Mr. NEILL: There is one point which I do not think has been presented to the minister. Accepting the position he has stated, would he allow an exemption instead of a minimum of $1,000? A man earning $1,200 is now subject to a deduction of $120, but with an exemption of $1,000 he would pay only ten per cent on the $200 over the $1,000.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend overlooks the fact that in the case of those who receive $1,200 and under, the government pays the contributions to the superannuation fund, hence the deduction is only five per cent. In connection with the borderline cases we have provided that in no instance shall a man receive less than $1,000 per year.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister would consider the point raised this afternoon in connection with board and allowances and insert the words "in cash" after the words "one thousand dollars"? I refer to the seamen who receive $65 per month but who undergo a deduction of ten per cent on the alleged cost of their board. Of course this board does cost the government something, but an arbitrary value is placed upon it and a deduction of ten per cent made. The deduction comes off the $65 received. These men have homes to keep up, and after this deduction is made and they pay the necessary expenses for clothes and other things, it leaves very little for their families. I know the minister has power under section 6 to make arrangements of this kind, and I should like to know if he will consider this matter.

Mr. RHODES: In the application of this act, as in the application of any act of a general character, there are bound to be instances of hardship.

Mr. NEILL: That is what you are taking the power for.

Mr. RHODES: You cannot escape these individual cases. However, I cannot accede to the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. The amount of cash which such a man receives has been adjusted in the light of the value to him of the allowance he may receive, whether it is living quarters, food, rent or a dozen and one other things. These are classed as compensation and his salary must be judged not in the light of the amount of cash he receives but in the light of the amount of his total compensation, either in cash or in kind.

Mr. NEILL: But this is not based upon the value to the man, it is based upon the cost to the government. The government may set a figure of $30 as the value of his board, but if he were living at home with his family he could live much cheaper than that. If this man were living at home it would be quite different, but he must maintain his wife and family out of his wages, and I ask the minister how he can do that when this deduction is made from the $65 he receives.

Mr. RHODES: It is beside the point whether or not a man can maintain a home on $65 per month or any other sum.

Mr. NEILL: It is very much to the point.

Mr. RHODES: That is not the point, although for the sake of argument we will assume that he cannot. I am not going to give the obvious answer, that he is not compelled to work for the government and need not accept that rate of compensation if he does not wish to do so. So far as this bill is concerned all we are dealing with is the question: Shall there or shall there not be a deduction of ten per cent? The broad question of whether or not an individual is being adequately compensated is not one which can be properly raised here. The objection raised by my hon. friend may be well taken, but it has no reference to the question of the 10 per cent deduction.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister think over the point I raised this afternoon of reconsidering his decision six months from the beginning of the fiscal year should the revenues in the future justify it?

Mr. RHODES: It would be difficult to provide against such a contingency in view of the fact that our whole set-up, so far as current account is concerned, has been made up for the year on the assumption that this deduction will take effect during the fiscal year. In these circumstances the government would leave itself open to every conceivable kind of pressure and criticism if it did or did not act at a given time with respect to the restoration of the balance. This does not apply to my hon. friend, but in view of the criticism which we have received ad lib from hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the blank cheque, and considering the objection they attach thereto, I am rather surprised at the suggestion that there should be such a power as that placed in the hands of the government.

Mr. NEILL: But this would be specified in the act, that in six months' time action shall be taken if the increasing revenues justify it. I do think the minister's argument rather weak when he says that the set-up of the finances is based on the assumption he states and therefore he cannot depart from it. The set-up of the finances in the last several years past has totally failed to come up to his estimate and nothing in particular has happened. Cheerfully and hopefully he anticipates, as he says in the budget, that the returns in the ensuing months will run higher than he has calculated either in the past or in his set-up, and I have no doubt that he will cheerfully accept the increased revenue in the months to come if it eventuates. Well, surely he can anticipate action on such increased revenue. He will not repudiate the increased revenues as they come in, and therefore I do not see why he should not consider the suggestion. With all deference to the minister, I submit that the argument as to his being unable to depart from an arranged set-up is rather weak.

Mr. RHODES: If it is any comfort to my hon. friend I am quite prepared to concede that my argument is weak, but I do not agree with his that the matter is not being considered, for I have given it a great deal of consideration. Because I cannot accede to the suggestion he makes, it by no means follows that the matter is not being considered.

Sir EUGENE FISET: In section 3, subsection 1, there are two provisos. The first is:

That no provision of this act shall operate to reduce the compensation of any member of the public service of Canada below $1,000 per annum.

That appears to be absolutely specific, but the second proviso, I frankly confess, I do not exactly understand; I do not understand the purpose of it. The first proviso seems to deal with the matter absolutely and entirely, but the second provision is extremely vague and I should be glad if the minister would explain it.

Mr. RHODES: The first provision is intended to deal with the borderline cases and the second one is the general exemption. Whether these provisos are happily worded or not, I think that they are very clear in their intention. I do not assume responsibility for the verbiage; the responsibility belongs to the Department of Justice. I may say, however, that the idea was to make it clear beyond peradventure that the full salary up to $1,000 should be paid in all instances.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is rather vague. There is another provision, which is that the money may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. Does the minister think it is advisable that such a provision dealing with civil service appropriations should be placed in the body of the bill? This house has not voted the civil list for any department. That civil list contains first of all salaries, and secondly contingencies, and it seems to me it could easily be provided that the money that may be needed should be voted by parliament instead of being paid out of the consolidated revenue fund. Inasmuch as each department will have to deal with any adjustment that may have to be made in the salary of any one of the civil servants that may be affected, why not provide in the body of the act for the money to be paid out of departmental contingencies vote? The contingencies vote authorizes the payment of travelling expenses of civil servants. Surely therefore, if you amended this bill to provide that any adjustment required would be met out of the contingencies vote, you would avoid creating the precedent, which is now being established, of dealing with the matter out of the consolidated revenue.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has had a very wide experience in the public service, but I would point out to him that there is nothing unusual in this provision. He may not have found it in a salary bill of this kind, but he will find it in numerous statutes passed by parliament. Now, the reason for this is twofold. In the first place, I must direct to the attention of the committee the fact that the estimates were prepared and printed on the basis of ninety per cent, and notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said, the civil government vote has been passed in a number of instances. In the second place, the contingency vote has been reduced in most departments. But even if it were at the old figure, it could not adequately take care of the ten per cent. But there is a further reason, and it is this. A number of cases will have to be dealt with by the treasury board under the provisions particularly of subsection (c) of section 6, and money must be provided to pay the compensation in these cases. You could not, unless you put in some omnibus lump sum in a general vote, which would not get you further ahead, be able to provide by specific vote for these particular cases; whereas this means that where you can pay it out of the consolidated revenue fund there will be no excess vote but only that amount required will be taken for the compensation provided for in the restoration of salary deduction in respect of those who receive up to $1,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I quite understand the minister, but I realized during my days in the service that one of the most sacred things was the consolidated revenue fund. I can remember that it was impossible to draw any money from that fund except by governor general's warrant when the house was not in session. I realize also, as the minister says, that especially in the last three or four years there has been a tendency for us to put our hands on this special vote, called the consolidated revenue fund, and to embody in numerous acts of parliament the powers granted under this act. This deals with civil service appropriations. I think it is creating rather an awkward precedent to authorize any money to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund for such a purpose. I believe it would be proper to provide under a special vote, either in the supplementary estimates or in the contingencies, a lump sum to be administered departmentally or by the treasury board than to place those words as they stand in the legislation. Of course I may be wrong. I can quite well understand the Minister of Finance has his own reason, but I think one of my colleagues has an amendment to offer and we can proceed with it.

Mr. RHODES: In reply to the hon. member for Rimouski, may I say that this bill is establishing a precedent which I hope parliament will never be called upon to follow in after years.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Why take such an extreme course?

Mr. RHODES: I have no doubt I can find numerous cases, but my mind comes at once to the provision which is on the statutes today in regard to old age pensions. If my memory serves me aright that is an elastic provision in precisely the same terms. There is no vote, no sum mentioned. The money may be taken out of the consolidated revenue fund and the amount may expand or contract, of course theoretically contract, because we will expect it to expand. Naturally this provision is in the bill for the reasons I have indicated, and it will not be necessary to deal with it again on account of our not being able to make an accurate estimate. In view of the circumstances and the precedent I cannot see any objection.

Mr. VENIOT: I fully agree with the stand taken by the hon. member for Rimouski. The case cited by the Minister of Finance of the old age pensions is an entirely different one.

Mr. RHODES: Why?

Mr. VENIOT: I will give the reasons. The general estimates as submitted to the house provide for a deduction of ten per cent or for ninety per cent of the former salary. This bill completely disorganizes those estimates; it provides that up to a certain salary the amount of ten per cent as deducted in the general estimates shall be returned. The proper way to deal with the matter would be to bring in a supplementary estimate to supplement, if I may use that term, the general estimates as they now stand. In that respect the case is entirely different from that cited to the committee by the Minister of Finance. My opinion is that sufficient information could be obtained so that there could be inserted in the supplementary estimates of each department the sum necessary to cover the restoration of this ten per cent deduction. Each department ought to be able to know within a measurable distance the exact figure that would be required. I can understand that the minister is quite right in saying that certain cases will have to be readjusted in some way or another, but those cannot amount to such a large sum as to warrant the minister in departing from the principle of obtaining the authority of parliament in voting money for public expenditures. In view of that I have an amendment that I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski:

That section 3 be amended by striking out the word "unappropriated" in line ten on page two and substituting the word "appropriated" therefor.

While I am on my feet might I ask the minister this question: Has he given any thought to the case of commission postmasters whose ten per cent deduction is made from the gross revenue of the office? Has he considered applying the ten per cent deduction to the actual salary the postmaster would receive after paying the expenses necessary for carrying on the office?

Mr. NEILL: The wording of the amendment does not make sense.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly does not.

Mr. RHODES: I am sure the chairman would say that the amendment is out of order without my raising the point, even assuming that it made sense.

Mr. NEILL: It should read: "Of any moneys appropriated."

Mr. VENIOT: It means that the word "appropriated" is substituted for "unappropriated."

Mr. RHODES: All I can say is that if the money were appropriated, it would not be in the consolidated revenue fund. I do not want to split hairs with my hon. friend. I submit to him that he cannot differentiate in principle between the provision of this bill which says that the money required under the legislation shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, and the old age pensions measure which he supported, which makes precisely the same provision.

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly I do.

Mr. RHODES: Why?

Mr. VENIOT: I have already given the reason.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The difficulty, as I understand the matter, is this. The clause as amended would read:

There may be paid out of any appropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund—

Mr. VENIOT: Let me read the amendment again:

That section 3 be amended by striking out the word "unappropriated" in line ten on page two and substituting the word "appropriated" therefor.

Or substitute therefor the word "appropriated."

Sir EUGENE FISET: I do not wish to second such an amendment because I do not think it is what I intended. I would be willing if the hon. member for Gloucester would substitute for his amendment:

Out of moneys appropriated by parliament, such sums—

Instead of:

Out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, such sums—

Mr. VENIOT: That is what it means.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether the committee might not think it desirable to leave this as it stands. It is the usual form adopted in all cases where an elastic sum has to be provided to meet a situation arising by reason of changed arrangements from the estimates as submitted. I will give another case, one in connection with the civil service commissioners and their retirement. They were to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund such gratuity as was thought desirable. Wherever an amount has to be paid to supplement a fixed sum in the estimates and the exact amount cannot be ascertained, I think it is within the knowledge of the hon. member for Rimouski that this is the form which is used; that is the unnamed and undetermined amount which it is impossible at the moment to fix, is to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would the Prime Minister allow one word? I am not exactly criticizing the method that has been adopted. I say it is too bad that a precedent of that kind should be created.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a precedent.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the Prime Minister permit me? In this special measure providing for the deduction of ten per cent we are really dealing with civil government estimates. I was under the impression when I spoke that none of the civil service appropriations had been voted for any department. The minister tells me some have been voted. In the civil government appropriation there are two kinds of votes, one providing for the salary of the civil service for each department, and the other for contingencies. I think if the Prime Minister takes the trouble to read the bill he will find that the sum of money concerned will not be extraordinarily large. In my humble opinion it would be preferable if a special amount, call it contingencies if you like, were provided, either for each department so that they might deal with their own cases, or in a lump sum, and let the sum be voted by parliament. I do not criticize either the Minister of Finance or the government for taking the course they have; it is their responsibility, but I have put my views fairly and I think plainly.

Mr. GERSHAW: The question I intended to ask has been answered rather fully by the minister, but I wish to say just a word that might be of use in further consideration of the matter. I have before me a list of ten post offices, within each case the gross revenue for 1930, 1931, and 1932. A typical one is where the gross revenue in 1930 was $3,000 and is now $1,900. These men will not be benefited by this legislation, yet their expenses are the same as when the revenue was at the higher point. The responsibilities are the same—they handle large sums of money; they must in each case pay an assistant. I give these as typical examples of post offices all over the country; these postmasters are making a greater contribution on account of the way their salaries have been reduced.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend of course will appreciate that he is dealing with a class of public servant in receipt of a far higher salary than $1,000.

Mr. GERSHAW: Slightly higher.

Mr. RHODES: Well, they are beyond the limit, and we cannot possibly bring them in.

Mr. HEENAN: The Minister of Finance gave a very illuminating answer to the question I asked, but I am afraid his answer with respect to the principle adopted in connection with old age pensions is not so illuminating.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend should distinguish between the case of the appropriation and the old age pension.

Mr. HEENAN: I am going to try to distinguish, try to illuminate. Surely each minister can estimate the number of employees in his department that are going to have the ten per cent restored. Neither the minister nor anyone else can tell from month to month how many old age pensions will have to be provided for. He does not know but what another province might ask the government of Canada to permit them to enter into this agreement. Another thousand old age pensioners might come on the plan.

There is no other way I know of that they could be provided for except by what you might call a blanket order of this description. That cannot be said with respect to the number of employees to be affected under this measure.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend may have illuminated the situation, but I must be very dense for I have not seen a ray of the light. Certainly he has made no legal or constitutional argument that has any bearing on the point. In the case of the old age pension bill it would be easy to put a sum in the estimates of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 or $50,000,000 if need be. That would be an appropriation by parliament. But there is not a single dollar mentioned. Now my hon. friend says, the departments can say how many will come under the provisions of this bill. I cannot say how many, but I can assure my hon. friend that there will be a very considerable number, some of whom will not be determined until towards the end of the year, the borderline cases. The best you could do would be to put a lump sum in the estimates which would mean little or nothing, specifically to provide for contingencies of the kind.

The hon. member for Rimouski said we can use the contingency account. I have pointed out that would not be sufficient. And if we enlarge it I do not see that we are much better off, except that there is a limit. If my hon. friend wants a limit that is another matter, though I do not see that it is called for, because it applies to those particularly referred to in the bill.

I see we are not going to make further progress to-night; we have reached the hour for adjournment, and therefore I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 30, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 66, for the relief of Helen Isabelle Smith Maybee.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SOLDIER SETTLERS

Mr. McINTOSH:

1. Have any soldier settlers been compelled to leave their farms during the past year, 1933-34, that is, since the passing of "An Act to amend The Soldier Settlement Act," assented to May 23, 1933?

2. If so, what was the number and their names, by provinces?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. No soldier settlers have been compelled to leave their farms as a result of action by the Soldier Settlement of Canada or the Department of Indian Affairs since the passing of "An Act to amend the Soldier Settlement Act" assented to May 23, 1933.

2. Answered by No. 1.

MOOSE JAW, SASK., RELIEF CAMP

Mr. VALLANCE:

1. What amounts have been charged by the Saskatchewan relief commission to the government for the operation of the camp for single unemployed and destitute men at Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, from June 16, 1933, to March 31, 1934?

2. What are the terms of the contract between the Saskatchewan relief commission and the contractor in charge of the camp, one J. H. Timms, and covering the above periods?

3. What amounts have been expended by the contractor during this period for: (a) clothing; (b) food; (c) wages; (d) all other expenses of the operation of the camp?

4. What are the names of the employees of the contractor in the said camp and what wages are paid to each?

5. What is the average number of men housed in this camp per day since June 16, 1933?

Mr. GORDON:

The following telegram has been received from C. B. Daniel, General Manager of the Saskatchewan Relief Commission, in response to a request from the Department of Labour for the information called for by the above inquiry:

Re telegram April twenty Vallance questions one commission do not operate camp at Moose Jaw or any other place in province (stop) We furnish sustenance and shelter through caterer for physically unfit men and for physically fit men pending placement in federal camps or farm homes (stop) Dominions share of costs at Moose Jaw from June sixteenth nineteen thirty-three to March thirty-first nineteen thirty-four is nine thousand three hundred and twenty-nine dollars this being fifty per cent of forty cents per man day (stop) J. PENITENTIARY RIOTS—COUNSEL ENGAGED

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. What counsel were employed to prosecute the offenders in the penitentiary riots at St. Vincent de Paul, Kingston, and Dorchester?
2. Were they appointed by the federal or provincial governments?
3. Who paid their expenses?
4. What was the total amount received by each counsel?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. St. Vincent de Paul—J. E. C. Bumbray, LL.B. in the preliminary proceedings, and in association with the local Crown Prosecutor at the trials.

Kingston—J. Keiller MacKay, LL.B., in preliminary proceedings, and certain of the trials. The local Crown Prosecutor at the remainder of the trials.

Dorchester—E. C. Weyman, in the preliminary proceedings, and in association with the local Crown Prosecutor at the trials.

2. Mr. Bumbray, Mr. MacKay and Mr. Weyman were appointed by the federal government, Mr. MacKay was appointed by the provincial government for certain of the trials.

3. The expenses of Mr. Bumbray, Mr. MacKay and Mr. Weyman were paid by the federal government, except such as were paid to Mr. MacKay by the province.

4. Paid by the dominion—J. E. C. Bumbray, LL.B., $4,956.09; J. Keiller MacKay, LL.B., $3,109.85; E. C. Weyman, $1,736. No information as to amounts paid by provinces.

CHIEF SUPERINTENDENT, POST OFFICE SERVICE

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Who is the chief superintendent of the post office service?
2. When was he appointed to such position?
3. What is his salary?
4. Where was he born?
5. When did he enter the civil service?
6. How long was he in Canada before he was appointed to the civil service?
7. When was he permanently appointed?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Underwood, Edward James.
2. 30th October, 1925.
3. $5,220.
4. Hanley, England.
5. 5th October, 1914.
6. No information.
7. 1st April, 1915.

DREDGE NO. 126

Mr. BRASSET:

1. Who is at present the watchman of the dredge of the Public Works department at Havre aux Maisons, Magdalen Islands?
2. What salary does he receive?
3. Are any persons other than the watchman receiving a salary or remuneration from the Public Works department in respect of such dredge?
4. If so, who are such persons and what salary or remuneration are they receiving?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A similar question to the one above was previously asked by the hon. member for Gaspe on February 2, 1934, and answered on February 5, 1934. (See Hansard of February 5, 1934, page 264). The answer is the same at the present time.

STE. ANNE DE BEAUPRE RELIEF WORK

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Have any complaints been made by unemployed men regarding certain unemployment relief undertakings carried out by the municipal council of St. Anne de Beaupre during the winter of 1933?
2. If so, what are the names of the unemployed who complained and what was the nature of their complaints?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Yes.

2. The names of the unemployed who complained are as follows: C. Cloutier, Alfred St. Hilaire, Freddy Racine, Elzear Leclerc, Gerard Gagnon, Omer Tetu, Maurice Tetu, Joseph Mercier. The complaint consisted of a petition from the above mentioned unemployed, who complained that they had been compelled to work on private property in return for the direct relief granted to them by the municipality.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. GOULET:

1. What is the total number of men engaged in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?
2. How many of these men are of French origin?
3. How many of such men are Canadian-born?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to ask that this be passed as an order for a return, except as to the second question. We have no record as to which members of the mounted police are of French origin. We can tell, with respect to the third question, who are Canadian born, and that will be shown in the return.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question stands as order for return except as to the second question, which is dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. GOULET:

1. What is the total number of men engaged in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?
2. How many of such men are Canadian-born?

MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. HOWARD:

1. How many boats were originally purchased or built by the government for the government merchant marine?
2. What year was the first construction contract let?
3. When was the fleet numerically at full strength?
4. What was the total cost of the boats purchased and built?
5. How many boats does the government merchant marine still own?
6. How many were sold during each of the following years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933?
7. What price did they bring?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS—INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (for Mr. Mitchell) moved:

For a copy of all instructions issued by and under the authority of the Minister of Pensions to the administrative officers of the Department of Pensions during the last twelve months.

Mr. BENNETT: It is understood, of course, that this motion will not cover the ordinary correspondence between administrative officers in the department; but any instructions that have to do with the administration of the Pension Act would be included.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried with the exception noted.

CANADA-AUSTRALIA RADIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I would like to direct a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister with reference to the statement which appears in the press by the Hon. Archdale Parkhill that direct radio service between Canada and Australia is likely to be replaced by a United States service from United States stations, and that the Point Grey station is likely to lose that traffic. Has the Prime Minister any statement to make in that regard:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The whole matter of radio communication between Australia and Canada was under consideration by the Postmaster General of Australia, the Postmaster General here and the technical officers of the departments that were in a position to speak with authority on the matter. I have no statement yet to make. The matter is largely one for technicians.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 23, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to extend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) my congratulations upon the able manner in which he has discharged what is always a very difficult and onerous task. His was a clear and frank statement of the country's financial position without any attempt to minimize the difficulties or to evade the responsibilities inherent thereto. In his speech as the chief critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) discharged his duty in a manner which was no doubt entirely satisfactory to those with whom he is associated and for whom he spoke. However, I do not think he will think it a discourtesy on my part if I refrain from following his lead in the form of my remarks. I assume the function of a critic is to criticize, and in that respect the hon. member undoubtedly discharged well his duty. I think on this occasion he excelled himself. But as I listened to his remarks it struck me that they were singularly lacking in any constructive feature. He most skilfully evaded all recognition of the very difficult circumstances in which this country in common with all other countries is placed or of the problems which face this country in common with others. This thought came to my mind: Can it be possible that the hon. gentleman and those with whom he is associated are unaware of the significant changes, both social and economic, which have come about in this and other countries during the past fifteen years? These changes are not merely due to the depression of the last three years; they have been reaching a degree of completion in recent years but they have been coming about for at least fifteen years.

The object of a budget is, first, to acquaint the country with the financial status of the country and, second, to survey affairs generally with regard to trade and other matters, both internal and external. I have intimated already that in my opinion the Minister of Finance discharged his duty in a most admirable way. He was unbiased by his difficulties and courageously disclosed to the house the precise conditions. Of course, any minister that does that lays himself open to criticism here and there with regard to the details of his speech. But it was necessary that this be done and I think the minister has discharged his duty with credit to himself and to the house.

My purpose to-day is to invite consideration by the house of certain factors which vitally affect our trade and commerce, both internal and external, and which have resulted in a considerable rearrangement of modern business practices. This rearrangement has been almost revolutionary in its character and effect. Old shibboleths such as the law of supply and demand, buy that we may sell and tariff for revenue only will not extricate this or any other country from the embarrassing entanglements into which their trade has been drifting because of the operation of these new and potent factors.

First, let us look at Canada. As far as Canada is concerned, the most tragic and significant fact is the subnormal price of farm products and the consequent loss of purchasing power of the people in a very large section of the country. Some one will say, "Expand your foreign trade," but that is no answer. I would point out this one simple fact, that apart from wheat—I am speaking now of agricultural products—we consume within the bounds of Canada the major portion of the products of our farms. I shall run over a few. We consume something like 98½ per cent of the butter produced in Canada, exporting and importing very small quantities. We consume 90 per cent of the bacon and 98 to 99 per cent of the beef produced in Canada. These are the most important but there are others. The fact remains that the major portion of our farm products are consumed in Canada and, therefore, it behooves the house to give a very careful study to whatever factors are now operating to contribute to the embarrassment of the producer and to the low prices which the consumer is now paying. As I have intimated, it is my intention to examine certain factors, both internal and external, which have a vital effect upon this and other questions pertaining to the trade, commerce and industry of this country.

There is a startling fact to which I should like to invite the attention of the house. Since the war Canada has passed through what is virtually an industrial and trade revolution. This has not occurred among the workers but in the control and ownership of the business organism of the country. The more I study this matter the more startling it becomes. Private ownership and personal supervision have been displaced to an almost unbelievable extent by a bond form of capital and corporate management. This applies to industrial and commercial distributing concerns, and it is difficult to estimate to what extent this change has affected the well being of those engaged in agriculture and industry. In order to demonstrate what I am referring to in these general remarks I shall give the house certain facts which, in my opinion, have a very significant bearing upon our affairs. The tendency to merge business under a limited control was prevalent in Canada and abroad before the war but it was checked by the war. Just as the war checked the extension of the merging of business under limited control, so did the depression of 1929. Whether or not that depression was due to that tendency I should not like to say but the fact is that for the time being it curbed the merging of business. In order that the house may get a proper perspective of this matter, which I consider to be of very grave importance, I should like to quote from a government report issued in 1913. This is a report on industrial mergers and over capitalization and I shall read some brief extracts from it in order that the house may be seized of the significance of the movement at that time and its consequences. I propose also to examine some factors with regard to external matters. This report of 1913 says:

> Towards the close of the decade 1900-1910 a tendency to form amalgamations became marked among industrial enterprises in Canada. The tendency reached the proportions of a movement more or less general in 1909-1910; but it later almost completely subsided.

Then the report goes on to quote the Monetary Times, to the effect that in that period there were a great many mergers formed absorbing 248 companies, the aggregate capital of which was $456,000,000. This however is the significant part of the quotation:

> The outstanding feature of the merger movement in Canada as above developed was its lack of success. Of the 56 amalgamations just mentioned, several met complete failure, several were saved only by drastic reorganizations, and several had to defer dividends on bonds and stock issues. Profits estimated on the "savings" above enumerated—

That is, the savings due to management and to other causes usually given as arguments in favour of mergers.

> —in many cases did not materialize. Consolidation in itself, it was found, by no means guarantees economies or larger profits as compared with the operation of individual plants. Many unexpected difficulties cropped up in the process of welding individual plants together.

I read that merely to indicate that there were before the country and before economists certain facts which I do not think were given very much credence or very much attention; otherwise we should perhaps have known better than to do some of the things we did subsequent to the war.

Let us turn to the period following the war. During the years from 1922 to 1929 there were formed in Canada no less than 120 mergers, involving over 500 separate companies. Of power and paper mergers there were 8, which took in 58 concerns. A biscuit merger absorbed 7 of the old companies; the Eastern Dairies absorbed 10 local companies; the Dairy Corporation of Canada took in 6 separate companies; 4 flour milling companies absorbed 48 bakeries; 1 paving corporation gobbled up 14 independent companies; 11 public utility corporations combined 46 local companies; General Steel Wares combined 5 companies, including such concerns as McClarys, which for a generation had been a household term in this country, and Happy Thought. It is difficult to realize the effect that this has had on our national life. The social change resulting from this was most striking, because this is what ensued. Of the 500 companies which were thus merged into a much more limited number, the heads of these companies vanished as leaders in business. Some of them of course were carried into the merger and occupied positions of leadership; but by long odds the largest proportion of these independent leaders were eliminated from the business life of the country and no longer contributed either their experience or their guidance to its affairs.

I have also under my hand a statement—I will not read it in detail—showing that a large number of these companies failed financially; in other words, they were not successful as mergers. So that from the economic standpoint there was no gain to the country so far as they were concerned. In reference to this matter I would quote some extracts from a book recently published by Mr. T. E. Gregory. Gold, Unemployment and Capitalism is the title of the book, and the author is recognized, I think, by a great many as a high authority on subjects of this kind. His words in reference to this tendency to merge or to form cartels, to which he also refers, should warrant I think at least some attention. This is what Mr. Gregory says:

> To have both planning and freedom, regulation and perfect elasticity of organization and technique is an impossibility. The difficulty of reconciling capitalism and planning may be judged by the mistakes committed in the last ten years in consequence of the enthusiastic acceptance by certain classes of business men in all countries of the doctrine of rationalization.

Further on he says:

> What has caused so many rationalization projects to fail, that is, to disappoint from the financial point of view, has been the neglect of the distinction between the technical optimum and the economic optimum; and neglect of this distinction is peculiarly liable to occur when the direction of economic enterprise passes out of the hands of those trained to think in terms of the market into those trained to think in terms of the process subsidiary to the output of a certain product or service.

Then he concludes:

> The fact remains that the rationalized undertakings of the era 1922-29, with their enormous overhead investment, their centralization of initiative and authority, their greater ability to monopolize the market and to buy on the most favourable terms, have not shown themselves conspicuously more successful than the non-rationalized undertakings. They have lacked adaptability, and elasticity, and for my own part I believe we shall witness a less blind worship of size and authority and monopoly in business for some time to come, unless indeed the whole process of economic adjustment of scale of output to demand is to be permanently prevented by the intervention of the state.

In other words, he directs attention to the growing tendency towards the development of mergers and monopolies in business, and to the obvious failure of this effort. May I give a more striking illustration of the working-out of this tendency? I give this because it applies to the commonest of all foodstuffs, bread, and it does present to my mind, to the mind of every thoughtful person, and particularly, I fancy, to this house, subject for very careful consideration.

Six mill-controlled bakeries in Montreal, with an aggregate yearly capacity of 163 million pounds of bread, can supply four-fifths of the bread sold throughout the whole province of Quebec. The total of all bread sold in Montreal alone is some 88 million pounds. In other words, these six controlled bakeries could supply 80 per cent of all the bread required in the province of Quebec. The significant fact is that in Montreal there are 126 bakeries and in the province of Quebec 887. Yet these six have the capacity to control 80 per cent of the supply of the whole province.

Take Toronto. Six of Toronto's seven mill-controlled bakeries report a capacity of 202 million pounds. The total consumption in Ontario is 403 million pounds; in other words, these six bakeries in Toronto could supply half the total bread consumed in Ontario. And yet there are 235 bakeries in Toronto and 1,111 bakeries in Ontario.

In Winnipeg we have this situation. Three mill-controlled bakeries have a capacity—77 million pounds—to supply the whole province, for the estimated annual provincial consumption is around 57 million pounds. Yet in Manitoba there are 57 bakeries in Winnipeg while in the whole province there are 136.

In Vancouver there are four mill-controlled bakeries with an estimated capacity of 50 million pounds, whereas the total consumption for the whole province of British Columbia is 58 million pounds. Yet there are 99 bakeries in Vancouver and 267 in the province.

This question of the development of huge commercial and industrial organizations, with capacity far beyond the requirements of the community, and with the concentration of control of these industries in the hands of a comparatively small number, constitutes a problem which this country might well keep in mind when considering the policies to be adopted in dealing with these matters. Such is the story. In the light of those facts, very much abbreviated in the telling—and I have under my hand many more facts in support of my contention—can anyone say that our old methods of handling farm products will succeed? I submit this proposition to the house: in the face of the facts to which I have made reference wherein is justified the opposition to an attempt to give Canada marketing legislation which will enable the country, the producers and others interested to have at least some interest in the orderly marketing of their products? The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) says: Let the government keep its hands off this business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. STEVENS: He said it over and over again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. He said over and over again: Let parliament make what regulations they like.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend has spent about two weeks in criticizing and objecting to a bill which is designed, as I have intimated, to assist in overcoming the difficulties which have resulted from the concentration of business in a comparatively few hands.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Let the Magna Charta function.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says: Let the Magna Charta function anyway. He may question my other interpretation of his remarks, but Magna Charta will take care of all this.

Let us turn to the question of foreign trade. Are the old conditions of pre-war days operating now? The chief financial critic of the opposition (Mr. Ralston) says: Buy that you may sell. That sounds well; these old shibboleths, as I have said, sound well, but I ask him and the house: Buy from whom and how? From the cartels of Europe? Totally ignoring the change that has come over the organization of industry, business and commerce in Europe, totally disregarding the cartels that have grown up there in recent years, cartels which are international in character and which by their weight and influence very frequently largely direct the policies of government, they tell us that the only thing that is necessary is to buy so that you may sell. Let us examine the situation in regard to the cartels in Europe. In the first place the system so far as the internal operation of cartels is concerned is an old one. For instance, in Germany they have had cartels since, I think, 1874, but the cartel of Germany of pre-war days was one to regulate business within her own territory. These cartels, however, have now become international in scope. It is true that before the war there were a few international cartels; for instance, there was the carbide cartel, the rail cartel, that is concerning the production of steel rails, the incandescent cartel and the aluminum cartel, but it is since the postwar period that we see the development of the great cartels in Europe. These have been used as a means of readjusting the economic structure of Europe; that fact cannot be questioned. In the political, social and economic upheaval which has been occurring in Europe during the past fifteen years we find that the international cartels, understandings between groups of industry in different countries, have played and are playing a very important part. For example, let us take the Franco-German potash cartel. Both the German and French governments are interested in it and it very largely controls the supply of that commodity.

