman said I was stringing this house, and I ask him to withdraw that remark.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the face of these figures—

Mr. BENNETT: Order; the chair is speaking.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Prime Minister has no right to ask this house to accept his statement, in the face of these orders in council. I will take it back, then. I say he has no right to ask this house—

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to have that remark withdrawn.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have withdrawn it, but I am saying now that he has no right to ask this house—

Mr. BENNETT: That is just repeating it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —to accept his statement, in the face of the orders in council. I know a little bit about how business should be done by governments and others, and if this is the way it is being done by this government, it is extraordinary that the Prime Minister did not say so at once last Friday. Where did they get the money? Did they get it from the banks? Mr. Anderson says it is to pay for a campaign now nicely started. The newspaper article states that the $500,000 federal grasshopper advances, according to information available in Regina, would cover the cost of the campaign of poison distribution now under way. I wonder if it is a grasshopper campaign or an election campaign that is on. You may as well say it is the one as the other. An election campaign is in progress, and we find that an order in council is tabled the day before yesterday and is issued either on Saturday or Monday. The wire is sent out to Mr. Anderson, and he loses no time in announcing it. I say that without vouchers, telegrams and details that does not correspond with the way things are done in ordinary business, nor does the statement made by the Prime Minister conform to the regular business methods of the house.

The right hon. gentleman was trying to make out the other day I was too old to understand these things. Well, I am getting old, but I am not responsible for my age any more than the Prime Minister is responsible for his—or the age of anybody else, so far as I know. He was wondering what the people would think who were listening in the gallery. I think they will be still wondering, if that is the way the Prime Minister conducts the business of the country. And then when one in his seventy-fifth year undertakes to draw attention to the matter, he says he is going to treat extreme age with silence; but I am not going to treat his bluster with silence. Of course, sometimes provinces have to borrow from the bank, and then afterwards recoup the banks from the federal treasury. But does the minister expect this house to accept his statement that these two orders in council aggregating $2,000,000, or exactly the amount given by the United States are merely a coincidence after last Friday's discussion? There are some remarkable things I know in the world which have been mere coincidences, and if the Prime Minister will say that these two matters are coincident, I shall accept his statement.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not asking the member for Long Lake, because he does not know anything about this matter. I am asking the Prime Minister.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): All right, go on.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, reference has been made by the hon. member for Melville to the part being played in the campaign against grasshoppers by the United States, and to the fact that their expenditures have equalled the sum of $2,000,000. The difficulty last year in connection with the campaign in Saskatchewan was that in the United States territory adjacent to Saskatchewan no campaign was undertaken to fight the grasshopper menace. The result was that they were allowed to hatch and develop, and they came in clouds to attack the crops in the province of Saskatchewan. Realizing what had happened not only in their own country but in Canada, the United States undertook this year to carry on a very effective campaign to deal with their grasshopper situation. So that there would be no break in operations an international meeting was called to be held at Fargo in Dakota at which were represented—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, this year; it was in the winter time, preparatory to this spring's work. There were representatives from the dominion department and from the provincial departments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It was agreed to make a united effort against this menace or pest. The United States voted $2,000,000 and undertook to carry on their campaign under federal auspices. Those who have watched the campaign and the effect of preparation for it feel that at a cost of $700,000 in the three prairie provinces the work done under our methods will be more effective or at least as effective as that carried on by the federal government of the United States. That is so, because the fact that they are undertaking the whole responsibility, means that they have to pay for all the work being done. In Canada the method of campaign and division of work is as follows: Officials of the federal department of entomology made a survey last year, and are continuing their survey at the present time. They had all possible information before them as to where outbreaks might be expected, so that municipalities and farmers affected would be equipped to meet it. Entomological officials of the federal department, officials of the experimental farms, and officials of our seed branch, together with officials of the provincial governments met and set up a central committee which undertook an educational campaign throughout the west. Upwards of 1,400 committees were established to take care of the divisions into which the provinces had been divided. The provinces were to supply poison and bait. In that connection they ran into some difficulty because the price of bran rose quickly through the demand for that commodity. It was used in a fifty-fifty ratio with sawdust and with water and poison and was to be broadcast as thinly as possible as bait. As a result of the rise in the price our officials in western Canada undertook a study of some substitute for bran. A substitute was found which was almost as good and whether or not the fact it was found had any direct bearing on the drop in the price of bran I should not like to say definitely, although we feel it had. The fact is that bran dropped considerably in price. That bait has been purchased and distributed, ready for operation in the campaign. The municipalities take the responsibility for the distribution of this bait and the farmers themselves do the work of applying the poisoned bait in their own time. They are responsible on their own farms. It is believed by those in the best position to judge that this method, with the expenditure we have made, is the most effective method that could be employed, because it puts the responsibility directly on the farmer but involves no cash outlay on his part. If they carry out this plan the way we believe they will, we think it possible to save from the prospective crop fourteen out of the fifteen bushels from the grasshopper menace. We have an example in the vicinity of Lake Carlyle, in Saskatchewan, where individual farmers who applied this bait, which has to be applied in sunlight, at temperatures varying from 65 to 85 degrees did save their crop almost entirely. They estimated a loss of about one bushel per acre, while farmers adjoining who did not do this work lost practically their whole crop. But we have every hope this year, with the co-operation between the American officials and our own, that it will be possible absolutely to control the grasshopper menace so long as there is no letting up of activity. But to show the danger we run into in certain parts of the west because of people giving out information that the menace was not as bad as our officials had reported, this year the officials in a certain municipality went out to a certain area where we had reported a severe outbreak as likely, and took the machine with which the soil is shaken to count the eggs, and after a good deal of work on their part reported that the danger had been very much overestimated. Our officials went there to check up, and taking these people with them, showed them, by the proper method of finding out how many eggs there were, that from fifty to one hundred eggs were present per square foot and that we had been very conservative in our estimate. The trouble was that the officials of the municipality who had gone out were so vigorous in making the test that they not only shook out the earth but the eggs as well. Our committees are very wide awake to see that there will be no lessening of their energy and no lessening of their appreciation of the difficulty that is in front of them. This bait and the poison had to be bought, and so far as I am aware, and I have been more closely in contact with the situation than anyone else in the government, every request so far as finances are concerned has been fully met, so that the poisoned bait and everything that goes with it can be purchased.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no fault to find with that at all. We all know that they started good and early and distributed the poison betimes. But what I pointed out last Friday was also true. It was on the last lap of the hopper fight that the campaign fell down last year, for want of poison, and I drew the attention of the government to the fact that the estimates for entomology were reduced to one-half of what they were in 1931 and that no special grant was in sight in Canada as there was in the United States, where $2,000,000 had been appropriated. I pointed out that we were in danger again of a vastly greater territory being infected this year with grasshopper eggs, and that if we were to run short again of grasshopper poison during the last lap of the campaign the insects would take their flight, and of course, scatter all over the rest of the province.

I have nothing but commendation to give to the minister for starting earlier in the campaign, but what I wanted to know was, where was the money to correspond with the United States grant? The Prime Minister justified the small vote this year on the ground that it would not be needed, that the grasshoppers were receding, and that less money would be required, showing that he did not know the first thing about it. I pointed out that that was a long-bow stretcher of a statement to begin with. I pointed out that they were not receding, that it was the worst and most terrific invasion of grasshoppers that we have ever seen and that more money was required. The Prime Minister went on for half an hour or more, answering either myself or the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) or the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) and pointing out that the money voted, while it was less, was being efficiently administered; that the grasshoppers were disappearing and that we did not need so much money. Then someone must have given him a tip, because he began to say something about something being given, after I had suggested drawing on the vote for peace, order and good government. I suggested, why could we not keep peace and order with the grasshoppers as well as with anything else, but there was no response even to that. Then after a little while the Prime Minister wakened up to the fact that there really were more grasshoppers there than last year and he said they had arranged to make a loan for that purpose to the west. May I ask the minister when the recommendation went to council on which the order in council was based? Of course, a recommendation is always sent to council by some minister before an order in council is passed. Was that recommendation sent by the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Labour? The Prime Minister said last Friday that the Minister of Agriculture always attended to such requirements, and naturally I would suppose he would look after it. When was that recommendation sent to council, and by whom? Does the minister know what day the order in council was passed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The understanding was this. We received various requests because we are very closely in touch with the committee of the provincial governments with a view to making this campaign thoroughly effective. We have been in touch with them from time to time and have assured them that whatever was necessary to carry out this campaign would be given, as it has been in the past in connection with various relief works and other works. They received this money from the banks, the banks having been given the assurance that when the required amount was purchased—and no one could say exactly what that amount was—the money would be forthcoming.

So far as the information last week is concerned, I myself received a telegram from western Canada before the discussion took place in the house at all.

Dealing with another point while I am on my feet, the hon. member asks why this vote is cut in two. He will remember, I am sure, the way it was done when he was Minister of Agriculture. This used to be under a vote for the Destructive Insect and Pest Act and the money divided between the experimental farms branch and the entomological branch, but this year it was felt more advisable, in order that the officials in charge could make their plans ahead, to divide the vote, giving the experimental farm their part and the entomological branch theirs, which is the item under discussion. Not only that, but actually there is a slight increase this year as compared with last in what was given to the entomological branch. So, instead of a decrease in the vote there has been a slight increase.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I knew most of that except that I did not know the half, $350,000 was more than the whole, $700,000, and I do not know that yet. My hon. friend forgot to tell me when the recommendation went to council.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say exactly. I believe it is the finance minister who submits the recommendation in such cases as this.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was a meeting of council, apparently. I do not want to ask my hon. friend what occurred in council, but somebody must have sent a recommendation upon which the order in council was based. I anticipate that it would be the Minister of Finance in the event of a loan being required and made. That would be in his department. But either he or somebody else must have made a recommendation to council. It seems to me we cannot get this information. They do not want us to get close to the matter. There should be a record of the recommendation to council. Every order in council is based on somebody's recommendation, and it should not be a difficult matter to produce it. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, I should be accused of being oversuspicious in the absence of something being given to the committee beyond a nice dissertation on what was done last fall, all of which we knew. I asked a question as to when the recommendation was made to council, when it was signed, who signed it and when the order itself was signed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think the hon. member has got the point. An understanding was reached with the government of Saskatchewan that they were to proceed to make every possible preparation to meet this grasshopper menace, and this was made months ago.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is quite all right.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have been in almost continuous contact with them. As I stated, a telegram came from Regina stating what had been purchased, what their indebtedness was for it and asking that money be sent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know that. I think all this money is spent in advance; a loan is obtained from the bank and then recouped afterwards. There is no other way of doing it, but that has nothing to do with the date upon which recommendation was made to council. There should be no difficulty in telling the committee when the recommendation to council was made, when the order was signed and when the governor general signed it. It looks to me as though there must have been some awfully smart work done to have it gazetted before the announcement was made in Regina. The announcement was made on Monday, so they must have worked on Sunday. Why should there be this secrecy? If the minister does not know, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) should know, or the Prime Minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid the hon. member is labouring under a delusion. This money was actually spent during the past two or three months.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may be getting old but I am not so old that I am labouring under a delusion. I have been sitting around the council table too long not to know all about recommendations and orders in council. Sometimes they are put through the same day the recommendation is received, but more frequently it is the next day as the clerk must get them ready. Evidently there was rush after last Friday and I can imagine that they all went through on Saturday or Monday. I do not see why we cannot be given this information.

Mr. MANION: Why is the hon. member opposing the giving of this money to Saskatchewan? He is from Saskatchewan and I do not understand why he should oppose it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend is not so thick in the head as not to know what I am trying to get at.

Mr. MANION: What is the opposition for?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not objecting to giving money to Saskatchewan because I think they need it all. It happens, I suppose, to be a coincidence, that is all. An election is on at the same time the grasshoppers are there—they are all hopping around. What I want to know is why this order in council was put out at the exact time it was, and immediately after last Friday's discussion. Was that a coincidence?

Mr. BENNETT: I just want to say one word. The item under consideration is one of three hundred thousand odd dollars for entomological work. This has nothing to do with grasshoppers. It has been pointed out that this amount was arrived at in consequence of the vote of the previous year being divided between the experimental farms and the work carried on by the entomologists. The discussion which took place the other evening indicated that this was not to be used for the destruction of grasshoppers. At least, that is what I said, as hon. gentlemen know. It has nothing at all to do with the destruction of the grasshopper. During the discussion the question arose as to whether or not Saskatchewan was properly caring for its farmers by taking the necessary measures to destroy the grasshopper. It is obviously not my duty to follow every item but I knew that we had undertaken to supply Saskatchewan with all the money required for the purpose, whether the sum was large or small. We arranged with them to go ahead with their work and buy their poison. My memory is that the Minister of Agriculture, who lives in Saskatchewan, received a night letter on Saturday morning, which, of course, had been sent before this discussion took place. This night letter indicated that they had now reached half a million dollars of expenditure, not a million and a half dollars. Matters of this kind which do not come under the relief act are recommended by the Minister of Finance. There was no mystery about it. The recommendation was put through; I signed the order in council, and my memory is that His Excellency approved it on Monday. The order in council was laid on the table of the house. I cannot say with certainty upon what date His Excellency signed it. The million and a half obviously involved a matter which had to do with other things altogether. My memory is that it was one of the provincial ministers, I believe the treasurer, who was down here to discuss the question of advances to be made for this purpose and who sent the telegram to the Minister of Agriculture. This telegram was sent in pursuance to a promise given to the treasurer by the Minister of Finance. We sent the money to him. I may say that we have had to send substantial sums to other provinces, and I cannot understand why a heated discussion has taken place on this item. This item is for entomological purposes and has nothing to do with the other question. The other question is between Saskatchewan and the dominion and it has been arranged to the satisfaction of the province. That refers to the manner in which the province discharged its duties with respect to the grasshopper plague. If there was any mystery about it, it is hardly likely that it would have indicated, as was clearly done, that this was money which was utilized for that purpose. If there was any mystery about it there would have been no necessity for its being there, as every member of the former government must know. It was done just in the ordinary course, and if it happens to be a coincidence, it is one of those coincidences which sometimes happen. The fact that it happened to be half a million was merely because Saskatchewan had reached a point where they had no further credit. They had spent a million and a half and it was acted on accordingly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no need to draw upon my right hon. friend's memory for information as to when the order in council was passed. It was laid on the table the day before yesterday and it is on all our files. I knew this money was required in the west and I knew it was required last year, and more of it. What I was referring to was the delay of the government in getting the supplies through when they were needed. My hon. friends jumped right into the breach and it was not twenty-four hours before they got busy with the recommendation to council after the question was raised by myself and others last Friday. The order in council was put through on Monday and tabled on Wednesday. That was pretty smart work, and I want to congratulate them; but I just want to tell them that they cannot put that thing over on me, that they had it arranged months and months ago or even weeks and weeks ago.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member must withdraw that statement. I said and the minister has said that these arrangements were made with Saskatchewan. Under the rules the hon. member is bound to accept our statement. He says that we cannot put that thing over on him, but I desire that he should live within the rules. His age protects him from many things but not from that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —in doing business to the extent of millions—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member must accept the statement of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right; we will have it out another day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not eleven o'clock for a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Has the hon. member accepted the statement of the Prime Minister?

Mr. BENNETT: I say to the hon. gentleman who is an ex-minister of the crown that when he states that we cannot put that over him, we did have arrangements to advance money to the province of Saskatchewan for this and other purposes, this is a statement that is contrary to the rules, and I ask him to accept the statement of the ministry as to what was done and not say that the ministry has stated in the house what was not true with respect to the matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will accept the right hon. gentleman's statement, but will he not come along on Monday with the documentary evidence of this? Why should we have to take the minister's statement with regard to money when there is a regular business way of dealing with the matter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is just one wrong impression that I wish to correct before we leave this, and that is that the campaign in Saskatchewan last year was in any way curtailed by lack of support from the federal government for supplying bait for fighting the grasshopper menace that year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know they ran short of poisoned bait several times.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 28, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

TARIFF BOARD REPORT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) presented the interim report of the tariff board on the subject of wool textiles.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): May I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if sufficient copies of the interim report of the tariff board will be published to enable each member to obtain one or two, since I understand the report is of peculiar importance to the public.

Mr. RHODES: No, not unless some new practice is devised under the act. We are only called upon to table one copy for the use of the house.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*J. W. GAUDETTE

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Is J. W. Gaudette, of Quebec, in the employ of the government?
2. If so, what position does he occupy, what salary does he receive and when was he appointed?
3. Was he appointed by the civil service commission following an examination?
4. If not, in what manner was he appointed and upon whose recommendation?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not been able to ascertain whether any person by the name of J. W. Gaudette is in the employ of any department of the government of Canada.

ASSISTANT DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Who is the assistant deputy Postmaster General?
2. When was he appointed?
3. What salary does he receive?
4. When was he appointed to the civil service of Canada?
5. Where was he born?
6. How long had he been a resident of Canada when he was appointed to the civil service of Canada?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Coolican, Peter Thomas.
2. April 1, 1925.
3. $6,000, (less 10 per cent).
4. November 27, 1907.
5. England.
6. No information.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS COST OF TRAINS BETWEEN MATAPEDIA-CAMPBELLTON

Mr. MARCIL:

1. What has been the cost to the Canadian National Railways, per year, of running the Gaspe trains to and from Matapedia to Campbellton since the changing of the terminus?
2. What has been the cost to the Canadian National Railways of hauling the postal cars for the Gaspe mail service from Matapedia to Campbellton and vice versa, since the Post Office Department has been freed of any cost in this matter?

Mr. MANION:

Mr. Marcil's question was submitted to the chairman of the board of trustees, Canadian National Railways, who replies that the inquiry concerns a detail of railway operation which is not of public interest, but adds that the operation of the Gaspe trains through to the main line terminal of Campbellton—a distance of 13 miles—and the closing of the branch line terminal at Matapedia, after taking into account all changes in arrangements incidental thereto, has resulted in a saving to the railway company.

The subject matter of the inquiry is, of course, one that might be brought up later at a meeting of the select standing committee on railways and shipping, should the honourable member so desire.

*TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES

Mr. GOULET:

1. How many trust companies, loan companies or other companies in Canada are allowed to accept deposits?
2. Are such companies audited by the Department of Finance?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this question I intended to have indicated the other day that part of the information asked for will take some time to secure, inasmuch as it is within the sole province of the several provincial legislatures to deal with companies that have charters from such legislatures.

Question stands.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS

Mr. GOULET:

1. What is the government doing to encourage the public to deposit money with the Post Office Savings Bank?
2. Is the government advertising the Post Office Savings Bank?
3. Is the government soliciting deposits for the Post Office Savings Bank?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Whenever demand is made for the establishment of a Post Office Savings Bank in a locality, prompt action is taken to provide this facility, if the circumstances are favourable.
2. Advertising is carried on in connection with the Post Office Savings Bank in the form of posters and hand-bills on the premises of post offices where savings banks are located.
3. The post office provides every facility possible for those wishing to deposit with the Post Office Savings Bank. It does not make a practice of soliciting business.

*MUNICIPAL ASSESSMENT OF CROWN PROPERTY

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Is the Vancouver Board of Harbour Commissioners opposing the city of Vancouver's attempt to assess private occupants of crown properties?
2. What was the amount paid by the Alberta wheat pool for the Vancouver harbour board's elevator: (a) in 1932; (b) 1933; (c) 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: The second part of this question can stand as an order for return.

As to the first part, the British North America Act provides that property belonging to the crown is free from taxation. We therefore have no power to impose taxation upon it, and when the city of Vancouver sought to assess private occupants of crown property it was made known to them that if the properties were assessed as leases or leasehold interests in crown property the crown was not concerned, but when it was intimated that it was proposed to assess such leasehold property as fee simple, then the operation of the section in question of the British North America Act made it impossible to agree to any such action.

*PUBLIC WORKS—QUEBEC

Mr. BARRETTE:

1. Has the government reconsidered requests already made during the years 1921 to 1930, with respect to the following works:—

(1) Dredging at Pentecote river (Riverin river), on the north shore of the St. Lawrence.

(2) Improvements to the wharf on the north shore of Aux Coudres island in the county of Charlevoix.

(3) Construction of the wharf at Mutton bay, in the county of Saguenay.

(4) Enlargement of protective works at Moisie, in the county of Saguenay.

(5) Construction of the wharf at Moisie, in the county of Saguenay.

(6) Construction of the wharf at Magpie, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river.

(7) Breakwater at Longue Pointe de Mingan, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river.

(8) Enlargement of the wharf at Harrington harbour, in the county of Saguenay.

(9) Wharf at Hamilton cove (Portneuf river), in the county of Saguenay.

(10) Enlargement of the wharf at Dolbeau (Grosse Roche), in the county of Saguenay.

(11) Enlargement of the wharf at Betsiamites (Bersimis), in the county of Saguenay.

(12) Repairs and improvements to the wharf at Beaupre, in the county of Montmorency.

(13) Improvements to the wharf at des Rochers bay, in the county of Charlevoix.

(14) Dredging at Petites Bergeronnes, in the county of Saguenay.

(15) Protective works at Pointe-au-Boisvert, in the county of Saguenay.

(16) Construction of the wharf at Point Lebel, in the county of Saguenay.

(17) Enlargement of the wharf at Port-au-Persil, in the county of Charlevoix.

(18) Enlargement of the wharf at Port-au-Saumon, in the county of Charlevoix.

(19) Wharf at Riviere-aux-Vases, in the county of Saguenay.

(20) Protection of the shore at river Blondelle (St. Joachim), in the county of Montmorency.

(21) Enlargement of the wharf at St. Anne de Beaupre, in the county of Montmorency.

(22) Work on the retaining walls of St. Jean river, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river.

(23) Protective works at St. Margaret river, in the county of Saguenay.

(24) Reconstruction of the wharf at St. Irenée, in the county of Charlevoix.

(25) Construction of a public building at Pointe-au-Pic, in the county of Charlevoix, for the use of the Post Office Department.

(26) Wharf at St. Simeon (Riviere Noire), in the county of Charlevoix.

(27) Enlargement of wharf at St. Simeon, in the county of Charlevoix.

(28) Enlargement of the wharf at Sept-Iles, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river.

(29) The breakwater at Sheldrake on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river.

(30) Enlargement of the wharf in du Gouffre river, at Baie St-Paul, in the county of Charlevoix.

(31) Enlargement of the wharf at Petite Riviere St. Francois, in the county of Charlevoix?

2. If so, will the government comply with these requests this year?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, is not this an improper question? If you will be good enough to look at the second part:

If so will the government comply with these requests this year?

I think there is a rule that no question of that character may be asked. The inquiry refers to the years from 1921 to 1930, lists a number of works, and then asks the intention of the government with respect to them. I think that is an improper question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question No. 9 will be struck out.

GENERAL HORNBY'S IMMIGRATION PLAN

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Is the Canadian government assisting or has it promised to assist directly or indirectly a certain General Hornby or any other person or any organization to bring farmers from England and settle them in the county of Compton, province of Quebec?

2. If so, what are the names, occupations and addresses of the persons or societies that may have recommended this scheme to the Canadian government?

3. Is the government of the province of Quebec assisting or has it undertaken to assist directly or indirectly in carrying out such scheme?

4. Is the municipal council of the city of Sherbrooke assisting or has it undertaken to assist directly or indirectly in carrying out such scheme?

