House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, April 17, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo) moved the first reading of Bill No. 56 (from the Senate) with respect to hospital sweepstakes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. FRASER: In view of the statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister I hardly think it is necessary to explain the bill. This is practically the same bill that was introduced in the house last session, and in view of the fact that we will have an opportunity for an extended discussion I do not think any further explanation is necessary at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FRASER RIVER BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the difficulty that is being experienced in crossing the Fraser river from New Westminster on down, and in view of the many reports that have been appearing in the press I should like to ask if the government are considering the advisability of constructing a bridge across the Fraser river under the public works program.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): My recollection is that the matter has not been dealt with. Representations have been made to the government with respect to charters held by individuals for bridges across the Fraser river, and since the advent into power of the new administration in British Columbia I believe certain legislation has been enacted dealing with the matter. Nothing has been received by the government of which I can think at the moment, however, other than the correspondence to which I have referred. I will look it up, and if there is anything I will let the hon. gentleman know.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GUTHRIE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Referring to Hansard for yesterday I find that when the vote on the amendment to the relief bill was taken my name is recorded as amongst those who voted against the amendment. A few minutes later, when the motion for the third reading of the bill was put, I certainly rose in my place and voted; my name was called by the assistant clerk, but my name is not recorded in the division list or in the list of pairs. I wish to have that error corrected, Mr. Speaker, since I certainly voted for the third reading of the bill.

May I say that I attach no blame at all to either the assistant clerk or the clerk in regard to this omission. When the vote was taken there was so much conversation, and perhaps disorder, in the chamber that though my name was called by the assistant clerk it might well be that the clerk did not hear it. I think my old friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) will bear me out when I say that in our early experience in this house the taking of a division was rather a dignified and indeed one might say a solemn occasion. When the whips returned the doors were closed; no one was permitted to enter or leave the chamber, and on pain of a very severe rebuke no one was permitted to move about the house at all from one seat to another. Apart from the traditional applause that always greeted the votes of the leaders the proverbial silence was always maintained, so that you could hear a pin drop. I wish members of the house would assist in restoring that ancient dignity, so that at least we may have a properly recorded division in this house.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I am very glad to have the opportunity of endorsing every word that has been uttered by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), and I hope that in future the old traditions of parliament will be observed.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if he is now in a position to make any announcement in regard to the intentions of the government as to implementing any or all of the provisions of the Gibb report at this session.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, the information I can give my hon. friend is that I do not think we intend to implement that report this session.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to a question of privilege affecting this house. On Thursday, April 12, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) referred to an article appearing in a newspaper, headed:

Arthur Cutten facing charge of conspiracy alleged by United States Secretary of Agriculture to have made false reports to manipulate grain prices.

After asking the first question the hon. member said:

My second question is, did the said Cutten do anything in Canada of the kind complained of by the American government according to the dispatch I have just quoted?

This question of the hon. member is to be found at page 2067 of Hansard. A point of order was taken and considerable discussion took place, whereupon the hon. member for Temiscouata spoke as follows, as reported in the next column of the said page:

There is an obvious connection between the manipulation of grain by Cutten in Chicago and what might have been done here. We do not know what has been done here. I do not know, no one knows—

The Chairman: Order. Does the hon. gentleman speak of his personal knowledge or of what he has read?

To this inquiry the hon. member replied:

Well, most of our knowledge comes from the press, because the government does not say much.

Then there was a further statement made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. At page 2071 the chairman said:

I understood the hon. member was going to speak on the point of order.

Then the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said:

Yes, Mr. Chairman. Let me go a step further. As far as the Cutten matter is concerned, in which you intervened, Mr. Chairman, in a very courteous manner, I understand that this wheat which Cutten was selling in Chicago was sold to Mr. McFarland, and that the government was guaranteeing the money which was paying for that wheat.

Then, at page 2072:

As I said a moment ago, my only interest so far as the Cutten matter is concerned is this, that owing to the guarantee given Mr. McFarland by the government, Mr. Cutten in Chicago sold wheat to Mr. McFarland, and he had to use money for the guarantee which the dominion gave to him. In making that statement I think I have said sufficient for my purpose.

That was a direct and positive statement. Then, later at page 2074, the following statement was made by myself:

There is just one observation which the hon. member made which I submit to the committee is a very serious one. He has alleged that in consequence of something that appears in the newspapers there was collusion—that is what it amounts to—between the cooperative wheat sellers' organization and Mr. Cutten at Chicago and that money was used by Canadians for the purpose of buying Mr. Cutten's wheat.

Mr. Duff: If the Prime Minister will allow me, I said that there was a report.

Mr. Bennett: Any man who in parliament makes a statement of that kind must accept the responsibility for making it.

That is the direct statement, which will be recalled. Then the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said, "I am willing to accept it."

I cabled Mr. McFarland the sense of the statement thus made and I have just received an answer, as follows:

Replying your telegram, never directly or indirectly, either for myself or for any person, corporation or government, have I had any business transactions in wheat or other commodities with Arthur Cutten either in Chicago, Winnipeg or elsewhere.

McFarland.

I mention that, Mr. Speaker, because the statement, in the first instance, was a very direct one, and later it was said to have been only a report. I do think that the privileges of this house have been violated by a statement of that positive character being made with respect to one who was discharging the duties that he was, and whose contradiction is unequivocal and certain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe it is against the rules of the house to quote statements from outsiders in reply to statements made by hon. members of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true, Mr. Speaker, but when it involves a question of a witness who was brought by a committee of this house before it, and a statement of that kind is made, the government as such, not a member but the government, may make a denial on the strength of the information received from the individual whose name is given, in order that there may be no question about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let any hon. member try to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg the hon. member's pardon.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let any hon. member try to do what the Prime Minister has done.

Mr. BENNETT: It was frequently done by hon. members opposite.

The following legislation will be submitted to the house before—

Mr. DUFF: Before the Prime Minister gives the leader of the opposition the information asked may I make a statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. DUFF: But it is a question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: All right.

Mr. DUFF: The other day when I brought up the matter about something which occurred in a committee of the house the Prime Minister was the first to rise in his seat and state I had no right to do so. To-day however the Prime Minister does deliberately what I tried to do the other day. So far as I am concerned, and so far as Mr. McFarland is concerned, it is quite possible that Mr. McFarland might not have known whose wheat he was buying in Chicago. He does not say so in that telegram. Let me say to the Prime Minister that there is no question about it, and I think I know what I am talking about when I say that the wheat Mr. McFarland bought, and the money guaranteed by this government, was wheat which Mr. Cutten sold to Mr. McFarland on the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement which is made by the hon. member does not add anything to what has already been said by him.

Mr. DUFF: Or yourself.

Mr. BENNETT: But it will be recalled that it was stated by Mr. McFarland, and it is a matter of evidence, that he had bought not a single grain of wheat in Chicago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He did not say Chicago.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he said Chicago.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The business which will be submitted to the house comprises amendments to the Food and Drugs Act; The Proprietary Medicines Act; The Criminal Code; The Soldier Settlement Act; The Customs Act; The Elections Act; The Farm Loan Act and The Bankruptcy Act. Compromises or arrangements with creditors it is hoped will be in the form of one bill. Possibly there will be one other administrative change in addition to the legislation now pending before the house and the senate, and the changes which will arise from the deliberations of the existing committees on the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act, if they emerge successfully from the committee to which they have been sent. There will be changes of course in the Currency Act, some changes in the Finance Act and some changes in the Notes Act. There will be submitted also a consolidated Excise Act which cannot be submitted until after the budget has been delivered. There will be a new Companies Act and a Franchise Act arising out of the Elections Act. I think I may say to the right hon. gentleman that the main features of the Elections Act will remain as they are, but an effort will be made to enact a statute along the lines of the recommendations of the first chief electoral officer, that is the establishment of a basic list which will not depart from the principles of the present Elections Act. There will also be an Emergency Public Works Act, to which reference has already been made. There is in addition another bill in process of preparation which to-day I cannot speak about—with certainty, but about which I may be able to speak with certainty by the end of the week. There will also be amendments to the Judges Act.

Mr. POULIOT: In the meantime prosperity will be around the corner.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 38, to amend the Dairy Industry Act.—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister mentioned yesterday that to-day we would go on with the marketing bill. Is there any reason why that should not be proceeded with?

Mr. BENNETT: I indicated last evening that we were proceeding with the marketing bill, and with certain bills on the order paper of which I gave the numbers. We are proceeding with this first; that is all.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—definitions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister explain the purpose in the change in this part of the act, with particular reference to the definition of "fat" which is now to include fats of mineral origin. An explanation of the whole clause I think would be in order.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The definitions are being extended so as to be more in line with the requirements of modern practice. The definition of "fat" is amended to include mineral fats as well as animal and vegetable fats because there has been an effort to use mineral fat in producing an article that is being used as a substitute for butter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the article?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not the name with me but as certain attempts have been made in that direction it was thought advisable to amend this definition as a protection to the consuming public, so that they would get what they thought they were getting when making a purchase.

Mr. NEILL: Does not the act dealing with oleomargarine already prohibit such a thing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, margarine is not a mineral fat.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would not the Pure Food and Drugs Act take care of such a product? The minister's explanation of the matter is not at all clear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not covered by the Pure Food and Drugs Act because mineral oil is used for medicinal purposes and there is nothing injurious in its use for that purpose. The object of amending this definition is simply to prevent the substitution of mineral oil in products that would come into competition with butter.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do I understand from the minister's remarks that the department knows of cases where mineral oil has been used as a substitute in the making of butter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, that is correct

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that allowed?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is to prevent it.

Mr. MITCHELL: If mineral oil has been used as a substitute in the making of butter, what action has been taken by the department in such cases?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It was not used in the making of butter but in substitutes for butter or in products that resembled butter and were intended to be used in place of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I remember the fight over oleomargarine some years ago, and I am curious to know what these products are.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that such a product is being manufactured in the United States, and they desire to bring it into this country. We do not think it should be brought in, and if we decide that it shall not be brought in and sold as butter, this section will enable us to prevent that being done.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like to know what the product is called. I have very strong opinions about this thing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not got the name of the product, but one of the advantages claimed and advertised for it is that it makes what is eaten more palatable and will prevent the consumers from becoming what they would consider too stout.

Mr. MITCHELL: What I want to get clear in my mind is this: If this article is imported into this country and sold as butter, will prosecutions take place under this section?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would be possible under this bill to make prosecutions if thought desirable.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then it is the intention of the government to prevent the sale of this substitute for butter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Its sale as butter, yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It may be sold if it is not offered as butter, is that it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, that is my understanding. The definition as it stands at present requires that there must be a specified amount of fat in a product sold as butter. Under the present act, the definition of "fat" would not exclude mineral oil. It is for this reason that the change is made.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do I understand that what is being sold in the United States as a butter substitute could not be sold in Canada as such but could be sold as a different product in spite of the oleomargarine law?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It cannot be sold as butter but it could be sold for medicinal purposes. The definition which we have now does not specify this particular kind of fat. I regret I have not the particulars before me but I shall be glad to get them for the hon. member.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has the minister satisfied himself that this amendment will be fair to the butter producer and not interfere in any way with his market through permitting the introduction of a substitute which can be sold as a medicinal article?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of the bill is to protect especially the butter producer and the consumer. This bill has been before the agriculture committee when a full discussion took place. The bill met with the approval of the members of that committee but I must admit that since that time the details have not been as fresh in my mind as they might be.

Mr. SANDERSON: Has there been any request for this proposed legislation and, if so, from whom was it received?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The industry submitted samples to us which upon analysis were found not to contain either milk or vegetable fat. The change has been made as a protection to the producer and to the consumer.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will this legislation permit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or similar products? I can remember distinctly my maiden speech many years ago when I spoke against oleomargarine. The majority of the house pronounced themselves to be against this product even when sold under its proper name. There has always been a danger of confusion among the consumers. If this measure is to open the door to substitutes for butter I think our farmers in general will protest very strongly.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of widening the definition is to afford the protection the hon. member suggests.

Mr. SANDERSON: There was so much noise in the chamber that I could not catch the answer to my question. I believe the minister said that requests had come from the industry. Am I right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is my understanding.

Mr. SANDERSON: What does the minister mean by the industry?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The producers of butter, the creameries.

Mr. BOUCHARD: You mean the dairy industry?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The dairy industry.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister will pardon me for not being present when the bill was introduced and I should like to know his reasons for bringing in this legislation. I should like to know who asked for these amendments and from what part of the country requests were received. For instance, has the minister received representations from Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Requests have been coming in from time to time from the dairy industry as a whole and from the industry in different provinces. As I said before, the purpose of this amendment is to widen the definitions to bring them more in line with modern practices and to assure the consuming public that they are getting what they want to purchase. It is intended also to prevent the manufacture of or the entry into this country of products which will be in competition with those of our dairy producers.

Mr. LUCAS: Has any of this product been sold in Canada up to the present time?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not of which we have any record, but we understand that it was contemplated that sales would be made.

Mr. LUCAS: This amendment would not keep it out other than by providing that it be sold on its own merits.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a clause in the act which has not been amended. Section 5 reads:

> No person shall manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale, any oleomargarine, margarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter, manufactured wholly or in part from any fat other than that of milk or cream.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is that a clause in the new bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, that has not been changed.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I would suggest that this section be allowed to stand until we have studied the other sections. We could then come back to it if the committee is willing.

Mr. SANDERSON: Has the minister received any request for this legislation from the National Dairy Council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not before me the names of those who made requests that there should be changes but from time to time requests have been made that the definitions should be changed to be brought in line with modern practices. One of the problems to be dealt with is the tendency to produce an article containing no animal or milk fat. It was to widen these definitions that this change has been made.

Mr. SANDERSON: There is so much confusion in the chamber that it is very difficult to hear and I am not just clear as to what the minister answered. I asked him if any request for this proposed legislation had been received from the National Dairy Council.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say but I would say that requests have been received from branches of the dairy industry. As the National Dairy Council is supposed to be representative of the whole industry, I think it is immaterial whether or not we have received a request from that organization.

Mr. SANDERSON: Just what does the minister mean? Does his answer take in any particular province or all provinces? For instance what requests did he receive from Ontario?

Mr. CASGRAIN: And Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I have stated a number of times, I have not before me a specific list of the different bodies that made requests for this change. The changes proposed here have all been made after consultation with the producers' organizations, with the National Dairy Council, with the cooperative creameries and with others engaged in the dairy industry.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister bring before the committee all the requests that have been received either by himself or by his department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to supply the hon. member with the information, but it will be impossible to get it this afternoon.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am aware of that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is very kind of the minister to say that he will bring down these requests, because I was going to ask for them myself. In our province there is an organization known as La Société de l'Industrie Laitière, which a few years ago held a large convention in my county, and these people are very much interested in any bill of such wide scope as the one before us now. The minister told us that this bill was being introduced in order to meet the requests of the dairy industry, and he has intimated that certain statements have been received from those persons at the end of the industry. I should like to have these reports, because this is the committee of the whole house; it is not the committe on agriculture, before whom specialists in the dairy industry and in matters of that sort affecting the dairy council have the right to be heard, and where members may comment on statements made by people who are better versed in the industry. It would be very interesting, I am sure, to all the members of this committee, and certainly to myself to have these comments made so that we might find out whether the provisions contemplated in the bill are really of such a nature as to assist the dairy industry and, I would add, the consumer. Will the minister tell us what will be the effect of all these amendments that are now proposed. It is very important to know whether they are in the interests of the dairy industry and whether at the same time the consumer will benefit.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have no hesitation in saying that it will be of benefit to the dairy industry, the dairy producers particularly, and also to the consumer, because it will enable the consumer to know that he is getting what he believes he is buying when he purchases a product.

Mr. DUPUIS: When the minister uses the term dairy industry, does it include such concerns as Borden's milk, and distributors in the large centres? Are they among those who have asked for the amendments?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Everybody did not ask for it; the request came chiefly from representatives of producers.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes, but could the minister tell me whether Borden's milk was among those making the request?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot tell the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DUPUIS: Can the minister tell me after looking into the question?

Mr. BOUCHARD: Will the minister agree to my suggestion and allow this clause to stand until we have studied the bill further? We could revert to it later on.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I understand that we are to get some information from the minister. I would ask therefore that the clause be allowed to stand.

Section stands.

On section 3—Regulations.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In the explanatory notes it is stated:

This is necessary in order to permit fixing of a legal standard for any dairy product by the governor in council.

I am wondering whether there will be any conflict between the provisions of the bill we are now considering and the other bill, the marketing bill, which will be taken up shortly. In this bill are we given to understand that the governor in council will fix the standard of butter which is to be put on the market? That is what the explanatory note says. Is the governor in council going to fix the various standards of butter in the country?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This also is an extension to include dairy products that are not now included, products of a type different from those dealt with when the act was last revised—for example, processed cheese. It does not change in any way the principle of the act as it now stands.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How were these standards arrived at before the amendments were proposed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This does not mean a new set of standards; it is merely an extension so that standards may be set up for products not now named, products that have come into being since this act was last amended. There is no change in principle.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is it the object of this bill to fix a standard for cream? As we all know, cream is a noble word which has very often been prostituted to represent a low grade commodity very little different from milk. For instance, when you ask for a certain grade of cream, cereal cream or any other, the percentage of fat if I remember rightly is about 10 per cent, perhaps lower in some cases. Milk left in its natural state will give up its cream and I believe the right percentage of fat in the natural state is something around 18 per cent. Are we going to allow this noble word "cream," which is so appealing, to be degraded, representing a product with 10 per cent of fat? I wish the minister would be good enough to consider this question carefully and give the committee an assurance that in the near future he will fix some standard which will not be confusing to either producer or consumer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The amendments proposed by this bill deal only with manufactured products and that would not include cream.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If we are a little concerned about this matter it is because it is important. The explanatory note in connection with paragraph (h) of clause 2 just passed, reads:

This paragraph is amended to include mineral oil in a definition of fat. This is necessary as such an oil might be used in the manufacture of a substitute for butter.

I am afraid, if we pass this bill and give this power to the governor in council to brand, mark and classify certain standards of butter and cheese in accordance with the bill, we might before long have substitutes that might be passed through, adopted, classified and passed as correct and that would be in competition with the dairy products of our farmers in the various provinces. I think this bill is drafted more in order to benefit the jobbers and others who trade in that line of business, who buy and resell the product, than to protect the man of the soil.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of these amendments is to do exactly what the hon. member seems to fear is not being done. No new powers are given and the purpose is now as it has been in the past, to bring the people to whom he refers under control, so that the consumer may know what he is purchasing. The effort is being made to protect the farmer's product against substitutes that we do not consider so beneficial. The purpose of these amendments is, so far as I can understand the hon. member's observations, to do exactly what he wishes done and it gives no additional powers to the government; it is a widening of the definition.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand the minister to say that the farmer who produces butter and goes around selling it is not affected by this bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He is not.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is the explanation we require. Will the minister answer the question of the hon. member for Provencher?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He has answered it.

Mr. DUPUIS: In answer to the hon. member for Kamouraska the minister said that this clause will not affect cream. What does paragraph (f) of clause 2 mean? It reads:

"Dairy product" "dairy products" or "dairy produce" means any milk, cream, condensed milk, evaporated milk—

And so forth. I would like to have from the minister an explanation of his answer that cream would not be included, because I heard my learned friend from Kamouraska mentioning the noble name of cream, and I thought he was recalling a poetic idyll of the mythological past. I would like to know if cream is included or not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Cream is included in dairy products, but it is not included in products for which we set the standards. At the present time the standards for cream are set by municipalities and provinces.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Standards of dairy products.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The section in the original act, subsection 3 of section 6 deals with the abolition of power to sell or have in possession for sale a butter not in keeping with the weight of the package that is supposed correctly to represent the weight. Paragraph (a) reads:

No person shall sell, offer or have in his possession for sale,

(a) any butter moulded or cut into prints, blocks, squares or pats, unless such prints, blocks, squares or pats are of the full net weight of one-quarter pound, one-half pound, one pound or two pounds, but nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps, of indiscriminate weight, as sold by farmers.

Paragraph (b) reads:

No person shall sell, offer or have in his possession for sale,

(b) any butter packed in tins or other packages alleged to contain any definite weight of butter unless such package contains the full net weight of butter. . . .

One can see that the original section dealt solely with the selling or offering for sale of packages on a weight basis or standard. There is now proposed to be added to that an entirely new principle, something altogether apart from the question of weight. The proposed amendment reads:

No person shall manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale any dairy product which does not conform to the standards and requirements of or is contained in a package contravening the provisions of this part and regulations made hereunder.

First, I would like the minister to explain the necessity and the reasons for this clause. In his explanation I hope he will be able to remove from my mind the opinion that the clause as now drafted imposes a serious hardship and handicap on the farmer who himself is selling butter, for notice what may happen. If my wife is making butter on the farm, we bring it into town and we turn it over the counter to a retail store keeper who exchanges groceries for it. That store keeper has no knowledge whatever as to whether the butter is up to the standard and grade required under the bill, that is the new standards and grades to be provided. He has no way of knowing that until that butter has passed through a grader's hands, yet under this clause he may be prosecuted for having in his possession for sale butter which he has taken from a farmer in exchange for goods.

Mr. NEILL: And so may the hon. member.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, so may I. I suggest that a little further thought be given to this clause. In my opinion it deliberately strikes a blow at the small farmer who is selling his own butter and at the storekeeper who is taking it over the counter and offering it for sale. It is a clause which undoubtedly will advance the interests of the milk distributors' combine in Canada. That is the feeling I have in reading the clause and I hope the minister can explain it more satisfactorily.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The butter to which the hon. member is referring is usually called dairy butter as distinguished from creamery butter and there is no grading of dairy butter or butter that is manufactured by the farmer.

Mr. NEILL: But this says "dairy product."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, "dairy product" as defined in the definition, but there is no grading of butter as manufactured by farmers as the hon. member understands that term.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is what I am afraid of under the powers we are giving the minister or the governor in council under this act. Will it not be possible, under this act, for the governor in council to pass such regulations as may affect the dairy farmer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no change in the power that is granted under this section.

Mr. NEILL: But the interpretation clause states:

"dairy product," "dairy products" or "dairy produce" means any milk, cream, condensed milk, evaporated milk, milk powder, butter—

Just the word "butter"; it does not say "creamery butter." That is any kind of butter, and I certainly believe section 4 will cover dairy butter. I would suggest that the trouble might be overcome if the minister would allow the insertion of the words "more than ten pounds of" in line 4 so that it would read, "No person shall manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale more than ten pounds of any dairy product" and so on.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is less inconvenient to the farmer at the present time. There is no interference with the manufacture and sale of butter by farmers at the present time, nor is it contemplated to take any additional power under this act.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is there any distinction made in the original act between creamery and dairy butter? Under subsection (f) of section 2 all butter is included. It does not make any distinction between dairy and creamery butter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under part I of the act creamery butter means butter which is manufactured in a creamery and dairy butter means butter manufactured in a dairy. A dairy is a place where the milk and cream of less than fifty cows is manufactured into butter.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is there any other section in the act which gives privileges to one and not to the other? As the hon. member for Bow River has asked, will a farmer be able to sell his butter to the local merchant or to anyone else?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is that stated in the act? In the amendment we have only the word "butter."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The regulations do not include farmers' butter as described in the first part of the act. The farmers' butter has not been graded in the past, and it is not intended to grade it in the future. Under these changes there will be no more interference than there has been in the past with regard to the farmer manufacturing and disposing of his own butter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that this bill will not affect the farmers' business at all? Do I understand that they will have the right to manufacture and market their butter as they wish without being bound by any of these amendments?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is correct.

Mr. NEILL: But unfortunately the statements of the minister are not incorporated in the act. The minister has said that this bill does not apply to the butter produced by farmers, but in two, three or five years from now the act as it reads will apply, and the act states:

> No person shall manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale any dairy product—and so on. Then I turn to section 2 for the definition of dairy product, and I find that it includes the single word "butter." The one generic term includes all separate definitions. "Butter" includes dairy and creamery butter, and the definition of dairy products must be taken as it appears under section 2, which includes the single word "butter." I would take the minister's word as long as he is minister, but this act will be interpreted as it is written.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The regulations do not include farmers' butter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The statement of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is strengthened by the statement of the minister as to the bill itself. He points out that the act defines creamery butter as butter manufactured in a creamery and dairy butter as butter manufactured in a dairy. Having made that clear in the interpretation section of the bill surely it is absolutely necessary to carry the proper terminology through the bill in order to describe the exact type of butter to be dealt with. Therefore I would submit that subsection (f) of section 2 should be amended by inserting the word "creamery" before the word "butter." It is only one word; it will not interfere with the minister's intentions but it will definitely place the farmers outside the danger of future adverse action, which may still be in keeping with the legislation.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is nothing in these amendments that makes any change from what has been the practice since this act was first introduced; the regulations do not cover farmers' butter. The regulations are based on the definitions in the beginning of the act, and there never has been any regulation applying to butter produced by farmers in their dairies.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that only a matter of custom or is it in the legislation? I do not see anything to that effect in the bill, so apparently we have to rely on the good will of the chief executive.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says there has been no change.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not in that respect.

Mr. NEILL: There has been a change by inserting a new section, which states that no one shall have in his possession any dairy product except under certain conditions. That is where the trouble comes in.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister says there has been no interference in the past, that the farmers have not been brought under this act. I think in the city of Montreal farmers coming to the markets have had some difficulty with the officials of the Department of Agriculture. I remember some cases coming before the magistrates' courts in regard to men who were offering butter for sale.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The farmer whom we consider the dairy farmer never has been interfered with at all as far as federal officials are concerned. There never has been a prosecution against a farmer, according to my information, unless he became a dealer in other butter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He would not be responsible if he did not sell the finished product.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the minister will look at the original interpretation section he will find that the term "dairy product" is interpreted to mean any milk, cream, condensed milk, milk powder, butter or cheese, or any other article manufactured from milk, and all imitations thereof. Now we come down to subsection 4 of section 4, which simply refers to dairy products, which include anything made from milk, cream, condensed milk and so on. Surely the farmers' butter is made from cream.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No person disputes that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And the mere fact that the minister says that so far the regulations have avoided the law rather than lived up to it does not justify the position he is taking.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not finished. A moment ago the minister suggested that the regulations made clear that the individual farmer with less than fifty cows was not to be affected by this legislation and so far had not been affected by any regulations, but as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out the fact is that he can be affected under the law. The regulations can be changed by order in council.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It has always been that way.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It does not matter whether or not it has always been that way. There are new principles introduced in this new legislation which are of an extremely drastic character. If the minister would turn to clause 22 he will find the following:

> The governor in council may make regulations not inconsistent with this act as to,
> (b) the establishment or designation of grading stores.

And so on. I am in disagreement with any legislation which will give the power to this or to any future minister to affect the individual farmer in his transactions with retail stores, or in the sale of butter to his neighbours. It should not come within the ambit of this type of legislation. I strongly recommend that the word "creamery" should be inserted before the word "butter". If the minister would simply add the word "creamery" in the interpretation clause, then all the subsequent clauses would refer to creamery butter. That is what the minister states he wants to refer to, and nothing else. He does not want the legislation to affect any other kind of butter, and in particular farmers' butter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe that the spirit of the act will be better taken care of in this way, in view of the action which has been taken in the past and in view of declared intentions because the administration of any act, no matter how it may be worded, depends to a greater extent on the spirit in which the administration is carried out than on any other factor. Let us suppose that we followed the hon. member's suggestion and inserted the word "creamery", would that not be a challenge to some persons to evade the regulations? As it is there is power to deal with such person.

Mr. DUPUIS: You mean the farmers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, with the farmers. But that power has never been exercised, and there is no invitation to any person, under the cloak of a farmer, to avoid the regulations. I do not think any better assurance of the farmers' protection and the present intentions of those officials could be given than the action which in the past those officials have taken. I feel that in order to provide a protection against the temptation or invitation I have mentioned it would do well to leave the section as it is. In this way dairy butter in the hands of farmers may be treated as I have stated, but against people who would make a practice of purchasing such dairy butter to any great extent, reworking it and so on, we would be able to invoke the regulations. The chief protection here afforded is the understanding that there is no intention of inconveniencing the small farmer in either the production or sale of his product.

Mr. CASGRAIN: From the explanation given by the minister, and his explanation about section 3 of the bill it appears to me as though the government has the right, by order in council, to fix a new legal standard of the product. What is the reason for this authority? At the present time is there not a legal standard fixed and in force?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is the hon. member referring back to section 3, which has passed?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, because we see in section 4 of the bill a reference to the same point. In section 3 I find the expression "and other dairy products or constituents thereof" Paragraph (a) of section 3 is as follows:

(a) the prescribing of standards and for the definition, classification, marking and branding of butter and cheese and other dairy products or constituents thereof.

Then, section 4 of the bill:

Section 6 of the said act is amended by adding thereto as subsection 4 thereof the following:

"(4) No person shall manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale any dairy product which does not conform to the standards and requirements of or is contained in a package contravening the provisions of this part and regulations made hereunder." (New.)

I refer to the expression "to the standards and requirements of"—that existed before. Was there any legal standard? What is the meaning of the expression "legal standard"? Was there not a legal standard before these amendments were contemplated?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. And there is no change contemplated in those standards. The widening of the definition is to enable standards to be set up in connection with dairy products covering products which were not produced at the time the act was passed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the minister refer to new dairy products which will be put on the market. I should like the minister to give some explanation as to what he has in view, and what he believes will be those new dairy products. In order to make this amendment necessary there must be new dairy products; otherwise the amendment would not be necessary.

An hon. MEMBER: That would compete with butter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One example, that of processed cheese, is set before us.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the processed cheese?

Mr. GOBEIL: Reworked cheese.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The blending of cheese.

Mr. CASGRAIN: With what?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With different cheeses.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The blending of different cheeses together?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And milk, and so on.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In what proportions?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on what sort of processed cheese they are making.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that the only product which this amendment contemplates in connection with which standards will be required?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It refers to any new products which might be manufactured; I have mentioned only one of them. Others may now be in process of manufacture.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does it refer to butter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What will the mixture be for butter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Eighty per cent fat and sixteen per cent moisture.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What kind of butter would it produce then? Would it be as good as other butter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no change in the butter standards, none whatever.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is the same?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why is it necessary to place section 4 in the bill if no change is contemplated? I have read section 6 of the act, which section 4 of the bill amends, and I do not think that this amendment, which is marked "new" in the bill is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Wait a minute.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is to cover all individual products which would be standardized which are not now defined in the act, or could not be defined until such products came into being. In this particular connection there is no change whatever in the principle of the act.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Adulteration of dairy product.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has this section any reference to salt?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We find the expression "any foreign substance," and in French the expression "quelque substance étrangère." What is "any foreign substance"?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Any substance other than those that enter into the manufacture of butter as defined.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is butter as defined? What is the prescription for it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is defined as follows:

"Butter" means the food product commonly known as butter, which is manufactured exclusively from milk or cream or both, with or without the addition of colouring matter, common salt, or other harmless preservatives.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is a foreign substance?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Anything other than that.

Mr. DUPUIS: This amendment is to prevent anything being done to injure the good product?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no objection whatever to this amendment if we have a proper definition, but as it now stands, as the hon. member for Kamouraska suggested a moment ago, it might include salt, sugar, colouring matter, the vanilla in ice cream or the strawberry flavouring or the colouring in ice cream. I find in the interpretation clause of the Dairy Act itself a definition of a foreign substance so far as cheese is concerned, but not so far as butter is concerned. I may have overlooked it. Foreign substance is defined in the Dairy Industry Act, section 2 (i) as follows:

"foreign substance" means any substance not necessary to the manufacture of the cheese into which it is introduced.

If the minister would include after the word "cheese" in that definition the words "or other dairy products" it would be satisfactory.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This new section is introduced just to cover that point.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister in mind any new process or new butter product in which some foreign substance is contained at the present time?

Section agreed to.

On section 6.

Mr. REID: I notice that section 6 provides in 21 (a):

"Dairy produce" means butter, cheese and other food products manufactured from milk.

But in section 2 of part one of this bill I find this definition.

"dairy product," "dairy products" or "dairy produce" means any milk, cream, condensed milk, evaporated milk, milk powder, butter, cheese, ice cream or any other article manufactured from milk and all imitations thereof;

It will be noticed that "dairy product" covers a number of things but "dairy produce" means only butter and cheese and other food products manufactured from milk. Why not the same definition in this part of the act as in the first part?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This change in the act is to meet the very insistent demand of practically all provinces in the dominion for power to grade butter and cheese for domestic consumption. The request has come from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Quebec and practically every other province. I do not think there has been a request so far from Manitoba. What the provinces are asking is power so that by passing enabling legislation they will be able to grade butter and cheese for domestic consumption chiefly. This is the action they have requested.

Mr. DUPUIS: It will regulate the sale of farmers' butter as mentioned by my hon. friend from Bow River?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. DUPUIS: Dairy produce includes produce manufactured by a farmer, does it not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. This is to make it possible to meet the demands of the provinces in this connection. So far as the wording goes, it is similar to the clause in force previously. Farmers' butter will not come under the regulations. In that respect it will be similar to clause 4.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Was the new section 21 (e) also requested by the provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is necessary for the purpose of grading for domestic purposes that these definitions should be inserted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the department going to undertake to design the package or container?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the purpose of this paragraph about the package or container?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We simply approve of the package.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the minister why there is a difference between the definition of "package" in this section and the definition in section 2 of the bill? In section 2 (o) "package" means any box, tub, crock, tin, crate, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of any dairy product; but in part 2 of the bill, section 21 (e) "package" means any box, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of dairy produce.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This applies to cheese and butter only.

Mr. VENIOT: But the definition of "dairy product" in section 2 (f) applies to any dairy product and the definition of "package" in 2 (o) includes the words "tub" and "crock". But the words "tub" and "crock" are left out of 21 (e) in part 2. There is a difference in the interpretation there. Which will butter come under? The reason I ask is that butter is often bought in tubs and crocks. I buy my butter from the farmers in crocks or tubs. But under part 2 of this bill I could not do it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not the intention to apply this to farmers—

Mr. VENIOT: But under part 2 if I purchased butter in crocks or tubs the farmer would be liable to prosecution because he would be violating that part of the act. Why not insert the words "tubs or crocks"?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The request is for the grading of butter and cheese for domestic consumption.

Mr. VENIOT: Under part 2?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under part 2.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, but you are not allowed to pack in a tub or crock as you are under part 1. Which are we going to adopt?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is covered by the words "or any other receptacle".

Mr. CASGRAIN: I cannot find any reference made to part 1; there is no heading to show the difference between parts 1 and 2.

Mr. VENIOT: The words "or other receptacle" appear in part 1; the subsection reads:

> "package" means any box, tub, crock, tin, crate, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of any dairy product.

In part 2 the definition is:

> "package" means any box, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of dairy produce.

Why leave out the tub and crock? It would only take a small amendment to have those words included.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no conflict.

Mr. VENIOT: That is the minister's interpretation but it is not mine; I claim there is a very serious conflict. The minister states that there is no conflict between the two, but I fail to see that that is so. There should be no difficulty in adding the words I have mentioned to part 2. There would then be no possibility of the difference of opinion which could now arise.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The words "any other receptacle" would cover that.

Mr. VENIOT: You have those words in the other.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would not the words "any other receptacle" in part 2 include crocks?

Mr. VENIOT: Then why specify the receptacles in part 1; why not just say "any other receptacle"? I claim that having specified them in that part the inspectors could adhere to that specification and a vendor might find himself in trouble under part 2.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the hon. member agrees that everything in part 1 is included in part 2—

Mr. VENIOT: No, I do not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What is there in part 1 that is not included in part 2?

Mr. VENIOT: The words "tub and crock."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We are not talking of words, we are talking of receptacles.

Mr. VENIOT: Tubs and crocks are receptacles and they are not included in part 2.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In part 2 there are the words "any other receptacle."

Mr. VENIOT: In part 1, after specifying the receptacles you mention also "any other receptacle." Why specify crocks and tubs and then leave them out of part 2?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In part 1 we have the definition of package as meaning any box, tub, crock, tin, crate, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle; in part 2 a number of receptacles are mentioned followed by the general statement which covers any other receptacle.

Mr. VENIOT: Why were tubs, crocks and tins left out?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There was no reason for leaving them out but I see no reason for putting them in; it was just a matter of description.

Mr. VENIOT: Why were they included in part 1?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A number of things were described and then in order to cover the whole field we have the words "any other receptacle."

Mr. VENIOT: Why not make it just "any receptacle"?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no objection to that but I also do not see any gain in making that amendment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I notice the explanatory note reads:

> It is proposed to use inspectors appointed under the provisions of part 1 of the act to assist in enforcing the provisions of this part and the regulations made hereunder.

The minister stated a few moments ago that the small farmer would not be disturbed by the government inspectors or surveyors. I recall a case in my county about two years ago where a number of farmers got together in order to produce butter. They were not producing on a large scale such as a cooperative society would; they were producing only in a small way, but they got into trouble. I went to the department and saw the officials and as this was their first offence, they were very lenient. I think this bill would cover the farmer who was manufacturing butter in a small way on his farm, possibly with the assistance of his sons or his family. In the case to which I referred the complaint was made in Quebec city and I had to get it settled. I think we should have something more than the assurance of the minister that the farmer producing butter in a small way will not be subject to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would be impossible to define any limit. In the case referred to by the hon. member, a number of farmers got together to produce and sell their butter. What distinction would there be between that and a creamery? I claim that the purposes of the act can be best served by leaving it just as it is now. It is intended to prevent any violations which may occur. The understanding always has been that a bona fide farmer manufacturing butter on his own farm would not come under the purview of these regulations.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to make a suggestion in connection with the question raised by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot): Would there be any objection to saying that a package means any box, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle and then add "without restricting the generality of the foregoing" or words to that effect?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no objection, but I see no gain.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I point out what the gain would be. If it is left as it is, "Any box, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering," unless the words I have suggested are put in, "any other receptacle or covering" could refer only to any receptacle or covering of the same type as those previously mentioned. That is the difference.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret that I must disagree with the hon. member. As "package" is defined in either case it is broad enough to cover all conditions. Perhaps I am in order in suggesting, in the kindliest possible spirit, because this is a matter for free discussion, that there should be a revision of the composition of the agriculture committee; otherwise it is pretty much a loss of time to take these matters up before that committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does that mean that this will be referred to that committee?

Mr. BENNETT: It has been there.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It has been gone into fully by them and returned to this house without amendment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But as I said a little while ago, we did not have an opportunity to hear all the explanations given in that committee. We cannot be everywhere; we haven't the gift of ubiquity.

Mr. VENIOT: So far as changing the composition of the agriculture committee is concerned, though I am not a member of that committee I am a consumer of butter, and I have as much right as members representing the agricultural interests to have my say before this committee as a consumer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No one has disputed that.

Mr. VENIOT: And as a consumer I am not protected under that clause; that is what I claim.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In what way?

Mr. VENIOT: I have already explained it, and the minister cannot tell me why tubs and crocks have been left out of the definition.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Are they receptacles? If they are, they are covered.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes; but why put them in in the first part of the bill and not in the second? There must be an object. I do not want to be suspicious or to attribute motives at all.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Each part of the bill was prepared at a different time. I see no gain in changing the wording either in part I or in part II, because in part II the definition of package includes everything in part I. The wording was prepared at different times. The receptacles indicated in part II will include everything in part I. No additional purpose would be served by making the change, and I feel we are wasting the time of the committee in further discussion.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the minister intend by "any other receptable or covering" to include receptacles of a kind or type different from any box, paper wrapper or carton?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, that is not intended—any other receptacle.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Any other receptacle, even if different from boxes? Then I want to submit, and I know that the Prime Minister will agree with me, that this does not express the idea.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Will the hon. member repeat the question?

Mr. ELLIOTT: "Any box, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of dairy produce" means only any other receptacle or covering of the type already mentioned, namely, boxes, paper wrappers or cartons. If the minister intends it to include coverings other than boxes, paper wrappers or cartons, he must put in the words I have suggested in order to convey that meaning.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is intended to cover all types of receptacle which it might be considered satisfactory to use.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If that is the intention, may I point out with great respect to the minister that that intention is not conveyed now, because as it is worded now it covers only boxes, paper wrappers, cartons or other receptacles or coverings of that nature.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It does not say "of that nature" here.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know, but it does not need to, and the Prime Minister will say so.

Mr. BENNETT: He will say that this matter has been considered by the agriculture committee, and considered very carefully too, and reported back without amendments.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Who will say that—the Prime Minister?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he is saying it now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The committee on agriculture no doubt knows a lot more about agriculture, but they do not know more about the drafting of a statute than lawyers do, and I do not think that the Prime Minister would suggest that the agriculture committee knows more about drafting a statute than he does.

Mr. BENNETT: I once heard of a distinguished lawyer whose friends said he was easily the best farmer in the district while a farmer friend said he was easily the best lawyer in the district. That has no personal application, although the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay expects me to say it refers to him.

Mr. VENIOT: "Any other receptacle or covering" would allow a farmer who perhaps might not be always disposed to strict cleanliness to bring in butter and sell it from door to door wrapped up in cloth, as I have seen some do. Now that is a covering; it may not be a receptacle but it is a covering, and that is why, to protect the consumer against that sort of thing, I want these definitions specified.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member may still get his butter in cloth if he wishes it.

Mr. VENIOT: But I do not want it; I want to prevent that, because it is not sanitary, and I submit that the consumer is not being protected from that standpoint.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No; we are waiting for the light.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the objection to having the clause cover what is intended?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The chief reason is that it would be impossible to enumerate everything that might be used as a package.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is just the object that would be effected by the amendment I suggest. If you amended it so as to read: "Package means any box, paper wrapper, carton, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, any other covering or receptacle used for the packing of dairy produce," you would have the effect which the minister says he is aiming at. As it stands, either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice will say that that idea is not conveyed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As the hon. member knows, this bill has been submitted to the Department of Justice. The subject matter of the bill comes under the Department of Agriculture: the drafting of it rests with the Department of Justice.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They can make mistakes too.

Mr. VENIOT: You cannot have regulations when you define by statute.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We might define the material but not the character of the package.

Mr. VENIOT: Seeing that there is quite a difference of opinion on this matter and that another clause of the bill stands, I suggest that this be allowed to stand also so that the minister might go into it and consider it seriously. I am in earnest about this matter. As a consumer I feel that I am not sufficiently protected by the bill. I do not want to obstruct it; I do not wish to take any conveniences away from the farmer or the dairyman, but as a consumer I claim that I have a perfect right to be protected and if I think I am not, I have a right to express my opinion. I would ask the minister to allow this clause to stand and to give it further consideration. He says that the bill has been drafted at different periods and perhaps the second part was drafted by a different individual from the one who drew up the first part. The individual who prepared the second part may have overlooked the definition of "package" in the first part and if the clause is reconsidered and revised, the minister can then come back to the committee and give us his studied opinion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of course the agriculture committee is not infallible but while this description of "package" is marked "new," so far as I recollect the description is the same as it has always been for any of these commodities. Mention is made of a number of things and then the words "or any other," are added, because there is always some other. The technical, legal term as stated by the hon. member for West Middlesex is quite right, but this is the ordinary phraseology. The language of the section is for two classes: the language is primarily for the farmer and then when some difficulty occurs where the services of lawyers are required, maybe we should have another description.

Mr. VENIOT: What about the consumer?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The consumer will have a lawyer to represent him.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no objection to a second technical legal phraseology as suggested by the hon. member for West Middlesex. I have seen that kind of phraseology and have often wondered what it meant. We would always have to have a lawyer around to explain the meaning. But anyone would know what the definition in the bill means. Instead of reciting a hundred different kinds of packages, it recites a given number and then adds the words "or any other." That description of course may be wrong from the strictly legal standpoint, but it is intended for common, everyday people. We do not want to have to be running to lawyers all the time for interpretations of enactments; that is a luxury we cannot afford these days.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no doubt that if the bill is left as it is it does not convey what the minister intends it should—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It does.

Mr. ELLIOTT:—or what the ex-minister thinks it conveys. It will certainly have an interpretation from a lawyer before very long because it does not convey what it is intended it should. Following up what my hon. friend has said, I may say that the ex-Minister of Agriculture is quite wrong when he speaks of a description and a legal description. There is just the one legal description and that is not the one we do have here. I would say to him that the clause is improper as it is worded and while it is all very well to say that people do not want to run to lawyers, my hon. friend would be one of the first to be running to a lawyer if he were to get into any difficulty. That is an old story. The man who decries the lawyer the most loudly is always the earliest at his office when he is in trouble. I see no reason why the suggestion made by the hon. member for Gloucester should not be followed, that is that the clause be further considered. The minister should consider the matter and have the clauses made comparatively uniform and drafted so as to mean what is intended.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no ground for allowing the clause to stand. I do not understand the hon. member's statement that it does not include what it is intended to include. As far as I understand it does.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I contend that it does not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As there is no ground for letting the clause stand, I do not think it would be advisable to waste any more time by a further discussion on it or allowing it to stand for further consideration. It has been given very full study and covers the intent and purpose of the legislation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I just want to object to the expression used by the minister with regard to wasting any more time. We are not wasting time; we are endeavouring to save time, and the minister will find that he will save time by not taking quite as arbitrary an attitude as he has done with regard to this clause. Let me tell him what I am willing to do. If the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister, who are present and each of whom is a fairly good lawyer, will say that the clause means what the minister says he intended it to mean, then I shall not move the amendment which I had thought of moving.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All these bills go through the Justice department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the hon. member wait a moment until we hear from the Minister of Justice?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the way to do it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the hon. member for West Middlesex tell me what his point is?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Clause 21, paragraph (e) reads:

> "Package" means any box, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of dairy produce.

As it stands, if there is nothing more, it means any other receptacle or covering of the kind before mentioned. That is the legal interpretation. What I say should be stated if it is intended to cover a receptacle or covering of a kind not before mentioned is:

> different from a box, paper wrapper or carton and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, any receptacle or covering.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The language as I read it:

> "Package" means any box—

That does not imply paper at all.

> —paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of dairy produce.

I think that is broad and general enough to include almost any material one could put in. Under the rule of sui generis, to which my hon. friend refers, "goods of the same general description or genus or class" is the term used in all judgments on the subject. There is the word "box" which I judge might be made of any material; then we find "paper wrapper or carton" which may be made of metal, paper or any other substance. Then follow the words:

> Or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of dairy produce.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister look at part I, at the definition of "package" in paragraph (o). Why leave out the words "tub, crock, tin, crate"? That is my objection to the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a definition, and the word "package" does include:

> Box, tub, crock, tin, crate, paper wrapper, carton or any other receptacle or covering used for the packing of any dairy product.

I do not think that interferes in any way with clause 21 that I have just been reading.

Mr. VENIOT: I want to know why those words are omitted from part II. Why not specify them in part II just as in part I?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That matter was explained some time ago.

Mr. VENIOT: Not to my satisfaction.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The description enumerates certain kinds of packages, and because all could not be foreseen the general statement "or any other receptacle" follows. There would be no difficulty if we added three, four or half a dozen specific containers or receptacles, but it is felt that the words "or any other receptacle" give a wider meaning.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Unless the minister agrees with my suggestion I am not going to say any more; I will simply move the amendment that I think will give the section the meaning the minister says it intends to have. The Minister of Justice has quite properly stated the rule and by his statement has made it quite clear, I submit, that this does not include any other receptacle or covering of a kind or sort different from those previously mentioned. I take it that I am correctly interpreting his views.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I think so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Now the Minister of Agriculture says he does not intend to include any receptacle of a kind or sort different from what is already mentioned, that is, box, paper wrapper or carton.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But the word "box" would include any kind of box. It does not have to be of wood or paper.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Quite so, and "carton" would mean any kind of carton, while "paper wrapping" might mean any kind of paper wrapping. Then there are other things that might be included, and they are intended to be covered by the latter clause, but that cannot cover them unless the words I suggest are inserted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We may be at cross purposes, but I must say that I think the language of the bill as it appears now is ample for all purposes, and I do not see any advantage in adding to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Might I just ask the Minister of Justice whether, in his opinion, this clause is broad enough to include any covering that is neither a box, a paper wrapper or a carton.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the reason for the difference in the two descriptions of a package? Why leave out some things in this description of a package which are included in the other description?

Mr. GUTHRIE: One description is in part 1 of the bill and the other is in part 2; that is all I can say.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reason has been given a number of times this afternoon, not only by myself but also by the hon. member for Melville. It is a matter of practice, in describing packages, to enumerate some, and because all cannot be foreseen the phrase "or any other receptacle" is added to cover those not specified. Nothing could be clearer than that.

Mr. VENIOT: If I understood the Minister of Justice correctly he said, in answer to my question as to why the words tub, crock and tin were left out of part 2, that I was presupposing a reason. I have been presupposing a reason right along. There must be some reason for having left out those words in part 2.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No reason whatever.

Mr. VENIOT: Then why not insert them and end all this discussion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There would be no gain in inserting them.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not want to use this term offensively, but if the minister is so stubborn that he will not listen to the opinions of others who feel that they are aggrieved under this section I do not see any use at all in bringing a bill of this kind before the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think it will be agreed by hon. members of the committee that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is perhaps in the best position of any member of the house to understand the meaning of the word stubborn. I take no offence, therefore, from the remarks he has made. All I say is that in my estimation this includes as much as is included in the definition in part 1.

Mr VENIOT: It does not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would the hon. gentleman indicate what is not included in part 2 that is included in part 1? "Any other receptacle" would include tubs, crocks and the other articles not named in part 2 but named in part 1.

Mr. VENIOT: Then why leave them out?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I have stated a number of times, it is a matter of custom in defining anything of this kind to specify some and include the general statement afterwards.

Mr. VENIOT: Not when the definition appears twice in the same act.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I move that the subsection be amended by adding after the word "carton" the words "and without restricting the generality of the foregoing."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just before that amendment is put I should like to say a word. I have no doubt that this amendment is correctly drawn up from a legal point of view, but I have always taken the view that we should use as few legal terms and classical expressions as possible. We often say "modus operandi"; can we not say, just as easily, "mode of operation"? There are many other expressions used in our legislation that we could easily dispense with in favour of the plain language, especially in legislation dealing with agricultural matters. That may be just an opinion of mine, but it is an opinion I have held and have tried to carry out all my life. With all due respect to the technically correct draftsmanship of my legal friend, I like the present form better. I admit that I am old fashioned, but in some things I hope to remain old fashioned, and this is one of them.

Mr ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend prefers an illegal clause to a legal clause, as I understand he does, he will have to oppose the amendment.

Mr. VENIOT: In order to make the situation plain to the ex-Minister of Agriculture may I say that my objection was taken because part 1 included the words tub, crock and tin, under the definition of a package, but in part 2 those words are left out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It would not make a bit of difference if they were all left out but one.

Mr. VENIOT: Let us take the word "wrapping." That is not defined in any part of the act. Butter can appear for sale on the market wrapped in old newspapers. What is to prevent that? I am taking an extreme case, but that is the only way we can get to the bottom of this matter. What is to prevent a farmer coming to market with his butter wrapped up in old newspapers, with no other wrapping at all?

Mr. SHAVER: The board of health.

Mr. VENIOT: You do not always have a board of health.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): "Paper wrapper" appears in both parts.

Mr VENIOT: Quite so, but under this clause what is to prevent a farmer from coming to market with his butter wrapped up in old newspapers?

Mr. BENNETT: He could not sell it; that is all.

Amendment (Mr. Elliott) lost on division.

Subsection 21 agreed to.

On subsection 22—Regulations.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I ask the minister if there is an advisory committee representative of the interests of the producers and manufacturers to work out with the minister and his officials the regulations to be approved by the governor in council, as was done in connection with the Grain Act and some other legislation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They have been submitted to the representatives of the provinces, and approved by them.

Mr. BOUCHARD: And in the future that will be done?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister any idea as to what fees will be charged to the farmers? From the French bill I read:

(f) L'imposition de droits pour le classement des produits laitiers.

What fees will be charged?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No fees applying to farmers.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the fees to the dairy industry?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only when there is regrading to be done.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is there any provision for the grading of homemade butter? Of course as the minister is aware there is no such provision. Perhaps I may be considered old fashioned, but I am still of the opinion that despite the progress of the dairy industry there is no modern process which can replace the good flavour of homemade butter. Of course such butter has acquired a bad reputation because in olden days there were no refrigerators, and the butter was placed on the market all at once in the months of November and December. I know that to this day on the Paris market in France the butter which draws the highest price is the homemade butter manufactured in Issigny. That butter is made according to the old fashioned methods. I have tested most of the different kinds of creamery butter made in Canada, and I must say we have no butter which can compete with the French butter I have just mentioned. Would the minister consider that the encouragement of the manufacture of homemade butter would be worth while, so that people who have maintained a taste for this butter may be able to secure it? Perhaps those people are not very numerous.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I agree entirely with what the hon. member has said. A good deal of consideration has been given to the possibility of grading what might be called domestic butter. Reports up to the present indicate that the quantities affected are not sufficiently large, and that the whole problem is too involved. That is one of the questions which has always received careful consideration, because I agree with the hon. member that we would have achieved a great gain if we could encourage the production of that class of butter.

Subsection 22 agreed to.

Subsections 23, 24 and 25 agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. BROWN: Although the section has been passed I should like to refer to part 2, the new section 22. As the explanatory note says:

> This subsection previously read "the grading of dairy produce intended for export." The words "intended for export" are omitted in order to provide by regulation for the grading of dairy produce for domestic consumption.

Of course we do not know what the regulations may be, but I should like to ask the minister to what extent it is intended to interfere with the selling of homemade butter by the farmer himself to the consumer. That is very common. Most of the butter handled by the local merchants is undoubtedly creamery butter, and as such is subject to grading, but very frequently the merchants will take in a small lot of dairy butter. That butter does not go on to the market; that is, it is not shipped out of that community but is passed on to local consumers. Will that butter be subjected to grading?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. BROWN: I am glad to hear that. It is only a small proportion of the total trade, and while I am heartily in favour of the principle of grading I think that small trading of that class should not be interfered with.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECT AND PEST ACT

The house in committee on Bill No. 39, to amend the Destructive Insect and Pest Act—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

[Mr. Bouchard.]

On section 1—rights of provinces or of governor in council not affected.

Mr. CASGRAIN: This is a very lengthy section with several lines underlined. In the bill that has just passed the house we asked for a clause similar to what is contained here, "notwithstanding the generality of the terms of this act," but that was not allowed to be inserted. Very extensive powers are being given under this section. For instance, the power of the governor in council is to extend to any matter within the scope of this act, "notwithstanding the existence of any provincial law relating thereto." As I was not in the agriculture committee I would ask the minister to give us an explanation of this important section.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We shall look forward to having the hon. member in the agriculture committee after the interest he has shown this afternoon.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I shall be very glad to assist you.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of this section is to make clear certain questions that have arisen since the passing of the act last session. That is the sole purpose. It was thought that with the passing of the act last session, if the federal government undertook any control or passed any legislation with reference to anything coming within the purview of the act, the province could not deal with that particular problem in relation to their own particular difficulties, but that if the federal government had not passed the legislation the provinces would have been free to do so. There are certain cases where that did not work satisfactorily. In connection with the corn borer, for instance, the dominion government passed certain regulations with reference to the importation of corn from certain states in the United States, and under an interpretation of the act as it stood, it was thought that such action might prevent the province of Ontario from passing any legislation looking to the control of the corn borer or with reference to cultural methods or anything of that kind. Similarly with the grasshopper pest in the western provinces. It clears the bill of what might be considered a misunderstanding and makes it perfectly clear that a province is free to introduce any legislation it wishes so long as such legislation is not repugnant to the federal legislation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The section states:

> —but the power of the governor in council shall nevertheless be construed as ample to extend from time to time the application of this act and the regulations made thereunder, to any matter and to every aspect of any matter within the scope of this act, notwithstanding the existence of any provincial law relating thereto.

I understand that this parliament has the right to appeal the laws passed by other legislatures but I think in the matter of agriculture all the provinces are cooperating together and I should like to know if the minister has in view certain provincial legislation which it might be considered should be overridden in order to make the application of this act more complete.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The provinces asked for legislation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Did the provinces ask for that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They seem to give up certain power which they have.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The act of last year stated that if the federal government did not pass legislation with reference to any of these matters, the province might do so. It may be that a province might pass legislation to deal with some of these insects, but the federal government would not be prevented from passing similar legislation to cover the whole dominion. This amendment is made in order to prevent the overriding referred to by the hon. member and to make cooperation possible.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Have any representations been made by the Department of Agriculture of Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a case in Quebec which this will cover.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They are agreeable to it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

LIVE STOCK AND PRODUCTS ACT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 40, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not know whether I am in order but this would seem to be a good opportunity to obtain some information with regard to certain export trade which was carried on in Montreal. I was told some time ago by people connected with the live stock industry that the government had paid a bonus or provided certain credits to a firm in Montreal which was exporting cattle to England. I do not know whether this was done under the provisions of the relief act. There was a gentleman, I think named Richardson, who was connected with a firm known as the Richelieu Company. This company purchased a large quantity of live stock in Ontario for which some farmers were paid while some were not. Apparently the government gave some money to this company to help it refit boats and make them suitable for cattle shipping. I have no accusations to make in this regard but as we are talking about the exporting of live stock, perhaps the minister could give us some information in connection with this venture.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The act as it stood before this bill was introduced gave the power to fix the charges of live stock commission men and also the charges for the handling of stock or yardage at the stockyards. There was also the provision for a bond to protect the producer or whoever might be selling stock to these people. The act did not include an exporter or an exporter's agent as it is only recently that there has been any export trade of this kind. This amendment is to make possible the fixing of charges by and the bonding of an exporter or an exporter's agent in order to protect the people whose stock may be handled. In the case of the corporation to which the hon. member refers, it would have been possible to have the people bonded. I do not know the details of the matter, but the farmers who I understand have had a loss are following it up and are being given every assistance. It has been the policy of the government during the past three or four years to make certain that there would be space available for cattle intended for export, and to prevent any increase in the freight charges, in certain instances boats have been fitted up for the carrying of the cattle. My understanding however is that no subsidy was given to individuals outside of the steamship companies that fitted up the boats.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the name of the steamship company that fitted up the boats?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The Manchester lines and Anchor-Donaldson.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister the figures paid in each instance, and the number of head of cattle exported under the new policy adopted last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not the figures for cattle exported, nor have I the figures as to the money paid, because this work has not been handled under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Under what department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When either the Department of Trade and Commerce or any other department made these arrangements with shipping companies for fitting up boats, as indicated by the minister, and when apparently some encouragement was held out to induce people to ship cattle to the old country, were these things done under any authority? Under what authority was the transaction carried out?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is the hon. member asking under what authority the boats were fitted up?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under the authority of the Farm Relief Act, I believe, to give assistance to the marketing of agricultural products, in this instance, cattle.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not know the minister personally very well, but from the point of view of cattle and agricultural matters generally I know that he is a highly qualified member of the government. I do not understand how this matter stands. If the export of cattle had to be encouraged and extended, surely it should have been done under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture rather than under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Trade and Commerce sees to the opening up of new avenues of commerce here and there, having Canadian representatives in various dominions and countries promoting the sale of the different forms of produce which we have to export. I submit, however, with all due deference to the persons who carried out this transaction, that it is a reflection on the Minister of Agriculture to have removed from his purview this very important part of the work of improving conditions in agriculture, in connection with the cattle export in this case, and putting the matter in the hands of the Department of Trade and Commerce, without any control on the part of the Minister of Agriculture, who I submit is the member of the government best qualified to direct such operations, and to indicate to individuals who wanted to go into the cattle export business exactly how they should set about it.

I have not all the details of the transaction, but I am told that it is not too rosy, and that some people have suffered losses in consequence. I know that the minister, being himself a farmer, should have been the one directing these operations. I do not think it is fair to divide between two departments the administration of a branch of agricultural activities. The Department of Agriculture should be charged with the responsibility of developing the cattle export trade, but here we find the Minister of Trade and Commerce stepping in. I do not know what was done, but as the result of inducement, or friendship, or the belief that it would make a good story, certain privileges or bounties were given, or certain prices were paid to allow individuals to go on with that trade, developing it, with the result that to-day the Minister of Agriculture does not seem to know anything about it, although he is the man most competent to inform the country regarding the matter. He can only say, "I do not know anything about it, because it was not done under my department but under the Department of Trade and Commerce." It seems that the Department of Agriculture has been deprived of an important function in this regard.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend is mistaken in that. This is in the nature of a steamship subsidy to fit up ships for cattle. My hon. friend has been long enough in the house to know that all steamship subsidies and subventions are under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and have been for the last thirty years.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We had not known that it was done that way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The subsidies granted for the carrying of mail from the post office are also all granted by the Department of Trade and Commerce. Consequently, when money was to be advanced for the fitting up of steamships for carrying cattle, the proper department to do it was the Department of Trade and Commerce, which I understand carried it out. And, if my memory serves me, it was under the provisions of the farm relief legislation. I am not familiar personally with the particular transaction to which my hon. friend has referred, but I know that my hon. friend from West Middlesex is familiar with all the details. The matter is under consideration. We are all very anxious to find a settlement for those men who I am afraid have been swindled out of their cattle, though through no action of the Department of Agriculture nor of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but through the operations of a company, which operations may be considered very questionable.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not want to blame anyone or make trouble or accuse people of wrongdoing if no wrong has been done, and I am glad that the Minister of Justice has given this explanation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is here and I have no doubt the committee would be glad to hear what he has to say, because we were told that some encouragement had been given and I understand now that it was by way of subsidies to steamship companies to promote the export of cattle. I understand also—a man named Richardson, I was informed, had something to do with it—that a small company solicited farmers to export cattle through them, pointing out that the ships were ready, but the result was a loss to members of the farming community. The whole thing has left a bad taste in everyone's mouth. As I say, I do not want to blame anyone before I have heard exactly what the situation is, and I should be glad to hear from the minister who had charge of the transaction an explanation as to any guarantees that were given, whether the companies were subsidized and to what extent, who initiated the project and when it was started.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Unfortunately I do know a good deal about the transaction to which my hon. friend and the Minister of Justice have referred. I am not sure that at present it is possible for anyone to say exactly how the situation stands. It is quite correct, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that what assistance has been given by a department of the government has been given by the Department of Trade and Commerce. At the present time assistance is also being given by one of the other departments whose assistance is, I think, valuable and the matter is under consideration. I assume that an opportunity may be given—I do not know whether this would meet the view of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay—to discuss the matter later when we know something more definite, as I think we may within the next few days, as to the real situation. I knew the situation was bad last week, but it is much more regrettable than anyone imagined at that time and I think it is one which should receive the most careful and sympathetic consideration of all the various departments interested and of the different members of the house. I did not know that the matter was going to be introduced on this bill because I was aware that it did not come under the Department of Agriculture, but I would make the suggestion, if it meets the views of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay and the chairman, that the matter might be discussed to better advantage after the facts are known.

Mr. STEVENS: I fully appreciate the observations of the hon. member for West Middlesex whose attitude throughout in the matter, so far as I am concerned, has been very reasonable. His suggestion, I think, is quite sound; it would perhaps be better if the matter were discussed when such steps as are now being taken have progressed a little further.

In answer to my hon. friend's question of a moment ago I can state in two or three sentences the essential features of the matter. During the past two years, in order to assist in the movement of cattle to the British market, we have assisted a number of steamship companies to fit out ships for the carrying of cattle, that is, to construct in the ships stalls in accordance with the regulations of the British board of trade. I think, generally speaking, we have paid an average of about $10 to $14 a stall, the amount varying in some cases. The reason we had to step in was that so irregular had been the movement of cattle from Canada to Great Britain that steamship companies refused to put in the stalls, because to construct them say for one trip, woud result in a loss. When we undertook this, the cattle rate was $20 a head, but by our putting in the stalls, the steamship companies cut the rate down in most cases to $12 a head and in some cases to $15 a head. Therefore a very substantial saving was achieved. I think between sixteen and twenty vessels were fitted out, but I have not before me the exact number. On several occasions I brought the vote before parliament and in one instance the money was paid out of the relief appropriation.

As regards the particular case to which reference has been made, two ships were fitted out for the steamship companies, which ships were chartered by the Richelieu Company of Montreal. The iniquitous part of the matter is that the Richelieu corporation purchasing cattle from the farmers undertook the shipment of the cattle to the old country, collected payment and did not pay the farmers. That is roughly the story, and without any question there was not only a very serious injustice but in my estimation a crime perpetrated against the farmers. The government, as pointed out by the Minister of Justice, will cooperate in every possible way in, shall I say, the securing of a remedy or justice to the farmers, and the matter is in progress at the present time by some action jointly taken by a group representing the farmers, every cooperation being given to that effort. But as the hon. member for West Middlesex said a moment ago, it might be better if the whole question were left for discussion at some time when it was understood the matter would be discussed after further information had been received in regard to the situation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps the suggestion is the best one at the present time, and I take it that later there will be an opportunity for debate if it is considered desirable to discuss the matter?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Under some heading I am satisfied the minister could provide such an opportunity.

Mr. STEVENS: There will be no difficulty about providing an opportunity.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am hoping that something more satisfactory than appears at the present time will result.

Mr. CASGRAIN: As regards the company to which the minister has made reference, and respecting which he mentioned that money had been paid under a certain act to fit out two boats, was it a company that had been in business and in that trade for a long time? Was it a responsible company when it applied to the government?

Mr. STEVENS: If I am wrong hon. members may correct me, but I understand the company owned the old Bickerdike pier. The lairage is there—cattle pens and shipping facilities. So far as I know they had been operating for a number of years.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the minister know who is at the head of the company? Was it a company incorporated by letters patent or merely an ordinary firm doing business?

Mr. STEVENS: I understand it is an incorporated company known as the Richelieu Company. I am speaking without the record. The president is Mr. Richardson with whom there was another gentleman by the name of Morgan.

Mr. CASGRAIN: E. A. D. Morgan.

Mr. STEVENS: I could not say as to the initials. There was also a Mr. MacDonald who acted in the establishment of contacts in the old country. They made contacts with the London port authorities which in a measure contributed to the establishment of the lairage in London.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How much was paid to the Richelieu company?

Mr. STEVENS: The amounts paid were paid for the installation of stalls on the ships, and no amount was paid to the Richelieu corporation other than what was paid on those stalls.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, the bill to which I am asking the house to give second reading is practically the same bill that was introduced last session. Briefly it asks parliament to give the people of British Columbia what was given to the people of the eastern provinces in 1897 and reaffirmed, with certain changes and amendments, in 1925. I introduced the bill in 1932, and at that time objection was taken that the wording was not exactly clear. Objection was taken because the bill contained these words:

> provided that notwithstanding anything in this subsection contained the rates on grain and flour shall on and after the 27th day of June, 1925, be governed by the provisions of the agreement made pursuant to chapter 5 of the statutes of Canada, 1897.

As I say objection was taken at that time; it was said that if the bill passed in that form it would be retroactive to 1925. So in 1933 I deleted that clause and brought in the bill in much the same form as it now appears. I might become discouraged after bringing forward this bill year after year without success were it not for the fact that I consider that a great injustice has been done the province of British Columbia in that it has been long denied what the other provinces have enjoyed in regard to freight rates. So my hope has been renewed, and as far as I am concerned I have made up my mind that so long as I am a member of parliament I will continue to introduce this bill or until we obtain that for which we have long sought.

I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to cover all the ground that has been covered during previous presentations of the bill, but there are some salient points with which I should like to deal in an endeavour to clear away many of the misconceptions and erroneous beliefs prevailing among some hon. members at least, because after listening to the arguments of some hon. gentlemen I am of the opinion that they are not exactly clear as to the position of British Columbia and as to what that province requests. Let me say right here that we are not asking for any special privilege, nor am I asking that this parliament become a rate fixing body. I am asking for equality, and surely no hon. member would deny the same treatment to the people of the province of British Columbia that has been given the people of the other provinces.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with some of the erroneous ideas held by various hon. members in an endeavour to overcome their misunderstanding with regard to our appeal. I should like to speak for a moment as to the costs of construction, because in the past these appeals have been met with the argument that this differential exists because of the mountain differential, and perhaps many hon. members think of traffic to British Columbia as climbing up the mountains from this side and going down the mountains on the other side. So they believe its costs more to construct a railway to British Columbia and that the cost of maintenance is higher. I should like to quote from the judgment delivered by the board of railway commissioners in September, 1927, in the general freight rates investigation; in the sworn evidence given during that investigation by those who were in a position to know the cost of constructing the railway to British Columbia and the maintenance costs I find some very interesting facts. I am going to take up the time of the house to quote one or two striking examples. The cost of construction from Kamloops to Hope, a distance of 168 miles, was $133,563 per mile; the cost of constructing the line from Montreal to Ottawa, a distance of 111 miles, was $178,614 per mile. The cost of construction from Hope to Fraser River Junction, another portion of the railway in the province of British Columbia, covering a distance of 77 miles, was $51,544 per mile, while the cost of construction from Joliette to Garneau Junction, a distance of 61·49 miles, was $62,394 per mile. I could give other illustrations; these are not just picked out as special cases. In the evidence presented at that time many points throughout Canada were referred to, and I could give two or three times this number of examples.

Then with reference to the cost of operation —because I am met also with the argument that it costs more to operate the railways to British Columbia from the prairie provinces than it does in the east—let me read from the testimony at page 142. This evidence was given by experts of the Canadian Pacific. In British Columbia the operating cost in 1925 was $3,536 per mile, while on the prairie divisions, which many members think are as level as a billiard table, the cost was $4,702 per mile. So we find the per mile operating costs higher on the prairies than in British Columbia, and if I had time I could name points in the east and throughout the province of Quebec where the operating cost was much greater than the cost in British Columbia.

Then let us consider what they call helper or pusher mileage. In the prairie provinces and throughout eastern Canada there are portions of the railway where two or three engines are required on each train. On the Canadian National line, at least, one engine brings a full train of either freight or passenger cars from Vancouver through the mountains over one of the lowest grades in the dominion. I want to repeat that; this is one of the lowest grades in Canada. It amounts to only one half of one per cent, if my figures are correct, whereas in some parts of the prairies the grade is as high as one and a half or two per cent. That cannot be repeated too often. Not only were the construction costs less and the operating costs lower; the pusher car mileage is less than on the prairies and the grade, especially on the Canadian National, is one of the lowest on any railway in Canada.

Now for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, I should like to examine some of the freight charges throughout Canada in order to see what the province of British Columbia is up against. I do not want to take up too much time but I feel that this information should be placed before parliament in order to present a clear picture to the members of this house, so that they may see for themselves that we have been unjustly dealt with. The distance from Calgary to Fort William is 1,242 miles and the rate is 26 cents per hundred pounds of grain. That rate is for both export and domestic grain. The distance from Edmonton is a little less than 1,242 miles. The distance from Edmonton to Fort William being 1,213 miles at the same cost, namely, 26 cents. The distance from Fort William to Montreal is 997 miles, and the rate is 11 cents for export over the Canadian National, and 30 cents over the Canadian Pacific. As to why there should be the difference between 11 cents and 30 cents in the rates on the two railways I have never been able to find out. From Fort William to Quebec, a distance of 1,142 miles, grain and grain products are being carried for 18·34 cents per one hundred pounds.

I should like to give a complete picture of the whole of Canada in connection with this transportation system. From Fort William to Saint John, a distance of 1,555 miles, the export rate is 30 cents and the domestic rate 52½ cents on grain and grain products. From Fort William to Halifax, a distance of 1,723 miles, the rate is 30 cents for export and 54½ cents for domestic, per hundred pounds.

How do we in British Columbia fare? From Edmonton to Vancouver, a distance of 776 miles, the rate is 20 cents for export. Although the act at present says it is 41½ cents for domestic purposes, I realize that last year we were given a reduction about which I shall speak a little later on. The house should accept the rate of 41½ cents as the correct rate because the present agreement which is now in effect on grain only is extended for one more year.

Mr. MANION: That is for domestic purposes?

Mr. REID: Yes. From Calgary to Vancouver, a distance of 642 miles, the rate is 20 cents for export and 41½ cents for domestic, per one hundred pounds. I should like hon. members to note that the mileage has been reckoned on the Canadian National mileage, although the distance over the Canadian Pacific is 134 miles less. The argument was urged before the railway commission that that fact should not be taken into consideration, and that the rate should be granted on the Canadian National mileage of 776 miles. In that connection I mention that the Canadian Pacific have been picking up considerable extra money, because I understand that one hundred miles represents a day's operation by a train crew, and therefore this railway company saves at least one train crew on this haul as against the number of crews used by the Canadian National Railway.

When the minister or any other hon. member replies I should like him to tell us why it is that when grain leaves Calgary or Edmonton to go east it is just grain, but when it comes west we are told, "Oh yes, that grain for export is at a certain rate, and the other or inferior grain is for domestic purposes, and for it the province of British Columbia will have to pay twice." That, Mr. Speaker, is against all railway practice, because, as must be evident to every hon. member, the lower priced article is generally, if not always, carried at a much lower rate. One could mention coal, for instance, and compare the rate on that commodity with that charged for carrying silk. Coal is carried at a much cheaper rate than silk. But when we come to grain, and especially to that portion of it going to British Columbia from the prairie provinces, we find that the railway companies operate on an entirely different basis because on the lower priced article they charge twice as much as on the higher priced article.

Mr. MANION: May I interrupt the hon. member? If he has the rates before him—and I believe he has—would he give the export rates from Edmonton or Calgary to Montreal, and the corresponding rates to the Pacific coast?

Mr. REID: From Edmonton to Montreal?

Mr. MANION: Yes, if the hon. member has them.

Mr. REID: I believe I have that figure before me. The total distance from Calgary to Halifax is shown to be 3,000 miles, and the rate is 41½ cents.

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. REID: I can give the rate from Fort William to Montreal.

Mr. MANION: I should like to have the rate from Calgary to Montreal or Halifax, and from Calgary to Vancouver.

Mr. REID: I can give the minister the rate from Calgary to Montreal.

Mr. MANION: All right.

Mr. REID: From Calgary to Montreal, a distance of 2,239 miles, the grain is carried for 53½ cents. That is the latest figure I have.

Mr. MANION: And from Calgary to Vancouver it is 20 cents?

Mr. REID: Yes; that is the export rate, of course.

Mr. MANION: I understand that.

Mr. REID: Those are the figures the minister wanted?

Mr. MANION: Yes, thank you.

Mr. REID: Very well. In brief, over a distance of 1,242 miles, from Calgary or Edmonton going east, grain is carried at the rate of 43 cents per ton per one hundred miles, while the cost to Vancouver for export is 60 cents per ton per one hundred miles, and domestic use 90 cents per ton per one hundred miles.

I do not think it is necessary for me to elaborate what I have said, because I believe I have placed enough figures on the record to show the gross discrimination that exists against the people of British Columbia who wish to obtain their feed requirements from the prairie provinces.

As I have said, I am not pleading that parliament should fix railway rates. I have been met with the argument time and again that parliament is not a rate fixing body. Further, I am not going into the whole question of rate structure. If I took the time to do that, and placed on record figures showing express rates and other railway rates imposed against the people of British Columbia as compared with the rates imposed against the eastern provinces, I would show a most unfair condition indeed. At this time I am asking for equality of rates on grain and grain products; I am not asking parliament to fix rates. For the benefit of some hon. members may I say that the rights of none of the provinces will be jeopardized. This is not a question that interferes with maritime rights, the rights of the eastern provinces or any other rights. The plea I am now making is simply that parliament extend to British Columbia rights equal to those enjoyed by the eastern and prairie provinces.

Having by this time, I hope, placed the case for British Columbia in as clear a light as possible; having pointed out that mile for mile construction costs were lower, in British Columbia, that maintenance costs were lower, and that we have the lowest railway grade in the whole of Canada, I ask the minister or any other hon. member after I have concluded to refute any statements which up to the present time I have made. I suggest to the minister that in these days of compulsory co-operation it might be well to look into the fact that the Canadian National railway have the lowest grade. If there is any change made the Canadian Pacific should be compelled to take all their grain over the Canadian National line into Vancouver. Instead of, as has been suggested, dropping off a portion of the Canadian National line, if there is to be cooperation I suggest that the Canadian Pacific be compelled to use that low grade route. If this were done we might have a chance to obtain justice.

I now come to an important point in my remarks. Someone may say that it does not pay the railway companies to haul this class of goods. Let me say that I have it upon the authority of a Canadian Pacific railway expert that there is not one man in the employ of either the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National who is capable of telling what it costs either railway to haul any given commodity. When giving evidence this particular person was asked if he could give that information, and he said he was unable to do so. In order to remove any doubts there may be in this connection I shall read the evidence. Mr. Flintoft is examining Mr. Lloyd of the Canadian Pacific Railway:

Mr. Flintoft: What would you say as to the possibility of getting the cost of any particular commodity?

A. Well, we do not know; there has never been any system devised yet by which you can get the cost of carrying any one commodity.

Q. Mr. Lloyd, I want to know whether it is in your opinion possible to work out the cost of carrying any particular commodity?

A. It certainly is not possible to arrive at the cost of transporting any individual commodity.

This statement is reiterated, because I find the following:

Q. Would you say that that "average cost per gross ton mile" would be a fair figure to apply to the cost of moving grain in train load lots?

A. I do not know what the cost of handling grain is.

Q. Is there any information in your statistical department that will give you that?

A. We have nothing to tell us the cost of handling any commodity.

I am quoting, Mr. Speaker, from the general freight rates judgment delivered in 1925. So it will be seen that we have the railway experts admitting that no one can tell what the costs are. How, then, have the rates been arrived at? The answer is simply that a rate has been fixed, and having been fixed the railways take the attitude: We are going to hold to it. That is what it amounts to, Mr. Speaker.

I want to refer to one or two arguments that have been made in previous years. The Minister of Railways has used the argument that this House of Commons is no place to fix freight rates, and that it is up to the board of railway commissioners to determine what the rates shall be. But I could quote many authorities in proof of the statement I now make that it is useless for the people of British Columbia now to go before the board of railway commissioners and plead for a reduction of freight rates. I have here the evidence of Mr. McKeown, chairman of the board of railway commissioners, to that effect.

Mr. MANION: He is not chairman of the board now.

Mr. REID: No, I was speaking of 1925, but I can get evidence from a little nearer home. When the amendment to the Railway Act was introduced in 1925 what did we find? We found hon. members now on the government side of the house but then in opposition saying one after another—I could quote Senator McRae, General Clark, and others—that it would be useless for the people of British Columbia to go again before the board of railway commissioners to plead their case. I have in particular the evidence of one who, it may be claimed, is an authority, and that is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He stated when the bill of 1925 was passing through the house that the hands of British Columbia would be forever tied and that it would be useless for the people of that province to appeal to the board of railway commissioners in the hope of getting any reduction in freight rates. Speaking in this house on June 16, 1925, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce said at page 4320 of Hansard, when the amendment to the Railway Act regarding the Crowsnest pass agreement rates was then before parliament:

> Now the minister says to us that he purposes by this legislation to give the Board of Railway Commissioners—I quote his own words—an absolutely free hand. He does nothing of the kind. Not only does he not give the Board of Railway Commissioners a free hand, but he deliberately ties their hands in so far as the fixation of rates is concerned on wheat and flour, which after all, is a tremendously important part of the freight carried in this country, particularly in western Canada.

A little further on in the same speech he said:

> I do not ask special privileges, but I do ask for the province of British Columbia the opportunity to plead its cause on a firm and even basis. I ask for the opportunity for my province to come before the board and say: Here are the economic conditions; here are the reasons why we ask you for a freight rate structure of a given standard. But instead of that, the government is saying to the province of British Columbia: If you go before the Board of Railway Commissioners you go there with one hand tied behind your back. There is no escape from that.

I do not need to quote any other authorities to prove the contention which I have made ever since I first introduced the bill, that is is utterly impossible for us ever to get an equitable reduction of freight rates by appealing to the board of railway commissioners. They themselves have so stated, and I want to repeat that the members now on the government side of the house, when they were sitting in opposition in 1925, when the amendment to the Railway Act was going through, spoke to the same effect. It has also been my own belief that it is useless to go before the board of railway commissioners with any hope of getting redress.

Now what is our position in the province of British Columbia? A bill is introduced here asking for a reduction—or rather an equality—of rates, and we are told that the board of railway commissioners, and not parliament, is the properly constituted body to deal with that matter, yet we have it stated on the very best authority, as I have pointed out, that it is useless for us to go before that board. And so, Mr. Speaker, I am pleading at the foot of the throne on behalf of the people of my province that once and for all this differential be removed which has created a terrible handicap and has long been a great injustice to the people of British Columbia.

Probably the Minister of Railways will tell us that this is not the proper time to take such action, that the traffic of the railways has gone down, but I would point out that an argument of some sort can always be made. It was made in the prosperous days. We were told then that it was not the proper time to give us what we are now asking. I wish to point out, however, to the Minister of Railways, who perhaps knows it better than I do, that sixty-eight per cent of the traffic of the railroads in this country is wheat. At present we are looking for markets for our wheat, and where can our prairie farmers find a better market than in British Columbia? If we could get that grain at the same rate as those in other countries do, there is no doubt that a greater market would be found in British Columbia for immense quantities of the wheat and grain products of the prairie farmers.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that we were given just a sop last year when the railway companies for some reason or other reduced the rate on domestic grain by some eleven cents. When the railways did make that slight reduction and continued it for this year they omitted fifty per cent of the feed requirements of the poultry raisers which is mill feed. That omission takes a lot of answering. Our fight has been for grain and grain products, but the little sop that was handed to us by the railway companies last year, and which has been continued for another year, denied us a reduction in the rate on mill feed, which constitutes fifty per cent of the feed requirements of our poultry farmers. The result is that the people of Ontario and other eastern provinces—and I am not complaining of this at all—are able to obtain their mill feed requirements at a much cheaper rate and consequently a lesser price than the people of British Columbia, although they are much further removed from the wheatfields than we are in British Columbia.

I believe that the time has come, Mr. Speaker, when the whole freight rates structure of this country should be overhauled. The rates were set many years ago when conditions were entirely different from what they are to-day.

I would also point out this in connection with our plea. It seems all right for hundreds of millions of dollars to be spent on canals in eastern provinces for the benefit, it may be, of the wheat farmers, but when we in British Columbia ask for something the reply is: This is not the time to do it. This may not be the proper time to say it, Mr. Speaker, but I am going to say that if ever the St. Lawrence waterway scheme comes into effect I hope something will be done about the tolls on the Panama canal, for our ships leaving Vancouver and New Westminster are now charged approximately $9,000 a trip to pass through that canal. I hope if the time ever comes when we shall deal with the St. Lawrence waterway that we on the Pacific coast will be remembered and that a quid pro quo will be exacted for the charges that are levied by the United States on our ships passing through the Panama canal, which, as all hon. gentlemen know, is owned by the United States.

This appeal is not a question affecting the maritime provinces or any other group of provinces. It is a question only of equality of rates, a question of justice. I know that some have said that it is just the same old story I am telling, but I think we all remember that in that fine old hymn it is said that the story should be repeated over and over until it is taken in. That is what I am doing, repeating the story until the government do take it in.

This is not a political question and I have endeavoured to keep clear of recriminations or accusations. I have endeavoured to make my plea in as fair a manner as possible. I have not accused any hon. member of doing this, that or the next thing. This is too serious a matter to go into personalities. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has stated that an equal opportunity will be given to all Canadians. I say to him that as far as we in British Columbia are concerned, we have not had that equal opportunity. Our foreign competitors are able to purchase our grain at a cheaper rate than what we have to pay. In 1930 we had 5,000,000 head of poultry in the province but at the present time we have only some 1,250,000 head. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) knows that this is correct. There are many chicken plants in which thousands of dollars have been invested now lying idle and it is time something was done. I make a most earnest plea to this government to adopt this bill.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of the bill introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The hon. member has been consistently advocating a reduction in the domestic rate to the Pacific coast. As he says, he is not playing politics. I am making a plea to-night on behalf of the people of British Columbia and I am making this plea entirely outside of politics. I ask the Conservative members from British Columbia to get in with us on this fight. They know that the people in the constituencies of Cariboo, Victoria, Nanaimo and the Fraser valley all want this reduction. Our climatic conditions are very favourable to poultry farming. There are many poultry farmers in my riding and if they were able to obtain low grade grain at reasonable rates they would be benefited as would the farmers on the prairies. I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) to this fact: A carload of grain or chicken feed can be delivered in China or Japan at a lesser rate than to any part of British Columbia.

Mr. MANION: That is not true; at the present time we have a special rate for that.

Mr. MUNN: There is an export rate on No. 1 wheat.

Mr. MANION: That is a different thing; my hon. friend said chicken feed.

Mr. MUNN: With the export rate you can ship No. 1 wheat to China and Japan and they will have a cheaper chicken feed than we would have with a lower grade of wheat shipped at the domestic rate.

Mr. MANION: They would not use it as chicken feed.

Mr. MUNN: I was just pointing out what could be done. As I said before, this is not a political question. It is something to which we are entitled and for which we have been fighting for years, this reduction in the domestic rate to the Pacific coast on grain and mill feed. Again I ask the Conservative members from British Columbia to get in with us. If we keep pulling together surely we will get results some time.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker (Mr. Munn) has intimated that we should get behind hon. gentlemen opposite in order to obtain a reduction on the rate to British Columbia on feed grain. I might say to the hon. gentleman that long before he entered this house we were fighting for a lower rate on feed grain. We took it up in 1925, in 1926 and again in 1927. At that time the provincial authorities saw fit to step in and take the case to the railway commission, which I think was the proper tribunal. They spent some $130,000 in employing legal men to fight this case, but the result was that we did not get a reduction. I want to make it clear to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and the hon. member for North Vancouver that we agree with what they have said with regard to the situation in British Columbia. We realize the unfortunate position in which the poultrymen and dairy farmers find themselves and the disadvantage they are under as compared with other districts in Canada. We have been ready and we are ready to-day to do everything possible to have these rates lowered so that the poultrymen, the dairymen and the stock raisers in our province may be in a more favourable position to compete with the neighbouring provinces.

I agree with the hon. member when he says that these rates are unfair but I do not think he is adopting the proper method of remedying the condition. As he said, he introduced a bill similar to this one in 1931; he introduced another bill in 1932; he has introduced this bill and he says he is going to continue to introduce bills. I am afraid the farmers of the province will be out of business long before this type of legislation becomes law. In 1903, Sir Wilfrid Laurier realized that the question of freight rates was too complicated a matter to be considered in parliament and he appointed the board of railway commissioners which was designed to function as a court of record in the same way as the supreme and exchequer courts. It was to have complete control and authority over all questions pertaining to the operation of our railways including the charges to be made for hauling traffic. It was to function as a judicial body and was to hear all interested parties. Its decisions were to depend, first, on the evidence submitted and, second, on the proper appreciation of the evidence in relation to the relief sought. Provision was made for appeals from the decisions of this board to the privy council and I think it will be admitted that on the whole it has proved to be satisfactory. At times there have been criticisms of this board, but every section of Canada has been accorded an opportunity to appear before it. The present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) as well as the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) have expressed opinions on this matter. I have referred to this before but I think it is worth while repeating. The hon. member for New Westminster has referred to a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and I shall deal with this a little later. If hon. members will turn to page 4439 of Hansard of 1925 they will find that the then Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition, said:

> I have been looking over some of the speeches which I made in western Canada last fall, and which were quoted, in part I think, by the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) in his remarks the other evening. I notice in speaking on the prairies I intimated very clearly that my view was that the railway commission was the right body to fix rates and should be given a free hand in the matter but that I felt it should expect to receive directions from the government on matters of national policy. When speaking in Vancouver and Victoria I made similar statements. . . .

That was the view of the present leader of the opposition. Let us see what was said by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). At page 4420 of Hansard of the same year the hon. gentleman made the following statement:

> The railway board is charged with the duty of making rates fair and equitable to all. We have set up the board to do that work. Why then not let the board perform that duty? They are infinitely better qualified to make these rates than are members of parliament. If parliament has no confidence in the railway board—and that sentiment has been expressed by some hon. members—then the remedy is not to throw the business of rate-making into this house; the remedy is so to constitute your board that you will have confidence in it.

Those are the statements, respectively, of the present leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Waterloo.

The hon. member for New Westminster referred to a statement made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am very sorry he did not quote from the speech made a little earlier in that debate. I would refer the house to Hansard, two or three pages earlier in that debate of June 16, 1925, at page 4319, and I would ask my hon. friend to see what the present Minister of Trade and Commerce said on that occasion. This was the statement he made:

I have argued in this house and before my own constituents and the people of my province for certain principles which I think should underlie and govern the making of a freight rate structure. I have argued that the fixation of rates is such a complicated problem that it should not be pitchforked into parliament, but rather that it should be dealt with by a competent board, that board in my estimation being the Board of Railway Commissioners.

A year ago I appeared before the board and in discussing the matter, particularly with the chairman, I found that British Columbia has never entered any appeal against freight rates on feed grain going into that province. I was told that there was no reason in the world why such an application should not be presented and should not receive favourable consideration. At the time I was there the appeal to the privy council was pending and nothing could be done, but now the appeal has been dismissed the case is wide open. I suggest to my hon. friend therefore that if he wants to get action he cannot obtain it in the way he is going at it, because parliament will not go back on what it did in 1903 and undertake to fix rates in this house. So that I appeal to my hon. friend to join the rest of us and appear before the board to present the case for the farmers. I suggest also, what I think is right, that it is not necessary to employ expensive counsel, as the province of British Columbia did in 1925; for any farmers' organization, any individual farmer, can be heard before the board. And I am sure that a member of parliament would also be heard. I suggest to my hon. friends opposite therefore that they join with us and that we go and present the case on behalf of the farmers with a view to getting some immediate action.

The hon. gentleman says that this bill has been on the order paper for three months. Well, the house has been in session since January 25 and this is April 17, so that he does not seem to have been very anxious to press the matter. If hon. gentlemen opposite are eager to get something for the farmers of our province, what they are trying for, namely, a lower rate on feed grain, they ought to join with us in presenting the case to the board. I am going to move an amendment which I hope will receive the support of this house:

That this bill be not read the second time but that, in the opinion of the house, the subject matter thereof should be referred at the earliest date to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. Is the proposed amendment in order? The provision which the hon. gentleman has in mind is the moving of an amendment to the motion for the second reading of the bill by the enunciation of a general principle which is in opposition to the general principle of the bill. I respectfully suggest that the principle embodied in the amendment is not in opposition to the general principle of the bill as introduced by my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: I do not agree with my hon. friend. The principle of the bill is the question of freight rates, and the amendment is a suggestion that the question be referred to the board of railway commissioners. It is a different matter. I submit that it is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With respect to the point raised by my hon. friend—

Mr. MANION: Are we allowed to speak two or three times to the point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) to have spoken to the point of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I submit, with all due respect to the opinion of the Minister of Railways, that this does appear to be a peculiar transaction. Here we have an amendment the effect of which would be to refer from the House of Commons to the board of railway commissioners a request in connection with freight rates. I do not think I have ever known that to be done, although of course there is no reason why that should prevent its being done. I do not think however that the amendment is in order.

Mr. BARBER: The resolution does not propose that the House of Commons should refer this bill to the board of railway commissioners. It states that in the opinion of this house the subject matter of the resolution, which is the question of freight rates, should be referred at the earliest possible date to the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think the Minister of Railways is serious in his contention, when he says that the principle of the bill is the question of railway rates and that the amendment is that the question of railway rates should be referred to the railway commission.

Mr. MANION: Where it has always gone.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a question of procedure, not of principle. An amendment to the second reading should be something which is in opposition to the principle of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask a question of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)? If the contention of the hon. member who moved the amendment is correct, and it is not a motion from this house referring the bill under discussion to the railway commission, then it is a negative of the bill and therefore is out of order.

Mr. GRAY: The rule is quite clear. Rule 755 reads:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, . . .

Mr. MANION: This is adverse to it.

Mr. GRAY: Surely that is not the case here. I submit, according to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, paragraph 755, the position is as pointed out by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). It is a question of procedure, not one of principle, that is being discussed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of opinion that the amendment is quite in order according to the paragraph just quoted by the hon. member, as it is a repetition of May at page 357 and Bourinot at page 509. The amendment seems to come quite within the provisions there quoted and in my opinion it is in order.

Mr REID: I must appeal against your ruling. Knowing what is back of this, I must appeal.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The Speaker having decided that the amendment moved by Mr. Barber, seconded by Mr. Plunkett, is in order, Mr. Reid appeals from that decision. Is it the pleasure of the house that the Speaker's ruling be sustained?

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

And leave having been granted:

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay upon the table of the house the report of the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief for the year ending March 31, 1934.

I also beg leave to move that three hundred copies in the French language of the report of the commissioner of unemployment relief, 1934, be printed, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that copies are to be printed in French and in English?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

LIVE STOCK AND PRODUCTS ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 40, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Progress reported.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Monday, April 16, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Weir for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Before we proceed with the discussion of this bill, Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order to raise. My attention has been drawn to a copy in French of this bill, which apparently has been reprinted. I have one copy of Bill No. 51 in French which appears to be all right, but another copy of the bill is marked "réimpression". I should like to know by what order of the house the bill has been reprinted in the French language.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think it is in order to reprint the bill except by an order of the house. On the French copy of Bill No. 51 I have before me I find the word "réimpression". Surely a bill is only reprinted when changes or amendments have been made.

Mr. SPEAKER: The official bill before the house has not been reprinted. The hon. member may have a copy that has been reprinted, but it will not be official.

Mr. CASGRAIN: With two official languages in the House of Commons any hon. member may discuss Bill No. 51 in French.

Mr. SPEAKER: In any event, an order of the house is not required to reprint the bill. That can be done by the committee or by the proper official of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: That is their job; what do we know about it?

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I think that the government is to be congratulated upon having introduced this measure, which is an attempt to improve the methods and practices of marketing of our natural products. The production of our natural products is in Canada one of the most important pieces of work to which Canadians can adapt themselves. It is probable that no more important piece of legislation has been debated in the Canadian parliament for many a long year than the measure now before us. I think it is most remarkable that within twenty-four hours of the first reading of this bill telephonic and telegraphic communications reached the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) from six of the provinces advising him that it was their intention to pass concurrent legislation. Judging by the messages I have received from British Columbia and from other parts of Canada, it would appear to me that there is a very considerable volume of favourable farmer opinion on this measure. I have been waiting, therefore, with great interest to hear the opposition which would be raised to it.

The first effort in opposition which came to the attention of the Canadian people was that carried out by the Canadian chamber of commerce. The present president of that chamber is a sincere and honourable man but one who has spent his lifetime in opposition to cooperation. The chamber of commerce, through its affiliated and associated boards of trade throughout Canada, circularized those boards and sent them a statement of the arguments which might be used in favour of the bill together with the arguments which might be advanced against it. Upon reading the sheet one came to the conclusion that the author of it had taken a great deal more pleasure in writing the second portion of it than he did in writing the first. This communication was accompanied by a questionnaire, at the top of which was printed the instruction that it should be answered yes or no, thereby bringing it into the category of that famous question, "Have you stopped beating your wife?" That questionnaire was worded in such a way as to make it a piece of special pleading against the bill; and it is not surprising, therefore, to read that certain of the replies which have already reached the chamber point out the unfairness of it. I think it is becoming apparent that the usefulness of the chamber of commerce in Canada has been somewhat impaired by its unfair treatment of this measure.

Last night we listened to the first three speeches in opposition to the measure. The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) proclaims himself a strong upholder of cooperation, but from his remarks we find that he is opposed to the regimentation of men. He would have been content had the measure contained certain safeguards included in the British marketing legislation, although he seems to be of the opinion that it will not be very long before that legislation is repealed.

The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) is of course a critic by nature, and he is at his happiest in his criticisms of a government measure while he sits in opposition. The picture he painted of what he saw in the bill put me in mind of those waking dreams suffered by a man who is passing through the feverish stage of a liver chill. He saw boards, and boards and more boards. He saw dominion boards, commodity boards, provincial boards and local boards, treading on each other's toes and being set up at great expense to Canada. I noticed that his criticism was enthusiastically received by his Liberal colleagues. I could not help wondering, however, whether it would be as pleasantly received by the people of Nova Scotia whose business it is to produce and to market fruit. I noticed that on the fourth of April the hon. member for Hants-Kings met the Nova Scotia fruit shippers and explained to them his interpretation of this measure. I presume that what he told them was similar to what he told hon. members in this house last night. But six days after that meeting with the fruit shippers the Nova Scotia fruit growers and shippers held a joint meeting at which they passed a certain resolution. I read from one of the Halifax papers as follows:

Kentville, April 10, 1934.

Unanimous approval of the principles of the marketing act now before the federal parliament was given at a joint meeting of the executives of the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association and the Nova Scotia Shippers' Association that was held here this afternoon. There was a large attendance of delegates who came from all parts of the fruit belt, the provincial Department of Agriculture being represented by F. W. Walsh, chief of the marketing division. Arthur Kelsall, President of the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association presided.

It seems evident, therefore, that those who are actually employed in the production and marketing of apples in Nova Scotia will scarcely be likely to agree with the criticism advanced by the hon. member for Hants-Kings.

Then the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) gave his view in opposition. First he gave us a piece of that famous speech of his on the tariff. He followed that by stating his opposition to majority rule, and his disgust in connection with something which would further restrain the liberty of the subject. With regard to majorities ruling minorities may I say I regret that Hon. Donald Sutherland is not the member for South Oxford, but yesterday he was in the minority. I have a good deal of respect for the views advanced by the hon. member for West Edmonton with regard to the liberty of the subject, because until a very short number of years ago I was very much inclined to those views myself. But, Mr. Speaker, what rights has an individual to-day, under organized modern society as we know it? The hon. member may not drive his car down Sparks street in any way and at any speed he desires. Why may he not do so? Because there are others, his neighbours, who desire also to drive their cars down Sparks street. The hon. member for West Edmonton may not take his clothes off in the rotunda of the Chateau Laurier. Why may he not do so? He may not because there are others, his neighbours, who desire to use the rotunda of the Chateau Laurier in the way that rotunda is meant to be used. In this instance there are farmers in Canada who have been deterred from marketing their produce in the way they desire to market it because of the actions of certain other farmers their neighbours. I very much question whether the liberty of the subject can be advanced as an argument against this bill. The hon. member to whom I refer, from his cradlehood to that day, far distant I hope, when he will be laid in his grave. will have had his liberty curtailed, and he will find that he has had to observe the many and varied restrictions imposed on him by modern society.

I also shall endeavour to paint a picture of what I see in this bill for the fruit growers and other farmers I represent; for in the Okanagan valley and the southern valleys of British Columbia there are farmers who are engaged in wool growing, in poultry raising, in live stock, in dairy products, in vegetables and in fruit. But before I paint that picture I want to describe the frame, the setting of it.

For the twenty-two years in which I have worked in the Okanagan valley there has been a cooperative effort. The volume of its support has ebbed and flowed. After a time of desperately low prices the cooperative has prospered. There was a time when it reached a volume of eighty-five per cent of the total crop, and the fifteen per cent outside the cooperative movement was its destruction. When the cooperative movement had charge of eighty-five per cent of the crop they were able to approach a good deal nearer to orderly marketing than had ever been attained before; that is to say, in rolling the crop to market they were able to feed each distributing centre throughout Canada with that quantity which apparently that centre would be able to handle without glut and without scarcity. But the fifteen per cent was in the hands of small independent shippers, and they were able, marketing but one car or two, to jump into a market which had been stabilized and jump out again so quickly, possibly by shaving the price or by consigning their car, that they did not suffer. But they left behind them a demoralized market. Hon. members should remember that I am referring to the marketing of a highly perishable product, the evidence of whose quality changes almost overnight, a product that must be marketed when it is ready in quantities sufficient to dispose of the whole or incur the costs of storage. There again the cooperative was under a disadvantage, because the independents, handling the very small quantities which they did, did not have to store. The cooperative therefore it was that had to incur the costs of storage, and in the export market as well the independent bore no share of the loss.

At the time of which I speak in all probability thirty per cent of the Okanagan crop of boxed apples was exported. It was exported to relieve the Canadian market. The principal part of it went to the markets of Great Britain, and there it came into competition with fruit of just as high a quality produced in the Pacific states. The Americans for many years have looked upon the British market as a very desirable dumping ground, in consequence of which the price always ruled low. I say that thirty per cent at that time was marketed abroad. The smaller independent did not export, and in consequence the cooperative movement had to take charge of thirty per cent of the whole crop instead of the thirty per cent of the crop which it handled itself. In those three ways the very small quantity marketed by an individual independent shipper was marketed to the advantage of the growers that supplied them and to the detriment of the growers that supplied the cooperative movement because of the stabilizing umbrella that the cooperative movement held over the market.

The fifteen per cent was in the hands of certain independent shippers. Some of them I would describe as responsible firms. It quickly became evident to them that they must do something if possible to bring about an orderly condition of the marketing of the whole crop or their business would go to the wall. As a consequence of that, sufficient support was obtained for a petition to the provincial government and the Produce Marketing Act was passed under which a committee of direction was set up which should direct the sale of the crop—not, as has so often ignorantly and unkindly been said of that committee of direction, that it was a government committee which sold the crop. It was nothing of the sort. One of its members was appointed by the growers as their representative. One of its members was appointed by the shippers as their representative, and in order to find a neutral arbitrator as chairman, the lieutenant governor in council appointed the chairman. For the three years in which the committee of direction operated we had a nearer approach to orderly marketing in southern British Columbia than we have seen before or since. But suit was entered against that committee of direction and that suit was successful. The judgment of the supreme court put that committee of direction out of existence on the ground that a provincial statute could not enable a committee set up under it to regulate the sales of produce outside the province of production. After the committee of direction was dead it was noteworthy that the volume of support for the committee had increased overnight. Following the death of the committee of direction the division of the crop in all probability was sixty per cent cooperative and forty per cent in the hands of independent shippers and a few grower-shippers, growers who marketed their own crop and perhaps the crop of a neighbour or two. Amongst that forty per cent there was a considerable number of what I would call responsible business firms. Then the forty per cent dwindled away to very small and irresponsible shippers who were not prepared to cooperate with anyone.

A new measure of cooperation entered upon the scene. The responsible independent shippers drew together in one group and with the cooperation of the cooperative probably ninety per cent of the total crop was marketed in an orderly fashion. That merely drove home to the responsible shippers, as to the cooperative that the ten per cent outside was sufficient to upset it. We very nearly approached another year of dog eat dog, of cut-throat prices and ruin for everybody.

The last attempt at orderly marketing was the stabilization board. The stabilization board functioned for one year, and a few weeks ago it also went out of existence on account of a curious judgment. The various firms of shippers that went in under the stabilization board had to contribute in the form of a levy to the funds of the board which it used in its operation. One of these fruit firms decided that it would not pay the levy. The stabilization board sued that firm and lost the case. Mr. Justice Murphy in an eighty-five page judgment decided that the stabilization board was opposed to the Combines Act.

As evidence of the type of person the fruit grower has to work with, I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the stabilization board came into existence with the support of most of the fruit shipping firms. The firm against which the board started this suit was one of those and the manager of that company was a member of the committee that brought the board into existence. He was the man who proposed the resolution to make the levy part of the plan. Presumably he later changed his mind and refused to pay the levy and a suit was started and lost by the board. When that judgment was handed down it was not unnatural that gloom should pervade the Okanagan valley. I am using no exaggerated terms when I say that that industry is looking ruin in the face.

On March 26 this bill received first reading and the news of that fact was received in southern British Columbia with great delight. The growers considered that they had been doing all that lay in them to proceed along the road toward orderly marketing but each time they had made a step in advance, something happened to upset them. After the provincial legislation had been thrown out of existence they felt that the only ultimate thing to be done would be to have dominion legislation passed which, in cooperation with provincial legislation, would give them the orderly marketing which they sought. They believe that this Bill No. 51 gives them what they seek. This is a picture of what I consider this bill will do for these growers.

Under section 5 of the bill the producers may join together in the preparation of a scheme to be submitted to the minister for his approval. The minister must satisfy himself that there is a sufficient volume of support behind the scheme. How is he to do that? In my opinion the only way he can do it is to have the figures of a poll laid before him. It is most desirable that the scheme should make provision for registration and polling. When the minister is satisfied that there is a sufficient volume of support behind the scheme, he turns it over to the dominion marketing board to be set up under section 3 and that board examines the scheme in all its detail. In my opinion there are three courses open to the board; it can accept the scheme, it can reject the scheme, or it can suggest amendments to the scheme. If and when a scheme has been accepted, it is referred to the governor in council and it may be set up by order in council. It then begins to operate as a scheme chosen by the farmer and put into operation by him. It is almost certain that any scheme will contain the idea of a board selected by the producers to be in charge of the fruit or whatever commodity it may be which they have to handle. The principle behind it all—it is the principle with which we are chiefly concerned at this stage of the proceedings—is that the producer should have in his own hand the power of conducting the marketing of his produce in an orderly fashion and this cannot be done until there is a majority rule of the minority. Suppose the producers in any given area are quarrelsome or unwise enough not to compromise their difficulties and differences of view; suppose they proceed in support of two schemes, neither of which have sufficient backing to warrant the minister in accepting them. Under section 9 the minister could then propose a scheme for that particular district if it appears in the wisdom of the governor in council that orderly marketing can be obtained by these means. The minister may propose a scheme which will be adopted and put into operation by order in council.

Some of those who are opposed to this bill see in that an imposed board, a board resident in Ottawa which will sell the crop of a farming area perhaps thousands of miles away. To me that would appear to be contrary to common sense. The scheme which would be proposed by the minister and accepted by governor in council would, in my opinion, be such as I have described already, a board composed of the producers themselves, selected and elected by the producers, which would have the power under this act to conduct the orderly marketing of that particular product.

Another principle involved in this bill is the question whether it is desirable that the government or the authority set up under the government should have the power of regulation over exports. Without going into great detail as to what happened last August and September in the British market, I would remind hon. members that a condition approaching chaos prevailed. When the dominions met together at the time of the Ottawa conference they entered into treaties with each other but the treaties they made were primarily for the benefit of the producers in their own countries. The treaties in connection with apples which Great Britain made with Australia, New Zealand and Canada were primarily for the protection of her own orchards. When the English apple crop began to pass on to the markets of Great Britain in August it was found that those markets were not yet free of stored apples from Australia. Under the plan which had been so carefully considered at the Ottawa conference it was anticipated that Australia would be off the British market by August, before the early English apples began to reach the market. But in the first year of operation it did not so work out and the consequence was that low prices prevailed not only for that month but for the fall months as well. When the Canadian apples began to reach the British market in September, October and November it was found that extremely low prices were still prevailing.

In the working out of the Ottawa agreements, Great Britain again and again has shown her good faith by refusing to adopt harsh tactics, by refusing to go to the limits to which she might go under the provisions of these treaties. She has intimated quite plainly that if Canada will take to herself the power to regulate her exports, she may refrain from imposing quotas. Suppose Great Britain had not taken that action last August; suppose she had done what we will assume she had the right to do and imposed a quota overnight; there was no legislation in this country which would enable the government or any other authority to use any regulatory power over Canadian export apples. It would have been a clear case of dog eat dog and the cramming of ships as hard as they could be crammed and sent to the market, with the result that no one would have got anything. The government decided to take advantage of this opportunity to insert regulatory powers in the statutes of Canada. Under the powers laid down here the government may exert such regulatory authority with regard to the distribution of Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia apples for export as would be considered nothing else than businesslike.

A further principle involved in this bill is that contained in part II. In part II the government takes power to investigate marketing conditions of any natural product; it can examine into every phase of what takes place in connection with produce passing from producer to consumer. Surely that is a desirable principle. It will particularly have its attention drawn to those cases where the producer receives a mere pittance and the consumer pays a lot. We hear so much in these days of spread. Here is a case where under a statute, as the bill will become, the government takes power to conduct investigations to look into the matter of spread, and presumably to let in the light of day and to take a certain course of action if wrongdoing is discovered.

So far I think I have dealt entirely with the principles behind this bill, but there are two remarks I desire to make at this stage. They have to do with principle, though not exactly what you might call the principle of the bill, but rather the principles behind two details of the bill.

Under the stabilization board last operating in British Columbia, one quite essential feature was the pooling of a certain variety of fruit. The markets of Canada differ rather curiously in price level, and it is not feasible when you are dealing with the crop handled by a different set of independent shippers and a cooperative to so perfectly proportion that crop that each of these units shall market so much in the low price market and so much in the high price market. Therefore the practical method of doing it is for them to market where directed by the regulatory body, and for the receipts of that variety and that grade to be pooled. There is no doubt, I maintain, that under subsection (a) of section 4 that power is covered by the bill, but it appears to me it would be a desirable thing for a definite statement to be made by the government as to whether I am correct in reading that into the bill, because it will have a very considerable effect on the volume of support which this measure will receive in certain farming communities.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it the hon. member's understanding that the pooling for each variety is to be for the whole of Canada?

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member, if I understand him aright, asks me whether I think the pooling for each variety would apply to all Canada. Certainly not. The pooling which I am describing is the operation of the local board, and the local board operating in southern British Columbia will have nothing to do with the apples of Kentville.

The other point of principle connected with detail to which I wish to refer is one in connection with another type of marketing altogether, not the type of marketing to which we fruit growers of British Columbia are accustomed. I am imagining the case where a local board is set up to handle the products of a certain farming community whose habits have been such that in their attempted regulatory methods of marketing in previous days the board itself has done the marketing. It would be very desirable if a pronouncement were also made with regard to that. My opinion is clear, that subsection (a) of section 4 also gives power for that to be done.

I agree that these are matters which will be treated in detail as the clauses come up in the committee stage, but I think it is desirable to mention them at this stage of the proceedings, because there is an earnest desire amongst farmers all over Canada to understand as soon as possible exactly what the provisions of the bill mean. I have endeavoured to give my views; I have endeavoured to show what in my opinion this bill can do towards orderly marketing in the part of Canada from which I come. In my opinion the government has taken a courageous step in bringing forward this measure, because it is so obvious that we live in a stage of society which cannot stand still. We cannot be satisfied with those marketing conditions with which our fathers were satisfied. There are difficulties being imposed upon us from without as well as from within, and this is an attempt, a courageous attempt I maintain, to deal with the difficulty, which this bill, if it works out as I think it will, will tend to solve.

The Minister of Agriculture was not the only one in this house who deeply appreciated the tribute that the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) paid him the other day. There are very many in Canada who agree with the hon. member for South Battleford. Canada is to be congratulated on having as Minister of Agriculture one who looks at things as a farmer first and who is recognized as a successful farmer; and it is well known and recognized by all the farmers of Canada that he approaches each problem from the farmer's point of view and with the farmer's knowledge.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): With the picture which my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Stirling) has drawn of conditions in his district, I quite sympathize. I have some knowledge, not perhaps of that particular district but of conditions at home; I have had personal experience of conditions that arise when ten per cent undertake to defeat the cooperation of ninety per cent. But I am rather afraid that in his endorsation of this bill the hon. gentleman has been animated rather by a desperate desire to get something than by a close examination of the bill itself. I am afraid that the golden apple of this bill will prove to be Dead Sea fruit and turn to ashes in his mouth.

I do not think the hon. member was quite fair to my hon. friend from Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) or to the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) in suggesting that they argued the matter from the political standpoint. I thought their remarks were singularly clear and that they presented a very graphic picture, and to some extent a superior picture to that given us by the hon. member for Yale, inasmuch as they confined themselves entirely to the effect of the bill, whereas the hon. member for Yale wandered further afield and spoke in general terms. There are at any rate two items with which I shall deal when I come to them and regarding which may I say with all respect and politeness to him that he read into the measure something that I submit is not there.

Much has been said about the principle of this bill, I suppose there is a principle in it, but it is so obscured and surrounded by unnecessary and, in some cases, almost vicious details, that it is somewhat difficult to find it. To that principle I am in a sense committed, not from any instructions or requests I have received from home, for I have received none in connection with this bill, but rather that I have on the platform and privately at home endorsed the general idea, talking about the marketing act as it was introduced in Great Britain and saying that possibly the measure which we would adopt in time to come would be along those lines. To that extent I should be very glad to support the principle of this bill if one could disinter the principle from the mass of confusion and details which surround it. But in that case I would have to keep for myself a very large reservation of liberty to vote and work for a very thorough amendment of the bill in committee, and, if it were not so amended, to vote against it on the third reading more particularly as regards clause 9, which I consider the most vicious one in the whole bill. As, however, the government has a large majority, my vote one way or the other matters not to it; the question is only one between my constituents and myself.

I agree, in fact I more than agree with, I heartily endorse everything said by the hon. member for Last Mountain in his very well thought out presentation of the subject, especially when he stated that if the bill had followed the lines of the British act he would have been prepared to support it. I also agree with the hon. member for Hants-Kings in much of his criticism, but I differ from him in regard to the principle. I admit the truth of the point he made regarding the experiments tried in various parts of the world in curtailing production by withholding goods from the market in connection with rubber, coffee and so forth, and how they have failed. I suppose we were all brought up to believe the law of supply and demand was one that could never be defeated by any machinery of legislation. But times change and we must move with them, even possibly against a law that we thought was impregnable. But the conditions on which this bill is based are not exactly similar to those mentioned by the hon. member for Hants-Kings, and even if they were, I say that times change; there is in London a committee sitting, trying to set the price of wheat for the whole world. Does that not give a marked indication of the progress we have made along those lines?

Another argument in favour of the principle of the bill is that if we do not check or regulate our exportation, Great Britain will do it for us and will do it in a way that we do not like. Britain has already intimated to New Zealand that, despite treaties, she must cut down her butter imports. She has advised us politely and by way of negotiations, conversations, rather than by the mailed fist, that we shall have to go slowly on our exportations of cattle and I think we shall very soon find that the same thing will apply as regards our exports of butter to the mother country. The Hon. Mr. Elliot, Minister of Agriculture there, is determined, so far as he can, to make Great Britain self-sufficient from a food standpoint. One cannot blame him, but we shall have to pay some of the price.

Then again, to combat the argument of the hon. member for Hants-Kings, we have some precedents, not only in the British act but also in the New Zealand act, and I am always ready to follow the lead of those two great countries at opposite ends of the world, Britain with her sober, staid, conservative method of making progress slowly, a step at a time, but never going back and always making a success of what she undertakes, and at the other end New Zealand with the finest population on earth, full of optimism, of forward-looking movement, ready to embark on what I might call the very best form of socialistic ideas, and making a success of them. So I say, when I find those two countries uniting on a measure and giving me a precedent, I am willing to follow them a long way. In New Zealand, as far back as 1921 they passed the Meat Export Control Act which gave them absolute control, if necessary, of the whole of the meat. Of course this was only as regards export; it did not deal with domestic consumption except inasmuch as it related to export, but it provided for pooling and a levy on the whole of the produce exported. In 1923 they passed a similar act dealing with dairy produce when again they took power to make a levy on everything exported in order to finance the scheme and they also took power to pool. The scheme must have worked pretty well because that is ten or twelve years ago and they have not had occasion to change their act since then. As a matter of fact their act to control meat exports is working very well.

Great Britain put her marketing act into force in 1931 and before much practical organization was done, she passed another one in 1933, which was largely an amplification, an extension and, to some extent, an amendment of the first one. Now pooling was unfortunately omitted from our legislation. The hon. member for Yale read into one of the sections something which he hoped rather than thought would cover that, but I have under my hand the latest advices from British Columbia where the legal authorities say that our measure does not cover pooling and that the local act cannot under our legislation institute pooling either. But pooling is in the British act and also in the New Zealand one. I think the hon. member for Yale quoted clause 4 as follows:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power,
> (a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product.

I have not found any lawyer who is willing to read into that power to pool the marketing of products.

I said that Britain had a marketing act and we might well follow it, but we must remember that Britain differs from us in three very fundamental and important aspects. I want to impress that upon the house. First, Britain is a small, compact country, homogeneous to a large extent in its population, and where every point can be reached easily by wire in a few minutes or by transport in a few hours. That is very important as compared with the great distances in this country. The second is that Britain has one jurisdiction and that is a most important and almost vital matter as compared with our conditions. There is only one body to give orders, to report to and so forth. We have nine and we have also the boards below that. Just imagine the vast possibilities for misunderstandings and disputes that will arise between bodies three or four thousand miles apart in carrying on negotiations and arrangements that in Britain would be dealt with in a matter of minutes.

Another equally important matter is that Britain is an importing country and in that is her safeguard, her bank, her reservoir, her safety valve for any trouble that may happen. She has only to take in the slack and say with a wave of her hand to outside nations: A little less butter or ham or bacon as the case may be. In that way her troubles are solved because she is an importing country. Her policy is destined to stimulate production and as that production grows, what will she do? She will stop the imports to a proportionate extent; she can do this, so to speak, by a wave of her hand, saying: A little less on the quota, and the whole business goes on smoothly and profitably. What have we? We have power to stop imports, but that would not do us much good. We have power to stop exports, but what good would that do us? I think it always has been found that when you get a government scheme, even if the price is low, it has a security, a certainty and a finality about it so that people will increase their production. The government of Brazil took over their coffee at a very low price and thought there would be no increase in production, but people got in new machinery and increased their production three or four times over because their money was sure. There is no doubt that this scheme will stimulate production, as is the intention in Great Britain and no doubt will be the result here, and what are we to do? We cannot raise our hands and stop importations to meet the case; we have to dispose of that slack in some way that will be very difficult to arrange.

Now I should like to deal with the bill itself for a few moments, not in regard to the details appropriate for discussion in committee but rather in its general aspects. These things, put together, form the reason why one should or should not support the bill itself. This is the most appallingly autocratic bill I ever had in my hand. Outside of Stalin I do not believe any of the dictators in Europe who at least pretend to practise constitutional government would bring forward a measure of this kind. I notice that the definition of natural products includes food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product. I suppose that would include liquor, which is made from grain; I want to use that illustration later on. We turn over the page and come to the dominion marketing board. Under section 3 the governor in council may establish a board to be known as the dominion marketing board, and subsection 2 states:

> The board shall consist of such number of persons as the governor in council may from time to time determine—

I wonder if what someone said the other night was true, that this act is only introduced as a gesture and is not meant to be used. I hope that is not so; I do not believe it, but certainly the utter lack of definiteness about many of these matters would lead to that supposition. This board may consist of three or of fifteen people. Is there any civil service appointment about it; is there any returned soldiers' preference? No; it will be almost as good as the Senate; it will be a home for burned out politicians, and if fifteen is not enough members the government can esaily make it twenty. In connection with our railway board, our tariff board and our pensions board the number of members is mentioned and the salaries are named as well. Here it states that they shall receive such remuneration as the governor in council shall determine. What is the reason for that? In these other important acts which have been passed by this house the salaries of the chairman and of the other members are specified. Here it is provided, apparently, that they shall get such remuneration as they ask. In another subsection it states that the governor in council may authorize certain members of the board to exercise the functions of the board in respect of any product or class of products. I suppose that might mean one member; we might have one man in Canada placed in supreme control of the lumber business, the fish business, the butter business or the liquor business. What possibilities that opens up for campaign funds, does it not? That it is, however; one man may have that power.

There is another point here; I am not a lawyer, and perhaps this may sound ridiculous from a legal standpoint, but I mention it for the consideration of lawyers. The whole of this bill to this point is entirely superfluous; that is, this board is only a buffer, a convenient but expensive buffer between the minister and the real boards called local boards, to which reference is made later on. They are really in the same position as the British boards. There is nothing similar to this dominion board in Great Britain; they have what is here called local boards and the minister deals with those boards. Those boards are the same, as to their origin at least, as the boards that will be created under section 5 of this bill. I maintain that this dominion marketing board is a superfluity.

On the next page I see it is provided that they may regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product. What product? A board must deal with one or more named products, but this board is not going to do any work of that kind; it is going to be a sort of senate, looking down on the real boards that are doing the work, and we are going to pay for three, five, ten or fifteen men at any price they like to name, while the local boards will do the work. That is not the way it is done in Great Britain.

[Mr. Neill.]

Then here is the most vicious thing in the act, next to section 9. Under subsection (b) of section 4 the board have the following power:

> to exempt from any determination or order any person or class of persons engaged in the production or marketing—

> —of the regulated product or any class, variety or grade of such product.

What is the practice under the British system? It is very different. The British system exempts certain people from the scheme, and that is a very different thing. I need not take time to go into the details, but they exempt certain small people from the working of the entire scheme. I find on looking up the act that in the case of dairy produce those having less than four cows are exempt, and that a man selling less than twenty-five eggs at one time is exempt as well. These people are saved all the bother; they do not have to register or go through any of the formalities; the government do not have to clutter up their records with them, and it is so much fairer to everyone. But what is to be the system here? This board is to be given power to exempt from any determination or order an individual or individuals engaged in producing or marketing. It might be that only one man will be exempt; the board might say, "We are going to prohibit the exportation of butter for two or three weeks" but by accident Tom Jones may be exempt from that determination. What would that be worth to him? It might be worth a small fortune. Under the British system that could not happen. In order to keep them satisfied with their lot the section hands on the railways throughout the country are encouraged to keep a cow, a pig, a few chickens and so on. They will have to sit up nights in order to make these returns; they will have to be registered and so on, with all the trouble involved. The greatest danger, of course, is that somebody with a pull may just happen to be exempt from the marketing order that may be made, and if he is an exporter himself he will make a very good thing out of it.

Further on in the act there is provision for lending money for the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing or conditioning the product. Every man who has a root house for potatoes or anything else will want the government to pay for it; every man who has not a roothouse will want the government to build one. All the creameries will want some help from the government. There is also provision for research work. That may be all right in Great Britain, but it has nothing to do with this bill. We deal with research work in another way in this country.

Then we come to subsection (f), which states:

to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board—

All these men with one cow and a pig have to get licences from the board, and those licences are subject to cancellation on the say so of the board for the violation of any provision. Is that the system in Great Britain? It is not. There they outline the penalties in their scheme; violations are punished by fines, and they do not go so far as cancelling the licence of the individual. And as the hon. member for Last Mountain pointed out last night, they make provision for looking after the consumer. There is a consumers' committee, who see that the scheme does not injure the consumer. Above that there is another committee which has power to take action and change the scheme if it finds any abuse or injury being committed. Is there anything of that kind in our act? If there is I have not found it. Again it is provided that people must send in all these returns. Fancy the poor section hand sitting up at night asking his wife how much she churned in March and how much in April, because if he does not know that the whole return is upset.

Then subsection 2 reads:

The board may collect charges for services rendered,

(a) in respect of all or any portion of the regulated product marketed under its direction, and

(b) if it cooperates or acts conjointly with any marketing board or agency established under the law of any province, in respect of all or any portion of the product subject to regulation by such provincial board or agency.

I do not find much fault with that except that it leads to confusion and a great deal of bookkeeping. Then, right near the end of section 4, half way through the whole bill, we come to the first mention of the real scheme. The word "scheme" is noticed for the first time in the reference to the board. At section 5 I find the following:

A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

This is the real thing; this is the real act. This is the thing which corresponds to the British board, namely that which we call the local board. The procedure is to petition, and one minister, remember, considers whether that petition is good, or whether those men are representative. My friend and I may call ourselves representative, and yet we may not be. The British system requires that they shall be substantially representative. The minister makes the decision, just one man,—just the minister. If he is satisfied and considers the petition satisfactory he does not have to give any explanation. When the minister goes to the House of Commons in Great Britain he has to give reasons why he thinks his decision is all right, and he has to put his views in writing. But in this country, according to this bill, he does not need to do anything at all, except—consider. If he considers the thing is O.K. and the persons engaged are sufficiently representative the scheme shall be referred to the board. In that connection I shall but refer to the foreword to the British act. This is what it says:

Every scheme shall be administered by a board elected by the producers.

Are our schemes going to be administered by boards elected by the producers? Not at all. We can elect a lot of Chinese laundrymen, if we wish, and it would be quite all right.

Then I shall turn to some of the provisions pointed out last night by the hon. member for Last Mountain. I shall touch upon them only briefly. This is what the British minister has to do: He has to get the petition, and then he has to publish it for a period of six weeks. Then he holds a public meeting to see if anybody wishes to kick about it. Then he lays it before each house of parliament, and along with it must be a copy of the evidence which convinced him that the scheme was suitable. His action must be the same both before the House of Commons and before the House of Lords. Then they have to provide for a board to administer the scheme. The men who run it have to be elected in such manner as may be provided by the scheme, and they must be registered producers. After all that is done, namely after the House of Commons and the House of Lords have O.K.'d the procedure, the minister approves the scheme, but he suspends it for about two months, within which time he takes a plebiscite or a poll of all the registered producers. If sixty-six per cent do not vote for it the whole thing is off, and if less than fifty per cent vote it is closed off automatically. These are some of the safeguards imposed by the British government, but which are wholly lacking in the measure before this House of Commons. Under this measure the scheme needs only the O.K. of the minister who thinks that Tom Jones and his friends are decent fellows—and he lets it go at that.

In order to give a further illustration I should like to make a quotation. Apparently in the British parliament they have introductions to their bills, and in this instance I quote from introductory remarks:

> The procedure regulating initiation and control of schemes is democratic in character.

Can we say that about our measure? It continues:

> By whomsoever they may be prepared, schemes may be submitted only by producers of the product concerned; moreover, there must be a poll, on which all affected producers can vote, before any scheme comes into full operation. Similarly, democratic control in the administration of every scheme is assured by the fact that the board, i.e., the administrative body entrusted with the administration of the scheme, is composed of the elected representatives of registered producers.

How very far distant is that from anything to be found in the measure before us. Democracy?—democracy appears to have been forgotten when this bill was drafted.

Then we come to some of the provisions to be found in the measure. I find that every scheme shall state "the number of persons who shall comprise the local board and the basis of their selection." It may be the president of the Liberal or the Conservative association, so far as this regulation is concerned. They do not need to be representatives of producers. The stipulation is merely as to the "basis of their selection." Selection?—they may agree upon an appointment by the minister. It does not say "election" but "basis of their selection." That is where the hon. member for Yale went wrong. He stated that they would be elected by the producers. Probably the hon. member hopes so, but certainly there is no guarantee of it in the measure.

Then section 6 indicates that the framers of the bill have awakened at last, and have thought of giving some publicity to the thing. In that connection section 6 states:

> When a scheme has been approved by the governor in council, the minister shall give public notice thereof in the Canada Gazette.

That is, when the scheme has gone through the successive stages of the minister, the board and the council, this action will be taken Why not do it before the scheme is approved? Would that not be a good idea, when they are going to publish it afterwards in the Gazette? So much for Canadian democracy.

Then in section 8 we find a provision which at the present time I shall not go into. It is a provision for extending the power of any local board, but there is no check on them, and no suggestion of how it is to be done. It is just simply on the say so of the minister, or if the governor in council is satisfied with the recommendation of the minister. That is all that is required. I may remind the house that in Great Britain one has to go through pages of forms, if a scheme is to be substituted, amended or extended. The same performance has to be followed which is followed in an original case. One has to go through the House of Lords, through the House of Commons and so on. Here the extension may be made, heaven knows to what extent, simply if the minister himself is satisfied.

Now we come to section 9—and that is the section which I consider the most vicious in its import. I cannot see how the minister, a man whom I respect, with whom I have no trouble at all and with whom I never had a harsh word, could sanction this section. Much as I respect him I cannot understand why he has allowed section 9 to creep into the bill. I do suggest that the progress of the measure would be greatly helped if section 9 were eliminated. It is as follows:

> Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may if he—

—think it is necessary, put in a scheme of his own. If he thinks it is necessary he can draw it up himself. Because he believes some trade to be injuriously affected he may propose a scheme for the marketing of the products of that trade. He does not need even to take it before the board. He takes it to the governor in council, who, in turn, approves of the scheme and authorizes the board to administer such scheme directly or through any agency which it may establish. It is not limited even to the formalities of the rest of the bill, but is given entirely to any agency which may be established.

Let me suggest this: Everything is going along smoothly and quietly in a certain industry, but all of a sudden out of a blue sky the minister takes the notion—or some minister; I shall not refer to any particular minister, because he is not named—some person makes a suggestion to the minister who says, suddenly, " We will have a scheme about that; I shall draw it up and I shall have the government approve of it"—which, of course, is a mere formality—"and then I will appoint a board, and the board will appoint Tom Jones to run it." The whole of that industry may be run by that man, without warning or notice, except that publication will be made in the Gazette after everything is all cut and dried. The expression in the bill is: "through any agency which it may establish."

Then, section 12, subsection 2, is as follows:

The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette,

(a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence.

That, of course, is a necessary provision, and I agree with it. But I notice that the British act of 1933, which I have before me, gives the same provision, namely, that the government may prohibit the importation of any particular article. In the British act, however, there are four pages of safeguards. If any hon. member questions my statement may I say that I have the measure before me, and he may see for himself that there are four pages, as I have indicated. But here it is simply done by the governor in council.

I visualize the situation like this: The governor in council may provide that a certain natural product shall not be exported from Canada. In the constituency which I represent there are many trollers, that is, fishermen who troll for salmon. At this time of the year their market is entirely in the United States, in Seattle. I need not go into why that is so, but I simply state that that is the case. They could get a market in the canneries, but it would be an inferior market. The canneries do not particularly need it because it is not good for canning, but they could handle it as fresh fish. Suppose a couple of canners got together and, after using influence, got the board to decide that none of that fish was to be exported. What would be the situation of those trollers? What remedy would they have? Under the British act when a man is aggrieved by its operation he can go before two arbitrators appointed under the act. You will find all that in the 1931 act, I think it is. He can go before two arbitrators and get a ready form of arbitration. There is nothing of that kind here. No; he simply has to take his medicine.

The minister said that he thought there were three requisites for this act, and that was that it should be sound, simple and practical. What a travesty on the English language if you call this bill sound, simple and practical! It is a travesty on truth and justice and common sense to call this bill sound, simple and practical. If I had two bitter enemies I would not wish them a worse fate than to put one to run this act and the other to try to make a living under it. It would be a case indeed of "Judah is avenged of her children."

My time is nearly up, but I would like to say a word on part II. That is the less important part of the bill. It is the part that deals with investigations into spreads. The first part deals with people charging a commission; the second is concerned with the people handling; and the third provides that the minister may at the request of the board or on his own initiative institute an investigation of the spread on any natural product. Why natural products? Why not any product at all? A lot of evidence has been given before the price spreads committee dealing with the horrible spread and the slum conditions and sweated wages of workers on manufactured articles. As this bill is dealing with spreads, why not deal with spreads in manufactured articles also? I suggest that if it is going to inquire into the spread on natural products, the bill might as well also be applied to the spreads in manufactured articles so as to give the consumer a little look in.

Section 18 of the bill says, a regulated product. Surely it should be natural product, any natural product, in fact, any product at all. Then section 21 provides that every person who receives a spread that is excessive shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000 or two years imprisonment in the case of an individual, and to a penalty of not exceeding $10,000 in the case of a corporation. That is put in just as window dressing. They might as well have said ten million dollars. Is there any chance of any company paying a fine of $10,000 for an offence under this act? Would it be fair that any individual should have to pay a fine of $5,000 for some very petty offence against this act?

Another thing. A spread is a rather difficult thing to determine. What is a fair spread to me might be a much more expensive spread to my neighbour. By improved methods, greater energy and good management one man may be able to handle an article at a lower cost. If his case is selected as the criterion the other man is going to pay a fine of $5,000 simply because he uses obsolete machinery or does not have the same energy or good management as the other fellow. I do not say that the man with the antiquated methods should be taken as the standard, but I do say that he should not be fined $5,000 judged by the standard of the man with more modern methods and better management.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that some will say that I have been simply tearing this thing to pieces and trying to attack it in a political way. I have nothing to gain in a political way by attacking this bill. It is not an issue in my district, and I can take as impersonal and unprejudiced a view of it as I ever did of anything. But as I see it, this bill needs not an architect but a wrecker. Let us tear it down and build it up again. All praise and credit to the minister for the conception behind the act, but let us have an act that really regulates and that will be effective in the interests of the men described by my hon. friend from Yale and my hon. friend from Hants-Kings. Then no one will be more willing to support it and promote its passage through the house than myself.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I think there will be general agreement with the statement of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) that this is one of the most important bills that has been introduced into the house in many years. It is generally recognized now that agriculture is the industry upon which the prosperity of Canada must be based, and the marketing of agricultural products is a matter that has given great concern to the farmers during very many years.

In the early days of our farmer organizations in the west, when we undertook to concern ourselves with the marketing of our produce we were practically told by those interested in the trade that the marketing was none of our business, that our business was to produce, and they would take care of the marketing. Well, we did not see it that way. We thought it was a matter of very great concern to us not only to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before but to see that what we produced was put on the market at the highest profit to ourselves. So we proceeded to consider ways and means of marketing, and we did establish cooperative institutions that have functioned with greater or less success, some of them with a great deal of success, and some of them unfortunately proving apparently a failure.

I wish at the outset to pay a tribute to the two hon. members who started the discussion of this bill, the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) and the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). With their keen legal minds they have analyzed the provisions of this bill and thoroughly exposed its weaknesses, so that it is only necessary for those of us who follow to deal with some of the details and point out some of the situations that are likely to arise and that undoubtedly will arise if the provisions of this bill are put into effect.

I wish I could pay a similar tribute to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). So far as explaining the principle of the bill is concerned his speech was very disappointing. Not only did he not deal with the details of the bill, but he did not even remotely touch upon its principles. I can come to only one conclusion, though it may be a wrong one, and that is that this bill was something that was handed to him and that he was told to put it across. But in some respects the minister's speech was an excellent one, and under certain circumstances I could have listened to it with a great deal of interest. The minister showed a very clear understanding of the difficulties that have confronted the farmers in handling their produce profitably. Being a farmer he clearly recognizes the handicaps that have been imposed upon us, but in my judgment he completely failed to set forth even in a general way the principles which he proposes to apply through this bill to remedy the present difficulties.

The minister told us that he had received many communications from all over Canada endorsing this bill. I am not at all surprised at that. The attitude of the farmers, unfortunately, and the same may be said of other sections of the population as well, has been such that during the hard times through which we are passing they are ready to accept almost anything that holds out the slightest hope of better conditions. They are ready to try almost anything, and so I am not at all surprised that a general expression of approval of this bill should have come from many sources. But it must be remembered that these expressions of approval have been founded on a very insufficient knowledge of the bill, and I think we may fairly ask what, after all, are men's opinions worth who only know that it was the intention of the government to bring in a bill to facilitate the marketing of farm produce and who know actually nothing about the details of the measure proposed. It may be that there are institutions here and there which have received copies of the bill and, therefore, are in position to express a measure of intelligent opinion upon it, but I am quite satisfied that many of these expressions of approval have come from men who are not sufficiently informed of the contents of the bill and of how far-reaching it is in some respects. Undoubtedly the avowed purpose of the bill is one of which we must approve; according to the title it is an act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

I have not the slightest doubt—I am speaking now of men in the prairie provinces where our wheat is grown—that many men are of the opinion that this bill is to provide something like the old wheat board which was established to handle the crop of 1919. I think we can pay a tribute to that board and say that it was a magnificent success under the guidance of Mr. James Stewart. I believe that gentleman served on the board without recompense, and he was supported by men who were well acquainted with the grain trade. Undoubtedly that board handled that crop to the satisfaction of the farmers. If I remember rightly, we received an initial payment of $2.22½ or $2.25 and a final payment of 48 cents per bushel. We were quite satisfied. There was a demand that that board be continued. There was a mistaken feeling that such a board could continue to do for us what Mr. James Stewart had done with the crop of 1919. I have no doubt that remembering the satisfactory manner in which that board functioned, many are looking forward to the establishing of a board which will bring about the conditions which prevailed at that time. However, I think we can put out of our minds the thought that any wheat board could do for us to-day what that wheat board did under the circumstances which prevailed at that time. It is not at all surprising that expressions of approval should come from many different sources.

The minister referred to some of our co-operative efforts and he gave some of the reasons why he thought some of those experiments had failed. I agree with most of the reasons he gave, and I certainly agree with him when he says that one of the main causes of failure was the putting into positions of business management those who had made a success as propagandists. I do not intend to mention specific cases but we have good reason to know that some of the mistakes made in a business way were made by men who had no business capacity but who were capable propagandists. It is a good thing to have propagandists for a cause but the fact that a man is able to get up on a platform and expatiate upon the benefits of a particular line of conduct does not mean that he is capable of handling such a business as the selling of wheat. I have had men tell me that they did not consider there was anything to the selling of wheat and that in their opinion such an operation did not require a clever man. There are those who use the statement of the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) to the effect that wheat sold itself. At the time that the former Minister of Trade and Commerce said that, that statement was largely true. It did not require any great activity on the part of the government to sell wheat, but things have changed.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt? His last statement which has gone on Hansard is to the effect that I said that.

Mr. BROWN: I said the former Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is just as true as if you had said it.

Mr. BROWN: I think the minister would have said the same thing at that time.

There was another reason given by the minister for the failure of the cooperatives and it is one to which too much weight must not be attached. He said that many of these cooperatives failed because they did not have one hundred per cent control. The hon. member for Yale has stated the case of the fruit growers very clearly and in most moderate language. We always listen to what he says with a great deal of interest, and I have no doubt that what he said with regard to the difficulties which confronted those growers in the marketing of their fruit is absolutely true. I have no doubt that the situation which prevailed in Vancouver with regard to milk is as has been described, but we must not carry such arguments too far. There are those who say that the failure of the wheat pool was attributable to the fact that they did not have one hundred per cent control. I do not intend to go into the causes at any great length, but I state most emphatically that whatever they were, they were not attributable in any sense to the fact that they did not have one hundred per cent control. At the time that the pool was on the verge of bankruptcy, if not already bankrupt, it was a strange attitude for the executives to take when they said that if they had only had one hundred per cent control they could have handled the thing much better. I do not want to be unjust in my criticism of the pool but in my judgment there is no doubt that had the fluctuations in the grain trade been normal the pool would have continued to function with satisfaction. But it could not stand up against the tremendous drop which occurred in the price of wheat, especially when the initial payment had been more than that ultimately received for the wheat. All I ask of any body of officials is that they be honest and face the facts and not make undue claims for powers which it would have been impossible for them to exercise under any condition.

There is another cause for the failure of our cooperatives, and it is one of the weaknesses of democracy. One of the weaknesses of our cooperative institutions is the unwillingness to pay for good service. I think I have heard the former Minister of Agriculture complain that he lost some of his best officials because he was not allowed to pay a remuneration high enough to retain them, and unfortunately it is still true of our cooperative institutions that there is an unwillingness to pay for the service of good men. I remember very well that when we organized the first large grain handling company in the west, the Grain Growers Grain company, one man said that he would manage it for a thousand dollars a year. It might have been managed for one year and there would never have been a second. That is undoubtedly one of the reasons for the failure of our cooperative companies.

There is another reason which is perhaps pertinent to this discussion—the disposition to want to pull down existing institutions and to establish something new. We have that disposition manifest not only in our farmers' cooperatives but in governmental institutions.

An hon. MEMBER: We want to change the government.

Mr. BROWN: That is always in order, I suppose. But we have suggestions to-day that instead of working with the economic system we have, for example, we must entirely dispense with it, overthrow it and establish an entirely new system. And so we had this in our marketing institutions; the old system must go; it could not possibly exist side by side with the new, and anyone who suggested that we must go slow and experiment with the new before completely discarding the old was sneered at and scoffed at as a man opposed to all the farmers' interests. And that practically constitutes one of the reasons why our cooperative institutions have not had the measure of success that we should like.

If it is agreeable, Mr. Speaker, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, April 18, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

OATHS OF ALLEGIANCE ACT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house I should like to move that item No. 38 on the order paper be struck off. My reason for doing this is that the hon. Secretary of State is introducing a bill which meets the purpose I had in view. He has kindly shown me a copy of the bill, and I am quite agreeable to it.

[Mr. Brown.]

Bill withdrawn.

QUESTIONS

*BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT BONDS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

Are the chartered banks or any of them advertising for sale any part of the sixteen million dollars worth of Beauharnois bonds held by them as collateral security?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, as far as the government is aware the chartered banks disposed of bonds to the extent of $15,000,000, par value, to a syndicate which made an offering to the public. Of the amount sold one-half was applied against the guarantee given by the government.

TRACADIE, N.B., LAZARETTO

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Were tenders called for the installation of an electric lighting plant in the lazaretto at Tracadie, New Brunswick?
2. If so, when, and how many tenders were received?
3. Who were the tenderers and the amount of each tender entered at noon January 18, 1934?
4. Who was the successful tenderer and the amount he tendered on January 18, 1934?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2. (a) Tenders to be received not later than January 18, 1934; (b) Five tenders received.

3. Northern Machine Works, Bathurst, N.B., $3,100; J. S. Parker, Saint John, N.B., $3,395; E. J. M. Bourgeois, Tracadie, N.B., $3,423; C. V. Clark, Saint John, N.B., $3,652; E. S. Stephenson & Co., Saint John, N.B., $4,675.

4. (a) Northern Machine Works, Bathurst, N.B., (b) $3,100 (Date of tender January 15, 1934).

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CANADA-GREAT BRITAIN TRADE STATISTICS

Mr. GOTT:

1. What were the total exports from Canada to Great Britain for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934?

2. What were the total imports from Great Britain to Canada during the foregoing years, naming major commodities and amounts?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NOVA SCOTIA PUBLIC WORKS EXPENDITURES

Mr. DUFF:

For a return of an itemized statement showing the particular undertakings which make up the expenditure of $472,000 disclosed in the Auditor General's Report for 1933, Volume 2, M-8, for public works in Nova Scotia; also an itemized statement showing the particular undertakings which make up the expenditure of $390,000 disclosed in the Auditor General's Report for 1933, Volume 2, M-8, for trans-Canada highway.

GRANDE-ENTREE CHANNEL BUOYS

Mr. CHEVRIER (for Mr. Brasset):

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Department of Marine, or the department's office at Charlottetown, and any persons of the Magdalen islands, county of Gaspe, respecting the buoys of Grande-Entrée channel, from October, 1933, to date.

PEDIGREED HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the government based on an article which appears in this morning's press. In a Canadian Press dispatch I notice that a question was asked in the British House of Commons as to why Canada was buying sixty or seventy pedigreed pigs from Sweden. Mr. Thomas said that all but eight of these pigs were not produced in England. I should like to ask the government if it can tell the house for whom the pigs are being bought, what their pedigrees may be, or any information they may have in that connection.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member's question will stand as a notice. The minister is absent to-day.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this year for the first time in the course of this prolonged depression it is possible to review the year's operations in terms of business improvement, reviving confidence and expanding revenues. Three successive budgets have been delivered in the face of a progressive decline in business with the inevitable disappointment in revenues and inability to meet necessary expenditures. Last year I expressed the belief that the turn in this tide had been reached and I ventured the hope that important developments which had occurred or were under way would lead to an early recovery of business activity. What was then a hope can now be asserted with confidence as a fact of experience. The fiscal year which has just closed has been a year of recovery—recovery that is unmistakable and of greater magnitude than many had thought possible.

The evidence of business recovery is written incontrovertibly in the recorded facts of our industry and trade. I desire not to weary you with statistical details but as a thorough appraisal of current business conditions is an essential of sound budgeting and as depression psychology is still rather too prevalent, I propose to review the essential facts as briefly as possible.

The most comprehensive measure of economic activity in Canada is the index of the physical volume of business prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. It is based on a compilation involving forty-five economic factors, including production of our leading manufactured articles, mineral products, and electric power, as well as freight cars loaded, construction contracts awarded and the volume of trade. In February, 1933, when business reached its low point in Canada, that index stood at 67·0. In February, 1934, the latest month for which the figures are available, the index had risen to 86·4, an increase of no less than 29·0 per cent. During the same period, manufacturing production increased by 41·7 per cent, mineral production by 13·7 per cent and total industrial production, including construction, by 38 per cent. These figures are of striking significance when compared with similar figures for the United States. According to indices prepared by the Federal Reserve Board, the corresponding increases for that country were 31·1 per cent for manufacturing production, 15·2 per cent for mineral output and 28·6 per cent for total industrial production. Their improvement was considerably more rapid than ours last summer, but their gains were not consistently held; with us, recovery has been more gradual but also more persistent.

Other indices of a general nature tell the same story of business recovery in Canada. The total amount of cheques cashed at chartered banks in thirty-two clearing house centres increased 16 per cent in 1933 over 1932 and another 23·4 per cent in the first two months of the present year over the same period last year. These bank debit figures reflect not only the volume of ordinary business but also increasing activity in financial transactions.

In this power age, increasing sales of electrical energy are also an indication of general business expansion, although the increased use of electrical appliances or processes in home and factory and the increasing sales of secondary power for steam production make it impossible to regard power output as an accurate measure of such expansion. Since the first of this year, the output of central electric stations has established a new record level for all time. In February the average daily output was 57½ million kilowatt hours, an increase of 24·1 per cent over the corresponding month of 1933, and 19·8 per cent over February, 1929.

The increase in the movement of railway revenue freight is an even more significant symptom of general business improvement because it points to better days ahead for our two great railroad systems. In the first twelve weeks of this year 491,279 cars were loaded, showing an increase of 23·9 per cent over the same period last year. The gain of 95,064 cars in the elapsed period of the present year reflects a heavier movement in ten of the eleven commodity groups of the official classification, grain alone showing a slight decrease as compared with last year. Furthermore, traffic is now practically up to the level of the movement of two years ago.

Again comparing February, 1934, with February a year ago, we find the following striking increases in productive activity in individual industries; pig iron production, 100 per cent; steel production, 369 per cent; newsprint production, 38·9 per cent; imports of raw wool and yarn, 143 per cent (in the textile industry imports of raw material are the best measure available of productive activity); raw cotton imports, 84·2 per cent; exports of boards and planks, 178·6 per cent; nickel exports 57·7 per cent; and construction contracts awarded, 72·8 per cent. During the past three months, contracts awarded, although still at a comparatively low level, were double the figure for the first quarter of last year. This improvement in the construction industry, which has been unduly depressed and which stimulates so many material manufacturing industries, is of special significance.

Expansion in the scale of operations should bring an enlargement of business profits if industry is operating on a sound basis. While the earnings of most business organizations during the past year were affected adversely by the declining trend of the early part of the year, there is convincing confirmation of improvement for the year as a whole in the figures of company profits. A recent compilation of the latest earnings statements of 79 important companies showed that 64 reported net profits aggregating $61,500,000 after all charges, against $47,000,000 in the previous year, an increase of over 30 per cent, while the remaining 15 reduced their deficits from $8,600,000 to $7,100,000.

Of more importance is the effect of this expansion in private business upon the absorption of unemployment, the most pressing social problem of the depression years. In the twelve-month period ended on March 1, the index of employment rose from 76·9 to 92·7, an increase of 20·5 per cent. At the beginning of March returns from 8,499 leading employers showed 153,688 more employees on payrolls than were reported at the same date a year ago, and of this total, 114,214 represented increases in industries other than highway construction and maintenance, and, presumably therefore, have not been affected by governmental activity in connection with unemployment relief. On the basis of these returns from a limited group of employers it has been estimated that the total increase in employment in Canada during the year was at least 250,000.

There is one other economic factor upon which I wish to comment at this stage, namely, the movement of commodity prices. The world depression cannot be attributed to any single cause but with a very considerable measure of validity it may be interpreted in terms of the drastic fall in the world level of prices with consequent inevitable disparities in different groups of prices. The result was not only substantial inequalities as between various economic groups but a serious disequilibrium between costs and prices which impeded individual enterprise and threw the whole economic mechanism out of gear. Recovery from the depression may be measured by the progress made in reestablishing a reasonable equilibrium between the various parts of the price structure—a working equilibrium between producers' costs and prices, between prices of primary products and those of finished products, between wholesale and retail prices, and between debtors and creditors, whether they be individuals, corporations or countries. Such restoration of equilibrium may be achieved either by a reduction of costs or by a rise in the general level of prices, or by a combination of both tendencies. During any depression a gradual reduction of costs and a considerable amount of liquidation always takes place, and up to a certain point the working of these normal automatic forces is highly beneficial. But so catastrophic was the fall in prices from 1929 to 1933 and so rigid are certain elements of the price structure (such as interest, taxes, etc.) that reliance solely upon this method of curing our economic ills would have involved such a measure of deflation and liquidation as would possibly have imperilled the stability of our social and economic fabric.

For this reason the government has consistently pursued a policy designed to stimulate a rise in prices by every sound means. As Canada is so heavily interested in export trade it has been recognized that our most important need was to secure a rise in the world level of commodity prices. Consequently, at the Ottawa conference in 1932, at the World Monetary and Economic conference in London last summer and in the negotiations which followed and which led to the issue of a joint statement on monetary and economic policy by the nations of the British commonwealth, we did our utmost to secure the adoption of common policies designed to promote first a rise in, and later a stabilization of, the world level of commodity prices. For reasons which I need not discuss at this time it proved impossible to secure as great a measure of international cooperation and the employment of as aggressive policies as was thought desirable. Nevertheless, as I shall show later, such action as has been taken has not been without a considerable measure of success. But our efforts have not been limited to the international sphere. I shall have occasion later to refer to the steps we have taken and the success achieved in fostering within Canada a lowering of interest rates and ease in the money markets, which constitute essential conditions favourable to a rise in commodity prices. The inadequate machinery of our Finance Act has been administered as far as practicable with this end in view, and, as you are aware, we are proposing to set up a central bank which is designed to give us an effective mechanism for cooperating effectively with other countries in a program to raise and stabilize price levels, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action.

In October, 1931, an order in council was passed prohibiting the export of gold from Canada except under licence. That was the final step severing the chain which bound us to the gold standard currencies, then subject to deflationary tendencies. As you are aware, it was followed by a substantial decline in our foreign exchanges which improved the competitive position of, and the prices received by, our export industries, although at the same time it increased the burden involved in carrying our external obligations. Many have considered it unfortunate that, because of the more rapid depreciation of sterling, our currency, though at a substantial discount in New York, still remained at a premium in London. I had occasion last year to point out that in fluctuating about halfway between the United States dollar and the English pound, our dollar was working out probably the most practicable compromise between those of our national interests which would be benefited by close and stable relations with sterling, and those on the other hand which would be seriously harmed by a heavy and fluctuating discount in terms of New York. Fortunately, the developments during the past year in connection with these two basic currencies both of which affect our interests so materially have been of a nature extremely favourable to Canada. In February, 1933, sterling in Montreal was quoted at an average discount of 15·9 per cent; in February of this year there was an average premium of 4·3 per cent. In February, 1933, New York funds ruled at an average premium of 19·7 per cent, whereas in February this year this average premium had been reduced to 7/10 of 1 per cent. During the last few days sterling has been quoted from 5·14 to 5·17 in Montreal and New York funds at a discount of 1/8 to 1/4 of 1 per cent. These rates of course mean that our exporters obtain a slight advantage in the British market and Canadian debtors are at no disadvantage in meeting their obligations payable in United States funds.

Much misunderstanding, however, seems to persist in connection with these highly technical matters of money and exchange. For instance, it is sometimes claimed that we should devalue our currency on the same basis as the United States have devalued theirs. This criticism appears to reveal a complete lack of appreciation of the fact that our dollar is currently selling on an approximate parity with that of the United States which has been devalued by slightly over 40 per cent. I have much sympathy with the desire for stabilization which may be latent in this argument, but in my view stabilization of our currency must await the establishment of a stabilized ratio, at least on a de facto basis, between the United States dollar and the English pound. So strongly are our interests tied up with both of these currencies that a policy of tying to one and not to the other would represent a poor second-best and not an ideal policy. I would have to qualify this general statement if either of these currencies should exhibit a deflationary tendency; that would involve a changed situation calling probably for a radically different decision.

In addition to these measures which have been taken to foster a rise in the general price level, I may add that the international wheat agreement which was signed at London is designed to effect by a better adjustment of supply and demand the price of wheat, which is so important a staple in our domestic economy and so important a constituent in the world price level. Our efforts to foster a rise in prices by every sound method will not be relaxed. In particular it is expected that our public works program will contribute to that end by accelerating the progress of business recovery already happily under way.

Granting that a rise in commodity prices is highly to be desired, the record of the past year has been distinctly favourable. From February, 1933, to February of this year the general index of wholesale prices in Canada rose by 13·4 per cent. This rise has been less rapid than that in the United States but more rapid than that of most other countries. The official index of the United States Bureau of Labour statistics is not yet available for the month of February, but the more rapidly fluctuating index compiled by Dun's shows a rise of 28·1 per cent during the period mentioned. In England wholesale prices have risen by 9·2 per cent according to the figures compiled by the Financial Times of London.

As an indication of the extent to which the maladjustments between various price groups have been corrected in Canada, I may add that while the wholesale price index was rising 13·4 per cent, the index for farm prices rose by no less than 34·9 per cent. Furthermore, the prices of raw and partly manufactured articles showed a rise of 23·8 per cent, as compared with one of 11·4 per cent for fully and chiefly manufactured commodities. It should be noted also that the price of Number 1 Northern wheat at Fort William averaged 43·2 per cent higher in February this year than in February, 1933, while the corresponding increase for cattle (steers, good 1,000 to 1,200 lbs.) was 45·7 per cent, and for bacon hogs at Toronto, 153·8 per cent.

I have referred to the steps which have been taken to promote a lowering of interest rates. Interest is one of the rigid factors in our price structure and the burden of fixed charges caused by the extravagant borrowing of the war and post-war years, aggravated enormously as it has been by the fall in prices, and for public bodies also by the necessarily large expenditures for unemployment relief during the depression, has been too frequently discussed in this house to need elaboration here.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

For certain individual debtors the burden has become unbearable and the government proposes to bring down at an early stage legislation designed to provide machinery whereby farmers who find themselves unable to pay the fixed charges on their outstanding debts will be able by an expeditious and inexpensive process to work out compromises with their creditors and to obtain new working capital. The guiding principle of this legislation will be to secure for the farmer a simplified debt structure reduced in size to a point where the carrying charges will be within the capacity of the farm enterprise to pay. This will involve some concessions on the part of creditors but these will be more than outweighed by the advantages which will follow as a result of retaining the farmer on the land as a willing and effective producer. The release of economic energy so produced and the substitution of hope and goodwill for despondency and discontent which are now prevalent in certain areas should result in a very real gain to our whole domestic economy.

The claim has been made that a somewhat similar procedure should be applied to certain classes of public debt in this country. This question was effectively dealt with in the statement made by the Prime Minister in this house a few weeks ago and is too large and complicated a subject to call for more than a passing reference by me at this time. But as I have outlined our proposals for dealing with farm debts, I wish to make clear why in my opinion the same kind of remedy cannot be applied to the problem of public indebtedness.

In the first place is the fact that so large a proportion of the direct and guaranteed debt of the dominion and the provinces is held by foreign investors. Not only that but, as a result of the method of financing in the post-war years a very large proportion of these foreign and of domestic holdings is in the form of bearer bonds payable at the option of the holder in either two or three markets. It is therefore impracticable, if not indeed entirely impossible, to administer a policy that would seek to differentiate between the Canadian and the foreign investor. Whatever argument may be advanced in favour of a comprehensive policy of scaling down all fixed charges due by Canadian debtors to Canadian creditors—and this would involve, what is too frequently overlooked, a reduction in payments to be made by as well as to Canadian creditor institutions such as insurance companies, mortgage companies, trust companies and banks—I doubt whether there are many Canadians who would be willing to contemplate a program which would involve even a partial repudiation of our external obligations. In addition to our traditional attitude towards the carrying out of our obligations according to the letter of the contract, there is the compelling motive of self-interest. Canada is a young country with a vast store of natural resources that has only begun to be tapped. If we are to convert those potential resources into consumable wealth and thus into a higher standard of living for our people, we will need the fructifying influence of foreign capital for years to come. We have a right to expect that our foreign creditors will not make it difficult or impossible for us to pay our interest and maturing debt obligations but, unless I am seriously mistaken, this country will never take any deliberate action that would cut off or seriously impede the flow of foreign capital for the development of our resources.

The second consideration I wish to place before you is that great as is the burden of our public debt, it is not beyond the capacity of our people to pay. I am sure you will grant that I am in a position to appreciate to the full how serious the burden is, not only to the dominion government but to some of our provincial governments as well, and I wish here to pay a tribute to the splendid spirit of the Canadian people under the strains and sacrifices of the last five years. That spirit as well as the stability and resiliency of our economic system have been beyond all praise. Also worthy of commendation are the earnest efforts which have been made by practically all public bodies to adjust their finances to the new and trying conditions, despite the criticism of the well-meaning arm-chair critics who find it easy to solve the difficulties of public treasuries by neglecting part of the problem. But the point I wish to make is that, oppressive as our burdens have been, they have actually been borne through the worst of the depression and at a level of taxation which is not abnormal when compared with the tax rates which certain other countries have imposed upon themselves. Furthermore, as I have tried to demonstrate, we are returning to more normal business conditions and price levels with a speed which a year ago few of us would have ventured to predict. With a normal volume of business and a reasonable price level I am convinced that we will be able to meet all our obligations without undue strain.

Under such circumstances the sound and practical policy appears to be to do our utmost to expedite the processes of business recovery and to facilitate those economic trends which will make for a lightening of interest charges. I have already discussed the question of raising the price level which automatically serves to reduce the real burden of debt. A second factor which works both directly and indirectly is the gradual lowering of interest rates. This process we have also been endeavouring to foster by every legitimate means. A year ago I had occasion to refer to the efforts being made to secure a lowering of the interest rate paid on savings deposits by banks, trust companies and other institutions. As you are aware, these efforts led to a one-half per cent reduction in the deposit rate which was followed immediately by a corresponding reduction in the rates charged by banks to public bodies and to agricultural borrowers. It also contributed to strength in our investment markets. Because the savings deposit rate is the basic element in our whole interest structure, it is to be hoped that our financial institutions can see their way clear to make another similar reduction which I am sure would have an important stimulating influence at this time. The London loan which we floated so successfully last August was intended in part to relieve our own investment market and thus make it possible for other public and private borrowers to secure funds at more favourable rates. The continuance of our domestic conversion program to which I shall refer later and the strenuous efforts which we have made and are making to balance our budget and thereby justify a high credit basis, have also contributed to a lowering of interest rates.

The striking success of these concerted efforts are perhaps not fully appreciated by the Canadian public. It seems to me highly significant that the 4 per cent twelve-year bonds which we offered for public subscription last October at 96½ to yield 4·38 per cent are now selling at approximately 101¾ or on a yield basis of 3·77 per cent. It is too much to expect that we are within sight of a 3½ per cent basis for the dominion's medium or long term obligations? And if so, will not the attainment of that objective be a convincing demonstration of the wisdom of the policies which we have followed?

I may also refer to the improvement in the short-term money market. In March last we initiated a new development by offering for public tender $15,000,000 of short term treasury bills. Those bill were sold on a 2·85 per cent basis for the three months' maturity and a 3·12 per cent basis for the eight months' maturity, the lowest rates at which the dominion has ever borrowed in this country. I may add that yesterday, after this statement was prepared, we concluded acceptances of offerings for treasury bills to the extent of $15,000,000. Of that amount we borrowed $1,600,000 of the July 1 maturity at a cost of 2·41 per cent, and $13,400,000, being the balance, of the October maturity, at the rate of 2·71 per cent. We hope to continue this practice for our short-term requirements and, particularly when the Bank of Canada is established we anticipate marked improvement in the organization and development of our short-term money market and a more efficient utilization of the funds available therein.

The figures I have given refer to rates at which recent borrowing has been effected or at which our outstanding obligations are currently selling. If we take the interest now being paid on all our direct indebtedness at present outstanding, we find that the average is 4·62 per cent. Eliminating the victory bonds which will mature on November 1 this year and will be converted at I believe a substantially reduced rate during the next few months, eliminating also the 5 and 5½ per cent tax-free issues which will not mature until 1937, and assuming that these war-time issues are replaced by 4 per cent securities (a very modest assumption), this average would be reduced to 4·35 per cent. Even this fairly satisfactory rate will I believe be further reduced during the next few years. That appreciable relief is being obtained through refunding operations is illustrated by the fact that in 1931, before the conversion loan was issued, the average interest paid by the dominion on its outstanding funded debt was practically 5 per cent.

The strength of our investment markets is reflected not only in the rise of bond prices, or which is the same thing, the lowering of interest rates, but also in the volume of new securities purchased by the public. During the last calendar year $345,000,000 of long-term obligations were absorbed by Canadian investors. Of this total $157,000,000 represented new capital. This compares with a total of new bond issues in the United States of only $900,000,000 of which $595,000,000 were for new capital. During the first quarter of this year our investment market has been active and strong. Over $73,000,000 of new government and municipal issues were offered during this period, or nearly four times the amount for the corresponding quarter of 1933. These healthy market conditions are full of promise for the gradual reduction of the interest burden now pressing upon public bodies, by the normal process of converting high-interest-bearing securities into new issues with a lower coupon.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

The statistical presentation of improved conditions in Canada carries greater reassurance when viewed in the light of world economic conditions. For recovery has not been a development unique with us. It has been world wide and its universal character suggests that it must have a basis more fundamental and probably more permanent than would otherwise be the case. It is now clear that in several countries it began as early as the summer of 1932, in the United Kingdom perhaps even earlier, and that in practically all countries the improvement last year was substantial. Though the rate of progress has varied and in some cases the gains have been more consistently held than in others, the movement is so world-wide and generally so similar as to suggest the automatic working of fundamental economic forces.

Although encouraging progress has been made towards world recovery, it would be a mistake to under-estimate the difficulties that have still to be overcome before a full measure of world prosperity can be restored. Unemployment still persists in all countries in distressingly large proportions. International trade remains at a low level. Little, if any, progress has been made in removing the excessive interferences with trade, the arbitrary quotas, the exchange controls, and the other defensive measures which have been devised to meet the dangers of currency depreciation and unfavourable balances of payments. In recent months there has indeed been increased stability in the foreign exchange markets but the integrity of certain currencies continues to hang upon a slender thread. Another period of currency unsettlement with the threat of competitive depreciation must be recognized as a possibility at least and this suggests the desirability of a renewed consideration of the feasibility of concerted effort for de facto stabilization of currencies by the leading countries. I am aware of the difficulties which surround the problem which the world conference found it impossible to solve last summer. But some of these difficulties have been lessened in the intervening months and the need for early action is emphasized when one realizes that little progress can be made in reducing restrictions on international trade as long as currencies continue to fluctuate and the danger of competitive depreciation persists.

On the debit side of the record for the past year we are also compelled to record certain unfavourable political developments—a serious aggravation of political tensions in Europe and the Far East, an increasingly unstable social equilibrium in some important countries, a succession of disappointments in the disarmament negotiations, and a threatened breakdown of the collective system which has been painstakingly built up during the post-war years. It is true that the tension is less serious to-day than it was at the beginning of the year but it remains a deterrent to constructive international cooperation.

As long as these adverse influences continue to operate they must be taken into the reckoning. The fact remains, however, that the low point in the long depression has been reached and passed, that considerable progress has already been made in this and other countries in the restoration of normal conditions, and that present economic trends are in the direction of further progress. This should give solid ground for confidence, if not for undue optimism.