Quotas are fixed for producers and also for exporters. I shall cite a few more instances in a moment. In the light of the fact that these international cartels are operating by agreement among groups of an international character, it is not enough to come to parliament and say: The solution of all your difficulties is to buy so that you may sell, because we are dealing not only with governments, not only with conditions that arise out of the imposition of tariffs in Europe and elsewhere, but with a completely new business structure that did not exist before and is of a tremendously important and potent character.

Let us take, for example, the steel cartel. Germany takes 43 per cent; France, 32 per cent, Belgium and, I think, one or two other countries the balance. Let me illustrate my point now. Canada is anxious and desirous in every way of trading with Belgium. Belgium is anxious to trade with Canada. That therefore looks like a comparatively simple proposition, but when we come down to a study of the actualities, what do we find? We find that a great steel cartel which controls the output of steel in Belgium as well as in Germany and France, has indicated that the price of steel exported to Canada shall be at a certain figure, which figure has no relation to the cost of production. I ask the house: Is the government of Canada called upon to stand idly by and allow an international industrial cartel in Europe to ship steel into Canada at figures obviously unfair according to our law as applied since 1905 to all other countries regarding goods sold at prices below cost of production? We cannot do so and that is one of the problems that arise between countries when they attempt to make agreements or understandings.

Mr. HANBURY: How are you going to break that?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will follow me I shall try to elucidate this matter a little further. Under this cartel one dollar per ton is taken for the ordinary business affairs of the cartel, but should one member of it exceed its production quota, it is fined $4 a ton and out of the fund thus raised those who come under the quota are paid for any losses which they may incur. For instance, the German industrialists had, I think, to pay several million dollars into this fund. I am seeking, however, to emphasize the fact of the existence of these cartels.

Let me cite one or two others. There is the chemical cartel which has grown to proportions that I think were undreamed of before the war. It is still in existence. I am not condemning cartels but I am inviting the house to take note of the fact of their existence just as I have invited the house to take note of the fact of the merger of companies in Canada as a new set-up in the structure of our business organizations. There is the rayon cartel, well known to be a strong international set-up, and the linoleum cartel. The copper cartel in 1928 and 1929 fixed a price of eighteen cents a pound and copper stood at that figure for two or three years. It is true that after the depression set in the price was broken, but the cartel is still in existence. Let us take lead and zinc. As regards zinc, Belgium, Holland, France, Germany, Poland, Great Britain, Spain and, I think in a sense Canada and the United States, are in this cartel. I remember not so very long ago that certain purchasers of lead, wanting to buy it in large quantities for a European country, were desirous of buying it in Canada. What did they find? The only place where they could buy that lead was in London from a certain firm which controls the export of lead to those countries. Why? Because of an international understanding among the countries of the world controlling the marketing of lead. It may be argued that the government of Canada should force, for instance, any Canadian producer to step out. But what would happen? Simply this; you would close up your lead mines, and the Canadian producer would have no opportunity of marketing his goods in any of these countries.

Mr. HEAPS: In that case could not the government itself step in?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I think not, where you have a large export as you have in lead, copper and other minerals. What I do think is that the conditions that have caused the cartelization of industry and commerce in Europe suggest the need of an international conference to give special study to this subject. I might say that the League of Nations have already taken cognizance of it and made several reports. As a matter of fact it is declared in one of those reports that so influential and strong were those at the head of some of these cartels that the League of Nations themselves felt that they should not go any further than merely cite the facts. There is a very interesting document published by the United States Department of Commerce, written by Louis Domeratzky, on this whole subject of cartels. It is a most illuminating document. There are also some utterances by the League of Nations.

I have cited this matter of cartels for the purpose of impressing upon the house the fact that there are new elements entering into the question of international trade that were not present formerly. But that is not all. We must now recognize—I have referred to this before, I shall merely mention it—that the question of war debts has resulted in inhibitions and impediments to trade in the form of tariffs and quotas; this is another factor that is beyond our control. The fact that certain countries of the world have been submerged in debt to other countries constitutes an inflexible and inexorable barrier against the importation of goods into that country except under certain conditions. It is just as inexorable as the law of gravity, there is no escape from it. It is senseless and useless for us to talk about moving trade in certain directions when as a matter of fact by reason of the financial condition and obligations of given countries it is impossible for those countries to open their doors to foreign trade except under certain conditions which must take cognizance of the weight of the debt and where it is owed. Yet, sir, there are those who still say that we should extend our markets. Here is another factor which I invite hon. gentlemen opposite to consider. In saying what I now say I am not attaching any blame to hon. gentlemen opposite, I am merely stating a fact. During the years that hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and I think in perhaps one or two instances before their time, there were some twenty-three most-favoured-nation treaties entered into by this country. What does that mean? It means simply this, if we follow the advice of certain hon. gentlemen opposite and make a trade agreement with Spain or Italy or Greece or any country in Europe covering certain items to be admitted to this country, the moment that agreement is made it immediately and automatically applies to twenty-three other countries. So, sir, when we discuss with a country the question of barter, if you wish to use that term as it is so frequently used lately, as my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) said in rather picturesque language the other day, all that is required is to give a quid for a quo—I do not know what he meant by a quid, it suggests chewing tobacco. Give a quid, he says, for a quo. But when you give a country its quid, there are at once twenty-three other countries that can chew on that quid just the same as the one to which you give it. That is one of the problems with which we are faced. It is a question whether that kind of international agreement was wise or unwise, for the moment I am expressing no opinion on that. I know arguments can be advanced in favour of it. But I say without hesitancy that in the light of the changed conditions, in the light of these other factors in Europe to which I have referred, this doctrine of the most favoured nation, which is embalmed in some twenty-three treaties, is a distinct impediment to the making of agreements with other countries, a grave difficulty.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Get rid of the hang-nail treaties.

Mr. STEVENS: There is another point to which I wish to refer briefly. Statements have been made about the balance of trade. My hon. friend the critic of the opposition dealt with this at considerable length. It is interesting to note that our periods of excessive borrowings synchronize with the periods of excess of imports over exports. Let us pause and examine that for a moment. Open your doors and allow goods to flow in, they say, the theory being that the moment you do that goods will flow out; and the golden age from 1901-2-3-4 to 1907 or 1908 is cited as proof and support for that doctrine. But turn up your trade returns for these years, turn up your financial balances and what do you find? You find that during the years when Canada did its heaviest borrowings abroad imports exceeded exports. And that must necessarily be; it is as I said a moment ago a law of economics. But what this parliament and the country is called upon to do is to pause and ask itself the question: How long can such a process go on? Obviously it can only go to a point where the borrowings and the interest incurred as a result thereof become a burden beyond the normal capacity of the country to bear.

Let us follow that a step further. This may be a platitude if you like, but nevertheless it is a mighty important law in economics of trade and commerce. A debtor country must necessarily export more than it imports or else it goes in the hole. A creditor country will almost invariably import more than it exports because it is thus that its debts are paid. Let me give the house some very significant figures. Great Britain is a creditor country and has been a creditor country for many years. I have the figures of its imports from 1913 to 1932 before me. We find that imports exceeded exports by huge sums every year. There is not a single year so far as I can see in this whole list in which British imports did not exceed exports. But it did not follow that Great Britain was in any sense suffering from that condition, because she was receiving payment for certain things. It was payment of interest, it was payment for services, particularly shipping services, which amount to two or three hundred million pounds a year. It was payment of obligations owed to Great Britain by other countries. But a country like Canada, that is a debtor abroad, that owes huge sums and interest, has no opportunity to pay except in goods, or by further borrowings. Speaking on this same subject in 1925, when the right hon. gentleman sat on this side of the house, I pointed out that there comes a time when a country cannot go on borrowing any longer. That time arrived two or three years ago as far as Canada was concerned, because generally speaking the money markets of the world were closed to ordinary borrowings.

Now I would like to examine that a step further. I have in my hand and will take the liberty of placing on Hansard a statement by the bureau of statistics on this subject. It shows what are termed the visible and invisible items in our trade. The hon. gentleman who is the critic of the opposition cited it the other day. What he did chiefly was to play upon item 23 which is cited as "net errors and omissions, $102,000,000." He joked, and said the statisticians could not come within $100,000,000, but what is a $100,000,000 among friends? I think he was most unfair in his criticism of the bureau of statistics. The facts are these—

Mr. RALSTON: I did not criticize the bureau of statistics, if my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend did criticize the bureau; he reflected on the bureau of statistics for not being able to account for this $102,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will look at the record he will find that is not the case. I twitted my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for showing a favourable balance of trade of $242,000,000 when the bureau of statistics showed $102,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: The $102,000,000 had nothing to do with it.

Mr. RALSTON: It certainly had.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend would permit me, he is not allowed to make another speech.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will permit me to finish.

Mr. STEVENS: I decidedly object to the hon. gentleman making another speech now.

Mr. RALSTON: It has been made clear—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has made his speech, and he will have other opportunities to make whatever statements he desires.

Mr. RALSTON: I am raising a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I have very good authority for asking for an opportunity to correct a misstatement of fact. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) during the course of a speech by myself, laid down the rule that misstatements of fact cannot be allowed to pass. Objection was taken—

Mr. STEVENS: From what page is my hon. friend quoting?

Mr. RALSTON: Page 531 of Hansard. I said:

> On what question of privilege my right hon. friend is rising, I do not know, I am sure.
> Mr. Bennett: The question as to a misstatement of fact. It is always competent to correct a misstatement of fact.

With that authority I am correcting a misstatement of fact by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if I may be allowed to do so.

Mr. STEVENS: In order not to prolong the discussion I will withdraw my statement, because I do not need it at all in my argument.

Mr. RALSTON: Very good.

Mr. STEVENS: However, in his speech the hon. gentleman reflected upon the statement because at the bottom it showed $102,000,000 unaccounted for.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not reflect on the bureau at all.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a limit beyond which I do not think I should be interrupted. I listened to the whole of my hon. friend's speech and did not open my mouth once.

Mr. RALSTON: But I did not make any misstatements of fact.

Mr. STEVENS: I will let that pass, but the point I am making is this: the $102,000,000 to which my hon. friend referred has nothing to do with the matter at all except to this extent, that in dealing with invisibles, as they are termed, there is no country in the world and there is no statistician in the world that can possibly make an exact balance. The general theory is that the business of any country will always balance itself. The point, of course, is that if a country's business is out of balance at the end of a period, though really there is no particular period since it is a continuous process, then the currency of the country will fall in relation to other currencies and there will be automatic impediments, shall I say, to trade. The outstanding example, of course, is the case of Canada and the United States. When Canada's exchange got out of line with the United States exchange our currency fell in value, and immediately and automatically it erected an additional protection for Canadian goods against imports from the United States. In other words, for every one per cent that Canada's exchange was off in New York, another one per cent was added to the general tariff of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Retract.

Mr. STEVENS: I have retracted; what are my hon. friends talking about? What the hon. gentleman said, so far as I can ascertain after a hasty search, was this:

As a matter of fact the bureau of statistics, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows, regards this balance of trade as something of a fantasy—

I was not very far off. There is no fantasy about it, and I will deal with that in a moment.

—they have an idea that trade always balances eventually, that the total international payments balance, and they do rather a remarkable and, so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, a shocking thing when they come to show the balance of trade at $102,000,000.

They make no such showing.

Mr. RALSTON: Go on.

Mr. STEVENS: That was a complete and absolute misrepresentation of the fact. The hon. gentleman says—

Mr. RALSTON: Finish the statement.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman says they do a shocking thing when they show a balance of trade of $102,000,000. I gave the facts as I have them and as my hon. friend had them when he spoke. Here are the facts—

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend should read on and finish the quotation.

Mr. STEVENS: I will finish it; I will read his whole speech, if time and the patience of the house will permit. My hon. friend went on:

Do you know what entry they make?

I recall to the house the rather dramatic way in which he made that statement:

Do you know what entry they make? They say, "Net errors and omissions, $102,000,000." They do that in order to balance up, because they do not regard this as a real balance at all. Of course, my hon. friend knows that the bureau of statistics, in publishing its statement—and so on. Then my hon. friend reads from the report of the bureau.

Mr. RALSTON: Go on.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly I am not going to read any more.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: I have covered the point; I am not going to enter into a tweedledee-tweedledum discussion with the hon. member across the floor of the house. The hon. gentleman referred to the $102,000,000 appearing in this statement; he will not deny that, and he went on to say to the Minister of Finance that this was shown as a balance of trade. It was not, and in order to show that it was not I will place the statement on Hansard. The first item has to do with commodity trade; the second with exports and imports of gold coin and bullion; the third with the correction for gold movements to convert to Canadian currency; the fourth with freight payments and receipts; the fifth with tourist expenditures; the sixth with interest payments and receipts; the seventh with immigrant remittances; the eighth with government expenditures and receipts; the ninth with charitable and missionary contributions; the tenth with insurance transactions; the eleventh with advertising transactions and so on, including twenty-one items. Then, Mr. Speaker, after citing all these items of visible and invisible trade the bureau of statistics shows, as item No. 23, "Net errors and omissions" to balance the statement. The statement is as follows:

Estimated Balance of International Payments for Canada

Preliminary Statement for 1933

(000's omitted)

—	Exports Visible and Invisible	Imports Visible and Invisible	Net Debit (−) or Credit (+)
1. Commodity Trade (Corrected by deduction of non-commercial items, overvaluations, etc.)	535,000	389,250	+ 146·0
2. Exports and imports of gold coin and bullion	66,000	850	+ 65·1
3. Correction for gold movements to convert to Canadian currency	27,000	350	+ 26·6
4. Freight payments and receipts, n.o.p.	40,000	55,000	− 15·0
5. Tourist expenditures	110,000	50,000	+ 60·0
6. Interest payments and receipts	50,000	275,000	− 225·0
7. Immigrant remittances	5,000	6,000	− 1·0
8. Government expenditures and receipts	6,500	9,500	− 3·0
9. Charitable and missionary contributions	1,000	1,000	—
10. Insurance transactions	15,000	11,000	+ 4·0
11. Advertising transactions	1,500	3,000	− 1·5
12. Motion picture earnings	.....	4,000	− 4·0
13. Capital of immigrants and emigrants	4,000	3,250	+ 0·75
14. Earnings of Canadian residents employed in U.S.A.	700	.....	+ 0·7
15. Exchange London and New York on interest and maturity payments and receipts	3,000	12,000	− 9·0
16. Miscellaneous items such as direct magazine subscriptions, artists and entertainers' receipts, radio programmes, etc.	.....	4,000	− 4·0
17. Difference between debits and credits as above	.....	40,500	.....
	864,700	864,700	.....
18. Sale and purchase of securities	350,000	250,000	+ 100·0
19. Maturities	.....	40,000	− 40·0
20. Direct investments	1,500	.....	+ 1·5
21. Net inflow of capital	.....	61,500	.....
	351,500	351,500	.....
22. Total debits and credits	1,216,200	1,114,200	.....
23. Net errors and omissions	.....	102,000	.....

The whole point, Mr. Speaker, is that of these items comparatively few are according to official statistics but must be estimated, and that is common in all countries of the world. My own criticism of the statement, if I had one, would be that I do not think they allow a large enough item for the services abroad for Canada. I believe the freight charges against Canada are larger than the estimated amount, though I know that very great care is taken to try to get that figure accurately. But, sir, let me go back to where I was when my hon. friend interrupted me. A debtor country must have an excess of exports of commodities over imports. I distinguish very sharply there between the export of commodities as against a general balance of the country's business. It necessarily must have an excess of exports of commodities if it is to make good its balances and debts abroad. For instance there is interest shown in this statement amounting to $275,000,000, and there is freight of $55,000,000 as against a credit of $40,000,000. There are other items as well which must be taken care of.

So, sir, I wish to make this point distinct and clear, that while it is quite competent for a borrowing country to have an unfavourable trade balance and still be sound financially and make good on its general year's trade or business, for a country such as Canada with its heavy obligations abroad, such as interest amounting to $275,000,000 and other services, it is essential that such a country have an excess of exports to some degree commensurate with the adverse balance which is indicated, or it must borrow heavily abroad and increase the public debt, as was done in the years from 1904 to 1913. That is the only alternative. I have pointed out to the house, and I wish to emphasize this now, that this country knows that it is not desirable, if it can be avoided, to add to the public debt merely for the purpose of balancing the exports and imports of this country. So it is highly desirable, indeed it is absolutely imperative, that so far as possible Canada shall create an excess of exports over imports. There are only certain ways in which that can be done, and this government has attempted at least so to adjudge its international trade relations as to achieve that end.

The question is, have we lost trade abroad, and if we have just where has that trade been lost? I am going to examine some very interesting figures. It is well for us to keep in mind the times and dates when these changes took effect, and when I cite, as I am about to do, certain facts and figures I ask the house to remember the metamorphosis that came over the economic and financial structure of this country in the last fifteen years. I also ask them to bear in mind the fact which I placed on Hansard in the debate on the address that in practically every one of the leading countries of Europe higher duties were imposed against Canada during the period before we came into office at all.

Let us look at some of our exports. Hams and bacons are somewhat important I think to Canada, and here are some very interesting figures. In 1925 we exported to all countries 1,208,721 hundredweight; in 1930 that had dropped to 267,026, or about one-fifth of what we had in 1925.

An hon. MEMBER: Who was in office then?

Mr. STEVENS: Who was in office? Not this government. In 1934 we had recovered that loss in export to all countries to the extent of 960,178 hundredweight. In other words, we are almost back to where we were before that loss in exports occurred before we came into office.

To the United Kingdom we exported hams and bacon in 1925 amounting to 1,193,186 hundredweight; in 1930 that had fallen to 241,324 hundredweight; and in 1934 it had risen to 945,597 hundredweight.

Take our fish exports to the United Kingdom. In 1925 they amounted to 311,031 hundredweight; in 1930 that had dropped to 143,064 hundredweight, and in 1934 we had made some recovery to 221,270 hundredweight.

Our exports to Great Britain of non-ferrous metals—I have these figures in dollars of value, not the weight, although I have the weight in some of my other papers—

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend giving fiscal years or calendar years?

Mr. STEVENS: Fiscal years. For the year ending March 31, 1925, we exported to the United Kingdom non-ferrous metals to the amount of $16,868,927. In 1930 that had dropped to $15,404,363, and in 1934 it had risen to $35,827,707. Mark you, in 1930 copper was selling at 18 cents a pound and now it is selling around 8 cents a pound. Take copper alone, of which our total exports to all countries amounted in 1925 to 438,563 hundredweight; in 1930, 1,577,176, an increase; in 1934 it had risen to 2,161,127 hundredweight. To the United Kingdom we exported 995 hundredweight in 1925; in 1930 67 hundredweight; in 1934, 1,275,579 hundredweight.

Take leather. In 1925 we exported to the United Kingdom leather to the amount of $1,658,157; in 1930 that had fallen to $1,201,162, and in 1934 it had risen to $2,400,834 in spite of a drastic fall in prices.

Now I come to wheat, about which so much has been said. We have lost the wheat market, my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) said. In 1925 we exported to all countries 191,764,537 bushels; in 1930, 177,006,369 bushels; in 1934, 175,534,255 bushels. In other words, there was a fall in our exports from 1925 to 1930, but there has been no serious loss since.

Take our flour exports to the United Kingdom, which is our big market. There was a drop in our exports between 1925 and 1930 from 3,274,976 barrels to 2,278,916 barrels, or a drop of about one million barrels. In 1934 we had won back to 2,551,249 barrels.

Take the export of our apples to the world. In 1925 we exported 1,406,237 barrels; in 1930, 1,882,280; in 1934 3,476,114 barrels. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite and others say that we have lost trade, lost our business with foreign countries.

Take our exports of lumber to the United Kingdom. In 1925 we exported 235 million feet; in 1930 that dropped to 187 million feet; in 1934 it had risen to 595 million feet.

When we take newsprint we find that there was a sharp increase in our exports between 1925 and 1930; and our export now is again increasing. Our average export in the last three years amounted to 39,600,000 hundredweight as against an average for the previous five years of 37,400,000 hundredweight. So in spite of the difficult times through which we have been passing we have measurably held that trade as well.

Mr. YOUNG: Has my hon. friend the figures for our total trade?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I have them here and will come to them in the course of my remarks.

I now wish to give a few figures of our exports to different countries.

Exports to France

Commodity—	1921	1930	1933
Wheat. . .	$11,200,000	$7,900,000	$9,000,000
Oats. . . .	1,200,000	300,000	85,000
Barley. . .	66,000	.....	55,000
Rye. . . .	115,000	.....	34,000
Canned lobster . .	277,000	260,000	376,000

I could cite the Netherlands, Italy and Germany indicating in some very important items an increase in our exports in these difficult times over the period before we took office.

Take our exports to the United States. While we are accused of destroying trade between Canada and the United States, the figures I am about to present will show just when the reductions in that trade occurred:

Exports to United States

Commodity—	1921	1930	1933
Wheat. . . .	$ 91,000	$ 7,000	$26,000
Flour.	12,000,000	12,000	3,700

It will be noted that our exports of flour in 1930 had dropped just one thousand per cent as compared with 1921:

Exports to United States

Commodity—	1921	1930	1933
Oats.	$4,700,000	$ 20,000	$71,000
Barley. . . .	1,150,000	69,000	....
Pease.	500,000	99,000	91,000
Hay.	3,700,000	321,000	54,000

And so on down the list—horses, sheep, fresh mutton and lamb, and so forth. I will give a few more figures:

To United States

Commodity—	1921	1930
Fresh mutton and lamb.	$ 1,600,000	$ 72,000
Poultry.	500,000	44,000
Tallow.	650,000	51,000
Butter.	5,700,000	8,000
Condensed milk. . .	2,500,000	116,000
Cattle hides. . . .	17,500,000	5,700,000

This at least indicates that the reason why our trade to the United States dropped was the Hawley-Smoot tariff which was passed before this government took office and with which we had nothing whatever to do, influencing it neither one way nor the other. An hon. member asked me for the total trade. I have before me the figures for the fiscal years of 1933 and 1934. The exports to all countries for 1933 amounted to $473,799,955 and in 1934 to, $579,367,045. Exports to empire countries in 1933 amounted to $222,118,927 and in 1934 to, $278,043,978. Exports to foreign countries in 1933 amounted to $251,681,028 and in 1934 to, $301,323,067. The increase to all countries amounted to 22·3 per cent; to empire countries, 25·2 per cent and to foreign countries, 19·7 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: What year?

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment. My hon. friends will say: Oh, but you are citing 1934 as against 1933. Of course we are. We are trying to show to the rather recalcitrant minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that there are evidences of improvement and recovery in this country. We are trying to give a little heart to the country.

Reference was made to the tariff board and I should like to make a brief statement in this connection. The hon. gentleman who criticized the government so bitterly cited this board and attempted to show that the government had been discourteous to it because of some delay in giving effect to its decisions. It was stated quite properly that in setting up this board the government had desired to establish one in which all persons would have confidence, particularly those who while not residents of Canada were extended the privilege of appealing to the board by virtue of an article in the United Kingdom-Canada agreement. In drafting the legislation—

Mr. McINTOSH: Will my hon. friend tell me from what manuscript he is reading?

Mr. STEVENS: I ask the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh): Is that a trick worthy of you?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. STEVENS: The same trick was tried last year by one of his colleagues. I am reading from a few notes which I made myself; they are my own composition.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am satisfied.

Mr. STEVENS: They may not be up to the statesmanlike utterances of my hon. friend but they are the best I can do. I may tell my hon. friend that the reason why I read this—surely I cannot be criticized very bitterly for quoting in the house?

Mr. McINTOSH: I am satisfied now.

Mr. STEVENS: I jotted these notes down because I wanted to be accurate in my utterances. They have not been submitted to anyone for correction, addition or deduction.

In drafting the legislation setting up this board, every reasonable precaution was taken to anticipate all the requirements essential to the free and untrammelled operation of the board, but with the many conflicting interests involved in matters pertaining to tariffs, it could not be expected that questions would not be raised as to jurisdiction or powers of the board. Such an instance occurred in connection with what is known as the jute twine case which was cited by the chief critic of the opposition. This was not a question as to whether or not the government would accept decisions of the board, it was definitely a question of jurisdiction of the board in making a decision in the form in which it was made. The matter went to appeal to the governor general in council, which was within the rights of the appellant, and it was decided to refer the point of law to the supreme court for a decision. It was a very difficult and considerably involved point and obviously some time would have to elapse during the period of consideration of the matter. There was no undue delay as the matter is now before the supreme court and it is entirely out of place to make it a subject of controversy on the floor of this house. Giving my own personal views, I have no hesitancy in saying that we have done everything we can faithfully to carry out the terms of the United Kingdom agreement, not only as it relates to this particular matter but to all others therein. There is no doubt that delay will occur in connection with difficult matters which may arise from time to time. I make this statement deliberately because of the time spent by the hon. gentleman in criticizing the government in connection with that case and placing before the country an entirely distorted and I think grossly unfair presentation of the matter. There is no desire either by members of the government or by those in the ranks that support the government to do other than treat all as fairly as possible in this matter. As I have said, many complicated and difficult points are bound to arise which cannot be settled, shall I say, ex parte or offhand.

I shall hasten on. There has been some criticism regarding the gold tax and I intend to make a brief presentation with regard to that and invite consideration. I think the first question which this house should ask itself is: Was this tax a fair tax or was a tax on gold a justifiable action by the government? Let me remind the house that under the law as it stands at the present time mining companies, including gold mining companies, are exempt from the payment of fifty per cent of the corporation income tax. There has been a fifty per cent exemption for exhaustion purposes. In the second place, when dividends are paid by mining companies, including gold mining companies, to their shareholders, there is a fifty per cent allowance on the personal income tax on such dividends. The gold mining industry in common with the rest of the mining industry has received already very gracious and generous consideration in the remission of taxation for the protection of possible exhaustion. The hon. gentleman who spoke officially for the opposition stated that the mines themselves pay a corporation income tax while the shareholders pay the income tax which is imposed upon individuals. He very skilfully ignored what I have just said, namely, that there is a fifty per cent rebate or allowance for exhaustion. Then my hon. friend said this:

> —there are other features which give difficulty in connection with this tax. First, it is discrimination against a particular industry and, second, it is discrimination against particular sections of Canada.

Mr. BRADETTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: We have it endorsed by two distinguished hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. BRADETTE: Just as distinguished as you are.

Mr. STEVENS: I said "two". I included my hon. friend in the two.

In the light of what has just been said and what was said by the chief critic of the opposition, let us see if there is any ground for the position taken by the hon. gentlemen. I have before me a list of dividends paid by the leading Canadian mines. I have not the particulars before me of the smaller mines, but I think these figures will be sufficient to show the trend and justify the action of any government in imposing a tax upon gold. I have definitely in mind the fact that the enhancement in the value of gold was not due in the slightest degree to any action of the industry, it was due entirely to extraneous causes. The accretion in value has been somewhere in the neighbourhood of 70 per cent, an enormous increase. During the years 1929, 1930 and 1931 the Dome mine paid dividends totalling $953,000 each year. The dividends paid in 1932 amounted to $1,334,000 and in 1933, $1,859,000. In other words, in 1933 they paid almost double the dividends paid prior to the enhancement in the value of gold following the 1931 abandonment of the gold standard by London. The following table will give the dividend payments of Canadian mines:

Dividend Payments of Canadian Mines

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit this to the house. The country is weighted down with extraordinarily heavy taxes; there is no question about that. In these times it is a difficult task for any government or people to meet, in the form of taxes, a substantial proportion of the obligations resting upon them. The people of this country have been doing their utmost to meet these obligations and now we find a sheltered industry—because I am bound to say quite candidly that it is a sheltered industry—which during this period of depression, owing to causes outside their own activities and capabilities entirely, have realized a tremendously increased income, while at the same time the costs of operation have not increased at all. Indeed, I believe that in many instances they have decreased, as for example in steel, powder and machinery. Nor have wages increased over what they were in 1928 or 1929. The government felt therefore, and properly so I submit, that this was an industry that should share in the burden of taxation, and the taxes which have been indicated have been accordingly imposed.

In the imposition of new taxation there are bound to emerge extraordinary cases, individual cases where representations can be made and always are made. There has never been introduced in this house a budget in the consideration of which, in the committee stage when individual taxes have been discussed, hon. members on all sides have not presented views which they have felt worthy of consideration. And that will undoubtedly happen in this instance. There may be some adjustments in detail, in administration; but this I say without hesitancy, that in the light of the facts this industry is entitled to bear its share of the weight of taxation in this country.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give the amount paid by the government in subsidies to these gold mines?

Mr. STEVENS: What subsidies?

Mr. HEAPS: The differential between the export value of gold and its home value.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Finance will take that as notice of a question, but I understand that a return was brought down and tabled. Let me point out however what South Africa is doing. In South Africa the new price of gold is 120 shillings; the standard price is 85 shillings, or a premium of 35 shillings an ounce or $8.75. The new tax they have imposed amounts to about half the premium or $4.35 per ounce. It is a different form of tax from ours. but in effect not materially different, because it recognizes that there is an artificial enhancement of the value of the product, and it takes away about half of that enhancement. Here is the significant feature of their law. When collections exceed $30,000,000, or £6,000,000, then a deadline is drawn and there is above that a slight reduction in the weight of the tax. Another point is this, that the mines that do not earn an excess profit, or a profit of £5,000, are exempt from the tax—small mines.

These are details in the South African proposal which might very well be the subject of discussion if one wished to make it so. But I would point out that it does not stop with gold, because silver and other metals as well as gold are included in the tax.

I have nothing more to say in this regard but to repeat that we do consider, in the light of the very excellent earnings of these gold mines, which we are all glad to see, that it is only fair and reasonable that they should share in the burden of taxation. And I say, speaking for myself and not for the government, because I come from British Columbia, which is a mining country, and have been in touch with mining for the last forty years, that in my opinion the mining industry as its attitude has been represented in the last few weeks in public statements has not done credit to itself. Indeed, I have told some of my friends that I was disappointed in their attitude. Certainly there are details, many of them to be brought forward, and they will be considered. But it is nonsense to say that the industry will be ruined, in view of the fact there is scarcely one that was not in operation before gold rose appreciably. Do hon. members realize that a year ago gold was $25 an ounce, whereas to-day it is $35—and I am reminded that it was due to the exchange conditions, the adverse exchange with the United States. I repeat, gold is to-day $35 an ounce as compared with $25 a year ago. Will mining men tell me or anyone else who knows anything about the matter that it will ruin the industry to take a portion of that? The thing is absurd.

There is much more that I might say but I fear I have kept the house altogether too long. I will not weary the house with further details regarding trade, though I happen to have them under my hand. But I would say this in regard to our trade relations. The conditions operating both in this country and abroad make the movement of trade exceedingly difficult compared with years ago, and we must take these factors into consideration. I have endeavoured to make clear to the house that new and momentous changes have taken place in the economic structure of the world, changes which forever bar us from a return to the old methods. In many countries these economic changes have been the cause of social and political upheavals of great significance.

The proper and courageous course for Canada is not a right-about face as suggested by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, but rather an aggressive but orderly advance, adjusting, as we proceed, our public attitude to these new factors in our business structure in such a manner as to secure to the producers and workers of this country a fair return for their efforts. To ensure that this be achieved, parliament must ever keep before it as its dominating motive, the overwhelming importance of human values, as distinct from an ever-increasing tendency to measure success by size and efficiency. Let parliament, sir, hold the balances in such a way that genius and enterprise may receive a just reward, but not at the cost of the happiness and well-being of our people.

Mr. GEORGE W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the budget address which was delivered a few days ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) might be summed up in the classic language of Sir Henry Drayton who, at the conclusion of one of those dark periods in Canadian history, in delivering his budget speech on May 9, 1921, ended with these words:

> The world is sadly out of tune. May we help in restoring harmony? Trust and confidence are sadly lacking. Class interests are advanced with selfish insistence. Unemployment is with us. Faith in our fellow men is weakened. Doubt of the future is often voiced. And what is the trouble? The sun still shines, our lands are as great and fruitful as ever, our resources just as vast and our rivers still sparkle on their way to the sea.