5. Is the municipal council of the county of Compton assisting or has it undertaken to assist directly or indirectly in carrying out such scheme?

Mr. GORDON:

1. No.

2. While various inquiries have reached the Department of Immigration and Colonization, it can scarcely be said that the Hornby scheme of settlement has been recommended to the department except by General Hornby himself.

3, 4 and 5. No information.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ALBERTA WHEAT POOL—VANCOUVER TERMINAL

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

What was the amount paid by the Alberta wheat pool for the Vancouver harbour board's elevator in: (a) 1932; (b) 1933; (c) 1934?

QUEBEC HARBOUR BOARD—AUTOMOBILE ALLOWANCE

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What sum of money has been granted to M. O'Meara and the two other members of the Quebec harbour board in lieu of the automobiles at their disposal the use of which was discontinued in the month of August, 1932?

2. What sum was expended by way of repairs, painting, renewal of parts, mechanical work, tires, etc., to Commissioner LeBlond's Packard automobile, from January, 1932, to August, 1932?

3. How many gallons of gasoline and oil were used from January, 1932, to the month of August, 1932?

4. In what manner was the used Packard automobile sold by Commissioner LeBlond, and what sum was paid by Commissioner LeBlond for this car?

5. Whether Commissioner LeBlond refunded the amount paid as licence fee from the month of August, 1932, to the month of February, 1933?

6. Whether Commissioner LeBlond refunded insurance to the amount of $363?

7. What quantity of gasoline did Commissioner LeBlond receive from the harbour board since August, 1932?

8. What sum was granted to Commissioner LeBlond in connection with a trip to Saint John, New Brunswick, on February 27 last?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BONAVENTURE COUNTY, QUE., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of all pay lists and accounts for material in connection with work done by the Department of Public Works in the parish of Bonaventure, Bonaventure county, during the year 1933.

DISMISSAL OF HECTOR HAMEL

Mr. VENIOT (for Mr. Denis):

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, telegrams, reports, inquiries, and other documents, respecting the dismissal of Mr. Hector Hamel, acting customs appraiser at Montreal.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

DEATH OF DOCTOR WILLIAM SPANKIE

TRIBUTES BY PRIME MINISTER, LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION AND MR. SPEAKMAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my sad and melancholy duty to inform the house that for the second time this session one of our members has been touched by the hand of death. Doctor William Spankie, the member for Frontenac-Addington, passed to his reward yesterday. He was a much-beloved member of this chamber. I think all who knew him held him in affectionate regard and esteem. He lived the greater part of his life in the community in which he was born, and he was family physician to practically three generations. Just what that meant people in these days have little opportunity of understanding, for the old fashioned physician, shall I say, with the changes that have led to greater complexity in our civilization has passed from the scene. That one who was a family physician for two or three generations would be greatly beloved goes without saying. His genial manner, wide knowledge of human nature, and his professional attainments, which had been recognized alike by the medical council of his province and of the dominion, made him a very popular figure in the community in which he lived. He took a deep and abiding interest in the public welfare. He was inspector of schools for many years, was greatly interested in educational matters in his province, and kept abreast of the great changes that have taken place in the medical profession, for as I say, he was closely identified with the council of physicians and surgeons not only in Ontario but in the dominion as well.

His life was an arduous one, especially in the earlier days, when the work of his profession kept him moving from place to place on Wolfe Island. He was accustomed to hardships and difficulties. That greatly endeared him to those whom he served. His popularity was such that when a vacancy occurred for the county in which he lived he was elected by acclamation and subsequently returned to this house.

He had attained the ripe age of seventy-four, being in his seventy-fifth year. He had given hostages to fortune, for three of his sons reside in the province in which I live, and two of them are members of the profession of which he was an ornament. I am sure that to the survivors of his family, his children, you, Mr. Speaker, will convey the sympathy of this house, for to the members of this chamber Doctor Spankie had endeared himself by the kindliness of his nature and his genial personality. We shall miss him greatly. It is one more reminder to us of the uncertainty of life.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the tribute which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has just paid to the memory of the late member for Frontenac-Addington is not only worthy and merited but will be appreciated as well as approved by hon. members of all parties in this house. While it is true that Doctor Spankie owing to the recent date at which he was first elected and to his advanced years was a member of parliament for but a short time; while it is also true that largely because of an infirmity of hearing he participated but little in the debates of this house there could be no clearer evidence of the fineness of his personality and character than the fact that notwithstanding these handicaps he was able to impress both so greatly upon others. It should be recognized that after all, his years in parliament were but the crowning recognition of a long life of useful service to his fellowmen and to the country.

Doctor Spankie was a man who, above everything else, appeared to find his greatest joy in doing good, and in the service to others. The theatre of his public actions may have been circumscribed but there was inherent in the actions themselves the greatness which belongs to a reverence for the highest virtues. The choice of his profession indicated his sympathy with human suffering, and his desire to do what he could, in the course of his life, to aid in its alleviation. The Prime Minister has made reference to Doctor Spankie's interest in educational matters. The fact that he devoted so much time in the community in which he lived to the offices of school trustee and school inspector showed his desire to widen, by the surest method possible, the opportunities of the oncoming generation. The value which he attached to learning was also evidenced not only by his own university attainments, but by the fact that all four of his sons were given to the learned professions, two of them to the profession of medicine, and the other two to the profession of law. By his lifelong participation in municipal affairs as well as in dominion politics, he disclosed his belief in the importance of government in human affairs, and in the obligation resting upon those best qualified in their communities actively to share in public life. All were expressions of the many-sidedness of his nature, which found their unity in the desire of service for others.

The Prime Minister has referred to Doctor Spankie as belonging to that class of family physician which is rapidly disappearing, and of whom too little is known even in our rural communities to-day, the general practitioner who in former years played such an important part in the life of the community in which he lived. I am sure no one familiar with modern literature could read the accounts that to-day are being given of Doctor Spankie's services to his community, his visits in mid-winter to outlying districts, driving himself his faithful horse, incurring all kinds of personal risks to serve some human need, without recalling that immortal chapter in Ian Maclaren's "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," entitled "The Doctor of the Old School." In a Canadian environment, not wholly dissimilar, he resembled in many particulars Doctor McLure of the Scottish glen. I thought I would find something there which would be appropriate to say in memory of him who is gone. I have a passage here which I think, perhaps is appropriate in its application to him, but is, I believe, even more appropriate to those of us who remain. It is a paragraph with which Maclaren concludes his account of the doctor's last journey:

> After which the minister prayed, that we might have grace to live as this man had done from youth to age, not for himself, but for others, and that we might be followed to our grave by somewhat of "that love wherewith we mourn this day Thy servant departed."

On behalf of other members of the opposition and for myself personally I express to the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite our very sincere sympathy in the loss they have sustained, of so loyal and devoted a colleague; and I join with my right hon. friend in extending our deepest sympathies to those who by his death have been so greatly bereaved.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members in this corner of the house may I associate myself with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in expressing our appreciation of the life and our regret at the death of our late colleague Doctor Spankie. Perhaps there is no gathering of men in which integrity of character and kindliness of disposition make themselves more effectually felt, seen and known than in this chamber. Both these qualities were possessed by Doctor Spankie. Because of that fact, and because at all times and to all men, regardless of party, Doctor Spankie proved himself a friend, we join in regretting his passing and in expressing our condolences to those of his family who are left to mourn him.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Monday, May 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade; and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 12, subsection (1)—Power to restrict importation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: During the interval since this bill was under discussion last we have drafted another clause which I think may meet some of the objections which were offered to section 12 when the bill was under discussion a few days ago. I will read the proposed new section, and submit it to hon. gentlemen for their consideration:

The governor in council may, by order or regulation, notice whereof shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette,—

(a) regulate or restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product;

(b) regulate or restrict the exportation from Canada of any natural product;

(c) provide for the licensing of persons by whom any such natural product may be imported or exported;

(d) prescribe the forms of such licences and the terms and conditions upon which the same may be issued, renewed, suspended or revoked by the governor in council.

Under this proposal it will be noted that the issuing and rescission of licenses will be placed under the jurisdiction of the governor in council and not under the minister, as was provided in the section as originally drafted. I am sending a copy to my right hon. friend. I believe the language in the amendment meets with some and perhaps all of the objections urged by him on former occasions.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This amendment is not included in the first batch, is it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is drawn only recently.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that every day in every way this bill is getting a little better, and we are encouraged not to persevere too much but, at all events, to keep going, in order to make it even better. It is not much better, by this last amendment though, —not much, but just a little. I wonder if there could not be some explicit reservations. We know that the world is chock full of trade restrictions of all kinds, and this is one more added to a number which is already too great. This is a case of restricting trade first by prohibition, and then by restricting importation. Surely the government could at least tell us what this is for. What are they trying to do? Are they trying to blockade the trade of the country just a little more, or is some more useful purpose to be served? I can imagine a useful purpose which could be served. Low grade commodities, poor, bum live stock that we do not want in Canada could be kept out, and any provision with that in view would be a proper one. Then, there are some breeds of lard hogs which are not desirable. But to have an indefinite and indiscriminate restriction by a local board, the status of which we do not yet understand, is not surely right. We have done a great deal of gagging at some of the objectionable provisions of this bill, and I must say that this is one of the worst sections we have to yet swallow, or amend—for me, all events. Yet I can see sufficient good in it, if it is defined, to view it with some favour. But to make the provision without any reservation other than that now stated by the minister, one which makes it only infinitesimally better, does not seem to improve the major objection. I wonder if the minister could not help us out, and tell us what it is for. Personally, I believe it is to deal with some problems such as the butter question with which we were faced last year. We remember the importations of butter which were put into bond at Halifax and Vancouver, and held at those points until the market could absorb them. That would not be a bad reason for the change. But instead of leaving it as wide open as a barn door I suggest there should be some specifications which would make it at least more understandable and more commendable. Would the minister come to my relief in that regard?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place, the power here indicated is not handled indiscriminately by the local board, but only with the authority of the governor in council, and any agent appointed by them to undertake it. Within the past few years a system of quotas has grown up in different countries. Directly or indirectly, restrictions have been made, and as an example we have the restriction brought about through exchange. If, therefore under the new scheme any country with which we trade decides to limit its imports of products which we export, it will be necessary for us to have machinery to comply with such new conditions. Otherwise the tendency would be to dump the product on the market, with the disastrous effects respecting price which one might easily anticipate. Similarly it might be necessary to use the clause with reference to imports in negotiations with other countries in connection with treaties or trade agreements.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then this is a sort of weapon with which to negotiate. I was wondering if it could not be worked the other way, whereby instead of having the provision against our imports we could have a quota on the other fellow's exports, just as the practice is being worked against us. Would that not be the simpler procedure, because one can defend prohibiting exports much better than you can defend prohibiting imports, although both look bad.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If, as the hon. member suggests, we were to leave the provision in the form of a quota in the event of Denmark shipping her products into this country, unless we had the machinery to control imports, such provision would be ineffective.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I read it, apparently the amendment eliminates one objectionable clause. I should like to know if I am right in my assumption. The clause to which I am referring formerly read:

> The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette,—
> (c) impose penalties for breach of any such order or regulation or of any licence issued thereunder, and, generally, make such provision or authorize the doing of such acts or things as may in his discretion be deemed necessary or expedient for giving full effect to any orders, regulations or licences made or issued hereunder.

It appears to strike out the power to impose penalties, but on second thought I assume that the last clause in the amendment, to "prescribe the forms of such licences and the terms and conditions upon which the same may be issued, renewed, suspended or revoked by the governor in council" may mean that the governor in council may still impose penalties for any breaches of the section. Is that right?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is power in the measure to impose penalties for the breach of any section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The section as it now stands means that the governor in council is to have the power to restrict the importations into the country and to restrict the exportations from the country of any regulated commodity the governor in council may wish to have so restricted. I say "any commodity" because another clause gives to the governor in council power to make any commodity coming within the definition of natural product, a regulated commodity, and this clause gives to the governor in council the power to require a licence with respect to the importation of or exportation of any regulated commodity.

The first exception I wish to take to this section is that it treats both exports and imports in the same way. Hon. gentlemen opposite have given certain reasons why some commodities should not be permitted to come into the country at certain times. They have not thus far given any reasons why commodities should not be exported from Canada, other than to oblige those nations which may have prohibitory tariffs or quotas against us, and to help to meet those prohibitions. It seems to me that is a mistaken attitude to take. People who are producing commodities know better than any other people where opportunities for their sale may lie, and what prohibitions they are likely to encounter. I think they might well be left to look after themselves in that regard, and should not be shouldered with the additional liability of having the government prohibit their exports. Such liability would be in addition to the prohibitions against the admission of their exports which might be made by certain countries. In the second place, this measure does not follow the British act in its essential provisions. The British act permits certain restrictions on the importations of regulated commodities, but it has nothing whatever to say of restricting exports. So far as I have been able to read both British acts dealing with marketing it would seem that they allow the producers and shippers and others concerned with the export of commodities the freest latitude.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They do not export any agricultural commodities. There is no necessity for doing so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot agree with my hon. friend when he states that they do not export agricultural products. But this measure includes not only agricultural products but the products of the forests and the lakes, rivers and seas. My hon. friend would hardly say that there are no products of the sea exported from Great Britain, although in Canada such products could be absolutely precluded from export if the governor in council wished so to direct.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Their act deals only with agriculture if I understand it correctly, and they have never exported agricultural products so far as I know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My statement remains true that they have not tried to regulate exports in Britain in regard to any commodity.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Because there is no necessity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I do not see why we in this country need to begin to restrict exports. That brings us, it seems to me, to the fundamental criticism of this measure. It aims not at regulating trade but strikes at the very heart of the primary industries of this country, namely, the production that comes from the primary and basic industries. This country is dependent on its basic industries above all else, and the greatest freedom should be allowed in the production and distribution of our natural products. But this bill goes the length of seeking to limit the production of natural products by a regulation which will be carried out through ths instrumentality of licensing. Licensing simply means that producers will have to comply with whatever the governor in council wishes to lay down as conditions upon which exportation can take place. That I think is a very serious departure in the whole business of legislation respecting the trade of this country, and should not be countenanced because it may lead anywhere.

I come back to what I said a day or two ago, that I believe this desire to limit production and trade through the instrumentality of licensing exporters and importers is part of a broader plan which aims, and in the future will be seen to aim, at the regulation of trade within channels within the British Empire at the expense of world trade. The Minister of Agriculture said that I had a vivid imagination when I made the statement that the government might wish to restrict trade in a manner which would cause it to flow in channels within the British Empire, even if such were at the expense of world trade. But I find that exactly that kind of policy is being set forth in different parts of the British Empire as the policy which certain governments should adopt.

I have in my hand a dispatch from London dated May 17, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 18 of this year, entitled, "Twofold policy now announced by Chamberlain. New world trade policy to which British government adheres outlined by Chancellor of Exchequer." The dispatch reads:

> London, May 17.—The new world trading policy to which Premier MacDonald's government now adheres has just been officially announced by Chancellor of the Exchequer Neville Chamberlain.

A little further on:

> The British cabinet has decided to develop a twofold policy in future of expanding the home market and developing inter-imperial agreements based on those of the Ottawa conference.

A little further on:

> Our main preoccupation will be domestic trade expansion and extension of the Ottawa pacts to the utmost. With such an object in view the British government intends to initiate a series of consultations with overseas premiers.

A little further on:

> Since the great slump began there has been a cessation of all foreign lending but lately representations have been made to the treasury to lift its ban on such loans. It is unlikely in view of the government's announced trade policy this will now be done.
>
> Meanwhile the dominions will benefit. They will have full access to the London financial market.

In other words, there is distinctly set forth by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain an imperial trade policy and an imperial financial policy, each of which seeks to regulate both trade and finance within the British Empire I shall not be surprised if, when we come to consider further the banking legislation in this house we will get still further evidence of the fact that it too is being fashioned by the government to accord with imperial policies of trade and finance.

In order that there may be no mistake about such a policy not being confined to Britain alone, let me make mention of a speech which hon. members no doubt either heard at the time or have since read which was recently made by the Prime Minister of Canada, in which he too dealt with the trading policy of his own administration. He defined it as a trading policy sealing empire unity. I have in my hand the account of the address to which I refer, as it appears in the Ottawa Citizen of May 24. It was made by the Prime Minister on May 23 of this year when the Prime Minister was responding to the toast of Canada at the Royal Empire Society's annual banquet at Montreal on the night of the twenty-third instant. The dispatch has the following:

> Speaking of the loyalty of empire peoples to the crown and the ties that bind the family of nations within the commonwealth, Mr. Bennett urged the necessity of evolving a common foreign trade policy which would seal and perpetuate the unity.

At that same gathering addresses were delivered by the trade commissioners from Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, the British West Indies and Bermuda. I have not any objection at all to the government having as its policy in matters of trade, an empire trade policy, but what I do take exception to is their lack of frankness and candour in not coming forward and saying that such is exactly what they have in mind. Instead of doing that they place on the statute books an act, under the guise of a measure to regulate marketing, which in reality so long as it contains the sections that we are discussing at the moment may be used, and I believe is intended to be used, to restrict exportation from this country of natural products where it may serve this imperial trade policy so to do, and equally to restrict imports into this country where it may serve this imperial trade policy so to do.

For my part I believe that what is best for Canada in the matter of trade is a world policy. I believe that as we build up our trade with all the nations of the world so will we build up a stronger Canada, and to that extent a stronger empire in virtue of Canada being a constituent element thereof.

There is another exception Mr. Chairman, I wish to take to this section, and to it I wish to take very strong exception. It is that here again is a move to deprive individuals of their rights and their liberties at the instance of an arbitrary tribunal, and without permitting the redress which the courts of the land should be in a position to afford. That kind of thing has become so common in this country that it has already been commented upon by members of the judiciary, who are in an exceptional position to judge of infringements of the rights and the liberties of the individual. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite say that if proceedings are to be begun under the provisions of the law which impose fines and penalties they will have to be taken in a court of the land where those affected will have all the protection which the law affords, and where they will not be deprived of their rights and liberties without due process of law. This section, however, says nothing whatever about any right of appeal to courts, only that the governor in council may determine who may import and who may export, and that he may do so by issuing licences, also that the governor in council is to determine under what conditions the licences are to be granted. I say that the moment a man is unable to secure a licence to import or a licence to export that very moment he is deprived of some of his rights and liberties, and according to this section if deprived he has no redress in the courts of the land because it is the governor in council who alone provides for the licensing and who alone determines what natural products may be imported or exported, and prescribes the forms of such licences and the terms and conditions upon which they may be given and revoked.

I referred last week to the important work by Lord Hewart the Chief Justice of Great Britain entitled The New Despotism, which takes exception to this depriving of individuals of their rights and privileges and liberties by arbitrary action on the part of boards and councils, whether they be the governor in council or some other general or local boards, without the safeguarding of those rights and liberties by the kind of protection which the courts have been created to afford. I desire to quote now from a chief justice of our own country. I have in my hand a copy of a very notable address which was delivered by the Chief Justice of Ontario, the Right Hon. Sir William Mulock, a short time ago, at a dinner which was given in his honour by the Bar of the province of Ontario. Sir William Mulock has had exceptionally wide experience in the matter of legislation, and I do not think he can be accused of being other than a true friend of the farmers of this country. In this parliament he was always a champion of their rights. For twenty-three years the Right Honourable Sir William Mulock was a member of this House of Commons; for nine of those years he was a minister of the crown; for twenty-nine years he has been a judge of the High Court, during which time he has been Chief Justice of Ontario for eleven years. I submit that anything said by the Right Honourable Sir William Mulock with respect to legislation and its effects is deserving of very careful consideration by the Parliament of Canada. I quote from Sir William's Speech as reported in the Canadian Bar

Review of January, 1934. At page 38, he is reported as follows:

I desire to bring to your attention a subject of the greatest importance, one which concerns the liberties, the rights, the happiness of every citizen in Canada, and the welfare of Canada itself.

I refer to the ever-increasing practice of the parliament of Canada and of our provincial legislatures of depriving our people of the protection of the law and of the courts, by vesting in autocratic bodies the power to arbitrarily deal with matters affecting our liberties and other rights without the intervention of any court.

I wish it clearly understood that the views to which I am giving expression have no reference to the actions of any one political party, but are intended solely as an abstract criticism of the practice of legislatures in shutting the doors of the duly constituted courts of justice against any citizen, rich or poor, high or low, whatever be his position in the community, and leaving the decision of his legal rights at the mercy of any non-judicial body, often ignorant of the law, bound by no no law, free to disregard the evidence and the law, and practically at its own will, to dispose finally of his rights.

Most people in Canada are of opinion that everywhere throughout the land the rule of law prevails and is sovereign guardian of their rights. It is not so.

For long years legislatures have encroached upon many of the people's most sacred rights, deprived them of the protection of the courts of justice, and conferred upon commissions, public officers and other irresponsible bodies the power of arbitrarily determining the people's rights.

To this situation all political parties have contributed; and the fact that the people generally have acquiesced in such legislation indicates an alarming indifference of the people themselves to the public safety.

I think I am safe in saying that there are literally many hundreds of boards and officers in Canada to-day authorized to exercise arbitrary power in dealing with the liberty and property of our citizens, and that free from any right of our courts to review such decisions.

Many of these boards are not bound by their previous decisions; are free to put their own construction on the common law and the statute law; to revive the star chamber method of conducting their proceedings behind closed doors, and to give no reasons for their decisions; the wronged suitor being left without redress.

This legislative invasion of the people's rights is continuing with ever-increasing momentum, and will undoubtedly continue until an aroused public opinion teaches the people's representatives that the spirit of John Hampden still lives and demands the restoration of the people's rights, and regards every representative who fails to resist arbitrary legislation as an enemy and a traitor to Canada.

That is not the comment of someone participating in a debate in a partisan way or from partisan motives, it is the deliberate and carefully expressed statement of a distinguished and revered chief justice of our country. I submit that its admonition applies immediately to what is being attempted in the section which we have before us at the present time. The section as originally drafted left the issuing and cancellation of licences exclusively with the board. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) evidently has recognized that that was indefensible, and has sought to bring the matter within the control of the governor in council. May I point out to him that the governor in council conducts his operations behind closed doors, that the governor in council may be just as arbitrary as any other tribunal and not infrequently is most arbitrary. When, as regards imports and exports, it is left to the governor in council to say who is to be licensed and who is not to be licensed, without this parliament having indicated in advance the limits within which the governor in council shall act in a matter of that kind, it is a very distinct invasion of the fundamental rights of the people. When that invasion affects the rights of producers and consumers it is invading pretty well the rights of all classes in the country. It is to this aspect of the section that I wish to take the strongest exception.

With respect to exceptional occurrences which may arise and to which reference was made a few days ago by the minister, I can see every reason why a statute might be so framed as to make provision that in certain exceptional circumstances and to meet certain needs, of which parliament would be informed immediately, the governor in council might have authority to take action of an exceptional nature. That is all right, but this is not for action of an exceptional nature, it is conferring a general power on the governor in council to be exercised at any and all times, and that I think is entirely wrong.