TRADE OF CANADA

Evidence of improving conditions is also found in the statistics of external trade. The declines that have been a feature of world trade in recent years have now, for Canada, been changed to increases, substantial for exports and not inconsiderable for imports. In the twelve months' period ended March 31, last, exports of Canadian produce increased by $105,500,000, or 22 per cent over the same period in the previous year. Imports, advancing less rapidly at first but showing greater gains in recent months, increased by $27,300,000, or 7 per cent. The improvement in aggregate trade was $132,300,000 over the same period last year, or 15 per cent, the total exceeding one billion dollars. The improvement has been on an ascending scale since July and in the last three months imports have increased by 40 per cent and exports by 50 per cent over the same period last year. The preliminary figures for the month of March, which will be released in the course of a few days, show total imports of $47,500,000, an increase of 45 per cent over March of last year. Exports are shown at $58,300,000, which is a gain of 56 per cent.

A statement of the total trade for the fiscal year ended March 31, with comparative figures, follows:

Trade of Canada
(000 omitted)

	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1933	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1934 (preliminary)	Increase

Foreign produce	6,914	6,312	602*
Total	$ 887,098	$1,019,459	$ 132,361

* Decrease.

As exports have advanced, taking the period as a whole, more rapidly than imports, the result is that in the fiscal year ended March 31, the excess of exports over imports amounted to nearly $152,000,000. In other words, Canada has derived from the exchange of commodities with the world at large, a credit balance of $152,000,000, available in the settlement of international balances for such debit items as interest on indebtedness owing abroad and instalments of principal. The favourable balance derived from trade in commodities was double the amount in the previous period.

It should be borne in mind that trade figures are for merchandise only and do not include gold. The exports of non-monetary gold, chiefly the current production of Canadian gold mines, amounted approximately to $90,000,000, based upon the average price obtained upon sale in world markets. This sum is an additional credit in the settlement of international payments.

The following statement shows the balance of trade in merchandise for the past five fiscal years:

The beneficial effects of the empire trade agreements are shown in the expansion of intra-empire trade. In the eleven months' period ended February 28th, the latest date for which figures by countries are available, exports from Canada to the United Kingdom, our largest market, increased by 20 per cent, accounting for more than half of the increased sales abroad. Exports to Australia increased by 54 per cent; to British India by 45 per cent; to British South Africa by 72 per cent and to New Zealand by six per cent. Statistics of the United Kingdom show that whereas in 1931 imports from Canada represented 3·8 per cent of their total purchases from abroad, in 1933 Canadian products represented 6·9 per cent of the total. Prominent among the commodities showing increased exports to the United Kingdom, were planks and boards, apples, meats, copper and other metals, and cattle.

Imports from the United Kingdom have shown an expansion in the eleven months' period of approximately $16,000,000, or 20 per cent. The chief increases were in fibres, textiles and textile products, in iron and its products and coal.

The stimulus which the expansion of trade has brought to Canadian business is illustrated in the renewed activity reported in recent months at our maritime ports. Both freight received from and delivered to connections abroad have shown increases which are very marked and which, in turn, have produced substantial employment at the ports, as well as increased freight for the railways.

Intra-Empire Trade of Canada

	Eleven months ended February 28, 1933	Eleven months ended February 28, 1934
Imports from United Kingdom	$ 79,356,647	$ 95,277,635
Exports to United Kingdom	170,195,271	204,747,312
Imports from British Empire	109,229,815	127,293,776
Exports to British Empire	204,773,851	248,667,773

About one-third of our purchases abroad has been from empire countries. The proportion in 1929 was about one-fifth. The percentage of exports to empire countries showed a further gain, while the proportion taken by non-empire countries declined moderately. It is noteworthy that a somewhat larger proportion of exports was taken by the United States.

A statement showing the distribution of import and export trade, excluding gold coin and bullion, by percentages, follows:

	Imports Eleven months ended February 28		Exports Eleven months ended February 28
	1933	1934	1933	1934
	Per cent		Per cent
United Kingdom	21.25	24.67	38.93	39.25
British Empire	29.25	32.95	46.83	47.66
United States	57.32	54.14	30.37	33.40
Other countries	13.43	12.91	22.80	18.94

These developments in our external trade have been distinctly favourable, reflecting the soundness of the policies which have been pursued in connection with the trade agreements, and testifying to the stability and efficiency of Canadian industry.

The recovery of business in Canada which I have described was reflected in expanding revenues. Unfortunately, however, this expansion did not begin until the second quarter of the fiscal year. While the extreme low point in business activity was reached in February, business continued without noticeable improvement until May. It was not, indeed, until June that the index of physical production in Canada exceeded the figure for the corresponding month of the previous year. There is also always a lag of one or two months between business improvement and the increase in government revenues. In the case of the sales tax, for instance, the taxes applicable to any given month are not received by the Department of Finance until the first few days of the second following month. As a result, the first quarter of the fiscal year showed a substantial loss as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year. By July 8th our collections were down by $16,600,000, despite the additional measures of taxation which were introduced in the last budget. The acceleration of business and the upward movement of prices in the latter part of the year reversed this downward trend. By the end of December the lost ground had been fully recovered and the final accounts will show a total revenue from taxation of some $17,500,000 in excess of the previous year.

The total receipts from taxation were $271,800,000 as compared with $254,300,000 in 1932-33. The budget estimates, after giving effect to the new taxation, anticipated a total tax yield of $305,000,000. The failure to reach the estimated revenue by some $33,000,000 has naturally been disappointing, although we can derive encouragement from the fact that there has been a sustained and gradually increasing improvement in recent months. Had it not been for the low level of business in the first quarter and the lag in revenues—in other words, had we had for a full twelve months' period the revenue volume of the latter part of the year—our expectations would have been fully realized.

Customs

Customs import duties yielded $65,900,000 and remains the largest single source of revenue, although showing a decline from the previous year. Excise duties, levied mainly on liquors and tobaccos, amounted to $35,800,000. The revenue from income tax was $61,400,000, only slightly less than in the preceding year and about the same amount collected in 1931-32. Although based upon lower incomes and profits, the yield from this source has been maintained by reason of the changes in exemptions and rates of taxation, and also as a result of the special tax of 5 per cent on interest and dividends imposed last session. The collections from the latter tax amounted to $4,800,000 in the fiscal year. Here again the receipts did not reach the estimate, due to the elimination of the premium on United States currency.

The sales tax produced $63,000,000 and the other special excise taxes, $43,500,000, these sources combined bringing in $24,300,000 more than in the previous year.

The following table gives a comparative statement of the revenues from taxation in the past five years:

Non-Tax Revenues

Revenues derived from the services of the various departments of government, including Post Office, amounted to $51,700,000, showing a decrease from the previous year of about $550,000. Post Office revenues amounting to $30,500,000 and interest on investments of over $11,000,000, are the important items under this head. On reference to the expenditure statement, it will be found that the operation of the Post Office Department cost $30,800,000, being $300,000 in excess of revenues. As the deficiency in the previous year was $700,000, there was a net betterment in the year of about $400,000. Interest on investments was slightly less than in 1932-33.

A statement of the non-tax revenues, with comparisons for the previous four years, follows:

Ordinary Expenditures

The ordinary expenditures for the year amounted to $347,700,000. It will be understood that as the accounts will not be finally closed until the end of April, the figures of expenditures are preliminary and may vary somewhat from the final amounts. The estimates for 1933-34, including supplementaries and statutory items not printed in the estimates, provided for a total expenditure on ordinary account of $363,700,000. The actual expenditures, therefore, are $16,000,000 less than the amount estimated.

In comparison with the previous year, ordinary expenditures show a reduction of $2,100,000. This result must be considered, however, in the light of the fact that increased expenditures were necessary on certain fixed and uncontrollable obligations. Interest on public debt increased by $4,700,000 and the requirement for Old Age Pensions increased by $1,000,000. Other large expenditures, over and above those of the previous year, included $1,000,000 for the Radio Commission and an increase of $1,500,000 in the amount of the subventions paid on movements of Canadian coal from the mines to centres of consumption.

Capital Expenditures

Capital expenditures, including Hudson Bay railway and terminals, Welland ship canal, St. Lawrence ship channel, and other public works, amounted to $6,500,000, being a decrease of $2,000,000. The estimates provided for an expenditure of $7,100,000 on capital account. The saving, therefore, was $600,000.

A comparative statement of capital expenditures for the five-year period, follows:

Special Expenditures

Special expenditures amounted to $42,900,000, slightly under the figure of a year ago. Included in this amount is $36,000,000 for relief measures. Of this sum $28,500,000 was paid under the Relief Act, 1933, and the balance of $7,500,000 represented commitments carried over from the relief acts of previous years. The expenditure for 1933-34 may be summarized as follows:

Direct relief	$ 25,870,000
Provincial and municipal works and undertakings	2,780,000
Other expenditures, including Dominion projects	7,350,000
	$ 36,000,000

The expenditures made by the dominion on unemployment relief since 1930, have now reached $115,500,000, to which may be added the cost of the wheat bonus in 1931, amounting to $12,700,000 and $2,400,000 advanced for employment in railway shops, a total of $130,600,000.

A comparative statement showing special expenditures under the different heads during the past five years, follows:

Loans to Provinces

Loans were made to the provincial governments under the Relief Act, to a net amount of $12,540,000 after crediting certain repayments. This addition to the loans of $38,200,000 outstanding at the close of the previous fiscal year, brings the total assistance of this nature to the provincial governments, to $50,700,000.

Three provinces, Alberta, Manitoba and British Columbia, received loans in connection with the payment of debt obligations to the public. Alberta borrowed $1,968,000 to meet a debenture maturity of the 1st April, 1934, payable in Canada or New York. Manitoba secured $1,470,000 to meet an obligation due the same date, also payable in Canada or New York. British Columbia received loans of $1,435,000 to meet interest obligations. The other loans related to the financing of the provincial share of relief expenditures or were for the purpose of placing the provinces in funds to assist municipalities to finance their share.

The provinces have paid interest on the loans as payments became due, with the exception of certain loans made to the province of Saskatchewan for relief purposes. This province has not been able to meet the interest from its own resources and has tendered treasury bills in payment.

At the Dominion-Provincial conference held in January last, which was attended by representatives of all the provinces, it was unanimously agreed that the dominion government should give special financial assistance to provinces where conditions warrant.

In granting these loans, our policy has been, as in the two previous years, to limit this form of assistance to the minimum. Each application has been considered having regard to the special situation prevailing, the particular purpose of the loan and the general budgetary position of the borrower on the ordinary services of government. It is submitted that the policy which has been pursued in this respect has been to the general advantage of Canada, considered in the light of the unusual conditions prevailing and as a temporary measure until more normal conditions prevail.

A summary statement showing the loans to the several provinces outstanding at March 31, 1934, and the purposes for which they were granted, follows:

Loans and Advances, Non-Active

Under this head are included amounts paid by way of loan which are treated as non-active and which, being non-interest producing, are considered in the accounts as additions to the net debt. They include the amounts paid in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Steamships, the deficit of the Montreal harbour bridge, and loans to a number of the harbour commissions. The net amount of such loans in the past year was slightly over three million dollars.

For the operation of the Canadian National Steamships, we paid $986,000, made up of $968,000 being the cash deficit on the West Indies Services, and $18,000 being the cash deficit on the operation of the ships remaining in the Merchant Marine fleet. Owing to further reductions in the number of ships operated, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine has found it possible to return to the government an additional one million dollars from the insurance fund which has been accumulated during the operations of the company since 1919. After receiving this amount, the result is a credit of $14,000 for the year on account of Canadian National Steamships.

The amount paid by the dominion government for the operation of the Montreal harbour bridge was $489,000. This represents the loss incurred by the bridge, not including depreciation and after crediting the annual contribution of $150,000 each from the province of Quebec and city of Montreal.

The non-active loans to the harbour commissions at Chicoutimi, Halifax, Quebec, Saint John and Three Rivers for expenditures on capital account, amounted to $1,600,000. Other capital expenditures were incurred by several of the Commissions during the year, special arrangements for financing having been made between the commissions concerned and the contractors, with the approval of the governor in council.

The following statement gives the record of non-active loans and advances for the past five fiscal years:

In addition to the non-active loans to harbour commissions, there were loans of $449,000 to the Montreal commission and $1,208,000 to the Vancouver commission for port developments, and the amount of $19,000 to New Westminster. As interest is received on these loans, they are treated as active assets and are not part of the net debt.

For purposes of record, I include a statement of the advances to harbour commissions in the past five years and of the amounts outstanding at the close of the fiscal year.

Canadian Farm Loan Board

The dominion continued to purchase at par the board's five per cent bonds to the extent that loaning operations required. Bonds purchased amounted to $400,000 and a subscription of $16,243 was made to capital stock. The capital furnished to date from the dominion treasury for the operations of the board aggregates $8,503,358, divided as follows:

Initial capital	$5,050,000
Purchase of bonds	3,000,000
Purchase of capital stock	453,358
	$8,503,358

The board has paid all interest due the government as it accrued.

Canadian National Railways

As the annual report of the trustees of the Canadain National Railway system has shown, railway operating revenues suffered a further decline of $12,500,000, or nearly 8 per cent, in the calendar year 1933. The loss in revenues was almost entirely covered by a saving in operating expenses. However, as the management had made its budget for the year on the basis of the gross earnings of the previous year being substantially maintained, the amount required from the dominion government for the payment of deficits exceeded the estimated figure by $4,300,000. The amount provided by the government and taken into the public accounts as an expenditure in respect of the deficit on the Canadian National Railway system, after payment of interest on obligations in the hands of the public was $58,950,000, a decrease of $1,100,000 from the previous year. The net loss of the system as shown by their accounts, amounted to $97,650,000. The difference between this sum and the contribution of the government above referred to, is made up of $36,000,000 for interest on loans from the government—such interest being accrued in the railway accounts but not actually paid —and $2,600,000 for certain other non-cash items.

The amount paid for deficits is made up of two parts: that for the system, excluding eastern lines, $52,200,000, and that for the eastern lines, $6,600,000. In the dominion accounts of previous years and in the budget statements, it has been the practice to include the loss on the eastern lines under ordinary expenditures. That practice has followed naturally from the days when the government's interest in railway operation was limited to the Intercolonial and other lines known as the Canadian government railways. Last year for the first time, following the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation, the whole railway deficit was taken into the accounts of the dominion as an expenditure, but the portion for the eastern lines was shown under ordinary expenditures and the portion for the rest of the system was shown as a special charge to consolidated fund. For the purpose of clarity in the presentation of the figures, the amount for eastern lines deficit has been excluded this year from ordinary expenditures, and the necessary adjustments have been made in the figures for the previous years in order that the comparisons may not be disturbed. The amount required for railway deficit, including eastern lines, will be found in the summary statement of expenditures under the special category of railway deficits.

There has, of course, been retained under ordinary expenditures the amount involved in the 20 per cent freight rate subsidy authorized by the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

In addition to the provision for deficits, the railway company required $1,900,000 for capital expenditures and $11,300,000 for retirement of debt, these items totalling $13,200,000. Against this sum, the company had $5,000,000 of working capital available, leaving $8,200,000 to be supplied by the government by way of loan. Notwithstanding that the operating results were less favourable than anticipated at the commencement of the year, the company kept within its budget, the additional amount required for deficits having been made up by a saving in capital expenditures.

As at the end of March, 1934, the debt of the Canadian National Railway system outstanding in the hands of the public amounted to $1,253,000,000, having been reduced by $10,000,000 in the past year. Of the amount outstanding, $962,000,000 are obligations guaranteed by the dominion.

During the first three months of the present calendar year, there has been a decided improvement in railway earnings and the net revenues from operations are some $4,000,000 in excess of those of the corresponding period in 1933. The railway budget for 1934 will total $85,800,000. Of this amount, $48,800,000 is the estimated requirement for deficits, and if this result is attained it will mean a lessening of the burden on the dominion treasury as compared with last year, of over $10,000,000. The company will require $4,200,000 for capital expenditures and $32,800,000 for retirement of capital obligations, including sinking fund and equipment principal payments. On September 1, $17,000,000 of Canadian Northern dominion guaranteed 4 per cent debenture stock will fall due.

The following statement summarizes the financial requirements of the Canadian National Railway system in respect of the calendar year 1933, as compared with their budget figures and with the actual requirements in 1932:

Summary of Expenditures

Having dealt with the expenditures for the year under the appropriate headings, it is now possible to present a summary statement of all expenditures for the year, including railway deficits. The total amount is $459,200,000 as compared with $468,726,000 in the previous year, a net reduction of $9,500,000. Actually the statement shows a total expenditure last year of $531,700,000, but it will be remembered that $62,938,000 of this amount represented loans made in previous years to harbour commissions and the Canadian National Railways which were written down from active to non-active assets, and strictly are not assessable against last year's business.

The summary of expenditures for the past five years followed:

*Corresponding figures for operations in the years 1929, 1930 and 1931 were $9,978,000, $28,425,000 and $52,256,000 respectively. In respect of these losses, $2,932,000 was taken into the government accounts as non-active loans in 1929-30, representing the 1929 loss after crediting certain surpluses in previous years. The losses in 1930 and 1931 were financed by loans and/or guarantee of securities. Government loans of $41,121,000 in respect of 1931 operations appear in the above statement under Loans and Advances, Non-Active, for the year 1932-33.

With ordinary expenditures of $347,700,000 and ordinary revenues amounting to $323,600,000, it will be seen that the deficiency on ordinary account was $24,100,000. The comparative figure for the previous fiscal year was $43,200,000. Notwithstanding the failure of the revenues to reach the anticipated figure, it will be observed that on ordinary account a net improvement of $19,100,000 took place.

After taking into consideration capital expenditures and special expenditures, including unemployment relief, less special receipts, it will be found that the deficit for the year on government operations, amounted to $76,300,000. This figure is further enlarged when there are taken into the government accounts the losses on operation of the Canadian National Railway system amounting to $58,900,000. The resulting increase in net debt during the year on all accounts is $135,200,000. The corresponding figure for the previous year was $157,700,000, indicating a betterment of $22,500,000.

Reductions in Expenditures

In view of the interest in the question of the cost of government generally in Canada, it may be appropriate to present some figures briefly analyzing the purposes to which the outlay of the dominion government is applied, and indicating the extent to which, by the various measures of economy which have been adopted, controllable expenditures have been reduced since 1930-31. For the purpose of these comparisons, the extraordinary and fluctuating amounts required for railway deficits and unemployment relief, are excluded from the figures, but all other expenditures of the government are included.

In the year which has just closed, such expenditures totalled $364,000,000. Of this amount, $230,000,000 was required for purposes classed as uncontrollable and $134,000,000 for controllable. In other words, out of every $100 expended $63 went for expenses designated as uncontrollable and $37 for services that are ordinarily regarded as controllable. The main services under uncontrollable are interest on public debt amounting to $139,700,000; war pensions, $41,700,000 and treatment and after-care of returned soldiers, $9,500,000. These three items alone account for 83 per cent of the expenditure included under the category of uncontrollable. There are, in addition provincial subsidies, $15,300,000; old age pensions, $12,500,000, and some minor items which do not add greatly to the total. All other expenditures whether on ordinary or special account, or capital or non-active loans and advances, are included for the purpose of these computations under the heading of controllable.

I should point out that there are included in the latter classification many items of a statutory nature which are not controllable, in the sense of being subject to reduction at the will of the government but they are included in that category because they pertain to the ordinary services of government. I might cite, for example, dry dock subsidies and the similar payments made in connection with the establishment of cold storage warehouses.

As compared with the year 1930-31, the uncontrollable expenditures for 1933-34 were greater by $19,000,000 due mainly to increased charges for interest on public debt and old age pensions.

The controllable expenditures, however, have declined from $217,000,000 to $134,000,000, a reduction of $83,000,000, or over 38 per cent. After allowing for the election expenses of two million dollars in 1930, for which there was no corresponding charge last year, the improvement stands at $81,000,000. This decrease has been brought about by a curtailment of $50,000,000 in ordinary expenditures and a reduction in capital and other expenditures of $31,000,000. To achieve this result, there has necessarily been a rigid scrutiny and control of departmental activities and personnel. From 1930 to 1933, government employees, including fluctuating as well as permanent staffs, were reduced by over 12,000 in number. The saving in salaries and wages exceeds $10,000,000 a year, not including the saving of some $7,800,000 arising out of the 10 per cent salary deduction.

There is further comparison which may be illuminating. In the fiscal year 1913-14, the ordinary controllable expenses of government amounted to $87,000,000, as compared with $123,000,000 last year. While these figures indicate an increase of $36,000,000, in a period of twenty years' growth and development of the country, there are important adjustments to be made to bring them to a comparable basis.

Of the increase of $36,000,000, over $17,000,000 is applicable to the Post Office department, the services of which have necessarily expanded in twenty years. The increased expenditure has been compensated for by a corresponding addition to the revenues and is not a contributing factor to the deficit of the government. Eliminating post office expenditures, the comparable figures become $73,000,000 for 1913-14, as compared with $93,000,000 in 1933-34, an increase of $20,000,000. In the interval, the population of Canada has increased from 7,600,000 to 10,300,000. The cost of maintaining public services has necessarily been influenced by the growth in population, as well as the addition of new services. Yet the actual expenditures to-day on the ordinary controllable services of government are less than they were in 1913-14 considered on a per capita basis. The figures are at $9.60 a head in 1913-14, as compared with $9.03 last year.

In appraising this result, note should be taken of the cost of new services added in the interval. It now costs $5,000,000 more annually to collect the public revenues than in 1913-14, due to the amplification of the taxation system. While the percentage cost of collection is lower, the actual expenditure has naturally been increased. The cost of administering the public debt is included under controllable expenditures and requires about $500,000 more than in 1913-14. Other new items are $1,000,000 for the Radio Commission, $320,000 for radio services, $1,600,000 for the Aviation Branch of the Department of National Defence, $380,000 for National Research Council and $2,750,000 for the movement of Canadian-mined coal. These items alone total $11,000,000. There are other items, such as the cost of operation of the new Welland ship canal, increased expenditures in connection with the grain act, amounting to some $1,300,000, and other expenses such as those arising from improvements in the status of labour, workmen's compensation and the eight-hour day, which have added, and quite properly so, to the cost of certain services.

Viewed in the light of these comparisons with the expenditures of 1913-14, and not desiring to minimize the necessity for the closest scrutiny of the cost of governmental services, particularly in view of the weight of our fixed charges, it does appear that the controllable expenditures have now been reduced to a point from which it will be difficult to effect further substantial savings without curtailment or discontinuance of services which are considered to be essential.

A comparison of the expenditures in the years 1913-14, 1930-31 and 1933-34, divided under the headings controllable and uncontrollable, is shown in the following statement, which also shows the percentages of the total required for the various services.

Loan Flotations

In the past fiscal year, the dominion had securities falling due amounting to $279,900,000. New issues were made for these maturities, as well as for new money which it was required to raise for governmental and railway purposes.

An issue of 4 per cent registered stock dated September 1, 1933, and maturing September 1, 1958, was made in London. The stock is callable on or after September 1, 1953, on giving three months' notice. The issue was offered to the public at 100, yielding 4 per cent. As the dominion had not been a borrower in the London money market for some eighteen years, the response of the investing public was awaited with keen expectation. The issue was an outstanding success, the applications totalling 20,000, representing over £80,000,000. The success of the offering was a tribute to the financial and economic stability of Canada and reacted most favourably on the market position of dominion securities at home and abroad. The stock has risen to a premium and is now selling on a basis to yield less than 3½ per cent. The terms of the issue provided for a sinking fund of one-half of one per cent per annum.

An issue of 4 per cent treasury notes dated July 1, 1933, was made in New York for the purpose of refinancing a like amount of 4 per cent notes due October 1 and called for payment on August 1. The new issue runs for 15 months from July 1, 1933, and is callable on or after 12 months. The issue was sold to the Chase National Bank of New York at a price of 98·875 and accrued interest.

An issue of $50,000,000 of 4½ per cent treasury bills held by the chartered banks of Canada matured August 1, 1933, and provision was made for renewal of this obligation by the issue at par of a similar amount of bills to run for one year, bearing interest at 3⅞ per cent.

Two other issues of treasury bills were made during the year. In May last, $40,000,000 of 3½ per cent treasury bills due in six months were sold to chartered banks at an interest cost to the government of 3¾ per cent. These bills were converted into longer term securities on their maturity in November.

A further sale of treasury bills was made by public tender. The amount of the issue was $15,000,000, dated March 1, 1934, and maturing either June 1, 1934, or November 1, 1934. Of the 3-months' bills $2,450,000 were sold at an average cost to the government of 2·85 per cent and of the 8-months' bills $12,550,000 at an average cost of 3·12 per cent.

On November 1 last, provision had to be made for $169,900,000 of maturing victory loan bonds, the balance remaining outstanding of the 1918 issue. To meet the obligation and provide funds for current purposes, a domestic loan of $225,000,000 was launched. The bonds were dated October 15 and were issued in three maturities: 2-year bonds with interest at 3½ per cent and 6 and 12 year bonds with interest at 4 per cent. The 2-year bonds were offered at 99·50 to yield 3·75 per cent, the 6-year at 99·00 to yield 4·19 per cent, and the 12-year at 96·50 to yield 4·38 per cent. The 12-year bonds were made subject to call, at the option of the government, after 10 years, and the issue price represented the lowest yield basis on which long term dominion securities had ever been offered in the domestic market. By way of inducement to holders of victory loan bonds, a bonus was offered for prompt conversion, and over $139,000,000 of the maturing victory bonds were turned in for exchange. The banks also converted $40,000,000 of 3½ per cent treasury bills sold to them in May. The total cash subscriptions amounted to $76,700,000, of which $45,700,000 was accepted. It is interesting to note that the small investor participated to a large extent in this offering, as out of a total of 22,663 cash subscriptions there were 16,426 from subscribers for amounts of $1,000 or less. In addition, there were many small subscribers who turned in their maturing bonds for the new issue.

The amount issued of 2-year bonds was $89,300,000, of the 6-year maturity $47,200,000, and of the 12-year maturity $88,300,000. The average interest cost on all maturities was 4·17 per cent, after including bonus for prompt conversion and commissions paid to banks and dealers. The expenses of issue, including commissions, advertising, printing, etc., were less than one-half of one per cent.

It is a matter of considerable satisfaction that the year's financing has been carried through so successfully at rates of interest that have been progressively favourable. Over $858,000,000 of war and victory loans bonds have been converted into new securities since 1930 in connection with which there has been a saving in interest in excess of $9,000,000 a year.

The direct obligations of the dominion in the form of unmatured funded debt and treasury bills are listed in the following statement:

Indirect Liabilities

Bonds outstanding at March 31, 1934, bearing the guarantee of the government of Canada, amounted to $993,000,000, having been reduced by approximately $3,000,000, in the year.

During the year some further contingent liabilities were assumed, under the authority of the Relief Act. In June last, 5 per cent treasury bills of the provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba were guaranteed to the amounts of $626,533 and $5,894,127, respectively, in order to enable these provinces to raise monies required for the payment of obligations due in New York. Also in the month of June last, two guarantees were given in connection with the production of 30,000 tons of steel rails by the Algoma Steel Corporation and 50,000 tons of steel rails by the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, both orders being for the Canadian National Railways. The guarantee of the dominion is limited to $660,000 in the case of the Algoma order and $1,100,000 in the Dominion Steel and Coal order. The amount of the guarantee represents approximately one-half of the amount involved in the purchase and is related to that portion of the cost represented by wages and materials that had to be bought. The government also undertook to pay interest at 5 per cent on the amount of the guaranteed advances until the rails are delivered.

For the purpose of enabling the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to meet capital obligations and indebtedness, payable partly in Canada and partly in the United States, the dominion guaranteed advances and interest thereon to the amount of $60,000,000 obtained by the company from Canadian chartered banks. In view of existing conditions, the company found itself unable to make a public issue of securities in the markets in which such financing would ordinarily have been done. The bank loans are secured by $100,000,000 par value of Canadian Pacific Railway Company 4 per cent perpetual consolidated debenture stock.

Reference has been made in the previous budgets to the assistance given by way of guarantee to western wheat marketing agencies. It may be observed that in connection with the marketing of the 1931 and 1932 crops, the advances which were obtained by the pools in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, under guarantee of the dominion, were repaid and no liability was incurred by the government. In 1933, the marketing agencies were able to finance their operations without government assistance. An order in council passed in April last under the Relief Act, 1933, continued the guarantee given to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, in respect of advances obtained for the marketing of the 1930 crop and the purchase of grain contracts made and to be made in order to secure the advantageous sale of wheat under their control. In so far as the latter guarantee is concerned, it will all depend, as stated before, upon the world wheat situation and the course of wheat prices as to whether there will be any ultimate loss to the dominion treasury as a result of this guarantee. It is fairly generally recognized, however, that the assistance which has been given in this direction has been of material advantage to wheat producers in particular and to the country as a whole, as otherwise the selling pressure at certain periods of the year, without some stabilizing influence in the market, would undoubtedly have resulted in harmful and depressing fluctuations in grain prices.

The guarantee authorized in 1932 in respect of bank advances of $15,538,500 to the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, was amended slightly to accord with the reorganization of the capital structure of this company. Recently a public issue was made of a portion of the first mortgage bonds securing the guaranteed bank advances, and as a result the amount of the guaranteed advances outstanding will be reduced by about one-half.

The guarantees given under the relief acts, as at March 31, 1934, amounted to $93,296,000, apart from those relating to wheat which are not for a stated sum and fluctuate from day to day. The list is as follows:

Ways and Means, 1934-35

With higher prices and expanding volume of business, the outlook for the revenues in the current fiscal year is distinctly favourable. A substantially increased income over the past year is assured even with only a maintenance of the gains already made and there are indications that the upward movement is being continued. The collections in the first two weeks of April have been most reassuring. As the ordinary expenses of government have been kept closely to the amount disbursed last year, and as there is ground for expecting a substantial reduction in the requirements for unemployment relief and railway deficits, it seems reasonably clear that we can anticipate a greatly improved budget position without adding to the existing rates of taxation. The taxation proposals therefore are not extensive.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Income Tax

No changes will be made in the schedules of income tax rates and exemptions. The five per cent tax on interest and dividends will be retained for another year. The Income War Tax Act, however, will be subject to a number of minor amendments, designed primarily to remove existing inequalities in its application.

Sales Tax

There are a few, but very few, alterations proposed in the various taxes at present levied under the Special War Revenue Act. I shall now enumerate these, commenting very briefly where any particular item calls for explanation.

It is not proposed to make any change in the rate of sales tax nor to alter materially the existing schedule of exemptions from this tax. There will be transferred to the exempt list bakers' cake and pies, certain sugar bush equipment, and milk albumen used exclusively in the production of animal or poultry feed. Otherwise the sales tax will remain unaltered.

Excise Taxes

With respect to excise taxes (apart from the changes to be mentioned in connection with beer and some of its ingredients which are in future to be dealt with under the Excise Act), the following changes are to be made. The present tax on sugar will be reduced to one cent a pound. Glucose and grape sugar, except when used in the manufacture of leather and artificial silk, will in future bear the rate of one-half cent a pound. These changes in the tax on sugar will become effective as of July first. On sparkling wines the tax will be reduced to seventy-five cents a gallon. The tax on cigarette tubes imported into or manufactured in Canada will be reduced from four to three cents a hundred tubes.

With respect to all imports under the British preferential tariff, the special excise tax will be reduced by one half, that is from three to one and one-half per cent. The reduction will also apply to certain commodities which under empire agreements enter Canada at lower rates of duty than those obtaining under the British preference.

The stamp tax on postal notes issued in the amount of $1 and under is to be reduced to one cent.

Tax on Gold

To replace the revenue lost by the reduction in the tax on sugar, it is proposed to levy a tax of ten per cent on gold. In this connection one must keep in mind the fact that since our abandonment of the gold standard, the price of gold in Canadian currency has risen from $20.67 an ounce to approximately $35. This is an increase in the selling price of the product of our gold mines of about seventy per cent. Furthermore, the extraordinary increase in the profits which accordingly accrue to gold producers finds its origin in circumstances entirely external to this particular industry. That is to say, the reason for this increase in price is to be found in the chaotic conditions of world currencies, the depreciation of our dollar in the foreign exchanges and the devaluation of gold by certain countries.

The proposed ten per cent tax will be deducted from the proceeds of all gold deposited at the mint for sale. On such gold as is unacceptable for treatment at the mint and is exported, the tax shall be collected under regulations to be made by the governor in council. In order that the tax shall not apply when the conditions giving rise to these fortuitous gains accruing to gold producers have to a degree disappeared, it is provided that the tax shall not operate to reduce the amount paid for gold below $30 an ounce in Canadian currency. In view of the tax the present handling charge incidental to the disposal and sale of the gold will be discontinued.

In announcing this tax, it is perhaps expedient that I suggest in advance a partial view of the circumstances which I believe make this form of tax more desirable than any alternative form which suggests itself, such as, for example, an excess profits tax on gold producers. This aspect of the matter has received the most careful consideration and we are convinced that whilst a tax designed to reach excess profits has certain advantages, the form of the tax as proposed is, on balance, best adapted to meet our particular situation.

For example, you are aware that many of our mines in Canada in the process of producing gold, produce other metals as well, and that in some other mines where base metals are the major products, considerable gold is recovered in the process. The difficulty which would arise in such cases in the levying of an excess profits tax would be that of determining for taxation purposes the profits due to the increase in the price of gold. The proposed tax avoids this difficulty. It may also be emphasized that the tax will be extremely simple in administration and can be collected with a minimum of cost. An excess profits tax, on the other hand, would necessarily be more complex and would involve additional expense and administrative machinery. Furthermore, the present tax will immediately return substantial revenue, while a tax on profits, unless made retroactive, would not provide additional revenue for the current year.

Against the contention that the proposed tax will injure the gold mining industry, it can be asserted that little if any of our production is obtained at present on such a narrow margin of profit as to be vitally affected by the proposed tax. Also, there is reason to believe that many of the recently discovered bodies of ore are such that profits would be realized even if the price of gold were at the usual $20.67 level, the price under which, I may point out, we attained the position of second largest gold producing country in the world.

Finally, it is believed there can be no legitimate objection to a tax which will operate merely to establish a market price for gold of approximately $31.50 an ounce fine under present conditions, especially when it is remembered that the average price received by our gold producers during the last calendar year was only $28.72 an ounce. This was a year, as you are aware, of great prosperity in the industry and of intense activity in the exploration and development of gold mining properties.

Excise Duties

The principal change in connection with excise duties is a consolidation of the existing duty of three cents a pound on malt and the gallonage tax of twelve and one-half cents on beer now levied under the Special War Revenue Act, into a single excise duty of seven and one-half cents a pound on malt.

While this change will result in a slight reduction in the rate of taxation to which beer is directly or indirectly subject, if calculated on a gallonage basis, it is believed that the total revenue forthcoming will at least equal that currently obtained from malt and beer. The new method of administration will assure not only more economical but also more certain collection of the tax. Furthermore, since the duty is to be levied on the malt alone, the time of payment will be advanced and the revenue secured before the malt goes into production.

In accordance with the above-mentioned change the existing duty on beer or fermented beverages made from substances other than malt has been increased by the appropriate amount and the excise tax on beer imported becomes an excise duty. The existing tax of twenty cents a pound on malt syrup is to be reduced to seventeen cents to allow for the increase in the duty on the malt used in its production and will be levied as an excise duty. In view of the increase in the duty on malt the existing tax on sweet wort is to be repealed. These changes in excise duties become effective July 1.

Customs Tariff

Amendments to the Customs Tariff are relatively few in number, but not without interest, and are summarized as follows:

Reduction under all tariffs	24
Reductions under British preferential tariff only	15
Reductions under intermediate and general tariffs only	13
Increases under intermediate and/or general tariffs	2
Increases under all tariffs	1
Clarification of wording	17
	72

Items of major commercial importance on which reductions are confined to the British preferential tariff include jute yarns, wide steel plate, salt cake, crude oil not in its natural state, impregnated canvas and spun yarns of artificial silk.

Numerous chemical commodities are returned to the free list, the more important of these being gum amber, aluminum leaf, flotation reagents, ingredients of synthetic resins and synthetic kryolite.

The solitary instance of upward revision under all tariffs is that of jute twines, the proposed rates being the result of an inquiry by the tariff board.

Duties are imposed, under the intermediate and general tariffs, on crude peanut oil and are increased on certain ferro-alloys. The former action provides an empire preference contemplated by the imperial economic conference but not hitherto made effective; the latter is intended to protect an important Canadian key industry, the only one of its kind in the dominion, against the questionable commercial practices of certain European producers.

The drawback of duty hitherto granted on imported bituminous coal, used in the production of coke in by-product recovery coke ovens, has been widened in terms to cover coke "produced by any method," with the amount of drawback for the entire item reduced from ninety-nine to fifty per cent.

Tariff Board

Since its inception in the early part of last summer, the tariff board, under Part I of The Tariff Board Act, has reported to Parliament upon eleven references made to it by the Minister of Finance. The subject matter of these reports is as follows: salt cake, impregnated canvas, jewellery findings, glass bases for imitation pearls, firearms and parts, button blanks, sailcloth of Egyptian cotton, jute yarns and twines, collodion bronze powders and telegage liquid. As respects all but the three last named, the Board's reports are directly reflected in several of the tariff proposals being announced today. These reports will be tabled forthwith. In addition, the tariff board has prepared an interim report on the wool reference, which arose out of an application by the British producers of woollen goods. The latter report will be tabled shortly.

Following representations by His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, this government contemplates action by order in council whereby the British content requirement shall be reduced from one-half to one-quarter, in respect of a wide range of chemicals, drugs, and chemical commodities.

It is estimated that the total revenue for the current fiscal year, after giving effect to the changes which have been enumerated, will amount to $360,000,000, made up as follows:

Taxation revenue:
Customs duties	$ 78,000,000
Excise duties	40,000,000
Income tax	61,000,000
Sales tax	72,000,000
Manufacturers', stamp, importation and other special taxes	55,000,000
	$306,000,000
Non-tax revenue:
Post office	$ 32,000,000
Interest on investments	11,300,000
Other sources	10,700,000

The ordinary expenditures for 1934-35 are estimated at $351,200,000. The anticipated revenue, therefore, will provide fully for these expenditures and leave a surplus of $8,800,000 to apply on capital and extraordinary expenditures.

While the demands upon the treasury have not permitted any general lowering of the rate of taxation, it is felt that the reductions, remissions and adjustments already outlined will have the effect of easing the burden in those cases where it has borne most heavily, and that the single increase in taxation will not result in undue, if any, hardship.

Thoughtful observers have with one voice expressed the opinion that the process of recovery from this unprecedentedly severe and prolonged depression would be gradual. Indeed, it may be fairly asserted that too rapid recovery would present the danger of an unhealthy reaction, and that we would be far better off in the long run if improving conditions should conform to the truth of the old adage, "slow, but sure."

At the same time, while the improvement has been gradual, it has not only been sustained but has progressively increased. This is evidenced by the splendid increases in both imports and exports for the month of March, which show a proportionate advance in volume of trade hitherto unprecedented.

It is generally recognized that this depression and its blighting effects have been world wide. This fact of itself has had the tendency to produce a "depression psychology," followed by what might be termed a "depression weariness." The result is that we do not so readily recognize and properly appraise the incontrovertible evidences of reviving activity which have made their appearance.

These signs of improvements are so marked as to indicate beyond question that we are on the road to recovery. May we with renewed hope, fresh courage and firm step press on towards the goal of better and happier days which lie not far ahead.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. Speaker, I beg to give notice that when we are in committee of Ways and Means I will move the following resolutions:

Income War Tax Act

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:—

1. That income shall include rents, royalties, reservations and other like considerations which fluctuate according to the production from or the use of the property leased or sold.

2. That companies exempt from taxation under section four, paragraph (k) of the act shall not be exempt if they fail to file, without reasonable cause therefor, within four months from the close of their fiscal period an annual return on the form prescribed, and at the same time pay a filing fee of one hundred dollars.

3. That the exemption of $1,000 heretofore afforded a trustee accumulating income in trust for the benefit of unascertained persons or of persons with contingent interests shall be abolished.

4. That interest, dividends, rents, royalties, annuities and other periodical payments received by executors and administrators of a deceased person shall be apportioned as if accruing from day to day and that portion accrued to the date of death shall be taxed as income of the deceased.

5. That the amounts paid by an estate or trust for the upkeep, maintenance and taxes of any property which under the terms of the will or trust in question are required to be maintained for the use of life beneficiaries shall be taxable as income of such beneficiaries.

6. That where any of the shares of a personal corporation are held by a non-resident shareholder, the company shall be taxable at the corporate rates of tax on such shareholder's proportionate interest in the income of the personal corporation.

7. That income from assets transferred directly or indirectly by a taxpayer to minors shall continue to be taxed as the income of the taxpayer transferring the assets.

8. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the 1933 taxation period and to be applicable thereto and to the fiscal periods ending therein, and to all subsequent periods.

Special War Revenue Act

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the revised statutes of 1927, and amendments thereto, and to provide as follows:

1. That the excise tax imposed by section eighty and schedule II of the said act on the following items be repealed, namely:

Ale, beer, porter and stout;

Unfermented wort (sweet wort) suitable for the brewing of beer, (as imposed by section twenty-seven of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1932-33);

Malt syrup, or malt syrup powder, extracts of malt, fluid or not, or any other malt product suitable for the brewing of beer, (as imposed by said section twenty-seven).

(To be replaced by excise duties).

2. That said Schedule II, as enacted by section twenty-seven of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1932-33, be further amended by striking thereout items (i) and (ii) and substituting the following:

(i) Materials enumerated in customs tariff items 134, 135, 135 (a), 135 (b), 139 (except glucose and grape sugar) 140 (except molasses); invert sugar and syrup, 1c. per pound;

(ii) Glucose and grape sugar (except when for use exclusively in the manufacture of leather and artificial silk), ½c. per pound.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

3. That schedule III to the said Act, being the list of articles exempted from the consumption or sales tax, as enacted by section twenty-eight of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1932-33, be amended as follows:

(a) by deleting the words "when produced by any one manufacturer or producer to the value of not more than three thousand dollars in any one calendar year" where they appear after the words "bakers' cake and pies" at the end of the second paragraph of said schedule and by substituting the words "not to include biscuits, cookies or other similar articles";

(b) by adding to the said schedule the following:

Sap spouts and sap buckets, evaporators and complete parts therefor, when for use exclusively in the production of maple syrup;

Milk albumen, when for use exclusively in the production of animal or poultry feeds.

4. That schedule V to the said act, as enacted by section thirty of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1932-33, containing list of exemptions from special excise tax imposed by section eighty-eight of the said act, as enacted by section twelve of chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1932, be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Articles enumerated in customs tariff item 352 (a)".

5. That subsection one of section seventy of the said act, as enacted by section ten of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1932-33, be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

70. (1) No postal note shall be issued under the provisions of The Post Office Act unless there is affixed thereto a postage stamp of the value of:

(i) one cent if the amount of money for which the postal note is issued is not more than one dollar;

(ii) three cents if the amount of money for which the postal note is issued exceeds one dollar; to be paid for by the purchaser of the note.

6. That subsection two of section seventy-seven A, as enacted by section twelve of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1932-33, be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

77A. (2) Except as hereinafter provided, every manufacturer and every importer of cigarette paper tubes shall affix to every package of cigarette paper tubes manufactured by him or imported by him into Canada, an excise stamp of the value of three cents for each one hundred cigarette paper tubes or fraction of one hundred cigarette paper tubes contained in such package.

7. That subsection one of section eighty-three of the said act be amended by repealing paragraph (b) and substituting the following:

(b) a tax of seventy-five cents per gallon on champagne and all other sparkling wines.

8. That section eighty-eight of the said act, as enacted by section twelve of chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1932, be amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, further, that the said tax be at the rate of one and one-half per cent on all goods imported into Canada entitled to the benefit of the British preferential tariff or any lower tariff.

9. That there shall be imposed, levied and collected a tax of ten per centum on the value of gold deposited for sale at the Royal Canadian Mint, such value to be an amount calculated under regulations to be made by the governor in council on the basis of the sale price of gold in the world market converted into Canadian currency at the prevailing rates of exchange, the amount of the tax to be deducted from the value so determined before final settlement is made by the Mint with the depositor.

10. That it shall be unlawful for any producer of gold from natural deposits in Canada to dispose of the same in quantities exceeding five ounces fine in any one week except by depositing it with the Royal Canadian Mint or the Dominion of Canada Assay Office, Vancouver, if such gold is in a form acceptable under the regulations for the receipt of gold bullion at the Royal Canadian Mint and that penalties be provided for violation of this provision.

11. That no charges, except the charges imposed by the regulations for the receipt of gold bullion at the Royal Canadian Mint, shall be made by the Mint in respect of any gold subject to the said tax.

12. That all gold exported in the form of ore, concentrates, or base bullion and all gold in manufacturers' sweeps so exported shall be subject to a like tax, under regulations to be made by the governor in council.

13. That the said tax shall not operate so as to reduce the amount payable to the depositor or exporter below thirty dollars per ounce fine in currency of Canada.

14. That any enactment founded on paragraphs one and two of this resolution shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

15. That any enactment founded on paragraphs three, four and five of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the nineteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

16. That any enactment founded on paragraphs six, seven and eight of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the nineteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four, and to have applied to all goods mentioned therein imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for consumption for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

17. That any enactment founded on paragraphs nine to thirteen, inclusive, of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the nineteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act, being chapter sixty of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and amendments thereto, and to provide:

1. That the excise duty on malt be increased as follows:

(a) On screened malt (malt from which the coomings have been removed), manufactured in Canada subject to excise regulations with respect to absorption of moisture in warehouse, from three cents per pound to seven and one-half cents per pound;

(b) On malt imported into Canada and warehoused, from three cents per pound to seven and one-half cents per pound;

(c) On malt imported into Canada, crushed or ground, from five cents per pound to nine and one-half cents per pound; thereby consolidating as a single duty of excise the duties of excise now imposed upon malt used in the brewing of beer and the gallonage tax imposed under the Special War Revenue Act at the rate of twelve and one-half cents per gallon upon the beer itself, the said gallonage tax to be repealed by an amendment to the Special War Revenue Act.

All duty-paid malt on hand in any premises subject to excise on the day this act comes into force to be subject to the difference between the rate already paid and that hereby imposed.

2. (a) That the existing duty imposed on beer or any fermented beverage made in imitation thereof, brewed in whole or in part from any other substance than malt, be increased from fifteen cents per gallon to twenty-five cents per gallon, thereby maintaining the differential rate of duty between beer brewed by the use of malt and beer brewed by the use of other substances and combining with the said excise duty the gallonage tax imposed upon such liquor under the Special War Revenue Act.

(b) That an excise duty be imposed on all beer imported into Canada and taken out of bond for consumption at the rate of twelve and one-half cents per gallon, to replace the excise tax imposed at the same rate under the Special War Revenue Act.

(c) That an excise duty be levied upon all beer brewed from duty-paid malt in storage at the time of the coming into force of this Act at the rate of ten cents per gallon.

3. That an excise duty be levied upon all unfermented wort (sweet wort) suitable for the brewing of beer in storage and unsold at the coming into force of this act, at the rate of ten cents per gallon, thereby equalizing the duty to be levied upon such sweet wort with the duty to be levied upon the malt entering into the production of sweet wort produced after the coming into force of the increased duty on malt hereby proposed; the tax imposed upon such wort under the Special War Revenue Act to be repealed.

4. That excise duties be levied on all malt syrup suitable for the brewing of beer at the following rates:

(a) When manufactured or produced in Canada prior to the coming into force of this act, per pound twenty cents;

(b) When manufactured or produced in Canada after the coming into force of this act, per pound seventeen cents;

(c) When imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse after the coming into force of this act, per pound twenty cents;

the above duties to replace the existing tax imposed by the Special War Revenue Act at the rate of twenty cents per pound, the reduction under (b) being to compensate for the increased duty on malt which enters into the production of such syrup.

5. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

RESOLUTIONS TO AMEND THE CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, That the Customs Tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter thirty-nine of the Acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the Acts of 1930 (first session), chapter three of the Acts of 1930 (second session), chapter thirty of the Acts of 1931, and chapters six and thirty-seven of the Acts of 1932-33, be further amended by striking thereout paragraph (j) of subsection (1) of section 2 thereof and by substituting therefor the following:

(j) "Proof", "proof spirit" or "proof spirits", means any spirit having the strength of proof by Sikes' hydrometer, that is, spirit which at the temperature of fifty-one degrees Fahrenheit weighs exactly twelve-thirteenths of the weight of an equal measure of distilled water at the same temperature.

2. Resolved, That the aforesaid customs tariff be further amended by adding to section 5 thereof the following subsection:

(5) In computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom, the value for duty shall not include the amount of the customs duty payable on tea for consumption in the United Kingdom.

3. Resolved, That schedule A to the Customs Tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter seventeen of the Acts of 1928, chapter thirty-nine of the Acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the Acts of 1930 (first session), chapter three of the Acts of 1930 (second session), chapter thirty of the Acts of 1931, chapter forty-one of the Acts of 1932, and chapters six and thirty-seven of the Acts of 1932-33, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 99e, 180, 187, 203b, 207, 208e, 208g, 208u, 210d, 210e, 219(ii), 242, 254, 267b, 278b, 278d, 294, 334, 339a, 353, 353a, 370, 375, 380, 392a, 409e (ii), 410d, 412, 414b, 445j, 471a, 472, 475, 511, 537, 537a, 551c, 651, 651a, 685, 709, 733, 811, 815, the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

MARKETING ACT

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort), for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the first speaker after the delivery of the budget undoubtedly suffers some handicap and possibly what I have to say may seem to be somewhat of an anticlimax after the important matters that have been dealt with by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). I hope, however, I shall be able to present arguments that may be of some interest why this marketing bill should not meet with the approval of the house.

When I moved the adjournment of the debate last night I had been discussing some of the reasons our cooperative institutions had failed. I was led to do that because of certain remarks that had been made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) in introducing the bill. But despite some apparent failures of cooperatives, I believe there is still hope for carrying on the business of the country and marketing our agricultural produce by means of our cooperative organizations. I was rather surprised at the admission made by the Minister of Agriculture when, although he said that he favoured cooperative institutions, he made this statement:

> I personally believe that in large measure the organized trade, trained as it is in the specialized business of getting the product from the producer to the consumer, is the best and cheapest method of carrying on the business.

In view of the minister's statement that he favoured the carrying on of business through our cooperative institutions, I was surprised that he should have made such an admission. I believe we have some outstanding examples of successful businesses being carried on through our cooperative institutions. I might refer to such companies as the Saskatchewan Cooperative Elevator Company and the United Grain Growers, to my mind two companies that were an outstanding success in rendering service to the grain producer.

It would be very interesting, if we had time, to review the history of those two companies and to show that they were able to function with the minimum of government support. The United Grain Growers which began business as the Grain Growers' Grain Company was entirely voluntary in its organization. It was able to carry on its work and to succeed in spite of the keenest opposition that was offered to it by the railway companies, the grain trade, the banks, and, I must say, some members of this house. I was not in parliament then but I had the privilege of reading Hansard and I recall some of the opposition that was voiced against that company, an opposition led by no less a man than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). Just look at the debates that took place in the house in the year 1920 and see the attitude of that minister toward that great company at that time. The Saskatchewan Cooperative Elevator Company came on the ground somewhat later. Unfortunately it was killed, one reason being, as I pointed out last night, a disposition to pull down something already established and to put something else in its place. The same forces tried to kill the United Grain Growers, but fortunately they were not successful. Those two companies from their very inception had the advantage of being controlled by sound business men, the United Grain Growers first by the Hon. Thomas Crerar and later by Mr. R. S. Law; the Saskatchewan Cooperative Elevator Company by such an outstanding business man as Mr. C. H. Dunning, followed by Mr. Fred. Riddell. I shall, however, not have time to deal with those companies at any length except to say that they were under good business management and were conducted according to sound business principles.

To come to the bill, I am asked what my objections are to it. My objection is that it proposes to set up a bureaucracy that would undertake to regulate the production and marketing of agricultural products. It proposes to give to the minister, acting only under an order in council without any reference to parliament, power to step in and take control of the marketing of any product he sees fit. If there is any doubt on that question let us turn to clause 9 of the bill which has already been read by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). That clause gives to a minister, whoever he may be, power to step in and take under his control the marketing of any product. This to my mind is the most obnoxious feature of the bill; it takes control entirely away from parliament. We are asked to deliver over to a minister and to certain boards that may be set up entire control of the marketing of agricultural products. Are we not going too far in this direction, taking away from parliament the control that ought to rest in it? I am quite willing to admit that in time of emergency a government may seek power to act during the recess, power which under ordinary circumstances they would not seek. But such power should be reduced to the absolute minimum and in such a case as this nobody will contend that there is an emergency or that there is any reason parliament should divest itself of authority and hand those powers over to a minister or to boards that are set up under this legislation.

But we have been told by those who defend this bill that those powers may not be exercised by the government. All I can say is that no government has a right to ask and no parliament has a right to grant powers that may not be exercised. No doubt this bill will receive the approval of those who have the mania for planning, who labour under the delusion that all activities of agriculture can be made to fit into a plan. To them that term "planned economy" has a very pleasing and comforting sound, it is like the old lady who said the blessed word "Mesopotamia" gave her great comfort. So this idea of planned economy is a very pleasing thought to certain members of this house and to large numbers of people outside. But I think they should give some thought to the question of just how far a planned economy is workable; to plan simply for the sake of planning is not likely to accomplish anything.

This bill has been declared to be a simple bill. Now simple and complex are relative terms. I suppose the binomial theorem is a simple matter to those who are experts in higher mathematics, but it is a very complex matter to those of us whose mathematics do not go beyond the multiplication table. To some the Einstein theory may be simple, but I think that most members of this house would admit that they understand little about it. So as to this being a simple measure I would say that on the contrary it is a very complex one.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is simply appalling.

Mr. BROWN: I am inclined to think, on the other hand, that simplicity would not commend it to the minds of many who seem to see virtue in a thing in proportion to its complexity. There is a disposition to refuse to take simple and obvious means of correcting some of our difficulties, and to seek an elaborate plan. I am reminded of one of Mark Twain's stories, the incident told, I think, in Huckleberry Finn. It may be remembered that Jim, the slave, had been apprehended and locked up in a shanty because he was thought to be a runaway. Tom Sawyer comes on the scene. The fact was that Jim was not a runaway slave, he had already gained his freedom, but Tom Sawyer had a flair for the dramatic and he could not rest satisfied with merely letting it be known that Jim was a free man and not a runaway, so he had to devise some dramatic and elaborate means for securing Jim's escape. I often think that some of our legislators are like Tom Sawyer in that respect.

The minister has given as one reason for supporting this bill the desirability of securing a high class product. We are all agreed that we should have a grading system that will secure a high class product, but we do not need this bill to accomplish that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear. Nothing to do with it.

Mr. BROWN: We have already established means for the grading of our agricultural products, and I think the Minister of Agriculture, as well as the former minister, will agree that I for my part, and I believe nearly all the members of this house, have given all possible encouragement to the grading system. The only opposition I have heard to grading agricultural products has come from the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) and some Tory members from eastern Canada. This bill is not needed to encourage the production of high class products. But when it comes to regulating the production and marketing of our products it is an entirely different matter. This bill proposes to put into the hands of certain boards the power to do two things; or at least to confer upon them the right to attempt to do certain things which I do not believe any man or group of men can possibly do. Those two things are, first to decide equitably as between man and man, community and community and province and province the amount of goods that each shall put on the market. I see there the possibility of great friction, the possibility of difference arising between the provinces that may strain the bonds of confederation. Let us suppose for a moment that the apple growers of British Columbia view a certain course of action as being in their interest, the apple growers of Ontario take another view, and the apple growers of Nova Scotia still another. Let us suppose that they all want to get into the prairie market. As a consumer of fruit on the prairies I want to see that we can get the kind of apples we want. Yet this board which is to be brought into existence is to have the power to say that British Columbia apples can go to such and such a place, Ontario apples to another place and Nova Scotia apples to another place. It may be just a prejudice but it is an idea that is strongly held on the prairies, especially among those who came from old Ontario, that Ontario apples are just a little better than British Columbia apples.

Mr. BENNETT: What about Nova Scotia apples?

Mr. BROWN: I have not had the privilege of eating many Nova Scotia apples! There was one year in which they came west, and we would be very glad to have the privilege of buying Nova Scotia apples if we find them better than other apples. But under this bill there is the possibility of this board thinking it its duty to attempt to regulate the direction in which apples from these various communities shall go. To my mind that power is fraught with great danger. Then this bill proposes to give to these boards power to regulate the amount that each shall produce and the amount that each shall market. Think of the difficulties involved in that proposition. There is a proposal to-day that each farmer shall be allowed a quota of wheat. What is the first difficulty that arises? Some farmers have not had a crop for four or five years, others have perhaps had fairly good crops continuously, others again have not had a crop for three years, two years or one year. The first thing the board which undertakes to work out this quota equitably comes up against is the question, how is it going to treat the man who has had no crop for four or five years but who may possibly have a good crop this coming year? Is he to be on the same basis as the man who has had good crops continuously? Then when they come to decide what goods shall be held off the market and what shall be allowed to go on the market, there is another difficulty. The Minister of Agriculture knows perfectly well that in the raising of hogs there is a certain point at which the hogs must be marketed, otherwise they are kept at a loss. Who is going to pay that loss? It has been suggested that it may be borne by a pool. But these matters lead to such complication that I do not think it would be possible for this or any government or any board that could be set up to deal with the matter equitably.

The minister mentioned the possibility of the poor veal calf not reaching the market in proper time. If there is one pathetic thing in the handling of live stock it is to hear a calf which has been taken away from its mother bawling in the stock yards. But this bill does not deal with that matter. It does not offer the slightest suggestion as to how the misfortunes or the sufferings of the calf may be relieved. There is no such suggestion in the bill.

When we come to the production of agricultural products we find that the difficulties of control are infinitely greater. Who will undertake to say what the harvest next fall will be from the crop being sown this spring? Who will undertake to determine accurately how much of any given product each man will produce. Whether the production be through the assignment of a quota or a reduction of acreage it will take an army of men to see that these regulations, whatever they may be, are put into effect. Even then, taking into account the uncertainties of the weather, the possibility of hail storms, drought and grasshoppers, and the further possibility that one man may be a better farmer than another, who will undertake to decide between these men, on an equitable basis?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. BROWN: I think I have not. I had twenty-five minutes left.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The hon. member spoke only ten minutes last night.

Mr. GOTT: It does not matter; go ahead.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Go ahead.

Mr. BENNETT: You are not the timekeeper.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): By unanimous consent the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. BENNETT: It is so seldom that we hear the hon. member I suggest that he be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BROWN: Let us suppose that I have a flock of sheep. All hon. members know that some sheep are very prolific while others are not. One ewe may produce one lamb, others may produce two, and others may have triplets. That is a matter beyond the regulation of mankind. What are we to do with the excess numbers? Are we to kill them? Then, the Minister of Agriculture knows perfectly well the uncertainties in connection with the rearing of little pigs. These are some matters beyond our control.

I do not wish to trespass unduly, but I should like to conclude with only one remark. Perhaps the most obnoxious part of the bill appears at page 3. It is as follows:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power—
> (g) to require full information relating to the production and marketing of the natural product from all persons engaged therein and to require periodic returns to be made by such persons, and inspect the books and premises of such persons.

I do not believe our farmers are prepared to submit to such legislation as that. In that connection may I read a short letter written by a farmer to the Winnipeg Free Press:

Eighty miles north of Carlyle there is an Indian reserve. An agent and a farm instructor tell the Indians what to do and how, when and why to do it.

They are told what to plant and how and where to plant it. If they have something to sell they must secure a permit from the agent. If they are short of funds the agent may give them an order for goods on the local store and later he will sell their produce to foot the bill.

How about the farmer under the new marketing Act? Well, he is placed squarely on the "Indian list." If the government chooses to take the farmer—and why should it be embodied in the act if they never intend to use it—every thing I have described as applying to the Indian, will apply to the farmer.

He will not be allowed to raise a chicken, cow or pig or sell a bushel of wheat or a dozen of eggs without a permit from some government agent.

Are the farmers of western Canada going to stand for that kind of treatment? If they do then we can come to but one conclusion, that the government is fully justified in putting them on the "Indian list."

G. W. Stockton.

Carlyle, Sask., April 10, 1934.

I am prepared to go a certain distance to meet a situation such as has developed in British Columbia in connection with fruit. Recognizing as I do the rights of majority control, I am prepared to go some distance in that regard, although I do not like to interfere with personal liberty. In view of the situation which has developed in that province, if by a large majority the fruit growers are willing to do certain things and they obtain the sanction of the provincial government, as a member of this House of Commons I would be willing to go as far as our constitution will allow to give them the right to handle their produce in the manner they themselves have decided it should be handled. I am willing to go that far. Then, if a majority of the farmers on the prairies decide to adopt some kind of board to control their live stock or their dairy produce, while as a citizen of Manitoba I might and undoubtedly in some cases would object, as a member of this house I should feel obligated under the circumstances I have described to give them the right to do so. That is an entirely different thing, however, from beginning at the top and giving to this or to any government or any board the right to take all these matters under its control. I am entirely opposed to parliament resigning its powers into the hands of any board or executive.

Reference has been made to the British Marketing Act. I am not going to say I am in favour of that act. England is a country entirely different from Canada, and the circumstances obtaining there are quite different from those obtaining in this country. That which may suit England, a small compact country, may not suit us at all. Therefore at the moment I am not prepared to say that I would support legislation in this House of Commons simply because it followed closely the British marketing legislation. I am prepared, however, to take specific cases as they arise and to deal with them as the circumstances demand. I am not prepared to throw over our established method of doing things and at once to institute a new method. I believe in orderly progress, here a little and there a little, dealing with situations as they arise. That to my mind is the attitude which will commend itself to the people of Canada.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the government on the attitude it has taken as reflected in the marketing bill now before the house. For two or three years we have been talking about arrangements which should be made for the orderly marketing of our produce. We are now trying to put through this house a bill which will bring about that which we desired. Several lawyers opposite have expressed their opinions, and we have had opinions from other hon. members opposite who know nothing about marketing or the conditions under which the eastern farmers operate. They are familiar with the selling and marketing of wheat, but they are totally ignorant of and do not understand the facts and conditions affecting the marketing of the produce of eastern farmers.

Some members of the opposition have spoken of this as a bill with teeth in it.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): False teeth.

Mr. PICKEL: We require a bill with teeth in it, double teeth all around in both jaws. At the present time the packers and the commission men have absolute control of the marketing of the farmers' products in the east, and anything that can be done to take control out of their hands I am willing and glad to support. The minister distinctly stated when introducing the bill that he did not regard it as perfect, but that it was a beginning. I should like to know what kind of bill could be brought in by the minister or by anybody on this side of the house that hon. gentlemen opposite would agree to. They have not agreed to a single clause of this marketing bill; they have found fault with it all.

I just want to give a few facts that I know. This criticism from the other side of the house is simply for political purposes. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) stated a few moments ago that we have grading acts at the present time and he knew of no one who was opposed to them except perhaps the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) and eastern farmers. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am an eastern farmer and I am opposed most strongly, not to the grading acts themselves, but to their administration and operation. That is what I am opposed to.

Because of the grading acts and because of the arbitrary action of the packers and commission men in the cities the price of eggs, for example, fluctuates. When the farmer has none to sell the price is high, but during the producing season all summer the price is depressed. I contend that the price of a dozen eggs or a pound of butter in this country should never go below twenty-five cents. The price should be more or less uniform. Why should the price be depressed?

In the spring of the year when the farmer begins to produce butter, which is his chief commodity, the commission men and the packers arbitrarily depress the price and keep it depressed all summer just so long as the farmer is producing, and while the price is kept low they fill up their warehouses. But the minute the farmer stops producing, up goes the price, and butter will be selling at forty cents a pound and eggs at fifty cents a dozen when the farmer has none to sell. That is the condition of the eastern farmer, and I say that these marketing conditions should be regulated. The packers in the cities know perfectly well that on all the butter and eggs they buy during the summer they are going to double and treble their money. In this country we consume all the butter and eggs that we produce. We are not exporting butter and eggs, and why should the packers be allowed arbitrarily to depress prices to suit their own purposes, in order to make millions next winter? You will see that they will repeat the old trick pretty soon now; you will see butter and eggs soon go down to the lowest point. Eggs will be selling for ten or twelve cents a dozen this summer and the packers will be filling up their cold storage warehouses at that price. That is what the farmer is up against. And the packers will buy butter at fifteen and sixteen cents this summer and sell it at 30 to 35 cents a pound next winter. Is there any justice in that? Do we not need a marketing board? I should think we do, and one with teeth in it.

The condition of the eastern farmer is almost as bad in marketing beef and meat products as it is with respect to butter and eggs. The man in the city does not realize it. He gets his meat at very reasonable prices, but the man in the country pays right up to the hilt.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What about the man in the city?

Mr. PICKEL: You can get it much cheaper than I can get it in my village where we are producing the goods; you can get it twenty-five to thirty per cent cheaper. If a man in the eastern townships has a beef animal to sell he cannot sell it to the local butcher because there is none; the local butcher has been put out of business by the packers. The small local butcher might operate for a little while until the packer comes along and puts somebody right down beside him and gives him his meat until the other man is put out of business. That is what they are doing. I tell you straight that I can go on St. Catherine street and buy meat products twenty-five to thirty per cent cheaper than I can in any small village in the east.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): That must be the cheaper meats.

Mr. PICKEL: Every kind of meat, fish and everything. In the larger towns like Granby, Waterloo and Farnham, where there is some competition provided by the Dominion stores and Atlantic and Pacific stores, prices are a little more reasonable, but in the smaller towns where there is no competition and the packer has control we pay right up to the hilt. The farmer cannot sell his beef animals to the butcher; he has to sell them to the local agent of the packer, who transports them to Montreal where they are slaughtered, and we have to pay the transportation charges in and out, and one or two abattoir charges are charged back to us.

Mr. YOUNG: Is this bill going to remedy that?

Mr. PICKEL: The packer is the cause of it all.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is this bill going to fix that up?

Mr. PICKEL: It should. Let us try it. I am willing to try anything.

Last session I introduced a resolution into this house on behalf of the United Farmers of Danville in the province of Quebec in regard to the sale of reactors. I want to say a word or two on that subject. The request at that time was that all these reactors should be sent direct to the fertilizer factory. Let me give the house my experience. In 1928 or the early part of 1929, on one of my farms I lost five head of cattle. They were large Holsteins. A neighbour also lost five cattle, but his were common grade cattle. They were were not nearly as large as mine and not in as good condition. His cattle and mine were sent to Montreal on the same day. This neighbour of mine telephoned to one of the inspectors of the department in Montreal and told him that he was shipping cattle. He asked him to go down to the abattoir to see that he got somewhere near their value. A man was sent down and this neighbour received $25 per head for his five head. My five head went through the local dealer; I had no one at the abattoir and I received only $24 for the five.

Mr. YOUNG: Exactly the same cattle?

Mr. PICKEL: Mine were better. In July last year a neighbour of mine sold a three year old heifer for beef. He was sending milk to the city and he feeds all his cattle quite heavily. At the same time he was selling two or three hogs and some young cattle. When he got to Montreal the buyer came round to look at his animals and the price offered for the hogs and calves was quite acceptable. He then asked about his heifer and the dealer said he would pay $20 for the animal. Under the rules I could not repeat the language of the owner of the heifer when he heard the price offered. He said, "Are you trying to be a philanthropist, or what"? The dealer told him he considered the animal was worth more than $20 but that they had to sell the animal. That is the position they take. Last December I lost four head on another farm and all I could get was $4, just enough to buy a can of disinfectant. That is the position we in eastern Canada are up against. I do not know anything about the wheat situation and I am sorry that the wheat market is as it is. I do not know whether this proposed marketing board can help out in disposing of the wheat, but I do know that it can help in eastern Canada to dispose of everything that we produce.

The hon. member for Lisgar referred to the grading acts, and it is these very acts that these people take advantage of. I am not against grading; I believe our goods should be graded, but I do object to the manner in which these grading acts are used by the middleman in order to beat the farmer. I have mentioned already the case of eggs which I returned to Montreal. That could be repeated any day. You can send into the city and get a case of eggs and then when you send it back you will not get more than half what you paid for them; the grading will be depressed by fifty per cent. Such a condition of things should be readjusted. The hon. member for Lisgar said that there was no emergency and that the powers granted under this act were too great to be given to any board. I contend that emergency exists and has existed for some time.

The principal products of the farmer in the east are milk, cream, butter, eggs and pork. I think we are in a fair way to getting some adjustment in the matter of milk and cream. I understand a milk commission has been appointed in Ontario. We have one in Quebec which has power to set prices. The Minister of Agriculture for Quebec is to be highly commended for this action. We believe that the farmer will now get a fifty-fifty division of the consumer's dollar. I do not know what is going to be done in Ontario. As far as butter and eggs are concerned, the farmer does not get a fair deal and these are two of his principal products.

While I am on my feet I might say that I have always advocated the manufacture of more cheese and less butter, and I should like to tell the house why I am of that opinion. The price of cheese is regulated on the British market, but the price of butter is fixed in Montreal. The eastern townships farmer who sends his milk to a creamery does not receive more than fifty per cent of its value. The creamery does its own testing and weighing and the farmer has not a chance. Here is an instance of the way we are treated. Three years ago I was sending cream from one of my farms to a certain creamery and it was testing 35 per cent. The creamery changed hands and within six months the test had dropped to 22 per cent. I said to the man on the farm, "Joe, they are stealing your cream." He said, "I know they are, but what can we do about it?" I told him that I would have a different truck come into my yard every day or every week if necessary. Without my knowledge he sent his cream to Eaton's in Montreal and the first test showed 42 per cent. During the past two years it has never been below 40 per cent. That is what the farmer in the east is up against.

There is a contention which I have made before to which many take objection, namely that we make the poorest butter that reaches the British market. We are in a fortunate position in that we do not export any more than we import; we are able to consume all the butter that we can manufacture. I contend that in the east we should manufacture cheese entirely and let the west supply us with butter. They make a good article, and butter manufacture adapts itself to the west. Milk is rather bulky, and as their factories are sparsely situated they would be able to manufacture butter much easier than cheese. As I said before, the price of cheese is regulated on the British market and we always receive a premium for our product. In 1903 or 1904 we sent over 247,000,000 pounds of cheese while last year we sent only about 70,000,000 pounds. If we are not careful we are going to lose our cheese market. In 1903 or 1904 New Zealand sent hardly any, while last year they sent 250,000,000 pounds; they have taken our place as far as quantity is concerned, but we still maintain our position as far as quality goes —we still obtain a premium on our cheese. It is hard for one man to go about the country and talk the farmers into making cheese. I do all I can, but I think the government should initiate a campaign throughout eastern Canada advising the farmers to make cheese. Instead of that, however, all governments for the past twenty-five years have advised the farmers to make butter, and especially to go into winter dairying. I never knew a man in this country to make a cent in winter dairying; it takes all summer to pay their winter grain bills. You cannot make money in the winter in this country in making butter.

I hope this marketing bill will extend to the grain business. We pay $24 or $25 a ton for bran while you can hardly give away wheat in the west. Someone is getting a great rake-off. Practically 95 per cent of the mill feed coming to Montreal from Fort William and Port Arthur comes by water; the water rate is 22 cents per hundred pounds while the rail rate is 44½ cents. Yet when a farmer comes to Montreal for a car of mill feed he pays the 44½ cent rate for it. The millers are exacting $4 on every ton they supply to the farmers. That is not right; it is not just, and I hope this situation will be remedied under this bill. It would be a great help to us and would also help the western farmers to get rid of some of their mill feed and wheat.

I do not think I have anything more to say, Mr. Speaker, with regard to this bill, though when it is considered in committee I will gladly take part in the discussion of the various sections. In introducing the bill the minister stated that perhaps it was not perfect, so some objection may be raised to some of the sections. I do not see, however, any reason for the wholesale onslaught that we have witnessed from the other side. It is unreasonable, and I cannot understand it. It has not come from farmers; not a farmer across the way has had anything to say about it.

Mr. YOUNG: What about the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown)?

Mr. PICKEL: The hon. member for Lisgar is not a farmer; he is a wheat miner.

Mr. BROWN: May I ask my hon. friend what he thinks constitutes a farmer?

Mr. PICKEL: The hon. gentleman may keep two or three cows, but probably they are dry most of the time.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): I offer no excuse for taking part in this debate, Mr. Speaker; I do not feel that I need apologize to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. It seems to me that every time the opposition discusses questions of national importance we are accused of doing so for political reasons. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) made the same suggestion, but I feel quite at ease in discussing the bill which is before the house. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite should cast such reflections on the opposition; they always do so for political effect.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. BRADETTE: I challenge the hon. gentleman who just spoke to name one instance where that has been the case.

Mr. PICKEL: I think all the opposition that has been expressed to this bill up to the present time has been for political effect.

Mr. BRADETTE: That is certainly a nice statement for a member of parliament to make on the floor of this house; that is a reflection on all the representatives here, because it applies to every hon. member.

As a retailer in the town of Cochrane for a quarter of a century I am going to deal with the statement made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi to the effect that the packers are trying to put out of business the retailers and small butchers. I have handled meat, but I yet have to see a packer try to put out of business a single retailer in northern Ontario. I hold no brief for the packers; I have tried to pay my bills, though they charge as much as they can, but I must say that in my opinion the hon. member has no right to insinuate that in any section of the country the packers have tried to put the small butchers out of business.

Following the words of the minister in introducing the bill, every hon. member, whether on this or on the other side of the house, is perfectly in order in giving his views on this legislation, so that the bill may be in proper form when it is reported by the committee. At page 2205 of Hansard the minister said:

I had hoped that there would be little controversy in connection with this bill. No one realizes and appreciates more than I do the fact that it is far from perfect.

Surely that is an invitation to discuss the bill. There are two kinds of criticisms, destructive and constructive, and I challenge any hon. member opposite to say that the criticism that has come from this side of the house has been destructive. Surely the speeches of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher), the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) and the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) could not be said to contain destructive criticism. I repeat that hon. members are absolutely within their rights in discussing the merits of any bill. I remember that in the fall of 1930 it was said that the Prime Minister had to attend the imperial conference and we were urged to put the legislation through as quickly as possible. The same situation has existed on other occasions; scourges have been held over our heads to prevent us from discussing matters of national importance. That is why I, as the humble representative of the riding of North Timiskaming I intend to present the viewpoint of the consumer, and I do not apologize for doing so. The minister said, at another place:

The first is that it must be sound, the second that it must be simple of operation, and the third that it must be practical.

Surely two hundred and forty-five men, elected by the electors of this country, have as much right to advise the Minister of Agriculture as the experts, whether in agriculture or in industry, who have been advising him for at least two months, especially since this discussion was invited by the minister himself when he presented the bill. In the last paragraph of the minister's speech I find these words:

I do trust, however, that this bill will be discussed in the spirit in which it is presented. In its preparation we have endeavoured to obtain all the points of view possible so far as the organized producers were concerned, at the same time discussing it frankly and freely with those whose business primarily has been that of marketing.

Surely, then, I have the right to present the point of view of the consumer. It is true that in my section of the country we have primary producers, but they are mainly engaged in the mining industry and farming, so this bill does not apply to them. It is true that a certain number of our population have graduated from the ranks of settlers to become farmers, but they are not in a position as yet to export anything to other countries. But we are all consumers, and our point of view apparently has not been considered in connection with this bill. Apparently the consumers have not been asked what they think of the bill; apparently the consumers have not advised the government or the minister in connection with the act. Representing a section of the country where we are all practically consumers I know from my past sad experience that when any new restrictions or regulations are imposed by the government we in northern Ontario have to pay the piper as a result. I well remember some restrictions which were imposed by this government—

Mr. PICKEL: Would the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Is there anything political about his speech now?

Mr. BRADETTE: Certainly not; I have the right to represent my own riding.

Mr. PICKEL: You are living among consumers.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have some knowledge of farming, but I am giving the viewpoint of the consumers. I maintain that in this bill there should be incorporated the viewpoint of the consumer. I well remember when I was sitting on the government side the ridicule that was often cast upon the so-called Consumers' League, because the consumers had the audacity to be represented before the tariff board. Surely on such an important matter as this new legislation which is so sweeping in its character and which goes to the very root of the national and personal life of practically every citizen in Canada, the consumer should have been asked for his advice.

Again I repeat that so far as the mining sections, the northern sections of the three western provinces and practically the whole of British Columbia are concerned, any new regulation that is imposed upon any of our activities, whether mining or farming or otherwise, means simply another load put upon the shoulders of the consumer. Some hon. members might be astonished if they knew the prices we have to pay in nothern Ontario since the seasonal tariffs were put on imported fruit and vegetables, and they would be more surprised at the price we have to pay for Canadian fruit. The price is simply ridiculous and unless people are well to do they find it impossible during the winter months to buy lettuce, celery and other foods that are supposed to be good for the health of the people at such a season. It all amounts to this, that in a bill of this character apparently—and I say this in all sincerity—the viewpoint of the consumer has not been considered.

No doubt a certain amount of good could be said about this legislation, and I repeat that it shows a trend of thought which has been in progress for the last ten years not only in Canada but throughout the civilized world. We are speaking more and more of planned economy and in terms of government interference in all activities; in fact, if one studies the movements and revolutions that have occurred in Europe, their origin has always been with the idea in the minds of the mass of the people that the capitalistic or industrial system had been so faulty that the controlling authority which would be set up through those evolutions should take upon itself the responsibility of all social and national activities. The same thing applies to some extent to this bill, and again I want to make myself very clear in this, that I believe the intent of the bill is good. There is no doubt in my mind that the capitalistic system has failed and at the present time it is having to bear the results of its own sin. I have no doubt that the citizens of this country worthy of the name are willing to give a very thorough study to this bill and this is also true of every newspaper, every institution, every one of our provinces and every one of our premiers; they have already made comments on the bill. Therefore any hon. member, whether on the government side or in the opposition, is entitled to voice his opinion, always with the one idea in mind that out of this measure something tangible will emerge that will give the people greater prosperity and comfort than they have had.

Some comparisons have been made between this bill and the British Agricultural Marketing Act of 1931. There are some slight similarities, but as has been so well pointed out by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) and the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), those similarities are not so great as to justify the impression being created that the same marketing bill they have in England would be good in Canada. The reason for this is very simple. In Great Britain they have only one central government, one that is all-powerful so far as national legislation is concerned, while here we do not have the same situation. Here we have provincial governments, and we cannot get over the fact that they are already in existence. There has already been discussion of the bill by some of the premiers, some being in favour of it and others against it. Therefore it is obvious that conditions surrounding the creation of the two bills are entirely different, and for the reasons I mentioned a few moments ago the British act would be impossible of application in this country.

We must not get away from the fact that the Hon. Mr. Elliot, Minister of Agriculture in Great Britain, is in a different position from our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) so far as the farmers are concerned. Mr. Elliot wants to make Great Britain self-sustaining as regards the products of the farm while in Canada we are faced with a different situation; here our farmers find themselves in the position where they have a surplus which must of necessity be exported, whereas in Great Britain they have no surplus, but a shortage. Thus, in discussing this bill we must see that we are on firm ground and not try to make comparisons too closely.

After reading the bill very carefully several times and after having studied throughly the N.R.A. of the United States, I believe that there is between the two a number of similarities; in several clauses the wording is practically the same, but the difference is this: the N.R.A. goes into all the activities of the United States while our marketing legislation singles out only certain activities of our national life, chiefly agricultural; it leaves out entirely mining, the automotive industry, cottons and other textiles. In a word, it leaves out the industries as we understand and know them. I am not aware of the reason for that. Is it because the government have thought, perhaps wisely, perhaps unwisely—this is not for me to say now—that by the high tariffs they have given to those industries, those sheltered industries, for the last four years, they have done all they can for them while during all that time the farmers have been left to look after themselves, and that this legislation is to be a sop for the farmers. That question I will leave the house to answer. The similarity between the present bill and the N.R.A. holds good only so far as the farmers are concerned. If the government contend it is such a good measure as the minister says it is going to prove; if it is so good for the farmer, the fisherman and the lumberman, why is the miner left out and why should the same principles not be applied to all our national activities? That I do not know.

In this discussion we should not get away from the fact that the present bill is no more and no less than planned economy. Everyone knows that the capitalistic system has sinned, but we should also remember that the capitalistic system has proven to the world that through its inventions, its ability of administration and management it could supply all the requirements of the civilized world. Surely to-day the same men who were responsible for that situation, who could develop the creative power of producing plenty should at this time without any drastic measure be able to do their part in the national scheme without compulsory power being given to certain men or boards, and they certainly should be Canadians enough to give a lead to this country during the present time of stress.

The hon. member who preceded me has cited several cases of butter, eggs, meat, cattle and so on, where he has told us there were inspections and over-inspections. So to-day we have machinery sufficient to a large extent for a planned economy, but the trouble is that no matter how many laws are put on the statute book, no matter how many regulations you may have, if the government has not the energy and sincerity to enforce them they remain a dead letter. That applies to this measure; unless the government is ready to see that it has full application.

In every section of this country there has been a deep interest in and serious discussion of this bill. This morning I received a letter which I believe was sent to every member of parliament by the chamber of commerce of Montreal, asking the government to make certain amendments to this bill. Again it comes to the point I mentioned a moment ago; surely if chambers of commerce, cooperative and other organizations, find it desirable to advise the government on such matters, it is the bounden duty of members of parliament in their humble way to present to the government their views on this very important measure. Therefore I want to speak briefly of certain features of this bill, features which in themselves may seem practicable and fairly innocent, but I believe this is the time and place to bring forward any amendments which to us seem desirable. In fact the minister in his admirable speech in introducing it left the door wide open for full discussion, he was quite open-minded, he said the bill was not absolutely perfect, that it might involve some anomalies. Take for example subsection 2 of section 3:

> The board shall consist of such number of persons as the governor in council may from time to time determine, and such member shall hold office during pleasure and shall receive such remuneration as the governor in council shall determine.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has dealt with that. It simply means that in a matter of such national importance the power of control is taken from the parliament and given to a board. That is not the British parliamentary system as we understand it. Some hon. members may say that in Italy they have something similar to that, but Italy is under a dictatorship while in Canada the government is still supposed to be controlled by the representatives of the people. The point so well presented by the hon. member for Lisgar is that it would simply mean that in practice all our social and industrial activities will be taken out of the control of parliament. The members of this assembly are elected to represent the people, their wishes and their sentiments, but by this bill the control of some of our most important national activities will be taken away from this forum. Take again subsection 5 of section 3:

> The board may, with the approval of the governor in council, employ such technical, professional and other officers and employees as the board may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the board with the approval of the governor in council.

That again is invading a field which should not be invaded. The agricultural marketing act of Great Britain is in a different situation in that respect. The hon. member who preceded me has shown that we have inspection and overinspection as far as primary production is concerned, there are too many inspectors at the present time trying to advise the producers. Yet over and above the existing machinery this bill proposes to erect another board with another set of officials; it is certainly bureaucracy with a vengeance. Our provinces have machinery for looking after these matters, there are marketing boards and cooperative societies in many sections of the prairies; we have the national research council which has cost millions of dollars and is doing good work. What would be the necessity for that organization under this board? It would seem that it would have to come under it or practically not function. I believe that section should be entirely struck out. Overlapping of that nature would cost the ratepayers of this country a lot of money. It would do nothing to lessen the price to the consumer or increase the profit of the producer. I have no grudge against government employees, but we must avoid bureaucracy, and any overlapping by new regulations will simply mean added cost to both consumers and producers.

Then subsection 9:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act.

Anyone who has studied the British parliamentary system will realize that here again one of the most important prerogatives of parliament is taken from it by that provision. I see the right hon. Prime Minister smile.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly!

Mr. BRADETTE: Is it not true that this board is going to take money out of the public funds without the sanction of parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no legislation that does not involve a curtailment of the unrestrained and unlimited liberty of everyone. That is what parliament is for.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But subject to the control of parliament.

Mr. BRADETTE: If this board is all powerful, is to function by itself without the sanction of parliament, it will be using the public funds which should be under the exclusive control of this parliament; there is no avoiding that fact.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

OATHS OF ALLEGIANCE ACT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 57, to amend the Oaths of Allegiance Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, on March 13 last the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), the former Minister of Justice, introduced a bill with the same title, "An Act to amend the Oaths of Allegiance Act." Since that bill was introduced and printed further consideration has been given to its terms, with the result that a slightly modified bill has been prepared, which was submitted to the hon. member for Quebec East before its introduction into this house and which has, I think, received his approval. He has already given notice to the house that he is withdrawing the bill introduced by him on March 13 in order that this bill, which is a modified form of his own, might be considered favourably by the house.

The hon. member for Quebec East, referring to the circumstances under which his own bill was introduced, made a brief reference to the proceedings of the imperial conference of 1926 of which he and the right hon. leader of the opposition were both members. The summary of proceedings of that imperial conference contains the following passage:

The title of His Majesty the King is of special importance and concern to all parts of His Majesty's dominions. Twice within the last fifty years has the royal title been altered to suit changed conditions and constitutional developments.

The report recites the title of His Majesty which was adopted by royal proclamation in 1901, and then proceeds:

Some time before the conference met it had been recognized that this form of title hardly accorded with the altered state of affairs arising from the establishment of the Irish Free State as a dominion. It had further been ascertained that it would be in accordance with His Majesty's wishes that any recommendation for change should be submitted to him as the result of discussion at the conference.

We are unanimously of opinion that a slight change is desirable, and we recommend that, subject to His Majesty's approval, the necessary legislative action should be taken to secure that His Majesty's title should henceforward read:

"George V, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India."

On March 12, 1927, the parliament of the United Kingdom, in order to carry into effect the resolution of the imperial conference of 1926, passed the Royal and Parliamentary Titles Act, 1927, which appears in the imperial statutes as 17 George V, Chapter 4, Section 1 of this act reads as follows:

It shall be lawful for His Most Gracious Majesty, by his royal proclamation under the Great Seal of the Realm, issued within six months after the passing of this act, to make such alteration in the style and titles at present appertaining to the crown as to His Majesty may seem fit.

Thereafter, on May 13, 1927, a royal proclamation was issued under the Royal and Parliamentary Titles Act providing that His Majesty's style and titles in the English tongue should thereafter be: "George V, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India." Since 1927 that style and title has been adopted in Canada and throughout the British dominions in all administrative acts, but the fact that that is not the title prescribed in the Oaths of Allegiance Act of Canada apparently escaped notice until the hon. member for Quebec East brought it to the attention of parliament, and introduced a bill to rectify that anomaly.

At the same time it has appeared expedient that the oath of allegiance in Canada should conform in its terms to the oath of allegiance which was adopted in the United Kingdom in 1868, and which has been adopted in South Africa, Australia and I presume in New Zealand, although I have not had access to the New Zealand statutes. That form of oath is the form suggested to be adopted in the bill now to be introduced.

The anomaly that our oath of allegiance should differ from that which has prevailed in the United Kingdom since 1868 led me to make some interesting researches. I found that the present oath of allegiance presently prescribed in the revised statutes of Canada was adopted by the parliament of Upper Canada on February 13, 1833, by chapter 12 of 3 William IV. In looking into the circumstances under which the statute was passed, I find that that was a time of civil strife and turmoil in Upper Canada. Upon the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1840 the oath which had been adopted in Upper Canada was no longer the oath for the united Canada which came into existence in 1841. The year 1849 was also a time of tumult, civil commotion and excitement and the legislature of old Canada re-enacted in 1850, chapter 18 of 13 and 14 Victoria the form of oath which had been adopted in Upper Canada in 1833.

When the British North America Act was passed in 1867 an oath was prescribed therein in schedule 5 by section 128 of that act. This was a simple form of oath to be taken by senators and members of parliament and did not conform to the somewhat elaborate oath which had been contrived in 1833 in Upper Canada and in 1850 by the legislature of united Canada. The British parliament declined to adopt that form of oath. In 1868 the British parliament by special statute, 31-32, Victoria, chapter 72, which came into force on July 31, 1868, a year after the British North America Act, 1867, was enacted prescribed a form of oath to have effect in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and throughout the British dominions in so far as the legislation of the Imperial parliament had force and effect. This simple form of oath prescribed in Great Britain in 1868 is:

I, ..., do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, Her Heirs and successors according to law. So help me God.

[Mr. Cahan.]

There was a provision in this statute that upon the demise of the sovereign, the name of the reigning sovereign of the time should be inserted for the name of Her Majesty, Queen Victoria. This is the oath of allegiance which is prescribed in the United Kingdom and in all the colonies of the empire and the same form has been adopted in Australia and South Africa. It seems expedient that this dominion should adopt the same form and this is what is proposed in the present bill.

The bill provides for two exceptions. There is a slightly different form of oath to be taken by members of the House of Commons and the Senate, which is prescribed by section 128 of the British North America Act, 1867, and the fifth schedule thereto. We have no authority or at least we do not propose to amend the British North America Act, and therefore we except that act in this proposed legislation. We have excepted also the simple form of oath which is prescribed in our Naturalization Act, which act is similar to the naturalization act of the United Kingdom. The same form of oath is prescribed in the naturalization acts of South Africa and Australia.

There is one other simple provision. Several statutes of this parliament contain special oaths of office to be taken by special officials. I am informed that when other officials are sworn in, it has been the custom for the clerk of the privy council to improvise such a form of official oath as he deemed expedient under the circumstances. There is in this bill a provision that from time to time the governor in council may prescribe oaths of office, which have not been expressly provided for by parliament, when new offices are created and it becomes necessary to administer oaths of office to the appointees to such offices.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STE. ANNE DES MONTS, QUE., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BRASSET:

1. What amounts did the Department of Public Works expend at Sainte-Anne des Monts, county of Gaspe, during the year 1933-34?
2. What are the particulars of such expenditures?
3. What works were carried out?
4. How many workmen were employed in connection with each of such works?
5. What was the salary of the superintendent of such works?
6. Who superintended such works?
7. What salary was paid to the workmen?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1 and 2. Repairs to wharf, $1,048.04; repairs to training pier, $1,502.18.

3. Wharf—fenders replaced on the east side at outer end, 4-inch hardwood sheathing placed, and some cross and longitudinal ties with vertical posts renewed. The north-eastern corner, damaged by the ss. Cape Gaspe, was also repaired. The Clark Steamship Co., owners of this vessel, reimbursed the department to the extent of $589.57.

Training pier—sheath piles replaced and driven along the east face.

4. Wharf—12 men, including foreman; pier—60 men including foreman.

5. 50 cents per hour, less 10 per cent.

6. Wharf—Luc Marin, foreman; pier—Thomas Lepage, foreman.

7. Carpenters, 37½ cents per hour, less 10 per cent; labourers, 30 cents per hour, less 10 per cent; carters, 45 cents per hour, less 10 per cent.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. LAFLECHE:

What is the total sum paid by the Dominion government since 1930 to date in the counties of Richmond-Wolfe, Compton, Shefford, Stanstead, Brome-Missisquoi, Chateauguay-Huntingdon, in connection with public works and by way of contribution under the Unemployment Relief Act?

Mr. DUPRE:

Richmond-Wolfe	$ 71,948 50
Compton	49,921 26
Shefford	55,844 20
Stanstead	40,082 64
Brome-Missisquoi	21,539 96
Chateauguay-Huntingdon	1,458 00
Total	$240,794 56

In addition to the above, there was approved, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, a schedule of works providing for repairs to bridges in the following counties: Chicoutimi, Compton, Deux Montagnes, Dorchester, Drummond, Gaspe Sud, L'Assomption, Matane, Megantic, Soulanges, Kamouraska.

The dominion contribution in this respect was $9,493.67, but it is not possible from the accounts received to determine the amounts chargeable to each county.

Also, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, there was approved a schedule providing for the painting of bridges in the following counties: Arthabaska, Argenteuil, Bagot, Bellechasse, Bonaventure, Champlain, Chateauguay, Deux Montagnes, Kamouraska, Laprairie, L'Assomption, Megantic, Montmorency, Papineau, Soulanges.

The dominion contribution in this respect was $4,999.81, but it is not possible from the accounts received to determine the amounts chargeable to each county.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, DISRAELI, WOLFE COUNTY

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. What amounts have the government expended at Disraeli, county of Wolfe, for direct relief, works, etc., from September 30, 1930, to March 31, 1934?

2. What were such works?

3. What amounts have been expended for each of such works or contracts?

4. What amounts have been expended yearly by the government for all works carried on at Disraeli?

Mr. DUPRE: 1, 2, 3 and 4. Disraeli village, Wolfe county.

Unemployment Relief Act, 1930—
Public works: Bridge and embanking repairs to aqueduct	$2,100 00
Direct relief	177 50
Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931—

BUTTER IMPORTATIONS

Mr. GIROUARD:

1. How many pounds of butter were imported from Australia, since August 1, 1930, to date?

2. What customs duty per pound was levied with respect to such imports?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

Imports of Butter from Australia Entered for Consumption in Canada from August 1, 1930, to March 31, 1934, with Rate of Customs Duty Applied and Amount of Duty Collected

	Lbs.	Rate of duty applied	Duty collected
August 1, 1930, to March 31, 1931	2,107,840	2,107,840 lbs. at 1c. per lb.	$21,078 40

PEDIGREED HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a question was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) based upon a press dispatch that an importation of Swedish pigs was to be made into this country. An answer of yes or no might be misleading and I should like to make a short statement in an endeavour to make clear just what is behind this press dispatch. It is generally recognized that the Danish pig is among the most suitable to produce bacon of the type desired by the consumer in the United Kingdom. This suitability is the result of years of careful selection based on the gain of the pig and the quality of the pig, using feed which is cheapest to feed. That is, the selection is based more on a pig suitable to make use of certain feed rather than the changing of feed and the putting in of considerable research work on feed to make it suitable to any pig. In order to improve the quality of her bacon, Sweden imported some of the best approved herds of Denmark landrace pigs. They carried on the work started in Denmark and the result is that they are now on almost an equal if not an equal footing with the Danish bacon produced by the landrace pigs. For this reason it was felt it would be all gain if there was an importation made into this country from the best of the Swedish herds in order to make a study of their suitability to our country and to our feeds and also with the possibility of crossing with different bacon type hogs used in Canada. Pigs of this type are not available for purchase in the United Kingdom, as referred to in a press dispatch. There was a small importation last fall of white pigs from the United Kingdom. This importation is contemplated, when we receive the assurance of the health of animals departments of the United Kingdom and the United States, that such an importation will not interfere with the understanding between the countries. It is the intention to keep the importation entirely under the control of our government institutions for experimental purposes in order to see how they respond to our conditions, in comparison with our own pigs under similar conditions. If they do not respond, as it is expected they will, they will not be distributed amongst private breeders but will be slaughtered and sold. Every precaution in this connection will be taken if the importation is made.

[Mr. Matthews.]

LULU ISLAND RIFLE RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): When the estimates of the Department of National Defence were under discussion the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) directed a question to me with regard to the Lulu Island rifle range in British Columbia. I informed him at that time that the range had not been sold and that tenders had not been called for. That was misleading, because I find on further examination that early last year, in February, 1933, this property had been transferred for administration to the Department of the Interior. While I was confident that our department had not sold it, it had slipped my memory for the time being that it had been transferred. I find on inquiry from the Department of the Interior that the property was offered for sale in August last. There was received only one tender, which was not considered satisfactory, and the property was not sold and has not been sold since.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

TORONTO EAST VACANCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): May I ask the Prime Minister when it is intended to issue the writ for the constituency of Toronto East.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The matter is covered by statute.

LIVE STOCK AND PRODUCTS ACT

The house again in committee on Bill No. 40, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 2—Exporting agent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What difficulties have been encountered to necessitate this provision?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): In the Live Stock Act authority is given to set a maximum charge which commission men, or people engaging in trade in the stockyards, may make for the handling of stock, and there is also provision that bonds be required for people so engaged in trading in live stock. The act does not cover these particular cases that have come into prominence through our export of cattle, and it was to include exporting agents that these two words were added.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is this to overcome such a difficulty as was recently encountered in the port of Montreal?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would be a protection in a case such as that.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—"Public commercial vehicle."

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This section will not interfere with the farmer taking his own stock to market?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It simply provides that anyone other than the farmer handling the stock will have to report to the owner the grading and ticket of sale to show what the basis of payment was.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Regulations.

Mr. REID: Will the minister give us a further explanation of this section.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some of the provinces that desire to improve the quality of their poultry have wished to pass legislation to give them control over the eggs that go into their hatcheries, so that they may be assured they are from approved flocks. That object however cannot be attained; that is to say, they have no control over eggs coming from another province into the territory concerned, and various provinces have asked us to insert this provision in the Live Stock Products Act, so that if they wish to pass enabling legislation they may do so in order to prevent the entry into the province of eggs from flocks that are not approved, and which are intended to be hatched in the hatcheries within the province. If the provinces do not wish to pass legislation, this will not interfere. So far as concerns those that do—and we have had a number of requests—it will enable them to carry out their plans for the improvement of poultry in each particular province.

Mr. REID: Has any request come from British Columbia?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe not.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Any request from Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. SPENCER: Any request from Alberta

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. REID: I understand some regulations are at present in force in connection with hatcheries. What are they?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This will not affect them at all.

Mr. REID: But there are some regulations in force at present; some supervision is given by federal officials in British Columbia?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. There are approved hatcheries and approved flocks. The approved flocks are on request approved by federal officials or by provincial officials and the desire is that eggs will not be shipped from one province to another from flocks other than from those approved for use in hatcheries. This provision will not affect any regulation which exists at present in British Columbia in connection with their approved hatcheries.

Mr. REID: May I draw to the attention of the minister complaints that have reached me regarding the present regulations in British Columbia, that is, that approval is given to certain hatcheries without investigation as to the source of some of the eggs in the hatcheries, the result being that some men who have approved flocks are at a disadvantage, so to speak, by breeders who have not approved flocks selling to those hatcheries. Difficulty is, I understand, going to arise due to provincial regulations being put into effect in Alberta designed to prohibit importation into that province of day-old chicks unless from approved hatcheries. Those two aspects of the situation should be looked into by the minister and I would like to know whether he has any further information.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. REID: At present in British Columbia those regulations are not being enforced, and I believe to the benefit of approved hatcheries.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would appreciate it very much if the hon. member would communicate with me and give me specific instances that will enable us to make an investigation of the matter to which he refers.

Mr. REID: I shall do so.

Mr. NEILL: I think this clause might very well be left out. It is dealing with pretty small potatoes, as the expression is, when we interfere in a matter of that kind. The minister has said that the object is to allow regulations which will permit the hatching only of chickens of an approved breed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, of approved flocks. This is very important from the standpoint not only of quality production but especially of disease control.

Mr. NEILL: The suggestion, as he said a few minutes ago, was that they had been bringing in from another province birds or eggs—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Eggs.

Mr. NEILL: —of an undesirable quality.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): From flocks that were not approved and not certified as free from certain prevalent diseases.

Mr. NEILL: The average man in British Columbia who raises chickens, makes a hobby of it and wants to increase the quality of his flock, will hardly go to the expense of bringing in inferior eggs from another province. It would not be sensible to do so. He will naturally bring in eggs from an approved breeder or approved hatchery or someone who has a reputation. He would not bring in inferior eggs from a distance because that would make them very expensive. If he wanted inferior eggs, he could get them next door.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This applies only to commercial hatcheries, but I know from personal experience there are commercial hatcheries that advertise under more or less fictitious certificates. The certificate is a very fine looking document so long as one does not investigate it, and yet there may be no registration behind the birds, no selection made and no guarantee that they are from approved flocks or flocks disease-free. This provision will not interfere with the small chicken farmer; it will affect only commercial hatcheries as a protection against disease and inferior birds.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Failure to comply with requirements.

Mr. GERSHAW: Does this mean that an ordinary buyer of cattle at a point of assembly shall be required, in order to comply with this provision, to fill in special forms issued by the government?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, it has nothing whatever to do with that. In the Live Stock Act power is given to the Department of Agriculture to set a maximum charge to be made by live stock commission firms in the handling of live stock. If it is felt that the charge is too high, notice is given that it should be reduced, but previously the period of time between the notice being given and the ministerial order being issued and put into effect was sixty days. Some live stock commission firms might, on request of the department, put into effect immediately the charges asked for. The others would have sixty days in which to do that, and then appeal. It is thought that thirty days will be sufficient.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Disbursements.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like the minister to give a little further explanation of this section. It seems to be rather important.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At first sight it might be felt that this was taking away some of the protection from the farmer selling his stock. The clause in its previous form, which is now to be eliminated, stated that the bank was to be responsible for the administration of a trust account, that is whether or not payments made out of that account were as they should be. I believe that this provision was in opposition to a clause in the Bank Act, and that there is no power to enforce it, but the producer and the farmer selling his stock is in no way affected. It simply has to do with the operation of a trust account. That is if one party to the trust account should issue a cheque in a wrongful way the bank was responsible for that. The protection for the producer is not in this provision, but in the fact that the people handling his stock are bonded.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May it not be implied that the government is accepting the responsibility for the administration of the trust account?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yet as the minister is providing the regulations for the administration of and payments from the account does it not appear possible that there arises some responsibility?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is claimed that this clause in our Live Stock Act cannot be enforced because it is contrary to a provision in the Bank Act. What I assured myself of is that this amendment in no way affected the protection of the farmer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am wondering if the minister may not be stepping into a possible difficulty. There is no doubt whatever that he is now cancelling a provision of the old act with respect to the obligation of the bank concerning trust accounts and is himself going to provide the regulations. There is undoubtedly a moral responsibility at least. I am afraid that may be the interpretation placed upon this section. I am not complaining.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid I have not got the point of the hon. member's question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, then, there is another question that I would like to ask on this section. Has the question of provincial jurisdiction been raised with the minister in regard to what he now proposes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not as far as I know.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Notice as to shipment of cattle.

Mr. YOUNG: Is not this section in conflict with the powers being given to the marketing board under the new marketing bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say not.

Mr. YOUNG: Why not? Here the licence is to come from the minister; under the other the licence is to come from the board. Is a man going to have to take out two licences?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, we would say not. This is optional. The marketing bill is not passed yet, nor the board set up.

Mr. GERSHAW: May I ask what this is particularly designed to guard against?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It might be used to protect quality. It might also be necessary, for example, in connection with a matter that has been under discussion at different times, that of restricted quotas to the United Kingdom. If this country were limited definitely to a certain number of cattle to be shipped out, powers such as this would be necessary to regulate the flow of those cattle.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 2, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

He said: This is purely a technical amendment. The Unfair Competitions Act was the name substituted for the Trade Mark and Design Act; it is referred to in this act and we are just making this act conform to the change in the title.

Mr. NEILL: What section?

Mr. STEVENS: It is section 7.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 53, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister if this bill is going to the agriculture committee?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the intention. I would suggest that rather than go into a detailed discussion here the motion might be allowed to carry so that the bill can be sent to the agriculture committee where it will be dealt with in the usual way.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): I am quite agreeable to that suggestion and will look with a good deal of interest for the new evidence the minister evidently has to justify this change. I will also look forward to hearing any evidence the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) or his staff may be able to bring forward, and will try to weigh all the evidence and decide the matter dispassionately.

Mr. STEVENS: In a judicial manner.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 18, consideration in committee of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort), for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I believe that yesterday, in the discussion of this very important measure, I made it very clear—and I suppose this applies to most hon. members on this side of the house—that as far as I am concerned I agree with many features and the spirit of the bill. We realize that the old policy of laissez faire is a thing of the past, and that to-day we must have to some extent a system of planned economy. Of course, in dealing with a matter of this kind we may go to extremes. We reached an extreme under the old policy and to-day, in order to maintain an even keel in the national life of this country, we must be careful that we do not go to the other extreme.

We must not expect the government to take over all our social and most of our personal activities. This bill implies the interference of the government in many of the activities of our daily lives, and that is why I have been opposing some of the features which it contains. We must remember, of course, that we cannot continue indefinitely to enlarge and implement further the policies of the past. We have seen many changes take place. In connection with our external trade, for instance, in the last twenty-five or thirty years we have made treaties with other nations of the world, while before that time the matter of external trade was left largely to corporations and individuals. We have seen the curtailment of our wheat acreage, which was agreed to by the right hon. Prime Minister after the conference last summer. This was another step in the direction of governmental regulation if not absolute governmental control. I feel that one of the main reasons for this act is to secure the sanction of parliament to the curtailment of our wheat acreage in the western provinces in order to have uniformity of policy in that direction. So I believe we have been courting government control for the last dozen years at least, and no one can say that I personally or the Liberal party are opposed to some of the principles contained in the bill now before the house, and the enlargement of that principle. I stated yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that doubtless the capitalistic system has sinned, but at least it has shown that it can supply all the requirements of the people. The situation we have to face to-day, however, is not so much a question of production and regulation as it is a question of distribution and of the purchasing power of the people. Notwithstanding anything that people may say to the contrary and notwithstanding what appears in this bill, the consumer must be primarily concerned with this measure.

There are other causes as well which have contributed indirectly to the present situation, and which have brought about the legislation now before us. One very important contributing cause of the depression was the financial structure of many of our corporations, the watering of stocks, the terrible gambling which we witnessed for six or seven years, and so on. A series of articles appeared in the Montreal Daily Herald during the course of last winter which indicated very plainly that the people of this country have been mulcted to the tune of nearly four billion dollars. In nickel stocks alone, for example, the Canadian people have lost at least $900,000,000. I am not going to read any of these articles since I believe they were distributed to all hon. members of this house and of the Senate, but I should like to refer to some of the headlines that appeared in connection with that series of articles:

Not only the big corporations with nationally known names, but thousands, if not tens of thousands, of the smaller corporations found it possible under the existing government regulations to squeeze the people to the tune of some four billions of dollars. That has been one of the main causes of the depth of this depression. We had the spectacle of European peoples sending across their gold and their money to carry on gambling in the New York market in a way that had never been done before during those so-called prosperous years. The government must be seized of these facts and should find a way of dealing with them. I know that the committee on mass buying intends to deal with the matter, but it is of such great importance that it is imperative that action be taken at once if we want to bring back prosperity to this country.

Some hon. members may think that it was only the so-called big fellow who was in the market, but this orgy of gambling reached throughout the rank and file of our Canadian people. On many occasions I myself have seen in the town of Timmins, for example, the miners coming from their work, still carrying their dinner pails, sitting before the stock boards to watch the quotations. I have seen people in all walks of life throwing more and more of their savings into this form of gambling, because it is gambling pure and simple, and the worst possible kind of gambling, for in a poker game there may be some chance, but it has been well proven by the Montreal Herald that in the stock market the dice are loaded against the smaller speculator, the little fellow, who had no chance of winning from the start.

I want to be fair, Mr. Speaker. I know that the government is sincere in wanting to go to the root of our present social evils, but I repeat that this has been the greatest cause of the depression that we are now experiencing, for the savings of our people were turned away from proper commercial and industrial channels and thrown into the stock market.

The bill that is now before us is leading to government control with a vengeance. As I stated a few moments ago, there must be some measure of control applied, as it has been applied in the past, and it is probable that the measure of control will have to be enlarged to some extent.

Let me review briefly what absolute government control has led to in other countries. Will anyone say, for instance, that absolute government control in soviet Russia, control of all the activities of that great population, has been beneficial to the working men and the farmers? Hon. gentlemen no doubt remember the statement that was made by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), who is very impartial in his views and fair-minded in his utterances. He told us after his visit to Russia last year that the situation he found there was most deplorable, that it could hardly be conceived.

Is Italy in a better position than she was a few years ago? Italy has an absolute dictatorship, absolute government control of all the social and commercial and industrial activities of that great nation. You can always judge a tree by its fruits. Only a few days ago the prime minister of Italy asked the Italian people to tighten their belts a little more, and that after having had full control of all the activities of that great nation for a number of years, with the people of the nation working together almost as a solid unit. After years of application of the government policy of absolute control, the prime minister of Italy tells the people that they must tighten their belts a little more. The belts of Canadian people are not as slack perhaps as we would like them to be, but I would like to see any prime minister in this country or any leader of any great party go before the Canadian electors and tell them that they must tighten their belts a little more. I believe that shows, Mr. Speaker, that absolute government control would not be applicable to this country.

It is true that the capitalistic system has sinned very grievously, but I believe that there are honest and sincere men in the higher positions in our industrial and financial life, and I believe that much can be done by cooperation and coordination between our industrial leaders and all other activities, and the government to solve many of our difficulties at the present time.

We cannot get away from the fact that this marketing bill now before us is intended to give a greater measure of control over the activities of our primary producers. It is true that the farmers were the first class of our population to suffer in the depression. Why? For one very good reason, and that was that they were not organized to curtail production. Mind you, I am not in favour of working against the designs of Providence. Regardless of what other people may say, I have faith in Providence, and when I am told that nations, and indeed whole continents, are planning to curtail production I have some fears, I nevertheless believe that there is a better solution of our problems. But the farmers were unable to get or maintain higher prices for their production because of the lack of organization amongst them, and then they found themselves with over-production. That was not because of more bountiful crops, but when unemployment came in the cities and men were thrown out of work, when labour became cheaper for it is simply a question of supply and demand and when labour is plentiful wages go down, the urban population lost almost fifty per cent of its buying power within a year. The results of that were felt more severely by the agricultural class in this country than any other.

To-day an attempt is being made in this country to curtail the acreage of wheat, and indeed the bill before us, if I understand it aright, is based on the principle of curtailing production or at all events maintaining artificial prices. I never have believed in artificiality, whether applied to industry or any other class of the community. I believe in the natural course of nature, which can be helped to a certain extent only by legislation and governmental regulation. Surely in this country we are not going to try to make our Canadian people as alike as two peas. Have we not confidence enough in their individualism to allow them to work out their own destinies, and abstain from interfering unless some form of regulation is absolutely demanded? Are we going to say that no one shall be allowed to grow a bushel of wheat or catch a pound of fish or produce goods of any kind without the dictation of government officials? I certainly give the government credit for all the intelligence and administrative capacity it possesses, but no one can make me believe that the primary function of government is not legislative and administrative. The course of history shows us that after the different units of population became large enough, governments were formed for the greater convenience of society, and that applies to Canada. But governments do not possess creative power. That belongs to the individual. Take the evolution of industry and the development of new inventions, for instance. Who will dare to say that these inventions are due to the inventiveness of the government? The suggestion would be absurd because that is not the role of government. The government role is to legislate in such a way that its legislation will be beneficial to all sections of the population.

So far as this bill is concerned, I fully appreciate that there are certain principles that must be followed and accepted, and those principles are not new because they have been practised in this country for a number of years. There must be some regulation but there certainly should be no regulation in an autocratic manner. I have not the time at the present moment to go into the details of this bill. I believe hon. members should take the opportunity both on second reading and in committee to discuss every phase of it. I am discussing this all-important problem from the viewpoint of the people whom I represent at the present moment. I represent a constituency which is partly industrial, partly mining and partly rural. There are located in my constituency some of the largest gold mines on the North American continent; we have some of the finest rural sections in Canada part of the Northern Ontario clay belt, and we have also great industrial centres like Kapuskasing, Iroquois Falls and Smooth Rock Falls. I have received hundreds of letters from people in my constituency, some for and some against this bill. They all ask that there should be a thorough discussion. The people in my constituency are very sincere and they appreciate the problems which we have to face at the present moment. Although they did not all have an opportunity of reading the bill, some are absolutely in favour of it while others are absolutely against it. The principle which applies to my riding applies also to the government. The government should be careful and not swing too much in one way or the other, they should endeavour to keep an even keel. Some of the people who have written me appreciate the need of a certain amount of governmental regulation but in most cases they contend that this regulation should not take away the initiative of the individual.

In most parts of this country we are still in the pioneering stage. I cannot visualize the time when the government will be the mother, the father, the director and the leader of all our actions, whether personal, industrial or otherwise. Some latitude should be given to the intelligence, the integrity and the activity of our people which has been so well displayed in the past. I can speak as a farmer and I can speak also as a common labourer because as a young man I earned my bread by the sweat of my brow. I would be quite willing to go back again to manual labour. I know the aspirations of the people and I know what the men in the shanties and working manually are thinking. Twenty or thirty years ago I spent my winters in the shanties, but in those days the government did not mean so much to the Canadian people. To-day we expect the government to give us everything. The government has a certain duty to perform in an administrative and legislative way but I repeat that they have no right to interfere with the personal actions of the people. The government have no right to dictate to the people and say what they shall do to-day or to-morrow, but they have the right to control certain of their activities. I have faith and confidence in our Canadian people. I believe in the spirit which is so well expressed in every section of the British Empire, the spirit of initiative and individualism, the spirit of respect for authority and concern for the welfare of our national life. We do not need drastic measures whereby our every step will be checked.

I mentioned yesterday the difference which exists between this bill and the English act and I pointed out that the principles which apply here are not the same as those which apply in Great Britain. This government intends to regulate certain provincial activities. We are quite ready to-day to blame the newsprint industry for their orgy of building mills and causing over-production; we contend that they should have known that the newsprint market, particularly that of the United States, was being well taken care of and even was saturated; but a few years ago we could not have visualized a federal marketing board which would have dictated to the Honourable Mr. Ferguson or the Honourable Mr. Taschereau their line of conduct at a time when they were asking the financiers of this country to invest their money in newsprint mills in northern Ontario or Quebec. The provincial premiers at that time would not have tolerated any interference from the central government because they maintained, and perhaps rightly so, that they were better acquainted with the situation. No one would have dared to criticize Mr. Ferguson when he was trying to induce American capital to come into northern Ontario and invest in timber limits, water power and newsprint plants, and the same thing applies to Mr. Taschereau of Quebec. Who would have dared to dictate to the Manitoba government in connection with their power developments? Can anyone contend that this marketing bill will foresee all the activities of the future, whether social, industrial or otherwise? Will anyone contend that he can foretell what will happen five or ten years from now? In 1927, 1928 and 1929 there was an apparent shortage of power in Ontario and who could have foretold at that time that in 1934 we would have a surplus?

I believe in the cooperative spirit of the people and we must fully realize the situation we are facing. I should like to mention I believe this act has been misnamed, it should be the national regulatory act. Codes have been established in the United States but I do not see anything of that kind in this bill, giving no protection to the small farmers, labourers and consumers.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) for admitting so frankly that the capitalist system is not one hundred per cent perfect. I think a further study on his part will reveal to him that the evils which he notes, especially those which were recorded in the article from the Herald from which he read, are inherent in the system.

From my point of view this measure is one of the most significant ever introduced in this house. It may or it may not accomplish the good or, on the other hand, the evil anticipated but it is remarkable in its tendencies. Many of its provisions are vague but I assume that in the discussion in committee their meaning will be fully ascertained. There are certain essential safeguards which seem to be entirely lacking and the operation of the bill is so dependent upon concurrent or enabling provincial legislation that it is next to impossible at this stage to forecast the actual working out of the proposals. However, I would say that the underlying principles are fairly clearly defined. Instead of there being only one principle involved, it seems to me that there are two principles involved in this bill. First, there is the government control of the marketing of certain natural products and derivatives thereof and, second, the bill affords another example of what is coming to be known as administrative legislation, that is, the granting to the government of certain general powers which it may carry out by means of regulations.

I should like to point out that this measure involves farreaching political consequences. It may very well mean much more than what appears on the surface, it may possibly involve the realignment of the political parties and organizations in Canada. I take it that by introducing this legislation the Conservative party is definitely committed to extending government control over industry; I can read the bill in no other light. Indeed, if the C.C.F. had introduced legislation of this kind I can fancy there would be hurled at us the charge that it was socialistic, communistic, bolshevistic and all the rest of it, and that we were destroying initiative and were all going to be regimented. The hon. member for Timiskaming has already suggested that in his speech.

Surely this is a great change in practice for the Conservative party. In this connection I recall an editorial which I read in the Ottawa Journal of May 3, 1929, entitled "Too Much Paternalism." This, I may observe, was in regard to certain insurance legislation. The editorial in question read:

> It is to be hoped that parliament and the government find a resting place for these recommendations in the most convenient waste basket. And the reason is clear. It is that if Canada keeps heeding all the reports that are made by committees, and goes on doing all the things that a lot of well-intentioned but misinformed people want her to do, then this country will become so burdened with paternalism and bureaucracy that the taxpayer will be crushed into the earth. Already, indeed, the hand of the state is everywhere. Yet, not satisfied with this, and despite complaints against the ever-increasing cost of government, we have men advocating insurance against unemployment.
> It is absolute nonsense. This country has no more need of unemployment insurance than it has need of polygamy. In a country like England, over-populated, and where industrial and economic conditions are entirely different from our own, there is something to be said for it. But in Canada, sparsely settled, lacking in population, and passing through an era of tremendous development, the proposition that it is necessary to insure our people against unemployment is absurd. Its only result would be to add to the cost of government, to produce more bureaucrats, and to discourage what is a real insurance against unemployment in Canada, namely, thrift and industry. . . .
> During the past few years we have seen Canada go in for a lot of expensive frills which, when first proposed, were widely ridiculed. And the reason is that any organized minority, if it wants to make enough noise, can put over most anything upon an indifferent and lethargic majority. That is why we are going further and further toward paternalism, looking more and more to the state to do things for us, and getting away from the old wholesome practice of individual effort.

Well, this measure says goodbye to all that. I do not think I need deal with the question of the liberty of the subject; it was very well dealt with by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I confess that some of us who were brought up more or less in the general principles of economy as taught by the Manchester school have had some little difficulty in adjusting our thinking to the new world situation. For example when some years ago it was proposed to have a 100 per cent wheat pool I myself found it very difficult to acquiesce in the proposal. And yet, when one studies the situation, such proposals are after all only an extension of certain practices with which we have become familiar.

In my own city some years ago we desired to have a new water works system. A vote was taken and the majority of the people were in favour of the system, so that we put through the necessary legislation and installed the water works. Previously a man might have sunk a well in his backyard. He might as an individual have been opposed to the new arrangement, but under our municipal practice as sanctioned by the people, a bill was put through the legislature. The majority of the people felt that they ought to have a pure water supply and the minority had to come to terms and participate whether they wished it or not.

I have wondered, however, whether the government is prepared to carry out some of the implications of this principle under which the minority rights must be set aside in the interests of the general welfare. I hope the Prime Minister will not think I am taking advantage of his very generous hospitality to-day when I say that this train of thought was suggested by the speech of the Postmaster General of Australia. I find that in Australia when the majority of the bondholders were willing to accept a lower rate of interest the minority of the bondholders were, in his very happy phrase, "asked to agree." I would suggest that if the principle underlying this legislation is adopted by the government and the house as a whole we may as a next step hope for a referendum of bondholders with a view to reducing the rate of interest, and in that case the minority would be asked to agree. Of course, there would be nothing in the way of their being dragooned!

Mr. NEILL: Does my hon. friend find that in the bill?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but the principle of the bill might be extended into other spheres. Perhaps I would not be going too far if I congratulated the Conservative party on its virtual acceptance of some of the C.C.F. policies. Undoubtedly the British Marketing Act had a great influence in the drafting of this bill, and that act was originally drafted you will recall by a Socialist Labour minister in Great Britain. It is quite true that the act was subsequently modified before being adopted by the present British government, but it owes a great deal to its original drafting, and the original legislation was introduced as part of a definite and general scheme.

The trouble is that the present legislation might be described as patchy or streaky. It is a bit of socialism introduced into the capitalist system, and possibly we should remember the scriptural admonition against the sewing of a new patch on an old garment. If that is attempted the very great danger is that the rent will be made worse. I am afraid that this patchy legislation will not cure some of the major evils from which we are suffering at the present time.

While I congratulate the Conservatives on introducing this legislation even though I have tried to point out some of its weaknesses, and while I am a bit dubious whether or not the government will enact other legislation in harmony with it, I would say that the Liberals, by this bill, are placed in a very bad predicament. The leader of the opposition, quite honestly I think, still clings to the old laissez faire school of thought. He is heartily backed, of course, on every occasion by our friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young), and I am looking forward to that hon. gentleman's denunciations. We have already heard from the members for Last Mountain, Hants-Kings, West Edmonton, and others. They have already decided to oppose the bill on the ground, very largely, that it is an unwarrantable extension of governmental authority and an interference with the rights of the subject. I suppose they will have behind them, generally speaking, the Liberal sentiment of the present government of Quebec. On the other hand, may I point out that their position is weakened somewhat by the fact that the president of the National Liberal Federation has already departed very substantially from that attitude. At an earlier stage in the session I called attention to the speech delivered by Mr. Massey at Lake Couchiching on The New Economic Nationalism and I quote again for I think this is rather significant:

> It's a difficult world to live in; we are witnessing the very transition between old laissez-faire improvising ways of doing things, and a tightly planned modern state system. We have to plan our own recovery in this easy-going country of ours, our own reconstruction, our own relationship to this new world.

And again:

> The primary conflict is not therefore isolation versus internationalism but planning versus improvisation, and in this trouble planning will, I believe, be victorious.

Once again:

> It must suffice for me to say that national planning will have to be the foundation of Canada's international relations. Old conceptions of government must give place to new.

As I said before, I heartily agree with Mr. Massey's statement. Further than that, even such a sturdy organ of Liberalism as the Free Press of my own city is driven, in special cases, to abandon its old position. I notice an editorial in it of some months ago, July 31, on More Milk Regulation as follows:

> The whole argument for milk regulation is based on the vital importance of that commodity to the community. Any alert, intelligent public health policy must seek to assure all classes of the people of an adequate supply of milk of good quality. For the healthy growth of children this is particularly important. The effect of a better-than-usual supply of milk for the children of families on relief has been noted by many. It is necessary, therefore, that the retail price of milk should be kept as low as possible, and that requires that the spread between the price to the producer and that to the consumer should be no more than is reasonably necessary. That can only be assured if the distribution is on an efficient economic basis.
> The most striking thing revealed by a consideration of the present distribution system is that it is anything but economic. It is extremely wasteful and inefficient. The competition has led to the establishment of more plants for the pasteurization and handling of the milk than are necessary and many more wagons than would be required if the companies were not following one another around in all parts of the city. This wasteful duplication is paid for by the consumers, including many who can ill-afford it.

That is precisely the situation which has developed in our city and I believe it is situations of that kind which the bill before us is designed to meet. Moreover, the Liberals are having their difficulties because of the defection of large numbers of younger Liberals throughout the country who, perhaps, are more flexible in thinking and realizing the need of a change in policy. The outstanding example now is that of British Columbia where Mr. Pattullo has come out with certain legislation that is remarkably similar to the bill we are at present discussing and which is an entire abandonment of the old laissez-faire policy. I understand that the only possible way in which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) can answer those who appeal to him against Mr. Pattullo is by bringing forward another Liberal principle that he does not believe the dominion should enter upon a discussion of provincial matters; that each province should be autonomous. That may do for the time being, but it does not alter the fact that Liberals all over are being forced out of their old position.

In this matter the government it seems to me, is in rather a happy position because it has the support at least of the governments of the west. British Columbia, a Liberal government; Alberta, a U. F. A. government; Saskatchewan, a Conservative government and Manitoba, a Bracken-Liberal government—all these are more or less committed to the principle underlying this bill. So far as laissez-faire is concerned, the stars in their courses are surely fighting against Sisera. I think I cannot but take advantage of this opportunity to place before the house the position of our own organization in this matter of external trade. Plank No. 5 reads:

The regulation in accordance with the national plan of external trade through import and export boards—

Canada is dependent on external sources of supply for many of her essential requirements of raw materials and manufactured products. These she can obtain only by large exports of the goods she is best fitted to produce. The strangling of our export trade by insane protectionist policies must be brought to an end. But the old controversies between free traders and protectionists are now largely obsolete. In a world of nationally organized economies Canada must organize the buying and selling of her main imports and exports under public boards and take steps to regulate the flow of less important commodities by a system of licences. By so doing she will be enabled to make the best trade agreements possible with foreign countries, put a stop to the exploitation of both primary producer and ultimate consumer, make possible the coordination of internal processing, transportation and marketing of farm products, and facilitate the establishment of stable prices for such export commodities.

Permit me to say that the government in this bill goes much further in the direction of bureauracy than we in the C. C. F. would like to see, because we believe that whilst there must be some sort of social control, we should do our utmost to avoid centralized control and on the other hand rather encourage the development of cooperative institutions. The lack of such provision in this bill is one of its most serious deficiencies. In this connection may I read our plank No. 6 on cooperative institutions.

The encouragement by the public authority of both producers' and consumers' cooperative institutions—

In agriculture, as already mentioned, the primary producer can receive a larger net revenue through cooperative organization of purchases and marketing. Similarly in retail distribution of staple commodities such as milk, there is room for development both of public municipal operation and of consumers' cooperatives, and such cooperative organization can be extended into wholesale distribution and into manufacturing. Cooperative enterprises should be assisted by the state through appropriate legislation and through the provision of adequate credit facilities.

In this particular bill it would seem as if the state itself undertakes not merely the supervision but the actual administration of the marketing of goods. We on our part would rather see a larger measure of local cooperation.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I said that the bill contained very far-reaching provisions with regard to regulated products. Clause 4 indicates this. I do not think I need read it in detail, but it gives the board power:

To regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product—

And so forth.

To exempt from any determination or order any person or class of persons—

And so forth.

To compensate any person for loss sustained—

And so on. Clause 9 is also decidedly far-reaching as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) stated yesterday. I should like to ask: Why limit the control to natural products and to food or drink derived therefrom? Why not have control over manufactured products? If the breakfast foods would come under this legislation, and I think they would according to the terms of the clauses, why not clothes? If drink, we will say beer, would come under the terms of this legislation, why not furniture? It is all very well for the minister to tell us that all he contemplates is agricultural products, but the terms of the bill go much further than that. It would seem to me that the revelations coming out in connection with the price spreads committee clearly indicate that in connection with the processing we have great evils, and that we should exercise some sort of control not merely in the marketing of our natural products but also in the processing of them. Further than that, we should not limit its scope merely to food and drink derived from this class of natural products. Just how far the principle might carry us is indicated by the emergency action of the British cabinet back in 1921. I hold in my hand an article from the Manchester Guardian of April, 1921. Under that emergency action such provisions were included as:

That it shall be lawful for the Minister of Transport, the Board of Trade, and any other department approved for the purpose, and any person duly authorized by a department on whom powers are conferred by this regulation, where it appears necessary to do so, to take possession of any land, buildings or works (including works for the supply of gas, electricity, or water, and of any sources of water supply) and any property (including plant, machinery, equipment, and stores) used or intended to be used in connection therewith.

The Minister of Transport and the Commissioners of Works are empowered to take possession of any land, buildings, or other property for the purpose of providing accommodation in connection with any scheme of road transport or for housing persons engaged thereon, or of feeding or supplying necessaries to such persons.

The Admiralty, Army Council, Air Council, Minister of Transport, Commissioners of Works, and any other department approved for the purpose, are empowered to take possession of any food, forage, material, or stores, and any articles required for or in connection with the production thereof. After such department has issued a notice of possession any person who sells, removes, or secretes such material without consent, or deals contrary to conditions that may have been granted will be guilty of an offence against the regulations.

I mention this merely to show what would be involved if the principle contained in this bill were applied to other departments of our life.

Now there are several questions which I should like to ask the minister and the house. Three questions are outstanding in my mind as I read this bill. The first is, will the act benefit the producers unless there is a guaranteed minimum price? It seems to me that this is one of the fundamental questions involved in the present wheat situation. I cannot see that any government is justified in forcing the farmers to reduce the export of wheat, which means in practice more or less to reduce their acreage, unless there is supplementary legislation which provides that the farmers will be able to maintain a decent standard of living. Surely complementary to regulation, price fixing legislation is inevitable. That question I should like to have answered very definitely by the minister at some stage in this discussion.

The second question that occurs to me is, What provision is there for the protection of the consumer? In the British procedure more or less protection for the consumer is provided in the set up of the scheme. There are at least two committees, and provision for consumers' investigation. The publicity that is provided for, under I think section 9 of the British act, is to a considerable extent a safeguard to the public; yet notwithstanding these safeguards we find in practice that consumers are complaining a great deal about the actual working out of the British act. In the bill now before us I can find no protection whatever for the consumer.

The third question is, What about the employees? Personally I am strongly in favour of protection to the farmer, but if you protect the farmer you must surely protect his hired man. There must be some protection for farm labour. But nothing of that kind is included in the bill. Then again while certain secondary products come under this act, that is, food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product, it is not at all clear that those employees engaged in the processing are to have any protection. It is fresh in our minds that only a few months ago there was a strike in Stratford in connection with the packing plants. The employees were urging that they should receive an advance from 2 cents to 3 cents for each bird plucked. It would seem to the ordinary man that that was not an unreasonable demand, but it was denied by the packing companies. There ought to be very definite provision in legislation of this kind that the employees in any processing industry should be adequately protected. We have further illustrations in the revelations that are coming to us through the so-called Stevens committee. There is no doubt whatever that many employees are being paid much less than a living wage. In this legislation we are apparently overcoming some of the difficulties that have arisen through the division of jurisdiction as between the dominion and the provincial, so it would seem that we might incorporate into this act some sort of minimum wage legislation for those engaged in the manufacture of articles derived from natural products.

As there are a great many details and technical questions to be considered in relation to this bill, the proper procedure would be to send it to the agriculture committee where the experts might be heard. I cannot see how in any other way we can discuss the details with any very beneficial result.

There are several other matters to which I should like briefly to call attention in the time at my disposal. I would note that the central bank is being placed by the government under independent control. Why then, should this marketing board be in the direct control of the minister? That seems to me a great inconsistency. I should think that all the arguments which the government brought forward for the creation of an independent board to handle the money of this country would apply equally to the handling of agricultural products of this country. Further I note that in the setting up of a marketing scheme normally there is to be a petition from a representative number of the producers. There is no indication as to what constitutes a representative number. In the British act that is provided for. It seems to me that this is very loose indeed. Further there is no indication as to who is to bear the cost of such a petition. In the British act there is an arrangement under which the whole cost does not rest upon the producers. Especially in this country, where we are so widely scattered, I can understand that the bill as it now stands might work a very great hardship upon the cooperative organizations.

With regard to the section dealing with compensation, I am informed that in the Argentine the government has a monopoly of exchange and charges the importers in order to compensate the exporters. If our producers are to be compensated because of an adverse exchange it seems to me that we might very well charge the importers, who are benefiting by that self same adverse exchange. If we had some sort of clearing house in which arrangements of that kind could be made it would seem to me to be desirable.

We are told that we have before us a very important constitutional question. We have had difficulty because of the British North America Act, and I am told that although the provinces cannot delegate their authority to the dominion and the dominion cannot delegate its authority to the provinces, by the device of this marketing board in some mysterious way both can delegate authority, and it is presumed that this covers the whole ground. Hence it is said that the marketing board may have authority which can be secured neither by the provinces nor by the dominion. I am not a constitutional lawyer but I should like very much to have that point cleared up. In the meantime may I point out that under section 95 of the British North America it would seem that in any case the dominion government has very wide powers with regard to marketing. Section 95 reads:

> In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province, and to immigration into the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to agriculture in any or all of the provinces, and to immigration into any or all of the provinces;

This is what I should like noted:

> —and any law of the legislature of a province relative to agriculture or to immigration shall have effect in and for the province as long and as far only as it is not repugnant to any act of the parliament of Canada.

So it would seem to a layman at least that we need not worry too much with regard to the difficulty of jurisdiction if this dominion parliament acts in the matter.

I said a little while ago that the great difficulty I found in the proposed legislation was that it was simply one particular act, an attempt to bring about governmental regulation in one department of our public life. I ventured to say that was something like sewing a new piece of cloth on an old garment. In some way we must work out a new system. I know that a great many members of this house are prejudiced against the word "socialism." I am not particular whether or not that word is used, but I take it that we have reached the stage when we must have some sort of social control, if that term sounds any better. We are faced with a situation in which we have a large measure of monopoly, either private or public. I cannot think that we are going back to the old, individualistic way of doing things, and I do not think it is possible either to control these big trusts or to break them up in such a way as to overcome the terrific power they exert at the present time. Under these circumstances some of us believe that the only possible way is to have governmental monopoly or centralized government control over these monopolies which, if effective, would be pretty much the same as actual ownership. As I see the situation it is because we are living in an age of highly organized industry and yet have governments that are attempting to carry out policies that belong to an earlier age that we find ourselves in our present difficulties. If we went back one hundred or even fifty years I think a laissez faire policy would be good and that a free trade policy would be good, but unfortunately that stage of society has passed. Under these circumstances I would say to my Liberal friends that the only way to carry out the fundamental principles of Liberalism in this day is to secure some sort of planning which will be under democratic control. I think there is a danger that it might become autocratic; that is frankly what I fear in the action of my friends the Conservatives.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gobeil): The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. But it is possible, I submit, to have some sort of regulation under democracy: that is the problem we must work out in the future.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of a bill the first important consideration is that of distinguishing between the purpose of the bill and the principle which underlies its provisions. The purposes of the bill are usually set forth in the name given the measure itself, and the provisions of the bill indicate by their wording the principles upon which they are based. With respect to the measure now before the house the purpose is adequately described in the title, which reads:

> An act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

As to the desirability of a purpose to be served, as thus expressed, I think all parties in this house will be in entire agreement. There is need for improved methods and practices in the marketing of natural products; there can be no doubt of that, and there is also need for improvement in methods of furthering export trade. Those are highly commendable objects, and any provisions which will further those ends without injury to production and trade of the country or depriving individuals of rights, liberties and privileges which are sacred to all will, I believe, at this time, receive general endorsation. When, however, we come to discuss the question of the principles underlying this measure, we find that the means taken to effect these very desirable ends are questionable indeed and it is in these provisions that the principles are to be found on which the bill itself is based.

May I pause for a moment to say to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who has just taken his seat, that when he says the Liberal party is a party of laissez-faire he entirely misrepresents its position.

Mr. WOOODSWORTH: I am glad to know it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Liberal party at no time has been a party of laissez-faire. If one takes the history of Liberalism, either in the old land or in this land, one will find that most of the statutes relating to compulsory education, to industrial and social legislation, legislation respecting the regulation of factories, mines, shops and the like, and in this parliament, legislation respecting fair wages in government contracts, investigation of industrial disputes, combines, old age pensions and the like have been enacted at the instance of the Liberal party, and all these enactments have been in the nature of regulation and control. The Liberal party stands for regulation and control, but it stands for such regulation and control at the instance of parliament and not at the instance of bodies that are in no way responsible to parliament or to the electors of the country, and therefore without the necessary authority in the making of the laws.

The supreme consideration at the moment, it seems to me, is not whether we are to have regulated trade or regulated marketing —it is generally agreed that regulation is necessary—but whether that regulation is to be carried on by bodies which, under our constitution, are expected to legislate in matters of the kind or by powers delegated to special interests, or groups, or individuals with no responsibility to parliament or the people as a whole; in other words, whether parliament is to continue to be responsible for legislation as we have been for the most part up to to-day, or whether we in parliament are to divest ourselves of this obligation and transfer it to some bodies that hitherto have not had authority to effect those ends. That is a very large question, and it goes to the very heart of the situation in the world to-day. I know that in many parts of the world at the present time there is a tendency to get rid altogether of parliamentary institutions. In some countries the effort to get rid of them has taken the form of turning over government to groups who are given authority and power to manage and regulate as they deem best everything in the interest of persons belonging to particular occupations and callings. That is the method that is adopted in Russia. It is part of the soviet system. But that method I submit is not needed in Canada at the present time, and is not necessary to effect regulation in the most effective way.

Again there are movements in other countries, as for example in Germany, Italy and Austria, where the effort has been made to get rid of parliament altogether and turn over the power to legislate to dictators on the assumption that parliaments in those countries have broken down and have not served the purposes and met the needs of the people. I have nothing to say as to whether that is true of Italy and Germany and Austria, but I do say that so far as Canada and Great Britain are concerned it is not true. The parliaments of Canada and of Great Britain still stand as the great guardians of liberty and security for all classes of people in all parts of their respective countries. The exception that I am going to take to this particular legislation is that while it purports to be legislation to further the regulation of trade and the production and marketing of goods, it is really legislation designed to do away very largely, if not almost entirely, as I think I shall be able to show, with the power of parliament and the right of parliament to control in these all-important matters.

In that connection let me ask at once what are the principles underlying this legislation? As I have said, you have to look at the provisions, not the name of the statute to see what they are. In this bill they will be seen to explain why the government has found it necessary to divorce the carrying out of this legislation from parliamentary control altogether. When we examine the provisions of this bill we find that the principles are principles to restrict production and trade and to create monopolies. Those are the principles underlying this bill. I want to repeat that because it is all important. The principles underlying the provisions of this measure are the principles of restricting trade and restricting production and of creating monopolies with regard to commodities that are to be produced and bought and sold and stored and exported from different parts of the country.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Government monopolies?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Monopolies of producers in particular occupations, special groups controlling production, purchase and sale of different classes of products and commodities. My hon. friend, if he has read the bill, ought to have been able to discover that for himself. As to the principle that the essence of this whole measure is restriction of production and trade and the creation of monopolies there can be no question whatever. That is just where I am going to take issue with my hon. friends to my left in the far corner who are advocating some of the socialistic measures they have been putting forward. I do not believe they can have studied the provisions of this measure or they would not be prepared to give it the support they are doing to-day. I can understand how, in their desire to further the extension of state functions and to see a great bureaucracy built up, which of necessity will have to be supported by force, they are quite prepared to allow hon. gentlemen opposite meanwhile to transform the system of government in a way that would serve their ends in a socialist state. But I do say this, after listening to the same hon. gentlemen talking about individual liberty and denouncing a policy of scarcity, and after hearing them in one form or another contend for the rights of the poor and oppressed classes in the country, that they cannot have considered this legislation with care, or they would find it very difficult to give the support they have already expressed in its favour.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure that the right hon. gentleman would not suggest that we have advocated the extension of bureaucracy or advocated changes by force. None of that is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend all the time, even in his speech this afternoon, argues for the extension of state functions. How can you have an extension of state functions, let me ask him, without the creation of a bureaucracy? That is of the very essence of it. How can you possibly extend the functions of the state without creating a bureaucracy, and how can this bureaucracy carry out its functions except by the power of might, which is force, and which is always the power behind government and authority when it attempts to administer public affairs by a large extension of state functions? That is the answer I make to my hon. friend and to the members of his party. They have not come out and said: We are after force and bureaucracy. But the whole essence of the socialist state is founded on that, and my hon. friend knows it. No one knows it better than he does. He has read Cole's book on the method in which matters may have to be carried on for a time, he knows that Cole has said that the socialistic state will have to have a bureaucracy and be maintained by force, and that in the meantime as a step to that end socialists will probably have to allow Toryism to go very far to help create the needed bureaucracy and force and accustom the public mind to that kind of government. The members of the C.C.F. to-day are congratulating the government on this legislation which it has introduced. Is it not a nice spectacle to see an hon member, the leader of the C.C.F., which party regards itself as the antithesis of Toryism, congratulating Tories on their legislation, as my hon. friend has done in his speech this afternoon and that because it goes the length of further extending state functions in a manner which will inevitably serve to create a bureaucracy. We have our Tory friends opposite introducing legislation which, like the spider with the fly, is aimed at catching a few flies which happen to be at the far end of the chamber. They are prepared to walk into the spider's parlour for the time being to help the spider get through this particular legislation. But I am afraid the inevitable fate of the fly awaits them.

In order that it may be made perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the principles of the measure are as I have described them to be, let me give a bird's eye picture of what is proposed in the bill. Let hon. members carefully consider what it is that we are being asked to endorse. I might say, if one does not take the trouble to verify what one says by reference to the provisions themselves, the natural reaction to the picture would be that the measure could not mean anything of the kind, that it cannot possibly go so far. Let me give the picture.

First of all, in the regulation of trade and the marketing of our production in this country it might be asked, is it this parliament that is to regulate and say how much is to be produced, or what restrictions there are to be on trade, or how sales are to be regulated, or is it some other body or bodies? The bill does not provide that this parliament shall do any of these things at all, but it does provide that they shall be done by some bodies other than this parliament and in part by bodies that are not in existence at the present time. That is the first statement I want to make. This legislation is to give power to bodies that do not now exist, to make regulations which will restrict production and restrict trade, and to create offences for which it affixes penalties —it puts in this particular statute the penalties that are to follow if what is set forth as regulations and orders to be made by these bodies that do not yet exist is not carried out. That is what it provides.

The first proposal is that a marketing board shall be appointed and that certain powers shall be given to that board. What are the powers? One power is that if a group of persons in any local district come together and wish to regulate trade as respects a particular commodity, or group of commodities, it may petition the government to have the production of and trade in that particular commodity or group of commodities regulated in the manner it suggests. The government is then to pass on the petition to this board. If, after looking it over, the board advises that it is desirable to carry out the scheme—I direct attention to the word "scheme"; it is a scheme, not a law that is to be carried out—then the governor in council—not this parliament; parliament does not appear again once this bill has been assented to by the representative of the sovereign—may approve the scheme and publish its approval in the Canada Gazette. The scheme then becomes law; everything set forth in the scheme as framed and fashioned in that manner becomes part of the law of the land to which it applies. It need not and probably will not, apply to the country as a whole. There may be one scheme in British Columbia, another in Quebec and another in Nova Scotia; there is no obligation of uniformity, it is simply a scheme which a particular group of producers in a particular part of the country have agreed upon. Once it is approved of by the board, it becomes law in that part of the country.

This provision is put in the bill to please our socialist friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. It was put there to catch the leader of that party just as he has been caught this afternoon when he said that this means the beginning of socialism. His objection was that the scheme was not large enough, that it went just a certain distance, that it did not go far enough to suit him. It brought him, however, right into line with the government in supporting the measure because it is the beginning of the control of production and of trade not by parliament, but by groups which have united together to draw up schemes which are to be made applicable at their instance to the rest of society. Have we come to the time when that sort of thing is desirable? Are there to be no interests considered other than those of a particular group? Parliament stands for the necessity of seeing that all classes likely to be affected by legislation are heard from before legislation is imposed upon them. Does this law require that all classes shall be heard? It distinctly rules out all but one particular class and that the class whose self-interest and that alone is to govern. Take any group, whether they be tobacco growers, apple growers, hog raisers or other producers. Let that group come together and let a representative number of its members petition that the affairs of their trade as far as production, sale and the rest of it is concerned are to be managed in such and such a way in accordance with some scheme they have devised, if the board, the minister and governor in council approve of that scheme, it then becomes law. What about the men who belong to other occupations and callings? What about consumers generally? What about the great body of labour that the hon. member champions so eloquently in this house? They may not happen to be the particular group that is legislating in its own self-interest, but they will all be affected by the law the group is creating. Not one of them is to be heard in advance of the making of the law. The fines and imprisonments that are to apply to anyone who dares to violate what becomes the law are put down in the bill but what the law is to be none save the self-interested parties are to have a word. As I say, this was all intended for Cooperative Commonwealth Federation consumption.

Let us see what is intended in reality. Even if there is no petition by any group, even if there is no request from any source, if the government of the day or an unnamed minister—the bill does not say what minister; it may be the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), or any other minister—thinks it desirable to restrict trade or to restrict production, then the governor in council may make such regulations as are necessary to restrict that trade or production or regulate its business in other ways. That is all to be done without any reference to parliament. Is my hon. friend willing to turn over to the Tory party of Canada the complete control of all trade, and of the direction which it is to take? That is pretty much what he is doing in the support he is giving this measure. I have heard him advocate the desirability of trade with all nations and all countries.

There are two blights, so far as policy is concerned, which have been put upon the trade of this country since the present administration came into office. One is the blight of economic nationalism which seeks to bring everything in the matter of manufacture and trade within the confines of our own country, and the other, which I consider to be worse, the blight of economic imperialism, which seeks so to direct matters by legislation, as for example the United Kingdom-Canada trade agreement, tariffs, national revenue rulings and the like, that whatever little trade there may be beyond our borders shall be confined as largely as possible within the British Empire with as little as possible relatively with any foreign country. There is to be found the real significance of the powers to be conferred upon the governor in council under this legislation. When the government believes it is in the interests of its own policies it may pass any order it pleases with regard to the trade of Canada, regardless of the legislation parliament itself has enacted or may enact.

Do hon. members realize that this bill gives to the governor in council the power to prohibit absolutely the importation of goods from another country which the government may allege it is in the public interest to prohibit? Do hon. members realize that it gives the government not only the power to prohibit imports, but the power to prohibit the export of goods from this country? That is the power given to the governor in council. This parliament is to part altogether with its right to say what is to be imported or exported; under the provisions of this bill, hereafter the governor in council will have that power. I ask: Since when has this parliament decided to throw up its hands in the matter of the control of the tariffs of the country? Tariffs will be of no effect after powers of this kind are given to the governor in council. I have always understood that the great function of parliament was to control the revenues and expenditures of the country and that tariffs played a very important part both with respect to revenues and what as a consequence may be possible in the way of outlay. This legislation takes away from this parliament any possible control with respect to any article or series of articles coming within its comprehensive provisions in connection with which the government of the day may wish to prohibit exportation or importation. I submit that is going pretty far. As I have said, the effort is to get away from parliament altogether in the matter of restricting and prohibiting the importation and exportation of goods, as well as in the matter of regulating production.

The bill as it is presented to this house destroys all that we have been taught to cherish as the essence of British liberty. As it now stands, it destroys all that upon which our parliamentary system in the truest sense of the word rests. It is unconstitutional from beginning to end; it simply ignores the constitution of the country and the constitutional rights of parliament. I would go further and say that it is subversive of our judicial system, as I shall be able shortly to show. Men have been accustomed in this country to believe that they had some protection of their rights in property and the fruits of their own labour, in the judiciary of the country, that the courts of the land would have something to say as to whether or not they were to have their right to hold their own property respected and to do with it what they pleased. It will no longer be so, once this bill passes if it carries in its present form. This law declares that, once these different boards to be created in the manner I have described have made certain regulations, they may go to the extent of prohibiting a man from working on his own property or from selling his goods. That is to be the law, and he has no escape; all that the courts can now do is to see to the imposition of the fines and penalties here set forth.

We have had a good deal of discussion in this house about the unwisdom of the blank cheque, the principle of giving to the government or to anyone the power to dip into the public treasury for particular funds as needed, without control on the part of parliament, and we on this side have fought that proposal right along for four succeeding sessions. I believe that some of my hon. friends in the far corner for part of the time supported the Liberal party in that effort, but may I say that this bill repeats this very thing. It does not do so as an emergency measure to furnish relief, but it does propose to enable the government to do as it pleases with regard, not to increasing but to limiting production, not to expanding but to restricting trade. It goes a step further than that, for it takes the matter right out of the hands even of the governor in council and allows a board that is not yet in existence, the personnel of which, so far, we know nothing about, to dip into the treasury, into the consolidated revenue fund of the country and take out moneys for its own purposes. In order to enable it to satisfy its own needs, are we in this parliament going to hand the public treasury over to some board about the personnel of which we at present know nothing, and shall know nothing even after this legislation passes, until the board is actually in existence?

Let me now read some of the provisions—it is necessary to read the provisions, because the language I have used would seem unbelievable but for the fact that it is demanded by these very provisions. But before I quote them, let me pause and ask my hon. friends, who support this legislation, whether they believe in the old principle, "no taxation without representation." They accuse the Liberal party of standing for certain principles and shibboleths. Well, if we stand for them we stand for them because they have been the security of men and nations through the centuries, and they are the things that have stood up against revolution and against the kind of movements hon. gentlemen are fomenting at the present time—against Toryism

Mr. McINTOSH: And will do it again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition has stated that the Liberal party is standing out against revolution, which is being fomented by members in this corner. That is absolutely untrue and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that. I said against revolution, yes; the Liberal party stands against it. And, I added, certain movements of the kind my hon. friends are trying to further. I do not withdraw that, because the movement my hon. friend is trying to further is one I denounce —taking the making of laws from parliament and putting that duty in the hands of others.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I listened carefully to what was said, and I suppose it will come out in Hansard. But I refuse to allow the leader of the opposition to imply—

Mr. SPOTTON: He will change Hansard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, he will not change it, but I refuse to allow the leader of the opposition to say that we in this corner are seeking to foment revolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I think that, with your authority, Hansard might be permitted to read the notes now of what I said.

Mr. SPEAKER: If that is necessary, but I cannot see that the point of order is well taken. I do not see that the leader of the opposition was not within his rights—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) made the statement that I would change Hansard, and I ask that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. SPOTTON: I will change it to "revise Hansard."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We can all measure the size of the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not catch your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I think I am right in saying that there should be no implication whatever from the leader of the opposition, that any member in this corner of the house is fomenting revolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will say at once to my hon. friend that I made no statement of that kind with reference to him and his party. In my reference to revolution, what was actually in my mind when I spoke was the period of the civil wars in Britain when one party stood for the right of parliament to protect the people against impositions which the crown had no right to exact, and I meant that it was the Liberal principle of the rights of the people in the matter of their control over taxation that saved that kind of situation. And, I added, we stood against movements such as my hon. friend is leading—movements that would wipe out parliament and substitute soviets with respect to regulations to be imposed in some of these matters.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has no right to interrupt; there is no point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With all due respect to you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) may not agree with what has been said and he may argue that the inference from what he said is not correct. But there is no point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am willing to accept the explanation of the leader of the opposition that there was no implication, but in making that explanation the leader of the opposition says that we are seeking to wipe out parliamentary institutions—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and it is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition may or may not be correct in that inference, but he is within his rights in drawing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, Mr. Speaker, upon what does our whole parliamentary life rest? It rests upon the control by parliament, the commons in particular, over the revenues of the country, over expenditures, over taxation. That is what parliamentary life rests upon and has rested upon since there has been a free parliament in any part of the British Empire. The essence of it is complete control over taxation by parliament itself.

What has my hon. friend been supporting in his speech? He was supporting this bill. What are our friends opposite seeking in this legislation? The object of this legislation is to get away from parliament by the setting up of a board, the personnel of which we know nothing about, and can know nothing about until it comes into existence, and to give to that board and other boards powers which parliament alone should have. Let me read subsection 5 of section 3:

> The board may, with the approval of the governor in council, employ such technical, professional and other officers and employees as the board may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the board with the approval of the governor in council.

There is no mention of parliament there—no mention whatever of parliament, and there is to be no appropriation by parliament of moneys for the purpose, the board itself on authorization by the governor in council may take what is necessary out of the consolidated revenue fund. The board is to fix salaries and the governor in council to approve. Let me quote subsection 6:

> The board shall be a body corporate and shall have power for the purposes of this act to acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property.

Since I have been in this parliament, until the present administration came into office, the practice has been, when money was required for the purposes of bodies appointed under legislation, for an amount to appear in the estimates presented to this house setting forth the amount of money required, and for that amount or such portion of it as the house might be willing to grant to be appropriated in accordance with the custom and practice of parliament for centuries past. That custom was abandoned under the relief measure. Now that, under the guise of an emergency, the government have succeeded for three or four years in getting rid of parliamentary control in that way, we begin to see the reason that power has been sought all along. It is to give the governor in council, one individual, a dictatorship. The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that the difference between the executive in the United States and in Canada was that the executive there was one man while here it was a number of men. I told him that I thought I could point out that the executive here was still one man; it was the sovereign and in Canada his representative, and the Prime Minister admitted that. But it is the sovereign advised by the prime minister and his colleagues. To-day the Prime Minister and his colleagues have come to be the real executive, the principle however remains exactly the same; whether the executive is the sovereign acting in his own right, or the sovereign acting on the advice of his ministers, the responsibility ought to be to parliament; parliament should not be parting with its rights in order to turn them over to the executive. What does it matter if at one time the executive is a sovereign and at another a prime minister, supposing their powers to be the same and alike autocratic. We are face to face in Canada at this time with exactly the same situation—and I am going to refer to it a little later on—as the barons of Runnymede were with King John. John, the sole executive of his day, asserted that he had the right to say what moneys were to be spent and what was to go for this purpose and what for that. What has been suggested by the ministry opposite in this and other legislation? It is not that parliament shall have control of the money, but that the executive may do what it pleases with the public treasury with regard to those matters in connection with which it has been given and is now further seeking a free hand?

Let us take clause 3, subclause 9:

> The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act.

What is that other than a blank cheque? The government have already taken a blank cheque for use with respect to all their powers with regard to any thing that can be done under alleged peace, order and good government. They have a blank cheque with reference to all expenditures they may wish to make for purposes of relief. The time has surely come when we should make a decided stand against the taking of that power becoming the habitual practice of the government in relation to the regular business of the country. This is not an emergency. One cannot get away from the language of this provision: not parliament but—

> The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act.

That is as unconstitutional as anything can possibly be. It is setting at defiance the whole function and purpose of parliament, namely, the control of the expenditures of this country and the taxation. It is parting with that and giving it to an executive to do with as it may wish and thinks best. That is not the only such provision. Let me go a little further. Not only can they use the public funds in this way but—

> The board—

This is not even the governor in council.

> —shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power—

What power?

> —to compensate any person for loss sustained by exporting, storing or withholding from the market any product pursuant to any determination or order of the board.

That is, the board may go into the consolidated revenue fund and begin to compensate people. I have always thought that when compensation was needed, parliament was asked to vote the money necessary and an appropriation especially for the purpose was required.

Let me go a step further:

> To compensate any person in respect of any shipment made pursuant to any determination or order of the board to a country whose currency is depreciated, in relation to Canadian currency, for loss due to such depreciation.

I am not saying that there should not be compensation in certain cases, but what I do say is that whatever compensation is to be made out of public moneys, the House of Commons should say how much compensation is to be paid and appropriate what is necessary before anything is paid. No board, no governor in council should have that right. It belongs to the people's representatives in the House of Commons.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How about the compensation for the destruction of diseased cattle?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is getting restless, I know, but let him try to retain his patience for a time.

Let us go a step further and see what powers are given to this board. We have been criticizing the ministry opposite for what they have taken in the way of power not only to pay out moneys under a blank cheque, but also to give guarantees for different purposes, using relief measures for making loans, guaranteeing advances by banks, and the like, and I think the leader of the C.C.F. has criticized them pretty severely for what they have been doing in the way of making loans and guarantees. We have now reached the point where they are going even a step further. Not only do they wish to do that themselves but they are willing to let this unnamed board do it. Paragraph (e) of clause 4, following the words:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power—

> To assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product.

We have in Ottawa a bureau of research, one that cost this country quite a sum of money and that is doing excellent work. When money for research work is required, the minister in charge of the department brings in his estimates and asks parliament for an appropriation for that purpose. We discuss the purpose here and find out whether it is in the public interest, and whether, other interests being considered, that particular interest should be the one that should receive the attention the minister is asking for it. Then in the light of what is best for all, and not merely for one particular interest, the vote is granted. But under this legislation the board, not parliament, is to have the right to make grants or loans, to assist research and all the other objects mentioned in the section. About all the power parliament will have left will be to make good the losses that will inevitably occur as a consequence of those grants or loans.

Let me take another paragraph in the same part under the powers of the board. Paragraph (h) states:

> To pay the operating and necessary expenses of the board.

Having in mind the necessary taxation, that is a nice provision—for the board. I do not know that it is equally good for the people who have to pay the bills. But this legislation gives to the board power to pay its own operating and necessary expenses.

Then paragraph (i) states:

To acquire, hold and alienate such real property as in the opinion of the governor in council may be necessary for the purposes of the board.

If one reads this bill through, one cannot find anywhere within the four corners of it provision that parliament is the body that has to make the appropriation in the first instance.

These are all evidences in this legislation of a violation of that most sacred of all principles: No taxation without representation, and control by the House of Commons over the expenditure of public moneys. Where is the public, as a whole, represented on the board that is to make expenditures in this way? The only real representation worthy of the name is that of this House of Commons which represents the whole of the nation.

I shall now come to some provisions that deal with the power to legislate generally. I have dealt specifically with expenditures of public money. The "blank cheque" is only one phase. Let me now cite wherein this legislation does away with the rights of parliament to legislate on other matters and turns this power over to other bodies. I have read some provisions which relate more particularly to taxation and control of power and expenditures. I come now more specifically to those which relate to the making of laws with respect to production and trade.

Clause 8 states:

Whenever the governor in council is satisfied, on the recommendation of the minister, that a majority of the persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product so require, he may approve of a proposal for,—

(a) the extension of the geographical limits of any part of Canada to which an existing scheme relates;

(b) the extension of the powers of any local board;

(c) the amalgamation of two or more local boards.

And so forth. Not parliament, but the governor in council and the board between them are to determine how far a law is to apply. It is to be remembered "an existing scheme" means the regulations made by a board and which have the force of law. Listen to this:

9. Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in the said product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board to regulate such product, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of such product, and the governor in council may approve of such scheme and authorize the board to administer such scheme directly or through any agency which it may establish. Such scheme shall continue in force until terminated by—

By parliament? No, by the governor in council.

Are my hon. friends opposite prepared to support that kind of legislation? Is anyone in this House of Commons prepared to support it, if he really understands it?—that a minister of the crown, unnamed, may if he thinks it desirable frame a scheme the purpose of which is to regulate production and marketing, and which, if he can get his colleagues to agree to it, then becomes part of the law of the land, and those who do not carry on their production or the sale of their commodities in the terms of what is laid down, not by parliament but by this scheme, are to be subject to fines and penalties and possibly imprisonment. Does anyone believe that that is something which this House of Commons should tolerate for a moment? If any plan for the regulation of trade or production cannot stand the criticism of this parliament, that is the strongest reason why it should never be put into operation. Let the minister come to this House of Commons and this parliament with a plan—"plan" would be a much better word than "scheme," although "scheme" comes nearer to indicating what it will be when it is really wrought out.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Very symbolical.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If a minister of the crown will come with any plan or scheme which has anything to commend it, surely with such a majority as hon. gentlemen opposite have they could count on getting it through the House of Commons. If they cannot, they have no right to say that when this parliament is no longer in session or apart from this parliament, they shall be free to set up any kind of plan or scheme they please.

I pause to make clear what is meant by "a natural product." The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) assumed all through his speech that what is referred to is simply farm products. But that is not this bill at all. Let me tell him that this term has an application very much wider than merely to farm products. He pointed out that the British North America Act contains a clause which places agriculture under both provincial and federal jurisdiction, and argued that at least it would seem that under that clause something might be done. The products of agriculture are only one of the classes enumerated. Look at the definition of "natural product" as set forth in the bill:

(e) "natural product" means any product of agriculture or of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product.

That includes, to begin with, pretty much everything that it is possible to eat or drink, and also a great many other things. It includes boots, shoes, clothing, furniture and furnishings, household supplies and the like; it includes any article which can be partly manufactured or derived from the natural products mentioned. And you are giving power to this government to make a law with respect to who is to produce those commodities, how much is to be produced, who is to sell them, or whether they are even to be offered for sale. And, as I shall show a little later, you are making it a criminal offence if some man should by chance even offer for sale something that under one of these boards or schemes is prohibited or restricted.

Let us go a little further on that point. Listen to this:

12. (2) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette—

Let me pause there—not by law of the parliament of Canada, not by any statute, but by order or regulation of the governor in council,—

(a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence;

but also to quote first 12 (1):

The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product, and the governor in council shall have power to make regulations to provide for the licensing by the minister of importers, or otherwise to enforce any order made hereunder.

Can we conceive of anything more sweeping? In other words, hereafter we are to be governed not by statutes but by such orders or regulations as the governor in council may make to restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product. What does it mean? If the government should make up its mind that it is desirable hereafter that trade shall flow only in certain channels, that it is not desirable for example that the people shall get oranges or coffee or sugar at a less cost by getting these and other necessaries from some particular country that would like to trade with Canada but that does not happen to be within the British Empire, then it may prohibit these goods coming from that country and say that we shall get that kind of product hereafter only from the particular countries within the British empire so designated or implied. This is economic imperialism which, as I said a moment ago, is their pet policy. In the last campaign the policy was economic nationalism: Canada first, but it has since grown to economic imperialism: Empire first. This section gives this government power to say what goods are to come into the country and what may be exported out of the country. I do not think I need stress that much further. However let me re-read subsection 2:

The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette,—
(a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence;

There you are! Now, Mr. Producer, no matter what you are producing, if it suits the governor in council—not if it suits the parliament of Canada, not if it is a law that has been put on the statutes while members of parliament from all parts of Canada were present—if it happens to suit the governor in council, whether parliament is in session or not, to say that you shall not export anything without a licence, then you will have to get a licence, and without it you cannot export. Let us read the second section. The governor in council may:

(b) prescribe the forms of such licences, the terms and conditions thereof and the persons who shall have authority to issue the same;

That is a fine power to give to a government on the eve of a general election, to send around the country a lot of agents of the government of the day with power to issue licences to the producers in the different localities.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Campaign funds!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And further the governor in council may:

(c) impose penalties for breach of any such order or regulation or of any licence issued thereunder, and, generally, make such provision or authorize the doing of such acts or things as may in his discretion be deemed necessary or expedient for giving full effect to any order, regulations, or licences issued or made hereunder.

What freedom is there left to a producer? And this applies to all who have to do with the natural products named. Not merely those engaged in the various branches of agriculture but fishermen, producers of forest products and of all things that are manufactured or derived from the natural products mentioned are, as regards production and sale, all to be at the mercy of what the governor in council may do.

I know what the minister is going to say when he gets up to answer. He is going to say: Do you think we are going to exercise these powers? We want them, but we are not going to exercise them. That is what we have been hearing all along. But when that argument has to be brought to the defence of a measure it is the strongest reason why the measure should not be enacted at all. We cannot afford to give to any government, as this measure does, power to do what it pleases with respect to production and trade.

Now let us go a little further. The governor in council and the boards to be established by him under this act may in the manner described create offences for breach of any regulations made. That is something new; that goes further than anything we have had up to the present time. Heretofore I have understood that parliament was the only body that had the right to create crimes and impose penalties, that the consent of the House of Commons and the Senate and the assent of the representative of the sovereign were necessary before any particular act could be made a crime. It is not apparently to be so hereafter. The governor in council may make any regulations he pleases and may prescribe penalties; any breach of such regulations will constitute a crime.

Now let us come to another point, which I wish particularly to stress. I refer to the right set out in Magna Charta that no man shall be dispossessed of his rights without the lawful judgment of his peers under the law of the land; not the law as made by the governor in council, not the law as made by some unnamed and as yet unexisting body, but the law of the land as known to everyone. It is an essential principle of liberty and freedom that the law of the land should be known, that it should be so known that every man as he runs may read. The law should not be something which is to make its appearance in the Canada Gazette after some board or governor in council, not parliament, has passed a regulation; it is something that should appear in the statutes of the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Was Beauharnois given away by order in council or by parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So far as Beauharnois was concerned, it was a matter of the provincial government; the government of the province of Quebec gave to the Beauharnois company the powers it had. The federal executive of the day only complied with the provisions of an act of this parliament which obliged it to pass upon whether or not certain conditions laid down by parliament with respect to non-interference with navigation had been complied with. Those conditions were complied with and, so far as the government of the day was concerned, it would have been a greater wrong, if wrong it could be said to have been, not to have certified to what its own officials stated were the facts, than to have taken the course which by the terms of the legislation it was obliged to take. My hon. friend knows that. But may I ask my hon. friend this question: Why does he interject that remark into a discussion of this kind? Is he trying to befog or get away from the issue? I think my hon. friend is beginning to see some of the weaknesses of his own position and is adopting the Tory tactics of trying to do all he possibly can to becloud the issue. My hon. friend and the Tories are getting closer and closer together every day.