Gone are the days of surpluses of revenue over expenditures. Gone are the days of expanding trade. We in this country are now at the end of four years of an era of debt, deficit and decay. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) this afternoon attempted to say that the policy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when the present government took office four years ago is not the proper one in the light of present day conditions. My mind goes back—and I think this gives the reason for present-day difficulties—to the early summer of 1930, when the Prime Minister went on a rampage of promises from one end of Canada to the other. I remember very well his promises to the farmers: Listen you agriculturists, you who have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade; tell me: When did free trade fight for you? I will make tariffs fight for you; I will use tariffs to blast a way for you into the markets of the world. I remember one of the Conservative cartoons issued at that time—and this has reference to wheat which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was discussing this afternoon—showed a great Canadian wheatfield with Jack Canuck standing in the centre shouting to a picture of the leader of the Liberal party (Mr. Mackenzie King): What are you going to do with my wheat? Wheat was then selling at $1.08 a bushel and in the month of March of this year it was selling at forty-one cents a bushel. The people believed those promises in 1930 and they elected this government for which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is an apologist this afternoon.

The government kept two of its promises; one of those was to call a special session of parliament and the other was to increase the tariff. Parliament met in September, 1930, and the tariff was increased enormously against other countries. My hon. friend now talks about our trade falling off. I will show him in a few minutes why it has fallen off. At the special session of 1930 the tariff was increased against every other country in the world. Then the Prime Minister went to the imperial conference at London and asked the British people to impose a tax of ten per cent on their food in order to give Canada a preference in their market. We all remember what the leaders of British thought said then about the matter; if they adopted that, they would be on a slippery slope leading to the bottomless pit. The Prime Minister came back to Canada and went to the city of Regina still talking about obtaining markets for Canadian produce. I can hear him yet over the radio when he came to discuss the matter of Canadian wheat; he said: My fellow Canadians who are now within sound of my voice, just at this very minute Mr. Marler, Canadian ambassador to Japan—and he would not be there if my right hon. friend had had his way in 1928—is on his way to China to enter into a treaty with that great nation for the sale of your Canadian wheat. How much wheat did we sell to China? We heard some talk a few years ago by the government that they would not permit the sale of 100,000 head of Canadian cattle to Russia because Russia was an ungodly country. Still it was all right in 1930 for the Prime Minister of Canada to send Mr. Marler to China to enter into a treaty with that country. Within my recollection and that of the oldest man in the house, we have been sending missionaries from Canada to China to christianize them. How much wheat have we sold to China as a result of Mr. Marler's visit? We have sold none, but the Argentine republic, according to this pamphlet which I have in my hand, published by the Department of Trade and Commerce under the authority of the Minister himself, in March of this year sold 2,756,000 bushels to China.

Let us proceed. Next came the second imperial conference and the British people were to impose a tax of six cents a bushel on wheat from nations outside the British commonwealth to give our wheat a preference in their market. What ever came out of that? Political effervescence number two! According to the same publication to which I have just referred, of April 23, 1934, issued under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada these are the startling facts with regard to the imperial conference in connection with the sale of wheat in Great Britain. Great Britain's imports of wheat were as follows:

For ten months ending March, 1933
133,906,000 bushels

For ten months ending March, 1934
132,141,000 bushels

Or practically the same amount.

For ten months ending March, 1933

From	Bushels
Canada	75,250,939
United States	2,191,843
Argentina	15,568,360
Australia	26,165,040
Russia	3,960,702
Other countries	10,769,833

For ten months ending March, 1934

From	Bushels
Canada	46,083,447
United States	329
Argentina	29,222,056
Australia	28,430,005
Russia	14,917,986
Other countries	13,487,000

The facts are that so far as the imperial conference agreement was concerned, this country sold Great Britain 29,000,000 bushels of wheat less last year than it did the year before and the difference was taken largely from Australia, Argentina and Russia. No wonder the right hon. leader of the government said when speaking in London in December, 1932, in connection with the imperial conference agreements that they should be considered rather in the light of the hope they offered for the future than in present accomplishments. I recall one of the Proverbs that says, "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick." The hearts of the Canadian producers of wheat are sick at the present time.

Next we had the world conference to settle the matter of wheat, with some fifty nations present. Notwithstanding the fact that the Prime Minister of this country had given a bonus of five cents a bushel to the western Canada wheat growers two years previously, he now says we have too much wheat in the world, and the idea is to cut down the acreage. Well, two thousand years ago the greatest man that ever trod this earth, speaking in Judea said, as recorded in St. John's gospel: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." Now we have the spectacle of the Prime Minister of this country addressing the Young Canadians in Winnipeg and saying in effect, that is all wrong, what our blessed Lord and Saviour should have said was, I am come that they might have life and have it less abundantly. We now have before this house that monstrosity the marketing bill in connection with our agricultural produce, a cross between Russian soviet socialism as sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and a Mussolini dictatorship as sponsored by the right hon. leader of this government. In 1929, $1,388,000,000 in value of exports from Canada, and in 1934, $480,000,000 tells the tale as far as this government is concerned.

That is one side of the picture. Let us look at the other. As I said before, this government kept two of its promises: calling parliament together and increasing the tariff. Right after they increased the tariff in 1930, one of the leading government newspapers of Belgium, in January, 1931, published an editorial, which I want to put on Hansard to make the record complete:

> Just previous to his departure for the imperial conference in London, Mr. Bennett brought down in the Canadian house a bill dealing with the tariff. The tariff changes which were immediately put into force were adopted by the Canadian parliament. It is of some interest to Belgium whose exchanges with Canada have favourably developed in the course of these last years, to examine the situation and to bring out somewhat the point. . . .
> We learn, moreover, that Belgium is, with the exception of Great Britain, its best European customer in the purchasing of wheat, oats and barley, and ranks second or third of all Canada's clients in the purchasing of these products; that it absorbs almost the total Canadian output of zinc ore and the greater portion of that of asbestos. . . .
> Belgium can therefore not remain indifferent to Mr. Bennett's projected legislation of a distinctly protective character, and making for a complete revision of the Canadian customs tariff. It surely would be hardly conceivable that she should continue to be one of the best customers of a country which deliberately closes its doors to her products.
> . . . Canada is not the only country which produces wheat, oats, barley, asbestos and zinc ore. There is no reason why Belgium should not supply herself with these articles on markets which are more friendly to her productions.

That was the attitude of Belgium in January, 1931 following the increase of tariffs by this government in the special session in September, 1930. And thirty-seven other nations followed the lead of Belgium in retaliatory measures against Canada. Let me put some of them on record. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) speaking at Guelph a few nights ago, said that no country had increased its tariff against Canada since the present government came into office, with the exception of duties levied on three small items by the Hoover administration in the United States. Let me put the facts on record. The fact is that thirty-seven nations retaliated against this country, among them are Esthonia, Siam, Poland, Germany, New Zealand, Mexico, Czechoslovakia, the Bahamas, Italy, France, the Argentine, Cuba, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Colombia, India, Norway, China, Bolivia, Denmark, Uruguay, Greece, Switzerland, Belgium, the United States, the Netherlands, Jugoslavia, South Africa, Sweden and the Irish Free State. Let us examine some of these and learn the correctness of the statement made by the Minister of Justice that no country had increased its tariff against Canada since this government came into office.

Siam increased its tariff on tinned meats, fish, vegetables and fruits from 5 per cent to 20 per cent in February, 1931.

Esthonia increased its tariff on wheat, on March 26, 1931.

Poland increased its tariff against Canada on wheat, rye, oats, barley, rye flour, wheat flour, and rolled oats in March, 1931.

Germany increased its tariff against Canada on oats, hogs, fresh and frozen meat, and preserved meats, on April 30, 1931.

New Zealand increased its tariff against Canada on gum boots; newsprint and other paper; wire, including barbed wire, from free to 22½ per cent on June 2, 1931, and on all other commodities from the preferential tariff to the general tariff.

Mexico increased its tariff on timber; aluminium wire and cable, bars, rods and sheets; pipes and tubing; butter, cheese, wheat and flour on May 3, 1931.

Czechoslovakia increased its duties on hogs in May, 1931.

The Bahamas increased the tariff on beans and peas, from 9 cents a bushel to 36 cents per hundredweight, and on some metal and mechanical goods, fresh meats and potatoes, on May 28, 1931.

Italy increased its duties against Canada on radios, and radio-electric and other materials, salmon and canned shellfish, three times in one year, on June 17, September 30, and October 3, 1931.

France increased its duties against Canada on canned salmon, hams, condensed milk, milk powder, cheese, rubber goods, boots and shoes, and belting, and all canned goods, four different times in the year 1931; on June 30, November 10, November 19, and December 10.

The Argentine increased its duties against Canadian wrapping paper; book, writing and wall paper; sewing machines; sardines; smoked herring in boxes and kegs; cheese; and gas cooking stoves on September 21, 1931.

Cuba increased its duties against Canadian knit goods and iron piping on September 21, 1931.

St. Vincent increased its duties against Canadian electrical apparatus on July 3, 1931.

St. Lucia increased its tariff against Canadian wheat flour on September 26, 1931.

Colombia increased its tariff from 4 to 8 cents per kilogram on wheat, and at varying rates on barley, oats, wheat flour, potatoes, canned vegetables, condensed milk, smoked and salted fish and rubber footwear on September 27, 1931.

India increased its duties against artificial silk piece goods, silk yarns and threads, and electric bulbs on September 30, 1931.

Norway placed timber on an import permit basis on July 17, 1931.

China increased duties against all Canadian products on December 1, 1931.

Bolivia restricted bills of exchange against all Canadian goods on October 9, 1931.

Denmark increased the duties on Canadian apples from 12 cents to 60 cents per hundredweight on October 19, 1931.

Uruguay increased her duties against Canadian products, including potatoes, on October 10, 1931, and again on October 22.

Greece increased her duties on November 28, 1931, on all commodities.

Switzerland increased the duty on building board on November 17, 1931.

Belgium increased her duties on cattle, meats, frozen or fresh, butter, etc., on November 27, and December 7, 1931.

The United States, Switzerland, Jugoslavia and South Africa all increased their tariffs against Canada, South Africa four times in the one year, on April 15, June 8, October 29 and December 13, 1931. That is the tariff warfare that has been going on between this and other countries of the world during the last four years. I understand that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice said there were only a few items on which there had been increases, but I have given the list which was compiled after a very careful and exhaustive study of the commercial intelligence journals covering 1930 and 1931.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my statement still holds. I said the important trading countries of the world had all increased their tariffs before this government came into power and that, with the exception of the United States, none of the great countries had increased their tariffs against Canada since that time.

Mr. McPHEE: Just in reply to my hon. friend may I say that I have here a document which I received only two days ago from the foreign tariff branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, in reference to wheat. In 1929, Italy had a duty of 74 cents per bushel against Canadian wheat, and on August 19, 1931, that duty was increased to $1.07 per bushel. That is just one item. The whole cause of the difficulty is that we have been on a rampage of tariff warfare ever since 1930, when the blasting process began, and the trouble is that there are too many governments in the world of the same mentality as the government we see opposite. There are warehouses in India filled with jute, warehouses in Australia filled with wool, warehouses in Brazil filled with coffee, warehouses in China filled with rice, warehouses in the United States filled with cotton—they ploughed ten million acres under last year, thinking that would solve the difficulty—and warehouses in Canada filled with wheat. There are millions of people throughout the world starving for these very commodities, yet we have a government that in effect says that after all trade is not the difficulty. Our oceans were meant to be the means of conveying goods from the countries best fitted by providence to produce them to other countries less able to produce them, and to bring back the goods produced in those other countries in exchange.

Now we come to the budget resolutions. I must hurry along, but I want to consider very briefly some of the relief proposed by this government for the condition in which we find ourselves to-day. I have here the tariff resolutions submitted by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in which I find several interesting items. The first is dried blood. Well, my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has dried up many of the arteries of trade in this country and bids fair to dry up all the arteries, human and otherwise, so I do not understand why dried blood should be on the free list. The next item I find is beads used in the manufacture of pearls. How interesting it will be to the great mass of farmers in western Canada to learn that beads for the manufacture of pearls are to be admitted to Canada free of duty. Then I see that gold or silver wire for ornamental purposes is placed on the free list from Great Britain, while the tariff with regard to other countries is reduced very considerably. What about barbed wire, which still pays a duty of ten per cent though it came into Canada free of duty from the days of the Laurier-Fielding tariff in 1897 until the advent to power of this government? Barbed wire still pays that duty, but under this budget gold and silver wire for ornamental purposes is to be admitted into Canada free of duty. I should like to page the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), who shed burning tears on behalf of the western agriculturists and the dairymen and dairy maids in 1930. I should like to ask where he was when this iniquity was about to be perpetrated upon the western farmers. Barbed wire is still taxed ten per cent; cream separators, which came into Canada free of duty from 1897 until this government took office, pay a duty of 25 per cent. Where is the relief in connection with cream separators and barbed wire? But we are told that beads for making pearls, dried blood, cricket balls, gold and silver wire and so on are to be admitted into Canada free of duty.

Here is another item that is even more interesting. Electric dry shaving machines are to be admitted free of duty. Cream separators carry a duty of 25 per cent; barbed wire and binder twine are taxed, but electric dry shaving machines come in free. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time in our part of the country we have Bennett buggies, the old cars to which are hitched teams of horses for the motive power, we have Bennett carts, the cars cut in two, with a pair of shafts attached to form a sulky, and again the horse furnishes the motive power. We have Bennett shoes made of binder twine cut from the sheaves and now, according to the press of western Canada, we have Bennett braces, made from the inner tubes of automobile tires. And we are told that electric dry shaving machines may be obtained by the farmers of western Canada free of duty.

Now we come to another interesting item; harps are to be admitted free of duty. Last year the bagpipes were put on the free list, in order to appeal to one class of citizens; this year harps are admitted free of duty, presumably in an appeal to another class of citizens. If the legal principle that the greater includes the lesser does not apply I suppose my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will move an amendment to this item to provide that jew's-harps be admitted free also to appeal to another worthy class. To me, Mr. Speaker, harps suggest the judgment day, and I presume that in this item my hon. friends are referring to their political judgment day. If that is not the case may I hope that their final destination may be that land referred to in Revelations where the harpers harp with their harps, and that when they reach the other shore and touch with their finger tips the ivory gates and golden they may not carry out their earthly policy of putting high, retaliatory or even discriminatory tariffs against the import of their former fellow Canadians.

Let us put side by side with those items—the dried blood and so forth—this item: On September 11, 1933, duty was paid on a shipment from Great Britain of thirteen dozen woollen socks valued at £4 10s. 7d., or $22 in Canadian money, as follows:

Rate, 30 per cent, less 10 per cent,	$ 5.94
Plus 75 cents a dozen, less 10 per cent..	8.78

Add the $22 to the $14.72 and you get $36.72. On that, as the custom return shows, the sales tax of 6 per cent was imposed, amounting to $2.20; also the excise tax of 3 per cent, amounting to $1.10. That made a total duty of $18.02 on an importation valued at $22, or a duty of 82 per cent on socks, one of the necessities of life to the Canadian farmer. It is all right, according to the government, to reduce the duties on electric dry shaving machines, dried blood and other items, but what about the goods that are a necessity to the farmer?

The Prime Minister, speaking in Lethbridge, said, "I am neither a high tariff man nor a low tariff man. I am one of those who will utilize the tariff as an instrument of government to save our country from destruction and maintain our position and integrity in the markets of the world." Well, Mr. Speaker, if this is saving us from destruction and maintaining our position and integrity in the markets of the world, then all I can say is God help Canada.

While the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking I turned over my file and found a letter that had been addressed to him from a merchant in my constituency, and if the minister or the government had taken any action on the matter brought up in that letter it would have helped the people of western Canada. I am sorry the minister is not now in his seat. This letter is written by a merchant in my home city, and is addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It reads:

As a member of the Merchants Consolidated Limited I am advised by them that the Welland Vale Manufacturing Company have refused to sell them harvest tools for the reason that they have two large wholesale houses in Winnipeg distributing for them in the west.

The Merchants Consolidated have a large number of members throughout the west, and they handle hardware, groceries, boots and shoes and dry goods. If the Welland Vale Company refuse to sell them, where are they going to buy harvest tools? On account of tariffs this company find it difficult to bring in tools from other countries.

Some relief could have been given to the farmers of western Canada if this letter from the Yorkton merchant had been acted upon. The subject he mentioned was deserving of more consideration than harps or dried blood and the other items I have mentioned.

What is the solution, Mr. Speaker? The solution is a reasonable adjustment between debtor and creditor in this country, a reasonable reduction in the rate of interest to the farmers of the country and a tearing down of the iniquitous tariff walls that have been built up around Canada in the last three or four years. Perhaps I cannot do better than to put on record the words of a man better able to express himself than I can? Mr. Owen D. Young, of the United States, the author of the Young plan, and one who took a prominent part in the last presidential election in the United States as a supporter of Mr. Roosevelt. Here is one paragraph from an address that he delivered a few days before the election:

With the currencies abroad broken, with our own economic machinery threatened and endangered, with debts both domestic and foreign in every land crushing their people, it is time that liberal parties came into power to save conservatives from their own destruction, and to save the rest of us who are victims too. Not until then will our surplus cotton move from the plantations of the south—not until then will our surplus grain and wheat move from the farms of the north—not until then will our surplus manufactures move from the factories of the country—and not until then will our surplus of labour and of commodities which now economically crush us, disappear. It is the restoration of trade alone which holds not only the economic but the social salvation of the world.

To that doctrine we on this side of the house subscribe, and if it were adopted and put into practice then my hon. friend the Minister of Finance could very well look forward with renewed hope and courage and go forward with a firmer step towards the goal of better and happier days, but that will not come to pass until government of the people by the people and for the people shall again have its full measure of fruition in the legislative enactments of a Liberal government in Canada.

Mr. F. T. SHAVER (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my congratulations to those that have been extended to the Minister of Finance for the budget he has presented to the House of Commons and the country. I think the people of Canada are particularly fortunate during these trying years of depression in having at the head of the Finance department a gentleman of the character and long experience and exceptional ability of the Minister of Finance.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. McPhee) devoted the greater part of his speech to a criticism of the government because they had not, so he claimed, opened foreign channels of trade, and because certain markets had been closed against Canadian products. I think his speech was answered in its entirety before he made it by the speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), who showed very conclusively from the official records of Canadian trade that it was during the years hon. gentlemen opposite were in power that foreign markets were lost to a very great extent, and that so far as natural products from Canada were concerned many of the products of Canadian farms and forests were being exported to other countries in much larger quantities during the past year than when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

My hon. friend from Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) referred to a few countries that had raised their duties against Canadian products, but the great majority of the products he mentioned are not natural products at all. He said that Italy had increased her duties against radios and radio parts. But those are not produced on the farms in Canada. He said that Cuba had raised her duties against knit goods and iron piping, and that India had raised her duties against artificial knit goods, and so on. Nearly all the items he mentioned were manufactured articles, not natural products at all, on which duties had been imposed by other countries. He said that Norway had raised her duties against Canadian timber, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce showed that last year the exports of timber from Canada had increased by a very large amount over 1930.

The Minister of Finance was able to paint a rather optimistic picture of Canada's position at the present time, and I think that it was entirely justified by the conditions that exist to-day. The fact that we had a total increase in trade last year of $132,000,000 over the preceding year; the fact that Canada leads the world in per capita export trade; the fact that we had an increase in manufacturing production and, in railway revenues, and a gradual upward trend in commodity prices, all help the people of Canada to realize that the dark clouds of depression are passing away and that brighter days are with us.

I shall not attempt to deal with the whole speech made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) as I believe it was answered very conclusively by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. However, there was one point he made in his speech to which I should like to refer. He moved an amendment couched in these words:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.

A little earlier in his speech, dealing with the reduction in the drawback which the government was introducing in the budget in connection with foreign coal used in Canada for certain purposes, he made this observation:

> If it means that there is to be a further restriction with regard to competing American coal, then so far as I am concerned, coming as I do from Nova Scotia, I welcome it because if there is to be a policy of protection the natural product of Nova Scotia as well as of other provinces should be protected, particularly in view of the national interests which exist in connection with the preservation of the mines of that province.

The hon. gentleman believes in economic nationalism when it is applied to the coal industry in Nova Scotia but he is entirely opposed to it when it is applied to the textile industry in the county which I represent.

In his contribution to the budget debate, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) criticized severely the protection which had been given the textile industry and the implement industry in eastern Canada. But before he finished his speech he asked the government to give special consideration to the beet sugar industry which I assume is located in his own constituency or in his own part of the country. He asked that the government should give freight protection and by implication asked for a subsidy to that industry, because he quoted the subsidies which had been paid over a period of years by Great Britain. That hon. gentleman believes in a policy of economic nationalism as applied to the beet sugar industry in his own county, but he is entirely opposed to it when it is applied to the textile industry in my county.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has condemned time and again the existing tariff protection enjoyed by the industries of eastern Canada, but he has a resolution on the order paper protesting against the use of oriental labour in the shipping on the Pacific coast. He asks that this employment should be confined entirely to Canadian white citizens. The hon. gentleman is quite satisfied to have protection against oriental labour but he is willing that we should permit goods to come in from oriental countries manufactured under living conditions which Canadian people should not be expected to adopt and which we would not want them to endure. He is quite willing to allow such goods to come into Canada to compete with the products of the textile and other industries in the county which I represent. And this attitude is to be found among Liberal members from one end of the country to the other. When hon. gentlemen of the Liberal opposition talk about economic nationalism they always apply it to an industry which exists in some other part of the country, but they are quite satisfied that industries in their own sections should receive protection, either by way of freight rates, subsidies or tariffs. They cannot be accused of believing in a policy of economic nationalism, but they give a very clear demonstration that they are devoted to a policy of economic sectionalism.

During the years it has been in office this government has rendered outstanding service to the Canadian people, but to no section of the people have they given better service than to the farmers. No government since confederation has rendered a more extended service to the agricultural interests of our country than has the present government during the years it has been in office. The protection which has been given to agricultural products; the empire agreements, which were strenuously opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the marketing bill, one of the most forward looking and progressive pieces of legislation ever introduced into the parliament of Canada, have all been opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. The best evidence that the empire agreements have been of benefit to Canada is the fact that our exports to Great Britain last year increased twenty per cent over the preceding year, while we had much larger exports to other parts of the empire. In my opinion if the marketing act is to be a success it is absolutely necessary that the government administering the act must be one which believes in and practices the principle of protection. If we do not have a protected market; if our market is liable to invasion by agricultural products from foreign countries being dumped into Canada, the work of the marketing board will be rendered very difficult indeed.

There are two particular products produced in large quantities in the part of the country which I represent, and, as I have pointed out, the tariff on these two commodities has put millions of dollars into the pockets of Canadian farmers. I refer to butter and eggs. Hon. gentlemen know that during the years the Liberal party was in power our markets were flooded continually with butter from New Zealand. There was always a spread running from 6 to 10 cents per pound between the Montreal and New York prices, the New York prices being the higher. At that time our prices kept down quite closely to the London prices. In 1933 when butter was receiving the protection to which it was entitled, the average price in New York was 23·7 per pound; in Montreal, 21 cents a pound and in London, 16·8 per pound. Without protection I have no doubt that the Montreal price would have approximated very closely the London price, making a difference of at least 5 cents per pound in what the Canadian farmer would have received. We all know that during the winter months the price has been much higher in Montreal than it was in New York, and from 11 to 13 cents per pound higher than it was in London. In January the price in Montreal was 25·2 cents per pound, in London, 14·4 cents per pound, and New York, 20 cents per pound. In February the price in Montreal was 27·8 cents; in London, 15 cents and in New York 25·8 cents. In March the price in Montreal was 29·5 cents, in London, 16·2 cents and in New York, 26·5 cents. The only hon. member who has attempted to explain away these facts is the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand). During an address which he gave recently in the house he stated that the farmer of eastern Canada was not assisted because he produced very little butter during the winter. I wonder if the hon. gentleman took pains to find out how much butter was actually produced? I did, and I found that in December, January, February and March the farmers of Canada produced 33,000,000 pounds of butter. Because of the tariff, the value of this butter was enhanced by at least 5 cents per pound, so that $1,650,000 was put into the pockets of the farmers of Canada.

The same is true with eggs. We all know that during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite our market was flooded continually during the winter months with eggs from the United States. There was always a slump in prices during the winter months and the farmer never expected to get a reasonable price for his eggs during a period when it cost him the most to produce them. Because of a reasonable measure of protection and the initiative and energy of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), who was instrumental last fall in having 2,000,000 dozen storage eggs shipped out of Canada to the British markets, thus taking them out of competition with fresh eggs during the winter months, we find that during the past winter the farmer has received exceptionally good prices for his eggs. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in power eggs were always imported into Canada by way of Chicago. On February 28 the top price in Chicago was 20 cents per dozen while the price in Montreal was 45 cents per dozen. On March 21 the top price in Chicago was 17 cents per dozen, while the price in Montreal was 25 cents.

The production of hogs is a large industry in eastern Ontario, the part of the province in which I live. The empire agreements, which were opposed in their entirety by hon. gentlemen opposite, have been of tremendous value in giving to the hog producers of Canada a larger share of the British market as well as better prices. We have only to compare the price in Chicago with the price in Montreal to see how the Canadian price has improved. On February 28 the price in Chicago for choice hogs was $4.80 per hundredweight, whereas in Montreal it was $10. On March 21 the price in Chicago was $4.40 and in Montreal $8.75. On April 28, just a few days ago, the top price in Chicago was $3.90 and in Montreal $9.10.

The only gentleman on the opposite side who attempted to explain away the facts was the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly), who not long ago, admitting that hogs had doubled in price in Canada as compared with the United States, brought forward this fantastic argument, that the United States did not produce bacon hogs but produced a short, thick, fat animal used chiefly in the production of lard. May I direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that back in 1930, the last year they were in power, the United States, the country which the hon. member for Willow Bunch tells us does not produce a bacon type hog, exported to the United Kingdom 145,472,302 pounds of bacon and hams while Canada exported in that year to the United Kingdom 13,011,400 pounds. The agreements with the United Kingdom came into effect in the fall of 1932, and if you compare the figures for 1930, of Canada's exports to the United Kingdom, with the figures for 1933, you will find that they had risen to 71,524,700, or five and one-half times what they were in 1930; whereas the exports of the United States to the United Kingdom had dropped to 73,355,663, or about half what they were in 1930.

That shows clearly the value of an assured market so far as that product is concerned, and it disposes effectually of the fantastic argument of my hon. friend, that the country to the south of us, with millions of farmers, does not produce bacon hogs.

With one product which the farms of eastern Canada produce, the marketing board, as so ably pointed out in his excellent speech the other evening by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers), will be able to do a great deal, and that is cheese. We are constantly on an export market with regard to cheese, because in 1933 we consumed only 27·6 of the cheese produced in Canada and exported 72·4 per cent. There has been a continually low price for cheese and it has been a difficult problem with many farmers in my own county. The fact is that we have been on an export market and I believe that the marketing board, by assisting in curing, storing and in giving a regulated supply to the British market, will have a considerable effect in helping the farmers in this very important industry.

I have reviewed very briefly a few of the agricultural items in which the farmers in my own county are interested. We admit that the prices of farm products have been low. But the prices of basic commodities throughout the world have been low, and Canada has shared in those low prices. It can be said without fear of contradiction however that the policy which this government has so far put into effect has been of great value in keeping prices at a better level as regards the commodities which I have mentioned than they would have been had not this policy been put into force. And while, as I sincerely believe, the farmers of my own county have benefited by the policy of the government, I am glad to be able to say that the Cornwall industries also have been assisted in that county by that policy.

In this connection I would read a paragraph or two from an editorial that appeared in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder of Wednesday, February 14, 1934. It is headed "Cornwall is in the Limelight" and reads:

> Believe it or not, the name of Cornwall is a magic word throughout Ontario to-day. Because of its rapid recovery from the effects of depression, Cornwall is occupying an enviable position among cities and towns of the province.
> Wherever one goes, the comment is always the same—"You are from Cornwall? Things are booming down your way, aren't they?"
> It gives one a feeling of justifiable pride to hear admiring and sometimes envious remarks about Cornwall. We know that our industries are working at capacity, that employment to-day is actually greater than it was in the boom year of 1928, that relief is no longer necessary, that new factories are locating here, that Cornwall is experiencing a period of unparalleled expansion while other cities and towns are just beginning to shake off the fetters of business stagnation.

There are various reasons for the prosperity of this large industrial town. One reason is that we have not all our industrial eggs in one basket. We have diversified industries and a splendid class of working people, both French and English, who for intelligence, industry and devotion to duty are unsurpassed by the working people of any section of Canada or on the North American continent. We have three railways and boat service located on the St. Lawrence, electric power at reasonable rates, and our street railway furnishes a switching service which is very efficient and helpful to various industries. We have also an efficient and active board of trade and city council. But notwithstanding all these factors, the most important, and the one that has contributed more than anything else to the success of industry in Cornwall, is the assistance which has been given by the tariff policy of the present government.

I have referred in this house on previous occasions to the additions that have been made to Courtauld's plant since this government came into power. This firm is a large manufacturer of rayon, and when this government came into power, in the short session of 1930, one of their first acts was to give this and various other industries in Canada the protection to which they were entitled, in order that they might maintain a large number of working people and pay them reasonable wages. This industry in 1930 was employing about 1,000 people. Immediately after the tariff policy of this government came into effect they began the construction of an addition to their plant and it was finished during the following year at a cost of some $3,000,000. Owing to the increased business last fall and winter they have been building another plant which is now completed at a cost of about $2,500,000. Whereas in 1930, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they were employing 1,000 people, they are now employing about 1,500, and with the new addition to the plant they will be employing in a few weeks' time about 2,000. In other words, there will have been an increase in employment in that one industry alone in four years of one hundred per cent.

We have another new industry, the Powdrell and Alexander concern, which is a branch of a large American firm manufacturing materials used in the making of window shades. They are employing 200 people working full time. That industry came to Cornwall because of exceptional advantages the town offered, but it first had to decide to come into Canada, and it did so because of the tariff policy of the present government. Then there are three cotton mills which found it necessary two months ago to put on a night shift in one of the mills and to take on 130 additional people. In conversation with representatives of the clothing industry, I have been informed that this business has been better in the past few months than for some time previously. The manufacturers of metal beds, of which there is an industry in Cornwall, have also benefited by the policy of the government. We have two paper mills which manufacture fine book paper used in the publication of magazines. It will be recalled that hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power put into effect tariff item No. 1060, which permitted magazine publishers in Canada to import book paper of this type, giving them a rebate of eighty per cent. The result was that some of our Canadian magazines were using paper manufactured in the United States, so that in 1930, the last year hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, we imported 6,346,282 pounds of that type of book paper for magazines from the United States. In 1932, because that tariff item was struck out by the present government when they came into power and the duty went up immediately to the old figure of 25 per cent, we imported only 50,352 pounds. These magazine companies are now buying large quantities of paper from the mills in my constituency. In addition to that, three years ago this government put into effect a duty on United States magazines forcing the publishers of many of them to establish Canadian editions and to print them in Canada. They have largely been using Canadian paper. One company which publishes a group of magazines and which started to use Canadian paper just a few months ago is now using Canadian book paper at the rate of 2,000 tons yearly, which would take the output for sixty-seven days of the largest paper machine used in Canada.

I wish to draw to the attention of the house how plant extension of a successful industry helps others. I mentioned the large addition which Courtaulds made to their plant in Cornwall in 1933 and 1934 and which cost in the neighbourhood of $2,500,000. For the construction of that plant they used 893 carloads of materials coming from widely separated points in Canada. Let me cite a few of them:

Material—	Point of origin	Number of cars
Sand	St. Emelie, P.Q.	242
Stone	Joliette, P.Q.	204
Cement	Montreal	77
Brick	Laprairie, P.Q.	33
Haydite blocks	Outremont, P.Q.	28
Reinforcing steel	Sault Ste. Marie	10
Structural steel	Lachine	68
Roof slabs	Cooksville, Ont.	20

And so on with a number of similar items, the whole totalling 893 carloads. In addition to that they used in the neighbourhood of 200 carloads of machinery, and every possible article they could purchase in Canada was bought in this country. For instance, one item alone, three carloads of equipment coming from Galt, was valued at about $115,000. Another item of three carloads of electrical equipment coming from Toronto was valued at $180,000. This merely goes to show the advantage to the country of having successful industries; it is not only the people they employ in their own industry but the fact that they give employment to thousands of people in secondary industries in all parts of the country. All these people employed in the secondary industries are consumers of Canadian farm products. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has pointed out that the most important market for our farm products is our home market. It is of course absolutely necessary that we build up our export trade because we have always a surplus to export to the markets of the world, but our primary market is right here in Canada. I am informed that of our gross agricultural production we consume eighty-five per cent and export fifteen per cent. If we leave out those two great commodities of wheat and cheese, the greater proportion of our production of which we export, we consume in the dominion ninety-six per cent and export four per cent of all other farm products.