May I make mention of another circumstance which I believe to be vital. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said at different times that the British government take certain rights and have certain powers and authority given to them. They argue that we ought to follow that example and that our government should have similar rights. I would take no exception to that as respects the present bill if the measure contained, as does the British legislation, all kinds of safeguards against arbitrary action framed in the interest of consumers as well as producers. We would then have a very different measure from that which we have here. The point, however, which I wish to bring out at the moment is this: The British parliament is in session practically the year round and the statutes in Great Britain require that as soon as any action is taken under any of these measures, it is to be reported immediately to parliament, or if parliament be adjourned as soon after its reassembling as possible. All action taken by the British government and by local boards under its legislation must be reported to both houses of parliament. With what result? You have parliament practically continually exercising the fullest supervision over any orders in council which may be passed by the King in council, and over regulations by any minister of a department. Here in Canada the time during which parliament is in session is much shorter, and it is during the period when parliament is not in session that we may expect the governor in council to be passing the various orders to which strong exception is likely to be taken. For these reasons I feel that this section should not be permitted to pass. I believe, if enacted, it will work unexpected hardship in a multitude of directions. In saying that, I repeat once more that if the government need exceptional power for exceptional purposes a section could be drafted and passed by this parliament which would give to them all that is required to meet any emergent situation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There does not seem to be any reply from the minister. I wish to associate myself with my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) in all that he has said. He has said much better all that I wanted to say myself. Something might be done to provide for exceptions instead of having a general rule like this. The government sometimes answer us by saying they will use good judgment, but what kind of judgment have they shown in getting this bill through? What kind of experience have they seemed to have? Every move has been a new blunder and if the bill is administered in the same way, it will not be wisdom they will be showing, it will be the blundering they have shown all along. I have no desire to get out of patience but I am pretty nearly fed up with their trying to make a good bill out of a monstrosity. I sometimes feel like telling the minister and the government to take their blooming bill, assume full responsibility for it and do with it what they like—what Paddy did with the sixpence.

There is one suggestion I should like to make. We might finish with this bill and then leave it in committee till it is reprinted. This might be done in order that there would be no delay with the legislation now pressing on the house or in the offing. I have made this suggestion before and I should like the minister to give us his assurance that if the bill went through now we would at least have a look at it first before leaving the committee stage. If it were reprinted before it went out of committee, I think that would be only fair. I suggest that instead of moving it out of committee, immediately we have reached the last section, the minister have it reprinted, because there must be a good many other matters to be dealt with with which so far the minister has not dealt—sections that are standing. We have had a clarification list of eighteen sections, and now we have had further clarifications of the clarifications, and I should not be surprised if we had another set of clarifications—a clarification of the clarifications of the clarifications. I think it would be a mercy to the government as well as to the rest of us if they would take a day to have it published. Let us look it over to see what it looks like, so that we may get all this patchwork together in the form of a bill. Surely that is not an unreasonable request. We do not want to go to the third reading stage without having all this patchwork put together, because that would necessitate moving that the bill be referred back to the committee, and as far as I am concerned, speaking for myself I do not want to do that. Would the minister entertain that suggestion? Let us get it through somehow and let it stand until it is printed so that we may have a look at it before it reaches the third reading stage, before it goes out of committee. The Minister of Justice knows that that is a reasonable proposal.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the remarks of the leader of the opposition, I did not rise to make any reply because I could see, in what he said, nothing that had not already been replied to. His imagination, and particularly his suspicion, has lost nothing as a result of his rest over the weekend. I made it as clear as I could make anything, with my limited knowledge of English, that in the preparation of this bill there was no intention of putting it to the use which the right hon. gentleman suggested would be made of it in connection with empire trade—the use which he said was the chief principle of the bill. To-day he repeats that he still believes it is intended to use the act based upon this bill to restrict trade with foreign countries for the purpose of increasing trade, or of directing the channels of trade, throughout the empire; and he also states that an endeavour is being made seeking to limit production.

I cannot understand why the right hon. gentleman, from the time the bill was introduced until the present moment, has persisted in reading into it, as one of its chief principles, the limiting of production, unless the reason is that having read that principle into the bill the first time it appeared before the house he feels it incumbent upon him to substantiate that assertion, repeated at least fifteen times in his original speech, with respect to what he considers to be the purpose of this legislation.

Let me repeat briefly now what I have stated before, and let me try to make it if anything clearer on this occasion. No government in any country would pass legislation to restrict the export of primary products or of any of its commodities to any other country of its own volition; but we must remember that other countries are imposing quotas against imports into their territory. For example, Great Britain might at the beginning of the year limit the exports of our cattle to the United Kingdom to 20,000 head for the year, let us say for the sake of illustration. Now, we have no say in that regard. But if the British parliament did pass such legislation it would be necessary for this government to have certain powers over exports to regulate the flow of that commodity out of this country into the United Kingdom; otherwise there would be a tendency on the part of those whose business it was to export cattle or to raise cattle for export to throw as many as they could on the old country market, and to do so immediately. And the old country would accept them until the quota had been filled. Then there would be an unnecessary glut of the market in Canada. And the throwing upon the British market at one particular time, and in a short space of time, of that number of cattle which we were allowed in our quota would be disadvantageous to our producers.

We do not know in that connection what action may be taken by any country to set up quotas, because I am told there are restrictions in trade, through the instrumentality of quotas, in more than twenty different countries, practically all European. France perhaps has come out more decidedly than any other country in the use of quotas as such to control trade, using them as an instrument of negotiation with other countries.

Here I should like to remind the leader of the opposition of something which apparently he has lost sight of completely. I believe that one of the greatest obstacles in Canada to the negotiation of trade with other countries is the most favoured nation treaty introduced and put into practice by the government which the right hon. gentleman himself led; because as soon as any country offers to negotiate, or as soon as we approach another country with offers of negotiation, we find that we are tied to so many other countries that we are obliged to make similar arrangements with them. I have therefore no hesitation in saying that one of the greatest obstacles to the widening of our trade the world over through negotiation is this very treaty for which the government led by the right hon. gentleman himself was responsible.

I see nothing to be gained by the reprinting of this bill before the third reading. We have spent enough time on it, and every member of the committee should know it almost by heart.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to my hon. friend's last remark, I think that if the minister will look up his own utterances, or those of some of his colleagues, he will find that an undertaking was given earlier in the discussion that the bill would be reprinted for the third reading. The minister is saying now that he will not concede that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I said it would be printed for the third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought the minister said it would not be printed for the third reading.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Before the third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We wished it for the third reading. The minister says that he said it would not be printed before the third reading; I do not think that was what we heard. However, there is no difference between us if we understand that the bill will be reprinted and that we shall have an opportunity of looking it over before being asked to vote on the third reading.

With respect to what the minister says as to the use to which this measure may be put, namely to meet in the way he has indicated a situation that may arise in Great Britain, I take no exception. I will admit that he may use the measure as a means of helping to meet certain situations as they may arise, and in the way he has suggested. But I would point out with deference that he himself may not always be the minister; and even if he is, he may find himself subject to cabinet policies much broader than those of his own department. Indeed, the very clause which he says will be used in one way is equally capable of being used in quite another. I shall illustrate. I will take the very example suggested by the minister. The minister says, assume for example that there are certain restrictions on cattle going to the British market. These would naturally be annoying to our producers. He then said, we can prevent certain shippers shipping all kinds of cattle, we can have regard for this provision and see that only certain classes are shipped. But is it not also possible that the government, seeing what the British government has done, may begin to follow a policy quite other than that which the Prime Minister has just laid down, namely the policy of making tariffs fight for the producers; and when the British government begins to restrict importations from Canada, immediately retaliate or threaten retaliation by restricting what in the way of imports may come in from Great Britain to Canada? Under this clause, as I read it, the government have the power of beginning a species of economic warfare between different parts of the British Empire, to say nothing of between Canada and other parts of the world, a species of economic warfare which may be wholly ruinous to inter-Imperial trade as well as to trade in general. I think that possibility is there, especially when the Prime Minister himself, has elsewhere declared that part of his policy is to make tariffs fight for us. You have there a very clear assertion that some power is needed which will enable the government here—it would not be parliament, it would be the governor in council probably when parliament is not in session at all—to stop altogether certain importations into this country. I think parliament ought not to permit the possibility of any such thing, but parliament cannot prevent that possibility unless now, while it has the opportunity, it refuses to enact a clause of this kind.

Before the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) goes out, apropos of this provision, which here carries regulation to the extent of prohibiting imports altogether, may I ask the minister if he will tell us what has caused him so completely to change his whole point of view with respect to the excessive paternal regulation of trade. I have in my hand a statement made by the minister himself, on June 8, 1926, over so small a question as that of grading eggs. The Minister of Justice at that time waxed very eloquent with respect to a bill brought in simply to regulate the grading of eggs. Let me read what he said:

> I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the whole system is wrong. Surely we can continue the open market system.

Well, this is not the open market system, this is a proposal to let the governor in council close the markets, both import and export. However, let me go on:

> If you are going to grade eggs, why not grade other produce? Why not grade butter, fruit, potatoes and other vegetables, that are bought on the market? Why compel the farmers to undergo this grading system only in regard to their eggs? I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is an imposition upon the farmers of this country, and more particularly it is an imposition on the wives of the farmers. No injustice has been done in the past under the old system. Both purchaser and vendor have been satisfied with the old open market system, where the good old doctrine of "caveat emptor" —let the buyer beware—prevailed. Under that system the purchaser got the eggs he bargained for, and the vendor was satisfied with the manner in which his eggs were sold. But these regulations are carrying this paternal idea in government to excess.

If that was true in regard simply to the grading of eggs how can the Minister of Justice to-day justify a paternal system which may possibly preclude altogether either importation or exportation of certain commodities?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In those days I thought egg-grading was a great nuisance, and I think it is yet. But there was a more serious objection than that; this parliament had no right to pass such a law, and the courts set the law aside. Until the provinces took it up and passed legislation egg-grading was not enforceable.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well now, I was not intending to allude again to that cruel joke we had on the Minister of Justice, because he took it so nicely. But it did pass the courts by us getting the necessary enabling legislation in seven provinces out of nine.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Stockyards and the grading of hogs were in the same category. But before we took that extreme measure we had to try the other way first. That was not the ground or objection my hon. friend took against egg grading.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I condemned it as a nuisance, and I do yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Your constituents do not think so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well I thought so, and I do yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well it is a cruel thing on my good friend to open that up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the paternal idea in government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He was up against it so badly he has been blushing ever since about it. Anyhow, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question. There was some talk by the Prime Minister about being mercenary, that there was nothing mercenary in the government. Well there never was a request made by my predecessor to let a bill or a section or a vote on the estimates stand while the member was away but it was granted, but I cannot get the least thing of that nature from this minister, not as much as you could fill a thimble with. I wonder if he can tell us this? If an order of the kind that we are discussing is passed, as a result of a scheme for the regulation of some product, say in Prince Edward Island, silver fox pelts or anything of the kind—they are not regulated in the province now, but they may be at any time—if such an order is passed and the government meets the situation by taking steps to stop the competition of a similar commodity coming into the country, potatoes or anything you can imagine, will this order, made on the petition if only of a part of Canada, extend right from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver, in jurisdiction or will it be circumscribed by the area of the regulated product?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is for export.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it is imports we are on now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Section 12 covers both.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I do not care which way it is, will an order that is an outcome of a marketing scheme got up by a locality or province be national in its effect, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As it reads it has to do with imports into Canada, and I would take it to mean that it would be a national order, covering exports and imports.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then we have the spectacle of a marketing scheme for a small locality determining the export and import policy of all Canada. Did you ever hear of the like? I think we should let this thing go, if we desire to hurt the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One moment. There is one other objection to this clause I desire to raise, and then if the committee wish to pass it, well and good. It is that this provision is but a part of the government's policy of scarcity, of promoting scarcity instead of plenty; a policy that has been strongly denounced in different parts of our own country, and where it has been attempted in other countries as well.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So that we may have the benefit of the right hon. gentleman's opinion, would he explain how anything in this section or in this bill has for its purpose a policy of creating scarcity? As I have stated, this has to do solely with orders of governments outside of this country, over which we have no control.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well the whole bill is one relating to curtailment through licensing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not of production.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does not mention the word production. Here again I wish to take exception to the government's method of proceeding. They have referred over and over again to the British marketing legislation and said, we are proceeding along lines similar to the British marketing legislation. But if one looks at the British legislation one finds that it refers from beginning to end to production. In Britain they face the question squarely and say, production may be limited. But this government has not the courage to say it is restriction of production, they say they are simply restricting importation and exportation and trade. I ask again if it is not a fact that you cannot restrict the sale of particular commodities, either the importation or exportation, without that inevitably acting upon and restricting production? That is the whole purpose, that is the whole purpose of licensing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is not the right hon. gentleman in what he has already said advocating that we do adopt a policy of restricted production? Because he quotes the British act as providing for a restriction of production.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The British act speaks about production. If my hon. friend will safeguard this legislation with the safeguards the British have thrown around their legislation, then I would be prepared to give him my support. The British act, first of all, takes care to see that different departments of the government are involved in any restrictions that may be imposed. In the second place, as I have already pointed out, the British act deals solely with imports and not with exports of any kind. In the third place the British act provides that all legislation under that measure, before it can be of any force or effect at all, must receive the approval of both the House of Commons and the House of Lords. This act does not require anything of the kind; as has been said over and over again, its whole purpose is to get away from the House of Commons and the Senate and to allow the governor in council to do as he pleases with respect to the power given him under this legislation.

Take a specific example; assume that for some reason the government thought there were too many potatoes being grown in Canada. All the government would have to do would be to pass an order in council setting forth that in their opinion the total quantity of potatoes should be so much, and that in order to produce potatoes licences would thereafter have to be obtained by all potato growers which licences would set forth how much by way of the production of potatoes they would thereafter be permitted. The minister cannot say that that power is not in this bill. He may say he does not intend to use it in that way, but so long as it is there it can be so used. What is true of potatoes is true of every other natural product, whether it be a product of agriculture, of the fisheries or of the forests. The minister states that this act is going to be used as a means of combating embargoes and prohibitions in other countries, I can see that it will not be very long before under the guise of regulating trade, it will be used as a first class instrument of economic warfare through the imposition of prohibitions, quotas and other restrictions against countries that may adopt a similar attitude towards Canada.

Before we go in for a policy of that kind, it should be clearly sanctioned by this parliament, that we should not at this time put the House of Commons in a position where it can be said later on that the house consented to the governor in council having a power of the kind. The policy of scarcity is the base offspring of those base policies of economic nationalism and economic imperialism which are rampant in different parts of the world, and which are now being adopted in our own country; policies which everyone denounces when he speaks of what is at the bottom of the world's ills to-day, but which, apparently, no parliament is seeking to throw off, or at all events combat in the open way in which they should be combatted. We find one country destroying its coffee, another destroying some of its live stock, a third destroying something else; we even find our own government entering into agreements—without the consent, the knowledge or the authority of this parliament—limiting the total amount of wheat that can be produced in the country or sold abroad.

That is the kind of thing I mean when I speak of a policy of scarcity. It is not only individuals in this parliament who feel aroused and riled about it; those in other walks of life who are most concerned with the well being of our citizens are beginning to protest openly against this vicious policy which aims at scarcity of production rather than at plenty. When I spoke on the address I was taken to task by the Prime Minister because I made a reference to the prayer book of the Anglican church. What do we find the Very Rev. Dean Riley saying, in the cathedral in Hamilton, as to the policy of scarcity? Let me quote a dispatch I hold in my hand:

> "It's a damned blasphemy and I use these words advisedly," stated Very Rev. C. E. Riley, B.A., D.D., Dean of Niagara, in a trenchant attack on the present system of distribution before a large congregation at the 92nd annual service of St. George's society of Hamilton, at Christ's Church cathedral last night.

That appears in the account of the Hamilton Spectator of April 23, and the report goes on to quote the dean's very strong denunciation of what he refers to as this business of legislators trying to limit production when they ought to devote their efforts to seeing that production is more plentiful and that there is a better and wider distribution. Let me quote the following comment upon the dean's utterances which appeared in another Hamilton paper the Hamilton Herald of April 26. It is as follows:

> The outburst of the Very Rev. Dean Riley on Sunday evening may have shocked his audience, but the shock was nothing to what the people of the dominion have felt who are directly concerned with the results of the policy he denounced.

That is not an opinion quoted in England; that is the opinion of the dean of a cathedral in Hamilton, speaking of policies as he sees them in Canada at the present time.

> His position was a reasonable and logical one. The Anglican church in its comprehensive litany and collects leaves little in human affairs out of consideration.
>
> The prayers for harvest bounty and for happy seedtime are thoughtful and natural expressions. We pray to God "that it may please Thee to give and preserve to our use the kindly fruits of the earth so that in due time we may enjoy them"; and again—"Increase the fruits of the earth by Thy heavenly benedictions; and grant that we, receiving Thy bountiful liberality, may use the same to Thy glory"; and again—"We give Thee humble thanks for this Thy special bounty, beseeching Thee to continue Thy loving kindness unto us; that our land may yield us her fruits of increase, to Thy glory and our comfort."

Surely the dean was justified in using the strongest language about those who profess to honour God and then deliberately take away from His children the opportunity of enjoying the kindly fruits they have prayed for; and all merely because they are not wise enough to plan for plenty, and too ignorant of the methods of commerce to do anything but blockade the traffic of the world.

That is what hon. gentlemen opposite are doing by this legislation, blockading the traffic of the world. This bill seeks to give power to the governor in council to control imports and exports as he pleases. In this very city, within the last week, while this House of Commons was debating this very question, another prominent divine gave utterance to words very similar. He happened to belong to a different denomination; I refer to Reverend Robert D. Whyte, former minister of Knox church in this city. I have in my hand the report of an address which the Reverend Mr. Whyte gave on May 22. In it I find the following:

"It is utterly fallacious and the wildest kind of insanity for Brazilians to burn their coffee, for New Zealanders to drive their sheep into the sea and for governments to drive farmers to keep acres out of production.

You could not get a more pointed statement in opposition to legislation such as that before us at the moment.

Mr. COTNAM: Is he an authority?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I fear he is a much better authority than my hon. friend; he speaks in a very disinterested way for the general public. He is not supporting a government as a party man, in connection with a party measure.

Mr. COTNAM: For whom are you speaking. Are you not supporting a party?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here is what the Reverend Mr. Whyte further says:

"Our statesmen must be in a fog and incapable of finding their way out," he continued. "I don't know how such men go to church at Thanksgiving to thank God for the earth bringing forth its increase." . . . "People are asked to go to the polls to vote to keep things out and statesmen meet to limit production. There ought to be an answer to such an incongruous absurdity, yet last year a plague of grasshoppers instead of being a catastrophe was hailed as a blessing."

It is to that sort of thing that the people all over the country are taking exception. I venture to say that until this year, we in this parliament never heard a minister of the crown advocate a policy of limiting production. It has been slipped in and along, one stage at a time, and now we have reached the point where the government demand the right to do as they please with regard to the restriction of imports and exports. I say that power never should be given to any body other than parliament itself. I believe, moreover, it is a power to which the governor in council has no right. The constitution of the country gives this parliament the sole control of trade and commerce. It does not provide that a body subordinate to this parliament shall be placed in a position superior to it. The trouble with the whole of this legislation is that it takes a number of subordinate bodies, tiny little local boards to begin with, then provincial boards and the board to be created by the governor in council, and finally the governor in council himself, and confers on all these subordinate bodies powers of legislation which are superior to those retained by parliament for itself. That is all wrong. That is contrary altogether to the sovereignty of parliament and the rule of law, and should not be countenanced for one moment.

Mr. TURNBULL: One thing certain, whatever the reverend gentleman from Hamilton said or did, he did not parody the Prayer Book. The action of the right hon. leader of the opposition, in quoting the dean in support of his own actions is going pretty far. With regard to the reverend gentleman from Ottawa. I have no doubt that he was misled by one of my right hon. friend's speeches. Having taken the whole of his evening reading the speech, he had not time to read the other side of the story; consequently he got into trouble.

The right hon. gentleman says we are following a policy which will promote scarcity. He has said no Liberal minister of the crown ever advocated in parliament the principle of restricting or of lessening production. I wonder if the Hon. Charles A. Dunning was speaking for the government when he said what I shall quote. The statement to which I shall refer is reported in the Regina Leader of June 13, 1930, and appears on the first page of the second section of the paper. Mr. Dunning was at that time addressing a meeting of the Regina Women's Club, held at the home of one of the citizens of the city of Regina and, speaking of conditions at that time he said this:

At present there is more than is needed in the world of the principal basic commodities. There is too much wheat, coffee, steel. There is a greater capacity for production of the needs of humanity than people can buy and pay for. Nowhere is this more true than in the United States. Production must lessen until consumption catches up with it. That period will be a difficult and hard time.

I ask my right hon. friend this question: Was the Minister of Finance in his government speaking for the government when he made that statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Most certainly not. And if he were speaking for the government he was simply making a general statement about world conditions, and was not setting forth any policy on behalf of the government.

Mr. TURNBULL: It is a new theory in government when we find that the Minister of Finance does not speak for the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about the Minister of Railways in the South Oxford by-election?

Mr. MANION: What did I say?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With regard to lowering interest rates.

An hon. MEMBER: Keep quiet.

Mr. MANION: I stand by those remarks.

Mr. TURNBULL: Especially when he is doing it in the middle of an election campaign, and is proposing to put forward the policy of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So was the Minister of Railways.

Mr. TURNBULL: And, in connection with the suggestion that he was talking about general world conditions, may I say that one of the particular commodities he mentioned was that of wheat. If my right hon. friend will pursue the speeches of the Hon. Mr. Dunning made about that time he will find that his minister discussed wheat, specifically, as being one of the difficulties. In fact, in his budget speech of May 1, 1930, he made the statement that our exports to Great Britain had decreased in the past fiscal year by $148,000,000, most of which was attributable to grains, that our exports to the continent had decreased by $80,000,000, and that exports of grain to the continent had decreased by $81,000,000. He seemed to be very much worried about the world situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend in order to make my position clear? I take no exception whatever to the government giving all that it possibly can by way of information to the public, and acquainting the public as fully as possible with all the facts it should have. That is an entirely different thing, however, from the government assuming the paternal attitude here intended and determining for the people what they are to do once they get the information.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not know what the Minister of Finance of that day meant when he told the people that production must lessen until consumption catches up.

Mr. BROWN: Did he propose legislative action?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): He meant what he said.

Mr. TURNBULL: He did not get a chance to put legislation into effect, and if he had come into office in 1930 and introduced the legislation the hon. member for Lisgar would have been the first man to get up in his seat and vote for it. We heard something also with regard to making agreements restricting sales of wheat. Although this matter has not much to do with the clause under discussion, may I say that the agreement provided for a Canadian quota of 200,000,000 bushels. If the right hon. gentleman would look up the record of our export to the world in the crop year of 1929-30, which closed on July 31, 1930, along with the term of office of the right hon. gentleman, he would see that the last crop year synchronized with the last year of office of the right hon. gentleman, and would find that the export of wheat for the year amounted not to 200,000,000 bushels, but to 155,000,000 odd.

Mr. YOUNG: What were the figures for the year before?

Mr. TURNBULL: Do not worry about the year before.

Mr. YOUNG: They were the biggest we ever had—370,000,000 bushels.

Mr. TURNBULL: Why did you lose it? If Canada had a market for 370,000,000 bushels in 1929, why did she not have a market for 370,000,000 in 1930?

Mr. BROWN: You tell us why.

Mr. TURNBULL: Because hon. members opposite were in power.

Mr. YOUNG: Did conditions improve when the new government came in?