I was referring to the principle that no man could be dispossessed of his property without trial by his peers under the law of the land. What does this measure say? Up to the present our conception has been that, excepting under the law of the land, no man shall be dispossessed of his property, but what do we find on referring to the subsection I read a moment ago, subsection (a) of section 4?

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power—
> (a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

Let me make this perfectly clear. If it is necessary that certain grades should be prohibited from being marketed; if certain things of that kind are essential I for one will support anything of that nature, provided I am afforded opportunity to support it on the floor of this house as part of the legislation going through this parliament, in the interests of all and in a form in which its provisions will be known to all. But it is not our responsibility, when we are sent here to protect the interests of the people at large, to turn over a duty of that kind to some other body. So with subsection (f):

> to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder.

If certain trades are to be licensed, it is for this parliament to say what those trades should be, and to lay down the law and determine the offence and the penalties, instead of leaving it to some other body to attempt anything of that kind.

Then, when a scheme has been approved by the governor in council—a scheme put forward by the governor in council and published by the minister in the Canada Gazette—we come to section 6, which provides

(2) The provisions of the scheme as approved shall have the force of law, and the local board shall, from the date of the publication of the said notice of approval, be a body politic and corporate.

There you have the establishment of a soviet, a little group who are to have complete control of their own scheme that has been approved by the governor in council. Is that not taking away from the people at large rights which they are entitled to have defended by this parliament? Then under the head of offences, and I regard this as a very serious matter, I find the following:

Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

That is section 14. This House of Commons is being asked to enact penalties of this kind which will subject the citizens of this country to the possibility of fine and imprisonment, for what? For offences that we know of at the present time? No, for something a board, either the large board or a local board, may determine hereafter to be an offence. Well, I say we may be prepared to see the last vestige of liberty on the part of the citizens of this country go if that clause is ever allowed to remain in this act.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, before recess I was speaking of the principles underlying this measure and had pointed out that as one reads the provisions of the bill he discovers that its primary purpose is that of limiting production, restricting trade, and creating monopolies in the production and sale of natural products. I pointed out that the provisions of the bill justified the view that it aimed at taking from parliament and transferring to a board to be appointed under the statute, and to local boards to be appointed in sections of the different provinces, the power to make regulations with respect to the production and storing and sale of natural products, but that parliament itself is not to be the body that under the act will make whatever may be necessary in the way of regulations.

I had also pointed out that under this bill when enacted into law there will be transferred from parliament to other bodies the creation of offences, offences in the nature of crimes, offences punishable by fine and imprisonment, and that all that is expected of this parliament is to fix certain penalties without knowing what the offences are to which the penalties are to be attached. The penalties are set forth in the bill, but I do not hesitate to assert that not a member of parliament can indicate at the moment what the offences are to which they are to apply. They are offences still to be determined by local boards, to be appointed under the act or by the governor in council.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that legislation of this kind violates the fundamental principles of British liberty, violates our constitutional system of government, violates every tradition on which our parliamentary system rests. I cited from the bill numerous provisions, anticipating to that extent the discussion in committee, because as I stated I believed that apart from this evidence the house would find it difficult to conceive that principles such as this could be embodied in legislation introduced into this parliament by any government. I think I have given instances enough of the provisions to make clear the assertion that I have made.

There is a portion of the bill to which I have not yet made reference and on which I wish to make one or two brief comments, and that is the last part which provides for investigation into some of the matters we have been discussing. Let me say at once that I believe there are certain evils which investigation is much more effective in curing than is any penalty. Publicity is a means of letting the light into situations that will not bear the light of day, and may serve even more effectively than any penalties that can be attached to the violations of the provisions of an act to avoid the evil which may be disclosed as the result of investigation. I welcome in the fullest degree any legislation which will provide for the fullest kind of investigation into industrial and commercial evils, but where there is to be investigation hereafter, care should be taken to see that innocent parties are afforded the same degree of security as that to which they are entitled in any inquiry which would be carried on in the way in which parliament has hitherto provided. This legislation with respect to investigation does away with the safeguards which ensure to innocent parties their rights and liberties. It creates an interference with industry, not at the instance of parliament, but at the caprice of a minister of the crown.

The investigations provided for are to take place by the minister on his own initiative if he so desires, or at the request of a board, and the minister's initiative in matters of the kind, however he may seek to deny that such is the case, is bound to be in a large measure the result of political pressure. There will always be open the possibility of believing that the investigation has taken place from a political motive, and that it is being directed towards political ends. That is bound to be the case where power is left entirely in the hands of one individual, and where the investigation is not provided for in accordance with some predetermined method which has been approved of by parliament as a whole.

The bill goes very far in regard to what it permits in the way of investigation. It enables the minister to name the investigators, to choose them out of a self-interested group, because it is the group that wishes to have its production regulated and has succeeded in getting certain regulations passed under the provisions of the act, and this group of investigators is given power to determine what condition exists that is against the public interest and that is detrimental in a number of directions which the act defines. They not only have the power to determine what exists in this way, but as a result of their investigation they determine in addition what the offence is.

The penalties, as I say, are set forth in the bill, and we are to be asked to enact those penalties into law. But the body that is to fix the penalties is not to be the body that is to determine the offence. While parliament is to fix the penalties, this bill asks us to hand over to unnamed individuals and unnamed organizations and groups the determining of the offences to which these penalties shall apply. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that without actually reading the sections of the bill anyone not in this House of Commons and with the bill before him would say that this was a misrepresentation of the situation, that such could not possibly be the case. I therefore wish to refer very hurriedly to the sections which bear out what I have said.

Under the head of Investigations in part II I read:

In this part and in any regulation made hereunder, unless the context otherwise requires,

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

(a) "committee" means a committee appointed hereunder by the minister—

A committee of unnamed individuals and groups. Then it goes on to define what "spread" is. There is also a clause which deals with the power to authorize investigations:

16. (1) The minister may at the request of the board or upon his own initiative authorize an investigation into—

Look at the number of subjects:

—the cost of production, prices, spread, trade practices, methods of financing, management, policies, grading, transportation and other matters in relation to the production and marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of any natural product.

As I pointed out this afternoon, "any natural product" means any product of agriculture, of the forest, of the sea, of the lake or of the river and any article of food or anything wholly or partly derived from any such product. This means that the minister on his own initiative may appoint a committee to inquire into almost anything at any time. This all is perfectly clear. What security is there for business when it cannot be carried on without undue interference on the part of the minister who may or may not exercise his authority for political reasons? What does this committee do? Section 17 reads:

(1) Whenever as a result of any such investigation the minister shall have reason to believe that such a situation exists as requires further inquiry he may at the request of the board or on his own initiative—

It comes back again to the minister each time.

—appoint a committee to inquire into the spread in connection with the marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of a regulated product.

Who are the committee? Subsection 2 reads:

(2) A committee shall be composed of such number of representatives of producers and persons engaged in marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion, and consumers, as the minister shall decide, and there shall be a representative of the minister who shall act as chairman.

What are the powers of the committee? Section 18 reads:

(1) A committee shall have power to investigate all operations occurring in connection with or in the course of marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of the regulated product for the purpose of ascertaining the spread received by any person in the course of such marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion, and whether the same is detrimental to or against the interest of the public in that it is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the regulated product.

In addition to having those powers, the committee has the determination of the result of the investigation. Section 19 reads:

A committee may after investigation as hereinbefore provided determine, in connection with any operation occurring in the course of marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of the regulated product, what spread is detrimental to or against the interest of the public in that it is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the regulated product.

That is not some body created according to the laws of the land such as a commission whose powers are definitely fixed by statute; it is simply a committee which has this power of determining what is detrimental, excessive and so forth. Section 20 reads:

A committee shall in the manner prescribed by regulations publish every determination made by it hereunder.

"Determination" is simply another word for "offence." The last clause, which describes the penalties, reads:

Every person who, to the detriment or against the interest of the public, charges, receives or attempts to receive any spread which is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the regulated produce, shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

In other words, this parliament is being asked to give its sanction to possible fines to the extent of five thousand dollars and to possible imprisonments up to two years, in the case of individuals, without knowing the offences to which those penalities are to apply. Parliament is not to have a say in defining the offence; that is to be done by the committee which is to be appointed by the minister to make the investigation.

I come back to the question of whether the fundamental rights and liberties of the subject are to be dealt with in that manner by a representative parliament, which above all else is elected to protect the liberty and rights and property of the individual. Under this act, if the bill becomes law, the committee is to create the offence, and the same should be said of the local boards which are appointed for the purpose of laying down the regulations, that is, the laws, the violation of which is prescribed as an offence. Are these to be representative bodies selected in the manner in which legislative bodies are selected or elected in Canada, in England, or any British country? Before hon. members of this house can have to do with the making of laws they have to comply with and have others comply with certain laws framed definitely for the purpose of seeing that whoever may be concerned in the making of laws is duly representative of the people as a whole. The first of these laws is the franchise act. The only persons who have a right to vote in a dominion election are those who can qualify with respect to the franchise. No qualification of the kind is required for membership on this law making committee. Anyone whom the minister wishes to appoint may be appointed to the committee. Next, hon. members have to be representative of constituencies. The Representation Act ensures that all classes in all communities shall have a say before any offence can be created. Nothing of the kind exists in this legislation. As a matter of fact, it specifically limits those who have to do with regulating and making the laws and regulations to the interested parties, to those who have to do with the particular commodities the production and distribution of which are being made into so many monopolies. As respects law making, it is not representation by population, but representation by occupation. In addition to the Representation Act, there is the Dominion Elections Act which has been framed to ensure that before any member of this legislative body can help to create an offence or to make a law, he must first be elected in accordance with the provision of a law that ensures a certain degree of protection to the electorate in the matter of its choice. But none of these particular precautions or anything like them are to apply to these boards which are to determine what regulations are to become law. There is simply to be a direction by the minister or the governor in council with regard to the new offences which will be created as a result of the investigation and determination of the boards of investigation.

One has only to ask oneself what will happen as a result of all this to see whence we are drifting. We may have one investigation in one province, another in another province and yet another in another. We may have one board determining one thing and another board determining another. But it does not matter what they determine, the penalty is the same for the man who has committed an offence, by not producing or selling his commodities in accordance with the determination of the board that makes the investigation. I repeat that one has only to make clear the purport of this measure as verified by its provisions to see how completely subversive of all that is sacred to British liberty and to British parliamentary institutions and to British practice and procedure in matters of legislation the proposed measure is.

This afternoon the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation cited the Winnipeg Free Press as a paper that at times inclines his way in that it finds it necessary to say that there is much that is good in socialism. I do not think anyone who studies industrial problems will deny for one moment that there is not good in very much that is termed socialism. Neither will anyone venture to say that the socialist party is the one party having a monopoly of all that is good in the matter of social legislation. The socialist party have taken many of the aims and policies which belong to other and older parties and have claimed them as part of their own beliefs and convictions. That may be perfectly right and proper, but there is no monopoly in the matter of social legislation as between the different political parties. They may differ as to how they are to go about achieving their ends and what they intend to do when they attain to power, but as for any one party being the sole representative of social needs, and the one party whose policies alone will meet those needs, that, I think, is carrying things a little far. However, let us see what the Winnipeg Free Press has to say about this legislation. I am going to read a paragraph or two, and I shall do so for the benefit of my hon. friend in particular. When the legislation was first brought down the Winnipeg Free Press discussed it in an editorial entitled The Marketing Legislation. And here may I point out that the Winnipeg Free Press stands in a very signal position as a guardian of agricultural interests in the west. It is a journal in the city of Winnipeg, the interests of which city are more bound up with agriculture than I suppose are the interests of any other city in Canada, though of course to some extent it is true of all cities in Canada that their interests are bound up in large measure with the prosperity of agriculture. The hon. member saw the force of that truth when he cited the Free Press. This is what that newspaper had to say editorially of the marketing legislation:

> The legislation, from a cursory examination, appears to justify the estimate of it which comes from the capital. It is pointed out that nothing ever proposed, not even the War Measures Act, begins to approach it in the power which it gives to officials to regulate the trade of the country. It goes further, it is stated, than similar legislation in any country in the world having parliamentary government.

That was the first statement. What had that newspaper to say after a careful study of the measure? In an editorial on April 3, under the heading The Dominion Marketing Bill, the following appeared:

> The text of Mr. Bennett's farm marketing bill bears out Ottawa telegraph dispatches which said it placed immense and perhaps unexampled powers in the dominion government's hands. It is like no other bill in the history of the Canadian parliament. It confers on the cabinet at Ottawa, and in some circumstances on one member thereof, authority to regulate, limit and even prohibit every kind of trade (domestic, export and import) in nearly every kind of natural product. This power is to be exercised by a national board and a number of "local boards," but these agencies will be created and controlled by the government. The bill, if it comes into force, puts an end to freedom of trade in all products (to quote its wording) "of agriculture, or of the forest, sea, lake or river," and in all foods and drinks partly or wholly made from such products, a category which includes such diverse commodities as ice cream and tinned salmon, beer and bread, sugar and beef. Sales of all these goods at home and in export markets, as well as imports of all of them, are brought under arbitrary and unlimited governmental control by this one statute. It is a bill rivalling, if not surpassing, the most notable efforts of the European dictators in the way of economic control.

That is a carefully and thoughtfully worded editorial which, I think, gives a just appreciation of this legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the C.C.F. party, speaking this afternoon, expressed the view that because some exception was being taken to the extension of powers on the part of governments in various directions, the Liberal party was holding to its old tradition of laissez-faire and did not want anything in the way of an extension of governmental powers. I think I made it perfectly clear to my hon. friend that the Liberal party, all through its history both in the old country and in this dominion, has believed in regulation, but it has been regulation brought about at the instance of parliament. When my hon. friend talks about the Liberal party believing in laissez-faire what he really means to say is that the Liberal party believes and continues to believe in liberty. He is confusing the two. Now liberty and laissez-faire are not the same thing. Liberty is secured sometimes by regulation and sometimes by laissez-faire. Laissez-faire is simply a method, just as regulation is a method, a means to a particular end, that end being liberty, and when liberty has been threatened by too great an encroachment of officialdom or arbitrary power then the Liberal party has stood for liberty and for freedom secured through laissez-faire. When, on the other hand, the individual has not had sufficient protection, then similarly in the name of liberty and of freedom—at one time political freedom, at another time social freedom, at another time religious freedom, and, as at the present time, economic freedom —the Liberal party has stood for such regulation as was essential to that end. What we have stood for is liberty and freedom, secured by laissez-faire when that method was needed to get rid of unnecessary restrictions that bind and handicap and fetter the subject and deprive him of his liberty, also for liberty and freedom secured by regulation at the instance of parliament when to the acquisition and maintenance of liberty that method of securing liberty and freedom has been equally essential. I am sorry that my hon. friend opposite is interrupting me.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry; I did not intend to interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I heard him talking about the Liberal party. He knew something about the Liberal party at one time.

Mr. MANION: There is now no Liberal party in the country I was speaking of, England, the greatest home of liberty in the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All political parties have had their ups and downs—

Mr. MANION: Mostly down in England at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —don't be too sure; you will never down the principles that the Liberal party stands for. I might observe to my hon. friend that the people of Canada to-day are thinking not so much about the position of the Liberal party in England as about the position of the Liberal party in Canada in the light of what happened this very week in the county of Oxford.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker? What do you think of an hon. gentleman who will refer to his political opponents as his political enemies, as the Minister of Railways did recently?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We shall have to let the Minister of Railways interpret that in his own way. Now what I wish to point out—and I think the interruptions have helped to make it clear—is that there are certain great traditions upon which all government is founded, and if you forsake those traditions it matters not what you do legislatively, you will destroy the edifice of the state itself. There are great traditions of the past which have been the main stay and security of the liberties of the British peoples, and it is as necessary if not more necessary to-day than at any time in the world's history that those traditions should be maintained. Take all the great charters of liberty in British history—what are they? They do not purport to express anything new; they express what was asserted by the people at the time those charters were drafted as the rights and privileges which they claimed to enjoy as individuals. What we are fighting for to-day is exactly what, as I said this afternoon, the barons at Runnymede were fighting for at the time they exacted the Great Charter from King John. That is something that will be apparent to every schoolboy and schoolgirl who has any knowledge at all of current history, because the first document that boys and girls are taught in school to reverence is the Magna Charta. I suppose the history best known in connection with the study of British liberty is Green's. May I read to this house a page or two from that work with reference to the Magna Charta and what it stands for.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hear some hon. members opposite laugh. I doubt whether some of them have heard of the Magna Charta. It is about time at all events they began to learn the most elementary lessons in government. To make clear to them the bearing of the Magna Charta on our present discussion I will quote from Green's Short History of the English People, the chapter entitled Under the Great Charter, 1215-17. Green says:

> It is impossible to gaze without reverence on the earliest monument of English freedom which we can see with our own eyes and touch with our own hands, the great charter to which from age to age patriots have looked back as the basis of English liberty.

Please note that. I have under my hand as well a copy of Select Charters Illustrative of English Constitutional History, by Stubbs, a well known authority. This eminent writer, speaking of the great charter of liberty, states:

> The whole of the constitutional history of England is a commentary on this charter; the illustration of which must be looked for in the documents that precede and follow.

That well expresses the significance and importance of this charter. Green terms it the basis of English liberty. Green continues:

> But in itself the charter was no novelty, nor did it claim to establish any new constitutional principles. The charter of Henry the First formed the basis of the whole, and the additions to it are for the most part formal recognitions of the judicial and administrative changes introduced by Henry the Second. But the vague expressions of the older charter were now exchanged for precise and elaborate provisions. The bonds of unwritten custom which the older grant did little more than recognize had proved too weak to hold the Angevins; and the baronage now threw them aside for the restraints of written law. It is in this way that the great charter marks the transition from the age of traditional rights, preserved in the nation's memory and officially declared by the Primate, to the age of written legislation, of parliaments and statutes, which was soon to come.

I pointed out this afternoon that the legislation we are discussing is so vague that one does not know what it really means. As I indicated a moment ago we know what the penalties are, but we are not yet aware what the offence is to be to which those penalties are to be attached. That is a reversion to a condition that existed in a period prior to the Magna Charta itself. Green says further:

But all vagueness ceases when the charter passes on to deal with the rights of Englishmen at large, their right to justice, to security of person and property, to good government. "No freeman," ran the memorable article that lies at the base of our whole judicial system, "shall be seized or imprisoned, or dispossessed, or outlawed, or in any way brought to ruin: we will not go against any man nor send against him, save by legal judgment of his peers or by the law of the land."

Where is the law of the land to which at the present time those penalties are being attached? I ask that question, and I should like hon. gentlemen opposite to answer it. Nobody yet knows what the offences are to be; they are to be named, but not by parliament. The security to one's person and property is no longer to be in statutes and parliament and the law of the land, instead, citizens of Canada are to be subject to fine and imprisonment for what any board appointed by a minister may declare to be an offence.

The great reforms of the past reigns were now formerly recognized—

And so forth. Then a little further on:

John had again raised the rate of scutage, and imposed aids, fines, and ransoms at his pleasure without counsel of the baronage. The great charter met this abuse by the provision on which our constitutional system rests. With the exception of the three customary feudal aids which still remain to the crown, "no scutage or aid shall be imposed in our realm save by the common council of the realm."

The common council of the realm being parliament. Yet if one reads this bill he will find that certain payments are to be made at the instance not of parliament but of a board, neither a legislative nor representative body in the true sense of the word. Green continues:

The provision defined what had probably been the common usage of the realm; but the definition turned it into a national right, a right so momentous that on it rests our whole parliamentary life.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That is to say the Great Charter asserted the right of the control of parliament over the revenues and expenditures and the taxation of the country.

Green goes on to speak later in this same chapter of rights in the matter of trade which the citizens were to be permitted to have:

The towns were secured in the enjoyment of their municipal privileges, their freedom from arbitrary taxation, their rights of justice, of common deliberation, of regulation of trade. "Let the city of London have all its old liberties and its free customs, as well by land as by water. Besides this, we will and grant that all other cities, and boroughs, and towns, and ports, have all their liberties and free customs." The influence of the trading class is seen in two other enactments, by which freedom of journeying and trade was secured to foreign merchants, and an uniformity of weights and measures was ordered to be enforced throughout the realm.

This bill gives to the governor in council the right to take away freedom of trade even between different parts of the one country, as well as the possibility of freedom of trade between this and other countries. Apart from parliament altogether it gives to these various boards and to the governor in council, at the instance of the minister and not of parliament, the right to restrict trade. It overrides the Customs Act, which makes definite provisions under which certain goods are allowed to come into the country. The bill says that the minister may prohibit the importation of goods, thus depriving the country of part of its revenue, and this may be done at the instance, not of parliament, but of the governor in council and of the minister.

What I have read of the assertion of individual rights and liberties in the Magna Charta was repeated each time there was a great crisis. This was what I had in mind when I said to my hon. friend this afternoon that the Liberal party through the centuries had stood for certain principles such as the right by parliament to control taxation and expenditure and to maintain the liberty of the subject. If he will consult this volume, Stubbs, Select Charters, he will find that, with regard to the period of Charles I and the Petition of Right, and of William and Mary and the Bill of Rights, there again is to be found in these great charters of liberties recited one after another principles which the British peoples have regarded as sacred to their liberty, to their property and to their rights as individuals, every one of which rights in some measure is being set at naught by the legislation which we have before us.

Reference has been made to our own constitution. I believe when this measure is properly studied it will be found that some of its provisions are also contrary to the provisions of the British North America Act. What does the British North America Act say with regard to trade and commerce? Does it say that local boards are to have the regulation of trade and commerce? Does it say that an individual minister of the crown and the governor in council may regulate trade and commerce? Let me read the provisions of the act. They are pretty clear and specific:

Distribution of Legislative Powers
Powers of the Parliament
It shall be lawful for the queen—

Now the king.

—by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say—

What is the second item in the enumeration?

The regulation of trade and commerce.

In other words, the British North America Act states that exclusive legislative authority rests in this parliament with regard to the regulation of trade and commerce. How, then, can hon. gentlemen opposite undertake to leave it to local boards to regulate trade and commerce? How can they give power to the governor in council to restrict the importation and exportation of goods? Such a power is a distinct violation of that section of the act. Another subject which rests entirely within the legislative authority of parliament is the criminal law. Parliament alone has the right to make criminal laws. Criminal law defines the offence and fixes the penalty. We are being asked by this bill to allow somebody other than parliament to define the offence. That again is a violation of the constitution of our country. How can we leave it to a local board, to some committee the Minister of Trade and Commerce or some other minister may appoint, to determine what is an offence, in the light of the provision of the constitution which says this parliament alone may make the criminal law? I repeat the mere fixing of a penalty is not the creation of what constitutes a crime; it is the offence that constitutes the crime. To prevent and to punish the offence a penalty is affixed by the criminal law, and both the criminal law and trade and commerce belong to this parliament.

In regard to the provinces what does the British North America Act say? I quote:

92. In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated;

Among those enumerated are, property and civil rights, and:

The imposition of punishment by fine, penalty, or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section.

The provinces have certain rights given to them under the constitution; the dominion has certain rights given to it under the constitution. Some of these rights are mentioned as exclusive rights. I say that where an exclusive right to legislate is mentioned in the British North America Act this dominion cannot confer that right if it belongs to the dominion parliament on a province, nor can the provinces if the right to legislate is exclusively theirs confer that right on the dominion. If the power to effect certain ends cannot be achieved by each legislating within its own jurisdiction and confining its efforts and acts to what comes within its jurisdiction, the only remedy is to have the British North America Act amended in such a way as to attain what is desired, if it be in the public interest. But as long as the constitution remains what it is we are obliged to respect it.

I might refer to a few other clauses in the constitution that I believe are being violated by this bill. In particular there is the provision in the constitution which declares that all articles of the growth produce and manufacture of the provinces, shall be admitted free into each of the other provinces. There is provision also in the British North America Act with respect to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, descriptive of how all revenues are to go into the consolidated revenue fund, and how alone they may be taken out as a result of specific appropriations by parliament. The bill, as I pointed out, gives to a board the governor in council is to create power to take money out of the consolidated revenue fund, and also to keep, as its own, certain moneys and not have them go into the fund at all, but to be used by the board as it pleases. The more one examines this bill the more one finds it difficult to discover wherein there is left a vestige of parliamentary practice or principle throughout the whole of it.

May I say further that this measure is very similar to measures that were enacted in this parliament in 1919. At that time two bills—the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act—were introduced and passed through parliament. They were of a character somewhat similar, although this one is a thousand times worse, violating as it does many principles that the others did not. But the bills of 1919 to which I refer had one or two features in common with this, one being the endeavour in the matter of fixing prices to have the federal government do something that belonged to the provincial legislative field. The Board of Commerce Act did not go as far as this bill seeks to go in having prices fixed, not by any parliament or legislature, but by some local board or committee. The regulation of trade and commerce was the issue that was uppermost as respects that legislation. What did the courts find? Once the statute had been passed, the courts declared it to be ultra vires. The judgment sets forth that section 91, the section I have read about the federal parliament having the exclusive right to legislate on trade and commerce does not empower the dominion to enact legislation of the kind that the Board of Commerce Act embodied. To quote from the judgment:

> The authority of the dominion parliament to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce did not, by itself, enable interference with particular trades in which Canadians would, apart from any right of interference conferred by these words above, be free to engage in the provinces. . . . No justification for interpreting the words of section 91, subsection 2, in a fashion which would, as was said in the argument on the other side, make them confer capacity to regulate particular trades and businesses.

I am not going to take time to go into the legal argument on this matter; that may well be left to members of the legal profession. But I do believe it will be found that when it comes to be interpreted this measure will meet with much the same reception by the courts as did the Combines and Fair Prices Act and the Board of Commerce Act of 1919. I wish to add that the government must be aware of what the finding of the courts is likely to be in a matter of this sort. I hardly think it is treating fairly the great body of producers and distributors in this country to be passing on the eve of a general election, an act which in all probability will be made to serve its purpose in the general election, but which once the election is over will be found to be ultra vires as respects its essential provisions and a law which will never accomplish aught of what it is supposed to accomplish.

I just wish to add a word in regard to the British marketing legislation. Some suggestion nas been made that this proposed legislation is similar in some respects to the British Marketing Act. May I say first of all that I do not think that the legislation is similar; but even if it were that would not be a sound reason for its enactment here unless the conditions in essential particulars were similar to the conditions in Great Britain. In Great Britain you have one parliament which can speak for the whole country. There is not one parliament and several legislatures each with exclusive powers of jurisdiction, consequently there is no question of possible conflict of jurisdiction; it is one parliament that speaks. May I point out this very great difference also between the British legislation and that now before us; the British legislation takes care to provide that before the finding of any board or any regulation becomes binding a resolution must be brought in and passed in the British House of Commons approving the regulation as part of the law of the country. The resolution in fact must be approved not by one house only but by both houses of parliament. In other words, in Great Britain they have reserved some rights to the House of Commons and parliament in these matters of the regulation of production and trade; they have not handed over entirely to unknown local boards the powers of parliament. That difference alone is enough to make any reference to the British act condemnatory of the present legislation.

May I say further to hon. gentlemen opposite that, having regard to the condition in which agriculture in this country is at the present time, they ought to be very careful what they do in the further examples they set to Great Britain in ways of restricting trade in Canada and creating monopolies in our natural products. I remember when the United Kingdom-Canada agreement was before this house and we were discussing the influences that had been at work to bring it about, I did not hesitate to say, when the Prime Minister of this country told the people of Great Britain that unless they changed their fiscal policy and became a protectionist country there would be little preferential trading between Canada and Britain, that it would not be very long, once protection became operative with respect to manufactured goods before we should find in Britain a demand for the protection of the various branches of agriculture, and see the gates beginning to be closed against the agricultural products of this country. I pointed out that within three years they would find that taking place, and that is exactly what is taking place to-day. To-day, when our agriculturists are finding it more difficult than ever, to enter the British market, and may soon find themselves shut out altogether in respect to some products, they have no one but hon. gentlemen opposite to thank for it, because it was they who demanded that before we would deal with Great Britain in the matter of extending British goods a preference, the fiscal system of Great Britain would have to be changed from that of free trade, which in large measure they had, to one of undoubted and unquestioned protection. It might therefore be advisable to go carefully at the present time in the way of creating further monopolies and restrictions of trade in Canada.

Let me recall this circumstance; it cannot be recalled too often. This proposed legislation is being discussed as if it related entirely to agriculture. But as I pointed out this afternoon, excepting the products of mines, it covers every kind of natural product and commodities made from natural products, and that means a considerable proportion of the whole industry of Canada. It gives this government power simply by order in council to stop the importation of any class of goods or products that come into Canada from Great Britain, provided they can be made in Canada out of some raw material produced in our home industries. That power is there; there is no use in the minister saying that they do not intend to exercise it, and that we are putting forward exaggerated ideas—the fact that such is the situation shows how wide of any true mark we are going in this legislation.

We are rapidly getting to the point where this country is beginning to despair of its trade altogether. More and more we hear the cry, "Where and how can we get trade with any country in the world with everything tied up as it is here?" May I draw attention to the fact that if the government were to seek to make an agreement with another country, difficult as the situation may now be in the matter of trade, it will be a thousand times more difficult when this legislation goes through, because of the restrictive powers given the boards and committees and governor in council under this legislation. Boards may make regulations; committees may make offences; the governor in council may make regulations and crimes, and, as someone reminded me this afternoon when I said they could do this when parliament was not in session, they can do this when parliament is in session as well. I meant that they were not as likely to exercise those powers when parliament was in session; I meant that these restrictions would be imposed after parliament prorogued, during the recess, as has been the case in connection with most of the orders in council that have been passed under the relief legislation. The subjects dealt with were not brought to parliament for discussion; one measure after the other, one guarantee after the other, one loan after the other, were put through at a time when parliament was not in session. I say you simply make it impossible for other nations to hope to enter into agreements with this country if you are going to increase uncertainties and further tie up trade in this way.

This legislation should be condemned because it proceeds on a basis that is fundamentally unsound and wrong. This legislation is based on a theory of scarcity instead of on a theory of plenty, as the one that should govern in matters of trade. This legislation is based on the idea that what is needed is limited production. That cannot be denied, and I heard my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. the other day denounce this theory of scarcity—and I think rightly so—as a basis on which legislation should be proceeded with in this country. We are not going to get out of the depression by limiting production more and more. We will get out of the depression when, with the plenty we have, we begin to take advantage of our plenty to offer to other countries terms which will enable them to trade with us. There is only one way in which a country can get out of a depression or in which a country can prosper at any time; that is by increasing its wealth and its facilities for exchange. All the wealth of a country comes from its natural resources. When you go to the root of the matter, the wealth of a country is not the amount of its legal tender; it is not a question of what is put on a bank note or what is involved in a bank credit. The wealth of the country is essentially what Providence has given to mankind; it is the products of the field, of the forest, of the mine and of the sea. These things, transformed by one process or another into articles available for human use, constitute our wealth. That wealth is there to serve the country and to bring purchasing power to the country as it is exchanged with that of other lands by means of international trade.

Our whole development has been built up on that theory. The construction of our railways, of our waterways and of all our agencies of communication, transport and the like, has been carried on at great cost on the theory that it was advisable to make possible the development of our great natural resources, and also to facilitate trade. To-day, however, as a result of policies which have been put into force by hon. gentlemen opposite, we have an entirely different theory. We are told that instead of plenty we must aim at scarcity; that in connection with the wheat grown on our western wheat fields, which we once considered as the gold of the country, instead of trying to find out how that wheat may be exchanged for other commodities the thing to do is to destroy it and not to allow it to be produced or sold beyond a certain amount. So we see whither we are being led, and grain is only one commodity. We have now a policy of limited production, and I say that policy is wrong.

It is wrong in every way; it is wrong because, in the first place, it defies the very bounty of Providence itself. What is needed is a change in the method of distributing wealth, a more equitable distribution. Let this parliament busy itself not in limiting production but in seeking to bring about a more equitable distribution of what is produced, and we will soon find a way out. But under the protectionist ideas that have prevailed so strongly on the other side this creation of monopolies out of a few favoured manufacturing interests is being extended now to agriculture and other industries, with the view of trying to create a sentiment in all classes throughout the country which will lead them to consider that limited production is a desirable thing. Well, as I say, that is wrong. It is wrong for the further reason that all progress depends upon initiative and enterprise and self reliance and upon giving enterprise and initiative and self reliance a chance for development in different ways. If you are going to limit production; if you are going to make it a crime for a man to produce the things he is capable of producing and to sell the fruits of his own labour, because that is what this bill does, then you are simply destroying initiative enterprise and self reliance and the very soul of the people. It shows to what lengths a country may be brought when it enters upon a false course and continues that course to an indefinite end.

In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make plain the position of the opposition by moving an amendment which will state in very clear terms what our position is in regard to this legislation. In order that there may be no possibility of the amendment being declared out of order, I wish to indicate in advance the rule of the house under which it is being moved, lest it might be said by some that it was being introduced with the knowledge that it would be declared out of order. Rule 755, with relation to the second reading of bills, is as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That is supported by May at page 357, and Bourinot at page 509 and is, I think, the rule that Your Honour cited the other evening as the one which should govern amendments upon second readings. In the light of that rule of the house, then, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Stewart (Edmonton), that all the words after the first word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

> This house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation, and which confers upon a minister of the crown and upon the governor in council unprecedented authority and unusual powers to restrict production, and interprovincial, inter-Imperial and foreign trade as regards both exports and imports, as well as other autocratic powers.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Before I address myself, Mr. Speaker, to a discussion of the measure before the house I should like to raise the point of order whether the amendment submitted by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) is in order, inasmuch as it constitutes what might be termed a declaration of policy, instead of offering reasons why consideration of the bill should not be proceeded with or should be postponed, or proposing something else germane to the actual motion before the house. I do not raise the point of order with the view of getting an immediate ruling but would request Your Honour to give it consideration, and my remarks also will serve to give hon. gentlemen opposite notice of the point of order.

We have listened, Mr. Speaker, for the space of nearly two and a half hours—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, two hours.

Mr. STEVENS: Two hours and twenty minutes, to be exact—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two hours.

Mr. STEVENS: We will give the right hon. gentleman his wish and say two hours. It has been a lengthy speech at all events.

Some hon. MEMBERS: And a good one.

Mr. STEVENS: But I am not complaining of its length. My observation was going to be this: Listening to the right hon. gentleman I wondered if he was aware that there had been a world crisis during the past two years. Did he recognize at all that there had been a complete dislocation of world trade, and that we in this country, in common with all the countries of the world, were confronted with new and baffling problems? What has actually happened in the world—not only in this country but in almost every other? We find that the chief countries at least, Great Britain and those of Europe, and I think we can add nearly every other, have been so disturbed in their internal economy as well as in their trade relations with other countries that there have arisen all over the world new and startling methods of doing business. That is a simple statement of fact, yet the right hon. gentleman throughout the whole of his speech never paid one atom or one moment of attention to it. He gave no consideration to the difficulties with which the primary producer—agriculturists, timber producers, fishermen—have been confronted in the last two or three years. No attention was paid to their problems. There was not a syllable in his whole speech devoted to offering a solution or encouragement, or even recognition of the existence of these problems.

What on earth has Green's history or the opinion of the historian Green about Magna Charta got to do with the price of eggs or hogs or butter? If the right hon. gentleman would just watch the financial page of his paper from day to day he would notice that the agricultural population of this country, constituting as it does about half our population, have during the past few years been suffering under a price condition which made the carrying on of their business almost an impossibility. That has been recognized. Just what to do to change that condition is the problem.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so; we recognize it. Everyone who gives these matters serious thought recognizes it. It is easy to say: Raise prices and fix them. That sounds easy if you do not think about it at all. But when you address yourself to the task of attempting to raise, shall I say, the price of farm products or of other primary products to a level that will enable those who are producing them to live, you are confronted with one of the major economic problems of the time. The countries of Europe have been faced with the same thing to a certain degree, and I shall deal with them a little later. But I ask the right hon. gentleman, with regard to his reading us a lecture as he did for about half an hour on our disregard of the principles of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, the parliamentary principles enunciated in the reign of William and Mary, while we all value these old principles, what on earth have they to do with the problems now before parliament? What ought to be engaging the attention of parliament are the things with which we are now confronted, and in the brief time at my disposal I think I shall be able to show that there are some very real problems facing parliament.

While I do not for a moment suggest that this bill is a cure-all for the evils of the present time I do say that the Minister of Agriculture in introducing the bill offered to parliament a proposal worthy of its serious consideration. Not that the bill is perfect; not that its details cannot be improved; not that changes may not be hammered out on the anvil of committee discussions, modifying details here and there to meet the will of parliament. But the purpose, the general scheme, the theme that runs through the whole of this bill, is directed to trying to improve marketing conditions in this country.

I submit, further, that many of the citations of the right hon. gentleman as he proceeded with his discussion of the bill were not fairly made, because he would cite some portion of a clause and indicate that it was a violation of parliamentary rights, and suggest that it referred, for instance, to production when the clause does not refer to production at all but says that the producers of certain goods may get together. What for? For the purpose of the better marketing of their goods. That is the theme of the whole bill—marketing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot let my hon. friend say that I misrepresented any clause. I simply say this, that Hansard will speak for itself and hon. members will find that every clause there given is correctly cited.

Mr. STEVENS: Hansard will speak for itself, but I shall refer in a few minutes to the clauses.

We admit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is new and unusual in its character. But in this country, as in other countries, people have been struggling along under conditions that have been difficult, and have been clamouring for something out of the ordinary. Peoples all over the world have been very restive with governments because governments have been slow to depart from the beaten track. This bill is a departure; there is no question about that. But it is offered to the house in an effort on the part of the government to cope with unusual and difficult circumstances.

On the second reading of any bill it is supposed that the general principles will be discussed, but I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that nearly every speaker who has preceded me from the other side of the house has discussed the details of the bill clause by clause, when there was no opportunity, under our practice, for the minister in charge to correct wrong impressions, to interpret the meaning of a clause, or to receive from the opposition and other members suggestions of improvements in any particular clause. I think the result has been complete confusion in the minds of members of the house as well of the public as to the intent of the bill. I submit it would have been infinitely better if the details could have been left to be hammered out in the committee of the whole.

May I now turn my attention to the general theme, or, shall I say, the reasons behind the introduction of the bill. I shall be very brief in this portion of my remarks. Due to a fear in the hearts and minds of the people of Europe in particular as well as of other parts of the world there has developed, not during the last three or four years but during the last ten years, a tendency to erect barriers against foreign imports coming into their countries. This is based largely upon the desire of the people to produce enough foodstuffs to make them independent of other countries in case their fears are realized and another war should break out. I am not going into details; it is only necessary to remind the house of that fact in order that hon. members may appreciate the reasons why certain barriers have been erected against trade.

Another reason why the barriers have been erected is this: Countries have become bankrupt, bankrupt because of international debt, bankrupt because of their inability to meet their foreign obligations. So we find that many countries erected—

Mr. YOUNG: High tariffs.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is quite right—high tariffs and barriers against the inflow of goods. They desired to create credits abroad or—it is the same thing—to prevent the accumulating of debits abroad.

Mr. HANBURY: Or the exchange of goods.

Mr. STEVENS: That is another reason. Exchange conditions due to fluctuating currency was still another. Some of the countries of Europe adopted the quota system, and this system has become one of the major methods of control of trade throughout the world. Nations imposed a certain restriction on the quantity of goods which might enter from a foreign country. I think I mentioned on a previous occasion that France, one of the most wealthy countries in the world, has some 1,300 items on her tariff under quota. These quotas are put on so that only a certain amount of goods may come in from other countries. Trade is allocated and directed and a monopoly created in their desire for the protection of their own trade. Greece does nearly all her foreign business by the quota system. She will allow only a certain quantity of this or that commodity to enter Greece according to the purchases by other countries of goods from her. All of this has changed completely the method of doing business.

The right hon. gentleman speaks of Canadian trade as though we were back in the days before the war or in the period since the war when these new methods were only in the process of development. He speaks as though there were no obstacles, no difficulties, no great changes or no new problems. If that were so there might be some grounds for the complaints the right hon. gentleman has made, but the fact is that there is not a country of major importance in the world that I know of that has not introduced high tariffs, quotas, inhibitions and other means of preventing the movement of trade. This is not because this government or his government which preceded it did anything to provoke such measures; it is because of conditions inherent in the countries themselves, chiefly the conditions which prevail in Europe.

I turn for a moment to some of the other reasons why this bill was necessary. I have mentioned the external causes, but there is an internal cause as well. Let us consider the change which has occurred in Canada during the last fifteen years. For instance, look at the development which has taken place in the creamery industry. A few years ago there were hundreds—I was going to say thousands—of small creameries throughout the country. I could name half a dozen large creamery concerns which now control not the whole but substantially a large part of the butter moving to the markets of this country. This mass production of butter is internal to Canada. Take the packing industry. Within the last ten years quite a number of the small packing interests have passed out of existence and the control is now vested in two or three firms. This has created a change. Take cereal production: a vast change has occurred in the milling industry. In all of the realms of industry we find great organizations growing up for the handling of agricultural as well as other products. For the moment we are keeping our attention largely on agricultural products. This has brought about a need for a change in the marketing methods of the country. These products are now largely processed in the great centres and are marketed in large quantities, leaving the control not with the producer but with the processing element which handles them. The bill now under consideration is designed to give some opportunity to the producers of agricultural and other products to get a fair chance in the markets instead of placing them under the control of the great marketing institutions which have grown up.

Unlike the right hon. gentleman, I am limited in my time, and I shall now turn to the bill itself. The bill has three major divisions. Before I state what those divisions are, let me say first that when the right hon. gentleman was closing his speech he referred to the fact that Canada was not like Great Britain. In that country there is one jurisdiction while in Canada we have a divided jurisdiction, that is, we have federal and provincial bodies. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said this the other night and he said it in condemnation of the bill. Had he given the matter a little thought he would have seen that the very construction of the bill with which he differs and about which he complains was necessary because of the fact of divided jurisdiction. In the first part of the bill provision is made for the erection of a general board to exercise the powers inherent to it because of federal jurisdiction. That will be a very limited jurisdiction, confined to internal Canadian trade or the handling of goods within Canada. Of course, when it comes to importing or exporting, federal jurisdiction will be supreme. When you come to direct the marketing of farm products within Canada you find yourself confronted with provincial legislation. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni will recall that provincial governments have often found themselves confronted with a limitation of jurisdiction on their part which prevented them from carrying out certain schemes, such as that which the fruit growers of the Okanagan wished to put into operation, or that of the milk producers of the Fraser Valley. I am not saying whether these schemes were good or bad; the point I wish to make in referring to the two instances I have mentioned in my province—others might be mentioned elsewhere—is that an effort was made by the producers to erect an organization which in their opinion would give them a better chance in the marketing of their products in the great consuming markets. They failed because of a conflict of jurisdiction.

In introducing this bill the minister has divided it into certain parts. One part erects a board clothed with federal jurisdiction. Another part provides for the acceptance by the federal board of cooperation by provincial or local bodies. It need not be provincial-wide; it might be local. For instance, a scheme, as it is termed, might be instituted in the Okanagan valley to deal with fruit. It might be developed, and it could come under the jurisdiction of the federal board, provided of course the provincial authorities gave the necessary sanction to that movement. It was for that reason that several of the provinces, knowing that this bill was coming forward, passed certain legislation, which might be termed enabling legislation to enable the local bodies or groups or the province as a whole to come under the jurisdiction of the federal board, or in other words to cooperate with that board. And so you have these two features.

A third feature in the bill, which might be referred to, and regarding which considerable complaint was indulged in by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon and evening, is the matter of investigation. In referring to this aspect of the measure I shall try not to violate the rules too far in going into detail, but I wish to discuss the question of principle and to reply to the complaint made by my right hon. friend this afternoon. He said that the committee provided for in part II of the bill for investigational purposes was in violation of the rights of parliament—that we were in a sense abrogating the rights and duties of parliament in this respect. I submit however that nothing of the kind can be read into this bill. The federal government having erected an organization that can cooperate with provincial bodies, surely there is no objection to such a body inquiring into spread, inquiring into the question whether or not the producer is getting a fair share of the consumer's dollar, to put it in a popular sense. That is one of the things we are trying to inquire into in the parliamentary committee. We all recognize that a parliamentary committee can never possibly cover the whole ground; we have had abundant illustration of that fact in the appeals that have been made to us to look into this, that and the other. But under federal jurisdiction, if parliament will accord this right and power, these investigations can be carried on. What difference on earth would there be between the work carried on by a body erected without all the formalities of a royal commission and the work carried on by a royal commission set up under the Inquiries Act? This government could to-morrow or at any other time erect a commission under the Inquiries Act to make an investigation into the very matters mentioned here, and it could be done at any time and parliament would not be consulted. Nor would there be any violation of the rights of parliament. All that this does is to recognize that in agricultural and natural products, in the basic industries of the country, there is need for a very considerable degree of investigation; and, recognizing that, a committee is erected and made part of the act itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I took no exception to the investigation phase, but to the committee of investigation creating the offence. No royal commission can create an offence.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is right in part. He says he objects to this committee having the right to create the offence, but I do recall his reading paragraph 15, and he dilated upon the objection to a committee of this kind. He said, "Imagine a committee of this kind!"—and then he read the provision with respect to the difference between the price of which any regulated product is purchased and the sale price thereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I objected to the committee creating the offence, but I said I welcomed investigation.

Mr. STEVENS: Take section 21, to which the right hon. gentleman referred:

> Every person who, to the detriment or against the interest of the public, charges, receives or attempts to receive any spread which is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the regulated product, shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

My right hon. friend objects to this because, he says, it removes control from parliament. But what does it do? It declares that any large corporation such as I have mentioned, or any body of that kind which indulges in a practice that is against the interests of the public, that is to say, charges, receives or attempts to receive any spread which is excessive, shall be charged with an indictable offence. Now what is an indictable offence? My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will I think agree with me when I say that the meaning of this is that the person charged shall be charged in the regular courts of the land with the offence in question. He is haled before the county court or the supreme court, charged with an indictable offence, and he has the protection of the courts of this country, as he would under similar circumstances in any other British country.

I appeal to the right hon. gentleman to be at least reasonable and fair in matters of this kind. He charges us with a violation of the rights of parliament, a usurpation of the liberties of the people, and an abrogation of the right of the people to appeal on this, that and the other. But the fact is that all the rights of the person accused are preserved. All that this does is to declare that in connection with this class of business with which we are trying to deal, where it is found on investigation that certain interests are obstructing the fair marketing of goods by certain practices, then such people shall be guilty of an indictable offence and haled before the courts and dealt with accordingly. Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not touched the point at all. The objection I made was that this committee determines what is an excessive charge, what is the offence. What offence is, is not set forth at all in any of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: It has to be set out, just as any other such matter is, by regulation by the governor in council. The right hon. gentleman this afternoon discussed at considerable length the powers under the act. May I point out to him that there is not a regulatory statute such as the live stock act, or the potato grading act or the grain act, or a dozen, yes, a score of other acts, statutes of the country, passed when the right hon. gentleman was in office and when others also were in power, in which the power of regulation has not been given, and in which the regulations exceed in dimensions the scope of the act itself. And such regulations have never come before parliament at all, though they form part of the law—acts which the right hon. gentleman's government passed—though I am not blaming him for it—and, as I am reminded, the breach of any of the regulations of which acts is punishable under the acts themselves.

I have here the Root Vegetables Act passed by the government of the right hon. gentleman, under my hon. friend the member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) when he was Minister of Agriculture. Let me cite this terrible abrogation of the rights of parliament:

> The governor in council may make regulations prescribing the quality, form and dimensions of all containers in which potatoes shall be packed—

This sounds alarming; I think we should look into it closely to see whether it is not a violation of Magna Charta. But will the right hon. gentleman listen to this? This is what my genial friend the hon. member for Melville put over on him. He could never have noticed this when he was Prime Minister:

—and the materials of which such containers shall be made, and may prescribe penalties not exceeding fifty dollars and in default of payment of any such penalty, imprisonment for any term not exceeding one month, for the violation—

Of what?

—of any of the provisions—

Of this act? No.

—of any such regulations.

That is, regulations made under the act. If I had time I know I could cite half a dozen statutes in every one of which similar provision occurs. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) advises me that the same provision is in 125 statutes out of some 225. I say to my right hon. friend that there is scarcely a statute having anything to do with regulating business, trade and commerce, internal or external, in which such provisions do not appear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend tell me of one instance where a body not connected with parliament has the right to determine an offence?

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the point. It is the governor in council that is provided for all through the measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am talking of the committee that it is intended to create under the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall come to the committee and the board in a moment. The point is that these statutes, and properly so, cannot be administered by regulations that have their origin in parliament. Take, for instance, the Meat and Canned Foods Act. That is an act which must provide for the size of the container; whether you shall put pectin or apple juice or anything else in strawberries; what is to be the quantity of liquid and the quantity of solid matter in a can of tomatoes or plums or peaches or peas or corn or beans, and so forth. There is a small book of perhaps fifty pages of regulations, not one of which ever came before parliament. Parliament would not be bothered with them, yet they are and have been in force and my right hon. friend and his government enforced them, and properly so, for years. All we are asking is that parliament do the same thing in this instance.

The right hon. gentleman said that this bill was calculated to restrict trade, to restrict production and to create monopolies. Those were his words; I copied them down exactly. This legislation was brought into this house not to do any of those things, but on the contrary to make possible the movement of goods in Canada in something like an orderly manner and to protect the rights of exporters in the marketing of their goods abroad.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister a question? Just what is the meaning of the title of clause 12, "restriction of imports and exports"?

Mr. STEVENS: I shall explain that; in fact I was about to do so. I was about to say to the right hon. gentleman: What would he or any administration do under these circumstances? I shall not name countries, because I do not want it to go out that I am criticizing what countries in Europe and elsewhere are doing; but a certain European country notifies Canada that it has imposed a quota on, let us say, canned salmon. They say to Canada: Your quota of canned salmon is 150,000 or 750,000 or 500,000 cases, a certain limited quantity. How is the right hon. gentleman going to direct that? It happens that in this instance—and perhaps I was unhappy in my selection of it—that the industry kept within the quota without any difficulty. But suppose we had a huge surplus over and above that quota which had usually gone to that market; who is the one who is to determine whether company A or B or C or D shall have unlimited access and who is to be restricted? That is not a duty that we are choosing to bring on ourselves; it is a duty imposed upon us.

Let us turn, for instance, to something that is known generally—the question of live cattle going to Great Britain. I am not for a moment complaining about the action of Great Britain; that is their own business. But Great Britain has asked that a certain quota of cattle shall be observed. I think we shall probably manage that without any great difficulty, but if the point is reached where we must stop sending cattle over there, let us say for a few weeks, what authority will say which person's or company's cattle shall go forward? Who will determine that? Surely there must be some power or body to do that. I can name a whole list of items where a similar situation may arise. It does not follow that that ends our market; it does not follow that we cannot ship more abroad, but it does follow that we are bound to respect the laws and wishes of the country in which those regulations are imposed and, moreover, they are and will be imposed whether we disregard them or not, so that in our own interest we must take suitable action so to direct our exports that the quota shall be observed.

Therefore, in this bill we have, as the right hon. gentleman says, a part which deals with the control of exports and imports. I say to him at once that this may be termed a form of quota, not something that we have adopted in order to impose our system upon somebody else, but something that is practised in every country in Europe, for example, Italy, Spain, France, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Poland I think—I am not quite sure of Poland—Greece, even in England, Bulgaria, Austria, Hungary. In all these countries a quota system is in force definitely and absolutely and imposed against the other countries of the world. In the face of this situation, what machinery would my right hon. friend erect if he does not accept this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What has been done right along?

Mr. STEVENS: I shall tell him that the task has been a very difficult one. It has been part of my duty as Minister of Trade and Commerce in some instances through officials of my department to get in touch with exporters to ask them to try to adjust their business, and they have done so; but in the last two years these quotas have been extending rapidly, not against Canada only but against all other countries. The time has come when we must have in this dominion some machinery which will enable the government to regulate the movement of those goods if we are to keep faith nationally with other countries and at the same time to do justice to our exporters. If I cannot appeal to my right hon. friend, I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite who are interested in this matter: What other method would they suggest which we could use which would adequately deal with the situation?

The right hon. gentleman says: But oh, this bill will give power to a body—and I remember he said this with a sort of dramatic emphasis—not yet in existence. What is legislation brought before parliament for? It is for the creation of these bodies, and that is precisely what we are trying to do in this case to-night. We are offering to parliament a proposal to create a body to do these things. Of course that body is not yet in existence; it could not be. Why should my right hon. friend, with that facility of language for which he is so noted and that peculiar intonation, suggest to the mind of his hearers the suspicion that something is wrong? Nothing is wrong with the bill; it simply and boldly and clearly sets out what the government asks parliament to set up so that we may carry on the business of the country. Oh, he says, but parliament will have no more control over the trade of the country; parliament is being asked to abrogate its rights. We are turning it over, he said, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), to a body not yet in existence. We are doing nothing of the kind. The very fact that this bill is before the house is a recognition of the rights of parliament. We come before parliament and tell of the difficulties with which we are confronted; we consult with parliament as to how those difficulties are to be met. In doing that we are bound to come with some definite proposal. Does the right hon. gentleman expect us to come to parliament and say: We are faced with a lot of difficulties and we do not know what to do; will parliament please tell us what to do? If we did that, the right hon. gentleman would very properly say that the government had better vacate office because it has no mind of its own. It is the duty of a government to formulate a scheme which in their judgment and in the light of their experience is one which will meet a given situation, and to present that scheme to parliament. This we have done. I repeat what I said in my opening remarks; I know that the Minister of Agriculture, in charge of this bill, will welcome in the committee all fair criticism and constructive suggestions from hon. gentlemen in any part of the house. I have no doubt that there will be suggestions that will improve the bill; if there are I certainly will join with him and with others in welcoming them.

Then the right hon. gentleman complains that this bill creates a scheme. He does not like the word "scheme," but I think it is the word used in the British act, so it cannot be very far astray. And he says that a group may be set up under the scheme, and he used these words, "all others will be excluded from that group, and some favoured group will have control." Now the right hon. gentleman knows better than that. What is the purpose of this part which provides for the erection of what is termed a scheme? As I said, we cannot exercise powers which are reserved to the provinces, and we recognize that there might be a group in a province or in a section of a province that wished to have a more regular or orderly marketing of their goods. Let me take as an example the apple industry, and in this connection I invite my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) to ponder what he said the other night. I think he made a most excellent speech; with much of what he said I find myself in accord. If I recall his position correctly he did not object to any scheme or regulation that would control quality, but he did object to control of quantity. Let me point out a situation that may very well arise. The apple growers of Nova Scotia or Ontario or British Columbia, all more or less independent groups, could form their schemes, could come together under a federal board in order to market their goods in an orderly manner. I invite him to consider carefully what happened last autumn. Nova Scotia had a phenomenally fine apple crop, and other sections also had good or fair crops. All these crops reached proper marketing condition inside of a few months, I think from about the middle of September to the middle of November, and there was a tendency to pour the apples on the British market. Remember that Great Britain also produces very fine apples, particularly in the southern part; and these come on the market at the same time. Then, as I think he or one hon. gentleman opposite mentioned, Australia and New Zealand, whose apples are marketed I think in May, June and July, sent an unusually large quantity to the British market, so that the Australasian apples were still pressing on the British market when the British and Canadian apples came along. It happened that our apples were poured in there in unrestricted quantities with the result that the market was very seriously disturbed and in a measure destroyed. The Minister of Agriculture there was so much perturbed because of the substantial loss threatened to producers that there was a very urgent demand for the imposition of a quota and a restriction of imports. That restriction was not definitely imposed last autumn, but I do say that if such a condition arises again, as it may and probably will, I do not doubt at all that there will be a quota imposed. Would it not be much better if before such a situation arises the Canadian representative could go to the British Minister of Agriculture and discuss the matter with him, estimate the needs of the market, and then that we should allow our fruit to pass on to that market in an orderly way instead of crowding it on without regulation, disregarding the rights of the British producer and the conditions of the market? That is precisely the sort of thing we are trying to provide for in this bill.

My hon. friend was going to ask a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was going to say that the essential objection was to our flooding the market with inferior grades; therefore control of quality would have met the situation perfectly and would have been all that was needed. I suggested the other night how that could be brought about without the expense of the complicated and cumbrous machinery of this bill.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree with my hon. friend that a substantial part of the trouble was due to the exportation of inferior grades. There again we see the necessity of this bill. But I do not fully agree that control of quality would be as effective as control of both quality and quantity. I have no hesitation in saying that either you are going to be faced with chaos in a number of branches of agriculture or you must have some machinery that will enable this country to direct its marketing in an orderly way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister began to take exception to a remark I made, and I think the words he took exception to were "all others will be excluded." But he did not go on to speak of that. I believe the minister misunderstood. His inference probably is that I meant all other producers of the same class of goods. I did not mean that. What I meant was, other classes in the community, persons belonging to other trades, callings and professions, and consumers.

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate that point, and the explanation. However, it does not alter this, and we will stick to the case I have given. Is it not desirable that the apple growers of these three provinces should be brought together in some common understanding of this export business? For instance our friends in Nova Scotia, who are only five or six days distant from the British market can pour their apples in while British Columbia and Ontario might be handicapped in that regard. Or British Columbia might have say 10,000 cases going through by way of the Panama canal in cold storage; the market is in danger of being flooded, and someone from eastern Canada pours his apples in and destroys it. No one, I am sure, desires that. Yet that is a condition that is very likely to arise. As a matter of fact the preference that we enjoy on apples, speaking of that particular commodity, will be frustrated and dissipated if we do not take great care in that regard.

I have already dealt with the complaint made by the right hon. gentleman as to creating a crime. I do not wish to detain the house further. There are a number of details that I should like to discuss, but I think it would be very much better if the various clauses of this bill were discussed in committee of the whole, so that we may focus our attention upon the clause immediately before the committee and not deal with it in a general way together with other clauses without giving the minister in charge of the bill an opportunity to reply.

I will therefore conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, with the observation that the bill as it is introduced is prompted by one desire only, and that is the desire to assist in directing the marketing of Canadian products in the Canadian and foreign markets. That is the genius of the bill; that is the object and desire of the bill. It may be that in order to achieve that end it will be desirable to, shall I say, have some measure of control over production if, for instance, there is a reckless production in some section of the country to the detriment of others in connection with our export business. Or let us look at it in this way: assuming that cattle are being exported that are not fit for the British market, is it not highly desirable that we should have some body to determine what cattle or what class of cattle should be exported? These are the sort of things—and I could name a score of them—that might properly come under the direction of this board.

With regard to the manner in which the board is set up, I think it is set up as other boards have been created. It has been complained very bitterly that the salaries of those who are to constitute the board are not named in the bill. That is a question which might very well come up in committee. My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) complained that the number of members composing the board has not been named, and I might indicate to him why it might be perhaps inadvisable to put that number in the bill. This central board, which we will say might consist of three, might find it desirable to set up committees to deal with apples, tobacco, hog products, milk, dairy products—

Mr. HANBURY: Lumber.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, my hon. friend can carry it to other natural products such as fish and lumber. Assuming that this was desirable, would it not be much better if the government had a certain amount of liberty to add extra members to the board if desired? That, I think, is the only reason the matter is left open. This is new legislation. This government will be back here next session; there is no doubt about that, and we will be back here for the next parliament as well. Next session, without doubt, we will be subjected to close examination as to how this bill has been administered. There is no chance of parliament being deprived of its right to control and direct its affairs, but let me again remind the right hon. gentleman that in questions of trade, in questions that have to do with the processing, the marketing and the controlling of our natural products, in all existing statutes or in any statute that would be workable there must be a certain measure of administrative liberty left to the government or else the thing would be hopeless. Imagine having to come to parliament and ask for a resolution approving of the setting up of this, that or the other body. The right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said the other night and to-day that in the British house they go to parliament and pass a resolution. The British house sits practically the year round. They adjourn for about a month at Christmas, as a rule; during the dog days in August when no one does any business at all they usually adjourn again, and outside of a short adjournment at Easter, the British parliament sits the year round. So they have a different situation; they are a small compact country with one parliament. Here we have the handicap—and I think it is a distinct handicap—of nine parliaments in the country in addition to our own. We have the task of trying to keep ourselves in contact and harmony with these various legislative bodies, at the same time carrying on the administration of the country, with this parliament adjourned for seven months of the year. Obviously it would be impossible to follow the British course and come to parliament in connection with the direction of an act of this kind. It would be absurd and ridiculous for any government to suggest that such a thing should be done.

So, Mr. Speaker, we offer this bill to the house, not as a finished product but as a new piece of legislation designed to meet an unusual condition which has grown up in recent years. We ask parliament to cooperate with us in hammering it into workable and suitable shape so that it may be administered in the interests of the country as a whole.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we were very glad indeed to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), in his fifty-five minute address, endeavour to give some reasons why parliament should accept this bill. His first remark was that conditions in this country were different because we are in the midst of a world crisis. When I heard him make that statement I was reminded of the words of Robert Burns:

> O wad some power the giftie gie us
> To see oursel's as ithers see us!

I remember reading in the newspapers the addresses made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other members of the government during the 1930 campaign; the world crisis was never mentioned. It was said to be purely a Canadian crisis; the world had nothing to do with conditions in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite tried to make the farmers believe they should have seventy cents a pound for butter, for one thing. The minister did not explain whether this bill is going to give the farmer more or less for his butter, but I think I can prove conclusively that whether it is a matter of butter, of wheat, of fish or of anything else, this bill, instead of increasing prices will lower prices. The strange point about the minister's remarks with regard to the world crisis, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) took twenty-five minutes to tell us that the world crisis had passed. Tonight the Minister of Trade and Commerce tries to tell this parliament that this bill is necessary because there is a world crisis in which Canada is involved.

The minister also said it was necessary to do something for agriculture. Well, it has taken hon. gentlemen opposite a long time to find that out. They have been in power for four years; for four years they have done practically nothing. Now the mountain has laboured and brought forth this mouse sponsored by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). A strange thing happened, however, during the address made by the Minister of Agriculture when introducing this bill. During his whole speech he did not take one minute to tell us what remedies were proposed for agriculture or the other primary industries of this country. He spent a great deal of time telling us about a calf that was taken to the stockyards from somebody's farm and that lost weight during the journey, but he did not say a word as to what this bill would do for the farmer or how it would improve conditions in the farming communities or in any other productive industry. I remember also that in discussing both the resolution and the bill the minister did not want us to ask any questions; in fact he would not answer us when we asked him to tell us what the bill meant. These are the hon. gentlemen who now come here and tell us that this bill is going to deal with and solve all our troubles.

What else did the Minister of Trade and Commerce say about this legislation? He referred to the fact that Greece and other countries have restricted trade by means of quotas. Surely it is bad enough for foreign countries to impose quotas on goods exported from Canada, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce admitted that by this bill the government was not only going to help foreign countries put quotas against our exports but was going to say to these other countries. "We have put extra quotas on ourselves so that our goods cannot be exported to foreign markets."

What else did he say, Mr. Speaker? He said that there was no intention on the part of this government by this bill to abrogate the rights of parliament. I say, Mr. Speaker, and the leader of the opposition has said, that by this bill the rights of parliament are being abrogated. But that is not all. In addition to the rights of parliament being abrogated, the rights of the private citizens of this country, which in my opinion are as important, if not more important than the rights of parliament, are being abrogated by this bill.

In order to make an argument the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the apple industry, and he wanted us to put a quota upon it. It is quite evident that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not very well informed so far as his department is concerned, because that is the department that has to do with trade and commerce whether internal or external. I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there is great objection to this bill, not only in the province of Nova Scotia where apples are grown and marketed, but also in the great province of Ontario; and I would not be surprised, although I do not know, if there was not the same objection in the province of British Columbia because only the other evening my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Stirling) in his speech in this house damned the bill with faint praise. He did not come out flatfootedly in favour of it, but in his effort to support the government skated around the bill and said that perhaps it might be advantageous to the apple growers of the Okanagan valley and the rest of British Columbia. I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce or anybody else, who are the better judges as to how and when the apples should be shipped than the men who are growing the apples and the men who pay their good money to buy them from the producers of Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia? Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce dare to say to me or anyone else in this house that a local board—comprised of whom? Comprised when the Tories are in power, and especially with an election in the offing, of Tories, of course—

Mr. LOUCKS: Oh no.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, and let me go further and say that when the Grits are in power certain interests and certain people will want jobs on that board just the same as when the Tories are in power. Does my hon. friend mean to tell me that the men who have put their money into this industry, the producers who ought to get every dollar they can out of it, are not in a better position to know when to ship their fruit than a local board comprised of heelers of one party or the other?

I go a step further. I say that this bill is not receiving the approbation of the people of this country. Those who have had a chance to study the bill are opposed to it. I say that the business men in this country are opposed to it and the producers who have had a chance to learn what the bill contains are opposed to it. I say further that within the next month when the people who do not know what is in this bill, but who naturally were hoping that there would be something good in it for the producer, when the common people of this country and the producers of agricultural products, of fish and of lumber, come to realize that instead of giving them higher prices this bill is going to drive the agriculturists off the farm, the fishermen off the sea and the lumbermen out of business by the restrictions it imposes, there will be general disapprobation throughout the country.

What does the Conservative press say of this bill? Surely if anybody should favour it we would expect the Conservative newspapers to do so. I have clippings here from four or five Conservative newspapers, but I have time to read only one. It is taken from the Montreal Gazette of March 27. Everybody will admit that the Montreal Gazette, even if it is a Conservative paper, is perhaps the sanest newspaper in Canada. What does it say about this abominable bill?

> The provisions of the natural products marketing act open the door to more government interference in business and in a much wider field than any to which such interference has been restricted in the past. The legislation is evidently based upon the assumption that those who are engaged in the production and marketing of fishery, farm and forest products do not know their own business.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, suggesting that the men who go down to the sea in ships and the men who work on the farms and in the lumber woods do not know their own business better than any Tom, Dick and Harry who will be appointed by the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but it is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to or commenting on or denying anything said by a member or exxpressing any opinion reflecting upon proceedings within this house. A bill is now before the house and it is not in order for hon. members to read comments in newspapers reflecting upon it. I must ask the hon. member to obey the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is out of order for an hon. member to quote from a newspaper discussing a bill actually before the house? I understood that rule to mean that you could not quote any extract from the press reflecting upon an actual debate in this house, not upon any bill or measure, surely, that is now before the house for consideration. Otherwise half the debates in this house would be suppressed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is plain enough and easy enough to understand.

Mr. DUFF: I bow to your ruling that the rule is very plain, Mr. Speaker. There is no question about it at all. If I am not to be allowed to read this article I will say that the Montreal Gazette, a strong Conservative paper, condemns this marketing bill in all its moods and tenses. It is absolutely opposed to the bill, and says that it will never be workable and that it is an interference with business in this country. That is sufficient for my purpose, when a paper like the Montreal Gazette condemns this bill in such a manner.

It is impossible for me in the short time at my disposal to deal with the bill at any great length. Consequently I shall deal only with one effect it will have on one natural product in this country, and I want to preface my remarks by saying this: in my opinion, instead of helping that industry this bill is going to drive it to the wall. Due to the policies of this government in the last four years that industry is practically on its last legs now, and it is going to be the last nail in the coffin, in my opinion, when this bill goes into effect. I refer to the great fishing industry in this country. I am going to deal with that industry in two of its phases: first, as to how this bill will affect the fresh fish industry, which is altogether an internal trade; and second, how it is going to affect the salt fish industry and the prepared fish industry, as far as foreign trade is concerned.

Let us see what will happen. Under this bill we are going to set up in this country different boards. What to do?

—to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality;

What does that mean as far as the fish industry is concerned? In the first place, how are these boards going to operate in the maritime provinces, on the great lakes and on the Pacific ocean? Anybody who knows anything about the geography of this country and knows anything about its business, and surely the Minister of Trade and Commerce should know something about it if anybody does, knows that in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, all along the Atlantic coast from Grand Manan to Cape North and extending up to Northumberland straits, there must be at least two hundred fishing hamlets each separate from the other. I want to impress that upon the house, that there must be two hundred different fishing hamlets from Grand Manan to Cape North. Will there be a local board set up in each community? If not, what good will a general board be if it is separated a hundred miles from the fishing community? Do you mean to tell me that the fishermen of Necum-Teuch will have to go to Halifax to consult the local board? Do you mean to tell me that the fishermen of Cole Harbour will have to go to Canso or somewhere else to consult the board? Do you mean to tell me that the fishermen of Glace Bay will have to go to North Sydney to consult the board? The thing is ridiculous on its face.

What is going to happen in the marketing of fresh fish? I claim that these boards will be no good and that they will not be able to carry out the functions which they are supposed to carry out as far as the fishing industry is concerned. What about the purchasing and selling of the product of the fresh fish industry? How can this bill help in any degree the producers of the fishing industry? The fishermen go out in the morning at four o'clock and bring in the fish fresh that evening. They must dispose of their fish immediately. We know what government officials or most of them are like; they interfere with every business instead of minding their own. These officials of the board will walk down on the wharf and they will say to the fishermen who have fresh fish in their boats: "You cannot accept that price of two, three or four cents per pound which the buyer is willing to pay you; you must keep your fish until to-morrow, the next day or the next week when it will be rotten so that the board can tell you when you can sell and at what price." That is what this legislation means. Let us assume that there is no interference and the buyer purchases the fish. He gets ready to box them up, he gets ready to ice them. Perhaps during the morning and before the fish were caught he had received telegrams from Montreal, Quebec, Winnipeg and other places offering him a certain price for fish and agreeing to take a certain quantity. This officious local board may be comprised of people who are the enemies of fishermen. They go down to the wharf and they say to the buyer: "You cannot sell your fish; you cannot ship them to Toronto, Montreal, Quebec or anywhere else." The buyer may have to show his telegrams and correspondence and the board may say, "You must hold this fish until to-morrow when the price will be higher. Telegraph your customer that instead of selling them for eight or nine cents delivered, you must have ten cents per pound." In the meantime the ice melts and the fish go bad. While the boards at Canso, Lunenburg, Yarmouth or elsewhere in Nova Scotia may be holding fish in that way, the boards in New Brunswick, whose officials may have more common sense, may permit fish to be sold. The result will be that the fishermen in New Brunswick are able to dispose of their fish while the fishermen in Nova Scotia cannot because of the interference of the board. That is exactly what is going to happen as far as the fresh fish industry is concerned.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): In that event the board would have to compensate the fishermen.

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps I had better deal with that right now. What a nice time the fishermen will have in trying to get compensation. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) knows as well as I that the fishermen receive their money as soon as their fish are landed and weighed. My hon. friend knows that the fishermen of Nova Scotia cannot wait a day or a month for a board to report to Ottawa and an investigation to be held. My hon. friend knows how hard it is to get money from this or any other government. They fool and humbug around for months, perhaps for years before they pay their honest debts.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Then these fishermen will hardly ask for a board.

Mr. DUFF: The fishermen do not have to ask for a board, the minister can appoint one. Some officious Tory in Lunenburg or Canso or somewhere else who wants a job can get in touch with the minister from Nova Scotia. He will go to the Minister of Agriculture and a board will be appointed in spite of the protests of the fishermen that they do not want one. If my hon. friend will read the bill he will not make any such mistake in the future.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Speak for your own party, not for ours.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend cannot get away from the fact that he said the fishermen would get compensation. It would be impossible for that to be put into effect as the fishermen must have their money immediately. I know the trouble there would be in getting compensation, and my hon. friend knows it just as well as I do.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): The bill reads:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power to compensate any person for loss sustained by exporting, storing or withholding from the market any product pursuant to any determination or order of the board.

Mr. DUFF: If that is true, perhaps the best thing for the fishermen to do would be to get in cahoots with the board and have it refuse to allow them to sell their fish and they would then obtain a better price for them by obtaining a fuller compensation. Under present conditions the fishermen do not get very much and the money would be coming out of the treasury. That is not the proper way to do business in this country. Why should the fishermen, the farmers or anyone else be compensated from the treasury because they are compelled to withhold their product from the market? That is not right and neither the fishermen nor anyone else wants that kind of legislation. They want to be able to go out and get the best price they can obtain; they do not want to have to appeal to a board and then obtain money from the treasury of this country because that board will not permit them to sell their product.

An hon. MEMBER: That will make a lot of work for the lawyers.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend behind me says that that will make a lot of work for the lawyers. What about the salt fish industry? I am again going to refer to my own province. My hon. friend knows as well as I that there is a large salt fish business in Nova Scotia. The fishermen catch fish fresh and take them ashore. They sell them to buyers who split and salt them and put them down in puncheons. Provided there is no interference in this bill, the fishermen get their money when they land their fish. There are perhaps hundreds of people in Nova Scotia engaged in buying fresh fish from the fishermen and salting them and putting them in puncheons. For the sake of argument let us assume that there is no interference by the board as far as the purchasing of fish is concerned. The buyer buys the fish, salts them and puts them away in puncheons. He leaves them for two or three months. Perhaps he has used up all his own money and he goes to the bank and borrows money on the fish he is getting ready for shipment later on. He may receive an offer from Gloucester or Boston for this salt, pickled fish but the board steps in and says: "No, you cannot sell this fish in Boston or Gloucester at that price; you must wait for a higher price." Perhaps this man may be kept from shipping his fish for two or three months. In the meantime the market has gone down. Why? Because the Gloucester and Boston fish men, finding they cannot get salt fish in Nova Scotia, go to Newfoundland, to Norway if necessary, or perhaps to New Brunswick, where the board may have more common sense than the one in Nova Scotia. They obtain their supplies from those places. The result is that in three or four months' time, when the embargo is lifted and the local board allows the dealer to ship the fish to Boston, he has to take a cent or two cents less per pound. My hon. friend says that he is compensated; but, I ask, why should there be any necessity for compensation? Is it due to the stupidity of the officials appointed by the government? Is that the reason why the compensation clause appears here? Why does not this government allow trade to flow naturally? Why should the government say to any man, "You shall not ship your salt fish to Boston or to Gloucester even if you wish to"? That is the man's own business and the business of the bank that advances him the money.

This bill is not fair to anyone, whether it be the man who catches the fish, the man who handles it or the man who sells it. And what about our foreign trade? In the maritimes there is what is known as the salt fish industry. There is pickled fish, herring and mackerel, and my hon. friend from Cape Breton South knows that in the island of Cape Breton the fishermen catch tens of thousands of barrels of mackerel and herring.

They go to the small business men in the community in the spring and obtain supplies —barrels, salt and nets with which to catch the fish. They go out and catch the fish and bring them in and split them or gib them, then they salt them and put them into barrels. Well, what will happen now? After the fish are ready for market this local board comes along and says to the fisherman, "You cannot sell your fish to the storekeeper in Louisburg; you cannot even send them to Halifax until we give you permission to dispose of them." What happens? In other parts of Nova Scotia there may be thousands of barrels of mackerel awaiting shipment and the local boards in these other places may allow the fishermen to ship their product to Halifax or to other purchasers of mackerel and herring in the province, and in the meantime the Cape Breton fishermen are left with their fish on their hands. By and by the market goes down and when the purchaser in the West Indies has all his bookings made for five or six months—because that is what they do—and all his arrangements to buy mackerel and herring have been completed so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, when he cannot get the commodity in that province he will go to Newfoundland and the fishermen in Cape Breton will be left with the herring and mackerel on their hands because the board would not allow the fish to be shipped out.

And who is to determine the loss? The local board, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance, who represents Richmond and West Cape Breton, where thousands of barrels of mackerel are caught every year? Who is to interfere, who is to fix the price, who is to use influence with the government to get the money paid as my hon. friend says the act provides? Who ever heard of business being carried on in this way?

Let me discuss something else in connection with salt fish. In addition to mackerel and herring, as my hon. friend knows, from Cape North to Grand Manan there are thousands of quintals of dried fish, cod, hake and pollock. This fish is caught and dried every year. Now, there is in the bill a section that provides that if the fisherman does not obey the mandate of the local board, if he does not take out a licence or do a hundred and one other things he shall be liable to fine and imprisonment. But what does the poor devil at Neil's harbour know about this legislation? He catches the fish and takes it ashore; he dries the fish and takes it to Halifax. When he gets to Halifax another officious local board appears on the wharf and says to him, "How much can you get for that codfish?" He and the other fishermen with him say, "We have had four or five offers at such and such a price," but the board says, "You cannot sell the fish at that price; you have to get more money for it. You must wait for more money." The result is that the fishermen have to lie around Halifax until the board is ready to lift the embargo; otherwise they will be obliged to take the dried codfish back to Neil's harbour or to Ingonish as the case may be. If that happens, then next winter my good friend who represents the constituency in which these places are situated will come to Ottawa and inform the Minister of Agriculture that the fishermen have sustained a loss as a result of the order made by the local board, and the hon. gentleman will endeavour to get money for them—and none will work harder than my hon. friend from Cape Breton North-Victoria. But he will not succeed, and the result will be that the fishermen of Neil's harbour will have their catch left on their hands or will have to sell at a reduced price, because that is precisely what the effect of this legislation will be.

But supposing, after some delay, the fishermen are allowed to sell their fish to the exporter; what happens under this law? Let us see what it says, so that my hon. friend will realize that I am simply stating the facts. The board shall have power:

> To regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality . . . to compensate any person in respect of any shipment made pursuant to any determination or order of the board to a country whose currency is depreciated. . . .

Let me deal for a moment with that last provision. Why should the treasury of this country compensate me if I choose to sell fish in a certain market where the currency is depreciated? I will give an example. Two years ago, owing to certain conditions, the Canadian dollar was worth only 76 cents or, to put it another way, the American dollar was worth $1.24, while the English pound in Trinidad was worth only $3.80 instead of $4.86. Now, I was shipping fish to Puerto Rico and I sold my bills of exchange at a premium of 22 or 23 per cent, whereas in Trinidad I had to take $3.80 for the pound sterling. Surely it is a matter of trading. Why should this government insert in this bill a provision to the effect that if anyone sells in a country whose currency is depreciated the treasury of this dominion should compensate the shipper?

Let us suppose that English currency were depreciated after the passage of this measure, as it was a year ago. It is true that goods shipped from Canada to Great Britain were paid for on the basis of $3.80 or $4.40, or whatever it was. But had it not been for the interference of this government, had they allowed the goods which the people of Canada bought in exchange for the goods they shipped to come in freely, it might have been as broad as it was long and no one would have suffered. But the trouble was that the Minister of National Revenue imposed a dumping duty to the extent of the difference in value between the pound sterling and a certain fixed amount.

As an exporter, I submit that this currency situation is all wrong, and the government has no right to compensate me if I sell in a foreign market in which the currency is depreciated. The Canadian product enters into competition with fish from other countries. Fish from Cape Breton and from my own constituency of Guysborough, from Halifax county, from Lunenburg and Grand Manan, goes on the foreign market in competition with fish from Newfoundland, Norway and even Great Britain and the United States. It is a well known fact that large stocks of fish are put into storage in the fall of the year from October to December, and those stocks have to do until June of the following year. The exporter or the fish merchant buys those fish from the fishermen and he pays the fishermen the current value for them. If he has not sufficient money of his own, he goes to the bank and borrows it under section 88 of the Bank Act. The result is that in many cases large sums of money are loaned to the different exporters of fish in Nova Scotia. Those men fill their storage plants with fish; they pay the labour for putting them in; they pay fire insurance on the fish and they pay interest every month on the money borrowed. But when they want to sell some fish, when they want to dispose of the article, when they desire to pay the bank part or all of the money they have borrowed from it, this legislation steps in and some local board says: Oh, no, you cannot sell your fish in a foreign market unless you get a certain price for it. They compel the exporters in the first place—and I object to this—to expose to this board, which is not and will not be responsible to parliament, their private business. The result is that if this board so desire they can tell their friend who is in the same business as I am, what price I have been offered for my fish. They say: We will not let you sell your fish, and I lose the order. As I said a moment ago, the buyer in the West Indies—Jamaica, Haiti, Puerto Rico or elsewhere—if he cannot get the fish from Nova Scotia will go to Newfoundland or Norway for it.

[Mr. Duff.]

Suppose the local board in Lunenburg will not allow me or another exporter to sell our fish. Perhaps the Halifax local board has more sense and will allow the exporters there to sell, and they will sell their fish and clear up their bank loans. The result is that I have a large stock of fish left on my hands in the spring. In view of those facts will the people of Nova Scotia, who risk large sums of money, be able to carry on business after this legislation comes into effect? No. What is perhaps worse is this: is there any bank in this country which will lend a man $50,000 or $100,000 to buy wheat, fish or anything else when it knows that under this legislation some local body may interfere and he cannot sell the goods on which the bank might have loaned the money? When this measure goes into force the banks will not allow people to do business in the way they have done it in the past and the banks will be fully justified in their attitude. My hon. friend says: All the man has to do is to say to the bank: Never mind, the government will recompense you for your loan if the merchant has to dispose of his stock at half price in the spring. If the fish turn red or dun and the merchant has to dump them on a foreign market, the hon. member for South Cape Breton says that the merchant can come to the government and get the difference. Who will decide what that difference is? I say that the thing is fundamentally wrong, and the Minister of Agriculture knows it is wrong because he is calling his friends together to-morrow morning at ten o'clock to decide whether they will withdraw the bill or what they will do with it.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): How does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. DUFF: I do know and my hon. friend should know, because he should be anxious to protect the interests of the people of Nova Scotia.

In my opening remarks I said that this bill would not benefit the producers of wheat, fish, lumber or anything else. In Nova Scotia at the present time we have voluntary cooperative societies which are composed of men in either the different farming or the different fishing sections. Those men in their organizations do good work; they get together, discuss their problems and decide what they shall do in their own best interests. But if this measure goes through, what happens?

Every one of those voluntary cooperative societies goes out of business. Under this bill there is not cooperation, but a compulsory setting up of a local board of, say three men, not of fifty or sixty or seventy, as in the case of the cooperative societies, who to-day, all have a say. This measure compels the fishermen or the farmers to get together and so long as they have a majority of their number, the government will create a local board. Under this bill, if somebody has sufficient influence with the government, it is not necessary for the fishermen even to ask for this board to be appointed. So far as I am concerned, I have always been in favour of cooperative methods. In fact, in the town in which I live we had the first cooperative organization in the fishing industry or any other industry in the dominion. Sixty years ago this cooperative method was adopted so far as the fishermen in the county of Lunenburg are concerned. I have been in favour of that because I have been interested in the cooperative movement in that county for the last thirty years. But I say that this legislation is not cooperation at all; it is pure compulsion. Not only am I opposed to compulsion, but I say also that this compulsory method of appointing a board—and I repeat this—is not going to help the fishermen. In the final analysis the fishermen will suffer most.

The bill says that if a number of fishermen get together and a majority so decide, they can get a board. What about the minority? Let us say, for instance, in one of the villages on the Nova Scotia coast there are one hundred fishermen, and sixty of them sign a petition to the minister asking that a board be appointed. Because there is a majority the minister grants their request and appoints three local men to act on the board. The minute this board is appointed, what happens? They can regulate the time and the place of marketing and determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality of the regulated product. They can also prohibit marketing by any person at any time. Is that fair? Is that British? If sixty men get together and say: We want to hold on to our fish; we do not want to sell them, is it fair that if the other forty men want to sell theirs, they cannot do so, or even if one man out of the hundred wants to sell his, he is not allowed? He caught his fish; he and his two little boys went out at four o'clock in the morning in the fog and rain and storm and brought those fish to land. Yet because of this legislation, perhaps because some of his neighbours do not like him, they will prevent him from selling his fish. I believe that in certain matters, for instance, in church and state, the majority should rule, and the hon member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) will remember the vicious legislation passed by this parliament in 1924. We know what happened in that case. Not only did the minority have nothing to say, but they were blanketed in an organization under the bill. That is what will happen in this instance; the minority will have no rights. They will be told under this bill that they must sell their fish or wheat or whatever it may be because somebody else says so. Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask you to allow me to speak for a few more minutes, not very long.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the leave of the house.

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) spoke for more than forty minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: He was not limited as to time.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, yes he was.

Mr. SPEAKER: He was not limited as to time under the standing order.

Mr. DUFF: I beg to differ.

Mr. YOUNG: Go ahead, with unanimous consent.

Mr. DUFF: Now, Mr. Speaker, I have protests from a number of people. This act interferes with the freedom of trade. The trouble in this country in my opinion is that we have too much paternalism, too many restrictions, too many regulations, too many people looking after other people's business instead of letting them look after their own. Someone has written some verses which will do to wind up with, in view of the fact that I have not time to present further arguments in this important matter:

Paternalism, or Liberty in Extremis

There were just ten commandments to govern us all
In the spring of our race, but now, in the fall,
Their number is legion, we know not the half,
To suppose we can keep all is surely 'to laugh.'

You mustn't buy tickets in lotteries bad,
You mustn't drink booze, or else you'll be had,
You mustn't plant wheat in excess of the scheme,
You mustn't pay interest too high, it would seem.

There's a quota for this, an embargo for that,
You have to pay duty on sox and on hat,
We're hedged and protected, no free will is left,
Of even the free use of air we're bereft.

If they legislate further all liberty's dead,
Paternal direction with only one head.
An order in council, as sure as your life,
You'll need to permit you to kiss your dear wife.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take much of the time of the house in discussing the measure now before us. I recognize that this bill contains very large powers. I recognize also that in order that a national board may be effective in carrying out the desired purposes it may be necessary for it to have very extensive powers. What I wish to say more particularly is that so far as the appointment of a national marketing board is concerned I am absolutely in sympathy with that proposal. As to the details of the bill, they can be left to the committee stage, when they can be properly discussed and amended where thought desirable by the house.

Unfortunately neither in his address in introducing the measure on first reading nor in moving the second reading did the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) take the opportunity to explain what in his judgment would be the scope or powers conferred upon this proposed marketing board. He did, however, speak of certain economic factors that must be dealt with and dealt with as soon as possible. Harking back to the ideas of twenty-five or thirty-five years ago is useless, for economic conditions have changed drastically since that time and we have facing us to-day a state of affairs such as the world has never known before; therefore extraordinary means must be taken now which would not have been taken then. So far, then, as the principle of the bill is concerned, namely the creation of a national marketing board to deal with the marketing of primary products, I am absolutely in sympathy with it, but I reserve my judgment as to the specific proposals embodied in the bill.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Duff) dealt more or less exclusively with fish, something about which he knows. For the few minutes that I desire to take the time of the house I wish to deal with the industry of which I know something, in which I have been engaged in western Canada for thirty-two years, namely the agricultural industry. I think we all recognize that very few items of agricultural produce are selling to-day at prices which return to the producer the cost of production. I maintain that that condition cannot continue much longer, or the effect upon Canada as a whole will be very grave indeed. I am therefore willing to experiment to see if it is possible to assure to the primary producers at least the cost of production of commodities which this country requires and finds necessary to export in order to pay for what is bought. If we go over the index figures for agricultural products, more particularly up to about two months ago, we find that the prices, in other words the return that the producer receives for his labour, have been reduced to a greater extent than have the price levels of manufactured goods and other services. We are faced with this condition, that the majority of manufacturing processes to-day are controlled by great monopolies which can restrict at will the amount they produce, and to a very large extent tend to maintain their price levels. But each of the hundreds of thousands of producers of agricultural products in Canada is in competition with every other producer of like commodities when he comes to sell the product of his labour. The consequence is that so far as exchange values are concerned, the primary producer to-day is not getting a fair exchange. I am sure if this or any government can bring before this house a measure which will produce a greater parity of exchange values as between the different classes of commodities which the Canadian people must have in order to live, that will be all to the good not only of the primary producer but even of the manufacturing interests in this country.

The minister in moving the second reading of the bill told the house that he had received many communications from cooperative selling organizations. I think he referred more particularly to farmer organizations. He intimated that they were desirous of securing legislation of this character. I have not had the opportunity of securing much information as to whether the farmers of western Canada are satisfied with the proposals contained in this measure. I was very sorry, therefore, to hear that instead of sending this bill to the agriculture committee, where those who are most interested could come and give testimony as to whether the powers are sufficient or in their judgment too great or whether the general trend is satisfactory to their purposes, the minister proposes to submit this bill to a committee of the whole house. May I suggest to the minister that in my judgment, in order to satisfy public opinion and satisfy the producers themselves, it would have been far better to send it to the agriculture committee in order to give those directly interested, the actual producers of the commodities which will be to a large extent controlled by the proposed legislation, the opportunity of appearing and presenting their point of view. I suggest that that is absolutely essential. That is why I am not at the present time taking the opportunity to discuss the bill clause by clause and give my opinions on the various sections. But after all is said and done, sir, the most important thing in connection with any piece of legislation of this kind is its administration. It all depends on the administration of the legislation whether it will be successful and whether it will satisfy those whom it is intended to benefit. You might have the best piece of legislation the mind of man could conceive, but with poor administration the benefits would be absolutely lost. On the other hand you might have a piece of legislation considered poor, but with good administration it might be quite beneficial and effective. I would stress very strongly indeed that, in whatever form this measure passes the house, the government have a great responsibility in seeing to it that the administration is the best this country can secure, because unless there is proper administration I am satisfied that it will be a failure and will be detrimental to the best interests of the producer.

Let me repeat, sir, that with the principle of the national marketing of the primary products of this country I am in hearty sympathy. With regard to the provisions of the bill I want to hear a further explanation by the minister as to just how he proposes or expects to put it into effect, and until that explanation is given I am neither supporting nor criticizing this legislation. And may I suggest further that I trust the Minister of Agriculture will see his way clear to send the bill to the agriculture committee, which in my judgment would be much more satisfactory to the producer than to have the bill considered by the committee of the whole.

On motion of Mr. Young the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, April 20, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, April 20, 1934.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that Right Hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, acting as the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

F. L. C. Pereira,
Deputy Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the third report of the select standing committee on standing orders and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): On the first reading of the sweepstakes bill the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) suggested that the government might fix a certain day for discussion of the matter. Is it the present intention that the bill will be proceeded with this evening or shall we take up public bills in the ordinary course?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. gentleman for directing attention to the matter. It is proposed to suit the convenience of all members of the house in fixing a day for discussion of the sweepstakes bill, possibly some day next week. The Secretary of State will lay on the table as soon as he can have it prepared, a copy of the resolution that was passed by the legislative assembly of Quebec and a copy of the bill that was passed at the last session of the assembly. I think that can probably be done on Monday. Then we can fix some convenient day for the discussion of the sweepstakes bill after consultation with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and others who may be interested.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

WASHOUT AT MATAPEDIA, BONAVENTURE COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I would call the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) to a Canadian Press dispatch appearing in this morning's papers concerning a very serious interruption to traffic on the main line of the Canadian National Railways in Matapedia in my county, where passengers, baggage and mail have had to be transferred by canoe over the Restigouche river. Owing to the very heavy fall of snow in the Matapedia valley during the past winter there has been a washout of several hundred yards of the main line, and trains have been held up three or four at a time. I have been urging for many years the erection of protection works for the main line and village of Matapedia and I hope that with this occurrence the Minister of Railways will take a deeper interest in the matter. In the meantime I would ask if he has any further information beyond what has appeared in this morning's papers?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. gentleman sent a request over to my office for information, and I have a good deal of information here which I will send across to him. It is not of particular interest to the rest of the house. I may say in a sentence—

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I wish the minister would give the information to the house so that it will appear in Hansard because my people are deeply interested in it. In Gloucester county we are almost cut off from communication with northern New Brunswick.

Mr. MANION: I was going to say that the railway informs me that they have complete control of the matter and are taking every procedure needed. I thought it would be sufficient if I said that and sent the letter across to my hon. friend from Bonaventure and anybody else who wants to see it.

WINDSOR BROADCASTING STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I would ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if there is any truth in the newspaper report that the radio broadcasting station at Windsor is being taken over by the radio commission for a period of five years?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I will look into the matter and give my hon. friend the information.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to an editorial that appeared in the Charlottetown Guardian of April 16 in which it is stated that the government of Prince Edward Island had taken up with the railway trustee board the matter of rates charged for automobiles on the car ferry and that they had been referred to Mr. Allison Fraser, being informed that he was the man who had authority in this regard. The editorial states that Mr. Fraser has refused to put into force this year the rates that were in force last year during the tourist season. May I say to the Minister of Railways that we as a province absolutely refuse to accept Mr. Fraser's dictum in this matter, and I trust that the Minister of Railways will look into the subject with a view to seeing that our province receives at least the same rates as were in force last year.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): The statement is correct in so far as it indicates that the government of Prince Edward Island had seen the officials of the railway, but I may inform the hon. gentleman that they also interviewed myself some months ago. A deputation from Prince Edward Island saw me and I have had the matter up for some time with the railway management; but inasmuch as the car ferry is in a sense operated separately from the railways, it was a matter in which the government had a right to have a fairly strong opinion in regard to rates. My own opinion, passed on to the management—and I believe they are accepting it—was that the wisest course would be to observe exactly the same rates as were in force last year in connection with the tourist traffic. If they do, I fancy that will be satisfactory, though I may add that there are some people in the province who protest that there should be even lower rates than last year. The best that can be hoped for, however, is that during the tourist season there will be charged the same rates as were in effect last year.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): In rising to speak to the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition to this bill, may I at the outset extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and to the group he leads upon the outstanding success they have had in winning over the Prime Minister and the government to the wholehearted adoption of their policy. For if this bill is carried into effect it will involve in the agricultural industry, in the mining industry, in the fishing industry and in many of our manufacturing industries a complete system of planned and regulated economy from the primary producer right through to the consumer. The hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre recognized the situation yesterday when he said that this would probably result in a realignment of political parties in Canada.

We of the Liberal party have always contended that the C.C.F. party and the Conservative party are much closer together in their political philosophy than either one of them is to the Liberal party—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Even that would be to their credit.

Mr. YOUNG: —and I think the developments of the present session will show that there is much truth in that contention. The government received considerable support for its relief bill from gentlemen in the corner, and now gentlemen in the corner are getting full support for their policy from the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Quid pro quo.

Mr. YOUNG: In this connection, might I refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would point out to the hon. gentleman that some of us in this corner voted against the relief bill.

Mr. YOUNG: I said considerable support. The statement to which I wish to refer is found on page 2337 of Hansard of yesterday. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said:

> I am willing to accept the explanation of the leader of the opposition that there was no implication, but in making that explanation the leader of the opposition says that we are seeking to wipe out parliamentary institutions . . . and it is not true.

I am glad to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre make that denial, but I attended the convention of the C.C.F. in Regina last summer, and for three days I sat in the gallery listening to the debates that took place there. Many startling statements were made but I took down what I considered to be the most startling, which was made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis). They were discussing whether or not they should proceed by constitutional means to take over the government of the country and the hon. gentleman argued that they should proceed by constitutional means because, he said, if they were not strong enough to get into power by means of the ballot they were not strong enough to get in by any other means; but, he added, "When we get the power of the state in our hands we will use that power to keep it in our hands." Let us examine that statement. What is the power of the state? It is the power to make laws and to enforce them, and the proposal made here is that they should first get into power and then make laws that will render it impossible for anyone to turn them out of power again. If that is not depriving parliament of its rights, I do not know what is.

This legislation is based on the assumption that a small group of men, chosen in part by the government and in part in other ways, are more capable of managing the individual businesses of farmers, of lumbermen, of fishermen and of manufacturers in this country than are the men who own the businesses. Under our present system, if I mismanage my business I suffer for it, and that is the incentive to me to keep right up on my toes and attend to business. But under this legislation it is assumed that a group of men who have no direct financial interest in the business will be in a better position to manage it and to put it on a profitable basis than I can myself.

I have little sympathy with those who say that they agree with the principle of the bill but are opposed to the details. To me the whole principle is abhorrent. The very idea of a marketing board sitting here in Ottawa and telling the farmers of the country how many acres of wheat they shall sow, how many acres of oats, how many acres of barley and of flax, how many head of cattle they shall be allowed to raise, how many hogs they shall fatten, how many chickens they shall feed, that board having the power to put them in gaol if they dare to sell any of these in violation of its ruling—why, the whole idea is abhorrent to anyone of Liberal thought. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) the other day, speaking to the bill, made this statement: "The principle behind the bill is that the producer should have in his own hand the power to control the marketing of his own products." That is not the principle of the bill; that is the very antithesis of its principle. The principle of the bill is that the power should be taken out of the hands of the producer to control his own product. I was surprised, I was shocked the other day, when the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) was speaking, at an interruption made by the Prime Minister. The hon. member was speaking against the curtailment of the rights of the people and the Prime Minister made the statement that "All legislation restricts liberty; that that is what parliament is for." That is not what parliament is for. Parliament was set up in the first place and has been maintained through the ages to protect and maintain the rights and liberties of the people against those who would encroach upon them.

Mr. BENNETT: And protection has always meant restriction. If the hon. member would read a little history he would know that.

Mr. YOUNG: If every law that is passed restricts liberty to some extent, that is no reason that we should pass a law restricting all liberty. If every law that is passed means a restriction of liberty, we should be all the more careful what laws we do pass and this one should certainly never be passed.

Last night, discussing what he called the necessity for the bill, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) referred to quotas set up by different countries of the world restricting the imports of various commodities allowed into those countries. He instanced that as one of the reasons which made this bill necessary. There is nothing in this legislation to overcome that difficulty. I realize fully the difficulty of carrying on international trade in the present temper of the world, but in this bill there is nothing to solve that problem. In some quarters a very mistaken idea exists as to the meaning of the granting of a quota. Many people think that when the government of one country grants a quota to another, it means that the country granting the quota undertakes to buy that quantity of goods from the other. That is not the situation. If, for instance, Great Britain gives us a quota of a million barrels of apples a year, that does not mean that she will buy a million barrels from us; it means that the British government says to us: We will permit you to ship a million barrels into our country but you must take your chance of being able to sell them when they get here; you must find your own market after the apples arrive. I ask this question: Will the boards that will be set up under this bill to take care of the marketing of our apples, be any more successful in finding those markets than would be the scores and scores of individuals who are now trying to sell and whose financial interests are at stake if they do not find a market for their goods? If this legislation comes into effect, we shall probably have three local boards in Canada handling apples: one in Nova Scotia, one in Ontario and one in British Columbia.

Mr. DUPUIS: And one in Ottawa.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, a central board in Ottawa, but it will not do the marketing; it will do only the meddling, so to speak; it will have authority to restrict the powers of those local boards, but it will be the duty of the local boards to find markets for our apples. Will those three local boards be more successful than the individuals who own the apples and whose financial interests are at stake if they fail to find a market for them? Supposing one board is a little more enterprising than the others and does find a market in some part of the world for a certain quantity of apples: would it be able to supply that market? Not without permission of the central marketing board. What would the central marketing board say to them? It would say: You have done well to find that market but you must share it with the other two boards. So the poor board that has found this market discovers that in order to sell one barrel of apples it has to find a market for three barrels. What incentive would there be then to find any market for their goods? In any case, why should they care? Their salaries and expenses will go on regardless of whether the apples are sold. If the apples are even dumped in the ocean, that will make no difference to the board because their pay will go on just the same. In that event they would be apt simply to settle back into a state of dull routine and let the marketing take care of itself.

The other day I heard a story—and I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce heard it also—of a board set up in a certain part of the country to handle the raw product of its customers. It was not dependent upon service for its clientele; it had that bound to it by a contract. What happened? There were in the market three principal buyers for the commodity and the board did what? The first week they sold all their receipts to buyer number one; the second week they sold all their receipts to buyer number two; the third week they sold all their receipts to buyer number three; the fourth week they sold all their receipts to buyer number one; the fifth week they sold all their receipts to buyer number two; the sixth week they sold all their receipts to buyer number three; the next week they sold all their receipts to buyer number one, and so on, and they continued that process from one year's end to the other. What had they done? They had ceased to function as a selling agency; they had simply sat back and allowed the business to run itself. Yet that board was under more direct control of the producers than will be the boards that will be set up under this bill.

There is a further danger that those boards might decide to withhold from the market the products they have to sell. People getting into that position, handling large quantities of goods not at their own risk, might think the price ought to go up, but the judgment of the world is that it will not go up, so the world offers a certain price for the commodity.

They match their judgment against the judgment of the world and having nothing at stake, they hold back those commodities from the market. There must be a great deal of fun in playing the market in that way. Some people in Canada have had many millions of dollars worth of that kind of fun in recent years and the taxpayers are going to pay for it, but I do not think we want any more experiences of that kind.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) the other night, speaking on the bill, outlined the cause of failure of some of the cooperative associations. He said that one reason was that they were apt to choose as their salesmen, their managers, men who had no direct financial interest in the affairs of the cooperative. That difficulty is not removed by this bill as we shall see when we come to discuss it item by item. Those boards that will have control of the marketing are not directly responsible to the producers. Let us look at the bill itself. Subclause (1) of clause 3 reads:

> The governor in council may establish a board to be known as the dominion marketing board—

This board is not to be appointed by the producers. The dominion marketing board will be appointed by the governor in council. Subclause (2) reads:

> The board shall consist of such number of persons as the governor in council may from time to time determine, and each member shall hold office during pleasure and shall receive such remuneration as the governor in council shall determine.

Not elected by the producers; not under their control; not in direct touch with them and not necessarily in sympathy with them. Subclause (4) reads:

> The governor in council may authorize certain members of the board to exercise the functions of the board in respect of any product or class of products.

What does that mean? It means that the government will not make the mistake it made in the case of the tariff board. In that case it appointed three men and the chairman happened to be a man who would not jump every time the string was pulled. If any man happens to get on this board who dares to think for himself and who does not agree with the minister, the governor in council may authorize the other members of the board to do all the work and that man will have nothing to do. Subclause (9) of clause 3 reads:

> The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act.

This board is to have power to use the taxpayers' money to carry on its activities. The powers of the board are given in clause 4, and among them are the following:

> To regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

I wonder whether the government has given consideration to all that is involved in that clause. I know there are in the house some ministers who believe certain classes, that is the lower grades, of cattle should not be marketed. If one of those gentlemen happened to be the man in charge, he would prohibit the marketing of low grade cattle. In that event, consider the position of the farmer in the dried-out district whose crops have failed, whose cattle are thin and who is in no position to fit them for the market. What can he do? The only thing that man can do is to throw his cattle on the market and get what he can for them. But under this legislation it would be impossible, for the board would say: No, we will not allow you to market your lean cattle because it would interfere with the price other men can get for their fat cattle. Then there is the power to prohibit marketing. I wonder if anyone has considered the political possibilities of that clause. Suppose, for instance, the board forbids the export of lumber. An election is about to take place. Some unscrupulous politician comes into a lumber district and says: Boys, if you vote right they are going to open the gates and let us sell lumber again. Is that likely to make any difference to the election? I wonder if the government has given consideration to such a possibility.

Then subsection (c). The board shall have power—> to compensate any person for loss sustained by exporting, storing or withholding from the market any product pursuant to any determination or order of the board;

The significance of that clause is that it would guarantee the top price to every one; for those who get the lower price will say to the board: You ordered us to sell in a certain place; someone else who sold in another place got a higher price; now you must compensate us, give us the difference between what we got and what they got. You can pay it out of the treasury. Suppose the price of apples in Canada were $5 a barrel, and suppose it were only $4 a barrel abroad. The board could order the Canadian apple shippers to export large quantities of apples and dump them on the world market at as low as $3 a barrel in order to get rid of them. In so doing they could create an artificial shortage in Canada and force the price up to say $6 a barrel. Then those who had sold abroad at $3 would be able to come back to this board and demand compensation, demand the same remuneration for their apples as received by those who sold at home at $6. So the consumers of this country would be in this position: in the first place they would pay $6 for their own apples, and then would have to pay $2 or $3 a barrel for the apples eaten by the people in other countries.

Then the next clause:

(d) to compensate any person in respect of any shipment made pursuant to any determination or order of the board to a country whose currency is depreciated, in relation to Canadian currency, for loss due to such depreciation;

That is to say, this board undertakes to guarantee, to back the notes of other countries. In private business it is not considered good business to back any one else's notes. But here we have a board that can lightly assume the responsibility of backing the notes of foreign countries. That would not be very easy to carry out. If a country with which we are dealing has its currency depreciated 50 per cent in relation to ours that depreciation will be in greater or lesser degree reflected in the number of that country's dollars which will buy our products; those who ship goods to that country will get more of those dollars for them. They will come to the government with these dollars and say: We have got so many of these dollars, but they are not worth par in our dollars; please make an adjustment by giving us good Canadian dollars in exchange for these depreciated dollars of another country.

Then look at the next clause:

(e) to assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product;

That is to say, this board will have power to dip into the public treasury and either give or lend money. What for? For the establishment of saw mills, flour mills, bakeries, canning factories, tobacco factories, breweries, distilleries, and to put in charge of them men who perhaps do not know anything about running them. But that will not matter, for they have the public treasury to fall back on, and if they do not know how to do the work they will be furnished with research men to carry on research work so that they can tell them how to conduct their business. I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in his seat; I will be sorry for him when this bill takes effect, for there will be very little money in the treasury to balance the budget when these boys get through.

Then in (f) we find the board shall have power:

to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder;

Every person, farmer, lumberman, fisherman, manufacturer, must go to the board every year and get his licence, and that licence will dictate what he shall do and how he shall do it. How easy it would be to withhold the licence of one that you wanted to get out of the way. Withhold the licence of a farmer, his farm would become worthless and someone's friend could buy it at a small price.

Then look at the next clause:

(g) to require full information relating to the production and marketing of the natural product from all persons engaged therein and to require periodic returns to be made by such persons, and inspect the books and premises of such persons;

The idea of appointing men to go out in the farming country and insist on every farmer making returns! Of what? Of everything he had produced and what he sold it for or did with it. The farmer's wife must account for every dozen of eggs that she sold. And all these reports would be sent to Ottawa. Imagine the number of civil servants required to tabulate all this and check it up!

Then the board is to have power:

(j) to cooperate with any marketing board or agency established under the law of any province to regulate the marketing of any natural product of such province and to act conjointly with any such provincial board or agency;

What is that for? In order that the federal and provincial boards can combine their powers and activities to defeat the purposes of the British North America Act. The provisions of the constitution were enacted to protect the rights and property of the citizens. Now those who desire to get control of other people's business and manage it for them sometimes find those provisions awkward, they are in the way. So they devise this scheme to defeat the purposes of the constitution.

Then look at section 5, marketing schemes —a great word:

(1) A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

You notice, sir, that it is "the production and marketing or the production or marketing." Under that clause the members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange could hatch a scheme, present it to the government, and if they had a sympathetic minister they could have that scheme put into effect without the farmers knowing anything about it, and give themselves a monopoly of the grain trade of this country.

(2) The petition shall be filed with the minister and if he considers that the persons engaged in the production or marketing of the natural product are sufficiently represented by the petitioners, the scheme shall be referred to the board with a request for a report on the expediency thereof.

What number would be a representative number? It just depends on the minister. In our country a township is a block of land six miles square. The minister might take the view that one farmer from each township would be a fairly representative number of the farmers of the west. Is that an extreme case? I know one more extreme. Only three years ago my right hon. friend the Prime Minister went to Regina and met three or four farmers from Saskatchewan who told him a certain thing. He considered that they were representative of the farmers of Saskatchewan, and acted accordingly. "A representative number" is a very wide and elastic term. Perhaps three or four men in the whole province might be considered a representative number. Then the people most concerned, the farmers whose business is going to be taken out of their hands, the lumbermen whose business is going to be controlled by this organization, the fishermen, will know nothing until an announcement appears in the Gazette that this thing is done. And the farmers never see the Gazette.

Let us see how these local boards are to be set up. The first step is that a number of men engaged in a certain industry get together and hatch a scheme, for marketing a certain product. These schemers choose from among themselves a chairman, and they elect a board. Then they draw up a petition which they present to the minister outlining their scheme. They also select a head office, and they say who their chief executive officers are to be. They even make the appointments. They submit all this to the minister and the minister submits it to the board in Ottawa. What does this board in Ottawa know about it? It is quite out of touch with the producers on the farm, the fishermen on the sea, the lumbermen in the forest, but this board shall decide whether or not the scheme is acceptable. If they decide that it is, the announcement is made in the Gazette, and the producers, the people most concerned, know nothing about it until they are all in, and the schemers are in control. Well, can they get out of the scheme? Yes, there is a way out. How can they get out? They must circulate a petition, but the petition they must circulate to get out is not the same petition they use to get in. Any petition to get in only requires what the minister called a representative number, which may mean three or four people in a province or one person in a township, but in order to get out they must have this sort of petition:

(2) A representative number of the persons operating under a scheme approved under section 5 of this act may petition the minister to revoke the scheme.

(3) The petition shall disclose to what extent the persons operating under the scheme are represented by those signing the petition and the minister shall decide whether all those so engaged are sufficiently represented—

The number on the petition to get out is much more comprehensive than the number on the petition to get in. It must represent all those engaged in the industry, and the minister has the right to refuse that petition if he sees fit to do so. Then let us look at section 9, which is the worst of all:

Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in the said product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board to regulate such product, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of such product—and so on. The minister may impose a scheme without consulting the people at all. From what I have seen here I have an idea that there are some ministers who hold the opinion that certain classes of people should not be allowed to do business at all and who would, if they had it in their power, shut them out. The minister who is put in charge of this legislation might happen to be one of those so disposed; he might say that certain classes of people are not to be allowed to do business in any particular line, and might hatch a scheme to put them out of business, and that scheme would become law.

Then when we turn to section 12 we find that power is given to over-ride the Customs Act, to restrict imports coming into this country, as though they were not sufficiently restricted already. Not only that, but power is given also to prohibit the export from Canada of any commodity so regulated. What Canada needs most to-day is markets, and every ounce of energy we have available should be devoted to the finding of markets.

Yet if any man goes out and finds a market for his product without consulting this board, after having found that market this board can forbid him to supply it. What inducement is there for anyone to find markets in order to help dispose of the products of this country? We are asked to surrender all these things to this board, and what do we get in return; what do they offer us in exchange? They offer us the privilege of having our private business taken out of our hands and put into the hands of a bureaucracy that has no financial interest at stake, that probably knows nothing about running the business and that is not in any way hurt if the business fails, but we will have to pay the bills if they make a mess of things.

The other day at the Rome conference France made an offer; they said, "We are willing to buy wheat from you if you are willing to buy something from us." Would not the government be much better advised to find markets like that and say to France, "All right, we are ready to deal with you," instead of trying to regulate the production and marketing of goods in Canada? With this bureaucracy set up and no one else allowed to do business all hope of progress and improvement in this country in marketing and fashioning our goods must die, for there will be no interest on the part of the bureaucracy in making any improvement. They will be secure in their seats; they will not be in the least concerned as to whether or not our products are marketed to the best advantage.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a few words from the essay on liberty by John Stuart Mill. I wish hon. gentlemen opposite and in the corner would study that work carefully.

Mr. HEAPS: When was it written?

Mr. YOUNG: It was written long ago; so was the bible.

> The only unfailing and permanent source of improvement is liberty, since by it there are as many possible independent centres of improvement as there are individuals. . . . But where everything is done through a bureaucracy, nothing to which the bureaucracy is opposed can be done at all.

And again:

> A state that dwarfs its men in order that they may be more docile instruments in its hands, even for beneficial purposes, will find that with small men no great thing can really be accomplished; and that the perfection of machinery to which it has sacrificed everything will in the end avail it nothing, for want of the vital power which, in order that the machine might run more smoothly, it has preferred to banish.

Just in closing I should like to make one more reference. Yesterday the live stock producers of western Canada appeared before the price spreads committee. They are opposed to this or any other marketing bill, and for the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to read what they have to say:

> It would seem then that if our departments of agriculture would function as we wish them to, there would be no need for superimposing further expense on the country for a board . . . departments of agriculture appear to be set up to serve governmental policies which may be a vastly different thing from serving the farmers. If departmental officials can function freely with the one objective in view, viz. that of aiding the industry it does not appear necessary to establish any additional board.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who are very much enamoured of the idea of what may be known as government interference in business. There has been a great deal of it in this country; there may be a great deal more, but at the present moment we are faced not with a theory but with a condition, and sometimes when we are faced with conditions we must give up cherished theories. While, as I say, as a rule I am not in favour of government interference in business, there come times in the history of the world, such as the present, when governments must,—not interfere in business,—but use the powers of government for the purpose of assisting and promoting business.

Yesterday we heard something about restricted markets and restricted production. With the exception of the first two or three speeches during this debate we have heard nothing from hon. gentlemen opposite but an attempt to becloud the real purpose of this bill. There is not a single word in the bill from beginning to end with regard to the restriction of production. The only principle contained in this bill is authority to take measures for the purpose not of restricting markets but of making it possible to market the goods which the farmers and other people in this country are producing.

We have heard a great deal about liberty. Liberty is one of those wonderful things that have come down to us through the ages, but we cannot meet present conditions by the doctrinaire philosophy of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). What the people in this country are up against at the moment is the fact that they have not liberty to handle their products in such a way as to get the best results, and the primary producer in this country wants liberty—not according to John Stuart Mill—but liberty to live and make a decent living out of his production. I should think hon. gentlemen opposite would hang their heads in shame when anyone talks about restricted markets. When they came into power in 1922 our markets were not so very badly restricted; we were selling $200,000,000 worth of farm products annually to the United States, but while the opposition stood by and said they were afraid to pass legislation for the benefit of Canada lest they might provoke the United States, one by one our markets slipped away from us.

Must we place on Hansard again, for perhaps the fiftieth time, the fact that the markets for our wheat were lost during the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite? In 1925 Mussolini started the "battle of the grain," as he called it, and that was five years before this government came into power. That was followed by the imposition of tariffs by Germany, France and Italy, which were among our principal markets for wheat. Are not these gentlemen honest enough to go out and tell the public that the markets of our Canadian farmers were lost during their régime, not because of anything their party did and not because of anything our party did but because foreign countries desired to preserve their own markets for their own people and their own purposes. If their party was responsible at all it was responsible for that attitude which said, "We are not prepared to raise our general tariff, and we are not prepared to increase our British preference lest it might be misunderstood across the border." And then they come back and try to talk to us about restricting markets. There have been no steps taken by this government, since it came into office, which in any way restricted markets. There have been no steps taken by this government since it came into office which have not been for the purpose of obtaining markets for our natural products. The imperial conference treaties —and hon. members opposite are still throwing slurs at them—have provided markets for many of our natural products, markets which this country would have been very sorry not to have had, and markets which this country would not have had if hon. gentlemen opposite had had their way.

Mr. REID: Not for very long.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, you have got to that now, have you?

Mr. REID: Lord De La Warr said it in the House of Lords the other day.

Mr. TURNBULL: We are now confronted with a condition, not a theory. This country now must decide which direction it will travel. We can have socialism.

An hon. MEMBER: We are getting it.

Mr. TURNBULL: We can have control of capital.

Mr. DUPUIS: You have it already.

Mr. TURNBULL: Nobody knows better than the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), who has been sitting on the price spreads committee for the last month, the effect of private capital and its operation on the marketing of goods in this country. We can have socialism; we can have controlled capitalism and we can have a policy of laissez-faire, —the middle of the road, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) would say. The Liberal policy is the middle of the road. You see it illustrated in the question asked last night by the leader of the opposition when someone said, "If we are going to have orderly marketing we have to have some machinery." He said, "What have we been doing about it all along." That is the attitude of the Liberal party, that what they have been doing all along must be indefinitely continued,—nothing new, nothing to take the place of anything else, but just to let it drift. That is what they did during nine years of office, and that is just exactly what brought this country to the pass it was in in 1930.

The unemployment condition in the country has not been created since we took office. It began years before that, under the dominion of the right hon. gentleman who said, "What have we been doing all along; just let it drift." We have heard something about parliamentary control being endangered in these times, and we have heard that this government wishes to take the control of matters out of the hands of parliament. Hon. gentlemen should know something about what happens when control is not in the hands of parliament. One of the first actions of this government after it took office was to provide that our water rights, our navigation rights on the St. Lawrence system could no longer be given away by orders in council, but could be given away only by an act of parliament. Who was looking after the rights of parliament in those days, and who is now talking about looking after the rights of parliament?

I listened with great interest to the two hour speech delivered last night by the right hon. leader of the opposition. In the first place I heard him say that the principle of the bill was satisfactory. He did not say it in those terms; that would be too much to expect. Nevertheless he said it. He said that the purposes set out in the bill were desirable, and that regulated trade was necessary. Having admitted that he has admitted it all. The rest is merely detail.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. TURNBULL: The rest of the bill deals with the manner in which the regulations are to be applied. At the beginning of his speech I repeat that the right hon. gentleman admitted the principle of the bill is correct. Then he proceeded to spend two hours piling up bogey troubles such as the hon. member for Weyburn has been piling up for the past thirty minutes. I used to think that the hon. member for Weyburn was a man of innocent mind. But I do not know of anybody who in thirty minutes could have conceived more means of being wicked in business, in the ways described by the hon. member, unless it would be his right hon. leader.

I heard the leader of the opposition make a criticism of this bill. He piled up some arguments, and then proceeded to knock them down. I heard mention of the Magna Charta, and that sort of thing. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that when this parliament under the leadership of the right hon. leader of the opposition passed the Canadian wheat board bill in 1922, he did just exactly what he said in every sentence of his speech delivered last night was wrong, and should not have been done. There is not a single thing in this marketing bill, which the right hon. gentleman criticized last night, which is not contained in even worse form in the Canadian wheat board bill which hon. gentlemen opposite sat in their seats and voted for in 1922. Why is what they did in 1922 considered to be right and proper, and the same thing done at the present time considered to be wrong? What principle of Liberalism is it which says that what was done in 1922 by a Liberal government is all right, but that when a Conservative government does the same thing in 1934 it is all wrong? The only principle of Liberalism of which I know which admits that view was the principle defined by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) when he said: "It is a principle of Liberalism to have no principles." The principle of to-day is discarded to-morrow, and the principle of to-morrow is discarded next day. It is the principle of expediency. The party is operated like a weather vane. It tries to keep its ear to the ground and stir the passions of the mob. When they succeed they come here and cheer. That is the true principle of Liberalism. Talk about giving authority to unnamed boards that you do not know anything about—that is exactly what the Canadian wheat board bill did. Not only did it give authority to unnamed boards, but it gave authority to the governor in council to fix the salaries of the unnamed boards, and to fix them without consulting parliament. What happened to the Magna Charta of those days? What happened to the great petition presented to William and Mary in those days ?

Mr. BENNETT: And Green's history?

Mr. TURNBULLL: They would turn over in their graves if they knew what hon. gentlemen opposite did in 1922 to the liberties of parliament. It is true that in 1922 the money that the government decided they were going to give to these gentlemen was not going to come out of the pockets of the general taxpayer. That is right. It was going to come out of the pockets of the farmers the hon. member for Weyburn has been talking about, and out of their pockets only. These gentlemen were not only regulating markets, but were put in charge of the markets. Having in their possession the money of the farmers they were authorized to dig into the farmers' money and to take out whatever the governor in council said they could take. But, of course, the liberties of parliament were not at stake at all—oh no.

The right hon. leader of the opposition criticized at great length that section of the bill wherein he said the board had power to create offences. I do not know whether he took any great objection to investigations. I may state, however, that the wheat board was authorized to make investigations, and to go up and down the country making examinations. It is suggested that because a board may do some investigating and find out whether or not in its opinion a price spread is excessive, they thereupon create an offence. They do no such thing. It is the act which creates the offence. It is the act which states that anybody who charges more than he should or maintains a spread greater than ought to be maintained is guilty of an offence and liable to indictment and fine. He has to be haled before the courts of this country. He has to stand his trial, the same as any other person would have to. And when he comes to trial the finding by the board can not be used as evidence. He has to be tried anew, and his case has to be proved, irrespective of the board. All the investigation accomplishes is to discover whether there is sufficient evidence upon which a man may be placed on trial. When he goes to trial it is then for the judge or jury, as the case may be, to say whether or not he shall be convicted. There is no creation of an offence at all. The right hon. gentleman seems to think that this board is going to have powers to make regulations, and that these regulations, are going to have the force of law. There is nothing new about that. The wheat board act provides that a board shall be set up with powers to make regulations. Read section 14 of that act and you will see what it provides, and when you talk about trying to get around the British North America Act by concurrent legislation with the provinces you will certainly find it there, and the hon. member for Weyburn voted for it, even though it was getting around the British North America Act and upsetting the constitution and disrupting confederation by concurrent legislation with the provinces. Section 10 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act provides—

Mr. YOUNG: What date was that?

Mr. TURNBULL: It was assented to on June 28, 1922.

Mr. YOUNG: Was I here then?

Mr. BENNETT: No, you were only on the way.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He must have voted by long distance.

Mr. TURNBULL: Did my hon. friend oppose the bill?

Mr. YOUNG: I was not in the house then.

Mr. TURNBULL: Did he oppose it outside the house?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes I did.

Mr. TURNBULL: My hon. friend says that he opposed this bill but he continues to support the party that put it through. He voted for that party provincially and federally, and I have no doubt that he also supported them from the platform. So his opposition was evidently lip opposition, but when it came to putting the ballot in the box he was right with the party. Let me quote again section ten of the wheat board act:

The board shall have capacity to receive, have, enjoy and exercise such further powers or rights as may be conferred upon it by the legislature of any province—

Not by this government, but by the legislation of any province:

—with relation to any matter connected with the purchase, acquisition, sale or marketing of wheat and within the legislative authority of the province.

Let us see some of the powers that were conferred upon this board by the province. I have before me the Canadian wheat board bill passed in the province of Saskatchewan and assented to on July 27, 1922. It says:

The board—

This unnamed board, without its salaries fixed in the statute, not elected by parliament, but appointed with the approval of the governor in council:

—may, with the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, make such regulations as it deems necessary for the purpose of fully and effectively carrying out the objects and provisions of this act; and subject to such approval may create offences and provide penalties in respect of violations of any provision of this act or of any order or regulation made by the board under its authority.

Mr. YOUNG: That was provincial legislation?

Mr. TURNBULL: Yes, passed by a Liberal government in Saskatchewan, and this board that was going to be set up in Ottawa had power conferred upon it by the provincial government to make regulations, to create offences and to provide penalties for breaches of the regulations, and the then government just before the bill was passed had given the board, that they were going to appoint, capacity to receive, have, enjoy and exercise the powers and rights conferred upon it by the provincial government. That was the power conferred upon the board by the provincial government—the power to create offences, the power to enjoy and exercise the right to create offences. That was all conferred upon the board by the provincial government, and the board were authorized by the leader of the opposition and his friends on the other side of the house to create offences, pass regulations, fix penalties and legislate—a board with greater powers than the representatives of the people have.

The leader of the opposition fulminated for twenty minutes yesterday because we were going to set up a board with powers to legislate, and we the representatives of the people before we could legislate had to get the franchise of the electors, and be elected to this house. But here was this autocratic and bureaucratic government going to empower a board that had never been elected by the people to make regulations and pass laws for the people of this country. Was it not terrible? Yet he had authorized in 1922 a board not only to pass regulations approved of by the governor in council but to enjoy and exercise such further powers as might be conferred upon it by the legislature of any province, powers conferred by a government outside of this government altogether, and this board had the power to create offences and fix the penalties for them, and there was not a whimper from any hon. gentleman opposite at that time about the constitution or about the Bill of Rights or Magna Charta or any of these other great disturbing things that are going to upset all true and tried government in this country at the present time. I suppose that William and Mary never even heard of it.

The leader of the opposition referred yesterday to this unnamed board, appointed by governor in council, not by parliament, which was going to put into effect a scheme of operations not submitted to parliament, and with salaries fixed by governor in council, with allowances provided by the governor in council, and with all the powers which are being conferred upon them. Talk about a board for regulating trade; they were going to take the trade, according to the leader of the opposition. He talked about the poor fellow who could not sell his eggs and could not sell or export his butter and other articles. Why, Mr. Speaker, under this other act which I have cited if a single farmer in the province of Saskatchewan took a bushel of wheat and sold it to his neighbour for seed without the consent of the board he was liable to the penalty provided in the regulations that parliament had never approved of.

Mr. YOUNG: Now tell us about the bill that Anderson put through.

Mr. TURNBULL: I am not talking about the bill Anderson put through. I will talk about the bill Pattullo put through, if you like.

This board that hon. gentlemen opposite were going to set up had power to go through this country and appoint agencies, companies and organization all over Canada, and nobody thought that the constitution was being overturned or that the liberty of the subject was in danger. Not only was that board unnamed but the government went up and down the country for six months trying to fill the positions on the board, and they could not get anybody to adopt the baby that had been left on the doorstep.

Some question was raised yesterday as to the marketing of wheat under the bill now before us. There is not a single thing in the four corners of the marketing bill that is not on the statute books of this country now so far as the marketing of wheat is concerned. The wheat board bill has never been repealed—

Mr. TOTZKE: Then why the bill?

Mr. TURNBULL: —for purely political purposes.

Mr. DUPUIS: We know it.

Mr. TURNBULL: Did my hon. friend mean the marketing bill? Because as my hon. friend knows, the Canada Wheat Board Act covered wheat and grain, but it did not cover my hon. friend's cattle nor his butter and eggs. We do not wish to take power to take a man's wheat from him and force him to deliver it or to sell it to us, and then transfer it again, but we want a certain amount of power to regulate the travel of the farmers' products to market. There is not going to be any question of interfering with the individual marketing of grain or butter or eggs.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does my hon. friend suggest that this bill is but an extension of the wheat marketing act?

Mr. TURNBULL: I should hope not. I think my hon. friend was very much in favour of the wheat act.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. gentleman seemed to be making a comparison.

Mr. TURNBULL: The argument I am making is not at all that this legislation is the same as the Canada Wheat Board Act. If my hon. friend had been listening carefully he would know that the leader of the opposition yesterday,—and my hon. friend from Weyburn also did it to-day—read into this bill a great many things that were not in it and condemned those things. I have been pointing out that the very things that are not in this bill, and which the leader of the opposition condemned, were the very things he had enacted in 1922.

The object of this bill is entirely different from that of the wheat board act of 1922. There is no intention in this bill to take over the products of the producers of this country. The leader of the opposition went very far afield when he suggested that boots and shoes came within the purview of this bill, as well as furniture and a lot of other things. It simply indicated that he had not read the bill very carefully, if at all. If he had read it with any degree of care he would not have made those statements which he repeated over and over again, not simply once or twice, but three or four times, and which had absolutely no foundation so far as this bill is concerned.

This bill deals with the natural products which are mentioned and with other articles of food and drink that are made from those natural products, and unless my hon. friend turns to eating his boots, as he may have to do before he gets out of Prince Albert, this bill will not apply to him at all. The whole purpose of the bill is confined to those things which the leader of the opposition himself said were desirable. The sole and whole purpose of the bill is to provide for the orderly travel of goods to market with as little interference as possible with the actions of individuals in getting those goods to market. My hon. friends on the other side of the house, of both parties, have over and over again declared that to-day our problem is not one of production but of distribution—that we were producing more goods than we could distribute. Now, this bill is an attempt to solve in some degree the problem of distribution; it is an effort to assist in that direction. There is not a single thing in the bill about production being restricted.

Mr. DUPUIS: Did you read it?

Mr. TURNBULL: I did read it, and there is in it nothing that says that the government or the board may restrict production.

Mr. YOUNG: They will licence producers and through that may restrict anything.

Mr. TURNBULL: Hon. gentlemen have wandered far afield in their endeavour to find points to criticize. The most strained interpretations conceivable have been put upon the bill. Do not hon. gentlemen think that we should be serving our constituents better if, instead of trying to deal with the bill in the manner in which my hon. friends opposite have discussed it, they took the view that at least it is a step in the right direction? Let us approach the consideration of the bill from this point of view, that it is going to be put into force, and the machinery operated, by decent, sensible people who will endeavour to serve the interests of those whom they will be trying to serve. Let us take that view rather than proceed on the assumption that all the scoundrels and scalawags that can be got together will be put on the board for the sole purpose of hampering the administration of the legislation and making the whole thing impossible. Let us take a different view of the bill from that. Why not assume its success as a possibility if not a probability, and that it will be of assistance to those whom it is intended to help? I am one of those who would be in favour of the greatest freedom in the marketing of products, and I should say that every man ought to market his own products as best he can, if only we were moving into unrestricted markets. But the fact is that we are not moving into unrestricted markets; we are moving into markets where it is not possible for everyone to market his products.

Mr. YOUNG: How will this bill open markets or remove restrictions?

Mr. TURNBULL: No one suggests that the bill is going to open markets or remove restrictions. That is one of the things which the hon. gentleman assumes that the bill is going to do and then he criticizes it because he says it is not going to do that. This bill was intended to enable the producer to get his products to market as best he may under the conditions that are prevailing in the restricted markets of the world, and to provide that you do not throw five or ten million barrels of one product upon a market that can absorb only half a million. The intention is that goods shall be directed to those markets where they can be best absorbed. Take my hon. friend's illustration about the lean cattle. The farmers of Saskatchewan had lean cattle and, he said, the board would prohibit the selling of them. It will do nothing of the kind. What the board would do would be this. It would direct that those lean cattle be placed where they could be developed into fat cattle and sold to proper advantage. They would not allow lean cattle to go to the stockyards and depress the price of the whole product. Rather, they would direct that they be sent to the men who have feed, to the grazing field, where they could be properly fattened for the purpose of being marketed under proper conditions. Surely that is entirely different from looking at the bill with antagonism and hostility, regardless of what our constituents want. Should we not try to see in what way the proposed legislation can assist the producer, instead of straining every effort to suggest difficulties, with all the devilish ingenuity which my hon. friend from Weyburn seems to possess.

There is in connection with this bill another point that seems to me to be of value. We are faced with the desire of agriculturists in France, in Italy, in Germany and in Great Britain, to have as large a part of their own markets as they can get, and there would be a feeling of hostility towards us if we tried to flood their markets and put them out of business. And that is only reasonable on their part. When the producers of Great Britain or of France are dealing with the individual traders and farmers in Canada, there is no possibility of getting together with a view to promoting mutual interests, but if we have a board in control of principal products in Canada, a regulating board, then that board can meet similar organizations in other countries and discuss matters of common concern in an endeavour to smooth out difficulties by cooperation, rather than by competition. My hon. friends opposite seem to be tired of the word cooperation nowadays, because they are not using it to the extent that they used to.

I am not one of those who believe in governmental interference with business; I am of the opinion that the less governments are in business the better it is for both business and government as a rule. But there are occasions when cherished theories do not square with the facts—Facts are stubborn chiels that wilna ding—and sometimes we must make our theories accommodate themselves to the facts. We are not dealing with normal markets or marketing conditions, and theories that are of general application often do not apply under exceptional circumstances. For this reason, because I believe that the bill if properly applied, as I believe it will be applied, will assist in the orderly marketing of our goods, in the placing of our goods upon the best market, in the regulation of grades of goods that shall go to those markets, in providing that goods in an improper state shall not be marketed, and in doing various other things that will assist our producers—it is because I believe that the bill will accomplish these things that I support it, and in supporting it I think we are doing something for our constituents and for the country at large and particularly for those people who are engaged in the production of primary commodities. It is agreed, I think, that the producers of primary products are those most in need of assistance in this country at the present time. It is the feature of this depression, it is the feature of all depressions, that the prices of primary products fall further than do the prices of manufactured goods, perhaps because the producers of primary products are not so well organized as the other fellow. When you are returning from a depression to normal conditions, then the faster you can raise the prices of primary products in relation to manufactured products the sooner you will reach normalcy. And if this bill in any way, by regulating the flow of goods to the market—not restricting the amount that will go there—will help to obtain better prices for primary products, thereby restoring the producers of such commodities to a normal state, restoring their purchasing power, which has been sadly depleted, then I say that such a bill deserves our friendly criticism and the wholehearted support of the house and not the sort of sniping and backfiring that have come from the other side of the house in the last two days.

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario): I have followed with very considerable interest the speech of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). I should like to reply to some of the statements he has made, but unfortunately I am going to confine myself entirely to the principle of the bill. I listened very attentively to what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said yesterday afternoon and evening and I did not gather from his statements that he approved of the principle of the bill. If it was a fair inference from what he said that he approved of it, then I respectfully disagree with the leader of the opposition. I want to make it very plain at the outset, so that there shall be no misunderstanding, that I am opposed to the principle of the bill.

I listened also with interest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens); I am always interested in what he has to say in the house and I was a little shocked, I must confess, at his opening statement. Addressing the leader of the opposition, he used these words:

> Did he recognize at all that there had been a complete dislocation of world trade?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is in charge of the bureau of statistics and for the work I have to do I lean very much upon that bureau. I regard accuracy of statement as the first essential of the bureau of statistics and I expect that from the minister in charge. I have before me a statement as to the actual condition of world trade as published by the League of Nations. There has been dislocation; there has been shrinkage. I am quoting now from volume three for the present year. It will be found that there has been a shrinkage in prices on the present rates of exchange of something around 50 per cent. That is not a complete dislocation of trade. It will be found that there has been a shrinkage of some 25 per cent in volume, in quantum. In other words, let me make that statement very plain. On the present rates of exchange trade at the end of the period quoted was, in dollars, some 50 per cent of what it was at the commencement of the crisis in 1929 and some 75 per cent in quantum of what it was in 1929. That is not a complete dislocation of trade.

I want to-day, if I can, to fit this bill into the world condition of trade, into the system of trade. We have heard in this house much of nomenclature. Sometimes we say that a thing is socialistic and it depends upon who says it whether we condemn or approve it. I want to know just what this measure is and shall confine myself first of all to making an inquiry. In the first place the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday evening was, it seems to me, just a little bit unfair in suggesting that we on this side of the house were not greatly concerned over present conditions. I have been following them with great anxiety. I realize that the government and the economic and political institutions of this country were subjected to severe strain and I feared that they would crack under it.

I may be wrong, but I see in this bill evidence that my fears are well grounded. I regard the bill as one of the most important, one of the most revolutionary measures that has ever been introduced into this house. Some reference has been made to its history and it may be that I can throw a little light upon that. I understood the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), to say that the bill had been copied from the Agricultural Marketing Act of Great Britain. In this house we are justifiably proud of copying British precedents, especially when they come from the United Kingdom.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid the hon. member is making a slight misrepresentation of what I intended to convey.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I said it did in part include some of the principles of the British marketing act.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I accept the correction. I would like to go a little bit further and refer to something that seems to me at any rate to cover more clearly the principles laid down in the bill. This is a statement taken from an Economic Survey of Australia, volume 158, published in November, 1931, and given by the lecturer on marketing, university of Melbourne, Australia. In this statement hon. members will notice where the word "scheme" is derived. The lecturer says:

> In the inauguration of its agricultural organization scheme in 1922, the Queensland government provided what is perhaps the most remarkable instance of extreme legislative support of centralized marketing.

That bill was amended in 1929 and this is what the lecturer has to say of its character:

> Under this act, the government may at any time notify its intention to provide for the controlled marketing of any commodity, but provision is made for a poll of producers of the commodity to be taken on the question, if such is demanded, in which case 60 per cent of the votes cast must be in favour of control. . . . If the vote is favourable, or if no vote is demanded, a board authorized by the act to make all arrangements for the marketing of the whole of the product, is elected by the producers of the commodity concerned, together with one representative of the government. The scheme is not one of government control, but one of "compulsory cooperation."

If that is not the father of the act, it is the grandfather. It seems to me that the two principles are the same. I can well recall some hon. members raising their eyebrows askance at that time and stating that that was socialism; that the action of the Queensland government was socialistic. Well if it was then, it still is; there is no doubt about that.

I want to go just a step further. There has been some protest in the house about reference to what King John did at Runnymede and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) was criticized for quoting John Stuart Mill. I am going to bring the house up to date and make a quotation from Doctor Robert Liefmann, on Cartels Concerns and Trusts, printed in 1932. I presume hon. members will recognize that Doctor Liefmann is regarded as a world authority on the subject. He is professor at Freiburg university. He says at page 222:

> The tendency towards compulsory organization of industry springs in part from socialistic ideals, since the socialists welcome anything which has the appearance of planned economy, and are quite willing to make use of capitalistic forms of organization to this end, as the syndicates and trusts of soviet Russia show. The expressions "socialism" and "socialization" have thus become extended to cover all sorts of organizations regulated by the state, in which, however, there is no question of the abolition of private property.

Now I take it that this government was not elected as a socialist government. That was not the platform on which they appealed to the country. We have had well recognized socialist views in Canada, presented by two parties. I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong in saying that the C.C.F. and the communist party have differed flatly on this ground: the C.C.F. have said, We want a mandate from the people to introduce socialism; the communist party are prepared to introduce it with or without a mandate. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to say in all fairness this government should have a mandate from the people before they effect such a violent change in the economic life of this country. Not a mandate such as has been suggested by the Natural Products Marketing Act; the vote of say 60 per cent of the producers, that would not satisfy me at all. I have not the slightest doubt that if you were to put the question to the potato producers, "Will you have competition or not"? You would get about the same response as if you put it to the politicians in respect to the next election. Probably the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and myself, are the only two in the house who would vote for competition at the next election. And I am not so sure of myself.

The leader of the opposition last night did not visualize this bill quite as I would. He had an idea of a body of men sitting here while parliament was not in session. Now the bill—and I have no desire to go into its clauses in detail—you will find, establishes a corporate body. That is the usual phrase. I have visualized a corporative state. I have visualized an occupational parliament. They exist in other countries. It seems to me that you have here the charter of such a body sitting in Ottawa, with the civil service, with power of taxation, as has been pointed out, with certain powers over the tariff. I have visualized that this parliament will abdicate the most important economic function that it has to perform, namely holding the scales evenly between buyers and sellers. It turns over the scales to the massed strength of the producers to be used against the scattered weakness of the consumers. I have read very carefully the bill in its different clauses and I find clause after clause which says, Pay, pay, pay. The power is given to tax the producers themselves. But if the taxation ended there it would clearly be of no benefit to the producers, so I take it that the principle is, Pay and pass. That is a well recognized principle in relation to all marketing boards. In the marketing board of the United Kingdom, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) well knows the subject is now a matter of discussion. Take the wheat import board of the United Kingdom, the board that deals with the wheat produced locally. The Minister of Agriculture knows that there is what is called a processing tax. The miller collects it, he pays to the wheat growers of the United Kingdom a deficiency payment, the difference between the price actually received and the price that is fixed by the government. Now here is the criticism that applies at that point. What is the amount, what taxation does the consumer actually pay in connection with that act? The matter came before the British house the other day. Mr. Elliot was asked: What was the expense of the marketing board? He said, I do not know. Then he was asked if the request were put on the record would he be able to tell within a reasonable time? His answer was, No; the member ought to realize that the government has no direct connection with the board. Now those things have led to dissatisfaction. The marketing board in the United Kingdom is not wholly popular. It is a conscription of the housewife; how could it be otherwise than unpopular? This act will have less popularity in Great Britain. The people of Great Britain are going through a struggle, and we admire their heroism. They are ready to sacrifice for their own farmers and producers, but I doubt if they are equally ready to sacrifice for ours. You cannot conscript the housewife in England much more. There are two million housewives in England on public relief. Even now there is a committee of the medical association examining the conditions of malnutrition in Great Britain, and the object of this bill clearly is to raise prices, and also clearly to raise them mainly at the expense of the British consumer. Mr. Speaker, this bill in my opinion—and I recognize the danger of prophecy—may have a very disastrous effect upon our imperial preference. I am going to give the government, and particularly the Prime Minister, credit for doing something that I did not believe could be done; that is induce the British government to put a tax on food. I must say that I still doubt the wisdom of it, but the Prime Minister and the government of the day secured the imposition of that tax.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are going to pay for it later.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): It is not altogether popular in England. This bill will make it less popular. The Minister of Finance will remember that during the Ottawa conference there were nine economists who considered the effect of a food tax in Great Britain. Their conclusions were published in a book called Tariff, the Case Examined, at page 140. I should like to read just a paragraph, and as I recall it this particular paragraph was written by Sir William Beveridge, who says:

> Dominion farmers cannot, by any kind of preference in the English market, get more for their wheat than they can get without any preference at all, except on two suppositions: first, that they cease competing among themselves and form an export monopoly; second, that they use their monopoly power to sell more dearly to Britain than to foreign countries.

Then he goes on to say:

> The second supposition is startling. If it were realized, it would mean that the dominions were using the preference in order to carry out a scheme of monopoly dumping from behind the British tariff at the expense of the British consumer. It would mean that the British people were being taxed in the worst possible way to provide funds for subsidizing, not any of their own industries or interests, but either the dominion farmers or the trade competition of Britain or both.

Then Sir William goes on to say:

> It is hard to believe that Mr. Bennett, before making his proposals in October, 1930, can have thought out their economic implications.

I find it very hard to believe that the Prime Minister and the government have thought out the implications of this act, because it seems to me—and if I am wrong I should be glad to be corrected—that it carries out the very fears that were expressed by those nine distinguished economists. It is bound to create resentment; all foreign monopolies create resentment. Wherever you are subjected to the importation of goods upon a basis that does not subject itself to economic provision there is not only resentment but you render trade in your own country impossible.

I must say that I sympathized with this government when they shut out certain imports from Russia on that very ground. I must say that I sympathized when it was proposed to raise the tariff against the United States on certain goods that were subjected to monopoly production, and I expect the people of England or any other country will have the same objection that we felt at that time. Australia realized the position. It will be recalled that at one time there was a compulsory marketing board for wheat in that country. In 1920 that board was dissolved, except in Queensland, for the very reason that I have offered, that it would lead to reprisals in the countries of importation. I know the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture are familiar with the compulsory marketing board in Australia in regard to wool, known as "Bawra" the British-Australian Wool Recovery Act. That board was dissolved in 1924. Many efforts have been made to revive it; Sir John Higgins and others have pleaded with the wool growers, but the wool growers have said, "No, we must sell our wool in open competition," and it is sold in the open market. And I would have the minister recall that while wool has been and still is subject to some restrictions it is less restricted than any other basic commodity and has been the first to recover its price.

Denmark is in much the same position. I have not the latest information but I know that within the last two years they have had a free, open market in regard to butter, with the exception of the use of the words "Lur brand," as the Minister of Agriculture will recall. Ninety per cent of the butter made in Denmark is exported. They sell their bacon in open competition, and eighty-five per cent of their bacon is cooperatively produced. Some of it is cooperatively marketed, but the Danes said, as the hon. member for Weyburn echoed, "What we want is a market, and we want that market to be as free as possible. We want to encourage the middleman to go out and sell our goods."

Last night the leader of the opposition referred to the economics of scarcity. Well, all the information that we are being given to-day as to the reasons for this bill is old information. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pictured to us what would happen if we exceeded our quotas. I should be glad to have, from the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, examples of where we have actually exceeded our quotas, not vain fears but actual instances which would indicate a real need for this legislation. Otherwise I must look over the world, and I must say that schemes of this sort have failed. The Chadbourne plan in regard to the compulsory marketing of sugar failed: it did not turn out to be the economics of scarcity. The plan was put into effect; in 1929 the visible world supply was over four million tons while in 1933 it was six million tons, and remember that the parties to the agreement kept their agreement, but there was a shrinkage in consumption. That is the invariable effect of the economics of scarcity and of marketing monopolies. In regard to coffee even the figures have been destroyed; twenty-seven million bags of coffee were destroyed. In connection with copper there was a marketing monopoly the world over, and there was a revolution in Chili. There was a revolution in Brazil in regard to the marketing monopoly of coffee, there was a revolution in Cuba in regard to the marketing monopoly of sugar, and we know that to-day Russia is another example.

I should like to speak for a moment or two about another feature of the bill, namely that having to do with spreads. May I say to the minister that I began life as a market reporter on Front street in Toronto. I knew those men who bought and sold the products affected by this bill. As I look back I realize that very few of the men I knew in those days are rich to-day; as a matter of fact I know of none. The proposal is to fix spreads. Well, a commission merchant may make one hundred per cent profit on a transaction and hon. members may say that is a very large spread. He may make one hundred and fifty per cent or two hundred per cent,—put it as large as you like. But the next day he is liable to lose as much on another transaction. How are you going to regulate his spreads? Is this the only legislation we are to have affecting spreads? Does the government for one moment think that it can stop with this legislation? I suggest that there are more inequitable spreads in wages. Is the government going to attempt to iron out those wage spreads? There are more inequitable spreads in wealth; is the government going to adjust that? Once you roll a heavy burden half way down a hill it is very hard to hold it.

I believe I can see that the government have been following the advice of Sir Arthur Salter in a lecture delivered recently to Cambridge university. Sir Arthur Salter referred to legislation of the sort as a kind of bastard socialism pressed upon harassed governments by sectional organizations. Mind you, Sir Arthur was in favour of it, but on conditions. May I at this point read briefly from page 20 of his book The Framework of an Ordered Society:

> I believe that we can both plan and preserve freedom on three conditions: That parliaments will delegate some of their functions to the executive, without abdicating their ultimate responsibility; that the executive will fit itself for its tasks by welcoming the assistance of those who direct the actual economic activities of the country; and that these in turn will assume the task of collectively controlling and planning their own activities, in association with government and through an appropriate organization.

It seems to me that is precisely what this government proposes doing. And here is Sir Arthur Salter's stipulation—and no inference is required, because he makes it very plain—that to carry it out you must have a world ordered economy. He puts it in this way:

> The whole of these sectional planning and guiding authorities would be linked together by the formation of wider councils, drawing their membership by selection from the smaller councils, and culminating nationally in national economic councils, and internationally in a world economic council; these councils being suitably related to the governments, so that the whole system would be an adjunct to—or rather an integral part of—the machine of government.

That is the edifice. There are two lions' dens, one in Moscow and one in Geneva. Canada would be unwise to go into either of them. We have a heritage here; we have a vast country, and we are proud of it. Every hon. member in the house is proud of it. Do you think for one moment that a world ordered society does not mean ordering from a world centre? And if you can order production you can order migrations, and we thereby surrender our autonomy. It may be that it is necessary, but I should like to have further information.

May I in conclusion quote another statement by Doctor Liefmann. Coming from a German, under present conditions the statement is of double interest. I can see reasons as outlined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to why this bill should be passed. The hon. member for Regina asked us to think of these reasons and to give the bill sympathetic consideration. I want to point out—and I presume that is the purpose of an opposition—the difficulties and inescapable consequences, so that hon. members may weigh them. Doctor Liefmann says:

> The resulting mixture of economics and politics, which keeps on attributing new tasks to the state, is a good deal to blame for the lack of patriotism so generally deplored in Germany and for generally admitted stagnation or even degradation of our political life; it has also had disastrous effects on our foreign policy. The state as the great defender of justice and welfare ought to stand above the economic system and work for social equilibrium within this system. If it is too much drawn into the war of interests, and has economic interests of its own all over the place, it loses its authority and becomes less and less capable of effecting the impartial regulation of economic life.

May I give that statement a home touch. I should like to quote something stated yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce which gave me a picture of the difficulties that this government will face, once this bill has become law. I believe the minister did not mean what I have taken from his statement, but referring to apples he said:

> For instance our friends in Nova Scotia, who are only five or six days distant from the British market can pour their apples in while British Columbia and Ontario might be handicapped in that regard. Or British Columbia might have say 10,000 cases going through by way of the Panama canal in cold storage; the market is in danger of being flooded, and someone from eastern Canada pours his apples in and destroys it. No one I am sure desires that.

Well, may I tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce if I were a Nova Scotia apple grower I would desire it. I would like to take advantage of my geographical situation, and I believe the apple growers of Nova Scotia, generally, will take the same position. In connection with this bill we are going to meet that situation over and over again because, remember, you have assigned all but the mineral kingdom to the new occupation of parliament, and you have done it because others have done it. If I were on the shores of the upper Niagara river and I saw a man plunging in, I would not follow him. There is scarcity and poverty on the shores of the upper Niagara but they are not to be escaped by plunging into the river. I would stay on land. If the situation is so serious that it means the destruction of capitalism in this country, and remember that our economic life is within a political frame, then I should be one of the first to support this government in an effort to ward off what I at any rate believe would be the destruction not only of the social life but of the economic and political life that we have led and have been proud to lead in this country.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I propose this afternoon to deal with the marketing bill before us from the standpoint of a wheat producer of western Canada. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) gave to the house this afternoon an account of the different methods which have been adopted by the farmers of this country in past years for the marketing of their products, and he emphasized particularly the wheat board. Perhaps I cannot do better than give a summary of just what the farmers of western Canada have attempted to do in past years in the effort to solve this great problem of marketing the wheat crop of western Canada.

Their first concerted effort was to organize the United Grain Growers' Grain Company. That was the first, shall I say, cooperative effort on the part of the farmers to market at least a portion of the wheat crop of the three prairie provinces. Then came the Co-operative Elevator Company of the province of Saskatchewan. In the province of Alberta we had a similar organization. Then in 1919 came the wheat board. I know that my hon. friend from Regina was not dealing with the wheat board of 1919.

ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act for the relief of Gertrude Ethel Mosgrove Roast.

An Act for the relief of Clara Dingman Freeman.

An Act for the relief of Marguerite Pearl Hopper.

An Act for the relief of Sadye Harris Rosenberg.

An Act for the relief of Eva Brabant Paradis.

An Act for the relief of Williamina Muir Briggs.

An Act respecting Prudential Trust Company, Limited.

An Act to ratify and confirm an agreement respecting the joint use by His Majesty and the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway of certain tracks and premises of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at Quebec.

An Act respecting Relief Measures.

An Act to amend the Criminal Code. (Race meetings.)

An Act to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

An Act to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

An Act to amend the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

MARKETING ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was attempting just before we proceeded to the Senate to enumerate various steps which the farmers of western Canada had taken in marketing the entire crop grown in the three western provinces, and I had reached the point where we had come down to the wheat board of 1919. I think there is a misunderstanding, not only in the minds of many members of this house but throughout the country, the impression being that when this bill comes into operation, if it does, it will have the same effect as the wheat board of 1919 had. I propose to deal with the differences but I might at this time make this statement. The wheat board of 1919 received all the wheat, when the farmer chose to deliver the wheat, and at all times they fixed the price for the wheat. The board of 1922 was similarly constituted. So that when you take the legislation that was put through on both occasions to make it possible for those boards to function and compare that legislation with the legislation we are now considering, in my opinion you cannot make a just comparison.

I am one of those who believe that some assistance in some way is necessary to allow the wheat grower to carry on. I read a very interesting article published in the Farm and Ranch Review, which probably confirmed this opinion of mine more than anything else that has been drawn to my attention. This article appeared in the Farm and Ranch Review of December, 1933, and it indicates all the countries in which the government is in some way either subsidizing production or affording tariff protection. Apart from one occasion on which this government paid a bonus of 5 cents on wheat we have received no subsidy nor have we had assistance from this government, and I realize as well as other members of this house do that it is impossible for the government to give us assistance by tariff protection.

Now, the countries that are enumerated in this article I should like to place on record, so as to show what they propose to do. They are not dealing entirely with the wheat situation but with the situation that is most prominent in the particular country in which farmers are affected. We come first to the Argentine and we find that under the sugar production law the output is restricted to 368,000 metric tons so as to maintain the home price level. In Australia the stabilization committee under the Patterson plan removed surplus butter with indemnification for loss in exports so as to increase the domestic price. There is a protective tariff of 7d. per pound. Sugar prices are fixed by government with indemnification for export losses. Cotton price is fixed at 5d. per pound until 1935. There is a bounty of 1½d. paid the grower and a bounty paid on wheat and flax to the grower. Under the British quota lamb and mutton export is to be restricted. I will not read all the details but will indicate the countries. In Austria there is a bounty on the production of grains. In Belgium there is a subsidy to farmers on arable lands. Brazil has a coffee valorization plan. Bulgaria has an export bounty on rye and wheat, while beet sugar prices are fixed by law and imports are prohibited. In Chili the agricultural export board fixes domestic agricultural prices and grants subsidies on exports. Czechoslovakia has an export bonus which is paid upon agricultural products of all kinds. In Denmark the retail domestic price of beet sugar is fixed by the government and measures are also taken to maintain domestic prices of cattle and swine. Then we find Esthonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Latvia, Lithuania, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Southern Rhodesia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the Union of South Africa, Russia, Uruguay, Jugoslavia and the United States—all those countries with some system either of bonuses or tariffs for encouraging their farmers.

I was very much interested last night in listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) when he made this statement, in speaking about the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King):

He gave no consideration to the difficulties with which the primary producer—agriculturists, timber producers, fishermen—have been confronted in the last two or three years. No attention was paid to their problems. There was not a syllable in his whole speech devoted to offering a solution or encouragement, or even recognition of the existence of these problems.

Further on he said:

The agricultural population of this country, constituting as it does about half our population, have during the past few years been suffering under a price condition which made the carrying on of their business almost an impossibility. That has been recognized. Just what to do to change that condition is the problem.

Again he said:

But the purpose, the general scheme, the theme that runs through the whole of this bill, is directed to trying to improve marketing conditions in this country.

After listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce giving utterance to those words I was considering just what the government had done to relieve or help the people about whom he was then talking. This morning I received a letter and with the permission of the house I would like to read it. It is addressed from Freemont, Saskatchewan, and is dated April 16, 1934. It reads:

Dear Mr. Vallance:

I herewith enclose correspondence, and particulars relating to a bundle sent to a young man, recently married, who resides just south of Freemont. The articles in the parcel were sent to him by his mother as wedding gifts and as she sent the bill to Dinsdale, he knows that the total cost of the goods in England was only $30.39.

What I am trying to establish is just what this government has done to assist those individuals about whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce was talking last night.

Young Dinsdale's wife gave birth to a child a few weeks ago, and our municipal doctor reports them living in extremely poor circumstances. But for a little timely assistance, Dinsdale could not have paid the duty demanded on the parcel, and it would have been sold at auction in the usual way, I presume. A good many persons in like circumstances would have been on municipal relief long ago, and yet this is the encouragement this man's parents get for trying to assist him.

I should like the house to visualize a family out in Freemont, Saskatchewan, one of those for whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce is so solicitous and to visualize the mother and father back in the old land. They knew this boy was on relief and they sent to him a bundle whose contents I propose to enumerate in order that we may see just how much encouragement was given to the parents to assist their boy in this country. The parcel contained cotton pillow cases, linen towels, cotton towels, cotton sheets, blankets, cotton fabric and sewing cotton, and the entire cost in the old country was $30.39. When it passed through the customs they then for duty purposes added $16.58, making an arbitrary valuation of the goods of $46.97 and they charged a duty, taking everything into consideration, of $20.81. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce: Does he consider that that is giving assistance to those people he mentioned and was so solicitous about last night in the speech he delivered in support of this bill? Is that the type of treatment they have to expect from the government on the one hand while the minister tells us that they have drafted this bill entirely in the interest of the producers? No; when this bill is thoroughly understood by those individuals about whom I am now talking, it will not receive the consideration he expects.

So far as this matter of markets is concerned, at the imperial economic conference in 1932 we entered into an agreement and on page 50 of the report of that conference will be found the United Kingdom-Canada agreements. In section 4 I read this:

> It is agreed that the duty on either wheat in grain, copper, zinc or lead as provided in this agreement may be removed if at any time empire producers of wheat in grain, copper, zinc and lead respectively are unable or unwilling to offer these commodities on first sale in the United Kingdom at prices not exceeding the world prices and in quantities sufficient to supply the requirements of the United Kingdom consumers.

I should like the house to note this:

> At prices not exceeding the world prices and in quantities sufficient to supply the requirements of the United Kingdom consumers.

Under this agreement we guaranteed that we would deliver to the mother country wheat in quantities and delivered at such time and in such place as she desired.

Now we come to the next step in marketing the wheat of the western farmer. The government found they had to step in and stabilize the market. I did not blame them for that; they felt it was necessary, but I wish to draw the attention of the government to just what this has meant on the British market. Might I say, in passing, that when they did that they violated the contract or agreement into which they had entered in Ottawa in 1932, because wheat prices in Canada have been entirely out of line with world prices. I have in my possession various communications from those in the old land who are interested in the export of Canadian wheat. I do not wish to read too many of them, but I think it is only right, in order to draw the matter to the attention of the government, that I should read at least one. The greatest volume of Canada's number one hard wheat is sold in the country from which I came, Scotland. Ninety-eight per cent of all wheat coming from Canada that is milled in Scotland is number one, and the best market that Canada had—it does not have it now—for number one and number two hard wheat was there. The other day I received a communication from the Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society, Limited. This is probably one of the largest organizations in existence, and one of the largest consumers of Canadian wheat in the world. They enclosed an article taken from the Glasgow Herald of March 27, 1934, less than one month ago. I propose to place this on record:

> Mr. John I. McFarland's statement in your issue of 23rd instant, made before the banking and commerce committee in the Canadian House of Commons on the eve of his departure for Rome, is a most extraordinary one.
> Some years ago a suggestion was made that the Canadian people should be taxed for the benefit of the farmer. It was unanimously rejected,—

That refers to the one hundred per cent pool that was suggested.

> —but Mr. McFarland and Mr. Bennett have been controlling the price of Manitoban wheat with the backing of the banks of Canada and the guarantee of the federal government. The result is that they are faced with enormous loss, and therefore taxation has been forced on the Canadian people as a whole for the sake of the farmer.
> Mr. McFarland says he has got rid of over 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat in three years, and he makes a supposititious case stating that the price might have fallen to ten cents per bushel. Well, it did not, and he cannot get any credit for that. Therefore, he claims to have saved £20,000,000. But this will convince nobody.
> He now says that an increase of ten per cent over the prices now ruling would enable him to break even. This is of no interest to anybody. It is a pure gamble. As he stands today it looks as if he would lose between £4,000,000 and £6,000,000.
> Mr. McFarland denies that he has been gambling. Still "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." He has undoubtedly been gambling, because he is buying wheat that he is not going to use, and for only one purpose.
> He further goes on to say that in the United States, France, Germany, and the United Kingdom the bonuses and arrangements made have been successful, and he makes out that the British farmer has disposed of 50,000,000 bushels at a price of one dollar thirty-five cents in place of fifty-four cents.

I suppose he means by this that the farmer is getting 45/- for his wheat, which is really only selling at 19/6d. This is not correct. The farmer is only making 19/6d. per quarter, and the government is paying him the difference between that and 45/-.

Now the Ottawa conference was intended to base wheat on a natural level. But this idea Canada immediately proceeded to interfere with, with Mr. Bennett's and Mr. McFarland's assistance.

Therefore I claim that their action is a breach of the Ottawa conference. They held up the price of Canadian wheat until it was running about 6/- to 7/- per quarter above the price of 64 pound Argentine wheat. This could not be called a natural price for wheat.

Mr. McFarland seems convinced that he can hold back Canadian wheat and make people pay any price he wants. Well the importation of Manitoban wheat to this market has fallen almost 50 per cent in 1933 compared with 1932, while imports from Russia, Germany, France, the Argentine, Hungary, etc. are in some cases four times what they were.

Mr. McFarland and the pool action have cost Canada her continental trade. If he goes on as he is doing it will cost Canada the British trade.

I had in my file, Mr. Speaker, a note of the extent to which other countries have increased their deliveries of wheat to the British market, but I am sorry to find that it has gone astray. I would very much like to have placed it on Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: The quotation the hon. gentleman has just read was, I presume, a letter published in the Glasgow Herald?

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Did it give the name? If the name was published there should be no objection—

Mr. VALLANCE: No, I have no objection. It was a letter that appeared in the Glasgow Herald, and was sent to me by the Scottish Cooperative Wholesale Society. The letter is not signed, but it was sent to me from that society.

Mr. STEVENS: A most reputable organization; I am not questioning that.

Mr. VALLANCE: I suppose it came to me because of the association I had with that organization in my boyhood.

In another communication that I have received from Glasgow, from the Scottish Millers' Association, eight points are brought out:

(1) That the policy of Mr. Bennett and Mr. McFarland on Canadian wheat is wrong. They are holding the wheat at an artificial price compared with other world wheat.

[Mr. Vallance.]

(2) That it may cost them very dear and reduce the consumption of Manitoban wheat permanently.

(3) That it is not in accordance with the arrangements made at the Ottawa conference.

(4) That it may alter the methods of baking so as to use less Manitoban flour.

(5) That it is unfair to the importing trade to have a premium put on Canadian milled flour after their fighting a battle with the British government to get this flour in free.

(6) That bakers cannot be compelled to buy flour regardless of its price, or a wheat regardless of its price compared with other competitive wheats.

(7) That the Argentine is one of the many sources of danger because they are selling a very good wheat (64 lbs.) at 6/- per quarter less.

(8) That the Canadian position with the Canadian farmers will be worse than ever.

The other night when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was putting through some of his estimates I drew to his attention the fact that these countries had been increasing their exports into the British market while ours were declining. He indicated at that time that as far as the Argentine was concerned the exchange was probably responsible. In regard to Australia he said the reason was the same. As to Russia, well of course there is nothing permanent there; Russia might at any time dump wheat in order to establish credits in any market. Then I pointed out to him that it was the "sound money" policy of this government that was responsible for our wheat not being sold to the same extent as in 1932, and coupled with that is the fact that the price of Canadian wheat was out of line with world prices. The letters I have had from the old country show that there was a time when they depended entirely on the western United States for their hard spring wheat, and if Canada continues to pursue the policies she has now adopted they probably will have to resort again to wheat from that country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that the British market is the only potential market we have, in spite of the six cent preference. Now we propose to bring new legislation; we propose to bring in a bill to encourage the marketing of the wheat of Canada.