During the years this government has been in office, and since it gave to the industries of Canada the protection to which they were entitled, no other industry has been attacked to the same extent as has the textile industry. Hon. gentlemen opposite have used up hundreds of pages of Hansard in attacking that industry; they have poured the vials of their wrath to a very great extent upon the textile manufacturer. They have tried to point out that he was bleeding the people of western Canada, forgetting all the time that textile manufacturers employ thousands of people who are Canadian citizens just as much as any other producer in Canada and who have a right to a decent day's work and to receive a decent day's pay. The policy of the present government has, since it has been put into effect, assisted very materially the textile industry in the county which I represent. That industry is one of the oldest in Canada. First there was wool, then the manufacture of cotton, later on the manufacture of silk and during the last few years the synthetic product, rayon. The first cotton mill was established at Sherbrooke, Quebec, in 1844; the second at Thorold, Ontario, in 1847. In 1885, nearly half a century ago, there were 107 completely equipped woollen mills and twenty-two completely equipped cotton mills in Canada, operating 10,900 looms and 531,350 spindles. That has grown until in the calendar year 1932, in the industries in the textile group there are 2,002 establishments with capital invested of $321,593,062, with 102,116 employees receiving in salaries and wages $82,817,944 and a total value of production of $274,411,736. If I might be permitted I would like to put on Hansard this chart giving in detail the different types of Canadian textile industries:

The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) in a speech which he delivered not long ago, disposed very effectively of the argument submitted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly that of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), who pointed out the excess of protection which he claimed the textile industry was receiving. I had had those figures worked out from an independent source just a few weeks prior to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Regina, but I merely wish to quote these on two particular kinds of cotton fabrics manufactured in my constituency. In regard to cotton print piece goods the hon. member for West Edmonton gave the actual duty collected as being 58.5 per cent. The correct figure is 26.35 per cent. For white flannelette he gave 52 per cent as being the actual duty collected. The correct figure is 25.9 per cent. One could draw from every speech made on the budget by members of the official opposition and many others made by them the inference that the effect of the tariff policy of this government has been so to curtail importations from Great Britain that the British people in return are not buying so much of our Canadian farm products. That does not apply to the textile industry, as I shall be able to prove with the figures which I have under my hand and which I would like to place on Hansard. This is a statement of the exports of cotton piece goods and cotton yarn from the United Kingdom to Canada for the years ending 31st December, 1931, 1932 and 1933, showing conclusively that the empire agreements had materially assisted the textile manufacturers of Great Britain, because if we compare 1933 with either 1932 or 1931 the exportation of cotton piece goods from Great Britain to Canada increased by 68 per cent and there was a corresponding increase in the exportation of cotton yarn from Great Britain to Canada. With the permission of the house I should like to place this table on Hansard.

* As supplied by the Board of Trade to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce.

I note in the budget which has been brought down there is a reduction of one and one-half per cent in the excise tax on British imports; which is an additional sacrifice that will have to be made by Canadian manufacturers. I am firmly in favour of the Canadian textile manufacturer and every other manufacturer getting the protection to which they are entitled, and I speak more particularly on behalf not only of the manufacturer himself, although he deserves credit, but also of the thousands of men and women who are employed in these industries and for whom the policy of the present government has done so much to enable them to obtain regular employment and decent wages.

The official opposition have continuously attacked the manufacturing industries of Canada. I wish to draw their attention to the fact that according to the census returns there were in 1931, of those ten years of age and over gainfully employed in the manufacturing industries of Canada, 442,759 men and women. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite continue to maintain that these industries are receiving too much protection, that in fact they are not entitled to so much consideration. There was a time when voices were raised from the liberal benches on behalf of the manufacturing industries of Canada. I can recall years ago when there were men from both Ontario and Quebec who did not sit so quietly and listen to their colleagues attack the manufacturing industries; knowing as they did their importance in the economic life of Canada they were always ready to rise to their defence. Sir Lomer Gouin, one of Canada's great men from Quebec in the years gone by, more than once defended the industries of Canada. Prior to my time in the house I remember reading speeches of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who comes from an industrial section of Ontario, and who was ready to rise in defence of the industries of Ontario and Quebec. But those voices are silent now; there is no one in the Liberal opposition to defend these industries which are so important in our industrial life. I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite a question. Their leader has told us—I have quoted this before, you will find it on pages 263-4 of Hansard for the fall session of 1932—that if he were returned to power one of his first acts would be to restore the Liberal tariff as it was when they went out of office and increase the British preference to an average of fifty per cent of the general tariff. What would happen to the industries of eastern Canada if that policy were put into effect? I know what would happen in my constituency; at least 1,500 people would be thrown out of work inside of six months or a year. I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they propose to do for these men and women that they would throw out of employment. Are they going to take them out to the wheat fields of western Canada to grow more wheat to add to our already large surplus?

The policy of the party now in power, the policy of this government, is a truly national policy which aims to help all sections of Canada, and I believe in that policy. I believe that Nova Scotia coal and fish from the maritime province should be used by the Canadian people to the largest possible extent. I believe we should use all the beet sugar we possibly can to give aid to the beet sugar industry. I have bought and sold many thousands of pounds of beet sugar in my time, and I was glad to do it because I looked upon it as a one hundred per cent Canadian product. I believe we should give a preference to white sailors in British Columbia rather than to foreigners. But I also believe that the industries in my part of the country should receive the same consideration from hon. gentlemen from other parts of the country that I am willing to accord to theirs.

I think it can be safely said that Canada is coming through this depression as well as if not better than any other country. I attribute that to three reasons. The first is the character of the Canadian people. Coming from the great parent races, British and French, reinforced by the very best which the nations of Europe had to offer, our fathers were a pioneer stock and they have transmitted to the Canadians of to-day those pioneer characteristics of courage, determination and energy and the will to overcome difficulties which I believe have been great factors in helping our people through these trying times. The second reason is the abundant natural resources which we possess, greater I think than those entrusted to any other nation of ten million people in the world. The third reason, and just as important as the other two, is the fact that we have been singularly fortunate in having at the head of affairs in Canada during these difficult years a statesman who is the epitome of all the best characteristics which the Canadian people possess, that in the Prime Minister of Canada we have one who demonstrates in his life these characteristics of determination, the will to succeed, the ability to overcome difficulties, the greatest heritage that our pioneer forefathers have handed down to us. I believe also we are fortunate in that in his cabinet he has surrounded himself with a group of men of the same type, men who during these trying years have been devoted to the interests of the Canadian people. An article by Isaac F. Marcosson published in a January issue of the Saturday Evening Post, entitled "North of the N.R.A.," has often been quoted before, but I would like to direct the attention of the house to it, because it is an article that every Canadian should read. The writer is a disinterested and trained observer who has spent many years in travelling and studying the conditions in various countries and has fitted himself to form a clear and accurate judgment of those conditions and the reasons why they exist. In that article he gives a very high place to Canada among the nations of the world for the way in which she has survived the difficulties by which she has been beset, and he gives the reasons I have enumerated, namely, the character of the Canadian people, our abundant natural resources, and the fact that we have been fortunate in having at the head of affairs a statesman and government who have devoted their very great abilities to the best interests of our country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, at the very outset I desire to extend my felicitations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the very pleasant manner in which he delivered his budget speech. He spoke for about an hour and forty minutes and during that whole time he wore a smile. I think there is only one explanation for the fact that he smiled while delivering a budget speech of the kind that he did deliver; it must be a perpetual smile. I am truly sorry that I cannot compliment the minister on the contents of that speech. A few days ago the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) taunted the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) with seeing things; he said the hon. member saw boards and boards and more boards. Well, I must confess that during the last four years I have been seeing things also; I have been seeing deficits and deficits and more deficits, and about ten days ago I saw another one. The shortfall between revenue and expenditure is becoming a fixture in this country, and it is very hard to say how long this condition will last with the tornado of indignation that is sweeping the country to-day.

It is not my intention to-night to deal with figures. The Liberal financial critic (Mr. Ralston), speaking for two hours and twenty minutes, gave all the figures that were necessary, in my opinion, in order to criticize the budget successfully. Other speakers on this side of the house who have followed have placed the government on the grill with regard to its record and policies, and I have no desire to add to the misery and discomfort of the government at this time.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) on the fluency of speech which he displayed in his defence of the government this afternoon. The hon. gentleman tried to leave the impression with the house that the Liberal party entertained a certain antipathy towards the manufacturers of Canada, but such is not the case. The Liberal party is the friend of the manufacturers just as much as any other party is, but the Liberal party is not going to assist the manufacturers of Canada to the prejudice of the consumers. As a matter of fact the manufacturers were paying dividends until the Liberal party went out of office. I would also suggest to the hon. member for Stormont, who spent about half his time in eulogizing the government, that it would be a good idea to leave it to the electors to judge whether it should be a eulogy or a dirge. I have made what I think is a pretty safe guess in that respect, but I am not going to divulge that guess to the house to-night.

I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to deal with conditions existing throughout Canada as a whole. There are hon. members in this house representing various parts of the dominion who are well able to speak for the parts they represent. I come from the province of Saskatchewan, and I am going to confine my remarks to the conditions which exist in that province. There are conditions existing in the province of Saskatchewan to-day for which no government, no party and no individual is responsible. For five successive years in parts of that province we have had drought, and last year the drought was aggravated by a plague of grasshoppers. I am not going to be so unfair as to blame any party, any government or any individual for those conditions, but that is the situation. In some respect the government are trying to do their utmost to assist those people who are in distress through no fault of their own, but before I conclude I think I will be able to point out to the house that a great deal more could have been done by the government to assist the people of western Canada.

About the time the Liberal party went out of office in 1930 the farmers were getting good returns for their natural products. This afternoon the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) said that at the time this government assumed office the farmers were getting $1.08 for their wheat while the prices of other grains were in proportion. Before the present government were two years in office, however, the prices of natural products had dropped by more than fifty per cent in comparison with the prices of 1930, and that condition has continued for so long that the farmers of western Canada—and when I speak of Saskatchewan I am speaking of the three prairie provinces—are to-day on the verge of despair.

I am not going to be so vain as to say that the government are responsible for the low prices now existing, but with prices as low as they have been for the last three or four years it is necessary for the government to come to the rescue of those people to a certain extent. The debt of the farmers and the people of the west has increased by leaps and bounds during the last four years, through no fault of their own, and they are not in a position to reduce that debt or, for the last three or four years, to pay interest on it. A short time ago the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) delivered a very able speech in this house, on the motion to go into supply, with reference to the debts of the Dominion of Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) replied very ably, but he laid a great deal of emphasis upon the sanctity of contracts. I am going to make the statement that the debts of this dominion, both public and private, never will be paid one hundred per cent. I do not wish to leave the impression with this house that it is with any satisfaction or delight that I make that statement. I belong to a profession that never opens its mouth except when truth is assailed or justice is to be vindicated. I have been practising that profession for eighteen years, and I know what the sancity of a contract means to me and to all persons within the British Empire. When I say these debts never will be paid I do not mean that it will be the fault of the debtor, and of course it will not be the fault of the creditor either. These debts have accumulated through no fault of the people who owe the money. Because of the conditions that have existed for the last three or four years the debtor finds himself in such a position that even if prosperity returned to-morrow it would take him eight or ten years to get back to the position in which he was before the depression visited the country.

To give some idea of the extent to which the depression has made itself felt among the people of the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker, I am going to read an article that appeared in the Saskatoon Daily Star of December 2, 1933, just four or five months ago. One of the professors of the university of Saskatchewan, Professor E. C. Hope of the department of farm management, made a careful survey of conditions existing in that province in an attempt to arrive at some figure as to the extent to which the farmers of Saskatchewan have gone back during the last four years. After a very careful survey he says:

> To restore to the condition of 1929 the buildings, farm machinery, household equipment and clothing of the dwellers on the 136,000 farms in Saskatchewan would take a sum of at least $140,000,000.

His estimate is made up in this way:

> The farm buildings of Saskatchewan were worth $236,000,000. Professor Hope puts the wear and tear not replaced at $50,000,000.

During the last four years the farmers of Saskatchewan have not been able to keep their buildings in proper repair. The whole setback amounts to $140,000,000, and Professor Hope points out that it would cost that sum to put the buildings in the state they were in in 1929. Before the depression the district had farm machinery and equipment running from two to three thousand dollars per farm. This is now four years older and has not been replaced, and repairs have been cut down to a minimum. It is estimated that it would cost $40,000,000 to put this equipment back into shape. It is also estimated that the internal fittings of the home have deteriorated to the extent of $20,000,000, and wardrobes to the extent of $30,000,000. So in the items I have mentioned the people of the province of Saskatchewan since 1929 have gone back to the extent of $140,000,000. As I have already said, that is not the fault of the people, and it is not the fault of the government or of any individual, but this government could do something on behalf of the people. I am not going to say that they could do it by their fiscal policy. If they changed that fiscal policy it would be of immense assistance, but that alone would not be sufficient.

What is the remedy? We talk about the cancellation or repudiation of debts. The word "repudiation" has not as much terror for me to-day as it had two or three years ago, when we take into consideration the fact that the nations of the world are now repudiating their debts. We used to glory in the fact that England until a few years ago was doing her utmost to pay her war debt to the United States, but strange to say, when the British budget was brought down only a few days ago showing a surplus of some $165,000,000, it contained no provision whatsoever for meeting the war debt payments to the United States. I have this suggestion to make to the government. I understand that there is some question whether this government has the power to pass legislation with regard to a compromise between debtors and creditors, that that is considered by some to be the prerogative or under the power of the provincial government. But something definite should be done about this question of debt before parliament prorogues. Even when we had prosperity the creditor found it necessary at times to compromise with his debtor, and it is often in the interests of both creditor and debtor to effect a compromise. That is not repudiation at all. I contend that the government should do something, even if by compulsory legislation, to bring debtor and creditor together. It is in the interests not only of the debtor but of the creditor also, because to-day the creditor does not know where he stands; he cannot tell how much of his debt he is going to be able to collect, and it would be much better for him if he did know definitely because then he would be able to adjust himself accordingly.

What is the remedy? This is not an original suggestion, because I noticed that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) made the same suggestion a few days ago. I would say that on the debts of the people of this country, especially of western Canada, the interest should be remitted for the last few years since the depression and until prosperity is restored. If that is going too far, I would say cut the rate of interest down to at least 3½ per cent. I know the farmers. I am farming on a fairly large scale myself, and I know that there is not a class of people in this country who are more desirous of paying their debts and meeting their obligations one hundred per cent than the farmers. Naturally the farmer is an honest man, because he toils fifteen, sixteen and sometimes twenty hours a day. In the long days of summer he is on the land with the first rays of the rising sun. He is there at noon, and long after the sun has gone to rest the farmer is still toiling around his farm. He is anxious to meet his obligations to the very best of his ability, but he simply is not able to pay his debts, and this government or any government would only be doing its duty by the people of this country if it passed legislation under which debtor and creditor could be forced to get together and compromise on their debts.

The population of Saskatchewan is less than one million. The mortgage debt of the rural portions of the province to-day approaches $200,000,000. Arrears of taxes in the province amount to about $46,000,000. The debt of the rural municipalities amounts to about $17,000,000. Together the urban and rural debt amounts to about $59,000,000, and you have a population of less than one million in the province. I am sure that similar conditions will be found in every other province in western Canada.

What I have said about debts should apply also to the debts which people owe to the banks. I am not going to undertake to criticize the banks because I understand that that is going to be done to perfection in the committee on banking and commerce to-morrow starting at ten o'clock, and it would be entirely out of place for me, an ordinary individual who does not know a great deal about banks—about the only thing I do know about finance is that I know when I am broke—to criticize the banks. I shall leave that to the committee on banking and commerce to-morrow.

But we have to use some method of paying the debt of this country. Even if we did compromise, the debt is so exorbitant that a compromise would not suffice. I have a remedy to offer, and again I find that it is not original with me; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) got ahead of me in this respect. I read in Hansard that he undertook to quote from some of the speeches I made in that notorious campaign which ended so disastrously for my hon. friend on the twenty-third day of October last. I believe that bond taxation should be levied against certain individuals in this country. It is to the credit of the present Prime Minister that he has always been opposed to tax exempt bonds. He was opposed to them in 1918 and 1919, and has been consistently ever since. My contention is this, that as those bonds were issued in order to induce people to invest so that the country might carry on their part in the war to a successful conclusion, the exemption from taxation should apply only to the original purchaser of the bond. It should not apply to the man who has purchased a tax exempt bond from the original holder. I have it on fairly good authority that there is one person in this dominion who is holding about $15,000,000 of victory bonds which are not subject to taxation. Such a condition should not be allowed to exist. That man should be asked to give a statement to the Minister of Finance or to the government. He could abide by the sanctity of the contract and permit whatever bonds were purchased directly to be exempt, but those purchased indirectly, from the original purchaser or through a second or third person, should have to pay a tax.

There is another remedy I intended to suggest, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) got in ahead of me. Here also I refer to the conscription of wealth. I believe that the conscription of wealth is going to come as surely as the rising of to-morrow's sun. But this is nothing new; to a certain extent we already have conscription of wealth. We have the inheritance tax, the succession duty tax, and the income tax—all forms of conscription of wealth. But it should go a great deal further than that. In order that I may not be regarded as an extremist, I should like to quote from a statement made by the Honourable Philip Snowden in the House of Commons when he was chancellor of the exchequer. He said:

> Some hon. members have made a reference to the capital levy. I was a strong advocate of that proposal and I shall never cease to regret that when the time was so favourable it was not adopted. When trade depression came the opportunity had passed, but there is a way in which we can partially apply it—and I am doing that. It is this: Wartime-made fortunes, profiteering fortunes, are now coming into the estate duty. An important committee of this house has said that when millions of men were dying and exposed to death on the battlefield, a few profiteers at home increased their wealth by £4,000,000,000. I am going to get some of that back.

The same applies to Canada. The robber and the profiteer had their fling during those sad and gloomy days. I know that the Minister of Finance is good hearted. He comes from the same province from which I came and I know the temperament of the people there. However, he has a duty to perform and in all fairness to these people I submit that a survey of the wealth of this country should be made—I mean, the wealth held by individuals. Conscription of wealth should be put into force.

The Prime Minister has always laid great stress upon the sanctity of contracts. As I said I appreciate his position in that respect, but we should not forget that when the government was trying to balance its budget it did not hesitate to reduce the salaries of the civil servants. I submit that the sanctity of contracts should have been considered in that respect. The government did not hesitate to reduce the salaries of the members of this house, of course, and of the senate, which salaries were fixed by statute. I am not whining about that, but—

Mr. DUFF: I am.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) is a different type of Scotchman to what I am. I am not whining about that at all, as I feel I should do my share to meet the obligations of this country; but, to use the vernacular, I object to being made the goat. That is all I am going to say about the debt question.

I should like to refer to the policies of the different political parties which are appealing to the country for support. Is there a political party in this country to-day which is in a position to bring about an improvement in conditions? I am not going to ask if it is the Conservative party. That party has been in office for four years and their record is exposed to the gaze of the people. The intelligent electors of this country are not going to look to the Conservative party to lead them out of the chaotic conditions in which they find themselves to-day. There are two parties left, the Liberal party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Possibly I should not discuss the policies of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in view of the fact that October 23 last saw the destruction not only of the party but of its policies. But they are still causing mischief in the country. Perhaps the explanation for this is that they are alive to the extent that a person is who has been condemned to die. When the sentence of death is being passed upon a man he is allowed so many days before he ascends the scaffold, in order that he may have an opportunity to prepare to meet his doom. The sentence of death was passed upon the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on October 23, 1933, and it will be carried into effect as soon as the bugle sounds the call of duty at the polls.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member has the prisoners mixed up.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): No, they have the mark of Cain on them. There is only one way in which to come to a conclusion as to which party will best serve the interests of the people, and that is by discussing their policies. I was astonished when the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) made the statement a few nights ago in the house that he was not a socialist. I am sorry he is not in his seat this evening, as I would like to have him explain just what he is if he is not a socialist. He not only said that he was not a socialist but he said he has never been one. What is he? He is not a Conservative, and he is not a Liberal, although I have a sneaking suspicion that nothing in the world would please him better than an invitation to join the ranks of the Liberal party. If he is not a socialist, why did he come into the constituency of Mackenzie at the last by-election in order to assist a candidate who was an out and out socialist? That seems to be direct contradiction of his statement. Here is a photograph, taken a few days before the election, of the man who was the Socialist candidate in the constituency of Mackenzie. Making his nomination speech before the vote was taken, he said this:

> You want to know, of course, where I stand politically, socially and economically. I will tell you in one single word: I stand to-day as an out and out socialist. I am not afraid of the word. I am an out and out socialist, a thoroughgoing advocate of the cooperative commonwealth or the brotherhood of man.

It is quite apparent that my hon. friend from Bow River is antagonistic to the Liberal party and the Conservative party when he will come into the constituency of Mackenzie and try to elect a man not of his own political hue, so that I am very anxious to know to what political party the hon. member belongs. Now, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is undoubtedly a socialist party, one hundred per cent; the leader of the C.C.F. has made statements to that effect, though I am not going to quote them to-night. And the C.C.F. being one hundred per cent socialist, the hon. member for Bow River attended a convention which it held at Regina on July 19, 20 and 21, 1933. The socialists are very fond of advertising themselves, and wherever two or three are met together they have their photographs taken. The photograph of the entire group was taken in Regina on one of those three dates in July of last year. I see the leader of the group sitting in the front row in the centre, and the member for Bow River is also in the group, but with his hand he is apparently trying to conceal his face. Evidently he had qualms of conscience at that particular time. I see, too, a gentleman sitting between the leader and the hon. member for Southeast Grey, and I believe he is the very gentleman I happened to defeat on October 23 last.

I did not know that the time was passing so quickly, so I shall have to leave any further discussion of the policy of the C.C.F., because I wish to consider for a moment the policy of the Liberal party. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is a way out of the present depression, and that way can be found in a little pamphlet of four and a half pages—this pamphlet which I have here setting out the position of the Liberal party and its immediate program.

An hon. MEMBER: How old is that?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): It is not very old, not as old as the Minister of Railways. This policy came into existence on February 27, 1933.

Mr. TURNBULL: You have had a summer school since then.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): That is true; I am glad that my hon. friend from Regina is keeping abreast with the times, because we may find him on this side before the session is ended if he continues to add to his intelligence. He had better attend the Spring school and I will be his teacher for a few days. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of the Liberal party will lead us into the promised land.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): I am glad that hon. gentlemen laugh; it is seldom that they laugh when they are talking about their own record. However, I do not object to their interrupting me; it is an indication that they are waking up. How will the policy of the Liberal party lead us into the promised land? The answer is, through the reduction of tariffs and the liberation of trade. An imperial conference was held in Ottawa in July, 1932, and the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, the chief delegate from Great Britain, made this statement at the opening of the conference:

> I may be allowed to remind you that the countries of the commonwealth depend upon world prosperity both directly, when they are selling commodities for which a world market is indispensable to them; and also indirectly, when they sell to the United Kingdom because the purchasing power of the United Kingdom depends upon her ability to sell in a world market, and that in turn depends upon the ability of the world to buy. . . .
> Let us, therefore, aim at the lowering rather than the raising of barriers, even if we cannot fully achieve our purpose now, and let us remember that any action we take here is bound to have its reactions elsewhere.

What Mr. Baldwin aimed at did not come to pass, and I will tell you why. We have in this country a Prime Minister whose transcendent ability, superb courage and dynamic energy, coupled with a seductive and devastating personality, dominated that conference. It is all to his credit; there is no doubt about it that he was the leading figure at that conference.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): I do not want any cheers from either side when I say what I think I should say. What Mr. Stanley Baldwin wanted, I repeat, did not come to pass. Now I am not an economist but I have confidence in the opinions of those who have held positions of responsibility and trust. Mr. Baldwin was Prime Minister of Great Britain once through the death of Mr. Bonar Law, who was Prime Minister, and subsequently he became Prime Minister by the will of the people. I suggest therefore that when a man holding a position of that kind, a man in whom the people of England have such implicit confidence as to make him Prime Minister, makes statements, they should be given every serious consideration. I submit that if we had reductions in the tariff it would assist us materially in bringing back prosperity to this great country.

What are the conditions to-day? There is despair in many places; penury and want have placed their ineffaceable seal on the door of thousands of homes in this great and rich land of ours. The poison of despair is already in the blood and is spreading. I know of a father and mother in Saskatchewan who entered into a covenant with death to destroy their only child and then themselves because life had become intolerable to them; they could not find the subsistence of living. These conditions exist. I wish I had it in my power to convince the Prime Minister that it is high time for him to leave his sinful life at Damascus and start for his glorification at Rome. If he cannot see his way clear to abolish high tariff entirely, then in the interest of the country which he loves so much, a country which has been so abundantly kind to him, surely he can quarantine it for a generation at least. The inevitable result would be a greater and more prosperous Canada; satisfaction and contentment would take the place of despair and want; and in the full plethora of her exuberant wealth Canada would take her place among the foremost countries of the world.

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): May I first congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon the splendid budget address which he presented to us a week or so ago, and also offer a few words of commendation to the last speaker (Mr. MacMillan) on his admirable effort in the house. I shall not attempt to discuss the question of debts or his proposals in respect thereto, nor shall I discuss the proposal which he made in regard to the conscription of wealth. All I may say in that connection is this, that his right hon. leader was prime minister in this country from 1922 to 1930; the party which he supported so loyally during all those years was in power, and we did not have a great demonstration of conscription of wealth during those years.

I propose to deal very hurriedly with the question touched upon in the amendment moved by the financial critic of the opposition (Mr. Ralston), and to endeavour to discuss the question of world trade and international cooperation. May I first read the amendment as we have it submitted:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.
> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

Analyzing that amendment as it is presented one would say that the mover is contending that there has been a disaster in connection with Canada's trade; that that disaster has been caused by economic nationalism and that the government of the day has introduced this economic nationalism. The second part of the amendment states that the cure for this would be to promote export trade throughout the world, and the inference is that the party which the hon. gentleman represents would introduce the cure by the substitution of policies advocated by his party. I contend that the hon. member has taken hold of the old political expedient of grasping an existing evil, playing it up strongly, laying the blame for the presence of such evil to his opponents, and then claiming that his particular policies are the cure. That is an old expedient which has been played often not only in politics but in other lines. Let us make a rapid review from Canada's viewpoint of the situation in the world in which we live.

True, there has been a distinct falling off in trade during the past four years. As a matter of fact, our total trade as expressed in dollars has decreased to about thirty-seven per cent, but at the same time it is a remarkable coincidence that world trade has decreased to exactly the same percentage. When we look to the greatest nation, financially speaking, in the world, the United States, we find that the total income of that country also decreased to exactly thirty-seven per cent. If we take those few figures they are in themselves a fair indication that the condition which has been found in Canada so far as trade is concerned is worldwide. That has been repeated so often it is hardly necessary for me to reiterate it. Is it necessary to go over the history of conditions existing since 1914? The war; the years of recovery; the loans granted to European nations during those years; the difficulties which those countries found in building up their trade; then following along to the orgy of speculation; the cutting off of credit extended to the nations of the world; the crash and all that has followed. Canada came into the whirlpool of this world condition.

The amendment speaks of economic nationalism. When did this commence? At any rate, when did it begin to manifest itself most predominantly? It was in 1927 that the nations, particularly of Europe, began to build around themselves tariff walls, embargoes, licences, quotas and all the other obstructions to international trade, and 1928 was the year in which bilateral trade agreements were made among the nations. That is when this so-called economic nationalism, mentioned in the amendment, took root. But hon. gentlemen opposite were then in power; the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was leader of the government; why did he not do something to prevent this economic nationalism? What steps did he take? What steps did the supporters of the then government take? Shall we place upon them the responsibility for the existence of this in Europe, in the world and in Canada itself? Hon. members opposite say: That is unfair. Of course it is. The right hon. gentleman was not responsible for this, nor was the government of the day responsible for its introduction in Europe; but it is just as fair for me to contend that he was responsible for it as it is for the right hon. gentleman now to contend that the present government is responsible for its continuance. Laying aside political shams and facing the situation as we know it exists we realize that this is a world condition; that it is the manifestation of the tempers of the peoples of the world, particularly those of Europe, and we are facing in Canada the reality that we are living beside other nations that have adopted this policy.

The government came into power in August, 1930. As a result of what had occurred during the preceding years they found that the country was wide open to foreign trade and goods were being dumped. Why? Because credits had been cut off by the creditor nations of whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) spoke this afternoon, and the debtor nations proceeded to produce and manufacture commodities in larger quantities, dumping them into foreign markets in order to secure means with which to pay their debts. Creditor nations insisted that their debts should be paid, and paid in currency. They insisted that their own tariff walls should be built higher and higher. To secure money under those conditions where did the debtors look? They looked to the open markets; one of them was Canada and the other was the United Kingdom. So that goods were being dumped into this country. What did the government of the day do? They did the only logical thing; they used the only weapon they could use, the weapon that was at their disposal —they stopped the unusual and tremendous flow of goods dumped on the Canadian market. The United Kingdom followed exactly the same course. When credits were cut off, when creditor nations refused further credit, refused goods as has been stated this afternoon, there was nothing for the government of the day to do but proceed to balance its trade, and so it did. Instead of letting an adverse balance of over $100,000,000 continue, it proceeded to reduce that adverse balance, and I am glad to say that for the fiscal year just ended we shall have a favourable balance of probably $145,000,000 to assist in paying the debts which we owe. These were the conditions which existed, and with which the Canadian government had to grapple. There is no difference of opinion amongst the Canadian people, no matter to what party they belong, in regard to the desirability of international cooperation. There is no quarrel amongst the Canadian people as to the advisability of creating and maintaining normal channels of trade with people who will deal with us on fair and equitable terms. There is no quarrel between us in regard to matters of that kind, and never has been, and as long as we remain sane people there never will be. Yet it is a strange thing how political partisanship will sometimes distort one's judgment. For instance, when the Prime Minister and his government proceeded to negotiate with countries that were prepared to negotiate with us, countries to which we would most naturally look for trade negotiations, whose temperament and whose history would incline them to enter into trade relations with us, opposition was met with from our friends across the floor. The Prime Minister turned to the United Kingdom and to the other countries of the empire. To make a long story short, the government succeeded in arranging the Ottawa conference agreements, which have certainly brought a very considerable financial return to this country and to the other countries concerned. However, even if we had not benefited to the extent of one dollar from the arrangements so made, those agreements would still be well worth while, because they stand as an object lesson to the other nations of what unity of purpose and harmony of spirit can accomplish in the way of international cooperation regarding trade, finance, commerce, and social or any other questions. And I am glad to say that they have produced results, even so far. Other nations have come to the United Kingdom and sought the same privileges, and the United Kingdom and other countries have been able to arrange agreements on a cooperative basis because of the spirit which was exemplified at the Ottawa conference.

I am prepared to agree with my hon. friends opposite or with any one that the crying need of the day is international cooperation, a different spirit, a different attitude among nations. For that reason I express my approval of the efforts of the League of Nations. I think this is the wrong time for Canadian statesmen, Canadian members of parliament or Canadian citizens to be expressing their opposition to the endeavours of the League of Nations in any line. The League of Nations endeavoured to bring about an understanding between nations in regard to trade, and while they did not succeed to any great extent, at least they created a public opinion, a sense of responsibility of one nation towards another that had never existed before. I am not going to deal at any greater length with the matter of international trade, but I wish to refer to one phase of the work of the League of Nations which has been an outstanding success. Representatives of fifty-six of the outstanding nations sat around a table and with the force of public opinion behind them agreed on the humanitarian work of the league. It is true that the major activity of the league was the establishment and the continuation of peace, and I think you will agree that it is worth while. If the league did not succeed from the standpoint of dollars and cents in promoting trade understandings, admitting for the sake of argument—though I do not agree with the statement—that they did not succeed in doing much towards the establishment of permanent peace if their only achievement was what they accomplished in the humanitarian department of their work, the league has served the world well and is worthy ten times over of the continued support of the Canadian people.

May I take a few moments, then, to outline some of the successful activities of the League of Nations? I shall be very brief, but I think I can give a sufficiently general survey to constitute an object lesson as to what we can do in our own country. I shall deal only with two or three undertakings of the league, and first I will discuss the way they handled the matter of refugees and soldiers who had to be repatriated. May I emphasize this point, that when nations can come together and agree upon principles of this nature it does not require a great stretch of the imagination to understand how it may be possible for them to agree even upon such contentious matters as trade, war, disarmament and so on. These nations were moved by humanitarian feelings. There were five hundred thousand soldiers living under indescribable conditions, two hundred thousand of them in Siberia and the balance in various other countries, as prisoners of war. The nations agreed to finance the undertaking and to restore those prisoners of war to their homes. The project was organized in a skilful way, and Doctor Nansen was placed in charge. The undertaking was of a major character, as we can understand by comparing the administration of the relief camps in the various parts of Canada. Even with a highly organized department of this government in charge and with relatively few men in the camps there are difficulties in this country, where supplies are so easily obtainable and transportation is so regular. In this case two hundred thousand men were brought from Siberia, for instance, to their homes in Europe. There was no serious loss of life; the men were clothed, fed and sheltered, so that it will be seen that international cooperation can attain great ends if the nations set their minds to it.