Mr. TURNBULL: Certainly they did. During the term of office of the late government every European country increased its tariffs on wheat going into those countries to the point where they became prohibitive, and not only that but during their term of office these European countries put quotas against our wheat, along with the wheat of other exporting countries, until we could not sell in those countries.

Speaking at a nomination meeting on June 17, 1930, and speaking shortly after that at Melfort, the then Minister of Finance defending his budget said that we had lost the markets in Europe, and that the only market we had left was in Great Britain. He said if we could not sell our wheat to Great Britain we could not sell it anywhere. That was the position hon. members opposite were in with respect to wheat. But there has not been one year since this government took office that Canada has not sold more than 155,000,000 bushels of wheat.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: You gave it away; you did not sell it.

Mr. TURNBULL: Why do hon. members opposite take the position they are taking in connection with this bill?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): They do not know, themselves.

Mr. TURNBULL: There used to be a time when they had some sympathy with the desire of the farmers to market their produce in an orderly manner. They took that position at one time. To-day however we have the opposition of the Liberal party. True, we had the vote of the ex-Minister of Agriculture, but while he voted for the bill he has damned it in all his discussions. He talks on one side and votes on another.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am exercising my reservations, that is all—and I made a good many of them.

Mr. TURNBULL: You reserved most of the bill, I think. The hon. gentleman can go back to his constituency in Melville, and when he meets one person in favour of the bill he may say, "I voted for it." But when he meets another person who is opposed to the bill he may say, "I talked against it"—and in that way he may ride on both sides of the fence. He is the old-type politician who has not forgotten the old way.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have done exactly as I said I would do.

Mr. TURNBULL: There was a time in the history of the Liberal party when they were working for the farmers in the country.

Mr. YOUNG: And we are still.

[Mr. Turnbull.]

Mr. TURNBULL: Let us take the situation to-day: The right hon. leader of the opposition has said he does not like the idea of tariffs fighting for the producers. He has said he never imposed a protective tariff to protect any industry; in his case it was always tariff for revenue. That tariff for revenue protected the goods of the manufacturer but did not protect the goods of the producer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about Dominion Textiles?

Mr. TURNBULL: What about Dominion Textiles? Was it not the government of the right hon. leader of the opposition which fixed the empire content of textiles at fifty per cent so that British textiles could not enter this country under the British preferential tariff? Why do they talk about textiles?

Mr. YOUNG: Tell us about the September budget.

Mr. TURNBULL: In 1930 the attitude of the Liberal party towards the farmer was quite different. I have before me some remarks which were made by the then Minister of Finance, and which are reported at page 1614 of Hansard of that year. These were the remarks of the minister in his speech introducing the budget for which hon. gentlemen opposite voted. Mr. Dunning said:

> Western farmers are also advancing along cooperative lines designed to promote orderly marketing of crops. Too much importance cannot be attached to these efforts. Canada's grain producing power is tremendous. In marketing she must compete with the world. Cooperative effort in the direction of the most economical marketing methods should command the sympathetic support of all Canadians.

Here we have a bill to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products and in the export trade, making provisions in connection therewith and containing clauses to prevent too great a spread between producer and consumer, and then instead of this bill receiving the sympathetic support of all Canadians it has the wholehearted opposition of every member or the official opposition in this house. Why the change since 1930? Why is it that they are sliding back to the Magna Charta when in the old days they were in favour of the "sympathetic support of all Canadians for more economic marketing methods."

Mr. BROWN: We still are.

Mr. YOUNG: This is not an economic marketing method.

Mr. TURNBULL: My hon. friend from Lisgar says, "We still are." He never was in favour of anything which the Liberal party did not back up, not even when he was a Progressive. He was selected a Progressive-Liberal, and he sits here a dyed-in-the-wool Liberal ever since he was elected, and he has never cast a vote or said a word against his Liberal leader. He will be sympathetic with a marketing bill if his Liberal leader introduces it. If anybody else introduces it he will be dead against it. That is the whole story from the other side of the house.

As I said the other day, why do we not get through this bill and give the farmer in this country a break? Why not give our primary producers a chance to get orderly marketing of their products? Why must we contend day after day to get a little something for the farmers out of the opposition? Every bill that comes into this house to give the farmer a chance is met wth the argument—the rights of parliament and the liberties of the individual. To-day again we heard the argument against licensing, that a man must have a licence to market his crop, and the very minute he cannot get a licence the leader of the opposition says that the man is prevented from carrying on his trade.

Mr. VENIOT: Why not?

Mr. TURNBULL: And my hon. friend from Gloucester says, "Why not?" Does not he along with other hon. members realize that there is hardly a business in this country that is not licensed? Does he not realize that every town, every city, every village in this country almost without exception imposes licences for this business, that business and the other business? My hon. friend from Weyburn could not run a pool room in his own town without a licence.

Mr. VENIOT: You can run a manufacturing business.

Mr. TURNBULL: You could not own a dog in Ottawa unless you got a dog licence for it, and the minute you cannot get a dog licence you must get rid of your dog.

Mr. VENIOT: Why do you want to put the farmer in the same category as the dog, and force him to have a licence?

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not. I put the farmer in the same category as the hon. member for Gloucester, and perhaps there is cause for complaint in that. Ever since this Canada of ours was a civilized country there have been licensing laws and other laws that have subordinated the position of the individual to the good of the community, and to the extent that they kept a man from doing what he liked they might have restricted his individual liberty, but the liberty of the individual, as the leader of the opposition has said, must at times be subordinated to the general welfare of the community.

All we are asking in this bill is that regulation be applied in the marketing of products for the general welfare of those who have the products to market, that where we are moving our products into limited markets there be some regulation of the quality and quantity of goods that goes into the limited market. And now we are confronted with opposition from the other side of the house to the very thing which the Minister of Finance adhered to in 1930, the very things on which he asked the voters to support him. Then he was a member of the government of the leader of the opposition, and now hon. gentlemen opposite are opposed to the very things which they supported in 1930 because they are sitting on the other side of the house and we are sitting on this side. It is the old political game.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: You will not be there long.

Mr. TURNBULL: If the hon. member for Provencher thinks he is going to get anything out of his opposition to this bill he is mistaken.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: You do not need to worry about me.

Mr. TURNBULL: I am not. Neither is anybody else.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: In the first place I say that this is not a marketing bill at all. It is a bill of restrictions and nothing else, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. TURNBULL: There is only one more point to which I wish to refer, and that is the citation made by the leader of the opposition from an article by the Chief Justice of Ontario in the Bar Review. The sentiments there expressed are admirable, and I think most people approve of them, but they have absolutely no bearing on what is in issue here to-day. What the Chief Justice of Ontario was condemning was the setting up of legislative courts that adjudicated on the rights of the people in place of the ordinary courts—workmen's compensation boards, for instance, which is one of the courts set up by legislative authority in the province to take from the ordinary courts the powers that they had theretofore exercised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was much wider than that, if my hon. friend has read the article.

Mr. TURNBULL: He may have covered more points than that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It covered arbitrary authority wherever exercised, whether by a court or a board.

Mr. TURNBULL: Certainly, but not arbitrary authority by parliament or arbitrary authority by order in council, if you want to call it that. It covers adjudication between individuals by these new courts, but has no reference to legislation. The chief justice would be the last man to criticize legislation or the methods of parliament. He is criticizing particularly the administration of civil justice by the granting of powers of adjudication to boards and taking those powers away from the civil courts, and the workmen's compensation board is the most pointed illustration of it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before this section is disposed of I would like to submit that the criticism raised by the leader of the opposition has no particular reference to the bill itself but is a valid criticism of our general ignoring of the necessity of a new policy with respect to monetary matters. The criticism of artificial scarcity that the leader of the opposition raises is sound, and every act of this government and of his own government in the past was calculated rather to assist in the creating of scarcity, so that commercial and other enterprises might be able to profit by the higher prices that would ensue therefrom.

So far as this bill is concerned, my conception of it—I may be incorrect but I hope I am not—is that it purports to improve the marketing processes of the primary producer so that he will be able to secure a larger share of the consumer's dollar expended for the goods so marketed. If the bill has any other purpose I do not believe I would have supported it. As the leader of the opposition has said, under our present system and with your present type of ministers here and in other countries you cannot expect the introduction of a policy calculated to do what he implied ought to be done, namely, to increase the purchasing power of the masses of the people. As long as you have your sound money system and your gold standard restrictions, as long as you have the present wholly unjust disparity in national income, just so long are you in the position of being compelled artificially to provide for scarcity, and the government of the leader of the opposition got no further away from that than the present government is getting away from it. We accept this bill only as a means of modifying slightly some of the inherent evils in a wrong monetary system. That is all. France presented the conference with a draft treaty for the definite limitation of production of a large number of basic commodities. The reference to Brazil has become almost classic in connection with monetary reforms. Six million bags of coffee destroyed last year and almost a million the year before. There was a limitation of cotton in Egypt in 1926 and again in the state of Texas. We have this artificial restriction of production offered as a cure under the system under which we are now living. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) has just suggested to me that the leader of the opposition has not yet proposed a scheme by which there would be any increase of the volume of purchasing power on the part of the masses of the people in order to enable the consumption of the plenty which we are now undoubtedly capable of producing. In my opinion, that is the nub of the whole business. If hon. members will take the well placed words of the leader of the opposition and analyze them with respect to the general economic conditions and general social system and work out a plan by which we shall endeavour definitely to consume production instead of trying to regulate, we would be on the fair road to happier days for all of us. I agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that there is no effective overproduction or surplus in the world. There is no surplus of wheat, there is no surplus of steel goods, there is no surplus of anything and there can be no surplus until, as was said by a mind equally astute to that of the leader of the opposition, Sir Basil Blackett, a director of the Bank of England, until the last Hottentot is living like a millionaire. The trouble with both Sir Basil Blackett and the leader of the opposition is that they have not related their broad conception of the trouble to the legislation necessary for monetary reform. We cannot lose sight of the fact that the masses of the people in this country have never yet received sufficient income to pay income tax. More than ninety seven and a half per cent of the Canadian people are below the income tax level of the dominion government. All the income tax that has ever been paid has been paid by two and a half per cent of the people. In the face of a scarcity of purchasing power of that kind, on the one hand, and a vast dominating wealth on the other, how is it possible to continue? The trouble with the present system is that there has never been a sufficient volume of purchasing power circulated by the present financial system. Never at any time. There are some free traders and mid-Victorian economists who protest that the mere act of production creates the necessary purchasing power, but that is not accepted to-day. Every modern economist states that there never has been and is not to-day a sufficient volume of purchasing power to take up consumption. Any student of modern finance knows that until we relate this problem to the point of view of consumption, even to more than consumption, it cannot be solved. I submit to the leader of the opposition that while his general criticism is sound, this bill itself will neither increase purchasing power as a whole nor decrease it as a whole. After the bill is passed the situation will be just about the same except that there will be a little more regulation in marketing.

Mr. NEILL: If this section stood by itself I would not be opposed to it because I realize that the government must have some means of dealing with quotas which may be proposed by foreign nations. But it does not stand by itself, it is associated with the preceding sections which gives it far greater powers for good or evil. If the minister had accepted the amendment which I proposed last week by which a scheme could not be initiated and controlled by the marketing end, that is, the wholesalers, the commission brokers and middlemen of that character; if he had accepted the other amendment which I suggested which made it compulsory to have a poll of the producers in an industry, then I would have had no objection to this section. But he did not allow these amendments to pass and this section now puts a fearful power into the hands of the men appointed in the manner I indicated earlier and by means of which they may obtain such drastic control that the producers might be in a far worse position than they were before. I should like to put something on record which I think will be worthwhile for the information, perhaps not of the minister, but of the producers throughout the country. It is what took place in Great Britain quite recently in connection with one of these schemes. I do this in order that the producers may have some idea of the situation they are liable to be up against. My information is not biased by any political or party considerations, as I take it from the pages of the Commercial Intelligence Journal of May 26. This deals with the hop situation in England. The hop production of England is small as the total acreage is between 16,000 and 17,000 acres. I ask my hon. friends from the prairies to compare an acreage of 16,000 or 17,000 acres with the almost unbounded wheat acreage of the prairies and realize what their situation may be when the situation I am about to outline occurred in connection with such a small area. The consumers of hops in Great Britain are a small associated body of brewers, readily if not easily negotiated with. This article is by Mr. G. S. Cole, Canadian trade commissioner, a man of high repute and I quote from page 865 as follows:

> The Agricultural Marketing Act of 1931 included a scheme for regulating the market of English hops. This was implemented through the formation of the English hops marketing board, 1932.

That is less than two years ago.

> The situation this year is complicated. Briefly, a bill is before parliament to enable the hops marketing board to impose quotas (1) on English production to prevent market flooding; (2) on imported supplies. The hops marketing board was successful in having the bill presented in the latter part of 1933,—

Apparently they had had some opposition but they succeeded in getting a bill before parliament. They had to have a bill.

> —but a committee of investigation was appointed in November, 1933, by the Minister of Agriculture under the agricultural marketing acts, 1931 and 1933, to consider the objections of the brewers' society to the scale of values placed by the hops marketing board in October, 1933, on the crop of that year. Early in February, 1934, the committee reported to the minister that the evidence and arguments placed before it disclosed no justification for the complaint of the brewers' society.

I wonder what happened in the meantime to prices and what happened to those who had to put their hops on the market forthwith. The article continues:

> In April, 1934—

That is nearly six months after the trouble and the market must have been deadlocked during that period.

> —in consequence of an arrangement come to by the hops marketing board and the brewers' society for the discussion of certain matters supplementary to the amendments to the hops marketing scheme, 1932, which are now before parliament, the Minister of Agriculture appointed a provisional committee consisting of four representatives each of the hops marketing board and the brewers' society, and three independent members. The purpose of the provisional committee is to consider, in principle, the following matters:—
>
> (a) Long-term planning in the production of hops;

(b) The fixation of the estimated total market demand for hops of each season;

(c) The determination of prices, with reference to (i) costs of production; (ii) the rate of profit to be fixed, having regard to the growers' willingness to accept a fixed rate provided the brewers agree to purchase not less than the quantity put forward as their firm requirements for the purpose of estimating the total market demand; (iii) the nature of the undertaking the brewers' society are able to give in this respect, and (iv) the marketability of the crop;

(d) The administration of the "levy fund," if such is agreed to be established; and

(e) Any other relevant question which the brewers' society and the hops marketing board may agree to refer to the committee;

And the committee, having done so, are to make recommendations regarding the composition, functions and machinery of a permanent committee to deal with this question. You will observe that they had a board to begin with, and then tried to get a bill through to amend the act; but there were objections on the part of the brewers and a provisional committee was appointed to study all these questions which have been mentioned and to make recommendations for the setting up of the machinery of a permanent committee. The writer goes on:

A word of explanation as to the objections raised by the brewers to the hops marketing scheme which was presented to parliament may be in order. Although complicated in character, these provisions may briefly be described as an attempt to allocate to each registered producer who grew hops in 1932 a basic quota equal to his average annual quantity of hops picked during the five years 1928-32.

We will visualize the attempt to put something like this into effect throughout the millions of acres of the prairies.

This implies that any one who was not a grower of hops in 1932 could only be allocated quotas when the estimated market demand exceeded the existing basic quotas by ten per cent—that is, by about twenty-five per cent more than the present output. Even so, the conditions under which quotas were to be allocated to new growers might in practice prohibit newcomers from entering upon production, since any increased allocations are to be sold——at the discretion of the board, a preference only being given "so far as practicable" to those who bid highest for the privilege of being placed in the register.

Mark that.

Do hon. members see the significance of that? If there are any quotas over and above those allocated to the producers of hops in 1932, then these quotas are to be put up to auction, the preference being to those who bid the highest for the privilege of being placed on the register. We have heard comments on the restriction of production, but here we find liberty of production being put up at auction, so that no one can get a show unless he bids higher than someone else. There are vast possibilities in this connection, possibilities which we can imagine but do not need to deal with.

This article continues:

Brewers regard the quota scheme as in any event premature, since, as far as can be foreseen, the whole of the 1934 crop will be absorbed without difficulty. But such crop might be relatively a failure, in which event brewers contend that they would find themselves wedged between a marked insufficiency of home-grown hops and the need for competing in the world markets for supplies, and having to meet the high import duty of £4 per hundredweight on foreign hops and £2 13s. 4d. on British Empire hops.

The brewers affirm that the quota system over-rides the principle involved in these import duties, which were instituted to protect the English hop grower from a flooding of the market at home when world production was high. Their contention is that, as the only consumers of hops, they should not be subject to an import duty, to be paid by them, on hops not grown in this country, while at the same time the freedom to grow hops in England is virtually withheld from all but those who were growers in 1932. The Hops Marketing Board—which has the exclusive right to buy and sell hops and to fix the price at which they should be sold—is composed of eighteen members, and it is the complaint of the brewers that fifteen members of it are either hop growers or are associated with the hop industry.

I have not the next page under my hand but it observes that since this board started the price of hops has gone up from £3 per hundredweight to £15. I wonder where the consumer comes in. While it is difficult, reading something like this, to grasp the meaning, I put it on Hansard so that members of this house and the producers in the country can study it and observe all the complications. This is a scheme conducted in Great Britain, where producers are in a small, compact body, a small industry, and where the people, by long tradition, are naturally inclined to the carrying out of laws both in their spirit and in the letter. Yet, in a country such as that, all this confusion results, the market being tied up for six months, with no ultimate solution in sight, and with the price rising from £3 to £15 per hundredweight, the brewers complaining that on account of the restrictions placed on British production they may have to go into the foreign market in order to make their purchases, with the heavy foreign duty involved.

Will that help the producer? I say that if we are not exceedingly careful we shall find ourselves involved in one huge mess. I admit the spirit of the bill and the minister's good intentions; but what are we to expect if things work out in Britain in the way here indicated? And that is only one item; because so far Britain, with characteristic caution, has gone into schemes that cover only dairy products, hogs, potatoes and hops, and one other commodity, I believe. But we are proposing to deal with the whole range of agricultural and piscatorial products in Canada—a wide open field—and I do suggest that we should be better employed if we went a little slower, until we saw how it would work out.

[Mr. Neill.]

I thought it would be valuable to put that extract on Hansard in order to show the tremendous possibilities for confusion and for disorganization of the market and indeed of the industry itself.

Mr. MULLINS: When this bill first came before the house I did not like it; I was very much afraid of it. But after listening to the various arguments put forward, and when I think of the conditions that actually exist in Canada, I am absolutely in favour of it. I wonder if the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) realizes what rubbish is going forward to the British market? I may say for his information that there left Montreal a short time ago for that market a shipment of cattle that positively should not have left this country. I am sorry to be obliged to charge the hon. gentleman with responsibility for such a situation, but the fact is that he abolished the policy of sending out pure bred sires throughout Canada. He knows he is responsible for the abrogation of that policy.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You are talking rubbish.

Mr. MULLINS: And he has left nothing but a lot of rubbish amongst the farmers. You could not go from here to the mountains and buy a trainload of cattle suitable for the British market. Surely then this bill must be of some use if it will restrict the exportation of that rubbish which is unsuitable.

The right hon. leader of the opposition spoke about people dumping coffee, and running sheep, into the ocean. Well, if they would drive into the ocean most of the poor cattle that are going to England I think they would be doing Canada a kindness.

I cannot understand what purpose is to be served by opposing this bill. What is the idea? If the bill is in the interests of the farmer, if it will prove beneficial to agriculture by stopping the export of inferior commodities of all kinds other than live stock, then why not support it? I speak of live stock particularly because that is the line along which my life's work has been directed, and it is one of the leading products of the country. No man engaged in agriculture on the other side of the house will deny that the farmers cannot be successful without live stock, and I have preached this incessantly in this house.

I had not intended discussing this matter again but I could not help bringing it up after seeing this recent shipment from Montreal, intended for the British market—a cargo absolutely unsuitable for the British market. The leader of the opposition has referred to certain preachers. They are all right in their place, but I suggest that they read that chapter wherein Jacob is spoken of as making a deal with Laban to care for his herd; and in that regard I can only deplore the fact that the ex-Minister of Agriculture did away with the policy in regard to pure bred sires.

I see my hon. friend from Lisgar, who I know has occupied the pulpit in western Canada. He knows something about this subject; he knows what poor quality there is on the farms in the west. And he knows moreover that this is the outcome of action taken by the ex-Minister of Agriculture, and I cannot understand why he has taken such exception to this bill. I was just as bitter against the bill when it was first introduced as any man here, but the more I look into it the better I think it is for the farmer that he should have that commodity restricted. I say it is unfair to keep this house in session at the high cost involved in opposing a bill like this. Let the bill go through and let it help the farmers and stop the poor quality that is going to the British market.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) is always very fond of trying to impress the country with what the Conservative party and the present government have done for the farmers since 1930 and the harm the Liberal party did previous to 1930. May I tell my hon. friend that unless the policies practised by this government are changed very soon the farmers will not need any marketing bill because they will be broke and will not be farming.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): That is your idea.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: No one knows it better than the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan). All he has to do is to go back to his own riding—

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I am ready to go any old time.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: —and see the position they are in. The hon. member for Regina has been trying to impress upon the house that this is a marketing bill. But it is not a marketing bill, and this clause 12 and the amendment are just the opposite of a marketing bill. Under the previous clauses of this bill it is provided that schemes may be brought about. Under this clause and the amendment what is done?

> The governor in council may, by order or regulation, notice whereof shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette,—
>
> (a) regulate or restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product;
>
> (b) regulate or restrict the exportation from Canada of any natural product;
>
> (c) provide for the licensing of persons by whom any such natural product may be imported or exported;

Under previous clauses, power is given to the governor in council to approve schemes, while by this clause 12 and the amendment you give the governor in council power to restrict imports of any natural products into Canada or exports from Canada. You simply knock on the head by this clause everything provided for in clause 3. Does my hon. friend from Regina, or does the Minister of Agriculture think that when the farmers become acquainted with this amendment by which the governor in council can restrict the export of any of their commodities by licensing—for if a man has no licence he will not be able to export, and the minister knows that—

Mr. MULLINS: He will not restrict quality, and there will be no licence necessary—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How do you know?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Under this clause we are discussing now the minister can do anything he likes, and neither my hon. friend from Marquette nor anyone on this side of the house will know what is done until an order in council is passed. If that is what my hon. friend from Regina calls a marketing bill, I call it just the opposite. I represent a riding in which the people are all farmers, and I have yet to receive one request to support this bill. My hon. friend from Marquette, who is now so strongly in favour of this bill, took a long time to be converted; I think his conversion is on account of an election coming pretty soon—

Mr. LOUCKS: It would be a good job if you were converted.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I say to my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) that I have yet to receive any request from my riding to support this bill, and the farmers in my riding are just as intelligent as those in his.