I have not time to deal with all the clauses to which I should like to refer, but before attempting to analyze the bill from the standpoint of the wheat grower I should like to say something about the wheat agreement, because it has to do with this very problem of marketing Canada's wheat. We entered into an agreement under which Canada was allotted a certain quota in the world market; this quota was to be passed down to the provinces, from the provinces to the municipalities and from the municipalities to the individual growers. I suppose the powers granted in connection with the wheat agreement will be passed on to the board to be set up in connection with the marketing of our wheat, because section 4 of the bill says:

The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power—

(a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

The average wheat grower in western Canada usually has his obligations fall due on November 1, and it is his ambition to sell his wheat before that date in order to meet those obligations. Even under the wheat agreement, without the application of this bill, it might not be possible for the producer to do so. I should like to recite a hypothetical case. We will assume that in normal times a farmer produces ten thousand bushels of wheat; under the agreement, whether it be the ten year volume and three year average or the three year average and three year volume, he will be given a specific amount of wheat to deliver. Under the ten year volume he will deliver seventeen bushels to the acre; under the three year volume he will deliver thirteen bushels to the acre. We will suppose that a farmer grows, as I have grown, thirty to forty-eight bushels to the acre; he is allowed to deliver seventeen bushels. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) knows, as well as it is known by those of us who understand the wheat industry from a practical standpoint, that if under the wheat agreement or under this bill I am permitted to deliver only a certain portion of my production, either seventeen or thirteen bushels to the acre as the case may be, and am compelled to hold back the remainder of my wheat, it will be impossible for me to finance my operation. How can the farmer finance the taking off of his wheat or the operation of his farm? If I am allowed to deliver only seventeen bushels to the acre it is financially impossible for me to pay the cost of producing anything from seventeen to forty-eight bushels. I am therefore not permitted to meet my obligations. The law says I am permitted to deliver only a certain volume of wheat, but it also says that I must pay my labour, my taxes, the grocer, the baker and all the other bills incidental to the operation of a farm. If this agreement into which Canada has entered is in the interests of the country as a whole, as I hope it is, then I say the wheat producers of western Canada should not be asked to carry this load, because under present conditions western agriculture cannot stand it. I am one of those who favour the setting up of a marketing organization that will take delivery of all the wheat and then Canada can do what she chooses with it. We should not ask the grower to bear this burden; I do not think it is fair.

Coming now to the bill before the house, I find myself up against the same thing. The argument that has been advanced in connection with the wheat agreement, and that will be advanced in connection with this bill, is that the best place to store wheat is back on the farm. You cannot negotiate wheat when it is on the farm, Mr. Speaker; no farmer can go to the bank, in spite of section 88 of the Bank Act, and establish a line of credit on wheat lying in the granary. So how are we to carry on? I still say that if Canada wishes to control and regulate wheat she should take the responsibility of financing the whole operation, objectionable as that might be. Then subsection (c) of section 4 states:

to compensate any person for loss sustained by exporting, storing or withholding from the market any product pursuant to any determination or order of the board.

If the government suggest to me that I deliver only a certain portion of my wheat will they, because I have to store the remainder, pay me for the storage of that wheat? I doubt it. There are many sections of this bill with which time will not permit me to deal, but to which I have very strenuous objection. We come to subsection (f):

to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board—

What I object to most strenuously in this bill is the domination of a group, a board set up by order in council, with the producer never consulted and never considered. I believe in cooperation; I should be inclined to support a resolution which would provide, in connection with the growers of wheat or those concerned in the production of the other primary products of Canada, that when seventy-five per cent of the total had voiced their intention of so doing, the other twenty-five per cent should be compelled to cooperate so that the producers themselves would manage the sale of the product. One of the most regrettable features of the activities of the farmers in attempting to market their products has been the fact that they have depended upon men who, in many instances, were not experienced in the marketing of those products, and as a result the farmers suffered. Under this legislation a board is to be appointed by the governor in council. I would expect, at least, that the chairman of the board would be brought from the grain exchange in Winnipeg, because he would have a knowledge of the marketing of wheat. If my suggestion were adopted, however, and the farmers were allowed to band themselves together and choose their own board I think it would be much more efficient because of the interest they have in the marketing of their products.

Under this legislation we are to have three types of boards, beginning with the central board sitting here in Ottawa and including the provincial boards and the local boards. There is so much machinery involved in this proposal that it is enough to ruin it. I am absolutely opposed to this type of legislation. During the twenty-eight years I have lived in western Canada I have been pledged to the support of cooperative marketing, but in this act I see no vestige of cooperation.

Then we come to subsection 6 of section 4:

The board may require the local board to furnish full information from time to time relating to the production and marketing of the regulated product, and shall advise the local board in all matters relating to the exercise of its powers.

This subsection gives the power of regulating production. The board would have power to say to me how much wheat I may grow or how much I may market. First as an individual and a grower, and secondly as a representative of a rural constituency, I refuse to support any such legislation as this.

Then we come to the marketing schemes, and we find the following:

A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product—

Not the producers. It may be a marketing organization. This subsection departs entirely from the rights of the producers.

—may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

(2) The petition shall be filed with the minister and if he considers that the persons engaged in the production or marketing of the natural product are sufficiently represented by the petitioners, the scheme shall be referred to the board with a request for a report on the expediency thereof.

(3) Upon receipt of a report from the board recommending the approval of the scheme as submitted or as amended by the board, the minister may recommend the approval thereof, and the governor in council may thereupon approve the said scheme and fix the date when the same shall be effective.

I wish to deal with only one other clause before six o'clock, and with that in mind I turn to paragraph (b) of subsection 4 of section 5:

(4) Before any scheme is approved the governor in council shall be satisfied.

(b) That some part of the product produced may be exported.

I shall not go into details in connection with all these paragraphs, but would simply draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that from paragraph (b) to (i) the producers have no say whatever as to the personnel of the managements of local boards.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to the legality of certain pieces of legislation, and whether or not they are at variance with the British North America Act. I have before me an article from the Winnipeg Free Press headed Under the Dome, and dealing with section 121 of the British North America Act. That section is as follows:

All articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

The point I should like to place before the government is this: Under the bill I am not permitted to sell wheat to anyone other than the marketing board. Yet the interpretation of the person who wrote this newspaper article, and it is my own as well, is that section 121 extends to the provinces the right to engage in interprovincial trade. Has this government to-day the power to tell me that I cannot deliver any of my wheat or the products of my farm to John Doe who may live in any of the other eight provinces? Under the bill now before me the government state that without their permission I cannot do that. First, I have to be a licensed grower; I have to have a licence even to grow it. Then I must be licensed to sell it, and can sell only to the board.

Mr. YOUNG: Or go to gaol.

Mr. VALLANCE: Or suffer a penalty, yes. To me, Mr. Speaker, the penalties under this legislation are altogether out of proportion to the offences. I should expect that some member of the government would clear up the point I have raised in connection with section 121 of the British North America Act. As a resident of Saskatchewan I contend I have the right under that section to deliver any or all of my wheat to any individual who may live in one of the remaining eight provinces.

I am very sorry that I cannot support the measure, although I am in favour of a co-operative marketing bill which would permit the producers of any primary product to attempt by joint effort to market their own products in their own manner. If this bill is so amended I shall give it every support, but in its present state I cannot. I have sent many copies of the bill out to the farming districts, and I believe when it is understood by those whom supposedly it is framed to help it will meet with the same opposition as that which it is meeting at the hands of the official opposition.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: What is there to-day in any law to prevent any group of producers from getting together for the purpose of marketing their own products?

Mr. VALLANCE: No one knows better than the minister that at one time an attempt was made to have one hundred per cent control in the three provinces. I am told by an hon. member sitting near me that at one time British Columbia attempted what the minister has suggested, and they were told that their action was ultra vires, and that there would have to be amendments to the British North America Act.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course that is not what the hon. member said a minute ago.

Mr. VALLANCE: What did I say?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not quibbling with the hon. member; I was merely curious to know what he meant. The hon. member said that—

Mr. VALLANCE: I would rather have the minister ask me if I said it.

Mr. STEVENS: —he was in favour of groups of producers having the liberty to get together under a cooperative system for the purpose of marketing their goods. What is there to-day to prevent them from doing that?

Mr. VALLANCE: The trouble is that we cannot compel others to come in. I suggested that when seventy-five per cent of the growers interested in any one commodity desired that it should be made compulsory for the other twenty-five per cent to come in, it should be so. That is the point I made.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain), and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Barber.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the other evening my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) discussed very moderately but at some length the bill which is now before us, but as there was a good deal of discussion at that time I unfortunately did not have the opportunity of speaking for a few minutes to offer my views, and consequently the debate has gone over until this evening.

During the previous discussion one of the members on this side of the house moved an amendment in effect that the bill be referred to the board of railway commissioners, which after all is exactly where the matter should go to my mind because it deals entirely with freight rates, and if there is a more complicated question than freight rates that can be discussed anywhere I should like to know what it is. I presume we will all admit that the tariff, for instance, is a very complicated question, but to my mind it is child's play compared with the question of freight rates. I do not consider, sir, that this house or the government of this country or any government or any House of Commons previous to this one has been or is the proper body before which to bring such a question as this, with all due deference to my hon. friend's argument to the contrary.

The government of Canada in 1904 established the board of railway commissioners whose duty it is to deal with freight rates, and since that time, with one or two extraordinary exceptions, it has always been considered that the freight rate structure is a question too technical to be dealt with by this house. My hon. friend from New Westminster will not quite agree with that, but let me illustrate what I mean by that statement.

Let us imagine that this bill should become law. It would in effect make the freight rates westward exactly the same as the freight rates eastward on the basis of the Crowsnest pass rates and on the basis of the shorter haul from Calgary rather than the longer haul from Edmonton. That perhaps may not be very clear to those who have not looked into the question, but my hon. friend from New Westminster and my hon. friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) and others who have studied the matter will understand the statement. Now if you pass this bill and fix these rates at the present time, it does not matter what the details of the rates are; the fact remains that you are fixing freight rates in this house and any member of the house on either side and belonging to any party would then be justified in coming before the house and demanding that we also fix the freight rate on some particular commodity from his constituency moving to some other section of the country.

That is not a far-fetched illustration, because while my hon. friend from New Westminster was speaking the other evening I jotted down different products on which I have been approached this year by various members to your left, Mr. Speaker, and also to your right, in respect of which special freight rates were asked because of the distressful times in various sections of the country. I have had some hon. members from northern Ontario, for example, and some from southern Ontario take up the question of the rates on pulpwood, claiming that the freight rates are unfair to the pulpwood industry because of the low prices of all lines and the lesser demand for pulpwood and paper in the United States, and so on. My hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) nods his head in assent. He understands that question because he comes from a section where pulpwood and lumbering generally is a very important industry. On a number of occasions the members from this side of the house and from the other side have requested that the Canadian National Railways—they have even suggested that I intercede with the Canadian Pacific Railway—should endeavour to set special rates for their section of the country on pulpwood and lumber products in general. I have also had many requests from various parts of the country demanding special rates on agricultural products because of the very low prices that prevail at the present time and because of the difficult position in which the farmer finds himself to-day in trying to make ends meet. I have always answered that it was a matter over which I have no control, and I say frankly that I have passed these letters on to the particular railway concerned, the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National, because I have no power to compel them to control or fix these rates. The only body aside from the railways themselves which has power to deal with the freight rate structure in this country is the board of railway commissioners, and I have pointed that out to anyone who has approached me on questions such as this.

I mention that because it will illustrate to my hon. friend from New Westminster the Chinese puzzle which parliament would have to deal with if we attempted to enter into such a complicated question as freight rates, and to show the house how complicated the question is I am going to quote a paragraph from the general freight rates investigation made by the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. NEILL: What date?

Mr. MANION: Unfortunately I have not the date, but I think it was in the year 1927. It is the report of the general freight rates investigation—

Mr. REID: It was in 1927.

Mr. MANION: I thought that was the year. I quote from page 140 of that report:

> Numerous exhibits have been placed before the board and costs and comparisons made from all angles. Studies are presented comparing operating costs in the British Columbia district—

That is what my hon. friend did the other night. If I understood him aright he quoted from the middle of one page—and I am not criticizing him at all for that—just one of the statements to which this paragraph refers. It goes on—> —with those of the prairie district from the standpoint of average mileage operated, of freight operating expenses, gross ton miles, net ton mileage, freight train miles, loaded car miles, empty car miles, per mile of road, as well as from the standpoint of net tons per train, gross tons per train, net tons per car, loade cars per train, empty cars per train, ratio of empty to loaded car mileage, net tons per mile of road, and freight trains per mile of road and from all these computations and standpoints ratios and averages were worked out involving extremely complicated and exhaustive calculations, all of which are to some degree interrelated, and no one of which, perhaps, by itself leads to any absolutely certain and definite conclusion.

That is the attitude of the board of railway commissioners on this exceedingly complicated question. I well remember the late vice-president in charge of traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Mr. Lanigan, an old friend of mine, now retired, who had been in charge of traffic I think for thirty-five or forty years, an exceedingly able and charming man, discussing with me many years ago, long before I was Minister of Railways, the question of freight rates. He told me that no one but an expert could deal with them sensibly at all, and I believe he is correct. I have heard it argued to and fro very often how impossible it is for the question to be dealt with except by experts, and even they differ, as we have often seen.

I mention this only to show the house how difficult it would be for it to deal with a question such as this. If we settled this particular question in this house, even after the most complete investigation and thorough debate, we would be inundated by demands from all sections of the country and from all sides of the house for changes in the freight rates structure without proper investigation to support the demands that were being made.

The hon. gentleman dealt with another aspect of this question, and I just wish to show how complicated that is. He gave the rates per mile, per one hundred pounds of grain, from Calgary and Edmonton to Vancouver, and the rates to Fort William, and then on to Montreal, Halifax and Saint John. I asked him to give me the rates from Edmonton and Calgary to Vancouver—they are the same though the mileage is different—and he gave me the rate as 20 cents per hundred pounds. I also asked him for the rate from the same points to Montreal and he gave me the rate of 53½ cents per hundred pounds. Then he argued from that, because of distances, that it was not fair to the western provinces. Surely however, as a matter of fact, a rate which is nearly three times as great eastward as it is westward cannot cause any serious injury to Vancouver, and certainly no one in the Calgary or Edmonton district would think of shipping grain eastward to Montreal during a season when he could ship it west for little more than one-third that rate. Then he made a comparison of rates from Edmonton and Calgary to Fort William and from Edmonton and Calgary westward to Vancouver. Even the rate to Vancouver has an advantage over the rate to Fort William, because the rate to Vancouver—I am speaking of the export rate—is 20 cents whereas the rate to Fort William is 26 cents. In other words, there is an advantage of 6 cents per hundred pounds westward. But when the grain gets to the head of the lakes, at Fort William or Port Arthur, it is still in the centre of the continent and has to be carried to seaboard before it can be shipped abroad; so that even if the rates were lower to Fort William the grain would have one thousand miles to travel before it could reach Montreal, or fourteen or fifteen hundred miles if it were shipped to the maritimes.

There is, therefore, no argument to support the view that grain would be diverted eastward rather than westward under these rates. At any rate, there is no comparison between an inland port such as Fort William or Port Arthur, or for that matter any of the eastern lake ports, and the port of Vancouver, for the reason that Vancouver is on the ocean; and while there is a long haul around the Panama canal, the rates are low and Vancouver is immediately on the ocean, whereas an inland port at the head of the lakes is subject to the disadvantage of the great distance which the shipment would have to take from that point, as I have indicated.

I would point out that if an attempt were made to carry out any of the proposals put forward in this bill it would upset the entire freight rate structure. Moreover, according to statements made to me by both railways, the adoption of the bill would result in a heavy loss of revenue to both systems.

My hon. friend claims that the export freight rate is considerably lower than the domestic freight rate to Vancouver on No. 1 Northern wheat, being 20 cents from Edmonton and Calgary, as compared with a domestic rate of 40 or 40½ cents—practically double. But we did obtain last year a special rate on feed grain from these points to British Columbia points, and I do not think my hon. friend mentioned this the other evening. But if you attempted to place the domestic rates for No. 1 northern or for the better grades of grain on the same basis as the export rates you would do considerable injury to the railways by taking away much of their revenue, and you would be ignoring the principle that export freight rates are always, or at any rate nearly always, in all countries, lower than domestic freight rates, for the reason that the export rate is only part of a through rate to some foreign country or some outside port, so that they have to make the rates as low as possible in order to compete in the world market.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the special rate granted on feed grain last year?

Mr. MANION: I regret that I cannot give my hon. friend that information offhand. Personally I had a good deal to do with having that rate put into effect. There was held in my office a meeting of representatives of the different provinces who were here for the interprovincial conference a year and a half ago and I had representatives of the railways present. I hope I may be pardoned for boasting a little in saying that I had to take a club to the railways to get them to consent to it, because I had been arguing for it for a considerable time. Finally, after discussing the matter with the representatives of the provinces, both railways conceded the rate. Speaking from memory, I think it is nearly midway between the domestic and the export rate—an hon. gentleman near me says it is 30 cents, and I think that is right. That rate they conceded after a good deal of argument and it is still in effect. They may wish to eliminate it later, but so far as I am concerned I do not think they should. I do not know that much freight has moved in consequence of that lower rate, but at any rate it was put into force.

Another point I wish to make is this. The rates on Canadian grain are the lowest rates in the world. That is the claim made by both railways and, I think, quite justifiably. They contend that the rates on grain in Canada are lower, by and large, than the rates on grain in the United States or in any other country over similar distances.

May I add, in regard to the amendment of my hon. friend from Fraser Valley, that I am entirely in accord with what it proposes, inasmuch as the board of railway commissioners is the proper body, appointed in 1904, to deal with this question. That board has rendered excellent service ever since that time, and I submit that this house would be most unwise if it undertook to become involved in this question. I suggest that the proper course is to support the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, on the principle that the board of railway commissioners is the logical body to which a question of this sort should be referred.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to make just a few observations in reply to some of the statements made in this debate, particularly by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). First, may I say that I am indeed pleased with the spirit in which so far the debate has been carried on, and in this regard I refer especially to the speech delivered by the Minister of Railways this evening. The hon. gentleman has quoted from the report of the board of railway commissioners in the general freight rates investigation, and if there is one reason more than another why I cannot accept the amendment it is the very paragraph which he read. If you will note the last sentence—and these are the views of the board in 1927—you will see from this statement that after all data has been placed before them, average mileage operated, the gross ton miles, net ton mileage, freight train mileage, etc., all of which are to some degree interrelated, not one of them by itself leads to any absolute, certain and definite conclusion. All this information has been laid before the board of railway commissioners many times but no results have accrued from the appeals made, some of them I am sorry to say very expensive.

I cannot agree with the Minister of Railways when he says that the settling of this question would be the settling of commodity rates. I would not attempt to bring into this house the general freight rates question; it is too complicated, as I am perfectly well aware. But parliament in 1925 changed the commodity rates of the Crowsnest within the territory from Calgary to Fort William and substituted therefor the Crowsnest Pass rates on grain and grain products within the whole area between these two points, settling definitely the status of grain and grain products. That is exactly what we are asking for.

As I have stated, our appeal before the board of railway commissioners has not met with any degree of success; it has been turned down time and again and it is in view of that I have endeavoured, since I have entered parliament, to place the matter before it. In 1925 they did not set commodity rates; they set a rate only on grain and grain products going easterly from Calgary or Edmonton to Fort William, and we in British Columbia are asking for equal treatment. We are not asking parliament to set commodity rates. Commodity rates do not enter into the question at all, because, if parliament were to adopt the bill now before the house, the only thing affected would be grain and grain products. The matter of commodity rates and the general freight rates structure is not touched upon and I will agree with some hon. members that when we come to that, those complicated questions should be discussed before the board of railway commissioners.

I am sorry I cannot accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), because past experience has shown us that we can hope for very little before the railway board. As I have pointed out, the various commissioners who have sat in judgment have put it on record that the hands of British Columbia are tied, so to speak. They did not say so in so many words, but they said that the Crowsnest rate from Calgary to Fort William had no bearing on any appeal made by British Columbia as regards grain and grain products going west. The other evening I quoted the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) who took the attitude at that time that if parliament in its wisdom or otherwise had seen fit to change the act and give to the east those old rates, we should also receive the same rates westward. On that occasion of course, he declared that he would rather see the whole matter go before the board of railway commissioners. But inasmuch as the bill fixing those grain rates did go through parliament in 1925, my appeal now—and it has been practically the same since I have entered parliament—is that parliament should put into the act what was left out in 1925.

When the hon. member for Fraser Valley spoke, I am sorry he interjected that little remark about the anxiety I had and the delay in introducing the bill since I came here this year. It is said that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones, and it is equally true that those who have done little themselves should not attempt to criticize the efforts of others. It was due to that remark of the hon. member that I took the pains to search the records, and I find that in 1926 he was silent in regard to railway rates. In 1927 he was silent; in 1928 he spoke a matter of 103 words on the budget, and in 1930 he had a small paragraph. I would not have mentioned this, but I think it was very unfair on his part to cast it up to me that I had delayed this year because I had not seen fit to introduce the bill a little earlier in the session. That has no bearing on the matter, and I endeavoured in the course of my speech to keep away from recriminations.

Mr. BARBER: I should like to correct the hon. gentleman. I was not silent. I went to the proper tribunal, the board of railway commissioners, on several occasions, where I thought I could get more action than I could in the House of Commons.

Mr. REID: The hon. member may say that he went before the board, but we have been going there for years because the appeal of British Columbia goes back, so far as I know, to at least 1921, and that province has been appealing before the board every year without results from then to 1930.

Mr. STEVENS: The matter started long before that. I started it myself in 1912, so it is quite historic.

Mr. REID: Yes, but except in 1925 no strong attitude was taken in the house in connection with it.

Mr. NEILL: I took it up repeatedly.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes, there was. Before the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) entered parliament, the matter was before the house.

Mr. NEILL: And after.

Mr. REID: Now that the minister has entered into the argument, I wonder whether he would suggest to the government that they adopt the proposal he made in 1925. When the bill was before the house then, he said: "Abrogate the whole agreement". Would he now advise his government to abrogate the Crowsnest agreement as he suggested when he was arguing in 1925?

Mr. TURNBULL: It was abrogated long ago by the government the hon. member supports.

Mr. REID: That is another angle. It was not abrogated in the true sense of the word; ia was changed in 1925. It may have been abrogated by a decision of the board, but it was reinstated and the present legislation was put through the house in 1925. In that year the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he was in favour of abrogating the whole thing. That is what he said then. Seeing that he has entered into the discussion, would he now advise the government to abrogate the Crowsnest agreement and leave the whole matter of grain and grain products to the board of railway commissioners?

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt my hon. friend? He seems to think he is making a statement that will embarrass me.

Mr. REID: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not in the slightest. The first speech I made in the House of Commons in 1911, I made on this question, and I advocated the same principle as that enunciated by my colleague to-night, that the question of railway rate fixing ought to be in the hands of the railway board.

Mr. REID: I think I am making a fair statement when I say that the minister gave it as his opinion in 1925 that seeing the Crowsnest pass agreement was being changed in that year and subsection 6 put into it, the hands of British Columbia were tied so far as going before the railway board was concerned. That is the stand the minister has taken. He stated it three times in his speech and I agree with that. If he was correct then, would he take the same stand now?

This move for equalization of rates is a fight on the part of British Columbia and we have tried to bring it where redress should be given—to the foot of the throne. It is not a freight rates investigation or of settling the whole question of freight rates on goods passing between the prairies and British Columbia. We are asking for just what parliament gave to the eastern provinces in 1925; it is an appeal for equality and equality only. As I was pointing out, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I are in agreement regarding the fact that it is useless to go before the board of railway commissioners since the act was passed in 1925, although it was a Liberal administration that had it passed, I am agreeing with him in his opinion that it tied the hands of British Columbia and subsequent events have proved that to be the case. I think that is pretty clear.

There are in British Columbia and, I suppose, in Alberta and also Saskatchewan, large quantities of low grade grain, and as our foreign markets are getting less we are wondering to-day where we shall find markets for that grain. There is in British Columbia a market and there would be a greater one if that grain could be moved there at a reasonable cost, but when those who would purchase the farmers' low priced grain, or grain that is frozen, or feed grain, had to pay forty-one and a half cents per one hundred pounds in freight—I realize there is an agreement in effect for the year—when they had to pay the full domestic rate there was not a great deal of that grain moved. Production of poultry and eggs in British Columbia has gone down and down, and the situation is bad enough just now with the many hundreds of poultry plants not doing anything. One thing affecting them which helped to put them out of business was the fact that grain was costing far too much. Not that the farmer was getting to much for his grain; the freight rate was eating up too much of the total cost. British Columbia in 1928 was producing 27,000,000 dozen eggs, but for 1932, the latest report I have, the figure had dropped to 15,000,000 dozen. Not only that, but the consumption of eggs in Canada had also dropped. I quote these figures to show that there is a ready market in British Columbia for the low grade grains of the prairies and mill feed for dairymen, if only we could receive the same treatment as the eastern provinces have had and enjoyed for many years.

Might I refer to one remark of the Minister of Railways? He mentioned the mileage from Calgary to Fort William, and said that when grain reached Fort William it was practically in the centre of Canada; it had not reached the seaboard. While he was speaking I noted that from Calgary or Edmonton to Montreal, which is the port at the head of navigation, the distance is 2,239 miles, and grain is carried all that way for 53 cents per hundred pounds, while we in British Columbia were being charged 41½ cents for a distance of only 642 miles.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. MANION: But the rate eastward that my hon. friend is giving is the export rate. There is a domestic rate that is considerably higher.

Mr. REID: I am glad the minister drew that to my attention, because the domestic rate as far as Montreal is concerned is some three cents per hundred pounds. It is only a paper rate; there is practically no domestic grain movement to Montreal.

Mr. MANION: Most of it is carried by boat down the lakes, making a water competitive rate. Scarcely any grain is carried by rail to Montreal for export except a little in winter. Nearly all of it is carried in summer and by water.

Mr. REID: That may be true, but the fact remains that a rate exists between those points; 2,239 miles for 53 cents as against 41½ cents for 642 miles.

Mr. MANION: But as my hon. friend said, it is only a paper rate; it is not used.

Mr. REID: If you take the rate to Fort William, 26 cents, it is much cheaper than for grain going west; and to Fort William there is no domestic rate.

Mr. MANION: There is practically no domestic consumption at Fort William; there is only a comparatively small population. It is all for export, really.

Mr. REID: Well I am not going to detain the house any longer, I am sorry to say I cannot accept the amendment, because past experience has shown us in British Columbia that we can expect very little from the board of railway commissioners. As is well known, we have appealed time and time again to that board and every kind and manner of objection has been raised as to why the same rates that apply east on grain and grain products cannot be given to British Columbia.

Amendment (Mr. Barber) agreed to on division.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

International Boundary Commission—

Expenses connected with the maintenance in a state of effective demarkation of the international boundary, $27,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister give some explanation as to the progress being made in this work?

Mr. MURPHY: The work that is carried on by the international boundary commission in Canada is in accordance with the treaties entered into with the United States on February 4, 1925. The work consists of maintenance, which means reclearing of the boundary vistas through timbered areas traversed by the line, the keeping in repair of boundary monuments and reference monuments that mark the course of the line, erecting range marks to range the boundary over wide areas of water in the interests of the fishing industry, or to facilitate the enforcement of customs and immigration laws, and erecting new monuments where necessary to mark the boundary crossings of new highways, locating, establishing and marking the boundary on international bridges and in international tunnels; and performing all other related duties, such as furnishing to the several departments and bureaus of the two governments information relative to the international boundary.

Mr. LUCAS: What has been the total cost to Canada up to the present time? And has the minister any idea when this work might be completed?

Mr. MURPHY: The total expenditure up to December 13, 1933, on the field work of maintenance of the international boundary by the Canadian section under the treaty of February 14, 1925, is $67,428.09.

In regard to the second part of my hon. friend's question I would say that I expect this work will go on from year to year as long as there is a boundary line between the two countries—in other words, it will never be finished.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Yukon Territory—
Salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territory, including surveys, $42,000.
Grant to Yukon council for local purposes, the construction and maintenance of roads and such other expenditures as the commissioner is authorized to expend by and with the advice and consent of the council or any committee thereof; and its accounts with respect to such expenditure shall be subject to examination and audit by the auditor general as provided by section 22, chapter 215, revised statutes, 1927, $60,000—Total, $102,000.

Mr. TOTZKE: What is the nature of the surveys they carry on in the Northwest Territories at the present time?

Mr. MURPHY: Has my hon. friend reference to a survey in the Northwest Territories, or any survey in the Yukon?

Mr. TOTZKE: In the first portion of this item it says: "Administration of the territory, including surveys."

Mr. MURPHY: There is in the estimates an item of $1,080 which pays the salary of a surveyor in the Yukon, who does the necessary survey work in regard to mining claims and so on.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Lands, Parks, etc.—
Dominion lands, seed grain, mining lands and ordnance, admiralty and public lands, salaries and expenses, etc., $83,800.
Advancement of forest conservation; national inventory of forest resources; investigation of forest conditions and rates of growth, and development of scientific management methods; forest protection studies, technical and economic investigations of forest industries; the operation of field research stations, demonstration forests, and forest products laboratories; co-operative undertakings in forestry and forest products, etc., $241,300.
Grant to Canadian Forestry Association, $1,620.
Investigations of water and power resources and of international waterway problems, the dominion hydrometric survey and for the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts, etc., $157,565.
Amount required to meet expenses of Lake of the Woods control board, $7,000.
To provide for the expenses connected with the national parks of Canada, historic sites, care of indigents in the parks, the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in the parks and the payment of their remuneration; also, to promote tourist travel in Canada, $1,041,399.
Administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $31,900.
Cost of litigation and legal expenses, $4,000.
Amount to provide for expenses in connection with determination of location and boundaries of ordnance and admiralty lands in the province of British Columbia, $3,000.
To provide amounts required for expropriation of areas for right of way on the Savona—Port Moody section of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, also on the Pembina and Stonewall branches of the same road, $1,000.
Amount required to cover the payment of retiring leave to officials other than those on civil government, $7,500.
Salaries of revenue staff, $15,822—Total. $1,595,906.

Mr. TOTZKE: I should like to ask the minister for some information in connection with the Migratory Birds Convention Act. Some years ago an agreement was entered into with the United States authorities in connection with the sand-hill crane, which formerly existed in large numbers in western Canada and did considerable damage to the grain crops. The information given the settlers in Saskatchewan was to the effect that while these birds were protected in Canada, when they got back to the United States they were slaughtered by thousands. I have no way of knowing whether or not that report was true, but that was common talk in western Canada. I should like to know if the minister has any information in that regard.

Mr. MURPHY: I have no specific information on this particular phase of the matter, but I may say to my hon. friend that I have met some of the members of the United States biological survey, and they are as keenly interested as we are in this country in protecting the migratory birds. Under the act we are required, as they are, to protect birds which fall within the provisions of the act, and I know that two years ago the federal government of the United States put into effect regulations which drastically curtailed not only the length of the season but also the number of birds that could be killed in the different parts of the country. I do not think I have any information in regard to the sand-hill crane, but it is certain that this is one of the classes of birds protected under the treaty. I can only make the general statement that to the best of my knowledge the United States are endeavouring to the best of their ability to carry out the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. TOTZKE: When does the treaty expire, or for what length of time does the treaty remain in force?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed, Mr. Chairman, that the treaty is for the period of one year and continues from year to year unless one year's notice is given by either party.

Mr. TOTZKE: Does the minister say the treaty was for one year originally? I understood it was for a period of ten years.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member is correct; in the first instance it was ten years in regard to certain species of birds.

Mr. TOTZKE: And then the treaty is renewed from year to year. If the treaty is to be renewed in the near future I suggest that the minister try to get some information as to whether the report is true that the birds are being slaughtered wholesale in certain sections of the United States while we in western Canada protect them. At times these birds come into the fields by hundreds and thousands, and it does not take them long to clean up a quarter section of grain. I have walked through a field where you could not find a kernel of grain left, just because of these birds.

[Mr. Totzke.]

Mr. MURPHY: Is my hon. friend speaking of the sand-hill crane?

Mr. TOTZKE: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Is the existing treaty still between Great Britain and the United States or is it between Canada and the United States?

Mr. MURPHY: The treaty was made in the first instance between the government of Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. VENIOT: Then following the ten year period the treaty will be taken up by Canada, I suppose?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Does the minister know when the treaty expired? While he is looking up that information may I direct his attention to the fact that one reason for this treaty was to extend protection to mariners. That may seem odd, but still it was one of the reasons because of which this treaty was entered into. It is a well known fact to mariners that the gull often indicates a coming storm or a change in the weather, and for that reason the gull was included under the Migratory Birds Convention Act. The same statement applies to the wild goose, the brant, and so on. If we are protecting a bird under the present treaty because it goes from one country to the other, and it becomes a destructive bird in Canada, I should think if the government would take cognizance of what has been said by my hon. friend from Humboldt and lay the matter before the United States government it could be easily arranged to exclude that destructive bird from the classification of migratory birds. Of course, in making a treaty between Great Britain and the United States they considered the seafaring end of it almost entirely and did not think of this kind of bird as destructive on land. The gull, the brant, the wild goose and the duck are not very destructive, and if the United States could be convinced that the bird referred to is not a sea going bird but is a destructive bird on land, I do not think there would be any trouble. It is not like the similar bird we have in the maritime provinces, which is a sea going bird; this is a land bird, but it comes under the treaty. I think if the matter were properly placed before the government of the United States this bird could be excluded from the operation of this act.

Mr. MURPHY: I wish to amend an answer I gave to the hon. member for Humboldt a few moments ago in connection with the duration of the treaty. The clause dealing with that matter reads as follows:

It—

That is, the treaty—

—shall remain in force for fifteen years, and in the event of neither of the high contracting parties having given notification twelve months before the expiration of said period of fifteen years, of its intention of terminating its operation, the convention shall continue to remain in force for one year and so on from year to year.

Mr. TOTZKE: The fifteen year period has expired before this.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes; the treaty was entered into on August 16, 1916, and is now being continued from year to year.

Mr. CANTLEY: On a former occasion when the estimates of the minister were before the committee I expressed my views in regard to this matter. I agree fully with the statements of the hon. member for Humboldt. I believe the hon. member for Gloucester makes only one mistake when he refers to the land birds and sea going birds, because I understood him to say that in his opinion a large number of the birds which went north from the Northumberland strait and the other waters bordering the province of Nova Scotia and his native province, New Brunswick, returned the same way.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I did not say that.

Mr. CANTLEY: I must have been mistaken. The point I wish to make is this: Of, say, 1,000,000 birds which go north over the Atlantic coast or Northumberland strait not ten per cent come back that way. They come back through the prairies when the grain is ripe. They later go down through the United States, and finally reach Mexico. Not ten per cent of them come back the way they went up. They make a circular route, with the result that for years the Americans have enjoyed the advantage of this treaty; there is no doubt about that. Because of the fact that in recent seasons tens of thousands of those birds have been slaughtered, the eastern sportsmen of the United States are now taking steps in every way possible to prevent the people in the central and western parts of the United States from slaughtering the birds. They realize, as we do, that their people are getting ninety per cent of the advantage from the protection of these birds, and that in the past they have contributed nothing whatever towards their protection. It is high time that the treaty between the United States and Canada was revised.

Mr. VENIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. CANTLEY: It should have been revised years ago. I hope the minister will realize the importance of the matter and see to it that we get a fair deal with our friends to the south which, up to the present date, we have not had.

Mr. MURPHY: Replying generally to the observations of the hon. member, may I say that the greatest known breeding ground for game birds, notably the wild duck, is in the southern portion of the Canadian prairie provinces. That fact has been established through observations extending over a period of years. While hon. members will realize that no definite or dogmatic statement can be made concerning the routes followed by birds in migration, nevertheless from the system of banding which has been adopted by certain governmental bodies and private individuals, and from a careful study of the banding practice, the flight of the birds can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of accuracy. If any hon. member will take the trouble to consult the charts which have been developed by the officers in charge of that work in the dominion parks branch he will observe that the birds which breed in western Canada follow many lines of travel when going to the south. Some of them go to the Atlantic coast; some go by way of Ontario; a number go directly down the Mississippi from the prairie provinces, and a few of them find their way to the states on the Pacific coast. The statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Cantley) to the effect that most of the birds going north from the Atlantic coast find their way back by way of the prairies is not in accordance with the studies which have been made by departmental officials.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is in accordance with the facts, which is of more importance.

Mr. MURPHY: Of course there might be differences of opinion as to what the facts are. However, I wish now to deal with the other phase of the question, namely that the treaty does not work fairly so far as the people of Canada are concerned. In other words the suggestion is that the inhabitants of the United States obtain greater benefit than we do from its operations. Let me present the other side of the picture. We will suppose that there was no treaty with our friends to the south in connection with these migratory birds. The United States have a population of about 120,000,000 people, consequently there will be many more sportsmen or hunters in that country than there would be in the Dominion of Canada. From the study I have been able to give to the question, and from my personal knowledge extending over a period of about twenty years, in which I in common with other Canadians have enjoyed the sport of hunting wild fowl, I consider that the regulations which have been brought into being under the terms of the treaty are greatly to our advantage. If there were no treaty or no regulations these birds which to a great extent breed in Canada might be slaughtered indiscriminately by our friends to the south, and with the exception of a general protest we would have nothing to say in the matter. Again, from my personal contact with members of the biological board in the United States, from letters which I have received from members of different game conservation organizations in the United States, and from contact which officials of the department have with those same organizations, I would say that those who are truly interested in the conservation and preservation of the different species of game birds do not all live in the Dominion of Canada. The fact is, I believe, that all true conservationists living on either side of the border are doing their utmost to see that these birds are conserved for both countries.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I notice that there is a vote of $241,300 for the advancement of forest conservation. Could the minister tell the committee where the laboratories and various research stations are located?

Mr. MURPHY: One laboratory which carries on general laboratory work is located in the city of Ottawa; one dealing principally with the pulp and paper industry, is located in the city of Montreal, and one carrying on laboratory studies pertaining to the woods and lumber products of British Columbia is situated in the city of Vancouver.

Mr. VENIOT: I was going to suggest that we would do well to finish one item before jumping to another.

Mr. MURPHY: I agree with the hon. member for Gloucester. When I answered the hon. member for Skeena I was under the impression that we had completed the discussion we had conducted previously. If such is not the case I agree that we should dispose of one item at a time. I would point out to the hon. member, however, that the various subheadings are all listed under one item, namely item 182. I thought that the discussion on the migratory birds had concluded.

Mr. VENIOT: Not quite.

Mr. BOWMAN: Did I understand the minister to say that certain of these regulations were of particular benefit to Canada? I agree entirely, Mr. Chairman, with what has been said as to the feeling in Canada, particularly western Canada, as to migratory game birds and as to the treaty existing between Canada and the United States. In Manitoba, particularly in the northern part of the province, we have a great breeding ground for millions of ducks. In the last four or five years, during the dry years which took such a toll of game, the waterfowl which formerly used to breed in the southern part of Saskatchewan have gone to the northern part of the province and to northern Manitoba.

Here is the situation so far as we are concerned. Our hunting season opens in the fall, from September 15 or 20, as a general rule, varying as the local authorities deem advisable, and it extends to about the middle of October, sometimes towards the end of the month, depending how early the freezeup comes. In the part of the province from which I come the canvasback is the main bird that is shot by the hunter.

Mr. VENIOT: We have them down home too.

Mr. BOWMAN: Yes. The canvasback leaves for the south between the sixth and tenth of October, sometimes a little later, but the main flight takes place about that time. The consequence is that we have a hunting season extending from the fifteenth or twentieth of September to the sixth or tenth of October, about three weeks, so far as our main game bird in that part of the province is concerned. As soon as the bird starts south and gets across the line it runs into a hunting season which is two or three or four or five times as long as ours as it proceeds south, while in Manitoba we have a hunting season of only two or three weeks. The same applies to the northern part of Saskatchewan, as my hon. friend from Humboldt will agree. The season in the United States for this same bird is two or three or perhaps four months.

The mallard leaves later in the year after the freeze-up, and that gives us a little longer season. It does seem to me that if there are any advantages at all in this treaty they are not in favour of Canada. In our part of the province we are breeding these birds by the million, and they go south to be shot during a hunting season which is two or three or four or five times as long as the season which we enjoy in Canada. The feeling among the hunters in the west is pretty strong that the treaty should be revised a little more in our favour than it operates at the present time.

The same applies to geese. There is very little, practically no shooting of geese in Manitoba. One is very fortunate indeed if he happens to bag a goose during the season, not perhaps in the northern part of Saskatchewan but in the northern part of Manitoba, where there are very few migratory geese. but in the eastern part of Manitoba close to Winnipeg there is a flight of millions north and south annually.

I make these few remarks, Mr. Chairman, because I have no hesitation in saying to the minister that there is a very strong feeling prevalent in the west that this treaty is not as favourable to Canada as it might be, and if there is to be a revision in the near future it is hoped that some of these matters will be borne in mind.

Mr. TOTZKE: When I started the discussion on this matter it was not with the idea of saying anything in connection with the sportsmen of the United States killing migratory game birds. A sportsman is a sportsman, as a rule, and not a slaughterer. My objection was rather in connection with the rumour which has been current with us in the last few years that it is not the real sportsman in the United States that slaughters these birds but people who are transgressing the common rules of sportsmanship as we understand it in this country. I was told a couple of years ago by a friend of mine who had come back from the southern states that a large flock of sand-hill cranes had dropped into a small slough or lake down there. They had been dropping in there every year always about the same time, and the men around the lake were on the lookout. On this occasion arrangements had been made beforehand to flood the lake at night with light, and when the birds arrived machine guns and shotguns were posted all around the lake and the birds were slaughtered literally by thousands. That is the sort of thing that should be investigated when the treaty is revised.

While I am on my feet I would ask the minister a question which probably may not come under this vote, although it is closely connected with the question of migratory game birds. It is with regard to the grant we have usually made to the Jack Miner bird sanctuary at Kingsville, Ontario. Is there a grant in the estimates for that purpose this year?

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, the statement I know is frequently made that under the Migratory Birds treaty the United States has far more advantages than Canada. The hon. member for Dauphin stated that the length of the season in the United States was, in some instances, from three to four to five times as long as it is in Canada, but as a matter of fact the total length of the season in the United States in 1932 was three and a half months. When a conference was held between the officials of the United States and Canadian governments the officers of the United States wholeheartedly entered into the spirit of conservation and as a result the season in the United States was limited in that year to one month. I would further point out that after the treaty was entered into, no market hunting was allowed in the United States; no sale of slaughtered birds was allowed, and no spring shooting, practices which had prevailed before the passing of the treaty. There is scarcely any doubt in the mind of anyone who has studied this question that were this treaty not in effect there would be no open season and no hunting and no wild migratory game birds in either Canada or the United States.

The hon. member for Humboldt raised the question of the destruction of crops by certain birds. I would point out that under the terms of the treaty, permits are issued to shoot under certain conditions, thus preventing the damage referred to.

The item which my hon. friend asked about, namely the Jack Miner sanctuary, comes under miscellaneous, item 230, page 55.

Mr. STANLEY: A few weeks ago I spoke of the decrease that was taking place from year to year in the number of waterfowl in Canada. In spite of the treaty and of game regulations the fact is that during recent years the game have been decreasing to the extent of ten per cent per annum. I am advised by men who are closely in touch with the whole situation that probably the greatest single factor in the destruction of these waterfowl is the diminution in suitable water areas and breeding grounds. That is due probably not only to dry seasons but to the increasing cultivation, settlement and ploughing up of ground in the prairies—I am referring to that part of the country more particularly. As settlement extends, the breeding grounds diminish. The fact is that the breeding grounds are not all in Canada—and again I am speaking still of western Canada—but are international; so that when we come to consider the advisability of taking steps to preserve the wildfowl we must consider what can be done to preserve their breeding waters.

This will have to be on an international basis, and in my opinion the governments of the countries alone cannot do it; it must be done in cooperation with citizens and organizations who are particularly interested in this type of work .

I might also impress this thought upon hon. members, that the breeding grounds cannot maintain themselves; they can be maintained only by proper management, and unless there is an international arrangement between the governments, working in cooperation with voluntary sports organizations, taking over complete management of these breeding grounds, then only one result can be expected and that is the gradual but sure disappearance of our waterfowl.

In a booklet I have here which discusses the management of such breeding grounds, proper management is summarized under the following seven heads, which I think I might well read:

1. Maintenance of water levels, as directed by engineers.
2. Providing food and cover by caring for existing growths, introducing new varieties, preventing fires, eliminating grazing.
3. Preventing trespassing.
4. Controlling natural enemies where necessary.
5. Practising sanitation to check disease and epidemics.
6. Observing waterfowl and reporting concerning conditions, food, cover, etc.
7. Attempting artificial aids in propagation where feasible.

Right here I think perhaps I should refer to the death of thousands upon thousands of waterfowl in western Canada during the past season. In the district not very far from the city in which I live there are breeding grounds where waterfowl died literally by thousands. An investigation is now being made by some officials of the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture to determine what may have been the particular source of the disease. I cannot give any information on that point, but I do wish to emphasize the fact that care must be taken of these breeding grounds, and it must be done with intelligence and systematically. Moreover, it must be controlled by authorities with power to deal with the situation on an international basis.

Mr. VENIOT: No doubt the minister or some of his officials have received reports of the lack of feeding grounds, in the last two or three years, along the Atlantic coast in the maritimes. It is a known fact that a disease of some kind has attacked the eel grass beds and other feeding grounds in the salt water with the result that thousands of wild geese and brant have died for want of food. I think I am safe in saying that in several parts of the maritimes, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick certainly—I am not so sure about Prince Edward Island—private individuals as well as associations interested in bird life have contributed from their own private means to feed these birds, clear of the feeding grounds, inducing them to come almost into civilization in their backyards to be fed rather than to starve, because they cannot live on the feeding grounds, especially in the straits of Northumberland, in the bay of Fundy and in the bay of Chaleur. Has any investigation been made or any report received in this regard? If not, I would now appeal to the minister to have an investigation made and to see that some artificial means are adopted to care for these birds which frequent the salt water shores, so that our bird life may be protected.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not unacquainted with the problem which the hon. member for Gloucester has mentioned, because it has been brought to my attention in the last two years.

Mr. VENIOT: Especially in the last two years.

Mr. MURPHY: Owing to the lack of eel grass, which is the only food of the Canada goose and brant in those areas, vast numbers of these birds have perished along the shores of the Atlantic. I am informed by officials of the department that during these two years investigations have been carried on with a view to determining the cause of the destruction of eel grass, the natural food of water fowl, and it is believed to be due to a species of bacteria; but so far no definite authentic information is available with regard to this particular disease.

The hon. member says that certain private individuals and organizations have contributed from their own means to provide food for some of these birds. That I believe is true, but I would point out that while this may be done with wild geese it is not possible with brant, because it would be impossible to feed them on the land. It has been brought to my attention also by people in other parts of Canada, notably residents of Calgary, that they have maintained some birds in a sanctuary within the confines of that city by providing food for them.

Mr. VENIOT: The brant is a bird that feeds especially on fish; the wild goose feeds on eel grass.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman agrees with me. I was saying that requests had been made to the department from various organizations in Canada that they be assisted in the purchase of food for migratory birds. But may I say that so far neither the department nor myself has decided that we can adopt that principle. It would be a very serious step to take and one which I am not at the present time prepared to recommend. But I wish to point out to the hon. member for East Calgary that we are, along with himself and others who are interested in this question, fully aware of the situation in those breeding areas in western Canada where the majority of wildfowl, especially the duck, are brought into being. We have recently made arrangements for the appointment of Mr. J. Dewey Soper, one of the outstanding naturalists in the dominion, as a migratory bird warden whose duty will be in the three western provinces and who will be in a position to give informed opinion to the department as to the steps which should, in his view, be taken for the conservation of those birds.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is any work being carried on by the department along the line of that being done on the recommendation of the president's committee at Washington for wild life restoration? I might say that that committee recommended something along the lines mentioned by the hon. member for East Calgary. It recommended that the United States spend $25,000,000 on this type of work. Amongst other recommendations were:

Construction of dams and dykes.
Fencing and ditching.
Excavation and blasting.
Food planting and land clearing, etc.
The purchase of 5,000,000 acres of submarginal land suitable for development and management as upland game areas.

I notice that while the subject was under debate at Washington someone there was kind enough to refer to the great work being done by Jack Miner of Kingsville, Ontario. I was going to ask the minister—and he can tell me when he replies—whether any part of this item of $31,900 is used in assisting or supporting the work being done by the Miner Foundation at Kingsville, Ontario.

Mr. VENIOT: There is an item of $2,250.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know there is a vote under another heading, but it is so small and the work being done by Jack Miner is so great it is costing the Miner Foundation many thousands of dollars a year to carry on the work. Its work is really wonderful, in fact, so great that when the recommendations of the president were before congress, this item appeared in reference to what was said:

President Roosevelt's program for restoration of the wild life of the United States "will coordinate well with conservation life in Canada toward which Jack Miner's project has been a fine contribution."

I have visited that place on different occasions and many other members have been there. The work being carried on by the Miner Foundation is really something of which Canada may well be proud. On various occasions there have been as many as 2,000 cars there in a day and thousands and thousands of tourists visit it. On looking at this vote for bird wardens, I was wondering whether an amount was granted for the work carried on at Kingsville. Has anything been done along the lines of the recommendations at Washington in the way of setting apart submarginal land in different parts of Canada for the restoration of wild life? It might be well worth while for the department to look into the matter. I should be glad to hear from the minister whether anything is being done along that line, if so, where, and if any support is being given under this item to the work carried on under the Miner Foundation.

Mr. MURPHY: The amount voted is devoted principally to the payment of salaries of the administrative officers, the bird wardens in different parts of Canada and the sanctuary caretakers. During the past few years we have established many sanctuaries in Canada through the cooperation of private individuals and the various provincial governments and I am happy to say that in increasing numbers we are receiving requests from different parts of the dominion to establish sanctuaries. The department realizes that this is one of the best methods of conserving wild life in which we are all so much interested.

To give a specific reply to the hon. member who has just spoken, I may say that no portion of this vote is devoted to the purposes mentioned by him along the lines of those being carried on in the United States, with the exception of $750 which is given to Jack Miner in addition to the grant of $2,500 less ten per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the Miner Foundation get $750 in addition to the $2,250 which appears under another item?

Mr. MURPHY: It is paid to Mr. Miner himself as a migratory birds official.

Mr. TAYLOR: The discussion on this vote had been carried on very much on the Migratory Birds Convention Act. I would like to get from the minister some information respecting an ordnance survey in Norfolk county known as the Turkey Point ordnance. How much land is included in that area? How many lots have been surveyed and leased? How many have been surveyed just recently and have any of those been leased? I would also like some information as to the cost of clearing away the underbrush on those that have been surveyed. I understand this was done as unemployment work in a provincial camp. I should like to know from the minister whether it was done under the ordnance vote or the relief grant to the province.

Mr. MURPHY: I have of course no objection to answering my hon. friend's question, but in deference to the opinion of the committee that we would deal with all these particular items one at a time, I shall defer my answer to him until the discussion on migratory birds is finished. If that is through, I am quite willing to answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. CANTLEY: The discussion is not quite finished yet. I listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for Dauphin said and with the great majority of what he said I am in close accord.

With regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary East about the drying out of the nesting places of geese, ducks and brant, there is no question about that. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the geese, ducks and brant are now going further north to breed than they formerly did. The duck will travel a hundred miles an hour; a thousand miles means only half a day for him. They are simply going further north and finding new places to breed. I do not think any great anxiety need be felt in regard to that phase of the situation.

The minister referred to steps being taken to feed the wild geese. I have appealed to him to contribute something to that, but he is stony-hearted; you cannot get a dollar from him for that purpose, and we have had to depend on private beneficence to save the wild geese in the eastern part of Canada. He suggested that wild geese feed on the land. They do not; we put the grain on the water and the goose takes out of the water, where he takes his natural food. He also referred to the cause of the destruction of eel grass. I am not at all certain of the cause, but I suggest that due to the earthquake of 1929 a very considerable area of the bottom of the Atlantic off the Grand Banks of Newfoundland was thrown up, so much so that out of eleven transatlantic cables all but one were put out of action, and it was found that the upheaval of the bottom had extended over more than three hundred miles. Nine cables were destroyed to the extent of about two hundred miles each. The supposition is that that change in the ocean bottom diverted, temporarily at least, the currents coming from the south and brought some kind of bacteria that attacked the eel grass. Whether that was so or not, the fact is that the disappearance of the eel grass synchronized with that earthquake. I am happy to say, from observation made in Pictou county, last fall, that the eel grass is coming back slowly. It will probably be five years before it gets back to where it was prior to 1930, but it is hoped that that will occur.

The minister referred to precautions taken in the United States for the preservation of wildfowl, and I think he said that in some of the states wildfowl were not allowed to be sold. I came up from Cuba by way of Miami a few winters ago, and when we entered the bay there were millions of wildfowl—ducks, brant, geese. And sportsmen—or hunters, not sportsmen—were shooting them with swivel guns and punt guns and disposing of them in all the hotels in the south and also down in Cuba. That is going on still. We are not getting a fair deal as compared with the United States; there is no possible doubt of that. The minister may of course say what he pleases, but I know differently.

Mr. VENIOT: The protection is not the same at all.

Mr. CANTLEY: Not the same. No such effort is being made there as is being made in this country. The minister made the suggestion that I favoured the total abrogation of the treaty. I do not. I want a new and a fair treaty to serve Canada. Look at the situation in Pictou county, where we are not now allowed any spring shooting. But that is the shooting we want, the shooting we used to have; and it did not result in the destruction of any considerable number of geese. I want to tell the minister that the wild goose is pretty well able to take care of himself, particularly in the spring. It is the kind of hard healthy sport that our people enjoyed for generations, and now we are entirely deprived of it, most unfairly. The fall shooting is of no use to us because millions of geese that we send north never come back to us—we present them to the United States. What I want the minister to do is not to abrogate the treaty, but to make a new treaty that is fair to Canada.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on the Migratory Birds Convention Act. I do not think it necessary to remind the house that I have in my constituency possibly the largest breeding ground for wildfowl in North America. We count our ducks and geese not in tens of thousands but in hundreds of thousands. I have been a migratory birds officer in that district more than ten years, and still have that honour—without pay. As a matter of fact it costs me a lot of money, because I spend a lot of money shooting hawks and crows every year, trying to protect the birds.

In regard to spring shooting, my own humble opinion is—and I speak as a practical man I think—that if this Migratory Birds Convention Act did not accomplish anything else it certainly stopped spring shooting and thereby resulted in great increase in the number of birds in our district. There is one point I would like to bring up, however, and that is that in my district, where the ducks are very numerous, I have noticed by study year after year that the crows kill about a hundred ducks for every one killed by sportsmen or guns. In the big breeding ground north of lake Winnipeg, in the willows along the river the crows hang out in thousands, and in going around the sloughs and the breeding grounds, which I visit nearly every fall, I was struck by the number of nests that had been robbed and the eggshells by the thousands scattered about. They take not only the eggs but the young birds until they are able to fly. I understand that in certain parts of the province a bounty is paid on crows, but of course that does not extend into the unorganized territory. I want to make a suggestion to the minister for what it is worth. Not all the birds breed in this great breeding area, because many millions go away up in the arctic, especially the geese. We have two or three Indian reserves there, and I wondered if the minister could see his way to provide some slight bonus to the Indians for killing crows. It would furnish useful employment for them in the summer when they have nothing else to do, and it certainly would increase the number of ducks more than any other measure that I know of. What the gunners kill in that country does not amount to anything, because the ducks and geese are there in millions, but if you could eliminate the crow menace it would do a great deal for the ducks especially. The goose can pretty well take care of himself; he is a fighter. But with ducks, the moment a crow swoops down they just beat it off the nest and swim away over the water with a wing sticking out as though it were broken to try to divert attention. I hope the minister will give this matter some consideration, and I trust that something will come of it. It is the best suggestion I can make, and I have made a very careful study of the whole situation.

Mr. BOWMAN: Did I understand the minister to say that in 1932 the open game season in the United States for waterfowl was one month?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN: For the whole of the United States?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN: From the north to the south?

Mr. MURPHY: The dates may have varied, but in any one zone the open season was for a period of one month.

Mr. BOWMAN: Well, that is the point. Starting in the northern part of the states perhaps the open season begins on the first of October, say in North Dakota; then go down to the next state and perhaps it starts the first of November, or the fifteenth, and you keep on going south until you get to Louisiana and you have what I said, three or four or five or six times the open season that we have in Canada.

Mr. CANTLEY: Down in Florida.

Mr. BOWMAN: Yes, all the way down. And as the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) says, many, many times the number to do the shooting. Our season in western Canada, according to the game law, is from the fifteenth of September to the first of December. It appears to be two and a half months, but as a matter of fact we have only three weeks shooting for the main bird which inhabits that part of the country. You have a little later shooting for the mallard, but the average date of freeze-up in Manitoba is November 7. As I say, it is quite clear that the advantage is all with the sportsman in the south.

The hon. member for Pictou mentioned a condition which he observed some short time ago. Two or three months ago I received a circular from some sporting organization in the United States drawing attention to a practice which is followed there of having private preserves where barley is scattered on the water. The ducks are brought there and fed for perhaps a week or ten days prior to the opening of the season, and when the season opens it becomes nothing but a slaughter. We do not know just how much of this is true, but some of it must be true. We do know that the season is much longer in the United States and we do know that the great breeding grounds for these birds are in the northern part of Canada and up into the Arctic circle. I am simply trying to direct the attention of the minister to these facts so that when this treaty does come up for renewal we may be able to get more favourable treatment than we have had in the past.

Mr. VENIOT: For the sake of information I should like to ask the minister how the Migratory Birds Convention Act is administered in New Brunswick, whether it is under the mounted police or under the officials of the department, as it was before the mounted police were established in New Brunswick.

Mr. MURPHY: The police work is carried on by the mounted police.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister mentioned the establishment of bird sanctuaries. Would he explain the steps necessary in the establishment of these sanctuaries, the cost, the distribution of the sanctuaries and the progress that has been made in western Canada?

Mr. MURPHY: If the lands are privately owned the department would act upon the application of the owner. If they were crown lands the department would act upon the application of the province. In practically every application for the establishment of a sanctuary we refer the matter to the province concerned and invariably, at least since I have been minister, they have agreed. With regard to the cost of establishing a sanctuary, there is no cost entailed except that a caretaker is sometimes appointed to see that the rights of the sanctuary are preserved. I cannot give my hon. friend any figures as to the progress that has been made or as to the number of sanctuaries that have been brought into being, but they do amount to a very considerable number. As a matter of fact I think I am correct in saying there are sanctuaries in practically all the provinces, with the possible exception of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has the minister any statement to make with regard to the establishment of any of these sanctuaries in the northern part of Saskatchewan since the resources were taken over by the province in August of 1930?

[Mr. Bowman.]

Mr. MURPHY: All the sanctuaries that were established prior to the transfer of the resources were transferred with the other lands, and I understand that the province undertook to maintain those already established.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister has nothing definite with regard to new sanctuaries that have been established?

Mr. MURPHY: I would be able to get the list and give it to my hon. friend; I do not have it with me to-night.

Mr. McINTOSH: I wish the minister would let me have that list, because I have in mind one or two very important locations suitable for sanctuaries, and I doubt whether any action has been taken. Prior to 1930 I did some work in connection with the establishment of a bird sanctuary about sixty miles north of North Battleford on Birch lake, and I do not think anything has been done since that time. The location is splendid, and something should have been done about it before this.

Mr. TAYLOR: If the discussion with regard to birds is finished I should like to secure some information with regard to the ordnance reserve at Turkey Point in Norfolk county.

Mr. MURPHY: During the past winter certain work was carried on at Turkey Point, which is ordnance land; the government of Ontario requested permission, shall I say, from the dominion government to carry on certain relief work in that area, and the necessary permission having been granted a number of men were given work there. We sent a surveyor to lay out the streets and lanes on which the work was to be done, and I am told that a good deal of work was carried out under that scheme. These lots have been made available for building sites, and I believe some applications have been made for these lots as a result of the work done under the relief scheme.

Mr. TAYLOR: I should like to ask the minister what has been the usual practice with regard to leasing lots in this survey.

Mr. MURPHY: The rental value of ordnance and other lands controlled by the department has been based on six per cent of the valuation of the property; that is our usual custom.

Mr. TAYLOR: And what has been the usual rent for lots in this survey?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. TAYLOR: I should like to ask the minister if rental has been based on the frontage of the lots in this subdivision.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think I can improve upon the answer I gave a moment ago. An officer of the department makes an inspection of the various properties and gives his valuation. We establish the rent on the basis of six per cent of that valuation.

Mr. TAYLOR: I have information from the department that on a fifty foot lot the rental is $10 per acre, plus 20 cents for each additional foot frontage. I should like to ask the minister if it has been the practice to give equal treatment to all lessees of these lots or whether there has been any discrimination in the rentals. I am speaking particularly of the lots facing what is known as Ordnance avenue.

Mr. MURPHY: I am afraid I cannot give the detailed information requested by the hon. member; I can only give the general practice followed by the department. To the best of my knowledge no discrimination is practised in the rental of ordnance or other properties administered by the department. I can but repeat what I said a moment ago, namely that these lands are all valued by an officer of the department, and on that valuation rental is based at the rate of six per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR: I thank the minister for that information, and should like to congratulate the department upon opening this new subdivision. Almost every lot has been taken along the lake front, and I am satisfied that the subdivision will be occupied very soon by people summering in that locality. I would ask the minister to consider very seriously that all be given the same privilege, and that preference be given to those who have had their applications in for some time.

Mr. MURPHY: I shall be very happy to make due note of the hon. member's representations.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): A little while ago I asked for information about the advancement of forest conservation. The minister was kind enough to tell me that laboratories were established at Ottawa, Montreal and Vancouver. Are those all the laboratories we have in Canada?

Mr. MURPHY: Those are the only laboratories which carry on forestry investigational laboratory work. There are many other laboratories which carry on different operations, some in the Department of Agriculture and others in the Department of Mines. Then, of course, there is the national research council located here in Ottawa which carries on investigations into practically every phase of industrial activity, with the exception of the special work done by the laboratories I have mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Do research stations come under the same heading?

Mr. MURPHY: When we refer to research stations we have in mind research work carried on in the field in various areas. For instance, there is one at the Petawawa military reserve, one at Valcartier in Quebec and another one in New Brunswick in which investigatory work in the field is carried on in connection with the woods indigenous to that section of Canada. There is one in the Duck mountain area of Manitoba in which experimental work is carried on for the woods indigenous to the three prairie provinces, and we are endeavouring to establish one in British Columbia. That has not been brought into being, although we have officers who carry on these works on both privately and provincially owned lands.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): How many men are connected with the research work in British Columbia, and how many are field men? I presume they are cooperating with the provincial forestry department?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, they are. The personnel in the forestry laboratory in British Columbia consists of twelve officials, namely, R. M. Brown, R. S. Perry, E. Parr, Miss M. M. Harris, J. H. Jenkins, H. W. Eades, F. W. Guernsey, J. B. Alexander, J. T. Lee, D. S. Wright, W. W. Davidson, R. J. Eades. In addition to these people we have a mechanical staff. In that staff are H. Chapman and A. White.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): What steps have to be taken to have a research station established? Does the application have to go to the provincial forestry department or to the federal department?

Mr. MURPHY: If a research station is to be established under our administration the application should be sent to Ottawa. As I said a moment ago, in cooperation with the province of British Columbia we are endeavouring to establish one of these research stations, but to date we have not secured a suitable area.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I notice an item of $1,041,399 for parks. How much of this money is allocated to such parks as Jasper and Banff in Alberta, and how much is allocated to the smaller parks in that province? Personally I am of the opinion that less and less people are finding themselves able to visit the large parks I have named, but they are in a position to visit the smaller parks in their immediate neighbourhoods. Further, I should like to know what projects, if any, have been authorized in those smaller parks.

Mr. MURPHY: The allocations by parks for the year 1934-35 are as follows:

Banff park	$246,500
Buffalo park	57,053
Elk Island park	19,000
Fort Anne park	2,962
Georgian Bay island parks	5,261
Glacier park	7,470
Jasper park	156,200
Kootenay park	61,800
Mount Revelstoke park	10,000
Nemiskam park	1,841
Point Pelee park	8,150
Prince Albert park	48,500
Riding Mountain park	62,500
St. Lawrence island parks	3,125
Wawaskesy park	280
Waterton lakes park	57,700
Yoho park	68,000

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: What projects has the department at the present time in connection with those smaller parks? Let us take Elk island park, for instance.

Mr. MURPHY: Elk Island park is not considered a recreational park. In the first instance it was established as an animal park, and while in these later years an increasing number of people are using it as a recreational area the parks department have not carried on recreational development to the extent that that work has been carried on in parks such as Banff, Jasper, Waterton Lakes, Prince Albert and Riding Mountain, although various facilities have been provided for people who use the park as a recreational area. There are facilities for boating and swimming, picnic grounds and things of that nature. But speaking generally we have not carried on recreational developments within the boundaries of that park.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I understand that some of the smaller parks are having a little trouble with their beaches and their water. The trouble, I understand, is that the water is infested with beetles and other insects. Does the government do anything to clear these lakes of insects?

Mr. MURPHY: Can the hon. gentleman name any particular park so that I can give him a specific answer?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The water at Elk island beach is not fit for bathing, I understand, although a doctor in the community has told me that it is just as fit as in any of the larger parks in Alberta. I was wondering what the situation was and whether the government did anything to clear these waters of insects.

Mr. MURPHY: No complaints have been made to the department in regard to that particular park, and no efforts consequently have been made in that direction. I can state, however, that the bathing facilities in Elk island park are used to a very great extent. In fact, bathing is one of the principal forms of enjoyment at that park. To the best of my knowledge no complaints have reached the department.

Mr. REID: Has the minister particulars regarding the seed extracting plant at the port of New Westminster? I am interested in knowing the amount of seed that it extracted, the countries to which the seed is sent, the revenue derived, and the amount of seed used in British Columbia and Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: The total seed collected at the end of 1932 amounted to 44,817 pounds, of which the British Forestry Commission received 26,374 pounds; New Zealand 17,183; Australia 677; Irish Free State 52 and northern Ireland 61 pounds. A very small surplus above the requirements of the empire authorities was disposed of to dealers in Canada, Spain, Belgium, Finland, Denmark, and other countries, but these latter amounts have only been about one per cent of the total. With regard to the cost of the operations, it is all done on a prepayment basis. The various governments concerned furnish Canada in advance with the amount of money required and we expend it in the extraction of the seed.

Mr. REID: It would seem then that the whole product goes to other countries and that very little is used in Canada, so that we are really running the seed extracting plant for the countries of the empire. The total given by the minister was 44,817 pounds extracted for 1932. Has the minister the revenue and expenditure at the plant, showing what it has cost the country?

Mr. MURPHY: As I stated it is done on a prepayment basis which covers the total expenditure. It is not costing Canada anything in dollars and cents.

Mr. REID: I see an item of $3,000 to provide for expenses in connection with the determination of the location and boundaries of ordnance and admiralty lands in British Columbia. Where are these lands located?

Mr. MURPHY: Section 8 of the agreement of the 20th February, 1930, between the dominion and the province of British Columbia on the transfer of the railway belt and Peace River block, provides for the appointment of two persons, one by the governor general in council and one by the lieutenant governor in council, to determine the location and boundaries of the several parcels of ordnance and admiralty lands within and without the railway belt. This vote is to provide for the necessary expenses of the dominion in connection with the survey of these lands.

Mr. REID: Who were the two persons appointed?

Mr. MURPHY: The appointments have not been made.

Mr. REID: Would the minister give details of the item of $1,000 for the Port Moody section of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, also on the Pembina and Stonewall branches of the same road?

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with those portions of the Canadian Pacific railway which were constructed by the dominion government and turned over to the railway company, it is provided in the contract between the dominion and the company that, where necessary, the dominion government will acquire the right of way. Before this department had advice as to what lands were affected by the right of way, patents for some of the areas were issued which contained no reservation of the lands required for the railway. The unsettled cases are not numerous and the areas are small, but in addition to purchasing the land, funds must be provided for legal work connected with the transfer of title. The Department of Justice has advised that it is the duty of the dominion government to procure title for the railway in all these cases.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Are the relief camps situated in the national parks in Jasper and Banff only, or are they also in the smaller parks?

Mr. MURPHY: Relief camps have been established in Elk island park, at Jasper, Banff, the Big Bend highway, Waterton lakes, Prince Albert, and Riding Mountain park.

Mr. HEAPS: How many of the unemployed are employed at these relief camps?

Mr. MURPHY: The number of men in the relief camps as of April 14, 1934, was 2,054, but at the peak of the season it was in the neighbourhood of 3,800.

Mr. HEAPS: How are these men employed?

Mr. MURPHY: They are employed on a sustenance basis; they are given their food and shelter and a sufficient amount of clothing to enable them to live in comfort and carry on their work. They are also given an allowance of twenty cents per day for the purpose of providing themselves with toilet articles such as toothbrushes, towels and soap, also tobacco.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it not be a good idea to have the committee of this house which is investigating low wages have referred to them the wages paid to these men in the camps?

Mr. MURPHY: These men are not paid wages; they are carried purely on a sustenance basis. They are given their food and the necessary clothing and fuel and shelter, and, as I have already explained, receive twenty cents a day, which is not given as a wage at all, but is given so that they can provide themselves with articles which otherwise would be given out on an issuance basis. May I repeat that wages are not paid to these men, nor has it ever been considered that they were employed on a wage basis.

Mr. HEAPS: Are they not performing some service for the government?

Mr. MURPHY: If the hon. member means, are they required to perform work in return for their sustenance, the answer is yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Are not the men in these camps working eight hours a day?

Mr. MURPHY: On days when it is suitable for the men to work they work eight hours a day.

Mr. HEAPS: And on days when the weather is bad do they receive the twenty cents a day?

Mr. MURPHY: If the men do not work owing to inclement weather they receive the usual sustenance and twenty cents a day.

Mr. GERSHAW: I know that the minister is anxious to preserve the beauty of the national parks and not have them destroyed for commercial purposes. I understand, however, that some of the glass plants import silica sand and material of that kind from long distances, and this particular sand is found in the parks. What is the policy of the government in this regard? Could any arrangement be made to have that material taken from the parks, or would that be contrary to policy?

Mr. MURPHY: The policy of the government is determined by the National Parks Act, which expressly prohibits the carrying on of any commercial enterprise within the boundaries of any national park, and permission to remove sand or to carry on any industrial activity in any of the parks could not be granted unless the act itself were changed.

Mr. TOTZKE: I notice in the item with reference to national parks a decrease of $71,000. How was this saving effected? What work is projected in the Prince Albert national park for the coming summer, and to what extent have the works which were undertaken when the park was established been completed up to the present time?

Mr. MURPHY: The reduction is explained by the fact that we are spending less money in practically every one of our parks than we were last year. I do not think it would serve any useful purpose for me to weary the committee reading all the various items, but the savings have been effected by economies in expenditure under the different items.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is that a reduction in the projects themselves?

Mr. MURPHY: In some instances there are fewer employees and in others there is not as much work being done. In regard to the Prince Albert park, in which the hon. member is particularly interested, under the heading of development the following items appear: On streets and sidewalks, $500; roads and bridges, $5,500; camp grounds, gateways and information bureaus, $2,952.15; stables, $2,522; garages, $1,620; warehouses, $655.20; sports facilities, $2,600.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is there any detailed information with regard to sports facilities?

Mr. MURPHY: Under the heading of sports facilities the details are: Completion of the playground, $500; completion of two tennis courts, $100; completion of nine hole golf course, $2,000.

Item agreed to.

Interior—
Salaries, $510,732; contingencies, $20,000.

Mr. VENIOT: The government having declared their policy on the cut in salaries, will this item stand as it is now or will provision be made in a bill?

Mr. RHODES: The bill is already before the house.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Gershaw.]

To provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, education, etc., and a grant of $100,000 approved by parliament in session of 1926-27, $3,939,500.

Mr. SMOKE: I do not often take up the time of the house discussing matters that come before it, but I have on two or three occasions in the past dealt in a very casual way with the situation that exists on the Six Nations reserve in Ontario. In order to introduce the subject I may have to go into what, so far as this continent at any rate is concerned, is ancient history. The antiquarian is an anomaly in Canada; people are not interested. At the risk of being considered a bore I desire to recall some of our earlier history. Some of it may be tradition, but not all. There are some records which are indisputable.

I am not as young as I used to be, I remember well an incident which occurred during the Fenian raid in 1866. There are probably few in the house who can recall that raid; with the exception of our dear old friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black), whose absence from this chamber during the session we all regret, and our beloved friend the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White), I doubt whether there is another hon. member whose memory will serve to recall any of the incidents of the raid. My memory of it, while fragmentary, is distinct so far as it goes. I remember my father and mother returning from town one day in their democrat wagon and telling us on their arrival home that the Fenians were over. I could take hon. members to within twenty feet of the very spot where I stood at the time. In saying that my youthfulness has gone, I am reminded of a saying which few in the house will remember but which I think was attributed to the late Sir John A Macdonald by either the Toronto Globe or our old friend the late J. W. Bengough. When Sir John made the remark that his youthfulness was gone, I believe that paper put it that his "usefulness" was gone. That may be so in my case.

I like, however, to reflect on those early days. My early reading of British and Canadian history brings back to my mind the pride which we felt in our treatment of the Indians as compared with that which they received in the United States. But let us reflect and see whether that pride can be justified and whether we have done all we could or should have done in justice to the Indians. I hope the Minister of the Interior, who is Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, will take up with the Prime Minister and the other members of the council the matter to which I am going to refer. I trust, if he does not, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works, who are both at present in their seats, will prod him along and see that he does it, because it is a very serious matter so far as our Canadian Indians are concerned.

Before 1492, when Columbus discovered America, the Indians were in sole possession of the continent. Whether the actual fact of possession meant ownership or not, Europe had no claim to ownership by what it was pleased to call the right of discovery, since the Indians were in possession. The European, however, claimed and used force to secure their claim, and, on the threat of force, not at all times by any means confined to threats, the Indians were induced to relinquish parts of America, their ancestral possessions, to Europe. In my office at home I have a photostatic copy of what purports to be a copy of an old deed, dated 1702 or thereabouts, some time during the first decade of the century, in the reign of Queen Anne. I am sorry I have not the document here to read, but I should be glad to furnish a copy of it to anyone who is sufficiently interested. It purports to be a deed from the Six Nations, or Iroquois, to Queen Anne, of a tract of land about 400 miles wide, and 600 or 800 miles long, which included, as far as I could make out the deed, the whole of the Niagara peninsula in Ontario and, in fact, all of old Ontario south of Georgian bay and most of what is now the state of Michigan. I do not recall what consideration is mentioned in the deed, but my recollection, so far as it goes, is that it was a pure gift to Queen Anne at that time because of the protection which she had given to the Six Nations Indians. This document appears to be the first link in the chain of title to that portion of our country.

During the revolutionary war in the United States, the Six Nations were allies of the British crown and fought side by side with the British armies against the armies of Washington, and, after the treaty of peace the Indians, like the Loyalists of British descent in New York state, lost their lands which were confiscated by the United States government. As compensation for such loss and in gratitude to the Indians for their great assistance in the revolutionary war, Governor Haldimand, acting on behalf of the British government, granted to the Six Nations a tract of land six miles wide on either side of the Grand river from its mouth to its source. This stretch of land twelve miles wide extended from lake Erie nearly up to Georgian bay in what is now the county of Grey. The Indians accordingly migrated from New York state to that portion of Canada. I have no record of the numbers of Indians who took part in this migration. Their descendants number now, however, probably 5,000 souls and are confined to the township of Tuscarora in the county of Brant and the township of Oneida in the county of Haldimand. It might be asked: why are they confined to this small extent of territory? The answer is not difficult to give. The house should be reminded that the Six Nations Indians were the most civilized, according to our way of using that term, of all the bands of Indians on the American continent with, perhaps, the exception of Mexico, and they had taken to agriculture to some extent. Upon migrating to Canada this band of Indians took up agriculture to a much greater extent than they had done before. They had, while in New York state, been engaged very considerably in agriculture but had derived their living to a considerable extent through the chase and fishing. When they came to Canada they engaged in agriculture to a greater extent than before, and as the years went by were becoming less dependent on the practice of the chase and fishing.

This development among the Six Nations meant that they could not effectively and usefully occupy in agricultural pursuits all of the land in Canada granted to them by what is called the Haldimand treaty and they therefore negotiated from time to time sales of extensive tracts of their newly acquired territory. As patents, however, had never been given for the twelve mile stretch of land, the only way by which purchasers could be sure of the freehold of such land was by the Indians surrendering those tracts to the crown and requesting the crown to give patents to the purchasers. This was done. The purchase money was paid, not to the Indians but to the government then carrying on in Canada, and in the early days a very large sum of money was paid to the government as consideration for the respective blocks of land sold from time to time by the Indians, amounting in the aggregate, I have been told, to something in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000. Those moneys, which were paid to the government because the Indians were looked upon as wards of the government and not able to look after their own financial affairs, were to be invested and the interest received therefrom paid to the Indians to be applied to their maintenance from time to time.

Unfortunately, however, there were in those days, as there are to-day, promoters, and one of the cleverest—and I am not saying that in a disparaging way—was a Mr. William Hamilton Merritt who conceived the idea of building a canal around the falls of Niagara—it developed later into what is known as the Welland canal—connecting the waters of lakes Erie and Ontario so that boats could pass to and fro. Mr. Merritt got a charter to build this canal. As a feeder for the canal, instead of taking the water directly from lake Erie, Mr. Merritt conceived the idea of tapping the waters of the Grand river some miles above its mouth so as to get sufficient waterfall to feed the canal, and he got a charter in the name of the Grand River Navigation Company. The building of the works of that company involved the acquisition of Indian rights from a point on the Grand river extending easterly to the eastern limit of their lands as given to them by the Haldimand treaty, and certain of the lands were taken, but without any compensation being paid therefor. Not satisfied with taking their lands without compensation, and money being very hard to get in those days, the happy idea struck Mr. Merritt of getting hold of some of the Indian moneys lying on deposit with the government as a result of the sales to which I have referred. The Hon. John Dunn was then receiver general of Canada, and it is said he was, if not president, one of the large shareholders in both the Welland canal and the Grand River Navigation Company. Therefore it became very convenient for Mr. Merritt to have a friend at court. Consequently a large sum of money was paid out of the funds of the Indians to the Grand River Navigation Company, and in lieu thereof the Indians were given stock in that company, a company which was never a financial success and out of which not one dollar was ever paid back to the shareholders. When I say this is a breach of trust I am sure my statement will not be disputed by any member of the committee, and I am sure it will not be by the finance minister, who is a good lawyer. I have not been able to look up the records to see when the kind of investments now required of trustees were defined by statute. It has been suggested that no such statute existed at the time these moneys were so applied. Whether that is so I know not, but even if not, the very fact that a subsequent legislature enacted laws restricting the character of investments that may be made of trust funds goes to show that what may have been considered proper investments a hundred years ago were really not proper investments; and even if in strict law there is no responsiblity upon the government, the rules of equity should override such strict construction, more particularly when, as I have said, the Indians were wards of the government and recognized as not being competent to manage their own affairs.

[Mr. Smoke.]

In order that we may have on record the figures in actual dollars of the loss to the Six Nation Indians by reason of the payment of this money out of the Indian funds, I give the following statement. While it may not be strictly accurate it is at least approximately correct. The transactions occurred when the currency of Canada was pounds, shillings and pence, but I give the corresponding figures in dollars:

Cash paid on stock in Grand River Navigation Company out of funds of Indians, $160,000.

Value in 1932 of 368.7 acres of land granted to the company without consideration at $40 per acre, $14,748.

Value of other lands granted company in 1832 without consideration, 182.1 acres at $10 per acre, $1,821.

Lands permanently flooded by works of Welland canal amounting in 1837 to 1,826.8 acres at $20 per acre, $36,536.

Interest on these various sums at 4 per cent per annum, not compounded, $833,252.20—Total, $1,046,357.20.

The Six Nations are sometimes said to be a difficult people. I may be accused of being one who is seeking to make them more discontented. Surely the present Minister of the Interior, who as such is Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and who, as I know, has devoted a great deal of his time to a careful study of this feature of Indian history and has familiarized himself with it, will not accuse me of seeking to stir up dissatisfaction. I know too that the Prime Minister, whose wide reading may possibly not have extended to this special part of the history of the Six Nations, will give this matter some consideration and do what can be done now to remedy a very great wrong. If this shall be the last appeal I shall ever make in this house, let it be said at least to my credit that my last words were an effort to redress a grievous moral wrong done to the Indians who were too weak to protect themselves.

The answer has frequently been given to me and to the Six Nations Indians that they have been recompensed for this money taken from them by the public works that have been done on their reserve. The government have been very kind; they built a splendid hospital, they built a school, they built roads; but that was done for other Indians also, and the Six Nations band should not be charged with this as against the money that has been misappropriated. Appeal after appeal has been made to successive governments in this matter, but in vain. It is, however, never too late, and I trust this parliament will settle the question once and for all. Justice demands it, and until justice is done an injustice remains unremedied. A wrong is a wrong until righted. The longer it takes to right the wrong, the greater the wrong.

The plea has been made—I have heard it made—that the present government of Canada is not responsible for what was done by a government which existed before the days of what is called responsible government. I cannot agree with that plea. Whether the government that did the wrong was what is known as a responsible government or not, it was the actual government of the day, government de jure and de facto, and the present government cannot and will not hide itself behind any such plea. Or shall we say that the administration of real justice is a lost art? Previous governments have turned a deaf ear to the pleas of the Six Nations to correct this wrong. Let us return to the practice of our ancestors, now almost obsolete, of insisting on the righting of grievances before granting supply. I appeal to the government to go to the limit in undoing the wrong done to the Six Nations over one hundred years ago, and reestablish in the minds of our Indian wards the belief that justice is still the keystone of our national life.

Mr. VENIOT: I would like the minister to explain what constitutes an Indian reserve and entitles the inhabitants to elect a chief. The reason I ask is that there is a reservation in the county of Gloucester, known, I think as the Gloucester county reservation, or by some other local name. The one who is recognized as chief of that reservation has had me write to the department several times claiming that he is the lawfully elected chief, and word comes back that that reservation is not entitled to a chief. I would like to know what the regulations are.

Mr. MURPHY: I feel certain that I express the sentiments of the committee in saying that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Smoke) has done himself great credit in putting before the committee the facts regarding the Six Nations Indians and their funds which were utilized over one hundred years ago in promoting the fortunes of the Grand River Navigation Company. I am not in a position to-night to enter into any argument, even if I considered myself competent to do so, upon this question which has now been agitating the minds of the Indians for over one hundred years. It will be noted that these moneys were, shall we say, taken from the Indians, or to put it in another way the funds of the Indians were used by a government which was not a federal government. These moneys were invested, if my memory serves me correctly, by trustees who had been appointed by consent of the Indians for the administration of the fund. They, very unwisely as it now turns out, invested the funds in the Grand River Navigation Company, with the result that on the failure of the company the moneys were completely lost. Since then the Indians from time to time, both by representations made by themselves and through briefs put forward by legal gentlemen, have endeavoured to obtain the return of the funds which were so invested by the trustees in years gone by. They first made their appeal to the imperial authorities, as it was considered that the representative of the crown in the dominion had under his own particular control the welfare of the Indians. The imperial authorities did not see fit to recognize the claim, and then the dominion government were asked to reimburse the Indians for the moneys lost. The question was submitted to the Department of Justice, and in an opinion handed down by the then deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe, he gave it as his opinion that the dominion government was not liable for these funds.

The hon. member for Brant, who has just spoken, has appealed to this parliament and said that in equity, if not in law, since these Indians are considered wards of the country the dominion government should reimburse them for the funds which were lost through the bad judgment, shall we say, of the trustees and those administering the province of Upper Canada in those days. This is a question, Mr. Chairman, which has given me a very great deal of thought. I am charged with the administration of the Department of Indian Affairs; these Indians are considered by practically everyone in Canada to be wards of the government, and we are the trustees of their estate and their funds. I think any man who has occupied the position of Superintendent General of Indian Affairs must be seized with his responsibility under those conditions. It is true, as the hon. member for Brant has stated, that on receiving the opinion from Mr. Newcombe to which I have just referred the department endeavoured, by way of works carried on in the reserve of the Six Nations and by the construction of the Lady Willingdon hospital, to liquidate the debt, if I may call it that. The hon. member for Brant to-night claims, as the Six Nations themselves claim, that this did not constitute a quid pro quo, that we carried on similar works in other Indian reserves in Canada for the benefit of the Indians, and that they still want the return of their money. But may I say that the construction of this hospital and these other works were carried on for that express purpose. I would point out also that in some cases, and notably the Blackfoot reserve in southern Alberta, the reserve is practically self supporting. They carry on their own affairs and their expenses are paid from the funds of the band. In general I may say that this is the policy of the department; we endeavour to lead them in the direction of becoming self supporting.

I do not intend to extend my remarks in regard to this question at this time, Mr. Chairman, but I am very grateful to the hon. member for Brant for having placed the matter so clearly before the committee. I wish to assure him that so far as I am concerned, within the limits imposed upon me I shall endeavour to see that justice is done.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does this vote cover capital expenditure for buildings?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, it covers all expenditures.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was wondering what were the chances this year of rebuilding the Indian school at Le Bret, which was burned some time ago. I believe there is some likelihood of a building program being initiated in the near future, and I do not know any better way to spend some of that money than in the construction of this school that is badly needed at that point. Le Bret is on the boundary between Melville and Qu'Appelle ridings, and my hon. friend knows the urgency of this matter. This was one of the early industrial schools; it was established away back in territorial days, and Le Bret is a very old and important settlement as well.

My hon. friend will not mind if I mention the none too good sanitary conditions that prevailed in the temporary quarters that were provided last year, though since that time substantial improvement has been made in the temporary quarters, for which I wish to express my appreciation. Even with these improved conditions, however, the minister knows quite well that the housing situation is not at all satisfactory. There is no doubt that this school will be rebuilt some time soon, and this coming summer would seem to be the appropriate time, if I might presume to make the suggestion. This is in a very public location; a railway runs right past the door, and this is one of the beauty spots of the Qu'Appelle valley. In addition to these reasons we must consider the interests of the Indians, who are wards of the government and for whom the government as the guardian should provide proper quarters. It is true that the men were provided with excellent even palatial, quarters right at the outset after the fire in a seminary across the lake. The men always seem to be provided for first, among Indians as well as among white people. Everything was lovely so far as the men were concerned, but the girls were jammed like sardines into a frame building that was used formerly as a town hall.

I was a member of a government for many years and I know there is always the limitation of money. You cannot spend what you do not get, and these are desperately trying times, but really I do not think those conditions, even with the improvement made last fall, should continue much longer, for the sake of the reputation of Canada. Since these Indians are the worthy wards of the country, as their host and guardian we should recognize the trust that has been imposed upon us and carry it out to the fullest extent possible consistent with the finances of the country. There does appear to be a little bit of improvement in our finances and outlook; I am willing to concede that and to express congratulations to all because of it. Times are a little better and they are going to improve even more I hope; the worst would seem to be over. Undoubtedly the process of recovery will be slow, but these are interesting human beings placed in our care, and surely the government has a very strong obligation to take care of these wards and particularly the female members when the males are already so well looked after. The minister can only spend what he gets, I know, but I was wondering if a nice little nibble out of this large vote might be devoted to the worthy purpose to which I have referred.

Mr. MURPHY: A few moments ago the hon. member for Gloucester asked a question in regard to the system of electing chiefs on a certain reservation in the province of New Brunswick. I am unable to give a specific answer to his question at the present time, but I may say that chiefs are selected by two different systems. The first is the elective system, which is carried on under the principle of manhood franchise and which exists on some reserves in Canada, and the second is the old hereditary system which prevails on other reserves. I am unable to say whether on this reserve the hereditary or the elective system is in vogue, but I shall be glad to get the information and give it to the hon. member.

The hon. member for Melville raised the question of the rebuilding of the Le Bret Indian school which was burned in the fall of 1932. At that time provision was made, as he has stated, for the temporary accommodation of the pupils. The Roman Catholic church have a seminary a short distance from the site of the previous building in which they were enabled to house the male pupils. Manifestly it was not possible, owing to lack of space and for other reasons, to house the girls in that building, and temporary quarters were found for them in the town hall. After a time it was brought to my attention that the accommodation provided for the girls was very unsatisfactory, from every point of view, and we were able to secure other quarters. As the hon. member has stated, much better arrangements were made. May I say to him that I agree the quarters are not such as we would wish them to be, but like everyone else we have to cut our coat according to our cloth, and the arrangements which were made were only temporary in order that the education of these Indian boys and girls would not be interrupted. In our endeavour to attain that object we secured the hearty co-operation of the church authorities.

I recognize the importance of this school. It is among the first schools in Canada, was looked upon as the premier school of the Roman Catholic church in Canada, and one to which various church dignitaries were taken when paying visits to portions of western Canada. I am sorry to have to state that no provision is made in the vote before the house for the erection of this school. May I say to him however that I am hopeful, and I have a basis for my hope, that this Indian school may be built during the season of 1934-35.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to bring a small matter to the attention of the minister. On the west coast of Vancouver Island there is an agency called the West Coast Indian Agency. It comprises some hundreds of reserves which, with few exceptions, are exposed to the full sweep of the Pacific ocean. For that reason it is difficult to reach them by anything other than a substantial boat. The ordinary means of travel to them is by a steamer which runs every ten days up and down again. I am familiar with the situation, because I used to be Indian agent and have often spent five or six days on the steamer to do only a couple of hours or half day's work. That is not an economical arrangement.

During the last ten or twelve years the department has maintained a stout launch which was very suitable for the work, and afforded means for the officials to travel. It has done excellent work and through it good service has been done. Last year the engine in the launch played out, and after being coaxed to the limit of its capacity it had to be laid up. I believe the launch was laid up in Vancouver in the early fall of last year. I asked the minister's department whether or not they were going to instal a new engine, and I was told there were no funds available. That was all right for last year, but when the new vote came into force this year I anticipated an engine would be installed and the work continued. However I was again told that no money has been voted for that purpose, meaning that the launch must lay up in Vancouver to decay while the work for which it is needed and required is not being carried out to the best advantage. That is not good economy. The officials will have to travel by steamer or by hired launches, an expensive way of travelling because even on short runs the rates charged are high; on a run of five or six days the expense would be considerable, and there would be very little economy. I would suggest that as the financial position has improved somewhat in the course of a few months it might be possible to get sufficient money to engine the boat and put it into commission again.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member has drawn to the attention of the committee that this year we are not using the government boat for this service. That is correct. Upon investigation we found that about $7,000 would be required to put the boat into operating order, and on the advice of assistant commissioner Perry we chartered a launch to carry on that service during the present season. Therefore the official will be able to carry on the necessary work as has been done in the past. May I state frankly that this step was taken as a measure of economy, and to keep our estimates for this year, in these days of stress and strain, at as low a point as possible. We believe however that ample service will be provided through the chartering of the launch.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask when the launch was chartered?

Mr. MURPHY: It is utilized as required.

Mr. NEILL: When was it chartered?

Mr. MURPHY: The launch is utilized from time to time. That is, we do not have the full services of it, but we engage it from time to time. We have made arrangements whereby we can secure it at such times as its services may be required.

Mr. NEILL: When was that arrangement consummated?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not the exact date, but I can get it for the hon. member.

Mr. NEILL: The point I wish to make is this: The minister has said a launch has been chartered to do the work. I want to know when the arrangement was made, because less than three weeks ago I wrote his deputy and renewed my request to have the engine put into commission. At that time I was told rather curtly that there was no money available, and that the boat would be left out of commission for the whole year. If substitute arrangements have been made to hire a launch I think it would have been only courteous and becoming an official writing a member of parliament to have given me that information. I want to know when the charter was consummated. I am beginning to think it has not been consummated.

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I cannot give the exact date that the arrangement was entered into. However as I explained a minute ago, I am informed we do not utilize the services of this launch continuously; in other words, the owner of the launch may use it for other purposes. An arrangement has been entered into with him whereby we may secure the launch at such times as we need it. Or, if it is considered advisable, the official may travel by regular steamship line. However some time during the winter of 1933-34 this arrangement was entered into, and again I must express my regret that I have not the exact information to give the hon. member.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the name of the boat, or from whom it is chartered?

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, I regret I have not the full information before me. Lest I give the hon. member and the committee wrong information I should not like to go into a detailed discussion on the item, but should prefer to get the full particulars and give them to the hon. member. He could submit questions either verbally or on the order paper. I shall give him the information which is in the possession of the department or, in other words, the full and complete information in regard to this particular matter.

Mr. NEILL: It really amounts to this, that no charter has been made and the officials must travel either by ordinary steamer or by hiring a launch, which latter is an expensive procedure.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Murphy.]

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 23, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

LOTTERIES

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I beg to lay on the table of the house three copies of a resolution of the legislative assembly of Quebec in regard to lotteries, which has been officially communicated to this government, and also three copies in English and in French of the act of the legislature of the province of Quebec passed last week.

DISCOUNT AND LOAN CORPORATION OF CANADA

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (for Mr. Sullivan) moved the first reading of Bill No. 58, to amend an act to incorporate The Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BURY: I am moving this at the request of the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan), and in doing so I wish it to be understood that I am not sufficiently familiar with the provisions of the bill to be willing to be taken as sponsoring them all. But I understand that the bill makes certain amendments to the bill passed by this house last year. The explanatory note reads thus:

> The main objects of this bill are to provide that the company shall be known in French under the name of "La Corporation de Prêts et d'Escomptes du Canada"; also that the company be empowered to lend money secured by pledge of movable property; and further to improve the wording of section five of the company's act of incorporation.

I understand that there are no very vital or important amendments otherwise.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOG CHOLERA EPIDEMIC

Mr. GOTT:

1. How many hogs were slaughtered in the recent hog cholera epidemic in Essex county?
2. How many departmental officials were engaged during the epidemic?
3. What was the total amount paid to the farmers for their losses?

4. How are losses computed and paid?
5. How many hogs were immunized or treated during the outbreak?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. 1,331.
2. 19.
3. $5,620.76.
4. Two-third value, permitted by the act.
5. 12,814.

HARROW, ONT., EXPERIMENTAL FARM

Mr. GOTT:

1. What was the cost of operating the Harrow, Ontario, experimental farm for the fiscal year ending March, 1934?
2. What returns did the farm make?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. $38,499.96.
2. $5,874.99.

MANUFACTURE OF MILITARY BOOTS

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Is the press report under date April 10, that the Department of Militia and Defence has awarded a contract or contracts for the manufacturing, in the maritime provinces, of nearly 20,000 pairs of military boots, correct?
2. If so, what firm or firms received the contract or contracts?
3. What quantity was allowed to each firm or firms?
4. Were any tenders asked before contracts were allowed?
5. If so, when were tenders called, what firms tendered, and what was the amount of each tender?
6. What price per pair was paid by the Department of Militia for such army boots, and to what firm or firms?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1, 2, and 3. Contracts as follows were awarded for 20,000 pairs of boots required for issue to men employed on the various relief projects throughout Canada operated by the Department of National Defence:

	Pairs
J. A. & M. Cote Ltd., St. Hyacinthe, P. Q.	9,000
A. E. Wry-Standard Ltd., Amherst, N. S.	3,000
Eudore Fournier, Plessisville, P. Q.	2,000
Corbeil Ltd., Montreal P. Q.	2,000
Tetrault Shoe Ltd., Montreal, P. Q.	2,000
Tillsonburg Shoe Co. Ltd., Tillsonburg, Ont.	2,000

4. Yes.

5. Tenders were called on March 1, 1934. The firms who tendered and the amount of each tender were as follows (prices include sales tax, and unless otherwise noted are for delivery at Ottawa):

J. A. & M. Cote Ltd., St. Hyacinthe, P. Q.	$3·2754 a pair
A. E. Wry-Standard Ltd., Amherst, N. S.	3·3708 a pair
Eudore Fournier, Plessisville, P. Q.	3·3920, 5,000 prs. 3·4980, 15,000 "
Dufresne & Locke Ltd., Montreal, P. Q.	3·4344 a pair
Corbeil Ltd., Montreal, P. Q.	3·5086 a pair
	Pair
Tetrault Shoe Ltd., Montreal, P. Q.	$3·5404
Tillsonburg Shoe Co. Ltd., Tillsonburg, Ont.	3·5404
LePage Shoe Co., Montreal, P. Q.	3·5510
Williams Shoe Ltd., Brampton, Ont.	3·5828
MacFarlane & Lafaivre Ltd., Montreal, P. Q.	3·6040
T. Sisman Shoe Co. Ltd., Aurora, Ont.	3·6570
Tebbutt Shoe & Leather Co. Ltd., Three Rivers, P. Q.	3·6994
J. Leckie Co. Ltd., Vancouver, B. C. (delivered at Esquimalt)	3·7630
(delivered at Ottawa)	3·9750
St. Arnaud Biron & Cie Ltee., St. Genevieve de Batiscan, P. Q.	3·8690
John Ritchie Co. Ltd., Quebec, P. Q.	3·94
Valentine & Martin Ltd., Waterloo, Ont.	4·00
John Palmer Co. Ltd., Fredericton, N. B.	4·2188
Palmer-McLellan Shoepack Co., Fredericton, N. B.	4·3248
Eagle Shoe Co. Ltd., Montreal, P. Q.	4·4520

The lowest tender received was that of Messrs. J. A. & M. Cote Ltd., of $3·2754 per pair. In order to distribute the work and to expedite delivery, the next six lowest tenderers were asked if they would accept orders for the number of pairs shown at the price of the lowest tenderer:—

	Pairs
A. E. Wry-Standard Ltd.	2,000
Eudore Fournier	2,000
Dufresne & Locke Ltd.	2,000
Corbeil Ltd.	2,000
Tetrault Shoe Ltd.	1,500
Tillsonburg Shoe Co. Ltd.	1,500

All these firms, with the exception of Messrs. Dufresne & Locke, stated they would accept orders at the price of the lowest tenderer.

6. $3·2754 per pair (including sales tax and for delivery at Ottawa).

GRANDE-ENTREE CHANNEL

Mr. BRASSET:

Has the official in charge of the buoys at Grande-Entree channel, Magdalen islands, been paid for the work he performed during the season of 1933?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes. The maintenance of the buoy service at Grand Entry, M.I., is under contract with Mr. Willie Doyle of that place for the sum of $200 per annum. His accounts for the six months ending July 2, 1933, and January 2, 1934, have been paid.

DUNDURN, SASK., UNEMPLOYMENT CAMP

Mr. TOTZKE:

1. Have tenders recently been called for the supply of groceries to the unemployment relief camp at Dundurn, Saskatchewan?
2. Were tenders advertised for or were certain individuals or firms asked to tender?
3. What are the names of those who tendered and who was the successful tenderer?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Tenders were called on March 12, 1934.
2. The following firms were asked to tender: Central Wholesale Grocers Ltd., Saskatoon, Sask.; Codville Co. Ltd., Saskatoon, Sask.; Macdonalds Consolidated Ltd., Saskatoon, Sask.; Western Grocers Ltd., Saskatoon, Sask.
3. Central Wholesale Grocers Ltd.; Codville Co. Ltd.; Macdonalds Consolidated Ltd.

Contract awarded to Macdonalds Consolidated Ltd.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—STONE CARVINGS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of Public Works been drawn to the fact that much stone carving remains to be completed in the House of Commons, particularly around the main entrance, and in the Hall of Fame?
2. When was the last work of this nature done on any part of the buildings?
3. In view of the fact that these buildings are a focus for thousands of tourists and visitors every year, and with a view to providing much needed employment for stone carvers, is it the intention of the minister to further the completion of this work?
4. Will the minister consider taking similar action with respect to the Langevin block, similar work on which has remained uncompleted for many years?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.
2. The last carving done was in the Memorial Chamber in 1927.

3 and 4. It is not considered advisable to have any further stone carving carried out in connection with the parliament buildings or Langevin block at this time.

QUEBEC SUPERIOR COURT

Mr. TETREAULT:

1. What are the names of the judges of the superior court of the province of Quebec residing outside their judicial district?
2. Does the government require these judges to reside in their district?
3. Do these judges comply with this requirement?
4. If not, why do they not?

[Mr. Brasset.]

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. With the exception of St. Francis and Three Rivers the judges of the superior court of the province of Quebec are not appointed to judicial districts.
2. The judges of St. Francis and Three Rivers reside in their respective districts.
3. Questions 3 and 4 answered by question 2.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the government purchased any paintings for the National Gallery of Canada, at Ottawa?
2. If so, what paintings have been purchased?
3. From whom were they purchased?
4. What was the price paid for each one?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. No, all purchases of paintings for the National Gallery of Canada are made by the board of trustees .

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

SHUBENACADIE, N.S., RURAL ROUTE

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. When was the mail contract last awarded for the rural route from Shubenacadie to North Salem, McPhee's Corner, Indian Road and return, being rural route No. 1, Hants county, Nova Scotia?
2. To whom was the contract awarded, and at what figure?
3. Was it awarded to the lowest tenderer?
4. What were the names of all the tenderers and the amount of each tender?
5. Who was the last previous contractor, and what was the amount of his contract?
6. For what term was the present contract made, and when does it expire?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. 15th April, 1931.
2. Gordon Waller at $650 per annum.
3. Yes.
4. Gordon Waller, $650 per annum; Alex. Sutherland, $720 per annum; O. Gardner, $764 per annum.
5. Alex. Sutherland at $750 per annum.
6. Four years. Contract will expire on 30th June, 1935.

SHUBENACADIE-MAITLAND, N.S., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. When was the mail contract last awarded for the carriage of the mail between Shubenacadie and Maitland, Hants county, Nova Scotia?
2. To whom was the contract awarded, and at what figure?
3. Was it awarded to the lowest tenderer?
4. What were the names of all the tenderers and the amount of each tender?
5. Who was the last previous contractor, and what was the amount of his contract?
6. For what term was the present contract made, and when does it expire?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. September 19, 1933.

2. Stuart G. Kirkpatrick at $1,148 per annnum.

3. Yes, but Mr. George Cook was not considered to be in a position to undertake the performance of that service.

4.	Per annum
Geo. Cook	$1,090 00
Stuart G. Kirkpatrick	1,148 00
Wendell Densmore	1,169 00
Samuel Cook	1,173 75
R. A. Fleming	1,176 00
Anson Lively	1,189 00
Alex Sutherland	1,200 00
Leslie R. Ettinger	1,200 00
Elroy C. Mosher	1,245 74

5. Samuel Cook, at $1,565 per annum.

6. Four years. Contract will expire on September 30, 1937.

SHUBENACADIA, N.S., MAIL

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. When was the mail contract last awarded for the carrying of mail between the post office and trains at Shubenacadie, Hants county, Nova Scotia?

2. To whom was the contract awarded, and at what figure?

3. Was it awarded to the lowest tenderer?

4. What were the names of all the tenderers and the amount of each tender?

5. Who was the last previous contractor, and what was the amount of his contract?

6. For what term was the present contract made, and when does it expire?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. January 30, 1934.

2. and 3. James A. Bell at $380 per annum.

4. Alex Sutherland, $385; James A. Bell, $468.

Before action was taken Mr. Bell wrote the department asking leave to amend his tender to $380 per annum which was accepted.

5. Alex Sutherland at $480 per annum.

6. Four years. Contract will expire on March, 31, 1938.

BUTTER IMPORTS

Mr. TETREAULT:

1. How many pounds of butter were imported from New Zealand from July 28, 1930, to October 1, 1930?

2. Was this butter imported under the terms of the treaty concluded during the preceding administration?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. Imports of butter from New Zealand entered for consumption in Canada in the months of August and September, 1930, were 2,681,985 pounds.

2. There are no permanent records of separate monthly collections under the different rates of duty applied, but from figures available approximately 2,603,585 pounds of this butter were entered under the terms of the Australian trade agreement effective October 1, 1925, and extended to New Zealand on the same date.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORIZATION OF PROVISION OF MONEYS TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year, 1934, and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 18, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has brought down his budget and also the third time that I have had the honour to rise on this side of the house and offer the views of those who sit around me in connection with the matters which he proposes. I again congratulate him, as I have done on previous occasions, on the clearness of the presentation which he has made, and on the moderation of the tone which he has adopted and of the language which has been used in presenting the annual statement of this great dominion. He knows and hon. members generally know that my congratulations cannot go very much further than that in view of the fact that those who sit around me and I myself feel that this budget is born of policies which are diametrically opposed to those which we endorse and which we believe to be for the benefit of Canada. It may be made clear before I get through that I am not particularly enamoured of the budget which my hon. friend has brought down. I do, however, want him to feel—and while it is a commonplace, at the same time even a sincere commonplace may be worth while expressing—this is a criticism not of the Minister of Finance as such or personally, but of those policies to which I have referred.

I could have wished, as a matter of fact, that for his sake the day for bringing down this budget had been a little longer delayed in order that the country might have got out of its mind the British budget which was brought down just the day before he addressed the house. That was a budget wherein the people of Great Britain, a country which has borne the load since the early twenties, were able to show a surplus of something like $150,000,000 at a time when customs duties were imposed, not gallows high as they are here, but having regard to revenue as well as to industry. That budget was in marked contrast to that which my hon. friend presented and which, when all was said and done, instead of showing a surplus, showed a deficit of something like $24,000,000 on ordinary account. May I say also that my hon. friend's budget showed a mistake predicting customs duties notwithstanding that year after year he has been modestly lowering his estimate in the hope some day to overtake the drop. It showed a mistake in prediction of customs duties of something like $6,000,000; last year he predicted that he would receive at least $72,000,000 in customs duties and he received something like $65,900,000. The year before he had predicted $80,000,000 and he fell below that by $8,000,000. I repeat, that perhaps he was not too fortunate in having to present his budget as he did the day after the British one.

In a phrase his budget, it seems to me, shows that the government are systematically living on the future of this country and the future that they are hoping for fails to arrive. I realize that a budget does not have the piquancy of a best seller and that generally there is nothing of dramatic interest to be found in a budget speech, but as a rule, having regard to the changes in the times, one would have thought my hon. friend, in the long speech which he delivered, would have been able to produce at least some item of liveliness outside the gold tax to which I will refer in a moment. I could not help feeling that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) had evidently not had very much to do with the preparation of this budget, because it did not satisfy the longing of his soul which he expressed in the house the other night when he intimated that the people were clamouring for something new and that governments had been slow to depart from the beaten track. He said, to quote his words in full:

> In this country, as in other countries, people have been staggering along under conditions that have been difficult, and have been clamouring for something out of the ordinary. Peoples all over the world have been very restive with governments because governments have been slow to depart from the beaten track.

I read this budget with the thought: Is there not some place here where the Minister of Finance has departed from the beaten track, if for nothing other than to satisfy the ambitions and longings of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? But I find that even silver, which is a favourite subject of my hon. friend, is not mentioned in the budget. That would have been a step aside from the beaten track for him.

Even the turnover tax, which has been mentioned in years gone by, is not to be found in this budget. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), speaking in the house in 1928, at a time when he had not the responsibilities of office, was most urgent that a turnover tax should be imposed in this country. Here was an opportunity for the Minister of Finance to step aside from the beaten track to give the people, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, something they are clamouring for and to impose some new form of taxation. The statement made by the Prime Minister in 1928 in Hansard at page 1252 was:

> May I remind the house that last year I argued that, in my judgment, the fairest method of taxation in the world was to be found in the turnover tax. I have not changed my mind in that regard; I think there should be a turnover tax collected every month.

A little further on he said, with characteristic modesty:

> I pointed out when discussing this question last year that the idea was not original with myself. I do not claim originality for it; it has been submitted to the house before and is endorsed by sound economists and financiers. I urge the Minister of Finance, therefore, to take it into his serious consideration.

That turnover tax is not found in this budget. The Prime Minister in 1931 again advocated it and again indicated his disappointment that it had not been put upon the statute book. He said—I am quoting from Hansard of 1931, at page 3307:

> I should like to have seen applied in Canada some new system of taxation, and he is quite right when he says it is not at all probable that I shall ever have a chance to try a new form of taxation, because it is not at all likely that I shall ever again submit ways and means to this house. I am not without hope, however, that some Minister of Finance reviewing the means by which taxes may be raised will realize the values and benefits accruing from a turnover tax. . . .
> Sir, it has not been my privilege to introduce any new forms of taxation to this country at this time. . . . I do not for a single moment disguise the fact that I would like to have done so. I should like to have written a budget which would have expressed my views with respect to taxation in Canada. That privilege has not been given, and it never will be.

I only want to say to the Prime Minister, who I am sorry is not in his seat, being indisposed I understand, that he ought not to feel too badly about it. He is tender-hearted and if he did bring down a system of taxation of this kind he would be sure to change it before the budget was through. He ought to leave it to the flinty Minister of Finance to impose taxation.

But if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is looking for the privilege of having it said of him that he imposed taxation in this country surely his ambition is satisfied in the increase of the sales tax from one to six per cent, in the imposition of an excise tax which did not exist when he came into power but which has been put up to three per cent, in the imposition of a two cent tax on sugar, in taking away exemptions from the sales tax, in the reduction of exemptions in the income tax; in these and in every other field of taxation I think my hon. friends opposite will be given full marks and will be held fully responsible when they come to the people of Canada, for having invented and imposed many new and onerous forms of taxation. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister need not have any regrets, I think. The Minister of Finance has enjoyed and exercised to the full the privilege, as the Prime Minister calls it, of levying and imposing taxation, as the people of this country have good reason to know.

But there might be some other method whereby the beaten track could be avoided and something new put into this budget. I have mentioned this before but in view of the fact that the other night the Prime Minister in the House of Commons dealt with debt conversion, let me remind this house that it was not so long ago that the Prime Minister had a very distinct and definite plan for retiring the national debt by means of a sinking fund which was to be established and a certain amount set aside each year. I quote from Hansard of 1928, page 1249:

> Mr. Bennett: The finance minister said that the only way to pay off the debt was out of surplus. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is another way in which we can pay off our national debt, and that is to pass a statute by which we provide that a given sum per annum shall be set aside to pay off the national debt of Canada.

That was in 1928. Of course, Mr. Speaker, you cannot pay off national debts and set up sinking funds unless you have surpluses, and you do not have surpluses with Tory governments in power. So it is all right for my hon. friend the Prime Minister to advocate the setting up of a sinking fund when Liberals are in power and piling up surpluses, but we hear nothing about that plan to-day when deficits are the order of the hour.

Another way in which my hon. friend could have got out of the beaten track and satisfied the Minister of Trade and Commerce was to have abolished the sales tax. That was an "iniquitous" tax according to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in 1928. That was a tax which the Prime Minister in Hansard of 1927 at page 397 called the "poor man's income tax." That is the tax which was referred to by the Minister of Justice in Hansard of 1928 at page 1124, when he pictured the poor man as having to wear woollen underwear in the wintertime and had to pay on that woollen underwear a sales tax of three per cent. He said that the poor man also had to wear a suit of woollen clothes, and asked: Mr. Speaker, do you realize that a man who pays $30 for a suit of woollen clothes has to pay 90 cents in the shape of this "iniquitous sales tax" to the government? He said the sales tax was a war tax and should have been abolished long ago. Well, the war was over ten years at that time, and it is over sixteen years now, and the sales tax is still on, but the man who buys a $30 suit of woollen clothes is not paying only 90 cents to the government to-day; he pays $1.80 under the taxation imposed by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Before the King government went out of power the tax had been reduced to one per cent and the tax on the suit of clothes was only 30 cents, but the sales tax is still here, the iniquitous sales tax which my hon. friend the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) proposed to have removed. This iniquitous sales tax and the poor man's income tax is still here and has been multiplied by six under the present government.

The financing of maturing obligations—that was a study which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister had dealt with on successive occasions that might have been introduced into the present budget as something out of the ordinary. The sinking fund he proposed at first, and then later he suggested when he was in opposition over on this side of the house that there should be some way of converting the national debt. Hon. members will recall that he mentioned it when he was speaking in the debate the other night on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply. When he was in opposition he advocated that there should be issued four per cent Canadian consols, and that the insurance companies and the banks should be compelled to subscribe for these consols and retire the national debt. This is what he said in 1927 in Hansard at page 407:

> If my suggestion were carried out there would be some diminution in interest profits, but in view of the fact that there are such vast profits earned over and above the money necessary to take care of reserves at three and three and a half per cent, no hardship would be imposed upon the Canadian people, who would realize that their savings, although the profits of the life insurance companies might be affected—and as my hon. friend knows, life insurance is intended for protection rather than for profit—would be available for the whole of the people, while the trusteeship obligation imposed on the companies would be better discharged by reason of the stability and certainty of the securities.

At that time my right hon. friend did not indicate that there was any difficulty at all about reducing the income of the life insurance companies, but in speaking in this house the other evening, as reported at page 1629 of Hansard, and I have read each passage that makes any reference to the life insurance companies, he studiously avoids altogether the views which he expressed in 1927. The most he says is on page 1629 where he says:

> Who are the holders of these securities? They are primarily the insurance companies, primarily those who, for the purpose of meeting contracts maturing in the future, have invested in these securities on the basis of their yielding somewhat a higher rate than three and a half per cent to take care of contingent losses that may arise by reason of fortuitous circumstances. Every hon. member, if he will think for just a moment, will realize, will understand that.

I say, Mr. Speaker, it is remarkable what a difference the responsibilities of office make. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister in 1927, when he was in opposition, thought there was no difficulty at all in forcing the life insurance companies and the banks to subscribe to four per cent securities. But it is a very different thing in 1934, when the suggestion is made that perhaps these insurance companies might head a campaign for the lowering of interest rates in this country and for the converting of the national debt. No, Mr. Speaker, that proposal is not in the budget. The beaten track is not left so far as debt conversion is concerned.

There is another thing. I felt that in the budget this year we might at least have heard of a promise that was made by the Prime Minister in 1930, and I quoted that promise the first time I spoke on the budget after the 1930 election. There were a good many promises made by the Prime Minister. There was one made down in the province of Nova Scotia by the Prime Minister with regard to old age pensions. The promise was contained in a letter which I put on record at that time, and which I shall not quote in full to-day, but from which I will extract a couple of paragraphs:

Bennett's Pledge On Old Age Pensions
Conservative Federal Headquarters
Victoria Building
140 Wellington Street
Redmond Code,
General Secretary.

Ottawa, Canada.
July 12, 1930.

To the people of Nova Scotia:

I leave out the first two paragraphs. The third paragraph reads:

While the old people of your province were unable to benefit by the present act during the last two years, nevertheless through the contribution of one-half of the pension money from the federal treasury you have been contributing your share of the pension money going to the old people in other provinces. This situation cannot continue.

Mr. King says that in order to adopt a national old age pension bill, we will have to amend the British North America Act as it is now unconstitutional for the federal government to pass such a bill. I contend that if the dominion government can contribute 50 per cent as they do at present, they can contribute it all.

If returned to power on the 28th of this month, I pledge my party to pass a national old age pension bill by which the federal treasury will provide all the money required—thus treating all the old people alike, whether they live in the maritimes or in any other part of Canada.

Faithfully yours,
R. B. Bennett,
Leader Liberal-Conservative Party.

I directed the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister to that promise ten months after the Conservative party came into power; I said it seemed to me that the old people of the province of Nova Scotia had a right, after that letter had been sent to them two weeks before the election, to believe that as soon as possible after the Conservative party were in power the 100 per cent old age pension act would be passed, because it is not very much good promising old people an old age pension act and then waiting three or four years to pass it; a good many of those to whom the promise was made would not live to get the benefit of it. At that time the Prime Minister said it was not promised that the act would be passed immediately, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) interrupted and said "It will be done." I would point out to the Minister of Justice that it is now two years and ten months since he made that statement in the house and that it is now three years and nine months since the letter was written, but the promise of a one hundred per cent old age pension act is still unfulfilled. So I ask my hon. friends, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for the sake of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens): How about just breaking away from the beaten track for once and fulfilling just one promise? How about just breaking away from the track that seems to have been laid down by the party opposite, of disregarding promises entirely, and fulfilling just this one promise? But that has not been done. Apparently there is only one beaten track for my hon. friends as far as budgets are concerned; that is debt, deficits and taxes. There is nothing else, and so far as any features go which would satisfy the ambitions, the desires and the ardour of my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, this budget is just as featureless as the Sahara desert; the only thing in it is this tax on gold, to which I shall refer in a few moments.

There is something else to which I should like to refer. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, as I can understand, has to be guilty of a certain amount of repetition in connection with his budget speeches, but there is one phrase I do hope he will omit if he happens to bring down a budget next year, that is to say if there has not been an election in the meantime. I find that in 1932 almost the last words in my hon. friend's budget address were:

As a final word, may I say that I do not propose to indulge in prophecy. But I do desire to record my firm conviction that we are not far removed from events which will herald the dawn of better days—

That address was delivered on April 6, 1932, and the results that year showed a deficit of $157,700,000 and an addition to the debt of $148,126,000, together with additional taxes, as will be remembered by hon. members of this house and by the country, so that the better days did not dawn. Then in 1933 my hon. friend used these words in concluding his remarks:

At the same time we have no occasion to despair for the future. On the contrary I am of the firm belief that we can look forward with complete confidence to better and happier days.

In that year, according to the budget which my hon. friend has just brought down, we had a total deficit of $135,200,000, an increase in the debt of $139,244,000 and now we have this tax on gold, to which I am going to refer shortly. The better and happier days are still deferred. Now this year, in 1934, I find my hon. friend still optimistic; he says:

May we with renewed hope, fresh courage and firm step press on towards the goal of better and happier days which lie not far ahead.

I believe my hon. friend spoke better than he knew this time; I really believe the better and happier days are going to come, if there is an election. My hon. friend evidently was thinking of Nova Scotia, of British Columbia, of Restigouche-Madawaska, of Yamaska, of South Huron, of Mackenzie and of South Oxford. Judging from the example that has been given by these constituencies my hon. friend, I feel satisfied, can look forward to better and happier days under Liberal government. If there were to be no election and the present government remained in power I would say that I should set these words of his to music, to the tune of "The same old story in the same old way," but if the election comes off, as we hope it will, the tune can more suitably be, "Happy days are here again."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to some matters which are in the budget, not matters which are left out but matters included in the budget. The first to which I intend to refer—and it is not new to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance or to this house—is the fact that notwithstanding all that has been said in the past by the right hon. Prime Minister, this is not a budget. The matters which are not in this budget, so far as a list of expenditures is concerned, are rather formidable. We have understood that in the budget there should be brought down a statement of the expenditures made during the last fiscal year, a review of trade conditions, an indication of the government's policy with regard to trade, and a forecast of what conditions were to be expected during the coming year, together with the financial commitments which are to be made. I find fault with this budget on two grounds, first the items which are omitted and secondly the predictions which have proved grossly inaccurate. I cite as my authority for the necessity of compliance with those two principles the right hon. Prime Minister himself, who in 1931 condemned in unmeasured terms the former Minister of Finance for not having predicted a deficit of $75,000,000, indicating that this was:

> the basis of responsible government, it is the basis upon which representative institutions have been established, and that responsibility can only attach when there is some estimate as to what is being received by the country from the taxation imposed and as to what expenditures are to be made.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in the light of these words, if this is a budget.

In this budget is there any estimate for the so called public works program that is supposed to come down some of these days? Is it not proper that this should be included somewhere in the budget? I have looked through it from end to end, and the only statements I can find with regard to any expenses other than ordinary expenses are simply a reference to relief and a reference to a deficit on the Canadian National Railways. There is no statement here with regard to public works, though we understand that the amount to be spent will be something like $50,000,000. Is there anything here for advances under the relief bill other than the ordinary advances which have been made from year to year and which, unfortunately, we are coming to regard as ordinary though they are most extraordinary because they are made under the authority of a blank cheque. There is nothing whatever in this budget with regard to them. My hon. friend does not even deign to give the amount which will be spent for relief; neither does he deign to give the amount which he thinks will be spent in connection with the Canadian National. Is there anything here to show the amount involved if the wheat obligation should come due this year? Is there anything to indicate the amount which would have to be provided to pay that? Not a dollar. That is not in the accounts at all. All that my hon. friend does is attempt to raise enough money to pay the ordinary expenditures which he knows about, to comfort himself with the idea that there might be $8,000,000 surplus on ordinary account and then let the future take care of itself. I submit that that is not a budget which will meet any test as to the necessities of a budget. It is not a budget which would meet the requirements laid down only two or three years ago in this House of Commons by the Prime Minister.

But further than that, it is not a budget because it shows, as have previous budgets, that there has been an absolutely inaccurate estimate of the necessities of the public service. Let me speak about the item I have just mentioned. In 1933 my hon. friend estimated $35,000,000 for special expenditures and non-active advances. What did he spend? He spent $52,570,000 or $17,570,000 more. He estimated for the Canadian National Railways $47,941,000 and spent $52,264,000, leaving out entirely the eastern lines deficits. In other words, there is a difference of over $22,000,000 on those two items. My hon. friend may take whichever horn of the dilemma he likes. If his leader was right when he said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in delivering his budget address in the British parliament is always held to the strictest account as to the extent to which he has been able to realize his expectations and the extent to which his representations agree with the facts of the year in review—if I say his right hon.

leader was right at that time, then my hon. friend stands condemned out of the mouth of his leader himself.

As the years go by under this government we are getting farther and farther away from the first principles of government. We are getting to the stage where power is being handed over to the sixteen or seventeen men sitting on the treasury benches and this House of Commons is told simply to give a blank cheque, to give them not only the power of parliament but the resources of the treasury as well.

Then, so far as this year's budget is concerned, let me remind my hon. friend of the predictions which have been made in the past, and how far short they have fallen. In 1931 the right hon. Prime Minister, then acting as Minister of Finance, said, speaking about the probable customs duties which he had taken into consideration in estimating his budget:

> Taking this into consideration the figures presented indicate a balancing of the budget by a substantial margin in respect of expenditures properly applicable to 1931-32, after excluding capital.

He said they indicated a balancing of the budget by a substantial margin. When the accounts were cast up and my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance had to present the budget in the following year to the house the so-called balancing of the budget by a substantial margin had faded into insignificance, and my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister's estimate of revenue was $71,652,000 too optimistic, and instead of the budget being balanced there was a deficit of $81,000,000. In 1932 my hon. friend cautiously, as befitted a new Minister of Finance, referring to revenues from customs and excise taxes said:

> Without building too greatly on help from these sources in the present year it is the considered view of the government that reductions in expenditure on the one hand, and proposed additions to the taxation revenues on the other, will in the final outcome represent a complete balancing of the budget on the usual governmental services.

Yet we find the result of the year's financing was not the balancing of the budget, but a deficit on ordinary account alone of $53,000,000. Then again in 1933, I shall read the minister's remarks as they appear in Hansard for 1933, page 3223:

> Accordingly it is proposed to recommend measures which will, it is anticipated, produce at least $70,000,000 on the basis of present business conditions, leaving a surplus of $2,000,000. Even a slight improvement in price levels and the general volume of business would increase substantially the surplus to be applied against capital and special expenditures.

But when we look at the budget speech which the finance minister has just delivered we find that the $2,000,000 surplus he predicted has turned out to be a $24,000,000 deficit notwithstanding that business has improved as he says.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that those are not budgets in the sense, at least, in which his right hon. leader understands them. I am afraid that predicting in this country is becoming a sort of byword. It is shaking the confidence of the people in their government. I would not mind so much if the Prime Minister had not adopted that holier than thou attitude, had not wrapped a mantle of purity about him and given thanks that he was not as other men were, and indicated that he was the only man who had ever brought down a real budget. But having done that and having plumed himself on his own righteousness then he ought to be held to it. I submit that having boasted of his own rectitude of deportment the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance stand convicted of the very offence which the right hon. gentleman has charged against others, only in a greater degree, namely that of omitting entirely items which should be in the budget and consequently failing by millions of dollars properly to predict the result of the year's financial operations. For the consideration of the Prime Minister I suggest that instead of giving lectures to other people on budget making he might, it seems to me, having regard to that record, take a correspondence course himself in that subject.

For a moment or two I should like to deal with the matter of public debt. The Minister of Finance has not placed on record any indication of the public debt except that pertaining to the present year. I realize he is not required to do it, but it seems to me that such a table would have been informative. At the risk of detaining this house I shall read into the record figures showing what the public debt has been in each year, beginning with the fiscal year of March 31, 1930:

Year beginning—	Public debt
March 31, 1930	$2,194,746,000
March 31, 1931	2,319,196,000
March 31, 1932	2,501,782,000
March 31, 1933	2,649,908,000
March 31, 1934	2,789,152,000

The following figures will show the increases in public debt:

Year—	Increase
Between 1930 and 1931	$124,450,000 (odd)
Between 1931 and 1932	182,586,000 (odd)
Between 1932 and 1933	148,126,000 (odd)
Between 1933 and 1934	139,244,000 (odd)

These figures show a total increase between March 31, 1930, and March 31, 1934, of $594,405,000. That means an increase in the interest payable by the people of this country of practically $25,000,000 per year, or $2.50 per head. That is the interest load which has been put on the people of Canada since this government took office. As will be remembered, under the old Liberal government, between the years 1925 and 1930 there was recorded a total surplus of $257,000,000.

My hon. friend may say that this government's position is due to railway deficits. Let me remind him that during the Liberal administration current deficits on railways were paid out of revenue, and were not added to the public debt. Let me remind him, further, that under the Conservative government between the years 1919 and 1921 the average deficit on railways before paying interest due the public averaged $22,000,000 yearly. From 1922 to 1930 under Liberal government the average surplus available for payment of interest due to the public was $24,000,000, and the deficits began again in 1931 under the present government with $4,100,000 and for the last two years over $3,000,000 each year before paying interest due to the public.

Someone else may say that the debt is due to relief. Well, Mr. Speaker, relief was not contemplated when this government came into office. There was to be no relief. There was to be no necessity for relief. Speaking in this house the Prime Minister realized that conditions were serious in 1930. Before he went down to Moncton and made his promise, the Prime Minister made a statement which appears on page 18 of Hansard of 1930. He said:

> What about conditions in this dominion at this moment? What about conditions from east to west? It is true that part of the unemployment is seasonal; but since the beginning of the year I have traversed Canada from Victoria to the far east, and in every city of this dominion, east and west, there is abnormal unemployment, so that men who are accustomed to give, as I have been, to assist those who are unable to earn sufficient to keep body and soul together, have never before seen such distress as I have seen in the communities I have visited.

Then he went down to Moncton and said that he would give work to every man who was willing to work, or perish in the attempt; that he would give work, not doles. He cannot say he did not know what the conditions were at that time, and he promised that employment would be found. The public debt has been increased by $596,000,000; the increased interest charges amount to $25,000,000 a year or $2.50 for every man, woman and child in the dominion. I should like to put on record the Moncton promise of the Prime Minister because it seems to me that this goes with the passage I have just read. The promise was:

> The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work, or perish in the attempt. It is going to call parliament at the earliest possible date after July 28, and take such steps as will end this tragic condition of unemployment and bring prosperity to the country as a whole. . . . Mr. King promises consideration of the problems of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment. Which plan do you like best?

In bringing down his budget this year the Minister of Finance strikes rather an optimistic note in the first paragraph or two of his speech. He indicates that statistics show that conditions in this country are improving a little but he does not say anything about the fact that at the end of February there were still receiving relief heads of families totalling 267,853, while the total on relief numbered 1,270,599. I place those figures beside the statement of the Prime Minister at Moncton in 1930. My hon. friend must produce more than statistics furnished by the bureau of statistics to convince the people of Canada that at the present time all is well in the dominion. You do not need to take index figures or adjusted trade returns, all you have to do is to go up and down and across the length and breadth of this country to find that there is still a lot to be done in the way of improving conditions before we get back to the days we had before 1930.

Let me now deal with the matter of debt conversion. The other night the Prime Minister referred to this in the debate which arose on the motion to go into supply. I believe that the development of trade, the balancing of the budget and the conversion of our debt are the three most important questions in this country. The Prime Minister has given the impression that we must all stand still until 1937 has passed as far as the conversion of the debt is concerned. He says that the letter of the bond is there and that it must be observed. The Minister of Finance says that the sole remedy with regard to the conversion of the public debt or the easing of the burden of the public debt is a rise in the price level. I would hardly think that the taxing of gold is a good way to raise the price level, but my hon. friend knows best. The interest burden is now $139,730,000, while this year's deficit will add another $6,000,000 making the total $145,000,000 per year. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance said that the Prime Minister had dealt with the matter of debt conversion. I submit that a matter as important as this one deserves more than an offhand statement from the Prime Minister in a debate on a motion to go into supply; I submit that it deserves detailed attention in the budget speech. I do not profess to offer anything new but I would remind the Minister of Finance that in 1928 the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, said this:

Is this country to continue to be menaced by this economic evil, by this debt hanging over our heads? Are we to continue, of all countries in the world, to make no provision for the future? Are we to be content to expend our patrimony day by day without putting anything aside to take care of the long days of the future that are before us? I say it is unfair to posterity, and still more, it is unfair to ourselves, it is unfair to the taxpayers of this country to extract from them each year these increasingly large sums of money and make no provision for the retirement of our national obligations. The sum to be set aside is not large. I can only say this, that if we on this side of the house were entrusted with power, we would not hesitate a single moment to make provision for the retirement of the national debt of this country.

Then why does not the Minister of Finance devote his energies to converting our national debt upon a large scale, instead of reading us some piffling remarks, written by an economist a hundred years ago? Let me go further. The saving of 20 million dollars a year on the refunding of the debt might be possible if you would say to the holders of the 5½ per cent tax exempt securities maturing within the next nine and ten years that there would be freedom from or great deduction of income tax during the next decade. Does it ever occur to hon. members that in addition to the 110 million dollars free money, the exemption from income tax for the next five or ten years might bring about a great expansion of public revenue?

I have just one more extract. All this has to do with the conversion of the public debt and with the things the Prime Minister proposed to do at that time. He was impatient with the Minister of Finance of that day and he said that two billions of securities ought to be converted. He is reported on page 1252 as follows:

With two billions of securities maturing in nine or ten years, and with money at 4 per cent, there is the greatest opportunity that was ever offered to any minister of finance in this country. To seize that opportunity requires courage, skill, ability, knowledge; it requires willingness to devote some time to a study of the problem. It requires more thought about economies and less inclination to extravagance; it requires more consideration of the question as to how the money is to be secured rather than how it may be spent. It requires the consideration of world factors that determine the price at which money can be obtained. Is this government giving the problem that degree of attention? Is there any evidence of such consideration of the question on their part? Let hon. gentlemen opposite ask themselves that question.

That was in 1928, and we now have an offhand statement by the Prime Minister saying that he has thought about this question a great deal but has come to the conclusion that 1937 is the earliest time at which we can think of any possible conversion of this debt. As a very humble member of this house let me suggest to him that the first thing to be done in connection with the conversion of our national debt or the lowering of the interest burden is a considered and serious drive towards balancing the budget. If he considered that 1928 when money was cheap at 4 or 4½ per cent was a good time to convert, it seems to me that the present cheapness of money should be taken advantage of. The next thing is a planned major refunding operation, preceded by conferences with institutions and carried out in a manner similar to the victory loan campaign.

The Prime Minister says that there are difficulties with regard to foreign holdings. Possibly there are, but this government has not hesitated to tax non-residents with regard to dividends. The government of the United States has not hesitated—you may call it repudiation or whatever you like—to change the letter of their bond as far as payment in gold is concerned. The Minister of Finance has not hesitated to take advantage of the fact that the United States is regarding its dollar as worth only sixty cents in gold and to make our dollar worth the same. Nothing is said about repudiation when we are paying in these sixty-cent dollars. It seems to me that perhaps we are not meeting the situation fairly when we talk about repudiation and hold up that bogey with regard to debt conversion. Let us assume that there are difficulties with regard to foreign holders, let us assume with the Prime Minister that we want to maintain our credit—by the way, I do not quite appreciate what good we hope to do by maintaining our credit so far as foreign investment is concerned as there does not seem to be much under this government in which foreigners want to invest except gold mines. The sale to foreigners of industrials in this country has not been heavy under this present government.

But let us assume that we desire to keep our credit unsullied in every respect. May I offer this suggestion, for which I claim no originality, because I observed that it was put forward in a Canadian journal one or two weeks ago, and I have also heard it discussed by others. I mention it now simply in order that it may be on record, and that the government, if they have not considered it, may keep it in mind in connection with the conversion of our debt. That suggestion is this. If you feel that you cannot carry on a major refunding operation simply by reducing interest rates and planning a victory loan drive, appealing to the patriotic consciences of Canadian citizens, if you cannot manage it by appealing to the institutions and the citizens of the country, or if you feel that a conversion in this way under present circumstances will not be justified, why not consider the question of compensation for reduction of interest rates by way of increasing capital? I say to the government, consider the matter of amortizing the difference between a 4½ per cent bond and a 3½ or a 3 per cent bond. Add enough capital to the bond to equal the present worth of the reduction in interest, covering a period of, say, twenty years. You will then have materially decreased the annual interest charge, and the capital will have been increased by a much smaller sum than the total of the annual interest savings. I note that the estimate was made, in this journal to which I have referred, that refunding $1,500,000,000 on the basis of 2½ per cent tax free there would be an increase in capital of $200,000,000, but there would be a decrease in annual charges of $20,000,000. On the other hand, refunding $2,300,000,000, would create a capital addition of about $600,000,000, but at the same time it would mean an annual saving of something like $34,000,000. These are proposals that ought to be considered. The Prime Minister did not mention this plan the other night, and I should like to hear his comment upon it. What I do deplore, however, is the rather dogmatic attitude taken both by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance in assuming that this matter of debt conversion is completely out of the picture and that we are absolutely obliged to continue paying $145,000,000 in interest per annum whether we like it or not.

No one proposes the repudiation of obligations, but we cannot accept the statement of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Finance as absolutely the last word in the matter. I repeat, I consider debt adjustment, a balanced budget and an increase of our trade the three greatest problems before the dominion to-day.

Now, I have spoken of the direct obligation of Canada, which is $2,789,152,000 to-day apart altogether from guarantees. But there are indirect obligations, as the Minister of Finance says in his speech. There are additional guarantees, listed in his budget speech, totalling $82,905,000. There are guarantees on account of the Canadian National Railways harbour commissions and Canadian National Steamships of $993,000,000, or a total of $1,075,905,000 —guarantees in addition to the direct debt itself. What does that mean? In round figures, that means a total of $3,890,057,000, as the total obligation of this dominion in respect of guarantees and direct obligations.

I have included in that something not stated in the budget speech; I have included an obligation of $25,000,000 on account of the wheat guarantees. The Prime Minister indicated in the house the other day that this might amount possibly to $15,000,000. Well, in my opinion, neither the Prime Minister nor Mr. John I. McFarland nor any man in this house or in the country can tell us what it will amount to; it is absolutely impossible for anyone to predict it, when you find that 100 million bushels of wheat or more is being held. No one knows exactly, but a very large quantity of wheat is hanging over the market. Now, wheat may be quoted at a certain price to-day; drop any large amount of it on the market and attempt to realize and you will see the bottom fall out of the market; you will see how quickly millions will mount up in the way of losses. So that we cannot make an estimate as to the amount of the possible loss in connection with the wheat guarantee.

Right here I wish to protest once more against the idea of the Prime Minister writing a letter giving an absolutely blank guarantee to the banks of the dominion to back up and finance the operations of any one individual in respect of any undertaking. The least that the Prime Minister could have done, when he wrote that letter, was to limit the obligation to so much money; he should have stipulated some figure. At the present time however there is no limit; not a dollar is mentioned. This means that Mr. McFarland, as head of the cooperative wheat producers, can buy and sell as he thinks proper. The suggestion was made that there might have been a limit, but there is no record of any limit at all, so that he may buy and sell as he thinks fit. He may go to the banks and get money and when the whole transaction is over, when the thing is all washed up, when the wheat has been realized on five or ten years from now, the government of Canada will foot the bill and the people of this country will pay for it.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the reasons why I complain of this not being a budget. The Prime Minister, with all due respect to him, is too fond of signing letters in the name of the people of Canada. He signed a letter, in January, 1931, if I remember rightly, guaranteeing the banks with regard to the wheat pool, and passed an order in council the next September, nine months afterwards. That is not good business, having regard to the size of the transaction and the necessity for carrying on government business in a proper way. In the first place, he did it under an act which stipulated no limit whatever, and which he extracted from the members of this house by force of the government majority—an act which makes no provision at all for any limit in amount or purpose, but empowers the government to loan in connection with anything they like. It is primarily a relief measure but it has developed into everything but that. Now, that is one obligation to which I refer. We do not know exactly what the liability is, nor shall we know until Mr. McFarland is all through.

They say that Mr. McFarland is not gambling, not speculating. Let me put the situation to you, Mr. Speaker. Here was the job that was given him. No. 1: You, Mr. McFarland, are to dispose of the 1930 crop. Well, that seems fairly easy; he can go and sell. But, no; Mr. McFarland, while you are to dispose of the 1930 crop you will not depress the market. So that the next step you will take is this. If you find the market going down in connection with the 1931 or the 1932 crop, step in and buy wheat. In other words, instead of selling you are to buy. What is the result? He was charged with the duty of disposing of the 1930 crop, and to-day, after three years, Mr. McFarland, who was supposed to dispose of the crop of 1930, has succeeded to this extent that he has on hand in the shape of futures, millions of bushels more wheat than he started out with. This means that there will have to be rust in the Argentine or a famine somewhere which may provide an outlet for the disposition of that wheat, and in the meantime we will roll up the cost of carrying the wheat each month and each year.

That I say, Mr. Speaker, is not good business. It is not good business for this country that the government should operate in that way. If they wanted to undertake the obligation they should have come to parliament and submitted an estimate of what it would involve, and should have discussed the whole matter thoroughly on the floor of the house before the writing of that letter.

The guarantee in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway is exactly in the same category in many respects. That transaction was carried out in this way. Discussions were had with the Prime Minister, an intimation having been given that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have difficulty in financing for 1933-34. We are told that no suggestion was made at all that the government should guarantee the loan, but suddenly on May 30 the suggestion came from someone—Mr. Beatty I think—that the government should guarantee the loan. The Prime Minister thinks there may have been a discussion earlier than that. Parliament prorogued on May 27, 1933, and on May 30 the conference was had between Mr. Beatty and the Prime Minister. The next day, May 31, a letter was given by the Prime Minister that this country would guarantee the obligations of the Canadian Pacific for 1933 and 1934, would guarantee the banks so that they might loan money enough to retire those obligations and carry them for the railway for five years. That amounted to $60,000,000. When was the order in council passed in respect to that? The following November, November 29, 1933. This was a good thing for the Canadian Pacific, so far as financing was concerned; the banks got a good piece of business, but the Prime Minister is too prone to sign his name to letters, to doing things in a big way and using the credit of the Dominion of Canada for that purpose. I am reminded that the money was loaned and the advances made by the banks all through the summer of 1933 long before the order in council was passed. That is the situation. What has happened? We are talking about four and a half per cent or four per cent loans for the Dominion of Canada. What are the banks getting out of the Canadian Pacific guarantees? A guarantee of interest at five per cent with practically a government bond backing it up, because it is a letter of the Prime Minister of Canada backed up by an order in council. What are the banks getting with regard to the wheat pool? The dominion can borrow at four or four and a half per cent, but the banks are getting five and a half per cent for the wheat pool borrowings under a dominion guarantee. I want to be fair to the banks; they are giving four per cent on money left on deposit, but five and a half per cent is the rate paid to the banks by the cooperative wheat producers and that despite the fact that they have a government guarantee behind them.

Mr. HACKETT: Four and a half per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: I was quite satisfied it was five and one-half per cent. I accept my hon. friend's correction if that is so, but as a matter of fact I think it is five and one-half per cent. It is, however, a rate above that which the Dominion of Canada should be paying for guaranteeing the banks or anybody else for money.

Further, with regard to the Canadian Pacific loan, let me say this. The statement is made and is unchallenged that the loan which the Bank of Montreal made to the Canadian Pacific they were willing to carry on the security which they had without any dominion guarantee. In some way or another the Prime Minister felt that the matter was important enough for him to intervene and apparently the suggestion came from him just as much as it did from anybody else, that the five-year financing be done now and that the government step in like a great father, take over the whole load of the Canadian Pacific financing for the next two years and give this blanket guarantee. Those are matters which do not appear in the budget speech. The $60,000,000 guarantee is there, but the circumstances under which it is made do not appear in the budget and are not mentioned by the Minister of Finance in his speech. So, if we take the guarantees both direct and indirect and add the $50,000,000 to be spent in public works we find that the national debt is something more like $4,000,000,000 than the $2,700,000,000 which was mentioned by my hon. friend. So much for the blue side of the sheet so far as the book-keeping is concerned.

I feel that the Minister of Finance has not done quite justice to himself or to the country or to the government in the way in which he has presented in his budget the trade figures and the business of the dominion. He does not seem to realize that perhaps the most important thing in this country is trade; that we cannot collect any taxes, that we cannot hope to get rid of our railway debt or our other debts and deficits unless we have trade. But in a budget speech which occupies twenty-seven pages of Hansard, two pages are devoted to trade and the figures in connection with it. A budget should present some study of the trend of trade in this country of the various classes who are doing business here, of the possible avenues of trade and of the possibilities of developing the trade which we have. I find in the budget what I think is most fragmentary information. We have the total trade of Canada for the fiscal year; the comparative total trade from 1930 to 1934; the intra-empire trade for a year; comparisons between empire and United States imports and exports, and the only reference to international trade outside the United Kingdom is the total increase and the balance of trade. That is not enough for a budget speech of the Dominion of Canada; we ought to have a serious attempt to show exactly the condition of trade in this country and the possibilities of its development.

Anything there is in the budget speech with regard to trade seems to be aimed at this object and this only—to try, if possible, to justify the government's policy with respect to the shackling of trade and the imperial conference agreements. That seems to be as far as they go. The only reference which is made is this, and I am quoting:

> The beneficial effects of the empire trade agreements are shown in the expansion of intra-empire trade.

The minister winds up with this statement:

> These developments in our external trade have been distinctly favourable, reflecting the soundness of the policies which have been pursued in connection with the trade agreements, and testifying to the stability and efficiency of Canadian industry.

Again the trade agreements have been particularly mentioned. What are the facts? In the first place, with regard to the trade agreements and trade with the empire, as I tried to point out before in the house, the tendency is that way anyway; my hon. friends cannot get any credit because of the fact they happen to have these trade agreements signed in 1932, because the tendency of trade since 1930 and before has been for empire trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friends laugh. I have in my hand a publication issued under the authority of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce: Canada's Foreign Trade, 1933, and at page 15 it states:

> The tendency of Canada's trade quite apart from the trade agreements during the past three or four years has been toward a greater exchange of commodities with empire countries.

This was natural. In the last year the tendency has been more marked than ever. Why? Because of the rise in sterling, because of the increased purchasing power of British money; second, because of the prosperity of the British people and their getting back into the purchasing world again. Yet my hon. friend turns this to his own account and says that the trade agreements have brought about this increase. The fact of the matter is that any increase in trade between Canada and the mother country has been due to natural and economic causes.

Mr. MORAND: But the hon. member nevertheless voted against the tendency.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not vote against the tendency; I voted against my hon. friends pegging the tariff on 139 different articles in order to prevent trade with the rest of the world.

Let me point out what the statement of the Minister of Finance says with regard to the increase in trade. I take his own figures. I do not know that they are even as enthusiastic as the tendency indicated by the publication issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I find this on page 2274 of Hansard: if we take the proportion of our exports which went to the British Empire in the eleven months ended February 28, 1934, over those of the same period in 1933, they increased by the astounding percentage of ·83 per cent. That is exactly what my right hon. friend shows; in 1933 it was 46·83 per cent—I am reading from his own speech—and in 1934 it was 47·66 per cent. Now the proportion of our exports which went to the United States in that same period, according to the same statement—and this is the policy which according to him vindicates the tendency and the soundness of the policies of the government regarding empire agreements—increased by 3·03 per cent; in other words nearly four times as much increase to the United States.

As to imports, the proportion of our imports which came from the British Empire increased by 4·37 per cent; the proportion of our imports which came from the United States decreased by 3·18 per cent. Now let us see where the principle of bargaining comes in.

The basic principle of this government's policy was that you must bargain; you must get a quid for your quo every time. But the result of these figures is this: For the year ending March 31, 1934 we bought 3·7 per cent more of our imports from Britain than in 1933 and we sold them only ·83 per cent more of our exports. In other words, we increased our imports from them four times as much as they increased their imports from us. That is the quid pro quo we got as the result of our bargaining.

When my hon. friends opposite talk about bargaining, let us go back to the period from 1921 to 1930. The amount we sold from 1921 to 1930 to Britain and the empire was $4,057,000,000, when we did not have any Ottawa agreements at all to encourage any tendency or vindicate any soundness of policy. We sold them $4,057,000,000, and we bought from them only $1,823,000,000. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite know, and I am sure that some of them are perhaps shivering a bit now, particularly those who represent agricultural counties, that there is going to be an attempt made to revise the British trade agreements in June of this year. My hon. friends are going to find out that the three year schedule on certain agricultural commodities will be running out and that there is going to be an attempt made, as has already been indicated in the newspapers, to revise the schedules particularly with regard to agricultural products.

What about wheat? Wheat was the thing on which we were going to get a preference. The imperial conference agreements were going to be a great help to wheat. I quote Broomhall, March 10, 1934, showing the imports into Great Britain of wheat. The imports from Roumania in the season August 1, 1932, to January 31, 1933, were 9,000 quarters; the imports from Roumania from August 1, 1933, to January 31, 1934, were 255,500 quarters. That is Roumania. The figures for other countries are as follows:

Wheat—Quarters of 480 lbs.

	August 1, 1933 to January 31, 1934	August 1, 1932 to January 31, 1933
Roumania	255,500	9,000
Canada	4,408,000	7,364,500
Argentina	2,243,000	704,500
Australia	2,539,000	2,125,000
Russia	1,735,000	495,000

The imports, it will be seen, increased from every country except Canada. Of course, there are many other countries besides those given above, but those are the largest wheat exporting countries, and those are the actual results if hon. gentlemen opposite want to know the tendencies of the empire trade agreements. There is the situation so far as the import by Britain of wheat from this country is concerned.

Now, what else? The Minister of Finance says that whereas in 1931 the imports from Canada represented 3.8 per cent of Britain's total purchases from abroad, her purchases from Canada in 1933 amounted to 6.9 per cent of the total. That is a fair example of the minister's attempt to extract sunshine from cucumbers. The year 1931 is not the one he should take for comparison, but 1932, as the agreements did not come into force till October, 1932. In 1932 my hon. friend's figure of 3.8 per cent for 1931 had gone up to 6.1 per cent, and in 1933 to 6.8 per cent, or an increase of only .7 per cent with all these other factors working that I have indicated. In other words, Canada increased her trade in that market by a little over one-half of one per cent of Britain's total imports.

My hon. friend in his budget speech deals with the percentage increase of our exports to Australia, South Africa and British India. Our increase in exports to Australia, in millions of dollars, represent about six-tenths of one per cent of Canada's total exports. But the Minister of Finance makes a special reference to that, and another reference to our exports to South Africa and British India. Our increased exports to British India, in dollars, amounted to less than one-fifth of one per cent of our total exports, and to British South Africa our exports, which represented an increase, according to the Minister of Finance, of 72 per cent, actually figure out to an increase of less than one-half of one per cent of our total exports.

But what is rather interesting is that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance mentions an increase of 6 per cent in our exports to New Zealand. He did not look over on the other side of the page and tell us what our imports from New Zealand were. While our exports to New Zealand have increased by 6 per cent, our imports from New Zealand have increased by 148 per cent. I wondered what it could be that we were importing from New Zealand at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Butter!

Mr. RALSTON: Surely not butter! Surely butter did not account for an increase of 148 per cent in our imports from New Zealand under this government. Everybody knows that with this government in power New Zealand butter was not to be mentioned; among christians, it was not to be spoken of except at low breath. Yes, there was an increase of 148 per cent in our imports from New Zealand, although that is not mentioned in the budget speech at all.

If I may be permitted to go back for a moment, I should like to indicate to my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) that I was right in regard to the percentage payable under the wheat loan. At page 213 of the committee's report I find this:

> Q. I think Mr. Dodds, or somebody else, said the notes are demand notes?
> A. Yes, I was not positive.
> Q. What is the interest rate?
> A. 5½ per cent and they get—where they have a specially large deposit—they get credit, rate of interest of 4½ per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. gentleman will recall that he was speaking about the rate of interest allowed on the credit balance, and he said it was four per cent. I was privileged to correct him and tell him that it was four and a half per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: I accept my hon. friend's statement. I thought he was correcting me about the five and a half per cent, but he was speaking of the rate which was allowed on account of the deposits.

Mr. HACKETT: At page 136 of the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. RALSTON: Let us get it clear. The situation with regard to the wheat guarantee is this: The Dominion of Canada has guaranteed to the banks an account, which pays five and a half per cent interest to the banks on all borrowings. At times when there is a specially large amount on deposit an allowance is made by the banks of four and a half per cent interest on account of the credit balance.

I have been pointing out, Mr. Speaker, the references in the budget speech to the matter of trade. I do not want to pursue that very much further, except that I want to put on record what is not on record in the budget speech, namely the record of Canada's total trade, because we on this side of the house, regardless of what hon. gentlemen opposite are interested in, still believe in trade not only with the British Empire but with the world at large. The following figures of our total trade are from 1928 to 1934:

Year—	Imports	Exports	Total
1928	$1,108,000,000	$1,250,000,000	$2,359,000,000
1929	1,265,000,000	1,388,000,000	2,654,000,000
1930	1,248,000,000	1,144,000,000	2,393,000,000
1931	906,000,000	817,000,000	1,723,000,000
1932	578,000,000	587,000,000	1,166,000,000
1933	406,000,000	480,000,000	886,000,000
1934	433,000,000	585,000,000	1,018,000,000

So my hon. friend the Minister of Finance puts it rather prominently in his budget speech that there has been an increase in total trade, from 1933 to 1934, of $132,000,000. Well, it is pretty easy to get an increase if you start at the lowest point, which in this case is 1933. That was the lowest point in the trade of Canada since 1912, so it is possible to show some increase, and I am very glad indeed that this increase has come about. It is just the same as a patient with a temperature of 105; if that temperature gets down to 104½ the patient is improving, no doubt, but even under those conditions the patient is not altogether well.

[Mr. Ralston.]

The serious thing, however, according to the Prime Minister's past statements is this: I do not know anybody who talked as much about the Canadian people being hewers of wood and drawers of water and the exporting of our raw materials as the Prime Minister when he sat here as leader of the opposition. Will you believe me, Mr. Speaker, when I say that on looking up the record of this government I find that whereas in 1930 our exports of raw materials totalled 38 per cent of all our exports—and that was when my hon. friend was travelling all over this country criticizing us—in the year covered by this budget raw materials amounted to 45 per cent of our total exports. Hewers of wood; drawers of water; giving away our patrimony; selling our inheritance for a mess of pottage—these were the expressions used in 1930 while to-day, under the gentleman who said so much about it in 1930, we have a 20 per cent increase in our exports of raw materials.

Now for a moment I should like to deal with farm products, and I think it will be agreed that some of these things should be dealt with in connection with the budget. The important feature to the people of this country perhaps is not so much the export of industrial goods or manufactured articles as it is the export of agricultural products, the products of the farm, the forest, the sea, and the mine. I find that notwithstanding the increase of $105,000,000 in exports, in 1931 the exports of agricultural products totalled $209,000,000; in 1932 they totalled $204,000,000 and in 1933 they amounted to only $198,000,000. In other words the increase in exports, which my hon. friend gave as $105,000,000, has not taken place in connection with farm products, but instead there has been a falling off. That brings me directly to this point: We are trying to assist in arriving at some kind of parity between the price level of agricultural and other primary products and the price level of other commodities. How are we getting on? In presenting his budget speech my hon. friend the Minister of Finance congratulated himself, I think, and this country on the fact that while the wholesale price index was rising by 13·4 per cent the index of farm products rose 34·9 per cent. But those are percentages of increase, not actual increases of the index figure; they do not indicate, as one might think, that the index figure rose by 34·9. In the first place the increase is due to the fact that, as in connection with the total trade of Canada, the minister started at the lowest point, which I think was February, 1933. Let me read to you what the position is with regard to the relative position of price levels as between agricultural and primary products and other commodities from 1930 right up to the present time.

	Farm products	Manufactured goods	Difference
July, 1930.. ..	79·8	85·8	6·0
March, 1931 . .	59·4	78·0	19·4
March, 1932 . .	52·6	71·5	19·6
March, 1933 . .	44·7	67·9	23·2
March, 1934 . .	56·5	75·0	18·5

In July, 1930, the spread was only 6 points, while in March, 1931, it was 19 points, and it is practically the same to-day. I am afraid my friend the Minister of Finance cannot give much comfort to the farmers by saying there has been an increase in the price level of primary products as compared with the general commodity price level. The point is that there is still that disparity of almost 20 points between those two price levels, and we will not have prosperity in this country until that gap is more nearly closed up.

The Minister of Finance mentioned the balance of trade. We have dealt with that on so many occasions that I need only take a moment at this time. My hon. friend rejoices in the fact that there is an excess of exports over imports of $142,000,000, and he says that does not take account of the export of gold, amounting to $90,000,000, thus intimating that there is a total favourable balance of trade of $232,000,000. Here again this publication put out by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not seem to jibe with the statement of the Minister of Finance. I have in my hand an extract from a publication called Estimated Balance of International Payments of Canada, published by the Hon. H. H. Stevens, M. P., Minister of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa. Here I find a statement of the estimated balance, but it is not $232,000,000. Leaving out the detailed items I give the last two debits and credits. The exports are given as $1,216,200,000; the imports are given as $1,114,200, leaving a difference not of $232,000,000 as the Minister of Finance would suggest but of $102,000,000. Of course that is a difference of only $130,000,000, but what is that between friends? As a matter of fact the bureau of statistics, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows, regards this balance of trade as something of a fantasy; they have an idea that trade always balances eventually, that the total international payments balance, and they do rather a remarkable and, so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, a shocking thing when they come to show the balance of trade at $102,000,000. Do you know what entry they make? They say, "Net errors and omissions, $102,000,000." They do that in order to balance up, because they do not regard this as a real balance at all. Of course, my hon. friend knows that the bureau of statistics, in publishing its statement covering 1926 to 1932, said:

> Balance of trade figures are frequently misinterpreted due to the persistence of the doctrine, long ago exploded, that a nation's trade is necessarily in a healthy state when exports exceed imports, necessitating an import of gold to make up the difference.

So we do not get much comfort out of that balance of trade. I have said before and I repeat that if you get a balance of trade by starving yourself, by restricting your imports or by not getting the things you should get in order that you may be comfortable, that you may have the necessities and perhaps even some luxuries, then that favourable balance of trade is a bad thing. On the other hand, if the favourable balance is made up by increasing your exports while you are supplying your own necessities, by supplying the world at large and being able, from your abundance, to import, then the favourable balance of trade is a good thing. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that a favourable balance of trade which is produced by privation, by having to buy less, is not a good thing; the favourable balance of trade in which we all rejoice is the balance produced by the exhilaration of being able to sell more.

Now let me say a further word; I am still on trade, but I cannot leave this point, because it seems to me this is a state of affairs which even some of my hon. friends opposite do not seem to realize. What has this government done with regard to the increasing of the foreign trade of this country? I have already dealt with the imperial conference agreements and with the statements of the Minister of Finance in regard thereto. Let us now have a look at my friends' activities as the champion trade agreement makers. These hon. members opposite are the men who are really supposed to know how to make trade agreements and who, according to their own statements, have negotiated several very valuable ones. Of course, they frowned on the agreement with France made by the Liberal government; they said that was a poor agreement, one which worked against Canadian interests, and for that reason they cancelled it. They made agreements—how many do you say? They made three, outside of the imperial conference agreements. One was with Germany, another with Austria and the third with France.

Let us now see how much trade they have developed through their trade treaties. The order in council authorizing the treaty with Germany was passed March 31, 1933. In 1932 the exports to Germany were $7,700,000. In 1933 the exports to that country were $9,900,000, showing an increase in exports of about $2,000,000. If hon. members will take the trouble to look into those figures they will find that the exports making up the difference were largely wheat and metals, commodities which Germany needed. At the same time, however, there was an increase of $2,000,000 in exports to Germany, with imports remaining about the same.

Now, let us turn to France. That, by the way, is the treaty where a great improvement was supposed to have been made. In 1932 our exports to France were $14,000,000, while in 1933 our exports were $12,200,000. That is a falling off, instead of an increase in exports.

[Mr. Ralston.]

The old treaty expired in June, 1932, and because of that I have compiled the figures for a six months' period. I find that in the last six months operating under the old treaty we exported $8,500,000 of goods to France, while in 1932 when we had no treaty we exported $5,000,000. Then, in 1933, under this brand new, shining treaty of my hon. friends opposite we exported $6,600,000, or in other words $2,000,000 less than was exported under the old treaty.

What is the summary of the treaties and trade agreements negotiated by the present government? The summary is this: They sold $2,000,000 more to Germany than we did the year before the treaty was made, and $2,000,000 less to France. Oh yes, but there is another treaty to be considered—Austria; we have a treaty with Austria. Let us see what our trade with Austria has been. In 1932 exports to Austria were $8,900, and in 1933 under the treaty they were $13,900. In other words, there has been an increase of $5,000. To summarize, there is an increase of $2,000,000 to Germany, a decrease of $2,000,000 to France, and an increase of $5,000 to Austria. That is the contribution which my hon. friends opposite have made to world trade by their trade agreements.

Now, one thing more. Hon. members opposite have always been very keen, and laudably so, to show that Canada is doing better than anybody else. If that were true nothing could give us greater pride. However I feel that we ought to look at the facts, and see if my hon. friends opposite are correct in their assumption, because if Canada is not doing as well as other nations we should know it. I have before me three tables. May I state that I believe we are more deeply interested in exports. I have had a table prepared, taking the year 1928 as a basis, because I thought that was a fair year. The exports of each country for 1928 have been taken at 100 and then a comparison is made with the exports of 1933. With that in mind I have made up the index figure for 1933 representing exports of each country as compared with 1928 which I have taken as 100. They are as follows:

Belgium	64.5
Germany	58.7
Japan	57.5
Italy	56.1
The Netherlands	50.4
France	49.4
United Kingdom	47.9
British India	41.6

And then, in ninth position, comes Canada, with the figure of 39·4. The United States is behind Canada, with the figure of 35·8; Australia 35·8 and New Zealand 35.

So hon. members opposite will have to look to their export trade more than they have been doing if they wish to show that as compared with the figures for 1928 Canada is increasing her export position. As my hon. friends opposite like to take the low points, let us compare the export figures for 1932 as compared with those for 1933. In these foreign trade figures showing increases in exports of 1933 over those of 1932 we find that Canada is sixteenth on the list . Australia is first with a percentage of 35, and Canada sixteenth with the figure 7·6. That is Canada's position in increases in exports as compared with 1932.

We have always boasted that Canada has been fifth in total world trade. She did hold that position in 1930. In 1932 however Canada was seventh and in 1933 she took ninth position. Last year, Canada's export position was fifth, and this year she is sixth. In imports Canada was last year in eighth position and this year she is in ninth.

The point I am trying to drive home, if I can, by the use of these figures is this, that my hon. friends opposite have completely neglected the development of world trade. In the first place, they are shutting themselves in behind a tariff wall, and in the next place they have adopted some sort of economic imperialism which seems to be filling their hearts and minds, a policy which I am afraid is going to prove a delusion. They are neglecting the opportunity—because there is an opportunity—to develop trade with the world at large. The figures show it, and I commend them to the consideration of my hon. friends the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I had intended at this point to deal with the matter of revenues, but I do feel that I ought to bring home to the Minister of Finance the point which I have made before but which, like some other points I have made, he does not seem to have caught. I refer to my suggestion of making customs duties a source of greater revenue than they are at present. I have pointed out to my hon. friend that in past years customs duties have been used to good effect in producing revenue which could be used to run the services of the country. The following figures will serve to indicate the percentage of our total revenues made up by customs duties:

Year—	Percentage Per cent
1928	45
1929	49
1930	49
1931	46.7

And this year, I am sorry to say, only 24 per cent of the total revenues collected was made up of customs duties. Why? Because my hon. friends opposite have put up such high tariffs that they have virtually created an embargo, with the result that goods do not come in and therefore are not subject to duty. He is feeling the effects of the law of diminishing returns. As I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks, he cannot possibly overtake the diminution of customs tariffs. In 1931 the Prime Minister said he was going to secure a certain revenue from customs duties. However he was $22,000,000 short, because at the special session of 1930 he raised the tariffs. In 1932 the present Minister of Finance guessed he was going to get $100,000,000 from customs duties, and received only $80,000,000, because of higher duties imposed. In 1933 my friend guessed again and said that $72,000,000 was the most he could expect from customs duties and, owing to the increases in tariff which had taken place, as I said a while ago, he received not $72,000,000 but $65,900,000. All this is in spite of what my hon. friend calls expanding trade. All this is in spite of the fact that according to hon. members opposite the country is doing better. The fact is that our revenue from customs duties is going down.

Let me give my hon. friend an example of how the duties that they have put on have hurt our exports. This government put on sharp increases of tariff against the United States. The United States put on an import tax of $3 and a duty of $1 against our lumber. The result was an imposition of four dollars against us. We then to find a market for our lumber included it in our treaty with Great Britain. What has occurred in connection with our timber exports to the United States due to the high duties which were put on against that country? In 1930 we exported to the United States $26,000,000 worth of planks and boards; in 1933 we exported only $6,000,000 worth of planks and boards, a drop of $20,000,000. My hon. friends think we got a market in the United Kingdom. In 1930 we exported to the United Kingdom $5,500,000 worth; in 1933 we exported $7,600,000 worth. We had a gain of $2,000,000 to the United Kingdom but we lost $20,000,000 in exports of lumber to the United States. That is what happens in retaliation for our high duties. The same thing has happened in connection with imports. Duties have not been collected because goods have not been coming in. As I have said before, our hon. friends are creating a vicious circle. In the first place they are cutting off the market for our producers' goods; in the next place they are cutting off the revenue from customs duties because no goods are coming in in exchange for those producers' goods; in the next place they are imposing a tax on the man who has lost his trade. These extra taxes have to be imposed to make up the loss.

One cent has been taken off the sugar tax. I should like to read the remarks made by the Prime Minister when the government of which I happened to be a humble member took off the tax on tea. He quoted Mr. Lloyd George's speech, and then in Hansard of 1930, page 1830, he said:

> I commend that to the government opposite: Go and tell the housewife that you are taking the duty off tea now; that last year you took the duty off cheques, parlour and sleeping car tickets; and that this year you are taking the duty off tea on the eve of an election. I cannot without having before me the figures express any opinion with respect to the condition of the revenue generally but I should say that if there is one war tax in all the world that should have been dealt with as soon as possible it was the tax on tea. Every member of this house will say that. But, as a matter of fact, the government had not seen fit to take the tax off tea until now, on the eve of an election. Who will say, in the words of Lloyd George, that there was no bribery in that? Those were his words, not mine.

At the most there is only one year more before an election and so my hon. friends are getting ready to meet the housewife and say to her, "We have taken off one cent of the tax on your sugar bowl."