One could go on and outline the work done in regard to the refugees from Asia Minor. These people, numbering, 750,000, mainly women and children, were brought across to Greece, financed through a highly organized scheme and placed in homes in their new country. Other refugees were taken to that country also to such an extent that in the end they constituted one-fifth of the total population. One could outline what was done in Roumania and Bulgaria, and in connection with the million and a half refugees from Russia who, following the revolution, were scattered over the various countries of Europe. Through the League of Nations organization these people were taken back to their homes in safety, under an arrangement with the Russian government.

All this goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that when there is a will there is a way, and when there is an international will there is an international way. Those difficulties, which in the past have been insurmountable, even when taken up by the League of Nations, need not remain insurmountable if the nations get together. However, I shall leave that to deal with what I consider perhaps the most important work of the League of Nations; I refer to their health organization. This was started in a temporary way following the war, in connection with the return of these refugees and repatriated soldiers. The small countries of eastern Europe became overrun by epidemics of typhus, malaria and so on; literally millions of their people were stricken with disease and hundreds and thousands of lives were lost. The health organizations of the countries concerned were utterly unable to cope with the situation; even under normal conditions they were not skilfuly or scientificaly organized, and the League of Nations volunteered to help them. Allow me to emphasize the fact that when the League of Nations stepped in they did not force their way in; they came at the request of Poland, Latvia and other countries concerned. They met with the willing cooperation of the health organizations of those countries and assisted them to combat the epidemic.

I want to emphasize that fact, Mr. Speaker, because later on I shall refer to the conditions that exist in our own country. There was no interference at all with existing organizations; it was simply a matter of securing the assistance of those who were better informed in that kind of work. The best medical health officers that Europe could secure were sent to these various small countries to work in cooperation with existing health organizations. Gradually, step by step, the scientific knowledge, skill and experience of these men were made apparent, and slowly but surely that knowledge permeated and pervaded the various parts of those countries until, in less than two years, the epidemics which had seemed so terrible and with which it had been almost impossible to cope were entirely eliminated. Then it was that that vision which was given to the League of Nations became more permanent and they undertook a like work in those countries where malaria was so prevalent. One-fifth of the population of the world, 650 million people, occupied countries which were malaria infested. Year after year went by but gradually the scientific assistance which has been extended on a voluntary basis by the League of Nations has made itself felt and conditions have vastly improved.

Then they went further. They arranged conventions, and all these various countries sent their skilled men to become more skilled. They came to Denmark, to France, England, the United States and Germany, where year after year lectures and practical demonstrations of public health work were given and discussions were engaged in. The program was extended and the men were divided up into smaller groups and visited for one or two or three months at a time various countries where they were able to see, at first hand, public demonstrations in operation—water systems, sewage systems, hospitals, research laboratories and all the other scientific provisions which are necessary for the maintenance of the public health. That work has been going on without any blare of trumpets, without any great publicity on the part of the League of Nations and without any unnecessary noise by the various nations of the world, but from year to year the work has been developed until to-day even those nations which were very backward in public health work are standing well up with even the most advanced countries of the world, and those efforts are still going on. The main thought here is that nations can come together in a general way and many of them can send their representatives, and indeed have sent them, to cooperate with one determined purpose in view, namely to raise the standard of public health, and in that they have succeeded. I think I am safe in saying that no similar effort on the part of any group of nations has had such a large success. No undertaking by any nation or any group of nations heretofore has had the result of saving so many human lives, of relieving so much human distress of mind, body and spirit, and even of soul, than has this undertaking of the nations which faced one another in the early days of 1920 and agreed to help one another in raising the standard of public health work.

Applying that to our own selves—because I think there is a lesson here for us, although the advance that is to be made in public health work is not being announced in any great public advertising or with any blare of trumpets. We have in this country provincial health organizations of varying degrees of efficiency. I most thoroughly agree that the proper place for the public health organizations is in the province, as near to the people as possible. That is perfectly right. When it comes down to the actual administration there is no substitute for the provincial departments of health, and I do not wish to be misunderstood as in any way recommending that there should be any change in that respect. That is exactly the method that was followed in connection with the successful undertakings by the League of Nations, with no interference, but rather coordination and cooperation, bringing together all the work in a cooperative way. But there is a place and a very valuable place for the federal Department of Health in this connection. Each province would do its own work, certainly, but the federal Department of Health could be the coordinating centre with its influence steadily permeating and helping to raise the standard continually in the provinces, with the federal department making the utmost use of the existing provincial departments of health, but at the same time persistently grappling with the problems which present themselves.

I have presented this, Mr. Speaker, in very general terms indeed. If I had time I could illustrate by a few definite proposals what could be accomplished in this way, the individual provinces working separately in their own fields, and the federal department coordinating in attacking such problems as heart disease, cancer, kidney conditions, and so on. These are problems which are presenting themselves, and to-day I am sorry to say the efforts are being defeated because the spheres of activity are too constricted, and there is not that coordinating national and international effort that is required to make the efforts a success.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan) on his very able maiden speech in this house to-night. Not only did he speak well, but he gives promise of being one of the real debaters of the house. He also showed that he has a sense of humour which he will find very necessary if he sits in his present position very long.

I was a most interested listener to the various suggestions which he made for curing the ills of the body politic. Being a new member he did not realize that the very suggestions which he made to-night had all been made previously several years ago from this corner of the house. Whether the suggestion comes from him or from any other part of the house, it is always welcome and we shall do our level best to cooperate with any hon. member in bringing about necessary reforms.

The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) will pardon me if I do not follow him closely. I was glad to hear what he said with regard to the League of Nations. The league has in many ways done splendid work, although some people think it should have done more; and a résumé of what has been done with regard to health comes very well from the hon. member. Particularly good work has been done in that connection and I think the public should know about it.

In referring to trade the hon. member said that while the trade of Canada had dropped down to about 37 per cent of what it was, world trade had suffered also. That is all very well, but it does not mean that we should rely upon international conferences and international actions for relief. Relief must be started by some country, and Canada might just as well be the country to start it as any other. In my opinion too much attention has been given to international trade. International trade is very important, but our home trade between our own people is of greater importance.

It is very interesting to sit in this house and listen to the discussion of the budget by hon. members on each side. Hon. members on the government side give continuous praise while hon. members of the official opposition continually blame the government. I happen to be in the fortunate position of not having to give all praise or blame entirely. I cannot give as much praise as I should like to, but there is some praise due to the government. I shall certainly blame wherever I think blame is due. I do not think it can be said of the government that they have been inactive. This government during the last four years has probably been the busiest government Canada has had at any time, except the government which held office during the war. Look at the number of conferences that they have called or attended, one nearly every year; look at the enormous amount of taxation which has been levied on the people; look at the enormous amount of unemployment relief which has been given, such as has never been known in the history of Canada; look at the large number of alterations which have been made in the tariff schedules. Unfortunately the conferences did not turn out to be as successful as one would have hoped they would be. I think it must be admitted that the first and last conference drew practically blank. While the middle conference did some good with regard to empire trade, that benefit was derived to a certain extent at the cost of our world trade.

Then we come to the taxation proposals. This government felt that it had no alternative, although I think it had, than to levy taxation very heavily. This taxation has interfered with our internal trade because it has proved to be a great damper on the purchasing power of the people. In spite of the fact that about $130,000,000 has been spent upon relief, our problem has not been solved. Yet we were promised some four years ago that this problem would be solved very quickly. There is no doubt that the increases in the tariff have had the effect of interfering with our export trade. I do not say that the government have not done their best; I think they have in all sincerity, but they now find themselves in the difficult position of having to admit that their remedies have failed, and they are attempting to find other means of meeting the present crisis. Under the law of self preservation they are looking for a way out and they are not bothering very much with conferences. This budget shows the smallest increase in taxation of any budget of this government. Only one new tax is suggested by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). The tariff has come in for some attention, but instead of increases we find decreases. The government came into office with the policy of putting the tariff up very high with the idea of saving the country. After four years they found that that policy did not produce the returns expected, and they have come to the conclusion that they had better chisel the tariff down as much as possible.

The deficit this year amounts to about $76,000,000 which with the Canadian National Railways deficit of $59,000,000 gives a total deficit of $135,000,000. Trade has been bad for the last few years and such a condition is bound to have a serious effect upon the budget.

The one new tax which the government has seen fit to levy is the tax on gold. If there ever was a popular tax, I think it is this one. For several years past general business has been endeavouring to make both ends meet and has been looking with envious eyes upon the gold mining industry, which has been doing particularly well. The figures given this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) show plainly the fortunes made by those interested in our gold mines. Although it may be necessary to give some consideration to the mines with smaller production, I think the tax of ten per cent upon all gold sent to the mint or exported is a very just tax and will be well received by the public.

The sugar tax should never have been levied and I am glad to see that it is being cut from two cents per pound to one cent per pound. I am glad to see the income tax has not been reduced. I should have liked to see this tax increased, but possibly the government does not want to increase any taxes this year. About seventy-five items in the tariff are to be changed, but, strange to say, with the exception of three, all the changes are downwards. I notice that most of these changes are in the British preferential tariff, in connection with steel and chemicals. The empire content requirements are being reduced from fifty to twenty-five per cent on a wide range of articles. The special duty of three per cent on the duty paid value of empire goods coming in under the preference is to be cut in two. This is all to the good, but it reminds me of the Liberal budgets brought down in 1927 and 1928. At that time the Liberals were trying to cut down the tariff but they did not reduce it very much, and the same thing has happened in this budget. However, instead of leaving the income tax where it was at that time, the government of that day reduced it by ten per cent in each of the years 1927 and 1928. I think that was a very serious mistake. Of course, hindsight is always better than foresight, but I believe that anyone looking backward to-day will concur in that statement.

An amendment has been moved to this budget by the official opposition. Personally I am not satisfied with it. It seems to me rather vague, and certainly it is not as specific as I should like it to be. I therefore take the liberty of moving, seconded by Miss Macphail:

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "that" and substituting therefore the following:

This house regrets that there is no indication in the budget that the government intends to take any action to put an end to the unnecessary suffering of our people arising out of the policy of financial deflation, unwise and inequitable tariff policies and economies which inevitably lead to restrictions on the production and distribution of wealth. Such policies are responsible for the present condition of poverty in the midst of plenty.

And further, that this house is of the opinion that the control of national credit, which by the constitution is vested in this parliament, should be exercised immediately by the government so as to:

Provide sufficient purchasing power to enable our people to "loosen their belts," and to take full advantage, as consumers, of their ability to produce;

Raise the price of agricultural products and other primary commodities to an equitable level in relation to the cost of production, the price of manufactured goods, and the settlement of outstanding liabilities, public and private;

Provide employment of a character that will add to the national wealth, and under conditions that will assure an adequate standard of living;

Create an increased volume of business which will permit the collection of sufficient revenue by our various governments, municipal, provincial and federal, to meet their necessary expenditures.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) gave us a most detailed account of all the moneys received and all paid out with regard to the country's business, but he said nothing with respect to what we are producing annually, or to our powers of producing if we only allowed our machinery to operate freely. He did not say anything about these two important points. If he considered them he would find that Canada from the producing point of view can be a very rich country indeed; and as a rich country, I submit, we should not for a moment tolerate so much poverty in the midst of abundance. Nothing is said with regard to total production and total consumption. Nothing is said with regard to the remedy for unemployment except, as suggested by the Prime Minister and some of his supporters, that the best thing to do is for us to tighten our belts, work harder, produce more and consume less. For my part I cannot see that this offers any way out of our difficulties. The Minister of Finance does not tell us how purchasing power is going to be increased. Apparently he has never given very much thought to the idea of social credit. Nor did he make any suggestion with regard to improving our financial system except by cutting the interest rate. That of course will help a little but it will be too slow to save the situation. He did not say anything with regard to controlled inflation, which will have to be recognized if we are to solve the problem of our debt, which I will refer to in a few moments.

The Minister of Finance contends that it is necessary for this country to borrow abroad in order to carry on its activities. In this I entirely disagree with him. Whatever moneys are brought into this country are brought in entirely on the basis of the powers of the country to produce and deliver goods, and if the assets of Canada or of any business in Canada are good enough for Wall street or Lombard street they should be good enough for our own financiers.

He also made a statement which I query. Referring to the debt he said that it was not beyond the capacity of our people to pay. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance realized, when he said that, that the Canadian debt plus guaranteed loans in 1913 amounted to $483,000,000 whereas in 1933, twenty years afterwards, the same liability amounted to $4,002,000,000, or an increase in the twenty years of $3,519,000,000. Does he realize, does the public realize, that the interest on this debt has increased eleven times in that period? And according to the minister's own words our uncontrolled expenditure at this time is 63 per cent of the total revenue. Taking the interest on gross debt and guaranteed obligations we have a liability equal to nearly 50 per cent of our total revenue. The provincial governments are in a somewhat similar position. I find the interest on provincial borrowings has increased 370 per cent since 1916. Now, the question which we all have a right to ask, and which was put so well a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan), is this: Can this debt be paid? Personally I do not think it can possibly be paid without a distinct change in our financial system, either by controlled inflation or by making proper use of social credit. I cannot help feeling with Mr. J. M. Keynes, the noted British economist, who in referring to these accretions of interest said that if they were allowed to grow without mitigation for many generations, half the population would be no better off than slaves to the other half. I regret to say that in my opinion the people of Canada to-day find themselves in that position. Many people to-day feel that they are slaves to the rest of the community, and I think it is more like 60 or 70 per cent who are slaves to the other 30 or 40 per cent.

The total revenue this year is $324,000,000, a slight increase over last year. The Minister of Finance thinks he can get the cost of money he is borrowing, from 5 per cent down to 4.35. But this is far too high. He reminded us that the western provinces have borrowed no less than $50,000,000 from the federal government. There are various reasons for this. Some of those who live in the eastern provinces will wonder why the west has to borrow. But when one realizes that the western provinces are quite young from the point of view of development, that they had to incur very heavy expenditure in getting started, that they have a very heavy capital investment per capita, the reasons are apparent. It must be remembered also that they have largely primary industries only; that these industries have been hit during the crisis probably worse than any other, and that while interest continues to be charged on their debts one hundred per cent, at the same time their paying capacity has been largely reduced, because in some cases the values of their commodities have dropped fifty and sixty per cent. That is one of the main reasons the western provinces have had against their will to come to the federal government asking for assistance. But when one looks at what the Canadian Pacific, one railway company, borrowed from the banks with government assistance, namely, $60,000,000, the assistance given the western provinces does not seem so large.

I have in my hand a table of the loans that were advanced by the banks to various provinces and industries, loans that were guaranteed by the Dominion government. The total, not counting any of the guarantees to the wheat pool, amounts to $96,550,468. The government in their wisdom may have thought it fitting to support the banks in getting behind these various loans, but in this list there is one loan which is guaranteed by the federal government and to which I take great exception; it is the loan that the banks made to the Dominion of Newfoundland. I have here a statement made by Mr. B. C. Loftus, recently elected Conservative member, at Westminster. He made this statement with regard to Newfoundland:

> There is general agreement that a process of deterioration which has now reached almost unbelievable extremes may be said to have set in about quarter of a century ago . . . for a number of years there has been a continuing process of greed, graft and corruption which has left few classes of the community untouched.

Then the following comment is made by the editor of the New English Weekly:

> A stern condemnation and deserved, but could the politicians have corrupted the country and imposed upon it an impossible burden of debt if they had not been aided by the financial houses of issue both here and in Canada? They knew, they must have known, as they floated the loans and received their commissions that the government of the dominion was at best incompetent, that the country was poor and unable to bear the increasing burden of debt. The castigation of the politicians is deserved, but surely the commission might have and indeed ought to have passed censure on the financiers who floated the loans, the pandars of all this political graft and corruption.

I cannot see why we should through our government place the credit of Canada behind loans made by private corporations to a country outside this dominion and I hope the Minister of Finance or one of the other ministers will make a statement in regard to the matter.

I would like to say a few words regarding the serious situation that we find in the prairie provinces. It is well known that for some years past many of our products have been selling below cost and that any reserves that the people had have been depleted. One has only to go through the country to see that the buildings and machinery are going unrepaired; that there is no money with which to make the necessary improvements. The standard of living has if possible been lowered. The young people are facing life under a handicap; their parents are having great difficulty in giving them a decent education, especially a higher education. I think the government itself realizes to-day that agriculture is just about at the limit of its endurance whether in the east or west and naturally the collapse of agriculture would mean the collapse of general business. As the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan) has said, the farmers want to pay their debts, but it does not matter how much they want to pay if it is impossible for them to pay and Canada is up against a very difficult problem, because so many of the industries depend directly on agriculture.

I want to congratulate the government on introducing their marketing bill. It took a good deal of pluck to introduce it, but one thing we cannot criticize the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for not having is plenty of courage. A marketing bill or something along those lines has been asked for in western Canada for many years and I shall therefore take great pleasure in supporting the second reading of that bill, reserving the right to criticize, if need be, any details when the bill is either in committee of the whole or before the committee on agriculture if it is sent there. The need of marketing legislation seems to me to be brought before us when one realizes what the figures mean that were given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) in introducing the bill. I find that no fewer than nine of our farm products are nearly all consumed in this country. The figures are as follows:

Percentage of Home Grown Agricultural Products Consumed in Canada

	Per cent
Eggs	99.8
Sheep and lamb	99.4
Butter	98.9
Poultry	98.3
Cattle and beef	97.3
Potatoes	96.9
Hogs and pork	95.4
Barley	88.2

That means to say that a very small percentage of those products when sent abroad will affect the prices sometimes very drastically and oftentimes bring them below the cost of production. When we consume so much of those products it should not be difficult under a marketing board to be able to take care of that small surplus and to see that the producer gets a fair return for his work. On the other hand, looking at the different countries that have bought Canadian produce, I find that for reasons best known to themselves they have raised their tariffs on wheat from a very low figure, sometimes from no tariff at all, to a very high one, as follows:

Rates of Duty Charged on Canadian Wheat by Various Countries

	Lowest rate	Highest rate
Germany	Free in 1922	$0 98 in 1930
France	$0 11 in 1924	0 85 in 1930
Italy	Free in 1921	0 73½ in 1929
Czechoslovakia	Free in 1921	1 36 in 1933	(per cwt.)
Japan	0 18 in 1921	0 34 in 1930
Mexico	0 60 in 1923	1 05 in 1930

In the case of Czechoslovakia it goes from free in 1921 to as high as $1.36 per hundredweight in 1933.

While I am on that I want to give the house some figures which will give those who have not a knowledge of western Canada an idea of some of the extraordinarily low prices that are being paid for farm produce. I have in my hand a bill of a sale near Hughenden, Alberta, a part of the west that has never had a complete crop failure. It must be remembered that the machinery to which I am going to refer is all second hand, but it is second hand machinery that is being used. I find that six horses that were sold brought a total of $95.50; one horse a few years ago would have fetched that price. I find that six cattle, consisting of two steers, one calf and three cows, brought a total of $41.75. Then we have some of the machinery:

One binder	$ 5 00
One disc	8 00
One set of sleighs	11 00
One wagon gear	19 00
One sulky plough	5 00

One set of harrows	5 00
One gang plough	4 25
One hay rake	3 00
One mower	5 00
One fanning mill	6 00

It is almost unbelievable. I know this particular case because the man who had the place had an overdraft at the bank; he had given this stuff as collateral, and he wanted to turn the whole thing over to the bank against the loan. But the bank would not take it. They did however, write their loan down from $700 to $500 and brought sufficient pressure on him to have this sale. When the sale was over it did not bring in $700 or even $500; it brought $241.05.

I give these figures because I think it is essential that the people in this part of Canada should know the extraordinary situation that the farmer on the prairie is struggling against. I am glad to learn from the Minister of Finance that the government intends to bring in a bill designed to liquidate to a certain extent the farmers' debts, or the expression used I think was to enable them to stay on the land. I cannot say much with regard to the legislation proposed, as we have not particulars, except that I am glad it is coming. But I want to warn the government right now that it will have to be much more far-reaching than the long term farm loan act of a few years ago. That has given very little relief indeed. I shall withhold further comment until the legislation comes down, but I hope when it does come I shall be able heartily to congratulate the government on what they propose. Then I understand the government intends to bring in a bill with regard to public works. I hope that it will include provision for finishing those branch lines of railway where the grade has been prepared already but the rails are still wanting. I have in my mind one particular grade running some twenty-five miles easterly from Bulwark. The grade is all ready, it only awaits the steel, and completion of this line is very urgently needed. The farmers there have been waiting for many years, living a long distance from elevators and putting up with a great deal of hardship. I sincerely hope that when the public works program comes down such undertakings will be considered. I have taken the matter up with the Minister of Railways several times, and I hope we shall now see provision made for finishing such public works.

In conclusion I should like to refer to some of the defects in our economic system as I see them. Our problem is not one of unemployment, but of unpurchasable production; that is, that people are unable to buy the goods which they want and which are already made. This brings about consequent unemployment, with the usual glut of goods; production thereby is further reduced, and there is the consequent poverty. Poverty is caused not by unemployment but by lack of purchasing power accompanied by economic need. We have many people who might be called unemployed, but they are spoken of as leisured because they have money to spend. We have, as outlined so ably by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, industrial plant much greater than we really need, although we could use it a good deal more if the people were able to purchase the goods that can so readily be made. This brings about frantic cut-throat competition in selling goods, because of the vast amount to be sold and the few who are able to buy and the many who can buy but little. This defect in the means of selling goods brings about the next stage, the grabbing for foreign markets. As each country is trying to do the same thing we are drifting into worse and worse economic warfare which undoubtedly will lead ultimately to military warfare. It seems to me, therefore, that instead of spending so much time and money and consideration in an attempt to find markets abroad for our surplus products, we should pay more attention to satisfying the needs of our own people. I was reading, the other day a most interesting book on the life of Napoleon, and I noticed that he considered that the problem that should engage his attention first of all was that of agriculture, next industry, and third external trade. Canada would do well if she followed a similar line of reasoning.

As I have said, the problem of every country to-day is how to get rid of goods, and they are trying to get rid of them by export. But we have a real demand at home, and our problem is to turn that real demand into effective demand. If we have not money sufficient to buy the goods that are made, that is allowing for the exchange of goods between export and import, we have not the money to buy the goods that come into this country in exchange for the exports. A glut of goods, as we well know, means that factories shut down, more and more men are out of work, with consequent lack of purchasing power and increased burden of taxation on those who are working in order to take care of those who are unemployed. So it seems to me that we have to pay more attention to the matter of purchasing power. In these times agriculture is the industry that feels the distress most because it is least organized, consequently the prices of agricultural products drop first and are usually the last to recover. Therefore the responsibility of government at this time is to enable the farmer to get a fair return for his work, which will have the effect of bringing about an improvement in all industry.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I understand it to be the custom, when taking part in the budget debate, to refer to matters that have been alluded to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in his address, and I understand also that it is the privilege of hon. members who have some other subject much in mind to speak upon that subject. I propose to avail myself of that privilege this evening. Before doing so, however, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the manner in which he delivered his budget address. I could not help sympathizing with him as to some of the material contained in that address, though I must admit that there was some occasion for rejoicing in connection with other parts of his speech.

To-night I want to speak upon a subject to which I referred early in February, that is, the need for the amendment of our company laws. A little later in the session the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) said he thought possibly the amendments proposed in the speech from the throne would not be proceeded with this session, but at a still later date the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated that a new companies act would be brought in, and I understand that this new act has been brought in and is now upon the members' files. I want to congratulate the government, and particularly the Secretary of State, for their action in bringing down this bill this session. I have not had time to study the act as yet, but if it is as stringent as the Secretary of State suggests I am sure it will meet with the approval of this house. In his preliminary remarks the hon. gentleman said:

> The bill also contains very strict and stringent provisions with regard to the issue of prospectuses by companies or by underwriters on behalf of companies.

Later he said:

> They are so much more strict and stringent than the provisions of the provincial companies acts that if this act is adopted I think it may result in a very serious diminution in revenue for the consolidated fund, because until provincial acts are amended or modified in like manner many applicants for charters certainly will go to the provincial authorities rather than to the dominion authority.

[Mr. Spencer.]

I congratulate the Secretary of State upon this disregard for the consolidated revenue fund. I think it is very fortunate that the government has decided, regardless of the loss of revenue, to improve our companies act and make it less possible than it has been in the past for fraudulent companies to operate. The minister concluded his preliminary remarks by saying:

> —I trust this bill will receive the careful consideration of hon. members of the house before it is dealt with by the committee of the whole.

I am confident that this is precisely the reception that will be accorded this bill.

As I said just now, Mr. Speaker, early in February I referred to certain matters in connection with the promotion of companies in the Dominion of Canada during the last few years. I prefaced my remarks by saying that undoubtedly the majority of the promotions had been of a strictly honest character but that there had been many that were decidely dishonest, and that there had been dishonest promoters of companies who had defrauded the public without mercy. I then went on to speak of financiers and financial organizations that had promoted mergers and combines in Canada that were illegal in some cases and near illegal in others, that were distinctly detrimental to the interests of the public and positively disastrous to investors. I said further that these questionable and in many cases immoral ventures frequently were connected with the necessaries of life, such as bread, milk, fruit, fish, coal, textiles, pulp and paper, asbestos and cement. I omitted to say "among others" as I had intended, but I think it was clear to the house that I was not trying in the least to make grave disclosures at that time. I was not trying to inform this house of the conditions that existed, because I knew that the majority of hon. members were perhaps better informed than I was. I was trying to remind this house once again that the time was ripe for an improvement in our company laws in order to prevent a recurrence of the disastrous happenings of the past ten years in the matter of company finance. Nor was I trying to attribute blame to any government, either federal or provincial, either past or present; I was trying to draw attention to certain evils and to suggest certain remedies. The day following my speech the Prime Minister made this remark in the house:

> There are thousands of men and women in Canada to-day who have been practically ruined because of the shares they bought in various enterprises in this country during the last seven years. It is a blot upon this country's financial history.

So I had the Prime Minister with me in the opinions I expressed the previous evening. I am informed that on the following day one of the Montreal papers said, "Everybody knows these things." I did not see that statement personally, but if it be true that everyone knows these things certainly it is equally true that it is the duty of someone or some authority to do what may be possible to prevent their recurrence. It seems to me every hon. member of this house has to line himself up either with the reformers on one hand, those who believe in preventing that kind of thing in the future, or on the other hand with those who say that the law of the jungle is the right law, who believe in the survival not of the fittest but of the slickest, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) said some time ago; who believe that it is every man for himself, and his satanic majesty take the hindmost. It may appear to some hon. members that I am suggesting locking the stable after the horse has been stolen. Admittedly horses have been stolen but, to pursue the metaphor further, there are still horses in the stable and there will be others later on, so surely it is advisable now to provide the bars, the locks and padlocks that will prevent further thefts.

On reflection it seemed to me that when I spoke on February 1, I said too much or too little in regard to certain necessaries of life that had been the subject of the operation of wrongful combines and mergers. I had said that in the case of combines and mergers, monopolies or near monopolies had been created, and by practical monopoly of purchasing power the price to the producer had been forced down; by oppression of labour wages had been forced down, and the pace had been speeded up to a point almost beyond endurance; that by virtual control of output prices had been raised and the consumer had been gouged. I agree with what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said this afternoon with regard to the benefits or lack of benefits resulting from many of these mergers and combines. I am unable to see that they have benefited in any way the producer, the consumer or the investor, or that they have proved of greater benefit to labour than the smaller, independent units. The question then arises: Have they benefited anyone and, if so, whom have they benefited? They have benefited the promoter only.

First I am going to refer to milk, which was the subject of an inquiry by the agriculture and colonization committee of this house last session, when much interesting information was brought to light. I do not think I need refer to the result of that investigation, because every hon. member had the opportunity of following the proceedings of the committee from day to day, but I do want to give in brief the history of just one company, tracing it from its very inception to the present time, in order to prove that there has been an evil in connection with the formation of companies to deal with this much needed commodity.

I am going to quote from several newspaper articles to prove my point. In the Financial Times of October 15, 1926, there appeared the photograph of a certain gentleman who was described at the foot of it as the "originator of many utility and food enterprises in Canada." The article went on to say that he had just completed the purchase of National Food Milk Products Limited. Previous to this it is understood that he had been fifteen years in Alberta, during which time he had originated two large utility enterprises. Then he came to eastern Canada and "saw the possibilities for development in food product lines." He is not the only one who has seen the possibilities for development in food product lines. Unfortunately there have been too many of them.

This gentleman, having come upon a very promising little dairying industry in or near the town of Gananoque in the province of Ontario, conceived the idea of forming a company to handle this little dairy, and the National Milk Products Limited was formed.

This preliminary notice of October 15, 1926, was followed by another a week later in the Monetary Times under the title of "New Company Issues." It was stated that this new company was being floated with a new issue of $150,000 six and one-half per cent twenty year first mortgage sinking fund gold bonds.

Then we leave National Milk Products, Limited and we find in the Produce News of November 30, 1928, an announcement of the formation of another company called the Canada Dairies, Limited, which we are told was a consolidation of seven Toronto dairies.

Four months later, on March 18, 1929, we are told that Canada Dairies, Limited, has acquired the company which I first mentioned, National Milk Products, Limited. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the securities of National Milk Products were placed on the market on October 22, 1926. I should have said that at that time first mortgage bonds for $150,000 were outstanding, and $150,000 of preferred stock.

In the Financial Post of December 26, 1929, just nine months after Canada Dairies, Limited, had acquired National Milk Products, Limited, we read:

> National Milk has gone into receivership. It is not known how much the bondholders will receive.

I think, sir, it might have added: It is definitely known how much the preferred shareholders will receive—they will receive nothing.

We find that:

> National Milk was a subsidiary of Canada Dairies, Limited, but the latter company did not guarantee the $150,000 of bonds outstanding . . . and had cut loose from the Gananoque firm, leaving whatever can be got from it for the bondholders.

That is a very casual statement. What did it mean for the poor bondholders and shareholders? I am informed, and I believe credibly informed, that the people of the town of Gananoque contributed $250,000 in the purchase of the securities of this company. These people in the town and the farmers in the concessions to the north and the south, the east and the west, including probably many a poor labouring man, contributed their little quota for the purchase of a share of that company. A very casual statement—"whatever could be got was left for the bondholders."

In the Financial Times of December 16, 1930, we read that a special meeting of Canada Dairies, Limited was held to confirm, "if deemed advisable, by-law authorizing sale of assets of Canada Dairies, Limited to the Dairy Corporation of Canada, Limited."

On June 4, 1932, we read that Canada Dairies put on a customer-ownership sale, offering $50,000 six per cent first mortgage bonds to pay off old mortgages, assisted by the Dairy Corporation of Canada. The public is invited to carry this load. We read from that very article as follows:

> The original company consisted of a merger of six or seven small companies arranged by—

I shall not give the name:

> —and other associates not now associated with the business.

It is a remarkable fact that whenever these companies get into trouble, those who are responsible for their formation are found to be "not now associated with the business." They have got away with their profits, leaving the people who put up the money to bear the loss. The article goes on to say:

> About $800,000 was paid for these concerns but in the upshot a large part of the business was lost in merging and results were unsatisfactory. Those who bought about $300,000 in preferred stock have not found their investment satisfactory.

Again, a very casual way to put it! Men who have lost $300,000 would hardly regard their loss as merely unsatisfactory. Most of them would think of other words which are far more appropriate, if less polite. Who lost that $300,000? What labour does it represent? What distress does the loss of it entail?

But there is still left the Dairy Corporation of Canada, and what of it? It consists of a merger, and what do we hear of this company recently? We read that it had to be reorganized, that in 1930 the company had issued sinking fund debentures to the tune of one million dollars, which were "secured by first floating charge on all company's assets and undertakings. Company cannot mortgage, pledge, lien or charge upon the mortgaged premises," and so on. But we are informed that there was a joker in the trust indenture, that these debentures were never a first lien, that they were always "subject to the bank loans and other secured charges in the ordinary course of business." In a circular letter accompanying particulars of the new scheme of reorganization, the president of the company sententiously remarks, "The payment of this bank loan is a problem." The only comment one can make on that is: What wisdom!

One of the subsidiary companies of the Dairy Corporation of Canada was the City Dairy of Winnipeg. It may be that hon. gentlemen have recently been receiving a little magazine called Wilton's Review from Winnipeg. It contains very interesting information with regard to this company known as City Dairy. My reason for referring to these companies is that I want to point to certain evils that exist in the constitution of many of our companies to-day, and at the same time to point out possible remedies.