Mr. LOUCKS: I do not think so.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They have sent me here for the last twelve years, so they must be fairly intelligent, and I thank them for it. The farmers of Rosetown have probably sent my hon. friend here for the last time.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Why do you not stay in Manitoba where you belong?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Stop cackling! Now, Mr. Chairman, the governor in council under this clause is given too great power. The bill gives too great power to these boards. I do not think the minister has received any unanimous demand for legislation of this kind. I think that the producers of natural products especially of farm products, once they find these restrictions and regulations can be imposed on them by the governor in council or by these boards, will rise up against this bill, because it is not going to help them in any shape or form.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has put on record, because various hon. members have quoted the British Marketing Act, first on one side and then on the other, though in that respect I am not referring to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. But the right hon. leader of the opposition quoted the British act with respect to the power given to consumers' committees and so on, and as a model or principle to be followed; yet in the same breath he objected to the restriction of production. Here I wish to make one short statement, even at the cost of repeating it so often; that is that the leader of the opposition does not yet grasp the meaning of this bill. The principle of this bill is the regulation of marketing; in no sense is it restriction of production. The right hon. gentleman has said on different occasions that he believes in a system of orderly marketing. I would ask him if he can have orderly marketing, which means a regulated or controlled market, without control. That is the fundamental point on which he bases his whole argument, and this false premise has led him to drag in sermons from Hamilton and elsewhere, and press quotations that he is furnished with galore at all times, ending up with this reverend gentleman speaking in Ottawa and referring to people hailing the grasshopper plague in Saskatchewan and the west as a blessing. I wonder who ever hailed the grasshopper plague in western Canada as a blessing. I am afraid that if the right hon. gentleman tried to sustain his physical body on such empty imaginings he would not long continue to grace this chamber, much to our regret. The false impression that many of these reverend gentlemen and others seem to have formed is I feel sure due more than anything else to the fact that this bill has been so misinterpreted in respect to production by the right hon. gentleman himself.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Beaubien) made the statement that these powers which we are taking in section 12 are too great to give to local boards. But this power is not for local boards.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I did not say that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is my mistake then.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I said you give certain powers to the boards under the previous section.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The longer this debate proceeds the more idiosyncrasies and anomalies proceed therefrom.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are the biggest of them all.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I did not hear that remark, but the hon. gentleman who interjected it has been responsible for a great many of these idiosyncrasies and anomalies about which I am going to speak. It was not so long ago that I heard the remark passed by an opposition member with regard to this group that it would not get anywhere because there were too damn many preachers in it, but to-day I heard the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) read several extracts from addresses by certain preachers or ministers in this country. While he was reading those extracts the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) applauded the mention of planned economy. Until a short time ago, judging from his speech on the marketing bill, I thought he was averse to that idea. A few moments ago the hon. gentleman said that he believed in orderly marketing, but I do not see how you can have orderly marketing unless at the same time you have planned economy.

The leader of the opposition says he opposes this bill because it is restrictive. Well, we have restriction in any case, whether we have this bill or not. Certainly so far as our wheat exports are concerned we have had restriction during the last four or five years; we have found it extremely difficult to get rid of our surplus in the markets abroad, due to the quotas that have been placed against our grain. If that is not restriction I should like to know what restriction is. One hon. member mentioned licences. It is only natural that you must have licences even under this bill. Among other things, he said, you have to get a licence if you have a dog, and the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) asked, "Why do you place dogs in the same category as human beings?" May I say that unless you do get orderly marketing in this country by a bill of this kind I am afraid the farmer will continue to lead the dog's life he is leading now, because we have no system of orderly marketing.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask the minister one question. Under section 4 the board has power to grant compensation—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): We are on section 12.

Mr. REID: I must base my question on section 4. Under that section it is provided that compensation may be paid by the board if an order of that board prohibits a certain person or group of persons from marketing a certain product. Will the same provision apply in regard to orders of the governor in council? Suppose an order is issued restricting a certain person from exporting or importing a certain product. Would that person be allowed compensation by the governor in council, as section 4 provides in connection with the board? My opinion is that if the board can grant compensation arising out of an order of the board the governor in council should have the same right.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am not sure whether or not I understand the question of the hon. member. Under the amendment it is not proposed to give the board power to grant compensation for anything withheld from the market due to the action of any government other than this government; that is, in connection with a quota. I do not know whether that answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. REID: No, it does not. I do not know whether I made myself clear. Supposing an order is issued by the governor in council prohibiting the export or import of a certain product. Would the individual concerned have the right to appeal to the governor in council for compensation, as he has the right to appeal to a board? Under section 4 an individual has the right to appeal for compensation if he is prohibited by the board from exporting or importing a certain article. Does that right extend to orders issued by the governor in council? If it does not I think it should.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid I do not understand the question yet. Section 4 does not provide for compensation if exportations or importations are curtailed by a quota placed by a country other than Canada.

Mr. REID: But it does provide for compensation in relation to products going to countries with depreciated currency and it provides for compensation to any person for loss sustained through storing or withholding any product on the order of the board. I presume the governor in council could issue similar orders, which might prohibit the import or export of certain articles. If that is so I believe the right of the individual to compensation should be the same even if the governor in council issues the order.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have no further answer.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely the minister has an answer; that is a very proper question. Undoubtedly section 4 provides for compensation in various cases; the individual, whether he comes in voluntarily or is forced in, may receive compensation. If you are going to refuse an individual who is an exporter the right to ship goods—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Quota or otherwise?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. Surely to goodness it follows that you must compensate him. He is refused the right to dispose of his product, and while there are many anomalies in the bill surely the right to compensation must follow as a matter of course.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the answer to the question that is evidently bothering the hon. member for West Edmonton is that under section 4, as amended, it is specifically provided that in the case of a quota forced on our producers by an outside government, no compensation will be paid.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then I should like to ask this question: Under section 4 has a board greater powers than the governor in council has under section 12?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It has different powers.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. VALLANCE: Then can the board compensate under section 4 and the governor in council not compensate under section 12?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Any compensation that might be made by the governor in council would be under section 9, under which a board would be set up to deal with any emergency matters.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Put it to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): All those in favour of the amendment will kindly rise during the taking of the vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Hon. gentlemen opposite may not come in.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Order. I understand that members may come in while a vote is being taken in committee.

Amendment agreed to: yeas, 39; nays, 1.

Mr. RYERSON: Mr. Chairman, I am paired.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Pairs count.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I have called for those who were in favour of and those opposed to the amendment to stand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I want a chance to vote against section 12.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Stand up like a man.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Only one member stood.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is it forty to one?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Thirty-nine to one.

Mr. HOWDEN: I think my pair was counted, but I am not sure. He was standing outside the curtain, but if his vote was taken I desire to vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That makes two, then. They are all for it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Thirty-nine to two, then.

Mr. McINTOSH: Are we all "regulated"?

Mr. VALLANCE: This is what you call an honest opposition.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the minister suggests we are all voting for it, I want it distinctly understood that I wish to poll my vote against it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But you did not do it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You may count me in.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not vote because my pair was absent, but had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am in exactly the same position.

Mr. ELLIOTT: For fear I may be suspected of having friendship for the amendment I wish to say that if my pair had been here I would have voted against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am paired with the Prime Minister. He not being in his seat, I did not vote; otherwise I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was paired with the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson); had he been in his seat I would have voted against it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I must remind hon. members that this is quite irregular. We do not take any notice of pairs.

Mr. VENIOT: But you cannot prevent us from stating our position.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): And it is not recorded.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hansard is reporting it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Go on with the next section.

Mr. VENIOT: What is there to prevent us from stating our position, even if it were not recorded?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Because you are out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: Are we out of order? You cannot show us a rule which states we are out of order.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am rising to a point of order, and I shall say what I have to say.

An hon. MEMBER: Smile, then.

Mr. SANDERSON: On the point of order, I was paired with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). That is the reason I did not vote. May I say further on the point of order that I have never seen a more irregular vote taken in this House of Commons. The chairman permitted members to come into the chamber while the vote was being taken, and not only that but he ruled that they had the right to vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member is not speaking to a point of order at all.

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes, I am.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Hon. members on this side voted regularly.

Mr. SANDERSON: And further than that, I am sorry to say that many hon. members opposite were paired and voted.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): We did not vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It is carried, without any reference to the number.

Mr. COTNAM: The charge made by the hon. member is a serious one. I believe he should substantiate his statement to the effect that hon. members on this side who were paired have voted. I am one hon. member who did not vote because I was paired.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Go on with the next clause.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Offences; failure to comply with orders or regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the significance of the word "determination" in this section. It reads:

> Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months or to both fine and imprisonment.

The clause as it stands imposes the penalty of fine and imprisonment on anyone failing to comply with the determination of the board. I suggest that the words "or determination" should be struck out; they have been struck out in other parts of the measure.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not see any object in keeping the words "or determination" in the section. I do not know why they were put in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe I can explain it. Part II of the bill gave committees power to determine certain matters. The government have changed that so that committees will have power to report on certain matters, and they have done away with "determination." The word "determination" evidently slipped in when the bill was originally drafted, and should not be there now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There could be no objection to the words being left out. I quite agree that the words "or determination" should come out, and I therefore move:

That the words "or determination" appearing in the first and second lines of section 14 be stricken out.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the clause carries I should like to draw the attention of the committee to what we are asked to do. We are being asked to fix penalties without knowing what the offences may be to which these penalties are to be attached. That is an entirely wrong position in which to place the House of Commons. Let me illustrate: Any local board, the existence of which is not yet known, the regulations of which will not be known until after it is formed, and the orders of which will not be known until after regulations are made, may give an order of a particular nature, and anyone who violates that order becomes liable to the fine and imprisonment for which we are now making provision. We are fixing the penalty to which some person or persons are to be subjected, although we have no idea what the offence itself is to be to which these penalties are to apply. That is wrong in principle. As I said a moment ago it is substituting local boards for parliament, and elevating these subordinate bodies into bodies having a power higher than that which parliament itself is prepared to exercise in the matter of the creation of offences. I do not believe that is a proper procedure or proper in any respect.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of course this is the same argument, in principle, which the right hon. gentleman has made so many times in connection with this bill. Under many acts of parliament we give power to pass regulations about which we know nothing at the time the bill is passed, and we provide penalties for breaches of regulations. In this instance it is an order of a board; it is not a regulation, but the same principle is involved. We have done it; it is an established custom of parliament; no harm has resulted; no harm will result, and I cannot see any objection to it.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that what parliament has done, at the very most, has been to set out a class of offences and attached to those offences certain penalties. It has permitted the governor in council to make certain regulations under some general clause which applies from one end of the country to the other. But here we are permitting a condition whereby an act may be made an offence in one locality which may not be an offence in another. Under such a condition we make a person liable to fine and imprisonment in one part of Canada, while in another part of Canada at the same time there is no similar law, although parliament has fixed the penalty. I have quoted from the report of the Royal Commission on Ministers' Powers. There is one other passage I should like to quote in this connection. It is from page 72:

The best exposition of the modern doctrine—

That is to say, of what the rule of law now means:

The best exposition of the modern doctrine and of its corollaries is that contained in Dicey's Law of the Constitution. He says: That "rule of law" which forms a fundamental principle of the constitution, has three meanings, or may be regarded from three different points of view. It means, in the first place, the absolute supremacy or predominance of regular law as opposed to the influence of arbitrary power, and excludes the existence of arbitrariness, or prerogative, or even of wide discretionary authority on the part of the government.

I submit that under that exposition what is here proposed is a highly improper method of proceeding, namely, to allow the governor in council arbitrary power to fix certain offences and to ask this parliament in advance of those offences being named or known, to fix the penalty that is to be made applicable when the governor in council has acted. The report goes on, still quoting from Dicey:

It means, again, equality before the law, or the equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land administered by the ordinary law courts.

There again I submit that we are violating what is fundamental because under this legislation there will not be equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land. These penalties that we are now asked to enact will apply only here and there as different local bodies, the central board, or as the governor in council may wish to have them apply. The penalties are to be made applicable to offences that are created by these local boards. I believe it will be found such a procedure is wholly unconstitutional and I submit we ought not to be asked to enact legislation of the kind. Quoting again from the report, Dicey says finally:

> The "rule law," lastly, may be used as a formula for expressing the fact that with us the law of the constitution, the rules which in foreign countries naturally form part of a constitutional code, are not the source but the consequence of the rights of individuals as defined and enforced by the courts.

In other words, individuals have certain inalienable rights, one of which is not to have their property or person put in jeopardy for any offence that is not known, and which is not a part of the law of the land. But in this bill you are making a man liable to both fine and imprisonment, the extent of which is set forth in the enactment of this parliament for acts that to-day are wholly innocent and which will not become offences generally, and of which even the nature is not known at this very time the penalties which are to apply to them are being set forth.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The powers of the board in respect of which it may make orders are all fully set out in section 4, and it can make orders only in respect of the matters set out in section 4. There is the very same provision in the grain act. By section 15 it is provided that the board may make regulations in respect of its powers which are set out in paragraphs (a) to (t) inclusive.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are the penalties specified in the grain act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know. I am talking about the power to make orders. There are penalty clauses specifying the amount and the limits of the amount. The whole jurisdiction of the board to make orders is set out in this act, and if people break the orders they may be penalized.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that any orders the dominion board would make would be applicable from one coast to the other, but this section goes further. It does not apply simply to orders by the board but to any order issued by a local board, and a local board may be nothing but a small group of interested producers in one community.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The local boards are a different thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. This section applies—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Section 14 reads:

> Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board—

That is what I take exception to; it may be the order of a local board:

> —or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence.

These local boards are boards of self-interested occupational groups, and they instead of this parliament are to be allowed to make a part of the criminal law. In other words, under this legislation these interested groups are to be permitted to make laws which will subject others, some of their own class possibly, and some not of their own class, it may be—certainly it is not a board representative of all classes—to a penalty of fine and imprisonment if they do not comply with the orders they may make.

Mr. GUTHRIE: These regulations or orders are all approved by the governor in council before they have the force of law.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite appreciate that it is useless for us to raise objections because the government is going to put this bill through, and so far as I am concerned I hope they do put it into effect. But may I point out to the minister that there may be a local board set up within certain geographical limits, and all the producers within those limits whether they consent or sign or not are to be subject to the orders of the board. The minister informed us some days ago that that was the effect Here you are fixing a penalty of $500 or imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both fine and imprisonment, if some order of that local board is not complied with. If I am wrong in my interpretation of these provisions I should like to be put right. Now where twenty-five per cent of the producers in a given territory are forced in against their will, without even having a poll, and then the board is given power to subject some producer who refuses to come in to a penalty of $500 or imprisonment or both, well, you will have a nice state of affairs in that community.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would point out further that the whole purpose of parliament is to see, when legislation is being enacted the effect of which is to deprive the individual of his personal liberty or his property, that at least it shall be enacted by those who have been elected to parliament under methods which are intended to ensure the representation of all classes. But this is the making of law not by representatives of the people as a whole but by the representatives of occupational groups, and it may be a very limited group in a particular occupation, and is always a self-interested group. There are none of the safeguards here which the Dominion Elections Act affords to all classes whose rights and liberties are likely to be affected by legislation. There is no secret ballot, no qualification of candidates, no qualification of voters—no parliamentary practice or procedure—none of the qualifications or obligations required of those who are the recognized law makers. All these are thrown to one side, and hereafter any interested group for its own purposes, if it can get away with it, can make an offence to which the penalties now being framed by this House of Commons shall apply. Parliament itself under the constitution has exclusive powers in that regard. So far as giving the governor in council power to create the offences to which these penalties shall apply I submit that parliament is thereby simply handing over to the governor in council a function and a power which the constitution has reserved to parliament alone, and which parliament cannot properly divest itself of and give in its entirety even to the governor in council. What we are being asked to do here, in the words of Lord Hewart, Chief Justice of Great Britain, is "to subordinate parliament, to evade the courts and to render the will or the caprice of the executive unfettered and supreme." The gravest feature of all is that while to a certain extent parliament might be prepared to countenance the making of regulations by subordinate bodies, it should be asked to permit such bodies instead of parliament itself to create criminal offences. That is going beyond any rights, it seems to me, which this house has.

Section agreed to, on division.

Mr. NEILL: Before proceeding to part II, Mr. Chairman, would it not be better to finish part I? Subsection 7 of section 4 stood.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Part II deals with investigations.

Mr. NEILL: A subsection was allowed to stand for redrafting.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Subsections 7 and 8 of section 4.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) asked that subsection 9 of section 3 be allowed to stand.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. NEILL: I am referring to subsections 7 and 8 of section 4. Subsection 7 reads:

The board may utilize the fund created by the charges or tolls in connection with the exercise by it or by a local board of any of its powers or for the pooling of returns.

And so on. That stood for redrafting.

Mr. DUPRE: Subsection 9 of section 3 was allowed to stand, and we will deal with that first.

On section 3, subsection 9—Payments authorized.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that subsection 9 of section 3 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament, of such sums of money as may be required to assist in the organization of local boards, to defray the operating expenses of the board incurred by it directly, and any expenditure incurred or authorized by the board under the authority of section 9 hereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first part of this subsection in connection with the appropriation of money by parliament was agreed to, but the section was then held over in order to add that part referring to the assistance to be given for the organization of local boards. I am not taking exception to this amendment but I would direct the attention of the committee to the fact that under the British act the local boards organize themselves and then subsequently come to the central body which thereafter may assist them financially, or in ways that may be necessary. What is here proposed, like most everything else in this act, is the other way around, it enables the governor in council out of the public treasury to assist in the formation of boards which may have to do with the limiting of production and the restriction of trade. As long as that is what the minister intends to do, all right, but we should know how far we are going.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that the following be added to section 4 as subsection 7:

A fund created by charges or tolls imposed in connection with the scheme of regulation may be utilized by the board or by the local board, if so authorized by the board, for the purposes of such scheme, including the creating of reserves and in the case of charges or tolls imposed in respect of the marketing of any product under the direction of any board or agency established under the law of any province to regulate the marketing of any natural product, the board may direct that the charges or tolls be utilized by and for the purposes of such board or agency.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is intended by this change?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When subsection 7 was under discussion a point was raised by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) in connection with the pooling of returns. After consideration it was felt that matters would be clarified by giving the board power for pooling and by substituting this amendment for subsection 7.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has not mentioned pooling at all.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It was felt it would clear up matters to have that in an additional subsection. In order to bring the whole thing in conformity, it will be necessary to change number 6.

Mr. NEILL: Will an amendment be introduced later on dealing with pooling?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the local board have power to disburse funds?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Full power?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: It deals only with incidental charges?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Am I correct or is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The disbursements are covered in amendments 5 and 6.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do they cover disbursements by the local board for whatever purpose the local board may consider necessary in the development of pooling, let us say?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to add the following as subsection 8 of section 4:

Any charge or toll imposed by the board pursuant to this section shall be a debt due to the board recoverable by legal action and a certificate under the hand of a chief executive officer of the board or of the local board, or board or agency established under the law of any province to regulate the marketing of any natural product as the case may be, acting as agent of the board as herein provided shall be prima facie evidence that the amount stated therein is due.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no material change in this; it is only to read in conformity with 7.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: Before we go any further I move to delete present subsection 6 of section 4 and to substitute therefor the following:

Whenever the board or a local board cooperates or acts conjointly with any board or agency established under the law of any province to regulate the marketing of any natural product the board may similarly impose charges or tolls in respect of the marketing of the whole or any part of the product marketed under the direction of such board or agency and may authorize such board or agency to act as the agent of the board in collecting and disbursing such charges or tolls.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has not kept faith. If that is all the amendment, we have not got down to pooling yet.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is coming.

Mr. NEILL: Is this where pooling is to be found?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That will be found under subsection 1, clause (c).

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be better to take the subsections in their order instead of going backward?

Mr. DUPRE: These are all tied together.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The amendment as I heard it read referred to any natural product. Does that mean any natural product within the meaning of the act?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to delete clause (c) in subsection 1 of section 4 as carried and to substitute the following therefor:

to conduct a pool for the equalization of the returns received from the sale of the regulated product; to compensate any person for loss sustained by withholding from the market or forwarding to a specified market any regulated product pursuant to an order of the board; provided that no compensation shall be paid in respect of a regulated product that may be withheld from a particular market because the grade of such product is deemed by the board to be unsuitable for such market, or because of restrictions imposed by the government or other competent authority of any other country upon the importation of any regulated product into that country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The only change is the addition of these words:

to conduct a pool for the equalization of the returns received from the sale of the regulated product.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps the minister would allow the committee to rise now so that we may study this during recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The amendment, I believe, was to subclause 1 of clause 4, dealing with pooling. Has the amendment been read?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It has been read.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps the minister would give us some idea how he proposes to arrange for the carrying out of this pool. I spoke about it the other day, and I do not propose to repeat my remarks. The minister said at that time that he was going to have the item redrafted. I pointed out—page 3225 of Hansard—that in the New Zealand act of 1923 they provide for pooling. But they go further. Pooling is a very general term; we do not understand anything very particular concerning it except the general idea that the receipts shall be pooled and divided, presumably equitably. But there is no provision for that in this bill. In the New Zealand act they prescribe what shall be done, and I think it would be desirable to follow that procedure here to some extent. They provide that the receipts from the produce shall be paid by the board into a separate account in a bank. I think that is highly desirable so that it will be earmarked. Then it says it shall be applied by the board in certain ways. The minister may say that he is going to arrange for all this by regulation, but in New Zealand they thought it worth putting in the act. They provided for six different things; for payment of expenses and commissions and other charges; salaries and wages; travelling expenses, and repayment of advances made by the board to owners. Then provision is made for creation of a reserve fund—that is a very important thing; and finally the balance is to go to the owners of the products. The minister may say: Well, the local scheme will provide for all these things. But the local schemers are more intent on their local problems; they see it only in the light of their local conditions, and I suspect they are not going to provide for all these features. I am not going to press the matter to an amendment; if the minister will not listen, the responsibility is his. But would it not be a good thing to provide now that the receipts shall be pooled, and to set up some safeguards for the benefit of the producers and also of the board as to the handling of the funds, what expenses are to come out, and the final balance to be paid to the producers?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have traversed this ground in our preparation of the bill, and we feel that these features can best be handled with it in its present form. Different schemes of pooling may be submitted, but as the direction will be under the dominion board we feel that through it uniformity will be attained as far as is desirable, at the same time leaving enough latitude to meet the different plans of pooling that may be brought forward. Regulations required to give effect to the particular manner of pooling suggested by local boards will be submitted to the governor in council on the recommendation of the board. The board itself will be the instrument to give uniformity.

Mr. NEILL: The dominion board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I hardly gathered that from some previous remarks. I understood that the minister was going to allow a great deal of latitude to the local boards. Now I gather that he is going to keep the control in the hands of the dominion board, to which I take no exception; I think it is a good thing, but it makes it all the more reasonable that the powers should be defined. I thought he said he was going to leave it to the local boards, which require perhaps some vagueness in definition, but if it is to be done by the dominion board, and he is going to get a certain basis of policy that will extend to all these groups, what objection can there be to putting some of the conditions in the bill? I feel he is going to make a good deal of trouble for himself. For instance, the idea that the money should be earmarked; is there any reason why the money should not be put in a separate fund instead of some common fund?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member misunderstood me if he got the impression that we were not allowing as much latitude to local boards as I have at previous times stated. Because of the flexible nature of the bill, ample freedom will be allowed for different suggestions or policies to be set forward. The principle will be under the control of the dominion board, but it will be capable of variation. For example, in Ontario they might wish to form a board to deal with one kind of fruit, setting aside funds to equalize the proceeds from that particular kind of fruit. They might also wish to set up a fund to equalize payments over different kinds of fruit. I can assure the hon. member that he is just covering the same difficulties that we considered in the preparation of this bill, and after the fullest consideration we felt it better to allow the freedom for which we have provided; yet the approval of a scheme by the dominion board will in itself provide for uniformity.