I should like to deal with the tax which has been placed on gold. My hon. friend is endeavouring to make up his revenue by imposing a tax which has created a good deal of alarm all over the Dominion of Canada and particularly in certain sections. Let me say to him that I do not think there is an industry in Canada which has attracted so much United States capital in the last two or three years as the gold mining industry. The Minister of Finance has said that he is anxious to attract United States and English capital. We are proud of this industry. It is one which has created a demand for skilled and unskilled employment; it has created a need for timber, steel, dynamite, chemicals, machinery and many other things in connection with its operations; it has created a need for fuel, food, clothing and other household supplies on the part of those employed in the mines. This industry has supplied a good deal of the freight and a good deal of the passengers carried by our railways. It has supplied an opportunity for development to the power companies and has been the cause of new hydro-electric enterprises being brought to completion. This industry has been one of the most important of any industry we have in the production of wealth. There is no need of a sales agent to dispose of its product, as there is a ready market. There is no question of price, as the price is fixed. We in this country have been able to pay a good many bills and to buy many of the things we have bought from outside, such as cotton, rubber, fruits and manufactured goods, with the gold produced by our mines. These mines are taxed already. The mines themselves pay a corporation income tax while the shareholders pay the income tax which is imposed upon individuals. My hon. friend now proposes to impose a further tax because of the artificial increase which has occurred in the price of gold.

There is something in the argument which he puts forward. I do not suggest that the tax is wholly bad by any means but I am suggesting that there seems to be a lack of appreciation of the fact that there are other industries in this country which have been able artificially to increase their prices because of government action. These industries have not been placed in the same category with the gold mines. The consumer pays an increased price because of government interference with other industries of this country, but no extra tax is being imposed on them. Outside of the two major points which I shall mention in a moment, there are other features which give difficulty in connection with this tax. First, it is discrimination against a particular industry and, second, it is discrimination against particular sections of Canada. All parts of Canada do not get the benefit of gold mines. The little province which I have the honour to represent has done some gold mining but to a very limited extent. We hope to have further developments. There is gold mining done in Quebec and there is a great deal in Ontario. Manitoba has some while British Columbia has a good deal. One or two of the western provinces have produced traces of gold, while we all know what has been done in the Yukon. Generally speaking, the bulk of this taxation will fall upon two or three sections of this dominion.

My hon. friend was in this position: He had put his duties up so high that he could not get any money. He did not want to continue the two-cent sugar tax, but where needs must, the devil drives. He had to get money from somewhere, and he said, "We will call on the gold industry." Had we been in the corner in which he is, we might have done exactly the same thing but I can assure him that we would not have done it in the same way. We would not have made the same proposal which he made in his budget speech. In the first place, he taxes production and not profits. I say to him that he cannot possibly justify a tax which discriminates between a mine which can produce an ounce of gold from seven or eight tons of ore and another mine which can produce a similar quantity from only three tons. In the case of one mine it may cost $29 to produce an ounce of gold while with another mine, it may cost $31. Regardless of this my hon. friend is proposing to tax everything received above $30 an ounce up to 10 per cent of the gross price received, I say that that is wrong and it cannot be justified. The low-grade mines will be paying a percentage beyond all reason when compared with other mines producing a higher grade ore.

Let me put an example on the record. Assume that it costs a mine $14 to procure an ounce of gold. They obtain $35 for that gold, giving a profit of $21. The tax will be ten per cent of that $35, or $3.50, which means sixteen per cent of the profit of $21. Another mine producing low grade ore finds that it costs $31 to produce an ounce of gold. That gold is sold for $35, giving a profit of $4. In this case the tax is the same, ten per cent on the $35, which leaves a profit of only fifty cents per ounce. The tax amounts to 87½ per cent of the profit. Now can the Minister of Finance justify any such taxation as that? My hon. friend to my left has suggested that in the case of some mines this tax will mean bankruptcy and the closing down of operations. Assume that it costs a mine $32 to produce an ounce of gold; that mine would have a profit of only $3 per ounce while it would be taxed $3.50 per ounce on the gold it produces; it would have a loss of fifty cents on every ounce of gold it produced. That means bankruptcy. And what does that mean? It means that the mines which are giving the most employment, providing an opportunity for supplying the greatest amount of material, the mines which require the handling of the greatest amount of ore, and the mines that are least able to pay are taxed the most—taxed out of existence. It is absolutely unfair and inequitable and cannot possibly be justified.

Secondly, let me point this out—and I appeal to the Minister of Finance, because he and I come from the same province. The hon. gentleman knows that in our own province particularly the mines there are in process of development now, and the little gold that is being produced, while it is being realized upon, is not providing money to be used in profits. Dividends are not being paid but the money is being turned back into the mines for purposes of development. I submit therefore that they should not be taxed, but they will be taxed under this provision, because 10 per cent of production is taken. My hon. friend ought to have special consideration for these mines. I believe that the tax in its present form is inequitable and indefensible, and will do incalculable injury to the dominion. It was none other than the Prime Minister himself who on March 27, 1933, as reported in Hansard, page 3424, with regard to the gold mining industry, made a statement which I think might very well be quoted on this occasion. He said:

> This country at the present moment has reached a margin of borrowing which, under the ordinary rules that govern, according to the books, is almost its maximum borrowing power unless you have a rapidly increasing population or great natural resources that are being rapidly developed. That is the reason that the increase in gold production in this country has added relatively so greatly to confidence in the country. And the reason is obvious.

But my right hon. friend undermines confidence when he taxes the gold mining industry in this inequitable fashion and shuts down the very mines that would do most good in the development of this country. Let me refer to a statement made by the Minister of Mines (Mr. Gordon), a member of this government, at Quebec, at a meeting of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy. This is what he said as reported in the Canadian Northern Miner of April 12, 1934:

> "I should like to touch on the policy of the dominion government toward taxation of mining profits," the minister said. "Some hold to the belief we should exact from the industry, particularly from the gold producing companies, a greater share of their profits. But which is the better course? To maintain stable taxation and thereby afford greater development of our gold resources with consequent greater return to the dominion's exchequer or to discourage this development by thinking up ways and means of deriving greater taxation from the industry? As I stated before foreign capital is in large measure supporting the ever-increasing number of prospectors and others investigating our gold possibilities.
> It is obvious then any undue stricture placed upon the profits of gold mines would result in Canada, as it has in other countries, in the slowing up of the stream of speculative money needed for gold mining development."

That was what the Minister of Mines had to say, and I suggest that the mining men of this country had a right to take it from that statement that the minister, as a member of the government, was intimating that the industry would not be taxed as it is at the present moment. I am sure that they did draw that inference. It was an assurance from the Minister of Mines which this government would do well to honour.

I wish now to say a word in regard to the provision respecting coal. I can only say that I have endeavoured to find out what effect the change in the regulations in connection with drawbacks will have, but I am afraid the matter will have to be left until we reach the committee stage when we can ascertain exactly how much coal is affected. I understand that the change made with respect to coal under item 1049 is that the drawback, which was previously 99 per cent of the duty, is now altered to 50 per cent, but that the incidence of the drawback, the benefits under it, will now be extended to gas retort plants as well as to by-product coke ovens. That means that you have an increased duty by 50 per cent and at the same time you may have an increase by 50 per cent in the number of those who are entitled to the benefit of the drawback. That will have to be left to the committee stage, when one can make intelligent observations on it. If it means that there is to be a further restriction with regard to competing American coal, then so far as I am concerned, coming as I do from Nova Scotia, I welcome it because if there is to be a policy of protection of natural products, the products of Nova Scotia as well as of other provinces should be protected, particularly in view of the national interests which exist in connection with the preservation of the mines of that province.

Let me now mention only generally the tariff as dealt with in the budget. I am not going into the items; I do not know enough about them, and we shall have an opportunity, in committee on ways and means, to discuss them. Generally speaking, I take it that they are pretty nearly what they appear to be, minor adjustments in the tariff. I am sorry that they do not seem to represent any decided change of heart, any rightabout face on the part of the government with respect to tariff matters. I find that peanut oil, beads, harps and cricket balls are all dealt with, and these articles would indicate the generally frivolous nature of most of the tariff items.

But what I do wish to refer to particularly is a matter which I regard as of much more importance than the individual items in the tariff, a matter of principle, and that is the appointment of the tariff board and the question of the decisions of that board, as well as the way in which this government should honour the findings of the body which it has appointed to deal with tariff matters.

I brought up in committee of supply the other evening the jute twine matter, and I feel I ought to put the salient points on record in connection with the discussion of this whole subject. Two years ago we appointed a tariff board. The Prime Minister intimated that he wished to secure the best tariff board he could get, and he went afield to find the man best qualified for the position of chairman. I find in Hansard of 1933, page 4836, this statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to Mr. Justice Sedgewick, the chairman of the board. The Prime Minister said:

> When we have to go to the bench for the purpose of securing an appointment, we do not do so because they are judges as such, or because I happen to be a member of the legal profession, but because in the very nature of things we must endeavour to secure for the positions the best talent we can command, with the idea in mind that not only will Canadians be proud of the appointment, but that those from other lands who come before that tribunal will say: Here is a man who discharges his duty in a manner worthy of the great traditions that belong to those who sit in judgment upon matters affecting the interests of the country as a whole. . . . If the committee were interested I could give the names of members of the profession who said: You must not take this man from us; he is the most brilliant and the best qualified of the judges we have had for years on our bench in the trial division and in connection with bankruptcy. . . . May I make just one or two other observations with respect to the matter? I knew that in time of stress and strain this house might not think this the most desirable thing to do; yet I say to my colleagues in this House of Commons that canvassing the situation in its entirety and looking over the field in every part of the dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific I know not where I could secure an appointee who would so fuly measure up to my conception of the ability required to perform the tasks imposed upon him under the statute as the gentleman who has been selected.

The Prime Minister was speaking there of the present chairman of the tariff board. In the debate—I have not the reference—the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) asked the Prime Minister whether he did not think it would be better to have the customs board retain their jurisdiction in the matter of appeals rather than have the appeals go direct from the appraisers to the tariff board. The Prime Minister intimated in the debate that he considered this bill provided the preferable way, namely, that appeals should be made directly from the customs officials, appraisers, to the tariff board.

A case came up before the customs officials and it was this: jute twine was being imported from Great Britain. Jute twine had, with other articles, been subject under our tariff to the provision of section 43 of the Customs Act which permitted the Minister of National Revenue to make an arbitrary valuation for duty purposes of goods coming in. In other words, jute twine was subject to what we call the dumping duty by reason of the fact that the minister was able to put an arbitrary valuation on the invoice. In November, 1932, we passed a statute amending our act and in view of the imperial conference agreements, we excepted from the provisions of section 43, goods coming in from Great Britain, so that after that date the minister was not permitted to make an order fixing a value for duty purposes or, in other words, he was not permitted to impose the dumping duty.

An order of jute twine came in; it was referred to the customs officials and notwithstanding the fact that the act had been amended in 1932, those officials held that the old order the minister had made still applied; they imposed a value for duty purposes on this particular shipment of jute twine and it was subjected to dumping duty. The matter was taken to the tariff board on appeal as was provided for at the time the legislation constituting the board was passed by this house. A decision was given; in fact, there were two decisions. The tariff board on October 30, 1933, decided that the dumping duty did not apply to goods coming from the United Kingdom because the statute of 1932 expressly exempted British goods from that dumping duty. That decision was made by the tariff board and handed down on October 30, 1933. Did the government accept that decision? They did not. Did the Department of National Revenue accept the decision? They did not. Did they keep on imposing dumping duties? They did; notwithstanding the fact that their own board, headed by the gentleman who is mentioned by the Prime Minister in the passage I have just read, handed down a decision that they should not impose the dumping duty, they kept on doing so and not until after February 10, 1934, did the government accede even sufficiently to say: Well, while this matter is under discussion we will not insist on the dumping duty being paid. I have in my possession, not here, but in my office, a letter written by the Department of National Revenue on February 10, 1934, telling the shipper that he has still to pay the dumping duty, notwithstanding the fact that the tariff board handed down their decision on October 30, 1933. That was not based on the ground that there was a serious question of law involved; I have been unable to find a single legal officer of any description who has given the opinion that the tariff board were wrong in their decision in that respect. Second, I have been unable to find anybody, although I have asked the minister pretty persistently, who could suggest there was an appeal from the tariff board to the governor in council, although an appeal was at least pro forma taken in order to hold things up.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Would my hon. friend read that letter of February 10, 1934?

Mr. RALSTON: It is in my office.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am not sure that he has interpreted it correctly.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be glad to bring it down. If, when my hon. friend's estimates are up, he will bring down those opinions of the legal officers, I shall be glad to bring down this letter. Has my hon. friend a copy of it before him?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I would be glad if he would read it.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Let my hon. friend go on with his speech.

Mr. RALSTON: I would like my hon. friend to read the letter. I do not want to say anything unfair. It seems as if the letter meant what I thought it did.

As a matter of fact, that is the situation with regard to the decision of the tariff board and the government prior to February 10 declined to accept th t decision. Since then they have issued a circular in which they have intimated that while the matter is on appeal or at least referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, they will not impose the dumping duty, but that importers must be prepared to amend their entries should an adverse decision be handed down. Let me point this out: The appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is not an appeal in connection with the matter which the tariff board decided. The board decided that the dumping duty could not be applied on a British shipment on account of the statute of November, 1932. What has gone to the Supreme Court of Canada? The reference to it is; did the tariff board have authority to decide that? They leave to one side entirely the question whether the tariff board were right in their decision; they are endeavouring only to test the authority. Does any importer care anything about the question of authority? Who ought to decide the question of the authority of the tariff board? It seems to me it is this parliament. Did we intend to give the tariff board authority to act in place of the customs board? If we did, we should say so by legislation and not by going to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Might I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? I think he knows full well that the very questions which he is discussing now so ably and eloquently are to be argued to-morrow on behalf of all parties interested on the question submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, and I would think, if my hon. friend has any criticism to offer in regard to the government or anybody else, it would be well for him to reserve his remarks until the estimates of the Department of National Revenue are before the house, rather than to discuss the matter when this question is pending as it is before the Supreme Court for argument to-morrow.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not discussing the legality of the reference; I am discussing the futility of making a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. I submit with all deference it was simply eyewash to make a reference to the Supreme Court in connection with questions which could have been decided by parliament. Either the government intended that the tariff board should have authority to decide these questions, or they did not, and there is no need to go to the Supreme Court to have that decided. Let the government come to parliament and propose to have the act amended. The real question which was not submitted to the Supreme Court is: Is there a dumping duty against British jute twine? Did the tariff board decide properly when they made their ruling?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That question arises out of the question submitted.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know whether my hon. friend had anything to do with framing the question submitted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I certainly did.

Mr. RALSTON: The question is: Had the tariff board authority to decide? It was a very ingeniously put question. The question that should have been submitted to the Supreme Court was whether the tariff board were right or wrong in their decision, but the government have seen fit to submit not that question, but whether the tariff board have the right to make the decision, thus leaving entirely aside the merit of the decision itself in which, after all, not only are the importers interested but, I would think, the jute twine firms on the other side. Surely in connection with a matter of that kind my hon. friends opposite who are so anxious to promote the imperial conference agreements, would consider it a matter of honour that the provisions of those agreements which propounded that any dumping duty or exchange duty should be done away with as soon as possible should be carried out. Yet I find my hon. friends carrying this thing along, paying no attention to the tariff board decision, charging importers this dumping duty just the same as before and doing everything they can to be just as niggardly as possible in complying with the provisions of the imperial conference agreements, and, secondly, making all the trouble they can for the business people of this country. That, however, is not half as important or serious as that the government of this country should in the face of a decision made by a tribunal appointed by itself, treat it with absolute contempt, indeed, such contempt as could be punished as such if it were committed by an ordinary litigant before a court. They pay no attention to the decision, and thus hold the tariff board up to possible ridicule or at least to the reflections of people generally who say that evidently the board has not much standing; or at any rate the government does not pay any attention to it. I submit that the action of this government in connection with the tariff board in the jute twine case cannot be too strongly condemned by anyone who wants to see any stability in this country in connection with tariff matters.

The other case was the so-called "tin plate" case. Tin plate was being imported into this country. The Ojibway plant had said that they were closing down; in fact, they had closed down. The question was, whether tin plate which was being imported into this country by the canners, was after the Ojibway plant had closed down goods of a class or kind made in Canada. The customs people decided that it was, notwithstanding the fact that they had a letter there stating that the Ojibway plant was closed, and no other plant was operating here. Nevertheless the customs people decided that tin plate was a commodity of a class or kind made in Canada, because they said: There may be some on somebody's shelves, or it may be made some time, or perhaps it has been made. Therefore it imposed the 20 per cent duty and the dumping duty, instead of 15 per cent. That affected the fish canners, the fruit canners, and everybody in this country who used tin plate. The decision was handed down in that case in December, as far as I can remember, after the most strenuous efforts on the part of representatives of this government to keep that case dragging on before the tariff board. The first time they appeared and asked for one month's adjournment—I think that is right although I am not sure how long the first adjournment asked for was—but the second time the representatives of the government asked for a three months' adjournment. For what? In order that they might look into the question of the imperial conference agreements and find out whether tin plate was being manufactured in Canada. There was only one possible plant and that was at Sarnia where investigation could be made, and could be made promptly. The application was made for a three months' adjournment notwithstanding that in the meantime the importers in Canada would have to pay 20 per cent and the dumping duty. The tariff board did not grant three months' adjournment, but granted one month, and the board on December 12, made an order and said that tin plate was not a commodity of a class or kind made in Canada, and the dumping duty was not applicable. But it took two months before the customs issued an order with regard to that and decided that the tariff board decision had to be accepted at least for the period from June to December.

I cannot understand what the explanation is. But I say it does not speak well for the government, and it constitutes a reflection on the tariff board which they should not be under. It is injurious to the commercial interests of this country and contrary to the idea of the stability of tariff policy, because after all the Minister of Trade and Commerce in days gone by used to talk about the necessity for tariffs and import regulations being stable and being definite and certain. Apparently the government were trying to secure that by the appointment of this tariff board, but now when they get decisions they do not like they immediately disregard them. What sort of example is that to this country and to the other litigants appearing before the tariff board?

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the first place the government for nearly four months have refused to follow the decision of the tariff board with respect to the jute twine case. They have disregarded the decision of the tariff board of October 30, until very lately. Secondly, they have refused to follow the decision of the board in a similar case with regard to felt hats, which I have not mentioned. Thirdly, they have no opinion that an appeal lies from that decision. They have no opinion that the decision is not correct. Fourthly, in the tin plate case the government refused to accept and flouted the board's decision for two months at least. I say this is wrong because it wears out business people. It is not fair to the commercial community. It is wrong because it is not in keeping with the imperial conference agreements, and I say it is especially wrong because it discredits a board appointed by this government itself, and to which the people of Canada look for some stability in connection with tariff matters.

I have not dealt, Mr. Speaker, with all the matters which are contained in the budget but as I intimated to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I hope I have demonstrated to him that at least there are some things about the budget of which I do not approve. After all I have said, Mr. Speaker, the most condemnatory criticism to be directed against this budget is that it shows that the government has neither the courage nor the capacity to follow through with their policy of trade restriction which was boastingly inaugurated at the special session of 1930. They have sown the wind and they are reaping the whirlwind. They find that Canada is not the only country which can restrict imports. They find, as a result, that Canada's former customers refuse to buy. They went into this trade war with the insane idea that they could give nothing and get everything by virtue of some heaven-sent superiority in commercial intelligence. The result is that the policy of strangling trade has increased costs of production to our farmers, fishermen, miners and lumbermen and, at the same time, the demand for their goods has been curtailed with a consequent drop in the prices of their products.

Having accomplished this tragedy in a country which depends so largely on exports of the farm, the forest, the mine, and the sea for its purchasing power, they—like Mark Twain who, in one of his stories, got his hero into such a fix that he said someone else would have to finish the book—now are forced to fall back on "the automatic working of fundamental economic forces," as they call it, to get them out.

Let there be no mistake, this country is now on the "dole" so far as export trade is concerned.

The problem is to bring about parity between the prices which the farmer and the other primary producers receive for their goods and the prices received for other commodities.

The Finance Minister, last year, deprecated economic nationalism. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that economic nationalism for Canada began with the advent of the present government into power and they have constructed a "Frankenstein" which threatens to destroy them. At the special session of 1930 the Prime Minister held out shining hopes of the imperial conference which he was to attend in London. The net result was summed up in that descriptive comment "humbug". In 1932 my hon. friend the Prime Minister told us to look forward to the imperial economic conference at Ottawa for relief. Relief did not come. In 1933 he hoped that a world economic conference might save us. That conference is dead. They now supinely await for the working out of "present economic trends", surely a curious position for a party which was going to blast Canada into prosperity.

We must face the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the continuance of present policies has made it absolutely necessary to adopt no uncertain methods to bring about a parity between the price level of agricultural and other primary products and the price level of other commodities and it is quite possible that the government of the day may be driven to drastic action in bringing about such a parity. A further consequence of continuing present policies might well be the necessity for the state to take the primary producer's surplus off his hands at a minimum price and market it abroad in a manner which will serve to increase, rather than to diminish, our total trade. This may be radical and this may appear to be artificial but it is a logical and almost inevitable consequence of a perpetuation of the economic nationalism to which this government has committed Canada.

I still believe, and those around me believe that it may not be too late, even yet, to extricate ourselves by paying attention to fundamentals. This country is in a different position from any other to promote export trade. There ought to be, and I still believe there could be an ordered and sensible readjustment of our fiscal policies, paying attention to the necessity for buying if we want to sell; at the same time giving our producers the purchasing power which comes from being able to dispose of their goods. Then we would have the home market for manufactured goods which has been talked about, but which has never been achieved by the present government. There need be no radical dislocation of business and industry, but there has to be a radical change in outlook and attitude, and whatever hope there may have been that this government would see the error of its ways, is shattered by the confession of helplessness contained in this budget. It is the climax of four years of inaction in which this country has been allowed to take the "shot and shell" of depression without the government attempting a single constructive operation, except counselling the troops to have courage and patience.

The Prime Minister repeatedly intimates that this and that can not be done. The trouble is that the budget is woefully lacking in proposing anything which can be done, but the back and shoulders of Canada are near the breaking point under the strain of present conditions, and the great currents of business are dammed and stagnant by reason of the policies of this government. Armies on both our flanks have, by active, aggressive measures, succeeded in driving depression back, and just now the government, cautiously peeping over the parapet, suddenly discovers that the enemy is retiring and the Minister of Finance indicates to his apparent surprise that,

> . . . it is now clear—that in several countries it began as early as the summer of 1932, and in the United Kingdom, even earlier.

And so they sit down on the fire step and complacently propose that we wait for the "automatic working of fundamental economic forces" and the effect of "present economic trends," which "are in the direction of further progress."

What is really needed is a persistent, determined, planned drive to clear the field. Can anyone question that Canada's success in that drive depends in no small degree on the development of her export trade? The Minister of Finance despondently tells us that:

> International trade remains at a low level. Little, if any, progress has been made in removing the excessive interference with trade, the arbitrary quotas, the exchange controls and the other defensive measures which have been designed to meet the dangers of currency depreciation and unfavourable balances of payments.

I ask him what his government has done to undo the injury caused by its own policy of shackling Canada's trade by these very measures to which he refers. Admittedly, Mr. Speaker, we have gone so far that we cannot retrace our steps all at once, but it is because this budget does not give a sign of even halting, let alone turning right-about face and marching in the other direction, that I regard it as the most hopeless and discouraging budget speech which has been delivered during the four years of this parliament.

The reassuring aspect of the matter is that, judging by the results of five by-elections, climaxed by South Oxford, the country will, at the earliest opportunity, remove this government from power and register unmistakably its opinion that its policies have proved a disastrous and costly failure for the people of this dominion. The people of Canada realize that the self-complacent, static attitude of mind reflected by this budget has already lost to Canada opportunities and prospects which will take her years to recover. They know now that every day under the policies of the present government means so much lost ground which must be later regained, and they look forward eagerly to a general election to return a Liberal government to carry out—as Liberal governments have repeatedly done in the past—the task of recovery and reconstruction. And so I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), that all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.
> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) will not expect me, I am sure, to follow his very lengthy criticism. I must say that although it took a good deal of time for him to make his address I really do not find that I have any very concrete idea of exactly wherein his criticism lies, and I do not know that the amendment has clarified the situation very much. It is in such very general terms that one can make almost anything or nothing out of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why don't you cross the floor?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. gentlemen here ask why I do not cross the floor. As a matter of fact some of us have been in this corner while two or three successive governments have crossed the floor.

The budget speech contains a general survey of financial conditions in Canada, and although it also covered a great deal of ground I think there are two or three outstanding points of which the general public ought to be made aware. First of all, and in my judgment very significant, is the increase in net debt during the year, on all accounts, of $135,200,000. I fancy the government is precisely in the position that any private business or individual is in; when you have to borrow money to pay interest on what you owe you are indeed in a bad way. It does not make much difference if the rate at which we are going into debt is a little less this year than it was last year; the fact is that this year's deficit is simply piled on top of last year's deficit.

We are also told that the reduction in controllable expenditures cannot go further. Looking to the future that does not give us a very great deal of hope. The reduction in controllable expenditures cannot go further, and I cannot but think of the hardship that has been caused by the reduction to date and the fact that very essential services have had to be curtailed or cut off entirely. On the other hand we are told that the increase in uncontrollable expenditures is bound to continue; that is, we have a debt which is expanding and on which the interest necessarily must increase also from year to year. So that is the unsatisfactory state of the country as a whole; we have controllable expenditures cut to the limit and uncontrollable expenditures bound to increase in the future.

I think one paragraph in the budget speech ought to be read into Hansard, because it summarizes the situation very well. It appears on page 2283 of Hansard:

> In the year which has just closed, such expenditures—

This excludes the amounts required for the railway deficit and unemployment relief.

> —totalled $364,000,000. Of this amount, $230,000,000 was required for purposes classed as uncontrollable and $134,000,000 for controllable. In other words, out of every $100 expended $63 went for expenses designated as uncontrollable and $37 for services that are ordinarily regarded as controllable. The main services under uncontrollable are interest on public debt amounting to $139,700,000; war pensions, $41,700,000 and treatment and after-care of returned soldiers, $9,500,000.
> These three items alone account for 83 per cent of the expenditure included under the category of uncontrollable.

And perhaps it should be added that the cost of administering the public debt is not included in uncontrollable expenditures. The only comfort the Minister of Finance gives us is that the burden of our public debt is not beyond the capacity of our people to pay. That is, he joins with the Prime Minister in asking the common people to tighten their belts.

Now we come to the taxes imposed through which we are to meet the proposed expenditures. I am pleased to find that there is a reduction of one cent per pound on sugar. The stamp tax on postal notes issued in the amount of one dollar and under is reduced by one cent. I suppose small mercies should be thankfully received.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): A one cent budget.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It might very well be called a one cent budget. To make up for these very slight reductions on one or two items we have the tax on gold. Again, that we may have this clearly before us, I should like to read the paragraph dealing with this tax:

To replace the revenue lost by the reduction in the tax on sugar, it is proposed to levy a tax of ten per cent on gold. In this connection one must keep in mind the fact that since our abandonment of the gold standard the price of gold in Canadian currency has risen from $20.67 an ounce to approximately $35. This is an increase in the selling price of the product of our gold mines of about 70 per cent. Furthermore, the extraordinary increase in the profits which accordingly accrue to gold producers find its origin in circumstances entirely external to this particular industry. That is to say, the reason for this increase in price is to be found in the chaotic conditions of world currencies, the depreciation of our dollar in the foreign exchanges and the devaluation of gold by certain countries.

These gains to the gold miners are classed as "fortuitous gains." I commend the Minister of Finance for so clearly pointing that out—fortuitous gains. One of the least satisfactory portions of the speech to which we have just listened is that dealing with the proposed tax on gold.

Mr. BRADETTE: Does that apply to all the gold mines?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The financial critic of the opposition has suggested that this tax means a discrimination against a particular industry. Well, I would point out that that is true of all our indirect taxation. Our whole tariff schedule means that particular industries are singled out for taxation, so there is nothing new in that contention. Further than that, it is suggested that it is discrimination against particular parts of the country. That, too, is true under our present system of taxation. Wheat is grown in one part of the country and furniture is manufactured in another part. Undoubtedly it might be said that any indirect taxation of that kind is a discrimination against some particular section of the country. Further it is suggested that the budget does not take into account the variations in the grades of ore and costs of production. I do not believe it is common that such variation should be taken into account. If we did fully take them into account it would be a bonusing of the marginal mines. Since this enormous gain in the value of gold is entirely a fortuitous gain—and I think that cannot be gainsaid—my question is: Why take only ten per cent? Why not take the entire fortuitous gain? I can see no reason why that should not be done. Gold is in a different position from any other commodity, since owing to governmental action it has become the measure of all other commodities. It is in an unique position. And if owing very largely to governmental action we have turned over millions upon millions of dollars to the people who at the present time have control of gold mines, and that action has meant to them an increase from $20.67 an ounce to $35, there seems no reason why the public should not gain the advantage of such increase. Of course, some one will say that would mean that certain mines would not be able to gain as much as they are doing to-day, that certain lower grade mines would be discriminated against, that a certain number of men would be turned out of work, and so on. I know there may be all these objections, but they apply equally in any taxation of this kind, because a good many industries have been put out of business through the very high taxation placed upon them in the purchase of the raw materials required for their products. Personally I think that if gold is as necessary in the carrying on of our trade as everyone seems to imagine, the only permanent solution would be for the government to take over the gold mines. They could then keep the miners at work on a reasonable wage scale; they would then be able to collect this fortuitous gain instead of turning it over to private individuals.

I note that there is no change whatever in the income tax. I am glad that it has not been lessened, but it does seem to me that the income tax ought to be a source of much greater revenue than it is at the present time. There is no reason why it should not be more steeply graded. Only a few days ago I noticed a very interesting editorial in the Gazette of March 19 headed, "On the Income Tax," and based on an article in the National Revenue Review. Since this editorial appears in such a highly respected journal, I believe I may read a paragraph or so:

Whilst the Canadian considers his income is too heavily taxed, he may find it intriguing, if not consoling, to compare his payments under this heading with the income tax the citizen of Great Britain pays. In Canada a single person in receipt of an income of $2,000 a year is liable for $30 income tax. A married man receiving a like income is exempt from payment. Single persons whose annual incomes are $5,000 pay $180 income tax and married persons $120. The scale continues as follows:

And then follows a table which I shall not give in detail. It will be noticed however that in case of higher grade incomes the British people are able to collect almost twice as much as we collect from similar grades in Canada. I would suggest that those people who are so very anxious to copy British institutions might very well copy some of the British policies with regard to income and inheritance tax.

Mr. RHODES: Would the hon. member permit a question? In making his last observation has he borne in mind the circumstance that the British people pay only one income tax, while in Canada in many instances we have three?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I recognize that fact, but I do not believe it alters the situation in the slightest. It might mean that the man who pays an income tax would have to pay a little bit more, but the principle is that great wealth ought to carry a very large proportion of the load. That is not being done either in our provincial or federal spheres. That is, the grading is not nearly as steep in this country as it is in Great Britain. With regard to taxation I should like to give to the house the plank in our C.C.F. platform outlining our policy in that connection. It is as follows:

11. Taxation and public finance!

A new taxation policy designed not only to raise public revenues but also to lessen the glaring inequalities of income and to provide funds for social services and the socialization of industry; the cessation of the debtcreating system of public finance.

The explanatory note reads:

In the type of economy that we envisage the need for taxation, as we now understand it, will have largely disappeared. It will nevertheless be essential, during the transition period, to use the taxing powers, along with the other methods proposed elsewhere, as a means of providing for the socialization of industry, and for extending the benefits of increased social services.

At the present time capitalist governments in Canada raise a large proportion of their revenues from such levies as customs duties and sales taxes, the main portion of which falls upon the masses. In place of such taxes upon articles of general consumption, we propose the drastic extension of income, corporation and inheritance taxes, steeply graduated according to ability to pay. Full publicity must be given to income tax payments and our tax collection system must be brought up to the English standard of efficiency.

We also believe in the necessity for an immediate revision of the basis of dominion and provincial sources of revenue, so as to produce a coordinated and equitable system of taxation throughout Canada.

An inevitable defect of the capitalist system is the debtcreating character of public finances. All public debts have enormously increased and the fixed interest charges paid thereon now amount to the largest single item of so-called uncontrollable public expenditures. The C.C.F. proposes that in future no public financing shall be permitted which facilitates the perpetuation of the parasitic interestreceiving class; that capital shall be provided through the medium of the national investment board and free from perpetual interest charges.

We propose that all public works, as directed by the planning commission, shall be financed by the issuance of credit as suggested, based upon the national wealth of Canada.

I should like to take this opportunity to suggest that there are certain economies which are not dealt with by the Minister of Finance and which I think should be considered by the country as a whole. Having in mind the general Canadian situation, I think first of the possibility of combining some of our provincial administrations. I can see no reason why the expensive arrangement under which we have three maritime provinces and three prairie provinces should be continued. It would seem to me that we might very well combine the maritimes and the prairie provinces, and thus cut down part of the load which is being carried by the people of this country.

As another example I would call attention to the enormous expenditures in connection with the administration of justice. The number of judges in this country is out of all proportion to the population. I cannot see why the speech of the Minister of Finance should not be made the occasion for considering some of these extravagances in the administration of our affairs. There are certain ways in which we could promote efficiency and at the same time cut down expenditure. Why should not our estimates be considered in appropriate committees? The government will have to undertake to initiate such reforms. I am glad to note that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has suggested that the time is coming when there should be a revision of the British North America Act under which there might be a redistribution of the powers as between the dominion and the provinces. Here again I wonder if I might be permitted to read the proposals of the C.C.F. in this matter. They are:

9. B.N.A. Act:

The amendment of the Canadian constitution, without infringing upon racial or religious minority rights or upon legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, so as to give the dominion government adequate powers to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope; the abolition of the Canadian Senate.

Then the explanatory note is as follows:

We propose that the necessary amendments to the British North America Act shall be obtained as speedily as required, safeguards being inserted to ensure that the existing rights of racial and religious minorities shall not be changed without their own consent. What is chiefly needed to-day is the placing in the hands of the national government of more power to control national economic development. In a rapidly changing economic environment our political constitution must be reasonably flexible. The present division of powers between dominion and provinces reflects the conditions of a pioneer, mainly agricultural, community in 1867. Our constitution must be brought into line with the increasing industrialization of the country and the consequent centralization of economic and financial power which has taken place in the last two generations. The principle laid down in the Quebec resolutions of the Fathers of Confederation, should be applied to the conditions of 1933, that "there be a general government charged with matters of common interest to the whole country and local governments for each of the provinces charged with the control of local matters in their respective sections."

The Canadian Senate, which was originally created to protect provincial rights, but has failed even in this function, has developed into a bulwark of capitalist interest, as is indicated by the large number of company directorships held by its aged members. In its peculiar composition of a fixed number of members appointed for life, it is one of the most reactionary assemblies in the civilized world. It is a standing obstacle to all progressive legislation, and the only permanently satisfactory method of dealing with the constitutional difficulties it creates is to abolish it.

It does seem to me that if the government would make a thorough survey of the situation which exists to-day in Canada, it might reduce considerably the enormous burden which, according to this budget speech, will continue to be borne by the people.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In this budget, as in most recent budgets, a very considerable proportion of the expenditure is on what is known as uncontrollable expenditures. May I point out that these expenditures are not really uncontrollable; they are uncontrollable only in so far as the government in power is determined to maintain the status quo. The financial critic of the government, who preceded me, called attention to the possibility of converting our national debts. We ought to have impressed upon this house the remarks made by the Prime Minister himself before the committee on monetary, and financial questions at the imperial conference of 1932. I quoted them in my speech on the address, but I think they cannot be too clearly put before the public. The right hon. gentleman said:

> Interest charges represent the most important of the fixed or semi-rigid elements in our cost structure. If prices remain on their present level, such charges will constitute an intolerable or almost intolerable burden in many cases. Even if it can be borne, the fortuitous gain—

May I direct attention to that phrase, which is also used in the budget speech this year.

> —the fortuitous gain to the creditor of 40 to 48 per cent in general purchasing power above what he contracted for appears to be a grave injustice.

The Prime Minister clearly recognized the injustice of permitting bondholders and others who hold mortgages in this country to receive from 40 to 48 per cent more than they should, but he has done nothing about it. This budget continues that arrangement, and all we are told is that these expenditures are uncontrollable. To continue:

> One of the most important effects of the fall in prices is the increased burden of the fixed charges payable on our governmental and private obligations held abroad, chiefly in the United States and the United Kingdom. . . . As one dollar to-day will purchase at wholesale 48 per cent more than it did in 1929, the real burden of the service charges on these foreign obligations has increased from $362,000,000 to $535,750,000.

These expenditures are said to be uncontrollable, but there seems to be no reason whatever why we should not deal with our debts, cutting them down at least to the point where they have the same buying power as they had when the debts were contracted. The Prime Minister admits that this would be fair but nothing is done about it. It is suggested by the Minister of Finance that we could not contemplate cutting down the debts, making any change in the bonds held by people outside Canada. I understand however that the great proportion of the bonds are held by people inside Canada, and they at any rate can be dealt with; and as regards those held outside, I might point out that a great many nations including Great Britain have in effect cut down their debts in this way.

The Prime Minister told us the other day that in raising the resources he is not actuated by party considerations. That may be true, but I think that the budget clearly demonstrates that he is actuated by class considerations, because from beginning to end the taxes rest most heavily proportionately upon the poor and least heavily upon the very wealthy; and I think it is fair to say of this budget, as of several preceding budgets, that the effect is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. We believe that the taxation policy should be used to lessen at least in some degree the glaring inequalities of income. On the contrary, the taxing powers are here being used to increase that glaring injustice and to make life still more intolerable for the poor, while the poor man passes over through interest charges a very considerable amount of his earnings to those who are already rich.

The Prime Minister the other day defended tax-exempt bonds on the ground that they represent absolute stability and security. I should like to ask him—What about the stability and security of the masses of the people? They have nothing of that stability and security to-day. The great majority of our business men do not know what to do in order to carry their small overhead; they do not know what day they will be faced with bankruptcy; and as for the labour men, they are not secure even in the opportunity of making a living.

It is very delightful indeed to witness a godfather presenting a child with a thousand dollar bond. The Prime Minister would not like in any way to deprive us of the pleasure of enjoying that very pretty picture, but I submit that there are a great many people to-day who are losing their homes and farms. I fancy nearly all of us have received the most pathetic letters from friends throughout the west where at most a few hundred dollars would save them their homes. But they have not that money and so they are losing their farms, essentially, as my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) says, in order that we may pay these interest charges and thus maintain the stability and security of certain classes.

The Prime Minister the other day pointed out the danger of impairing the resources of estates in trust, all those estates that were used in caring for the sick, the afflicted or for scientific research. But I would point out that there are a great many sick not provided for in this land. And what about even the children in our public schools who have not an opportunity of carrying forward their education, some of them not having even the chance of an ordinary decent life. In this connection I would read two or three paragraphs from an article in a recent number of The Canadian Forum on economic conditions in rural Saskatchewan by G. E. Britnell. He is summarizing and interpreting the final bulletin No. 19 of the seventh census of Canada. He says that 5,036 out of the 288,000 farms of the prairie provinces have water piped in the kitchen; or, reduced to more manageable proportions, that only one out of every 57·2 farms in western Canada enjoys this convenience, while in Ontario the corresponding ratio is one out of every 9·54. He points out that in the west one out of every 72·8 has water piped in the bathroom—it would be interesting to know how many have a bathroom of any kind—as compared with one out of 15·76 in Ontario. One out of every 34·44 western farm homes is lighted by gas or electricity as compared with one out of 5·95 in Ontario. That shows the entire lack of what in the cities would be regarded as absolute necessities. The article continues:

> The average farm home in Saskatchewan showed few signs of extravagance in the small cheaply-built frame house, the inexpensive but uncomfortably primitive heating system, the coal-oil and gasoline lamps, the cheap and inadequate furniture and the almost total lack of domestic conveniences.

And still further:

> Fresh fruit was the greatest possible luxury while farm children seldom saw oranges from one Christmas to another. Over wide areas of the province medical facilities were inadequate; after the prairie trails had disappeared, the roads, when once the traveller left the few half-graded dirt highways, must have been among the worst in the world; the cultural life of the farm community tended to continue as barren as that characteristic of all agrarian frontiers.

And again:

> Official figures illustrate graphically the extent of the financial collapse. For instance, it is reported "that forty rural municipalities, fifty villages and twenty-seven towns have defaulted in their debenture payments. In addition 828 rural school districts, 225 village school districts and forty-eight town school districts have defaulted in the payment of their debentures. . . . " The bank indebtedness of rural municipalities at the end of 1932 was $8,379,548.97; the amount due schools, et cetera, for the requisition of taxes amounted to $8,120,615.71; the uncollected arrears of taxes plus the tax sale holdings (which must be added to get a correct statement of total arrears) amounted to $30,368,345.82.

And so forth. The article goes on to tell of the hardships of the farmers and of the very serious conditions which exist at the present time. My point is simply this: that whilst we talk grandly of maintaining the credit of the country, these deplorable conditions prevail in certain sections. Why is it so important to continue to pay not only one hundred cents but well on to one hundred and fifty cents on the dollar in real purchasing power to maintain those who hold bonds and to take it out of the pockets of people who have to live in conditions such as I have described?

The other day when I looked over this budget it reminded me somewhat of that old biblical story where the taskmasters of Egypt required the people of Israel, who were practically their slaves, to make bricks without straw:

And the taskmakers hasted them saying, fulfil your works, your daily tasks, as when there was straw.

To all protests Pharaoh replied:

There shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks.

I might say that our modern Pharaoh insists on double the tale, as I have just explained. In fact, sometimes in this pressure that is being exerted, this tightening of the belt policy, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his cabinet are something like Rehoboam of the old days who, following the counsel of the young men, declared:

My father made your yoke heavy, and I will add to your yoke.

Tighten your belts. The answer of the people was:

To your tents, O Israel.

I may win some applause from my friends the Liberals when I remind them that the people rejected Rehoboam as their king.

The Prime Minister has a curious mentality and I refer to him because it seems to me that this budget incorporates some of the principles he has been giving us from time to time in the house. The other day, speaking in connection with titles, he said:

God has not given equal ability to all men and women. They are not all equipped with the same power of thought or with the same intellectual power.

Therefore it would seem, if I read aright his deductions, that some ought to be given titles and greater wealth, greater privileges of all kinds than others. I wish I could impress upon the government and the Prime Minister the fact that wealth to-day comes very largely through the possession of special privileges. Some few people have got charters and leases and all that kind of thing and in that way the owners of those special privileges have made their money. Withdraw the special privileges and they would be in the same boat as the rest of us.

The other day I was reading an article showing the gradual extension of powers which all governments are now being forced to take to themselves, and how the assumption of new responsibilities meant reorganization. The article to which I refer is called Politics versus Economics and I especially ask my Liberal friends to read it. It is by Gustav Stolper in Foreign Affairs for April, 1934, and reads:

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

But once the state comes into possession of the decisive instruments of power in capitalistic economy—money and credit—it at once finds itself becoming responsible for prosperity and depression.

And again:

Budget policy, tax policy, credit policy, currency policy—all go to make up one indivisible unit. Anything done in any one of those departments has its effect on all the others. As master of taxation, the state is in direct control of a large portion of the national income; as master of railroad and public utility rates the state is in direct control of another large portion of the national income; as master of the credit markets the state has indirect command over investments; this state therefore cannot avoid taking currency under its control.

The article was referring particularly to the necessity of the state taking currency under its control and that, I am glad to say, is being done more or less under the bill introduced in regard to the Bank of Canada Act, although under that legislation currency still remains under private control. I should like to emphasize that we can no longer judge a budget by the same standards as we judged budgets some years ago. The government itself is having to assume very much greater responsibilities for the affairs of the nation and we have a right to expect that the government will be very largely responsible for initiating those policies which will lead to prosperity. The trouble, as I see it, is that the present government has not done anything that would fundamentally alter the existing economic system.

May I close by quoting a passage from an excellent elucidation of the findings of the Bureau of Economic Research. This is contained in the letter of the National City Bank of New York of April, 1934. Mr. Walter Lippmann summarizes the findings in this way, and I think it very well summarizes the budget as well:

From 1929 to 1932 there was a great decline in the total national income. But in the course of this decline salaries and dividend payments fell slowly at first. Interest payments fell very little. Among labour incomes salaried men were favoured as against wage earners, and of course wage earners as against the unemployed. Relatively speaking, property incomes increased. . . .

The figures show that the depression was not like some great accident, say a shipwreck, in which all suffered alike. They show, on the contrary, that the sacrifices were very uneven, and that worst of all, though nearly everybody was poorer, the distribution of wealth became progressively more and more unequal, taking the greatest toll from those who already were the weakest, and far greater toll from the active producers of wealth than from the recipients of fixed or sheltered incomes.

Could any words better describe this budget? It takes the greatest toll from those who already were the weakest, and far greater toll from the active producers of wealth than from the recipients of fixed or sheltered incomes.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, first to offer my sincere compliments to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for the able manner in which he has presented to the house his budget. We all know that preparing the budget is a very difficult task, and whoever has that charge certainly deserves the congratulations of all the members of the house, regardless of party politics. I have pleasure therefore in joining those who have preceded me in offering to the minister my sincere congratulations.

I intend to confine my remarks practically to one subject, but before turning to it I wish to say just a few words to express my approval of the tax on gold. In my estimation that tax is very equitable. As the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) said this afternoon, the government has a certain amount of taxation to levy, and in my opinion that particular tax is one that will command the approval of a great majority of the Canadian people. The price of gold has advanced over fifty per cent in the last few months, with prospects of rising to an even higher level. So I think the Minister of Finance and the government deserve our approval for this tax, which relieves the citizens generally of some measure of other taxation.

I now come to a question which I consider one of the most important problems—indeed I think I can well say the most important problem—with which this government has to deal. I refer to the national railways. I do not intend to discuss the railways from the technical aspect, because I do not feel qualified to do so; I shall consider the question only from the point of view of the ordinary taxpayer who has to put his hand in his pocket to provide for the railway deficit of this country, and who would like to form an opinion as to whom he should hold responsible for the situation in which he finds himself. Ever since I came to this house in 1930, every time the railway question comes up for discussion and anyone on this side suggests that the previous Liberal administration was largely responsible for the present situation of the government railways some hon. member on the other side gets up and contends that both parties were equally responsible. As our hon. friends opposite have a strong press all over the country I think it is only fair that I should refer back some years and try to place the responsibility to a certain extent at least, in order that the taxpayers may be able to form their opinion as to which political party is really guilty of the great wastage of money which to-day threatens the economic structure of Canada.

While it may be quite true that both parties have authorized the spending of public money for the construction or extension of railway lines or the granting of privileges to railway companies which should not have been granted, my contention, and I think the conviction of the public, is that those who led the people to believe that this great venture would be realized at very little cost to the Canadian exchequer were the guilty parties, especially if they did not take every precaution to ascertain the probable cost of what was being undertaken. With that view let us consider for a few minutes the position taken by the two political parties in Canada in 1903 when the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was decided upon. I shall first quote a few paragraphs from the speech delivered by the then Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he presented the bill for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. These words I quote because they give a very good idea of the state of mind of the then leader of the government when he embarked on that enterprise. In the course of the speech made in introducing a resolution for a bill to provide for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific on July 30, 1903, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, as reported at page 7659 of Hansard:

> To those who urge upon us the policy of to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow; to those who tell us, Wait, wait, wait; to those who advise us to pause, to consider, to reflect, to calculate and to inquire, our answer is: No, this is not a time for deliberation, this is a time for action. The flood of tide is upon us that leads on to fortune; if we let it pass it may never recur again. If we let it pass, the voyage of our national life, bright as it is to-day, will be bound in shallows.

The next paragraph which I wish to quote refers to the Intercolonial. I wish to draw the attention particularly of hon. members from the maritimes on both sides of the house to these words, found at page 7660:

> I know very well that amongst those who oppose our policy there are a good many who maintain that it is sufficient that such a road should be constructed from Quebec westward to the Pacific ocean; that there is no need whatever of extending that railway from Quebec to Moncton because, between Quebec and Moncton, there is already the Intercolonial railway. Sir, the answer which we have to make to this objection is plain, obvious, categorical, peremptory and paramount; the answer is that the Intercolonial never was intended, and never was conceived, and never was built for transcontinental traffic.

The next quotation I am dedicating to the citizens of Canada so that they may consider whether or not the predictions made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the time have become realities. It is at page 7676 of Hansard of the same year:

We are told that we are keeping to ourselves the unproductive portion of the road, while we are leaving to a company the productive portion of it. This criticism might have a good deal of force in it if we were ourselves to operate the line which is to be built by the government. But we have made a contract whereby this line is to be operated, not by ourselves, but by that company, which agrees to pay us a rental at the rate of three per cent per annum upon cost of construction. Therefore, let our friends on the other side of the house, and let our friends on this side of the house also, take note of this fact, that with the exception of a few years of interest, to which I shall allude later on, we shall have this portion of the railway built by the government from Moncton to Winnipeg without the cost of one dollar to the Canadian people.

Later in the course of the same speech, and following the same line of thought, at page 7688 Sir Wilfrid said:

I need not dwell upon the importance of this covenant on the part of the company. It practically takes away from the guarantee of the government all risk. There is not a dollar to be advanced by the government. We do give our credit and nothing else. And our guarantee of seventy-five per cent of the construction of the road is to be supplemented by the credit and all the backing of the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself.

And again, at page 7690:

Now, sir, what is the liability incurred by the government for the construction of this road from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean? Assuming that the road across the mountains is 600 miles long, the cost of construction will be $18,000,000 and the total interest for three years will be $3,780,000. This is the whole of the liability which is incurred by the government for the construction of the railway from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean.

And at page 7691:

The sum total of the money to be paid by the government for the construction of that line of railway from Moncton to the Pacific ocean will be in the neighbourohood of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000, and not a cent more.

And again at page 7695:

Therefore the cash aid which was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000—the cash subsidy which is promised and which is to be given under this contract to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will not exceed $13,000,000 or thereabouts.

[Mr. Gobeil.]

This is the sort of information the leader of the government of that day broadcast to the citizens of Canada in order to have them endorse the project he was then furthering. Every hon. member of this house remembers that the then Minister of Railways, Hon. Mr. Blair, resigned his position as minister because he could not approve of the project. Let us see what reasons he gave in support of the decision to which he came on that occasion. At page 6739 of Hansard for 1903 it will be found that Mr. Blair said:

I objected to the government constructing another government road from Levis to Moncton. I objected to it because it paralleled the Intercolonial railway. However, I will not enter upon any elaboration of that point; I will merely state my position. I object to another government road, even if it does not parallel the Intercolonial railway. We in the province of New Brunswick are not asking for it, unless there are some who want to see the money spent there, and that class of people, I apprehend, are not a class who will influence largely the action of this government or the legislation of this parliament. Another objection was that I thought we were proceeding with undue haste. I have no hesitation in stating that I am as much in favour of the construction of another transcontinental line as any other member of this parliament; but I am not in favour of impetuously rushing into the construction of a transcontinental line from Quebec through an unknown country to Winnipeg and the west, until we know something about it—until we have the fullest information about it. The project is one of very great magnitude, and should be dealt with only after the maturest deliberation.

Now, sir, without having this bill before us, without being able to do more than simply indicate the order of events, I am going to state now to the house what occurred in connection with my resignation. On Saturday, the 4th of July, I became convinced that it was determined to build a line of government railway from Moncton to Quebec, and to proceed at once with the construction, without surveys, from Quebec to Winnipeg; and, sir, feeling convinced, knowing, in fact, that what my right hon. friend has stated to-day was then decided upon, I caused it to be made known that that policy, not to speak of other features which will be elaborated later, was not a policy to which I could commit myself as a member of the government.

Are not these words very significant, after our experience of the last thirty years? I am not going to make any further comments just now, but will quote another short paragraph from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech on that occasion. I refer to page 6747:

Allow me, in conclusion, to express to you my extreme sorrow for an action which I regard as a great mistake toward yourself, toward your friends, toward your colleagues, and above all towards your country, which, at this juncture, requires a bold and fearless policy of transcontinental development.

At page 6748 Mr. Blair replied:

I do feel that when my right hon. friend says I made a great mistake toward myself, toward my friends, toward my colleagues and toward my country that he is speaking the honest convictions of his mind. But, sir, if I am capable of exercising any judgment on a matter of this kind, I am bound to say that I do not agree with my right hon. friend. I am bound to say that if I had come to this parliament, and, with what little knowledge and experience I have had of railway questions deliberately advised this parliament and this country that this was a scheme which merited their acceptance, I do not believe I should have been doing my duty to myself. I should not have been doing my duty to the party with which I am allied. It was my plain and simple course to let them know at the earliest possible moment, and to let the public know also, how strongly I felt, as a responsible minister of the crown with respect to this important question. My strong conviction is that this country cannot wisely adopt and carry into operation the policy which my right hon. friend's government has adopted.

When sending his resignation to Sir Wilfrid Laurier on July 10, 1903, no doubt after he had been asked to reconsider his decision, in order to avoid any misunderstanding and any delay Mr. Blair wrote this letter, which will be found at page 6743 of Hansard:

With the most extreme regret, Sir Wilfrid, I feel compelled to tender you my resignation, which I have to beg you will hand to His Excellency without delay. This resignation you must treat as final. The action which has been taken since Saturday last, in submitting to a caucus of suporters of the government in parliament the transcontinental railway propositions, identically in the form in which they were adopted by council, assures me that the government has fully resolved to take the responsibility of asking parliament to approve them.

In case you may think the action which has been taken is not irrevocable, and to avoid any possible misunderstanding on the question, I feel I ought to repeat to you the conditions upon which I would be disposed, if you so desired, to further consider my action in this matter.

I would require that the government should abandon its present intention:

1st. Of building or authorizing the building of a line of railway to Moncton, which would be paralleling and destroying the Intercolonial; or building or authorizing the building of any other line of railway more remote from the Intercolonial until the need of such latter railway becomes apparent, and proper surveys and an estimate of its cost are first made and thoroughly considered.

2nd. The idea of immediately proceeding with a railway from Quebec to Winnipeg. The government should be content with declaring itself in favour of the policy of building a government line from Quebec to the prairies, and across the prairies to the Pacific coast, as soon as the need shall arise; and in the meantime that parliament be asked for an amount to enable a thorough exploration of the country to be made, so that it might be possible to judge whether or not a suitable traffic producing route could be found through this district, and its cost and the character and conditions of the country through which it is to pass ascertained.

I would further stipulate:

3rd. That if such a route is found practicable, and gave promise of a fair measure of traffic a railway should be built by government through, if the government should so decide, a commission, rather than by the government itself directly, and that a contract for such construction should be let only after open and public competition.

4th. That when built and ready for operation, such railway should not be handed over to any one existing railway company under lease; but that the same should be operated either by the government itself, through a commission appointed for the purpose, if so preferred, or by a trust composed of the representatives of the different railways which might intend to use it under direct government supervision and control; and that such form of dealing with the question of operation or management should be decided later after a fuller knowledge of the facts and mature deliberation.

5th. That the policy of giving a present guarantee or other aid to the company to build a railway in continuation of the Quebec-Winnipeg line through the fertile prairie district, the most valuable and promising section of the whole system, should not now be entertained, and that the final decision of the matter be deferred until it became reasonably clear that settlement along the probable route of such railway would justify its construction.

These words were uttered in this house thirty years ago. Are they not very illuminating in view of what has taken place in the interval? Can there be any doubt in the mind of any member of this house, or, for that matter, of any citizen of Canada, as to which of the two gentlemen I have quoted was clearer in his conception of what was to happen in the future?

Let us see what the leader of the opposition of that day, Sir Robert Borden, had to say about this project. It is not my intention to quote his speech at length, because the time at my disposal does not permit me to do so. In his capacity as leader of the opposition he opposed the bill on different grounds, the first being the lack of information at the disposal of the government which had launched upon an enterprise of such magnitude. His second ground was because it paralleled the Intercolonial railway, as pointed out by the Minister of Railways, Mr. Blair, and because he believed it would curtail its business. His suggestion was to extend the Intercolonial railway to the great lakes, and from there to the prairies, to improve the existing lines. I shall not give more details, because the facts are well known. I shall quote only a few paragraphs from his speeches, with his concluding remarks. Speaking of the estimated cost of $13,000,000, he is reported at page 7712 of Hansard as follows:

And the right hon. gentleman—

Referring to Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

—presented the most delightful and pleasing spectacle to the country of a road built from the Atlantic to the Pacific costing this country only $13,000,000. As a matter of fact, add $50,000,000 or $65,000,000 or perhaps $75,000,000 to that and you get some idea of what this project—brought down without deliberation, brought at the end of the session, brought down in a hurry—means to this country.

Then at page 8975, with regard to the extent of the information the government possessed as to the country through which the railway was to be built, he said:

Did you ever hear of a railway company contracting to build a line through a country about which it had no more information than the government have about this country?

It may be remembered also that this was one of the principal reasons invoked by the Hon. Mr. Blair at the time he sent in his resignation. Concluding his speech, Sir Robert Borden is reported at page 8993 of Hansard as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the opposition might well content itself with stating generally the objections to the policy of the government, but, in view of the importance of the question it is essential that an outline of our policy should at least be stated. In the first place I say that I believe this is a question upon which any political party in Canada should obtain the best possible expert assistance and advice and it would be our policy, by commission or otherwise in the speediest possible way to obtain that advice and assistance so as to be able to act upon broad lines, upon reasonable lines and with due inquiry, with due promptitude and at the same time with due caution and deliberation.

Then at page 9005:

Now, let me say in conclusion, that this that I have stated is in outline the policy I would be prepared to adopt. I will take the advice of the experts in the department of Railways and of the best experts in Canada, and, if necessary, of the best experts that this continent or any other continent can produce. But subject to that advice, I would be prepared to proceed along the broad lines I have proposed. Consider my proposal as contrasted with that of the government.

1. It combines prompt action with deliberation and caution.

2. It develops and does not throttle the Intercolonial.

3. It takes account of the expenditure upon the Intercolonial and upon the inland waterways, and brings those great national highways into harmony with our project. The lake route, the St. Lawrence, the canals and our great railway systems are joined by the policy I propose in one harmonious whole, whereas the policy of the government ignores the waterways, takes no account of the lake communication—cuts off the very Intercolonial railway on which this country has spent $70,000,000 and on which this government have spent $15,000,000 for the purpose of doing the very thing which I am advocating in this house.

4. It develops transportation along the lines of least resistance, that is to say, by water and by water and rail.

5. While connecting at the same time all the great railway systems in Canada, it controls in the only effective way the carriage of Canadian products through Canadian channels, by enabling the people's railway to compete for this traffic.

6. It affords immediate relief to the congestion of the west by bringing the Grand Trunk railway into Winnipeg without delay, and

7. It insists that further railway development in the west shall not only give necessary competition in settled districts, but shall open and develop new country.

Can there be any doubt as to which of the two political parties is really responsible for the two billion and a half dollars debt of the railways that this country has to carry? True, as I have already mentioned, that when the Conservative party took office seven years later they may have had to advance money on lines which should not have been built. But, sir, they had to do it. The work was then proceeding and could not be abandoned. The arm was caught in the cogs of the wheel, and as the machine could not be stopped the body had to go through. Let me remind the house and the country that the politicians of that day were not the only responsible persons. We had then, as we have now, business men who are always ready to blame politicians in times of crisis but who, under normal times, do not hesitate, in the effort to serve their own private interests, to ill advise the politicians.

It is a well known fact that on that occasion Sir Wilfrid Laurier followed the advice of the president of the Grand Trunk railway, and some of his associates. I believe that in justice to Sir Wilfrid I must make that statement. And to the same kind of politicians who to-day are preaching economy and urging the government to make reductions in expenditures to an impossible degree, because they forget that two-thirds of government expenditures are uncontrollable, let me say that until such time as they have put their own house in order and, referring especially to the pulp and paper industry, until such time as those so-called business men who seem deliberately to have wrecked an industry of which we Canadians should have almost a monopoly show their willingness to put that industry back on its feet, not by more manipulation, not by selling more stock to the public, but by extracting from it the watered stock and reducing capital values to a proper point, the sincerity of the advice of such men will be very much suspected.

The time at my disposal is now limited, and for that reason I must shorten the observations I had intended to make. In a few words, however, I should like to draw a parallel between the record of this government and that of the one which immediately preceded it. Between the years 1921 and 1930 what has been the attitude of the Liberal party towards the government railways? Have they tried to curtail expenditures? Have they profited from the experience of the first thirty years of operation? Sir, I state deliberately, no. They brought a man from the outside and caused him to be paid the royal salary of $150,000 per year. Naturally the salaries of other officers had to be levelled up to compare with his. Under his management hundreds of millions of dollars were wasted in purchasing branch lines and in building luxurious hotels for which there was no need, in operating a steamship service on the Pacific ocean which cost Canada more than $60,000,000 and which had to abandoned. During the last year of their regime and just before the general election Canada was committed to expenditures amounting to over $250,000,000. That was the heritage passed on to this government. Without exaggerating, this is the record of my hon. friends during the nine years of their regime.

What did this government do when it was confronted with such a situation? As soon as it could be done, they got rid of the man who had apparently decided to bankrupt this country. Through their representations and those of the new board of directors, the salaries were adjusted on an equitable basis. Over $1,000,000 per year has been saved by that one item. They stopped the foolish expense of having radios on trains which were costing hundreds of thousands of dollars. They brought about a saving of $850,000 in the travelling expenses of officials. As I said, the boat service on the Pacific coast was terminated, and although the efficiency of the road was not lowered, the expenses were reduced by nearly $100,000,000 during these three and one-half years.

This is what the present government has accomplished since 1930 in connection with the railways. These economies were made in the best interests of Canada and in the best interests of the employees of the railway. It should not be overlooked that if these economies had not been brought about the employees of the road would have been faced not just with reduced wages but with the prospect of no wages at all. But what whispers do we hear now? Do hon. friends opposite give the government at least some credit for all this? Far from it, sir, because on every occasion both inside and outside the house—and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) is especially good at this—they try to poison the minds of the employees with the suggestion that this government is against the national railways and wants its amalgamation with the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the management of the latter. They state that they as a party are opposed to this. They will not find this such an easy job since the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) has pronounced himself in favour of amalgamation, having said that it is the only salvation of the railways. I am not prepared to go as far as my hon. friend, as I believe that the new board of trustees should be given a chance and a fair trial in the hope that they may be successful in substantially wiping out the deficits. However, I am prepared to say that this country cannot stand much longer a deficit of over $1,000,000 a week in the operation of our railways. The taxpayer cannot and will not stand it. If amalgamation is the only way out of this mess, as pointed out by the hon. member for North Waterloo, we will have it no matter what government is in power, whether Conservative, Liberal or Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The citizens of this country will demand it and the government will have to obey. But I would tell my fellow-citizens that the Liberal party is ninety per cent responsible for the present situation of our national railways. If these railways can be saved from ruin the Conservative party and no one else will save them.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wonder if the house will permit me to refer to an incident which occurred this afternoon. I spoke of a letter of the Department of National Revenue dated February 10, 1934, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) intimated that he thought I was not quoting the letter correctly. I said that I had not the letter and the minister intimated that he had a copy before him. I have since got this letter and I should like to read it in justification of the statement I made. A letter was sent to me by the Commissioner of Customs dated April 23, 1934, in which he stated that he enclosed a copy of representative letters sent by his department to importers dated November 8 and November 22, 1933, and February 10, 1934. I shall just quote the letter to which I specifically referred, the one dated February 10, 1934, which reads:

Gentlemen,—

I have your letter of the 25th ult., relating to the application of fixed values on an importation of jute twine.

The situation is that an appeal has been made to the governor in council from the decision of the tariff board on this question, and until this appeal is heard—and the hearing is expected shortly—the department cannot do otherwise than allow the matter to remain in statu quo and apply the fixed values as heretofore.

Yours truly,

for Commissioner of Customs.

My statement was that the department was insisting on applying the fixed value, disregarding the decision of the tariff board.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, my first word is one of congratulation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for the clearness and frankness with which he laid before the house and the country the situation in which our country is to-day. I should possibly qualify that in one or two particulars. In referring to increases in prices, the minister stated, as reported on page 2270 of Hansard:

As an indication of the extent to which the maladjustments between various price groups have been corrected in Canada, I may add that while the wholesale price index was rising 13.4 per cent, the index for farm prices rose by no less than 34.9 per cent.

I believe the minister based his figures upon the index of February of last year, which belief is to be gathered from the preceding paragraph, but I think a fairer comparison would have been to take the index figures at a normal time rather than at a time when agricultural prices were at their lowest ebb. If that were done, then the percentages would have been very close to or possibly the same as those given this afternoon by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston).

I do not intend to follow the arguments of the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) except as to one remark he made. He stated that the people of Canada would not stand for continued deficits in Canadian National railways account of about one million dollars a week. I have gone through the budget statement of the Minister of Finance pretty carefully, but I do not believe that there is anything in it to help remedy the railway situation. Before our railway situation can improve I believe we shall have to have some traffic for the railways, and so long as our trade is restricted to the extent that it is at the present time then the railways will have nothing to do, or at any rate will have insufficient work to make them pay.

I have also carefully gone through this budget to see whether there is anything in it that may be of particular interest to the people whom I have the honour to represent. I do not think they will be particularly interested in some of the changes that have been made, for instance, the reduction in the tax on beer, ale and porter. There may be a little benefit from the reduction of the excise tax from 3 to 1½ per cent on goods imported under the British preference, but I hardly think that any of the people I represent will benefit in any way by the reduction from $1.50 to 75 cents on champagne and other sparkling wines. They may derive some benefit from the reduction of two cents on postal notes not exceeding $1, but few of them will benefit by the reduction of four cents per hundred or fraction thereof on cigarette tubes. I gather from the newspapers that in connection with the reduction on cigarette tubes it is the opinion of the tobacconists that it will mean no reduction in the price. Whether the newspapers are correct or whether the opinions of those who have been consulted by newspaper reporters is correct, I am not prepared to say. The people however will welcome the reduction of one cent per pound on sugar; we only regret that the budget this year did not wipe out that tax altogether. We realize the difficulty the minister faces in raising revenue; we realize that when he reduced the excise tax on sugar from two cents to one cent per pound he had to find some other means of raising the same amount of taxation, and this apparently he did by putting a tax on gold. In passing, I believe that the tax on gold is a reasonable kind of tax, but I think it should be applied somewhat differently. In my opinion it should be a graded tax, as explained by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) this afternoon. I cannot understand how the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) can object to a graded tax on gold and be in favour of a graded tax on income; the two seem to me to be very similar ways of raising revenue. However, the hon. gentleman objected to it this afternoon; he thought the tax was all right but not high enough.

Under this budget I find that the duties have been raised on three series of articles that may affect the ordinary individual: 278b, crude peanut oil, for refining for edible purposes, used as materials in Canadian manufactures; 537a, rovings, yarns and warps, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres; and 375, ferro-alloys of various kinds. The duties have been lowered on twenty items when imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories, on twenty-seven items or classes of goods imported only for manufacturing or processing purposes, and on five completely manufactured items.

None of the people I represent are particularly interested in any of these changes in the tariff with the exception of completely manufactured goods, and I have looked into the matter to see how far these will benefit any of them. I take the first item, 409e. This item reads:

Fruit and vegetable grading, washing and wiping machines and combination bagging and weighing machines, and complete parts therefor.

Under the old tariff it was free under the preferential, 10 per cent under the intermediate and 10 per cent under the general tariff. Under this budget the rates are the same, but I find that in the old tariff there were items carrying rates of 15 per cent preferential, 27½ per cent intermediate and 35 per cent general. So far as the farmer is concerned however, in the purchase of fruit and vegetable grading, washing and wiping machines, as I read the schedules there has been no change in the tariff affecting him; it has been changed more in the wording of the tariff sections, clarifying the tariff to indicate that farmers will get the goods they require under these rates.

The next item is 410d. This item reads:

Well drilling machinery and apparatus, and complete parts thereof, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and seamless iron or steel tubing over eight inches in diameter, for use exclusively in drilling for water, natural gas and oil, and in prospecting for minerals, but not to include motive power; packer rubbers for oil and gas wells.

This item is free under the three tariffs. In the old schedule it was also free, but packer rubbers for oil and gas wells are added, and under the old tariff that particular item bore rates of 15 per cent preferential, 25 per cent intermediate and 27½ general, and apparently it came under item 618. Now it is included with well drilling machinery. That does not bring any benefit to the people I represent.

Mr. STANLEY: It does to some of the rest of us.

Mr. BOTHWELL: How much did it cost my hon. friend or any of his constituents for packer rubbers?

Mr. STANLEY: It assists some of the people in carrying on their work and in promoting an industry which is of so much importance.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I appreciate the reduction even if it is small and affects only one particular industry. The next item is 445j, electric dry shaving machines, of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use in removing human hair, and complete parts thereof. I do not think our people will be very much interested in that. The next item is 511a, cricket bats, balls, gloves and leg guards. I do not know whom this will benefit. In my youth we used to play cricket a little but at that time we had to make our own bats. I can scarcely recall now how we got the ball or whether there was a duty on it or not, but I can say at any rate that among farmers, who are hardest hit at the present time, there are not many who will be interested in that item. The next item is 597b, harps. Is this an election bait for the Irish? It is free under the preferential tariff.

There is in this schedule one item in which I am rather interested, and that is:

267b. Crude petroleum not in its natural state, ·7250 specific gravity or heavier at 60 degrees temperature, when imported by oil refiners to be refined in their own factories.

The rates are, per gallon, British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, one and one-half cents; general tariff, one and one-half cents. The old rate was: British preferential tariff, one-half cent; intermediate tariff, one and one-half cents; general tariff, one and one-half cents.

A couple of years ago we had considerable discussion on gasoline in the house or in a committee of it. That did not get very far in the house that session, but we are not satisfied with the gasoline situation yet, and when I noticed that item I wondered just the reason for the change in the duty on crude petroleum not in its natural state. I began looking into the matter to find out whence that particular kind of petroleum was coming, and from the Trade of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1933, I find the imports were as follows:

From United Kingdom— British West Indies— Date	Imports gallons
1930	nil
1931	nil
1932	nil
1933	10,849,658

That was imported under the preferential rate.

From Peru—
1929	nil
1930	7,684,088
1931	7,047,497
1932	1,351,595
1933	nil
From Russia—
1929	nil
1930	nil

The Trade of Canada shows nothing for 1932, but the fiscal year ended March 31. The fiscal year 1933, includes from March 31, 1932, and as I understand the situation, some time in the early part or in the summer of 1932 some big shipments of this particular grade of gasoline came in from Russia. I find in the Trade of Canada that 9,963,048 gallons of this particular brand of gasoline were imported from Russia. Then in the fall of 1932 the government apparently thought none of this gasoline should come in from Russia, so they raised the duty on this particular brand from three-tenths, four-tenths and one-half cent per gallon under the various tariff classifications to one-half, one and one-half, and one and one-half cent per gallon. In the latter part of 1932, as I understand the situation, this importation of 10,000,000 gallons came in from Trinidad, in the British West Indies. I am sorry I was not able to get the figures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934, because I expect I would have found that the importations from the British West Indies were still greater in that year. Apparently what happened was this: before the budget came down, I presume the oil companies asked the government for a reduction in the duty. They began to get that particular class of gasoline from the British West Indies and as the gasoline imported under that item is to be imported by oil refiners to be refined in their own factories, nobody else will get the benefit of the reduction. So much for that.

The Minister of Finance in his budget statement realizes the serious position in which many of the people of Canada are to-day. This is shown by his remarks as reported on page 2270 of Hansard where he says:

> For certain individual debtors the burden has become unbearable and the government proposes to bring down at an early stage legislation designed to provide machinery whereby farmers who find themselves unable to pay the fixed charges on their outstanding debts will be able by an expeditious and inexpensive process to work out compromises with their creditors and to obtain new working capital. The guiding principle of this legislation will be to secure for the farmer a simplified debt structure reduced in size to a point where the carrying charges will be within the capacity of the farm enterprise to pay. This will involve some concessions on the part of creditors but these will be more than outweighed by the advantages which will follow as a result of retaining the farmer on the land as a willing and effective producer. The release of economic energy so produced and the substitution of hope and goodwill for despondency and discontent which are now prevalent in certain areas should result in a very real gain to our whole domestic economy.

That shows, I say, an appreciation on the part of the minister that our farmers in particular are in desperate straits. He is also trying to find means of raising revenue, and before I get through I am going to suggest to him one method of doing so which I think he has overlooked. That is, the oil industry should be put on a basis where it will be fair and equitable to all persons in Canada, and then, if the government needs to raise additional taxation, let them do a little taxing there instead of allowing the oil industry to get away with all the profits they are now extorting from the people of Canada. In the first place, dealing with that industry, I want to quote from the Petroleum Products Industry in Canada, 1932, a publication issued by the bureau of statistics under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). I find there that the refineries in Canada used 930,114,055 gallons of crude oil in 1932. Canada in that year produced only about 36,000,000 gallons, or less than four per cent of the crude oil that was used in the refining industry in this country. If there is a necessity for duties in order to maintain that industry which is producing less than four per cent of the crude petroleum used, I think it would be a more equitable way to deal with the matter to bonus that industry rather than to penalize for the benefit of the major oil companies all the people of Canada who use oil and oil products. The significance of the following figures is rather startling.

Petroleum Products Industry

Number of persons employed	5,134	4,116
Salaries and wages	$ 8,190,130	$ 5,980,681
Cost of material	71,800,429	52,237,387
Selling value	91,787,205	71,697,757
Surplus	11,796,646	13,478,689

Those latter figures would not be all profits, but they would include profits. When the prices of raw material dropped as this schedule shows I submit that the cost of other materials entering into the cost of gasoline or lubricants would drop also, so that the main difference between those figures of $11,796,000 for 1930 and $13,478,000 for 1932 would be profit. It shows that between 1930 and 1932 there was a wage cut of $2,209,449 or an average wage reduction per man employed of $142.24. The average yearly wage was reduced from $1,595.27 to $1,453.03. But between 1930 and 1932, although the selling value of the product at the works is some $20,000,000 less, the amount left for profit—or profit and other costs—increased by $1,683,043, which to me indicates that the oil industry, taking advantage of the depression, reduced the wages of their employees and used the money to pay additional profit. That is the only conclusion that one can draw.

I clipped from the Financial Post the record of the three major oil companies operating in Canada, and I want to read a few extracts. Here is the statement of the Imperial Oil Company taken from the Financial Post of April 21, 1934:

> Lands, buildings, plant and other equipment increased from $112,333,827 to $113,457,235 and floating equipment dropped from $12,252,502, to $12,008,380. Against this, reserve for depreciation went up from $54,702,873 to $60,411,958, a gain of $5,709,085 or more than net profits on all Canadian business. Other reserves on fire, marine, cargo and freight insurance, and annuities, increased from $12,538,862 to $12,761,920.

Then we have the British American Oil Company. Here is the heading:

> B. A. Oil Sales Down Somewhat But Earnings Up.
> Company Reduced Bank Loan From $3,000,000 to $1,750,000.
> British American Oil Company's consolidated financial statement shows the company to have increased its gross and net profits in 1933 as compared with 1932, to have increased its earnings on the common stock from 99 cents a share in 1932 to $1.01 a share in 1933, to have reduced its bank loan by $1,250,000 to $1,750,000 and to have redeemed $178,572 of fifteen year five per cent convertible sinking fund gold debentures due 1945, leaving $4,462,500 outstanding.

Then there is another statement, income and surplus account. It shows an increase in the surplus carried forward from $6,810,805 to $7,338,510. The working capital is increased from $3,101,142 to $4,375,227.

I submit that the major oil companies in Canada were making profits prior to the change in the tariff in 1930 and do not need the protection given them now. I remember during the boom days in the west when the cities and towns were filled with real estate agents. Coming down the street in the morning a fellow would meet you and say: "The corner of Second avenue and Main street is sold." "Who bought it"? "One of the banking institutions." Next day you heard about another corner. "What bank bought that?" They knew it was the banks coming in and buying the best corners in the towns. But that is all changed now. You can go through any village, town or city, anywhere in Canada I presume, and you find that most of the best corners are occupied by Imperial Oil, Supertest, British American or some other oil company. The investment in oil stations must be tremendous, and the cost of distribution consequently tremendous. I do not know whether they are hiding their profits in that way, trying to spend their surplus so that they will not have to show excess dividends, but the inference is quite clear as to the position that the major oil companies are in.

Then we get letters like this. Here is one from Prince Rupert comparing prices charged in Prince Rupert and in Alaska:

	Prices per Imperial gallon
	Alaska	Prince Rupert
Gasoline.	17·4c.	24c.
Distillate.	15·6c.	19·5c.
Mobiloil A lubricating oil. . . .	75·6c.	$1.10

The writers of this letter, the Canadian Halibut Fishing Vessel Owners' Association, say:

> From this you will see there is a great deal more difference than is represented by the duty. This we take it, is brought about from the fact that the duty prevents the bringing in of foreign products, consequently the home product has the field, and they not only add the price of duty but as much more as they can get away with. . . . There is absolutely no reason why the price of these products should be any more here than they are in Alaska, particularly as we understand that the Union Oil Co. supply their Alaska station from Vancouver, the same product, as is delivered to their station here.

I have another letter dealing with full diesel tractors. This is written by the Caterpillar Tractor Company:

> One of these tractors sold to Mr. O. B. Lassiter of Chin, Alberta, was able to one-way plough 4,200 acres at a cost of 9 cents per acre for fuel, oil and labour. This result was partly due to Mr. Lassiter's location, as he was able to buy Diesel fuel from the Kevin-Sunburst oilfield in Montana at a price which enabled him to lay it down on his farm for 6¼ cents per gallon. Had he bought a similar fuel from any of the larger Canadian oil companies, he would have paid 12 to 15 cents per gallon. Why this condition should prevail is something of a mystery as Mr. Lassiter paid duty on every gallon he imported. Over and above that, he paid duty and excise tax on the tractor itself which represented an increase of about 40 per cent over the cost of a similar tractor to a farmer living just south of the international boundary. In fact, the charges paid by this farmer over and above the factory price and freight amounts to more than the total fuel cost for 7,000 hours operation on fuel costing 6¼ cents per gallon.

In addition I have a letter from the Craig-Jensen Company in connection with lubricating oil, in which they talk about the dumping duty which has been added. The writer states:

That you may have at hand convenient information in connection with this matter, by obtaining copies from the department of customs manifest No. 2159, which covers shipment of 4,179 imperial gallons of oil (their invoice RS 8762, Freedom Oil Works). You will note that customs charges total $688.65 and this special duty clause accounts for $300.09 of this amount, or 7.18 cents per gallon.

That letter was written on November 5, 1932, after the sales tax of four cents per gallon had been imposed in the United States and added to our price for import purposes. The situation in connection with oil was explained early in the session by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), who told us that he could have purchased gasoline from the Standard Oil Company and the Pan-American Oil Company at 4·89 cents per gallon laid down in Quebec city, without duty or sales tax, while to buy oil from the Imperial Oil Company or the Champlain Oil Company in Montreal would cost 12·50 cents in Montreal plus 2·50 cents for shipping from Montreal to Quebec, or a total of 15 cents per gallon. That price, I presume, would include the sales tax and the duty of 2½ cents per gallon, although I doubt if the Imperial Oil or the Champlain Oil paid any duty.

This difference in price has caused the people of the west to seek for means to obtain cheap fuel. They organized independent oil companies, but I understand that these companies have been bought up by one of the major oil companies or there has been some amalgamation, so that the farmers, through their cooperative associations, are now endeavouring to raise money themselves in order to build an independent oil refinery. I would quote the following dispatch from the Regina Leader Post of March 24, 1934:

Further details of the proposal that farmers' cooperatives establish a $150,000 oil and gasoline refinery in the province will be discussed by directors of the Sherwood Cooperative association at a meeting at 10 o'clock next Wednesday morning in the Sherwood rural municipal building, Cornwall street.

C. O. Smith, president of the association, said details of the plan had been sent to the central cooperative buying association, Saskatoon, for consideration but no reply had been received up to Saturday afternoon.

The plan calls for construction of a refinery at a cost of $75,000 at some central point in the province with an additional $75,000 as operating account.

[Mr. Bothwell.]

Then last year the Saskatchewan legislature endeavoured to take some action. A bill was introduced by Hon. A. C. Stewart, Minister of Highways, in an attempt to stop discrimination in regard to gasoline prices as between different sections of the province. I understand that the bill was introduced because, when an independent oil refinery was constructed, the major oil companies were in a position to cut prices in the territory to be served by that small refinery, and so put it out of business. The object of this bill was to prevent the major oil companies from taking that action. Under the provisions of the bill any company found guilty of discriminatory sales was liable to a fine of not less than $1,000 and not more than $10,000, while any person violating this provision of the act was liable on conviction to a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $500, or to imprisonment. That act was not passed, however.

A move now is under way, for the third time, to get at the small refineries by way of freight rates. A year ago the Canadian railways proposed that any refinery in Canada not reshipping at least sixty-five per cent of its finished product by rail should pay a higher freight rate on its crude oil than the refineries that use the railways for their gasoline distribution. The next proposal was that a higher rate should be charged on crude of 40 gravity or over. The independents claimed that as they used a crude of 40 gravity or over, whereas the big refineries were able to use a lower gravity crude, this proposal was another attempt to put them out of business. The latest move, according to information sent the board of railway commissioners, is that the Canadian railways, through the Canadian Freight Association, have given notice that after June 30, 1934, they will not participate in a through rate on oil from the southern field to Saskatchewan. That is very alarming to those small local refineries remaining in the west, and municipal councils are also alarmed. I should like to read one resolution that has come to me:

The following resolution was passed at the regular meeting of the council of the rural municipality of Miry Creek No. 229, and we are forwarding same to you for your consideration.

1. Whereas there now appears to exist in western Canada a complete monopoly of the oil refining industry as indicated by available statistics and information which show:

(a) That seventy per cent of the stock in the Imperial Oil Company is owned by the Standard Oil of New Jersey.

(b) That prices quoted on all refined oils, whether by the Imperial Oil Company or by any other refining company in western Canada, are the same and do not vary one from the other, pointing to the dictation of such prices by the Imperial Oil Company.

(c) That all refineries in western Canada are owned or controlled either by the Imperial Oil Company or by some other refinery whose prices appear to be governed by those of the Imperial Oil Company.

(d) That the dividends accruing to the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey on their Imperial stock alone are nearly double the whole Canadian payroll of the oil refining industry of Canada, and independent oil distributor having no other source of supply the consuming public is helpless in the hands of this monopoly.

2. And whereas for these reasons there is now no competition in the oil refining industry in western Canada.

3. And whereas crude oils come to the said refineries duty free while the refined gasoline used by the consumer is charged with a duty of 2½ cents per gallon, 1 cent per gallon additional tax, plus 6 per cent sales tax and 3 per cent excise tax; such duty ostensibly for the protection of the Canadian labour, but the profits going out of Canada on Imperial oil stock alone are nearly double the whole payroll earned in the oil industry by Canadian workers.

4. And whereas under the operation of the N.R.A. in the United States the price of crude and refined oils and the cost of labour are controlled so as to practically eliminate the posibility of surpluses of cheap oil products being dumped on the Canadian market.

Therefore be it resolved:

First. That the council of the rural municipality of Miry Creek No. 229 recommend to the government of Canada that all duties be lifted from all refined oil products.

Second. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of National Revenue and the sitting member of this constituency at Ottawa.

I have received a resolution in very much the same terms, passed by the board of trade of Abbey, Saskatchewan.

I trust that the minister and the government will give consideration to this matter and see that justice is done the farming communities which are dependent upon oil and oil products for the successful operation of their industry.

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I join with the other speakers who have congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the clear and concise manner in which he presented the budget.

I hope the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Bothwell) will pardon me if I do not attempt to follow him in his diatribe on gasoline, his pet hobby.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) the official opposition critic, again made a clever legal analysis of the budget, as he usually does, and skilfully skated around most everything which tended to touch on the basic facts of the whole set-up. To my mind this year's budget is not very contentious. It was framed to meet a difficult situation, not to meet popular demand. At the outset of the hon. member's remarks, with great gusto he brought out the fact that the British government, when presenting its budget, has shown a magnificent surplus. Once again he skated around the basic facts when he omitted to say that in the British budget no provision was made for the payment of war debts or the interest on them; consequently when he attempts to compare that surplus with the deficit shown in the Canadian budget he has not been fair. As hon. members are aware, Canada is paying the interest on war and other debts; she has met her obligations in full. Like a voice crying in the wilderness his whole argument was, as last year, based on the assumption that Canada is the only country in the world suffering from the depression. His argument will not register to any great extent with the Canadian people; they know differently; they are not as gullible as they used to be. They are beginning to think for themselves. The people of Canada know that with the exception of relief expenditures practically the whole debt structure was left by a Liberal administration on our doorsteps when we took office. The late Liberal administration, when in power, coasted along on the wave of prosperity like a man in a deep well looking up at the stars. Had they exercised even a little vision and made some attempt to provide for a rainy day instead of embarking upon a wild reckless orgy of spending, purely for political purposes, the problems confronting the present government would have been greatly minimized.

The member for Shelburne-Yarmouth spoke vigorously about the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). We have heard this criticism so often that it is beginning to grow whiskers. I believe any fair-minded Canadian would be quite willing to absolve the Prime Minister from most of those promises, and that even hon. members opposite would be fair enough to admit that in 1930 no one could see what was ahead of Canada. Certainly no one thought the depression would be so intense. All the childish chatter about election promises does not hold any great appeal for the Canadian people. To-day the people are interested in the problems confronting them, and the remedies this government may effect to meet those problems. They are not interested in what happened in the days of William and Mary, at the time of the signing of the Magna Charta, or in a lot of other ancient stuff to which we have been listening. Speaking about trade the hon. member employed the age-worn political trick of using the dollar and cents basis instead of the volume basis for purposes of comparison. He made no allowance for world prices which, every school child knows, fell to almost unheard of levels during the last three years.

There is one portion of his speech, however, with which I find myself in agreement—not wholly, but to some extent—namely that portion in which he referred to the new taxation on the gold mining industry. I have availed myself of every opportunity to oppose this tax. I need not remind hon. members that gold mining in the last three or four years has saved Canada from destruction. I should not have to remind the house that the new gold price has resulted in a great expansion of that industry, not only in that it has attracted fresh capital, but also that it has provided markets for the primary producers and industries of Canada. Old mines which have been closed for years have been revived, shafts dewatered and reopened. Many of these mines were closed down because they could not work at the old price of gold. As a result of the new price there has been intense prospecting. Representing an extensive mining district I am in a position to know that in my constituency hundreds of men are now going into the bush where, in other years, there would not be dozens. This will mean that new finds are going to be made and new mines are going to be brought into being, resulting in added employment.

Then, there is another angle to the situation, namely that even the older mines, and many of the newer ones, are to-day milling ore which only a few years ago they could not afford to handle. My objection to the tax as now constituted is based on the fact that it is a gross tax on the production of gold. I do not think I need remind hon. members that it costs as much to mine and mill a ton of rock with two dollar gold content as it does to mill a ton of rock with fifty dollar gold content. Every dollar which gold expands in price expands industry, and every dollar that the price of gold contracts is bound to contract industry that much. There is no doubt about that. As I said a moment ago, they are now working ore which they could not handle at the old price, and the result has been that thousands of men have been taken out of the relief camps and put back to work.

I am of the opinion that the tax should be graded on a basis somewhat similar to that followed in connection with the income tax, where those best able to pay will pay, and those least able to pay, namely the low grade producers or the base metal producers in connection with which gold is simply a by-product, will not be taxed as heavily.

I have confidence enough in the government to believe that the matter will be given consideration and that the proper adjustments will be made. Possibly the budget may have been drawn in a hurry and all phases of the matter may not have been considered. I sincerely hope the minister and his government will reconsider the whole set-up, and I am quite sure that if they are given proper consideration the miners and prospectors will not hesitate to make further contribution to the well being of Canada.

I was more than pleased to note that the Miinster of Finance intends to bring down legislation in connection with debt adjustment. I do not know what form the legislation will take, but may I say in passing that I believe it is long past due. We know that the western farmers are to-day suffering from loan conditions which are at extreme variance with conditions obtaining when those loans were created. The loans were negotiated with loan companies at abnormally high rates. Loan companies and banks thought the loans were justified and loaned accordingly. Of course, at that time farm prices were good, and through the sale of his products the farmer could take care of his obligations. However, during the past three years the prices of farm products have decreased approximately fifty per cent, and as a result the farmer is carrying on at a loss. Under the circumstances he is not in a position to pay his taxes, interest and so on. Land values are falling and in most cases the amount of the mortgage is in excess of the value of the property involved. Consequently, there is no hope either for the mortgagor or the mortgagee. An adjustment of these conditions is long past due and unless some move is made to wipe out or reduce considerably this burden of interest and accruing interest rates, only chaos can result. The land companies and the banks would be well advised to accept half a loaf and maintain their solvency; otherwise insolvency will result, and any mortgagor or vendor who cannot see this fact is fooling only himself. Had the land companies and the banks taken this action voluntarily months ago, the debt legislation which the western provinces have brought down and which this government is going to bring down would have been unnecessary. The legislation brought down in the west will prevent most mortgagees from obtaining anything like the full amount of their claims.

I was pleased to hear the minister state that the government intends to inaugurate a public works program. We have been looking for this for some time and to my mind it is the only way to bring about prosperity. Our people will be put back to work and payrolls will be created to be passed around to everyone.

I was pleased at the move of the government in bringing down a central bank bill. I am sure this legislation was a great shock to our friends on the other side of the house. They have been going through this country from coast to coast telling everybody that this government was the great friend and champion of the banks and financial interests. Anyone who has studied this legislation will know that it is not very popular with the banks. Some of our Liberal friends have gone so far as to say that the Conservative party is going red. If what we are doing is red, then I am glad to be on this side of the house. If anyone had told me that the government would bring in a central bank bill which would take over the entire gold reserves of the banks at the old price, I would have said that they had one more guess coming. But the government has done this, which shows that it is prepared to meet courageously and without fear the situation which confronts it.

From day to day we hear in this house another argument which has grown whiskers, the argument of the usurpation of power and the utter disregard of constitutional rights. May I say that the people of this country are not interested in that sort of childish chatter, and the sooner hon. members opposite get that into their heads, the better it will be for them. Hon. members opposite do not seem to realize that we are facing new conditions. Once the march of progress is started, you can do no more to stop it than you can stop the tide coming in and going out. In my considered opinion the greatest enemies which any political party can have are those orthodox members within its ranks. We are facing changed conditions and we must change accordingly. Any government which refuses to remake and reshape itself to meet those conditions is going to cease to exist; do not make any mistake about that.

If there are any doubting Thomases in this house who do not believe in the intentions of the government, I ask them to withhold their criticism until all the legislation is brought down. If they have any doubts as to the courage of this government to bring down the necessary legislation to bring about the happy conditions for which we are all looking, let them wait.

The marketing bill which the government has brought down has received a great deal of attention. Once again we have met with considerable opposition from the other side. Why this has happened, I do not know. Even the western members are talking against it and I would like to know how they will talk when they get back to their constituents. I think some of them will back track a little. I noticed they were labouring somewhat when they got up in the house to talk against the bill. This is probably one of the most revolutionary pieces of legislation ever brought before this house.

Mr. NEILL: Revolutionary is right.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I am glad to be a member of the government which has brought in this legislation, and I am going to support it with all the force I can. This bill was prepared after a careful three year study of the problems confronting the primary producers, particularly the producers of agricultural products. We cannot do very much with wheat because the ramifications in connection with that commodity are considerable. Because of the conditions prevailing in the world markets, this would be very difficult. Once again let me remind the house that the government has not lacked courage in handling the wheat problem of this country. I think hon. members must admit that, whether or not they agree with the methods adopted. This marketing bill is proposed to regulate production where there is overproduction. We know that production beyond a possible hope of sale or consumption is poor business and can bring only chaos.

Some very prominent men in this country —I do not hesitate to mention one leading Conservative in the west, Mr. Sanford Evans —and other so-called economists condemn all co-operative movements. Being so closely associated with the grain exchange I do not attach importance to the position he has taken. In attacking this act some hon. members opposite have spoken of legitimate business. As far as I am concerned, there is only one business that is legitimate, and that is the one in which the producer receives a fair return for his labour and investment. This bill is framed to permit the marketing of our surplus in an orderly manner, both at hame and abroad. It is framed for one purpose only, to provide a fair price to both producer and consumer. When I drive along Wellington Crescent in Winnipeg, one of the principal streets, and see the mansions which have been built from profits taken from the farmers, I cannot help but think that this legislation is long overdue. I am not one of those who believe that prosperity can be restored by raids on the public treasury, but we are facing a new era and we must meet it with advanced ideas in legislation, and that is what this government is doing.

I have spoken at greater length than I had intended. I rose to make a few remarks on the budget, particularly in connection with the mining tax in which I am greatly interested. For several weeks we have been meeting in this chamber but we have not made very much headway. I have been sitting here wondering why, in times like this, we in this house who are all, I think, deeply interested in the welfare of this country, cannot shake off this political leprosy which threatens to destroy us at this time and get away from this holy show of parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): We should try to make this Canada of ours the great country which such eminent statesmen as Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier thought it would and should be. In brief, I think it is about time this parliament got down to business.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (South Huron): In rising to make a few observations on this 1934 budget, I hope that my hon. friend opposite will not consider me discourteous if I do not follow him in his remarks. I need hardly say to the members of this house that this is only the second time I have had the privilege of hearing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) deliver his budget address. One year ago it was my privilege to hear the hon. gentleman deliver an address when introducing his 1933 budget which I think, for composition and for delivery, should go down in the records of this house comparing favourably with any address given by any of our previous ministers of finance. I think the present minister deserves our congratulations on the very efficient way in which his budget is prepared and also on the excellent manner in which he delivers his address, and I want to assure my hon. friend that it was a pleasure to me to have had the privilege of listening to his address one year ago, as it also was a pleasure to have the privilege of listening to his address again on Wednesday last.

I shall always look back on that address of last year as one of the outstanding incidents in my first experience as a member of this House of Commons. I remember very well I had a great deal of sympathy with the minister at that time because I did feel that he was introducing in his budget many things which he must have known were going to affect seriously many citizens in a way in which I am sure he had no desire to see them affected. Indeed, I remember that on one occasion, when we were discussing the items of that budget in committee, the Minister of Finance was visibly affected by some criticism to the effect that he did not care what certain classes of our citizens had to contend with or the hardships they had to endure. I want to be fair to the minister and I may say that I did not share in that criticism, because I believe that he is a very humane person and has an interest in and a great deal of anxiety for all classes of citizens. Naturally therefore I had a good deal of sympathy with him because I felt that circumstances had placed him in a position where he was advocating a policy which was going to have an effect that ordinarily he would have no desire to see brought about.

I recall also one incident when we were discussing the budget in committee last year. The question was asked the minister as to what he expected the saving would be through the reduction in the salaries of civil servants and others. He replied that he estimated that the saving would be approximately $8,000,000. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) immediately rose and asked the minister then the question what he estimated the loss in revenue would be through the reduction on two articles of luxury, namely, cigarettes and liquor. Again the minister's answer was that, with the same volume of business, it would be approximately $8,000,000. In other words, the saving that was effected by the reduction in the salaries of civil servants and others was going to be entirely offset by the reduction in the tax on these two articles of luxury. I think that is certainly reversing the order of things, because I believe it is the duty of governments to see that there is no reduction on any article of luxury if such reduction means an increase on articles which are the very necessities of life.

Now there were in that budget of last year certain things which were bound to create a great deal of criticism throughout the country, and that is particularly true in regard to the tax that was imposed on sugar. I am very glad to see that the government have realized their mistake in placing the tax on that commodity and have reduced it by at least fifty per cent. It did seem to me that the tax was quite unjustifiable in view of the fact, as I have pointed out before, that there was a reduction to a great extent on two articles of luxury. It was manipulation such as this that created a great deal of criticism and discussion all over the country.

I remember that when discussing the budget last year I made the statement that it was a typical Tory budget, its outstanding features being taxes, tariffs and deficits; and having had an opportunity of conversing with my constituents since that time I have found that I was expressing the opinion of the great majority of them when I made that statement.

There was another thing that received a good deal of discussion last year and about which there were many complaints, and that was the advantage that many had gained at the expense of the government by what was supposed to be a leak in connection with the tax that was intended to be and actually was placed on sugar. From all parts of the country complaints came pouring in with regard to this so-called leak, and I believe the minister did endeavour to locate the source of it. Whether he was successful in that task I do not know, but I do know that the people resented information of that kind being spread abroad before the actual presentation of the budget itself. I am glad to know that nothing of that sort is occurring this year, and I think the minister should be congratulated on that.

If we go back to the last federal election we cannot help remembering the promises and predictions made by members of the government as to what would happen if they were given control of the country's affairs; and bearing those promises and predictions in mind it is certainly interesting to review what has actually taken place in the presentation of the various budgets that have been brought down by this government. If we turn to the 1931 budget, which was the first one introduced by the present government, we find that taxation began immediately to increase. That budget was introduced by the Prime Minister, who was acting as Minister of Finance, and almost his first words were to announce a duty on tea, an increase in the postage stamp tax, a raising of the sales tax from one to four per cent, the levying of a tax on coal, and burdening us with numerous other forms of taxation such as increases in the tariff on many essential articles, all of which placed a burden on the people at a time when they were least able to bear such a burden. There is no doubt that this had a very depressing effect not only on business in Canada but on every citizen. But if I may put the matter in this way, there was a silver lining to the dark cloud that was settling over the Canadian people at that time because the Prime Minister was then introducing a real budget, something which, according to our hon. friends opposite, had not been done for some time. The silver lining to this dark cloud was the fact that those increased taxes were going to provide the government with a splendid surplus at the end of the fiscal year and with this assurance of course the people took courage and went forward to meet the financial burden which they know lay before them. But what happened at the end of that year? Imagine the consternation of the people when at the end of the year they found not the expected surplus but a very substantial deficit, and, according to the public accounts, an increase in the public debt of some $114,000,000!

Now we come to the 1932 budget which was introduced by the present Minister of Finance and which included further additional burdens of taxation. Indeed, it was conceded, I think, to be one of the most burdensome budgets so far as taxation was concerned, that was ever submitted to the house. But once more the country was led to believe that with the additional taxation imposed at that time it would have a surplus at the end of the fiscal year. In that budget the sales tax was increased from four to six per cent; there was an increase in the excise tax on cheques, telegrams, railway tickets, long distance telephone calls and almost everything one could imagine. But after all the additional taxes that were imposed by that budget, what did we find at the end of the year? We found not the expected surplus but a very substantial deficit and again, according to the public accounts, an increase in the public debt of some $220,000,000.

That brings as to the 1933 budget and we will remember the additional taxes that were imposed last year. The minister in his address on Wednesday last had to announce another deficit and another addition to the public debt of some $135,000,000. The point I wish to make is that notwithstanding all the promises, arguments and predictions that were made as to what would happen were the present government returned to power, we have found in each and every budget presented by the government in comparison with the 1930 budget, the last one introduced by the Liberal party, increased taxation, increases in the public debt, increases in tariffs, in fact, an increase all along the line. That is not a new experience for our hon. friends opposite or for the party they represent, because if we review the record of the Conservative party since confederation, we find that only four times have they been able to show a reduction in the public debt, as the following figures will show:

Year	Reduction in public debt
1871	$ 503,000
1882	1,734,000
1912	122,000
1913	25,617,000

On the other hand we find that the party represented by those who sit on this side of the house, the Liberal party, have had eleven years in which they have been able to show a very substantial reduction in the public debt, as follows:

Year	Reduction in public debt
1900	$ 779,000
1903	10,222,000
1904	730,000
1907	3,371,000
1924	35,993,000
1925	345,000
1926	27,706,000
1927	41,896,000
1928	50,984,000
1929	71,345,000
1930	47,740,000

I think we ought also to point out that the Liberal party have controlled the affairs of the country for some twenty-nine years since confederation, while the Conservative party and union governments have been in control for thirty-eight years. The point I would like to make there is that the Conservative party have had more opportunities to show what they were able to do in a financial way than have the party on this side of the house. That represents a true picture of the financial accomplishments of the two parties.

Much has been said in regard to our trade with the United States. I remember very well during the last federal campaign the amount of discussion that took place as to our unfavourable balance of trade. It was stated in my constituency that if this government were returned to power, that unfavourable balance would be wiped out. What do we find has happened since this government has come into power? Notwithstanding all the trade barriers that have been in effect and notwithstanding the rate of exchange which has existed and which in itself has been a very substantial tariff, we find that for the years 1931, 1932 and 1933 there is still an unfavourable balance of trade of an average of $138,000,000 per annum. There is something significant in that; I think it proves conclusively that our natural market for much of our basic produce lies to the south of us. In view of that I still believe it would be splendid if these two countries could get together and agree on some reciprocal trade arrangement which would be mutually beneficial.

[Mr. Golding.]

I fully appreciate the fact that the present government has done its utmost to control imports by raising tariffs, by imposing the dumping duty and by every other method possible, but apparently it forgets that it is quite impossible to reduce imports without at the same time reducing our exports, and our trade figures are grim reminders of this indisputable fact. I would like to put on Hansard our trade figures just to show how, as the imports were reduced, exports were reduced in almost the same proportion:

Year—	Imports	Exports
1923	$ 802,000,000	$ 945,000,000
1924	893,000,000	1,058,000,000
1925	796,000,000	1,081,000,000
1926	927,000,000	1,328,000,000
1927	1,030,000,000	1,267,000,000
1928	1,108,000,000	1,250,000,000
1929	1,265,000,000	1,388,000,000
1930	1,248,000,000	1,144,000,000
1931	906,000,000	817,000,000
1932	587,000,000	587,000,000
1933	406,000,000	480,000,000
1934 (est.)	443,000,000	579,000,000

Looking at those figures one sees that as the imports were reduced exports were reduced correspondingly. The figures tell their own story, and demonstrate the point I have been endeavouring to make.

When we remember the bitter and extreme criticism that was directed against the Liberal government in the last federal campaign, how our friends opposite were almost in tears over the alleged neglect of the interests of the farmers, and how they blamed and condemned the Liberal party for not securing more markets and higher prices for their products; and when we see now articles and interviews in the press endeavouring to show the splendid trade that they say is being built up between the United Kingdom and Canada, I think it would be well for us to turn back the pages to recall the volume of trade that existed between Canada and the United Kingdom at the very time to which this criticism relates. I was interested in the campaign in our own constituency, and I took particular notice of the arguments advanced by the supporters of our hon. friends opposite. What do we find was the condition that existed at that time? In 1930 our imports from the United Kingdom amounted to $189,000,000 and exports to $283,000,000. That is the time at which this criticism was aimed against us. In 1933 imports had fallen to $86,000,000 and exports had also fallen to $185,000,000. For the present year, when all this splendid trade is said to have been built up, returns for eleven months indicate that imports amounted to $95,000,000 and exports to $204,000,000, far from approaching the values of 1930.

There is another feature I wish to touch on. I have noticed that the comparisons of trade figures sent out by the Department of Trade and Commerce are made between the years 1933 and 1932. In view of the arguments made in 1930 I submit that comparison should be between 1933 and 1930. That is the year when the promise was made that the wrongs of the Canadian people would be righted. That is the year when, as I said, our hon. friends were almost in tears—

Mr. McINTOSH: Crocodile tears.

Mr. GOLDING: —owing to the terribly low prices that the farmer was receiving for his produce. That is the year the Liberal party was condemned in every way, shape and form for its alleged neglect to secure markets for farm products. And in view of all the arguments at that time I think anyone who is at all fair will agree that all comparisons should now be made between the years 1930 and 1933.

I need hardly say that I do not wish to be too critical of the actions of the government. I fully realize that they are having their difficulties and troubles and have many hard problems to face. I believe that in their way they are endeavouring to give the best service they can. That service, whether we realize it or not, is taking its annual toll. One need only look at the change in the personnel of the federal and provincial cabinets of this country to realize the toll that is being taken from year to year, the price that is being paid by those who are endeavouring to carry the burden and responsibility of government. Therefore I do not want it to appear that I am not sympathetic with our hon. friends opposite or anyone else who is carrying such a responsibility. I have every sympathy for them. But I believe they are pursuing a wrong course, a wrong policy, and they are making their task all the more difficult by so doing. As a representative of a rural constituency it is my duty to oppose any policy which I believe is not in the best interests of the country. I think I can fully appreciate the position of the government in regard to the expansion of trade; practically every country in the world is engaged in this policy of tariff competition. We have entered the scrap also, and it is this policy which is so seriously affecting not only the trade of Canada but the trade of every country in the world. In the interests of the farming community of this country it is absolutely necessary that the tariff on commodities that the agriculturist uses should come down. I am perfectly satisfied that that has to come about. I have been rather amused since I became a member of this house by arguments advanced by some hon. members opposite. Some tell us that as far as the two old parties are concerned there is little or no difference in their outlook in regard to tariffs. I have heard hon. members on the government side endeavour to show that the average tariff has increased very little since the present government took office. On the other hand the Prime Minister frankly and honestly tells this house and the country that they saved the situation by imposing tariffs of unprecedented height. Both these arguments cannot be right. I attended many meetings in our constituency during the last federal election, and if I understood the English language at all correctly, those representing the party on the other side tried to make the people believe that they were going to save the situation if they were elected by imposing higher and still higher tariffs.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Prohibitive tariffs.

Mr. GOLDING: I think the Prime Minister tells the truth when he tells the house and the country that that is what he did. That is one promise at any rate that he carried out.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The only one.

Mr. GOLDING: The imperial economic conference provided a splendid opportunity for this country and for the British empire to set an example to the world by reducing tariffs. It is well known that at the opening of that conference the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin expressed the hope that that would be done. But we all know that the very opposite took place, and I refuse to believe that that has not seriously affected our trade prospects in more ways than one. It is all right to tell us of the splendid trade we are building up between the British empire and ourselves; that is all very fine, but let me say once more that I am satisfied that many markets to which we might have had access have been closed to us to a certain degree at any rate as a result of the action taken at that conference.

There is another point on which I should like to touch for a few moments; that is the problem of our debt. I must confess that last year I was disappointed with the action taken by the government in regard to the loan floated at that time; I did think the interest rates would have been lowered to a much greater extent than was the case. I believe this whole debt problem must be dealt with in a courageous way. Interest rates in this country must come down if we are going to come through, and I stand solidly behind any policy which will bring about a readjustment of our whole debt structure. Australia tackled this problem in a manly way; the United Kingdom did likewise, and there is no question but that their position has been very materially improved as a result. I see no reason in the world why we in Canada should not endeavour courageously to deal with this problem also.

The debt of our country, federal, provincial and municipal, is increasing at an alarming rate. This is particularly true in regard to our federal debt. What is the use of the government boasting of how splendidly they have come through the depression when practically everything that has been done has been accomplished with borrowed money? What is the use of boasting of our splendid balance of trade when we are being swallowed by the quicksands of debt? I think the financial critic of the Liberal party, speaking on the budget this afternoon, made the statement that the increase in the national debt since this government came into power amounted to something like $596,000,000. We can hardly conceive that this amount has been added to our national debt. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) gave the members of this house something to speak about when he pointed out, during the course of an address not so very long ago, that since the war, in interest charges alone, this country has paid the enormous sum of over $1,900,000,000. These are staggering statements, and I think the government should give serious consideration to this whole debt problem.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there are other problems to which serious consideration should be given in order to give our people a chance to come through. The various governments of this country should take immediate steps to deal with the problem of the cost of government in Canada. This may require changes in the British North America Act; if so, well and good. I am quite satisfied, however, that it is the general opinion among all classes of citizens that we are being governed and legislated to death. It does not matter where you go, whether it is on the street, in the church, on the farm, in the factory or in business places; you hear this matter discussed by everyone, and it is a problem with which the Canadian people will have to deal. In my opinion a committee should be set up by the federal and provincial governments which should be representative of business, industry and the great masses of the people, to investigate and report as to the solution of what I consider to be one of our greatest problems. I do not know that it would not be beneficial to have all politicians excluded from that committee, in the interests of the Canadian people; that is my opinion.

Now I should like to say just a few words in regard to the Liberal policy in connection with external trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that we have no policy. Let me give the policy behind which we stand, which was announced in this house by our leader:

The Liberal party believes that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development, and that Canada needs trade.

It will promote trade with all nations and negotiate trade agreements with any countries willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis.

It will abolish the extravagant increases in the tariff made by the present administration, which have had the effect of strangling trade, exploiting consumers and robbing railways of business.

It will abolish all unwarranted extra taxes on imports, such as the exchange and dumping duties, as imposed by the present administration.

It will end the making and altering of tariffs by executive action.

It will substitute stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs laws.

It will continue the Liberal policy of British preference by a percentage reduction in existing tariffs rather than by a percentage increase against foreign countries in existing tariffs.

It will grant to British imports a real preference.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, while hon. gentlemen opposite may take a great deal of credit for having put through the empire treaties and having practically forced the United Kingdom to adopt the policy of protection, I am satisfied that it will not be very long before they deeply regret having done so. I have been reading and watching the developments in the United Kingdom, and I am sorry to say that in my own mind I am persuaded that we are going to be up against a stone wall before many years have passed so far as the export of our products is concerned.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medcine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue this debate I should like to say first that we were all delighted to hear the genial Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) say in no uncertain terms that he saw some signs of reviving confidence, of increasing revenues and of business improvement. It will be the prayer and hope of the Canadian people that these signs may materialize and that the trend may continue to be upward until the spectres of want poverty, privation and unemployment are banished from our land.

I do not wish to quote numerous figures on this occasion, but for a few moments I should like to present the human interest side of the problems and to suggest some of the solutions which might be applied to them. While we are emerging from the depression the time is surely opportune for us to take stock of our assets, to investigate the weak spots in our system, and in the light of the experience gained to make such remedies and so to build for the future that our children will not suffer the economic defeat which is upon us at the present time. In looking backward at what might be called the man-power age we find that in the past the fear of scarcity was ever before the people. It was uppermost in their consideration, and it was the chief guide to the conduct of mankind. For centuries the struggle for existence, the struggle for the necessities of life, required drudgery, hard work and long hours of labour, and the stress and strain of that exertion did much to bring premature old age upon the people. We find that the span of life has been increased from about forty to about fifty-eight years. This to some extent is due to modern health methods, but to no small degree it is due to the fact that it is no longer necessary for people to labour so hard in order to get a bare living. There is no doubt that the hard living certainly caused the breaking down of the arterial system. Of recent years however machines have been invented to do the drudgery and the uninteresting and difficult tasks which in other days were done by hand labour. Men have succeeded in harnessing steam power, water power and electricity, so that in these days machines have solved the production problem. Professor Soddy has estimated that since the introduction of mechanical power the productive capacity of Great Britain has increased by 4,000 per cent. This, however, has brought its problems. It is regarded as the arch enemy of the unemployed, because as the machines developed so the requirements for labour fell. This is why so many people feel that machines have taken away their means of livelihood.

A few examples might be cited. One man in a glass factory in charge of a bottle making machine displaced fifty-four men, and another man with the aid of a cigarette wrapper has displaced as many as one hundred men. This problem has brought about the paradox of poverty amid plenty. There is very clear evidence of that condition. Ogden L. Mills of the United States made this observation:

> The paradox of poverty amid plenty will never be solved by doing away with plenty.

Economists tell us that our distribution system is at fault, and that production has far outstripped distribution in the race. Science, behind closed doors in laboratories and research departments, has made it possible to harness machine power, and people were unprepared for such great advances. The advance came upon them so quickly that the distribution was found to be obsolete, although heretofore it had worked satisfactorily. And so we have the paradox of on the one hand hungry stomachs and on the other great stores of food. In a book entitled Looking Forward, President Roosevelt makes this statement:

> It is common sense to take a method and try it. If it fails admit it frankly and try another. The millions who are in want will not stand by silently forever while the things to satisfy their needs are within easy reach.

Those who have suffered most from the depression are the people living in the remote rural parts of the country. They still have to undertake laborious tasks. The men, women and children have to work hard. Machinery has helped them but little, and in many cases has been their undoing. All hon. members recognize that in Canada a greater number of people are engaged in agriculture than are engaged in any other industry. Agriculture is said to be the most important industry, and as a result the slogan has arisen, "If you can save agriculture you can save all." When the present government came into office the prices of farm products were falling. Perhaps they could not help that, but from that day to this the farmers have been greatly handicapped because they have had to sell their products at prices lower than production costs. Wheat which was costing them sixty cents to produce had to be sold for forty or forty-five cents. Cattle which cost five and a half cents per pound to raise were sold at from two cents to three cents, and sometimes as low as one and a half cents. While such a condition exists there can be no hope, because nothing but chaos stands before the primary producers.

When the present government took office they could not control the fall of farm prices, but they should have so planned that the little money the farmer did receive would go farther. They should have planned a reduction in the prices of other commodities so that those prices would harmonize with the prices received for farm produce. The government failed in that respect. On the contrary they increased tariffs on barbed wire and cream separators, commodities which probably since confederation, had entered this country free of duty. A duty of ten per cent was levied against barbed wire and of twenty-five per cent against cream separators. The duties on binders, drills, cultivators and a long list of other agricultural products were increased from six per cent or seven and a half per cent right up to twenty-five per cent. The duties on cotton and woollen goods were increased from twenty and twenty-four per cent to forty and forty-six per cent. These increased tariffs failed to reduce commodity prices; in fact, they had the very opposite effect. This factor, together with the adverse exchange rate, which lowered the prices still further, has impoverished the farming community to the point where, in the district from which I come, people are asking that some of the surplus wheat be ground and shipped to them so that they may have feed for their stock.

I wish to suggest one method by which the government might attempt a solution of this problem. We have heard a good deal about the manner in which other countries have helped their farmers. We have heard how foreign wheat and agricultural products have been shut out by high import duties and bonuses. These measures have been taken in the United States, France, Italy, Germany and other European countries. We in Canada have not given our farmers the same treatment. True, one year they were given a bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat, but we find that a sister country within the empire, namely Australia, has given nine cents a bushel and given it continuously. Through Mr. McFarland efforts have been made to stabilize the price of wheat but as yet we do not know what effect these will have. We are facing desperate conditions because agriculture is in a desperate situation. Surely we are not bankrupt in salesmanship, and I suggest that we approach these countries which have been good customers of ours in days gone by and say to them: We produce the products of the farm, of the mine, of the lake, of the sea and of the forest; we are equipped to transport and to store those products; you have your old-age industries which have learned to produce certain articles very cheaply; will you not exchange with us some of the products of your industries in return for some of our products? This would do something to increase world trade, and we all know that the hard times came to Canada when world trade fell off. According to the figures given by the minister, in 1930 our total trade was $2,393,212,000, while this year it will probably be only $1,019,459,000, less than half. Surely these countries could be persuaded not to take men from the factories and put them on the land where at great expense and with great effort they produce the lowest grade of wheat from land which is most unsuited for agriculture.

[Mr. Gershaw.]

In closing I wish to bring to the attention of the minister one other way in which the people on the farms might be greatly benefited. I refer to the sugar beet industry. In southern Alberta the economic welfare of many thousands of families depends upon this industry. The growing of sugar beets in southern Alberta has definitely passed the experimental stage; it is now an accomplished fact. This particular part of the country is specially suited for the growing of sugar beets with a high sugar content. With irrigation, with the fertile soil and with the sunshine for which this section is noted, the possibilities of this crop are almost unlimited. But progress in this connection has been almost at a standstill. In 1911 Canada produced 29,000,000 pounds of sugar from sugar beets, and twenty-two years later the production had risen to only 132,000,000 pounds. Each year we consume in Canada 939,000,000 pounds of sugar. I should like to read an extract from a London, England publication, entitled Empire Production. It reads as follows:

> The prairie provinces themselves import $10,000,000 worth each year. This might well be supplied by six or seven more factories like that at Raymond cultivating from sixty to seventy thousand acres, giving employment to 5,000 farmers, 8,000 hand labourers and 2,000 factory workers and using each year 125,000 tons of coal, 1,500,000 sugar bags, 30,000 tons of lime rock, 3,000 tons of coke, 200 tons of soda ash and large supplies of other materials.

The British investor has been very patriotic. He has been willing to pour his money into many parts of the British Empire but the investments he has made in Canada have proved unprofitable. Through the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Southern Alberta Land Company, British and other investors have invested $35,000,000 in irrigation projects. The future of that section depends upon the success of these projects, and the success of these projects depends upon the growing of sugar beets. Other types of farming cannot be carried on successfully. Irrigation farming means diversified and intensive farming. The method of summer fallowing which is used in working dry land is not feasible with irrigated land, as the water takes out that which summer fallowing will not restore. It is also too expensive to leave half the land idle in summer fallowing. A rotation of cultivated crops is required, and in that particular region the sugar beet is the only root crop which can be profitably grown. Experiments have been made with the soya bean, but they have not proved satisfactory as it has been impossible to find a species which will grow. The growing of sugar beets would give employment to a great many people if factories could be established to manufacture the sugar. The one factory which we have distributes $1,800,000 annually in the purchase of supplies. I have frequently quoted the findings of the committee which sat in 1932, and I should like to quote again the final finding of that committee. It was:

Your committee further recommends that if no successful attempt is made in the immediate future by the refineries to increase the facilities for the manufacture of beet sugar the government should take into consideration steps to accomplish this end.

What we need is not an increased capacity by the one factory we have but the establishing of a number of factories spaced over a wide area. Why has production been so slow in Canada? At the present time we manufacture something like fourteen per cent of the sugar we consume, and I should like to give some of the things which are required to increase our production of sugar. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on Hansard some of the particulars of the assistance which Great Britain has given to her sugar beet growers.

The subsidies paid by Great Britain are as follows:

Year—	Amount
1925	£1,250,000
1926	3,225,859
1927	5,400,000
1928	4,250,000
1929	4,250,000
1930	6,022,972
1931	2,375,000
1932	2,400,000
1933	3,350,000
1934 (estimated)	3,300,000

Every country in the world has helped its sugar beet industry. If this industry is to prosper there should be some adjustment made in freight rates and the five refineries throughout Canada should endeavour to expand their production of beet sugar in accordance with the recommendations of the committee. In order to have an economic unit you must have a mill costing about $1,250,000 with a capacity of 1,200 tons per day. You need freight protection, and there should be some arrangement by which the refineries now enjoying the market exclusively would be forced to expand sufficiently to manufacture beet sugar in the districts in which beets are grown. Also a campaign is needed to persuade people to use beet instead of cane sugar. I have brought these things to the attention of the house because I believe that in that part of the country from which I come this is one factor which provides the greatest help in the welfare of the country.

On motion of Mr. Simpson (Algoma) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 24, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 59, for the relief of Archibald Bruce Elliott Smart.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 60, for the relief of Lilac Violet Grumbell Reid.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 61, for the relief of Lily Archer Watson.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 62, for the relief of Annie Isabel Tinning Meldrum.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 63, for the relief of Lois Theresa Malcolm.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

WASHOUT AT MATAPEDIA, BONAVENTURE COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I wish to thank the Minister of Railways and Canals for his kind attention to the matter to which I directed his notice the other day regarding the interruption of service at Matapedia on the Canadian National railway. I understand from press dispatches that there is some improvement. I would like to know from the minister whether there is any further information.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have been more or less in touch with the matter and I have sent to my hon. friend and also to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), who have been inquiring, a number of statements regarding it. To-day the report from Montreal is that the flood at Matapedia has subsided, the track has been repaired and the trains are running on regular schedule.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Friday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; when on Thursday the 19th instant this measure came up for second reading, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), at the outset of his remarks, in reply to mine, raised a point of order. This will be found on page 2352 of Hansard:

Hon. H. H. Stevens (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Before I address myself, Mr. Speaker, to a discussion of the measure before the house I should like to raise the point of order whether the amendment submitted by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) is in order, inasmuch as it constitutes what might be termed a declaration of policy, instead of offering reasons why consideration of the bill should not be proceeded with or should be postponed, or proposing something else germane to the actual motion before the house. I do not raise the point of order with the view of getting an immediate ruling but would request Your Honour to give it consideration, and my remarks also will serve to give hon. gentlemen opposite notice of the point of order.

What I wish to point out now is that thus far there has been no opportunity to discuss the point of order which has been raised and I hope before Your Honour gives a ruling you will see that such an opportunity is given to hon. members.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this would be a proper time to discuss the point of order and if any hon. member wishes to address the chair on it, I shall be glad to hear him. I have been giving the matter a good deal of attention since it has come up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to submit that the amendment is entirely in order. In doing so I wish first of all to distinguish clearly between the purposes and the principles of the bill. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself noted the distinction between purpose and principle when in speaking on this measure in the house on March 26 he said as reported on page 1809 of Hansard:

In moving his resolution the minister is not supposed to do more than to state the general purposes of the measure. On the introduction of his bill, when asked, as I understand the rules he should, he may give a succinct statement indicating the general purposes of the legislation, and the principles to be crystallized into legislative form.

I draw attention to the distinction which the Prime Minister very properly made, and at that time drew to the attention of the house, between the purposes of the legislation and the principles to be crystallized into legislative form. The Prime Minister further said as reported on page 1810:

The motion for second reading will involve the approval or the disapproval of the general principle indicated by the bill.

A little further on he said:

But general legislation, upon which the government has determined its policy, is usually submitted to a committee of the whole house.

And the government pursuing the intention therein expressed has in mind I understand submitting the bill to a committee of the whole house rather than sending it to a standing committee. In other words, the government has decided its policy as it is expressed in the legislation, and there is not open for further discussion in committee the question of policy with respect to its provisions as was the case for example in connection with the bill respecting the creation of a central bank. In that case the Minister of Finance made it quite clear that the question whether there was to be public or private ownership of shares, or public or private control, was a perfectly open matter, something that could be discussed in the committee to which the bill would be sent. But in this case, in the light of what the Prime Minister has said, the government has indicated by its action in not permitting the bill to go to a standing committee, and the reasons given by the Prime Minister therefor, that the principles embodied in the legislation indicate the government's final policy.

At the time of submitting the amendment I was careful to look up Your Honour's previous rulings in the house, to see that the amendment that was moved would be in order. I would like to read the amendment itself and then Your Honour's latest ruling on a question of order in the case of an amendment on second reading, to see if the amendment does not give ample evidence of being entirely in order. The amendment is:

This house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation, and which confers upon a minister of the crown and upon the governor in council unprecedented authority and unusual powers to restrict production, and interprovincial, inter-Imperial, and foreign trade as regards both exports and imports, as well as other autocratic powers.

Your Honour in ruling the other evening in regard to a measure before the house, the last I think on which Your Honour gave a ruling, namely that relating to the freight rates bill, drew attention under standing order 75 in regard to second reading to citation 755, as set forth in Beauchesne which is as follows:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, ...

My purpose in moving that amendment was to give special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of the bill, and in so doing I therefore moved an amendment which would be declaratory of some principle which is adverse to the principles and policy and provisions of the bill.

As to what are the principles, policies and provisions of the bill, there can be no mistake, once one looks at the measure. As I have said, the purpose of the bill as set forth in the title is to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products and export trade by means of regulation. Regulation is a method, a process, a matter of procedure, not a principle. Regulation is a purpose which all parties in this house hold in common. That is not the principle of the bill, any more than the establishment of a dominion marketing board as such is the principle of the bill. The purpose of the bill is that of regulating and improving production—

Mr GUTHRIE: If I may ask a question; suppose my right hon. friend's amendment were to carry, what would become of the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The second reading could be revived later on. The amendment declares, in the meantime, for its being based on a principle that is adverse to that which hon. gentlemen opposite have embodied in the legislation. The amendment would mean that the bill would not now be read a second time et cetera. May I go on and refer to the question of the principle? Without any question the principle of this bill—one of its principles—is to take away from parliament and to entrust to bodies delegated for the purpose the right of making regulations which would have the force of law and be enforceable by fine and imprisonment; to take that power away from parliament itself and give it to other bodies still to be created. That is a principle that from our point of view completely undermines the authority of parliament. It is, I contend, a principle that should be maintained above all others by the House of Commons. But the bill goes still further and gives to the governor in council power to restrict trade, to prohibit both imports and exports by order in council. Our contention is that the regulation of trade is a duty which should be performed by this parliament, not delegated to any governor in council. The governor in council should have no more right to place an embargo on exports and imports or to restrict importation or exportation of commodities than to do away entirely with the tariff. The control of the tariff should remain with this parliament. The amendment is declaratory in the clearest terms of the assertion of the willingness of the opposition to have parliament pass the necessary measures for the regulation of trade and marketing, but it contemplates having this done by the House of Commons itself, combined, of course, with the Senate.

In case there should be any question whatever as to principles underlying the present bill being those of taking away from parliament control over trade and over production, also over expenditures arising out of the legislation, and being the principles underlying limited production and restricted trade and the creation of monopolies, let me refer specifically to certain provisions; because as the rule I have just read points out, an amendment may declare principles adverse to or differing from the principles, policies or provisions of the bill. These are some of its provisions. Section 3 provides:

(1) The governor in council may establish a board to be known as the dominion marketing board to regulate the marketing of natural products as hereinafter provided.

With this should be read subsection (a) and (f) of section 4 which shows how it is "hereinafter provided."

(a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality;

(f) to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses, and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder;

Then section 5 provides:

(1) A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

(3) Upon receipt of a report from the board recommending the approval of the scheme as submitted or as amended by the board, the minister may recommend the approval thereof, and the governor in council may thereupon approve the said scheme and fix the date when the same shall be effective.

Section 6 provides that:

(1) When a scheme has been approved by the governor in council, the minister shall give public notice thereof in the Canada Gazette.

(2) The provisions of the scheme as approved shall have the force of law, and the local board shall, from the date of the publication of the said notice of approval, be a body politic and corporate.

And again section 9:

(1) Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in the said product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board to regulate such product, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of such product, and the governor in council may approve of such scheme and authorize the board to administer such scheme directly or through any agency which it may establish. Such scheme shall continue in force until terminated by the governor in council.

12. (1) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product, and the governor in council shall have power to make regulations to provide for the licensing by the minister of importers, or otherwise to enforce any order made hereunder.

(2) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette,—

(a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence;

(b) prescribe the forms of such licences, the terms and conditions thereof and the persons who shall have authority to issue the same;

(c) impose penalties for breach of any such order or regulation or of any licence issued thereunder, and, generally, make such provision or authorize the doing of such acts or things as may in his discretion be deemed necessary or expedient for giving full effect to any orders, regulations or licences made or issued hereunder.

Then I refer to section 14:

14. Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

In part 2, which deals with investigations, it will be found that very similar powers are given to bodies as yet undetermined. I submit that the reading of these sections leaves no doubt whatever that the principles underlying this measure are first that of limiting production, second that of restricting trade and third doing both these things by creating monopolies with regard to certain products that are to be marketed. And fourth, all this is to be done, not by an act of this parliament which will leave the matter in a known and finally determined condition when the bill is signed by the representative of the crown and becomes law but by giving these powers to bodies that are still to be brought into existence and giving to the governor in council, rather than having held within the control of this parliament, the power to restrict both imports and exports and the control of all expenditures under the act. Our position, Mr. Speaker, is that we are wholly favourable to the regulation of trade to improve marketing conditions, but that the regulation and marketing should be by act of this parliament in accordance with parliamentary procedure and practice and not by bodies other than parliament itself.

In conclusion may I by way of illustrating what I have in mind direct attention to the amendment that was moved on the second reading of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, Bill No. 24, which amendment came before the house on March 30, 1932, and which Your Honour permitted to remain before the house and to be voted upon as entirely in order. I submit that the present amendment as regards the points at issue, is on all fours with that amendment, which was moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and seconded by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). The name of the bill was Unemployment and Farm Relief, that was its purpose. The amendment, which was directed not at its purpose, or name, but at the principles upon which it was based, was as follows:

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved:

1. That this house has been from the commencement of the session and continues to be ready and willing to consider and vote without delay any money or grant, submitted and asked for by the government for relieving distress and providing employment throughout Canada.

2. That this house cannot surrender the rights of the people of Canada, through their representatives in parliament, to maintain direct control over matters of taxation and expenditure, nor vest in the governor in council or in any other body absolute and despotic powers under the guise of dealing with peace, order and good government, particularly while parliament is in session.

I repeat that as regards the points involved in this discussion the amendment now before the house in regard to this marketing act is on all fours with the amendment which was held to be in order in 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the right hon. gentleman does not mean that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman has just read that previous amendment, which contains the words "that this bill be not now read a second time." There is nothing like that in the amendment now before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a declaration of principle adverse to that set forth in this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: "That this bill be not now read a second time."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not the essential point, if I may say so with all deference to the Prime Minister. The rule governing the matter reads:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question—

Not that the bill be not now read a second time, which is what the Prime Minister is saying, but——a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

I submit that this is exactly what is done in the amendment to the marketing bill now before the house. That amendment is declaratory of principles that are adverse to and that differ from the principles, policies and provisions of the bill before the house.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the other evening I raised the point of order in connection with this amendment. In the first place may I point out to you, sir, that the motion before the house is that Bill No. 51 be now read a second time. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has moved a rather lengthy amendment which he says is a declaration of principle, but I would invite Your Honour to give attention to the first three lines of the amendment. It must be borne in mind that the motion is that the bill before the house be now read a second time. On the second reading of a bill it is customary to discuss the main principles of the bill, leaving such matters as the detailed interpretation of clauses to the committee of the whole, where it is understood the minister can give individual replies. The amendment opens with these words:

This house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products—

Bill No. 51 is clearly for that purpose; its title reads:

An act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

That is the main object and principle of the bill, and the mover of the amendment says he is quite willing to support legislation to assist orderly marketing. Then he continues with a series of declarations, and the right hon. gentleman now argues that according to his interpretation certain clauses in the bill do violence to certain principles which he chooses to include in his amendment. I submit, sir, that this is all a question of opinion and subject to debate. In order to point out to the house the way of consistency in these matters I should like to direct attention to Bill No. 26, respecting fruit, which passed through this house a few weeks ago and was given third reading, and which has been sent to another place. In that bill, which already has been approved by the house, many of the clauses are very similar to the clauses which the right hon. gentleman complains are objectionable to him in the bill now standing for second reading. I find the following section in the bill which has been passed by the house:

The minister may from time to time make regulations:—

Then follows a long list of regulations which may be made. I invite Your Honour to recall that the right hon. gentleman specifically objected to subsection (a) of section 4 of the bill standing for second reading, which provides for the fixing of grades and so forth in order to control the quality and the movement of goods by quality as well as by quantity. In this act, which was approved by the house, and in connection with which the house has placed itself on record—

The minister may, from time to time, make regulations

(a) To establish one or more grades for each kind of fruit and in establishing any such grade, provision may be made to allow for variation—

"Variation," and all the details are not mentioned in the bill. The minister is empowered to do this by regulation. That is the point the right hon. gentleman complained about. Then, farther down in the bill we find this:

(g) To prescribe the time when any regulation shall come into operation, the particular kind or kinds of fruit and fruit packages—

And so on. And in the light of the right hon. gentleman's complaint, I ask the house to follow this:

(h) To provide that all or any kind of imported fruit or fruit packages shall be subject to certain or all regulations made under this act—

In other words, we have already exercised the powers which the right hon. gentleman now presumes to condemn in his resolution. Mr. Speaker, in the first place I challenge the declarations contained in the amendment offered by the right hon. gentleman as being a fair criticism of the bill. I challenge them as being the principles which he declares he wishes to enunciate in contradistinction to the bill itself, because the measures in the bill are not in any sense a violation of many of these so-called declarations of principle. It is merely the extreme interpretation he may put upon them. That is a fair matter for debate in the house, but it is not a question which can be, shall I say, eliminated or overcome by the moving of an amendment.

Now then, sir, may I make some observations as to the effect of the amendment. This bill is a government measure, and if the amendment were accepted I presume the effect would be that which usually follows the defeat of a government measure. I repeat, this is a government measure. Then, the right hon gentleman moves a resolution,—it is not an amendment to the resolution before the house, at all. It is not an amendment to the motion that the bill be read a second time. There is no reference to that at all, and that is what is before the house. But it is permissible at that point to discuss the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is mistaken. The right hon. leader of the opposition's amendment begins:

That all the words after the first word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor.

The words that follow the word "that" are in connection with the second reading.

Mr. STEVENS: May I, with all due deference to Your Honour, submit that although he did not include that in the amendment, it does not alter my point at all.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes it does.

Mr. STEVENS: No it does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Look at page 2352 of Hansard second column, fifth line, where the right hon. leader of the opposition said:

I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) that all the words after the first word "that" be struck out.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but it does not say a word about this bill not being read a second time. It does not touch the point or the resolution before the house, at all. It is pointed out that all that is left of the original motion is the word "that." I pointed out that the amendment does not make any reference as to what shall be done with the reading of the bill. The motion before the house is "that the bill be now read a second time." The right hon. gentleman has just cited the rule.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the rule?

Mr. STEVENS: The rule which the right hon. gentleman invoked in his own support reads as follows:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

But my right hon. friend has not so done. He has said he is in favour of the principle.

Mr. CASGRAIN: "Or provisions."

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend said to-day, he said it the other day, and he said in his amendment that:

While prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products—

That is an approval of the principle of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the purpose of it.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the principle of it, without any question. Then the rule goes on——or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction.

There is nothing in this amendment to meet that point. Then——or otherwise opposed to its progress.

He does not offer an amendment "that it shall be read this day six months" which is the common method used. Then the rule goes on——or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence—

In other words, should this bill involve matters which have been dealt with by some public body, involving public documentation, it is competent to a member to request delay in reading in order that these documents may be laid on the table of the house. That is as far as the rule goes.

But the preceding rule deals with the matter in a different way. It states:

The opponents of the bill may vote against the question that the bill "be now read a second time"; but this course is rarely adopted as it still remains to be decided on what day it shall be read a second time, or whether it shall be read at all; and the bill therefore is still before the house, and may afterwards be proceeded with. The ordinary practice is to move an amendment to the question by leaving out the word "now" and adding "six months" or any other term beyond the probable duration of the session.

My submission is, first, that the resolution or amendment is out of order inasmuch as it does not directly apply to the resolution before the house. In the second place I suggest that the right hon. gentleman has not offered to the house in support of his amendment arguments to justify the position declared in the amendment. And, in the third place, I submit to the house, as I said a moment ago, that if the house desires to be consistent it ought to bear this in mind, that a similar bill, carrying many provisions including penalties, regulations which were not set forth, power to make regulations, power to impose penalties and many other matters included in Bill No. 51, has already been approved by this house during the present session.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my argument is that the amendment is not in order, and is not competent to be accepted by the house.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word or two on the point of order. The first objection taken by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Stevens) was to the style and cause of the introduction to the amendment, namely, "That all the words after the word 'that' be struck out and the following substituted therefor." I submit that the proper introduction to an amendment such as that now before the house is that appearing in the amendment. The striking out of the word "now" could apply only to the six months' hoist. I state that this amendment is entirely different, because it is a determination of principle, a matter entirely different from a six months' hoist.

In the second place, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he raised this point of order. His objection was on one point, and on one point only. May I quote his words:

> I should like to raise the point of order whether the amendment submitted by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) is in order, inasmuch as it constitutes what might be termed a declaration of policy, instead of offering reasons why consideration of the bill should not be proceeded with. . . .

Mr. STEVENS: May I say it will be recalled that we had no notice of the amendment. I never saw it until the right hon. gentleman read it. I was compelled to make a brief statement, and I simply reserved the right to make the point of order later on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not in the slightest degree criticizing my hon. friend, but I do submit that the only point of order before the house at the present time is that this amendment which was raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition was out of order on one ground, and that the ground was then, in the language of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

> Inasmuch as it constitutes what might be termed a declaration of policy, instead of offering reasons why consideration of the bill should not be proceeded with. . . .

Now, let us read again the general rule, namely section 755, which is amplified in May at the foot of page 390, also at page 39 of the same volume and by Bourinot at page 509. These rules describe the procedure adopted in moving the six months' hoist, in connection with which the proper introductory appellation is as mentioned by the Prime Minister. But the proper appellation for this amendment, the amendment now before the house is found in the words used by the leader of the opposition. The rule is as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principles adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

Although my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and my right hon. leader may differ as to what the principle of this bill is, I say that even that is not germane to the question whether or not the amendment is in order because it goes much further than the word "principle" and deals with policy—the very question which the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself raised on the point of order, as to the policy or provisions of the bill. My friends opposite may say that the principle of the bill is marketing. We say that it is not. We say that the principle of this bill goes much further and that the policy and provisions of the bill establish and prove the truth of the language that is used in the amendment. What is that language?

> —any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation.

My hon. friends may say that that does not exist in the bill. But that has absolutely no relevance, not in the slightest degree, to the argument whether the amendment is in order. We can enunciate, by way of amendment, the general principle which we believe to be embodied in the clauses of this bill, and whether or not our friends opposite differ with us that is a matter of political argument. The amendment goes on:

> —and which confers upon a minister of the crown and upon the governor in council unprecedented authority and unusual powers to restrict production, and interprovincial, interimperial and foreign trade as regards both exports and imports, as well as other autocratic powers.

The only argument which my hon. friend the minister brings up here is: You passed the Fruit Act the other day. Does he seriously think that the extraordinary and extensive powers of this bill are comparable in the slightest degree to the provisions of the Fruit Act? Where do we find in the Fruit Act the unnamed and undetermined boards and the tremendous delegated authority that you have in this bill? If I wanted to indulge in an argument on the merits of the bill, I might say that I am prepared to support a marketing bill such as is asked for by the producers of British Columbia. But that is not Bill No. 51.

My hon. friends opposite will tell me that we can alter the bill in committee, but I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of every member of this house who is opposed to the actual principle, policy and provisions of Bill No. 51 to vote against that bill on the second reading or to vote for a generous amendment such as we have now before us, and not simply to be satisfied with the assurance of the Minister of Agriculture and of some other speakers that this bill may be amended in committee. We do not know what the amendments are going to be.

I am not opposed to the principle of marketing; I am in favour of orderly marketing; but I am opposed to this unprecedented delegation of authority to unnamed boards and to an unnamed number of boards throughout the country, to which are to be delegated powers which never before have been delegated by a parliament of Canada.

To recapitulate, Mr. Speaker, there is not the slightest comparison between the Fruit Act and this bill. The Fruit Act is under the control of the minister. It contains provisions for regulations; but what have we in this bill? Unnamed and undetermined boards functioning throughout Canada, together with most unusual provisions and policies.

There is another question in regard to the Fruit Act. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the rule which you will find referred to in May, and under which the words "any compulsory measure" might be taken objection to. But May had reference to an old English case where an amendment containing the words "any compulsory measure" and imposing burdens on the people was ruled out of order because at that time there were other bills before the house by which such burdens were imposed. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no other such bill before this house. The Fruit Act has been disposed of. This imposes compulsory obligations upon the people and establishes unnamed and undetermined boards. So I submit, Mr. Speaker, on the actual point of order raised by the minister himself that he is absolutely ruled out of court by rule 755 and by Bourinot and May. In the second place, it is not the principle of this bill; it is the policy and provisions of this bill which are referred to in section 755.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is a little difficult to explain just why this amendment should be in order. In the first place, we have to determine what the rules are with respect to debate on the second reading of a bill. The rules of this house are the rules of the English house, that the principle of the bill is to be discussed, but instead of the principle being discussed the right hon. gentleman has to-day again discussed the sections.

The other evening when the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) raised a question as to the principle of the Bank of Canada bill and referred to the provisions in that bill dealing with the ownership of the shares he said, "One of the principles that I declare for is public ownership." The right hon. leader of the opposition then rose in his place and asked: "What is the principle of this bill?" And he went on to say that the principle was that there is to be a central bank. Now the principle of the bill before us is that there is to be a marketing board.

Secondly, the right hon. gentleman has this afternoon suggested that because that Bank of Canada bill was to go to a committee of the house there was a distinction to be drawn between it and this bill, which is to be considered by a committee of the whole house. But the conclusion that he should have drawn was exactly the opposite of that which he did draw, for a committee composed of part of the house can never have the power that a committee of the whole house has, and it was competent, as the Minister of Agriculture said, when he introduced the bill, for this house to make suggestions which it thought proper for the purpose of amending this bill. When the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) suggested that we did not know what the amendments were to be, he immediately begged the question for it is for this house to suggest such amendments as may seem desirable after debate and discussion in order that there may be a clear appreciation and understanding of the desirability of accepting any amendment in lieu of the existing sections. That is the position as it stands up to the time when the amendment is moved.

Now what is the test? The test is a simple one. What will happen if the amendment carries?

Mr. YOUNG: Withdraw the bill and bring in a better one.

Mr. BENNETT: But the bill will not be withdrawn. It will disappear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. Read rule 756.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill may be moved to be put back on the order paper, but it disappears from this order paper and it can only be put back upon a motion being made to that effect. When it disappears from the order paper what takes its place? A bill? Oh no; a pious hope that straddles the fence and speaks for both sides. In other words, their principle is: "We want to be on both sides of this measure. We want to say in the country that we have supported orderly marketing. But also we want to say we opposed this bill."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Right.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is perfectly frank, but the rules are not predicated on that assumption. The rules are predicated on the assumption that members of parliament have opinions and convictions which they are prepared to back up with their votes.

Mr. McINTOSH: As the electors of South Oxford did.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not for a moment, Mr. Speaker, miss any pearly word of wisdom. I thought I heard one, but it seems I was mistaken. I was about to say that the test is: What would happen if this amendment carried, if it is in order? If it is in order there must at least be something happen in the way of destroying the bill that is before the house. But that is not what hon. gentlemen opposite want to do. They say in the preamble of the amendment: We are for marketing. Then they go on to say: But we are against this kind of marketing. That means that they are in favour of the principle of the bill, and the principle of the bill is marketing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman stood in his place the other night and reproved the hon. member for Macleod because he was asserting that he had a right to advocate a publicly owned bank as one of the principles of the Bank of Canada bill, and he asked; What is the principle of the bill? And he answered, that we have a central bank. The principle here is: Shall we have a marketing board? Yes or no? You cannot escape your responsibility under our rules by setting up a resolution that lets you support the bill in one breath and oppose it in another. That is what the rule is designed to prevent. It insists that there should be a clear cut division of opinion upon the issue. The issue is a marketing bill—yes or no?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this bill confined simply to marketing or is it by its title not also related to export trade?

Mr. BENNETT: Anything that is incidental to marketing must be dealt with and marketing touches every phase of trade and commerce so defined. The principle is a marketing bill and if the genius of the house evolves better provisions than those that obtain, it is open to the house to suggest what they should be. That is the position at the moment. The amendment is that all the words after "that" be struck out. The motion is that the bill be read a second time, therefore, all the words after "that" are to disappear and in place of those words we are to have substituted a mere safeguard which says: We are in favour of the principle of this bill, namely, a marketing board but we do not like some of the provisions that arise out of the application of that principle. Can that be in order? It is not in order, it is a matter for the committee. The principle of the bill is to be decided on second reading and there is an assertion of adherence to the principle in the first three lines of the amendment now before the house. If this were to be adopted instead of a motion for the second reading of the bill we would have these words:

> This house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure—

That cannot be an amendment to this motion because it declares favourably to the principle. The very words read by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) were, "opposed to the principle of the measure." That is, you can move a resolution opposed to the principle of the motion but you cannot move one that asserts your proud adherence to the principle of it and your abhorrence to the provisions in its details. I submit that the motion is out of order for that very reason. You cannot approbate and reprobate in the same amendment, to use the language of Lord Elgin. Here they approbate by stating that they approve of a marketing board, then they reprobate, not the motion but the details of it. This is the reason why I submit with confidence that the amendment is out of order.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth) With regard to the matter of principle to which my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has referred, I submit that he is mixing up the principle with the name of the bill. I do not think he ought to suggest and I do not think he can fairly suggest that because this bill happens to have in its title the word "marketing," therefore that is the only principle or provision in the bill. He cannot by introducing a bill which has the word "marketing" in its title prevent us from moving an amendment to the motion for second reading in order to register disapproval of its many provisions which are not germane to marketing and which may have a much wider significance. My right hon. leader has referred already to the fact that this bill contains not only provisions for marketing but provisions for restricting imports and exports. It contains also provisions to make crimes where no crimes existed before. My right hon. friend is suggesting that by calling it a marketing bill, you make marketing the principle of the bill and that if you are in favour of marketing, then perforce you must let it have second reading and go to committee no matter what other objectionable provisions there are. Reference has been made to rule 755 but my right hon. friend has missed entirely some words which are most important in connection with this resolution, namely, that we can move a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or different from the "principles, policies, or provisions" of the bill. I emphasize particularly the word provisions. That is exactly what we are doing.

My right hon. friend mentioned the central bank legislation. In that case it was distinctly laid down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that a central bank was the only thing to which we were committing ourselves by that resolution. The questions of share ownership and other possible knotty problems were to be left quite open for discussion. The Prime Minister is now suggestng that we must simply open our mouths and shut our eyes because of the fact that the term "marketing" is in the title to this bill and that we must swallow the whole bill and allow it to go to the committee if we are in favour of marketing. I submit that that is not what the rules provide. They provide that simply because the word "marketing" appears in the title you are not bound to accept that as the only principle of the bill, that you have a right to examine it to find out what else is in it. The rules provide that you may move a resolution declaratory of your non-adherence to some of the provisions which are contained in the bill, even though they are provisions which are not covered by the title. I looked up Bourinot just before I came in to find what cases he cites in which amendments have been submitted. The citations are rather old but I found one which referred to an amendment moved in 1882. This was an amendment to a bill to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. I hope the Prime Minister will note that. According to him, if any hon. member was in favour of readjusting the representation in the House of Commons in any way he would have to vote in favour of the motion for second reading and allow the bill to go to committee. The amendment moved at that time showed that the house was in favour of readjustment but was not in favour of the readjustment proposed in the bill. The amendment appears at page 412 of the Journals of 1882. The motion was for the second reading of a bill to readjust the representation in the House of Commons and Mr. Mills moved, in amendment, seconded by Mr. Rymal:

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question, be left out, and the words "in readjusting the representation of the people in parliament, there should be no needless interference with existing arrangements, and the principle of justice and fair play towards both political parties should be observed;"

There was an admission that the house was in favour of readjustment but was taking direct issue with what was regarded as one of the provisions of the bill, namely, the provision which did not give fair play to the parties in the house. The amendment went on to say:

> That the bill contains numerous needless changes, and is framed with a view to concentrate large bodies of the Liberal voters in a few electoral districts, and to add Conservative voters to, or remove Liberal voters from, many electoral districts, and thus weaken the effective strength of the Liberal party, and to pack the constituencies of Ontario in favour of the Conservatives.

That amendment shows that on the motion for second reading they were discussing the different provisions of the bill, not just the title. That amendment admitted that there should be a readjustment but it complained of the provisions of the bill. It is cited in Bourinot as authority for rule 755. The house divided upon the amendment but under the circumstances which existed at that time, the amendment was lost. I am pointing out that that amendment is similar to the one we have before us. It went into the heart of the bill, it dealt with the provisions of the bill and made a declaration that certain of the provisions were not acceptable to those who supported the amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there any point of order raised in connection with it?

Mr. RALSTON: No, but I would point out that Bourinot cites this very case as one of the authorities in connection with rule 755. I do not think we could have much better support for our contention that an amendment having to do with the major provisions of a bill is perfetly in order.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will observe that in the amendment to which he has referred there is no substantive approval of the principle of the measure, it is only read into it by inference.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think my right hon. friend will adhere to that point. Surely there was a pretty plain inference. This is a bill to readjust the representation. The amendment says that in readjusting the representation—

Mr. BENNETT: That is provided for by the British North America Act.

Mr. RALSTON: No, in readjusting the representation—

Mr. BENNETT: The readjustment is provided by that act.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, but the bill was for the readjustment as provided for under the British North America Act. The bill was being introduced under the powers which that act gives permitting parliament to readjust the representation. The readjustment was being made under that act. My right hon. friend suggests that this amendment did not approve the principle of readjustment. I say that it could not have approved it in much plainer language when it says that in readjusting the representation, certain definite principles should be observed.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I do not want to delay the house or Your Honour in your decision of this question, but I have carefully listened to the argument and after giving it the best consideration I am able to bestow upon it, in my opinion, the amendment is out of order. I shall try briefly to give my reasons for the opinion I have just expressed. I do not see how anyone can argue that this is not purely and simply a marketing bill; that is the main principle of the measure: For the more orderly marketing of certain natural products of Canada. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) suggests that the bill goes much further than the question of marketing because it touches on the question of exports and imports. But surely exports and imports of natural products are so related to the general question of orderly marketing that they form part of it.

The next point mentioned by the hon. member was that penalties are imposed for breaches of the provisions of certain of the clauses in respect of marketing. Those penalties are consequential; they appear in all such bills, and in our revised statutes there will be found many acts incorporating the imposition of penalties. One is almost shocked when one considers the matter. I believe in the revised statutes there are no less than one hundred and twenty-five such acts where penalties are prescribed for breaches of regulations. But this fact does not detract from the general principle that this measure is a marketing bill, purely and simply.

The trouble I see with the amendment moved by my right hon. friend is that, as the Prime Minister has stated, it is an attempt to bestraddle the question, to favour both sides of the question, to blow both hot and cold, which is contrary to the rules of the house. The rules provide inferentially and, I think, very distinctly that a member shall express his opinion one way or the other on questions which arise, and, indeed, until recently, a member could be compelled to vote, if present in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about the freight rates bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the first objection to the amendment is fatal. The next objection, to my mind, is that the first three lines of the amendment constitute a declaration in favour of the principle of the bill; I do not think there is any question about that. In regard to the other portions of the amendment and all the denunciations heaped upon the various clauses of the bill by my right hon. friend's amendment, every point he mentioned is a proper one for the consideration of the committee of the whole house. When the bill is in committee my right hon. friend may move an amendment on every one of those points, and the house may adopt his amendments if it sees fit. Those are matters which do not pertain at all to the principle of the bill; they are merely details designed to carry out the principle. When the house is in committee every statement contained in my right hon. friend's amendment may be dealt with by the committee; he may move motion after motion, taking the opinion of the committee and it may be that on many points his views may prevail. But the amendment must not anticipate the committee stage of the bill. In my humble judgment the amendment as drawn is certainly out of order and should be so ruled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Minister of Justice a question before he resumes his seat? If instead of the provision as to imports and exports reading:

> The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product—

It were to read:

> The governor in council may remove any duties with respect to any article of trade and commerce—

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the statute now; it is the Customs Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking now of the provisions of this bill as it is framed. If it were to read that the governor in council may have power to remove or to increase duties, would the minister say that the mere fact that the measure is entitled "An Act for the Improvement of Marketing," would make the provision quite regular, and the principle of the bill one of marketing rather than one of changing the tariff?

Mr. GUTHRIE: When you get into the realm of duties an entirely different principle applies. There is power in the Customs Act for the governor in council, I think, to wipe out duties altogether.

An hon. MEMBER: Not to increase them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The question of increasing duties is different. That would be a matter of imposing taxation on the people by order in council and that is not permissible. When taxing bills are introduced in the house, they are introduced by way of resolution and not by way of a direct bill.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I would like to point out that it has been the custom from time immemorial to discuss the principle of a bill on the second reading to enable members to express their views and if so desired to change the form of a proposal which is made to the house. The same rule applies to all amendments. When a motion is made by a member and put to the house by the speaker, it is the right of any other member to move to amend it in accordance with certain rules. Members may not be willing to adopt the question as proposed to them and may consequently desire to modify it in various ways. When we are voting on the supply bill, we very often preface the amendment by saying that while the house is willing to vote supply to His Majesty to carry on the public business, we object to such and such an expenditure. Bourinot at page 509 states:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure. The Senate has a rule on the subject:
> "64. The principle of a bill is usually debated at its second reading."
> The commons have no rule on the subject, but the practice of the house is always to discuss the principle of a bill at this stage. Any member may propose as an amendment a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

We may favour a marketing board on certain conditions, a marketing board whose expenditures, whose cost to the country, would be controlled by parliament. That is not the proposal which is now being made. The present proposal is that the administration of the measure will be carried on by a board created by the governor in council and that the expenditures involved will be controlled solely by the governor in council and that parliament will have nothing whatever to say in the matter and no control over this expenditure. Surely a member may be in favour of a marketing board, but not of one of that character, a board to which the rights of this parliament are delegated. I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who know the rules of parliament will confirm this rule of Bourinot that this is the only opportunity we have to express an opinion on the principles of the bill as presented to the house. For that reason I submit very humbly that the amendment is in order.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): May I add one word to the argument? The argument of the opposition that this amendment is in order is based upon paragraph 755. That after all is not a rule of the house; the rule of the house is standing order No. 75. Paragraph 755 is after all merely a quotation from May. I happened to look up May a moment ago, and paragraph 755 which is quoted here complete from May starts at the bottom of page 357 and goes on to page 358. Let me read the next two clauses. The last word in 755 is "Judges." May continues:

The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such proposed resolution, which must, therefore, "strictly relate to the bill which the house, by its order, has resolved upon considering," and must not include in its scope other bills then standing for consideration by the house.

Then listen to the following:

Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee, nor attach conditions to the second reading of the bill.

I submit that this amendment does deal with the provisions of the bill, because, as pointed out by the Minister of Justice, all the clauses in the amendment could be moved as amendments to the bill in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What page is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. MANION: The continuation on page 358 of May, twelfth edition of the same clause, 755.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has a different edition from that which we are using. The thirteenth is the edition used by the house generally.

Mr. MANION: The quotation in 755 comes from the exact page I have used, and it is continued on page 358.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is out of date.

Mr. MANION: Then my right hon. friend's whole argument is out of date.

Mr. SPEAKER: It having been moved that Bill No. 51, an act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith, be now read the second time, the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King moved in amendment that all the words after the first word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation, and which confers upon a minister of the crown and upon the governor in council unprecedented authority and unusual powers to restrict production, and interprovincial, inter-Imperial and foreign trade as regards both exports and imports, as well as other autocratic powers.

The Hon. Mr. Stevens raised the point of order as to whether the said amendment is in order inasmuch as it constitutes what might be termed a declaration of policy instead of offering reasons why consideration of the bill should not be proceeded with or should be postponed, or proposing something else germane to the actual motion before the house.

The Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King in moving the amendment quoted paragraph 755 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms—which paragraph is published as a quotation from May, thirteenth edition, page 390, and is repeated by Bourinot at page 509—as follows:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, . . .

This rule is subject to certain limitations. If the right hon. member had continued to quote from May, he would have found the following reference to an amendment to a motion for second reading of a bill:

Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee.

The precedent cited in May in support of this is found in 188 Parliamentry Debates, fourth series, column 76, The Education (Scotland) Bill:

Mr. Speaker: I have to rule that the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Glasgow and Aberdeen universities—to the effect that the house while welcoming educational legislation for Scotland regrets that the present measure does not propose change in the educational areas which is urgently required in the interests of efficient administration—is not technically in order, because it does not challenge the principle of the bill. The question raised can be decided by an amendment to the bill itself. If the hon. member wants to object to the second reading, he should move that the bill be read this day six months.

The amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition does not challenge the principle of Bill No. 51, and it anticipates the committee stage. It declares that the "house is prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products," and the bill is intituled "an act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products." There is so much similarity between those two propositions that one cannot be moved as a resaon to reject the second reading of a bill enunciating the other.

The amendment further declares that the house is unalterably opposed to the granting of certain powers and the application of certain methods in the giving of government assistance to the marketing of natural products, but does not connect the granting of those powers or the application of those methods with the bill. It does not declare any principle adverse to or differing from the principle, policy or provisions of the bill. The bill deals with powers and methods which may be altered in committee.

The objection to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation can be dealt with by amendments when the committee of the whole is considering section 3 of the bill which establishes the dominion marketing board, and section 4 which defines the powers of the board. The action to be taken by the governor in council and the minister in administering the act is described in almost every section of the bill and may be strengthened or weakened by amendment when the bill is in committee.

The case cited by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth differs from this case. There a definite declaration as to what the mover was in favour of was laid down; in this case the amendment declares as to what enactments the mover is opposed to, without connecting them with the bill or the principle of the bill.

The objections raised in the proposed amendment cannot be looked upon as reasons why Bill No. 51 should not now be proceeded with and, moreover, they may be considered after the bill has been read a second time. For these reasons I find the proposed amendment to be out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regret that I am obliged to appeal from Your Honour's ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, this marketing bill which I hold in my hand is one of the greatest compounds of good, bad and indifferent that it has fallen to my lot to analyze and decide upon. So much is that the case that at times and in places the bad features of this bill seem almost to supersede the good. Notwithstanding that, however, and having regard to the fact that I hope we will have two opportunities before two committees to expunge the bad features and preserve the good ones I have decided to support the second reading of the bill. That is my best judgment. At this stage, and before giving my reasons for so doing, I should like to read an extract from Hansard of May 13, 1932, in which I gave expression to these words:

> I think we have reached a time in our history when agriculture is simply staggering to its fall, and we can afford to ease up a little in our extreme political alignments and work on behalf of agriculture even if we have to work through a Tory government, which is the only avenue available at this time. That is pretty straight talk, but that is the way I feel. I am in opposition now; there are not enough of us here to perform the functions of government. The electors, in their wisdom, elected another government and we have a new minister of agriculture. I have not very long to assist agriculture now, perhaps ten or fifteen years more, and I am prepared to work through this government until the electors provide us with a better avenue. Things are so bad in connection with agriculture that I believe I would work through Beelzebub himself if necessary, and therefore much more through the minister. Conditions are so distressing on many farms that we cannot afford to quibble as to where the good things may come from at this time.

That is exactly the way I still feel, and I am thinking not of the government or even of parliament but of the farmers and producers throughout Canada who asked for this legislation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: For this legislation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What they think this legislation is. Having made the merits and demerits of the bill the basis of my decision I think it is up to me to mention some of the good features of the bill, and I think it has good features. In passing I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the bill contains more than one principle, and that is the difficulty we have been up against. There are many principles involved, but to me the outstanding point is that a long deferred marketing act has been presented to us, and I have to decide what I am going to do with it. My decision is to support the second reading of the bill and, before the agriculture committee, where I hope it will go, to expurgate the bad features and "hold fast to that which is good." I believe it is quite safe ground when I take that attitude. We have then a marketing bill—and may I say that we are the last part of this British Empire to have such legislation. All the dominions, with the exception of Canada, have a marketing act. I do not say that that in itself is sufficient argument in favour of accepting any bill; as a matter of fact I believe in the principle of standing alone for the right, if you have to. But it is worth while to think about that feature, namely that we are the last part of the British Empire to pass such legislation. As a matter of fact we will soon be the tail end of creation with respect to marketing legislation, because more than thirty other countries have it. That is also worth thinking about.

We have before us a marketing bill, and I believe in part of it as at present drafted, but the bill which I hope will go forward from this house after we have concluded our deliberations I hope to be able to support almost in toto. I believe, further, in a marketing board. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the government to which I belonged is responsible for a wheat marketing board act. In connection with the wheat board we were successful in our methods of reconciling the jurisdiction of the dominion with that of the provinces. The legislation in this connection was passed in the year 1922, and to it some rather unfair references were made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). However, we shall not go into that matter now. The method of passing enabling legislation and concurring legislation is laid down in this bill, and was laid down twelve years ago by the government to which I had the honour of belonging. At that time the same principle of enabling legislation was involved. Of course, we did not deal with the same objectionable details, but we did have to deal with the same constitutional difficulties as are herein dealt with in this marketing act. The province of British Columbia established a satisfactory system of marketing boards, but in that province they always ran up against the final difficulty of standing the test in the courts, and without this legislation they were unable to carry out their marketing programs.

I have given three reasons why I like this measure. Then we come to a feature of the bill to which a great many people have taken strong objection. Owing to the paucity of information given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) in his speech one cannot wonder at such objections. I am sorry to have to make that statement. Of course, the minister was labouring under this tremendous difficulty, namely, that when he proposed the second reading of the bill the recesses and rafters of this building were reverberating with the Liberal cheers of victory from South Oxford. At that moment my good friend the minister was put into the front line trenches to explain this bill. Under those circumstances I think the enthusiasm would have been taken out of anyone, I do not care how young or old a political warrior he might be. However, I have no brief for my hon. friend, nor do I intend to make excuses for him. The fact remains however that in view of the meagreness of the information he gave the house I am not surprised that the opposition of many hon. gentlemen was invited. I did not know then what many of the features of this bill meant and I do not know yet.

Then, we find the provision prohibiting the export of certain unnamed commodities. Is it any wonder, without any knowledge of what is meant, there has been strong opposition to this also. That is a provision we should have had long ago, a provision at least some portion of which we have already exercised. It would prohibit low grade commodities, such as low grade live stock, low grade wheat or, in fact, low grade anything being shipped to the export markets of the world. The Antipodes have had that legislation for I don't know how many years. Denmark has it. They export the good and leave the bad at home, or do something else with it. When one understands this provision he realizes that instead of it being an objection to the bill it is a virtue.

At the present time we have a congested European and British wheat market. Would it not be the part of wisdom at this time when there is justification for it, to tell those who have low grade wheat, say No. 6, that it is not fair to send such wheat to a market already congested and thereby pull down the value of the higher grades. That is not a wise procedure. This is the time to say, I repeat, that the low grades should not be placed on already congested markets, thereby in some measure lessening the opportunities afforded for sale of the higher grades. Especially is that true when there is an opening for the same low grade wheat in the Orient, if there is another opening for wheat anywhere at the present time. As every hon. member knows, the only way to compete in the orient is by offering low grade wheat at prices in competition with rice. I do not know whether the government understands this situation as do some other hon. members, but certainly they have not explained it. For that reason I am not surprised that this particular feature of the bill has met with strong opposition. However, having had conversations with some of the staff in the Department of Agriculture, and being in a position to guess the rest of it, I have assumed—and I believe I am right in my assumption—that this provision is for the purpose of meeting such situations as we now have whereby low grade commodities are authorized to be kept off congested markets. That is good practice. I may state frankly, Mr. Speaker, that the late government did, without any of this legislation, refuse the shipment abroad of poor live stock. We had no legislation to support us, but we just took chances, when exporting cattle to Great Britain shortly after the major portions of the embargo were removed in 1923. We did take the responsibility at Montreal and at other ports for saying that certain low grade cattle could not take ship. No one objected. We just took it for granted that we had that authority. Possibly that may not have been the right procedure for us to adopt, but may I say it did keep low grade animals off the British market, and that is what this legislation proposes to do legally.

Mr. BENNETT: Was the action to which the hon. member refers taken by order in council?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think we did it by order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Just did it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We did not even have an order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think we had. We were simply assuming that it was the sensible thing to do and, acting sanely in the matter, we prevented such low grade stock from going anyway.