On February 17 of this year a meeting of the shareholders of City Dairy was held. At this meeting it was disclosed that when the shareholders bought their preferred stock only 4,500 preferred shares were authorized; that the preferred stock became entitled to voting power after one year's default; that 2,000 of these preferred shares participated with the common stock in dividends over seven per cent and up to ten per cent; that at that time there were 3,000 shares of the common stock of a par value of $100 in existence; that in 1933 all the preferred stock being in default as to dividends the holders naturally thought that they controlled 4,500 votes as against the 3,000 votes in common stock. But they were mistaken. They discovered that the 3,000 shares of common stock of the par value of $100 had been converted into 15,000 non-par shares, and thus that they had lost control.

How had this happened? In 1930 certain by-laws designed by the holders to place the common stock in a permanently dominant position were duly passed, and in course of time a petition for supplementary letters patent was filed in the office of the provincial secretary. The facts recited in the petition were apparently quite truthful and very frank. On September 27, 1930, supplementary letters patent were granted. In an article which appeared in the Financial Post of March 17, 1934, the president of the Dairy Corporation of Canada is quoted as follows:

> In 1930 the capital structure of City Dairy was changed and gave the Dairy Corporation of Canada sufficient common shares to outvote the preference shares if those preference shares assumed to vote owing to dividends being in arrears.

A scheme of rearrangement was submitted, and what happened? Those who contributed $450,000 will be absolutely at the mercy of the holders of the original 3,000 common shares, who did not pay more than $100 per share. I know that this particular case is no business of the federal government, but it illustrates what is quite common in the formation of companies. I hope this is an evil which is being dealt with in the amendments to the Companies Act.

I referred to bread, and I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) referred to the same subject this afternoon. I should like to give a few facts with regard to this commodity. In 1931, the allegation having been made that several bread companies had formed an illegal combine, an investigation was held, either by the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act or by a commissioner. During the course of his investigation the registrar found that four milling companies operating bakeries had then acquired ninety-six bakeries in Canada. They manufactured one-third of all the bread manufactured in Canada and ninety per cent of the bread manufactured in the communities in which they operated. Taking these facts in conjunction with those given this afternoon by the minister the house will see the control which could be exercised by these four milling companies operating bakeries throughout Canada. The house will realize how easy it would be for price agreements to be made by these four companies. At the conclusion of his report the registrar states:

> No conclusive evidence has been adduced to show that this combination constitutes a combine within the meaning of the Combines Investigation Act. At the same time, the predominant position of these flour milling companies in the baking industry, and the possibilities of monopoly and price enhancement which are theirs, are such as to warrant continued governmental interest in the situation, and, should the need arise, further governmental action on behalf of the consuming public.

It is quite evident that these four companies have something which very nearly approaches a monopoly of the bread business in eastern Canada. The very idea of monoply is repugnant to the free thinking people of Canada. Men who seek to control any industry are never actuated by altruistic motives but are invariably themselves controlled by a ruthless lust for power and financial gain. Have these combinations benefited the consumer in any way? Have they benefited the producer in any way? Have they benefited the labourer or have they benefited the investor? Poor's appraisal of the securities of these milk and bread companies to which I have referred is, with one exception, "speculative" or "very speculative."

I referred to coal but I do not propose to speak on that matter this evening. I understand that the decision of the court as to the existence of an illegal combine has been appealed and I shall make no further reference to the matter.

I referred to fruit also. It is within the memory of hon. members of this house that in 1926 four companies and four individuals were fined $200,000 in all because they had formed an illegal combine in fruit. Although I have not the facts, I believe there is a general impression that a similar combine exists to-day.

I mentioned fish also. I might point out that recently an inquiry was held in Manitoba into an alleged combine in connection with the fishing industry of that province. The commission found as follows:

> We have found that a combination exists between four companies and that other companies have agreed with them, to regulate and control a large proportion of the summer caught fish on lake Winnipeg.

Time will not permit my going into details with regard to this alleged combine in fish.

I referred to asbestos. I do not believe I have time to deal further with this except to say that the inquiry recently held or at present being held in the United States goes to show that the control of asbestos is almost world wide and that J. P. Morgan and Company have presumably acquired control not only of Canadian companies but of companies in Great Britain, Europe and on the north American continent. The Prime Minister, speaking recently, I believe in Toronto, referred to the asbestos situation in Quebec and the desire of the president of that company to purchase asbestos in Russia rather than in Quebec.

I do not think it is necessary for me to amplify the remarks I made on February 1 in connection with cement. In 1909 there were 11 chief producers who had been brought together at a cost of $14,822,250. Stocks and bonds to the tune of $27,134,786, or almost twice the cost of purchase, were issued. Even with this huge capitalization satisfactory dividends were paid. However, in 1927, Wood, Gundy and Company and associates purchased this company and recapitalized at $35,000,000, although it was alleged that there had not been any corresponding increase in capital assets. Despite the water in the stock satisfactory dividends were paid. But in 1923 a cloud appeared upon the horizon which seemed disastrous to this large company. The National Cement Company was incorporated, but this was a competitor not to be endured. In 1928 the National Cement Company was acquired by Alfred Rogers and associates and in 1929, a year later, Canada Cement took over National Cement. We now have practically a monopoly in cement products which are used for thousands of purposes by practically every industry in Canada. Again I ask: Has this huge monopoly benefited the consumer? Have the labourer and the investor been benefited? Poor's appraisal of this particular stock is "speculative."

I referred to pulp and paper, but as my time is going rapidly I do not think I can deal with this matter except to say that the history of the Canada Paper and Power Corporation is one of greed and mismanagement of finance. I should like to make two quotations. I made one in this house about two years ago, and the other is contained in a letter which was addressed recently by a firm of investment bankers to I believe practically every member of parliament. Mr. Taschereau is quoted as having said that in 1920 there were 100 paper mills, producing $100,000,000 a year in products, capitalized at $22,000,000, employing 31,000 employees, and paying them yearly $45,000,000. At the end of ten years there were 109 mills, producing $215,000,000 in products, but capitalized at $714,000,000. There had been an increase of 2,000 in employees but payrolls remained the same as in 1920. While production increased by 115 per cent, capitalization increased by 3,500 per cent, roughly speaking. I quote from the letter of the investment bankers as follows:

> In general, the financial and industrial leadership in Canada has differed only in degree from the depredations of the robber barons of medieval Europe, the brigands of Tartary or other ungodly countries, the Corsairs of Algeria or the pirates of Penzance.

This firm of investment bankers stated that the above was an extract from a published article by the president of a well known Canadian life insurance company. Again I ask: Did this combination benefit labour? Did it benefit the producer or the investor? If not, whom did it benefit? It benefited the promoters only.

I was going to refer to Dominion Textiles, but time will not permit.

Having dwelt for a few minutes on these mergers and combines, the operations of which have been distinctly detrimental to the interests of the people of Canada, I wish to refer now to some fraudulent company promotions through which investors have lost millions. Possibly hon. members are wondering why I did not leave these remarks until the second reading of the new Companies Act, but I wanted to speak with greater latitude than probably I should have been permitted to do had I waited until that occasion, when one would be expected to speak only on the principle of the bill. In every one of these instances I propose to point out an evil and suggest the remedy. Take the O. J. Brooks ventures, which resulted in the loss of from ten to twelve million dollars to the people of Canada. This man Brooks came to Canada in 1921 and promoted seven finance corporations and finally promoted Brooks Steam Motors Limited. He took from the people of Canada, as I say, from ten to twelve million dollars, including about $3,800,000 in Brooks Steam Motors alone. How was this accomplished? It was accomplished by the illegal use of common stock and no par shares. I had hoped to be able to deal at considerable length with this particular company but time will not permit. Suffice it to say that I will point the moral before closing my remarks. There is another company to which I wish to make some reference and that is a concern referred to in an editorial of the Free Press of Winnipeg of May 18, 1928. This was a western company owned by a famous westerner, Senator Patrick Burns, and a small group of associates. This company had a prosperous record and looked like a good thing. I have looked up the prospectus as well as the Toronto Globe of May 18, 1928, and I find that the prospectus was issued by the Dominion Securities Corporation Limited, on May 16, 1928. On May 12, 1928, this company, the Dominion Securities Corporation, had addressed a letter to the shareholders then in the concern, reading in part as follows:

We have purchased the business of P. Burns & Company Limited. There will be a rearrangement of the capital structure which will necessitate calling for redemption the 6½ per cent first mortgage bonds at 104 and accrued interest on the first of Juy next, and a formal notice of this call has already appeared in the press.

Notwithstanding this letter, dated May 12, 1928, the company issued a prospectus four days later stating:

From the letter of Mr. John Burns, to be president of the company, we summarize as follows:

The prospectus concludes thus:

These statements have been accepted by us as accurate, but are in no event to be construed as representations by us.

This prospectus makes very alluring statements to show that the earnings of the company are far more than sufficient to pay interest on all securities offered for sale. But in a letter recently issued by the Preferred Shareholders' Protective Committee some very strong statements are made, and I suggest to hon. members that they take the first opportunity of reading this communication. I am quite satisfied that they will agree that an investigation should be made into the affairs of this company and into the history of its capitalization. Again time forbids that I should deal in detail with the operations of this particular company.

Now I wish to point out briefly the lessons to be learned from these cases. National Milk Products illustrates the need of closer supervision of promotions and especially of those promoters who are so ready to "see the possibilities of development in food product lines" and in public utilities.

City Dairy Limited illustrates the evil of the "abstraction of the vote" to which I should like to refer, but I am afraid I shall be unable to do so; I hope to have the opportunity on the second reading of the Companies Act. It also teaches the evil of the no par value share.

The case of the mill owned bakeries shows that concentration of the production of any food line is detrimental to the interests of the public, and that our present concept of what constitutes an illegal combine needs some adjustment.

The case of the Dairy Corporation of Canada seems to show that there should be some official charged with the responsibility of bringing those responsible for withholding necessary information to the bar of justice; for what is the business of many people usually becomes the business of none. And trust companies who have undertaken to protect certain classes of shareholders should not be able to evade all responsibility for fulfilling the trust by employing the customary formulae but should be held responsible to those shareholders in every case in which there is a "joker" in the trust deed.

The tobacco inquiry, the fish combine in Manitoba and the asbestos case illustrate the need of a widening of the legal interpretation of what constitutes an illegal combine.

The cement case illustrates the need of a stricter control of the capitalization of mergers and so forth, and similarly the pulp and paper situation.

The textile situation suggests that the time has arrived for limitation of the earning capacity of mere money capital.

The Brooks ventures illustrate the evil of bonus stock, call it stock watering or illusory capitalization, whichever you will, and the necessity of our courts passing upon the adequacy of the consideration given for shares, when called upon to do so. There are other cases to which I wish to refer but I am afraid I shall have to postpone consideration of them.

The case of Burns and Company Limited suggests that the person or corporation issuing a prospectus should not be able to hide behind the formulae usually employed but should be held directly responsible for all statements contained therein. A casual glance over the new Companies Act shows however that provision of that kind has already been made. And all the cases combined seem to suggest the necessity of the erection of an investment board clothed with large powers of investigation and control.

There are many other matters which I should like to have dealt with but I shall speak of them when the bill is before the house.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): It is customary for members of parliament speaking on the budget to refer to the wonderful manner in which the minister of finance presents it to the country. I believe that in the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) Canada is blessed, as it has been in times past, with a man highly qualified for the office, and the way in which the hon. gentleman presented the budget now before the house was a credit not only to himself but to parliament. But in bringing down the budget he must have found himself in a very embarrassing position for more than one reason, one of the main reasons being the rash promises made on previous occasions by his party and his government, and also by reason of some of the principles and policies enunciated by outstanding members of the government when they were in opposition. These were brought forcibly to the attention of the house by the opposition financial critic, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston).

One thing in particular which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) advocated and which made a strong impression at the time was the turnover tax. It is not my intention to deal at any length with this but merely to refresh the memory of the house, pointing out how easy it is to propound new policies if not new fallacies which are very workable in opposition but difficult of application when men are in responsible positions of government. The same thing applies to the statement of the Prime Minister that if he were in power he would almost compel the insurance companies of this country to take up the national debt at a lower rate of interest than then prevailed. Several other theories were propounded by the then opposition and in each case when they have the responsibility of administering the affairs of the country, they find those theories impossible of application. I recall very vividly that time after time not only in this country but throughout the civilized world new parties, fads and fallacies come out which look well at the time but when those parties take on the responsibility of government, they also find their ideas impossible of application for the simple reason that they would be detrimental to the country as a whole.

One matter I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance is the fact that last year parliament through legislation reduced the interest rates on savings accounts by one per cent. But one thing that will strike every hon. member is the fact that if anybody wants to get a loan from any of these banks which have received special treatment from parliament, no doubt on account of the fact that savings were coming in too rapidly for the demand made on the banks because of the high rates of interest charged by them, he cannot borrow at a lower rate of interest. In my section of the country prior to last year when we wanted to borrow any money from the banks, the rate of interest was eight per cent, and this compounded at least four times a year. We find ourselves in the same situation this year. Why is it that when the reduction in the interest rate on savings accounts was granted to the banks the interest rate on loans made to their customers was not also regulated so that loans might be at a lower rate than we have to pay at the present time? If the banks are overloaded with savings deposits they can find an outlet for their money in good solid investments whether in industry or all kinds of new commercial enterprises or the refinancing of the older institutions.

I should like now to allude to something which I have already mentioned in the House of Commons: I refer to the refinancing of the Canadian National Railways. I believe the day is now at hand when that refinancing should be done so that the people, the owners of the system, may know exactly where they stand in regard to the financial structure of that great institution. We know the propaganda that has been spread against national ownership of our railways, and it is not fair, when we are discussing that all-important matter, not to mention the fact that our national railway system has been overloaded with dead timber, dead material and dead capitalization, all of which it has absolutely no right to be shouldered with the responsibility of financing at this time.

I want to mention briefly a regional aspect which greatly affects our section of the country. I have mentioned this on several occasions and I wish to repeat it. So far as the section of the Transcontinental from Quebec to Winnipeg is concerned, it has never come into its own because it has never received the attention of the present or past governments in regard to the through traffic, freight or passenger, to which it is entitled. I well remember twelve or fourteen years ago the great rejoicing we had throughout northern Quebec and northern Ontario when the first through passenger and freight service was established; I well remember the demonstration made by every section of that part of the country. But the story was much sadder when over a year ago the passenger service was entirely done away with so far as through transportation from Quebec city directly to Winnipeg was concerned. Those fine national trains, numbers one, two, three and four, without warning to our section, were entirely withdrawn, and to-day there is no possibility of travelling directly from Montreal or Quebec or the maritime provinces to Winnipeg. The situation is worse because of the fact that since those two trains were cancelled practically all the traffic is lost to the Canadian Pacific. I speak of this question with knowledge; I know the people in my section find it impossible to travel directly between Winnipeg and Quebec city. When we want to go to Winnipeg, we have to come around by North Bay. In my section where we have a population of over 100,000 I do not think since the curtailment of that passenger service five per cent of the people who go to the west travel Canadian National. That accounts somewhat for the problem facing the Canadian National and explains certain loss of revenue. Why that service was ever curtailed I have never been able to learn either from the government or from the railway board. It is possible even at the present time to reestablish that service so as to allow the Canadian National to come into its own. Everybody who is familiar with the old line of the Canadian Northern where the traffic is now routed, knows that it goes through practically a wilderness; it does not go through a settled country such as we have in northern Ontario. I say to the house, and particularly to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) so that he may use his influence, that the passenger traffic should be reestablished over the northern section of our country, if not to Cochrane through North Bay over the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, at least from Montreal to Harvey junction and from there to Winnipeg. In that case so far as the through traffic is concerned, the railway would come into its own. That section has suffered on account of lack of service and the Canadian National has suffered by losing that revenue to the Canadian Pacific without any benefit to the people.

I want to felicitate the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) on his wonderful speech, and I feel all the more at liberty to do so because it was recognized as such even by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) when he spoke this afternoon. Not only was the hon. member speaking as a financial critic but he was propounding suggestions that will help the present government if they try to implement them. People from all sections spoke well of his ability in discussing matters of such great national importance.

I want to concentrate my remarks particularly on a subject in which the whole country is interested: I refer to the gold tax. I am quite at liberty to speak on it because I do not own either directly or indirectly any stock of any mining corporation in any section of this country, and I have no interest whatever in the gold mining industry. Moreover, I can speak with an open mind on the matter because our section, when any problems, local or regional or national in character, arise, always tries to take the viewpoint of the whole of Canada. If one part of this country is affected by this tax we feel that the whole of Canada will be affected. I was astonished this afternoon when the Minister of Trade and Commerce tried, I believe, to insinuate that the protest that was made in the house against the tax was merely a local one. The gold mining industry of Canada to-day affects every citizen, and although its activities are centred in only three or four provinces, the beneficial effects are experienced throughout the whole dominion. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows well that in my section hundreds of carloads of lumber coming from British Columbia are being used every year in the Porcupine district alone. The gold mining industry affects every economic and industrial activity of our country and therefore the question is not parochial; it is one that affects every section.

Let me go further. The gold mining industry realize that they have duties towards the country as they have towards the province and the districts in which they are situated; therefore the industry is willing to bear its proper and reasonable share of federal taxation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is not here, which I regret, as I would like to have some further light on some statements he made on that matter. He said, on April 23, as reported on page 2446 of Hansard:

> The financial critic of the opposition has suggested that this tax means a discrimination against a particular industry. Well, I would point out that that is true of all our indirect taxation.

I do not see how that statement will bear the light of analysis, because we are actually singling out one industry under the present system of taxation. There are other industries, which I am going to mention later on, that have been making large profits during the past year. Take for instance Imperial Tobacco; their annual report shows they made last year a profit of about six million dollars, but we have not applied a special tax on that exorbitant profit. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre goes on to say:

> Our whole tariff schedule means that particular industries are singled out for taxation, so there is nothing new in that contention.

As far as I know, tariffs are not taxes on industry but are in fact intended to help and shelter industry. Take the oil or the textile industries: Imperial Oil, for instance, had a net profit of nearly twenty million dollars last year, but there is no proposal in the present budget to tax that particular industry, which is not being taxed by the tariff but is being sheltered and helped by artificial protection.

He goes further:

Further than that, it is suggested that it is discrimination against particular parts of the country.

As with the human body, if one section of the country suffers distress, then the whole country suffers. Although geographically we belong to central Canada, we have never taken a parochial attitude with regard to maritime rights, for instance, or the fruit growers of British Columbia or other activities of our national life. This is not a local problem; it is entirely a national problem. You cannot call the gold mining industry a local industry, because its beneficial effects are felt in every channel of our national life. Then the hon. gentleman says also:

Further it is suggested that the budget does not take into account the variations in the grades of ore and costs of production.

Doubtless the Minister of Finance in the very near future will come out with a statement corroborating what has been said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is an anomaly to put a flat tax of ten per cent on gold produced regardless of profits. I intend to show how low grade ores are being treated, and how thousands of men will be thrown out of employment if that tax is applied uniformly to all the gold mines. I believe I am right in saying that the Flin Flon is working on ores yielding an average of $2.70 per ton on which they make a clear profit of 15 cents per ton. Any hon. member can easily visualize what will happen as a result of this tax to mines operating on such low grade ore. The Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon gave us a ray of hope in suggesting that some amendment of the taxation proposals in that regard will be made. It will have to be made, otherwise the government will find very quickly that instead of being beneficial the tax will work its own destruction. It will throw out of employment a lot of men and paralyze to a large extent many sections of our country.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went on to say:

I do not believe it is common that such variations should be taken into account.

[Mr. Bradette.]

He certainly showed a very sad lack of knowledge in leading the house to believe that the gold mines are working on a definite ratio of actual gold per ton. I shall in a few minutes name mines that are working on an average gold content of $2.75 and similar figures, and others where the veins are so narrow that more rock has to be mined than ore; so that the hon. member, posing as a friend of the worker, showed a sad lack of understanding. I believe he was in the town of Timmins last year, where he would see one mine alone, the Hollinger, that employs 2,800 miners. It had a chance under the new price of gold of increasing its capacity by working lower grade ore than in previous years. Then the hon. member went on to say:

If we did fully take them into account it would be a bonusing of the marginal mines.

Well, it may surprise hon. members to know that out of 475 mines actually in operation at the present time there are about 15 on a dividend paying basis. Can you visualize, in view of that, what harm may be done by a flat taxation of ten per cent of all production? Then he went on to say:

Since this enormous gain in the value of gold is entirely a fortuitous gain—

That is a very fine word to use. Are not all gains in commerce and industry fortuitous? This afternoon another hon. member, also a labour leader, for whom I have great respect, asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce what amount of money was spent in subsidies for gold mining. I may tell the hon. member that the government of Canada has not given a single cent of subsidy to our gold mines. The government practically seized the gold produced. If it had been allowed to go for instance to the New York market the mines would have received the very same price as was paid by the government. The government simply paid the price that the gold producers would have received in the New York market.

Then the hon. member went on:

Of course, some one will say that would mean that certain mines would not be able to gain as much as they are doing to-day, that certain lower grade mines would be discriminated against, that a certain number of men would be turned out of work, and so on. I know there may be all these objections, but they apply equally in any taxation of this kind, because a good many industries have been put out of business through the very high taxation placed upon them in the purchase of the raw materials required for their products.

Again that is a statement which astonished me, because I do not know of any taxation or tariff restrictions against any raw material coming into this country. I know of no tariff for instance, on raw rubber or raw cotton coming into Canada.

Then the hon. member spoke of the nationalization of our gold mines. I wish he were here, because I was going to ask him what mines he would nationalize. Would he nationalize only the paying mines, the fifteen that are on a dividend paying basis, or every gold mine in operation at the present time?

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a single member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group in his seat at the present moment, although time and time again they have been complaining of the lack of attendance of members of the two other parties.

On motion of Mr. Bradette, the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 1, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 65, for the relief of Lucy Doris Cannon.—Mr. Pettit.

Bill No. 68, for the relief of Bertha Alice Maude Maher Burke.—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 69, for the relief of William James Thistle.—Mr. Heaps.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 72, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: I have not had an opportunity as yet to examine the bill and as it will be available to hon. members, my suggestion is that the explanation will come more properly on second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST NARROWS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) if the government has received an application for the approval of plans for the First Narrows bridge at Vancouver. This project has been endorsed by a majority of the citizens of that city and I should like to know the present status of the application.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): I might state that an application was received some time ago for approval of these plans under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Since the plans were filed representations have been received both in support of and in opposition to the proposition. Engineers are investigating and the applicants are furnishing certain information which has been asked for. Pending the completion of the report the matter is still in abeyance.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, might I mention to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that the press appears to have an account of the Dominion Elections Act. Whether or not that account is correct I cannot say but I should like the Prime Minister to indicate when we may expect to receive a copy of the bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret more than I can say the fact that a statement has appeared in the press. From what source this statement comes, I know not nor have I been able to ascertain. As soon as a draft is prepared, it is my purpose to hand a copy to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am not responsible for what appeared in the press and I deeply regret that such a statement should have been made without any authority. Extraordinary conditions during the past two days have prevented my completing what I was doing with respect to this matter but I hope by the end of the week to be able to hand a copy to the right hon. gentleman.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when we may expect to have the program of construction of public works.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): We desire to have some of the existing legislation put forward a bit before introducing this matter. The draft of the bill is prepared but the schedule is like Jonah's gourd. The right hon. gentleman will understand what I mean.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, when this was introduced it was not my intention to say anything at this stage as I was well aware that there are several hon. members of our small group here who are far better qualified than I to speak on matters pertaining to agriculture. However, the opposition to the bill has covered such wide ground and has been so inconsistent at times that I felt I should add my mite, if for no other reason than to answer some of the charges which have been levelled against us in this corner of the house. I think almost every hon. member who has spoken on the bill has stated that it is of very great importance. According to those on my right, it is important for its ill effects, while on the government side of the house it is maintained of course that it is important for its beneficial effects. As a matter of fact I believe that one member, my hon. friend from Nelson (Mr. Stitt), went so far as to say that it was revolutionary and, moreover, that he was glad to take part in this particular revolution. I appreciate that for my hon. friend from Nelson to speak about revolution is much safer than it is for me. I would suggest to him however that he be careful because if the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) hears of it he will certainly use it against him.

I am not sure whether the bill is as important as either its opponents or its friends say it is, but I am quite satisfied that it is significant. It is significant in that it shows that an appreciation of the social and economic developments of the past few years are at last percolating through the mental equipment of some people. It is significant also because it is evidently becoming—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to desist from loud conversation; it is difficult for the hon. gentleman who is speaking to make himself heard while such conversation is going on.

Mr. MacINNIS: The bill to me is significant because it is evidently becoming apparent to the advocates of rugged individualism that that very desirable virtue is rapidly leading to ragged individualism.

I favour this bill in principle. I am not saying of course that it is perfect nor that I will vote for it if it is not improved, but I will certainly vote for its second reading because I do agree with the principle. I am in favour of the principle of cooperation. For almost a quarter of a century I have belonged to the trade union movement and I understand and realize the benefits that have accrued to the working class through their association in trade unions. Unfortunately compulsion had sometimes to be used and perhaps unfortunately also there are compulsory clauses in this bill. But I believe that the farmer himself is beginning to realize the benefits of cooperation and has come to the conclusion that a certain measure of compulsion may be necessary to impress upon the more shortsighted in his own class that it is essential for them to cooperate for the welfare of all.

In my opinion the bill has become necessary for the same reason that it has become necessary to regulate traffic on city streets and even on country roads. We restrict the freedom of the individual on our streets and roads because it is necessary in the interests and for the safety of all who use the streets and roads that such restriction should be enforced.

I think it was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who pointed out when introducing the bill that the position of the farmer had changed very considerably during the last generation or so. He pointed out I believe that it was not so long ago when the farmer was producing on his own farm most of the stuff consumed by himself and his family. It was consumed on the farm. What he sold or exchanged he sold to or exchanged direct with the consumer. Now I think we must realize that the farmer's position has indeed changed considerably, particularly within the last twenty-five years. To-day he is not turning out a complete product; that is to say, he is taking some part in the production of a socially produced commodity. He is producing not for his own consumption and for the consumption of his family but for a market, and the article or commodity he is producing is not finally finished until it has reached the ultimate consumer somewhere within the four corners of the earth.

In recent years the farmer has passed through a stage comparable I think to that which the handicraft worker of other days passed through at the time of the industrial revolution. As a matter of fact he is passing through an agricultural revolution. I think it was Sir Arthur Salter who, in his book Recovery, pointed out that if there had been no financial crisis at all nor an industrial crisis there would have been an agricultural crisis. He also pointed out that the methods which the farmer followed to overcome his difficulties were different from those pursued by financial and industrial interests. He said that when the price of farm commodities fell, the farmer, in order to make up for the loss of revenue through falling prices, instead of reducing the quantity of his product going on the market increased it, with the result that there was a further fall in prices, and so on.

In my opinion the position of the farmer to-day is very close to that of his brother worker in the city. May I for a few moments try to show the similarity. Living under a system of capitalism in which, in order to live, everyone must have something to sell and not only have something to sell but also to find a buyer, the farmers and the industrial workers find themselves in very much the same position. Let us take the industrial worker first. By and large the city and town workers have nothing to sell but their ability to labour, and when they find someone to buy their labour they are said to have found a job. But note this. They have no claim to ownership in what they will produce with their labour. They sell their labour power at its market price, depending like all other commodities to some extent on the law of supply and demand; but what they produce belongs not to themselves but to the person or corporation buying their labour and paying the price therefor—wages. What they produce is left in the plant or factory when they have done their day's work.

The exploitation of the industrial worker is easy to see. I remember years ago when we used to discuss how the industrial worker and the farmer were exploited. It was easy to see that the industrial worker was exploited at the point of production, but it was not so easy to find where the farmer was exploited. He did not sell his labour direct to anyone. He was a man of property who owned land and machinery and stock of various kinds. But I think it has become more clear since that time how he is being exploited. One thing of course is clear, that he does not sell his labour direct to an employer, but turns that labour, by the use of his land, his machinery and his stock, into various commodities depending upon the particular form of agricultural production in which he is engaged. If he is a grain farmer he turns it into various kinds of grain; if he is a dairy farmer he turns it into dairy products, and if he is a fruit farmer, he turns it into various kinds of fruits. But note this: that the moment he has done that he is under the same compulsion to do what the industrial worker had to do, that is to find someone to buy his commodities. That is where his difficulties begin. He has no say in setting the price of what he has to sell and no say in setting the price of what he has to buy. He is selling in a market that, so far as he is concerned, is absolutely uncontrolled, and on the other hand he is buying in a market that is absolutely controlled. He is, as a matter of fact, selling in a market that is not only not controlled but is sometimes rigged and manipulated against him, and he is buying in a market that is not only controlled by the producers of manufactured articles but is also protected by tariffs of various kinds. So it will be readily seen that the farmer is exploited through the market.

We hear a great deal these days about confiscation and the dangers of confiscation. Let me say that the farmer is confiscated annually at the end of every year because everything except a bare living is taken away from him through the market.

I am quite satisfied that the bill in its present state is not perfect, but I suppose nothing is perfect when it is first conceived. We know that the automobile of to-day is very different from the first automobile and that the airship of to-day is very different from the first airship that was tried out by the Wright brothers. After my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) had spoken on this bill a week or so ago, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) followed and castigated us in this corner for supporting this bill. According to him we were falling into the Conservative net; I believe the simile he used was that of the spider and the fly. Well, I think the leader of the opposition ought to know something about spiders and flies because I remember in 1921 quite a number of Progressives came into this house and fell very readily into the Liberal cobweb. I do not wonder if he feared that possibly those of us in this corner of the house might fall into another web. However, he need not be afraid because we have no such intention; once bitten, twice shy, and we are quite sure we shall never fall into the net again.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We were never in it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so. But that does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that we are not going to support any good measure that comes before this house regardless of whether it is introduced by Liberals or Conservatives. So far as I am personally concerned, I made one promise and one only to the electors in my constituency, and that was that I would support any measure which I thought would be to the advantage of those I represent, and on the other hand, that I would oppose any measure which I thought would be to their disadvantage regardless of who introduced it.

The leader of the opposition pretends to be greatly concerned over the undermining of our parliamentary institutions. I think anyone who keeps his ear to the ground these days and realizes how parliaments and democratic institutions have disappeared in other countries must also have realized that they have disappeared because they failed to function to improve the conditions of the people of those countries, and if we in this house of parliament are going to waste our time in mere talk, I think the people will get tired of parliament and use some other means of making available to themselves the great wealth of this country.

May I say to the leader of the opposition that nothing could be more detrimental to the dignity and usefulness of parliament than his own opposition to every measure good, bad or indifferent that is brought before parliament. In his opposition to this bill he went back to the thirteenth century to the time of Magna Charta, and in extolling the rights and privileges conferred on the people by that great document he pointed out that they were endangered by this bill. Now, to be historically accurate, the Magna Charta did not confer any rights or privileges upon the great mass of the British people; it conferred rights and privileges upon only a certain class, upon the barons, the ruling class of that time. So far as the great mass of the people is concerned, they never had any economic rights at that time and consequently any political or legal rights for them were quite useless. The leader of the opposition is so enmeshed and so obsessed with the letter of the law that he has lost sight of the spirit of the law; he is so taken up with the question of legal justice that he is overlooking a greater and more fundamental thing, that is, social justice. He fails to realize that until we have social and economic justice, legal and political justice will be of very little benefit to us. Let me give a little information to the house in regard to the condition of the working class in Great Britain upon whom, according to the leader of the opposition, the Magna Charta conferred such great privileges and benefits. I am speaking not only of the time when Magna Charta was signed, but of conditions six hundred or more years later, or about one hundred years ago. The leader of the opposition quoted from Green's History of England; I shall quote from another book which I believe is a classic of its kind, H. de B. Gibbons' Industrial History of England. Speaking of the condition of the working class in 1834 he says:

> But then came the great continental wars and the industrial revolution; and it is a sad but significant fact that, although the total wealth of the nation vastly increased at the end of last century and the beginning of this, none of that wealth came into the hands of the labourers, but went entirely into the hands of the great landlords and new capitalist manufacturers, or was spent in the enormous expenses of foreign war.

Then he says:

> Moreover, labour was now more than ever dependent on capital, and the individual labourer was thoroughly under the heel of his employer.

Thoroughly under the heel of his employer despite the privileges of Magna Charta.

> This, it will be remembered, was the result of the system of assessment of wages under which the justices of the peace, including of course chiefly manufacturers and landowners, fixed the wages of labour for their own districts, and fixed them at so low a figure that they had nearly always to be supplemented out of the rates paid by the general public. The labourer had no redress, for all combination in the form now known as trades unions was suppressed, and his condition sank to the lowest depth of poverty and degradation.