Mr. NEILL: Just one more question. The minister says he is going to leave the greatest latitude to the local boards. That is desirable, perhaps, but there are certain standard things, not questions of right and wrong but of good business principles, that cannot be gainsaid and must be accepted, and that we could accept right now. For instance, suppose a little local board, interested only in its own affairs, arranged that an advance payment which turned out to be excessive should be made to the fruit growers; they pay perhaps what they think is ninety per cent of the value and it turns out to be one hundred and twenty per cent. There is trouble right there which could be obviated if we or the board set certain standards suggested by common ordinary business sense. Some people would think it a fine thing to get all they could out of the fruit in the first place, but later they would be confronted with the situation that it sold for less than they expected, and who is going to pay the expenses? All kinds of things like that might happen from lack of business experience. Why not set certain standard gauges within which the local board would have to operate? The minister says he is going to see that they are in agreement with general business principles. Why not put that in the act so that they may start off in that way, instead of starting off wrongly and getting into trouble for having done so?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I feel that too many conditions must be taken into consideration to place any narrow limit in this regard. I fully appreciate the difficulty of the hon. member, but so many conditions may arise that we feel it much better to retain this provision.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before we pass on to part II of the act, which is the investigational rather than the marketing part of the bill, might I ask the minister if he intends to have any proviso inserted with regard to the status of the local boards? I was unavoidably absent one evening when this bill was under discussion, and it may be that this was dealt with at that time. I remember bringing up the matter, not by way of amendment but merely as a suggestion a day or two previously. Will the government or the central board have a representative on the local board, providing the very necessary contact between the central board and the local board and in some measure at least representing the consumer? Will the provincial government of the province in which the petition originated have a representative on the local board? Will the producers themselves have two or more representatives on the board and will the unorganized producers, the coerced minority if you like, or any organized body other than the one presenting the petition, have representation? That would give a total of five members of the board. It seems to me, with the tremendous powers to be exercised by the local board, that it would give some assurance to the public if the central board had some representation on the local board, which has to do with administration salesmanship. It would give some little feeling of security to know that the consumers would be kept in mind, at all events, by the board administering the marketing scheme of which it had charge. I do not think anything has been done in that regard and it is in the interest of even the producer himself that it be provided for. I have asked a number of members, and they were not aware that any change of that kind had been made, so the minister will forgive me if I have dealt with something already covered.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the absence of the hon. member the other evening no constitution of the board as such was set out; it still remains open, so far as the selection goes; no change has been made. I see a great deal of merit in my hon. friend's recommendation. If the majority of the board were producers, in many cases it would be advantageous for them to have the trade represented, and also to have a representative of the provincial or federal department. But in the province of Ontario, for example, a scheme might be submitted and the province might desire very strongly to have a representative on the board, while in some other province that would not be thought the best course of procedure. So I feel, as I have stated, that the board in its supervisory capacity in connection with all schemes will be in a better position to work out the constitution of a local board than would be the case if we set it out in the bill.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had in mind the strong argument—not my argument, I may say—used so frequently against this bill; I refer to its compulsory nature. Under present conditions that does not worry me very much, but I should like to have that difficulty minimized as much as possible. By having a representative of the minority or of other bodies not already represented on the board I believe that argument would be done away with to a large extent. In some cases the minority may number a third of the total producers, or even more. If my hon. friend took the notion a petition would not be needed; he has authority to act without a petition. On the other hand he might require one hundred per cent of the producers to be in favour of the scheme. I hardly suppose either of these extreme cases will come about, nevertheless the provision is there. I think it would reduce the opposition to a minimum if a flexible favourable vote were inserted, say from sixty-six and two-thirds per cent to eighty-five per cent, as I previously suggested. Then the minister would have discretion to choose between those limits, and he could also have a representative of the minority on the local board, which after all is the important salesmanship body.

If that were done it seems to me these complaints about coercion and compulsion would be very greatly reduced. There is bound to be an element of compulsion in any scheme of this kind; if no compulsion at all were exercised one man out of a hundred could hold up the entire scheme, which would be absurd. But if the favourable vote could be set at between sixty-six and two-thirds per cent and eighty-five or even ninety per cent, just to give the minister a range within which to choose, depending on the commodity in question and other circumstances, I should think an immense responsibility would be removed from his shoulders. I should think he would jump at the chance, because under the present bill he will find that he must assume a tremendous responsibility. I do not think it is well, either for the sake of the bill or for the sake of the minister, that he should carry such a responsibility when it can be so easily removed in the manner I have suggested. I am not going to press the matter; I simply felt that I would like to draw it to his attention.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate the suggestions of the hon. gentleman. The bill is based on the assumption that the producers are themselves most concerned with the success of their scheme. Knowing the difficulty of forcing a group into the scheme, perhaps to a great extent against their will, I feel that the producers would be the first to realize the importance of securing their cooperation by having the minority name one member of the board. Perhaps in most cases these minorities will be organized in their opposition, and in that case it would be a simple matter for them to select a representative on the board. But difficulties may arise; there may be two or three groups opposing the scheme, or the opposition might not be organized at all. I had quite a definite constitution set out in the first draft of the bill, but because of some of the difficulties I have suggested I felt that it would be better to leave the question open in that regard.

Then with reference to the other suggestion of the hon. member that a range should be stated, between sixty-six and two-thirds per cent and eighty-five per cent; the difficulty I see would be this, that the eighty-five per cent would in each case, be held out and insisted upon by the minority, simply because it had been mentioned, and the sixty-six and two-thirds per cent might be held out by the majority because it, also, was mentioned. As I have stated previously I do not think many schemes could hope to succeed with less than seventy-five per cent, but after it gets into operation I believe the board will be in the best position to influence the formation of local boards under schemes, and to create as great a degree of uniformity as we could expect to have under the varying conditions. I appreciate the suggestion made by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), but for these reasons I believe it better to leave the matter open.

Mr. NEILL: If the minister thinks that the first action of the majority of anybody would be to hasten to give representation to the minority, he has more confidence in human nature than I have. I have no doubt that the minister, in common with most hon. members, has advisory committees in his district to give him advice. Has he any recollection of such committees taking immediate or any steps to give the minority in his district representation on the committees? I do not think so. I think I am the only man in the house who tried to do that, and my efforts were not a startling success.

While I am on my feet I should like to make one last appeal in connection with a matter I have brought before the committee on two former occasions. I do not expect that the minister will yield now, but he might give at least some assurance. If he will not put my suggestion in the bill he might assure the committee as to his intentions. I would have confidence in the minister, although I know from experience that officials are not always bound even by assertions made by the minister in the house. I refer particularly to contracts. Some of the schemes may be put into effect immediately while others may not be effected for months or probably years.

Meantime business will try to go on, and we know that business is to a great extent formulated upon the basis of contracts ahead. We do not grow a crop overnight; we have to make contracts stretching out perhaps eighteen months ahead. The minister thought that my objection in that regard could be met by saying that no doubt any local board would be keen to recognize contracts. That is not necessarily so. They may take a very narrow view and say, "We are running this thing, and we will do what we think best." I heard only the other day about a man who said that if the bill passed with no contract provision he was going to cancel certain contracts he was then making because he would have no assurance that the producer would be able to fulfil them. He did not make the statement in any political or nasty sense. If the minister is not prepared to incorporate my suggestion in the bill would he at least give the committee some assurance that when any board is constituted any bona fide contract entered into in pursuance of the ordinary course of business, whether it be for a short or a long period, according to the custom of the trade, will be recognized for the period of its existence by the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): While in certain instances I agree with what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said, I know he would not expect me to make a statement now which would in any way or to too great an extent embarrass a local board. I can say this, however, that what he has said will be borne in mind in connection with the formation of boards.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Shall the clause carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make one suggestion to the minister? It arises out of the second part of the bill but bears upon the part we have been discussing. My suggestion is occasioned by a change which the minister is proposing to make in the second part of the bill. When the legislation was drafted in part II it left to local investigating committees the power to determine what were offences. According to the amendment of which the minister has given notice the ministry intends to do away with the right of the local committees to determine offences, and instead places on those local committees the duty of making reports to the government. What constitutes the offence is set forth in a clause by itself, and undoubtedly the report to the government will help to draw attention to what may be an infringement of that provision. If there were a similar alteration made in the first part of the bill with respect to these powers to create offences being given by local boards, such alteration would go a long way towards meeting the objections I have been raising to the powers the minister is giving. If instead of giving to the local boards, which are as yet unknown and unconstituted, the power to determine what are to be offences—this parliament having only the duty of naming the penalty which is to attach to the offence—the minister would have the local boards report to him or to the governor in council and let the governor in council, which is responsible to parliament, create the offence, thereby having the law made applicable and uniform from one end of the country to the other, we would be proceeding infinitely more in accord with parliamentary procedure, and would be adopting a course which would prove to be a real protection to the producers themselves. I am afraid that, left as it is, the measure will help to penalize the very persons in whose interests it is being passed. For example, if a group of producers determine that a certain kind of action is to be an offence in the particular locale in which they are operating, and such offence is not one applicable generally to the whole of the producers in Canada carrying on similar business, those who are affected will certainly be handicapped. There is another danger which I see, namely that a group of inefficient producers might wish to rid themselves, if I may use that expression, of some efficient producer who is not carrying on his business as the majority of the producers may wish it to be carried on. As I read the bill, an offence might be created by interested competitors which would serve to put such an individual completely out of business, I do not think that is a power which should be given to any group, in any community, at any time. No group of individuals should have the power, through power given them by this parliament, to subject those who are in competition with themselves to the possibility of both fine and imprisonment. I believe the main purpose the minister has in mind could be served if, as I say, instead of allowing the local boards to create the offences they permitted the ministry itself to determine the offences. Though parliament to my mind is the only proper authority. I believe it would be even better if all the schemes presented were dealt with in a similar manner. That is the manner in which the British legislation proceeds. In Britain it is not so much the locality as the ministry which determines the scheme which shall be made applicable. But localities may make whatever representations or reports they like to the minister, as a guide to what they think will best serve their interests.

Section agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: Before we proceed I should like to move to amend paragraph (a) of section 4, which has already been adopted by this committee. The amendment is not very important; we simply add the words "to designate" in the second line and the words "or class" at the end of the paragraph. I therefore move:

To delete paragraph (a) of section 4 as adopted, and to substitute therefor the following:

(a) To regulate the time and place at which and to designate the agency through which the regulated product shall be marketed, to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality, grade or class of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade, quality or class.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am in favour of that amendment. It means everything.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Could we learn what the effect of the amendment may be?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The clause as it was passed provides for regulating the time and place at which, and the agency through which, the regulated product shall be marketed, and the amendment is to make it read "designate" instead of "regulate" the agency. It was felt that as it stood it might be subject to misinterpretation. In the explanation I gave the other day the effect of it was as if the word "designate" had been used. Then the words "or class" have been added at the end to conform with the use of those words in an earlier part of the section.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is not the real fact of the case that the section of the act which gives the governor in council power to set up a board ought to give the power to set up a board which shall act as a selling agency, while the other clauses do not provide that the local board shall of themselves be the selling agency? Is not the purpose of this clause then to enable a local board to be designated as a selling agency?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then I have misunderstood the purpose of the amendment. How can a local board become a selling agency?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board cannot become a selling agency but it can direct the channel through which the product shall be marketed. Personally I thought that the words "regulate the agency" would cover that, but after the explanation I gave the other day it was pointed out that it might be subject to misinterpretation, and that is why we have used the word "designate." Just as an individual would wish to bargain or negotiate with the different channels of trade as to how his product should be marketed, the same power is given here, only there is the added volume that would be brought to market under this scheme. But the selling board itself is not a marketing agency.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are we to take it then that there is no provision in this bill for a local board that will also be a selling agency? If so, this is going to be a disappointment to the producers. I do not understand this part of it at all. I would like the minister to let the committee know just how a local board controlling or regulating a product may undertake the selling of that product itself—let us say a local dairy board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board itself does not buy or sell but it does regulate the channel through which the product shall pass, and in that way it has control over the marketing agency. If they do not receive the same service through each channel of trade they can make different arrangements. It is just to deal with that point that this has been added.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In that case, if the growers themselves set up a body or institution for the selling of the product the local board can then designate that body as its agency?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If it was felt to be to their advantage.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is a roundabout way, a very subtle and ingenious way of getting there, but I suppose it might be arranged.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I must object to that, because I do not think there will be many cases where there will be a desire to set up a marketing agency of their own, rather than use the existing channels of trade which are engaged in the buying and selling.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): For instance, the grain exchange?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That might possibly be.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend is due for a lot of disillusionment.

Mr. YOUNG: If I understand this aright it does not apply to the local board at all but to the dominion board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The powers of the dominion board are set out, and the dominion board is given authority to delegate these powers to the local board. It may not be necessary to delegate them at all. It depends on the scheme.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—board to continue to have authority.

Mr. DUPRE: I move, Mr. Chairman, to delete subsection 1 of section 7, and to substitute therefor the following:

(1) Every scheme established hereunder shall continue in force until terminated by the governor in council.

That is to take the place of the present subsection 1 which reads:

Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers until such time as the governor in council may authorize.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is not much change.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, except that the word "scheme" is used instead of local board, that being necessitated by another change.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the event of the growers themselves originating a plan which is accepted by the governor in council after having been submitted to a vote of the growers, I disagree that the governor in council should have the right to disband that body without any vote of the growers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The bill states that.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to add as a new clause 15 at the end of part I, in order to meet some of the suggestions that have already been made, the following:

15. (1) Within three months after the end of each fiscal year the board shall transmit to the minister a statement, signed by the chairman, of its affairs for the fiscal year in the form prescribed by the governor in council.

(2) A copy of such statement if parliament be then sitting shall within fifteen days after receipt thereof by the minister be laid before parliament, or if parliament be not sitting it shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I may say in explanation that that is to meet the request which the leader of the opposition made the other night that a report be submitted to parliament. We are moving a similar clause at the end of part II.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to express my thanks as well as appreciation to the minister for including this amendment. There is just one point I would mention, and that is that the amendment suggest that a report shall be submitted to the minister within three months after the end of the fiscal year. The fiscal year ends with the month of March, so that would make it the end of June before the minister would get the report, and it would be some time after that before it would be laid on the table of parliament. Most of our reports are made to the ministers at the end of the fiscal year and are laid on the table immediately. Could not this report be submitted similarly to other government reports in that respect? This could be effected in the amendment simply by saying that "at the end" of the fiscal year a report shall be made to the minister, instead of "within three months after the end"? Seeking to meet what the minister has in mind, I think this would allow parliament to get a report in time for its consideration. I am suggesting that the words "within three months after," be struck out and the words "at the end of each fiscal year," substituted therefor.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no objection to that.

Mr. DUPRE: It will then read, "at the end of each fiscal year the board shall transmit," and so forth.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 15—Definitions.

Mr. POULIOT: Has the minister the figures for which I have asked several times in connection with the consumption of farm products?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret that this report is not yet completed.

Mr. POULIOT: The spread which exists between the 1934 and 1930 prices of farm products is considerable and should be looked into. This means a great loss to the farmers and I am sorry it is impossible to get that information.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Power to authorirze investigations.

Mr. DUPRE: I beg to move an amendment the purport of which is to strike out the last three words in subsection 1, "any natural product," and substitute therefor the words "any regulated product."

Mr. POULIOT: Did the minister say he was moving that?

Mr. DUPRE: All we are doing is to strike out the words "any natural product" at the end of the subsection and substitute therefor the words "any regulated product."

Mr. POULIOT: The minister says that he moves that?

Mr. DUPRE: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: If he moves then he is better than the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who does not move at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister explain what will be the effect of this change?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): "Regulated product" is the phrase used in every other place in the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the effect of this change?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is really to correct a clerical error.

Mr. NEILL: We have been told both in the house and in the press that the government are taking powers under this bill to go farther than the control of marketing; they are to have power to investigate spreads. It was suggested that these powers were not altogether disconnected with the revelations of the price spread committee. There is no reason why these powers should be restricted to regulated products. To all intents and purposes this part of the bill is a separate bill. We have been dealing with the marketing of natural products and we are now going into a totally different thing. The government has recognized this fact by making a different part to the bill. We are now going to deal with spreads, somewhat along the lines of the combines act, and there is no reason in the world why it should be confined to regulated products. Why not leave it as it is and have it cover any natural product? I think it would be a very retrograde step to confine it only to those articles or products which are the subject of regulation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) suggested the other day that it should cover any product. I would not like to increase the scope of the bill to that extent but if we are to have investigations of spreads I think they should cover all natural products.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): From my present understanding of the section I am strongly inclined to agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). A case occurs to me where there might be an efficiently functioning milk board. It might be found that in the case of an unregulated product, such as forage crops, alfalfa or somethink like that, the conditions were so chaotic as to lead to a possible disruption of the milk industry. The milk board might want to ask the minister to make an investigation of the price spreads in the forage industry and I see no reason why that should not be done. I do not think the minister would lose anything by leaving this section in its original form.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the intention of the government to introduce further legislation?—because I think the effect of this amendment is to destroy the generality of this portion of the bill. In the interpretation section there are three exceptions to the definition of regulated product, and the amendment proposed to this section would destroy its effect.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In subsection (b), spread is defined with reference to any regulated product, and this amendment is to bring this section in conformity with section 15.

Mr. HEAPS: If this amendment is passed, would not it have the effect of restricting the operations of the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, somewhat.

Mr. HEAPS: It is very hard at the present moment to see to what extent this amendment is going to restrict the operation of the bill. From what the minister has said, it would appear that this is to apply to those products which are regulated and this bill will have nothing to say with regard to products which have not been approved by the minister or which are under schemes. It may be that there will be only one or two schemes approved and in that case all other products would be barred from any benefits, assuming that any benefits are going to accrue from this bill. If there is going to be any restriction, we might as well understand what it means. If it is not the intention of the government to restrict the operations of this measure, I think parliament and the country in general ought to know.

Mr. TURNBULL: An examination of all the sections of part II will indicate that the original intention of the bill was to have this part apply only to regulated products. Every section except the one in question refers to regulated products. In this one, by a slip, the word "natural" is used instead of the word "regulated." If we are going to change the policy of investigating only regulated products, which was the original intention of the bill, as one can judge from the other sections, to a policy of investigating every natural product under the act, then we shall have to amend every other section, changing "regulated" to "natural" products, because the term "spread" is defined to be a charge made by a person for selling a regulated product. Suppose you leave section 16 the way it is—that the minister may appoint a committee to investigate any spread in natural products: when you come to section 17 the result will be an investigation that provides for action only in connection with regulated products, and if you follow the other sections out later on you will find that the whole purpose of the part was to deal with regulated products and not with natural products that are not regulated. So that it becomes a question whether you will change the word "natural" to "regulated" in section 16, restricting the investigation to what was apparently the original intention of the bill, or whether you will widen your policy to provide for investigation into every natural product.

I fancy there is provision in other acts for an investigation under certain circumstances, in connection with combines and trusts, and if it is desired to have investigations into matters not covered by this bill in the way it is drawn, other bills might be passed for the purpose. But for the moment the investigation in part II is plainly intended to apply only to regulated products, and the use of the words "natural product" in section 16 is a typographical error, which can be left as it is only if you are going to widen the whole process of the bill to apply to all natural products.

Mr. HEAPS: It seems to me that an error of this kind is too important to have crept in accidentally. The typographical error may have been in those sections where "regulated" is used instead of "natural." Many of us have been and are at this moment under the impression that the bill was much wider in its scope—

Mr. TURNBULL: The number of instances in which "regulated" is used in the bill would indicate that the mistake was in the use of the word "natural."

Mr. HEAPS: It seems to me that there must have been the intention somewhere to use the word "natural" instead of the word "regulated," because there is such a vast difference in meaning between the two terms. I can see that under the present provisions of the bill, if the word "regulated" appears all the way through, as suggested, the application of the act may be of such minor importance as to be of extremely little value to the farming community of Canada. Before a natural product can be regulated there must be a scheme upon which the majority in the district must vote, and it must be approved by different bodies and then by the minister in charge; and when you have two or three schemes in operation there may be certain forms of dairy products coming under the regulations, and these would be the only commodities in regard to which there could be any investigation so far as parliament is concerned. If this is to be the situation, then it seems to me that the boon which this measure promises to the farming community will be insignificant. In other words, the mountain will have laboured only to bring forth a mouse.

I have been extremely anxious to support a worth while measure which would provide for a real regulation of basic products, but it is hardly worth while spending two or three weeks of the time of parliament in the discussion of this bill if the result is to be that only one or two things produced on the farm will come under its provisions. It is difficult to get the farmers to organize in so far as certain lines of their products are affected; and when the bill is restricted, as is now suggested, using the term "regulated" instead of the term "natural," I submit that the benefit is out of all proportion to the time and labour spent on this measure.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are apt to get into great difficulty if we attempt at this point to enlarge the scope of the measure. It was not intended as a measure which would afford a general inquiry into spreads and the like in regard to all natural products. It is in its inception a scheme to produce in Canada something in the way of order in relation to our products, and it prescribes that certain products shall be regulated in the manner set out in the bill.

As regards part II, there is no doubt, when one reads the bill, that the intention of applying it only to regulated products was carried out by the draftsman; but unfortunately in one instance, in section 16, he used the word "natural" instead of "regulated," because in nine other places in part II—and there are only three or four sections—you will find the words

"regulated product." And all the provisions apply to regulated products.

We all realize that this bill is an experimental proposal. It has not yet been tried out in Canada, and you can spoil a measure by extending it too far. Let us try it out in the first instance in connection with those regulated articles which were in contemplation when the bill was drawn; then, if it does not serve its purpose, there is ample time hereafter to extend it or to limit it, and if anyone wants an inquiry into spread, or greater legislation than we now have in regard to these matters, there are other acts that can be amended. But so far we have proceeded on the single principle of dealing with regulated products, and it would be unwise now, without a great deal of consideration, to widen the scope of the measure at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It would seem to me that some such investigation as this might very well be a preliminary step in the setting up of various schemes. Natural product is already defined in the second section, and it is defined to include:

> Animals, meats, eggs, wool, dairy products, grains, seeds, fruit and fruit products, vegetables and vegetable products, maple products, honey, tobacco, lumber, and such other natural products of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product that may be designated by the governor in council, in accordance with the provisions of this act.

This provision is wide enough to cover a great many of the products in which to-day, we believe, there are very unnecessary spreads and in the handling of which there is a great deal of waste, in addition to many of the evils that have been revealed in connection with the present investigation. It seems to me that a great many farmers and other producers might hesitate before entering upon any scheme until they were convinced that it was in their interests to do so, until it had been very clearly shown to them just where the evil lies in the present way of handling things. Under these circumstances an investigation would be highly desirable. Further than that, supposing a board handles one particular kind of product. There are other products that may occasionally be substituted for one that is regulated. It would not be possible to carry out adequately the regulation of one product unless possible substitutes for it were also regulated. As a step towards that regulation an investigation such as is made possible under the bill as it now stands seems to me highly desirable. Instead of extending the scope of the bill the minister is now asking us to restrict it. I hope he will see his way to hold it as it was originally drafted.