I now turn to the section which has to do with the storing and preserving of farm commodities. I am bound to take the stand that I would have gone even farther in this connection. I should like to have seen the processing of commodities included, a procedure which would have my support. If processing were included the board would have the right to establish somewhere in Canada a demonstration packing plant, without which we will never get to the farmer the information he must have in order to secure his confidence in our packing plants. This principle was demonstrated in connection with terminal elevators. Do you ever hear any cry about the terminal elevator now? No, because the government established one. May I say it was not our government, but the government of my hon. friends opposite. Although I do not think it is always a paying concern, I do believe it established the fact that there were not in connection with the terminal elevators the abuses that many had believed. Since that action was taken there has been no difficulty. Therefore I say that if processing were added, the proper authority would have the right to establish an experimental abattoir which would show the farmers just what profits were being made and could be made or not be made in the matter of processing live stock. I believe one such abattoir would be sufficient, and that it should be placed in the stock yards auction market and not away from the yards. It should be favourably situated in a position convenient to the animals. I have outlined six good features in this legislation. It would be sufficient to take those six favorable features as a nucleus for the bill and while adding others thereto try to eliminate the really bad ones—and I tell you they are here in abundance as the bill now stands.

Then, some people shy at the bill because it is said to represent state socialism. Well, as I understand the dictum and policies of our friends to the left, the C.C.F., it is that which they have preached in this house on many occasions, namely, the doctrine of "production for use and not for profit." Why, Mr. Speaker, the avowed purpose of this bill is to make more profits, and if my friends of the C.C.F. believe in "production for use and not for profit," they should oppose this bill because avowedly it is out for more profits for the producers, and it is because of that, that I am supporting it. So this bill does not present any feature of state socialism in that respect.

State socialism also implies and declares for a change in ownership. Is there any change of ownership even remotely implied in this bill? Not at all. This bill however is a piece of social legislation gone to excess in the matter of control, gone to folly, and that is what is causing so much opposition. My hon. friends opposite are not familiar with this class of legislation, and they seem to think that the farther they go the better. Did you ever hear the saying, that too far east is west?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Did you ever hear about Paddy's chimney being so plumb that it was over plumb, or did you ever hear of a man walking so straight that he leaned over backwards? Now the government in their anxiety to have a wonderful bill, different from any other bill they ever knew of, made this bill reach out to all creation and include not only farm products but nearly all the natural resources of the nation. Anybody who knew anything about reforms would not act in that way, because it can only invite opposition and disaster.

I do not want to refer unnecessarily to the former government's policy of standardizing various farm products, but what would have happened if we in one bill had attempted to standardize all at once all the farm products that we finally succeeded in standardizing at the end of nine years of effort? If we had put the whole of that in one bill, we would not have got to first base with it, but by bringing about measures of grading gradually, and familiarizing the house and the country with the policy of standardization, we finally consummated that policy at the expiry of our term of office.

I have given some of the reason why this bill is not state socialism. I shall be interested to hear my C.C.F. friends, who are supporting this bill on the ground that it is state socialism, reconcile such support with their doctrine of "production for use, and not for profit."

I have many reservations regarding many of the features of this bill, and I must say that unless some of these features are eliminated or substantially altered during the committee stage I shall be obliged to vote against the bill in committee and on the third reading, but if these objectionable features are eliminated or substantially removed, if the bill is expurgated, and cleansed of these bad features, I shall continue to support it through to the end.

The bill is too comprehensive to start with. Why experiment on such a ghastly big scale? Is it wise to include all these commodities to which the bill refers? Every new commodity outside agriculture that you are going to control by this bill only creates further opposition to the measure. Why not start out with a limited number of commodities where control is likely to be supported strongly by the community in which it is started In many of the communities control is already under way in regard to some commodities, and the only difficulty is that they run up against the decisions of the privy council.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They will do that again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not under the enabling legislation. We had some experience in the Department of Agriculture with regard to live stock and live stock products in that respect. One of the first duties I performed on coming to Ottawa was to write to every one of the provinces sending them a copy of our proposed legislation with respect to live stock and live stock products, and asking them if they could see their way to passing enabling or concurrent legislation as the case might be, and after four or five years every one of the provinces did. So we had that principle recognized in the department in connection with the grading of hogs, the grading of eggs, and the control of stock yards. Any legal difficulties in the way were removed by enabling legislation.

I think it is also a big mistake not to mention in the bill who is going to administer the law. We have the Minister of Agriculture sponsoring the bill, and this is supposed to be a marketing act for agricultural products mainly, but as a matter of fact the door has been thrown so wide open that it deals with the products of our fisheries, of the forest and what not, and three or four ministers might well claim the right to administer the act. It is true that the preponderating feature of the bill is agricultural, but nevertheless there are many other commodities dealt with, and knowing the ambition and the flair which the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to have for agriculture, and not knowing in the bill who is going to administer this act, on that ground alone I would oppose it if I thought that any other minister than the Minister of Agriculture would be in charge of it.

Then we have the wide open interpretation of "natural products." Just imagine all that that includes! My right hon. leader and other members on this side have not misinterpreted the bill in its definition of "natural products." It includes almost every natural product and products processed therefrom under the sun. Did hon. gentlemen see Mr. Taschereau's interpretation in this morning's paper? There are all kinds of possibilities of difficulty and danger associated with grabbing the whole practically of our natural resources and putting them all into this one bill that is supposed to be primarily for agriculture. It really looks as if a lot of kindergarten legislators were in charge of this measure and are endeavouring to bring within one act what nobody ever saw the like of previously—practically the whole natural production of this country.

Nevertheless, I believe still that we can make a good act of it. Let the Minister of Agriculture take this bill to the agriculture committee as he has done with similar bills. Bills of this nature have always been sent to the agriculture committee, unless it was simply a matter of making some trifling correction or something like that. As a matter of fact, last week the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the standing committee on agriculture a bill that was not one-hundredth so important as this. I certainly disagree with this amendment to the grain act as it stands, but as it was going to be sent to the agriculture committee I agreed to it with such reservations as I am now making to this marketing bill.

I wonder if I might get the Prime Minister's attention for one minute.

Mr. BENNETT: I am following the hon. gentleman very carefully.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not the faculty myself of talking and listening at the same time.

Mr. BENNETT: I could tell the hon. gentleman the last thing he said.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Anyway, I should like to have the Prime Minister's and the minister's special attention for a moment I plead with them to reconsider their decision and have this bill referred to the agriculture committee. We would not bring the whole earth to that committee as witnesses. All the witnesses I have in mind are in Ottawa right now. There is one here from the Pacific, and others, and the staff is here. Why not take this regular and proper course? I urge that, Mr. Speaker, with all the earnestness and sincerity of which I am capable. Also, why not name a limited number of commodities to which you know there will be no or little opposition and put them in the natural products interpretation clause, and that will help carry the bill both here and in the country.

Mr. SPENCE: Would you have done that yourself?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sure. That is the way we always proceeded in similar matters.

Mr. SPENCE: I remember you all right. I will tell a story later on.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about. It was always the policy of the former government to refer agricultural bills to the agriculture committee and to bring about reforms gradually. Practical reformers invariably start with something that you can handle, to avoid running into difficulties and disaster by having too ambitious a plan and spoiling the whole lot—in other words, creep before attempting to walk. That is my suggestion to the government. It will not cost anything, and they do not need to follow it.

Under the provisions of this bill wheat is included, and that is sufficient to make me oppose the bill. The situation in the west has been fierce since some tried to bring about a hundred per cent pool. If that is being considered as desirable the government will be simply putting the fat into the fire. The controversy is dying out, so why stir it up at this stage? This commodity should not be included in the bill at present, in my estimation. I am willing to take my chance when I make the statement I do in connection with this highly controversial problem, which should not be stirred afresh now. My proposal would be to start out with say milk and its products, fruit and its products, bacon, cattle, honey, maple sugar, perhaps a dozen or so all told, in connection with some of which marketing schemes are already under way. All that would be necessary would be to provide the necessary legislative machinery and put it in motion, and the government would be on safe constitutional and democratic ground. There would thus be the minimum chances of opposition and subsequent failure. Ten or twelve commodities could be mentioned and then the words "and such other commodities as may be added thereto from time to time by parliament."

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman is aware that it is a matter of legal construction that it is far more desirable to use a general term than to endeavour to specify. All the branches of an industry would be included in the declaration of the industry, so therefore there is no purpose in that argument.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have the same provision now in connection with the weed acts of the west. Those acts state that noxious weeds are so and so and so and so, naming the kinds, and such other weeds as may be added thereto from time to time. Lawyers always place great value on precedent, and I am giving one to the Prime Minister. Even if there were no precedent, I think my suggestion is quite sensible. It would be safety first anyway.

There is another section of the bill which is open to justifiable criticism. It reads:

> The board shall consist of such number of persons as the governor in council may from time to time determine, and each member shall hold office during pleasure—

[Mr. Motherwell.]

There is a general rumour that this board will consist largely of departmental officials. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept these officials without any reservation but everyone does not know them as I do. The government will be open to the charge of establishing a centralized bureaucracy. "Let not your good be evil spoken of," is good advice. No one is so perfect and above suspicion that he can afford to place himself under suspicion. Why not state that the members of this board shall be say the deputy minister of agriculture, the director of farm economics, the dairy commissioner or such other officials as the government may choose? The same principle is employed in appointing many members of the grain standards board. There should also be on this board a practical farmer who also knows the technique of agriculture. There should also be one more member. What about the consumer? Great Britain has taken every precaution on behalf of the consumer. The government is turning loose a lot of boards and giving them unprecedented powers and is making no provision to protect the consumer. I realize the consumer quite often is a doubting man who frequently disbelieves that anyone is thinking of him very much. He does not seem to care a great deal, even at election time. Some of them were quite willing in 1930 to pay more for their butter and then paid less. However that may be, I suggest that on this board there should be a representative business man, one who knows the needs of the consumer. The government should not assume that the producers will be always so comprehensive in their outlook that they will think of the consumer's viewpoint at all times. I believe that this board would be greatly improved if all interests were represented thereon, but the government has the power and it can do just as it pleases. This would be a step to disarming the criticism that this is bureaucracy; it would be a board upon which everyone was represented, including the consumer. I am sure that such a board would appeal to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). I believe it would appeal to all sensible people and if it were submitted at any public meeting it would receive approval, I think.

Subsection 7 of section 4 has been discussed, and apparently this has to do with quotas. When we make provisions for quotas against commodities coming in from Great Britain, they will say, we are accommodatingly inviting the establishing of quotas by that country against Canada. By means of a gentlemen's agreement with this government, Great Britain has put into force a quota against our cattle and there is talk of quotas against our oats, dairy products and other commodities. This would simply be an invitation to Major Elliot, the British Minister of Agriculture, to put on further quotas against Canada. Provision is being made also for reprisal quotas on our goods by foreign countries. This looks bad to me and I should like to know more about it in committee. I may be wrong in this, but that is my understanding of the clause. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) just whispered the word "quota" in his speech. I do not believe there were half a dozen members who heard what he said. Quotas are not mentioned in the bill but yet they are snuggled and smuggled in in a confusion of words and terms. The government has launched this bill without proper explanation and is amazed when it receives opposition. I am amazed that I do not oppose it myself, but my love of some of the things that are in the bill is greater than my dislike for some of the objectionable things. I hope the government will reconsider its decision and send this bill to the agriculture committee where the winnowing takes place.

Nothing is said in the bill as to the percentage of vote which shall determine the action to be taken by the minister. The government is pretending to follow the British act but this bill does not hint as to what size of vote will be necessary to launch a marketing project. What is it to be? Is it to be a straight majority? Any one of us is glad to get here on a straight majority of two or three, and I have even known hon. members who have been permitted to sit in this house by the vote cast by the returning officer. But these marketing matters are looked upon differently; there should be somewhere between a 66 to 75 per cent favourable vote before these marketing proposals go into force. There is no hint of what it is going to be so long as the minister is satisfied. Let me appeal to him. He should not put himself into that position. Let him consider the immense responsibility he is assuming of being the only determining factor with nothing to guide him but his own judgment and that of his staff in regard to so important a matter. Even assuming they will be absolutely right, how will the great body of the people be convinced that that is the right way to carry out that plan? That is not the proper way to deal with the matter. The British act places the majority at 66 per cent. May I say there again the Department of Agriculture has been determining policies on a two-thirds vote in connection with slaughtering animals for tuberculosis. Before a restricted area can be established, you have to get the consent of 66 per cent of the stock owners of that district. On that 66 per cent basis the government staff in the health of animals branch, after providing for all the preliminaries in connection with the matter, go out with inspectors, organize a veterinary crew in the affected area, test out the reactors, kill them and salvage them at the nearest abattoir. Will the other third agree to that? They do agree with very few exceptions. It is common sense that they should. The interest of the whole is greater than that of a part,—a third. That is being proposed by me in connection with some features of this bill with even more favourable modifications.

Another proposal I would make—and I feel my leader is absolutely right in regard to it—is that until the board builds up public confidence in itself these marketing proposals should in the interests of everybody be submitted to parliament After parliament sees that the board are using their powers wisely and well in the interests of those whom we are all desirous of serving, that is the producers, then the necessity of coming to parliament could be discontinued after, say two or three years. Parliament is giving the Minister of Agriculture greater powers in his recent bills than it did to the last Minister of Agriculture, and to the last minister parliament gave infinitely greater powers than it did to his predecessor. How do we account for that? It is because the various ministers administered their standardization legislation in conjunction with the various producers' organizations concerned and gave constantly growing satisfaction. I know some producers will raise the objection: Oh, we shall have to lose another year if we have to come to parliament for its approval of a marketing project. We can avoid losing another year in connection with this scheme in this way for this year. Let us get this bill through the committee on agriculture as quickly as possible; let us get it through the commitee of the whole also as quickly as possible, then through the senate and royal assent. If I know anything about the matter, we are likely to be here until the middle of July. Before that date one or more marketing schemes can, I feel, be got ready for submission to parliament for approval, as they are now already under way. I know how impatient farmers are in regard to getting any reforms that they may already have been waiting years for. It is far better to make sure of one's ground and then go ahead rather than to be precipitate in one's action and find it necessary to retrace one's steps. That is a proposal, I think, worth while considering and after a year or two or even three years parliament would have no hesitation in saying:

All right; so long as you are conducting this business the way you are doing, we will let you go ahead with your new marketing proposals, always reserving the right to withdraw that power from you if you abuse it.

The clause with regard to the right to restrict imports was brought up by a number of speakers on this side. That may mean quotas; it may be aggravating regulations or it may be tariffs; I do not care what it is, we have no right as a parliament to delegate power to local boards to control imports. I believe in delegating powers where that is warranted, to producers as is now done to the legal profession, to what we call the learned profession, to which is delegated powers and remarkable administrative powers too. We have the same authority and right to delegate powers to farmer groups or marketing bodies. But there is a point to which I do not think we should go and that is to delegate the control of imports. That control is something that should surely belong to parliament. Let us not fall over ourselves trying to be good to the farmers as it is not really being good to them when we go this extreme length. The farmers who asked for this legislation do not approve of a great deal of the stuff in this bill; they are not particularly concerned so long as they have in it what they want; the bad things do not interest them much. They are all wondering why we are objecting to the bad things. It is our duty to protest against the bad features, to protect the people who are asking for this legislation from the consequences of the government's proposed actions, and to eliminate the bad features so that we can go out to the country and defend all the features of the bill. I would like this bill to go out to the country as the product, not of the Conservatives alone but of the whole parliament of Canada, and then it would be launched without any bias or bigotry. I have had experience in these matters; I have met not with this kind of opposition but with direct opposition from almost every manjack on the other side in connection with our standardization proposals; in regard to hog and egg grading particularly, with the result that nearly every Tory in the country was opposed to the legislation and greatly hampered the acceptance of it throughout the country. This parliament, from all sides, should get reasonably behind the measure. Let us work out the best bill we can, get it started along the line of least resistance, get our noses through the door jamb first, then our heads and shoulders, then our whole bodies, and we shall find the confidence of the country will go out towards this proposal and all hands will be for it. Some may say that is an ideal not attainable, although I believe it is. May I point out that this is not a vision; It is not a case of either young men seeing visions or old men dreaming dreams. In this parliament in connection with the grain act in 1929 and 1930, we worked out in the committee on agriculture and the subcommittee a solution that has stood the test of time ever since, and to which we gave one hundred per cent approval.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Lawson): I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I regret that very much myself. I think I shall embrace an opportunity of continuing this story, maybe on the budget.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, permit me, before commencing to discuss the bill, to extend my congratulations to the department and more particularly to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) on the vision they had in bringing down such a bill as that now before us. At the outset I may say that it was my privilege for six years to be a delegate on the wheat pool and from that experience I gained some knowledge of cooperative marketing. When the wheat pool started it was recognized that we must have a certain sign-up before it could be operated. Our objective was at least fifty per cent. We succeeded finally in getting nearly an eighty per cent sign-up on the second contract, as the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) will remember. What was the reason for the wheat growers in Saskatchewan getting together to the extent of say eighty per cent? It was that they realized the need for orderly marketing. We were all convinced of that. The other night the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) mentioned some of the farm organizations we have had: he mentioned the Grain Growers Grain Company, now the United Grain Growers. I admit that that company did considerable good to farmers in western Canada. I myself am a shareholder in it. He mentioned also the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company that did much good. But I think it is beyond question that we did not go far enough. We found, after all we had done, that there was still a lack, and that lack was orderly marketing. It is not necessary to explain it to western men, but for the sake of eastern members I may tell the story, which was this: In the fall wheat began to flow to Winnipeg in such volume that the price was depressed; in other words we were our own competitors. I think we are all ready to admit that the purpose of this bill is orderly marketing. Prior to coming here in January I believe all the federal members from Saskatchewan, both Liberal and Conservative, were invited to Regina to discuss the marketing bill. I believe the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) was there. From our side Mr. Turnbull and myself met the solicitor and the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, and they intimated to us what they wanted. I feel that this bill pretty well covers what was suggested by them. Their desire was for the orderly marketing of the primary products of our province. I do not know whether the hon. member for South Battleford committed himself to what they suggested. Recently I met the solicitor of the wheat pool again, and his only condemnation of the bill is that it does not go far enough; yet the opposition say it is too radical, too far-reaching. I want to compliment the ex-Minister of Agriculture as a Saskatchewan member on the attitude he has taken; I think it has been very fair. He has at least straddled the fence; I do not know whether he is going to get over, because he says that when the bill gets into committee there are certain clauses to which he is going to object. At any rate I think he has endorsed the first six clauses; and that is gratifying. On such a bill as this, having no purpose but to help the farmers, all the farmers, not only those of the west but of the east, I think we should get together, knowing as we do the present state of agriculture in this country.

I am rather amazed to find some hon. members so suspicious about the powers to be given under this bill. It is contended that it takes from the farmers the control of their products, giving too much power to the Minister of Agriculture or the boards that may be set up. In that connection I notice in the bill the following provision:

7. (2) A representative number of the persons operating under a scheme approved under section five of this act may petition the minister to revoke the scheme.

That is, when the farmers themselves, or a certain number of them, have petitioned the minister to set up a board, and the board has been set up and has operated, should they find that there is any failure in it, the same number of men or others, if I interpret it aright, would be empowered to come with a petition to the minister and ask for the revocation of this scheme. I think that is sufficient protection; I do not think the farmers should be afraid in view of that.

Then it has been said by several speakers that the rights of the farmers are being taken away. I want to ask who in that calling has any great rights to lose at the present time? In other words, what have we to say about any commodity when we go to market it? Very little, I think we must confess, as to the merchandising of it.

Mr. VALLANCE: You will not have any under this bill.

Mr. LOUCKS: I think my hon. friend will admit that that is the situation. Some six weeks ago I had occasion to go to the market in Ottawa. Walking around I priced eggs, which I shall use as an illustration. I asked one farmer, "How much do you want for your eggs?" He said, thirty cents a dozen, and I guarantee them to be fresh." I asked the adjoining farmer what he wanted for his eggs. He said: "Thirty-five cents a dozen." "How can you expect," I said, "to get thirty-five cents for your eggs when your neighbour here is offering me eggs for thirty cents, and guaranteeing them just as fresh? He said, "Is he really offering them for that"? I said, "Yes." I called them together and asked them how they liked their system of marketing. That is the condition prevailing even on the Ottawa market, which I believe is considered one of the best in Canada for agricultural products. I can go back to my boyhood days when I drove a one-horse wagon here in old Ontario and took my mother to market; I remember my mother being just as disappointed in selling her eggs as that man was. Who was her competitor? Her next-door neighbour. And that condition still exists. I asked these farmers how they would like what this bill provides for, a scheme making it possible for them to cease competing with each other. That is the trouble, the same as with this vast amount of wheat.

Now what happened after we operated a wheat pool for some six or eight years? Do not forget that while starting with the pool was optional, it was compulsory after we had signed. Something has been said here about the penalties. Let me tell you that when I signed the contract of the wheat pool I agreed to be subject to a penalty of twenty-five cents a bushel should I market outside the pool. That would have meant to me probably about $2,500 on a crop of 10,000 bushels. Why did I do that? Because I was convinced that I should not be a competitor of my neighbour or the other farmers of Saskatchewan. The penalties provided under this bill are from $25 to as much as $500 or three months in gaol. The farmers of Saskatchewan were willing to subject themselves to more than that to save the situation for orderly marketing.

If ever there was a time in the history of Canada that regulated marketing was necessary it is now; I think we all agree on that.

Another feature on which this bill has been criticized but which I think necessary is this. Last fall, for instance, in my part of the country—and I think this would answer the hon. member for South Battleford—we had thousands of pigs weighing perhaps fifty to sixty pounds each, and the time came when the barley or whatever grain they had ran out. The farmers had not a dollar to buy grain to finish these pigs, so what did they do? They sent them to the Saskatoon stock yards, and the price realized would not average $2 each. Would it not have been a good thing for those farmers if there had been in effect some measure such as this, so that the board could come to their rescue, go to the bank if necessary and get a loan to buy barley, which was only twenty-five cents a bushel? Just imagine the earnings that could have been made if a bill similar to this had been in force, and that applies equally to cattle. Thousands of cattle were taken to market when they were not fit for sale at all, and so far as prices were concerned they were practically slaughtered on the markets of Saskatoon and all over western Canada.

Some mention has been made of quotas. We know we have a wheat quota to-day, and I found it very gratifying to read in the newspapers recently that some fifteen nations were getting together, in Rome, to agree according to the report, upon a world pool. They are not only the producers and exporters; they are the importers as well, the producers and consumers, if you like. There is an example of cooperation between the consumer and the producer. We have read the evidence brought out in the price spreads committee, and surely it must be agreed that it is a step in the right direction if we can prevent such spreads. I believe hon. members will agree when I say that the farmers cannot go on unless we do something to raise commodity prices. How can we do that? One way is by means of this marketing board. I was told by a solicitor for the wheat pool that they are well satisfied with the proposition, that they would not want one clause removed though they might add two or three more. Surely by setting up this board we can eliminate a great deal of that spread; surely we can raise commodity prices. When I go down the street of any town or city and pass the stores I often think that while I might go in and offer so much for an article, it is not possible for me to dictate the price that any merchant need accept. What would happen to their businesses if they had nothing to say with regard to the price for which their articles were sold? When we come to the farmer, however, that is exactly the situation that prevails. He has never reached the point of being able to say anything as to the price for which he shall sell the commodities he produces. Surely no one is going to object if he tries to do that now.

The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) referred to the Scottish cooperative in his own home county. Naturally they would take exception to the activities of Mr. McFarland and to this government guaranteeing the banks in an attempt to secure some decent price for our wheat. I know that when we organized our pool the Scottish cooperative took exception to our action, naturally enough, since they have elevators scattered here and there over our province. Why did they take exception? They did so because, when we had eighty per cent of the wheat under one control, it hurt their business. Yet the hon. member for South Battleford gets up and almost applauds the Scottish cooperative while condemning the government for having come to the rescue of the farmers of western Canada by guaranteeing the banks in order to take the wheat off the market. Let me point out to my hon. friend that if the growers of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta had signed contracts for another year; if we had retained that control of the wheat which we possessed when we had about eighty per cent of the farmers united and if we had continued to make the initial payment to the farmers there would have been no need of the government stepping in. But wheat got out of order again and it was necessary for the government to come to our rescue. That was the reason that action was taken, and that was the only reason. We reached the point where we refused to sign our contracts and to-day, while we claim we have wheat pools, the farmers are putting their wheat through any elevators at all. I will agree with the hon. member for South Battleford that the price dropped so low that the initial payment would not have been sufficient to finance operations for the coming year, but that was what happened.

I want to make it very clear, as a member from Saskatchewan, that I am interested in other commodities than wheat. It is a great mistake to suppose that Saskatchewan produces nothing but grain. Saskatchewan is the leading producer of horses; it stands second in poultry, third in milk, third in pigs and fourth in the number of cattle. So I am doubly interested in seeing that everything possible should be done to assist agriculture in this country, because we are vitally concerned in almost all agricultural activities.

When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) introduced this bill a few days ago he referred to several commodities and mentioned the extent to which they were produced and consumed in Canada. For instance, more than ninety-nine per cent of all the eggs we produce are consumed here. Surely something can be done to raise that commodity price. I do not mind telling you, Mr. Speaker, that when I was home at Easter eggs were worth barely eight cents a dozen in our town. What farmer can continue at that rate? My son received 38 cents for five dozen eggs, in our own town. In connection with sheep and lamb, ninety-nine per cent of the production is consumed in Canada, yet the farmers have no say as to what price they shall receive. When I hear hon. members talk about the need for foreign markets it seems to me we had better set our own house in order first, and I believe this bill goes a long way in that direction. We consume 98.9 per cent of the butter we produce and over 98 per cent of the poultry. Let me say that last fall, in November and December, I saw turkeys brought to the market in Saskatoon, and I actually saw women with tears in their eyes because they had to sacrifice their poultry. Why was that? There was no order about it. I actually saw one woman come out of a store with tears in her eyes. She had gone there expecting to get so much for her poultry, but she did not get anything like what she hoped. That was because John Jones, Tom Smith and other people had been there before her and too many turkeys had been placed on the market. Surely we can regulate that, to some extent at least.

I want to say again that I am glad the government of Canada have come to the point where they see the possibility of doing something in this direction and are bold enough to take a step forward. In connection with cattle and beef we consume over ninety-seven per cent of our production according to the official statistics; more than ninety-six per cent of our potatoes, ninety-five per cent of our pork products, ninety-four per cent of our oats and eighty-eight per cent of our barley are consumed in Canada. Yet we have been sitting here looking at each other and doing nothing. I do not think they mean anything by it, but I sometimes wonder why some hon. gentlemen in this house object so strenuously to the farmers doing as others have done in an attempt to guarantee at least a reasonable price for what they produce.

In the amendment which was ruled out of order this afternoon the leader of the opposition moved against compulsion. I want to say right here that this measure would not be worth the paper it is written on if there were not compulsion in it. What good would it be? I believe I can make myself clear by explaining the situation in regard to wheat. Last year and for two or three years prior we did not have the farmers in western Canada, and particularly the province of Saskatchewan, on contract, and because there was no compulsion the wheat was rushed on to the market at Winnipeg. I admit that I was not bound to sign a contract—it was optional—but after I had signed, what happened? I was under compulsion to live up to that contract and to do nothing else. That is what compulsion means, and it does not mean anything else.

I do not think we should become fearful of the set-up of the boards. I have no doubt that the local boards will consist of men drawn from agriculture. There is no doubt about that. I was pleased to hear the ex-Minister of Agriculture state that he would like to see something done very quickly. He intimated that if the bill went to the committee on agriculture probably thirty days would be required for discussion. In that connection I want to say this: I hope we are not going to waste thirty days in the passing of this bill. If there is any one thing which more than another is disgusting to the people out in the country, it is that very thing. They see us coming down here and sitting day after day, day after day. What did we do this afternoon? We wasted nearly all of it disputing the amendment offered by the right hon. leader of the opposition. I wonder what the people back in the country think of us when we sit down here arguing, arguing. We argued for weeks to get the relief measure through the house, and we argued this afternoon on a little point in connection with the amendment. That is not what the farmers are thinking about.

When I landed home on a Saturday a meeting in my home town had been arranged. The farmers who crowded the hall wanted me to give them an outline of the marketing bill. As I had a copy with me I took it clause by clause; I explained it to the best of my ability, and I tell hon. members right here and now that in regard to that bill there was not a dissenting voice. They were one hundred per cent behind it. They said, "If you can do something like this, your government is working, and working in the right way." There were men in that meeting who would not consent to wheat pool contracts; they refused to sign, but they see now the results of their folly. I want to say in all fairness, however, that you may go into any community you like and you will always find that minority which did not cooperate. Even when the telephone system was being developed in western Canada, over twenty-five years ago there was a minority which said, "No, we want to see the telephone in operation and we want to know what we will receive from it before we will have anything to do with it or take any share in its operation." We will always have such minorities, and we had them when we signed those contracts. Do hon. members mean to tell me that when a minority refuses to cooperate for its own good and for the welfare of the majority, some rule should not be brought in whereby—for their own good, mind you,—they may be forced to come in and to cooperate? Certainly there should be. It is not harmful to them; it is in their own interests. That condition however will always exist, because there is that class of men. And while we have adopted cooperative measures in western Canada I should like to be fair to those who would not cooperate; their attitude is due to lack of education. But to-day there is a greater grasp of what cooperative marketing will do than there has been at any previous time, because men—even that minority which kept out of the wheat pools—are beginning to realize that by so doing they did not help themselves. They are helpless so far as the marketing of their wheat is concerned. They would cooperate to-day.

In my section of the country, whether they be Liberals, Conservatives or members of the Cooperative Commonwealth party, almost one hundred per cent of the people are giving credit to the government because it helped to finance wheat operations and to see that wheat was stabilized at a certain price. The people are behind that action; there is no doubt about it.

On a certain day in Regina I met the sixteen directors of the wheat pool who said, "Mr. Loucks, you may tell this, if you like, that irrespective of politics, if there is one man to whom we want to give credit it is the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. We give him credit because he went to London and while there cooperated with representatives from twenty-one countries in order to obtain a quota and to help the wheat growers in western Canada." The executive of the wheat pool made that statement, and in making it they were only fair. They realize what the government has done. They realize, further, that such action must come. I believe that in connection with every commodity there may have to be a quota; there is no question about that. To-day the problem is not one of production but one of merchandising that which is produced.

Only this morning some members visited the experimental farm in order to observe experiments being made along certain lines. I could not help thinking: After all, what good will come of these experiments? I do not want anyone to think that I am undervaluing the work being done at the experimental farm, but no matter how well an animal is bred, no matter how carefully it is developed, if it cannot be marketed in an orderly way so as to obtain something from its sale, there can be very little use in taking special care in breeding. While visiting the farm we observed experiments in connection with poultry, but my mind went back to the fact that eggs in my constituency were worth only eight cents a dozen. I had to think of those facts, because I know the circumstances. If after all these experiments have been made at the experimental farm, through a bill such as the one before us we can make it possible for the farmers in Canada to obtain some profit, then I say we should act promptly.

But this bill goes even farther than that: it provides for investigations. Why is that provision made? If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) were in his seat I would assure him that the investigations could go far enough to see that we as producers do not exploit the consumers. No farmer will object to that provision, because he does not wish to exploit the consumer. The bill takes care even of that possibility.

For these reasons I cannot see why we cannot get together and set an example. Why cannot representatives in this House of Commons, coming from all parts of the dominion, for once present a united front in connection with this bill? All hon. members know that if at a later time one clause or another did not meet with the approval of an hon. member he would be at liberty to move an amendment. True, there may be weaknesses in the bill, but they could be remedied in committee. In the event of an hon. member opposite offering an amendment in the interests of the farmers, I believe I would be open minded enough to accept it. If agriculture would be helped by such amendment, I would agree to it.

There is a further condemnation of the bill in that it promises subsidies. That is, whenever a farmer is dictated to, if you choose to use that term, in connection with cattle or any other commodity, there is a clause providing for a subsidy; he will be helped because he has had to hold back a shipment of cattle. In my view that part of the bill particularly commends itself. It has been the subject of much great criticism, however; it seems that in some cases guarantees are considered necessary, but when it comes to the farmer objection is taken. This bill goes to the extent of subsidizing when it is felt that it is not desirable to ship a certain commodity. We ought to cooperate with the farmers in Great Britain, but how are we going to do it if we do not have some means of effecting that cooperation? Certainly we do not wish to flood the English market. We say to the farmer who is not allowed to ship wheat, "We will subsidize you for a certain amount." I hope the Minister of Agriculture will for the time being leave that clause as it is.

The farmers are not able to finance the setting up of the machinery and I would not like to see the act crippled for the lack of funds to set the machinery going. I make this prediction, however, that once it is established, almost automatically the farmers will take care of it. They are not the ones who are always wanting to go to the consolidated revenue fund—not at all. I would remind hon. members that the farmers of western Canada financed the machinery under the old wheat board. There was no objection whatever to doing that. The farmers do not object to financing the marketing of their own products. We have financed millions and millions for the wheat pool, two cents a bushel for the elevator and one cent a bushel for reserve. I hold over $2,000 in certificates myself. I did not object if I was going to get a better price for my wheat, and I do not think I should ask someone else to pay that for me. But things are so serious for the farmer at the present time that for the first year at least I hope this clause will be retained in the bill whereby the government can come to the rescue and help with the financing of things in which the farmers will need a little assistance.

I have spoken at considerable length, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think it is necessary to occupy the time of the house further in expressing my approval of this bill. I am not one of those who feel like criticizing altogether hon. members of the opposition for their attitude in regard to this bill because there are some things about each other that we do not very well understand. For instance, my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) and I have cooperated in pretty nearly everything, but he cannot cooperate with Mr. Loucks on this bill. His constituency adjoins mine and his people need this bill just as much as mine do, but I notice that his last words in addressing this house were that he was going to oppose the bill. I fear for him when he tells the farmers of his constituency that Mr. Loucks of Rosetown supported this bill and he did not. I am afraid of what the farmers will say to him, but I am generous enough to be ready to go and help smooth things over for him and patch it up. But when I go back to Rosetown constituency myself I know that I need have no fear at all because of my attitude on this bill.

The bill is very simple. There are only about three clauses that are important. The most important provisions are those providing for orderly marketing and the regulating of the things that we produce. My hon. friend from South Battleford and I have cooperated in different organizations out there. I have listened to him speak many times on agricultural matters but I confess that I never heard him labour harder than he did when he was addressing this house the other day and endeavouring to justify his opposition to this bill. The first time I met him he was organizing a farmers' union. I have always looked upon him as a man who was trying to help agriculture, and therefore I was more convinced than ever when he was opposing this bill that he was labouring under a handicap; but I will help him if I possibly can.

I have been informed that the hon. members in opposition in this house were told that they must oppose this bill; that has come to me pretty authoritatively. I can tell them further that the solicitor of the wheat pool went around to some of the members from Saskatchewan and tried to whip them into line, and told them that if they did not support the bill it would be very serious politically for them. He came into my office the other morning—naturally he comes to me because we have discussed it—and he said that he would like to see the bill go further. He and I have spoken from the same platform and we are in sympathy in regard to agricultural problems, although we do not agree politically. So I will advise my hon. friends opposite from Saskatchewan not to go too far in opposing this bill. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that I am free. I feel fully justified in supporting the bill because it is trying to do something for the farmers; it is giving them a chance to live.

We are not living in the past. As I said earlier in my remarks, I drove my mother in a one-horse wagon to the Kingston market, and she had to be penalized in selling her butter and eggs. Do hon. gentlemen think that with the vision we have to-day we are going to be content to live in the past? Not at all. It has been suggested that this gov ernment is becoming too socialistic, but I want to warn those who have made that suggestion that we have got to step forward, and this bill is a step forward. That is why I can support it and go back and defend my attitude in Rosetown constituency one hundred per cent, and if necessary when I go back I will try to fix up things for my hon. friend from South Battleford.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I ask my hon. friend a question in regard to the statement he made respecting the solicitor of the wheat pool? Would he mind telling us just who the members were that the solicitor saw and told that they had better not raise any objection to this bill?

Mr. LOUCKS: He did not mention the names but said he went around among the Saskatchewan members.

Mr. TURNBULL: He got the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell)

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING—CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED

Bill No. 58, to amend an act to incorporate the Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada—Mr. Sullivan.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. A. F. TOTZKE (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, just before the house rose at six o'clock we were listening to an address by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks). I paid close attention to his remarks, but about all I could gather from them was that he was in favour of the bill. He had nothing particularly new to bring forth, so I am sure he will pardon me if I do not follow him in the few remarks I wish to make. However, the hon. member said one thing which I do not think I can allow to pass without comment. He made a positive statement to the effect that the solicitor for the wheat pools had gone around to some of the members from Saskatchewan to try to whip them into line by telling them if they did not support this bill it would prove very serious politically for them. The hon. member said that the solicitor had come to his office the other morning, the inference being that the solicitor had told the hon. member that he had gone to see some of the Saskatchewan Liberal members to whip them into line. I know the solicitor for the wheat pools very well and I do not believe he said anything of the kind.

Mr. LOUCKS: I take exception to that. I claim he did say just what I said.

Mr. TOTZKE: I still say that I do not believe the solicitor for the wheat pools said anything of the kind and I do not think I am departing from the rules in making that statement. I submit that that is a matter between the hon. member for Rosetown and the solicitor for the wheat pools. I say that that statement is entirely incorrect so far as I am concerned, because the solicitor did not try to coerce me in any way either to support or to oppose the bill, and so far as I have been able to learn from my colleagues from Saskatchewan, the solicitor did not try to coerce any of them.

During the course of his remarks the hon. member for Rosetown said that he was glad he was free. I am glad also that he is free and I am sure he will have still more freedom after the next election. We are responsible to our constituents for our actions, and I am sure all hon. members on this side are willing to leave any judgment upon their actions to the constituents who sent them here as their representatives.

I should like to deal with some of the provisions of the bill now before us, and to give as clearly and as concisely as I can my interpretation of them as well as my reasons for the action I intend to take upon the motion for second reading. The bill is entitled:

An act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

If that title gave us a true picture of what was intended to be done by the bill, I think all hon. members on this side would be only too pleased to support it. However, as I read the bill it is a long way from doing that. Instead of tending to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products, the bill really tends to restrict that marketing. In introducing the bill the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) started out by saying that he would not speak at any great length at that time. He said:

> . . . there will no doubt be ample opportunity to make any observations that I think it necessary to make when the bill is before the committee.

To me that seems a very strange attitude for a minister to take in introducing a bill having the supreme importance of this one. At a stage of the procedure when the principle of the bill is being discussed he did not take the opportunity of developing fully the provisions of the bill in order to show the people throughout the length and breadth of this land just what this bill means. These people are waiting anxiously for that information, but he did not take the opportunity to indicate to them precisely what was in his mind as to the meaning of the provisions of the bill. Perhaps the minister was not any too sure himself as to what its provisions mean. I am sure he knows quite well what the people of Canada, and especially those of western Canada, have been expecting in the way of legislation to take care of the marketing of their products. It is my impression that the minister himself was not any too sure about the bill and was not any too well satisfied with it.

The minister in his speech first gave us a history of marketing as it affects agricultural products and the reasons for the failure of some of the cooperative associations that have been trying to take care of marketing natural products in different parts of the dominion. He said first of all that they did not have the proper men at the heads of the organizations; second, he said that the cooperatives themselves lost sight of the necessity of improvement in the quality and quantity, and of continuity of supply; third, he said that efforts had been made by private interests throughout the country against the success of the cooperatives and in that way a good deal was done to prevent them from succeeding. He said also that the executives of the cooperatives were chosen for their business ability and had no vital financial interest in the production of the natural products which they were undertaking to handle. Again he said that the number of producers who had remained outside the cooperatives depressed the market and thus undermined the efforts of the cooperatives. He said that the bill would take care of all, or at least the majority, of those difficulties and bring about better marketing conditions. In other words, he said in effect that if provisions similar to those contained in the bill had been in force the cooperatives could have been successful in the past. As I develop my argument I intend to deal with some of these matters.

The minister said that a great deal of thought and consideration had been given to the preparation of this marketing bill. I do not doubt it, but I wonder by whom that thought and consideration were given. I feel satisfied that it could not have been the Minister of Agriculture who was responsible for the bill. Anybody who has studied it and knows the minister; who knows the part of the country from which he comes, knows he is fully aware of the ideas and the desires of the farmers at least of western Canada in connection with a marketing bill of this kind, and I do not believe the minister himself, had he been drafting the bill, would have done anything other than put into it what the farmers, those who had been taking part in those cooperative movements, desired in connection with the marketing of their products.

This afternoon there was a considerable argument on the principle of this bill. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said that there was only one principle, that of establishing a marketing act; that that was the whole principle contained in the bill and on that principle we should vote on the second reading. But after listening to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture and reading it over in Hansard I notice he says that three principles are contained in the bill: first, to give the producer control of the regulation and marketing of his products; second, that organizing and getting closer to the market would show the necessity of improving the quality; third, that this plan was necessary so that the primary producers might devote their entire time to production and be assured of no interference in marketing. With these principles I wish to deal at more or less length. I think the summary I have given of the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture, together with his statement that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada and that the country cannot succeed if agriculture and other primary industries do not succeed, will pretty well cover his speech.

I want to congratulate him on his speech, not so much for the explanation he gave of the bill—because, indeed, explanation was conspicuous by its absence—as for the tone of his speech. He was very moderate, more moderate than he usually is; and I should like to congratulate him upon the fact that in his speech there was nothing in the way of political partisanship. But I am disappointed that he did not go into the provisions of the bill. If in his dissertation on the problems and difficulties of the primary producers in marketing their products he had indicated the manner in which this bill was to take care of those problems and difficulties, it would have been much more to the point and more what the people generally desire.

The minister said that he had received many resolutions supporting this bill. I wonder how many resolutions he has had in support of it since the people throughout the country have had an opportunity of studying its provisions. I wonder also, since the bill has been studied, how many resolutions he has received expressing dissatisfaction with its provisions. I have under my hand a news item from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 28 of this year, giving an account—

Mr. MORAND: That is not news.

Mr. TOTZKE: I know the editor of this paper is one of those who sits in an office and gets a few paltry dollars a month and therefore should not know anything about what is agitating the minds of the Canadian people, but this article does not happen to be an editorial. This is an interview given by Mr. W. A. Landreth, of the poultry pool. Time will not permit me to quote the whole interview, but I wish to read just one sentence—and I may say that this gentleman in this interview was inclined to support the bill. He says:

> The aim of the bill is producer control based on the British marketing act.

We know that producer control in this bill is not based on the British marketing act, and I have often wondered what this gentleman's reaction was when he actually got a copy of the bill and studied its provisions. I am satisfied that he would give an entirely different interview from that which he gave to the Free Press at that time.

It is significant that so few of the members supporting the government have risen to speak in favour of the bill.

It is true that a number of them have said they are in favour of it, but invariably in the course of their remarks they had to read something into the bill. They said they were in favour of it if so-and-so were incorporated; or they were in favour of it but felt the government was going to make certain amendments. That was invariably the case in all speeches made by hon. members opposite, and I want to give some short quotations from their remarks to show that I am correct in making that statement.

The first to speak from the government side following the address of the minister was the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I have a very high regard for him; I believe he is sincere in everything he says in the house, and I know he is particularly interested in marketing legislation because he represents a number of fruit growers in the Okanagan valley who have in the past tried to market their products through a scheme of compulsory cooperation, and only the fact that the bill was declared ultra vires by the courts prevented them from carrying on that method of marketing. So I say that he is very much interested and very sincere. I quote from his speech on page 2255 of Hansard:

> Under section 5 of the bill the producers may join together in the preparation of a scheme which is submitted to the minister for his approval. The minister must satisfy himself that there is a sufficient volume of support behind the scheme. How is he to do that? In my opinion the only way he can do it is to have the figures of a poll laid before him. It is most desirable that the scheme should make provision for registration and polling.

The hon. member for Yale is supporting the bill, but one of the very essentials that he asks for is not in the bill, and we have no assurance that it is going to be embodied in it.

Then I take another quotation from the hon. member's speech, found at page 2256:

> It is almost certain that any scheme will contain the idea of a board selected by the producers to be in charge of the fruit or whatever commodity it may be which they have to handle.

He says "it is almost certain," but again there is nothing in the bill to warrant the assertion that the producers will select the board.

Here is another quotation from the speech of the same hon. member, found at page 2257:

> Therefore the practical method of doing it is for them to market where directed by the regulatory body, and for the receipts of that variety and that grade to be pooled. There is no doubt, I maintain, that under subsection (a) of section 4 that power is covered by the bill, but it appears to me it would be a desirable thing for a definite statement to be made by the government as to whether I am correct in reading that into the bill, because it will have a very considerable effect on the volume of support which this measure will receive in certain farming communities.

Once again he wants the government to say that he is correct in reading this provision into the bill. I maintain that these things are not provided for in the bill as it stands.

Then I wish to refer to one or two remarks made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel). At page 2311 he is reported as saying:

> This criticism from the other side of the house is simply for political purposes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the criticisms coming from this side of the house are simply for political purposes, how about the criticisms that are coming from behind the government itself? Are they also for political purposes? Or is it perhaps that the bill has been introduced for political purposes? Is it that an election is in the offing and this bill will be put through and the election held before its provisions may be tried out.?

Mr. McINTOSH: Surely they would never do that!

Mr. TOTZKE: Lower down on the same page the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi is recorded as saying:

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am an eastern farmer and I am opposed most strongly, not to the grading acts themselves, but to their administration and operation. That is what I am opposed to.

I am in favour of the grading of products. In respect of our products for export it is necessary to have grading systems, proper quality and continuity of supply, but I say to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that if these boards are established there will be just such grading as there is at the present time. Does he think for a moment that the grading done by the officers of these boards will be any better, any more satisfactory than the grading done by the inspectors under the present act? I say it will not. And the average farmer, who after all is human, will not be satisfied with any system of grading if he thinks the grading of his products has not been done fairly, if he thinks he should have had a better grade than the grader gives him.

Lower down on the same page the hon. member is reported as having said:

And the packers will buy butter at fifteen and sixteen cents this summer and sell it at fifty and sixty cents a pound next winter. Is there any justice in that? Do we not need a marketing board?

Are these marketing boards going to be in a position to do what the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi wants them to do? Are they going to be in a position to take butter and eggs and perishable products in the summer, give the producer a reasonable price for them, and carry them over to the winter? Why, the very bill prevents them doing that. They are not buying and selling agencies, they are only directing and regulatory agencies. While they have under this bill power to build cold storage plants and in that way take care of perishable products, who is going to advance the payment to the producer? These boards have no right to do that. Therefore I say that the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi was reading into the bill something which is not there.

Further on he was asked if this bill was going to fix up all our troubles, and he said, "It should, let us try it; I am willing to try anything." I also say that the bill should make provision to deal with the difficulties of which the hon. member speaks, but it does not do so; therefore we are not justified in supporting it in its present form. We are all ready to do anything we can to improve the position of the producer, but surely the combined wisdom of the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other members of the cabinet, not to mention the Prime Minister, could have evolved a better marketing bill than this.

I want to make one or two quotations from the speech of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). He usually is a very able debater. Seldom is he at a loss for arguments in support of any bill introduced by the government, but in this particular case I was very much disappointed in him. I felt that he had to labour very hard indeed to find some justification for supporting this bill. At page 2381 he is reported as follows:

The farmers of Saskatchewan had lean cattle and, he said, the board would prohibit the selling of them.

He was referring to an hon. member on this side.

It will do nothing of the kind. What the board would do would be this. It would direct that those lean cattle be placed where they could be developed into fat cattle and sold to proper advantage.

Where is there anything in the bill that provides for places and men to take these lean cattle and fatten them to the proper condition for the market? There again the hon. member for Regina is reading something into the bill which is not there. Under this bill I say that these difficulties cannot be overcome. For example, when hogs are in the proper stage as regards weight and conformation they may be sold as bacon hogs or as selects, but if you have to keep them even two or three weeks longer they become too heavy and the producer loses the advantage of the price paid for bacon hogs and the dollar premium for select bacon hogs.

I am afraid I am not going to have time to go into the provisions of this bill as carefully as I should like, but there are certain things that I wish particularly to speak about. This bill does not give the producer the control over the marketing of his products which he desires, and which in my opinion he should have. In the first place, it sets up a dominion marketing board which is to be under the control of the government and governor in council, but it makes no provision whatever for any control on the part of the producer. All through the bill I have been looking for any provisions that might give the producer some control over the marketing and regulating of his products, but I can find none. Subsection (a) of section 4 provides that the board shall have power:

To regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

The board has complete control as to what shall be done in the way of regulation and marketing. In subsections (c) and (d) provision is made for compensation to the farmer on account of any loss that he may incur in consequence of any order of the board. That is all right so far as the farmer is concerned; I am all for compensation for him in such an event. But I would point out that there would have to be found an army of investigators. And who is to decide whether the compensation is just or not? No opportunity is given for the farmer himself or his peers, his fellow farmers, to have anything to say as to whether the compensation provided is satisfactory or not. I say therefore that under this provision it will be very difficult indeed to give satisfaction to the producer. Subsection (e) gives the board power:

To assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product.

That is a very good provision; facilities of one kind or another should be afforded to take care of storage and processing of farm products. Such facilities are very necessary, but we should pause to consider the expense to which all these things will lead. Here, however, is one section that I cannot allow to pass without comment. I refer to the provision contained in subsection (f) of the section I am considering:

To require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder.

In this section the board, over which the farmer will have no control and in the composition of which he will have nothing to say, will have absolute control over the producer, and by the cancellation of his licence they may restrict his production or refuse altogether to allow him to produce any goods at all.

[Mr. Totzke.]

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that I shall have to leave the various sections of the bill which I should like to deal with, inasmuch as there are some general remarks I wish to make in connection with the matter. Let me say first of all that this bill does not meet the situation; it does not give those powers which the farmers, more especially the producers of western Canada, are looking for. I know from my personal experience in western Canada something of what the farmers wanted, something of what the cooperatives wanted in connection with this marketing legislation. In the first place, they wanted power to form compulsory marketing pools. There is no question of that in my mind; I have no doubt that those who have been agitating most strenuously for marketing legislation of some kind such as some of our producers have are absolutely in favour of compulsory pools. The producers in the west are not unanimous on this, but there is considerable agitation and there are some arguments to be advanced in favour of it. What the pools themselves, or at any rate the majority of them, want is power to make it compulsory, but they do not want that power in any arbitrary manner; they want the producers to have an opportunity of voting on the question whether there shall be a compulsory pool or not. The only thing they want is that a certain majority should be fixed at a very high percentage, and if that high percentage of a majority vote in favour of it, then the minority shall be forced to come into the pool. I am not advancing as my own opinions any of the statements which I am now making, but rather my impression of what the farmers of the west, or at least some of them, are asking for.

In the second place, I am sure that the boards and those advocating a marketing plan want the power to buy and sell; at any rate they want the power to act as selling agents. I am sure they want control of the boards themselves, and they want the power to disband the board if necessary. As I said before, I have no doubt that all those who are agitating in favour of these powers are averse to having the powers without an opportunity being given the producers themselves of voting on the scheme, so that by their vote they may say whether they want it or not.

I wish to say a few general words now. The Minister of Agriculture, in the course of his remarks, said that agriculture is the backbone of Canada. I have no doubt that every one in this dominion will admit that agriculture is our main industry, and that if agriculture is not prosperous the rest of Canada cannot be prosperous. In my own province of Saskatchewan the farmers are not prosperous; indeed, they are in very bad shape, because they need markets for their products. The members of this government admit that that is what is needed by the producers, but they say that at the present time the markets of the world are restricted and we should regulate our supplies. Well, there is nothing in this bill to promote the extension of markets for our products. What the farmer of western Canada wants more than anything else is for someone to sell his products for him. He wants somebody, whether it be the Department of Trade and Commerce or whoever it may be, to go on the markets of the world and sell his goods. The time has passed when we in the west can sit back complacently and say, "We have the best wheat in the world; the nations cannot get along without it and therefore they will come and buy it." We have had the experience of being unable to sell our wheat in that way and I say therefore that we need someone to sell it. If we cannot find a means of disposing of it, it will be a very short time before the farmer of the west is out of business.

What has this government ever done to sell the products of the western farmer? An imperial conference was held in Ottawa and we were given a six cent preference on our wheat. We were to sell it at the world price. Has this made a market for our wheat? Not at all. The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), in his remarks the other day, read a letter from an old country firm setting out the situation with regard to wheat in Great Britain. There was a table which he wanted to put on the record; I have it before me but I am afraid I shall not have time to put it on either. Not only have the farmers of Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker, suffered from poor crops due to climatic conditions, but the prices for their products have fallen away below production costs, and now we are asked to restrict our production in the hope that prices will go up. The farmer in western Canada does not want restriction; what he wants is a bumper crop and fair prices, otherwise he will never get out of the hole. I say that this government should go to those countries in Europe which formerly imported our products and make trade agreements with them. We should say to those countries, "We will take some of your products if you will give us the opportunity of sending wheat to your country." At the conference recently held in Rome, France made the offer that she would be willing to reduce her wheat acreage if she were given the opportunity to place some of her manufactured products on the Canadian market. Why do we not accept that offer? Is it not time we got away from the idea of protecting some of the little secondary industries in eastern Canada? Is it not time that we gave proper consideration to the primary producers? Is it not time that we gave the western farmer a chance to buy some of his implements of production and necessities of life at more reasonable prices, in order that he may more nearly equalize the cost of production with the price he receives for his products? The farmer in western Canada through all these years has been paying through the nose. To-day he is in the position where he can see no hope. All the agitations and radical speeches made in the western provinces are the result of the position in which the western farmer finds himself. What he wants and what he needs is an opportunity to trade his products for those which he requires produced in other countries. He wants an opportunity to carry on that trade in a fair and reasonable manner. That is the only way in which he may hope to survive.

Mr. C. N. DORION (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, representing a county which comprises a population three quarters of which are farmers, I deem it my duty to briefly comment on this bill No. 51.

The title "The Natural Products Marketing Act" summarizes all its economic purpose.

Ever since the mechanization of industry which gave birth to economic liberalism—the primary cause of the ills from which this modern world suffers, at present—numerous measures have been enacted by various countries; however, such legislation, as a whole, only concerns trade and industry. The present bill under consideration is one of the most progressive measures ever submitted to the parliament of Canada, and that is what gives it such importance, because by this legislation we are resolutely resorting to regulated economy, particularly in connection with natural products.

Since the government introduced this bill, we have read some criticism in the press which sides with the oppsition, especially in the province of Quebec.

The conservative party is charged with having borrowed part of its program from the radical party, the C.C.F. We may reply, as Disraeli once said:

I am a conservative to preserve what is sound; a radical to suppress what is unsound.

For too long a time—we are aware of this, to-day, more than ever—the state has neglected to carry out one of its primary functions: to regulate the economic activities of the nation, not in the interest or for the benefit of the private individual or group of persons, but in the interest of the collectivity or community.

Up to this day, economic liberalism—which prompted Jean Baptiste Say to state: "Production opens markets to products"—made it a rule to prohibit any interference by the state in the economic field of activities. The rule of supply and demand was the law. Where has this principle in practice for over a century and a half led us? What do we see throughout the world after such a long period of indifference or "laissez faire"? Why has the state so long been reluctant to interfere in order to regulate the prices, salaries and markets? Those are as many questions which we have a right to ask and which the present bill will be a solution for many.

Indeed, it is not sufficient to have discovered new methods of wealth production, the means of specially putting such production in circulation and distributing it must be resorted to. I repeat what I stated a moment ago as regards mechanization of industry and economic liberalism; the first of these two sciences has attained a high degree of development; however, the second through abstention on the part of the state has lamentably dragged behind.

As George Boris wrote in his work intituled: "Problème de l'or et crise mondiale":

> There is no lack of motive power or means to create it. Neither are the building materials wanting; nor are we short of food to feed humanity or fuel to keep the people warm; nor are the textiles or leather wanting to clothe us. Large mills exist, new ones can easily be built and equipped to turn the raw material into articles of consumption. And the hands are also willing, only awaiting the order to start work.
> However, the means of distribution and exchange are not in keeping with the methods of production which could probably fill our requirements and wishes. That is the reason why the iron rule remains in force making the poverty of some the ransom for the welfare of others.

The period between 1914 and 1918 should serve as examples to us. It happened that troops were marking time on certain battlefields while others were almost overwhelmed by the enemy. What did those in command do under such circumstances? Did they send back home these unoccupied soldiers? No such blunder was made but there was a new distribution of the various units, troops were massed where the enemy was on the point of breaking through. So must we act in the economic field of activities. The duty of the state is to regulate the purchasing and marketing of natural products so that those who are short may purchase them from those who already have too much.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Why produce wealth if we do not know how to put it in circulation or distribute it? In fact, are not the two results sought by this bill to circulate and distribute our natural products? Mr. Albert Rioux, president of "l'Union Catholique des cultivateurs de la province de Québec," doctor of agricultural science, has a deep knowledge of farm problems—not only from a theoretical viewpoint but also as regards the practical side—he is one of the most brilliant Canadian scholars who studied the question, he wrote in the "Devoir" on April 10 and 17, two very interesting articles in connection with the act relating to the Natural Products Marketing Board. It will afford me pleasure, indeed, to see these two articles translated into English for the benefit of our friends who speak the English language and who do not read the "Devoir."

In the first of these articles, after having noted that, from the very outset of the crisis, all industries had taken measures to adapt themselves to the law of supply and demand by reducing their output and exercising a strict control over their members, the author adds:

> The farmers carried on their production, they even attempted, in a number of cases, to increase this production so as to compensate themselves for the loses sustained in the drop in prices.
> Moreover, agriculture is incapable of quickly adapting its production to the changing conditions of the market. Many factors which influence the agricultural output are uncontrollable by man. Isolated, essentially individualists, farmers cannot organize and easily group themselves to regulate their production and marketing activities.
>
> Free competitive methods have afforded an opportunity to large corporations to monopolize the distribution of most of the farm products.
> Ever since the crisis prevails, we note that, in all countries, the margin, between the prices paid to producers and exacted from the consumers is continuously increasing. The cost of distributing farm products is too greatly increasing. Briefly the situation of farmers demands state intervention.
> New conditions are developing, we are rapidly passing from a system of free competition to that of economic control.
> Regulated economy, means deliberate control of economic activities not for the benefit of one or groups of private interests but for the benefit of the community.
> In the past economy meant that the state was prohibited to interfere in the economic sphere; it trusted to the hazard of indifference or chance to solve social problems; it looked upon as sacred the law of supply and demand, abstained from influencing prices, wages and the market. This free competition brought on chaos in the distribution of products, the fleecing of producers and consumers by trusts, overproduction and deflation of prices.

Agriculture, the industry of primary importance to society is also the one which has felt the crisis most and is the most helpless to react. Most of the countries have first attacked the wheat problem, the importance of which is foremost. Wheat is the foundation of agriculture; it fixes the prices of the coarse grains and, indirectly, the price of animal products. Even in 1925, Italy levied a tax on imported wheat and inaugurated a vast program known as the "wheat conflict." In Germany the general tariff on imported wheat is almost three times the price it sells on the London or Liverpool market. Great Britain adopted its "Wheat Act" in 1932 so as to give to her producers a sufficient market, at a profitable price. France, Belgium and all the countries of central and eastern Europe developed a vast system of customs tariffs, regulations in the charges for grinding, in the importation quotas, in licences to import or export. These competitive measures against imported products were everywhere accompanied by a program of protection and assistance to national agriculture.

Soon, not only wheat but all other products will come under the control of regulated economy. In England, the Agricultural Marketing Act provides for the organization of producers of certain farm products for the purpose of regulating prices on the market. In the United States a whole chain of legislation embodies all economic activities, "the Agricultural Adjustment Act, Emergency Farm Mortgage Act, Farm Credit Act, Emergency Banking Act, Unemployed Relief Act, National Industrial Recovery Act." The agricultural and industrial program of Roosevelt constitutes the most complete scheme put into practice heretofore. By creating The Natural Products Marketing Board the dominion government boldly takes the path leading to regulated economy.

In the Devoir's issue of April 17, Mr. Rioux adds:

The hon. L. A. Taschereau has just enacted a measure in the legislative assembly intituled "An Act to assist in putting into effect in this province any regulation helping the marketing of the natural products of Canada." The provincial government is therefore authorized to enforce by orders in council the act creating the Dominion Marketing Board. We wish to congratulate the Prime Minister for his diligence in cooperating with the dominion authorities; we hope that, in the administration of this act, the cooperation of Quebec and Ottawa will be perfect.

Mr. Speaker, I think Mr. Rioux was too hasty in congratulating the hon. Prime Minister of Quebec in having the Legislative Assembly adopt an act permitting the enforcement in the province of the Natural Products Marketing Act. If we are to judge from the interview published in "Le Canada" of this date, Mr. Taschereau desires to protest against two measures at present under consideration by the House of Commons. First, Mr. Taschereau referring to the Marketing bill, states:

Ottawa desires to take over the control of our forests, mines, fisheries and natural products.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Shame!

Mr. DORION (Translation): Evidently Mr. Taschereau has not read this bill because the Dominion government has no intention of encroaching on provincial rights as regards ownership of forests, water powers or mines, but simply wishes to legislate in connection with products of the forest, water powers and mines.

Mr. Taschereau after having referred to the new tax on gold, adds:

The danger is at our door.

Mr. Taschereau must have probably thought that he was another Mirabeau. Rising before the Assembly of the States General, in 1789, Mirabeau exclaimed: "We are discussing and the danger is at our door." Danger is perhaps at certain doors but not in the sense which Mr. Taschereau wishes to convey. The danger lies at the doors of certain large industrial corporations and trusts.

Mr. Taschereau has no need to fear we shall permit him to sacrifice, as he has done for ever so long, the natural resources of Quebec, to dispose of them at shameful prices and thus rob us.

I return to the article of Mr. Rioux, of April 17:

Mr. Taschereau expresses, however, the opinion that this measure encroaches on the rights, prerogatives and autonomy of Quebec. The Dominion Marketing Board will only regulate the forest, land and sea trade, it will not have the authority to sell or concede to foreigners at wretched prices, our forests, mines, water powers, lakes, rivers and all our natural resources. As in the past, such prerogatives will remain with the province. . . .

A number of newspapers have charged the dominion government with assuming an economic dictatorship.

They are unaware, no doubt, that this Marketing Board is requested by farmers' associations of all the provinces.

A few years ago, British Columbia at the request of those interested, organized a closed cooperative society of fruit growers. Within two years, this organization succeeded in giving a considerable impulse to the fruit production of that province.

When referred to the tribunals, the British Columbia legislation was declared ultra vires. Since then, fruit growers have been requesting a federal measure which would permit them to revive their compulsory cooperative association. They have found again that the minority of growers who do not join a free cooperative society spoil the good effects of such cooperation.

As the hon. Mr. Taschereau pointed out, the western provinces are favourable to such a proposal. But so are also the eastern farmers. At its annual congress of 1932, "l'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs" requested a federal commission to supervise the marketing of farm products, especially, to regulate the trade of dairy products. At the congress held in November last, our society again made the same request so as to organize the marketing of our important farm products.

In April, 1933, the representatives of the principal Canadian dairy associations met in Ottawa. They unanimously adopted quite an elaborate resolution requesting the Dominion Minister of Agriculture to create immediately a Farm Produce Marketing Board.

In November, 1933, delegates of the principal farming groups of all the provinces again met at Toronto. After three days of debate in the presence of Hon. Robert Weir, who was assisted by a number of experts from Ottawa and Toronto, together with the collaboration of representatives of British and Australian Cooperative societies, the congress passed a resolution requesting the Dominion Minister of Agriculture to prepare a measure based on the British Agricultural Act of 1931, so as to facilitate the marketing of farm products.

Instead of assuming an economic dictatorship, the dominion government simply acquiesce to the ever pressing and repeated solicitations of the farmers throughout the country. It is the first time that farmers have been able to obtain such a broad national agricultural policy.

Mr. Rioux who, I repeat, possesses a wide knowledge of farm problems of our province, speaking on behalf of "l'Union catholique des cultivateurs de la province de Quebec" approves of this bill, and I think he is quite right.

I think, sir, in order to dispel the crisis from which suffer certain national products —especially agricultural products—the duty of a government, conscious of its responsibilities towards the people, is to regulate these products, to assure their marketing, supervise the quantity and quality and even—if it becomes necessary in the interest of the people, as a whole—to establish a kind of monopoly by the state on some of these products.

One may designate this as regulated economy, however, whatever name is given to such a system, it is without doubt preferable to the chaos existing at present which is so detrimental both to producers and consumers.

May I quote, sir, what some author wrote on the causes of unemployment:

> The fault lies in the system of mass production, of rationalized and concentrated production, when unaccompanied by an endeavour to increase consumption and the purchasing power in all countries, where bankruptcy exists. Unrestricted and uncontrolled competition, unlimited production, out of proportion with consumption, are neither desired nor possible.

All those who feel uneasy about the duration of the present depression, admit it: the present crisis is a natural sequel of the disorderly state in which is to be found the distribution of wealth in connection with its production. That is the primary cause of the financial, monetary and social troubles from which we suffer.

The present bill under consideration is of a nature to remedy this disorder. No doubt, as the hon. Minister of Agriculture stated, it is subject to improvement; however, such as it is, sufficient benefit can be derived from it to warrant our support.

It is futile to imagine that the future will be like the past. We are passing through a period of economic evolution. No doubt schemes like this one are totally contrary to our preconceived ideas; however, the necessity for a new economic organization is clearly seen by those who are willing for a moment, to observe the changes taking place these days throughout the world. Ever since the Christian era, many economic systems have been tried out, each adapting itself to the circumstances and conditions of the times and locality. Providing that at the basis of all economic systems, we always adhere to the great fundamental Christian principles, nothing should prevent us from seeking improvement and even perfection.

All legislation which affords us the means of controlling production in quantity as well as in quality, allows us to regulate such production according to consumption, insures the distribution under the best conditions possible —both in the interest of producers and consumers—deserves the approval of well thinking citizens.

Such is the aim of the present bill. That is also why, I deem it my duty to give it my support.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the statement was made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members to your left that the legislation now before us is somewhat socialistic I think it might be in order for me to address you as Comrade Speaker rather than as Mr. Speaker. It looks now as if the vested interests have transferred their affections to the members to the left of the Speaker and that the members to the left of the Speaker have transferred their affections to the vested interests.

I am very thankful to the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) for the only really constructive speech on this legislation that has come from hon. gentlemen to my right in this debate. Indeed he has gone so far that I am inclined to believe that he has knocked the wind out of the sails of the constitutionalists who sit with him, and I am now wondering what the poor old Liberal boat will do now that it has been cast upon that stormy sea in which it is now wallowing. I am also wondering what the boy on the burning deck from Weyburn will do in this regard.

I shall state at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that if liberty was being abused I should fight like blazes to defend it, but I certainly refuse to be led on another false scent by this old smelly red herring that has so often been thrown across the path not only of hon. members of this house but of the public generally. As I have already said, I am thankful for the statement made by the hon. member for Melville in regard to this legislation. What he said was that there were certain sections of the bill that he did not like, but more sections that he did like. In other words, he felt like Brutus, not that he loved Caesar less but Rome more. Similarly it is not that the former Minister of Agriculture loves the arguments advanced by his party less, but he loves the legislation that we have before us more.

I think we had a parallel case in regard to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition not so very long ago when there was moved from this corner an amendment to the Bank of Canada bill. I noticed that at that time the opposition voted against the amendment moved by us. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and both the amendment that was moved on that occasion and the amendment now before us dealt with the provisions of the bills that were and are before the house.

I am sorry I was not able to follow the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Dorion) as I do not understand his language. I am glad that the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke) did not, like some of his friends, use again that outworn argument on liberty and constitutionalism.

We in this part of the house, Mr. Speaker have been criticized because we believe in the idea of a planned economy, but I notice that the Hon. Vincent Massey in a statement which he made the other day said:

> The primary conflict is not therefore isolation versus internationalism, but planning versus improvisation, and in this trouble planning will I believe be victorious.

I suppose after making a statement like that Mr. Massey, if the leader of the opposition ever gets into power, will not again be appointed minister plenipotentiary to Washington.

Stuart Chase has had this to say in regard to liberty in his book, What is an Economic System For?—

> The whole history of legislation refutes the abstract argument on liberty in so far as each law does curtail liberty.

I understand that during the regime of the leader of the opposition many bills were passed containing similar provisions and providing for similar penalties, and yet the members of the opposition who now so vociferously criticize this legislation did not criticize the curtailment of liberty in that legislation which they helped to pass during the Liberal regime. I think all this talk about liberty in connection with this bill is nothing less than a travesty on justice and a burlesque on liberty.

The principle of the marketing bill now before us is, broadly speaking, that there shall be a body between the primary producer and the ultimate consumer to facilitate a better and more economic distribution of natural products to the consumer, or, in the language of the bill itself, this is an act "to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade."

Since my constituency want to know how I stand on this matter I shall have to put myself on record. This is a bill which the farmers of the west have been fighting for during the past decade, and if its opponents think otherwise they have another thought coming to them. I am quite satisfied that the agriculturists of my part of the province of Alberta at least are wholly in accord with the principle which I have just enunciated.

I strongly deprecate, however, the stand taken by the hon. member for Melville when he advanced arguments to show that this bill was aimed at the consumer. Never in the history of Canada have the consumers been getting away with such shameful and disgracefully low prices for farm products. Do hon. members who advance this argument expect that the farmers of Canada are going to produce indefinitely at below the cost of production in order to benefit the consumers? Do they expect that the primary producers will be willing to remain in eternal bankruptcy in order that the consumers may obtain their produce at next to nothing? I can see neither rhyme nor reason in the contention that the consumer is being discriminated against by the provisions of this bill when not so long ago eggs were selling at four dozen for twenty-five cents, turkeys at seventy cents each and grains below the cost of production. The consumer has had his innings, and I think it is about time the farmer should be allowed to come to bat and secure a few runs. As has been said by the hon. member for Humboldt, farming is still the most important wealth producing industry in Canada. I agree with that statement. I believe that any improvement in that industry will mean improvement all along the line, so why should we oppose the principle of this bill? The prosperity of the farmer is the prosperity of everyone; help him and you will be helping the other fellow. Why is Roosevelt so anxious to drive up the price of the primary commodities if it is not in order to help put the farmer on his feet? Once the farmer is put on his feet the people engaged in other industries will also be aided.

In my opinion the fall in the price of wheat to fifty per cent of the 1929 figure was the greatest blow ever struck at the industrial life of this country and of the world. In the last analysis, the prosperity of industry depends upon the prosperity of the farm. The manufacturers of this and other countries have been watching carefully this rise in commodity prices. They have also been watching their own export figures. I think the events of the last five years have brought out one great truth, that so long as seventy out of every one hundred people in this country are too poor to buy there can be no recovery for the industrial east. The catastrophic fall in the price of everything the farmer produces slowed down the wheels of industry in Canada more than any other single factor. The consumer may gloat over this fall in the prices of wheat and other commodities to a record low level, but I believe that that decline has proved to be a very doubtful blessing. While the cost of living has fallen somewhat, the full extent of the decline in wholesale prices has not been reflected in retail prices. There was a virtual removal of the farming communities from the list of prospective buyers and this completely upset the balance of trade in this country under which the farming communities purchased the products of the factories while the factories purchased the products of the farms. The balance between country and town has been put completely out of gear. The price which the farmer gets for his products and the price which he has to pay for the goods and services he requires are out of all proportion. This is why I am not in sympathy with the whining of the consumers under circumstances which allow them to cash in on the miserable plight of the farmer. Under the caption, The Farmer and His Income, the Weekly Sun of Toronto puts the whole thing in a nutshell when it says:

There is food for considerable thought in facts concerning the decline in the farmers' income presented by Business Trend, a publication devoted to the study of Canadian economics, and its relationship to the period of business depression with which the country is now struggling. The Brockville Recorder, discussing the question editorially, points out that it has all along contended that until higher prices are available for farm produce, particularly wheat, there can be little prospect of a steady and permanent revival of Canadian business, whatever the artificial means which are taken to furnish employment and to keep money in circulation. It has also contended that the reduced prices which the farmer has been obliged to accept for his products, while paying almost as much for his manufactured requirements, form a situation that demands correction before business in general can return to its former state of prosperity.

And now comes forward Business Trend with the suggestion that it was this discrepancy between the prices for farm produce and for manufactured produce that really precipitated the period of depression and that made it inevitable.

Then follows a comparison of prices which I shall not read. The article continues:

A lower commodity price level strikes those who have definite fixed charges to meet. Interest on farm mortgages did not decline—neither did taxes. The only way the farmer could meet the situation was by lowering his standard of living—cutting down his purchases—buying less. That is why business is dull—the farmer lacks the purchasing power.

Assembling these facts, it says:

1. Business cannot return to normal until the price of farm products goes up or the price of manufactured goods comes down.

2. The spread between manufactured goods and farm products and field grains must be narrowed. The lines must coalesce—they now diverge. The tendency to diverge still continues.

3. Anything which tends to bring these closer, helps to restore better times—opposing forces deepen the depression.

4. The farmers of Canada as a whole have had already to accept heavier losses than the manufacturers of the country. They are still taking losses even heavier than they were a year ago, while the prices of manufactured articles have not declined in nearly the same proportion.

And again:

Agriculture is the great basic industry of Canada. Others may possess importance, but none reaches the same standing or affects so many people. It has always been the case that when agriculture suffers depression, manufacturing is similarly depressed. If those responsible for the direction of national affairs would bring back the prosperity of recent years, their first business, the Recorder concludes, should be to see that farmers are able to command better prices for their products and that their purchasing power is thereby increased. Until this is done, business will continue in a more or less depressed state, no matter how high tariff walls are raised or how many millions of dollars are distributed in unemployment relief.

When I listen to the arguments advanced by various speakers in opposition to this bill, I cannot help but think of the strange world in which we are living. If my analysis is not wrong, it appears to me that the Liberal party at present is becoming the Conservative party in Canada and the Conservative party is becoming the Progressive party while the group in this corner is still at its old duty of prodding both parties on to some action such as has been described in the bill now before us.

I never realized the Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde duality of character of the leader of the opposition until he made his two-hour speech the other day. He has suddenly become more conservative than the Conservatives themselves. I never before heard a speech so full of anomalies, idiosyncrasies and inconsistencies. A Liberal was once asked why he did not join one of the more radical groups and he replied, "Well, I suppose it is because I am too conservative to change." That just about sizes up the situation so far as that two hour speech is concerned. I think the leader of the opposition is too conservative to do anything toward bringing about a radical change in this country to help meet the emergency with which our farmers are faced. We must let things take their course, say hon. members to the right of me, and not interfere with the established order of things in Canada. Well, shades of Gladstone and Laurier! I have often wondered what the Liberal party in Canada were coming to after making statements of that kind. It appears that the cream of liberalism in this country has turned sour on us again. It seems that they have lost their morale, their effectiveness and their usefulness because during this debate not a single constructive suggestion, with the exception of the speech of the hon. member for Melville, has emanated from that side of the house in regard to the legislation now before us. All they do is to look backward, and I verily am afraid that the Liberal party will be called the backward party or retrospective party or retroactive party rather than the great Liberal party of reform. Let us conserve the past, is now their slogan. It has been said that a rolling stone gathers no moss, but who wants to be covered with moss unless it is the Liberal party to the right of me? Recently they have been so covered with this fungus growth that they cannot see daylight ahead of them any more. It is no wonder they are beginning to atrophy. Since they can no longer look forward, they must needs look backward. Indeed, I am afraid that their faces may have a tendency to grow on the back of their heads. It seems that every time they take a step forward they always take two steps backward, and that is exactly what they are doing in their opposition to this bill in view of the fact that the farmers in Alberta are almost to a man, supporting this measure. Who cares what happened one hundred or one thousand years ago? I fail to see how that is going to buy the baby any clothes or to get the farmers out of the present depression or to help to raise commodity prices in this country. What have conditions of yesterday to do with conditions of to-day in Canada? It seems to me that the Liberal party are like the old lady who still persists in wearing a rat in her hair. That may have been all right fifty years ago but to-day the thing is simply not being done. It is very dangerous to look backward. Physically, it results in stiff necks and crossed eyes and usually ends in spiritual atrophy. It is a dangerous thing for a party as well as for an individual to look backward too much, because if one were to examine the old family tree and go back a little too far, sooner or later one will run across some horse-thieving relative or some other similarly undesirable forefather. It is equally unwise for any party to go too far back into history. They should leave well enough alone so far as looking backward is concerned.

But it seems to me that the new Conservative party in Canada are like the Bourbon kings: they forget nothing and remember nothing. Since they have set the pace, may I point out that four hundred years ago the Liberal party was known as the Whig party which, in a Scotch vernacular, meant "corrupt, sour whey" or else "sour cheese." I understand that at Ingersoll the other day the leader of the opposition, after delivering a speech to the people there, was donated a large block of cheese. I do not know whether that was in admiration of his ability, but in view of the two hour speech which he made in an academic dissertation on liberty I am inclined to believe this block of cheese is symbolic of the disintegration of former Liberal policy, or, in other words, it is good milk that has gone bad. I cannot agree at all with the defeatist Liberal attitude on this question. What they to all intents and purposes mean is that nothing can be done and therefore nothing should be done. I do not think that is a cure for depression. If they think it is, then old man sunshine certainly has nothing on them for optimism.

It seems to me that all this talk on liberty and constitutionalism is out of date, and it certainly has nothing to do with the provisions of the bill or with the marketing of primary products in Canada. The debate has been turned into a kind of farce by the innumerable and irrelevant references to this idea of liberty. The idea of liberty has always been represented as a pure, simple, lovely and excellent young maiden, but after the way in which the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) misapplied her ideal, I am afraid she will not talk to him any more. I am surprised that a man of his age could be so flippant and flirtatious in regard to matters of this kind. I certainly believe the manner in which she was embraced by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will certainly not enhance the chances of permanent wedlock that he might have had, had he adopted some other attitude towards the idea of liberty in this lovely damsel. As for the method employed by the leader of the opposition of virtually dragging this fair maiden by her long tresses into this discussion will forevermore condemn him to a life of celibacy and all the other idiosyncrasies that go with bachelorhood. Of course I can visualize him as saying: Give me liberty or give me death, whether that statement applies to marital, economic or political problems. But it certainly does not destroy my contention that this fine virtue, liberty, has been wrongly construed as applied to the discussion on this particular bill. It is not political but rather economic liberty that is at stake at this time. In this age of great industrial development we have evolved an industrial system in which there is no liberty, in which the producer has to take the price that is offered him on the basis of laissez-faire, the policy of rugged individualism that the Liberals have upheld for the past one hundred years, but which now seems to be out-dated and obsolete. We have attained political freedom; what we want now is economic freedom. The trouble with many people is that they have one-track minds. They have been in the rut so long and have worn it so deep that they are not able to look over the edges and see what is going on in the world about them. When one realizes that under this rugged individualism cattle are being burned in the Argentine, oranges thrown into the ocean, and other food products being wilfully destroyed, one certainly concludes that the economy which permits such insanity cannot be very much planned.

The world's markets at the present time are being shot to pieces. Purchasing power in the world generally as well as in Canada has been reduced to almost nothing. In answer to all this what do we get from the hon. member for Weyburn and other hon. members to my right? Nothing but cries of, "Negotiate; why don't you negotiate?" When we analyze this feature thoroughly we find that the chief protagonists of negotiation have been largely responsible for negotiating this country out of business. For lack of time to develop this point further I shall just submit comparative figures for one staple product, wheat. Thereby hangs a tale. But before I come to that let me say that the hon. member for Weyburn, being a Scotchman, doubtless sings often the old ditty:

> My bonnie lies over the ocean,
> My bonnie lies over the sea;
> My bonnie lies over the ocean,
> O bring back my bonnie to me!

"My bonnie" may be taken to refer to international trade. So one can visualize the hon. member singing of it in the following paraphrase:

> I'll bring it back through negotiation,
> I'll bring it back with a treaty or two;
> With tariffs and free trade devotion,
> I'll bring good times back unto you.

If it were not unparliamentary I would ask all hon. members to join in the chorus.

Here are some significant figures as to the rates of duty charged on wheat by various countries:

	Lowest rate	Highest rate
Germany	Free in 1922	$0 98 in 1930
France	$0 11 in 1924	0 85 in 1930
Italy	Free in 1921	0 73½ in 1929
Czechoslovakia	Free in 1921	1 36 in 1933	(per cwt.)
Japan	0 18 in 1921	0 34 in 1930
Mexico	0 60 in 1923	1 05 in 1930

Mr. YOUNG: Will my hon. friend tell us what were our exports of wheat in 1929 and each year since?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Our exports of wheat in 1927, 1928 and 1929 were very large. But that is aside from the point. The point is that you have charged the government with failure to negotiate, but what about negotiation during the time these conditions came into being? My point is that these markets were lost to us between the years 1921 and 1930 when the duty on wheat was raised as indicated by the above figures.

Mr. YOUNG: If my hon. friend would give the figures that I have asked for we would be able to check him up.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I would give them if I had them here but I have not got them. If my hon. friend wants to know he had better look them up for himself.

Mr. GOTT: You are clever in arguing from figures you have in your head.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: These figures show that the duties against our wheat have been slowly rising ever since 1922. Who was in power then, and who lost this trade? Certainly not the C.C.F., certainly not the Labour party, certainly not the United Farmers. It was lost by these mighty negotiators.

Mr. YOUNG: Hear the new allies of the Tory party!

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The great defenders of liberty in this country were the ones who lost this trade for us. Yet they keep on crying. "Why don't you negotiate?"—completely forgetting what a sad lot of negotiators they turned out to be when they were in power. If negotiation is the criterion by which the Liberals are to be measured, how would they explain the enactment of the Fordney-McCumber tariff in 1922, which killed our cattle trade? They did not do much by negotiation there. What excuse have they for the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1929? That certainly did not do us any good. In view of these facts I should think they would be the last to mention negotiation.

I should like also to refer to the "brick for brick" tariff policy that was considered so great a virtue in the time of the Dunning budget, but so terrible a sin under the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen; but I do not wish to rub it in too much. I think I do Mr. Dunning an injustice by not enumerating some of the great benefits that accrued to Canada when the Liberals in 1930 put hay, straw, oats, wheat and cut flowers on the free list of imports. Of course Canada has not enough of these things, but must bring them in from foreign countries! It is only right to give the credit for so profound a discovery to the Liberal statisticians of the day. It was when the farmers of this country began to see the ridiculous futility of such a free list that the party had to look into their bag of tricks for some other scheme to fool the public. Their latest device has been to make goo-goo eyes at Miss Liberty and try to win her over to their way of thinking. But by their crude ways and lack of good behaviour and proper etiquette they have estranged her affections. I heard the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) heave a couple of sighs and saw him cast a few flirtatious winks in her direction. I saw the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) also throwing kisses by the handful, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) give a long series of "yoo-hoo's," the hon. member for Weyburn plead on bended knee, the leader of the opposition whisper a lot of sweet nothings in her ear, but generally speaking the amorous technique of the Liberal would-be Romeos made no impression whatsoever upon her; for while any of these so-called liberty lovers might be able to supply the veil, the ring, the trousseau and all the other paraphernalia incidental to a wedding, with the hon. member for Lisgar hanging around to tie the knot, I verily believe that honest Bob Gardiner could step right up to the very altar like Lochinvar of old and snatch away the unwilling bride from the whole lot of them. One can almost imagine Bob saying: I cannot offer you castles in the air, like the leader of the opposition, or sugar-coated hokum like the member for Vancouver Centre, or the luxuries of free trade like the hon. member for Weyburn, or the paradise of good old Liberalism like the member for North Battleford—

Mr. YOUNG: Why don't you speak for yourself, John?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am not offering her anything at all, because I did not make love to her like you fellows did—Bob Gardiner saying: "All I can give you is true love and an honest average living," and Miss Liberty saying: "I understand, Bobby darling, but that is more than I expect from those fellows over there."

Now all that this bill purports to do is to facilitate marketing, and in my opinion it in no way infringes upon the liberties of the individual; rather, it aims at the lightening of the burden thrown upon the producers of this country in consequence of abnormal marketing conditions. Why, therefore, should we theorize and elaborate on abstract problems of liberty? Why should we warp facts to fit them into preconceived ideas of freedom? This marketing problem is an actual condition in Canada and it must be met by direct action and not by long quotations about liberty from men whom the worms have eaten a hundred or a thousand years now. To defeat this bill, it seems to me that the Liberals must even resurrect the dead instead of allowing them to lie in peace—or in pieces as one hon. member behind me suggests.

Once again we have had this weird ghost of constitutionalism taken out of its musty and mouldy casket in the dark and damp parliamentary dungeon from amongst the cobwebs, worms, lizards and other crawling creatures existent down there; and once again we have this fleshless and ghoulish skeleton trotted out on the floor to haunt hon. members and destroy their peace of mind. Once again we have this soulless, fleshless, meaningless old bugbear flaunted by the leader of the opposition to scare the wits out of the spinsters and bachelors and sisters and brothers and fathers and mothers and cousins and uncles and aunts and grandmas and grandads to show them how devilish and damnable is the legislation which we have now before us.

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): I rise to occupy the time of the house for only a few minutes, and I doubt whether I would have taken part in this debate had it not been for the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Luchkovich) relevant to the exportation of cattle from Canada to the United States. Having the figures before me, I wonder whether he realizes the importance of that trade.

I had some questions on the order paper a few days ago in which I sought to ascertain the trade between Canada and the United States in cattle alone for the past few years, and I learned from the report that came to hand the other day that in 1928 Canada exported to the United States 200,013 head of cattle. After the application of the Fordney-McCumber tariff and the Hawley-Smoot tariff in 1930, before the Liberal party went out of power, Canada exported 1,976 head of cattle. I quote these figures merely to direct to the attention of the house the importance of the cattle trade. The result has been, not only in cattle but in all classes of trade, that the United States has practically refused to deal with us.

I rise to support this bill, having been solicited by a number of my constituents, because I represent the most diversified farming section in the whole dominion, and this bill stands to benefit every solitary person I have the honour to represent. That is why I am supporting this measure, Bill No. 51, An Act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

I desire to place on record a letter which I received from the South Essex growers under date April 12. The gentleman who writes me this letter calls me Ecc, and although he aspired to the Liberal nomination in the riding some time ago he writes as follows:

I have your letter of April 10 re marketing act and certainly am pleased that you are familiar with the act and are supporting it.

[Mr. Luchkovich.]

The Canadian Horticultural Council, of which I am vegetable representative for the province of Ontario, have been fighting for an act of this kind for a couple of years. Now that the act has actually been drafted and had its first hearing we hope nothing will prevent it being passed by the house.

At a largely attended meeting of the fruit and vegetable interests of the province held in the parliament buildings in Toronto on April 3 the feeling was unanimous that this bill should fill all our requirements in regard to sane control of marketing our agricultural products.

The only opposition, so far as we are aware, is from the chambers of commerce in the larger cities who are, apparently, opposing the measure, acting in the inteersts of possibly their wholesale and jobbing interests who feel that their control of setting farm prices will pass to the farmer.

And why should it not pass to the farmer? Why not? The farmer has been the under dog in this country for years; why therefore should he not have control over his products? The letter concludes:

We would ask you to contact our members and ask them to support this measure. I tried to get in touch with you during the Easter holidays but was unable to do so. Your support to this measure would be greatly appreciated by the South Essex Growers and also all others in the industry who are aware of the real purposes of the act.

Thanking you for your support, I am,

Yours sincerely,

Ed. Atkin.

There have been utterances in this house to the effect that this measure is radical, but it is not to be compared with the assertions of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) when he spoke in Windsor last year. On that occasion the hon. gentleman was heralded as the coming leader of the Liberal party, the coming Prime Minister of Canada, and a gigantic picnic was advertised for weeks and weeks. When he went to deliver his speech, however, less than one hundred people were in the audience, but owing to the fact that he had his speech all prepared for delivery, and had already handed it to the press, he had to deliver it. The Border Cities Star the next day appeared with the following:

Sees Canada Under N.R.A.
Liberals Will Devise Similar Plans if Given Power
J. C. Elliott's Pledge
Ex-Minister Assails Tory Spending With No Results Gained

Canada will have its N.R.A. campaign of higher wages, shorter hours and planned production if the Liberals are returned to power, Hon. J. C. Elliott, who was minister of public works in the King government, promised a Grit picnic late Saturday afternoon in Baby Park.

"What Liberalism is doing on the other side of the line, I believe it will do if given that chance as soon as the people of Canada have an opportunity of voting."

This pledge was dropped into a section of the former minister's prepared speech to some three hundred persons who attended the rally of Ward One Liberals.

It was supplemented by warm and detailed praise of the Roosevelt program by Mr. Elliott, who stated: "Mr. Roosevelt has accomplished more in the last three months in the way of carrying out his pledges to end unemployment than Mr. Bennett has done in the last three years."

If ever there was a radical statement, an expression without thought, I submit that the speech delivered by the hon. member for West Middlesex in Windsor was such. Now I want to show you some of the things that have been done as indicated by the report of the United States emergency hog marketing program, the objective of which was to take off the market 6,200,000 pigs.

A scale of bonuses on desirable weights and grades is paid by federal government. The pigs are sold on the markets and the bonus (if payable) is over and above the market price which applies.

It was desired to draw out 20 per cent of the objective in the form of sows (to lessen pig population next year).

Up to October 16, 1933, they had slaughtered six million, and paid out in hog beenfits thirty million dollars and secured only a comparatively small proportion of sows.

I ask hon. members to compare the price of hogs in the United States to-day with the price in Canada, and see if this experiment, this expensive experiment, which has taken place in the United States has been beneficial to the farmers of that country.

The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), speaking some time ago—and I regret he is not in his seat; in fact he has not been in his seat very much of late—made reference to some passes which were issued to hon. members of this house. Although this inference may be a little bit aside from the subject under discussion I want to tell the house the number of passes which have been issued, and thereby definitely establish that hon. members do not abuse the privileges given them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GOTT: All right. I will dispense with that. But I do wish to say that out of a total of 744,480 there were only 11,078 passes issued, to members of the House of Commons, which is a substantiation of my statement that hon. members do not abuse railway privileges.

Under this bill the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) could probably be controlled very well. For instance, he has been waving a one cent cheque throughout the province of Ontario during the last few weeks. And the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Blair), who has just come into the chamber, has been talking about a one cent cheque. He had ten subjects which he discussed in the South Oxford campaign. This one cent cheque has been photographed and presented to the people of the province of Ontario. I say to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that if these are the tactics he intends to use in the coming provincial election in Ontario he will not get ten feet down the first base line. I would ask the people of the province of Ontario to compare the one cent cheque he is waving throughout the province with the cheques he drew in 1930. In the month of March of that year he drew $620 sessional indemnity, $700 for expenses, and as Minister of Labour he drew $1,200, making a total of over $2,500 for that one month in 1930. I ask hon. members of this house, and especially the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, to photograph those cheques, and put them beside the one cent cheque he is now showing the people of Ontario.

I have before me a letter from the Ontario Swine Producers' Association. Under date of April 20, it is as follows:

Dear Sir:

I have much pleasure in enclosing a copy of a resolution passed unanimously at a meeting of the executive of the Ontario Swine Producers' Association.

In submitting this request to you we have every assurance that the bill, when passed, will provide producers of primary products with the necessary ways and means of not only establishing confidence in their own business, but also of guaranteeing to the primary producer his fair share of the consumer's dollar.

Trusting that you will lend your support in effecting the passage of this bill, I am

Yours very truly,
W. P. Watson,
Secretary.

This is signed by several of the solid citizens of the good old county of Oxford. The copy of the resolution passed by the executive of the Ontario Swine Producers' Association in support of Bill No. 51, the Natural Products Marketing Act, is as follows:

Whereas it is generally recognized that the prosperity of any country is directly dependent on the state of prosperity of its producers of primary products;

And whereas the prosperity of its producers is governed to a large extent by the system followed in the marketing of these products;

And whereas a proper and efficient system of marketing includes such important factors as grading, the control of quality, the regulation of supply and the spread between producer and consumer;

And whereas all of these factors have been taken into consideration in the drafting of the Natural Products Marketing Act;

Therefore we the executive of the Ontario Swine Producers' Association go on record as favouring the said bill in the form in which it was drafted for first reading March 26, 1934, and respectfully request your support and cooperation to bring about the successful passage of the bill.

This resolution is signed by some of the best citizens of the county of Norfolk. There was a by-election in that county only recently which was stampeded on the last day by the Liberal party. I do not take the result of that election as an indication that there is any public sentiment against the party now in power. I say that the party in power in Ottawa to-day has saved the Dominion of Canada from financial destruction, and thank heaven we have a Prime Minister who has backbone enough to put into effect policies which have been helpful to every Canadian citizen.

Mr. McINTOSH: Heaven had not anything to do with it.

Mr. GOTT: Speak out, and I shall try to answer you. The Conservative party to-day has as many seats as it had immediately following the election of 1930. After all the hullabaloo following the by-elections, the Liberal party has identically the number of seats in this house to-day as it had following the general election in 1930. And if to-morrow there were an election in Canada the present government would sweep the country from coast to coast. That is my prophecy. Where is the right hon. leader of the opposition going to run in the next election? Will someone answer that?

Mr. McINTOSH: Prince Albert, of course.

Mr. TOTZKE: Prince Albert.

Mr. GOTT: Well, he has to go a long way from home to find a seat, I must say. There was some talk of his running in South Essex—

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the hon. member ought to confine himself more strictly to the subject in hand.

Mr. CASGRAIN: All these matters are irrelevant to the matter under discussion.

Mr. GOTT: This resolution is signed by B. B. Warnica, A. J. Bradshaw, F. M. Chapman, Walter Galbraith, John H. Reid and D. D. Gagner, all resident in Simcoe and Perth counties. These men are good solid citizens, and no one would suggest that they are radicals. They have been good enough to express their views, and I regret that I am held down to a discussion on the second reading, because there are many comments which I should like to make but will reserve until I occupy a few minutes of the time of the house in the debate on the budget.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I hope the two hon. members who have preceded me will not expect me to follow them in the remarks they have made. With all due deference to them I submit that they strayed pretty far from the measure under consideration. I can scarcely see how they could connect their remarks with the bill now under consideration. I had hoped the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) would make an explanation of the bill or at least some comments on it instead of taking up the time of the house in a tirade against some hon. members on this side of the house. The hon. member's time would have been better spent had he devoted his time to a discussion of the bill. If the effort he exerted in his contribution this evening was the same effort he exerted in the constituency of Mackenzie last fall I think hon. members may judge the degree of consideration the people in that constituency gave to his remarks.

The measure before the house is one of the most important to be introduced this session. It is called "An act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith." I believe hon. members could express considerable sympathy with the title of the bill, if taken alone. It is indeed unfortunate that the details of the bill do not warrant that same favourable consideration. I listened with a great deal of interest when some days ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) introduced the bill. I was particularly disappointed when on that occasion he did not avail himself of the opportunity to advise this house just how the various provisions of the measure would be carried out. He did make a very good speech, and I should like to congratulate him upon it. Undoubtedly he made a comprehensive survey of agricultural conditions and conditions surrounding the marketing of agricultural products. He indicated clearly that he had an appreciation of those conditions, but he failed to indicate to the house wherein the provisions of the measure would in any way assist the marketing of the agricultural products to which he referred.

If I recall correctly, the minister instanced in particular two products as being seriously handicapped in the marketing. He mentioned a veal calf on its journey to market, and spoke of the calf being removed from its dam and then spending several days on the road to market before its lamentations were finally silenced. That is all too true, Mr. Speaker, and it is one of the difficulties which we are up against, but the minister did not in any way show how this measure would remedy that particular difficulty.

His other reference was to the marketing of large numbers of poorly finished cattle at certain periods of the year, the marketing of these cattle in turn having a very depressing effect on the market for better finished cattle. That again is only too true, and the minister being a practical farmer knows the difficulties full well in that regard. He knows that one of the main difficulties in having cattle of that type shipped to our markets in a particular season of the year is due to a shortage of feed on the part of the owners of the stock. He knows that in many instances these cattle have to be shipped out and marketed, particularly in the last few years, in order to keep them from starving to death, and that their owners would be willing to keep them and finish them properly if they could only get the money to buy the feed to keep them. That is the situation, and the minister knows it just as well as anyone else in this house. But here again he failed to indicate how this measure would in any way assist in remedying that situation.

The minister might have instanced several other conditions of a similar character—the difficulties, for instance, in the marketing of hogs over long distances. All these things are vital matters which we hope will be remedied by some means in connection with the marketing of primary agricultural products.

The measure which is now before us has been generally understood to be a measure to assist our cooperative organizations. By that I mean it has been the general understanding that it was designed to give assistance to cooperative organizations. Like the minister and, I believe, most members of this house I am very much in sympathy with cooperative organizations, and I am prepared at all times to do all I can to assist them in the valuable work they are carrying on. These organizations have made an immense contribution towards an understanding of the difficulties surrounding the marketing of the different products in which they are interested, and with respect to the matters to which the minister referred in his remarks. Particularly has this been so with respect to the grading and standardization of agricultural products. I am sure the minister will agree with me in that regard.

Like the minister I have also been associated with most of the cooperative organizations in my province in one way or another, and that being so one naturally must have a great deal of sympathy with anything affecting their welfare. I cannot, however, see how our cooperative organizations as a whole can look with complete favour on this measure. I am just afraid that it may do them more harm than good. Apart from the efficient marketing of the products which these cooperative organizations are immediately interested in, two things stand out as objectives in the minds of most people interested in cooperative marketing. One is the democratic control of their particular organization, and the second the development of their own leadership in their own organization. If we pass this measure as it is at present, we are going to regulate these organizations in such a manner, I am afraid, that we are going to destroy their incentive and initiative, with a consequent lessening of interest on the part of its members to the detriment of our cooperative associations. I am afraid that under this legislation the officers of these organizations will become mere office boys of some agricultural marketing board that is going to be set up, and I must say that I do not think our cooperative organizations are prepared to make that sacrifice.

Let me say right at the beginning that I am in favour of legislation to assist our cooperative organizations and cooperative marketing. If a substantial majority of producers who bind themselves together to control and market their own products find their efforts frustrated by a small minority which stands outside the organization in the hope of receiving some immediate advantage for themselves, and such an organization properly representative of the interested producers asks this parliament for assistance in meeting that particular condition, I think parliament has a right to consider favourably such action. But with respect to what this government might do by way of remedy, I for my part must reserve to myself the right to support or reject that course of action as an individual belonging to one of these organizations back in my own province. My point is simply this: I do not think it is fair that a small minority of producers, in order to secure some immediate advantage for themselves should be allowed to remain in a position where they can frustrate the efforts of or damage or ruin an organization which is attempting to do something which may be looked upon, generally speaking, as for the benefit of all of them. I do say that such assistance as is granted should be by way of act of parliament, and not by some set of regulations set up by some board which is given autocratic control.

Before referring to the bill itself or any of its details, may I say that there is sitting at the present time a special committee of this house which has been set up at great expense to investigate in my judgment matters particularly pertaining to the proposals contained in this bill. This committee has already spent a good deal of time and brought several witnesses from long distances for the purpose of inquiring into questions pertaining to the very matters which the minister mentioned when he introduced this bill some time ago. What I cannot understand is why this measure should be introduced at this time, and further why it should be proceeded with while that committee is still sitting and attempting to gather evidence which in my opinion this house should have before it considers this legislation. Surely that committee is going to accomplish something. Surely after all the work that it has done, and after all the efforts that have been made by members of this house sitting upon that committee, we can expect some recommendations from it, and why should we not have the advantage of having those recommendations before us before this measure is proceeded with? Suppose we pass this bill and then later find that the committee investigating price spreads and marketing has brought in a report to the house which may not be in line with the legislation we are now being asked to pass; what are we going to do? It seems to me that we have gone about it in the wrong way. We should have had available the information secured by the committee investigating price spreads and mass buying.

I should like to refer to some of the features of the bill in more or less detail. As the title states, the bill is:

> An act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

That is the title of the bill. Subsection (e) of section 2 gives the definition of natural product as follows:

> "Natural product" means any product of agriculture or of the forest, sea lake or river and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product;

From that definition it is abundantly clear that this measure goes far beyond the mere dealing with agricultural products. Broadly speaking, its effect is to take in all the natural products of this country except those belonging to the mineral kingdom. I think everyone will agree that this is an added reason why the bill should be studied all the more carefully. If we pass this measure as it is we will be taking an important and far-reaching step. In section 3 we have the reference to a dominion marketing board, and subsection (1) reads:

> The governor in council may establish a board to be known as the dominion marketing board to regulate the marketing of natural products as hereinafter provided.

The section then goes on to state that that board shall consist of so many people, and it gives the set-up of the board. I do not desire to refer to the board at any greater length, but I think it is significant that the bill contains no requirement as to what the composition of this board may or may not be. In all fairness to the people interested in a matter of this kind I think provision should be made to have representatives of the producers and the consumers upon the board. I think that is a fair request to make.

I should like to say one thing more with respect to a dominion marketing board. I have a great deal of sympathy with a marketing board but not with such a board as is provided for by this bill. My views on the setting up of such an organization are vastly different from those intended by this bill. This country should have a body which would show greater activities than those shown by any organization at the present time. This body should investigate and inquire into the methods of handling our products on the home and export markets and should seek information as to the best method of preparing and shipping our products both at home and abroad. If there were a board of that kind our producers would know what were the market requirements. Confidence would be restored to the people of this country and a lot of us would know what was the proper thing to produce.

Section 4 sets out some of the powers of the board, and subsection (a) reads as follows:

> —to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

If I interpret this clause aright it means that under this bill we are going to have a quota system in the marketing of our agricultural products. Apparently we do not appreciate fully the difficulty of carrying out a system of this kind and of getting the quotas properly adjusted to the actual producers. I am sure the number of people required to regulate such a measure will be appalling.

There is one other feature with respect to this quota system to which reference should be made. I have in mind the marketing of the great wheat crop of western Canada. Without intending offence to any hon. member of this house, it is generally recognized that the southern parts of the three prairie provinces normally produce the highest quality of wheat. In attempting to apply a quota system you would have to take a proportionate amount of wheat from every individual, whether he lived in the northern or the southern part of the provinces. Under this quota system we would probably be obliged to leave at home much larger percentages of our high class wheat than we would if all the wheat were to be marketed. I feel that this quota system will be very difficult to work out. I am going to be so bold as to contend that if this system is claimed to be in the general interests of Canada, and the farmers are obliged to retain on their farms some of their products on the ground that it is in the general interests of Canada so to do, then the whole of Canada should contribute to such a scheme rather than just the producers of a particular product.

Reference has been made to the wheat board which operated in 1919 and other years. Many people have the impression that this bill is to provide machinery of a similar character. I think many people have failed to realize the changed conditions which have developed since the wheat board was in operation. At that time we were encouraged and even urged to produce more wheat. There were no restrictions on the sale of that wheat; we were allowed to deliver every last bushel which was taken and paid for There is one important point which I think many people overlook and that is the fact that at that time we were able to obtain an initial payment of $1.25 per bushel, or more, whereas if a similar policy were adopted with respect to wheat to-day, I am afraid that under present conditions the initial payment to the producers would be only 25 or 30 cents per bushel. Therefore conditions are vastly different in that respect at least.

I wish now to refer to clause 5, the marketing scheme. In this reference is made to how the marketing scheme may be brought into operation. The clause reads:

> A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

If I interpret that clause aright, it means that a representative number of producers—it does not say how many or what the basis of their representation will or should be—may petition the minister who by order in council can bring them under a marketing scheme. I may be going a little far in what I am about to suggest, but after all we are passing laws that may be administered not necessarily by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) but by other ministers of agriculture and other governments. Consequently we should always keep in mind not what will likely be done but what can be done under the various pieces of legislation we pass. I am of opinion, if I interpret this clause aright, that if a number of producers in Ontario, for example, should band themselves together, come to the minister and ask to have their organization, for instance, one of dairy products or, to go a little further, a butter cooperative association, placed under this scheme, they could do so and it could be approved. The danger I see in that connection would be that the same organization might then turn around and say: Here, stop the importation of butter from Manitoba and the other western provinces into Ontario. Can anyone imagine what that would mean to our western provinces? Yet I think that interpretation can be put on the legislation that is now proposed. A similar situation could apply to poultry products moving from one province to another. I do not say that this will be done, but I say that in this legislation there is a possibility of something of the kind being done. It is a very dangerous step for parliament to take and one that we should hesitate before taking.

I want to refer for a moment to clause 12, which is another very important clause in this bill. It reads:

> The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product, and the governor in council shall have power to make regulations to provide for the licensing by the minister of importers, or otherwise to enforce any order made hereunder.

In my judgment that takes absolutely away from parliament its rightful control over tariff matters. I do not think there is any doubt that clause means that this marketing board set up by parliament would have power even over acts of parliament in this regard, to restrict or license the importation of products that might enter Canada in competition with a regulated product under this scheme. I do not know that hon. members fully realize the significance of that particular clause. It means simply that if its provisions are carried out the government and parliament would really have no control over tariff matters with respect to products which come under this measure and are to be regulated. How could the government make trade treaties or enter into agreements with other countries, with legislation of that kind standing on the statute books? How could they enter into trade agreements with other countries and agree to some policy for the entry of goods into Canada from those other countries and then have this board pass a regulation prohibiting that importation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That would not stand in the way.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): This is a most important piece of legislation and we should hesitate before we pass it. I think that particular feature of it is going a little too far. Like other hon. members I too have received representations with respect to this measure. I feel, however, I am fairly accurate when I say that this bill is not altogether what our cooperative organizations want, and in my judgment it is likely in the long run to do them more harm than good. It is certainly going to interfere with their own initiative in carrying on their activities. I cannot see how parliament can afford to delegate its power and authority to an independent board and still have the members of this house function as they properly should. I am not a very old member of the commons, but I have vision enough to think we should have some control over the different bodies that are set up by this institution and I am not as yet prepared to delegate the authority of parliament to some outside body, if for no other reason than that if this delegation of authority continues for a little longer the people might think parliament unnecessary and I might be deprived of my position.

I repeat—and I want to make this abundantly clear—that I am absolutely in sympathy with the cooperative movements of this country and I think they should be assisted in every legitimately possible way, but I hope people will realize that there is some responsibility on the part of members of parliament in dealing with these different matters. This bill, in my opinion, is not a marketing bill at all; that is altogether a wrong conception of it; it would be more rightly called a regulating measure. May I submit with all deference that the various objects the bill attempts to carry out in the way of grading and standardization of natural products can be and are being carried out very largely under legislation provided with respect to those different products. This year we have passed amendments to the Dairy Produce Act, the Fruit Act and some other acts under which we dealt with these very matters, so that in connection with them I do not think the bill is necessary.

Another weakness in the bill is that it fails to indicate where the board would be directed to extend any of its efforts toward promoting trade or getting markets. That is something that should have been in the bill as a duty of the dominion marketing board, and it is not there. In this regard I should like to refer to a matter with which the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke) dealt. We saw the other day in the press a communication from the wheat conference indicating that France had asked, if she restricted her acreage in wheat or the assistance to her own growers, what she could expect in return from other countries. The committee, quite properly, I think, said they could not promise anything, as that was the responsibility of the respective governments. The point I wish to make is this: France having made that statement, which we have no reason to think was not made in perfect good faith, what are we going to do to meet her? Is this marketing board to be clothed with power to deal with matters of that kind? There is no indication of it in the bill. The bill, however, does make it abundantly clear that if the situation were reversed and France were under agreement delivering goods to this country, this board could take steps by way of regulation to curtail the importation of such goods. That seems clear under section 12.

I submit that before this bill was presented and the house asked to deal with it we were entitled to have and should have had the advantage of the findings of the committee investigating mass buying and price spreads. If the minister can explain why that course was not pursued and this bill delayed until the report of that committee was more nearly ready, I should appreciate it. Personally I should like to see this bill referred to a special committee or a select standing committee of the house so that witnesses could be called to speak for the people interested—

Mr. GUTHRIE: You can move that.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): —and have them present their views concerning the various matters. I do not think this legislation is what our cooperative organizations are looking for, and they after all are the people most vitally interested.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): In rising at this time to say a few words concerning this marketing bill I assure you, sir, that it is with no desire to prolong the debate, which to my mind has already been too long. Session after session for the last three or four years, hon. members opposite have filled page after page of Hansard in putting before the house the lamentable condition in which the farmers of Canada found themselves. This lamentation relates largely to western Canada; it does not apply with equal force to the farmers of eastern Canada. I have the greatest sympathy with the farmers of the west. I visited their country last August, and what I saw in some of the western provinces made me feel very glad indeed that I lived just as far east as I could possibly get without getting my feet wet. I do not say this in any light way; I am a farmer myself, and perhaps no man sitting in this house who is not a farmer realizes fully what it means for a farmer to go out in the spring, prepare his soil, sow his seed, put in long hours of labour with high hope in his heart, and then when the autumn comes find that he has absolutely nothing to reap. Let me say in passing that no matter what measures may come before the house at this session for the purpose of alleviating the sufferings of my brother farmers in the southern portions of the three prairie provinces, I would vote for them cheerfully and willingly and give them my most hearty and loyal support.

As I was saying, for the past three or four years hon. members opposite have dwelt upon the condition of the farmers of Canada, and then they jauntily ask, "What are you doing about it? What are you going to do? Why don't you bring down some policy to alleviate their sufferings and improve their condition?" They have said so much along that line that the farmers of Canada are looking to us to do something. Now when the government brings down a bill that has been carefully considered, not by the minister and the Department of Agriculture alone but by agricultural organizations and societies all over Canada, they having given their advice to the minister on the matter on many occasions, what do we hear from hon. gentlemen opposite? It appears that they are afraid now that this government are really going to do something to better the condition of the farmer. That is what I gather from the very stiff opposition that is being put up against this measure.

I am not sure what the effects of the measures embodied in this bill may be. No man is sure, not even the minister himself. But I will say this: the bill is at least an honest effort to make it possible so to regulate the marketing of the products of the farm that the spread between what the producer who toils in the fields gets for his product, and what the consumer in the towns and the cities pays for it, is subject to control. This bill is an attempt to bring those two figures a little closer together, so that the producer may get a fair and equitable share of the consumer's dollar and the consumer at the other end shall not be exploited.

The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), who has just taken his seat, raised the objection that the bill is premature, that we should have waited until the price spreads committee which is now carrying on its investigations had completed its activities and brought in its report. My answer is that days and days ago enough evidence had already been brought out in that committee to justify the adoption of this bill. Then the hon. member said that the minister in introducing the bill did not give a sufficient explanation of the way it would work out and the final results to be expected. The minister, I take it, gave all the explanation he could give. It must be borne in mind that this bill merely sets up a central marketing board, but the working out of the bill, in other words the bill itself, cannot come into operation or be effective until enabling legislation has been passed by the different legislatures throughout the dominion. Further than that, the legislation that may be passed by the different legislatures cannot itself become operative until the producers of a specific product get together and say to themselves, "We want to take advantage of the provisions of this bill." That is the way the bill will operate, and the local marketing boards that will be set up in the various provinces, and the primary producers of these products themselves, will I take it have more to do with the regulations governing the operation of this bill than will the Minister of Agriculture himself. That is a strong statement to make; I know it is a strong statement, but I believe in my heart that it is correct.

The hon. member for Macdonald also laboured the point very heavily that this bill was aimed at cooperative organization. To my mind nothing is further from the fact. It is true, as the minister pointed out, and as other members of the house who have spoken on this question have pointed out, that these cooperative organizations have not always been one hundred per cent successful. Their intention was right; the object for which they were organized was right; but often those who were placed in charge of them lacked experience in the business that they were called upon to undertake.

I am a farmer myself and I know our ways, our faults, our peculiarities and our failings. I have attended a great many meetings in my time leading up to cooperation on the part of the farmers and I have not one word to say against it, remember that. But I have often noticed that some chap—might I be permitted to call him a smart Aleck—who knew a lot less about farming than about talking and putting out ideas, was sometimes responsible for getting the farmers together. He would say, "Boys, let us have a meeting in the hall a week from to-night and we will talk about marketing eggs, or poultry or potatoes or some other commodity." So the farmers meet there. This chap is usually chairman and secretary and spokesman, and as a result a number of motions are made and resolutions passed and they come away with a cooperative organization established, and this chap who knows absolutely nothing about the business, about establishing trade connections in foreign countries or in other provinces, finds himself suddenly at the head of an organization about which he knows very little. Yet, let me repeat, we have throughout Canada a number of fine cooperative organizations that are functioning very well, and this bill is by no means intended to interfere with their activities. In fact, I can see where it will be of great advantage to cooperative organizations of this kind. Take for instance in our own province, and I speak of that province because I know it best; we have a number of cooperative organizations known as marketing clubs for the marketing of our hogs. We have a number of them throughout our little province. Under the provisions of this bill, instead of doing away with these local marketing boards, we would centralize them together in one, and they as one cooperative marketing organization could operate under the provisions of this measure.

The hon. member for Macdonald, in closing his remarks, said he feared that this bill was nothing more or less than a setting up of the quota system in Canada and the application of quotas to the marketing or exporting of Canadian farm products. With all due respect to the hon. member, and I know that he is a gentleman of great ability, may I say that he seems to put the cart before the horse. As I take it, countries do not set up quotas for the purpose of exporting their own goods, but they do set up quotas to regulate the import of goods into their own territory; and it is that angle of the question that we in Canada may have to deal with in the near future. In other words, we with our products, seeking to get into outside markets, shall have to meet the quotas that are established in the different countries with which we have to trade.

The hon. member—and I might as well finish dealing with his remarks first—saw something in section 12 of this bill, and it was pretty much the same bogy that was raised by his right hon. leader—that old question of parliament renouncing its rights and passing them over to order in council. He read section 12 of the bill which provides: ,

> The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product . . .

And so forth. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that for the past four years that very clause, embodied in other acts, used in the same way but in other lines, has been the greatest safeguard that the dairy industry of Canada has ever enjoyed? Does he not know that we dairymen of Canada are protected against the undue importation of New Zealand butter by regulations and orders in council? Has he any fault to find with that? I fancy that if he had taken time to think that matter over he might well have left that part of his address unsaid. Then he concluded his remarks by saying that this bill is not a marketing bill at all, and he followed other members on the opposite side of the house who have taken serious objection to the bill all the way through. They have criticized it, even the title, clause by clause, section by section. But I have yet to hear one single member of them get up and read a better bill. I have yet to hear a single one of them get up and from his place announce something that is better. Their attitude is this, "We will object to this bill: we will do our best to pull it to pieces, to tear it down, but we are not building up anything better to take its place".

I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the farmers of Canada are to-day watching them very closely and very narrowly. Newspapers circulate into every home; radios are operated every night. Hon. members must know that the radio is an invention which is calculated to make politicians tell the truth; they can no longer make one statement in British Columbia, another in the prairie provinces, another in central Canada and another in the maritimes, because the radio takes the voice from east to west. Therefore hon. gentlemen opposite will have to be very careful in the objections they are making to this attempt to give Canadian farmers a better deal.

Mr. YOUNG: You used the radio in South Oxford.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Your leader used it in South Oxford.

Mr. MYERS: At this point I should like to speak about the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) who to-night has been referred to as the boy on the burning deck. With him I may include other hon. members opposite. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) and, of course, I would not like to leave out the fine looking member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh)—

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member for North Battleford has not spoken in this debate yet. A little later he will.

Mr. MYERS: The hon. member will likely speak, so my remarks will refer to him later.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do not prognosticate too much.

Mr. MYERS: I have in mind about the same idea that the farmer had in regard to the pig. He said that you could always kick a pig because if he was not coming out of trouble he was just going into some. While hon. members opposite were speaking I was wondering if they ever go out alone after dark. I think not, because they are afraid of ghosts. As I understand it a ghost is a sort of hallucination of the mind which leads one to think he sees things which do not exist. Sometimes it is a state of mind created by exterior influences—

Mr. YOUNG: No, interior.

Mr. MYERS: Yes, or interior consumption. They have attempted to read into this bill words which do not appear in it. However, as it is almost eleven o'clock I shall not go into these details at the moment, but will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.57 p.m.

Wednesday, April 25, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): On the 13th of March last when the estimates of the Public Works department were under consideration before the house I asked a question of the minister regarding paintings bought by the government for the national gallery. The item stood and progress was reported. A few days ago I put a question on the orders of the day asking if the government has purchased any paintings for the national gallery of Canada at Ottawa.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The answer is no.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The answer given was:

No. All purchases of paintings for the national gallery of Canada are made by the board of trustees.

This answer apparently was given to me by the Minister of Public Works. I would like to ask the government how I can find out the way to get an answer. If the Department of Public Works says that the board of trustees purchased these paintings, apparently the government does not give me the answer. I would like to know if there is a way by which I can get an answer. The board of trustees is not before the house. Generally it is the Minister of Public Works who deals with the estimates relating to the national gallery. I was discussing this very item and I put the question afterward. I think the government is able to give the answer, because, if I understand, the board of trustees is under the control of the Public Works department, and any money they would spend for the purchase of pictures would be under the control of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, no one knows better, or should know better, than the hon. gentleman that this parliament votes money to the trustees of the national gallery. This House of Commons does not purchase pictures, neither does any minister of the crown, for the national gallery. The question that the hon. gentleman asked could not be answered in any other way than the way it was answered, that is that the government has bought no pictures for the national gallery. If the hon. gentleman asks, what pictures the trustees of the national gallery have purchased during the last year the minister will send a note to the trustees and ask for the information and communicate it to the hon. gentleman.

The trustees of the national gallery were a body existing before this government came into power. There has been no change in the treatment of the trustees except that the amount available for the purchase of pictures has, I regret to say, been less than in previous years because of the diminution of revenue. But I do think it rather unfair for the hon.

gentleman to-day, after the answer the other day to repeat the question, "What pictures have the government bought?" The trustees are a body created by statute, unanimously I think, by parliament long, long ago, in order that they should be free from political influence or any other form of influence. I may say that there has been only one appointment made to the trustees board since we came into office, they are just the same trustees as before we came into office except for one gentleman; I think one member died and was replaced by Mr. E. B. Hosmer.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I shall change my question;—

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): In addition to what the Prime Minister has stated I can only say to my hon. friend that the annual reports of the national gallery are laid on the table of this house, and they contain information as to purchases made by the trustees.

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Might I ask the Prime Minister if the Hon. Mr. Patenaude has been named lieutenant-governor of Quebec?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): His Excellency the Governor General has approved of the appointment of the Hon. E. L. Patenaude as lieutenant-governor of the province of Quebec.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PURCHASE OF PROPERTIES IN CITY OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): A few days ago the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) asked a question with regard to the purchase by the Canadian National Railways of some land in Winnipeg, at Fort Rouge. The hon. member made some statements which were rather startling, and I promised that I would make immediate inquiries and see what were the facts, since I had not heard of the matter before. His first statement was:

It is now rumoured, firstly, that an excessive price was paid for these properties—

May I point out that these properties were bought in 1927, 1928 and 1929, and I quite agree that probably the prices were excessive. Then the hon. member said:

—that the expenses in connection with the handling of them were padded to a very decided extent—

[Mr. Bennett.]

I cannot answer that statement, but I am asking for a further report. Then the hon. member added:

—that rents are collected on the properties that are not turned in to the railway at all in some instances, and that greater rents are collected than are turned in to the railway.

That is a pretty serious matter, and again I cannot make any statement at the moment, but inquiries are being made. The railway did buy properties in the years mentioned, according to my information, for the purpose of extending their yards, which has not been done except to a very small extent. They bought the properties through a firm named Harris & Chisholm, who get five per cent for the collection of rents. An employee of Harris & Chisholm, whose name I do not care to give because he may not be guilty and I do not think I should label him as guilty, is said to be short in his returns to the extent of some $500. According to the statement given me the railway would appear to be wondering if they were to lose the $500, but I should think it would be Harris & Chisholm who would lose the money if their agent collected it and failed to turn it in. However, I shall endeavour to secure further information and furnish it to the hon. gentleman later.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I made it quite clear that this was in the nature of a rumour and not a definite statement. The rumour was to that effect.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last evening I was discussing the bill before the house in general terms and was about to express the opinion that the farmers of Canada have been looking for just such legislation for some considerable time. I am glad that my opinion in this regard was supported last evening by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) in the very admirable address which he presented to the house.

Let me say that when this bill was presented, in view of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite had been asking for a number of years for just such legislation in order to alleviate the condition of the farmers of Canada, I hoped that the bill would receive unanimous support and would be passed through the house with the least possible delay. I am afraid, however, that the opposition that has been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite will have a tendency to divide the opinions of the farmers themselves on this question. I think unanimity in regard to this bill should have been shown here and should have been carried right through the farming districts of Canada.

In the few minutes at my disposal I propose to answer some of the criticisms that have been directed to certain clauses of the bill under consideration. A considerable amount of discussion and doubt seems to have arisen with regard to subsection (c) of section 4, which reads:

to compensate any person for loss sustained by exporting, storing or withholding from the market any product pursuant to any determination or order of the board;

I think it was the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke) who made the remark last night that this meant that the farmers or producers themselves were to be compensated for any produce they were asked to withhold from the market. That is not my understanding of this subsection; my understanding is that when there appears to be a visible surplus of any commodity on the markets of Canada that would have a tendency to depress or lower the domestic market, certain dealers or exporters might be asked either to withhold a portion of this commodity from the market or to take a certain amount of that commodity off the market and export it to some other country. If they suffered a loss through such transaction then they would be compensated to the amount of their loss under the power granted by this act. Then there has been some discussion with regard to subsection (e):

to assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product;

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) seems to have almost an undue amount of imagination; he reads into this clause power to establish sawmills, flour mills, bakeries, canning factories, tobacco plants, breweries and distilleries. I would not object very much to the last two, but I see no reason why the hon. member should fear the construction of all these plants under the authority of subsection (e) of section 4. In my opinion under this subsection the board would have power to establish certain curing houses or storehouses that might be of great advantage in the marketing of some of our farm products, such as cheese. I am very sorry, as a farmer, that our position in regard to cheese is not as good as it was several years ago. The manufacture and sale of cheese in Canada has been more or less on the decline for a number of years, while the production of butter has markedly increased. I believe the Department of Agriculture might well devote their energies to fostering the manufacture of more cheese in Canada, especially in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Under this subsection they would have power to establish curing houses in Canada or elsewhere, as might be thought best, in order that our cheese might be properly cured before being placed on the British market. It is well known that Canadian cheese goes almost directly from the factory to the trade. As a matter of fact I believe that is the reason for some of the unpopularity of Canadian cheese at the present time. The market for our product is largely in Great Britain. We know that the consumers over there want a well cured and uniform product. Under this subsection arrangements might be made for the procuring of storehouses which could be used for the proper curing of our cheese. During the time required to effect the maturing the board would have the power to provide the necessary money to pay the farmers for the milk consumed in the production of the cheese. The same suggestion might be applied in connection with the erection of potato warehouses in my own province. In Prince Edward Island there is only a very short period in the fall of the year, before the frost sets in, during which we may market the major portion of our crop. A number of the business men, shippers and farmers of that province, backed by our board of trade have been asking both the local and provincial governments to assist in the erection of proper storage warehouses in order that we might be able to hold our potato crop for a longer period.

The hon. member for Weyburn has referred to paragraph (f) of subsection 1, section 4, which reads as follows:

(f) To require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board. . . .

And so on. The hon. member seems to take great exception to the word "register" and, at a later point, the word "licence." My interpretation is that the first part of that clause refers to the producer, and the last part to those engaged in the trade, or in the handling and marketing of the commodities.

May I say to the hon. member that there always comes a time when you have to register your men; you have to count heads and see where you stand. A short time ago I heard about a Newfoundland sea captain who had to accomplish a certain piece of work in connection with which he was not making very great headway. The crew were down in the forecastle. The captain went to the companionway and said, "How many of you are down there?" They said, "Three of us." He said, "Well, come up here, the half of you." I believe that principle applies as well to this legislation.

For the information of the hon. member for Weyburn let me say that since 1920 in the Potato Growers Association of Prince Edward Island we have been numbered, we have been counted and we have been registered, licensed, or whatever name you wish to apply. Not only that, but we have paid and continue to pay an annual fee of $2 into our association for that very privilege of being registered or numbered. It could not be otherwise. How could any board or the secretary of any organization or marketing association intelligently conduct its business unless he knew the number of growers or producers for whom he had to provide. That procedure is absolutely necessary. Not only do we have to register, but we have to record the number of acres of potatoes under cultivation in the year under review, and we are living through it. I say no harm can come from that clause. The same applies to shipping clubs. In the province of Prince Edward Island we have a number of clubs whose duty it is to ship hogs. Not only do the members have to register once a year, but every time they wish to sell hogs they have to record their names and the number of hogs they wish to export.

Then, the hon. member for Weyburn took exception to paragraph (g)—

> To require full information relating to the production and marketing of the natural product from all persons engaged therein and to require periodic returns to be made by such persons, and inspect the books and premises of such persons.

Let me say right here that the hon. member ought to have an opportunity of going into some of our packing houses and cold storage plants, and inspecting their books so that he might be able to ascertain the spread between the price received by the producer for the goods he puts into those plants, and the price that the consumer pays for the same goods when they come out. Last night the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke) referred—and not quite correctly—to what the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) said when speaking about this matter. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi did not object to the grading regulations; on the contrary he said he approved of them. He did voice the objection, however, that when the farmers begin to produce in the spring of the year the prices for eggs and butter invariably go down. Those commodities are put into cold storage by the owners of the plants, and kept in storage during the summer months. Then in the fall of the year when the supply from the farms begins to slacken off the storage supplies are put on the market. If one were to judge by the price the consumer has to pay he would never know it was the same article that had been put into the plants earlier in the year. What is true of eggs and butter is equally true of hogs.

May I say a word or two about a matter which has always caused me a great deal of annoyance. Hon. members who till the soil, as I do, and know anything about the management of farms know that there are two principal seasons in the year in which farmers market their hogs, namely the fall and the spring. Almost invariably for as many years past as I care to remember—and more—during times when great numbers of hogs are offered on the market the price has dropped. Then, again, during the summer and midwinter seasons, when few if any hogs are offering for sale, the prices will go up sky high. To my mind one of the functions of the marketing board established by this legislation would be to see to it that no such fluctuation could take place. The hon. member for Weyburn would do well to examine the books of these companies in order to ascertain whether or not the farmers are getting a square deal.

This legislation is to receive the sanction of local legislatures throughout the dominion, and the sanction of those engaged in the particular industries affected by it. The legislature of the province of Prince Edward Island for a long time has been looking for some such bill as the one now before us. While the local legislature of that province was in session, despite the fact that this bill had not passed the federal house, it passed the necessary legislation. As a result that province is now engaged in setting up a marketing board to cooperate with the central marketing board, and they are in great hopes that the central board may be established in time to look after this year's crop.

At this point may I read what an influential Liberal representative in the province of Prince Edward Island said about the marketing board legislation:

Mr. LePage said that he had been looking forward to some relief for the farmers. He could see great benefit could accrue from this legislation. The bill is now before the dominion parliament, and after it has been passed there, there would be a better opportunity for knowing more about it. He had suggested such legislation and was glad to know it was being introduced at this time. After receiving an anonymous letter similar to that received by Mr. J. A. MacDonald and which was signed "Association of Independent Potato Shippers" he was more than ever convinced that there is need of a marketing board to control prices. The farmers have been suffering for a number of years through their products being handled by speculators and not receiving sufficient prices for them.

Mr. LePage said that Canada controls the lobster supply of the world. He saw great possibilities in the lobster industry through cooperative marketing once the prices were controlled. If Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island were not quoting different prices, we might be getting $30 in place of $20 now through the marketing board. The price to the fishermen might also be controlled, so that they would receive more for their catch.

Ninety-five per cent of the beef raised in Canada is consumed in Canada, but the farmers are not getting the price they should receive. The meat industry is in the hands of a few big packers. There is something wrong when pork is selling on the street at 9 cents a pound, and yet bacon is selling at 30 cents. The same is true of fish. Though codfish is selling at 10 cents a pound in the city, yet on the shore about 20 miles from here, it only brings from one to two cents. Here is where a marketing board may prove of great benefit.

I would like to say a word or two with reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). That hon. member was dealing with the wheat situation and I gathered from his observations that he was opposed to the bill all the way through. I do not know very much about the marketing of wheat. It is possible that this bill might not operate as successfully in the marketing of wheat as in the marketing of some other commodities but I would just like to ask the hon. member for South Battleford, and other farmer members on the other side who have spoken in opposition to this bill, whether, in view of the fact that they do not know of a certainty just how this bill will work out, they are prepared at the present time to return home to their farmer friends in western Canada and take upon their shoulders the responsibility of advising them to have nothing to do with the present marketing bill. That is the question they will be called upon to answer when they meet their constituents, and it is the one which they must answer if they wish to be known as the representatives of the people and those who have the best interest of their people at heart.

The hon. member made one or two remarks to which I take a good deal of exception—I am sorry he is not in his seat, because I always like to be able to look at a man when I am talking to him. Speaking of wheat growing and the marketing of wheat in western Canada, he made this astonishing statement:

> I am one of those who favour the setting up of a marketing organization that will take delivery of all the wheat and then Canada can do what she chooses with it. We should not ask the grower to bear this burden; I do not think it is fair.

Then he continues:

> I still say that if Canada wishes to control and regulate wheat she should take the responsibility of financing the whole operation.

Any man who would put before the House of Commons a proposal that the federal government take over—which means buying—the entire crop of western wheat and then find a market for it and stand or fall by their operation, surely cannot be serious. Only a short time ago the same hon. gentleman spoke in very disparaging terms of what was done by the government during the past two sessions in order to stimulate and improve the marketing of western wheat. I remember that his criticism of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and Mr. McFarland who were engaged in this work, was very strong. Now he comes forward with the statement that the dominion government should take upon its shoulders the responsibility of marketing the whole western crop.

I will not take up any further time. I might just say this, that I listened with amazement to the two-hour speech delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day. He spoke on just three points: the independence of parliament, the constitutional issue and the Magna Charta. I wonder what the farmers out in the fields of Canada care at present about the Magna Charta or the constitution or the independence of parliament; they are more concerned with the marketing of their farm products.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I followed closely and with much interest most of the speeches delivered on this measure. No doubt the house is unanimous in recognizing that it is expedient, owing to the difficult times we are experiencing, to improve certain methods in our trade. The point on which we disagree is the scheme that the government wishes to impose so to attain its purpose.

I make it a rule to respect the views of my colleagues and all those with whom I differ of opinion. I intend in the course of my remarks to follow this principle. However, I shall point out to the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers), who has just preceded me in this debate, that I do not entirely agree with his views on certain phases of the bill, especially, when he contends that the prerogatives of provinces are not threatened by this legislation. No doubt, he refers to section 11, which reads as follows:

The Board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, exercise any power conferred upon it by or pursuant to provincial legislation with reference to the marketing of a natural product.

The board may exercise any power conferred upon it by a provincial legislation. The section does not state that it should but that it may; it will therefore be optional for this board to exercise the powers conferred upon it by provincial legislation. The section adds that this board may moreover exercise "any power under the authority of this legislation in connection with the marketing of a natural product, I am not a lawyer, however, I think that this section implies that this board may exercise all the powers conferred by a province; however, on the other hand, that it is perfectly free not to exercise them or set them aside and exercise those authorized by this section 11 under the act.

Furthermore, if the press has well interpreted the statement of the hon. Prime Minister of Quebec, whose standing as a legal authority is well known, one may note that his views certainly agree with the comments I have just made.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) seemed quite astonished, last evening, to find that the Liberal party opposed this measure and he could not understand our attitude. He spoke jokingly and ridiculed the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) as regards his arguments from a constitutional viewpoint. I thought that my hon. friend seemed quite pleased last evening, when he delivered his speech. He probably had reason to be because it referred to a radical measure and, as a member of the C.C.F., that pleased him very much. On the other hand, we are not obliged to share his views and the reason we oppose this bill, at present, is because we are the pioneers of this American continent, we were born in Canada, we have but one country, Canada, our history is dear to us, we possess institutions which are equally dear to us and we have a constitution that we wish to safeguard. We also have traditions which we do not want to foresake for new principles such as those that are advocated by our friends on the extreme left. At all events, if the hon. member for Vegreville will only, at the next election, consult his French Canadian constituents who usually support him and repeat to them what he stated as regards this bill, they will know how to act and will give him a full measure of justice.

In perusing, sir, this legislation known as "An Act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of national products, 1934," I feared at any moment to come across some expression with a Russian consonance, so much I found that this piece of legislation was remote from all British practice. We must, on the second reading of this bill, confine ourselves to the principle of the bill. I heard it said in the house that this bill contained not one principle but three. I think that there is a very important one involved and it is easily discovered.

To all purposes the government wishes to upset the authority such as constituted in this country and destroy one's liberty as well as commercial freedom.

The apparent purpose, improvement on the methods in practice for marketing the Canadian natural products for exportation, an improvement which we recognize as necessary, becomes of minor importance and cannot be the principle of this measure if the government persists in following this procedure rather than proceed by placing an item in the estimates and by cooperating with the provinces.

To allow the government to build up an all-powerful board having its elbow room in the public treasury without the authority of parliament, a board responsible to no one, which would have the right, without consulting any one, to legislate, monopolize, reward, licence, indemnify, expend, discount, exempt, possess, destroy, punish and even throw people in gaol, that is no more a principle. Organize boards of all kinds, shake up a whole army of officials whose number is unlimited and at a salary determined by themselves—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Informers.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): —it is simply an abuse of power which, in certain countries would probably result in civil war. And should we somewhat consult history, we shall easily find examples where these improper legislations brought the downfall of crowns. Even in our own country, hardly a century ago, owing to quite a similar legislation the people of this country took up arms and were thanked by a responsible government which the Liberal party upholds to-day.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): You are not in earnest?

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Should this bill be enacted in its present form, we shall witness the rights of parliament, of the representatives of the people, usurped, the liberty of the nation and commerce encroached upon and provincial prerogatives despised.

We note in section 3 that the governor in council shall establish a dominion board of organization which they will set up as they think fit and fix whatever salaries they please. Such legislation could, perhaps, be understood under a government like the present one in Germany or like the government under Mussolini, in Italy, or again like the one under Stalin, in Russia, but not under a responsible British government like ours. The representatives of the people have a right to know who shall form part of this board, how many persons will it comprise, moreover it is a special prerogative of parliament to vote all salaries.

Subsection 5 of section 3 stipulates that the board may, with the approval of the governor in council, employ such technical, professional and other officers as the board may deem necessary or desirable and grant them salaries as may be fixed by the board without being authorized by parliament, just as if it were a matter of urgency, when we already have a National Research Bureau paid by authority of parliament. This arbitrary provision constitutes a dangerous abuse of power which may have an entirely different result than that of improving trade and, I think, it is our duty to point out this fact to the public.

Subsection 6 of the same section grants to this all powerful board the right to acquire, hold, and dispose of real and personal property or destroy them if it so desires and make the governor in council foot the bill. By subsection 9 of the same section the governor in council completes its powers by assuming the right to pay to this board all such sums of money as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of this act and this out of the consolidated revenue fund, without consulting parliament whose duty is to check up the administration of public funds derived from the taxes levied on the people.

Section 9 of this act constitutes, perhaps, the provision which calls for the most severe criticism. Without any petition from any board, association, group of producers already established, without any complaint on their part, on the minister's own initiative, should a friend complain that the local board or any group of farmers—for instance "l'Union Catholique des cultivateurs de Montmorency" —is an impediment to the trade of certain products, this section authorizes the minister to introduce a bill for the marketing of this product; the governor in council may approve of such a scheme and authorize the board to administer such scheme through any agency or council which it may establish itself—no doubt, friends will be remembered—and remain in force as long as the board deems fit. This is a section which is directly contrary to the views of the hon. member for Queens. By this section the minister in charge of the administration of the act, may, on his own initiative, appoint a board entirely foreign to the organizations of the district where he will enforce the act and even if the provinces protested, I think that such protests would be disregarded.

Bearing in mind human weakness, it is possible that the minister has been misinformed, that only one side of the question has been explained to him and thus the public will be exposed to a grave injustice, moreover, this bill might serve the most deplorable purpose without the people being able to protect themselves. That is what may be termed, so to speak, an unwarranted authority.

In section 4, subsection 1, it is stated that this board shall have power to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product. As we are well aware through the Economic Conference agreements, at Ottawa, that the desire of this government is to promote the British Empire's interests, Canada is thus assured of an imperial boom, without precedent, and a strong reaffirmation of what the entire world deplores, economic nationalism.

Paragraph (b) of this subsection 1 empowers this board to exempt any person from conforming to the ruling as regards a natural product. This opens the door to the worst abuses, and we may expect friends to take advantage of such an opportunity to make a small fortune while their neighbours watch them becoming wealthy at their own expense.

Paragraph (f) empowers this board to require a licence from all producers regardless of his importance. We must, therefore, admit that numerous boards and officials will be appointed, et cetera, to annoy the farmers accustomed to living like little kings in their own domain. This paragraph is far from fostering the back-to-the-land movement because liberty which is dear to all, especially, to the farmers, will be replaced by slavery and might even lead to the gaol. Under the circumstances private enterprise must be greatly decreased.

The idea of improving the conditions of supply and demand—an unalterable principle of commerce—is accepted by all and no one will criticize the government for such a laudable endeavour. The proposal to improve certain trade methods is not a new one. The United Kingdom which possesses the genius of business to a high degree, also possesses an organization known as the British Marketing Board, an institution organized with the greatest circumspection so as not to harm the rights of any one and protect all interests, producers, salesmen and consumers—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That is what we also intend to do.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation) —an organization worked out by parliament, according to all the rules and regulations of the constitutions and which entirely eliminates all irregularities and criticism, inspires trust and encourages all those interested. Why did this government not proceed likewise and why has it not introduced a similar bill to that of Great Britain with which, no doubt, they are acquainted? In such a democratic country as Canada, the government has no excuse to introduce this bill. At a time when every person of sound mind are requested to oppose systems with subversive and radical notions which endeavour to take root among us, why does the government, in the interest of peace, order and good government, introduce an incoherent and autocratic bill, setting aside the rights of parliament, throwing overboard our constitution, our statutes and endeavour to enact a measure which should only find a place in Russia.

If the government did not proceed as did Great Britain when establishing its marketing board, the reason is that in Great Britain, statesmen who govern the country respect their constitution, while in Canada our rulers, in introducing this bill, have given proof of an entirely different attitude. The Prime Minister himself, states that our constitution should be amended. May it please Heaven that it be not in the sense of the bill under consideration, because it would be better to begin immediately to disrupt confederation.

It is absolutely unreasonable for the government to request the representatives of the people to approve an act granting the governor in council powers which they cannot forsake according to their oath of office and the constitution of this country. This bill would grant to the government, already in possession of a signature in blank, the powers of an absolute dictator. It is most unreasonable to request the members to help in undermining their parliamentary rights, in destroying the constitution and to place in the hands of one man the destinies of the whole nation. If that is not sovietism, I wonder in what way this bill differs. In fact should this bill be enacted in its present form, we shall witness throughout the country the organization of dominion marketing boards, local boards, investigating commissions, agencies and subagencies, composed of persons paid by the government from the consolidated revenue funds, indemnifying those who are friendly and presenting accounts to be paid by the public treasury on orders issued by the governor in council.

Moreover, we shall find that this staff will assume all prerogatives pertaining to provincial authorities, regulate the work of the people, like in Moscow, regulate production, take possession of it and market it, while the people will be powerless to prevent them doing so. The people will always be in danger of being ruined by a ridiculous and heavy fine or even thrown in gaol. Why not have added exile, as in Russia!

We shall witness the greatest abuses. It cannot be otherwise. These dictators under the plea of doing their duty, will have on hand licences to grant to any one, with conditions attached—that is sure to happen—they will enslave a whole nation to favour profiteers, political followers, they may even organize rackets worthy of the city of Chicago. That is where this section of exemption may lead us. While a friend is granted the privilege to squeeze a market, accumulate a fortune, his neighbour will not be permitted to market the fruit of his labours.

We shall surely see malignant, envious men, suing their neighbour through spite. Will not the country in which we live produce such a state of chaos, when the destinies of a whole nation are in the hands of one man, of a governor in council?

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Are you opposed to the principle of the bill?

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): We may, without exaggeration, state that the bill is not British but Soviet in its conception, and that, by this act, the government endeavours to follow Hitler's policy.

I find it impossible to lend my support to this bill, in its present form. I am fully aware that my constituents have not placed their trust in me in order to sacrifice what they cherish the most, their freedom of action so worthily won by them and so generously granted by the mother country. If this act is put into force as the government's majority intends to do, we shall soon hear of protests throughout the country. We shall preach patience, at present. Conscious of having accomplished our duty, it is on behalf of the infringed liberty of the individual, on behalf of our history, constitution and despised parliamentary rights that we request the people to tell us what they think of this government.

On the other hand, should the government wish to submit to us a measure based on the British Marketing Board, I shall be the first to support it.

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I desire to address myself to the measure now before parliament, namely, the natural products marketing bill. However, before doing so I desire to give if possible the background of the bill now before the house. I desire to do this because this bill emanated not from any master mind in this assembly but from the producers in different parts of Canada. The first conference called was the producers' marketing conference which was held in Regina on July 27 and 28, 1933. Among others, there were represented at that conference the Southern Alberta Dairy Pool, the Manitoba Vegetable Growers' Co-operative, the Canadian Poultry Pool, the Regina Live Stock Pool, the Canadian Horticultural Council, the Fraser Valley milk producers, the Saskatchewan Dairy Association, the National Dairy Council, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Manitoba Wheat Pool, the Cooperative Marketing Board, the federal Department of Agriculture, and the federal Department of Trade and Commerce. That conference passed the following resolution:

> Be it resolved that this body of producers representative of the major agricultural activities of western Canada, request the hon. the federal Minister of Agriculture to forthwith proceed with the preparation of a farm products marketing measure, which will be available to and adequate for the needs of the producers of all agricultural products in any part of Canada.

Following that conference, another conference met in Toronto on November 28, 1933. At this conference were represented Cooperative Federee de Quebec, the Montreal Milk Producers Association, Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers, Ontario Cheese Patrons Association, United Dairymen's Association, Ontario Milk Producers' Association, Nova Scotia Department of Agriculture, Prince Edward Island Potato Growers, New Brunswick Fruit Growers and Potato Growers, Ontario Growers' Market Council and the Horticultural Council of Canada.

Following those two meetings of the producers, at which there were represented practically every producers' association in Canada, we have before parliament the present bill for the consideration of this house. The measure we are now discussing proposes in my opinion three things: First, to ensure orderly marketing and thereby better prices; secondly, to prevent manipulation and exploitation; and thirdly, to provide machinery for removing from the local market any surplus which would tend to reduce the price. These I think are purposes with which we ought all to be in accord. It does not provide for restriction of production; it does not provide for price-fixing. It will be necessary in the discussion of the measure for me to quote certain clauses from the bill owing to the fact that criticism has been levelled against them in a very unfair manner in some instances.

I think it would be wise if I were to quote now section 3:

> The governor in council may establish a board to be known as the dominion marketing board to regulate the marketing of natural products as hereinafter provided.

Subsequently the measure sets out that there shall be local boards, and in subsection 9 of section 3 we have this very important clause:

> The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of this act.

Against subsection 9 there is directed the Liberal opposition of the country. They say it is an infringement of the rights of parliament. You, Mr. Speaker, in your place, have heard this argument a thousand times in this house since 1930, and in support of the argument that the rights of parliament are being infringed we have cited to us Magna Charta, King John and all history back for a thousand years. So retroactive has the present opposition become that its best arguments are drawn from at least a thousand years ago. Subsection 9 is intended to ensure early operation of the act and also to avoid delay, and another argument to which I shall pay attention later on will prove that Toryism now resides on the left of the Speaker. This expenditure is desired because otherwise the act itself would not come into operation. Largely, the present measure is the creature of the producers' associations of this country, but in order that they may operate it becomes necessary that the federal government, for a time at least, should make such expenditures as will enable them to commence.

Then I would quote section 4, against which many arguments have been advanced. That section provides:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power—
> (a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) particularly advanced what I should say was a very clever argument in regard to this limitation. He was of the opinion that quality might very well be regulated but not quantity. I should like to direct his attention particularly to the fact that for the purposes of any orderly marketing there must be regulation of the quantity of quality if there is any regulation at all. That is to say, if there were thrown on the market a large quantity of lower grades it would have the effect of defeating the purpose of the bill which is now before us. For instance, in the marketing of hogs it would be absolutely necessary that you limit the quantity of quality. This section fits in very well with whatever quota systems we may have similar to under the Ottawa agreement whereby we market hogs in the old country. It makes for uniformity of quality; it makes for uniformity of delivery; and it makes for compensation for intelligent effort on behalf of the producers of the country. In fact, it is placed here, I should say, for the purpose of fulfilling our part in the present world system of obtaining markets. The section itself is for the purpose of giving power to the producer to market his own product in the best possible way.

I come next to subsection (j) of section 4, against which much criticism has been levelled. That subsection provides that the board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power:

> to cooperate with any marketing board or agency established under the law of any province to regulate the marketing of any natural product of such province and to act conjointly with any such provincial board or agency.

There was certain criticism advanced in regard to this clause on the ground that it might impinge on provincial rights. But in regard to the question of provincial rights itself, this clause would not become operative unless the producers of the particular province desired to come within the four corners of its enactment.

I was greatly surprised at the very rabid criticisms directed against this government with respect to this particular measure, but I found no criticism directed against the governments of the different provinces who have themselves put through similar legislation. It is strange that all the blame should be heaped upon this government, hon. gentlemen forgetting entirely again the fact that the purpose of this is largely enabling legislation, in order that the producers and farmers of the country may be enabled to do that which they desire to do. In other words, if the producers desire it, if the provinces desire it, then they cannot all be wrong, and it seems to me that if we follow their desires, then anyone who tries to obstruct the legislation must be said to be doing it for a purpose which is not in the interests of the people whom they represent.

I would refer next to section 5, which reads:

> A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council . . .

And then the petition is referred to the board, following which the minister may, if he sees fit, recommend and give his approval. In addition to that, we find that before any scheme is approved the governor in council shall be satisfied:

> that the principal market for the natural product is outside the province of production; or that some part of the product produced may be exported.

That is to say this legislation is directed to the benefit of export trade. In view of the arguments advanced by the opposition that export trade is very desirable but nothing has been done in regard to it, I am again surprised that they should oppose this measure.

Then I should like to refer to certain sections of the bill which hon. members opposite consider too drastic, particularly section 7:

> (1) Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.
> (2) A representative number of the persons operating under a scheme approved under section five of this act may petition the minister to revoke the scheme.

Hon. members opposite, particularly the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), say that this is too drastic. May I point out first that the governor in council may withdraw his authority at any time, which makes the provision elastic to an extreme degree and capable of being quickly changed. Those who are detrimentally affected may themselves ask that it be changed; so that the legislation is perhaps as elastic and susceptible to change as any legislation which ever came before this house.

Criticism is directed particularly to section 9, which, it is said, involves bureaucratic interference from above. The section reads:

> Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in the said product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board to regulate such product, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of such product, and the governor in council may approve of such scheme and authorize the board to administer such scheme directly or through any agency which it may establish. Such scheme shall continue in force until terminated by the governor in council.

That is to say, even though there may not be a complete petition by producers the power is given to the minister himself to take a hand. Anyone who understands the cooperative movement in Canada will realize that at times there must necessarily come a deadlock; due perhaps to personal views, sectional views, provincial views. Then by section 9 a scheme may be implemented by the minister in charge for that purpose. I cannot see why that section is not desirable, to give to the minister power that he may exercise in his own discretion, if and when there is a deadlock, an impasse, if and when it becomes impossible for the different schemes of the producers to be all aligned, the corners all trimmed and an effective scheme put in action.

Mr. NEILL: Will the hon. member allow me a question? Does section 9 say that the minister's arbitrary action shall be conditional upon a deadlock?

Mr. WILLIS: No, certainly not. That makes no difference whatever. It merely gives the power to the minister. It is not going to say that on Tuesdays he may exercise it but not on Thursdays.

Mr. NEILL: Any old time he likes.

Mr. WILLIS: Any old time he likes he may exercise it for the benefit of the producer. It has been said that too much discretion is given to the minister in this regard. The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) I think made that argument, and made it very well. Also it is argued that there is a degree of compulsory cooperation. There is no motive, no reason why the minister in exercising his discretion should do anything which is not for the benefit of the producer. Remember that the minister himself belongs to a party, to a government. He is always open to public criticism which may damn him and the political party and the government to which he belongs; therefore I say there is no motive which would impel the minister to take any action not for the benefit of the producers. But it is very necessary that if the producers themselves cannot move there should be some provision in the act under which the minister himself can exercise some power in order to bring their efforts to a successful conclusion.

It has been said that the British act is preferable. That was said by many members of the opposition, including the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). I cannot see a parallel between the British act and any act which might be brought into force in this dominion, for the reason that in Great Britain they have no question of provincial jurisdiction. Here we are giving enabling legislation to such associations, such provincial governments as may care to use it. Therefore there cannot logically be any real comparison between the provisions of the British act, where there is direct administration by the government, and enabling legislation in this parliament which may or may not be used, depending upon the wishes of the producers.

Then criticism is directed against section 12, which gives power to restrict imports and exports. The section reads:

> (1) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product, and the governor in council shall have power to make regulations to provide for the licensing by the minister of importers, or otherwise to enforce any order made hereunder.
> (2) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette—
>
> (a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence;
> (b) prescribe the forms of such licences, the terms and conditions thereof and the persons who shall have authority to issue the same;

The section further indicates that penalties may be imposed. Imports particularly are to be restricted, because we desire to retain the home market for those products. The people whose products were concerned, who held conferences in regard to this matter, represented producers of poultry, honey, live stock, milk, fruit, vegetables, maple products, and in addition the western wheat pools had what you might call a sitting brief.

Again criticism is made that under this bill we are delegating powers which we should not delegate, infringing upon the rights of parliament; and they bring in the dear old argument of Magna Charta and King John. Again the poor old gentleman is disturbed and brought out of his tomb to support an attempt in the Canadian parliament to frustrate the efforts of the producers to get a marketing bill. Delegation of powers, I have heard men of the legal profession make eloquent speeches in this house on that subject. What do we delegate to the legal profession? We delegate to the legal profession rights of life and death over all its citizens; yet forsooth we should not delegate to experts in marketing the products of this country any powers whereby they may assist the producer, powers which conceivably were exercised by parliament. There must always be delegation of power by this parliament; indeed, I think it is the general opinion throughout Canada that if this parliament delegated a little more of its powers to people who are experts, instead of having so much political discussion in this house, the people of Canada would be much happier. These measures are necessary of course in order that we may have complete control of exports, in order that we may fulfil our obligations in regard to national quotas. Ten years ago, fifteen years ago, this measure might not have been necessary, but at the present time, due to the system by which world trade is carried on, it becomes an immediate necessity. And you must necessarily have provision for a penalty, in order to make effective the will of the people, to protect these producers against themselves.

Finally we have criticism against section 16, which reads:

(1) The minister may, at the request of the board or upon his own initiative authorize an investigation into the cost of production, prices, spread, trade practices, methods of financing, management, policies, grading, transportation and other matters in relation to the production and marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of any natural product.

In addition to that the minister may also require persons engaged in the production or marketing, adaption for sale, processing or conversion of a natural product to submit at regular intervals or at any stated time, information demanded by the minister in connection with the matters referred to in the previous subsection. That is to say, if hon. gentlemen opposite desire that we shall not implement what has been brought out by what is known as the Stevens inquiry, of course they do not desire these provisions, but so far as the man on the street is concerned this meets a great need in connection with control. The general criticism offered by the opposition in regard to this section is that the consumer is not protected. May I point out, sir, that under this section while the consumer is not protected the price spread is dealt with; therefore the cost to the consumer is brought closer to that which the producer receives. We desire now that the producer shall receive more; by doing the one we also do the other. So far as the consumer is concerned, if he pays only slightly more than the producer receives then you are bound to have prosperity for the producers and for the country itself. So, with regard to the argument concerning the consumer, I would say it has no merit whatever.

When we come to the other sections of the act we find that they are not of great importance and that very little criticism has been directed against them. Generally speaking, however, I should like to know whether in reality the opposition are satisfied with present conditions. If they are, they have well indicated their feeling during this debate. If they are not satisfied with present conditions with regard to the producer they have not suggested any measure by which the producer may be put in a better position. What alternatives do they suggest if they do not accept the marketing bill now before the house? I notice that one hon. gentleman, my good friend from Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), began to quote Mr. W. A. Landreth of the Canadian poultry pool, but he quoted only a heading. Strangely enough, while that very estimable gentleman could see very little good in this government previously, he is endorsing the present measure and his co-operative, together with others, were the people who met at the original conference and drafted the original resolution. So I suggest to the hon. member for Humboldt that it might not be wise to quote Mr. Landreth in support of his argument.

The fact that this measure is strenuously opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite is a splendid feature, I think. If this were a measure without teeth probably it would be allowed to slide through, but since hon. gentlemen opposite realize that the general cooperative movement throughout Canada desires this measure, they feel it necessary to fight the measure even as they fight the C.C.F. movement. In other words, they fight those things which are dangerous to their cause, hence the present opposition. We may well ask if they intend to oppose the second reading of this bill and the general principle of a marketing board in Canada. If they do so of course the country will know them by their acts. If they oppose the second reading of the bill they oppose the principle of the bill, but they have offered no definite alternative, so their policy is just as unknown as their policy in regard to tariffs. That question has been dragged into this discussion quite frequently. It is strange that the opposition should oppose the marketing bill without suggesting an alternative. It is strange that the opposition should say the tariffs of this country are too high without stating what tariffs are too high. I ask them if, when they come into power, they will take off the 25 cent tariff on corn and thereby re-elect me, or if they will not? We want a few details in regard to this tariff question as we do in regard to their marketing proposals. Hon. members opposite say they are going to change the tariff. What changes do they intend to make, and on what articles? Hon. members back of me ask if they intend to change the tariff on furniture, and I think that is important. Personally, however, I am more interested in barley, corn and butter. Will the tariffs on these articles be changed? If so, let us and the electors know, because we do not want to slide into power again on butter. Perhaps if we could get an announcement of their policy, however, we might do so.

I think if the opposition desire to be fair they should also criticize the provinces, since they have put through legislation in connection with this marketing bill. I should be delighted to hear the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) criticize Premier Bracken in this connection. They assisted him in his campaign, but he has put through implementing legislation in regard to marketing, so to be consistent I think they should criticize him as well. The present measure is to implement the desires of the producers of this country. It does not restrict production. It is said that it is a radical move; of course it is, and more power to the government.

Mr. HEAPS: Come over here.

Mr. WILLIS: It is a radical move to aid the producers, and that is what is needed. We have heard a good deal about the liberty of this parliament, but what we desire is the liberty of the producer to control his product.

I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the people of this country could step into this house they would see which party in this country is the stand-pat party; they would see where the reactionaries are. They would see where what is known as Toryism takes its stand. I find that according to the dictionary a Tory is one who is opposed to changes in the constitution. The head of the Conservative party in this country has stated already that our constitution should be amended, and I suppose hon. members opposite will be against that, as usual. So I should say Mr. Speaker, that in the great valley of depression to your left lies the Toryism of this country. And lest hon. members opposite should think I make that statement because of prejudice I should like to quote an outstanding authority, the leading Liberal journal in this city. I read the first paragraph of the leading editorial of April 25, 1934 of the Ottawa Citizen:

> There is nothing easier in Canadian politics than to sit on the opposition side in judgment of the government. The greatest opportunity for criticism is provided by the budget speech of the minister of finance. It is an opportunity also, however, for the leading financial critic to show where the opposition has any more hopeful policy to put forward. Never before in any Canadian parliament have there been such opportunities as in the years since 1930, but this official opposition has been more conservative than the government. It is simply a negative factor in parliament, offering neither light nor leadership in Canada's most critical period of economic readjustment.

I should like to quote also the conclusion of the editorial, what you might call the obituary:

> The results of the government's deflation policy are to be seen everywhere in the general conditions of Canadian business. The opposition's negative record in this parliament has made it appear that the Liberals would have done no better. Nor is there reason to believe that they will go much further than this government when they do come back into office. Unless the next elections bring a more radical element into the Liberal party, Canada will apparently continue to trail along behind the more enterprising political democracies, where the Liberals are not too conservative to explore new paths.

That, Mr. Speaker, I think would be a good note on which to conclude.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was not in order in reading a newspaper article referring to a proceeding now before the house, and I suggest that this be struck out of the record; in fact that will be the direction to Hansard.

Mr. WILLIS: With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, I did look up the rule previously and I held the opinion the editorial was just general comment. On several occasions I have heard similar editorials read in this house. It does not refer to a particular proceeding in this house at this time, but it is merely general comment in regard to it. It does not reflect on the house, any proceedings of the house or any member of the house. While I am a junior member, I know I have heard similar editorials read in this chamber, time and again.

Mr. SPEAKER: If so, it did not establish a precedent.

Mr. BOWMAN: Mr. Speaker, if I have your permission I should like to speak to the point of order. Just prior to the time the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) began speaking we were looking up the procedure, and we found that the thirteenth edition of May does not lay down any rule prohibiting the reading of comments upon the policies of a party. The comments in the editorial read by my hon. friend are comments upon the policies of a party in this House of Commons. It does seem to me that for that reason the hon. member was quite correct in reading from the editorial in question. I make these observations, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall look into the material of the editorial, and if I find any reason for modifying my opinion I shall let the house know.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising this afternoon to take part in the debate is to answer certain references made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the group in this corner of the house, to which I have the honour of belonging. A great part of the two hour speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition was taken up with a criticism of the action of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) as well as the actions of other hon. members sitting in this section of the house. So, if to-day I devote most of my time to an attempt to answer some of the right hon. gentleman's observations I do so because I am a member of the group to which he referred. He spent so much time criticizing what he considered to be our stand in regard to this bill that perhaps it would be but right and proper that I should answer his observations.

First of all he claimed that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had practically swallowed the Conservative party, because that party had introduced legislation favourable to the C.C.F. Later, he claimed that the government had spread a net into which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and hon. members associated with him had wandered, with the result that at this time they had almost become allied to the Conservative party. However despite the fact that those may be the feelings of the leader of the opposition I believe he is entirely mistaken in the motives he has imputed, which on this occasion will prompt us to support the bill under discussion.

If I had to summarize under three headings the objections which the Liberal leader and—I am not sure about this—perhaps the Liberal party, have to this legislation, I should place them as follows: In the first place they claim that the bill takes away from parliament the rights it possesses and delegates many of its powers to another body over which we may have no control. Then they state the measure is subversive of our judiciary, that it is unconstitutional, and that it destroys the liberty of the subject which was founded on the Magna Charta. With regard to the last contention may I say that the liberty of the British subject was not founded on the Magna Charta, although that document is a milestone in the history of Great Britain. At the time King John was having troubles and disputes with the nobility of Great Britain, the difficulties amounted to only a squabble between the barons of that day and the king. If we want to know something about the fight for liberty of the British subject we have to come to a period much later in British history, to a point nearing the end of the eighteenth century or the beginning of the nineteenth. However, I do not wish to enter at this time into a discussion of that aspect of the matter.

Then, the second objection was to the effect that the measure limits production and trade, and the third objection was to the licensing of industry. I presume if the government would remove those three objections from the bill, quite possibly the official opposition would support it.

Mr. BOWMAN: No danger.

Mr. HEAPS: Then the right hon. gentleman spoke about the unconstitutional aspects of the bill. To me that was a most extraordinary argument. In this bill we have a measure introduced in the usual way in the House of Commons, and one which I presume will in the usual way be passed by parliament. But this bill which has been presented to parliament in the proper manner is branded by the leader of the opposition as unconstitutional. Then, may I go farther. The right hon. gentleman has spoken about the rights of the individual and infringements upon individual liberty. Perhaps his terms are hardly correct, because the individual has only those rights or liberties which, under the law of the times, are regarded as being in the general interests of the community as a whole. To-day no man in this parliament or outside of it can do anything he pleases. He cannot go out and knock down a man he may meet on the street, he cannot legally steal. Our laws are full of offences which a man must not commit. I say that Canada would be in a state almost amounting to anarchy if we had to carry out to their ultimate conclusion the ideas presented by the leader of the opposition.

Then he urged that an individual has a right to the fruits of his own labour. To a certain extent that may be true. Further, I do not think anything in the act will take away from one's own labour the benefits he may derive from producing commodities for the general well being of the state. But I look at the state of affairs in Canada and ask myself, "What are the fruits of one's labour at the present time." I would suggest that the right hon. leader of the opposition should attend before the Stevens inquiry into price spreads so that he might ascertain what the fruits of one's labour amount to. Farmers have appeared before that committee, and time and again have stated that for the fruits of their labour they are receiving far less by way of monetary return than they actually put into the production of the commodities they have offered for sale.

Then I think of the fruits of the labour of those men and women who work in factories and workshops. Again the evidence before the Stevens committee indicates that in some Canadian factories men are working for as low as ten cents an hour. Women are working in the factories of eastern Canada, and possibly some in the west, for from $2 to $3 per week. Those, Mr. Speaker, are in these days the fruits of one's labour. Then, may I go a little farther? What about the half million unemployed about whom the leader of the opposition spoke in this house not so very long ago? What fruits have they derived from their labours? All they have before them is the opportunity of going around hunting for the elusive job, with probably no prospects of being able to find anything which will earn for them a decent livelihood.

I turn for a moment to discuss an aspect of the objection of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in regard to what he termed parliamentary control. May I read this extract from a small handbook issued by the Liberal party in 1921; this is part of the platform of the Liberal party in that year:

> Restoration of the control of the executive by parliament, and of parliament, by the people through a discontinuance of government by order in council and a just franchise and its exercise under free conditions.

I am quite in accord with that sentiment as expressed in that platform of the Liberal party, and would like to see it carried out to its utmost limit. But let us for a moment see how it was carried out during the few years that followed 1921. In 1927 there were given away by orders in council some of the most important natural resources of this country; in that way there was given away practically the Beauharnois enterprise, for without the order in council of the federal government there could have been no development of Beauharnois.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What part of the natural resources of Canada were given away by this government in connection with Beauharnois?

Mr. HEAPS: I am criticizing the actions and attitude of the leader of the opposition. During the major part of his speech he turned towards this corner and criticized it. In the second place he was decrying government by order in council, and I am just trying to find out what his actions were as compared with the principle laid down by the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs.

May I go further? In 1927 there was signed by every hon. member from Manitoba a round robin objecting to giving away to a private corporation the Seven Sisters power development, comprising, I believe, speaking offhand, about one hundred thousand horse power. In spite of the fact that there was the objection of every Liberal member from Manitoba as well as of those in this corner of the house, the then government by order in council actually gave away those natural resources of the country to a private corporation. That is my objection to government by orders in council.