You notice that at that time the labourers' wages and keep had to be supplemented out of the relief funds of that day, if I may use that term. The same things is happening in the Dominion of Canada at the present time, where the labourers must be sustained to some extent out of the relief funds of the municipalities, as came out before the price spread and mass buying committee a little while ago.

Now we go a little further:

What made the condition of the labourers worse still, was the fact that they could neither go from one place to another to seek work, nor could they combine in industrial partnerships for their mutual interests.

What wonderful privileges these people had, when they could not go from one place to another; if they did not like the master they had they could not go and look for another. Now they blame the workers for not going because forsooth they have more of them than they need. Adam Smith said:

We have no acts of parliament against combining to lower the price of work, but many against combining to raise it.

At another place he said:

The workmen, had, of course, no political influence; they could only show their discontent by riots and rick burnings.

So much for the privileges conferred upon the British people by Magna Charta.

Then the right hon. gentleman went further and pointed out that nearly all of the improvements that have come to the working class have come through the Liberal party. That does not agree at all with H. de B. Gibbons. At page 184 of his book he says:

These unions of workmen cried out for the restriction of non-adult labour to ten hours a day, and the Conservative party, who were chiefly interested in the land and not in the mills, supported them readily against the manufacturers, who were mainly Liberals and Radicals.

Then at page 185 he goes on to say:

It is curious to notice how these acts were passed. They all showed the steady advance of the principle of state interference with labour; a doctrine most distasteful to the old Ricardian school of economists, even when that interference was made in the interests of the physical and moral well-being, not only of the industrial classes, but of the community at large. Hence the economists of the day aided the manufacturers in opposing these acts to the utmost of their power, and the laws passed were due to the action of the Tories and landowners. Lord Shaftesbury, Fielden, Oastler, and Sadler were all Tories, though they were accused of being socialists. They were supported by the landed gentry.

We hear just the same thing to-day. Everyone who even suggests that there should be an improvement in the condition of the working masses is termed a socialist or a bolshevist or a communist right away. It does not make any difference whether he belongs to the group here or on the government side of the house.

Then we go a little further. I wish the hon. member for Weyburn were in his seat.

John Bright especially distinguished himself by his violent denunciation of the Ten Hours bill, which he characterized as "one of the worst measures ever passed in the shape of an act of the legislature."

That was before this bill was introduced, of course. John Bright was the great apostle of free trade, yet he was strongly opposed to any improvement in the condition of the working class through reduction of hours, or possibly increase of wages.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So is the hon. member for Weyburn.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so, that is why I wish he were here.

Let me give you one other instance of the privileges conferred upon the working class by Magna Charta. In 1834 there were tried, convicted and transported from England to Australia six agricultural labourers. Among them were George Loveless and James Loveless, brothers. I understand that the descendants of these two brothers are living at present somewhere in Ontario. The crime of these men was that they tried to organize the agricultural workers. George Loveless in court made this statement:

We have injured no man's reputation, character, person or property, we were uniting to preserve ourselves, our wives and children from utter degradation and starvation.

It is a long way from prosecuting people for organizing, to passing laws to compel them to organize for their own good. We certainly are moving, and I hope in the right direction. The judge in passing sentence on them said:

Not for anything you have done, or, as I can prove, that you intended to do, but for example to others, I consider it my duty to pass the sentence of seven years penal transportation across His Majesty's high seas to each and every one of you.

So much then for Magna Charta and the favours it bestowed upon the British people.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is what will happen to farmers if they do not obey this legislation.

Mr. MacINNIS: One of the terms of the charter was that:

To no man will we sell or deny or delay right or justice.

I wonder who it was that denied or delayed right and justice to these people even up to seven hundred or more years after Magna Charta was signed? The very class which at the point of the sword compelled King John to sign the charter.

In 1842, coming still further down, I find this in a report made by the children's employment committee, describing the employment of the children in the mines:

Chained, belted, harnessed like dogs in a go-cart, black, saturated with wet and more than half-naked, crawling upon their hands and feet and dragging their heavy loads behind them, they present an appearance indescribably disgusting and unnatural.

That was in 1842. I wonder who delayed right and justice to these children, and who is denying them right and justice to-day? The very successors of the barons who wrested the charter from King John at the point of the sword.

So much for the leader of the opposition. Now let me turn to something more pleasant. But before turning to that I notice that Sir Basil Blackett in a certain speech made a little time ago on the necessity of cooperation in industry, made this statement:

I know there are a great many people who quarrel with this doctrine, who hanker after the good old times. They will not believe that Queen Victoria is dead. What they say is, "if only the state would stop interfering, if it would stop doles to the unemployed, if it would stop interference with trade and commerce, if it would adopt complete free trade, then all would be well."

Then he goes on to say:

But would it?

I wish someone would take it upon himself to tell the leader of the opposition that Queen Victoria is dead.

Now let me come to something more pleasant. We are told that no matter what progress the C.C.F. may make elsewhere it will never make progress in the province of Quebec. It was my pleasure to have translated, because unfortunately I could not understand the hon. gentleman when he was speaking in his own language—

Mr. DUPUIS: Who was that?

Mr. MacINNIS: Just a moment and I will give the name. It was my pleasure to have his speech translated before the translation appeared in yesterday's Hansard. I am referring to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), who spoke on April 24, and who had this to say:

The present bill under consideration is one of the most progressive measures ever submitted to the parliament of Canada, and that is what gives it such importance, because by this legislation we are resolutely resorting to regulated economy, particularly in connection with natural products.

That is not exactly the C.C.F. program but it is getting fairly close to it. I have not the pleasure of the acquaintance of the hon. member, but I congratulate him on his advancement. Let me read the first part of our manifesto, which was adopted at Regina last year:

Planning

The establishment of a planned, socialized, economic order, to make possible the most efficient development of the national resources and the most equitable distribution of the national income.

Then the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency went on to say:

For too long a time—we are aware of this, to-day, more than ever—the state has neglected to carry out one of its primary functions: to regulate the economic activities of the nation, not in the interest or for the benefit of the private individual or group of persons, but in the interest of the collectivity or community.

Then he goes on to say:

Indeed, it is not sufficient to have discovered new methods of wealth production, the means of specially putting such production in circulation and distributing it must be resorted to.

And one other sentence:

The duty of the state is to regulate the purchasing and marketing of natural products so that those who are short may purchase them from those who already have too much.

But why confine it to natural products? Let me quote again from the Regina manifesto, to show how close we are together.

An hon. MEMBER: The last one?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, we have only one. The Liberal party have several. When I hear them talking about Liberal policies and principles I wonder which party they really mean, whether they mean Taschereau's policies and principles in Quebec, Pattullo's in British Columbia, Gerry McGeer's, or Mr. King's in this house. There are several others as well, notably those of the hon. member for Weyburn and the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). I heard that hon. gentleman say the other day, while talking about Liberal policies and principles, that Laurier cured the depression in 1896 by opening up the western provinces. The hon. gentleman forgets that there are no more new western provinces to be opened up, and that if Laurier were back here he would find himself in the same difficulty in which the present leader of the Liberal party finds himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read briefly from the Regina program, to show how closely the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency approaches it in principle.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that hon. member ready to pass the third degree of the C.C.F.?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know; you will have to ask him, but it makes no difference whether or not he is willing. The difference between those in this corner and those to my right is this: We do not care who improves conditions or who brings in the new social order, so long as it is brought in, while hon. gentlemen to my right want to bring it in themselves.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, they want to sit still and just let it happen.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps they want to sit still and prevent it from happening. I read from the manifesto:

> It is now certain that in every industrial country, some form of planning will replace the disintegrating capitalist system. The C.C.F. will provide that in Canada the planning shall be done, not by a small group of capitalist magnates in their own interests, but by public servants, acting in the public interest and responsible to the people as a whole.

So far as this bill represents that point of view we are in favour of it. In conclusion let me say that we are certainly and definitely reaching the stage in human society where cooperation will have to displace competition. Yesterday I heard someone on the other side of the house speak of the necessity of international cooperation, but we can never have international cooperation so long as we have competition at home. Cooperation, like charity, should begin at home.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at great length, at this stage of the discussion, on the present bill. To my mind, the details of the bill should be discussed in committee of the whole house. However, owing to the systematic opposition to the principle of the bill by hon. members opposite—especially, I regret to state, by the Quebec members—

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Especially!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): —I deem it my duty, as a representative of a rural county to express, briefly, what I think are the views of my constituents.

I frankly state, sir, that I cannot imagine what purpose hon. members of the opposition have in view, especially those from Quebec, in prolonging the debate on the second reading of this bill—

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): So much the better!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): —because, of all the provinces, Quebec is, in my opinion, the one which requires the most a measure of this kind, the spirit of cooperation being apparently, less developed than elsewhere. What is the first object of this bill? It is to grant the farming class better regulations for its products and marketing.

This is my interpretation of the bill.

The second object is to reduce the spread between the prices paid to producers and those paid by consumers.

The third object is to furnish the farming class with the necessary mechanism to attain such a purpose.

If we wish, sir, to attain these three objects, why so much discussion, why this obstruction for the last ten days, by members of the opposition, especially by those of Quebec? A number of members opposite hailing from other provinces, while criticizing the bill, have found some good points in it. They admitted, that, even granting the bill not to be perfect —no one, heretofore, made such a claim—the object, at least, was a good one.

I closely followed all the speeches made, in this respect, by hon. members from Quebec and, unless one of them spoke in my absence, I regret to note that not one of them had a good word to say for this bill.

As I stated a moment ago, this bill is, perhaps, not perfect; the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) made such a statement when introducing it. Moreover, as nothing is perfect on earth, it would be futile to contend that this bill is perfect. However, the government and the hon. Minister of Agriculture, in particular, are willing to accept any constructive suggestion which the opposition may make to improve it. This bill was drafted by the hon. Minister of Agriculture—who, indeed, is well posted on agricultural questions, our friends opposite, on various occasions, have praised him for his attainments in that connection—after consulting with the various farming associations of this country, growers of fruit, potatoes and other products of the farm, associations which represent the elite of our farmers, with the cooperation also of all the officials of his department, experts in agricultural matters, who were not appointed by the hon. minister, but were in the department, long before he took it over, 10, 20 and 25 years before. The hon. Minister of Agriculture devoted more than six months of his time in drafting and improving this bill. Notwithstanding all this, is it not most astonishing that our friends opposite contend, in the house and throughout the country, that this bill contains nothing worth while.

Unless, sir, hon. members opposite are prepared to state in the house that the Minister of Agriculture and those who draughted this bill deliberately intended to harm, ruin and enslave the farming class, no one will believe, in Quebec or elsewhere, that such a group of experts and agriculturists could have laboured so long to prepare this bill and reach practically no result.

May I recall to hon. members opposite that this scheme is not a new one. Farmers have been requesting a measure of this kind, not only since a month, six months, a year or three years but for ten, fifteen and twenty years past. For a number of years the farmers have been asking the government for some measure which will permit them to market profitably their products and receive a better price proportionately to the price paid by the consumer.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): More promises!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): That is the object of this bill. If we are to judge, not by the speeches of hon. members opposite, but by the requests of farmers, producers and experts from every province, even those from Quebec, in fact all who are experts in the matter entertain great hopes in the results which this measure will bring about. A large number of farmers and producers do not share the views of our friends opposite and think that such a bill is necessary, that it will help to regulate the price and enhance the output of farm products.

I do not intend to delay the house nor do I intend to quote excerpts from statements made by hon. members opposite. May I simply refer to the last speeches delivered last Thursday by two members from Quebec: the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) and the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville (Mr. Rheaume). The hon. member for St. Henri, in the course of his remarks, asserted that this bill would not improve farm products or their grading.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): He did not grasp the purport of the bill.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Is there a member in the house who can contend that this bill embodies any provision which might prevent the improvement of farm products? Is there any provision of this bill which affects the grading of products? Notwithstanding the intellectual gifts and legal science of my hon. friend from St. Henri, the elite of the farming class of my province, who approve this bill are in the following situation: A gentleman who has lived all his life in the city, a lawyer, no matter how eminent he may be, states in the House of Commons: Farmers of the province of Quebec and Canada, you do not know what you require, you do not know what will improve your lot; I, as a Montreal lawyer, do not hesitate to make this statement. I have no intention to hurt the feelings of anybody in saying this, because were I to give any advice to lawyers who sit in this house, they could rightly retort that I am not well informed. But such is the situation; our agricultural experts hear of a lawyer who states in this house: Gentlemen, you do not know what you require, and it is I, a Montreal lawyer, who tells you so; the bill that you have loudly insisted on for ten or fifteen years, will not improve your lot, it will be detrimental to farming.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): According to this, if you discuss universities, you should be a member of a university!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): If the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) wishes to discuss the university question in the house we can again do so.

Another member, sir—I mentioned his name just now and I am pleased to see him in his seat—the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville, delivered a speech on Thursday last. He made many statements. He should be acquainted with the farming question, and I think he is. The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville, although not a farmer himself, is continuously in touch with farmers, he must be acquainted with their requirements. To my mind, the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville, in making the comments which are to be found in his speech, proves that he takes no interest in his constituents.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): His mistake.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Very sad.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville stated that farmers had been deprived of their markets, that markets had to be found. The hon. member gave facts. He even pointed out that the farmers owing to the Fordney-McCumber tariff had been deprived of the United States market, our farmers' best market.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I said no such thing, it is Mr. McLean, of Toronto, a good Tory, who makes the statement.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): And the hon. member repeated it.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Yes, I did.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): And it is a fact.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Then, you both said so.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Will the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville, admit to his constituents that the Fordney-McCumber tariff was put into force when the right hon. Mr. Mackenzie King was in office? Will the hon. member explain to his constituents that, under the King regime, the United States increased their tariff on farm products from 100 to 200 per cent?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Tories were in power in the U.S.!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Will the hon. member remind his constituents, that the then government under the present leader of the opposition, did not protest or even endeavour to remedy the situation? It is a fact that our farmers were deprived of the United States market, I agree on this point with the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville. Only, they did not lose it under this government, they lost it under the government of which he was a follower, in 1922 and in 1929-30. Why make such statements, when all are aware, farmers like others, of what transpired in connection with the United States tariff?

The hon. member made numerous statements which I do not intend to discuss.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): He stated a fact.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Some of his statements were facts, while a large number of them were purely imaginary or conjectural. When one resorts to conjectures, any statement may be made.

The best argument in favour of this bill would be for the farmers of Quebec and Canada, to read, if it were possible, all the speeches delivered by hon. members of the opposition, especially those of Quebec, in this respect.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): There would be no more Tories, after that!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Not one of them found anything worth while in the bill. They made all manner of conjectures; that this bill would restrict exports and paralyse trade. They imagined numerous things which are not mentioned in the bill and that no one in good faith can find there. I could imagine that my hon. friend from Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Lafleche) would send some one to murder me when I am through with my speech.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): There is no danger!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I might fancy so, but this does not mean that the hon. member has any such intention. When certain members attribute such thoughts to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who worked so hard and did his best to find a remedy for the ills of the farming class, I state it is impossible to believe they are sincere.

One reason only could have influenced the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville to put forth such arguments. He probably thought that St. Johns-Iberville is so strongly liberal that he could say what he pleased.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Deny anything which I stated in my speech, I am expecting it.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): The hon. member's speech from the beginning to the end contains only conjectures. I have just quoted a case which he cannot deny, and the rest of his speech is the same. I may say to the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville that it is, perhaps, not wise to be too confident. Even if the people of St. Johns-Iberville are strongly liberal, I feel certain that a large number are intelligent, and I shall remind the hon. member that, on a previous occasion, his constituents repudiated him.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): When?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Would the hon. member wish me to remind him of the occasion?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. DUPUUIS (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I can read to the hon. member, if he so desires—I do not intend to do so unless he insists—I can read letters to him written by citizens of his constituency and who disapprove his attitude in the house.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): From Tories (bleus) like you!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): From good Liberals (rouges)! Does the hon. member insist?

Mr. LACRIOX: The hon. member is not discussing the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not interrupt in this way.

Mr. LACROIX: But he is not speaking about the bill, at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: I repeat, the hon. member should not interrupt in this way.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Does the hon. member desire that I should read this letter?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I am entirely indifferent.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I shall not insist. I only wish to point out to the hon. member that there are intelligent people in his county and some are dissatisfied with him.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I have never looked upon my constituents as idiots, the proof that they are intelligent is that they voted against your program and put no faith in your promises.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member wishes to address the house he may do so, in turn. The hon. member now speaking is trying to be heard.

Mr. RHEAUME: The hon. member asked me a question, that is all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions should be asked through the Speaker and not addressed directly to hon. members.

Mr. GOBEIL: I am quite satisfied.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): All hon. members will recall that on a previous occasion, the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville stated, when the militia estimates were discussed in the house, that the military school in St. Johns was a disgrace to his county, military men did not behave as respectable persons and were lazy people.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is speaking about the soldiers at St. Johns, and I do not know what connection such reference could have to the marketing bill. His speech should be relevant to the matter before the house.

Mr. GOBEIL: Speaking to the point of order may I say that I asked the hon. member if he were satisfied that I should read the letter, and he said yes. If he does not wish me to read it I shall not do so.

Mr. POULIOT: It could be read only with unanimous consent, and I strongly object to it. If he has something else to say about the bill, let him say it.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the letter or communication is not in order, it should not be read, whether hon. members do or do not object.

Mr. GOBEIL: I am not at all anxious to read it, because I do not wish to be unfair.

(Translation): I do not wish to be harsh towards my hon. friend, he has always been gracious with me, in the past and on various occasions, I do not wish to cause him unpleasantness; however, I know that these letters would interest greatly hon. members of this house. I shall read them on another occasion.

There is perhaps another reason why the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville should be cautious in his statements, notwithstanding the fact that there are intelligent people in his county. At the next Liberal convention, called for the purpose of choosing a candidate for the dominion election in the counties of St. Johns-Iberville and Laprairie-Napierville, one of the two members who represent these counties will have to sit between two chairs; and, as the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville is an excellent lawyer and a clever politician, I would advise my hon. friend for St. Johns-Iberville to be cautious and keep an eye on his constituents.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): The hon. member may permit me to tell him that he need not worry about us.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I am not worrying. Now, sir, hon. members opposite as well as their leader contended that this bill would restrict trade and especially export trade. Again, I wonder where in this bill can any intelligent member find a provision which restricts local or export trade. All agree that, in these hard times, we must regulate and control trade and especially our export trade. With your permission, sir, I shall acquaint the house with an incident which has come to my personal notice. While in Montreal, last autumn, I called at the office of an exporter who made some comments on live stock exports to the British market. To my amazement, this gentleman informed me that he had exported, that autumn, a few hundred—I cannot state the exact number—milch cows, not thoroughbred but crossed. He told me that a number of them had been sold for more than $100 each—more than £20 sterling. After having given me this information, he added: Unfortunately, it is most probable that we shall lose that market because certain dealers have shipped to the British market cows that were milch cows only by name. Unless we immediately take the necessary steps to empower the Minister of Agriculture to prohibit the exportation of such cattle on a market which, in the future, is to absorb our surplus of milch cows, that market will be completely closed to us. Is that not a fact which should impress every one of us? Is this not a situation where the Minister of Agriculture and the government should intervene, if we wish to safeguard the advantages we possess on the British market?

Similar situations exist in other activities in our cattle trade; such as fattened steers and chilled meats. This same exporter further informed me that, in the course of the year 1933, many thousand carcasses of beef should never have been exported to the British market because of their inferior quality. In his opinion, these exports are the cause of considerable harm to our trade. This bill aims at remedying this evil. The hon. Minister of Agriculture wishes to help the farming class and this bill embodies the means that farm experts and experienced farmers have suggested to him so as to meet this contingency. This bill will give producers the necessary means to export their products.

A number of members, including the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville, have stated that this bill would create new crimes. That is terrible! Amazing! But, sir, who is responsible for such criminal offences? What authority orders, for instance, that a man may not purchase a bottle of liquor illicitly without being fined or imprisoned.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): It is parliament.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Is it not the provincial legislature or dominion parliament? That is what will happen in this case. Parliament will decide. Parliament will delegate —no, I am wrong—it delegates its powers to no one, but it decrees that all violations to this act will constitute a criminal offence. The courts of this country, as in any other criminal cases, must decide whether the accused is guilty or not. I am not permitted, nor is any other member of this hon. house, to disrobe on Wellington street, in front of parliament, because the law forbids it.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): It would not be proper!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): It is not proper because parliament has so decreed. I also wish to tell my hon. friends that it is also the reason why the Doukhobors, in the west, were imprisoned. It is likewise proper that the provincial government should decree that any one found in possession of a bottle of liquor which has not been purchased from the commission, will be prosecuted and fined or imprisoned. I wonder who, in this country, is authorized to decree that any violation of an act sanctioned by parliament constitutes a criminal offence; I also wonder whether the intelligent citizen of my province will take stock in such an argument.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Are there any beneficial provisions in this bill? Let us hear of them!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) heard me state at the outset of my speech that I had no intention to discuss the details of this bill. Had my hon. friends opposite been wiser, it would have been better for them to follow such a policy. If they had waited until this bill was before the committee of the whole house to discuss its provisions, it would have avoided the discussion of all these imaginary things which exist only in their mind, will never be put into practice and which the hon. Minister of Agriculture never had in mind.

One more point and I shall close my remarks. We were faced, these last days, with a most sensational statement. When this bill was introduced in the house, almost every province had enacted a measure authorizing these provinces to give effect to this bill. Quebec also authorized such an act. A day or two after the prorogation of the provincial session, the newspapers—I have one of them here—published a statement made by the hon. Prime Minister of Quebec, to the effect that two measures—I shall only refer to this one—

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Are you referring to "Le Devoir."

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): This one is "Le Canada." The hon. member will not impugn the truth of this news item.

I do not intend, sir, to engage in a controversy with the hon. Prime Minister of Quebec so as to find out whether this act is or not ultra vires, because there are, on this side of the house, members who are better qualified than I am to discuss the matter.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): It is an easy matter.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): However, as an ordinary citizen, not being highly gifted, I read this bill over a number of times. I had the opportunity to discuss it with the hon. Minister of Agriculture and I may frankly state that no citizen of my province will find anything which might affect provincial rights. If I am not mistaken, international and interprovincial trade are the prerogatives of the Dominion government. The government by this bill has no intention to interfere with personal or provincial liberty. This bill is but a tool afforded to the farmers, the rural class so as to better regulate the marketing of their natural products. However, sir, without entering into the question in order to find out whether this bill may affect some provincial rights, I wish to state to hon. members of Quebec that I shall have no scruple in voting in favour of it. There is no proof whatever that provincial rights are threatened. This bill is intended to protect the interests and liberty of the people of this country and I have no hesitation in approving of it. A number of members opposite, in the course of the present session and in the past have suggested that the British North America Act be amended. Why? Because like all earthly things it is not perfect. Would it not be for the same reason that the hon. Minister of Agriculture had no hesitation in stating that this bill was perhaps not perfect, because it was the work of man? I may point out to hon. members of the opposition, to those of Quebec, that a government that has been guilty, I may even say of the crime of allowing the alienation of our forests, as it happened at the last session of the Quebec legislature, that a government who have committed such an act have no right to raise a question like the present one. You may not be aware, sir, that in Quebec, at the last session, the Liberal government which also has the support of our hon. friends opposite, allowed the rights of timber cut to be mortgaged under licence for an amount of almost $500,000,000, with the privilege of increasing this amount to an unlimited figure.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Order! Order!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): It is the public domain, the property of the citizens of my province. No one will contend, no one will endeavour to make us believe that the timber cut rights can be mortgaged without mortgaging the land, because the tree takes root and draws its life from the soil. The provincial domain which is owned by the people of my province has been mortgaged. If again, by this mortgage of the Quebec national domain, the lumber industry had been saved, if this mortgage had only been given after the watered-stock had been withdrawn from the capital of the Quebec pulp mills, perhaps I would have kept silent and said: To save this industry I sacrificed something. But such is not the case. The soil of my province has been mortgaged, the timber lands of Quebec were sold for the sum of $500,000,000 when the actual value of all these mills in this industry does not amount to $150,000,000. After such an act it does not behoove the Prime Minister of Quebec to criticize this government for introducing this measure which has been requested by the farmers for the last fifteen years and from which everybody entertain great hopes. I do not contend that this bill will be an infallible remedy which will cure all ills from which suffer the farming class, that it will raise the price of butter, cheese and eggs from 50 to 75 per cent. I earnestly believe that the proposed act will prevent the repetition of what took place in the past and the sad state of affairs we witness to-day. In the course of last winter, I stated that butter was dear enough, and even I may have said that it was too dear. Some one interjected that I would not make that statement in my county. I replied: Yes, I would. I shall repeat it at any time. And I have already done so. Do hon. members think that it pleases the farmer that butter should sell at 30 cents per pound in February when he produces none, and that it should sell 17 or 18 cents when he produces some? Is there a member in the house who will contend, with facts to support his contention, that there is a reason for butter prices to drop from 29 or 30 cents to 21 cents, in the space of a few days, as in this present case? The object of bill No. 51 is exactly to prevent such fluctuation—

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Another sop!

Mr. GOBEIL: —which should not exist in the prices of farm products.

We exported, in the course of last autumn, from three to four million pounds of butter. We imported, during the winter three or four million pounds, because we were short of this quantity. Would it not have been more profitable for the farmers to have stored three or four million pounds of butter in the course of the summer so as to market it during winter? I do not know whether this bill will have that result; however, such is its purpose for all farm products, that is why all fruit growers from provinces where fruit is grown have approved of this bill. That is also why the "Union catholique des cultivateurs de la province de Quebec," which represents the elite of our population and which has as its president a Quebec man, who is very highly rated as an agricultural scientist, Mr. Albert Rioux, has approved this bill. It was also approved by a number of other associations and farming groups in a large number of municipalities. Within the last two weeks, 25 to 30 farmers of my constituency have written to me as follows: For heaven's sake see that this bill is enacted, endeavour to have this measure put through, as we have been asking for such a measure for the last ten years and it is much needed.

I only intended to speak for a few minutes and I find that I spoke much longer than I expected. For all the reasons given, I shall vote in favour of the bill, and if it were possible I would vote twice for it.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great patience to the speech of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), the hon. prophet of Compton.

Mr. GOBEIL: Never mind about titles.

Mr. POULIOT: I have listened also to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis). It is interesting to note that an answer to the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Quebec has been given during this debate by hon. members in the far corner. During last summer members of the Tory party were saying throughout Quebec that there were only two parties, the Tory party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We now see the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation kissing the Tory party. They do not seem to be ashamed to kiss each other.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad to hear "hear, hear." That is the best answer which could be made to their speeches of last year. The hon. member for Compton referred to the constituency of St. Johns-Iberville but he seems to have forgotten that last session the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville (Mr. Rheaume) and myself invited him and the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre) to attend a meeting which was to be held in the beautiful city of Iberville. But neither of them showed up at the meeting. If they like these people so much why did they not come to address them on that occasion? The hon. member for Compton says that he speaks on behalf of the population of Quebec. How can he do that when he is so close to the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan), the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) and other members of the Ku Klux Klan. It is pretty hard for the hon. member to speak on behalf of the province of Quebec when he is associated in the House of Commons with members of the Ku Klux Klan.

Mr. GOBEIL: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I object to the remark made by the hon. member. I think I am a good friend of every hon. member of this house but the hon. member has insinuated that there is something wrong about it, something of which a man should be ashamed. I think he has made a reflection upon certain hon. members of the house which should not be tolerated.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, I do not think it is a reflection. I hope the time taken up in discussing the point of order will not be included in my time allowance.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member to whom the reference was made objects to the statement that he was associated with members of the Ku Klux Klan. He says he was not, and I think it was hardly a fair remark to make.

Mr. POULIOT: All right, Mr. Speaker. If you say it is unfair, I withdraw it. I always comply with the rulings of the chair and I will immediately withdraw the remark and say that the hon. member for Compton is so close to Long Lake and Regina that he cannot speak any more on behalf of the farmers of Quebec. That is my statement and it is perfectly in order. Now, the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) said the other day that he was ready to cooperate even with Beelzebub if Beelzebub was able to do something good. Well, politics makes strange bedfellows and we know that the hon. gentleman spoke that way jocularly. But the headquarters of Beelzebub is a place from which no one comes, and if one has to cooperate with Beelzebub it will be from long distance.

Mr. DUPUIS: Long Lake.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. One reason I object to this bill is that it contains no sort of policy; it is just a scheme. In the bill the word scheme is repeated over and over again. Therefore what have we? Have we a government of statesmen? No, sir. Are they even politicians? No, sir. They are just schemers, because the bill which has been introduced to save the farmers is just a scheme. It is a scheme which we are told will work this way and that way and the hon. member for Compton will find it just as good as the wild strawberry jam which his brother sells to the Canadian National Railways in such quantities.

Mr. GOBEIL: That is pretty small.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but it is a small jar. He likes this bill just as much as he does that jam, but the farmers in that constituency have no opportunity to sell such huge quantities of jam to the Canadian National Railways and other companies, and I can tell him that they will not have such a sweet mind with regard to this bill.

Mr. GOBEIL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I object to the remarks made by the hon. member and I want to make a declaration to the house. I have been, I think—and I put myself in the judgment of the house—very patient with the hon. member, but I want to say to the house that I do not feel belittled at all because one of my brothers takes advantage of the fruit which providence has put at the disposal of the citizens of our province. I feel very much less belittled—in fact, not belittled at all—to see one of my brothers in that business than if one of them were in Mexico in gaol.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know what the hon. member means. I have no relation in gaol in Mexico, but I would suggest to the hon. member that he be patient. If it hurts him, it will hurt him a lot, and if he is proud of the jam his brother sells in such a quantity, and the government refuses to inform the house, when so many employees are dismissed because it is complained that the Canadian National Railways have no money —well, the hon. gentleman should be ashamed of himself; he should be ashamed of himself to give such opportunities to his brother when he does not give the same opportunity to the electors in his constituency. The hon. gentleman should not make unwarranted statements about anyone. He said that the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman might confine himself to the bill before the house instead of indulging in personalities.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege myself. The hon. gentleman says I have a brother in gaol in Mexico. I want him to withdraw that.

Mr. GOBEIL: I never said such a thing. I said I am much more honoured to have one of my brothers in that line of business —and by the way, may I tell the house that the business of my brother has been done without my interference in any way, shape or form, and the quantity he has sold is very limited. He is simply selling what he was asked because they had a demand for it. Coming to what my hon. friend has said, I did not say one of his brothers was in gaol in Mexico; I said I feel much more honoured to have one of my brothers in that line of business than if he was in gaol in Mexico.

Mr. POULIOT: I want him to withdraw completely what he said. If he does not refer to any relation of mine I have no objection, but if he meant any relation of mine I want him to withdraw the remark at once.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Stirling): I suggest to both hon. gentlemen that they leave their mutual relations alone and speak to the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like the hon. gentleman to withdraw what he has said. I am sorry that the chair is giving a judgment of Solomon, because I think that Solomon would have rendered a different judgment if the matter had been submitted to him. Sir, the time at my disposal is very short. Let me say this to the hon. member for Compton. He will not be a member of this house after the next election; he may be sure of that; and when he casts aspersions on anyone I am glad he is well known throughout the country.

Now let us take the trade of Canada. Let us take our exports to Australia and the other dominions in the years 1930 to 1933 inclusive, and observe the decline in trade in each of those years. Here are the comparative figures: Our exports to Australia in 1930 amounted to $16,334,963. In 1931, after the Prime Minister had met Mr Thomas and indicated his views of Canadian isolation, that trade declined to $6,795,442. In 1932 our exports to Australia amounted to $5,390,008 and in 1933 it was $7,319,193. Our exports to New Zealand in 1930 amounted to $19,187,803; 1931, $12,710,326; in 1932, $3,728,500; and in 1933, $3,611,196. Our exports to South Africa for the years 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933 were respectively, in round figures: $10,919,321; $10,228,248; $8,401,876; $4,005,983. Our exports to the Irish Free State amounted in 1930 to $2,712,218. In 1931 and 1932 it was practically the same, and in 1933, after the Ottawa agreements, it was $2,249,044. Our exports to British East Africa amounted in 1930 to $1,707,167. By 1933 it had dwindled to $409,347. Our exports to British India amounted in 1930 to $9,116,711; in 1931, $6,957,536; in 1932, $3,043,431; and in 1933, $2,417,070. Our exports to Newfoundland amounted in 1930 to $12,650,967. In 1931 they were $11,061,777; in 1932 they were $6,900,539; and in 1933, $5,852,278.

We were told that the Ottawa agreements were wonderful. What are the figures of Canadian exports to the United Kingdom?