Mr. BROWN: It will be a matter of keen disappointment to many that the government has put this limitation upon the scope of this bill. For myself I was prepared to accept this part II as in some measure a redeeming feature of the bill, although I think that this matter should be dealt with in a separate measure. I thought this bill was perhaps in some degree a response to the demands made more than once by way of resolution in this house, both last session and this, for investigation into price spreads not only in natural products but in all products. With the arguments advanced by the two hon. members from Winnipeg I am sure that those who represent farming communities are in hearty accord. The limitation of the scope of this bill in my judgment makes it likely to be of very little value. What we want is investigation not only in the spreads in prices of farm products, processed products, but also into the spreads in prices of all products. It seems to me more reasonable to put these matters all under one bill than to make a special bill for investigation into the spreads of these regulated products.

Mr. TURNBULL: Did not my hon. friend vote against having any investigation into anything?

Mr. BROWN: I did not.

Mr. TURNBULL: On the second reading?

Mr. BROWN: Hon. members on the other side are very anxious to twist things so as to seem to put us in the wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BROWN: Personally I object to a bill that is full of poison even if there happens to be a little good meat in it. While I objected very strongly to the first part of this bill, it does not necessarily follow that I am opposed to investigation into spreads. I think any one who is gifted with an ordinary sense of logic would recognize that. But we constantly get arguments from the other side which, as I had occasion to say a few days ago, are scarcely worthy of a debate in a country schoolhouse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A reference to some remarks made in an earlier part of the debate will throw light on the reasons for the proposed change. On May 14, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr.

Stevens) was in the house, I asked the minister the following question as reported on page 3004:

May I ask the minister whether part II of the marketing bill, which deals with investigations, is intended to relate to the work of this committee, to serve the purpose of carrying on the kind of investigations the committee may wish to have made, or whether that part of the marketing bill is wholly apart from the work of the price spreads committee?

At the time we were discussing interim supply in connection with the work of the different committees of the house.

Mr. Stevens: The provisions of any legislation now before the house did not emanate from any committee; that is clear. It is quite obvious, however, to any student of the situation that there is much in the marketing act, for example, that with intelligent anticipation might be declared to be useful in dealing with problems which may be dealt with by the committee. To what extent, of course, I cannot hazard any expression of opinion at this time.

Mr. Mackenzie King: It seemed to me on reading the bill that part II was the kind of measure which possibly the minister would have brought in after the report of the committee had been made, in other words, that he was anticipating the report to-day and giving us legislation in advance.

Mr. Stevens: The right hon. gentleman will note that the marketing bill deals largely with agricultural and natural products.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Yes, natural products as defined and investigation into a wide field of operations.

Mr. Stevens: The price spreads and mass buying committee deals with that, of course, but deals with mercantile business generally, which is much wider in its scope.

I submit the ministry ought to tell us quite frankly whether this change is being suggested at the moment in order to confine this measure solely to natural products as set forth in the definition, with the intention of later this session bringing in legislation which will provide for investigation into such matters as those for example that the price spreads committee is inquiring into. If it is the intention of the government to bring in further legislation we should be advised of that now, because it would undoubtedly affect our attitude with regard to the provisions of part II of this measure as it stands. If the government does not intend to bring in further legislation to provide for investigation under proper conditions into all these matters into which the price spreads committee is inquiring at the present time, I think this part II ought to remain as it is without change in the nature of any restriction of its scope. If there is any change to be made it should not be made in the section now being discussed, changing "natural product" to "regulated product," but whereever the words "regulated product" are used in the other sections there should be substituted the words "natural product" or "any product."

When the bill was originally introduced I took strong exception to part I. I have further made known my reasons for that exception quite openly and frankly in the discussion. But I said at the beginning that I strongly favoured the provision for investigation in part II of the measure because I believed there were many evils which publicity would cure much more effectively than penalty. And while there were in part II certain sections that I thought ought to be altered, I still favoured anything that with proper safeguards to innocent parties would at least provide facilities for investigation of unfair or unethical practices or industrial abuses of any kind. I want to take that position very strongly at the present time. I want to make the part of this bill relating to investigations just as wide as it can possibly be made, to enable the ministry—with proper safeguards to innocent parties of course, to prevent political pressure dictating the investigations to be made—to make it just as wide as it can be made to permit of thoroughgoing investigations into practices that are unfair or unethical in business or other matters; and in that connection to begin with primary products and have the measure extended so as to include any class of commercial or business transaction as well as production and trade.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am sorry that I cannot give my right hon. friend any assurance that legislation will be introduced this session to carry out any suggestions or reports which may be made by the Stevens committee, which has been sitting for a long time and which has not yet concluded its sittings. I have no doubt that the committee will make a report, and it will depend upon what that report is as to what legislation if any will be introduced. On that point I can give no assurance at the present time.

But there is this to be said in favour of this bill as it stands. It includes a very general and generous line of natural products. Under the new definition it includes:

Animals, meats, eggs, wool, dairy products, grains, seeds, fruit and fruit products, vegetables and vegetable products, maple products, honey, tobacco, lumber, and such other natural products of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product that may be designated by the governor in council, . . .

That is a very full and complete list. If any scheme is proposed and adopted in regard to any one of these enumerated articles, it becomes a regulated product, and the fullest investigation can take place in regard to it. So I think that for our present purposes we are on pretty safe ground if we leave the bill as it is with the amendment now proposed, and if after the Stevens committee has reported, legislation is necessary in regard to that matter, I have no doubt that suitable legislation will be introduced. I agree with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) when he says that in his opinion any act to authorize an inquiry in regard to price spreads in general should be a separate act and not involved or connected with what is a marketing bill pure and simple. I think we would be on safer ground to treat this as a marketing bill in regard to regulated products, in accordance with all the clauses which heretofore have been passed, and await the report of the committee now sitting in regard to price spreads. If legislation then becomes necessary, by all means let us have it.

Mr. COOTE: Might I direct the attention of the minister to section 9, under which the minister, if he is satisfied that trade and commerce in a natural product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board, may at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of that product. Surely the minister should have the power conferred under section 16 to authorize an investigation into the costs of production, price spreads, trade practices and all these other matters, to enable him to determine whether he should set up a board for this very purpose. How else is the minister to determine whether that local board should be set up for that particular product? If there has been no application made to him which would bring the product under the terms of this section, surely the minister needs this power so that he may know whether that board is necessary.

Then may I say that in my opinion if any worth while use is to be made of this marketing act the minister must set up machinery for the express purpose of investigating this question of spreads and other matters in regard to natural products. Surely that machinery, once it is set up, should be used for all this investigational work, whether or not it is in regard to a regulated product. At the start we have no regulated products; the amount of investigational work done by the minister or by somebody else is going to determine how many boards will be asked for, or rather the number of products for which regulation will be asked, and certainly I think the minister would be well advised to take advantage of this machinery. I do not see how it can weaken the act in any way; it will make it far more worth while, and I think it will secure for the act a larger measure of support from some who are perhaps very lukewarm with regard to the first part of it. Personally I think section 16 should be left as it is at present. It may be that it should be amended to read "any natural or regulated product" which would bring it a little more in line with the other sections of the act, but if any other sections require to be changed because the words "natural product" are left in this section, it would not be a very difficult job to amend the other sections so that section 16 would not come in conflict with them. Personally I hope the minister can see his way clear to leaving the words "natural product" in section 16.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no reason why the word "regulated" should not be changed to "natural," or why it should not read, "natural or regulated product."

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I am afraid part II of this bill is designed to anticipate the report of the committee set up a couple of months ago to investigate price spreads, and if this is all we are going to get from the work of that committee by way of legislation then I say it is by no means sufficient. As a matter of fact I have had the matter of price spreads before this chamber on more than one occasion. On February 19, when the present committee was appointed, I made the statement that in my opinion this method was too roundabout to deal with the matter. This committee has been sitting for a matter of two months, and I think the government are beginning to realize that this question is too big to be handled in this way. We are told that the government are paying between $200 and $300 a day for solicitors for that committee, and that already the committee has cost in the neighbourhood of $75,000. If that is the case, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the sooner we dispense with the solicitors the better it will be. I have sat in the committee on many occasions; I have listened to the work of the solicitors, and in my opinion the committee would get some place if it had no solicitors. As it is, the solicitor is more or less a buffer for the government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member is hardly in order.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Then if I am not in order this section is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I am only suggesting that the hon. member is not in order in discussing the work of the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Then part II of the bill is not in order. I think the proper thing to do is to drop part II and bring in something that will more adequately deal with the question of price spreads.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to see one word added. The section now reads:

> The minister may, at the request of the board or upon his own initiative authorize an investigation into the cost of production, prices, spread, trade practices, methods of financing, management, policies, grading, transportation and other matters in relation to the production and marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of any natural product.

I should like to see the word "wages" inserted after the word "prices". Many instances have been revealed in the Stevens committee in which, in the processing, very low wages have been paid. It seems to me that we ought to make it clear that this investigation should be able to include the question of wages. It is quite possible that the words "trade practices" might be stretched to cover the question of wages, but since we are now mentioning cost of production, prices, trade practices, methods of financing and so on, it would be well to specify that consideration should be given to wages as well. There is no class in the community that is more helpless to-day than those people engaged in certain of our packing plants. For the sake of both the producers and the consumers we ought not to allow evil practices of this kind to continue. I think this is a very reasonable request, and I hope the minister may see his way clear to meet us in the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think wages would be included in the term "cost of production" but I see no objection to specifying "wages" as my hon. friend suggests. Now, in order to get the matter straight, it might be well to move an omnibus motion, to make all the corrections, of which some nine will have to be made. On page 8, at lines 7, 11, 13, 18, 25 and 38, and on page 9, at lines 4, 10, 18, 22 and 30 where the words "regulated product" appear I move that the words "natural or regulated product" be inserted, and that in line 21 on page 8 after the word "prices" the word "wages" be inserted. If that is understood I need not write the motion.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before the motion is put may I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this set of circumstances: Where you use the term "natural or regulated product" in regard to a product which is not regulated but is a natural product, do those sections apply?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, part II will apply.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then it applies to every natural product?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Part II would.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Part II applies to every natural product?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, "natural product" is defined in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): "Natural product" always includes "regulated product."

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, there are separate definitions for "natural product" and "regulated product."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But one includes the other.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he does not think we should insert the corresponding words in subsection 2 of section 17. It states:

> (2) A committee shall be composed of such number of representatives of producers and persons engaged in marketing, . . .

And so on—"of a natural or regulated product." Otherwise the subsection is left loose, and may include any producers or any marketers. The wording does not follow the rest of the part. It should read that these people should be producers, consumers, and so on, of a natural or regulated product. I refer to the second to last line at the foot of the page. The idea is that the people forming the committee should be associated with the product, and it is so carried out in the rest of the sections. In this particular section however the wording has been omitted. The committee might be composed of producers in some other lines.

Mr. COOTE: Would it not be better to leave the discussion of section 17 until we have concluded the discussion on section 16? The representations made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) would be in order on that section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment to section 16 is carried, but not the section as amended. One point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister is this: At the moment everything in connection with investigation rests on the initiative of the minister. The terms of the section are now quite wide, and under it the minister can investigate anything. I do not take exception to that, because I believe that if he wished it, the minister would have that power anyway. I do think, however, that there is a real possibility of the section as it stands being used to work a certain amount of injury on individuals, as a result of political pressure if it is to be used at all by the ministry. I do not make this statement in an offensive manner, and I make it as being applicable to any ministry at any time. My statement is that if by statute you leave in the hands of a ministry the making of investigations into anything, and you do not surround that authority by any kind of precaution as to the basis upon which the investigation is to be made, or anything of that kind, there will be perpetual pressure brought to bear upon the ministry to investigate anything and everything anywhere and everywhere and a ministry might conceivably see to it that where its friends were concerned there would be no investigation, but where opponents were concerned there would be speedy and possibly vexatious investigation. That is the danger in all such legislation, and I suggest there ought to be some kind of safeguard thrown around the matter of inquiry which would at least stipulate that investigations should be made as the result of representations by some parties who will state that they have some kind of reason for believing that matters ought to be investigated. If it is to be left entirely to the initiative of the ministry, it is almost a foregone conclusion that such initiative will be exercised at the instance of political friends against political opponents. If a minister wished to be partisan, that would be the inevitable result. In order to overcome such a difficulty, there should be at least a clause which would state that the investigation was to be on the representation of some group properly representative, and as a result of their having shown cause why investigation should be made by the ministry. But certainly if it is left in the way it now stands, whereby the initiative either to give or to withhold an investigation lies wholly with the minister, and there is no opportunity for other parties to secure investigation except at the will of the ministry, I am afraid the provision will become a huge political weapon. I am afraid, as a consequence, the provision will have very little effect, except to achieve the ends I have described.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the right hon. gentleman's contention is correct, that the provision could be used as a political weapon, in the event of a minister desiring so to use it, I feel the right hon. gentleman would agree that there would be no great difficulty in getting five or six people belonging to any party to make such recommendation. I realize that there is a good deal of truth in what the right hon. gentleman has said, but I do not see how the section could be qualified.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Shall the section as amended carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Committee to deal with spread.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has suggested that we insert after the word "consumers" in the forty-second line the words "of a natural or regulated product." I think it would be better to amend it in another way. The first subsection of section 17 gives the minister power to appoint a committee. He may, at the request of the board, or on his own initiative, apopint a committee to inquire into the spread in connection with the marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of a regulated product. That would mean a natural or regulated product. Then, subsection 2 should begin with the words "such committee," and thereby we would avoid any further amendment. Subsection 2 would then read:

(2) Such committee shall be composed of such number of representatives of producers and persons engaged in marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion, and consumers.

And so on. The committee is limited to inquire into some natural or regulated product.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, the committee would be limited in the scope of their inquiry, but their selection would not be limited to people connected with the trade. There might be an investigation in connection with sugar beet production, and it might be possible to appoint coal miners to do the investigating. I agree with the introduction of the word "such," but I think it should also contain my suggestion as well. The section does not state that the committee shall be composed of people associated with a particular product, unless the words I have suggested are inserted.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member will agree that any committee could not be confined to producers alone.

Mr. NEILL: I am not asking that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: "Persons engaged in marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion, and consumers," and then the words suggested by my hon. friend, "of such natural or regulated products;" what do you say to that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, for this reason. There would have to be experts outside of the members on the committee to do the actual work of the investigation, and to be certain that it would have on it representatives of the producers and so on. It would not be possible to select from a committee of producers of the regulated or natural product, as set out here, those of the proper qualifications to carry on such an investigation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think if we were to change the first word in the subsection, "a," to "such," it would serve all purposes. I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the first word, "a," in subsection 2 and substitute therefor the word "such."

Amendment agreed to.

Section 17 as amended agreed to.

On section 18—powers of committee.

Mr. DUPRE: It is desired to strike out the word "and" where it occurs in line 6, also to strike out lines 7 to 10 inclusive. I move, Mr. Chairman, that subsection 1 of section 18 be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

18. (1) A committee shall have power to investigate all operations occurring in connection with or in the course of marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of the natural or regulated product for the purpose of ascertaining the spread received by any person in the course of such marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I might point out that the deleted part of subsection 1 is included under another clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 18 as amended agreed to.

On section 19—determination by committee.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that section 19 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

19. A committee may after investigation as hereinbefore provided report to the minister, in connection with any operation occurring in the course of marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of the natural or regulated product, whether in its opinion the spread received is detrimental to or against the interest of the public in that it is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the natural or regulated product.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a little different from the amendment of which notice was given.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, but the change is very slight.

Mr. NEILL: Is there to be no provision for publishing this report?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say to the minister that I think it is an important change which has been made. The section as originally drafted gave this committee power to determine what was excessive and to fix the offence. By the amendment the committee is given power to report to the minister what in its opinion is excessive. Naturally the report will be used as a means of bringing the whole matter to the attention of the proper authorities and lead possibly to prosecutions, but it does not leave it in the hands of an interested group itself to determine the offence, what is in the nature of an offence is set out in clause 21 of the bill. That is exactly what I was hoping the minister might be persuaded to do with regard to part 1, that he would amend its provisions in a corresponding way. However, having made the amendment he has in this part of the bill, I wish to thank him for it.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 20—publication of findings.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to strike out this section and to substitute for it the following:

A committee shall in the manner prescribed by regulations publish every report made by it hereunder.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It simply changes the word "determination" to "report."

Mr. NEILL: I object, Mr. Chairman, to the suggestion that the report is to be published under regulations made hereunder. It says, "a committee shall in the manner prescribed by regulations." Is there nothing we can do in this house? Have we to leave everything to regulations? We have been told time and again that the exigencies of the situation require that the act must be, to use the minister's own words, flexible or, to use my description, vague, because of conflicting jurisdictions, because we do not know what the local board or some other board might think.

But here is a common everyday clause that we find in every act we pass, a provision for publishing something, and we cannot even determine our line of conduct there. We must leave the publication to be determined according to regulations. Cannot we assert ourselves this once and say how this report is to be published, whether in the Gazette or not? There is only one standard way of publishing these things, and that is in the Gazette. Then why not say it shall be published in the Gazette? This matter of leaving everything to regulations is getting cumulative; it is getting on our nerves. Nothing is to be done except by regulations. We began with regulations and we are ending up with regulations. Cannot we assert ourselves in one magnificent gesture and decide that the report is to be published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. DUPRE: With the permission of the committee I would like to withdraw the amendment I have suggested.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. DUPRE: I now move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out clause 20 and to substitute therefor the following:

20. (1) Any report of a committee shall within thirty days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the committee is of the opinion that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication and so states in the report itself, in which case the minister may exercise his discretion as to the publicity to be given to the report in whole or in part.

20. (2) The minister may publish and supply copies of any report in such manner and upon such terms as to him seems most desirable.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I beg to move that the following be added as a new section 21:

(1) Whenever in the opinion of the committee an offence has been committed against this part, the minister shall remit to the attorney general of any province within which such alleged offence shall have been committed, for such action as such attorney general may be pleased to institute, the evidence taken on any investigation by a committee and the report of the committee.

(2) If within three months after remission aforesaid, or within such shorter period as the governor in council shall decide, no such action shall have been taken by or at the instance of the attorney general of the province as to the governor in council the case seems in the public interest to require, the attorney general of Canada may permit an information to be laid against such person or persons as in the opinion of the attorney general shall have been guilty of an offence against this part.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There would not be any reference in any of the provincial acts to the present section 21 because as I understand that section it deals entirely with questions of trade and commerce, which are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal authorities. I do not see how the provincial governments could prescribe penalties for offences described in the present section 21.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They would provide penalties only for offences committed under their own acts. I do not know whether the penalties are similar.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It would not refer to this section.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The last clauses read were taken from the combines act.

Mr. NEILL: Are we not going to end up with a sort of imitation of the combines act and are we not infringing on the jurisdiction of that act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not an easy thing to state that every clause of this bill is within the jurisdiction of this parliament. Some very nice questions may arise but we have used all the ingenuity and knowledge of the law officers of the department to produce a measure which we believe is within the jurisdiction of this parliament. The clauses just read are taken from the combines act. Under these clauses it will be the duty of the minister to transfer the report to the attorney general of the province concerned. The administration of law, both civil and criminal, is under the jurisdiction of the provinces and not of the federal government. If the attorney general of a particular province takes no action for a period of three months, power is given to the attorney general of Canada to lay an information on the order of the governor in council.

Mr. NEILL: Are we not just duplicating these other acts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a duplication to some extent but these clauses have stood the test and they were thought to be valuable in connection with this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to make sure that there is no intention on the part of the government to repeal the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not that I know of.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As long as that is understood, it is all to the good to incorporate in this bill some of the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I should regret for any reason to see the Combines Investigation Act repealed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not heard of a suggestion of that kind.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 21—Penalty for infraction of provisions respecting spreads.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have the words "natural or" been added in line 30 of this section?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are not the provisions of the criminal code with respect to excessive prices, restraint of trade and the like to all intents and purposes the same as the provisions of this section?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The effect will be the same although I am not sure as to the exact language.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Has a similar section been enacted by the various provincial legislatures?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not sure whether the penalty clauses are the same.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My recollection is that in the Board of Commerce case it was held that regulations such as these and the penalties imposed for infractions thereof were not within the powers of the federal parliament. I have no doubt the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is quite familiar with that case. Certain clothing men in Ottawa were charged with having charged excessive spreads with regard to clothing. Penalties were imposed but it was held that they were not within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. I assume that the Minister of Justice has considered whether or not this section would be ultra vires because in another section of the bill it is provided that any part found to be ultra vires shall be excluded but that the rest shall be effective. Under the decision of the commerce case it would seem that no conviction would stand unless there was a similar provision in the various provincial acts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Following the commerce case, there is no doubt that any matter falling within the classification of property and civil rights would be held to be under provincial jurisdiction. But there are many things which will arise under this act in the way of trade and the regulation of trade which would not fall within provincial jurisdiction. In regard to such matters this penalty clause would have application, but in regard to provincial matters the same decision would be reached as was reached in the Board of Commerce case. In such cases, proceedings could be taken under the provincial acts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does not the minister think that they should be as nearly uniform as possible?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is my opinion but the provincial legislatures have passed their judgment with regard to matters of that kind. I think it would be a very good thing if they were uniform.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this the section with regard to penalties?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So that the matter may be on record, will you be good enough, Mr. Chairman, to read the section? I think it is practically the same as the provision in the criminal code.

The CHAIRMAN: The section reads:

Every person who, to the detriment or against the interest of the public, charges, receives or attempts to receive any spread which is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the natural or regulated product, shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars or to two years' imprisonment or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The penalty as set forth here, as well as the nature of the offence, is very similar to what is contained in the criminal code, section 498:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding four thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars, or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and not less than one thousand dollars, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company,—

(a) to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or

(b) to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or

(c) to unduly prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof; or

(d) to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

As I read these provisions, they are very similar to this section 21, with the exception that the section before us goes rather further in that it adds the words "or attempts to receive." Every person who, to the detriment or against the interest of the public, charges, receives "or attempts to receive" any spread, and so on. Nothing quite so drastic as "attempts to receive" appears at present in the criminal code. There may be ample reason for it, but it is going pretty far to make a criminal offence of an attempt to receive.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Even unsuccessful attempts to commit crime are punishable under the code; in fact, there is a clause which provides expressly for such attempts. The mere fact that a man has not succeeded may mitigate the sentence to some extent, but the criminal intent was there when he made the attempt.

There is just one matter that has been brought to my attention in regard to the question raised by my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott). In the Board of Commerce case, the board itself was authorized to fix prices, and that was perhaps the most prominent reason for the holding that the act was ultra vires. There is no attempt here to fix prices; we have avoided that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister refers to the Board of Commerce case and the power there given to the board, and that perhaps applies more to this section with which we are now dealing than to any other part of the bill. There was a finding by the judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the board by the act were empowered to inquire searchingly into these spreads and to attach what might be criminal consequences to any breach of the regulations. An addition of a consequential character such as this made to the criminal law of Canada, it was held, was something that could not be done. Such an addition to the criminal law could not be made.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

On section 23.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to add the following as section 23:

When an indictment is found against any person for any offence against this part the accused shall have the option to be tried before the judge presiding at the court at which the indictment is found, or the judge presiding at any subsequent sitting of such court, or at any court where the indictment comes on for trial, without the intervention of a jury; and in the event of such option being exercised the proceedings subsequent thereto shall be regulated in so far as may be applicable by part XVIII of the criminal code respecting speedy trials of indictable offences.