We are told that this measure will take away from parliament control that it already exercises. I am going to argue that it does the very reverse of what the leader of the opposition and my hon. friends of the Liberal party claim it does, for the very obvious reason that at present parliament has no control whatever over the production and distribution even of those commodities which are enumerated in Bill No. 51. If, then, we have no power either to regulate or to control the production and distribution of the commodities named in the bill, how can we take away from parliament something that we do not now possess? According to the bill there will be created certain boards, certain commissions, which will have control. Who has control at the present time of this production? It is in the hands of private individuals who have made such an awful mess of the production and distribution of those commodities that to-day it is incumbent upon parliament to do something to bring order out of chaos. We have at present to choose between two alternatives—control or chaos. If we have to choose between those two I choose control and leave the other to my hon. friends to my right. We in this corner of the house want the Canadian people to have control over the industrial and commercial life of the dominion in the same way as they have control over other matters, and I believe the measure now before the house is a step in that direction.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Does the hon. member include agricultural life?

Mr. HEAPS: When I speak of industrial life I regard agriculture as an industry.

Mr. BOUCHARD: What control is there to-day?

Mr. HEAPS: There is to-day no real control in regard to agriculture, and the fact that it is in its present chaotic condition has compelled agriculturists from all parts of the dominion to urge upon this central body, parliament, that something be done to lift them out of the rut in which they now find themselves. If that is not done, may I ask my hon. friends to my immediate right: What is going to be the alternative? Can agriculture continue to exist the way it is being carried on at present? Everybody admits that is almost impossible; therefore there is only one alternative, and that is proper government control and regulation. We have to choose also between government or cabinet and private control as we have it at present, and I will choose government control even though it may delegate some of those powers to a body as yet unnamed. I do not know why my hon. friends to my right are so afraid of a committee or commission that is to be appointed to administer these matters. In fact there is a great deal of confusion of thought in the minds of Liberals on this question; they are confusing the administration of the affairs of the country with the legislative functions of parliament. The party should be able to distinguish between what is legislative and what is administrative. In the administration of such a measure as a marketing act we are compelled to delegate fairly wide powers to a body which has the administration of such legislation under its jurisdiction. We have passed similar laws galore in the house. Even to-day we have handed over to the trustees of the Canadian National Railways enormous powers in connection with the running of the national system. Who objects to that? I remember very well many hon. members on the Liberal side of the house time and time again rising in their places and saying: We are giving and have given to the directors of the national railway system a completely free hand without any interference from the government. Nevertheless the expenditure of that railway is approximately two-thirds of the expenditure of the federal government.

I believe the functions of administration and of legislation should be kept separate. I for one am prepared to entrust to the proper administrative officials of the government power to administer the laws of the country as they should be administered, that is in the most efficient and sympathetic way possible. It is the function of parliament to create the legislative machinery and to see that the laws enacted here are properly carried out by the officials whom we may appoint. Even though we may appoint these boards to function in the way we want, we still do not lose control over them, because each year parliament has a right to inquire into every phase of their activities. May I go further? In every act of parliament that is passed by the house, if we have power to create boards, we have also power to unmake them, so if they are not functioning as we want them to, parliament has the power in its own hands and the remedy if it desires to exercise it.

Further, may I point to the many boards at present functioning in this country with very wide powers? Let me refer, for example, to the workmen's compensation boards that we have throughout the dominion. Throughout all the years that those workmen's compensation acts have been in effect, has any complaint been made in regard to their administration? There are compulsory features in our workmen's compensation laws. The employer is compelled to insure his employees against accident. Another important feature is the fact that these laws take away from the individual the right of appeal to the courts of the country. Have we ever had any complaint from any source whatsoever about the compulsory features of these laws? Have we ever had any complaint about the fact that the individual is denied the right of appeal to the courts? It is the very reverse; experience has taught us that these laws are in the general interests of the community and of those whom they are intended to protect and benefit. We have other forms of restrictive legislation. We have the minimum wage laws under which the state says to the employers of labour: You shall pay to the individual a certain fixed minimum rate of pay. The employer may object and may think he is being deprived of the opportunity of making a free contract with the individual, but under these laws he is compelled to pay to that individual a certain minimum rate of pay. If he does not pay that rate, very often he is brought before the courts and fined. Certain rights are taken away by administrative action; they are taken away not directly by parliament but by the law which has been enacted by parliament, which is administered by certain officials appointed by the government, and which are regarded as in the country's interest.

There are many laws under which the individual is deprived of what he may regard as his own rights. I cannot go on the streets of Ottawa and drive an automobile unless I have a licence. If I have a licence and drive on the streets I may come to an intersection and find a red light against me. Much as I would like to go past that red light, I am regulated and controlled by the municipal laws and I must stop. I must drive on certain sides of the street. If I do not obey these laws then I may be brought into court and fined. Going beyond that, an individual may commit the whole nation to war without the consent of parliament. This is what happened in 1914. While I do not agree with such action, I am pointing out what is an actual fact. A former government broke off trade relations between this and another country either by order in council or by the act of a cabinet minister. I refer to the action taken in 1927 when the government broke off trade relations with Russia. Parliament had nothing to do with that matter. When a budget is introduced into this house it becomes effective the moment it is delivered. Parliament has no say except to criticize what is already an accomplished fact. The administration of our income tax and excise laws put enormous powers into the hands of the administrators, and yet no objection is raised to the power vested in these officials. This parliament could never become an effective machine for administering the laws of the country. This is why we appoint such boards as the railway commission. Who would ever dream of this house creating a freight structure for the dominion? We have also harbour commissions and many other boards which I would enumerate had I the time.

Objection has been made to the licensing of industries. We do a great deal of licensing at the present time. We grant charters to the banks, to the railways and to the insurance companies. We lease water powers. The amount of licensing done in this country is amazing. Only the other day I received a little manual from the city of Winnipeg which shows the amount of licensing done there. The city of Winnipeg issues 151 different licences to individuals and industries within the city. What applies to the city of Winnipeg applies equally well to practically every other municipality in the dominion. We license abattoirs, hotels, theatres, circuses, taxi drivers and so on.

An hon. MEMBER: And dogs.

Mr. HEAPS: Even dogs, as an hon. member remarked. Under this measure industries are to be licensed by federal rather than municipal authority, and we hear a big complaint made in the house that if this is done it will be the end of everything. I claim that so far as the licensing and control features of the present bill are concerned, they are merely an extension of what has been done in the dominion for many years past.

I should like to leave this aspect of the bill and state why I believe this legislation has become necessary. To-day we are living in a completely different era from that of twenty or thirty years ago. Conditions have changed considerably during the past two or three decades. We are now living in an age of contracting capitalism as compared to the age of expanding capitalism in which we lived a few years ago. It has become necessary for governments to recognize the fact that export markets are not what they were years ago. Each country in the world now finds it comparatively easy to produce goods; all nations want to be more or less on an export basis; most nations cannot find export markets and refuse to accept imports. The result is the piling up of tremendous surpluses of commodities in all parts of the world. So far as industrial and commercial activities are concerned, the nations find themselves in a complete state of chaos. In my humble opinion, this has not been brought about by tariffs. If there were no tariffs I believe that we would still be faced with this great glut of commodities. This condition can be cured by increasing the purchasing power of the great masses of the people which in turn will have the effect of increasing the consumptive opportunities which are at present denied to them. One of the great problems which governments have to face at the present time is how to deal with this glut. In these days the individual has very little chance against the trusts and the huge combines. I should like to make a short quotation from a very interesting book as follows:

Much of this weakness of liberalism has been due to obsolete historical associations. Liberalism has been too long associated with laissez-faire, a negative and outworn attitude—it must now become positive. The old individualism is meaningless in a world of giant corporations, of ramifying combinations, and of national economic systems. It spells no longer either liberty or strength or social welfare. In practice liberalism has broken away from these old formulas, has in truth helped to demolish them, but in doctrine it has never fully emancipated itself. That is seen, for example, in the history of English Liberalism. English statesmen from the time of Gladstone have been apt to use old slogans for new policies as though the measures of national conservation, insurance and protection, which they introduced, were merely a continuation of the old Factory Acts. When they did not use the language of tradition, like Asquith, they used that of opportunism, like Lloyd George. The Fabians did in the name of socialism what should be done in the name of liberalism. They formulated principles and decisive doctrines and showed their application. On this side of the Atlantic liberalism has been still less expressive. In a period of expanding populations and developing resources, in a period when the law of unearned increment triumphed over the law of diminishing returns, there was no great incentive to such expression. But now the situation has changed and the necessity has arisen; liberalism must rise with it.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. HEAPS: I will tell you in a moment. It goes on to say:

Those so-called Liberals who refuse to advance one step should go where they belong. They have no business in the Liberal party. They should join their natural associates, the Conservatives.

I have been quoting from a book entitled The Liberal Way, published in September, 1933, and I have been giving the views of Professor MacIver, who is very well known to Liberals of this house—as my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) says, one of their brain trust.

Mr. YOUNG: We don't keep a brain trust.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, that is clear.

Mr. WILLIS: The writer is mistaken in one detail only.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: Let me go further and quote from the same book, The Liberal Way:

A study of the politics of most countries will show one problem at least which they have in common—the effort to relate economic activity to government.

That is the very reverse of what the present Liberal party are doing in this house. The leader of the opposition objects to this bill because, he claims, it will increase the functions of government, and so long as the Liberal party object to increasing the functions of government they must naturally be opposed to any marketing bill, whether it be this or any other. To proceed with the quotation:

We have already acquired a useful perspective in this matter: we need not wait for the historians of the future to tell us that the last generation is marked chiefly by the struggle—not over yet—between two functions—politics and economics. In the nineteenth century there was little risk of a clash between the two. Politics left economic activity largely in private hands and was concerned with other things. But gradually the state has been forced to turn its attention to the economic field. Economics, in fact, has wooed politics now for decades, endeavouring with difficulty to break down an habitual indifference. Early approaches took place in England when the great program of social legislation was launched before the war. The process has been more than one of "wooing" in other countries. There has been a forced marriage between economics and politics in Russia. In the United States, since the new administration has assumed office, it is clear that a new form of alliance between these two is probable.

How totally different this is from the attitude of the Liberal party towards this bill—and here I have been quoting from the preface to the book, written by the Hon. Vincent Massey. I will let his statement, as it appears in the book, stand side by side with the declaration of the Liberal party in this house. It will have been observed that the final statement of Mr. Vincent Massey has reference to what was happening in the United States and, strange as it may seem, although the opposition to-day claim that they are opposed to increasing the functions of government—that can be found in the remarks of the leader of the opposition—in another booklet published by the Liberal party entitled Industry and Humanity, circulated by the National Liberal Federation of Canada, they are practically taking the whole credit for the N.R.A. in the United States. If the opposition want to take credit for the N.R.A. in the United States I suggest that they read this particular pamphlet—I have not the time now to quote from it—because in that country the functions of state are being increased enormously, more than anything that is contained in the legislation introduced by the present government. On the one hand we have the Liberal party saying that they are totally opposed to increasing the functions of the state, while on the other hand they distribute hundreds of thousands of pieces of literature throughout the country, trying to link up the Liberal party here with the N.R.A. in the United States, virtually declaring that the party is the father of what is taking place there. It is difficult to know which of the two to choose.

Perhaps I might say a word with reference to what is taking place in the United States. At times I have expressed a great deal of sympathy with as well as admiration for the way in which the President of the United States is attempting to deal with the problems with which that country is faced. At least he is making an effort to get his country out of the economic chaos in which it finds itself at the present time. I am not however so hopeful of success as perhaps a good many people are, for in the United States they are attempting to carry on two different forms of economic principles within the confines of the country. They are trying to build up a great cooperative system within the competitive system, and sooner or later one must give way to the other; either the cooperative effort must triumph over the competitive or the competitive must triumph over the cooperative. Which will ultimately triumph I am not in a position to say, but it appears to me at present that the old order may prevail in the end over the cooperative efforts that are now being made.

I wanted to have a few words to say with regard to the Liberal amendment which has been submitted as an alternative to the bill now before us. I have had some difficulty in getting at the meaning of the Liberal amendment. Though it has been ruled out of order, I think it is well worth while my quoting a few words of it. My knowledge of the English language may not be as perfect as I should like it to be, and therefore it is difficult for me to interpret the meaning of the amendment, which reads:

> This house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation. . . .

I am wondering, if the names of those who are to have the powers in question were inserted in the bill, whether the Liberal party would support this legislation. Or, on the other hand, am I to infer from this that they are totally opposed to any form of market control or to the compulsory features of the bill? I am inclined to think it was an amendment designed to be capable of interpretation according to the wishes of those who interpreted it. It really had no particular meaning, but was facing both ways. There has been a great deal of talk about the magna charta of almost one thousand years ago, which no doubt in its own time served a very useful purpose. But I think the time has come when there ought to be a new magna charta, not for the barons as of old but for the common people of the Dominion of Canada. That magna charta is long overdue. When we see conditions in this country as they were just a couple of months ago, with about one and a quarter million people on relief; when we find that at the present time there are approximately half a million people out of work, it surely is time we gave to that vast number of our people some real hope that the future is going to be a little brighter than the past has been. To-day there is in this country very little of that economic freedom which my hon. friends to my right say we possess. What economic freedom is there for the mass of the people? Is it the freedom for that half million to go and look for a job which does not exist? Is it the freedom for that one and a quarter million to obtain their daily relief from the public authorities? Is it that freedom which the small storekeeper has, who from month to month can hardly keep his head above water?

I think the time must come when this parliament has got to take cognizance of these conditions. We cannot do anything by adopting that ostrich-like attitude of digging our heads into the sand and attempting not to see what is going on all around us. The whole commercial and industrial life of Canada is in a state of chaos, and if we are going to get out of the chaotic condition in which we find ourselves there is only one body in this dominion that can set about it with any effectiveness. We cannot leave it to private enterprise; if private enterprise could get us out of the present rut it would have done it long ago, because it is not to the advantage of private enterprise to have conditions continue as they are. Therefore there is only one authority capable of doing anything, and that is the state. At last the government of this country, representing the whole dominion, have decided to take hold of and control the situation in regard to one very important aspect of our national life. They have decided to assume control of and to regulate the marketing of the products of agriculture, of the field and of the forest. Because I believe that the step the government have taken, speaking in a general way, is in the right direction, I intend to vote for this measure. While I intend to vote for it, I am also in favour of submitting the bill to the agriculture committee, where certain features of it may be thoroughly explored, where we may have before us expert opinion, as is not possible before a committee of the whole house. After the bill has received second reading, I hope it may go to that committee for that full and open deliberation which may perhaps lead to improvements in respect to certain details of the measure.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) was addressing the house he quoted from a newspaper. I said that in my opinion it was not in accordance with the rules of the house to do so. I have since examined the article he quoted, and I find that he was quite within his rights.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The natural products marketing bill that we are now considering has been so well received in the country, and particularly in that part of the province of Saskatchewan that I have the honour to serve, that I hardly thought it would be necessary for me to say anything upon the bill at this time. But after listening to some hon. members opposite, particularly those from that province who spoke, labouring long and hard to place a wrong interpretation upon this bill and to show that the people of Saskatchewan are not behind it, I think it necessary for me to say a few words, and to inform the house that the reports I am getting from Saskatchewan—and I am receiving letters daily—are to the effect that it has been very favourably received there.

The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) covered the ground so thoroughly in his review of the events leading up to the framing of this bill and its introduction in the house that it is hardly necessary for me to say anything in that respect. I might just add that all the organizations he quoted,—the pool, the cooperative organizations, and even the grain trade in western Canada,—are favouring and supporting this bill. I have talked with many of the heads and representatives of these organizations and they have so expressed themselves to me.

There are, I think, certain features that we can agree on. From the discussion I think it is quite evident that we agree on the main principles of the bill. I think we are agreed that markets for the primary products are what we need, and that such markets shall be stable, orderly and regulated. The bill before the house is designed to secure that, to regulate in an orderly way the flow of primary products into whatever markets we may have, whether domestic or export. So that the main principles of the bill have been agreed upon, I need only deal with the matter in a general way.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and many of the hon. members behind him, particularly those from the west, in trying to put a wrong interpretation on the bill or speaking with respect to the regulations and the powers that the boards may have, have gone far afield to get an argument. They have been setting up men of straw in order to knock them down. We have heard the criticism that there is restriction. I say that in this bill there is no restriction of production as they have tried to make out. All governments have to pass regulatory acts; many such could be cited. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) cited many acts that this parliament has passed which are regulating acts. Certainly all countries have passed acts for the regulation of trade and commerce. We could even quote the empire agreements passed in this house. Certain regulations were set up with respect to quotas and the marketing of our products, and in regard to imports and exports. Then we have, as already cited in this debate, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Mexico, and many European countries all putting up tariffs, giving bonuses to their producers, and regulating and assisting their trade. This has not taken place only since 1930, or since this government came into office, but goes back even to 1927, 1925 and 1923, it started under the regime of the late government. The reason why the foreign governments to which I have referred took these steps I am not going to discuss. On hundreds of occasions in this house we have heard the reasons given. I do not care whether it was because of fear or because they wished to become self-sustaining; I do not care who is to blame because these countries took certain steps by way of setting up tariffs and restricting trade. What I am concerned with is the fact that a situation is facing this country and this government with respect to marketing. Everyone knows that to-day it is more difficult to market our primary products than it ever has been, due to the circumstances I have mentioned, and everyone knows that a small percentage of our products regulates the price at which the remainder is sold. I think the times warrant a change in our system. The world has changed, particularly with regard to international trade; we have quotas, bonuses, tariffs and so on. We must not sit still and do nothing, as hon. gentlemen opposite did when they were in office; the marketing of our primary products and the protection of our producers in order to see that they get fair prices are problems which must be dealt with.

It has been stated that this act is socialistic or radical in its nature. I do not care what may be said with respect to the act or the party that has introduced it; I say it is plain that the Conservative party intend to take such action as they think will be of some benefit to the producers of this country. Mass production has brought about many difficulties and is perhaps the greatest single reason for this act, and I think the evidence that has been given before the committee investigating price spreads and mass buying proves conclusively that it is time we took some action. The other day I attended a meeting of that committee and heard evidence to the effect that from three to five per cent of the cattle coming to the Toronto market regulates the price for the remaining ninety-five or ninety-seven per cent. Under this act the board that will be set up will have power to go on that market and take away the surplus and do as they see fit with it. They may dump it into lake Ontario; they may export it at a loss; they may turn it back to the vat and make fertilizer out of it, and the loss will be made good from the consolidated revenue fund of this dominion. Similar evidence has been brought out with regard to our poultry, our fruit and our dairy products. When the minister introduced this bill he told us what happened last fall and winter with regard to dairy products; he stated that a very small percentage of our primary products regulates the price of the remainder of the products which are consumed at home. Under this act that situation can be dealt with.

Now let us consider the bill. In my opinion it has three underlying principles. The first is the power to create boards to regulate and handle the primary products. In other words, in cooperation with the producers these boards will give the producers some say in the selling of their goods and the carrying on of their own business. In the second place the bill provides for the cooperation of provincial authorities or boards with the federal authority or board so that the producer shall not be exploited and prices manipulated to his disadvantage. In other words, enabling legislation is to be passed by the provinces which will allow these boards to work together so that the producer may not be exploited. In the third place the bill gives power to investigate and regulate, and there is provision that any loss sustained may be made good from the revenues of this country.

The real purpose of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is to make it possible for the primary producers to receive fair remuneration for their products so that they may obtain a decent living and a profit as a result of their labour. In other words it will lay the corner stone of a new foundation for agriculture. Speaking in Regina on October 19, 1930, the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) said that a new foundation had to be laid for agriculture if the country was to be saved, and I think this bill is the cornerstone of that foundation. Yesterday the hon. member for Melville quoted a speech which he delivered in this house on May 13, 1932, in which he dealt with the condition of agriculture and said there had to be practically a new start made. In that speech the hon. gentleman advocated something in the nature of this bill, and I want to congratulate the hon. member for the stand he has taken. He has been fair and reasonable on this occasion, and I think perhaps on many other occasions he has tried to be fair when we did not give him credit for it. The hon. member is going to support the second reading of this bill, and the objections he has taken to it are of a minor nature which may be overcome when we are in committee. I commend the hon. gentleman for having taken his stand in opposition to his leader.

It is very amusing, Mr. Speaker, to hear the opposition speak so glibly of wider markets. I make the statement, which I do not think can be challenegd, that no government ever did less to secure new markets or hold existing markets, or to take appropriate steps when they saw markets slipping away—as hon. gentlemen opposite must have seen from 1921 to 1930—than the government headed by the right hon. leader of the opposition, this champion of wider markets. I have before me a list of agricultural products that we export to the United States, which will be found at page 454 of the Commercial Intelligence Journal of March 24 of this year. In the first column are set out forty-three commodities; in the last three columns are shown the tariffs on those commodities entering the United States. In the third to the last column are the rates in the year 1921 on forty-three articles, twenty-five of which were on the free list. In the second column to the last we have the rates imposed by the United States in 1930, after nine years of Liberal regime. What do we find? Of the twenty-five articles we find not one article on the free list, and in connection with the other eighteen articles which in 1921 carried minor or small tariffs, the increases are in some cases from 100 per cent to 200 per cent. That is what the Liberal party saw happening to our export trade in primary products during those years.

Last night the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) reviewed the results of the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1923 and the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1929. What action did the Liberal government take which could be considered retaliatory? They did nothing not even a protest. We have the record of the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition delivered in 1929, at a time when he was in power, to the effect that he did not propose to take any action for fear of retaliatory action on the part of the United States. I could place on Hansard, further, a list of commodities entering Canada. These figures are very interesting because there are several items in the list showing an increase in the tariffs imposed by the government of that day. If we review the records respecting the percentage of goods entering Canada free of duty we find that to-day we have a greater percentage of goods entering Canada free of duty than we had at any time during the last twenty years.

The opposition opposed the United Kingdom agreements. When the agreements were under discussion the right hon. leader of the opposition said that if returned to power he would repeal the agreements, and would not be bound by them. But the people of Canada know very well what the agreements have meant to them. During the first six months after this house passed the agreements and they became operative, the people were naturally a little leary of them. They had been listening to and reading the arguments presented by the opposition. To-day, however, after more than a year's operation we find that the Canadian people know full well what the agreements mean to them, and that they have meant a great increase in our trade with the United Kingdom.

The leader of the opposition made the statement that the marketing legislation would contract rather than expand trade. He said that was happening to-day. Well, it is but a further illustration of the old saying that there is no one so blind as the man who will not see. That would apply with respect to the right hon. gentleman's statement. I have in my hand a record of some observations made by hon. members opposite, and particularly by the leader of the opposition, at the time of the debate on the United Kingdom agreements, and I shall refer to one or two of them. The right hon. gentleman declared the imperial treaties to be a tariff wall around the empire, to be a Tory conspiracy and for that reason undeserving of support from anywhere. While the leader of the opposition was taking that stand the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), at page 352 of Hansard for 1932-33, declared that the government had swiped the Liberal policy in broad daylight. Although his leader had just said that the trade treaties were a Tory conspiracy, when the vote came the hon. member for Melvile voted with his leader. I could refer to other statements made by hon. members opposite in that debate. However, at this time to prove that they were wrong I shall place on record some figures showing the increase in our trade under the agreements during the eleven months between April 1, 1933, and March 1, 1934. In that period, as compared with the same period in the preceding year, our exports to the countries enumerated increased in the following percentages:

	Per cent
British Empire countries	21
United Kingdom	20
Australia	54
British South Africa	61
British India	44

At the same time we had a very material increase in our export trade with several foreign countries. In fact, in the month of February last compared with the month of February, 1933, we had an average increase of 51 per cent. Hon. members opposite have offered criticism with regard to our volume of exports and imports, but I am pleased to give further figures showing the import trade for 1933 as compared with the same period in 1934. The increases from the countries indicated are as follows:

	Per cent
Foreign countries	41
United States	43
China	31
Japan	39
Germany	51
British Empire	45
United Kingdom	41
British India	114
Australia	182
New Zealand	102

There can be no doubt that the Prime Minister of Canada and his government are endeavouring to solve our problems and to obtain wider markets. They are endeavouring to see that the primary producers obtain markets for their products. Agriculture is the greatest industry in Canada. It is the one industry which each year produces more new wealth than any other industry. As I have indicated, our government is making an honest effort to do something in that regard. Certainly we are not standing still. I should like hon. members to compare the statement I have just made with the report from the Liberal summer school held last summer at, I believe, Port Hope. I have before me a record which came through the press indicating that after discussing this problem of wider markets, at a time when the leader of the opposition was present, the summer school admitted that Liberals could suggest no method of improving our market position. When a party gets to that state it no longer deserves the support of its members.

During the last two years we have learned two things in particular: First, we have learned that the world, and particularly the United Kingdom, can consume only certain quantities of our primary products. That quantity is less than it has ever been before. We have also learned the quality of the products they require. May I say that the measure before the house proposes to regulate both as to quantity and quality. Hon. members have pointed out, and the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) made it very clear to-day that under this measure there is no compulsion or no danger of interference with the rights or liberties of producers. Under this measure, when the minister is satisfied that a reasonable majority of producers of any one product have signified their intention of being organized and brought under this measure, the minister may provide for the set-up of a board. I do not think the farmers or other primary producers are worrying very much about parliament taking away any rights or liberties from them when that is done. We must trust our ministers, no matter of what shade of politics they may be. I am sure any minister taken into any government that might be formed in the future would do his best and could be trusted when the situation arose to do the right thing with respect to the primary producers.

As regards wheat, the machinery is practically set up already. We know what has been taking place and wheat may come in under this legislation or it may not. I have no particular reason to believe it will not and I would be satisfied whether it came in or not because I believe it could be properly handled in any event. But the machinery is set up under the Canada Wheat Board Act that was passed in 1922. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) gave the details with respect to that and he outlined the powers given to the board set up under that act, greater powers than are given by any part of this measure to a board. It is peculiar that at that time the rights of parliament were not considered to be in danger; there was no question about that then, and it was amusing to note the position taken on that occasion that it was all right to do certain things and to give powers to that board without infringing on the rights of parliament. As a matter of fact it was set out in that act that the government might—not by parliament—but by order in council extend the term of that legislation and, as I say, there was no question then about the rights of parliament being in danger.

The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) quoted from a letter which appeared in the Manchester Guardian. As I understand the matter, this article was cut out of that journal and sent to him by the Scottish Cooperative Wholesale Society of Great Britain. It made certain references to the government of Canada and to Mr. McFarland with respect to their operations in supporting the wheat market. No doubt the Scottish Cooperative Wholesale Society would like to get some cheap wheat. I would ask the hon. member whether he thinks the reading of that article at this particular time serves any useful purpose. The hon. member knows the situation as well as any other hon. member and in fact better than most because I believe to some extent he has been taken in the confidence of the government with respect to supporting the wheat market. But it was very inconsistent on his part to bring up that question because we know his record and his action with respect to what happened in the committee when Mr. McFarland appeared before it. We also know what the hon. member stated in the house the evening following Mr. McFarland's appearance before the committee, when my hon. friend practically suggested, as he did in quoting the article, that there was something wrong with the operations as conducted by Mr. McFarland. I say that the hon. member's stand on those two occasions is certainly not consistent.

I should like to quote some figures with regard to the importations of wheat into Great Britain. In February last Great Britain imported from all countries 7,566,000 bushels of wheat and from Canada 3,100,000 bushels, or practically fifty per cent. That shows that we are getting a fair amount of her trade and that Great Britain is dealing fairly with us in that respect.

I note also that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), when speaking the other day on the budget, referred to the wheat business. I think he made a mistake on that occasion; it was not right for him to make the statement he did in the house with respect to the amount involved and so forth for which the government might be liable in connection with the wheat transaction, because he was present in the committee when Mr. McFarland gave his evidence and he heard Mr. McFarland state that during the period he had been in charge they had handled one billion bushels of grain and he thought they had made a possible saving to the farmers of 20 cents or at least 10 cents a bushel. What does that mean? If Mr. McFarland has accomplished that they could take all the wheat they are handling at the present time and dump it in the lake and the farmers of western Canada would still be ahead of the game.

With respect to the quotation from the Manchester Guardian made by the hon. member for South Battleford I want to ask just this question: What is the Manchester Guardian? It is anti-British government; it is certainly anti-Canadian government. One could almost say that it was anti-British. There are in Great Britain a hundred journals that the hon. member can quote in the house if he likes, that will favour and support the action of the British government and that of this government with respect to the wheat business. Why is it that on many occasions we have heard quotations made in the house from the Manchester Guardian when hon. members could find other journals that would say just the opposite? The situation is this: When the hon. member made his speech and gave that quotation, it could be reported in the Regina Leader or the Winnipeg Free Press, which is certainly anti-government. That quotation could be cut out and sent to some friend in the old country who could read it on an occasion similar to that which we had the other night, as purporting to speak for the Canadian people and the Canadian government. That is what happened here the other night, but the journal from which the hon. member quoted does not speak for the British people.

The hon. member also cited a case where he might have forty bushels per acre to market. I only hope the hon. member for South Battleford and all the other members from Saskatchewan who are interested in farming will have forty bushels to the acre. I should be only too pleased if they could have such climatic conditions as would give them forty bushels to the acre. He said: "Suppose of those forty bushels I could sell only seventeen or twenty under the act, what would be the situation?" Let me answer him by asking a question. Which would be the better position—to be able to sell for a reasonable price say 60 to 70 cents per bushel seventeen or twenty bushels of the forty, or to sell the forty bushels at twenty cents a bushel, or practically not be able to sell any at all?—because that is what might happen.

I do not consider, that so far, a sound or reasonable argument has been presented against this bill. It seems to me that the opposition have been sent out to do an unpleasant job, to oppose for the sake of opposition, with instructions to go far afield in securing an argument. The whip has cracked, so to speak, and they are sent out to do this job. The leader of the opposition gave them a good lead when he made his speech during the debate. He employed the Magna Charta and Green's history to show that our constitution and the rights of parliament were in danger. I do not care, nor do the farmers of Canada care very much about the constitution or the rights of parliament, but they are concerned about markets and prices. When the right hon. gentleman advances that argument about the constitution, it is interesting to me to note that not on any occasion have they ever made a suggestion or charge that under any act that has been passed by this parliament has the constitution been affected in any way or have the rights given to this government been abused; the rights of parliament have never been affected. I wonder how much of the time of parliament has been taken up during the last four years and how many pages of Hansard have been covered by the discussion by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other hon. members opposite of constitutional matters and the rights of parliament. I am sure the people of Canada would be interested in that information. It is all so much ballyhoo.

What the farmer is worrying about is the prices he will receive for his agricultural products. He wants markets and the chance to make a profit in the sale of his primary products. That is what we propose to give him by this bill. This bill is only another evidence of what this government is trying to do and has always tried to do for the primary producer. I think the best argument in favour of this bill is the fact that opposition members are opposing it. They have opposed every measure which has been brought down in the interests of the primary producer. Another argument in favour of this bill is the fact that it will be of great benefit to the producer.

I suggest to the opposition that they give reasonable support to this bill. The people of Canada are anxious that something should be done in this critical time when the world is faced with the greatest difficulties. Canada is marketing her goods under the greatest difficulties and I know the people would appreciate it if we got behind this bill. I do not believe there is an hon. member opposite who will dare vote against it. I think the people would be glad if we stopped this ballyhoo about constitutional rights and passed the bill, which I propose to support.

On motion of Mr. Casgrain the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 26, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fourth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury).

DOMINION COMPANIES ACT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64 respecting Dominion Companies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a revision of the existing Companies Act and also of the Companies (Clauses) Act, with some modifications of the general statutes which were formerly parts 4 and 5 of the present Companies Act.

In the first place the Companies Act at present existing deals with companies with share capital as well as corporations without share capital. It is proposed to divide the provisions of the existing Companies Act into two parts, the first dealing exclusively with companies with share capital and the second with corporations without share capital, which carry on their operations without pecuniary gain. It has been found that joining the two together has led to mistakes through misapprehension as to which sections should apply to these two very different classes of companies. Then the present part 2, which is really an enactment of the old Companies (Clauses) Act, and which contains provisions applicable to companies incorporated by private statute of this parliament, has been made part 3; it was formerly in part 2. The other parts of the act are general.

Upon careful consideration of this bill I do not think it will prove to be one for discussion from a party point of view or really from a political point of view. The bill contains very stringent provisions with regard to the auditing of the accounts of companies and the publication of such audited accounts. The bill also contains very strict and stringent provisions with regard to the issue of prospectuses by companies or by underwriters on behalf of companies. In fact it has seemed to me at times that these provisions are perhaps too strict having regard to the conditions which prevail at the present time. They are so much more strict and stringent than the provisions of the provincial companies acts that if this act is adopted I think it may result in a very serious diminution in revenue for the consolidated fund, because until provincial acts are amended or modified in like manner many applicants for charters certainly will go to the provincial authorities rather than to the dominion authority. The provisions with regard to auditing and the issuing of prospectuses are more stringent in this bill than in any other act in any British country at the present time. I make that statement with confidence, after having examined most of such acts. Therefore I trust this bill will receive the careful consideration of hon. members of the house before it is dealt with by the committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any provision in the bill with respect to the restriction of the issue of securities?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly; first the provisions with regard to the report of the auditors are very stringent, and in the second place the company's securities can be issued and sold only by means of prospectuses issued by the company or by its underwriters under provisions which are very stringent indeed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*DOMINION LOANS

Mr. GIROUARD:

What is the total amount of the loans contracted by the dominion government from August 15, 1930, to March 31, 1934?

Mr. RHODES: This information will be found in complete detail in the budget speech of this year, to which I would refer my hon. friend.

PENSIONS CUT OFF AND RESTORED

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. How many pensioners were cut off from February 1, 1933, until the order to restore them was issued?

2. Have they all been restored?

3. How many pensions were cut off between January 25, 1933, and February 1, 1933?

Mr. MacLAREN:

1. 1,003.

2. Pension has been restored, or is in process of restoration, in all cases to which the order in question applies.

3. Information is not available as daily records are not kept.

LAKE AYLMER, DISRAELI, QUE., BRIDGE

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. Did the dominion government contribute to the cost of construction of the bridge erected in 1933 by Mr. Poudrier, on lake Aylmer, at Disraeil?

2. If so, what was the amount so contributed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. and 2. The dominion government in its relief measures does not deal with individuals but only with provinces and, consequently, would have no information regarding such a contract with Mr. Poudrier.

THREE RIVERS, QUE., UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. BOURGEOIS:

1. From December 11, 1933, to March 31, 1934, how much did the government of the province of Quebec claim from the Department of Labour on account of direct relief for the city of Three Rivers?

2. How much of it has been paid?

3. Is there any amount still outstanding, and why?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. $61,363.39.

2. $60,709.16.

3. There are at present in the Department of Labour accounts amounting to $654.23, payment of which has been recommended to the governor in council.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF INSPECTORS

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Was a reply sent to the following telegram:—

"Canadian National Telegram
OA 45-16 Collect
St. Joseph d'Alma, Que., 18 1020A
1932 July 18 A.M. 9.44
Henry Hereford
Commissioner unemployment relief
Ottawa Ont.

Hear federal inspectors will be accompanied by provincial inspectors. In what group will the honest people be.

Dr. L. Duguay, M.P.?"

2. If so, what was the nature of the reply?

3. Was the commissioner of unemployment relief able to tell the member for Lake St. John who were the honest inspectors and who were the dishonest inspectors?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The commissioner's reply is included in the same sessional paper as the telegram referred to; however, a copy is attached hereto, together with translation thereof which was sent to Dr. Duguay.

Ottawa, July 19, 1932.

Dr. L. Duguay, M.P.,
St. Joseph d'Alma,
Quebec.

Dear Dr. Duguay:

I am in receipt of your collect telegram of July 18th as follows:

"Am informed that federal inspectors will be accompanied by provincial inspectors. In what group will be found the honest people?"

In reply I beg to inform you that the inspectors of this branch act independently of any provincial inspectors. There are occasions when, as result of requests from this department, the provincial representative may visit a location at the same time for the purpose of producing documents which are in the possession of the province.

Your information that federal inspectors are accompanied by provincial inspectors, as you will see, in essence is not correct although it is quite conceivable that these men may even arrive at the same time. You may rest assured that the federal interests are being taken care of in the proper manner.

Yours truly,

Harry Hereford,
Commissioner.

L'Assistance Fédérale Contre Le Chômage

Ottawa, le 19 juillet 1932.

Dr. L. Duguay, M.P.,
St-Joseph d'Alma,
Comté Lac St-Jean,
P.Q.

Cher docteur Duguay,

J'accuse réception de votre dépêche du 18 juillet, expédiée port dû, telle que suit:

"Apprends qu'inspecteurs fédéraux seront accompagnés d'inspecteurs provinciaux dans quel groupe se trouveront les honnêtes gens?"

En réponse, je dois vous informer que les inspecteurs de ce ministère agissent indépendamment de tout inspecteur provincial. Il arrive quelques fois que, comme résultant de demandes faites par ce département, le représentant provincial peut visiter une localité en même temps, aux fins d'obtenir des documents qui sont en la possession de la province.

Votre information que les inspecteurs fédédraux sont accompagnés d'inspecteurs provinciaux, comme vous le constaterez, n'est jusqu'à un certain point pas exacte, bien qu'il soit très concevable que ces hommes puissent même arriver en même temps. Vous pouvez être certain que les intérêts fédéraux sont efficacement protégés.

Veuillez agréer, monsieur, l'expression de mes sentiments les meilleurs.

Bien à vous,

Harry Hereford,
Commissaire.

DISRAELI, QUE., BRIDGE

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. Was the dominion government prepared to contribute $1,750 towards repairs to the Disraeli bridge on lake Aylmer, in 1933-34?

2. Did the provincial government of Quebec make such a request?

3. If so, on what date?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2 and 3. On September 19, 1933, the province submitted to the dominion for approval a program of bridge construction proposed to be carried out by the province as a relief measure included in which was an item reading as follows:

County of Wolfe,

Municipality of Disraeli, Aylmer lake

Reinforced concrete slab on steel beams. Concrete abutments. One span.

Number of unemployed, 35.

Working days, 3,500.

Date of completion, 31/3/34.

Estimated total cost, $8,800 including approaches, $500.

Estimated manual labour, $4,000.

Proportion to be paid by the dominion, $1,750.

However, as the agreement entered into between the dominion and the province respecting relief measures did not provide for dominion contributions towards the construction of bridges of the nature contemplated in the province's proposal, dated September 19, it was deemed necessary that a separate agreement be entered into in this respect. A supplementary agreement was consequently prepared, approved by the governor in council, signed on behalf of the dominion by the Hon. W. A. Gordon, Minister of Labour, and transmitted to the province for completion. This agreement, however, was never signed by the province.

HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO RUMOURED APPLICATION FOR LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. There is a persistent rumour throughout the province of Ontario, in the city of Toronto and even in the corridors of this building, that the High Commissioner for Canada in London, the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, has asked for leave of absence to come to Ontario somewhat earlier this summer. The assumption is of course that the request has been made so that he might be in a position to participate in the provincial election, if and when it is called.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member has a question he must proceed to ask it.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am proceeding to ask it. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the High Commissioner has asked for leave of absence somewhat earlier this year than last year?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The first intimation I had about the rumours to which the hon. gentleman refers was in the statement which he made. No application for leave has been received from the High Commissioner.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, apparently, we are passing through a period of schemes and systems generally known as plans or planning. We have but to read the newspapers and reviews to find all kinds of economic reforms advocated by so called learned men, economists and governments. We find an example in the Republic to the south of us with its NRA and various systems. Every one has a new scheme to end the crisis or depression. Perhaps, some day, the right system will be found. It is to be desired. I do not think, however, that the government by its bill No. 51 submitted to us, has discovered the real remedy. The people at the next election, will be given an opportunity to choose between facism, socialism and democracy. Among all the systems proposed, I still prefer democracy. We cannot further try out all kinds of expedients and systems or be satisfied with a policy of evasion or hesitation as the one adopted since four years. Democracy will have to be founded in the future on an economic regime so as to insure the material needs of humanity.

Man has always been an individualist. Society has taught him to organize. Thus we have been given definite working hours, scales of fixed wages, the regulation of work for women and children, etc. In all cases society has always kept in mind the protection of the individual's liberty. That is what has been left out in the bill under consideration. What is lacking to-day, is a fair distribution of wealth. Wealth is in the hands of a few only. The great evil is that its distribution is not proportionate to our requirements.

In the United States an effort is being made to remedy this state of things; a greater demand is sought from the consumer by enhancing his purchasing power. I do not think that to attain such an end, production must be curtailed or limited. It should be increased so as to satisfy the requirements of all. We are suffering from too great an abundance, the result of an unwise distribution.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Does the bill introduced, at present, by the government solve these problems, while safeguarding the individual's liberty? I do not think so. The title is a long one: "An Act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of national products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith." I wonder whether the results will be as slow in coming as the government was in introducing this bill. I prefer the title given to it somewhere: Natural Products Marketing Board. I, moreover, prefer the title to the bill itself. The bill is very elaborate and so is the title. As I stated the government was slow in submitting this bill. Were I to criticize the government I would state that it is four years late. I fear that it is a still-born infant, that the government will never put into force, and even if it is explained to the people, especially in our province, they will not put any faith in it. I do not think that the results expected will even be realized, because the provisions of the bill are of a nature to harm the farming class rather than benefit it.

In four years the government has amended, changed and increased the tariff, signed agreements with almost all parts of the Empire, helped industrialists, manufacturers, bankers, insurance and railway companies, and it is only to-day that they give a thought to the farming class.

Fear is the beginning of wisdom. Elections must certainly not be very remote.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You have never given it a thought yourself.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): You may reply in your turn, if you wish, but please do not interrupt.

As the title indicates, the bill aims at helping the farmers. It is strange that the government has delayed so long to think of them. The establishing of a Bureau for Translations and the revival of titles were far more important! We all believe that the farming class should be assisted, it is the most important class in this country; however, where we differ is on the means to be taken, on the economy itself of the bill, if I may thus express myself.

The title is not the only thing to consider, sanction or swallow, so to speak, it is the provisions of the bill which must be examined. We must consider how this bill will work and what results will be derived.

The government gives us a new pledge. It is again the peddler of 1930, with a bag full of fine promises who appears in the person of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). Apparently, the devil is not dead; to-day, he still endeavours to deceive the people. The government and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) are well aware that promises can no further deceive the people; they, therefore, offer a bill. As always, the leader of the government wishes to do things on a large scale. He therefore submits to us schemes. He is an expert in the matter. We find in this bill, if we take section by section, nothing else but propects and schemes. There is nothing definite, it is an act to administer projects and schemes. Projects and schemes which will be carried out by whom? By a representative number of persons. Administered by whom? By individuals, persons who are unknown to us and are not named in the bill.

We have had, for the last four years, more than enough of this kind of legislation. We have had projects and schemes to end unemployment, yet unemployment still prevails. We have had projects and schemes to settle the sale of wheat, yet wheat remained unsold. We also have had some to save the C.P. Ry. Perhaps, the C.P. Ry is saved, but the government had to put up a guarantee, and there is nothing to assure us that they may not have to forfeit this guarantee.

All classes of society are taxed more than ever. The national debt has increased and again the people, especially the farmers will be called upon to contribute. This scheme will entail a large outlay which will not be controlled by Parliament, but under the exclusive authority of the governor in council, the Minister and the boards which the government will appoint to carry out this act.

Has the government ever thought of making inquiries in the United States in connection with the cost of investigations made by the United States government on certain items of the tariff? I am informed that certain investigations, ordered by the new administration in the United States, especially on two items, had cost more than $25,000 each.

This bill is full of complications and legal obscurities. How many persons will he appointed to the Central Board? What will be their salaries? The bill makes no mention of it. The commissioners will certainly be easy going business men as to money matters, especially on the eve of an election. Their remuneration is not fixed; no doubt it will be in the thousands of dollars. Moreover, a large staff will be set up, secretaries, stenographers, clerks, accountants, experts, inspectors, investigators and informers, as many persons who will act as election agents appointed by the government to satisfy our friends opposite who will require positions to hand out. It is stated that the government intends to amend the Election Act, so as to decrease the cost of its administration. I think that the saving which will result from amending the Election Act will amount to nothing owing to the further expenditures incurred by the enforcement of this act.

These officials will be appointed by the Civil Service Commission, and what will be their salary? No mention is made in the bill.

There is also a proposal to indemnify industries, those which bow to the Act for the losses incurred through the decisions of the Board. In what ratio and how will this indemnity be granted? No mention is made and apparently there seems to be no appeal from decisions which will be fatal to some of the people interested.

The Board will be empowered to purchase with our money such natural products which may be thought too abundant, so as to destroy them if the market is congested. It will be authorized to purchase buildings and warehouses. These are some of the exorbitant powers that the government grants to persons who will be chosen by it and over whom we shall have no control. What will be the assets of this new Board? No mention is made in the bill. Those in industries will be called upon to pay charges to the Board for services rendered, what amounts will they be? The bill makes no mention. Licences will be issued or sold. On what terms or conditions? We do not know. The government will foot the bill of this extraordinary organization. The deficit will be a large one, in proportion to the business carried on by the Board. Have we not already incurred enough liabilities: through the deficits of our railways; through the guarantee of $60,000,000 to the C.P.R., the guarantee to the wheat pool which amounts to almost $15,000,000?

Local boards may also be established under the authority of the province which will cooperate with the Central Board at Ottawa.

These boards will also have their own budget and, again, the people will be called upon to meet the deficits.

The consumers for whom no provision is made in the bill will receive no protection yet they will be called upon to reimburse those in industries the charges made by the central and local boards.

This bill, sir, will no doubt have the same fate as that of the Board of Commerce and the one known as the Fair Price Act which was introduced in the house some years ago, in the last days of the Union government and which was found to be ultra vires by the Supreme Court. According to this bill, the board will be empowered:

(a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality;

It is like saying to the farmers when, where, how and at what price they will market their products and this without consulting them or any petition on their part.

Representing in the house a farming constituency I cannot do otherwise than protest against this bill because I see a threat against personal liberty. I do not think that any farmer in my constituency approves of it.

The right hon. Prime Minister himself stated about a year ago:

It is the effort of each of us which will save the country.

He has perhaps changed his mind since then, because, to-day, he seems to desire that one man alone should control the destinies of farmers and dealers.

No one is opposed to cooperation for the marketing of natural products, as it was practised under the supervision of cooperative societies, here and there throughout the country. What we are opposed to is compulsory cooperation which places the farmers at the mercy and under the exclusive and absolute authority of a certain group and even of the minister who, under certain circumstances, will have the administration of this act.

In this regard, I warn the hon. Minister of Agriculture to be on his guard because he has other colleagues who would like to administer this act—especially the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens)—and should he not be on his guard the enforcement of this act might well be transferred to another department.

The British Marketing Act seems to me fairer and affords more freedom to the producers by only accepting advocated schemes after they have been submitted and ratified by parliament. Why not adopt the same policy? Over there, the liberty of parliamentary institutions and of the representatives of the people is still safeguarded. As the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) so well put it recently: "If such a policy is carried on any further, members will have nothing to do. We will simply be here to register our vote on bills which the government enacts owing to its large majority and we shall no longer be responsible for the enforcement of these acts."

The present bill also restricts, when it is thought proper, the importation or exportation of certain products. Is this not withdrawing from the members and parliament the exclusive right they have of legislating on the tariff and trade? By granting these powers to the governor in council and to the boards to be organized under his authority, do we not abdicate the most important powers and rights entrusted to parliament so as to regulate the revenues, expenditures and taxation?

In my opinion this bill is as bad as the one on doles that we have been forced to sanction for the last four years ever since the government is in office.

I am opposed to this bill, sir, because it grants too extensive powers to these councils and boards. These powers may be summarized as follows: to fix the sale, regulate the price, supervise the margin of profits and impose heavy penalties without parliament being consulted, for, if this bill is enacted and put into force, the state becomes, at the same time, controller of production and trade. We have had for the last four years a government of unemployment, and should this bill be enacted we shall have a government of traders.

I am not astonished to find our friends on the extreme left supporting this bill. It is in keeping with their ideas. If I am not mistaken, they were the ones who, in 1930, moved a resolution in connection with mass production and marketing. They had given it the title of "Cooperative production—Cooperative marketing."

We protested against such a measure at the time as we protest to-day against this bill, because it embodies the same principles and, in my opinion it is purely and simply socialism. We wish to assist the farmer; however to do so, it is not necessary, I think, to set aside the principles of our British democracy and borrow from Russia her soviet system which, to-day, is ruining her; it is unnecessary to "stalinize" our farmers so as to improve their lot and restore prosperity to this country.

In the course of this debate certain members on the extreme left criticized our leader for having pointed out the dangers which this bill contains and the harm it does to our parliamentary institutions and liberty: Let me simply say to these hon. members that if we enjoy, to-day, privileges and freedom granted to us under the British Crown—and that a number of them have sought in this country because they were denied to them in their native country—it is because we have always had in this country, especially in the liberal party, active and disinterested men, like the present leader of the liberal party, who have unceasingly fought for the people's rights and opposed any encroachment.

The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) quoted, yesterday, a list of those who requested this measure. He enumerated quite a number, however, I noted that they were mostly associations which purchase and market agricultural products. They are not associations of farmers or growers which request this legislation. I have not heard any one read in the House any petition or resolution of groups or associations of responsible farmers, requesting or approving this legislation. For my part, I have not received any.

We are not alone, sir, in protesting against this bill. Many hon. members opposite have spoken in favour of this scheme; however, with restrictions and reserves and suggestions to the government to reconsider certain sections. Last evening, one of them confessed to me that the greatest objection to this bill was the compulsory cooperation; that is what we are opposed to.

Commercial and business men neither seem to approve of this legislation. Mr. Major, who represents the Board of Trade, considers this measure too revolutionary. He states:

I am afraid business is being overburdened with all sorts of regulations and restrictions.

Mr. Wieland, President of the Board of Commerce asserts:

There was danger in the tendency of governments to seek control over private enterprise and business more than was necessary.

Mr. Wieland, President of the Board of Trade:

The government was trying to do something that was beyond its power.

Mr. Hamel, of the Olive-Dorion, Limited of Montreal, states:

I thought the board was to be given enormous powers and they might stop a lot of speculation in business—which would be a good thing; but if the board uses its powers to order the destruction of natural products, in a similar way to what had been done in the hog market across the border, then he was wholly against it, believing that nature should take its course—to interfere with it only invited disaster.

Mr. Ernest Cousins, who is at the head of an important company of distribution of cream and milk, thinks that this measure "would react against business generally."

Mr. Clarke, also at the head of a large company, stated:

The chamber is opposed to the government in business.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Read also the statements of the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell).

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I could also quote statements made by members opposite, friends of yours who made certain promises in the course of last election, who, however, have not kept them.

The people will judge the Government as they did at the last by-elections.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Do not bother about the elections!

Mr. CASGRAIN:

Gazette editorial: The bill would open the door to more government interference in business. It provides for a maximum of meddling in lines of commercial activity. It is an unprecedented departure. It is questionable if any British government anywhere has ever had or attempted to have such absolute control over private business. The bill overshadows in importance anything previously submitted to this parliament.

(Translation). A few days ago, sir, our distinguished Prime Minister of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, referring to this bill, said:

Ottawa wishes to assume the control of our forests, mines, fisheries and natural products. We shall reply: No. However, we are aware of the attempt which is being made and the spirit with which the dominion government is inspired. Mr. Duplessis, leader of the provincial opposition in the course of the session which has just closed expressed the same fears. I wish to congratulate him.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): There is a righteous man in the Conservative party!

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): The member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) turning towards us, yesterday, to dispel our fears, reminded us that we had delegated our powers to the Board of directors of the Canadian National Railway to whom we had granted full authority. That is a fact, however, the individual's liberty was not affected or limited. We did not prevent or force the people to use this railway, we did not expropriate them, we withdrew none of their rights. The sums required by the Canadian National Railway are voted each year, are controlled and verified by a committee of the house composed of representatives of the people, and they are the ones who vote these definite amounts. There is nothing in this bill which limits the amounts which the Central Board or the governor in council may expend. There is no clause in this bill which compels that the minister must submit to the house a report of its activities in connection with the expenditure and administration of this act. No amount is fixed. It is another blank cheque that the government requests from us so as to endeavour to redeem its pledges.

Mention was also made of the act known as Workmen's Compensation Act. It was the hon. member for North Winnipeg, I think, who referred to it yesterday to prove again that the citizen's liberty and rights had been undermined and taken away. By such acts, the citizen has lost nothing, his rights and privileges have not been decreased. Quite the opposite, they have more guarantee, less outlay and justice is rendered more speedily. At all events, all the workmen's unions of this country have requested such laws, they benefit the workmen.

How do you wish us, sir, to grant the government the powers which it requests by this bill, to manage the business of our farmers and fishermen, when we witness such a shameful failure in the administration of the country's affairs for the last four years?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I was amazed, last evening, to hear the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) request our cooperation. You will recall, sir, each time the bill for direct assistance was submitted to the house for consideration, our distinguished leader and other speakers on this side requested the government to move certain amendments and accept some of our suggestions. We also requested the government to adopt certain amendments in connection with the tariff, we begged of them to lower the customs duty, to find markets more easy of access for our farm products. The government paid no attention to our requests. Moreover, how do you wish us, sir, to cooperate with a government which, for the last four years, ever since it has held power, has not redeemed its pledges. Were we to help the government we would be equally guilty of treachery and of its misdeeds. I, for one, think we should not approve this measure neither any measure brought down by the government from now on until prorogation, because the government has lost the people's confidence. I have but to point out the results of the byelections which have been held within the last year: Restigouche-Madawaska, Yamaska, Mackenzie, South Oxford, which have written across the skies of this country the sure defeat of the government at the next election.

It is often stated that we have no practical suggestions to make to the government. My colleague and neighbour, the hon. member for Quebec Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) spoke the other day of Mr. Albert Rioux. The latter—and I agree with his views on this subject—states:

> At present, farmers must meet their liabilities with a 40 per cent deflated dollar. There should be a readjustment of the debts and mortgages.
> We believe that a good farm loan would be an excellent tool to carry out this adjustment.

However, I think that the government, if it wanted to show its desire to help the farming class, could amend the Farm Loan Act, which was simply an experiment when it was introduced; it could also make provision in order that the people of Quebec and the eastern sections could enjoy the same advantages as the farmers of the west. In the province of Quebec as well as in the eastern provinces, the homestead is generally more valuable than those of farmers in the west, yet the loan is limited to 20 per cent on buildings. I think it is unfair for those who borrow that the loan should not be proportioned to the total value of his property. The farm loan is not well distributed between the two sections of this country. The 6 per cent rate is not very encouraging for farmers of long standing because it does not afford them an opportunity to replenish their stock or improve their farm; it neither encourages younger people who show some desire to farm and wish to become farmers. The Quebec government endeavours to neutralize the disastrous effects of this act by contributing to part of the interest which the farmers must pay. That is quite a help; however, the Dominion government should amend this act in the interest of the farming class. What is more, instead of the bill No. 51 which is submitted to us the government should endeavour to find means to decrease the price of all things necessary to develop the land, forests, mines and fisheries. It should also endeavour to find new markets which are more easy of access in order to dispose of the products of these industries. That would be, I think, the best solution to the problem.

I am not alone in advocating such reforms. In fact, the other day, at the Bank committee Mr. Jackson Dodds, a gentleman of high standing in the financial world, stated that what was required to remedy our ills were markets and also more trade. That is what is required, yet the government does not bestir itself.

Another thing which the government might do would be to lower the price on gasoline. According to last year's statistics, we consumed in this country 503,800,000 gallons of gasoline. Two years ago the consumption was 100,000,000 gallons more. Why permit this gasoline to be sold at 7 to 10 cents dearer than it should sell? Who profits by it? Who are those who benefit by this spread of 7 to 10 cents between the cost and sale price? They are the Rockefellers, the Standard Oil of New Jersey, the Imperial Oil of Canada and other oil companies which are branches of the Imperial Oil of Canada.

These are as many problems which deserve the consideration of the government and which they could solve if they desired to help the farmers, the fishermen and all who are engaged in production or in the development of our natural resources. To help the Quebec farmers, the government should grant them, as well as to their sons, the same advantages as were offered in the past to immigrants who settled in Quebec or in the west: reduce the transportation rates of railways; increase the farm loans, instead of decreasing them as it has done for the last four years; cease incurring liabilities to erect a building for the legation at Tokyo; giving work to Japanese, when our people are in want and are starving, it would be better to give the money to our farmers; discontinue purchasing expensive paintings for the National Gallery by which the friends of the government benefit; cease granting subsidies to insolvent companies in order that they may improve or build ships to transport cattle to the European markets and thus prevent them from robbing the farmers. There are as many measures the government could take to help the farming class, if it were in earnest. The farmers, deserve to be helped and we should do our utmost to assist them with a scheme to meet their circumstances. Briefly, to quote the poet's words, as I have already done elsewhere:

> Remettre en honneur le socle et la charrue,
> Repeupler la campagne aux dépens de la rue,
> Grever de taxes les riches et dégrever les champs,
> Avoir moins de bourgeois et plus de paysans.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in addressing the house with respect to one or two aspects of this bill, may I first congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) upon having introduced such a forward measure. For some time, in fact practically from the time this government came into power, a bill of this nature has been under consideration and I think the minister and the government are to be congratulated upon bringing forward the provisions contained in this bill.

Before dealing with certain of the provisions of the bill I should like to refer briefly to some of the arguments and statements made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the address which he delivered on April 19. I listened to his remarks with considerable interest but at times I thought I had either misunderstood some of his statements or had not clearly understood the nature of the legislation. However, upon reading over his address I found that I had understood correctly what he had said. I then became even more surprised at some of the statements he made on that occasion. I do not suppose there is an hon. member of the house who is more capable of clearly understanding legislation and the difference between fine phrases or wording of clauses and paragraphs than the leader of the opposition. I am all the more surprised at the interpretation he has put upon this bill. Throughout his whole speech he referred again and again to the fact that the bill restricted production. At the very first of his speech, as reported on page 2334 of Hansard, we find him stating that the principle and essence of the whole measure is restriction of production. This phrase is used again and again. Probably not less than eight or ten times we find him making the statement that this bill has for its object the restriction of production. I contend that there is not a single clause or paragraph in the bill to warrant that statement being made. The right hon. gentleman stated also that this bill would create monopolies but I have failed to find any section of the bill which would warrant a conclusion of that kind. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) has stated that if this bill is passed it will lead to trade reprisals by foreign countries but I cannot follow his argument in that respect. We find a rather remarkable conclusion drawn by the leader of the opposition and appearing on page 2336 of Hansard as follows:

> This law declares that once these different boards to be created in the manner I have described have made certain regulations they may go to the extent of prohibiting a man from working on his own property—

Surely that is a far-fetched interpretation to place upon this bill and I contend that there is absolutely nothing within the four corners of the measure to justify any such conclusion. Later on at page 2341 the right hon. gentleman in referring to the products and commodities covered by this legislation states that it includes boots, shoes, clothing and furniture. I say again that there is absolutely nothing in the bill to justify a statement of that kind by any hon. member of this house. He makes another reference a little further down the same page. The right hon. gentleman states that if this bill were put into effect Canada could not trade with any country, for instance, which wanted to ship oranges or coffee into the dominion. Well, this is the first time I have heard that we have ever grown oranges or coffee in Canada, because the very paragraph to which the leader of the opposition referred relates to "natural product" as defined in the bill, which is a product of Canada. Once more therefore he has drawn an improper conclusion. But I was more amazed at two other statements he made in the speech to which I am referring. He says in effect that this measure is not to help the producer but is intended to trick the C.C.F. group in this house. Perhaps it might be well for me to read exactly what he said in this connection. At page 2334 we find the following:

> The members of the C.C.F. to-day are congratulating the government on this legislation which it has introduced. Is it not a nice spectacle to see an hon. member, the leader of the C.C.F., which party regards itself as the antithesis of Toryism, congratulating Tories on their legislation, as my hon. friend has done in his speech this afternoon and that because it goes the length of further extending state functions in a manner which will inevitably serve to create a bureaucracy.

I can quite understand why the leader of the opposition should be surprised at someone in some other corner of the house than this side supporting the government, because during the past four years he has found no occasion in any legislation of importance to support the administration or even to offer constructive suggestions. I say, he has found no occasion to take this stand during these very perilous times through which we are passing. Further on he says:

> We have our Tory friends opposite introducing legislation which, like the spider and the fly, is aimed at catching a few flies which happen to be at the far end of the chamber—

I do not know whether those in the corner of the house are to be congratulated on that reference or not.

> —they are prepared to walk into the spider's parlour for the time being to help it get through this particular legislation. But I am afraid the inevitable fate of the fly awaits them.

Just why this party should want to capture the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I do not know. I am quite certain he would not prove to be a fly if we did catch him; he might turn out to be a bumble bee or a hornet. In any event it has been made clear that the policies of the C.C.F. and the policies of those who sit on this side of the house are diametrically opposed, and at no time that I am aware of has the leader of the C.C.F. group failed to express clearly and distinctly precisely what his views were on the policies of the government of the day. At page 2341 the leader of the opposition had this to say. He said that this is really not a measure to help the farmer or the producer but is an ordinary election dodge. He quotes the provision that the governor in council may:

> (b) prescribe the forms of such licences, the terms and conditions thereof and the persons who shall have authority to issue the same;

On the strength of that the leader of the opposition arrives at this conclusion:

> That is a fine power to give to a government on the eve of a general election, to send around the country a lot of agents of the government of the day with power to issue licences to the producers in the different localities.

It seems to me hardly conceivable that in 1934, during these times, we should find the leader of a great party coming to a conclusion such as that in respect of the bill before the house. If that were one of the objects of the bill, if it were mere trickery to entrap the third group in this house, it is conceivable that this bill would receive the support which it is receiving in this house? Is it conceivable that it should receive the support of six or seven provinces of the dominion? Is it conceivable that it should receive the support of the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell)? Is it any wonder that when the leader of a great party makes statements of this kind with regard to a measure of so much importance to the primary producers of Canada, the leading Liberal newspaper in Ottawa, the Citizen, in an editorial of April 25, 1934, should have the following to say with regard to this negative opposition, which has been directed against the government and its policies during the last three or four years under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman? The editorial in question states:

It is simply a negative factor in parliament, offering neither light nor leadership in Canada's most critical period of economic readjustment.

Further down, referring particularly to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) this editorial makes the following comment:

This session there is no such excuse, but Colonel J. L. Ralston's speech on the budget last Monday afternoon made it clear that the opposition sterility is due to something more than tactics: it is a state of political barrenness. The light of Liberalism is flickering so feebly on the opposition side, it is quite liable to go out altogether when the Liberals come back into office.

I think these statements sum up the situation pretty well when conclusions such as I have referred to are drawn by the leader of the party opposite with respect to the measure which is receiving the attention of the house. And be it noted that throughout the whole of this discussion, as in discussions which have taken place during the last four years on measures of major importance in this house, no alternative propositions have been put forward. We have simply had destructive criticism; that has been the tenor of the debate from the opposition benches from the time this measure was introduced until this moment.

Let me turn for a moment or two to the principle of the bill, to which discussion is limited at this stage of the proceedings. I think the principle of the bill is very clearly and concisely set forth in the description of the act in these words:

An act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

All hon. members, even those of the opposition, will agree that there is at the present time some necessity for marketing legislation in Canada. Surely when there is keen competition among all countries to obtain foreign markets it is well that our products should enter those markets in the best possible condition; that they should be properly graded; and that the time of marketing should be carefully studied. If we consider just what has happened in the past, in the marketing of hog products, bacon and ham, in the old country, the present situation with respect to cheese, the matter of apples which was so well dealt with by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and so on with respect to all our natural products, it surely is conceivable that to market them in the best possible manner, under regulated conditions under the direction of experts, should be of advantage to the producers and to the country. Therefore, under the provisions of this bill we have a marketing board set up. It is given the powers enumerated in clause 4, subclause 1 (a) of the bill, as follows:

The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

Those are the board's main general powers which are further amplified by subsequent provisions of the clause. Under subclause 5 of the same clause the marketing board is empowered to set up a local board which may act as the agent of the main board or may exercise the powers of the marketing board itself. The method of procedure to get some action from the board is clearly set out in the bill. I do not wish to go into details with regard to that; those clauses have been read so frequently it is with some hesitation I read them again, but subclause 1 of clause 5 states:

A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

Two points are to be noted; first, that the clause is permissive; second, that the scheme may be got under way by a representative number of those interested. It is quite true that under another clause a scheme may be initiated or got under way by the minister, but the regular, ordinary manner in which action would be obtainable under the bill would be under the provisions of the clause which I have just read.

I have set forth very briefly and in a general way the principle of the bill. In order that orderly marketing may be carried out, certain further powers are given to the board. Under clause 12, subclause 1 and 2, power to restrict imports and exports is given, not to the board itself but to the governor in council. I am quite prepared to admit that the provisions of the bill with regard to exports are pretty wide and may be due for amendment. The provision with respect to imports is not as wide as that with regard to exports. It is to be noted in reading that clause that power to limit imports extends only to those natural products which enter Canada in competition with regulated products, while in respect to exports the provision is much wider, referring to all natural products. On first thought I am inclined to believe perhaps "natural product" should be changed to "regulated product," so that the power of the governor in council may be restricted to exports coming in in competition with regulated products as defined in the bill.

The other important provisions of the bill, those coming under part II, give the right to investigate the spread in prices as these products find their way to market. Clause 16, subclause 1 states:

> The minister may, at the request of the board or upon his own initiative authorize an investigation into the cost of production, prices, spread, trade practices, methods of financing, management, policies, grading, transportation and other matters in relation to the production and marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of any natural product.

In other words, under the provisions of this legislation power is given to the minister from the time the product is ready for the market at each step, in transportation, in sale, right up to the time it comes into the hands of the consumer, to investigate thoroughly all those stages in order to ascertain whether the charges made during that process are fair and reasonable. Surely it is not too much to ask that the primary producer be given the right to inquire just how his goods are handled and what each step costs from the time they leave his hands until they reach those of the consumer. I know that in the province of Manitoba, from which I come, there is a feeling that the producer is not receiving as much of the consumer's dollar as he should, that the spread is much too wide. I know the farmers feel that if they had the right to investigate the commissions paid, the charges for processing, for packing and handling and so forth, they would be much more satisfied. More than that, an investigation or two such as we have had by the Stevens committee certainly would help clear the air and would bring good results even if nothing further should be done.

Some objection has been taken to this bill because it is said that if it is put into operation business will leave the ordinary channels. Personally I do not take that view. I believe if both the producer and consumer feel they are getting a square deal, they will carry on their business with much greater confidence through the ordinary channels.

I have dealt very briefly, I must admit, with the act. I congratulated the Minister of Agriculture upon having introduced the bill; I am inclined to think, with the hon. member for Melville, that perhaps the bill has been overdue for some time, but it is here now and we have an opportunity to examine its provisions and make it a workable measure. If during consideration of the bill in committee changes are deemed necessary, let us amend the bill in order that it may be practical and of real benefit to those whom it is intended to help. Surely we need not go back to the reign of King William or Queen Mary to find out what we should do; surely we need not read the Magna Charta, as has been suggested by the leader of the opposition. The producer only wants a fair deal. A chance to realize at least the cost of production and perhaps even to make a little profit.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bowman) made reference to the charge of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the government had changed itself into a spider, temporarily, and had woven a web with which to entrap hon. members in this corner of the house. Well, my memory is still fresh enough to recall many webs cast by the leader of the opposition when he held office; I still remember some of the spells and webs which they threw out to entrap at least the votes if not the continuing support of some of us in this corner. But all have failed and will continue to fail.

I may say to you, sir, as doubtless you have observed in your tenure of office as Speaker of this house, that we never vote for either political party. Hon. gentlemen continue to make the grievous mistake, when we support the principle of a measure, of charging that we voted for their party or against it. We have not done so, nor are we doing so in this case. When I state to the house that I propose to support the principle of this bill and to vote for its second reading, certainly I am not voting for the Tory party, nor would I be voting for the Liberal party if they were the body to bring forward such a bill. I am not voting against the Liberal party when I vote for this bill; I am voting for the principle of a measure in which I believe, and which I think should have been introduced some years ago. If I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the government upon bringing in the measure let me say that I congratulate them on having had the excellent good sense to adopt almost the exact proposals of the C.C.F. movement, the very proposals which have been put forward by my own organization, the United Farmers of Alberta, for some years, and that have been advocated from this corner of the house for the last three years at least.

The necessity for economic planning has become more and more apparent to every student of economic conditions and of changing social affairs throughout the world in recent years. The complete breakdown of the competitive system has demonstrated the necessity for something in the way of ordered direction. The complete failure of private initiative adequately to deal with anything except its own private interests and greed has demonstrated again the necessity for some greater measure of direct control by the state of the activities of industry. One of the greatest apologists for the present system has diverged so far as to recommend a transformation as well as a reformation of most of our institutions. His name is familiar to most hon. members. Sir Arthur Salter has said:

> We need to reform and in large measure to transform this system.

I congratulate the Conservative government on having decided to take at least one step in the direction of the transformation and reformation of this system. Sir Arthur continues:

> We need so to improve the framework of law, of institutions, of custom and of public direction and control, that the otherwise free activities and competitive enterprises of man, instead of destroying each other, will inure to general good. In the organization of industry, of credit and of money we need to supplement the automatic process of adjustment by deliberate planning.

74726—162½

Then he throws out this warning, in which I concur:

> If we fail the alternative is an intervening period of collapse and anarchy, followed by chaos and a different system inconsistent with political and personal liberty.

I had thought of dealing with this abstract question of liberty, which has been argued so earnestly by hon. gentlemen to my right, but the question has been handled so excellently by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) that I do not propose to cover the ground further, except to suggest to hon. members that they sit down some evening and consider what element of liberty is possible to them in a complex order of society such as we have to-day. There is no liberty left to-day, nor can there be in a society of this kind, that would enable a man to step beyond the border of his own personality and affect the relations of another individual. For individuals liberty must end when it impinges upon or overlaps the liberty of another individual. In the condition of society to-day it is inevitable that there must be an increasing amount of direction and ordered planning, if we are not to have what Salter describes as inevitable chaos and anarchy. As a matter of fact, to this stage the entire development of our state of society has been on the basis of a modified form of anarchy; it has been on the basis of a form of individualistic ruthlessness, which has now succeeded in destroying reliance in itself and compelled the bridling of the beast. A nationally controlled economy is essential for these, among other reasons: There has been throughout the world, and particularly in recent years, a complete abandonment of the old philosophy of laissez faire, the philosophy of free competition, the philosophy of the right of the individual to extort and extract from society all he can get, irrespective of its effect upon society. That is the procedure which has been so eloquently condemned in so many excellent encyclicals from Rome, and pronouncements from other places. I could refer hon. members to my right to the Rerum Novarum and again to the encyclical Quadragesimo Anno in which limitless free competition is held largely responsible for the misery and degradation of to-day. I ask those hon. members if they do not think it is time we should recognize the soundness of this contention, and to govern ourselves accordingly. It is utterly essential that for the good of society the state must step in and assist in directing the evolution and the economic growth of the state.

Mr. BRADETTE: Does the Pope ask for governmental socialization?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, certainly he does.

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, no.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would refer the hon. member to page 38 of the encyclical in which His Holiness states that wherever industry possesses the power to dominate the community such industry should be state owned.

Mr. BRADETTE: But it is not business socialization.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, wherever it dominates the community or to the disadvantage of the community. Yes, he even goes that far. He goes as far as this bill goes when it recommends state direction of the activity of industry in the interests of the state, rather than of the individual. He recommends control in the interests of the state. Again and again that is pointed out particularly in the last encyclical Quadragesimo Anno. The utter failure of every attempt made in recent years to restore the slightest shadow of economic internationalism makes this planning now definitely necessary. My dream is of a brotherhood of men throughout the world, operated on the basis of the cooperative principle. But I say that to-day that is impossible of immediate attainment because of the nature of man, himself—his greed, his selfishness, and because of the building up of these wretched barriers against trade.

Let us be realists in this matter and, facing the facts as they confront us and the failures that we have had in these years past, undertake now to do what we can to organize, and in an orderly way direct internal economy of the country so that we may be ready, when the time comes, once more intelligently to step into the international field and extend the marketing of our products, as well as our international relations, in the broadest and kindliest way possible. Furthermore, there is a growing realization on the part of individuals within our state these days—that there is an increasing obligation upon the state itself, under conditions such as confront us now, to undertake greater responsibilities in respect of the conditions of certain classes whose standards of life have become so reduced as to be a stigma on the system under their administration. These are some of the reasons why I find a planned economy essential—and not only essential but inevitable. Apart from these reasons, the altered technique of production in modern years has made it essential. You cannot any longer leave to the increasingly fewer and fewer groups of individuals the complete domination of your industrial life. And yet that confronts us at the moment as an absolute fact. You must deal with that problem. You will have to face the problem of cartels and combines, just as this government is to-day, in a sort of way, attempting to investigate the tremendous effects of the growth of centralized industry in this country, such as is found in chain stores, department stores and so on. These are problems which must be dealt with, and no longer can society be left completely subject to the domination of these growing economic and social powers which are vested in the hands of a few individuals operating under the old system.

But Mr. Speaker, I cast this warning out: The object of the bill before the house is, to my mind, the important feature. First we must deal with its object, and secondly the administration to follow. But the object of the bill should not, under any circumstances, be the destruction of wealth. We should not place ourselves in the sacrilegious position of destroying those things which the Almighty, in cooperation with our efforts and those of science, has succeeded in placing at the disposal of the human race. The object of the measure should be, rather, to develop the means by which we can increase and expand the consumption of the great wealth to the extent to which our people are to-day capable. I am now going to say that this bill, alone, will be quite insufficient, in the long run, to achieve that end. However it is a step in the right direction. It is one phase of national planning. But if hon. members are going to delude themselves and the public into imagining that merely the arranging of marketing technique will solve their present problems, they are gravely mistaken. They have to go at least one step farther, namely into the field of distribution, by steadily increasing the consumptive power of our people. If they do that, then they will have taken in my opinion, the two most essential steps towards the building of a new state and a new social order in which, through the encouragement of the growth of cooperatives, on the one side, collectively owning the essential basic industries, and direction by the state of the other essential secondary industries, we will have brought into being what we are proposing in our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation manifesto.

What an amusing thing it is, Mr. Speaker, to find the leader of the opposition going around the country last summer and at one point saying he could agree with half of our program, at another that he could agree with two-thirds of it and at another with three-quarters of it, and now we find him preparing to throw out the first essential feature of the program, and the Conservative party stepping over and saying, "We will take it up, so it is all right." That is really most amusing. I think that, after all, history will have a little laugh or two at the strange shift of activity in the political field of Canada.

At any rate we, the C.C.F., have a plan. I congratulate the government for, at least in part, accepting that plan. Of course we are not the only nation on earth doing it, but I am glad this government has at least begun. But let them not ignore the fact that until we have solved the general problem of increasing the purchasing power of the masses, we will not have taken the proper steps in the direction of the permanent solution of the problem of distribution and no marketing act alone will be sufficient.

Referring now to subsection (e) of section 4:

(e) to assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing or conditioning the regulated product, and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product;

I am convinced, and shall so propose when we reach committee, that that provision should refer solely to cooperative societies; that the government should not undertake to assist by grant or loan institutions operated for private profit. But if they will modify that provision so that it will apply only to cooperative bodies, and expand it so that it will enable the extension of necessary aid for the creation of processing plants, then they will have gone a long way towards the complete acceptance of what in this regard we have been proposing for some years. This government, if it is to make effective the provisions of this bill, must extend to the organized producers in say the live stock industry, the poultry industry, or the dairying industry, facilities for going into the processing stages of such industries. If they do that they will have done a great thing for the primary producers and less than that will not justify the optimistic speeches made by some hon. members opposite with regard to the probable effects of this measure.

I further support the bill because of subsection (j), which provides that the board shall have power:—

to cooperate with any marketing board or agency established under the law of any province to regulate the marketing of any natural product of such province and to act conjointly with any such provincial board or agency;

With that clause I read section 5:

5. (1) A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

These two clauses, taken together, show me definitely that this bill has for its purpose the stimulation of interest in the organized cooperative movement in relation to the agrarian industry of this country. Any bill that has that object within its ambit must receive my support and will continue to do so. I am not a socialist; I have never been a socialist; I have never read any work of Karl Marx except what paragraphs appear in current digests or magazine articles. But I am associated with a movement that for more than a quarter of a century has struggled to find an intelligent solution of the problems of the primary producers, to whom I belong. As a result of this twenty-five years of earnest effort they have come to certain crystallized opinions. These opinions were not suddenly arrived at but are the result of the study of these questions from the distant past until to-day. Resolutions come forward from the locals, are discussed in the district associations, in the constituency associations and then go on to the annual convention, passing through a series of sieves in order to ascertain whether they have merit and are sufficiently intelligent to go forward to the parent body. If they reach the parent body and are adopted they become the policies of the movement itself. I doubt if there is any body in this dominion, outside of the agrarian and to a similar degree the labour movement, that has applied so much constructive, democratic thought to the problems and the solution of the problems that are facing our people to-day. As a result of the efforts, the struggles, the studies of these two bodies, working quite apart from each other all these years, it was suddenly found that we had arrived at almost exactly the same conclusions on the major national questions with which the country is concerned. So we met and formed a federation, known, as hon. gentlemen all know now, as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The organization to which I belong, the United Farmers of Alberta, constitutes the largest and most powerful part of that body. Our whole philosophy is based upon the development of cooperation.

Cooperation has flourished in many nations; some fifty-three countries to-day have an enourmously extended growth and development of that movement, both in the producer and the consumer fields. I shall probably, if I have time, give hon. members some figures concerning it, for they are amazing. But in Canada the development of the producer end is of comparatively recent growth. We have had substantial consumer cooperatives for many years. Now hon. members, particularly some to my right, rise and criticize the cooperative movement as having failed and broken down, and brought loss to those concerned. I wish to meet that challenge to-day. I want to tell this house, what many hon. members, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) well know, that the cooperative movement has not failed in Canada, that the cooperative movement, particularly on the producers' side, continued to flourish until the coming of the collapse of the capitalist system—in the ambit of which it tried to work—in the years 1928 and 1929. When we received a severe check at that time it was not because of any inherent weakness in the cooperative principle itself, but because the dead weight of the evils of capitalism had carried the whole system down and ourselves with it. The cooperative movement in the live stock industry continued even after the year 1929; it continued to flourish until England went off the gold standard. It could have still continued to make progress had not this government adopted the insane policy of attempting artificially to sustain the gold value of the Canadian dollar, thereby bringing about a condition in exchange rates that meant to us the loss of at least ten dollars on every head of cattle we shipped that year to England, with the resultant collapse of the live stock cooperative pool. The Fordney-McCumber tariff has had an extremely serious effect on the cattle industry, but that tariff was but one of the acts that tended to destroy us; the second act was that of this government in maintaining artificially the gold level of Canadian currency after the abandonment by England of the gold standard.

Now I come to the wheat pool. It has been subject to challenge by hon. members here and by newspapers outside. I made it my business in that year of great controversy when the price of wheat went to $1.70 to go straight to the heads of the pool in Winnipeg and find out the true condition of affairs. Remember, it was charged that the pools had deliberately held wheat off the market in order to hold up the European buyer. I found that that statement was completely false. It can be ascertained by any hon. member on application to the pool for their day sheets that they offered for sale real wheat on almost every day that year. Further, they offered wheat frequently at prices below the Winnipeg level. The reason for the collapse at that time was, of course in part the wild speculation on the Winnipeg exchange, and a condition in the grain market in Canada and Chicago completely out of relation to the Liverpool market. We had an artificial stimulation of price here, and most of the trading if not all in these days was being done on option. We might have stepped in as a pool and sold our wheat on option; we might have sold it at $1.70 on option, but, as was proven by subsequent events, had we done so we would have found that the option buyers would not take up the options when the time came for call. That is what was feared at that time, and justly feared.

Now let us come to the question of loss. Hon. members who will take the trouble to study the figures will find that the wheat pools of this country lost less per bushel handled than the private grain trade. Have hon. members forgotten that the great Alberta Pacific Grain Company nearly went under, with a loss of three and a half million dollars in that year? Have they forgotten that James Richardson & Sons nearly went to the wall in that year? Have they forgotten that the great "man of destiny" of the wheat market in Canada, the man who was held out to us as the real authority of wheat marketing in Canada, James Stewart, was fired from his position because of the losses his company sustained under his presidency during that year? Do you find that the wheat pool justifies its position? Not only do we find that but we find that our people have continued to have faith in it and we propose to continue to support the principle. We believe in it firmly and we believe that eventually it will succeed in at least checking and probably expelling the profit system and in bringing a fairer share of the consumer's dollar to the producer. For these reasons, as well as for those others I have mentioned already, I propose to continue to support this measure.

I have often heard discussions in this house by expert agriculturists to the effect that quality of product is the keynote to market security. In what country is quality the highest? It is the highest in that country with the most intelligently and highly organized cooperative movement—Denmark. Sweden also is particularly good in quality, and is also a strongly cooperative country. To me those two states stand out as a fair example of what a successfully ordered society can do in the midst of a general world calamity such as we are facing at the present time. People tell me that continuity of market demand will depend upon quality. I answer by saying that quality will depend not only on continuity of market demand but on stability of prices. There must be some certainty on the part of the producer, not only that he is going to be able to find a market but that he is going to be able to market his products at prices which will justify the effort and investment entailed in producing high grade products. If this bill proposes to go in that direction, I am for it.

I am utterly impatient with those critics who assume that this bill will cause a destruction of opportunity and will impose bureaucratic boards upon a system of free society. I cannot stomach that sort of thing nor can I understand a man who will put forward such an argument in the face of the conditions now existing in this country. We farmers have no freedom to-day; we have no market; we have no power; we have no money; the only right we have is to go to work. We can work in the fields from daylight to dark and then starve or worry over our debts during the winter.

An hon. member to my right during the course of one of his speeches stated quite cleverly that he believed this bill was a step forward, that it might win a battle but the eventual result would be that we would lose a war. I suppose he meant the war with the system but he did not clear up that point. The fact is the farmer—I am one—has lost both the battle and the war. Action is imperative and must be taken. The system under which we have lived or have tried to live has destroyed us. Hon. members know that I am telling the truth when I say that western agriculture has been reduced to a state of peasantry. Unless steps are taken the southern parts of the western provinces will eventually be depopulated. Something must be done to get us out of the appalling misery in which we find ourselves. In my opinion the farmers will remain in this state until they are prepared to organize efficiently for the purpose of furthering co-operative aims. This can be done by taking advantage of the provisions contained in this bill and in time the farmers may reach the state where they can challenge the power of the competitive system to destroy them. You and I cannot go down to a farmer and lift him up by his neck. We cannot pick them out one by one and solve their problems. We cannot superimpose upon unorganized farmers a system which will save them. The farmers must organize and I hope it will be made clear subsequently in committee that this bill proposes to give the utmost encouragement to the organization of primary producers, agriculture and others, so that they themselves may be able to take advantage in a democratic way of the provisions of this bill. I do not like the idea of this or any other government superimposing upon any branch of agriculture a board which will completely control the industry without the consent of the majority, but I do approve of the setting up of a central board which will have as one of its objectives the encouragement of the creation of pools and other cooperative movements among the producers of every branch of farm production and primary producers generally. We must aid in developing the sense of the responsibilities of citizenship, and I believe this bill may be an excellent move in that direction. That is another reason why I support the measure.

With the exception of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) my hon. friends to my right have treated this measure with scant courtesy. I ask them if they have taken the trouble to study the report issued by the University of Saskatchewan which deals with the outlook for agriculture in that province. The forecast given there for that province is true also of Manitoba and Alberta. I should like to give one or two quotations from this report. In dealing with cattle, the report states:

> With regard to cattle, it is mentioned that the Canadian beef cattle industry experienced in 1933 the most distressing year since 1896.

In connection with hogs it states:

> There is a probability that if feed prices remain low by the end of the year there will be an over-expansion of hog production.

No doubt there will be a further fall in prices. With respect to the prospects for the future, it states:

Prospects for 1934 are mentioned as unattractive. Shortages of food, feed, and seed, losses of horses, poor machinery, and prospects of the most serious outbreak of grasshoppers ever experienced have to be reckoned with. On top of all this the bill for assistance during the period of adversity also awaits settlement.

I draw the attention of the house to these facts: The interest alone on the present farm debt of Saskatchewan is so great that it would take four-fifths of all the money received for the entire wheat crop of 1934. Let me repeat that statement. The interest charges on the tremendous farm debt in Saskatchewan is so great to-day that it would take four-fifths of the total cash receipts of the wheat growers of that province to meet that charge alone. The farm taxes of the province would take two-fifths of the total cash receipts. If the farmers of that province are to meet the interest and taxes for 1934 they will have to receive one-fifth more than they do receive. Is not the position perfectly clear to hon. members? Is it not clear that we should undertake some action to bring about first, a restoration of morale; second, an increased encouragement to cooperative development and, third, with the assistance of the state a more orderly and intelligent marketing of our production. As I have said already, our own program calls for these very things, as for example:

The new social order at which we aim is not one in which individuality will be crushed out by a system of regimentation. Nor shall we interfere with cultural rights of racial or religious minorities. What we seek is a proper collective organization of our economic resources such as will make possible a much greater degree of leisure and a much richer individual life for every citizen.

To attain that we recommend the adoption of a system of planned economy, the planning of the production and distribution of the things that are essential to the national life of our people. Our program is:

The first step in this direction will be the setting up of a national planning commission consisting of a small body of economists, engineers and statisticians assisted by an appropriate technical staff.

It is interesting to note in connection with the general problem that one of the most eminent authorities in England, addressing a meeting of the British Association in 1933, recommended that there should be constituted in England a third house apart from the House of Commons and the House of Lords. This third house was to consist of the intellectuals of the country—not of intellectuals alone, of course, but of scientists—and the duty of that house would be something apart altogether from those of the legislative bodies. After all, the average politician has no time, in fact not one of us has time, to undertake more than the thought and labour entailed in meeting the day to day problems of the state which, heaven knows, are considerable enough in any event. We have little opportunity to sit down and attempt to work out or even to anticipate the distant results of our policies or to consider what other policies should be brought in to cope with events that are discernible in the future. It is suggested that this third body should sit in an advisory and consulting capacity, anticipating the problems that may arise and advising upon them, so that we might get ready to deal with them. Now, that is not original. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and others in this corner have time and again recommended the setting-up of just such a body. We call it an economic council, but genial gentlemen over there, obsessed with the institutional traditions of the country, insist upon calling it a third house. We do not insist upon that designation. As the hon. member for Red Deer has pointed out, the house has in effect accepted the policy but it has not yet been put into operation. Surely the government must realize the tremendous use they could have made of such a permanent national economic council during this crisis in coping with problems such as confront us. And so our program continues:

The task of the commission will be to plan for the production, distribution and exchange of all goods and services necessary to the efficient functioning of the economy; to coordinate the activities of the socialized industries; to provide for a satisfactory balance between the producing and consuming power; and to carry on continuous research into all branches of the national economy in order to acquire the detailed information necessary to efficient planning.

It is now certain—

And this has already been referred to in the quotation from Sir Arthur Salter and in my own reference to world conditions.

It is now certain that in every industrial country some form of planning will replace the disintegrating capitalist system.

This is obvious to all who have eyes to see or to read.

The C.C.F. will provide that in Canada the planning shall be done, not by a small group of capitalist magnates in their own interests, but by public servants acting in the public interest and responsible to the people as a whole.

We do not, particularly those of the U.F.A., which is the most powerful body in the Canadian Cooperative Federation, regard it as at all essential to undertake any vast dislocating series of socializations or nationalizations of industry. We do not believe it is necessary. We have come to the firm conclusion that the extension of the cooperative principle with nationalization of key industries and monopolies will carry with it all that we desire to secure at this stage in the attainment of our program.

In this regard I would quote the following from No. 4, the section on agriculture:

> The intense depression in agriculture to-day is a consequence of the general world crisis caused by the normal workings of the capitalistic system resulting in: (1) Economic nationalism expressing itself in tariff barriers and other restrictions of world trade.

We are definitely opposed to the continuance of that state of affairs, and when the time comes for its removal we propose to remove it as quickly as possible in order to establish harmonious trade relations with other countries.

> (2) The decreased purchasing power of unemployed and underemployed workers and of the Canadian people in general.

This is another reason for agricultural depression.

> (3) The exploitation of both primary producers and consumers by monopolistic corporations who absorb a great proportion of the selling price of farm products.

If this bill is directed—and I believe that this is the purpose—towards the control of those middlemen or intervening private processing companies or corporations, then I am for it. I want to extend its powers so that we shall be able to deal adequately with the tremendous problem that is facing us to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And so, Mr. Speaker, I propose to support the second reading of the measure.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): I would hesitate to transgress upon the time of the house or to take part in the debate were there not certain misconceptions of this bill abroad in my own province, misconceptions which have been to some extent stimulated and fostered by the speeches of the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) and the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I intend to devote a good portion of my time to dealing with one product in which my constituency is particularly interested, namely, fish, and I make no apology to the house for doing so, because if there is one industry which has been the orphan of politics it is the fishing industry. Not only has it been the orphan of politics, but the pulse of policy has been so feeble on many occasions that it was scarcely perceptible.

When the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was speaking on this measure, he made certain observations with regard to the industry which were so fantastic that I do not believe any one would pay attention to them had they not been uttered by a man who has spent his life in the fishing industry. Before I discuss the hon. gentleman's views however may I paint a picture of the industry itself. It is necessary to understand the problem with which we have to deal in order to see whether the measure which is before us will be efficacious as a solution. We have in the industry two principal forms of fish, fresh fish and salt or pickled fish. I include in the category of fresh fish processed fish such as smoked and frozen fish. I call it fresh fish because it is processed and marketed from the seaboard by corporations which have large plants and capital investment. We have also the salt fish industry which is an individualistic industry; individuals along the coast produce the fish and sell it to the exporter, who in turn ships it to the foreign markets. I have described it as individualistic, but it is not entirely so, because the largest centre happens to be the town of Lunenburg, where the industry is carried on by vessels manned by twenty to twenty-five men.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said that so far as Lunenburg was concerned the industry was cooperative. I regret that I cannot agree with that. If you call the following process cooperative, then it is cooperative. The men work on vessels in which they may or may not own a share and they work, not for wages but for a proportion of the proceeds of the catch when it is sold. That in my opinion is not a cooperative system; it is simply an alternative to the payment of wages. Sometimes they make more and sometimes less, but when their fish are dried and are ready they are sold to the exporter, who is certainly not in the cooperative business. He ships them to the foreign market. In years gone by we had markets in Europe, in South America, notably Brazil, in the West Indies, in Porto Rico and in Cuba. One by one these markets have been falling away and as we lose each market we have so many more fishermen out of employment. We reached our peak probably during the years of the war, certainly the peak in price. But from 1920 there has been a steady and continuous decline in the salt fish industry. We might just as well face the facts. Some of the things I shall say this afternoon will not, perhaps, be appreciated in my constituency, but the first vital blow which was struck at the industry was when prohibition was introduced into the United States. When the Volstead Act came into force, some of our fishing vessel owners discovered that they could make a great deal more money by putting their vessels into a different trade and they took them out of fishing. They did make more money for a time but they struck a vital blow at the fishing industry because there were no vessels immediately available to replace those taken off. The markets which those vessels were able to supply were lost and perhaps will remain forever lost, and those owners were the first real enemies of the fishing industry, at least in Lunenburg county.

From 1920 to 1929 there was a continuous decline, slow but perceptible, and after 1929 when the crash came which we call the depression, the fleet which had once numbered 150 vessels dropped to twenty-five and an industry which had once given employment to thousands of people in my native county now gives employment to only a few hundred. That is the situation. Coupled with that there is another fact which I think we have to face and which may not be palatable to the fish exporters: we have at no time made any exhaustive study of our market requirements; we have shipped the product prepared in the same way as was done by our fathers and grandfathers and said to the market: That is what we have, instead of trying to meet what the market might particularly want. Furthermore, we have had no system of compulsory grading or inspection. It has been possible to go to Labrador, buy what we call "slop fish," bring them to Lunenburg, put them in casks, as is done, and ship them to the markets of the world on consignment as Lunenburg number one. I say that that has been done. It has been done in my county, and it has been done in Newfoundland as the report of the royal commission there shows. What must happen to markets under those conditions?

[Mr. Ernst.]

They must decline, so that the industry itself is in some measure to blame for the decline. What is true of Lunenburg is true of the whole coastline because the individual fisherman is in the main a producer of salt or pickled fish. What has been the result? I know the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has visited the maritimes, but if some other hon. members could see the pitiable conditions under which those fishermen have been living during not only the last three years but the years of so-called prosperity, they would be staggered and astounded. Conditions among those fishermen have been terrible; they have been living on a yearly pittance which we could spend in much less than a month. I am sorry that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) is not in his seat. He has criticized and condemned this measure, and pictured to those men who are living in that misery and are in exactly the situation I have stated: If you have this measure, you will have a board in Canso, in Pictou, in every little village along the coast; you will have dictatorial officials coming along and saying that you cannot land your fish to-day or at all. What is the true situation? Does not the house agree with me that an industry in that condition needs control, coordination? I do not know of any other in Canada which needs it more. I believe a local board is required to coordinate that industry; I believe further that when they have done something to coordinate it and have made a study of the requirements of not only the markets which we have but those which we have lost because we want to regain them; if they inaugurate a system of grading and inspection which guarantees to the ultimate consumer that he is getting what he is paying for, we shall be able not only to retain the markets we now have but to expand the industry and to regain some of our lost prestige. Moreover, I believe if we carry on under the direction of the board a vigorous campaign of education among the fishermen in an endeavour to produce a better article—and no one can tell me that the article which was produced a hundred years ago cannot be improved upon; there must be methods of improving it—we can better the economic lot of the fisherman and help him to get more money for his product.

One more word about the salt fish industry. May I say that a royal commission investigated the fishing industry in Newfoundland where conditions are very similar to ours and where they compete with us in foreign markets. That commission found there the same conditions as I have pictured as existing in Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland to meet the need of her industry, has taken exactly the step which I am suggesting. If we are to maintain our markets and not be driven out of them entirely by our competitors, we shall have to do as they have done.

One word as to the fresh fish industry. This stands on an entirely different footing; it is carried on by corporations that buy from the primary producers, if you care to call them so, from the individual fishermen, and they also catch some fish with their own boats. These fish they ship fresh or processed. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said that their product was sold entirely in Canada. That is not quite accurate because a considerable quantity goes outside, although the larger percentage is sold within the dominion. The fishermen who sell to those companies get for their product only a pittance at present, hardly enought to sustain life. What is the trouble there? I venture to assert—and this statement is not going to be popular—that it is cut-throat competition among the companies conducting the business. One company cuts the other company's throat. A small man, a smaller dealer than another, unable to get into the market in any other way, ships a carload or more of fish on consignment. The result is a break in the market price which is not passed on to the consumer here or elsewhere but is passed back to the fisherman who gets only a pittance. I am not blaming the companies. So long as they have to exist under cutthroat competition, just so long must they buy as cheaply as they can. But if a board had control, this system could be eliminated and, if so, the fisherman of Nova Scotia might get at least a cent a pound more for his fish without increasing the cost to the consumer, especially if the price spread were investigated from the time the fish leaves the water until it gets into the fryingpan in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal or elsewhere. For these reasons, so far as the fishing industry is concerned, I am thoroughly convinced that this measure will be a real help, if applied. My fear, however, is that thanks to the bogeymen and ghosts that have been conjured up by people like the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, the fishermen will be afraid of the measure and of having any scheme applied to their industry. I interpret the legislation to mean that there will be no board unless the industry or at least unless a representative part of the industry asks for one. In the measure there is, it is true, a compulsory feature, but I interpret it as meaning simply this, that if in the event of two areas, let us say Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, adopting a plan for their fishermen and Prince Edward Island not doing so, it became impossible to carry the plan through to fruition with Prince Edward Island staying out, then it would become the duty of the central board to compel Prince Edward Island to come in and not break the market for the other two provinces. This clause looks to me purely like an emergency one and I repeat my only fear is that the industry will be afraid of it because of statements that have been made in the house and outside respecting the evil aspects of the bill, evil aspects which really do not exist.

I do not intend to take up more time in dealing with the question of fish, nor to transgress upon the time of the house at any great length, but I want to make one or two general observations about the bill itself. It is of course in essence a marketing bill. I apprehend that its principle is the principle of marketing. I freely confess that I do not like some of the details contained in the bill, but I hope it will be amended in committee. I am in favour of control, so far as control is possible, in connection with marketing. I have spoken of fish; I understand perfectly that the scope of the bill will include all natural products. If it can help the fishing industry, however, I feel quite certain that it can help the farmer, whether he be in the east or in the west.

Some of the observations that have been made in connection with the bill astound me. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) spent some two hours in discussing the various features of the bill, but from the start the central theme of his argument was that the bill usurps the rights of parliament, is derogatory to the rights of parliament, infringes upon the rights of parliament and is unconstitutional. I concede that the parliamentary system of government is the best system that has been devised as yet; at the moment I know of no better system, but unlike the right hon. gentleman I cannot look upon our parliamentary system as being something divine. It is man made, and I do not know of anything man has made that cannot be improved upon. The functions and privileges which belong to parliament were not of divine creation; they were given to parliament by man over a period of years, and I do not see why man in his wisdom should not take away some of the functions from parliament if he so desires. There is one function, however, which he must not and cannot take away without destroying the institution itself; that is, parliament must represent the sovereign and supreme will of the people. When parliament wishes to assert that will it must be permitted to assert it in whatever form that assertion may take, but when parliament wishes to delegate some of its power to a central board I cannot see in that delegation any usurpation of parliament's authority. That which is delegated surely cannot be usurped; that which is delegated can be taken back by the body which delegates it, and consequently I see nothing in this bill which infringes on the great and vital principle of parliamentary government.

The right hon. gentleman seems to be doing something which has become characteristic of him. He looks to the past for his guidance, but after having looked to the past, instead of setting his face to the future he keeps looking backward while trying to go ahead. That is true of more than one hon. member opposite. I have listened to many of their speeches in connection with this bill, and many of those to which I did not listen I have read. I could find only one hon gentleman opposite who really objected to a marketing bill on principle, and that was the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). That hon. gentleman, who is an economist and a man of distinction, holds views on economics which are incompatible with control. I respect his views, though I cannot agree with them. I could agree that we might allow everything to move freely, as gravity might dictate, if we could all start over again as babes in the woods, as innocent and as unspoiled. But when we are dealing with a world such as we have to-day I cannot agree with the hon. member's theories.

Many other hon. gentlemen spoke, but I do not recall another who disagreed with the principle of the bill. They criticized it in detail. I am not going to class the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) with the Liberals, but his speech was a mirage of impossibilities. Difficulty after difficulty, nonexistent, was conjured up by the hon. gentleman in a complete misapprehension of the whole situation, and the same process was followed by nearly all who sit to the left of the Speaker, with the exception of the little group sitting almost directly across from me.

In listening to these speeches, Mr. Speaker, one thought struck me. It was not what has happened to the Liberal party but what has happened to Liberalism as interpreted by the Liberal party. I have no quarrel with Liberalism; I can respect any man's honest convictions, but surely it is not Liberalism that is being preached by the Liberal party in Canada to-day. It is the dead shades of past Liberalism, with no future. Another thought has struck me during the past three years, which have been three of the most difficult years in the history of this or any other country; I refer to the utter lack of constructive suggestions to come from hon. gentlemen opposite. They may consider it the function of an opposition to bide their time and reserve their policies until they are in power, but it has occurred to me again and again that in a difficulty such as we are facing to-day they owe more than a party duty to their country. They owe a duty to the country which transcends party, and if they have anything constructive to offer at least they should present it and give the country the benefit of their suggestions.

I promised that I would not presume at any great length upon the time of the house, but one other thing that has astounded me has been the degree of apprehension which the Liberal members of the house have manifested towards those who sit to their left. They seem far more afraid of the so called left group than I am, though I do not say that I am representative of those who sit around me in that respect.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You are younger and more intelligent.

Mr. ERNST: I am not sure of that, though I admit the crime of youth. I should not like to see those who sit to the extreme left in power in this country, because I think they are radicals and their views, at least under present conditions and for many years to come, are incapable of application.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They are followed in this bill.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) made the same statement this afternoon. For the reason I have given I should not like to see them in power in this country but, Mr. Speaker, if we had not had radicals—I am not saying in this house alone, but in the world—I wonder whether civilization would not have almost halted. Many a radical, far out in advance of the practical, has been of inestimable benefit to the people of his country and to the people of the world. I have not the slightest doubt that when Wilberforce began to advocate the abolition of slavery he was classed as a radical by those around him, and I remember reading that even royalty, in the last century, classed the staid and proper Mr. Gladstone as something of a radical. I look upon a radical as one out in front with a lamp, sometimes showing us where we should go but more often showing us where we should not go, though in any event giving good service to the country and to the world.

I have transgressed further upon the time of the house than I had intended, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that those who oppose this bill fail to realize that the world is moving forward. The world is on the march; times and circumstances are changing with great rapidity, and if we are to keep pace with the world we must move forward. If we fail to move forward, just as surely as fate we will be engulfed in the tide of difficulties which follows every forward march. The world has moved forward since the dawn of history; sometimes the path has been tortuous and usually it has been difficult. I see in this measure—perhaps it is done unconsciously, so far as the government is concerned—some degree of planned economy. It is my view that planned economy, or socialism, is going eventually to be accomplished. Personally I prefer planned economy. This measure has been called socialistic by hon. members who sit opposite. It is not, because if they would read it they would find that it does not destroy capital or take away profit, both of which form part of the capitalistic system. At least for the present time I believe in the capitalistic system, but not in that capitalism which was allowed to run riot in the years gone by. I repeat that hon. members who oppose this bill are ignorant of what is going on in the world around us. I do not use the word "ignorant" in an unkind sense, but I do say that they have failed to grasp the realities of the situation and the fact that the world is changing. Personally I feel that when I vote for this bill I am voting for something which will put us on the path to progress.

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. John's-Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I closely followed the speeches delivered by hon. members opposite who are in favour of this bill. The comments of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) who has just sat down have not convinced me of the merit of this bill.

The hon. member stated that his party had the support of the small group at the extreme left. For some time past, the two parties seem to agree, and according to the statement of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) he seemed quite astonished at the attitude of the Liberal party as regards this measure. In another speech, he stated that, in the course of his parliamentary career, he had been designated under various names, but never as Liberal. May I say to the hon. member that the bounds of the Liberal party are too broad to include him because he is too narrow-minded. That is why he is a member of the C.C.F. whose ideas clash with those of the Liberal party.

I think, sir, that this famous bill rather forms part of the Conservative party's campaign literature for the next election. I read this bill twice. If I refer to the debate which took place in the house, yesterday, between the leaders of the Liberal and Conservative parties, I must conclude that opinions differed while the ruling of the Speaker finally leaned on one side; in fact, as in all decisions.

Briefly, I must state that the more this bill is discussed and examined, less we understand it. Nothing definite is mentioned, it is a bill which, when distributed in rural sections, will allow every member to interpret it as he pleases. I also think that this bill is introduced so as to further help the trusts. Farm products are selling less and less since 1930. I am of the opinion that the only way to help the farmers in order that they may receive reasonable prices for their products, would be to find them markets, as the Liberal party did before the Conservative party took office, in 1930; there will then be no need of creating a Dominion Marketing Board.

Let the government be bold enough to break up coalitions and wipe out the trusts, allow free competition on markets where farm products are sold, and I am certain that the farmers will receive profitable prices as they received previous to 1930.

A few years ago an investigation was held in connection with milk. It was stated before the committee that a trust existed in Montreal. The Conservative party had not the courage to interfere. I have here the Monthly Farm Bulletin of the Bureau of Statistics for January, 1934; at page 34, the price of milk is given for 1927 to 1934, at Halifax, Montreal and Toronto. They are the retail prices. At Halifax, milk sold at 27 cents per gallon between 1927 and 1932, and 23 cents between 1932 and 1934; a difference of 4 cents only. Why? Probably no trust existed there as in Montreal. During the autumn and winter of 1929-1930, milk sold between 28 and 32 cents per gallon, in Montreal, and during the winter of 1932, 13 cents. In Toronto, in 1930, between 28 and 30 cents, and in 1932, 15 cents. I think no such difference should exist in the price of milk; if one compares the price of milk, in 1932, in Montreal and Toronto with the price paid in Halifax the difference in the price is double. The dairy companies in Montreal bear various names; however, the owners or shareholders are the same. That is why farmers cannot obtain fair prices for their milk.

I am better acquainted with the marketing of cattle. A section of Bill No. 40 which was enacted a few days ago, compels any one who wishes to ship cattle to apply to the Minister of Agriculture so as to obtain a licence. When this bill was discussed in the agricultural committee—although I have not the privilege of being a member of this committee, I was present at a number of sittings—a conservative, perhaps, the best qualified on this subject, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), protested against this section, because he thought it would restrict competition. The minister will grant licences to whom he pleases. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated in the house recently that when any person has a complaint to make, he should make it to the government and not to his member. I am quite aware that if one's representative is a liberal, it is futile to request fair play. I therefore conclude that in order to obtain a licence from the Department of Agriculture, one must necessarily be a conservative. This does not agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Marquette who advocates free competition in the cattle market in order that farmers may obtain better prices.

At the committee which investigated the spread of prices and mass purchases, the hon. Mr. Parker, Minister of Agriculture, in Saskatchewan, and the hon. Mr. Mackenzie, Minister of Agriculture, in Manitoba, advocated a federal commission to investigate all the phases of the breeding and marketing of cattle, so far as domestic trade and exports are concerned. I have here some of the evidence taken at that committee. On April 19, Mr. Mackenzie of Toronto, a butcher, who is no more connected with any company but was in the employ of Gunn's Limited for 22 years and manager of the beef department of the Canada Packers for 5 years, stated that when in the employ of the Canada Packers he had eight purchasing agents under him. He even told the committee that the purchase price was fixed at a meeting held by these eight purchasing agents, after consulting with the agents of Swift Canadian Company. In giving evidence this gentleman, moreover, stated that the Canada Packers purchased 68 per cent of the goods which were shipped to the Toronto market, and that Swift Canadian purchased 32 per cent. Faced with the evidence of an absolutely independent butcher such as Mr. Mackenzie, will the government not have the courage to put an end to the speculations of these profiteers? It might, perhaps, be stated: These companies purchase their goods at low prices, they are therefore in a position to sell them cheap and the consumer thereby benefits. But such is not the case and I know what I am talking about. Ever since this trust was formed, in 1927-1928, the companies of Gunn's Limited, Davies, Canada Packing and Harris Abattoir, are controlled by the Canada Packers. Previously, four salesmen travelled throughout Quebec in order to dispose of their goods, they came to Saint John as well as other cities. There were therefore four salesmen competing with one another. To-day, there is no more competition, we are at the mercy of one salesman or rather of two if we include one from Swift Canadian Company. As I stated just now, according to the evidence given by Mr. Mackenzie, the latter company purchases about 32 per cent of the goods sold in this country. For the remainder, the farmer, the breeder of hogs, calves and steers must accept the conditions of a company which purchase over 50 per cent of goods that are sold and which controls the market of butter, eggs, pork, hams, and all similar products. These two companies have no favours for small dealers, they are all for the trusts. They deal with the companies known as the Atlantic and Pacific, Dominion Stores, Stop and Shop, etc. These chain stores pay 1 cent or 1¼ cent cheaper than the small dealer, the corner grocery store, and carry on an unfair competition by only selling for cash. Yet the government does not interfere! At present there is a committee of the house holding an inquiry, still the government introduces this bill before receiving the report of this committee.

I state, sir, that the government must necessarily consider this question and go to the root of the evil. The farmer is shamefully fleeced by the dairy and meat trusts. The government held an investigation in connection with coal companies and what was the result?

They did not even have the courage to lay on the table of the house this report, it was hidden away. An inquiry was held on tobacco, and when a member requested that this report be tabled, it was held back for a long time. Does the government lack courage?

When it is a question that might effect the interests of large subscribers to the election funds or friends who stand high in the conservative party the government shows a lack of courage.

In the inquiry on coal it was proved that the people of Quebec were being fleeced. The small dealer is not guilty in this connection, he simply is an agent for a wholesale merchant and the latter fixes the price. There are never two agencies, in the same city, for coal which bears the same trade mark, probably because this might create some competition. As trusts prefer to deal among themselves, it is practically impossible for the small coal dealer to make both ends meet, and the consumer is the one who is fleeced.

I wish to again refer to the statements made before the committee. If hon. members opposite desire, they may read the evidence which was given by Mr. McLean, president of the Toronto Packing Co., at a sitting of the committee, held on March 7, 1934. This witness stated that there was no agreement between companies, yet Mr. Mackenzie asserted that sometimes it was agreed beforehand to pay half a cent or one cent less per pound of meat. Do hon. members opposite realize what half a cent or one cent less per pound means? On a average steers that are sold on the market weigh 1,000 pounds; one cent less per pound makes a difference of $10 per head. This means that a farmer who has eight steers for sale is only paid for what five steers would sell and therefore is giving three away. That is where the evil lies.

The intention is to fix the prices. I have here the Trade Information Bulletin for April 21, 1934. At page 243 under the heading "Trade imports of meat and cattle of the United Kingdom," I find the following paragraph:

> One does not always realize that chilled beef is not considered or dealt with like a product which can be kept in storage. Its condition is at its best after its arrival on the British market. A committee of distributors on the Smithfield market fixes the quantity which should be offered each day for sale, and the placing of these quantities is done as much as possible in proportion to the tonnage which each consignee disposes. What is offered for sale each day is sold and the sales effected as a matter of course at the end of each business day, so as to market the stocks for that day; this is done at times at a much lower level.

How can one fix the prices of meat on the market? If the quantity of meat offered for sale on the market is too large one day what would happen if all sales were suspended or should it be decided that not a steer or calf graded as first quality should be sold less than five cents per pound? When a farmer or a dealer ships a carload of calves to the Montreal or Toronto market and those companies do not require them or will not pay five cents per pound, what becomes of the calves? Will the farmer stuff them in his pockets and bring them back home? Someone might say: Slaughter them and put them in cold storage. Will this remedy the evil? This meat to be kept in storage must first be frozen, and when frozen it will not command the price of fresh meat. To keep it in cold storage? That means a further outlay, as someone must take care of this meat. If it is left in cold storage two, three, four, five or six months, what will be the cost? Will this meat then be put on the market and compete with fresh meat? When an hon. member wishes to purchase a piece of fresh veal, he will not accept frozen meat instead if he happens to know the difference. I see the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Laurin) who nods his head affirmatively. I know that he is a connoisseur, and enjoys a good meal. Even if he were told that fresh veal sells 20 cents per pound, while frozen veal 10 cents per pound, if he wants fresh meat he will pay the higher price.

This veal which has remained in cold storage for five or six months has to be sold. What will be the price? In fact, it would have been more profitable to the farmer to accept four cents at first and return home with the money in his pocket. If he happens to be a dealer, will the bank loan him the money? Probably, but at a rate of seven per cent, payable each month. After six months of cold storage, he will not be able to sell his meat at a price to cover the cost of the storage and the interest he has paid out. If a real remedy is sought, new markets must be found.

I quote another excerpt of the evidence given by Mr. McLean, president of the Canada Packers:

> Canada has an annual surplus of 250,000 head, and every year up to 1929, Canada shipped to the United States or to England—mainly to the United States—250,000 head. The Fordney-McCumber tariff closed—first partly and then totally—the United States market, to our cattle; and the only market we now have is the very limited market of the United Kingdom which is not to be despised, under the present circumstances. Were we able to ship 100,000 head per year to that country beef would sell 3 or 4 cents more.

Mr. McLean is not a Liberal, he is a good Conservative. He is a friend of the financier, Sir Joseph Flavelle. What does he suggest? He suggests to open up new markets. We will then easily dispose of our products. The trusts must be wiped out and competition must be free. As I stated just now, what was done in Toronto where there are four salt meat establishments? They were merged, and to-day, the farmer is fleeced. That is where the evil lies.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) stated the other day that butter this winter sold wholesale at 31 cents. In March it sold at about 31 cents. Was this butter made during that month? No; it was butter that had been in cold storage since the months of June and July. I am aware that cold storage charges must be paid; however, the spread of prices between 16 or 17 cents and 31 is too great. What steps are the government taking to protect the consumer?

I wish to point out that an important factor in the decrease of prices is the reduced purchasing power of the workmen. A number of my clients were in the habit of purchasing seven pounds of butter per week. From 1931 their purchases gradually decreased. To-day they only purchase two or three pounds, and some weeks they have not sufficient money to purchase any. Some families consumed as much as 25 pounds of meat, while to-day with the dole system they are given 10 pounds.

Markets must be found to dispose of our cattle, butter and eggs. There must also be markets to sell our manufactured products so as to permit our manufacturers to open their doors. Last year a manufacturer of Saint John lost a million dollars' worth of business because we had no trade treaty with France. Is France not one of our best wheat clients? The government neglected this client, but amused itself in raising the tariff. The right hon. Prime Minister stated that if we wished to trade with other countries we would have to grant a bonus to industry. I do not think that the government should act differently than business men who do not pay their clients so that the latter must necessarily purchase from them. The business man must seek his client to do business with him; therefore the government should negotiate trade treaties and endeavour to find markets. If such a policy was followed there would be no need of regulating products.

If the government regulates the market they will have to do the same for production. If production is interfered with, the government will come in conflict with the laws of nature. Last year, for instance, the manufacturers of canned goods contracted for peas of 60, 70 and 80 days of growth, and it so happened that the 80-day crop was a complete failure. During the winter of 1932-1933, barns were full of hay. Last June, when the crop failed, price of hay went up. Notwithstanding these facts, the government informs us that the price of farm products is increasing. I would much prefer that the government informed us that prices were going up because of trade treaties with other countries.

I have here the speech of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, for whom I have much esteem; however, I find that his statements do not always agree with facts. Having shipped to Montreal tuberculous cattle on the same day as a neighbour of his, he complained that his neighbour received a better price for his cattle, although he contends that his cattle were of a higher grade. He does not state that his neighbour was cleverer than him; however, that is the conclusion I draw from his remarks. His neighbour telephoned to the inspector located in Montreal so as to inform him that he was shipping cattle and requested him to send someone to the slaughter house in order to see that he received a fair price for his cattle. Someone was sent and his neighbour was paid $25 per head, while he himself, having no one to represent him, received but $24 for five steers. I do not know whether this man was a federal inspector. Something went wrong or the inspector had some influential friends because it sometimes happens that when it is a matter of fleecing a farmer very little scruple is shown; in this case what probably happened was the grades were changed and the money which should have been received by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi was pocketed by his neighbour.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi is quite right when he asserts that farmers cannot ship eggs to the Montreal market without receiving a report that they are of an inferior grade. Country dealers are treated likewise. Why? It is because the grading is done by employees of the dealers who purchase these eggs. If the grading was done by government officials, it would be more impartial and the farmers would receive a fairer treatment. I quite believe the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi when he states that one can have a case of the best graded eggs sent from Montreal, then, after the eggs have been changed, the case is shipped back to some dealer, a report is then sent that 50 per cent of the eggs are of an inferior grade.

Since the hon. member for Brome Missisquoi has exposed these facts to the house, why does the government not take the necessary steps to remedy the situation? Why does the hon. Minister of Agriculture not appoint inspectors instead of giving positions to political friends who have been hanging around the lobby of the house ever since the beginning of the session? There are well qualified persons who would be very pleased to fill such positions, even at the minimum salary which the government offers. At least, they would protect the farmers and it would be fairer to them.

How do you expect the consumer to purchase, for instance, butter when this year he has to pay for two pounds of butter what he paid last year for four pounds? The government cannot regulate the marketing of farm products and increase the price when the consumer is starving! The farmer also is a consumer. How many farmers, in this country or even in Quebec, live entirely on what they produce on their farms? I do not know any. All admit that the purchasing power of the western farmer has decreased. I know some farmers who, in the past, purchased goods for an amount equal to the sale of their entire products. How do you expect the farmers to earn a livelihood when they sell their milk at 13 cents per gallon. Some farmers in my district received, in the past, as much as $225 per month for their milk while, to-day, they only receive $110. Therefore, has not their purchasing power decreased?

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Will the hon. member be so kind as to inform the house whether he is arguing in favour or against the bill?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Against it. There is nothing in the bill which might help the farmers. From the very outset of my speech, I think, I made this clear. If the trusts in connection with the marketing of milk, butter and eggs are abolished, prosperity will return to our rural districts. Open up markets. The house has heard the statement of Mr. McLean to the effect that there is only one way to enhance the price of beef from $3 to $4 per cwt; it is to open up markets. When we had markets under the Liberal regime, did the farmers complain? Were not the workmen employed? It is futile to endeavour to cure a patient if the ill is unknown. And the farming class suffers from the greatest ill. The moment the farmer loses his purchasing power, the manufacturer cannot dispose of his goods and the workmen cannot work. There is but one solution, open up markets. Give our manufacturers the advantage of exporting their goods so as to give work to our people. Workmen are not inclined to be stingy, when they have money they spend freely. During the war they paid potatoes $7 a bag and as much as 80 cents a pound for butter. In those days they were earning and could afford to pay such prices. To-day they can purchase potatoes at 40 cents a bag but they have not 5 cents in their pocket.

Before submitting a bill like the one under consideration, which means nothing and is simply an empty piece of legislation, let the government carry out the scheme suggested by the Ministers of Agriculture of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) no doubt is personally acquainted with the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan who has offered to cooperate with him and moreover, is not a Liberal. If the government will not accept the cooperation of members on this side, let them accept that of the hon. Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan. No doubt he is a good Tory.

My suggestions sir, are these: let the government abolish the trusts, let them do as in the United States get down to work. I am not against the capital system. No, however, I am opposed to organizations which fleece the people, the producer and the consumer.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, very early in this debate it became apparent that His Majesty's opposition was a party of divided counsel; that it did not speak with one voice because apparently it possessed little or no unanimity. In fact, four distinct positions have been disclosed during the course of the debate. First, there is the position of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King); second, there is the position of the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance); third, there is the position of the hon. members for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and Ontario (Mr. Moore), and, finally, there is the position adopted by the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), which is entirely different from the other three.

The position of the leader of the opposition was stated very clearly at the commencement of his speech. He does not object to the principle of the bill as we understand its principle, but he does object to certain features which spring from that principle. I mention this because at the commencement of his speech the hon. member for Ontario stated that he had not observed that his leader had approved the principle of the bill. What is the principle of the bill? It is simply the regulation and control of the movement and marketing of goods to the export markets. The hon. member for Ontario made it very clear that that is what he conceived it to be because in explaining why he would not follow the argument of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull), he stated that he would not do so because he wished to confine himself entirely to the principle of the bill. From then on I think I can say truthfully that his speech was confined exclusively to the merits or demerits of control or interference with the individual freedom of the producer and with marketing. On the principle as so stated the leader of the opposition not only declared his own personal attitude but spoke, whether with authority or not, I cannot say, for his whole party. He said: "Liberals stand for regulation and control," and later on: "It is generally agreed that regulation is necessary." Once you have established that principle, the other questions of the amount of control and authority to regulate which shall be given, the particular body in which that regulating power shall be vested, and the means, method and manner in which that regulating control shall be exercised, if properly speaking principles in the strict sense and not merely details, are at the best very subordinate principles which might very well be left to the committee stage.

The leader of the opposition placed great emphasis upon his objection to the bill because of its being an attack on the constitution. I think I am safe in saying that there has not been a major measure introduced in this house by this government, from the time it came into office in 1930 until the present time, to which that objection has not been raised by the leader of the opposition. So often and so regularly has it been made that I think hon. members, not only on this side but many of those opposite and the country at large, have come to the opinion that a constitution which has been so overworked should be given a rest—put out on grass for a while. The charge, however, has been answered very effectively by the hon. member for Regina. That hon. gentleman has smitten the right hon leader of the opposition between the joints of his harness and, to add insult to injury has done it with a shaft taken out of the opposition leader's own quiver. I am aware of the fact that the Canadian Wheat Marketing Act of 1922 is no longer in force; I am aware also of the fact that the argument of the hon. member for Regina is not an absolute answer, being a tu quoque one. And we on this side of the house would be the last people in the world to think that because the leader of the opposition had adopted certain principles and had embodied them in a bill, therefore they were sound ones and we should be right in following his example in our legislation. While that is all true, there is a measure of poetic justice in a man being levelled by a shaft which his own fingers have feathered. And the right hon. gentleman's harness is uncomfortably full of joints and his quiver inconveniently full of just that particular kind of shaft.

The second argument which the leader of the opposition levelled as an objection to the bill was that it restricted marketing and made for monopolies. I am going to ask the house in its sheer, cold sanity to answer this question: Which course is more calculated to restrict marketing and to make for monopolies, the course in which every producer and exporter is allowed to produce and export whatever he chooses regardless of quality, of grade, of condition, of volume or of time, insisting upon his own individual right to do what he likes with his own product, whenever he likes, in any measure he likes and in any way he likes? Or the course of regulating the flow of those products on to the market and of securing that their quality, their grade, their condition, the time of their delivery on the market, shall all be so chosen and so determined that their effect on the market shall be most beneficial to the traders and producers themselves? Only one answer can be made to that question, an answer which does not require any hesitation or doubt. The question itself carries its answer on its face. If you want to destroy, not to say restrict marketing, you will do it with a vengeance and with velocity, if you follow the first course, and the velocity will be an increasing one until it stops altogether by reason of the process of exhaustion because there is no more trade to restrict; it will all have gone. As to monopolies, is the policy of the bill calculated to produce monopolies? I am not a business man and therefore I speak with bated breath and whispering humbleness in the presence of men who have forgotten more business knowledge than I ever had or ever shall have, but it appears to me that the conditions that make for monopolies are not so much the conditions of prosperous trade, when the individual, robust, lusty and ambitious trader is able to make a profit and to remain in business and continue competition—not that condition of things, but such a condition of trade that the profits of trade dwindle and almost disappear, when individual traders are wiped out because of that, and men who remain in business are forced to combine in order if possible to preserve a little bit of the business that is still left. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that what will foster trade and promote its prosperity is not an influence that will make for monopoly; and in so far as it may do so, such monopolies can then be more easily dealt with and curtailed or restrained.

The right hon. gentleman advanced another argument which deserves some notice. He objects to the bill because it involves the extension of state functions, and he contends that the extension of governmental functions is absolutely impossible without bureaucracy. A moment ago I asked the house to consider and answer one question. I would ask the leader of the opposition to consider and answer another one which I now propose, and which, since he is not in the chamber, he may read, if he so desires, in Hansard. Was his own government, holding power from 1921 to 1930, a bureaucratic government? If he were here I should be able, I imagine, almost to feel even at this distance, the heat of indignation engendered by the question. To accuse the Liberal government, of which he was head from 1921 to 1930, of bureaucratic proclivities or practices, or of manifesting any symptom or sign of bureaucracy, is as near blasphemy as anything can be in political controversy. His government, the pure flower of unadulterated democracy, bureaucratic!

Yet let me remind the house that the whole history of the development of government has been nothing more than the extension of the powers of the government and of the state. When you go back to the early history of British government and the evolution of British governmental institutions, back almost into the mists of early history, you discover that the functions of government were very simple, very few, rudimentary and crude. To keep the king's peace between the lieges of the realm; to defend the realm and the lieges of the realm from attack from foreigners; to raise levies and dues that were proper to the king for himself personally and as representing the state, for the maintenance of his dignity and for the well-being of the state; and to dispense civil justice as between liege and liege—these, in brief, were the simple and few functions of government at its beginning. And the whole process of history has been to add to them century by century.

Did anyone raise the cry of bureaucracy in the House of Commons of Canada until 1934? I had not heard so. The right hon. gentleman stepped into a government that had grown by this process, yet he never seemed to experience the slightest difficulty or inconvenience about exercising its functions because it was bureaucratic. Does he think he can stop this movement to-day? He cannot stop it. It must go on; government must take to itself greater powers and rights for the well-being of the people as a whole. In his horror of bureaucracy the right hon. gentleman went out of his way, no doubt through sheer kindness, to give a warning to the leader, or one of the leaders of the group in the corner. He told the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that this bill was not conceived or framed or brought into the house for the ostensible purposes for which it appears to have been brought in. No; it was brought in as a web to catch the unwary feet of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. What a hope! I am not going to follow the right hon. gentleman in his argument, for the realm of cobwebs is one in which he is far more at home than am I. His whole speech was filled with them, fine-spun theories which he wished us to take for facts, and gossamers which he wished us to accept and build upon as substance. Well, spinning and weaving are very admirable and interesting occupations. They kept one lady very much out of trouble for twelve years while her husband was gadding about in foreign parts. To prolong her task she found indeed that she had to unweave what she had woven. I think sometimes that the right hon. gentleman himself often follows her example and unweaves much of what he had previously so vigorously woven. But while it may be interesting as a pastime, I suggest that if he wants this house and the people of this country and even some of the members of his own party to hang the whole weight of the trade of Canada on the fine filaments he has spun in his brain here in this chamber, not this party nor the country nor I think many of his followers will be willing to take that risk.

Let me turn to another objection which he has advanced. It is the objection that a certain local group in this country can devise a scheme and force it as law upon society when it has been approved by the minister. Well, there are just a few small mistakes in that statement; they are very trifling and not of much moment. It is not a scheme that is enforced on anyone. It is a law. It is not enforced on society, as I understand it, but on a group of producers. Nor is it enforced when the minister approves it; it is not enforced and does not become law until the governor in council approves it. If I do not shock the modest susceptibilities of hon. members may I illustrate it in this way: It is conceived as a scheme by the local body; but it may be stillborn. If the obstetrical science and skill of the dominion board brings it to a healthy birth, it still is only a scheme and not a law. Not until the governor in council cuts the umbilical cord does it become a separate entity with a really separate, independent existence, and then it, as Shakespeare's "Pity" in Macbeth, "like a naked new-born babe, comes striding the blast." Then it becomes law. And when it becomes law, it becomes so not because it is a scheme of a local board, nor because it is a scheme that has been approved by the Minister of Agriculture, nor yet because it is a scheme that has been blessed and sent forth by the governor in council; it becomes law by virtue of a statute of this house, passed by the other place and assented to by the crown.

Before I leave that, may I say this further word: the right hon. gentleman objects very strongly to the idea of compulsion, compulsion that is by any authority other than parliament, which, of course, can exercise all the compulsion it wishes. All I can say is that one member and he, by no means the least stalwart or vocal of his followers, who represents the riding of South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), is at issue with him there. The hon. member for South Battleford said very frankly: Why, that is the reason the wheat pool failed; it failed because it had not compulsion; we want compulsion and we want it, not by parliament but by the producers. Oh, oh! Who speaks now about the danger of monopolies? In the bill the compulsion is not by the producers but by parliament in a certain way after certain safeguards have been observed. But let me come back to the hon. member for South Battleford. He is, I am afraid, the Achan in his leader's camp. He has cast lustful eyes on that accursed thing, compulsion, which he wants for himself and his fellow producers. And he is brave, bold; he knows his opinions and does not fear to voice them. When he sees his right hon. leader coming through the camp searching for the accursed thing, compulsion, to find where it is hidden and housed, he comes boldly out of his tent door and asks: "What are you looking for?" "I am looking for the accursed thing, compulsion." "Well," he answers, "I have it right in here; what are you going to do about it? Are you going to take it away from me? I found it, or at least, if I did not find it, I got it. It is my wedge of gold and Babylonish garment, and I can't see why you should take it from me." What will the right hon. gentleman do? He cannot very well ask the ground to open up and swallow the hon. member and the accursed thing, because the ground might open up too widely and might swallow him as well as his recalcitrant follower, and the wedge of gold and Babylonish garment.

[Mr. Bury.]

We will leave my right hon. friend himself to extricate himself from that dilemma; because I wish to deal with another objection raised by him. It is this, that the definition of "natural products" includes boots and furniture. I could hardly believe my ears when I heard that. I turned up the clause in question to read the wording of the definition. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) dealt with the matter in part, but he dealt with it only on the assumption that it came within the second limb of the definition which has to do with food and drink. Nobody for a minute ever supposed boots or furniture could very well come under the category of food or drink. Then it must come, if it comes anywhere, under the first limb of the definition, and how does that read? It reads thus:

> "Natural product" means any product of agriculture or of the forest, sea, lake or river.

And there we stop. How can we get boots and furniture into that definition? Well, I give the right hon. gentleman a present of the furniture, but I should like to say something about the boots. As I was thinking over the matter a ray of light—perhaps that is an understatement—a flood of light swept into my darkened understanding and I wondered how it was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) had overlooked such a palpable fact; for though this may not be so in his part of the west, there is in my part a little plant which grows in the woods and on the prairies and which they call lady's slipper. And after all, it is no strain of English or of concepts to pass by a quite simple, rapid and short transition from lady's slippers to ladies' shoes and from ladies' shoes to ladies' boots and from ladies' boots to men's shoes and from men's shoes to men's boots, and there you are.

Mr. McINTOSH: And Dutchmen's breeches.

Mr. BURY: If a responsible leader of a responsible party thinks it well to argue along such lines, I hesitate to say what effect his other arguments will have upon the ordinary men of the street or upon the ordinary members who sit on the back benches of this side of the house. For me it certainly discounts much of his other reasoning.

May I turn for a minute, in the time that is left to me, to the speeches of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). When I listened to the hon. member for Weyburn I could not help thinking of two works of English literature. There was an Englishman who lived at the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century named Edward Young, I have no doubt an ancestor of my hon. friend. He is known to posterity and literature as the author of a very voluminous work, I think in nine volumes; I never had the courage to read them because I have nightmares enough naturally without adding to them artificially. His work is entitled Night Thoughts. The second work that was brought to my recollection in hearing the hon. gentleman's speech was a very exquisite little lyric of two verses written by an Englishman who died in 1921 and who therefore was a man of just yesterday, F. W. Bourdillon, whose lines are known to nearly everyone in the house:

> The night has a thousand eyes,
> The day but one.

The second verse commences:

> The mind has a thousand eyes,
> The heart but one.

And the moral of the verses is that the thousand eys are no good and the only eye that is good to give light either in physical or in moral or mental matters is in the one case the one eye of the day, and in the other the single eye of the heart. It seemed to me, as the hon. gentleman was speaking, that in order to damn a bill with whose principle he absolutely disagreed, instead of addressing himself to the principle, he went back to his ancestor and to Bourdillon and borrowed the thousand eyes of his ancestor's night to scrutinize meticulously and microscopically every clause and subclause, every phrase and word which might by any conceivable method of misrepresentation or twisting be made liable to abuse. Then he heaped all those words and phrases, clauses and subclauses, with their gigantic and innumerable possibilities of abuse on the floor in the centre of the chamber and asked: How can you gentlemen pass a bill that is liable to such enormous and multitudinous abuses? May I just remind the hon. gentleman through Hansard, because he is not present, that there has never been an act put on the statute books of this country, passed by this house and by the upper house, that has not been almost in every clause capable of abuse. If you are not to pass any bills because they are capable of abuse, you will never pass any bill in the House of Commons of Canada.

Now I should like to say a word or two with regard to the very moving and weighty speech of the hon. member for Ontario. The hon. gentleman is an avowed apostle of laissez-faire; you might sum up all that he had to say by way of argument on this bill in two words: "Hands off." Don't interfere with the principle of free production and free marketing by the individual. The work of production and of marketing are the twin arks of the cult of industry and trade, and the impious hands of no government, nor of any board created by a government, must be allowed to be stretched out to touch them for the purpose of steadying them, however much the carts on which they go may threaten to overturn. But a hundred pairs of other hands, thrust forward from every direction over the whole of this dominion, animated by any and every motive that may be conceived and, working for any different end, may push and jostle, shake and rock those arks to imminent disaster, and yet nothing will happen. Why? Because nature, as she has laws in the physical world, has laws in the economic world also, and nature will so operate through her economic laws, under and through, over and upon these two hundred hands working from different directions and for different ends, as to resolve all their conflicting forces into one resultant which will establish steadiness and progress.

That is a wonderful picture, Mr. Speaker, but is it anything else? Have we not known in the history of Canadian trade and of the trade of other countries that this theory will not work? Have not other countries awakened to that fact and determined to put into operation the principle which is embodied in this bill? Are we not to-day facing the competition of those other countries? What will be the fate of our trade unless we are prepared to adopt the part of wisdom and regulate our exports?

Let me take another line. I am not now concerned with the producers; I am conconcerned only with the great mass of humanity in Canada whose welfare depends upon the trade of this country. Burke has a wonderful phrase, true in part and false in the remainder. He speaks about a great body of people "who have been doomed by providence to live upon trust." I deny the "doom" as I deny the "providence;" but I admit the "trust." I cannot think of a more tragic condition than that great numbers of the people of this country, for the last four years and more, have been compelled to live so terribly upon trust. Most of us here do not have to live upon trust; we have something more substantial at our backs. There is no need for trust in our case, and therefore we do not know what it means for a man to come home day by day, week by week and not know whether or not he will have a job next week or next month. People who, by hard work and thrift, saved a little money, bought their own homes and put by a little money in the bank for a rainy day have been forced out of employment in the last four years and have seen their little reserves dwindle away as a man sees the blood flow from his body through a wound, sees himself get whiter and whiter and wonders whether any person will come to staunch the flow before the blood is all gone. Many of these people came long ago to the day when they had to go home and say, "I am out of a job." They still had their little home and a little money in the bank, but how long does that last? Taxes mount up; the little money in the bank goes and finally they lose their home. Then they have to live, not upon trust because they have nothing to trust, but upon relief. I can imagine what this must mean to a man and woman who have never gone through that experience before; who, almost to the days of their old age, have been self-sufficient, self-supporting and self-respecting, and who have never asked for help from anyone. Now, because of economic conditions, they are in danger of losing their self respect, their sense of self confidence and their morale. It is nothing to laugh about. So I say that if this bill will do one ounce of good in the improvement of the trade of this country I will support it with my whole heart.

That is what we need; we must have improvement in our trade. We cannot play fast and loose with the trade of Canada, and if that trade is suffering by reason of uncontrolled marketing in foreign markets and in Great Britain, the only great market we have to-day, then I say it is the duty of this house and of this country to support any measure that will bring back trade and that will enable us, in competition with the regulated trade of other countries, to secure that which we have been given a chance of securing and keeping through those great imperial agreements which were obtained by this government two years ago.

I am afraid I have trespassed unduly on the time of the house, but I should like to add one remark. The right hon. leader of the opposition speaks of this bill as a breach of constitutional right and custom, and others characterize it as a radical, revolutionary measure. I say it is not a radical, revolutionary measure; it was as inevitable as the rising of the sun. It is the correlative of the demand on the part of the producers for the assistance of the government. The moment any body of producers comes to a government and says, "We are a key industry of this country, and the well-being of the country depends upon our being able to carry on our business successfully," whether they be wheat producers, coal producers or any other body of producers, at that moment is created the right of the government and of the people of the country, the taxpayers whose money must be used for this purpose, to say, "We have the right to know that your business is being carried on efficiently and economically, and that our money will not be thrown down a sink hole." That is an absolute correlative right enuring to any government as the result of any form of assistance, whether it be by means of subsidies, lower freight rates made possible only by government payments or anything else; it is the right of the taxpayer who supplies the money to see that the business of the producers and exporters is carried on as effectively and economically as possible.

I can imagine the individual producer meeting the first representative of the board with the question, "Who are you?" The answer, of course, would be, "Well, I represent the marketing board," to which the producer replies, "What do you want?" The inspector answers, "I want to see what you are exporting; I want to see your product. You must have it graded, because we are trying to prevent low grade products, or products of inferior quality or in inferior condition from going to the markets of Great Britain."

Mr. VALLANCE: The producer would put the dog on the inspector.

Mr. BURY: His answer to that—if the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) can contain himself—is this: "These are my products; you did not raise them. I raised them on my farm, by my work, and I paid for the labour with my money. They are my products. And that market across the Atlantic ocean, in Great Britain, is my market." That is what he says. Is he right? I say emphatically he is not right. It is not his market; it is the market of the Canadian people. It is the market which every other producer may use equally with him, and he has no business, no legal right, no moral right by wrong and careless marketing of his products to injure that market for all other producers.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the preamble of this bill No. 51, under consideration reads as follows:

An act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

I see in this bill a total upheaval of trade in Canada. Up to the present, our Canadian trade was highly organized. We have in London, a High Commissioner, in other countries, like France, Japan and the United States, legations; in every country trade commissioners; provinces have even their own trade agents in all European countries. The provinces of our Confederation have burdened their budget in order to send to these countries of Europe and even Asia, representatives, experts in trade, who keep in close touch with the provinces in order to market most advantageously the products of this country. The department of Agriculture was in the best of shape when he left office in 1930. Heads of industries also did their utmost to carry on trade relations so as to sell their products on the markets of the Empire and Europe. To-day, in considering this bill, I find that the situation in Canada seems desperate; the government desires to upset and reorganize everything, it is intended to set aside provincial cooperative societies and other associations of farmers organized not only to improve farming methods but also to instruct farmers in the best methods to sell their products on the Canadian markets. All this is to be set aside and trade conditions in Canada are to be regulated.

First, the principle of the bill is wrong, it is wrong because it interferes with the practices and the privileges of the province of our Confederation. It is wrong because it invades the prerogatives of provincial governments which have organized their own methods of farming in connection with dairy products, cattle breeding and all things connected with agriculture and the dairy industry. Moreover, this bill sets up federal interference in private organizations. I contend that the government has no right to act thus, that this bill is ultra vires, nor has it the right—as the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Bury) has just stated—to tell the farmers: Your products do not belong to you, they are the property of every body. Since the effort was a personal one, the farmers should have the right to trade as they please. In these times of modernism, when everywhere are to be found innovators whose ideas have absolutely nothing practical and who advocate principles which cannot be put into practice, the government delights in innovating everything with this bill which, if it were a declaration in a judicial case, it would be subject to as many motions for particulars as there are paragraphs.

I should not like to leave to my children a will thus drawn, because not one of the executors of any court of justice could understand it sufficiently to honestly apply the provisions affecting the various heirs.

Let us examine this bill. What is sought by it? What is the object? What is the Deus ex machina? I should like to meet the person who invented this scheme, the person who taught such principles to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and sought to create such privileges. Perchance are the tariff barriers of our country so high as to prevent our products being exported to the countries of Europe where they could be sold at a profit? Are the agreements of the Imperial Conference, held in Ottawa, not giving the results expected, is the sale of our Canadian products so small that our warehouses, to-day, are too full, and are we producing too much, because consumers have seen their purchasing power decrease?

Does the government wish, by means of this bill, to increase the price of our commodities or natural products? Then it would be a boom for the farmer. However, one must consider those who will purchase these products regulated by the Marketing Board and increase their purchasing power. This purchasing power is too restricted in this country, at present. We have not enough consumers, yet the government wishes to regulate exports and imports. I state that we will have to face a chaos in trade. Never will this be a success in this country, even if it be given a fair trial. This bill is simply a substitution to present to the farmers a sham Messiah just as the government presented to the unemployed in 1930. Some members were lucky enough to slide to Ottawa on butter. Today, the farmers are offered, with the idea of buttering them in the next election campaign, a new scheme which will disappear with the last ballot-box.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): The hon. member forgets to state that his party slid down the valley of humiliation.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): We are not in the valley of humiliation, we are on the war path.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): We shall carry the war to Temiscouata.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Duguay) is very snappish. He states that we slid down the valley of humiliation.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Your leader is aware of it.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): My leader made a statement which the hon. member did not understand. He did not contend that it was a valley of humiliation when the question of the Beauharnois inquiry came up, but that it was a short stay in a valley where the sides were steep, however, we have climbed them. May I suggest to the hon member for Lake St. John, notwithstanding all the esteem I have for him, that he should have a good look at the ceiling of this house, because, after the next election, he will never see it again.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): I will expect you to help me in my county.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): He is not at your mercy.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Be quiet, there.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): It is seldom that you keep quiet yourself.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): If we examine this bill, we find that it is divided into four parts. The first, is the minister—one that is not designated, a shadow minister. This bill seems one of the harbinger signs of the result of the inquiry on the spread of prices. Ploughing is done in a very abnormal way in the House of Commons. We are at the plough while awaiting the horses which are held up in committee. This time, so as to be practical and conform to their scheme of upsetting everything, our opponents have put the cart before the horses.

Will this shadow minister be the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce? We do not know for he is not designated. Secondly, the Dominion Marketing Board; thirdly, the local board under the supervision of the dominion board; fourthly, the provincial marketing board. If these four working parts were put in a watch, I would feel sorry for the hands. It would never stop, the watch would never need winding.

Section 3 of the bill reads as follows:

> The governor in council may establish a board to be known as the Dominion Marketing Board to regulate the marketing of natural products as hereinafter provided.

But where are all our trade treaties? It strikes me that this is the home market, the local market of which we heard so much when we sat on your right, sir. However, this home market seems to have disappeared. The government intends to take possession of markets, create numerous channels, organize a commercial system, like a cartwheel, the nave of which will be the governor in council. No mention is made of the number of persons who will form part of this board; we do not know whence these people, these experts will come.

For some time past we have seen many experts in Canada, especially since 1930. For our banking affairs, the government sought an expert overseas in England. For our national ports inquiry the government also went overseas. There were no competent civil engineers in Canada. Where are we drifting to? There was another expert from overseas in connection with the last investigation. Briefly, there are no experts in Canada! Yet, there are men who have attained fame, highly gifted men, in this country, who could have been chairmen of these various commissions. Shall we again cross overseas to find a man having had experience with a marketing board so as to preside over the destinies of this Dominion Marketing Board? Paragraph 5 of section 3 reads as follows:

> The board may, with the approval of the governor in council, employ such technical, professional and other officers and employees as the board may deem necessary or desirable, and such persons shall receive such salaries or remuneration as may be fixed by the board with the approval of the governor in council.

If we possess such men in this country, where are they? In the various departments? Why not allow Canada's commercial organization to remain as it is. Since confederation we have been putting into practice new and improved methods. Why destroy everything in 1934? Why renovate everything? I see no reason to set aside a long experience in trade, agriculture and mines so as to carry out innovations wtih this marketing bill which no one can understand; it is not clear and absolutely impractical.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Salaries will be fixed by order in council. What will become of the authority of parliament? What will become of parliament itself? This board will build, purchase and sell. If buildings are constructed and it is desired to get rid of them, they may be sold. And this without being authorized to do so, when according to the statutes and the regulations of the various departments, no work can be carried out costing over $5,000, without asking for tenders, and no rural post-office can be constructed costing $500 or $1,000, without having the item placed in the estimates and voted. I think it is shameful. To my mind, this provision of this bill detracts from the principles of good faith and sincerity established by our parliamentary usages heretofore. I contend that to act in such a way is to set aside parliament and its authority. This marketing board should not be controlled by a minister who can do any thing he pleases by virtue of this bill, even change a man into a woman. Under the circumstances, at least, parliament should be the legislative body to supervise the operations of this Board and thus protect the producer, consumer, exporter and importer. Section 4 is a whole chapter by itself, it could serve as an epitaph for this government after it has passed away. It is as follows:

The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power (a) to regulate . . .

Listen to this,—it is amazing!

. . . to regulate the time and place of marketing . . .

The time and place of marketing certain natural products, this will be very fine with the various climatic changes existing in different parts of this country! The crop of Quebec strawberries will be very late.

to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality;

Absolutely, dictatorial powers! Together with the marketing board the minister will decide what products should be marketed, when, where, how and at what period. Does the government want all the producers of Canada to quarrel among themselves? Does it think it can regulate the marketing of farm products in such a way? What a hue and cry will rise on all sides! The enforcement will be a risky one and, under the circumstances, the farming class to which the government wants to show some favour, will never be satisfied. The government will be unable to help them with the enforcement of such an act.

Let us examine the privileges conferred on this board:

(b) to exempt from any determination or order any person . . .

The big man who slips out by the small gate!

from any determination or order any person or class of persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product or any class, variety or grade of such product;

That is quite a privilege! In the first paragraph it is explicit, all will be regulated; in the second paragraph, there is one exception, some will benefit by such a privilege. Who will they be? I should like to have a reply from some of my government friends of Quebec who support the government, they must have closely studied this bill. I should like to see them rise in the house so as to explain to us who are the people that will be compelled to go to the market with their natural products, at what period, place, date and with what kind of products and who are the persons that will be exempt. I wonder:

(c) to compensate any person for loss sustained by exporting, storing or withholding from the market any product pursuant to any determination or order of the board;

Is the government prepared for an avalanche of claims and complaints? And inquiries galore! It will be worse than a coach-establishment so numerous will be the complaints! All will complain because all will have grievances. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickle) will not sell his heifers dear, I can assure him, and he will no more complain as he did the other day in the house.

(d) to compensate any person in respect of any shipment made pursuant to any determination or order of the board to a country whose currency is depreciated, in relation to Canadian currency, for loss due to such depreciation;

What will be the cost to the government? Will this deflate our currency? I think it is deflated at present. If we are going to trade with European countries whose currency has depreciated, ours will also depreciate, this country will be the loser, and so will be the exporters.

(e) to assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product;

But we have wheat elevators at Fort William, Churchill, Vancouver, Montreal, Prescott, and even at Sorel; we also have cold storage plants in Montreal and here and there throughout the country. Shall we build more of them when we have enough to store our products that are to be exported but await a more favourable market?

Were I requested to sign a convention or a deed of sale containing so many obscure terms, I would not sign it and would also advise my client not to do so.

Now, how will this bill function? Section 5: "Marketing scheme." It is always a question of schemes; we hear nothing of realization; the government ploughs the desert and expects prosperity which is always around the corner. We see its shadow but it never appears and I think it will only come after the next Dominion elections.

5. (1) A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of such natural product by a local board under the supervision of the board.

Who will be these representative persons? I think I shall have to put the question to the "Key of Dreams," to a prophet or fortune teller. Who will be these representative persons who will request the minister to order that the price of a natural product be reduced on the local market and be regulated by a local board? Further on we find that previous to approving a scheme, the governor in council must be convinced. All depends on the governor in council; the people have not a word to say in the matter. The importer will only import what he is told to import; he will bring into the country only the goods that the government wish to be imported, moreover, he will have to obtain a licence, because should he import without this licence he will be prosecuted and liable to a fine of from $25 to $500, or else go to jail. In these times of post-war freedom, when all countries seek the means to rebuild; renovate, to cultivate good friendship, it is not very encouraging for the farmer, the producer and importer to be drawn into this regulated scheme. No mention is made of the consumer in this bill. Industries also are left out. Nothing is mentioned which might bring back progress and prosperity to this country.

The consumer seeks work and not the dole. The small property owner is at bay and those who have set aside a few dollars, honestly earned by the sweat of their brows, will see their money disappear. Second mortgage loans have no value to-day, and will be a total loss at the very first sheriff sale or given in payment to the first mortgagee.

However the governor in council must weigh everything before giving his decision, and all will depend upon the representative persons who will come before him so that he may decide what products will be put on the local market.

[Mr. P. Mercier.]

As to the provinces, the government relies on section 10. Note the stupidity of it:

10. Whenever a scheme relates to an area of production which is confined within the limits of one province, the governor in council may authorize any marketing board or agency under the law of the said province to be, and to exercise the functions of, a local board with reference to the said scheme, and such provincial board or agency may be authorized to collect charges for services rendered in respect of all or any of the products subject to its regulation by reason of the aforesaid scheme.

Is there in Canada, one province in which a natural product is exclusively grown? Wheat is grown in the prairie provinces, but there are three provinces and, in Quebec wheat is grown for the requirement of the farm and that of the baker. Wheat is grown on a large scale in the west. The world's former granary has now become Canada's too full granary. There exists no product exclusively grown in the limits of one province and one can foresee that this section will never be applied.

If this bill in its enforcement has no practical purpose, I wonder why it was introduced in the House. No government will ever succeed to put it into force.

I still have faith in our Dominion and provincial Ministers of Agriculture, in our Trade Commissioners stationed in almost all European countries, who endeavoured by all possible means to extend our trade and advertise our products abroad. Our world trade crisis would not be so serious if our tariffs had not been so high ever since 1930. We are behind a wall, as I stated at the outset of my remarks. We shall be involved in a general upheaval, and the proof of this is the fact that we shall be obliged to indemnify exporters for losses sustained because the products they had to market were not the best quality. This means that part of these claims will come under direct assistance so far as farm products are concerned and which are only good enough for rural local markets and cannot be graded high enough to be sold on our first class markets or exported. This will entail direct assistance so as to reimburse people who sustain losses because the products of their farm, forests, mines or fisheries are not allowed on the market. How will you satisfy the people in this debauchery of general remuneration?

I shall now, sir, close my remarks. I have frankly expressed my views. I have no faith in the efficiency of this bill. It clashes with our past agricultural history. It is not a remedy for the ills of our farming class. It cannot increase the prices; even if it did, the farmer would have to pay dearer for industrial products which he would have to purchase, while the consumers in the cities will be unable to purchase sufficient to subsist since his purchasing power is not increased. Our currency which we so highly prized hitherto will be deflated like the currency of foreign countries with which we trade.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate because it was impossible to anticipate that such a measure as this, which will bring to the farmers of Canada such substantial advantages, would be so strenuously opposed by the opposition. I recall that the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), who has had a large experience in agriculture, stated in this house last year on two occasions that he was in favour of a marketing bill. Societies and associations of farmers and business men all over Canada have for many months, indeed years, been clamouring for just such a practical and beneficial measure as we have now before us, and now the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his Quebec supporters are unearthing constitutional reasons for opposing it.

When I read the other day in Mr. Taschereau's organ, the Montreal Gazette, the interview in which he made such a violent attack on the federal government, I thought it was my duty to state my reasons for voting for this bill. I do not desire to be accused of misquoting him; therefore I shall give his statement as reported in the press:

"I do not know of a worse blow to Canadian unity and to the spirit that presided over confederation," declared Mr. Taschereau here last night in alluding to the federal government's marketing bill. . . .

"I note with much apprehension for the peace and well being of confederation, legislation now being discussed at Ottawa. I do not want it said I am entering upon the federal domain; it is primarily the most vital interests of the provinces that are not only in jeopardy but in danger.

"First, the marketing bill. Ottawa wants to take control all at once of our forests, our mines, our fisheries, and our natural products. It will be easy enough to say 'no,' to this, but one sees the attempt being made and the spirit animating the dominion government."

Further on he says:

"I do not know of a worse blow to Canadian unity and to the spirit that presided over confederation. The danger is at our doors."

That is the amazing statement that Mr. Taschereau is reported to have proffered. Such sweeping allegations are too amazing to carry conviction to the minds of the people of Quebec. Mr. Taschereau has condemned himself by his own actions. When Bill No. 51 which we are now discussing was first introduced into this house, many provincial governments sent to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) telegrams of approval and a great number of provincial legislatures then in session immediately passed unanimously the necessary enabling legislation in order that those provinces might cooperate with the federal government and their people enjoy the benefits of the marketing act. Mr. Taschereau himself, like the premiers of all the other provinces, received a copy of this bill, and what did he do? Did he denounce it in the Quebec house? Did he attempt then to show to the members of the Quebec assembly that this marketing board bill was detrimental to agriculture and industry and a blow to confederation? He merely expressed some doubts as to the propriety of the proposed legislation and immediately saw to it that the legislature unanimously pass a bill whereby the people of Quebec could cooperate with the federal government in the creation, operation and maintenance of a federal marketing board. The bill that was passed in the legislature of Quebec is bill No. 243, "an act to aid the putting into effect in this province of any federal act having as its object the marketing of the natural products of Canada and of any federal act respecting bankruptcy as regards compromises between creditors and debtors."

After Hon. Mr. Taschereau had taken such a commendable stand, he now turns round and in the most dramatic way asserts that confederation is threatened and the unity of Canada endangered by this bill. What logic! What consistency! If this bill were so bad, would it not have been the duty of the Quebec premier to refuse to pass the enabling legislation, which was nothing more or less than an approval of the federal measure? Nobody would have objected to Mr. Taschereau stating his reasons for refusing to commit his province to any policy which might destroy the so-called paramount rights of the province if such rights in his opinion were being encroached upon by the federal government. One might say that such views were highly hypercritical and were offered only for political reasons. However, I think the real motive for their utterance is the realization that the crisis is coming to an end, that unemployment is decreasing and, as the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) said a moment ago, prosperity is coming and is as inevitable as the rising of the sun above the horizon. The premier of Quebec will then be deprived of the opportunity of making capital out of the depression and playing politics with the relief granted for unemployment, and he does not conceal his disappointment. Wild statements such as these would do much to destroy the unity of the Canadian people if they were taken seriously by the people of Quebec. However, our people are used to such outbursts from Mr. Taschereau. He makes them on every occasion according to his mood and fancy.

Mr. Taschereau has said even more than that; he has commented upon the tax of ten per cent on gold. In the same interview he stated that "this ten per cent tax on gold beats all." I do not think I need comment any further upon that statement beyond saying that the federal government was granted the right of taxation by the British North America Act. The province of Quebec, like all provinces, receives a large subsidy from the dominion government. According to the estimates for 1934-35 this province will receive a subsidy of $2,592,013.68 which might be collected by way of taxation. Last year the deficit of Mr. Taschereau was about $7,000,000, and were he not receiving this subsidy, his deficit would be more than $9,000,000. When Mr. Taschereau makes such an amazing failure of his own administration, he has no right to attempt to teach a lesson to this government. I shall say only a word with respect to this tax as I shall comment further upon it during the debate on the budget. The only answer to be given to Mr. Taschereau's criticism is one which is clear, concise, obvious and unequivocal—we are going to take taxes off the farm and put a tax on gold. If Mr. Taschereau is not satisfied, we shall continue to do our duty.

On behalf of my native province I should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) for having initiated such a commendable piece of legislation at such an opportune time. For a long time the farmers have been crying for help; we must think of them, we must encourage them, we must help them and we must save them. As has been said by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel), the prosperity of industry depends upon the prosperity of the farm. If you save the farm, you save the country; we are going to save the farm and thereby save the country. I need not repeat what has been so clearly stated by my hon. friends on this side, that the purpose of this bill is to provide for the orderly marketing of farm produce in order to stop competition between producers, regularize production, improve the quality of farm products, regulate exports and arrange and promote cooperation between producers so that they may be assured of a reasonable profit. This legislation will also eliminate the disparity which now exists between the costs of production and the prices received for farm products. Everyone admits that the low price of farm products is killing agriculture and destroying the economic life of this country. The bill now before the house is a bold measure with far-reaching consequences, but every one admits that the sad plight of the farmer requires bold, sweeping and appropriate remedies. When agriculture is struggling, statesmen must be awakened. In other words, this is not the time for long and fruitless speeches; it is the time for a prompt, bold and definite action. But our Liberal friends are afraid of action and they certainly deserve what has been said of them by one Liberal newspaper in Ottawa, the Ottawa Citizen. Listen to what this paper said on July 28, 1933, the anniversary of the grand, sweeping victory which took place on July 28, 1930. They say:

> Nothing has been more pathetic in Canadian politics since 1930 than the failure of Liberals in parliament to advance any effective alternative to the government's policy.

And later:

> The self-satisfied ignorance of Liberals on other issues in world politics, as on the collapse of international finance, the progressive departure of nations from the gold standard, the revolutionary experience in national planning, particularly in Russia, Italy and the United States has done more to turn young people away from the Liberal party into the ranks of the C.C.F. than anything else.

That is what one Liberal organ thinks of the enlightened views of the Liberal party.

I can assure the Minister of Agriculture that this marketing bill is receiving the approval of the majority of the farmers of the province of Quebec. Yesterday the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) quoted the opinion of the distinguished president of the Catholic Union of Farmers of Quebec. He alluded also to the resolution which was passed unanimously by that association approving of the provisions of this bill. I shall not repeat what the hon. member said in that regard, but I should like to quote to the farmers of Quebec the opinions of associations of farmers in other provinces. I hold in my hand an article which appeared in the Farmer's Advocate, which is published in London, Ontario. This publication was first published in 1868 and has continued ever since without interruption. It states:

> The agricultural marketing bill introduced in the House of Commons by Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture, on March 26, has been described as ultra-modern and drastic, but it is not too modern and certainly not too drastic to meet the needs under the emergency conditions that exist in the primary markets of Canada. It is closely patterned after the British Agricultural Marketing Act and, moreover, it grants the powers and establishes the marketing machinery for which agricultural organizations from one end of Canada to the other have been asking. It is a fine piece of up-to-date legislation and provides the solution for agricultural marketing problems that are causing anxiety in many branches of the industry to-day and in numerous districts where ruinous prices exist because the old-type marketing machinery is rickety and inadequate.

And again:

In the first place the proposed legislation at Ottawa provides for a marketing board which will have power to regulate exports and direct the organization and functioning of local marketing boards or schemes in Canada. Two illustrations will suffice to show how this board could be of distinct advantage to the agricultural industry. During the months of May, June and July we manufacture approximately 125 million pounds of butter in Canada. Our net exports for the year are in the neighbourhood of 3 million pounds, but this very small surplus is sufficient to depress prices to such an extent that dairy farmers lose $5,000,000 because of the thimbleful of butter which is over and above domestic market requirements. The home market is preferable and there is no one creamery man in Canada philanthropic enough to say, "I'll export all the butter I make and thus keep the market clear for all you other fellows." Moreover, there is no legislation under which a creamery man may be forced to export a quota or percentage of his make. Hon. Mr. Weir personally took the matter in hand last summer and quietly induced a number of creameries to export some butter. What appeared to be a threatening situation was thus relieved and butter prices held higher than they otherwise would. A marketing board, endowed with reasonable powers, could achieve the same end much more expeditiously, with more justice to all butter makers, large and small, and with far greater advantage to the dairymen of Canada. Moreover, it is proposed to compensate those who incur a loss when exporting under orders of the board and, moreover, adjustments can be made by the board when sterling exchange is a further disadvantage to the Canadian exporter.

May I quote now from a publication which has a great reputation in Ontario; I refer to the Ontario Grower, which is published in Hamilton. Turning to the first page of the issue of April 10, 1934, I read:

Monday, March 26 will stand as a red letter day in the history of Canadian agriculture.

On that date, Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture, introduced in the House of Commons Bill 51, "An Act to Improve the Methods and Practices of Marketing of Natural Products in Canada and in Export Trade, and to make Further Provision in connection therewith." And thus was instituted a move toward the establishment of an administration of Canada's natural products but on a basis that is primarily voluntary in procedure.

If I quote now a few extracts from the editor's opinions you will see how much this piece of legislation is praised by farmers of all classes.

The new federal marketing act, officially known as the Natural Products Marketing Act, is now before parliament. It is a farreaching measure, drastic in some of its clauses, radical in thought, but a piece of legislation that comes into being because of absolute necessity. The act is destined to help those industries which, apparently, cannot help themselves. It provides for the appointment of a federal marketing board to supervise, control and organize trade, to give some guidance and direction to producers, in order that production plans may harmonize with market requirements and to prevent, as far as possible, undue fluctuations in supply, should prove to be a step forward. The act possesses a very important feature, inasmuch as it provides the opportunity for the producers of any commodity to become thoroughly organized, to gain complete control of the marketing of their product, and have a voice in trade policies governing that product.

May I also quote the opinion of a man whose reputation stands high in the city of Quebec, Mr. J. S. Royer, the distinguished president of the Canadian Fruit and Vegetable Jobbers' Association. At a convention of the Canadian Chambers of Commerce held in Toronto in the month of October he made a speech on marketing legislation which caused a sensation. I will quote a few extracts from it:

Mr. President,—

I have the honour to be the president of The Canadian Fruit and Vegetable Jobbers' Association, a trade association of wholesale fruit and vegetable dealers which has since its inception, ten years ago, held an associate membership in the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and has therefore followed very closely your valuable deliberations and conclusions.

For your information and probable enlightenment may I refer to the fact that imported fruits, having an average annual value at point of production over the past five years of some $20,000,000 and vegetables of some $6,000,000, have been handled by our members. In addition of course we distribute domestic fruits and vegetables of approximately the same value. Just here I would stress the point that while the five year average value of fruits is approximately $20,000,000, the rapid and consistent decline over the years is from approximately $26,000,000 in 1929 to but slightly over $11,000,000 in 1933, and while the average value of vegetables was $6,000,000, the decline has been from over $8,000,000 in 1930 to $4,000,000 in 1933. While values have decreased to this alarming extent I am satisfied that volume has been maintained, thus indicating a reduction in farm market values of at least 50 per cent. As a further indication of the extent of the business in which I am chiefly interested I will tell you that last year the city of Montreal alone consumed approximately 14,000 carloads of fruits and 8,000 carloads of vegetables.

The marketing of this vast volume of a highly perishable product is no simple task, particularly under the climatic conditions prevailing in Canada, and more particularly under present day conditions when the few remaining who have not been converted to the slogan "Fruit for Health" hesitate to buy what they consider to be a luxury and non-essential product.

While there are those who contend, and probably rightly so, that the present difficult position of agriculture is due in no small part to overproduction or surplus, I personally believe that in so far as fruits and vegetables are concerned the problem will find its solution through organized distribution. Dean Clement of the University of British Columbia recently defined a surplus as "that part of any crop or commodity which cannot be sold at a price which would pay for its production." If one accepts this definition then one must also believe that almost the entire fruit and vegetable crop of Canada was surplus last year as I am satisfied that but a very small percentage was sold at a price which would return the cost of production.

Even before the wave of non-buying struck Canada we who are in the fruit and vegetable business realized the unsound position of the Canadian grower due to the lack of organized and businesslike marketing methods at the point of production. Numerous conferences were held both between the growers themselves and between the growers and outside agencies which resulted in the establishment of cooperative marketing associations. A number of these have been successful to a degree but the percentage of failures was heavy and voluntary cooperation has in the net made but little progress. Even when organizations are formed the members face constant temptation to desert due to the fact that those outside can more readily find a favourable market for their few cars and so average a higher return than is possible for an organization which must take both good markets and bad and so average lower. However without organization chaos only results and all secure the low average prices so prevalent to-day. Opportunities for direct marketing by so great a percentage of the individual producers discount the advantages of large scale marketing. Failure of cooperative marketing in consequence has resulted through the impossibility of securing and maintaining control of supplies so long as the voluntary support of the producers has to be relied upon.

Changed conditions in recent years have made it evident that the major problems of distribution require unity of plan and marketing. Indeed, the useful results of planned marketing, once the necessary unity of policy has been obtained, are so evident as to warrant measures being taken to bring this about. Thus we find legislation to this end in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States. In all the principle is practically the same, that is, to make possible the control of the entire distribution of any product, or in any one area, and so prevent the ruinous so-called competition which, instead of being the life of trade, has proven to be the death of business. Few things are more pitiful than to see a man spend his life selling his services for less than they are worth and arriving at old age with nothing but a bad case of rheumatism, a worn out body and obsolete equipment. He has been a detriment to those in his community engaged in the same vocation, to his family and to himself.

Mr. Royer went on to depict the essential features of the British marketing act and concluded by asking the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to recommend to the Canadian government the taking of necessary steps to pass legislation similar to that which was passed and approved of and is now in operation in the United Kingdom. I have quoted lengthy extracts from this speech of Mr. Royer of Quebec to prove to the Minister of Agriculture that the best men engaged in the wholesale trade in fruit, vegetables and all other agricultural products agree with the farmers in recommending to the government and requesting it to enact immediately, practical and definite legislation which alone can cure the present sad situation in which the farmers of Canada find themselves.

May I, in the few minutes that remain at my disposal continue my humble remarks in my native tongue?

(Translation): Let us examine, sir, what stand the Quebec government took in connection with the legislation intituled: The Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934? When this bill was introduced by the dominion government the legislative assembly in Quebec, was in full session. When requested by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to cooperate with the dominion government, Mr. Taschereau, on April 11, introduced a bill purporting to put into practice in Quebec the dominion marketing act. The measure received the unanimous approval of both chambers of the Quebec legislature. Now that the provincial session has been prorogued, Mr. Taschereau solely to create doubt in the minds of the people and prevent the Quebec farmers settling down to work and reaping the fruits of this legislation, gives an interview to the Liberal press in which he contends that the dominion act is an encroachment on the rights of the provinces and a confiscation of the natural resources of Quebec. This statement of Mr. Taschereau is most regrettable. If Mr. Taschereau is sincere, why did he not then refuse to permit the dominion government to apply this act in the province of Quebec? If our measure, instead of being eminently favourable to farmers and producers of all kinds, is really a destructive and unconstitutional measure, as stated by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and liable to ruin the farmers as contended by the Liberal members of this house, why did Mr. Taschereau not wait before enacting his bill? Should he reply that he had not the necessary information, my reply then is that he is not a statesman; a wise and cautious legislator does not introduce a bill without being thoroughly enlightened on its merits and consequences. Moreover, the provincial assembly will meet again in June, as Mr. Taschereau promised to Mayor Camillien Houde; I challenge him here. Either this federal act is detrimental or beneficial. If detrimental, his duty at the special session in June next will be to cancel Act No. 243 by which he pledges himself to apply the Natural Products Marketing Act in the province of Quebec. If, on the other hand, our measure will be beneficial, the hon. Mr. Taschereau will nevertheless not repeal the act. All may wager, sir, but I warn you that never will Mr. Taschereau—in spite of the hue and cry raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe)—prevent openly the application of the Dominion Marketing Act in Quebec.

However, if our act is an excellent one it is not sufficient to allow its application in our province. One may oppose an act in two ways. One may carry on an active or passive resistance. I surmise that Mr. Taschereau will not dare repeal his act No. 243, but will oppose to the Dominion Marketing Act a passive resistance by quietly advising the Minister of Agriculture of Quebec, the agriculturists and all his agents, in Quebec, not to encourage the farmers, the fishermen, lumber dealers, breeders, fruit and vegetable growers to organize themselves so as to help in creating new markets, or reorganizing their production, or improving the quality of their products or taking the necessary steps to enhance the prices of their farming and industrial products.

Note what is taking place in the province of Ontario. The bill has not yet been enacted by parliament and already farmers are organizing throughout the province. Look at this newspaper, The Ontario Grower, of April 10. On the second page you will find the following heading in large letters: "Interpreting the Natural Products Marketing Act." I shall read word for word this advertisement:

> Local associations or groups of growers desiring information as to the legislation now being brought down in the House of Commons, can secure competent speakers for their meetings by communicating with the Ontario Growers' Markets Council.
> This vital piece of legislation, affecting the distribution of Canadian fruit and vegetables, deserves the support of every agriculturist.

At the bottom there appears:

> For full information write C. W. Bauer, Secretary, Ontario Growers' Markets Council.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gobeil) (Translation): The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): With the consent of the house, may I be permitted to finish my remarks.

The situation of farmers, sir, is too sad to make political capital at his expense. He is burdened and overwhelmed with debts. He cannot meet the interest on his mortgages. The price of his products is ridiculously low, yet, in the midst of all his troubles, his countenance is serene, he always courageously raises a large family and should you happen in the evening to pass his home where a good Canadian soup is still on the fire, you may hear him singing the chorus of our old songs of the past. I now appeal to Mr. Taschereau, Prime Minister of Quebec and beg earnestly of him to cease launching forth in petty politics, at least from now until the dominion election. On behalf of honour and justice, I request him to state publicly whether he will take or not effective measures to allow the farmers to enjoy the beneficial legislation which we are preparing, if so, I request him to state how he will cooperate.

Mr. Taschereau, sir, has the floor. As to us, humble servants of the people, we shall carry on here the work begun.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is with a degree of reluctance, a reluctance due in part only to some physical disability, that I rise at this stage of the proceedings to take part in the discussion upon the measure now before the house. I am impelled to do so by two main considerations: the importance of the measure itself as it may and as it undoubtedly will affect the great body of producers in Canada and the great percentage of the people of my riding and my province, and the fact that I have been among those who have consistently urged the introduction of legislation of this kind. My first words, therefore, must be of congratulation to the government and more particularly to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) upon the courage and initiative shown in bringing forward a measure of this type; to use the words of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the courage to take new paths, to open up new roads and to move forward in a new direction when times demand and when circumstances make it essential; and also upon their appreciation not only of the conditions which exist but of the responsibility of the state in respect of those problems.

It is not my purpose, nor does it conform, as I understand the matter, with the position which I occupy in the house, that I should enter into a detailed defence of this measure; that is the duty of the government which gave this legislation birth and of the party under whose auspices it was brought forth. Nor is it my place to enter upon a lengthy counter attack upon those who do not view this matter as I do. I was not elected to this house as a political partisan, and during the thirteen years I have sat in this chamber it has been my effort to cooperate with either or both parties in regard to any meritorious legislation which might be introduced. That stand I propose to maintain at this time. I shall therefore confine myself in the main to stating my views upon this proposed legislation and its possible effects, and to indicate why I welcome and shall support this measure on second reading. In doing so I shall endeavour to discuss the matter very briefly under three main heads: the conditions in this country and the world which make such legislation necessary and essential; the objectives which should be achieved if we are to meet and remedy those conditions, and the extent to which, in my opinion, this bill will meet these essentials and will accomplish these objectives.

As to the conditions themselves, Mr. Speaker, they are matters quite understood and appreciated by every hon. member of this house whose occupation, location or duties bring him into contact with the main bodies of our producers of natural products, and particularly our farmers. The conditions are obvious; that cannot be gainsaid: The condition under which we have violent fluctuations in the prices of farm products, fluctuations either arbitrary or fortuitous but equally calamitous in their effects; the conditions under which we have spreads which we believe to be unnecessary and far too great between the price received by the producer and the price paid by the consumer and the condition, above all, under which year after year the farmers of this country—certainly I can speak for western Canada, and I think for all Canada in that respect—receive less for their products than will enable them to maintain a decent standard of living and meet their obligations. Nor are the effects of those conditions confined to the producers themselves. We have had discussed in this house time and again the condition of the provinces, and particularly of the western provinces, and criticism has been made because loans and guarantees have been given in order to assist their finances. Why are the western provinces in that situation? Speaking now particularly for the three prairie provinces, where the great majority of the population are farmers, I can say that the financial situation of these provinces is not due to inherent defects in government or to extravagance in expenditure. I know that in my own province, and I believe in the other provinces, expenditures have been cut to the bone. No, the trouble goes deeper; the roots are in the ground, and the fact is that the majority of the taxpayers of these provinces are farmers. When the majority of the taxpayers are not receiving sufficient income to enable them to buy the necessities of life, let alone pay their taxes, government finances must suffer. There are only two sources open to any provincial government from which they may obtain revenue, namely taxation or borrowing; when the taxpayer fails borrowing is the last resort. But borrowing brings with it its own punishment and its own destruction in the accumulation of interest charges which result. There, Mr. Speaker, is a phase which vitally affects every taxpayer and every citizen in Canada. I think this should be taken into full consideration when the bill is being discussed, for only by an appreciation of these facts can we understand the measure now before us.

Then, leaving the domestic situation, we look to the world about us and what do we find? The situation has wholly changed within the last two decades. The time was, and not so very long ago, when apart from tariff restrictions in the various importing countries, the goods of all countries could be sold on a competitive basis; to the best man or the lowest price went the market. That was the day of freedom of sale, so called; that was the day of individual competition. But, Mr. Speaker, that day has gone and in its place we have not only tariff restriction but the exclusion of certain commodities; we have commodities admitted only under quota restriction as to quantity, as to quality, as to the percentage of goods from our country which may be used in proportion to similar goods of domestic origin. We may regret this situation; we may look upon it as detrimental, but facts are stubborn things. With other members of the house I have indulged in certain theories, but I have found that when a theory comes in conflict with an established fact it is usually the theory that is shattered and the fact that remains. This is something that must be taken into consideration, and in view of these facts legislation of some form to meet the existing conditions becomes not only necessary but essential.

Now I should like to say a word as to the definite objects which must be accomplished if these conditions are to be met. I am firmly convinced of the merits of cooperation in meeting problems of this kind. By that I mean cooperation among the producers themselves and the elimination, by mutual consent, of the self destructive and mutually destructive competition which prevails as between individuals. I believe that only by the encouragement, the assistance and the development of true cooperation, with all that it implies such as the increased intelligence of the producer, the increased self help of the producer and the working together of the producers, can the matter be solved. But we find another condition. I am not speaking now of wheat, which is a problem by itself; I am speaking of almost every other product of the farm from fruit to eggs. You will find that from ninety-five to ninety-eight per cent of the total production of each of those products is consumed within this country and that we export five per cent or less of each. Yet it has been borne out not only by our experience but by the statements of those in the trade that this small, insignificant export has shattered and brought to chaos the domestic price year after year, season after season. And again, any proposed measure which does not contain within itself the power to deal with such a situation must fail, for the domestic cooperation between producers cannot take care of the situation.

These are the main points which I believe must be covered, and I would emphasize particularly the necessity of securing to the producer a greater proportion of the price paid by the consumer. More than that, we must try to secure to the producer a return which will enable him to continue his operations, meet his liabilities and pay his taxes, and will restore to him that buying power the lack of which has been one of the chief causes of the depression which has fallen so heavily upon us and upon other countries as well. These are some of the things which must be accomplished, Mr. Speaker, and now I turn to this bill to see to what degree and in what measure the objectives desired may be achieved by it.

Before I do that, however, may I offer this suggestion: I have said that I am a believer in cooperation, and that argument has been advanced by many of those who oppose this bill. To my mind the present measure is rooted and founded in cooperation, for how otherwise can it succeed? It demands, and to a large degree has already received through enabling legislation, the cooperation of the provinces. It demands for its success, and indeed for its very life, the cooperation of the producers themselves. May I say again—because this is essentially important—that the very genius of this bill, the very basis and spirit of this legislation, is the cooperation which will be received by this federal body from those who will be more directly interested, and from the provinces who are in close touch with the problems of their own citizens.

I come now to the bill, and what do we find there? The bill proposes to set up a federal board which, acting as the general director of the bill and of the marketing plans, shall work in cooperation with and in conjunction with boards appointed by the provinces, each in their own sphere, and each to deal with matters which come under their jurisdiction. Further, the board is to work in cooperation with the local boards, which, as I understand it, will be appointed largely by the producers who will be beneficially affected. That is the scope of the bill. To that board and to the boards which will cooperate with it are given ample, wide powers —possibly too wide, but I do not think so. For we are meeting a condition the ramifications of which are as yet barely understood, and to my mind nothing could be more fatal than to hamper and restrict the board in respect of its statutory powers before it commenced operations, so that when it did meet with preblems it would not be able to deal with them promptly.

It has been suggested that parliament itself should deal with them. To my mind parliament is the last body in the world which could deal with the emergent situations as they arise. All parliament can do and all parliament should do is to pass such legislation and to delegate such powers, so that under the authority of those powers the executive may deal with each situation day by day, taking into consideration the individual merits of each case as occasion may arise. The powers, then, are wide.

Then, among the powers what do we find? We find the power to register, if necessary, the names and the addresses of the producers. And what of it? The very members in this house who criticize on that ground were most urgent that a given or stipulated percentage of the producers in each branch or of each product should indicate their approval, or by petition indicate their desire, that some scheme or plan should be put into force.

How could that be accomplished? How could parliament or the governor in council or the board have the slightest idea what percentage of voices had spoken or how many of the people were interested unless beforehand they knew how many had a right to speak? And how can that be done, save by registering the names and addresses? To my mind, when we consider other curtailments upon our individual liberty, curtailments under which we already suffer, the additional curtailment of being obliged to write down our names and addresses and our branch of production is but a very minor detail, and one which so far as I can conceive, will meet with no antagonism.

Then, the bill speaks of licensing. I doubt whether the government knows, and I am quite certain the house does not know, to what extent this licensing may have to be applied. However, the fact is that the power is given to license—and to license what? The clause which applies to licensing includes producers and dealers in the products. It is quite conceivable to me that anybody dealing in those products should be licensed. The power is there. Further, it gives to the board the power of restriction and control of exports. And, Mr. Speaker, how could that situation which I have described and which is familiar to all of us be met in any other way?—that situation under which a comparatively small export, an infinitesimal percentage of the production, is allowed to destroy and crush the price of the entire domestic product. How else could it be done? We have had some experience along those lines. Within the last three years a cooperative organization in Canada entered into a mutually satisfactory and mutually profitable arrangement with the great consumers' cooperative of Great Britain. On the one hand we had the Canadian cooperative live stock shippers and on the other the British consumers. It was an ideal arrangement—the hungry mouths at one end and the eager sellers at the other. On what rock did they split? They split upon the rock which has destroyed and made impossible the profitable shipment of live stock, hog products and various other products during the past number of years. Because of the fact that during certain seasons of the year the price offered for cattle and other products in Great Britain is higher than the price in Canada, exporters rushed to export their products, thereby creating a surplus upon the market. Then comes the season when perhaps Irish cattle may come on the market—this may not happen to-day but did at one time—and as a result the price falls below the level of that obtaining in Canada with the result that export ceases. The stipulation made by the British authority was this: "We are willing to receive your live stock, but we insist upon having continuity of supply week by week, month by month, season by season throughout the twelve months of the year." That was the condition. Now, hon. members cannot expect any single exporter to export at a loss, nor should we be right in expecting any such thing. Under this bill power is given not only to hold back and restrict during a time when an over supply might destroy the market abroad and break the price, but also to send forward during the slack months, at times when goods may be sold at a loss, the necessary quantity to relieve the domestic market, thereby destroying the surplus, and to reimburse the exporters or producers who under such conditions and circumstances send forth that surplus. Thus will assistance be given to all producers in Canada. That is only right and wise.

In what other way could we meet a situation such as I have described, such as other hon. members have described and which hon. members know exists, under which importers in the country purchasing our goods are restricted by quotas, and restricted as to quality, quantity, time and kind? Only by some central guiding body with power to act can that situation and can the conditions imposed upon us, conditions for which no government in Canada has been responsible, over which we have no control and with which we must comply, be met.

Then, too there is the control of imports. I shall not refer, save in passing, to the exaggerated arguments advanced in this respect by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). References have been made to the incongruity of the arguments of the right hon. gentleman. The bill provides that natural products of other countries which may come into competition with regulated natural products of Canada, may be kept out or restricted as to quantity. Under that provision it is suggested that oranges and coffee may be kept out of the country. It is news to me, Mr. Speaker, to learn that either oranges or coffee are natural products of Canada, or come into direct competition with regulated products grown in Canada. These are bugbears, and to my mind the very extravagance of the argument is one of the arguments in favour of the bill, because it shows how far afield people may sometimes go to find substantial arguments to justify their position.

Those are the main essentials of the bill, as I see them. I have read it from beginning to end, clause after clause, and nowhere do I find a power given to the board or to subsidiary boards to control, to check or to limit production. But I do find ample power given to control the methods of marketing. And, Mr. Speaker, that is one thing our farmers from one end of Canada to the other are demanding, namely that this lack of control which has brought them into the chaotic situation in which they now find themselves, with resulting loss to Canada, the closing down of our factories, and unemployment among our labouring classes, due to the lack of purchasing power of the farmer, shall cease. They demand that this uncontrolled situation shall be taken in hand, and shall be taken in hand by the one body in Canada competent to deal with it, namely the federal government. True, as the bill provides and as has been stated, this must be done in wholehearted cooperation with the provinces, each acting within its own jurisdiction; but no province alone could deal with the situation. They have tried and they have failed. The federal government, the federal parliament, some federal body alone can do that work and it alone must take the responsibility.

May I say further that the pictures that have been drawn of what might come to pass under this board apparently presuppose and are based upon one idea, namely that any board appointed would deem it to be its duty, its main objective, its ideal, to hamper and restrict and destroy the very producers for whose benefit the board is being brought into existence. I am taking it for granted that this government, and a Liberal government if again it should get into power, would have enough common sense, enough regard for their own political safety and appreciation of their own responsibility, at least to see that the best possible results be achieved. I am taking it for granted that any board which is appointed would accept it as its chief duty and main responsibility to do what is represented in the preamble of the bill, to carry into effect the purport and spirit of the act, and that is so to administer the act that it will enure to the benefit of those for whom it is being passed. I am taking for granted, and I am confident, that if by some strange chance or by some diabolical interposition a board should come into existence that had for its objective the destruction of the interests it is intended to serve, the tearing down instead of building up, the provincial boards would refuse to cooperate; the board appointed under the act would cease to function, and the act would be null and void.

For these reasons I shall not only support the bill on its second reading but, as I have said, I welcome its introduction. My criticism, if criticism I should offer at this time and which should more appropriately come during the committee stage, would be not that the powers given to the board are not limited, but that the bill itself embraces too much.

To my mind the problem of marketing the farm products of this country apart from wheat, because of the importance of the great diversity of products embraced in the general term "mixed farming" would provide a problem sufficient to engage the attention and occupy the time and utilize all the genius of any board which could possibly be appointed.

Personally I should not like to see wheat included in this bill, for the very simple reason that the problem of the disposition of our wheat is one wholly different and apart from the problem confronting our mixed farmers. What is the problem of the wheat farmer? It is the problem of the disposal of a great export crop, a worldwide product, graded, standardized. It is a problem of selling the great bulk of that product in export markets. The domestic market for wheat, while important, is relatively insignificant. The problem lies in the export market, in meeting the agreements which have been entered into and the quotas which have been put into effect. But apart from that the business itself is sufficiently great, of sufficient importance and sufficiently onerous, to occupy the full time and attention of a properly constituted wheat board, and I hope that at some time in the not too distant future this bill will be supplemented by another creating a federal wheat board to do for wheat what I hope this bill will do for mixed farming products.

I cannot speak of the products of the forest, for frankly, I cannot understand that reference in the bill. The products of the forest in their natural condition, as I understand it, are logs. When are logs manufactured? Is lumber a manufactured article? If it is, then it does not come within the scope of this bill, because it is certainly neither food nor drink. It would be classed perhaps with furniture and boots and shoes.

Speaking of boots and shoes, if I may digress for a moment, when the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) was making his eloquent and occasionally humourous address, he placed a certain interpretation on the reference made to boots and shoes by the leader of the opposition. I have in mind another interpretation, another idea concerning the matter. I wonder if boots and shoes come in from the fact that on this bill, at least, occasionally when he opened his mouth he put his foot in it. But is lumber a manufactured article? Paper certainly is; articles of pulp certainly must be, and to what extent would this bill apply? I do not know and frankly am not keenly interested or well informed on the subject; there are those who know much more about it than I do. But while I may deprecate the inclusion within the scope of the bill of certain matters which I believe are extraneous and should be kept out, I am certainly not going to cut off my own nose to spite my face or vote against a bill which I believe will benefit the farmers simply because it may benefit others also. To my mind that would be a rather narrow view to take of my duties in this house.

In conclusion may I make one reference to a remark that was made by a speaker this afternoon. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), in the very fine address which he gave to the house, spoke of the world marching on and of the necessity of the country and parliament marching on with it or being left behind in a hopeless bog. The thought came into my mind that if we are going to march on we have two alternatives: we may march on with the world in its progress as a disorderly, unorganized mob of self-destructive individuals, and if so we march to certain defeat and individual extinction; or we may march on with the world as a disciplined mutually supporting body of troops to take part in that glorious world victory over penury and want which I hope will be achieved ere long. My convictions lie with the self disciplined army, not with the disorganized mob of individuals. This is a measure through which a number at least of our people may organize and discipline themselves and take a world part in that forward march.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and others which may be developed during the committee stage when the details of the bill may properly be discussed, I welcome and support this legislation.

Mr. JOSEPH THAUVETTE (Vaudreuil-Soulanges) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house very long in debating the bill under consideration. I followed closely and with much interest the various speeches delivered by hon. members this afternoon and this evening; I was very much impressed with the various views set forth.

[Mr. Speakman.]

One speech especially interested me. Each time the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) speaks in the house, I listen with interest because I look upon him as a brilliant orator, a legal light. I have noticed that each time he takes part in a debate, or at least often, he specially criticizes the government of his province. He quite strongly attacked, this evening, the Quebec premier, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, and gave proof that he had special aptitudes as an official critic. I think, sir, that the hon. member as well as his friends must greatly regret that he was not chosen as leader of the opposition for Quebec, at the convention held in Sherbrooke last year. He would have been more at home and the charges he has made against the Quebec government would have produced more effect, had he made them as the official leader of the opposition, face to face with the Quebec premier. I trust that the people of his party will recognize this fact at the next election.

After closely reading Bill No. 51, now under consideration by the house, I deem it my duty, as representative of a county where farming is the main industry, if not the only one, to express my humble views on the timeliness of such an act. At this stage of the discussion one must consider the principle on which the government based itself to bring down such a measure. To what authority does the government intend to entrust the enforcement of this act? What powers will be granted to this authority to administer this act throughout the country? How will the regulations, orders and decisions issued by the central board at Ottawa, be promulgated throughout the various provinces? How will these orders be transmitted? There are many questions which it would be rational to inquire into before adopting the bill and enforcing it.

Will the benefits, which it is hoped to obtain for the producers in the application of this act, be in proportion to the losses which might be incurred through the working of this so intricate mechanism of associations, councils or boards transmitting their decisions from place to place so as to finally reach the central board or vice versa, in connection with the marketing or exportation of the products regulated by this organization?

Throughout the whole range of this hierarchy of officials, will there not be discrimination as against a certain class of citizen who will be cared for only after these large associations have taken the best of the market? Will intelligent men, experts in their trade or profession, with a long experience, comply with the regulations of these local or provincial boards which, from their viewpoint at least, have never been associated with the profession or trade to which they belong?

I intend, sir, to reply to these questions by the various sections embodied in this bill.

First, if I restrict myself to the reading of the preamble of this bill, I find nothing which would warrant us to have any fear:

An act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

No danger lies behind this title. It reminds one of the chocolate coating under which the druggist conceals his drugs to render them tasteless. If we had only to deal with the preamble, truly I would have no objection to approve of this bill. Seeing that for the last four years I have requested the government on various occasions, to help the farmer by finding him markets and obtaining better prices for the sale of his products; I regret to note, however, that ever since this government is at the helm of affairs in this country, it has done nothing to help the most numerous and important class of our population, the farming class.

In examining this bill, we find, under interpretation, the word "minister" and the definition for the requirements of this act:

"Minister means the minister designated by the governor in council to administer this act."

This, sir, is another snag added to our constitution.

By this act it is intended to suppress parliamentary rights, withdraw from the representatives of the people the right of legislating on the various questions which concern citizens, their financial, professional or trade interests, so as to confer upon a board or boards whose members are unknown and have not yet been chosen, the power of making regulations.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Do you contend that it is legal?

Mr. THAUVETTE (Translation): The minister is granted—is it the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce? The act makes no mention—the power to legislate. At all events, the whole mechanism of this bureaucratic machinery will be put into motion by the promulgation of an order in council. The government's policy of governing by orders in council still continues. Governing behind closed doors. The government has made it a principle to disregard the people's wishes and assumes the rights and privileges which parliament possesses of legislating in the interest of the nation on such vital questions as those at present involved. After the renewal of the signature in blank, the government intends to regulate the natural resources which belong to the provinces, such as forests, mines, fisheries, etc. That is the attitude which the government has taken ever since I have the honour of being a member of this house. We have had these last years a dictatorship which resembles that of Mussolini. We were heading for Moscow; now we have been switched on the road to Berlin.

May I, sir, discuss a few points of this bill. In examining the various sections which will determine the enforcement and working of the act submitted to us, we find at section 3, paragraph 6:

The board shall be a body corporate and shall have power for the purposes of this act to acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property.

I am amazed at the powers conferred on this board—which will legally be constituted by the governor in council—to hold, acquire and dispose of real and personal property, not under the authority of parliament but by order in council. Such properties are to be acquired, not under the authority of parliament but by order in council, they are to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund. If I understand the wording of the act, they will belong to the board which acquired them and may be disposed of as they think fit and for its own use.

Section 3, paragraph 9 reads as follows:

The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purpose of this act.

Always by order in council, the minister may draw from the treasury the sums of money it pleases, turn them over to the board which will pay the amounts deemed necessary for the purposes of this act. Certainly this provision will provide for the expenditure of sums of money drawn from the treasury, without parliament being given an opportunity to discuss whether they are necessary or even being given the opportunity of investigating matters.

However, sir, what seems to me most arbitrary and at the same time most annoying to the farmers of this country who will have to carry on their marketing every day by virtue of the act, are the powers defined in section 4 of the bill, subsection 1, paragraph (a):

(a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality;

Can one realize what confusion will be created among producers by putting into force this provision of the act! Can one imagine the recriminations and protests which will be forthcoming from all sides when all and each of these small producers will have to sell or ship all or part of their products to the market! I do not intend to question all the farmers of my constituency so as to find out their views; however, a large number have already protested. This section to my mind nationalizes the commerce of our natural products. It is state monopoly of personal liberty. It paralyzes all private enteprises. It smothers all personal ambition since the output of each and every producer can be restricted.

Are we assured that the preference shown by some farmers to produce certain products instead of others will be respected. Is the board going to meddle with the affairs of every one, annoy these good farmers so as to verify their licences or compel them to join associations which they will very little appreciate? This is one of the provisions to which I have strong objections. The people of this country are not prepared for socialism, they will not easily sacrifice their commercial liberties. Why this state management or rather this nationalization of the commerce of natural products, and why not act likewise with manufactured products?

Is it thought that the government's high tariff have sufficiently protected the manufacturers? Yet reports come in every day from the tariff board informing us that a large number of manufacturers of various goods protest against the high tariffs. They request lower tariffs so as to increase their trade.

I contend, sir, that the same thing will happen with natural products if the government enforces this regulated production and marketing of natural products by order in council.

This will have the effect of creating an atmosphere of uncertainty on the markets where it is hoped to sell the products, an uncertainty as to prices and quantity. The reaction might well prove to be a decrease in the sales. Does any one think that the farmer can keep in storage for an indefinite time perishable goods? All are aware that those who take up breeding for market purposes cannot keep these young herds, which are ready for the market, for an indefinite time. And how many such instances are there! I can well imagine the reception awaiting these gentlemen of the board when they appear on the market to prohibit the sale of the farmer's herds. The government will be apprised sooner than it expects of the protests coming from the four corners of this country.

This legislation is the result of the high tariff policy advocated by this government and clearly intended to win over the support of those who sit on the extreme left. We have witnessed these last days our friends on the extreme left embrace in a fatherly way this new born Tory infant as if it were their legitimate child. We have again noted that extremes meet and often have some affinity; however, I wish to point out that the truth is to be found in the golden mean.

Therefore, I would approve a bill introduced by this government purporting to help the farmers in improving the quality of their products. I would gladly support a bill which would be a scheme to help the farmers in their present organizations, farmers' unions, cooperative societies, etc., so as to make these associations more efficient and powerful, in order that their members could obtain a more abundant return and make larger profits on their production.

I cannot be convinced, sir, that producers would be benefited by restricting production. Moreover, would it be human, in these times, to restrict the production of the prime necessities of life, when we are aware that there are so many people that suffer for the lack of the necessary things of life while others have none!

If the government wants to show its good intentions towards the Canadian producers, especially the farmers, let it put at their disposal all the means capable of benefiting them by legislating in a constitutional way, by introducing a bill which would benefit those interested inasmuch as it would be applicable through conviction rather than through constraint.

In closing my remarks, sir, I wish to express my views on section 14 of this bill.

Offences

14. Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

I loathe to think that this section will render a great service to Canadian producers. Will parliament be held responsible for the enforcement of this section in connection with offences against any order or determination of the board or governor in council? Does the government always intend to carry on by blasting? This policy has already failed. I do not think it will be a success this time. That is why I cannot approve of this bill.

On motion of Mr. Spencer the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.47 p.m.

Friday, April 27, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return, of Almon Secord Rennie, Esquire, for the electoral district of South Oxford.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Almon Secord Rennie, Esquire, member for the electoral district of South Oxford, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. J. C. Elliott.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Sixth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Maloney (for Mr. Stinson).

THOUSAND ISLANDS BRIDGE

Mr. M. J. MALONEY (South Renfrew) moved:

That Bill No. 27, an act to incorporate Thousand Islands Bridge Company, reported upon to-day by the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills be placed upon the order paper of the house for consideration this day in committee of the whole, and for third reading.

Motion agreed to.

ESTIMATES, 1934-35

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates—Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Canadian National Steamships and Maritime Freight Rates Act—for the financial year ending March 31, 1935, was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes, (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 70, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of this amending bill is to bring conformity between the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and the Food and Drugs Act by the introduction of a clause which will affect a similar list of diseases in both acts for which the sale of remedies is prohibited. The effect will be that the list of diseases in both acts will be similar.

Another provision in the amendments is that protection will be provided in reference to vinegar. The substitution of acetic acid for vinegar will be prevented.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FUNDS TO MEET EXPENDITURE AND INDEBTEDNESS INCURRED DURING CALENDAR YEAR 1934

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year, 1934, and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which it is intended to found on this resolution is designed to take care of the full financial requirements of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1934. It provides for the raising of funds for equipment principal payments, sinking funds, and miscellaneous maturing obligations amounting to $12,185,828; for construction and betterments $4,202,007 and for the estimated net income deficits amounting to $48,840,298. These amounts, in particular as respects the contemplated deficits, are arrived at as a result of a report which has been received from the trustees of the railway system in conformity with the act. That makes the total sum required for the railway's operation under the headings I have mentioned $65,228,133.

The bill is in two parts. The first part has to do with what might be termed the ordinary financial requirements of the railway for the year. The second part makes provision for the refunding of two maturities for the calendar year, the first one falling due September 1, 1934, and amounting to $17,060,333.33, Canadian Northern four per cent guaranteed debenture stock and bonds; also Great Northern Railway of Canada four per cent first mortgage bonds falling due October 1, 1934, amounting to $3,510,250. It also provides for the refunding of a maturity falling due on February 15, 1935, Canadian Northern Railway Company 4½ per cent guaranteed bonds, amounting to $17,000,000. It was thought wise that we should secure at this time legislative authority to refund or otherwise take care of that maturity lest there might not be time to secure legislative authority having regard to the date at which the session might commence.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister I think gave a total of $65,000,000 odd. Would he kindly repeat the different headings?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly. The first item is for equipment principal payments, sinking funds, and miscellaneous maturing obligations.

Mr. HEENAN: How much for equipment?

Mr. RHODES: $12,185,828; then, for construction and betterments, $4,202,007 and net income deficits, $48,840,298. Does the hon. member desire the figures with respect to maturities?

Mr. HEENAN: No. Has the minister any details with respect to the new equipment and the investment required?

Mr. RHODES: When I was referring to the resolution perhaps I should have said that it is proposed that this bill shall be submitted to the committee on railways and shipping where full details will be available.

Mr. HANBURY: In what way does the minister propose to finance these obligations when they mature?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: The bill will provide an alternative; the money may be advanced or we may guarantee the securities of the railway.

Mr. HANBURY: Is it proposed that the government will issue bonds for the purpose of meeting these maturities?

Mr. RHODES: That remains to be determined; the alternative provision will be in the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) sent me a copy of a letter which he had received from some men who were being paid a very low wage by the Canadian National Railways. I am sorry I have not the letter with me at the moment but they claim that despite a majority award by the board of conciliation and investigation they were still reduced by the management of the railways. The letter refers to the fact that the government has announced the restoration of the deduction to civil servants receiving salaries up to a certain amount, and it is claimed that as the railway is owned and controlled by the government, the government should consider asking the management to give back the reduction in wages which has occurred in connection with the low paid men.

Mr. RHODES: I am sure my hon. friend will be the first to appreciate that I am not in a position to make a statement with respect to his question. His question is one which should more properly be directed to the management of the Canadian National Railways. This matter could be discussed quite fully in the committee.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to ask a question with regard to the general policy of book-keeping as between the government and the Canadian National Railways. As I understand it, provision is to be made for the issuing by the Canadian National of certain notes to cover equipment and principal payments on account of equipment and other capital expenditure, and also to provide for construction and betterments. I understand that the minister proposes to issue notes of the Canadian National which I suppose will be either sold or loaned against by the government in order to provide cash. In case the government should make loans, do I understand that the practice will be to treat the obligation of the railway to the government for those loans as an active asset as distinguished from a non-active asset?

Mr. RHODES: I could not answer my hon. friend with accuracy until I have had an opportunity to confer with the officials of my department. There are certain assets which are active and there are others which are not active. The active assets are treated as such and the non-active assets are absorbed in the annual expenditure as brought down in the budget statement. Without knowing the particular item I would not be able to give a satisfactory answer and in any event I would have to confer with the officials. If the hon. member has any particular item in mind I should be glad to get the information for him.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister gave an item of something like $12,000,000 for equipment principal payments, sinking funds, et cetera. These are to be provided for by notes and I should like to know whether the minister as keeper of the treasury will regard the asset as active should the money be loaned to the Canadian National Railways. I think the minister will find that in most cases where payments on account of capital expenditure or current capital expenditures, if I may use the term, are made, the obligation of the railway to the government is treated as an active rather than a non-active asset. I should like to know if this will apply to the whole of that $12,000,000.

Mr. RHODES: I would not like to answer my hon. friend at the moment but I shall make inquiry and before the bill passes I will give him an accurate answer.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 71, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1934, and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times.

Mr. RHODES: Before moving that the bill be referred to the committee on railways and shipping, I desire to inform the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that I am now in a position to say that loans in cash for equipment principal payments and capital have been entered in the books as active assets for the last two years. I move that this bill be referred to the committee on railways and shipping.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT—RESTORATION OF TEN PER CENT CUT TO EMPLOYEES RECEIVING $1,000 OR LESS

Hon. E. N. RHODES moved the second reading of Bill No. 55, to provide for the deduction from compensation in the public service.

He said, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that I feel I can usefully add to what was said when this bill was introduced. I can certainly add nothing to what was said in previous years at very great length in connection with similar measures which it has been our duty to consider. This year we have been able to make a partial restoration in full of salaries. It would have been a much more pleasing duty on my part, and much more pleasing to the government and to the house as a whole, could we have gone the full distance. That we do not do so is due entirely to the limitation imposed upon us by our revenues. That is the sole reason, and I may say that we shall be only too delighted, when the time arrives and the treasury will permit us to do so, to restore in full the salaries which have been reduced during the past two or three years.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Before the motion is carried there are just a few words I wish to say. You know, sir, that I have always opposed a reduction in the salaries of public officials, and I am not going to delay the house with any remarks this afternoon. I simply say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that I hope that in the next few months another government will be in power so that we can restore the salaries to what they were before the present administration reduced them.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): There is one class of public official who I think should receive some special consideration. Probably most of the members of this house have received communications similar to those that have come to me, and no doubt the government has received representations in the matter. I refer to the postmasters. It is well known that the total recompense of the postmasters proceeds not only from salary but from certain commissions, and it has been pointed out, very properly I think, by the postmasters, that not only have their salaries been reduced but that owing to the depression the recompense they receive through commissions has also been very much reduced.

Thus they suffer a double reduction. This I think is a situation which should in fairness have the consideration of the government. Is it fair to reduce by 10 per cent the salaries of those men who, because of the severe times through which we have been passing, have already suffered a great reduction in their total income? This matter I have no doubt has already been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance and the government, as it has been brought to the attention of myself and probably other members of the house. Has the Minister of Finance any statement he would like to make in that regard?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will forgive me, but I would remind him that I have exhausted my right to speak on the motion for second reading. In committee I shall be happy to discuss the matter.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Before the motion carries for the second reading I wish to make a few observations. I do not intend to delay the house at any great length, but we are confronted with a situation which I think calls for consideration in view of the decision which you, Mr. Speaker, gave a few days ago with respect to another bill. I voted against Your Honour's interpretation of the rule with respect to amendments to the second reading of bills, but the majority of hon. members sustained that ruling. We are now on the second reading of Bill No. 55, and that means that we are concerned with its principle. The principle of the bill may be ascertained in the same manner as the principle of the marketing bill was sought to be ascertained when that measure was before the house. This bill is "An Act to Provide for the Deduction from Compensation in the Public Service." The short title of the bill is:

This act may be cited as The Salary Deduction (Continuance) Act, 1934.

Section 3 of the bill reads:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, there shall, during the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March, 1935, be deducted from the compensation of every member of the public service of Canada 10 per centum of the amount thereof: Provided—

Now I submit that the principle of this bill is not to be found in any rider to the bill; we are not concerned with the principle of the rider. We are not concerned with the principle of the provision but, I submit, with the principle of the bill itself, and that principle is double-barrelled in that it is for the continuance of the deduction from compensation in the public service. It is true that by the rider in the bill, an amendment to the law, some small minority will be affected in an infinitesimal way, and I suppose that in times of stress such as the present, with a government in power such as we have to-day, for these small mercies we ought to be grateful. But my attitude to these salary reductions is well known both in this house and elsewhere, and I for one cannot accept the principle of a continuance of the deduction from these salaries.

Now, the Minister of Finance, in introducing the bill, said that a certain range would be affected. I quote:

That range takes in a very large number of employees of the public service. As nearly as we can ascertain some eighteen thousand in number will be affected, including revenue postmasters, part time collectors of customs, lighthouse keepers, wharfingers, charwomen, seasonal or part time labourers, lockmen and bridgemen on the canals. Those in receipt of salaries above the sum of $1,000 will be subject to the same deduction as hitherto.

Therefore, right on the face of it, there is one class of the two classes of the service, those engaged in the service of the state, that will benefit, one small portion of a huge class. The government, at the time they decided upon this most unfortunate policy, were careful to make these deductions as heavy as possible upon both classes of the service—the public service at large and the civil service, so-called. This bill means something or it means nothing. If it means anything, it means something in the way of deduction. But after all, what does it mean in a practical way? I am sure that if the minister had been properly advised, or if he had followed his own sagacity and had gone carefully into the measure, he would not have brought down this picayune concession to those affected; because, with all deference to the hon. gentleman, for whom I have the highest regard, I am bound to say that the restoration of 10 per cent to those who will benefit is absolutely ridiculous. Let us see how far the generosity of the government, under the most difficult circumstances to which the minister has referred, will go, and to what extent the 18,000 employees referred to will benefit. Is this to be a smoke screen or a camouflage?

I take the report of the civil service committee for 1932 and I find in appendix J the total number of permanent and temporary employees in the civil service so-called of Ottawa, as of March, 1931, which is the last figure available, was 11,766 and the total number outside Ottawa for the same date was 33,815, making the total number in Canada 45,581. Therefore there is in Ottawa about 30 per cent and outside Ottawa about 70 per cent of the classified service, so that when one speaks about the civil service one speaks not for the civil service of Ottawa alone but for 100 per cent of the civil service wherever in Canada those employees may be located.

When I look at appendix C of the same report, what do I find? The minister said that he was returning the salary deduction to all those who receive $1,000 or less. Included in that number let us see how many are in the classified service and how many in the non-classified service, and how they compare with the 18,000 he says will be affected. If we look at appendix C we find the different salary ranges comprise the following percentages of the classified service:

Salary range—	Percentage of classified service
Up to $1,020	6.2 per cent
Up to $1,500	42 per cent
Up to $1,980	79 per cent
Up to $3,000	94.65 per cent

These figures are cumulative. But all those in the range up to $1,020 are not getting that amount. The numbers and the various amounts they are receiving are as follows:

Number of employees	Salary
95	$210
64	240
80	270
1	360
92	420
69	480
5	600
159	660

We have not yet reached the class grade one, which starts at $720. The earnings of the lower grades in the classified service start at $720 and the class goes to $1,020. The numbers with the amounts received are as follows:

Number of employees	Salary
6	$720
82	780
4	840
58	930
106	960

Not one civil servant in the classified service earns exactly $1,000 because there is no such category. The class salary range is $720, $780, $840, $900, $960 and then $1,020. The minister might have gone a little higher and put the cleavage where it should naturally have been, that is, at $1,020. Who gave him the information or advice or suggestion to make the division at $1,000 when the nearest approach to that is $960 and then the salary jumps to $1,020?

It is true that the number of those who earn $1,020 and under is 2,145, but none of them earns exactly $1,000. There were 106 in the classified service at $960 or 721 earning up to that amount. If we take it that one-quarter of the classified service resides in Ottawa, then there would be 180 or at the very utmost 200 of them in this city who would be affected. That shows the fault or want of logic in making the division at $1,000 rather than at $1,020 where the cleavage should have been made.

Of those who earn from $720 to $960 there are about 200 in Ottawa and there may be about 700 in the whole of Canada. I do not think any of them are married, though undoubtedly some of those who earn that amount have certain dependents. Some may help their mother or brothers and sisters, but they are the very few. Why not, for instance, have started at the class, grade 2, getting $1,080 where, for example the letter carriers start, most of whom have dependents? The unfortunate feature of this attempted legislation is that it hits where it is least needed, but when the bill is in committee we will go more fully into that aspect of the situation.

Let us take the unclassified service and see how far we get within range of the 18,000 who in this time of stress are to be benefited by this most generous legislation. There are about 60,000 employees in the unclassified service. Under the prevailing rates there are some 6,000 and part-time, seasonal, postmasters, etcetera, about 18,000. Who are the people in this unclassified portion who would benefit? I am taking this from the Statistics of the Civil Service of Canada, numbers employed and expenditures on salaries by departments, published under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Let us take the Department of Agriculture first and move rapidly through the list. In that department the unclassified portion who would benefit are day labourers engaged in work necessitated principally in connection with experimental farms. In the Department of Immigration and Colonization the inspectors of immigration who are permanent officials of the Department of National Revenue, are paid part-time wages only and as has already been shown in customs returns, their part-time wages—from $50 to $400 per annum—paid by this department are included in salaries and wages of "non-enumerated classes."

In the Department of Labour the same thing applies. In the Department of Marine, the expenditure on wages for all ships' companies and casual help is included under "non-enumerated classes;" the latter includes the working force employed during the summer months in deepening and widening the St. Lawrence ship channel, also artisans and labourers employed by the day as required at the Sorel shipyard and on construction work. Is there something in the far distance or the near distance or what?

In the Department of Fisheries it includes wages for egg-sorters employed for short periods, and fishery guardians employed occasionally for short periods.

In the Department of National Defence, the members of the permanent naval, military and air forces are not regarded as civil servants. Hence neither numbers of personnel nor expenditures on pay are included in this report. Transient labour is sometimes employed by military engineers on repairs and construction work.

In the Department of National Revenue it is occasionally necessary to engage employees for a few hours or days at the most, yet these still appear as those who have benefited by this generous return.

In Pensions and National Health, in the health branch, where there is no part time salaried medical officer to look after sick sailors on landing at maritime ports, private practitioners give attention to these sailors and render their accounts to the department. Occasionally when a vessel having quarantinable diseases on board arrives at a quarantine station it is necessary to engage a nurse or other help for a few days to assist the regular staff. These are among the eighteen thousand who will benefit.

In the Post Office, the employees of revenue post offices and sub post offices, together with mail contractors and licensed vendors are placed in the category of "non-enumerated classes." Mail contractors are paid under the tender and contract system, and as a rule do not give the whole of their time to the postal service. Most of the people affected by this disposition are people who have other avocations, they are not full time servants of the crown, they have some other means of livelihood, while those in the enumerated classes, the civil servants so-called, are by law precluded from engaging in any other sphere of activity than the service of the state. Those therefore are some who will be helped by the generosity of the government.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

I have therefore shown that up to the present there might be in the city of Ottawa 180 in the unclassified, and probably some 600 to 650 charwomen. There are also classified temporaries not under the civil service commission, probably some 300, so that the total affected here will be from about 1,130 to 1,200. In all Canada there are 721 in this class, grade one, with salary of $457,000; in Ottawa 180 with salary of about $114,000; 650 charwomen with wages of $22,650; and 300 unclassified at $900 or a total of $270,000. That is there would be altogether $406,952 upon which to draw this ten per cent. So this year the government would return probably $40,000, but from this one class alone they had during the last years over $80,000.

Now let us see the fairness of this return, in view of what the minister told the house when he presented his budget the other day. The total payroll of the classified service in Canada was $91,000,000 odd. The Ottawa payroll for the same period was $19,134,000 or twenty per cent of the salaries. The ten per cent deduction in 1931 gave $8,700,000. Ottawa contributed in cash $2,000,000. One quarter of about 8,000 statutory increases would amount to something like $250,000. The promotions that were stopped would represent something like $75,000. In other words, Ottawa has contributed $2,325,000. And Ottawa produced that amount out of $8,700,000 or thirty per cent of the revenue with twenty per cent of the salaries paid.

But that is not all with reference to the treatment that these people are getting now. Take for instance a chief clerk in the service; his maximum is $3,720. Suppose he was at $3,480 when the ten per cent came. His present salary is $3,480. Ten per cent off is $348, the increase stopped, $240, the deductions therefore outside of his five per cent for superannuation amount to $588 or sixteen per cent, to which adding the five per cent gives twenty-one per cent instead of ten per cent. The straight deduction by the stopping of promotions and statutory increases and the ten per cent cut bring it to sixteen per cent.

Take another class, a head clerk, a similar calculation shows the result to be seventeen per cent. Yet when the minister spoke the other day he told the house that in the last two years they had taken in a phenomenal amount of money—I will come to that in a moment.

There is another feature about it. Who are those who will benefit? Following the rules of the house I asked His Honour for some information in respect to the staff. I asked:

Are all the sessional staffs of the House of Commons to be benefited by the terms of the proposed Salary Deduction Act just introduced?
Answer: No.
Question: If not all, which ones will?
Answer: Charwomen, pages and parliamentary restaurant employees in receipt of salaries of $1,200 or less per annum.
Question: If any are excluded, which ones are they, what are the reasons therefor?
Answer: Sessional clerks, protective staff, messengers, servants, debates staff, stenographers.

As to the reasons, I am furnished with a circular letter number 115 dated April 11, 1934, from the office of the comptroller of the treasury. I do not know whether these regulations have been changed since; if they have, so much the better, they could not have been made worse than they are now. If they have not been changed, I shall cite them so that the minister may take cognizance of them and change them. Now what is the result? Take these two cases and see the logic of it. A stenographer here during the last session earned $690, at the rate of $5 a day. But for the purpose of this bill her salary must be computed at 365 days at $5, or equivalent to a yearly salary of $1,825, therefore she gets no benefit from the proposed restoration. A servant who last year worked, say, 300 days at $2.75, was paid $825. The government in its greed at the time of taxation takes the $825, taxes it $82.50, but this year when it is a question of returning it, they say to this man, you must calculate your salary at $2.75 a day for 365 days, and as the total remuneration so worked out comes to $1,003.75 he does not get back his ten per cent. That is based on this regulation, the fourth paragraph of the letter:

The bill is applicable to all employees, including prevailing rates, seasonal and sessional, and in order to establish whether the annual compensation will be above or below $1,000, accounting officers will establish what would be the amount earned if the employee were continuously employed for the full twelve months, and then treat the employee in accordance with the classification thus theoretically established.

When it comes down to returning the ten per cent, then all kinds of regulations are made so that the civil servants will not be able to get it back. But when it was a question of deducting, then if a man earned $16, or had been paid during the past year $35 for some small services he might have rendered, he was taxed $3.50. Then we are told by hon. members opposite that this is a most generous move, and that the 18,000 people affected will to a considerable extent be benefited.

These deductions are made, in the face of a statement by the minister made on April 18, which is reported at page 2284, of Hansard, as follows:

To achieve this result, there has necessarily been a rigid scrutiny and control of departmental activities and personnel. From 1930 to 1933, government employees, including fluctuating as well as permanent staffs, were reduced by over 12,000 in number. The saving in salaries and wages exceeds $10,000,000 a year, not including the saving of some $7,800,000 arising out of the ten per cent salary deduction.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, that from this particular class of service there has been a saving in salaries and wages exceeding $10,000,000 a year, outside of the sum of $7,800,000, and all this without one cent of expense for collection. Yet, when it comes to handing back some of this money we find exactly the contrary attitude. In other words the government took away from the service every penny it possibly could, and now when the time comes when they could do something, particularly in view of the tremendous amount of money they collected so easily, they deny even the most elementary rights of justice.

I could elaborate at greater length. What does the taking away of that amount of money from the civil servants amount to? It means that between the years 1930 and 1933, at a saving of $10,000,000 a year there has been a total saving of $30,000,000 in addition to the saving of $7,800,000 for a period of three years, amounting to $23,400,000, or a grand total of $53,400,000. There is that amount of money less in circulation among the civil service employees. One can readily imagine the amount of purchasing power which has been lost.

Next I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to the denial of promotions. This is one point which could not be considered in connection with the figures quoted by the minister. A vacancy may be created, by death or otherwise. The new appointee is not placed in the position at the salary he or she should have, but performs the work which had previously been performed at a much higher salary. Those people find themselves in the same position as the acting lance corporal, but without pay. This procedure, also, is against the recommendations of the Civil Service Commission.

As the service is not limited to the city of Ottawa, let us see what the opinion is in Brantford. I have before me a newspaper clipping dated April 12, from that city, which reads as follows:

> There wasn't much rejoicing around the post office over the announcement all employees receiving under $1,000 would get back that ten per cent pay cut. Only one is affected—the boy who delivers special delivery letters. His pay will be raised from nine cents a letter to ten cents.

This, taken with the cheque for one cent produced some time ago by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) would indicate that surely this is a one cent government.

At this point I should like to say only a word or two with reference to certain editorials, but I am afraid that because of the decision rendered only lately by you, Mr. Speaker, any criticism appearing in an editorial directed against a measure before the house would not be received. However, I would suggest that anyone interested in the matter, and any hon. member appreciating the meaning of this measure, should refer to the editorials of the Ottawa Journal of April 10, and the Ottawa Citizen of April 11.

However, as I have dispensed with the other editorial comments I shall direct my attention to only one of them which does not affect the bill. I commend this article to the attention of every hon. member. This is an editorial of the Ottawa Journal dated Saturday April 14,—and because of the writing of this article I can forgive the Ottawa Journal for many articles they have written. It is as follows:

> One of the most significant things in Canada during the past week was something that few people noticed. It was that the government's decision to do nothing substantial about civil service salaries was almost entirely ignored.
> Here in Ottawa, of course, there was regret and disappointment. But outside of this city, in the dominion as a whole, the matter went all but unnoticed. Not a newspaper, that we have seen, whether published in our larger cities, or in smaller centres, evinced the slightest concern. The thing was deemed unworthy of comment.

I read this because I should like the points contained herein to be brought to the attention of all hon. members. What does this mean?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, I must rise to a point of order. I submit it is not competent to read either a newspaper editorial or an article calling in question a matter before parliament. The hon. member for Ottawa is contravening the rules in doing so. Members of parliament are here to give expression to the voice of the people.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I suppose the point of order raised by the minister will have to come out of the time I had at my disposal. I hope the minister has not spoken with a view to interrupting the reading of the article, in other words that he has not attempted to trip me on a mere matter of time. I think it would be well for Your Honour to give a ruling once and for all as to what we are or are not to do. Only last night the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) read the whole of an editorial into his speech. Then, earlier in the week the same question was raised, and in connection therewith I was pleased to read what Your Honour said when, on that occasion, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) spoke. Your Honour then decided you would look into the nature of the editorial. As it did not attack the measure before the house, and was not a comment upon the legislation itself, your decision was that the hon. member was at liberty to use it. I cannot think that there would be one decision for one member and another for another. I have the highest regard for Your Honour's decisions, and respect them at all times, but I do submit that in reading this article, one which has nothing to do with the bill but which simply explains the situation of certain classes of people in Canada, I am well within my right. It does not criticize the policy of the government, but it brings to the attention of hon. members the fact that a certain category of government employees are worthy of some consideration. Possibly Your Honour would permit me to take the same liberty as you accorded the hon. member for Souris. In that event I could read the article, and then if Your Honour decided I should not have read it you might order that it be expunged from the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: The article read by the hon. member for Ottawa is on different lines from that read by the hon. member for Souris. As I understand what the hon. member has read it does comment directly on a matter before the house. The precedent as laid down by Bourinot, has been cited so often that there can be no necessity to repeat it at this time. I do not think the hon. member for Ottawa is in order in reading further the article, part of which he has already read.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It may be that what I have already read was not in order, but what I should like to read now is certainly in order. I do not wish to quarrel with Your Honour's decision but I suggest I should be accorded the same privilege which was extended to the hon. member for Souris. If you find, after reading the article, that it should not have been read Your Honour could say so at a later date. But if Your Honour came to the conclusion that I was within my rights in so reading the article you could so state.

Mr. SPEAKER: My ruling is that the editorial does comment directly on legislation before the house. The article read by the hon. member refers to the policies of parties. It is perfectly in order for the hon. member to make his own comments but the extracts which he is reading are not authoritative at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that we might have some decision which might be understood. I may be dense but I fail to understand just when I am permitted to read an editorial. I was very careful not to read certain ones I have just mentioned because they would constitute a violation of the rules. However, I am bound to accept Your Honour's ruling, but I must make these observations for my own satisfaction.

My time is about exhausted. For the reasons I have given I certainly cannot accept the principle of this bill which is one of deduction, and secondly, one of a continuance of deduction, also because it is so niggardly in its provisions. I am grateful for the little that has been done in a small way for a small class, but as I cannot accept the principle of this bill I shall vote against it.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, before the second reading of this bill is adopted I think we are supposed to express our opinion in regard to the principle embodied in it. Lest the second reading should go by without very much protest, thereby conveying the impression that this chamber is almost unanimously in favour of this bill and the principle embodied therein, I feel like voicing my own opposition to the principle of the further continuance of the salary deduction.

We have had this salary deduction imposed on our civil service for the years 1932 and 1933, and on each of those occasions I took the privilege of speaking in favour of the principle. I did so for various reasons. I realized that the Finance minister had difficulty in meeting his obligations. Revenues were down, expenditures were increasing, and it was necessary to conserve in the expenditure of money in every way possible. Also I realized that throughout the country in general there was a tendency among business firms, commercial houses, agricultural people, school teachers and so on to reduce salaries, and the government therefore was simply moving with the general tendency in the years 1932 and 1933.

But now, Mr. Speaker, conditions are somewhat different from what they were two years ago. Instead of business firms and commercial houses reducing salaries and having their employees get along on a lower wage scale, just the reverse is happening. We notice in the papers quite frequently items such as this one from Chemainus, B.C. This dispatch is dated February 28, 1934, and it says that nearly one thousand employees get a pay increase. The Victoria Lumber and Manufacturing Company have given their employees a wage increase of approximately ten per cent, effective March 1. I have another clipping here from Toronto, that the Toronto board of education has decided against any salary reduction in 1934, and has restored to the teachers the five per cent reduction that was in effect during the last two years.

Also another clipping to the effect that the United States Senate overrode administration forces and voted to restore one-third of the federal pay cut of last February and to give back the full fifteen per cent reduction effective July 1. And so on. I could quote a number of similar extracts showing that there is a general tendency to restore that which has been taken away for the past couple of years.

It seems to me that the dominion government will be moving along the right line if they too decide to restore that which has been kept back from the civil service for the past two years. I realize that they are making a slight gesture in that direction, but it is so slight that it is very difficult even to see it, and the benefits accruing therefrom are not going to be very extensive. It would seem to me that if the entire salary cut were restored to the civil service, while it would mean the raising of an additional $8,000,000, yet the benefits to be derived from putting that amount of money into circulation would be felt in a great many channels throughout the country, including the channels of taxation. It would mean, for example, that the returns from the sales tax would be considerably increased; it would mean that the income tax returns would also be increased. It would mean that business in general throughout the dominion would receive such a stimulus that it is quite likely that a considerable portion of the additional $8,000,000 expended would come back into the dominion treasury before the end of the year.

But in any case, even though it did not, I note in Hansard that the minister in his budget address tells us that he anticipates revenue for the ensuing year to exceed expenditure by the amount of $8,800,000. That being the case, even though there should be no revenue at all come back because of this $8,000,000 of additional expenditure, there would yet be $800,000 of a surplus, according to the minister's own figures.

Another point I would like to put before the minister is this. The government of the day has penalized the civil service of this country for two years by subjecting the civil service to a ten per cent reduction. But the wages of money have not yet been penalized. The largest item in our estimates is made up of interest on our public debt, $141,494,853.65 being the interest for the ensuing year. Without going into the question whether the government is competent legally to take action in regard to interest reduction, although I realize that Australia has taken action and reduced her interest charges by 22½ per cent, I would point out that if the government did take action and reduced interest charges by ten per cent, so that a levy was put on the wages of money, as well as having a levy put for the past two years on the wages of hard-working civil servants —if we put such a levy on the interest accumulating on our national debt it would bring us in over fourteen million dollars in one year. I would commend to the minister, if he feels that he must have this additional money, the taking of action along the line of reducing the wages of money, which is interest, and restoring to the hard-working civil servants that which I am sure they will be glad to receive, and if they receive it I am sure they will put it into circulation by spending it properly.

Mr. T. F. AHEARN (Ottawa): My colleague the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) who has just spoken, is recognized, I think, in this house as an authority on civil service matters, and therefore I do not propose to elaborate on the civil service statistics that he has presented to the house.

When the salary deduction bill of two years ago was introduced I stated that in my opinion such a bill was a wide open invitation to business to discharge employees and cut salaries. I think the same thing applies to-day. The businessmen of the country follow the lead of the government; the government is a barometer to business and industry. Public employees were being discharged, retirements were being hastened and salaries were cut and the employers observed that barometer and tightened their belts. Up to that time many employers had felt that they were doing a patriotic duty by trying to maintain wages and keep employees at work but the government legislation gave them a definite lead. I believe this action of the government is simply a vote of want of confidence in its own fiscal policy; it is simply a matter of deflation, of tightening the belt and it has been followed throughout the country. It is a strange paradox to see the government causing unemployment and the lowering of wages on the one hand and paying out huge sums of moneys for relief with the other. I think the condition of our revenues to-day can be blamed on the basic policies of this government. Towering tariff walls and extreme deflation all along the line must lead inevitably to a burden of direct taxation. The present policy is not different from what it was in 1930.

I think hon. members will realize that the civil service is what might be described as Ottawa's most important industry. It employs the greatest number of men and women and the wages and salaries paid are more than those paid by all other industries combined. The purchasing power of the city depends upon the civil service. When the dismissals occurred, followed by the ten per cent cut and the loss of the statutory increases, a terrific blow was dealt to this city. I do not believe the people throughout the country realize what a concentrated blow was dealt to one particular community. The effect of the dismissals and the cut in salaries was immediately felt in Ottawa. The earnings of practically all business concerns began to fall and many were forced to follow the government's example. Where three persons had been employed in a grocery store, let us say, one was let out and as a rule the two kept on suffered some reduction in pay. Business failures became quite prevalent. I know, from my own experience, that many Ottawa businessmen are simply hanging on by their finger nails. A large departmental store which was founded by men who had played a big part in the building up of this city and whose memory is still fresh in the minds of most of the people of Ottawa went into receivership. The irony of it all is that this was caused by a government whose election promise was employment for all.

Last January the number of heads of families on direct relief in Ottawa was 5,000. The census of 1930 gives Ottawa a population of only 130,000. Those in charge of the relief situation in Ottawa tell me that there are still about 4,700 heads of families on direct relief. There are also many unemployed persons being taken care of by relatives, while the missions and hostels are full of single men. The welfare bureau estimates five to a family, so hon. members will see that the unemployment situation in this city has assumed very serious proportions. I think any businessman in Ottawa will admit that the problem with respect to unoccupied houses, shops and apartments is becoming very grave.

If the reports in the press are true that employment is increasing in Canada, I am afraid Ottawa has lagged far behind. Optimistic reports have appeared in the press and optimistic statements have been made by members of the ministry in connection with the rise in revenues and I do not think anything else has received as much attention from my constituents. They feel that if these things are true, then they should receive some relief. However, I am afraid their hopes have been blasted. That seems to be the only definite policy of the government, to blast the hopes of the people of this country.

In these days of disappointments, we must be thankful for small mercies, and the return of the salary deduction of ten per cent to certain employees—I understand they number about 1,200 of whom about 700 are charwomen—is a matter of real satisfaction to the people of this city. Perhaps these people needed it the most, but the fact remains that this bill does not benefit the real civil service of the country. I understand that in Ottawa there are about 10,500 people who will not be affected by the provisions of this bill. These are the people who are charged with the main responsibility of carrying on the varied activities of government, but this great body of men and women receive no relief by the removal of the salary deduction or the restoration of the statutory increases. I warn the government, in all seriousness, that its policies with respect to the civil service are beginning to undermine the morale of the service as a whole. The service is beginning to feel that the present government has no sympathy for it or for those who live in the capital of Canada. Faith and hope are becoming seriously undermined in Ottawa. The minister tells the civil service to go on hoping. Now the civil service of Canada, as I think all hon. members of this house will agree, are an exceptionally fine body of men and women and they have exceptionally fine and high traditions of service. I remember, and I think hon. gentlemen will also recollect, the statement made by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin in which he expressed words of high appreciation of those civil servants of Canada with whom he had come in contact, and, coming from a country where the civil service stands very high in the esteem of the people, he paid the civil service of Canada, I think, a great compliment. After dashing to the ground the hopes of the civil service, the Minister of Finance, speaking on the budget, made the following statement as reported at page 2293 of Hansard:

> At the same time, while the improvement has been gradual, it has not only been sustained but has progressively increased. This is evidenced by the splendid increases in both imports and exports for the month of March, which show a proportionate advance in volume of trade hitherto unprecedented.
> It is generally recognized that this depression and its blighting effects have been world wide. This fact of itself has had the tendency to produce a "depression psychology," followed by what might be termed a "depression weariness." The result is that we do not so readily recognize and properly appraise the incontrovertible evidences of reviving activity which have made their appearance.
> These signs of improvements are so marked as to indicate beyond question that we are on the road to recovery. May we with renewed hope, fresh courage and firm step—

I wonder who wrote that.

> —press on towards the goal of better and happier days which lie not far ahead.

The minister is certainly optimistic and full of hope, and I cannot help feeling, as I am sure most other people feel, that he might have done somewhat better in this matter of salary restoration. He plainly voices a hope there, but he is not willing to take a chance of any kind. I understand that the revenues of the country in April have improved to a marked degree.

The policy of our neighbours in the United States has been to raise the wage levels and to reduce unemployment, but by a strange paradox this policy did not provide for the restoration of salary reductions to the civil service, which I understood amounted to 15 per cent. So that the Senate of the United States, no doubt realizing that this was inconsistent with a recovery program, have passed, over the president's veto, an act which provides for the full restoration of the 15 per cent by next July. An extremely cautious chancellor of the exchequer has also restored half of the reduction to the civil service of Great Britain. It seems, therefore, that the legislatures of Great Britain and the United States appreciate their respective civil services rather more than we do ours in Canada. Personally, I think that if there had been only a restoration of say half the cuts it would have caused great satisfaction in this country and would have stimulated business men. They would have felt that things were on the upgrade, and that the government was leading the way in the restoration of higher wage levels and greater employment.

I cannot help regretting that the minister, who has one of the kindest hearts in this house, did not feel himself able to do something substantial for a body of people who have suffered severely during the last two or three years. People generally forget, and perhaps hon. members in this house do, that during the boom years, 1927, 1928 and 1929, the wage increases to those engaged in industry generally reached a point 90 per cent above the figures of 1913, while those of civil servants went up to only 60 per cent. If civil service salaries do not keep pace with those paid in general industry, can the people of Ottawa be blamed for coming more and more to the conclusion that the government is not really in sympathy with the civil service and the people who live here?

Let me take the example afforded by the order in council brought down by the Secretary of State a few years ago, providing that no civil servant may run for the city council or the board of control without the permission of the head of the department. Consider the number of civil servants entitled to vote in municipal elections in Ottawa. They are wanted in the city council of Ottawa because they naturally represent a very large cross-section of the city and of Ottawa public opinion. Let us suppose that a large industry pursued the same policy; I think a roar of disapproval would go up. I would suggest that that order in council be rescinded.

An election is being indefinitely delayed, and the people of Canada are voting no confidence in the government. Now public opinion must be heeded by public men. I commend Canadian history to those who doubt that statement. I commend them to look at what happened to the government of Alexander Mackenzie who remained in office a little too long; I understand that the Liberal party was out for about twenty years. And Sir Charles Tupper also disregarded byelection results, and we all know that the Conservative party was out of office fifteen years. It can be seen, I think, that history has a marvelous way of repeating itself. I commend that thought to members of the present government

I rather hope that the present government does stay in one year longer than the ordinary life of parliament, because the public will know how to deal with those who will not respect popular opinion. Let them stay in, praying for the backwash of Roosevelt and British prosperity; but the people will exact the penalty all the same. History teaches that.

In the next election campaign the Prime Minister, I suppose, will address an audience in Ottawa, and I shall not be surprised or shocked if the audience at that meeting forms itself into a giant glee club and sings at the conclusion of his address:

> It is all very well to dissemble your love,
> But why did you kick us downstairs?

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a very few words on the measure before the house. I notice the previous speaker said that Sir Charles Tupper disregarded byelections. I think it would have been fairer if he had said that Tupper was warned by them; possibly the recent byelection in Canada will have its effect on the government of the day and maybe we shall not have an election this year.

I have always maintained in this house a consistent attitude against reductions in salaries. I am, in fact, one of the few who have been opposed to a reduction in our own indemnity.

Mr. AHEARN: In the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, I think so, if I remember correctly. When this salary deduction legislation was originally passed I understood it was to be for just a year and of course we have had a reiteration of that policy from year to year since the act was first passed. We have now the spectacle where the government comes to the house in a spirit of contrition and the amount of money that is going to be returned to the civil service is about two per cent of the original cut. I was pleased to-day to see the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) also in a spirit of contrition. We are gradually winning over all those who thought the soundest way to get out of the depression was by decreasing wages. Now we see the general movement toward what I consider the sound stand adopted by the forces of labour in this country in connection with wages. Whether we like it or not, the salaries paid constitute the cornerstone of the business life of the dominion. That has been recognized in every country in the world. It has been recognized in part by the institution of a committee under the jurisdiction of the government. It has been recognized by the republic to the south of us. It has been recognized by the government of Great Britain in giving back to their civil servants some part of the deductions made in their salaries. It has been recognized by the railroads of the United States. I notice in today's paper that the ten per cent deduction placed in operation there is going to be returned completely to the men during the next year. It has also been recognized by the government of Ontario; whether on the basis of pure economics or politics, I would not like to say. Nevertheless they in their wisdom find that the soundest way of bringing that province and, of course, this country in turn, back on an even keel is by a restitution of the reduction of wages put into operation by them.

I would like to have seen the federal government go further. I do not say that for political effect; it is a position I have always taken, a position the labour movement in this and every other country has taken in connection with wages of men and women not only in the civil service but also in industrial and business pursuits. Until we find a way of permitting the people to consume the things they produce, we shall never get out of the woods and that is true not only of this but of every other country. The present recommendation of the government does not go far enough; it includes 18,000 civil servants who receive wages below $1,000 per annum and I understand it affects only two per cent of the permanent service.

I would like to make one or two suggestions to the minister particularly in regard to temporary employees, and especially stenographers. I understand their salaries are based on a daily wage and of course they will not come within the confines of this legislation. I believe they should be treated just the same as some of the more highly paid officials of the government whose duties to a large degree centre around the sessions of parliament. It would be a constructive policy that rather than those girls being paid just for the five or six months they are here, they should be granted an annual salary and possibly allowed to come within the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. I think it is fair to say that most of them, when they leave here, are more or less kept in idleness until the next session of parliament rolls around. I am not saying this in criticism of the conditions enjoyed by those higher officials of the house whom I have mentioned.

Further, I do not think the bill goes far enough. Many of the employees coming within the provisions of the bill are single. If they are not single; if the argument should be that many of them are married, I would suggest as I have done before that their wage rates be investigated by the Stevens committee now considering the question of sweated labour. But it would have been well had the government taken into consideration particularly married men and those with family responsibilities who are outside the provisions of this legislation. I believe the government has a direct responsibility to see to it that the wages and working conditions of their own married employees conform to an adequate, might I say a Canadian standard of living. It would be well if the government would seriously consider this matter.

It is passing strange to see how the mental outlook of human beings goes in cycles. We get the cycle where people think the solution to the problem is through cutting wages. May I make this observation: if that is a solution to the problem, then let us work for nothing and we shall all become rich. If low wages and intolerable conditions constitute the basis of the success of any country, China and India would be the most successful in the world. I have no patience with some people who think because somebody else has a cut in wages, the civil servants should also have one. I do not think it is a sound policy to spread the misery. There would have been some soundness in the attitude of the government toward this question had they adopted a policy similar to that enunciated by the Postmaster General of Australia when he spoke recently before the members within the confines of this house. As he said, the obligation was spread not only over the wages and working conditions of the people in Australia, but also over the wages of money.

Mr. BEYNON: He cut the wages of the civil service there.

Mr. MITCHELL: You know how much it was as well as I do; I don't need to tell you. I am not supporting the position taken by the minister, I am just saying that the position of this government would have been far sounder if their policy took into consideration the reduction of the wages of money as well as the wages of human beings.

I have just had a note handed to me which says that the wages of a stenographer amount to less than $1,000 a year but they do not get back the ten per cent cut. I understand that their wages are on the basis of $5 a day rather than a yearly wage, which of course places them outside of the confines of this legislation.

I give the government some measure of congratulation for the steps they have taken, but I very much regret that they were not able to go the whole way, because I do not think that this country will ever get back to what might be called a normal condition until there is recognition of the fact that the consuming power of the men and women engaged in industry, the average man and woman, is the corner stone of the prosperity of the country.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): I wish to add a few words to the protest that has been made by other members on this side of the house in connection with this bill. Like the others I am of course in favour of the bill in so far as it restores some of the deductions that have been made in former years. But I believe the government could have gone considerably further in restoring the deductions to the lower grades. I believe when the bill came up in 1932 some members on this side, possibly of this group, proposed an amendment that the deductions should not apply to any salary or wage less than $1,800 a year. I believe that $1,800 enables a family, if it is not too large, to have a fairly decent standard of living, though not at all commensurate with what we could have in this country if we had proper distribution and were allowed to produce wealth in the way and to the amount that we could. So I suggest to the minister and the government even now that, as they feel that conditions are improving and that there has been some gain since the date on which the announcement was made and the bill introduced in the house, they should consider increasing the number of exemptions in the bill.

Before I say anything more, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) upon the position he has taken to-day. I remember last year when I spoke along similar lines he censured me rather severely, which hurt me somewhat, and which I rather resented at the time, because I pointed out then that I was not seeking an increase for myself, that I would have even agreed to have my own indemnity still further reduced if thereby those who were getting lower wages could have their salaries increased or could be exempted from the deduction. I am glad to-day to see that he has come to realize that, as I think the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) said, we cannot bring back prosperity by reducing wages.

Another effect of the salary deduction bill is that it has eliminated the annual increments resulting from promotions from one grade to another. This also is a hardship, and I do not think it is right that it should continue. I also wish to point out that the government itself is violating the terms of the bill by discriminating between individuals in the civil service. I have before me copies of various orders in council that have been passed recently increasing salaries. There is one case of an inspector in the income tax office for Montreal district who had his salary increased from $4,500 to $5,800. I think when a person is receiving a salary of $4,500 a year he is suffering no great hardship, that he can live fairly decently on that. Yet we have the government, that refuses to increase the salary of stenographers who receive a very small wage, or continues to reduce the wages of others who receive more than $1,000 a year, increasing the salary of a person who is already receiving the relatively high salary of $4,500 a year. There is another, an assistant inspector of income tax at the Montreal office, whose salary has been increased from $2,800 to $4,000 under authority of order in council. Another one, a clerk, grade one, raised to grade two. Another, a clerk, grade one, promoted to grade three, an increase of wages going with all of these promotions. Rather than discriminate in this manner, I think it would be much better for the government to restore altogether the deductions that have been made and bring harmony and contentment into the civil service. I believe that we are all becoming convinced now that the great problem before the world, and the problem that is facing this dominion, is to find some means to distribute the wealth that we can produce in such great abundance. I am quite satisfied that we can never do that by decreasing the medium through which the individuals draw upon that wealth.

In my opinion the government should be a model employer. They should set an example to other employers. That does not mean being extravagant or wasteful. They should first set a remuneration sufficient to provide a certain standard of living, and then see that no one in their employ receives less than that remuneration. I say again that the government would be wise, they would be doing a good thing for this country by restoring all the deductions made in 1932, or, as a minimum, by exempting from the bill all employees receiving less than $2,000 a year.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): To begin with a minor matter, I think there must be some misunderstanding in the minds of many hon. members of the house and of the sessional staff in connection with the staff's remuneration or the deduction. A pay day has passed since the minister announced that the ten per cent would be restored in part, and the staff has had no restoration. Apparently for that reason they think they are not going to get any. Take the question of the stenographers who get around $150 a month, which is figured as $1,800 a year. That being over $1,000, the department has ruled that they cannot get the ten per cent restored. But I do not see how the government can possibly evade—I do not believe they want to—the terms of the bill that:

> no provision of this act shall operate to reduce the compensation of any member of the public service of Canada below one thousand dollars per annum.

If it be found at the end of the year that members of this staff have not earned $1,000 in the year I suggest that it is very much up to the government to give them back the ten per cent for the limited portion of the year which they have worked, even though at the time they were working at a rate greater than one thousand dollars a year. That seems only reasonable. I trust the minister will take steps, either by regulation or perhaps by an explanation in committee, to make that clear. I wish he would do so, because there is a great deal of misunderstanding not only among hon. members but also among people to whom this matter is one of great concern.

I wish to touch upon another method of accounting, which I think is unfair. Seamen on government boats receive very small pay —I believe it is $65 a month—and board. The government have a habit of putting a fictitious valuation, inasmuch as it is a sum arranged by themselves, on the value of the board the seamen receive. That amount is added to the $65, with the result that the total is brought to a point where the ten per cent may be deducted. These men are not given very much in cash. They are given the food the government buys for them, which is bought at a price the government purchaser thinks best. Whether or not the buying is done in the most economic way, we do not know and the men concerned have no say in the matter. They are charged with a certain sum—and I forget whether it is $25 or $35 per month—but at least an arbitrary sum which is reckoned as part of their wages. Many of the men are married and have to maintain homes on land. It is notorious that a man living with his family can live far cheaper than when living by himself. Surely that is a matter which should be taken into consideration. For instance, if a department sends a permanent official from Ottawa out to the Pacific coast or to any other point in the dominion on public business, the whole of his expenses are paid while such official is away. Bills for hotel accommodation, board, and other necessary expenditures are paid. Those men are not charged with the board expenses, nor is the ten per cent deduction taken on the additional amount. Such computation would not be reasonable.

The next thing I would expect to hear—and I am afraid to make the suggestion for fear the minister should grasp at it—is that the men would be charged for their sleeping accommodation, blankets and so on. Although this may be a matter of small concern to most people in the dominion, it is of great concern to the men directly interested. I know of my own personal knowledge that it does make a very great difference. Taking the ten per cent from a man who is receiving only $65 in cash for the support of his wife, his home and his children, acts as a severe strain on his resources.

To some extent I should like to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis). I suggest that as times are improving, and as in every return, national revenues are increasing, the minister might consider whether in months to come, possibly in a period of six months from the beginning of the fiscal year, he could reconsider the situation, and just now make the necessary provision in the act. If at that time he found conditions had improved sufficiently, instead of waiting another six months he could then restore the ten per cent cut in its entirety. In my view he might very well do that. Such procedure would not cost him any money if the revenue was not coming in as fast as he thought it should be to justify a further increase. The minister himself showed an indication of his views in this connection because, as a matter of fact, he hesitated to make a decision in regard to the reductions until he had before him the last possible returns so as to ascertain what action would be justified.

At this point I shall deal with the bill in its wider aspects, and first congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his courage in bringing down that which he must know is an unpopular measure. With an election in sight he must realize that in the larger cities or those points of the dominion where civil servants predominate, the measure will not be received kindly. It could not have been his own disposition to incur all the odium involved, unless he considered his action entirely necessary. For that and other reasons I shall vote for the second reading of the bill. I do suggest however that he should have made the minimum limit greater, and in committee

I shall take the liberty to vote for an increase of the minimum from $1,000 to $1,500 or $2,000. That, I believe, would be reasonable. Civil servants living in towns or cities have to pay rent and are forced to buy everything they require in the way of vegetables. They have no garden facilities, they have to pay carfare and other like expenditures, and under those conditions $2,000 for a man with a family is only a mere living wage. I think the minimum, should have been placed at least in the neighbourhood of $1,800 or $2,000.

The suggestion has been made that we should all be in favour of high wages. I am in favour of high wages; I believe that a country is most prosperous when it can afford to pay high wages. But at the present time we are not discussing the question of wages throughout Canada; we are discussing the private business of the government of Canada. I do not think we could do anything better to promote the prosperity of the dominion government than to make an attempt to balance our budget. We are not dealing with a matter of wages, and I decline to be placed in the position whereby, because I vote for this bill, I am accused of being in favour of low wages. That is not the fact. I think that under present conditions the minister is justified in not going any farther in connection with restoring reductions than, as I suggest, to those under $2,000 a year. I am sorry he has not been able to give it all back. Under those circumstances we would all be getting the ten per cent which was cut off our indemnities, and for that reason there is a personal interest in it. If we wished to voice a grievance we might say that the cut was unfair, because the ten per cent is taken off our gross incomes, while on the other hand it is taken off the net incomes of civil servants. We are perfectly well aware that while we receive a certain indemnity, the sum we actually receive is largely reduced by the necessary expense incurred in obtaining it. I suppose 75 per cent or 80 per cent is spent in that way, and the real deduction should have been made on the 20 per cent or 25 per cent remaining. However I am not complaining, but I am simply pointing out in passing that the civil servant who receives $4,000 has that $4,000 to spend on his own private affairs. We do not get that. However, if the minister states, and the state of his budget reveals that no change can be made, I am prepared to suffer with the rest of the people. I must say however that in the country districts I have seen much of the bitterness of poverty. I have seen the scarcity, and scraping which has to be endured even by people in receipt of steady jobs, but whose incomes are so small that they are doing without many of the things considered necessary. Life insurance policies have had to be given up and I have known of many cases where men owning their modest homes have had to take the risk of losing them, because they simply could not afford to pay the premiums on fire insurance policies. I am not prepared to go to those people and say, "I am voting for an increase by ten per cent in the salaries of people getting from $4,000 up to $15,000 and $20,000." I could not show them that such action was justified. It must be admitted that when a person is receiving a salary of $2,000 or one which is to any substantial extent beyond that, the ten per cent is not being taken off the amount which must necessarily be devoted to the absolute necessities of life, as would be the case in the lower grades. The reduction in those cases is really taken from the amount those people would spend on luxuries. One would wonder what the word "luxuries" implies. The man receiving $10,000 per year has an interpretation of the word altogether different from the man who is receiving only $800 a year. To the man receiving the smaller sum a luxury might mean a two-bit movie once a month, or perhaps shoes which the children really need. I am prepared to go to my constituency and defend my action in this matter. In connection with those people receiving up to as high as $15,000 a year in the public service it cannot be said that a ten per cent reduction reduces their absolute necessities, as it does in the case of those working in the lower grades and receiving below, we will say, $1,800.

With the reservation that I should like to see the minister raise the minimum, in the manner I have indicated, I shall vote for the second reading of the bill.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my attitude in regard to salary reductions is too well known for me to go into any lengthy detail in my discussion of this measure. May I repeat what I said when salary deductions were under consideration before, that I believe the limit as to those who should suffer the reduction or deduction, as you wish to put it, should be raised. The limit suggested at that time was that no salary under $2,000 should suffer a reduction or deduction. I still hold to that opinion. What has brought me to my feet to-day more than anything else is to remind the Minister of Finance of a promise that he made during the debate on this question in a previous session. He will remember that I drew his attention to what I from my experience as Postmaster General considered an injustice that would be done to the commission postmasters. I pointed out on that occasion that if there was a reduction in the revenue of the office the commission postmaster would suffer a double deduction, a deduction of ten per cent in his regular salary, and in addition he would suffer a deduction because of the lower revenue of his office upon which his salary was placed. I also pointed out other injustices which I thought would be caused under the act as it was then laid before the house. I was pretty strong in my opposition, and the Minister of Finance on that occasion rose in his place in the house and told me, as well as the house although he was replying more directly to my argument, that if any injustice were done or any harm caused, if anything needed to be rectified, he would take steps to have it done.

Now we come to this bill which restores the salaries to a certain number of the civil servants, but I find that nothing is being done in this bill for the commission postmasters. Let me give an example of how they have been affected in the last couple of years. I have made a calculation here for myself for one post office for which I have the revenue figures for 1930 and 1933. It is the post office of Rosthern. The revenue in 1930 was $8,168, and in 1933 the revenue had fallen to $6,575. Let me be well understood. That is not the salary of the postmaster, but the revenue of the post office. How is his salary arrived at? In an office of that kind the postmaster gets a commission of 70 per cent on the sale of the first $1,000 of stamps, and 30 per cent on the sale of stamps from $1,000 to $10,000, and from $10,000 upwards a commission of ten per cent. Now, making the calculation, what do we find? In 1930 the revenue was $8,168. His commission from the sale of the first $1,000, at 70 per cent, would be $700. His commission on the balance, at 30 per cent, would be $2,150, or a total of $2,850. I am not taking into consideration the postal notes and money orders that were issued through his office because I had no means of ascertaining when I made this calculation what they amounted to, nor am I taking into account any allowance for what is called night service and forwarding allowance in the Post Office Department. I am taking the bare salary based on revenue clear of those allowances. They cannot amount to very much, about $200 or $250 in a post office of that class. That is as high as they amount to, and if they get it in one year all you have to do is to add it to the next year.

As I said, the revenue for 1930 was $8,168, and in 1933 the revenue had fallen to $6,575. Let us calculate his salary based on that reduced revenue. On the sale of the first $1,000 of stamps, his commission at 70 per cent amounts to the same as before, $700. His commission of 30 per cent on the sale of the balance of the $6,575 would give him $1,672, or a total of $2,372 in 1933 as compared with $2,850 in 1930.

Now this postmaster does not do the work of his office alone. He has to have assistants, and in an office with a revenue of $8,000 the chances are, in fact I am pretty sure, that he has at least two assistants, if not three. Those assistants are not paid by the government but are paid out of that bulk salary received by the commission postmaster, based on the revenue of his office less his regular civil service ten per cent deduction. The ten per cent deduction which is applied to his regular salary does not apply to the salary of his assistants because the government has no control over them. The postmaster may, in order to try to make up for some of the reduction he has suffered on account of the fall in revenue of the office, reduce the salaries of his three assistants. But it is a question whether he can reduce them very much. He is certainly not able to reduce them to the extent of $378.

Now what does this postmaster's reduction amount to? There is first the ten per cent deduction on his salary of $2,372 in 1933. Next there is the percentage deduction on the difference between the revenue in 1930 and the revenue in 1933. It amounts to practically 26 or 27 per cent.

I hope I have made it plain enough to the Minister of Finance to induce him to go to the Post Office Department and get them to check up on these figures, and then I am sure he will be convinced that a great injustice has been done to the commission postmasters throughout the country. They are in quite a different position from those civil servants receiving a regular salary. They are in a different position from a postmaster in an office classified as B-2. When a post office reaches a certain revenue, between $10,000 and $12,000, and the city where the post office is located has a certain population, the post office is of a different class. The postmaster who under the bulk system of revenue would be receiving for himself a salary of $3,000 or $2,500 we will say, and who must pay out of his bulk salary the salaries of his assistants, when he comes into the class B-2 post office has no longer the control of that bulk sum of revenue. It then comes directly to the department and the civil service commission classify the office and the postmaster begins at a minimum salary of $2,040, with increases of $60 a year up to the maximum of $2,400. The assistants who previous to his obtaining that classification were paid by him out of the bulk revenue of the office are no longer paid in that way. They become regular civil servants and their salaries are fixed by the civil service commission according to the classification of the post office in which they are working. The classification may give them $700, $750 or $900, and the postmaster has nothing at all to do with the fixing of their remuneration. The postmaster in the class B-2 post office becomes a regular civil servant. He suffers the salary deduction of ten per cent, say $200. But if he had not become a regular civil servant, if he remained under the old classification of his office, his deduction would have amounted to $400 or $500. In this way an injustice is done. The regular civil servant has suffered only a reduction in his salary which is fixed by the commission but the country postmaster has had to suffer a reduction in loss of revenue and a reduction in salary. If the revenues of the post office had kept up to the 1930 figure the injustice done would not have been so great, but I think it will be found that the revenues of a post office, especially of these commission offices, has been reduced considerably. I believe there is a difference of about $2,125,000 between the present revenues of the Post Office Department and what they were in 1930. I wish the minister would consider this matter and take it up with the officials of the Post Office Department.

I hold in my hand a copy of a memorial sent to the Post Office Department by the Canadian Postmasters' Association setting forth certain reasons why these things should be changed. I have given some of these reasons already and have added others. It cannot be said that this matter has not been brought to the attention of the government because the postmasters association has been very persistent in pointing out this injustice. When we were considering the bill which made a general reduction without any exception, I stated that I could not see how injustice could possibly be avoided.

There is certain information I should like to get when the bill is in committee. I do not oppose the second reading because we must be thankful for small mercies. The government has seen fit to make a readjustment up to a certain figure and while that does not meet my views in all respects, it is something.

[Mr. Veniot.]

I understand that some 18,000 servants—I am not going to call them civil servants—of the government will be affected by this measure. I am distinguishing between civil servants and workers outside of what is really known as the civil service, especially those workers who do not come under the civil service commission for appointment or dismissal. I should like to know how many revenue and non-revenue offices, that is accounting and non-accounting offices, will be affected by this measure. With the aid of the Postmaster General's report I have endeavoured to arrive at the number of non-accounting offices, and I find there are some 3,000. I think I am pretty close to the correct figure. These non-accounting offices are little country post offices in which the postmaster receives a salary of $100 per year. Previous to your humble servant occupying the position of Postmaster General in the former government, these postmasters received $60 per year. I increased this salary and I might say that that increase was strongly supported by the opposition of that day, the present government. The increases in these salaries and in connection with other offices amounted to over $1,000,000 in that year. But the present government has cut down these small, measly salaries. People will say that that does not make any difference, that this is ready-found money for these people as they are not dependent upon the salary for their living. That may be quite true but it must be remembered that they must give time to the work. There are many country post offices where the mails are received daily and although the revenue and the quantity of mail handled is small the postmaster or postmistress must attend to see that the mail is received and distributed. The postmaster cannot afford and the government cannot afford to have a separate building, and the postmaster uses his own house as the office. The government has done what I consider it had no right to do, cut down the rental allowance by ten per cent. A country postmaster may receive perhaps $20 per year for the use of his house but that has been cut by ten per cent. There are cases where the Post Office Department will not agree to a rental above $50 per year. Sometimes an application is made to the Department of Public Works and rather than undertake the construction of a public building to be used as a post office, that department will add $50 more for rental.

Not only was that allowance cut, but the allowance for night work was cut. Under our laws a country post office need not keep open after eight o'clock at night but any postmaster in a small country post office will tell you that people come in at eight, nine, ten, eleven and even twelve o'clock to get their mail. They come in from long distances and they see a light in the house and they come and ask for their mail. It has always been a question whether night service of that kind should be paid for by the department, but it was recognized in many cases. It does not amount to very much and is a help to the postmaster, and yet that night allowance is cut.

I am not going to ask the minister to look into too many things but I do ask him to look into the reduction in the rental, forwarding and night allowances. I ask him to see if some rectification cannot be made of what I claim to be injustices. From my experience as head of the department I know they are injustices. These injustices have existed for two years, which is too long. I hold the minister to the promise he made me when I withdrew my objection to the second reading of the bill last year, that any injustice which could be shown would be rectified. I feel quite sure the Post Office Department will admit that these are injustices and if they will not admit that, I should like to discuss them upon the floor of this house.

Mr .W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): I do not wish to delay the house for any length of time on this bill. I do wish however to associate myself to some extent with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). It is not very often that we see eye to eye, but on this occasion I think he was quite sound when he said that in discussing this bill we are not discussing wages in Canada but are discussing the private business of the government of this country. And I believe he was quite sound also when he said that a government cannot spend itself rich any more than an individual can. I know that an individual cannot because I have tried it. I cannot be at all surprised that the members representing the city of Ottawa should take the stand that they have taken on this bill. I can quite appreciate their being in favour of restoring the cut to the civil service of the country. I was however a little surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). It seemed to back up to some extent the stand taken by the junior member for Ottawa. He referred to the fact that business concerns in this city had gone bankrupt, and that was partly due to the reduction in the salaries of civil servants in the city. I want to say that the city of Ottawa does not know anything about depression. That is the situation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would that be a reason for inflicting this on Ottawa?

Mr. BEYNON: It is a reason why the people of the rest of Canada who are really suffering a depression and know what it means should not have to pay the additional taxation necessary to restore the cut. That is what it means, and I agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni when he says he could not support the restoration of the cut and go back to his constituents, who are suffering a decrease in revenue not comparable at all with the slight decrease which the civil servants have received, but infinitely greater, in some instances their revenue having been absolutely wiped out, and in other cases having slight revenues but being taxed to the limit of their capacity to pay the taxes of the country.

Then we have as a necessary measure one-half of the original tax on sugar. I will not stand up in this house and recommend returning the whole of the civil service cut until that tax is removed and until the revenues of the country will warrant its removal, because that is being borne by the whole of the people of Canada, who can much less afford it than the civil servants can afford to suffer this small cut.

People coming from western Canada to the city of Ottawa are struck by the fact that the people of Ottawa do not know the first thing about depression. The member for Kindersley is fully aware of that. He is a gentleman for whose views I have a great deal of respect and he is usually very sound, but I think he got off the trail this afternoon. I should like to see the salaries returned to civil servants. It is not that I have the slightest thing against the civil service and I should like to see them have the cut restored. But they are much better off, even with the reduction, than ninety-five per cent of the people of the west who are paying taxes to pay the salaries. That is the situation, and while that obtains I do not feel that I could stand in this house and advocate the return of the cut.

The hon. member for Kindersley spoke about taxing the wages of money. That subject has been explored, and he frankly admitted that he could not suggest how it could be done. I should like to see it done, and to a certain extent it is being done in so far as the refunding has been reducing interest. So far as the government is able to do that, they are doing it to their utmost.

There is one respect in which I wish to associate myself with the senior member for Ottawa, and that is with regard to the salaries of the sessional staff, those who are receiving as a matter of fact much less than one thousand a year because they are employed only during the term of the session. I do not think it is sound to compute their salary on the assumption that if employed all year they would receive over $1,000, because we know as a matter of fact that they are employed only a few months, less than half the year, and some of them come long distances. They are not overpaid. Those who have come since the increases were stopped get only $4 a day, and after they have paid their expenses they have little left. I hope the minister will give that consideration and that it can be adjusted.

I have also some sympathy with the arguments of the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). I know there are some postmasters in the revenue post offices who should receive consideration at the hands of the minister. While I am not as familiar with that subject as the ex-Postmaster General is, I know that there is hardship. How the matter can be adjusted I do not know but I am sure the minister will give it his attention.

That is all I wish to say on the subject. I have nothing in the world against the civil service or against their getting their pay back, but while the hardly-pressed people of the west are suffering hardships, while they are in that plight, I do not feel that I could stand in this house and ask that the reductions be restored.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I do not propose to take the time of the house for more than a few moments, especially as it will be more convenient, in committee of the whole, to deal with many of the individual and specific matters raised by different hon. members. I hope they will realize that if I make no reference to any specific instance they have brought up I shall be glad to do so when we are in committee.

There are however one or two general observations, as touching upon the principle of the bill, on which I wish to say a few words, as a reaction from some of the remarks made by certain hon. members. Take the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell). He may be surprised to hear me say that I have always been an advocate of high wages. You show me the country where you have high wages and high prices and I will show you a country in which there are far more prosperous conditions than there are in the country that has low wages and low prices. That is axiomatic. But my hon. friend goes off the rails, if I may use the vernacular, when he confuses wages with the amount paid to civil servants, which must come out of the pockets of the taxpayers, including the wage earners of the country.

My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni has suggested that it must be an unpleasant task for me to be associated with a measure of this kind. I assure him it is one of the most unpleasant duties I have ever had to discharge, and I have had many in my public life. But it is a duty, and one must perform one's duty. In that connection let me make this observation and I do it in all kindliness —with respect to a remark made by the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Ahearn) when he referred to the ill fate that befell the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie who was recognized as having been such an honest man that he said he had to sleep on the public chest with arms beside him to protect it against the raids of divers and sundry people. I do not profess to be a prophet, but I venture the opinion we are coming to the time in this country when men of the character of Alexander Mackenzie are going to receive a far greater degree of veneration than they did in times past. This dominion is strewn with wreckage in the form of public expenditures running into the tens and hundreds of millions of dollars which have been made with the acclaim of the people, not realizing, poor souls, that the day would come when they would be called upon to pay the bills. That day has arrived in very large measure and there is on the part of the Canadian people a consciousness toward public expenditures, the like of which has not obtained before. I hope the junior member for Ottawa does not continue along the trail indicated by the process of thought he showed here to-day, because if he does so, I venture to say that his continuance in public life will not be long. He was enunciating the theory that we should, to put the matter baldly, purchase the people with their own money. He had in mind the fact that in times past spending governments were popular governments. That was true, but, as I say, that was in the days when people did not stop to think and realize they would ultimately be called upon to foot the bills. I do not want to indulge in any heroics but my mind recalls a statement of Abraham Lincoln when he said: "I would rather be right than be president." I may say to the junior member for Ottawa that I would rather do my duty as I see it than be Prime Minister of Canada, even if that involves the protection of the people as against themselves. That leads me to say this: In the first place the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), and some other hon. members for whose opinions I have the highest respect, fail utterly to take into consideration the fact that we are passing through a period the like of which has not hitherto been known in the history of the world. The very world is rocking and we are coping with a condition which we cannot measure or deal with on the basis on which we would have dealt with it under what we knew in times past as normal conditions.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) for whose opinions, always formed as a matter of honest conviction, I have the highest respect, has fallen into error, I am afraid, when he suggests that by restoring the civil servants' pay we would improve conditions because we would be putting that much more money into circulation. I submit that we do no such thing. All we do is transfer from the pockets of all the taxpayers of Canada the $7,800,000 which would be required to be placed in the pockets of the civil servants who would receive that sum. You would increase the spending power of the civil servants to that extent but you would also diminish the purchasing power of the taxpayers to the same extent, and you are just as far ahead in the last analysis as you are in the first. The hon. member referred to the fact that an industry in British Columbia employing about a thousand men had restored the pay of its employees. Certainly, and why did they do that? Because they had the money with which to do it; the industry was earning sufficient to do it. The hon. member for Kindersley—and I hope he will not take exception to my singling him out for the moment because I want to deal with one or two of the arguments he put forward—said that the Minister of Finance in his budget estimated that we would have a surplus of some $8,000,000 during the coming year. That is true, but my hon. friend must bear in mind one or two factors. In the first place, as I know to my sorrow, this is a very difficult period in which to budget and we must have some margin of leeway. We are not dealing with budgets in the old days when conditions were more or less static. Last year I budgeted for a balanced budget this year, but I found I was wrong to the extent of $24,100,000, although I budgeted on the best advice which I could receive. There is not a country in the world which has not had that same difficulty in recent years. Let me point this out to the hon. member for Kindersley and to the house: he did not refer to the matter, but several hon. members referred to the action of the British government in restoring a portion of the salary deductions of civil servants and others in Great Britain. In Great Britain they had a surplus, not on current account but on all accounts, of a stupendous sum, greater than the amount which we shall have added to our national debt for last year and this year. Notwithstanding that surplus, what did they do? They restored only one-half of the salary deduction, and these deductions applied to school teachers to the extent of fifteen per cent, policemen, judges, members of the defence forces, cabinet ministers, members of parliament, in some instances going to twenty per cent in the higher brackets and ten per cent in the lower.

Look at the picture in Canada in the light of what they did in Great Britain. Notwithstanding that huge surplus, the British government restored only a portion of the salary deduction. Why? Because they wanted to err on the side of caution, I presume. But in Canada all we are hoping to do this year is to balance the budget on current account and go into debt still further to the extent that we have to utilize funds to meet deficits on the Canadian National Railways, capital expenditures which are not taken care of out of revenue and the amount required for unemployment relief.

It may be a surprise to the two Ottawa members that I am just as anxious as they are to see the salary deductions restored, but as a public servant I have a duty to perform and I have to keep in mind the taxpayers of this country and the fact that we must maintain the credit and integrity of the dominion We would be far better off to inconvenience, if I may use that word as a milder term, those members of the civil service who have to make the sacrifice for another year—and I hope it is the last one—than we would if we dashed into a restoration of salaries, knowing that we could bring it about only through putting additional taxation on the people.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Might I ask the minister this? I appreciate his words, but in view of what he said, would he remember, when the time comes, the burdens the civil service has borne?

Mr. RHODES: I yield to no man in this country in my appreciation of, in the main, the character of the work that is performed by the civil service. There are in the civil service the drones, as you will find in any large organization; there are some who are not earning one-tenth of their salary, but by and large the civil service are as fine a body of public servants as you will find in any country in the world. They work long hours, and this country is extremely well served. In my experience and contact with them the latter class are the ones who complain least about this salary deduction, because they know the extremity in which the country is placed, and the dire necessity which forces the government to effect this saving.

I do not want to enter into a dissertation on economics or sociology, much less discuss the tariff, but I think it is necessary to make just one brief reference, because my hon. friend the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Ahearn) was at pains to repeat what he had heard so many of his elders on the opposition side say, namely that our difficulties are due to the tariff policy of this government. He is a promising young man; I have every hope of his going far in public life and I do not want him to start off on the wrong foot, therefore I would warn him not to repeat in parrot fashion what he hears so frequently, or he may in time come to believe it himself. In the first place I never could understand what difference it makes to the taxpayers whether they pay by direct taxation or indirectly through the customs house. If you collect $100,000,000 in revenue through the customs house it comes out of the pockets of the people just as if it were collected in direct taxation.

An hon. MEMBER: You would do more business.

Mr. RHODES: I am prepared to admit that there are cases where the incidence is split; in some cases perhaps more is paid by the importer, in many cases it is paid by the exporter, and in some cases it is divided. But the point is that money expended by the people comes out of the pocket of someone, whether it comes through the customs house or through direct taxation. Let me point out to the junior member for Ottawa that we are not the only foolish people on earth. He cannot point to a single country in the world to-day, unless it be Russia, where there is no unemployment, and I am sure he would not want us to adopt the methods they employ there in order to avoid it. But let us say that the question he has raised in that regard is a matter which is open to argument. Well and good; we can discuss it in its proper time and place. But we are confronted with a condition and have to deal with it the best way we can, in the light of the ability of the taxpayers to meet their obligations.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

One other thing, though perhaps this is hardly necessary in view of some remarks I have already made. My hon. friend the junior member for Ottawa said in plain terms that the feeling was growing that this government was out of sympathy with the civil service. Well, that statement is quite parliamentary; my hon. friend has a perfect right to that opinion if he chooses to express it, but it is not justified by the facts. I think the ordinary, average, intelligent civil servant, and they are an intelligent body, realizes the situation as well as the government itself does. While he has to suffer because of this cut, as some of the rest of us do, he is prepared to meet the necessities of the case.

While there is much more I should like to say, I do not want to impede the progress of a measure for which I happen at the moment to be responsible. Let me impress upon the house the fact that I entertain most profoundly the hope that we shall never again be called upon to meet an emergent situation by an emergent measure of this kind. For the sake not only of the government of the day but of the country as well, and the welfare of the civil service, I hope we shall not be called upon again to deal with a measure such as this. When we are in committee of the whole I think I shall be able to demonstrate to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) and one or two others who made observations to-day that this restoration means something more than they think it does. It affects eighteen thousand people, and it matters not whether they be called civil servants or what their designation or classification may be, they are employees of the government. They are now being placed in precisely the same position as they were before any salary deduction took place. Whatever complaints may have been made as to the manner in which this deduction applied in the first instance, I do not think any legitimate complaint can be made as to the circumstance that, when the time came that we could consider a restoration, small though it may be, we have first taken care of those in the humbler ranks. And we will reach those in the higher ranks, who are best able to stand it, as soon as opportunity reasonably permits.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. HEENAN: On division.

The house went into committee on the bill, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE DISCOUNT AND LOAN CORPORATION OF CANADA

Mr. J. A. SULLIVAN (St. Ann) moved the third reading of Bill No. 58, to amend an act to incorporate The Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house asks hon. members to sanction certain privileges to some money lending interests, which privileges I do not think are in the interests of Canada. Similar bills have come before the house on other occasions, and unfortunately some have passed. Last year a bill very similar to the present one was placed before the banking and commerce committee, and was there subjected to considerable criticism; afterwards in the house the bill was thoroughly discussed and eventually defeated. I do not know how this bill has reached this stage, but inasmuch as it is now before the house for third reading I am afforded an opportunity of saying something with regard to this type of legislation.

In my opinion the bill should have gone to the banking and commerce committee. How it passed through committee of the whole I do not know. If it had gone to the banking and commerce committee I am quite sure an amendment would have been suggested and possibly passed at that stage. Looking through the bill I find it is very similar to two bills which came before the banking and commerce committee only yesterday. Apparently the whole idea behind the legislation is to enable certain money lending interests to lend financial assistance to those whom we may describe as down and out, and who cannot get any help or support from the ordinary banking institutions. In subparagraph (i) of section 3 I find provision for a rate of interest of no more than seven per cent. At first sight this looks very harmless indeed, because under our banking laws the same rate is allowed. But upon further investigation I find that two per cent is allowed for expenses. Subparagraph (ii) provides:

> Charge and deduct, in addition to interest as aforesaid, for expenses to be incurred by the company for administration, including overhead, keeping of records, professional advice, correspondence and other like matters, two per centum of the principal amount of the loan.

It seems to me that the banking institutions of Canada have exactly that same work to do before making a loan, and if they charge more than seven per cent we penalize them. In the present instance, however, it is suggested that the corporation in question should be allowed to charge another two per cent in addition to the seven per cent, because of the work falling to their lot. In the new Bank Act, supported by the government of the day, we have seen fit under section 91 to provide severe penalties if the banks charge more than the rate of seven per cent. Yet this bill asks parliament not only to permit the charging of seven per cent, but to permit an additional charge of two per cent to do the work done by the bank under the original seven per cent.

That is not all. In subparagraph (iii) I find provision for a fee not exceeding $10 for sundry services. Furthermore, interest is deducted from the principal before the principal is given to the borrower. This in itself means that the borrower is penalized for a good deal more than the rate called for in the bill. He does not get the full principal, but gets a sum less interest and other charges.

Further, if the unfortunate borrower happens to be so lucky as to be able to repay the loan before the due date he can do so only on condition that the lender has the option of deducting three months' interest. These various interests added together total about thirty-eight per cent. When we put stringent regulations and penalties in our Bank Act to prohibit banking institutions charging more than seven per cent surely parliament is not going to allow a loan corporation to lend money to probably the poorest of our people at a rate of about thirty-eight per cent interest. I have known of people in western Canada who borrowed at the rate of eight per cent or nine per cent compound interest. Once those people got into the hands of the moneylenders they found it most difficult to get out. Therefore I oppose any bill such as the present one which is likely to force borrowers to pay such high rates. I oppose it because I believe that only in very few cases will the borrower ever get out of the clutches of the moneylender. I therefore move:

> That the bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend it as follows: Insert the following paragraph immediately after subparagraph (iii) at page 3 of the bill, namely, IV "In no case shall the total charges for interest and additional charges exceed thirteen per cent per annum."

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I seconded the motion of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) because I am of the opinion that this form of organization is unnecessary in Canada. I am not unmindful that charters are being granted to similar organizations. I believe it was last session I listened to a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) in which he discussed interest rates and said that an interest rate of even ten per cent was unsound. I hold in my hand a pamphlet circulated by one of the corporations similar to the one now under consideration, a corporation which received a charter through this House of Commons and is doing business. They have a very subtle way of advertising. They say that they make loans of $50 to $500 to men and their wives for paying bills, meeting emergencies, and taking advantage of opportunities. They also say that the corporation is incorporated by a special act of parliament of the Dominion of Canada and that its activities are closely supervised by the dominion superintendent of insurance, and they add: "These facts guarantee the strength, reliability and motives of the organization." They go on to give the cost to the borrower of some of the loans. The following table shows the actual cash received by the borrower on loans of different amounts:

Amount of loan	Actual amount of cash received by borrower
$456	$404 96
300	263 00
240	208 40
180	153 80

Taking into account the cost of negotiating the loan, the discount, and the rate of interest charged, the borrower pays in some cases almost forty per cent. In the first place, it is absolutely unsound; in the second place I consider that it is taking advantage of people who possibly because of the present depression find themselves in the position of being compelled to borrow from these corporations. I do not think this house or the people of this country are willing to grant such powers to any individuals or groups of individuals. People of this sort are called loan sharks in the United States where the people have had a great deal of experience with them. The people of France have also had considerable experience with these loan sharks quite recently. I refer to Stavisky, the man who committed suicide and brought about the collapse of the French government.

In this pamphlet the corporation goes on to say that banks are principally wholesalers of credit while this corporation is a retailer of cash. They add:

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Since these small loans do not bring the banks a profit, they are forced to insist that they be well secured by negotiable collateral or acceptable endorsement. Banks do not accept as security the customer's chattels and wages—the only security many thousands of families have to offer.

I would point out in connection with their statement, "Banks do not accept as security... wages" that anyone who has had experience in municipal government knows that many of the municipalities have in effect regulations that should an employee's wages be garnisheed he is automatically discharged. I do not know of any better security that any corporation would desire for a loan than the borrower's fear of losing his employment under present conditions. They go on:

Many people of considerable means who might have bank credit by asking their friends to endorse for them, prefer to avoid these inconveniences even at a higher cost by coming to—

I will not give the name of this lending corporation, but they go on to say that the above-mentioned borrowers come to the lending corporation "when in need of sums of from $50 to $500." It will be observed how subtle is the approach made by this corporation with headquarters in this city, in their advertising to induce people to borrow from them. They say further:

To-day money is essential to the family. Gone are the days when the pioneer raised his own produce and traded it for everything from cloth and foodstuffs to household furnishings.

There is an ever-present need for money when debts pile up because of sickness, temporary unemployment, pay cuts, or when funds are needed for emergencies of birth, death, travel or to take advantage of opportunities in education or business.

I do not need to point out the unsoundness of the proposition and the unethical approach in an advertisement of this description. It puts me in mind of some of the advertisements for patent medicines which were scrutinized by the government to the south of us, advertisements setting out letters testifying to cures for certain diseases from people who on investigation were found to have died within six months of writing the letters.

Mr. COOTE: Having got enough from the testimonial to pay the funeral expenses.

Mr. MITCHELL: If there was not so much tragedy in the situation it would be almost a comedy. The pamphlet goes on to give testimonials from various individuals:

A financial expert who had found it necessary to borrow—

He must have been some expert.

—to meet unexpected expenses wrote after the loan had been completed as follows:

"I would like to take this opportunity to say how much I have enjoyed doing business with your firm, and where it does not interfere with my own business, I will be pleased to recommend your company to any reputable party seeking financial assistance."

We are passing through troublous times when many in poor circumstances find themselves with obligations that they have incurred, but I do not think that the conditions justify our giving any organization the right to charge interest rates of from thirty to forty per cent. Whether we like it or not, if we pass this bill, the responsibility is ours. It is passing strange that in this period of depression so many applications are being made to parliament for charters for corporations of this description. I would like the members of this house to bear these observations in mind when they are deciding whether this bill shall become law. Frankly I do not believe these organizations are necessary in this country.

I could speak at much further length, but as the hour is passing I will conclude by saying that I felt it my duty at least to point out to the house and to the people the subtle form of advertising that is being done by these loan companies in the pamphlets which they spread broadcast to catch people who possibly have not sufficient knowledge of the actual costs and charges involved in the borrowing that is done under the conditions laid down in the charters which companies of this kind get from the dominion government.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is of course a duty that rests upon the government of the day to be responsible in varying degrees for the legislation enacted by the house. It is the view of the government that this bill should not be passed in its present form. In addition to that, I suggest to my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) that with the permission of the house he amend his amendment by striking out the words "not more than thirteen per cent" and substituting words that the bill be not now read the third time but be referred back with instructions to the committee on banking and commerce. While it is being considered there the government will decide whether or not it is advisable to enact legislation to provide that the companies which have already secured charters, as mentioned by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), shall be subject to a general law to the effect that the rates which they may receive, including all charges, shall not exceed a fixed percentage somewhat less than the sum mentioned by the hon. member for Battle River. If the amendment should be altered as I suggest, we could immediately dispose of it; if not, I suggest that some hon. gentleman adjourn the debate in order that an opportunity may be given to consider just what form the statute should take to meet all cases of this kind.

Mr. SPENCER: With the permission of the house and on the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) I am quite willing that this bill should go back to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house the amendment will be amended to read:

That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Amendment as amended agreed to.

WAWANESA MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 29, respecting the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lavergne in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a brief memorandum setting out the reasons for these amendments and which I hope will make them clear to the committee. The Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company was originally incorporated in Manitoba in 1895. In 1929 a dominion charter was secured under chapter 85 of that year, the new company taking over the risks of the provincial company. The company is incorporated to carry on the business of insurance on the mutual system by premium note and also on the cash system, although it is primarily a mutual company. On the mutual system a premium note is given for an amount somewhat larger than the amount payable on policies issued on the cash premium system, payable in three years. An annual assessment is made against the note and the insured remains liable to the extent of the balance of the note, usually twenty-five per cent, for losses until the insurance is terminated. Policyholders on the cash premium plan have no liability beyond the cash premium paid or agreed to be paid. The main business of the company is fire insurance on the mutual system but it also issues automobile policies as well as cash premium fire policies.

At the time of the incorporation of the company under dominion charter, automobile insurance was not thought of, although this was included in the powers of the act. Fire insurance, mainly on the mutual system, was the object in view. Consequently, provisions in the act as to membership were not considered as closely as they might have been and were made somewhat wider than is desirable where other classes of policies, such as automobile insurance, are issued. The company eventually decided to issue automobile insurance on the cash plan and in order to preserve the mutual character of the company, even though it deals in other classes of insurance to some extent, it is deemed advisable to have the act amended so that membership will be limited to policyholders on the mutual system. This will correct a situation which is created by the present provision as to membership in the company and which is undersirable and prejudicial to the interests of the mutual policyholders who are and will remain to all intents and purposes the mainstay of the company. This provision is that each policyholder is entitled to one vote for each $1,000 of insurance carried. Under this provision anyone paying a premium on an automobile policy of approximately $80 can secure insurance for $100,000 public liability, $1,000 property damage, $1,000 collision damage and $1,000 fire and theft, making a total of $103,000. This insurance would entitle him to 103 votes. For the same premium a fire insurance policyholder would have a covering of not more than $16,000 and would be entitled to only 16 votes. Under the above provision, cash premium policyholders who pay considerably less for premiums and who have no further liability have equal voting rights with the mutual policyholders who are contingently liable over and above annual assessments up to the full extent of their premium notes for losses during the term of their insurance. The company was essentially a mutual company and it was never the intention to extend membership to policyholders other than those on the mutual system. It would be entirely contrary to the purposes and objects of the company to do so.

There are no provisions covering this point in the dominion insurance act, but some of the provincial acts such as British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario contain provisions governing mutual insurance and limiting membership in a mutual company to policyholders under the premium note plan. I would refer the committee to section 149 of the Manitoba act, chapter 5, 1932, to section 28 of the British Columbia Mutual Companies Act; and to section 263 of the Ontario act, chapter 218, revised statutes of Ontario, 1927. It is felt that this restriction is a proper one and necessary for the purpose of preserving the mutual character of the company and an amendment is therefore sought to the company's act of incorporation to provide for membership along the lines of the sections of the British Columbia, Ontario and Manitoba acts above referred to. The amendment proposed has been submitted to and approved by Mr. Finlayson and it follows the wording of the act incorporating the Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company, chapter 90, 17 George V.

Section 1 of the bill amends section 1 of the act and provides for the restriction of membership to those on the mutual system. Section 2 states that a director shall be a member on the mutual system. Sections 3 and 4 carry out the same idea. Section 3 states that each policyholder on the mutual system who is not in default shall be entitled to a vote and that any member who ceases to hold a valid policy on the mutual system shall thereupon cease to be a member. This bill has been passed unanimously by the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. SANDERSON: Does the company do business outside of Manitoba?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): It has a dominion charter and it does business outside of Manitoba; it operates in Ontario.

Mr. RALSTON: Are all policyholders now members, that is, are all holders of automobile insurance policies members as well as those who pay cash premiums?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Under the act as it stands, anyone who has a policy is a member of the company.

Mr. RALSTON: Section 4, which requires a two-thirds vote of the members, means the votes of the present members, in order to bring the act into force.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Section 4, to which the hon. gentleman refers, provides:

This act shall come into force on the date to be specified by the superintendent of insurance in a notice in the Canada Gazette, and such notice shall not be given until this act has been approved by a resolution adopted by at least two-thirds of the votes of the members of the company present or represented by proxy. . . .

That would refer to all policyholders of the company.

Mr. RALSTON: The present members.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Was the company's original charter a dominion charter?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): It was a provincial charter obtained in 1895. The present charter, which is dominion, was obtained by special act in 1929, taking over all powers of the former company.

Mr. SANDERSON: When did this company start to do business in Ontario?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I have not the information at hand.

Mr. SANDERSON: Apart from Manitoba and Ontario, in what other provinces do they do business?

Mr. BENNETT: All the western provinces.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I understand it does business throughout Canada; it is widely known.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): In section 1, giving the list of names, the name Manstone in line 12 should be Vanstone. I happen to know something about the company and I think that name as it appears in the bill is misspelled. The insurance manager is Mr. Vanstone.

Mr. BROWN: Vanstone is the name.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): If the hon. member knows that it should be Vanstone it should be changed.

Mr. BROWN: There is no question that Vanstone has been the manager of the company a good many years.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): That is the gentleman referred to.

PERSONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 43, to incorporate Personal Finance Corporation.—Mr. Hackett.

Mr. BENNETT: Stand.

Mr. POWER: When this bill came before the committee yesterday an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Sherbrooke to the effect that the life of these companies should be limited to five years or ten years in the same manner as the bank charters, which are renewed every ten years. The Minister of Finance, who was in the committee, said he thought the matter was worthy of consideration by the government, provided that the government could also as a matter of policy limit or restrict the existence of companies previously incorporated, because it would be obviously unfair to treat these new corporations which are now being brought into existence by parliament differently from others which had received authority to perform similar functions. I would ask the Minister of Finance, when the general policy of the government with respect to these loan corporations is being discussed, as the Prime Minister promised us a few moment ago it would be discussed, to call to the mind of his colleagues the fact that it might be in the public interest if the life of these loan companies were limited in a similar manner to the life of the banks.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will recall that in the committee I said that in the first instance I would confer with the superintendent of insurance and following that conference would take the matter up with my colleagues. Otherwise my hon. friend is accurate in stating the situation, and I shall be glad as opportunity presents itself to consider his suggestion.

Bill stands.

THOUSAND ISLANDS BRIDGE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 27, to incorporate Thousand Islands Bridge Company—Mr. Maloney—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the number of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: This bill is No. 27. It is not on the order paper, but a motion was made, granted by unanimous consent, to put it on the order paper.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Employment of labour.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I inquire of the sponsor of the bill whether the rate of tolls to be charged on this bridge will be the same as those in effect elsewhere in the province? Who is in control of the tolls?

Mr. MALONEY: I understand the toll rates will come under and be subject to the approval of the railway commission.

Section agreed to.

Section 21 agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT—RESTORATION OF TEN PER CENT CUT TO EMPLOYEES RECEIVING $1,000 OR LESS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, to provide for the deduction from compensation in the public service—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. HEENAN: There is one minister for whom I would almost let everything he proposes go through because when he proposes anything in the house he does so with such a gracious smile and I get so few smiles from any other minister of the present government that I would do almost anything for the Minister of Finance. But I listened to him with interest just before six o'clock and I am sorry that he attempted to read a lecture to some members on this side of the house—

Mr. RHODES: Oh, no.

Mr. HEENAN: —especially the two members for Ottawa, because, forsooth, they endeavoured to advance an argument why many of their constituents ought not to have their wages or salaries reduced. In closing the debate on the second reading, the minister, if I got his words correctly, said in effect—and there may be something in his argument—that this country is strewn with the wreckage of public expenditures made, as I believe he suggested, with public acclaim. I am inclined to agree with him that a great deal of public expenditure has been made in Canada with the consent and approval of the people generally. I think the minister also added words to the effect that the poor souls did not know at the time they were clamouring for those expenditures that some day they would have to pay the bill. I thought it was very strange for a minister of this government to make such a statement, because I am satisfied no other party that has ever been elected to power in this country has made so many promises as hon. gentlemen opposite have made in regard to public expenditures. And now when their policies have all failed, and brought the country to the verge of financial ruin, in order to make up part of the loss they take it out of the poor public servant. I can recall the promises made by the present Prime Minister and his candidates—I do not know whether the present Minister of Finance joined with them, for he was not a candidate; he was premier of a province at the time, but if he was anything like the then premier of Ontario, Hon. Howard Ferguson, he would have made plenty, because Mr. Ferguson not only proclaimed and repeated throughout Ontario the promises made by the leader of the Conservative party but added a good many others on his own account. Then of course he dug himself into a good job and left his colleagues in Ontario to sink, but unfortunately the people of Ontario had to sink with them.

Mr. SANDERSON: But he is still their adviser.

Mr. HEENAN: At any rate when on that occasion the present Prime Minister and his colleagues went through the country they knew the financial conditions that prevailed; they knew there was a world depression—if they did not they had no right to seek election to office—and it was just one more mistake the public made. But notwithstanding their knowledge of the conditions they went out clamouring for office, promising one thing after another—a national system of old age pensions paid one hundred per cent from the federal treasury; a national highway paid one hundred per cent from the federal treasury; technical education; a technical school in every little hamlet—and by the way in order to hoodwink the people they did introduce a measure in 1931 providing for grants for technical education but refused to pay in accordance with it—public works galore, in every part of the country—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mafeking cut-off!

Mr. HEENAN: Do not let us talk about railroads, because if this government is in office much longer we shall not need even tramways to take the goods out of the country. And what promises the Prime Minister made to the public servants themselves in Ottawa! I read some of the Prime Minister's speeches and I heard him over the radio the night before the election. There is no use repeating here what he promised the civil servants of the country. That is why I was astounded to hear the Minister of Finance read a lecture to the two members for Ottawa this afternoon because they were doing what they could to see that the public servants of this country got a square deal. Now I am not going to enter into any lengthy address, I am sure my hon. friends will know that—

An hon. MEMBER: Thank you.

Mr. HEENAN: I know my friends like to hear me, but I intend to deny them that pleasure. I am going to reserve my further criticism of this measure, because I said last session and the session before all I could say on the subject. I agree with the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) in practically everything he said, that the cutting down of wages and salaries only sinks the country into the mire that much deeper. Whether they are paid from the public treasury or anywhere else, the more money you take out of circulation the longer the country will be in getting back to prosperity. The point I want to make now is that the government ought to be an ideal employer; the government should take the lead. Here is a government that promised higher wages to the workers, higher prices to the farmers, yet was the first organization in the dominion to reduce wages. The Prime Minister made no bones about it; you have to take off your hat to him for something. When this bill was introduced he said someone had to lead the way, someone had to show an example in Canada. Unfortunately business men and employers of labour all over Canada followed his lead, followed the example of the government of Canada, and cut down wages and salaries to such an extent that in some cases they are not considered wages at all. In fact the Ontario government say that the money they are paying to men on the highways is not wages, that it is just a little pittance to enable them to buy a plug of tobacco once in a while. All that has resulted from the example of this government.

I want to hear the interpretation put on some of these clauses to see whether the public servants are going to get anything out of the measure. Out in the corridors I have heard several interpretations, though of course the Prime Minister is not responsible for them. I even heard that sessional employees, for instance the stenographers, are not to get the benefit of this restoration because they are paid by the day. Yet this bill says that those receiving not more than $1,000 a year are not to be reduced. I understand that the sessional stenographers receive about $500, yet they are not to get the benefit of this because forsooth it is argued—I hope the finance minister does not argue that way—that they receive $4.50 or $5 a day and therefore their salaries calculated on a yearly basis at that rate exceed $1,000. If that argument is applied I think the minister should work it the other way too, and should guarantee these public servants at least $1,000 a year. I think that is fair; he cannot have it both ways.

I shall reserve my further remarks until we get the minister's interpretation of the bill.

Mr. RHODES: As I understand it, the immediate subject under discussion is section 2 of the bill. After the exhaustive and illuminating analysis of the section made by my hon. friend (Mr. Heenan) there scarcely remains anything for me to say. However my immediate occasion for rising is to take exception to the attitude of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in suggesting that though it is competent, to use his own expression for the members for Ottawa to "put up an argument" with respect to their views concerning this measure, it is not competent for the Minister of Finance to put up an argument without being accused of reading a lecture to the hon. members for Ottawa. Now, sir, surely my hon. friend, who ought to be a democrat, should not in a free parliament deny even to one so humble as a minister of the crown the right to give expression to a point of view without being taken to task as having lectured hon. gentlemen opposite. If there was anything either in my voice or the manner or matter of my remarks which would lead my hon. friend to think I was attempting in a superior way to lecture hon. gentlemen opposite, I beg to assure him that such was far from my mind. All I can say is that if in the circumstances hon. gentlemen felt they were entitled to receive a lecture, then they must assume the responsibility, and I hope they will not blame me.

My hon. friend at the end of his observations was good enough to put a succinct question to me as to the meaning of this bill. I shall be glad to answer him or any other hon. gentleman to the best of my ability with respect to any question that arises. I wish to assure my hon. friend that the bill provides in clear terms that the compensation of any employee in the public service—and the definition is given in this section; it is a very wide one, namely:

"Compensation" means the salaries, wages, commissions, fees, or other remuneration, authorized to be paid by statute, or regulation, or other authority, and includes sessional indemnities and allowances, in cash or in kind, forming part of the remuneration attached to an office.

Putting it in as plain language as I have at my command, I wish to say that the bill provides that the compensation within the year of anyone in the public service shall not by virtue of this act be less than $1,000 per year. Sessional employees who are in receipt of wages of $5 a day projected over a given number of days would be placed in a class beyond the range of $1,000. But the length of time they actually serve, which depends upon the length of the session, will determine whether they will or will not within the period of a year receive $1,000. And if at the end of the session those employees do not in the aggregate for the year receive a salary of $1,000 they will be subject to no deduction. Inevitably there will be cases where immediate provision cannot be made, because it will not be known until later in the year whether an employee will fall within one class or the other. I would refer my hon. friend and the committee to subsection (c) of section 6, which is very wide in its terms and reads:

The treasury board may make regulations—
(c) For any other purpose deemed necessary to give effect to this act.

I can assure my hon. friend and the committee that the attitude of the treasury board will be to make regulations which shall construe this act in the widest possible terms in favour of the public servant, with the object of carrying out the express purpose of the bill as provided more specifically in section 3, that the compensation within the year of any public servant shall not, by virtue of any provisions of this act or of its operation, fall below the sum of $1,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Was that the condition in the old act?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. BROWN: It has often been in my mind to dissent from a view frequently expressed in this house, but hitherto I have refrained. That view is based seemingly on the belief that all industry exists for the purpose of paying wages—that we run our railways to pay wages; that we carry on our industry to pay wages, and that our farms are operated to pay wages. I wish to dissent most emphatically from that view. This afternoon the contrary view was expressed by the hon. members for Comox-Alberni and Moose Jaw. Wages or salaries are simply one of the factors which enter into the expense of carrying on industry, whether it be private industry or government business. The idea that industry can be brought back to a prosperous condition by paying high wages is, to my mind, beginning at the wrong end. It is putting the cart before the horse. I should be only too happy if Canada were in a position to pay high wages. But let us consider the position on the farm. I know perfectly well that we cannot bring farming back to a prosperous condition by beginning to pay higher wages. Unfortunately, and much against our will on the farm we have had to reduce wages. The most prosperous time on the farm was the time when we were paying high wages; those wages were demanded of us when times were good. Certainly we would be glad to go back to those days. What applies to the farm I believe applies with equal force to other industries and to matters of government. I agree with the statement made this afternoon by the Minister of Finance, namely that to pay high wages to one class in the community, thereby increasing its purchasing power, we must take it out of another class by taxation. I know that idea is combated by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and other hon. members at the end of the chamber. My firm conviction, however, is that just as farming cannot be made prosperous by beginning to pay high wages, neither can any other industry.

This afternoon when we were discussing the motion for second reading I called attention to the fact that I thought one section of the public service was being unduly discriminated against in the matter of salary deduction. My point was taken up by the former Postmaster General, a man thoroughly familiar with the whole situation. He stated the case very much better than I could have hoped to do, because in these matters I have not the knowledge possessed by the former minister. Let me, however, state the facts about one case which has come to my attention—I am not going to say it is an accurate statement of facts, but I give them as they are given to me. Certainly under such circumstances it would seem that revenue postmasters are being treated with some unfairness. For instance the person whose case I now put before the committee has stated that the postmaster's gross salary is $2,000 and that after a ten per cent deduction amounting to $200 the net amount received is $1,800. From that amount this man has to pay an assistant's salary of $500, fuel expenses $150, lighting $60, caretaking and insurance $100, reducing the net income to $990. If that is anything like a correct statement of the facts it will be perfectly plain to all hon. members that a ten per cent deduction from the gross receipts of this man has the result of subjecting him to a much higher deduction than that taken from any other class of public employees.

I am glad that in this measure the government has introduced the principle of setting a minimum from which there shall be no deduction. It will be remembered that when action was taken by the government two years ago to reduce the salaries, the contention was strongly urged that that system should be adopted. To some extent that principle is now recognized. So that, for my part, while I do not like to lose that extra $400 which hon. members would like to have received all these years, I cannot protest against the general purpose the government has had in view in adopting this legislation, much as we may dislike the effect it has had upon our indemnities.

Mr. HANBURY: I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Brown), that civil servants may be receiving either more than or as much as they are entitled to receive. I believe that in the civil servants of Canada we have a body of men and women who are entitled to anything that we can afford to pay them, within reason. I recognize the necessity of the government's attempting to balance the budget. But based on the very optimistic remarks made by the Minister of Finance upon the presentation of his budget, and particularly upon certain remarks made by the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Trade and Commerce before the electors of South Oxford, we are naturally entitled to come to the conclusion that conditions in Canada are on the up grade. I am one who believes that we are on the up grade. I believe also that the main responsibility for giving added impetus to the present trend rests with the government. The government have recognized this to some extent in the clause exempting from the cut the salaries of $1,000 and under. I think they should have gone much further. My own view is that they should have returned the whole ten per cent deduction. That would have done much to give encouragement to every class of the community throughout the country. I believe also that it is in the interests of the Canadian people that the government should return as soon as possible—it should have been done before now—the statutory increases which they have withheld and are withholding from the civil service. The government should also return to the system of giving the civil service the promotions which they have earned.

The main basis of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, is not that the civil service is overpaid or underpaid. I think the government have the responsibility to go as far as they possibly can in encouraging industry throughout Canada to-day and in encouraging people all over this dominion to spend the money they are withholding from the market.

With reference to the high wages referred to by my hon. friend who has just preceded me, I would point out to him that it is not a question of high wages or low wages; it is a question of relative purchasing power. We all recognize that the farmers of Canada to-day have a low purchasing power. We also recognize that the farmers of Canada to-day, particularly the wheat growers of the west, have received government aid on many occasions. I can speak perhaps for some of the industries that have not received a five cent bonus on wheat and other assistance. The lumber industry has not received the encouragement that even the grain growing industry has received in Canada, and yet the lumbering industry is quite prepared to shoulder its full share, I am sure, if the government will give that encouragement to industry which it should in the present circumstances.

I am again going to suggest to the minister that in my opinion there is a grave responsibility on the part of the government at this particular time to give added impetus to industry by seriously considering returning to the civil service of Canada the deduction which is being continued by this bill.

Mr. MANION: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Is the lumber industry paying as high wages in the bush, for example, as it was four or five years ago?

Mr. HANBURY: In comparison with five years ago there is a difference, but what the actual difference is I cannot say offhand.

Mr. MANION: A difference downward?

Mr. HANBURY: Downward. I would point out to my hon. friend in that connection that in British Columbia we have only recently had reenacted the minimum wage law. Prior to the enactment of that law the conditions in the lumber industry in British Columbia, arising out of the struggle for existence, permitted the operators to pay only a wage much below what should be paid, but through some development in the industry we have recently enacted a minimum wage law which provides the same minimum wage that was effective five years ago. Whether the more efficient workmen or the higher branches of the workmen in the woods will receive the same relative increase as the minimum wage represents is something that has not yet been demonstrated.

Mr. MANION: Then my hon. friend's industry is not doing to-day what he advocates we should do in connection with the civil service.

Mr. HANBURY: The industry in British Columbia has just decided to do that very thing. They are paying a minimum wage equal to the minimum wage that was being paid five years ago, notwithstanding that the cost of living is lower.

Mr. MANION: A minimum wage but not a maximum, my hon. friend said.

Mr. HANBURY: It is a minimum wage we are discussing, with ten per cent taken off.

Mr. MANION: I do not admit it is a minimum wage.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Last session when the salary deduction measure was before the house I made a plea for the lower grade civil servants. I am thankful that the government in their wisdom have seen fit to restore the deduction to civil servants receiving salaries less than $1,000. It might have been better if the minimum had been placed a little higher, but the decision must be left to hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, who are in a better position than the ordinary member to know the actual financial condition of the country.

I was glad to hear the explanation that was given by the Minister of Finance with regard to sessional labour. Another class which should be given the same consideration is the labourers, teamsters and such who are working, for example, at the experimental farms. From the interpretation given to-night by the minister I should judge that they are to be given the same treatment.

I realize quite well that in the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are mechanics and labourers who have had a much larger reduction in their income than ten per cent. In fact, many of them are still out of work. The farmers in my constituency and the dairymen who live closer to Ottawa are selling milk from their farms to the distributor for something like 76 cents per hundred pounds, which is two cents for milk that is being delivered to the consumer at ten cents a quart. I have no doubt, however, that they will be looked after by another committee of this house that is now sitting.

I have sympathy with the civil servant who is receiving a little more than the $1,000 and does not share in the restoration of salary provided for the lower paid employees. I have sympathy also for others who are working in this city, the street railway men, for example, who received a reduction of ten per cent in their wages which up to the present has not been restored, and whose working conditions were changed so that one man now runs an electric car which two men ran some years ago. That means a further reduction for them. In addition they have to take one day off every two weeks, which means a still further reduction. I have sympathy with these people as well as with the civil service, and I wonder if there are not other members who feel the same way. I know the sympathy that some members have for the civil service, and how they plead for them at a time like this almost with tears in their eyes, but do not mind getting a summons out for a man who drives his neighbour to work in his automobile instead of letting him pay street car fare.

I wish to congratulate the government on making a move in the right direction. I firmly and honestly believe, after the statement made by the Minister of Finance to-night, that when this time comes around next year the salary cut will be completely restored and everybody will be happy. I hope that that will apply to other concerns in this city at the same time.

Mr. DUFF: We are delighted to have a comparison made between conditions in private enterprise in the city of Ottawa and in the civil service, but I do not see, Mr. Chairman, what it has to do with this bill. If my hon. friend from Carleton has any grievance against any member of this house or against any private individual in Ottawa I suggest that he go down Sparks street at nine o'clock to-morrow morning and get a crowd around him and fight it out there. This is not the place. We are not interested.

My views with regard to the civil service salary deduction are very well known. Unlike the hon. member for Carleton I have always opposed this ten per cent deduction. Although I live a thousand miles away from Ottawa and from my hon. friend's constituents, a number of whom I believe, are civil servants, I have always been against this deduction of ten per cent. I believed from the first that it was not in the best interests of the country to make this deduction. But of course I understand my hon. friend's position; as a supporter of the government he must get up and try to express views in line with what his government and his party think.

I do not think for one moment that the country has gained at all by making this ten per cent deduction. I said two years ago, and again last year, that the very fact that the government was the first employer in this country to reduce wages by ten per cent would mean, and it has meant, that tens of millions of dollars would be taken out of the pockets of the workmen of this country. The result is that the whole country suffers.

The Minister of Railways asked the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard whether it was not a fact that the wages of the lumbermen had been reduced in the last two or three years. The minister seems to forget that there is quite a difference between the wages paid by private concerns and those paid by the government. Let me say to the minister that every civil servant in this country has a contract with the government. The ordinary lumberman in the bush or the man employed by a private concern has no contract, but every civil servant has a contract when he accepts a position. Advertisements are issued, applications are asked for, claims are considered by the civil service commission or the government, and when a decision is arrived at, the man or woman has a contract. He or she has a contract just the same as I have. The people of this country promised to pay me $4,000 per year to represent them in this parliament. I have always contended that I am entitled to that $4,000 and that this government had no right to reduce my sessional indemnity to $3,600.

Mr. McINTOSH: Sue the government.

Mr. DUFF: They would not issue a fiat. Let me tell the minister that the civil servant is in an entirely different position from that of the man in the bush or the man working in a private enterprise. Civil servants, whether they be stenographers, elevator men, charwomen, lighthouse keepers or anything else, have a solemn contract with the government. The Prime Minister often speaks of the sanctity of contracts. I say to the Minister of Railways: Go and consult the Prime Minister and ask him where is the sanctity of contracts in this bill or in those of the last two years. Subsection (b) of section 2 defines a member of the public service as follows:

> "Member of the public service of Canada" means every officer, clerk and employee in any branch or portion of the public service of Canada, to whom any compensation is paid, either directly or indirectly, out of the revenue of His Majesty in respect of his government of Canada, other than the Governor General of Canada, the lieutenant governors of the several provinces of Canada, the members of the judiciary, and the members of the military, naval and air forces of Canada, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and includes members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

I should like to know if it is intended that the governor general, the lieutenant governors, the members of the judiciary and the members of the military, naval and air forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are to receive their full salaries?

Mr. RHODES: I am sure we must all pay tribute to the consistency of the hon. member for Antigonsh-Guysborough throughout the years that we have had to consider such bills as the one now under consideration. He has left no doubt as to his attitude with respect to this and the measures of previous years. Whether or not we agree with him, we must give him credit for making his position so clear. It may be that when one enters the public service he has a contract, but I do not feel myself in a position to argue as to the legal position of that contract. I think the overriding question of the public need is the consideration which has governed. The people of the mother country have as keen an appreciation of the sanctity of contracts as any people on earth, and yet under precisely the same conditions, Great Britain reduced the salaries of some of her higher paid members of the judiciary by as much as twenty per cent, of her cabinet ministers by a like amount, of her school teachers by fifteen per cent and of the members in the other services by substantial percentages. Whether or not hon. gentlemen are in agreement with us, we have assumed it to be in the public interest to make this deduction in order to meet an emergent situation.

With respect to the specific question asked by my hon. friend, I may say that ever since the first salary deduction act the Governor General has voluntarily sent his cheque regularly for ten per cent of the full amount of his salary. The members of the judiciary and of the naval and, military forces are not touched by this bill, but there is another bill touching their salaries which will bring about a similar result. This bill makes a straight salary deduction, but a companion bill which will follow contains a provision for a special income tax to amount to ten per cent of the salaries of these individuals. It will be in terms similar to the bill of last year, and it will cover all those in the list except the lieutenant governors. For reasons which I need not at this moment discuss at length, it was felt that as representatives of His Majesty they should not be placed in the same position as those who had been cut.

Mr. BROWN: I have a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the government. This may not be the proper time to do it and, if not, I should be glad to be informed as to when would be the proper time. In some parts of the country there are government institutions such as experimental farms. Those employed on these farms are paid by the dominion government. In some cases they live in houses which are the property of the government and that property does not pay any tax. This imposes a very heavy burden upon the school systems. The matter was brought to my attention a month or so ago when it was pointed out that a large number of employees of the government in a certain place were living on government property. In that same place a large number of children were attending the public school, imposing a heavy burden upon the people of that community, many of them very poor, yet having to pay taxes out of their very small incomes to support the schools at which the children of government employees were receiving education, without cost to themselves or the government. If it is at all possible I suggest that in all such cases the government should see that a school tax in some form be paid so as to ease the burden of taxpayers in such communities. That is the situation that prevails in some of the provinces, although I am told to-night that there are some provinces in which an arrangement is made for the payment of some special tax. I suggest that in all cases where employees of the government live on property on which no taxes are paid and enjoy the benefit of schools the government should impose an obligation on those receiving remuneration to contribute to the school tax.

Mr. RHODES: I do not take exception in the main to the attitude of my hon. friend, but I must point out to him that he raises at once the larger question as to how far crown property ought to be exempt from taxation. I do not suppose it would do much good to enter into a discussion of that phase of the matter; that is a recognized principle and we need not go into the reasons for it. But where there are employees living on crown property under such conditions as the hon. member has depicted, the right to live in those houses forms a portion of the compensation, and the amount of cash which the employee receives is diminished to the extent of the allowance made for his so living. In the main that compensation is fixed by the civil service commission for various classes of the public service living on government property throughout the country.

Mr. VENIOT: That would not exempt the individual living in the house.

Mr. RHODES: As my hon. friend rightly says, there is no good reason why such a person whose children enjoy the privileges of the public school should not be called upon to pay his share of the school rates the same as other people living in the community. Whether there is any governmental action which can be taken or is required in the circumstances, I am not in a position at the moment to say, because so far as I am concerned the matter has never been raised before. But from the point of view of the community, in equity and in simple justice such an employee ought to pay his fair share of the school rates.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I accept very gladly the explanation which the Minister of Finance has made with reference to the various staffs of the house. The information which I received may have been right at the time, but a different construction has been placed upon it, and I congratulate the minister on this extension of generosity. I never took the words of the hon. gentleman to mean any lecture to me this afternoon; he would have had to speak in a very much different tone to lead me to believe that he was trying to lecture me. I like his cold steel; he is a gallant foe; I have had many a tiff with him, but I have managed to come out without being either too much scared or too much scarred.

The hon. member for Lisgar has stated the situation from his point of view, but I would say to him and particularly to the hon. member for Moose Jaw—and this applies to a slight degree to the Minister of Finance: O consistency, what crimes have been committed in thy name! It happens that in the constituency of Lisgar there are a certain number of rural postmasters and therefore there is a duty incumbent, and properly so, on the distinguished member for Lisgar, to look after their particular interests. It happens that in the city of Ottawa there is but one postmaster, but there are hundreds of letter carriers. Well, why should not what is good for the rural postmasters be also good for the city letter carriers? It happens that in Ottawa there are twenty or twenty-five per cent of the classified civil servants of the dominion.

If instead of having that percentage of civil servants in Ottawa we had so many farmers or brickmakers or textile workers or manufacturers, then I doubt very much that as many hon. members of this house who are prone to hit upon this city and upon the civil servants would take the same attitude. Why not be consistent, therefore? This city has a population of 136,000 and of that number there may be 10,000 employed in some line of industry, be it match making or soap making or forging or in the civil service or as grocers, and if these particular interests are not in conflict with the general interest, then surely there is a duty incumbent on those whose honour and privilege it is to represent these people in this house to see that their particular interests are properly safeguarded, provided that the general interest of others is not jeopardized. That is the stand I have consistently taken.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw said that the city of Ottawa does not know anything about depression. Well, I am not here to say unpleasant things about the city of Ottawa or of any other city. I am not here to expose the evils or those charitable cases that are being looked after. This is not the time and place, and it is not my particular duty to do so in this house. But I would point out that in Ottawa there has been a tremendous amount of direct relief expended through the government, by private parties, by social and religious organizations, and voluntarily by the civil servants to a considerable proportion of their salaries, though they have been cut ten per cent. True, it is not quite as apparent around Ottawa that there is as much depression or as much hardship as one might see elsewhere, but let me say that though the wound may be concealed it does not mean that it is not as painful as one that is exposed, and very often there is much more bitterness added in trying to conceal it than to show it.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw also said that so long as the western people suffered, he did not want the cut to be restored. Well, I have more consideration for the western farmer and more sympathy for the business people of the rest of the dominion than some members have for a certain portion of the community. I deplore their misery; I deplore the misery of the farmer, of the industrial wage earner, but I ask: How much has the $8,700,000 that was taken away from the civil servants helped those poor people, and also how much has the $2,500,000 from Ottawa helped to alleviate their suffering? I am sure it must have mitigated it to a certain extent if one considers how some hon. members desire that the cut be not returned. I think I have some reason to say for the city of Ottawa: Hands off the civil service.

The Minister of Finance this afternoon said that if we transfer the $8,700,000 from the pockets of the taxpayer, that is simply a matter of bookkeeping. I pointed out before in that connection that the government was able to collect $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 by simply moving the decimal point in the books and that it did not cost one-hundredth of one per cent to collect that amount. There never before has been any collection agency, any bond selling or issuing of a loan for the government that has cost it so little. It is quite proper for hon. members to take this attitude if they think it is going to benefit themselves, but let me put the matter in this way: If the civil service not only of Ottawa but of Canada as a whole is to be taxed in that manner to the extent of ten per cent and if that sum of $8,700,000 is applied on the public debt or to help to balance the budget, then why in the name of goodness and of justice did the large industrial corporations when they made the deductions they did from the wages of their employees, not take that money to the Minister of Finance and say: Here is our fair share; just as the civil service have paid their portion into your hands, so we pay ours that you may be helped in solving your financial difficulties, in balancing the budget and in alleviating the suffering that exists? But they did not do that, and the minister knows well that none of all the wage deductions that have been made by private enterprise has found its way into the coffers of the state to help relieve his financial troubles. But if that course had been followed; if the money taken from those whose salaries were cut had been paid into the coffers of the state, then of course the civil servants of Canada would feel somewhat relieved in knowing that they were not the only ones that were being mulct to this extent.

The Minister of Finance said lastly that the wages and salaries of the civil servants must come out of the pockets of the taxpayer, but one would think the civil servant simply drew his salary and did no work—

Mr. RHODES: Oh, no.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I know the minister does not mean that; it is absolutely inconsistent with the words of eulogy which he uttered, and quite properly, with respect to the civil service this afternoon, which he knows they deserve. That is what the minister says, but others who are not in his position, and who do not understand the situation as he does, put a different construction on the matter, and it is not fair. When the civil service of Canada works, it works for the benefit of the state. Civil servants are servants of the state; they serve not only Ottawa but the whole of Canada when they earn their wages, and there ought to be a feeling of pride on the part of everyone, whether from the eastern or the western provinces, or from the north or the south, to know that while goverments come and governments go, while one ministry falls and another takes its place, the civil service of Canada carries on its work just the same. The backbone of the Canadian public service to-day is the presence in it of men of long years of experience, men who have served loyally under Grit and Tory, Liberal and Conservative administrations. Therefore these people are entitled, for the sole reason that they have served the state loyally, to be so treated any time a question concerning them is brought up.

Having said that much, I have only one question to ask the minister so that he may reply when he speaks again. He said that some 18,000 would be affected. Some days ago I placed a question on the order paper, but it was turned, and quite properly, into a return. I do not know that I shall get the answer in time, and I should like to ask whether the minister can inform me as to the units that go to make the total. I should like to know how the 18,000 are made up, and what amount will be paid to each.

Mr. RHODES: May I at once say to the senior member for Ottawa that I do not take exception to his attitude on this question; on the contrary I commend him for championing as a representative of Ottawa the cause of a large number of those who are his constituents. He is doing only the right and proper thing as a representative who has in mind the interests of those who sent him to parliament. But I do object very seriously to his placing in my mouth words which I never uttered, and drawing therefrom inferences which cannot properly be drawn from the words which I did use. When I said that the civil servants are paid out of the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada I did not for one moment raise the question of the propriety of that being so; on the contrary, I am the first to concede to my hon. friend that I know many, many in the civil service who, even if they had their full salary restored, would still be earning more than they were receiving. There are many in the service who are underpaid even at their full salary. At the same time there are some civil servants who would be overpaid if they got $100 a year; they are, however, in the great minority. For the civil service at large I have nothing but the greatest admiration, and I admit at once that by and large they earn their salaries. If my hon. friend were fair—I am not suggesting for a moment he intended to be unfair, but he was—he would have acknowledged that I did not use the argument in the connection he suggested. The hon. member for Kindersley had said that if we restored the salaries it would have increased the purchasing power of the civil servants by $7,800,000 a year. What I said was that the civil servants were paid out of the pockets of the taxpayers and that all the restoration of salary would do, so far as purchasing power was concerned, would be to transfer it from the taxpayer, whose purchasing power would be that much less, to the civil servant, whose purchasing power would be that much more, and that at the end we would be no further ahead than when we started. That was what I had in mind when I made the remark that the civil servants were paid out of the pockets of the taxpayers.

With respect to my hon. friend's direct question, the officials of the department tell me that to make an exact allocation of the number affected in the city of Ottawa would take a very long time, because it means the conning of some sixty thousand names. The best estimate I can secure from those most versed in civil service affairs in Ottawa is that it will affect somewhere between fifteen hundred and two thousand individuals in Ottawa.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Could some proportion be given as between classified positions and unclassified?

Mr. RHODES: That is of the total eighteen thousand?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, of the number in Ottawa.

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that it is impossible to give the information unless the method I suggested a moment ago were followed. But I am advised that of the total number of employees in the public service comprised in this number, some thirty-three thousand, more than half, are in the classified service. While of course it would be impossible to apply that same proportion to those who are under the $1,000 rate, because the chances are that the greater number would be in the class above $1,000, my hon. friend, whose knowledge of the civil service is probably more intimate than that of most persons outside of the civil service itself, will be able perhaps to make some rough deduction until such time as we can get a more accurate figure.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to thank the minister for the assurance he gave a few minutes ago that those civil servants who are not getting over $1,000 a year, regardless of whether or not they are full time employees, will not be subject to the deduction. That will be a welcome assurance to many civil servants.

The hon. member for Lisgar said that the purpose of industry is not the payment of wages. But he stopped there and did not tell us what the purpose of industry is, so we are no wiser than before. In my opinion the purpose of industry is to produce the things that the community needs, and the things so produced are distributed in part through the payment of wages. I know very well that the owners of industry regret every cent they have to pay in wages, but I also know, whether they do or not, that if they did not pay any wages at all their condition would be much worse even than it is now. There is no possible way of keeping industry going unless we provide the means of distributing the product. It is being distributed to-day largely through salaries and wages. What has happened is that our ability to produce has increased and is increasing every day, and as it increases we are reducing our ability to distribute the product. Because of that the economic condition of the people becomes more and more the concern of government. We have noticed that in the last few years, in the extent to which the government has had to take steps to relieve the effects of the inability of industry to distribute its own product. If wages were reduced still more the position of the farmer would be worse, because he would be still less able to sell what he produces. Therefore I say it is of real concern to the government to see that the means of distribution of goods and services produced in the country are maintained. For that reason the government should make provision that those in its own service shall be adequately recompensed, so as to help relieve the depression in industry. We find that in the United States the depression was raised only when they took steps to raise wages. In Great Britain they had to do the same thing, and I am quite satisfied that we in this country will have also to do it.

Hon. members talk about the poor taxpayer. The fact is that taxation will have to be used as a means of further equalizing the present inequitable distribution of goods. It is being so used in Great Britain, where the greater portion of the larger incomes is taken in order to distribute better the products of industry. The hon. member for Lisgar will have to revise his economics before he finds a solution of the problem confronting the people to-day, the problem of misery and want in the midst of the greatest abundance that the world has ever seen.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would like to follow the question asked by the hon. member for Lisgar as to the position of revenue postmasters. As far back as April 16, an order of the house was passed for a return showing:

(1) A list of post offices having revenue of $1,500 to $10,000 (on which salaries are determined), showing revenue for each of the years 1931-32, 1932-33 and 1933-34; (2) casual or automatic pay cuts suffered by each of the postmasters in these offices for each year (exclusive of the 10 per cent deduction).

The return has not yet come down. I asked for it in order to be in a position to ask the minister some questions regarding the effect of this cut on revenue postmasters. When the ten per cent deduction bill came up the first year I drew to the attention of the minister the position of these revenue postmasters. Some of them have suffered as much as a thirty-five per cent cut by reason of shrinkage of revenue of the post offices. Those in the large post offices such as Ottawa are subject only to the ten per cent cut, and I suppose the revenue in the post office at Ottawa is proportionate to that of any other urban post office. There are I suppose large numbers of revenue postmasters who will be relieved of the ten per cent deduction if the income resulting from the revenue of the office is $1,000 or less; but there are many post offices showing an income of over $1,000 without allowing any deduction for the cost of help. Postmasters in this class are not receiving the consideration that many of us feel they should. I would like the minister to give them further consideration, because while many have an apparent income of $1,500 or $2,000 they are not in fact getting $1,000, yet are still subject to the ten per cent deduction. It seems to me that the government and the minister should give this type of civil servant a little further consideration.

Mr. RHODES: In reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat may I say that there may be instances where individual postmasters have had their receipts reduced as much as thirty-five per cent. I take it that my hon. friend is referring to the diminution of business in post offices. May I point out to him that so far as the aggregate of postmasters is concerned, nothing like that percentage is shown. The commissions of revenue postmasters in the fiscal year 1930-31 amounted to $6,664,651.

Mr. VENIOT: From salaries?

Mr. RHODES: These are commissions.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many offices?

Mr. VENIOT: What is the figure for the previous year?

Mr. RHODES: I have not that figure before me. The corresponding figure for the twelve months ending September 30, 1933—

Mr. VENIOT: Why not give the fiscal year?

Mr. RHODES: Because we have not that figure. The amount for the year ending September 30, 1933, is $6,542,170. As between those two periods there is a shrinkage in commissions to revenue postmasters of only two per cent. There are 12,000 revenue postmasters in the whole of Canada, and this salary deduction bill will restore the full salary to 10,000 of the 12,000.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister is mistaken; there are not 12,000 revenue postmasters in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: That is the information I have.

Mr. VENIOT: There are not that many on commission.

Mr. RHODES: I have the information—

Mr. VENIOT: I don't care what information the minister has; he has the wrong information. I make that statement, and I know what I am talking about. If the minister says there are 12,000 commission postmasters in Canada, he has the wrong information.

Mr. RHODES: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have that information, and I got it from the Post Office Department.

Mr. VENIOT: I have the whole thing right here in front of me. There is a mistake somewhere.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. RHODES: Since we cannot settle the matter upon the basis of "you're another" as between the hon. member for Gloucester and myself—

Mr. VENIOT: Better let it stand.

Mr. RHODES: I can say only this, that until such time as I can have the figure rechecked I must accept the figures which are given to me and which I am assured are accurate. Up to the moment that is the best I can say. Then, to conclude what I was saying, the salary, compensation or whatever you wish to call it would be restored in full to 10,000 out of the 12,000, assuming for the sake of argument, so as to appease the hon. member for Gloucester, that the figures given to me are correct.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all. I am right and you are wrong, that is all.

Mr. RHODES: At all events it is fair to assume that five-sixths of the postmasters will have their complete compensation restored as a result of this bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Why not do the same with other classes?

Mr. VALLANCE: On what I am about to say I am not going to condemn the government. My remarks will bear on the salaries the postmasters are now receiving. I hope the ex-Postmaster General will contradict me if I am wrong.

Mr. VENIOT: I will do that all right.

Mr. VALLANCE: For some considerable time postmasters, whether they be revenue or otherwise, have lost a certain percentage of revenue because of the fact that parcels are to-day going through post offices insured without the payment of any fee for that insurance. Although the Postmaster General is not in his seat I believe I am correct in that statement. At certain periods of the year the fees for insurance had brought considerable revenue to the revenue post offices which, under present circumstances, has been cut off. Probably that action was taken to meet the competition of express companies—I do not know. The fact remains that a source of revenue has been taken away from the revenue postmasters.

Mr. VENIOT: You are right.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of that fact, and in view of the general reduction in business going through the post offices, I again urge that the minister if at all possible give further consideration to this type of civil servant, because I believe in this connection an injustice is being done. Many postmasters to-day are unable to carry on. I do not have to enlarge upon the point, because the minister knows the facts as well as I do. He knows how their wages or salaries are arrived at, taking rent and other matters into consideration. The rent is determined by the revenue going through the post office. Because of the fact that the revenue is diminishing the rent diminishes with it. In many instances cuts as high as thirty-five per cent have been suffered. That cut it not in revenue alone but in salaries. It seems to me that if the minister can he should give them some further consideration.

Mr. RHODES: Without calling in question the merit of the plea just made by the hon. member for South Battleford, he must bear in mind that the fixing of postmasters' salaries is not within my province, nor, I am sorry to say, am I in a position to give complete information upon the point in question. I am not trying to avoid any responsibility, but the hon. member will appreciate that the information should be sought from and the plea made to my colleague, the Postmaster General. I shall direct his attention to the points raised by the hon. member. For the moment, however, I am not in a position to give him the information he desires.

Mr. VENIOT: In order to have a correct understanding between the Minister of Finance and myself I wish to state that there are 12,133 post offices in the whole of Canada. I was talking about commission offices, revenue offices paying postmasters on commission, and the Minister of Finance told us, as I understood him, that there were 12,000. There is no such thing.

An hon. MEMBER: How many are there?

Mr. VENIOT: It is hard to tell how many there are. The number is about 9,000, I think.

Mr. RHODES: If I may repeat, we cannot get any farther ahead at the moment. I assure the hon. member and the committee that I am giving only such information as has been furnished to me by the Post Office Department. However, in the light of what the hon. member for Gloucester has said I will check up with the department.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister may be confounding commission and revenue offices. I am speaking of offices affected under this bill, the remunerations of which are based on commissions. There are not 12,000 of them in Canada. That is the statement I make and stand by.

Mr. REID: I was particularly pleased this afternoon to hear the Minister of Finance say that he was a believer in high wages and high prices and that the countries in which high wages and high prices exist were the countries which gave the most comforts to ordinary citizens. I heartily concur in that statement. I was pleased also to hear that ten per cent was not to be taken off those receiving less than $1,000. My own view and wish of course would have been to see the ten per cent restored on salaries under $2,000. However, the minister has pointed out that in his opinion and in the opinion of the government conditions do not warrant such a change. While I am and always have been an advocate of high wages, and have persistently fought for high wages throughout my life, I believe this would be the proper time to view the great spread between the salaries received by a certain class of civil servants and other classes. We have a class of civil servants in this dominion under the heading of deputy ministers to whom we are paying in salaries a total of $275,000 a year, and I never hear anyone in this house protesting against the great spread between the $9,000 a year received by some of these deputy ministers and the $3,500 a year received by other civil servants who are just as capable. There are thirty men rated here at cost of over $275,000 a year, and in addition the country is contributing a certain amount of their superannuation. Very many of these men will be retired on a higher superannuation allowance than most men can earn in a whole year. Some of them receive an annual superannuation allowance of $6,000. I say that without fear of contradiction. If there was any possibility of the lower grade civil servants ever working up to a salary of $9,000, I for one would never raise my voice in protest, but when one considers that these $9,000 positions are just political appointments calling for men of no greater calibre than many heads of branches who are receiving only $3,600, although just as capable, I cannot help but express my feeling that it is time we reviewed this salary question very carefully. If we are ever going to put our house in order now is the time to do it. Let me repeat, in order that I shall not be misunderstood, that I am not against paying high wages or paying what a man is worth, but there is too wide a gap between a certain class of civil servants occupying high positions and that other large group which unless something is done can never be jumped and never will be, because in the majority of cases the higher offices to which I refer are just straight political appointments.

There is another point. I understand that an order in council was passed some time ago by the government that civil servants of the age of sixty-five years or over should be discharged or superannuated. If I am wrong I hope the minister will correct me. Some time ago I put a question on the order paper regarding this order in council, and a return was brought down to the house which makes interesting reading. What makes me rise on this occasion is what I consider an injustice in connection with an order of this kind. I am not at this time entering into the merits or demerits of the question whether a man of sixty-five or over should or should not be dismissed, but I do take the ground that once an order of that kind has been made there should be no favorites played. Many men who are sixty-five and over have retained their positions due to a certain amount of pull, while others who have not that pull have been dismissed and I feel that it is my duty to protest. I may be wrong in my impression about the order in council to which I refer. The return tabled in the house on April 9 shows the total number of civil servants discharged and superannuated under that order in council applying to employees sixty-five years and over. This was my question:

1. What was the total number of civil servants and government employees discharged and superannuated under the ruling regarding all employees 65 years and over?
2. What were the numbers discharged and superannuated respectively, in each department of the public service since the order came into effect?
3. How many persons 65 years of age or over, are still in the employ of the government?
4. What are the names of the said persons, and in what respective departments of the public service are they engaged?

The return that was brought down in reply gives a table showing in the first column the number superannuated or retired, in the second column the number discharged, and in the third column the number still engaged. I find that 506 were superannuated or retired and 58 discharged, and that 1,020 are still engaged. In looking over the names I find that men have been retained who do not occupy a key position. My complaint is not that they are retained, but that the order in council is not applied impartially, that one man with a little pull is retained and a man without pull let go. I could cite instances of men who have been retained in the public service because of a little influence they had, while immigration inspectors, customs and excise officers, clerks, cooks, charwomen, blacksmiths, and so forth right through the list have been let go. I know captains of dredges who have been let out in my district because they have reached the age of sixty-five, while I find others have been retained. I would like the minister to explain why this order in council has been carried out in the way it has.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend from New Westminster is probably aware of the fact that it has been the law for many years that it is competent upon the recommendation of a minister of the crown for the government to retire any employee who arrives at the age of sixty-five, and no special or general order in council is required for that purpose. The order in council to which my hon. friend refers had reference only to those civil servants who were sixty-five years or over and whose services could be dispensed with, and whose places it would not be necessary to fill. It was solely from the viewpoint of economy and efficiency in the public service that that order in council was passed. In each instance the individual retired received a retiring gratuity. In fact, in the view of the auditor general, who made official complaint in the matter, the government was over generous and exceeded its power in giving a larger gratuity than he thought the law warranted.

I cannot speak for all departments of the government; I can only speak for my own. Although it is not a pleasant duty to be associated with a policy which calls for the retirement, even with a gratuity, of those who have reached the age of sixty-five, it is difficult for one administering a department, having in mind his duty to the state, to justify continuing in the public service and paying full salary to one who is doing work that can be done by others in the department without adding to their numbers and without burdening unduly those who remain in the service. I would welcome from my hon. friend the slightest evidence that so far as my department is concerned there was any kind of pull whatever in the matter. I accepted without question the advice I received from responsible officers of my department in whom I had and still have the fullest confidence. I am not suggesting for one moment that there may not be individual cases where pull may have been exercised. We are all human. We know the atmosphere which surrounds the public service and which it is difficult to eradicate, but I would venture the belief that in the main, in the great majority of cases, the retirements were made in conformity with the idea which was in mind at the time the order in council was passed.

My hon. friend has referred to the fact that a number of others have been retained in the public service who are over sixty-five years of age. Certainly. We did not desire that any man who was performing a useful public service should be retired because he was sixty-five, and that was specifically provided for. The order in council had reference only to those whose positions did not require to be filled, in other words, those who were surplus in the department. Nor did it apply to those sixty-five years of age who were occupying administrative posts which they could properly fill. I have in mind members of the public service over seventy years of age who had to be retained by special votes in the estimates, but they are men who are singularly young for their years, who have acquired wide knowledge in the service and are of singular use to the public service, and it was believed that it was in the public interest that their services should be retained. I hope I have covered the ground that I should cover in answering to the best of my ability the question of the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. REID: The minister has covered it but, to be candid, I am not exactly satisfied with the reply. I realize that there are some men in key positions who in the interests of the public service should be retained, but in looking through this list I find that some of those who were let out were just as competent as those who were retained.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has put a wrong meaning upon my language. I would not want it to go abroad that the people who were retired were incompetent. The reason they were let out is because there was no work for them to do. In many cases these changes are made through no fault of the individual; there may be a change in the character of the public service. I do not wish for one moment to reflect upon any of these individuals.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think retirement at sixty-five years of age should be automatic.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is not, and that is the trouble.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is a sound rule. I have had some experience in municipal work where men can look forward to retirement on pension at the age of sixty-five years. I do not think any man is indispensable. The earth would continue to spin round on its axis if a bomb were dropped on this House of Commons and we were all finished off. Under the law of averages, when a man reaches the age of sixty-five years he begins to slow up. I know there are exceptions to the rule, but to circumvent a rule and prevent the younger men from coming along is unfair and unsound. When a rule like that is adopted it should be enforced without fear or favour.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Ten per cent deduction.

Mr. NEILL: I suppose I would be out of order in moving to raise the minimum above $1,000, but I would ask the minister if he will not consider suggestions in that regard.

Mr. RHODES: I think my hon. friend is quite right; it would not be competent for him to move an amendment which would have the effect of increasing the charge upon the public revenue. I say in all seriousness that I know of no other matter to which I have given more consideration, having regard to the demands upon the time of a public man. If I had consulted my personal wishes I would have liked to restore all the salaries and have no salary deduction act. But I had to measure the situation in the light of our needs. It may surprise my hon. friend to know that the moment you go above $1,000 you soon run into those who receive the major portion of the salaries paid in the public service. A jump of $100 or $200 runs you into millions. We felt that in the light of the revenues the maximum to which we could go this year was $1,000. For the reasons I have indicated, no further consideration could be given to this matter.