Mr. HEAPS: The proposed section refers to persons. Will the Solicitor General define what is meant by "person" under that section?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Person means person, and includes any corporation or any woman.

Mr. HEAPS: So long as it is all inclusive.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This gives the accused the right to elect for trial without a jury, and also provides for speedy trials under part 18 of the code.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it not be just as well to insert the words "or corporations"?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; "person" is defined in the criminal code.

Section agreed to.

On section 24.

Mr. DUPRE: I move the following as section 24:

The minister shall annually prepare a report of the proceedings taken under this part and shall lay the same before parliament forthwith, or if parliament be not then sitting within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the minister has said, this is experimental legislation and we are following to a certain extent what has been done in other acts. I would ask him whether he sees any objection to including in this section just the words "including the moneys expended, guarantees given and obligations contracted under this act." These are works taken from the Relief Act; the report to parliament to contain "a full and correct statement of the moneys expended, guarantees given and obligations contracted under this act." I think it would be advisable for parliament to have that information, because this bill gives to the board and the governor in council a pretty free hand in the expenditure of money; it also gives to the board power to make guarantees and to enter into money obligations. Parliament should be advised of all these things in detail.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would not that be included in this as it reads—"all proceedings"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think so, because if that were intended it would probably not have appeared in the Relief Act if so understood, I am satisfied. The Relief Act reads as follows:

A report shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after the expiration of this act, or if parliament is not then in session, shall be published and made available for distribution by the Department of Labour, containing a full and correct statement of the moneys expended, guarantees given and obligations contracted under this act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With all due deference, that would not come under part II, because part II has nothing to do with schemes, contracts or anything of that nature, but simply with investigations. It is the report of the investigation committee that would be submitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the minister is right in that, but I would ask him to allow us, if this passes, to revert to part I, and include those words in the corresponding section there. I believe it would be in the public interest to do so.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It does not relate to this part.

Mr. NEILL: I notice the word "annually" is used. Would it not be better to use the words "fiscal year" or "calendar year"? "Annually" is vague; he might elect to do it on his birthday. Why not the fiscal year as in the case of other returns?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think it matters much, but I am willing to agree to any arrangement. It is very difficult in a committee of this size to draw clauses to meet the views of everyone. There are a great many clauses in our statutes to-day that are not very good as they stand because they are the result of attempts to meet views here, there and everywhere. "Annually" I think would serve the purpose, but if it makes it clearer to say "the end of the fiscal year", put it that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The appropriations are for the fiscal year, and we are making them in this act, so "fiscal year" would seem to be the correct thing.

Mr. NEILL: I shall move to insert the words "fiscal year," or perhaps the minister will do so.

Mr. DUPRE: Yes; it would then read:

The minister shall at the end of the fiscal year prepare a report of the proceedings ...

Mr. NEILL: Yes, each fiscal year.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to add the following as section 25:

If it be found that parliament has exceeded its powers in the enactment of one or more of the provisions of this act, none of the other or remaining provisions of the act shall therefore be held to be inoperative or ultra vires, but the latter provisions shall stand as if they had been originally enacted as separate and independent enactments and as the only provisions of the act; the intention of parliament being to give independent effect to the extent of its powers to every enactment and provision in this act contained.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one point that I wished to ask the Prime Minister about if he had been in the house. Perhaps I may address my remarks to the Minister of Justice. This clause deals with the question of jurisdiction, and the Prime Minister, as the Minister of Justice will recall, dealt with the matter very fully and yet concisely when he spoke on May 18, and again the other day. But I notice this remark of the Prime Minister at page 3197:

But I do say that the dominion parliament in the exercise of its jurisdiction with respect to trade and commerce can confer upon any instrument that it selects the necessary power to act as its agent in the carrying out of its legislative power under trade and commerce.

I do not believe the Prime Minister meant "in carrying out of its legislative power," because what he said elsewhere would indicate that he was of the opinion that as far as the legislative power was concerned that could not be parted with by the federal parliament. What I think the Prime Minister meant to say was, in the carrying out of any provision enacted under its legislative power.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No doubt that was his meaning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just wanted to make that point clear.

Section agreed to.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I move that the bill be reprinted with the amendments.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I suggest to the minister that after the bill is reprinted the house be given a reasonable time, say a day, to examine the changes before third reading is called for?

Mr. CHEVRIER: You did not allow that with the translation bill.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Might I suggest to the minister that as the bill is to be reprinted, and as the changes are very numerous, many of them having been made verbally in committee, it might be well if the bill were to remain in committee until the reprinted bill is before us, not for the purpose of any great extended discussion, because I doubt whether it would involve much discussion, but in the event of some clauses not being as clear as they might to some hon. members, and in order to afford opportunity for the asking of questions and having such matters clarified.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If we find any mistakes I think we could refer it back for the purpose of correcting them, or when it gets to the other chamber I fancy we could correct them there without much trouble.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY

Mr. GUTHRIE: We propose now to go into supply for the purpose of opening up the Post Office Department on one item; then we will proceed with the Dominion Companies Act on clauses that are not contentious.

I move that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Salaries, including amounts required to pay allowances to office appliance operators, grade 2, operating mechanical audit card punching machines in accordance with the terms of order in council P.C. 280/383, dated February 17, 1930; and to pay allowances to typists, grade 1, employed cutting stencils in accordance with regulations approved by order in council; and to provide for continuance in office of G. C. Anderson, as superintendent of mail contracts from April 1, 1934, to March 31, 1935, $1,145,124; contingencies, $174,840.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand this is merely to enter the department in the regular way, with no discussion on the item.

Progress reported.

DOMINION COMPANIES ACT

The house resumed from Monday, May 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 64, respecting dominion companies—Mr. Cahan—Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

On section 3—Definitions.

Mr. CAHAN: For the information of hon. gentlemen I may say that I have received from several hon. members and others suggestions as to amendments in addition to those printed recently in the votes and proceedings. After consideration I am quite willing to accept some of those suggestions, but I am republishing the entire list of proposed amendments in the votes and proceedings for to-morrow in order that hon. gentlemen may have them, as they appear in succession, for more ready reference in the later discussion of this measure.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman is not blaming this on the translators, is he?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask if any one of the provinces has specifically endorsed this legislation?

Mr. CAHAN: The bill was prepared at the request of a previous interprovincial conference for submission to the last interprovincial conference. It was so submitted, and a committee of the last interprovincial conference, composed of attorneys general and deputy attorneys general, considered the bill. Their expressions of opinion were very favourable indeed, but they asked for a delay until March 1, within which time they might make any suggestions as to any amendments they might like to have embodied in the bill. It was agreed that if such suggestions were received the Secretary of State would call a further meeting, either of attorneys general or of deputy attorneys general, for the consideration of those amendments.

To this date no suggested amendment has been received from any provincial government. It has been stated quite clearly, however, that upon consideration the government of Nova Scotia has decided to retain its own form of companies act, which follows the English act, under which incorporation is commenced by filing a memorandum of association. The government of British Columbia, I understand, have intimated also that they prefer to follow the English act and commence by filing a memorandum of association. On the other hand the government of the province of Quebec has suggested no amendment, but it has suggested in respect of its own act that, although there may be revision in the future, that province will not follow the Canadian practice of granting letters patent, but will follow its own practice of incorporating companies by direct grant from the crown, which they assume to be the form of grant more convenient for their purposes and more satisfactory to their administration. Up to the present time no suggested amendment has been received from the department of the attorney general of any province of Canada, but this bill has been widely distributed and I have received from hon. gentlemen opposite and from leading lawyers all over the country various suggestions which we have considered very carefully. To the full extent that we are at present prepared to accept them a complete list will be printed in the votes and proceedings to-morrow.

Mr. BUTCHER: The other day the Secretary of State advised us that when we got into committee on this bill hon. members would be permitted to speak on the principle of the bill. Several hon. gentlemen who desire to speak on the principle are not here to-night. Would the Secretary of State grant us that same privilege at the next sitting of the committee?

Mr. CAHAN: Section 1 was reserved for the purpose of the discussion to which my hon. friend has referred. Now, having reserved that section, we can proceed until we encounter a section to which hon. gentlemen object or which they wish to have stand for further study.

Mr. DUPRE: There is one paragraph we intend to amend. I moved that section 3 be amended by striking out paragraph (n) and substituting therefor the following:

(n) Shareholder means every subscriber for or holder of a share in the capital stock of the company, and includes the personal representatives of a deceased shareholder, a subscriber to the memorandum of agreement and every other person who agrees with the company to become a shareholder.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I notice that in the votes and proceedings there are three pages of proposed amendments to this bill. Will the Secretary of State kindly say whether, when these amendments are translated, the cost of that translation will be added to the cost of the French version, and we will be told that the French version cost so much more than the English version, through the translation of these amendments.

Mr. DUPRE: This is out of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are in committee; I have asked a question and I should like an answer.

Mr. CAHAN: In order to be as courteous as possible to the hon. gentleman I will simply say that the translation of this bill will follow the ordinary course.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister will not say that the French version cost more than the English version because of the extra cost of translating these amendments?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): I rule that these remarks are out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that the amendment just moved by the Solicitor General is only a matter of redrafting?

Mr. CAHAN: When it was drafted formerly some words were inserted twice, and this is simply to make a clearer definition.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

Section 7 stands.

On section 8—Conditions precedent to issuing of letters patent to be established.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In connection with subsection 4, I suggest some provision ought to be inserted in the act whereby before the Secretary of State may on his own initiative change the name of the company, some notice should be given to the applicants, and that a name other than that applied for should not be changed without such notice being given.

Mr. CAHAN: That matter is already governed by office regulations. After an application has been received for letters patent in which a proposed name is designated the Secretary of State, if there are objections, never proceeds to change a name without notice to the applicants and obtaining the consent of the applicants to the new name. As a matter of fact, we are under an international agreement to which all the leading nations are parties, and provision is made in the Unfair Competition Act that a name shall not be granted in Canada which might be confused with the name of any other company, foreign or domestic, which is doing business in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that the Secretary of State is quite right in that what he states is the practice. I am thinking more particularly of the practice in other jurisdictions. It always struck me that there should be some provision in the statute which would compel the department of the Secretary of State to give notice to the applicants, and I can see no harm in inserting such provision.

Mr. CAHAN: If you insist I shall let the section stand. All I can say is that I am in the hands of the committee. In four years there has been no case in which such a difficulty could arise, because the applicants are notified, and I suppose there is an average of at least four or five times a month where parties object that certain names should be granted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say the name should not be changed without notice; that is the point I make.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There would be no objection to the section standing. I know that in a number of cases in which I have been interested no change has been made without its being communicated to the applicant.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think such change was ever made without notice.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think a charter would be granted until the applicant has assented to the change.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree that should be so. I have in mind a case in another jurisdiction where I applied for a charter, and the officials of the department proceeded to give another name. It was only after strenuous argument that I succeeded in getting the name I wanted. However, I am not pressing the point.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Shall section 8 stand?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like the minister to give it consideration.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I understand the minister to say there is now a regulation in the department?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes. If the official in charge of the branch were to follow the course the hon. member has just suggested he knows he would likely lose his office.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Section 8 stands.

Sections 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Different classes of shares.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to strike out subsection 7 of this section and substitute the following therefor:

(7) In the absence of other provisions in that behalf in the letters patent, supplementary letters patent or by-laws of the company, the issue and allotment of shares without nominal or par value may be made from time to time for such consideration as may be fixed by the board of directors of the company; and in fixing the amount of such consideration, the board, subject to the provisions of this part, may provide that a part, not exceeding twenty-five per centum thereof, may be set aside as a distributable surplus; provided that in addition, where the company acquires a going concern, which has a surplus over and above all liabilities, and any shares without nominal or par value in the company are issued and allotted as fully paid in payment or part payment for such going concern, the directors may by resolution set aside such further part of the consideration for the issue and allotment of such shares without nominal or par value as a distributable surplus as does not exceed the unappropriated balance of realized net profits of the going concern immediately before such acquisition.

Mr. CAHAN: A number of suggestions have been coming to the department from lawyers and others, and the opinions stated were that subsection 7 as drafted was not perfectly clear. We have had opinions from some of the most eminent lawyers in the country, and finally an agreement was reached. I think the section is now quite all right.

Mr. BUTCHER: Will the minister allow this section to stand?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Section 12 stands.

Section 13 agreed to.

Sections 14, 15 and 16 stand.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 18—contracts of agent binding on company.

Mr. CAHAN: I have an amendment to suggest to this section. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1932 a decision was given by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of the Bank of the United States vs. Ross with regard to the old section which is repeated in section 18 as it now stands. In view of that decision, after very lengthy consultation with eminent counsel, it has been suggested that the clause should be amended by striking out the words in the forty-fifth and forty-sixth lines, "as such under the by-laws of the company" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "either as expressed or implied." The reason for this suggested amendment is that the by-laws of the company are not known to the public and under the recent decision in the Bank of the United States vs. Ross there is the suggestion that in every case in dealing with the company an outside party must insist upon the production of the by-laws in order that he may make himself acquainted with all the powers vested by the by-laws in an officer of the company. If the amendment is accepted it will then read: "in general accordance with his powers either as expressed or implied." I think I had better allow the section to stand so that hon. gentlemen can see the effect of the amendment in the votes and proceedings to-morrow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a very important section, and under the theory of internal management a very difficult question arises whether there is power to make a binding contract or not. I am very glad to say that I called the minister's attention to the case of the Bank of the United States vs. Ross and the implications contained in that decision. I think it is worthy of very serious consideration. I should like to see the whole clause redrafted.

Mr. CAHAN: We will allow it to stand.

Section stands.

Sections 19 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On section 29—when company may surrender charter.

Mr. CAHAN: I have a suggestion to make. It is one of the suggestions printed in the votes and proceedings. Eminent lawyers have called my attention to the word "therein" in line 29. It is not sufficiently clear, they think, and so I have suggested that instead of the word "therein" we use the words "in such debts, liabilities or other obligations" to make it clear what "therein" specifically refers to.

Mr. DUPRE: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 30 and 31 agreed to.

On section 32—Allotment of shares.

Mr. DUPRE: I move to insert after the word "persons" in line 18 the words "or class of persons."

Mr. CAHAN: This clause makes it clear that the allotment may be made at such times and in such manner and to such persons as the directors may from time to time determine. In drafting the clause I thought that the words "in such manner and to such persons" would be sufficient, but it has been suggested by counsel that it should read "to such persons or class of persons" because there may come a time perhaps when the allotment would be made to all the present shareholders of the company or it might be made to all the preferred shareholders of the company as such, and, in order to obviate the enumeration by name of one or two hundred or more persons, it is proposed to insert the words "or class of persons" after the word "person."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 33 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On section 36—Invalid without entry.

Mr. CAHAN: It has been suggested that after the word "transfers" in line 9 there should be inserted the words "or in a branch register of transfers." The fact is that many companies have a general register and also branch registers, and, in view of the decision in the Royal Bank vs. Smith case respecting provincial branch registers, it was really an oversight that these words were not inserted in the drafting.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has consideration been given to the question of the registration of shares to make it obligatory on companies to open registers in the various provinces? I have in mind the question of succession duties and the payment of double fees. Nearly all the big corporations have their head offices in Montreal, Toronto or some other large city, while the shareholders are scattered throughout every province. There is no reciprocity between the provinces in the matter of succession duties, and very often the estates of deceased shareholders are mulcted for double duty. In the province of Quebec an incorporated company may claim a different province as its domicile, while the shareholder claims another province. This leads to a great deal of litigation and double expense. The banks have worked out a scheme for the relief of the estates of deceased shareholders. They provide a register in every province and it seems to me that this is the proper time and place to make it obligatory upon public companies to open share registers in every province. I have had a great deal of experience in connection with these matters and I know it works very great hardship, not on the companies but on the estates of deceased shareholders. I offer the suggestion that this clause be drafted in such a way as to provide that where there is any considerable number of shareholders in any one province, a company shall open a branch registry office in such province.

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact, it is not obligatory upon the banks to open branch or provincial registers, but in provinces where there is a considerable number of shareholders they do so for the personal convenience of their shareholders. Full provision is made in this bill for branch registers, but we have left it optional with the company as to the adoption of a branch registry system. This bill applies to every company incorporated, whether it be a small company with a thousand dollars capital or a large company with many millions of dollars of capital. After full consideration we thought that the time had not come to make the establishing of branch registers obligatory. In the case of the smaller companies it would be an obligation and burden which would be intolerable. I trust the hon. gentleman will allow this section to pass in its present form. I am ready to accept the opinion of the committee, but my own opinion is very decidedly against making branch registers obligatory in a general statute which applies to all companies, whatever their capital may be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appreciate that in the case of the small joint stock companies it might be a burden, but I do suggest that in the case of companies whose shares are listed on the stock exchanges it should be made obligatory. I am quite satisfied the section could be drafted in such a way as to cover the cases I have in mind, that is, companies whose shares are listed on the stock exchanges. It should not be any great burden if this were done, and it would provide protection to the estates of deceased shareholders. This should be done for the very pertinent reasons which I have urged. Any hon. gentleman practising in the smaller provinces knows that in the case of a large estate with diversified investments and securities a great number of shares will be held in companies listed on the Montreal or Toronto stock exchanges. In the case of decedents residing in the smaller provinces there is a double taxation because the shares are registered in the province in which the head office is located. I understand there is a recent decision in Quebec which is under appeal and which would afford protection, but I think this is the time and place to give consideration to the circumstances which I have indicated, I am afraid very inadequately. If we do not do it now we will not get it done for many years to come. This bill is to be a model and I appeal to the minister to give some consideration to these suggestions.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest that my hon. friend who has just spoken is approaching the matter from the wrong end. I submit that we are legislating for companies and not in connection with succession duties. I think there is a lot of room for improvement in the succession duties acts and in the way they are administered, although I do not cast any reflection upon anyone. The double duty is caused not by the Dominion Companies Act but by the rulings which have been given by the various attorneys general and the various succession duties departments of the provinces. While I sympathize with my hon. friend, I submit he is approaching the question from the wrong angle. I have a case in mind of a small estate which is being virtually held up because of claims from two different succession duties jurisdictions. I suggest that it would be a serious thing for companies, even those listed on the stock exchanges, to be required to have registers in every province regardless of the fact that their shareholders may be residing in only two or three provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree that we are legislating on behalf of all companies, but I suggest, with all deference, that we are also legislating on behalf of the shareholders of companies. I think that is a complete answer to the statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: They do not have to become shareholders.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In so far as their rights are affected by this bill, we are legislating just as much in the interests of shareholders as we are in the interests of the company. It would not be such a difficult thing to establish branch registers. The trust companies operate in every province, and all that would be required would be the appointment of a registrar in a particular province by resolution of the directors. It would necessitate the payment of a very small fee to affect the transfers I have in mind. I see no difficulty about it; in fact I am quite satisfied it could be worked out very easily and very economically. It would be of great benefit, not to the companies but to the shareholders, to whom they owe a duty in this respect.

Mr. CAHAN: Hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1932 I introduced a bill which created a new part to the Dominion Companies Act, a part which appears as part VI of this act, to be found at page 96. This part provides that all Canadian companies incorporated under any act of the parliament of Canada or of the legislature of the late province of Canada may have branch registration offices. When introducing that legislation in 1932 we gave most careful consideration to the question raised by the hon. gentleman with regard to branch registers. We provided by the terms of that enactment every facility for the opening of branch registers, with the result that many of the large companies have opened branch registers of their own volition in more than one province, but confining such branch registers to those provinces in which numbers of their shareholders were resident or domiciled. Shareholders have the option of not retaining shares in a company which fails to give them the protection which they think they ought to have in respect of the succession duties taxes. We have given the companies this option and have left it to the shareholders to bring pressure upon the company with respect to the establishing of branch registers. We think we have gone just about as far as we ought to go at the present time. This matter has been developed by a succession of decisions of the highest courts of the land, and I do not think we are yet in position to amend the Dominion Companies Act to provide for successful evasions of the decisions of provincial courts wth respect to the succession duties tax. I prefer to leave it as it is at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I must take exception to the last statement of the minister. There is no attempt to evade the payment of any succession duties tax. I do suggest that we ought not to pass legislation which will help two different provinces to obtain succession duties on the same securities. That is what has happened in the past and it is what I have had in mind as an evil that ought to be cured if possible. I have heard no good answer yet as to why it should not be made obligatory. I have in mind the case of registered bonds of the Canadian National Railways. For years I had put up a battle with the treasury department of the Canadian National Railways to have their bonds registered, not in Montreal but in the place where the bondholder resides. I had a long correspondence with the late Mr. Ruel. I could not get him to move for a long time, but finally I did, so that the Canadian National Railway bonds might be registered in New Brunswick through a trust company, as they had previously been registered in Quebec. Take the expensive litigation in connection with the Sifton estate. If the Sifton bonds had not been registered in Montreal, where the head office of the Canadian National Railways was, the province of Quebec would have had no earthly excuse for trying to collect from the executors a huge sum of money in succession duties. We are perpetuating what is really a scandal in this country, namely, the collection of double duties on the same set of securities.

Mr. RALSTON: Are they collecting to-day two income taxes on the salaries of ministers who live in Ottawa? It is done every day, but does anyone suggest that that is a scandal?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know whether my hon. friend is defending the principle of double taxation in succession duties.

Mr. RALSTON: The idea of double taxation is not necessarily a scandal, which is the term my hon. friend uses. Anyone who has lived in Ottawa knows that the same income is taxed twice in the city of Ottawa—by the city and again by the income tax department. But no one uses strong language, calling it a scandal. The food we eat is taxed a good many times and no one talks about it as a scandal. I do not understand my hon. friend's argument. I appreciate the fact that there are hardships, but my point is that he is proposing to legislate in the wrong place. In the first place this is a companies act and we are not concerned with the question as to who shall or shall not purchase shares of a company, because after all that is a voluntary matter; and secondly, as the minister says, we are pretty nearly legislating to assist in an evasion of provincial law. How should we like it if the provinces started to legislate in the same way to assist in the evasion of a dominion law? We have to be careful about a matter of this kind, which is not as clear as my hon. friend suggests. Further, it is questionable whether we shall get clear of double taxation simply by making it obligatory upon companies to register in the different provinces. It is possible that there may still be double taxation, and my hon. friend may be enhancing the possibility not only of double but of treble taxation if that is done. As the Secretary of State has said, we are not yet at the stage, so far as judicial decisions are concerned, where we know precisely where we are in relation to the possibilities of succession duties in Canada and how far domicile enters into it. We do not know how far the question as to where you can effectively transfer property, which is the test in some instances, determines the liability for succession duty purposes. I know that my hon. friend has had far more experience than I in connection with succession duties, but I submit that we ought as far as possible to legislate for companies rather than attempt to follow the incidence of the legislation into the account books and finally into the estates of various people who may or may not become shareholders as they think proper.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that after the word "transfers" in the fourth line there be inserted the words "or in a branch register of transfers.".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GEARY: Has the attention of the minister been drawn to line 21 on page 21, in subsection 2? Is it proposed to have the same amendment here? Does the same alternative apply after the word "transfers"?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. DUPRE: I move that subsection 2 be amended similarly in line 21.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 37 agreed to.

Mr. BUTCHER: Will the minister allow sections 38 and 39 to stand.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Sections 38 and 39 stand.

Mr. CAHAN: As this is a convenient place and it is a few minutes to eleven o'clock I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

END OF VOLUME III