1932	174,962,824
1933	185,133,197

That means that in 1933 we exported $98,000,000 less than in 1930, the last year the King government was in power. Then here are some figures of Canadian exports to the British Empire:

1930	$381,000,000
1931	295,000,000
1932	220,000,000
1933	223,000,000

That means that in 1933 Canadian exports to the British Empire were $158,000,000 less than in 1930.

With regard to butter and cheese, at page 1590 of Hansard, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) said on March 16:

Mr. Weir (Melfort): Did the hon. member say I stated this afternoon that the United Kingdom was the best market for our dairy products?

Mr. Parent: I understood the minister to say that.

Mr. Weir (Melfort): I did not say it.

Mr. Parent: I accept the minister's statement.

Mr. Pouliot: Therefore the Ottawa agreements are of no use.

In the Daily Bulletin issued by the bureau of statistics for March 29 we read that in the first two months of the year Canada stood in the thirteenth place among dairy producing countries exporting to Great Britain. New Zealand stood first with 3,000,000 pounds of exports, and Canada thirteenth with only 43,000 pounds. Moreover, in February of this year Canada was importing butter in large quantities, 420,000 pounds from Great Britain and 681 pounds from the United States.

Here are some particularly interesting facts about the tobacco business: On March 18, 1932, the Imperial Tobacco Company of Canada wrote to its customers:

The 1931 crop is said to be the best that has been grown in Canada so far, and for this reason we purchased supplies beyond our requirements. It will therefore naturally follow that our purchases from the 1932 crop will most likely have to be curtailed.

Here is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said on October 12, 1932, about the tobacco industry in this country:

Canada's potential production of Bright flue-cured tobacco for five years may be conservatively estimated at 50 per cent increase, and within ten years at 100 per cent increase.

That was on October 12, 1932. He went on:

The extension of the present margin of preference for another ten years will enable Canadian producers and exporters to plan production and business relationships for at least this period. This will particularly affect the large producers of Bright flue-cured tobacco in the Norfolk district, who have been taking such at active part in introducing this type of tobacco on the English market.

That was the language of the Prime Minister. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) said on October 27, 1932:

The British market consumes annually 230,000,000 pounds of which 200,000,000 pounds have heretofore been imported from the United States. With this twenty-five per cent preference made permanent for ten years the Canadian tobacco growers anticipate that they will enlarge their market and that within a few years the exports of raw leaf tobacco from Canada to the United Kingdom, instead of being eight, nine or ten million pounds, will be at least 100,000,000 pounds a year.

While the Prime Minister was blowing the horn the hon. member for South Essex was playing the same tune on his bagpipes, and this is what happened. In England they have a system of quotas. Wide publicity was given to the statement of the Prime Minister and to the promise that our tobacco growers would have a large market in England, which was repeated by people like my hon. friend from South Essex, with the kind permission of the comptroller of His Majesty's stationery office and His Majesty's customs and excise, a statement was issued by Frank Watson and Company, Limited, and published in London on February 12, 1934 The statement says that there are several countries which are shipping tobacco to England and that now England has stocks on hand of Canadian tobacco for two years and three months hence. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, that for over two years and three months there will be no English market for Canadian tobacco, due to the exploitation of what was said by the Prime Minister of this country and the hon. member for South Essex and other people.

We very often see a picture in the paper of the Hon. Howard Ferguson. His name was mentioned in the press on March 1 last, April 11 and on April 20. Here is a letter that was written by John H. English, Canadian government trade commissioner, March 6, 1934, from Trafalgar Square, London:

Chemicals, Gelatine, Boxes, Etc.

We are in receipt of your letter of 21st ultimo regarding your desire to be placed in touch with United Kingdom manufacturers of the various articles which you enumerate.

While otherwise we should have been glad to render you assistance, we would explain that all matters pertaining to the development of United Kingdom export trade to Canada, are, according to an arrangement made between the two governments, dealt with by the Department of Overseas Trade of the British government, 35 Old Queen street, London, S.W. 1, who in that connection maintain a service of five trade commissioners resident in the dominion.

Under these circumstances the work of this office is practically restricted to the development of Canadian export trade to this country, and we do not possess facilities for handling inquiries relating to import trade into Canada. We have, consequently, passed your inquiry on to the comptroller general of the Department of Overseas Trade, and you may expect to hear from him shortly, either direct, or through H.M. Trade Commissioner for Canada, Mr. F. W. Field, 1111 Beaver Hall Hill, Montreal.

Mr. Ferguson's idea is that the Ottawa agreements should work only one way. He is ready to promote Canadian exports to England, but according to the letter I have just read, it is the wish of Canada's High Commissioner to have Canadian imports from Great Britain curtailed. That is the tenor of the whole letter. The information that was sent by Mr. English to this correspondent was so useless that he had to communicate with the American office in order to get the information he required. To sum up, if we take the twenty items mentioned by the Prime Minister in his speech of October 12, 1932, we see, comparing the exports of 1933 with those of 1930 that we have an increase of $11,504,000 compared with a loss of $309,991,660.

Now, sir, I have something else that I would like to put on record, a statement of the total external trade of Canada according to the annual reports of the Department of National Revenue for the years 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933:

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Total External Trade of Canada

1930	$2,393,211,652
1931	1,723,640,743
1932	1,166,069,421
1933	887,097,541

Or in 1933 about one-third of what it was in 1930.

	Imports	Exports
1930	$1,248,273,582	$1,144,930,070
1931	906,612,695	817,028,048
1932	578,503,904	587,565,517
1933	406,383,744	480,713,797

Total Duty Collected

1930	$199,011,628
1931	149,250,992
1932	113,997,851
1933	77,271,964

On the other hand excise taxes had to be increased in order to compensate in a measure for the loss in revenue due to the loss of trade.

Foreign Trade

United States	$536,688,181	$148,529,831
France	16,693,560	12,781,753
Germany	25,468,414	8,132,635
Japan	30,482,483	10,336,216
Belgium	21,804,282	14,532,198
Italy	11,391,046	4,133,484
China	16,548,959	7,698,572
Argentina	19,206,877	2,509,856

The hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) went on a mission to the Argentine in 1931; since then we have had that falling off in trade. I see him smiling, I am sure that good result was due to his trip. In the case of France a treaty has been signed by this government but there is still a substantial decrease in trade.

We hear a lot about a favourable balance of trade. Comparing each of the last twelve months with the corresponding month in the last year in which the King government was in office, we see that there has been a substantial loss in each month. The comparisons are with the figures for the corresponding months four years earlier, starting with April, 1929 compared with April of 1933.

	Decreases
Month—1933:	Imports	Exports
April	$50,944,545	$30,732,487
May	68,618,187	31,684,220
June	57,925,076	32,735,508
July	48,812,555	25,062,497
August	39,159,264	24,566,976
September	60,681,432	29,966,230
October	75,144,938	59,051,829
November	65,022,138	50,683,742
December	48,997,602	37,591,499
Month—1934:
January	52,270,953	26,855,310
February	53,330,277	28,847,414
March	65,494,505	31,933,696

It means that, comparing the statement given by the Department of National Revenue for the month of March this year, with that of the month of March, 1930, we see that there is a decrease of $65,494,000 in imports and a decrease of $31,933,000 in exports.

The total loss in exports is:

From Aug. 31, 1930 to Mar. 31, 1931	$ 189,000,000
From Mar. 31, 1931 to Mar. 31, 1932	412,373,365
From Mar. 31, 1932 to Mar. 31, 1933	514,917,712

This is the result of the experiments and schemes of which the government has been so fond. First it was the isolation policy, then the higher tariff, then the Ottawa agreements in 1932 and finally the world conference in 1933. It was all a fiasco. Will it be any better when the Prime Minister goes to sell carrots and turnips on the market square, will he be more successful in handling the trade than he has been hitherto? What I am sorry for is that no one on the other side has enough guts to tell the Prime Minister that he should remove himself gently from the picture and give an opportunity to someone,—to anyone—else. There is my hon. friend the Minister of Railways for instance, he is in favour of the betterment of trade conditions, but he cannot do anything, he has in his way the great obstacle, the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will not listen to him. Often he has made very good speeches showing his willingness to lower trade barriers, but it is useless to speak about it, the policy can be decided by only one man, and that that one man by the results has been proved wrong. My hon. friend from Compton or anyone else will understand that on behalf of our people we feel indignant when we see the results of the government's policy. We remember what they said, and now seeing what has been done, seeing the decrease in trade with foreign countries and with British countries, who can say that the policy of the government has been successful? Not only that, if my hon. friend will listen a minute, and will look at Hansard, pages 964-5, he will see tables setting out the decrease in production and in home consumption in 1932 compared with 1930. It was such that Mr. R. M. Harrison of Windsor was perfectly justified in writing—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Have we not increased our trade with the other parts of the British Empire?

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The hon. gentleman has not studied the trade returns, apparently.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask my hon. friend to have enough patience to glance through the reports of the Department of National Revenue for the years 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933; he will see that trade has fallen away almost entirely, even within the British Empire.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Not at all.

Mr. POULIOT: Will you, Mr. Speaker, please tell the hon. gentleman to keep quiet and devote himself to those interesting reports?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You would spend your time better in reading them so as to get correct information.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. R. M. Harrison of Windsor said:

> Since, according to Mr. Bennett and other leading economists, restricted farm production is one of the sovereign remedies for our financial and economic ills, it is to be hoped the various fall fairs throughout Ontario offer substantial prizes for the following:
> Smallest yield of corn per acre.
> Leanest hog.
> Sheep with shortest wool.
> Cow giving the least milk.
> Largest crop of potato bugs.

This was written by a humourist, and only a humourist could deal with the interjections of my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Macdougall).

Now, sir, we have this most important piece of legislation brought in at this stage of the session. To me this legislation is most dangerous, because it is based on the principles enunciated and proclaimed throughout the country by the C.C.F. group. I might put to the government now the questions I put to the C.C.F. group in February of last year, but the government could not answer those questions. The results of our trade are shown in the reports of the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Trade and Commerce. We find that the press is reluctant to publish the official records concerning home consumption and home production because the decrease is so great that they might lose their advertising. Something should be done, but should it be done by the imposition of legislation which is not justified, which is most dangerous, which encroaches upon the rights of the provinces and which cannot be explained by any hon. gentleman in this house? I take the hon. member for Compton, for instance. I admit that he is intelligent, but his speech this afternoon might be characterized by that delightful French expression, "pot pourri." He is intelligent, as I say, but the only thing he could say about this bill was that he found it good. Is that a reason why we should vote for it? In Quebec they are strongly opposed to this bill because there they abide by the constitution. They respect and stand by the constitution of the land, and they believe that the constitution as it exists is the best protection for all. Therefore, sir, if Mr. Taschereau decided to introduce legislation in accordance with this bill it was in order that the government might not be accused of being unfair or parochial. But there is a reserve in that legislation; Mr. Taschereau wants to hear the illuminating explanations that are to be given by the government, so he has inserted a proviso to the effect that the bill will not come into force until it has been approved by the lieutenant governor in council. I think that was a wise step, because he will have the opportunity of weighing the explanations which may be given by the federal government before imposing that legislation on the province of Quebec.

I am afraid of no one, Mr. Speaker; I fear only God. If anyone in this house tries to impose on me by casting insults or making insinuations of any kind, I am perfectly indifferent. I am above that sort of thing, and I know that when the ministers are unable to answer our questions and when they sit like fence posts there will be some members to interrupt us while we speak. I do not pay any attention to fence posts; I am indifferent to them. I am here to do my duty, and I carry out my duty here in the House of Commons as a loyal citizen of Canada. I do my duty here as my only brother did his duty when he took the first German prisoners to be captured by the 22nd battalion and when he obtained his decoration at Vimy, where he was wounded, as a result of which he remained in the hospital for some time. I am not ashamed of any member of my family, sir; there are no grafters in my family, and that is why I am not ashamed to speak as I do in this house. I am defending the rights of my own people, which have been encroached upon by this government ever since it has been in power. Now I am speaking on behalf of the poor and the humble, who are not members of the Rideau club and who are never seen by the ministers, who do not hear their complaints or learn how those people suffer. They are happy; they are satisfied and contented, but I am here at a great sacrifice to do my duty on behalf of those humble people, whom I have always defended. If the hon. member for Compton had been a member of this house for a longer period he would have known that even against the hon. member for Inverness I have defended the rights of the small wage earners of Cape Breton. Sir, I am a very humble citizen, but I am proud of my record and nothing can deter me because I have always done my duty, so I do not have to listen to things of that kind.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: There is no question of privilege in what I have said.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The hon. gentleman said that at one time he had to defend the rights of the miners of Nova Scotia against me. Without hesitation I say that is an absolute falsehood. He never had to do that; no one ever had to do that, because there never was a man in the House of Commons who stood up for the miners of Nova Scotia more than I have done. I know more about them than is known by ten people like the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT: My answer to the hon. member is that the state in which he appears to be is the only excuse for what he has said.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to direct the hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark unequivocally.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member has made a statement in regard to the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) which he is asked to withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, if I am to withdraw the hon. member must withdraw the word "falsehood" which is not parliamentary.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You withdraw; if you do not I will go over there, and you will do it quickly.

Mr. POULIOT: If we are to withdraw together, all right; if we are both to withdraw I will do so graciously.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member must withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: If you say so, sir, I accept your ruling but on the other hand I may tell you that while we were discussing—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Unequivocally.

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking to a question of privilege now, because I am through with my speech. Years ago, Mr. Speaker, when we were discussing the low wages paid the small wage earners in Nova Scotia I gave a message to the hon. member for Inverness to deliver to the then Premier of Nova Scotia, but he never said a word about it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Did I oppose that? Was I not the first man to see that the eight hour day was instituted on public works throughout Canada?

Mr. POULIOT: But I gave him a message to the then Premier of Nova Scotia, and the hon. member never delivered it.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member's time has elapsed.

Mr. J. S. STEWART (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I trust the hon. member who has just taken his seat will not think it discourteous on my part if I do not attempt to follow him in the arguments he has brought forward in connection with the bill, because in the time at my disposal I intend to approach the matter from an angle entirely different from that pursued by the hon. member.

Having the honour to represent in this house a constituency in which the majority of the people are engaged in agricultural pursuits, my action in supporting the second reading of this measure, namely one to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, will, I am confident, meet with the approval of a majority of these people. The people in my constituency, irrespective of political leanings—whether they be Conservative, Liberal or supporters of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—desire that this legislation may become law, and that such condition may be brought about as quickly as possible. They realize that from the application of the provisions contained in this measure great good may accrue to the western farmers. I desire therefore to approach my discussion of the matter from the point of view of the farmer of southern Alberta. Even at the risk of repeating some of the arguments already made I desire to place on record the attitude of the men living in that section of Canada which I have the honour to represent. I should like to devote the latter half of the time allotted to me to an exploration of the possibilities of our receiving some assistance from the bill, and particularly the extent to which two important branches of agriculture carried on in southern Alberta may be affected.

First may I inquire as to why it is necessary for us to have this legislation, and why is it termed legislation which is urgently needed? My first answer would be that the farmers of Canada, together with farmers throughout the whole world, have suffered severely from the drop in commodity prices. I have before me a comparison showing the figure for to-day as compared with that of the year 1926, and it indicates that farm products in Canada have declined by 47·7 per cent. There is much less decline to-day than there was one year or even two years ago. I find that wheat has fallen to-day to the extent of 55·7 per cent, giving an index figure of 44·3. When we are dealing with wheat we are dealing with the most important product of western Canada. When we turn to manufactured goods we have to-day the figure of 75 per cent as compared with 100 in 1926. The purchasing power of the dollar has increased 36·7 per cent.

Although the farmers in Canada and the world over have received for their products prices which were unremunerative, yet having to meet the demands of their creditors they have increased rather than reduced their production. They have tried to make up in volume what they lost in value. As a result the world market has been flooded; it has been overloaded with goods and commodity prices have fallen to a very low level. Our domestic market suffered similarly, and many examples could be given to show the wastage which resulted from lack of a definite marketing plan or system of marketing.

My second reason for believing that the present legislation is necessary is that the countries of the world have placed restrictions against the exchange of goods between nations. What are the policies which, having been placed in operation, have restricted international trade? Before the war the most important method by which we restricted imports was through the instrumentality of tariff duties. Since the war, however, various other methods have been adopted and used extensively. The type of restrictions applicable to trade in agricultural products can be divided into two major classes, the first of which consists of import restrictions. Under that heading I make four subdivisions, namely milling regulations, import quotas, licensing of importers and foreign exchange. The second major class is that of export aids and restrictions, and again I make four subdivisions, namely, commercial treaties, export bounties, improvement by inspection in the quality or standard of the article, and restriction of exports.

The effect of these restrictions has been felt in every part of the world, and in that statement Canada must be included. The bureau of statistics of the League of Nations records a loss of twenty-five per cent in volume of world trade, certainly old trade lanes have disappeared and very few new ones have taken their place. These restrictions have had such an effect upon world trade that various countries of the world have found it necessary to pass legislation to effect control of production, marketing and prices. I have before me a file giving the number and names of measures passed by various countries, and enumerating the legislative acts passed to effect control of production, marketing and prices. These figures indicate that thirty-six of the leading countries of the world have passed about one hundred and fifty pieces of legislation similar to that now before this house. I shall not weary the house by giving the names of the countries, but should like to place upon the record what has been done in two of the leading nations of the world. First, in connection with France, we have milling regulations in November, 1929, import quotas in September, 1931, import licences in November, 1931, flax and hemp subsidies in July, 1931, and March, 1932, government purchases of tobacco in December, 1931, seasonal tariffs in March, 1932, and a stabilization decree in October, 1932. It is quite evident from that list that France is not anxious that any imports of any kind shall enter that country.

In connection with Great Britain we have the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1931, the Wheat Act of 1932, the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1933, and the Agricultural Marketing Act of Northern Ireland of 1933.

What means are provided within this measure to assist in overcoming the difficulties about which I have spoken? First, what does the measure offer towards a solution of the financial troubles with which our farmers are faced? May I say that none has a more intimate knowledge of those troubles than has the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the members of his cabinet. I think the executive were convinced long ago that the suggestions put forward by speakers at the Ottawa conferences that the only way in which to restore prosperity to the world was to increase wholesale commodity prices were sound statements. After a careful survey the government were convinced that the best way to assist the farmer was to give him an opportunity to market his goods in an orderly manner. During the last few days we have been told on several occasions that the farmer sells most of his products in the domestic market. It is therefore necessary that some regulation or provision should be incorporated into this bill in order to assist the farmer in the marketing of his goods in Canada. I find that such a system is provided by this bill. First, there is the provision whereby we may prevent the manipulation of prices so that in the future there will not be a drop of two cents in the price of hogs within a week, as has happened recently, and that without any apparent reason. Second, the government will have the power to regulate the spread in prices, as a result of which I feel the farmer will receive a larger portion of the consumer's dollar. Third, we will have the power to take surpluses off the market; if there happens to be an excess of a product at any one time, the government will be able to appoint an agent to take such surplus off the market, store it and return it to the market when an opportunity is found.

With regard to the passing of these 150 acts by thirty-six countries, I should like to ask the house if under these circumstances we should remain idle and if, through a fear of violating the Magna Charta of 1215, we should allow these conditions from without to destroy us without making any effort for our preservation. I feel that the government have the support of the majority of the people of Canada and one of the reasons why they have this support is the fact that this is a government of action. The government is alive to world conditions which affect the welfare of our people and is also alive to our domestic difficulties. The government has not failed us in this difficult situation but has produced a bill which will help us to solve the marketing problems of this time.

The bill has two main principles as its foundation. First, there is the orderly marketing of our products, and, second, it enables us to protect ourselves against destructive action by other countries. I think the government should be congratulated for bringing forward this measure. Praise is particularly due to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who has taken a very prominent part in the construction of the bill. He is an able Minister of Agriculture and has placed in operation many policies which have greatly assisted those engaged in the farming industry. I venture to predict that when his record is written his name in the history of Canada will be more intimately and closely associated with this bill than with any other of his agricultural activities. It is one of the greatest forward steps that has been taken in Canada for the past twenty years.

Many messages have been received by various hon. members from their constituents containing praise for the provisions of this bill. We have received messages from co-operative organizations, from united farmer organizations, from boards of trade and other public bodies. I should like to place on Hansard some observations which I have gleaned from reading the London Times of April 3. It states:

> The natural products marketing bill which the Canadian government has introduced into the federal parliament seems likely to become the principal issue in dominion politics.

So far as the Conservative party is concerned, we should be very glad to have that happen. The article continues:

> It is a comprehensive measure applying to all primary products, except those of the mines, the principles which recent marketing legislation in Great Britain has applied to certain selected branches of agriculture.

We are applying the principles of the British act to the products of Canadian agriculture. The article continues:

> It may be assumed that the American experiments in economic planning have not been without influence in Canada; but the bill is avowedly based on the British model. If it becomes law and is put into effective operation, Canadian farmers will be organized on the same lines as the British, and the discussion of common problems and the arrangement of satisfactory conditions for mutual aid will be proportionately easier.

That article contains two very important statements. First, it states that our bill is based on the British model. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite say that they would vote for this measure if it were based on the British model. Here is a statement by the greatest paper published in the English language to the effect that it is based upon the British model. Second, it says that when this measure becomes law the farmers of Canada will be organized on the same basis and in the same manner as are the farmers under the British act and that they will be able to get together to discuss common problems and make arrangements for satisfactory conditions for mutual aid to one another. Is not this something in which this government should take great pride? The article closes with the following statement:

> The endeavour will no doubt be accompanied with mistakes and maladjustments, with temporary losses and inconveniences, but, given perseverence and discipline, there can in the end be no surer way to stable prosperity.

I do not think it would be possible to find a more eloquent tribute to the provisions of this bill than that statement by the editor of the greatest British paper.

Under this bill a marketing board will supervise our exports and will endeavour to see that our products are standard in quality and that there is a continuity and uniformity of supply. This will assist greatly in making a success of the Ottawa agreements.. Those agreements gave us what are now the only stable markets we possess. No matter what may be the results hoped for from this legislation, it is important that we should have it now when we have only restricted markets. It is important that we should have it even though we should have unrestricted markets, but the legislation becomes more important when we have but the one market. The more restricted our markets are, the more imperative it becomes that we retain them by orderly marketing methods and leave nothing to chance or fortune.

It has been stated by our political opponents that Canada suffers from the restricted market which has been brought about by the fiscal policies of this government, but the history and the dates upon which these restrictions were brought into force proves that these charges are without foundation. Let us consider the history of the trade relations between Canada and the United States. From 1913 to 1921 the Underwood tariff was in force in that great country and we find that our domestic exports increased from $139,000,000 in 1913 to $542,000,000 in 1921. In 1921 we sent $192,000,000 worth of farm products to the United States, and of all our domestic exports to the United States 88·4 per cent entered that country free, so that we were operating under what would be practically a free trade policy.

The emergency tariff was applied in 1921 and then we had the Fordney-McCumber tariff from 1922 to 1930. In other words, these policies were in operation when the Liberal government was in power in Canada, and what effect did they have on our exports? Instead of sending $190,000,000 a year of our farm products to the United States, as we had been doing from 1913 to 1921, our exports of farm products to that country dropped to $92,000,000 a year and less. So that while the Mackenzie King government held the reins of power we lost a valuable market for our agricultural products amounting to $100,000,000 a year.

Was it the fiscal policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that brought about this loss? If it is argued that we have lost markets, through our fiscal policy, surely the same argument holds good with respect to their loss of markets. Now the loss of that valuable agricultural market, combined with the restricted wheat market which prevailed when we came in, had serious effects. The restricted wheat market bore fruit in 1930 by seed which was sown in 1925, when the restrictions were put into operation by European countries, and that is the situation which this government found with regard to our foreign markets when the Bennett administration came into power in August, 1930. So far as our foreign markets are concerned, one might say they at that time absolutely spelled ruin for us. But we had a prime minister who was a man of action and he took action in September, 1930. It was an honest effort to save our country, and it certainly has preserved the identity of Canada.

But what action did the former government take to prevent the loss of our agricultural products market in the United States? Did they retaliate or negotiate? Well, if they negotiated they certainly did not make much of a success of it judging by their record as given to this house in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) several evenings ago. They did not negotiate because they lacked the weapon with which to do so; and, what was still worse, they publicly declared that they would not take that weapon into their own hands to compel negotiation. Instead, they said to the United States, "You may do what you like about restricting our exports of agricultural products into your markets, we will not retaliate." Above all, we were counselled not to do anything provocative towards the United States.

I find now that I must turn to local matters in so far as this bill may affect agriculture in the riding which I have the honour to represent. Section 12 has this marginal note, that the governor in council shall have:

> Power to restrict importation of natural products which compete with regulated products.

Under the provisions of section 12 I believe that an important branch of agriculture, carried on in the irrigated areas, may receive much needed assistance. I refer to the desire of farmers living in these irrigation districts to have an increase in the acreage sown to sugar beets. Hon. members are well aware that we have $35,000,000 invested in irrigation projects by which we are able to supply irrigation for over 1,000,000 acres in southern Alberta. For many years we have demonstrated that we can grow sugar beets successfully. The cash returns from the sugar beet greatly exceed the returns which the farmer receives for his hay and grain crops. It is necessary to reduce our wheat acreage, and our farmers are very anxious to replace wheat acreage with sugar beets, and instead of 14,000 acres of sugar beets to have 28,000 or 30,000. We have a market at our door. We supply but twenty-eight per cent of the sugar consumption of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the other sixty-two per cent coming from a refinery not located in either of those provinces but hundreds of miles away in the city of Vancouver, and our desire is to replace raw cane sugar, which is imported into this country from Fiji, with sugar from beets grown by Canadian farmers on Canadian soil.

This sugar beet product is equal to the cane product and sells at ten cents per hundred pounds less than is commanded by cane sugar. I would submit the following facts to the house for consideration, so that hon. members may have a knowledge of the value of a factory to a community. In 1932, 2½ per cent of the lands in the Lethbridge northern irrigation district contributed 24½ per cent of the total value of farm products in that area of 100,000 acres, and 2½ per cent of the lands in the Lethbridge northern irrigation district in 1932 contributed 40 per cent of the cash value of the crops grown in that area. In the second place, in 1933, $1,634,000 was spent by the refinery at Raymond for beets, labour, freight and supplies, and it is claimed that the refinery greatly assists in maintaining a population of 10,000 souls. Thirdly, it has been my privilege to examine the contracts made by a privately owned corporation in the sale of lands to farmers. I have examined thirty-eight of these contracts, and after choosing four of the agreements at random I am able to give this information to the house. The four taken are for purchases of land in which the contract price of each amounts to between $4,000 and $4,500. I will take two farmers who have a contract for growing sugar beets and two who have not such contracts but are near neighbours. The first man with a sugar beet contract has, for a period of five years, averaged a payment of over $306 a year on the principal he owes the corporation. The second man with a contract, in the same period of years, has averaged a payment of over $360 a year. Let us turn to the other side of the picture. The first man who has no sugar beet contract has averaged a payment of $50.05 per annum and the second man has averaged a payment of $34.06 over a shorter term of years.

Now you can readily see which class of farmer will be able to discharge the contract he has entered into for the purchase of land from that irrigation company. You can readily see which class of farmer it is who will soon be able to call his home and his farm his own. Is it any wonder that the farmer who has no beet contract, but who may be just as good a farmer as the man who has a beet contract, is most anxious that we should have an increase in our sugar beet acreage? I find in the Ottawa Citizen of April 27, a dispatch from London as follows:

> London, April 26.—Sugar beet yield of nine tons to the acre has been obtained by British beet growers this year. Earl de la Warre, parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture, speaking at a meeting of the Sugar Beet Society in London to-night described this result as "amazing."
> Britain could claim a yield equal in efficiency to any country except perhaps Holland, he added.
> The meeting also was told British sugar-producers were delivering sugar at a lower price than in any other country in the world, and one-quarter of the sugar consumed here was being produced in the United Kingdom.

That is a very fine record, but we have surpassed that by a large margin, for in 1932 on a 14,000 acreage sown to sugar beets we had an average yield of 10·7 tons per acre. Furthermore, we had a sugar content of 18·41 per cent, the highest on the North American continent. Even last year, which was not a good one for sugar beet production, we had an average per ton yield of 9·3 per acre.

A delegation of men from all parts of Canada, from Ontario, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan and other provinces who are interested in the extension of the sugar beet industry, met a committee of the cabinet on February 23, 1934, and stressed the great value of and the urgent need for more factories. They also dwelt upon the final paragraph of the report submitted by the select standing committee on agriculture which investigated the sugar beet industry, and reported to the house in 1932. I quote that paragraph:

> Your committee further recommends, that if no successful attempt be made in the immediate future by the refineries to increase the facilities for the manufacturing of beet sugar, the government should take into consideration steps to accomplish that end.

That report was adopted unanimously by this house over two years ago, and since that time there has been no effort made by the refineries to increase or improve the facilities for the manufacture of beet sugar. I would therefore respectfully submit to the government that it is now high time it stepped in and took action.

Section 12 of the bill now before the house gives the governor in council power to impose quotas on imports of regulated products. So far as regulated products are concerned, I may say that the sugar beet is a regulated product. Giving evidence before the committee in 1932, one of the farmers from Ontario was asked if he would like to grow more sugar beets. "Oh my, yes" he said, "just give us the opportunity." We are not allowed to grow any more sugar beets because the sugar refineries cannot take care of the production, and we are asking for an extension of their facilities in order that they may be able to take care of greater production.

I would say that no import lends itself more readily to the quota restrictions than raw cane sugar, for two reasons. First of all, because that import can be replaced by a Canadian product furnished by Canadian farmers, and in the long run it will not cost the consumer one cent more for the refined product which is equally as good as that which is derived from the raw cane. Secondly, there are but five industrial corporations interested in refining cane sugar. Might I add that the management of these corporations appear to have divided Canada into zones for distribution purposes and in these zones there is only one class or grade of sugar sold; there is no competition between companies. When application is made on behalf of these farmers, or when they make application themselves to the government, from the various parts of Canada that raw cane sugar be placed on a quota basis, I trust that their application will be received with the sympathy it rightly deserves and that the government will see to it that Humanity, spelled with a capital H; and I say that in all seriousness—receives the fair and kindly consideration it rightfully deserves. If a quota is applied, and we would urge that it should be applied, then I am certain that the sugar beet industry will receive the aid it now requires and that within two years we shall be supplying twenty-five per cent of the requirements of the Canadian people instead of the fourteen per cent which we now provide, and that instead of three sugar beet refineries in Canada we shall have five. I am as confident as I am sure that I am standing here, that in the not distant future fifty per cent of our sugar consumption in Canada will be supplied from the products of Canadian farms grown by Canadian farmers, and when that day comes it will be a day of rich blessing for the farmers of our land and the labourers of our country.

May I close by recalling to the attention of the house and the country the statement made by the London Times, a portion of which I have already read. I should like to conclude with this warning, but also with this assurance as to the future of this act: "this endeavour will no doubt be accompanied by mistakes and maladjustments, with temporary losses and inconveniences, but, given perseverance and discipline, there can in the end be no surer way to stable prosperity."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE SMALL LOAN COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto) moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee on Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Small Loan Company of Canada.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I understood the Prime Minister to say to the house the other night that these bills would stand until the government gave consideration to the matter of bringing in a general act.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Yes, I think that he did say that.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I have in my hand the statement to which the hon. member for Macleod has made reference. The Prime Minister, speaking to a somewhat similar bill and suggesting that it go to the banking and commerce committee, said, as reported at page 2617 of Hansard:

> While it is being considered there the government will decide whether or not it is advisable to enact legislation to provide that the companies which have already secured charters, as mentioned by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), shall be subject to a general law to the effect that the rates which they may receive, including all charges, shall not exceed a fixed percentage somewhat less than the sum mentioned by the hon. member for Battle River.

I took it that the Prime Minister intended that these bills should stand until the government had decided what rate should be allowed to be charged for money loaned by these companies.

Mr. GEARY: I do not think the Prime Minister quite said that the bills should all stand, but that, having passed, they might be subject to some general legislation. However, I do not wish to press it or insist on going any further. I withdraw my motion, the bill to stand on the order paper.

Bill stands.

[Mr. J. S. Stewart.]

PERSONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 43, entitled an act to incorporate Personal Finance Corporation.—Mr. Hackett.

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill will stand for the same reason.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In rising to speak to this bill let me say at the outset that I differ from many members on this side of the house. But with many hon. members I realize and agree that the days of haphazard marketing of farm products have almost passed. We have come to the age of orderly marketing, which I believe to be necessary to-day in regard to most if not all our farm products. When I think of trying to maintain export markets for our farm products I realize the necessity of some such plan of orderly marketing. We have legislation to take care of quality and grades of many lines of agricultural produce, but I believe we shall have to go a step further and have uniformity of quality from one end of Canada to the other. Not only that, but having once obtained a market abroad that market will have to be retained by continuity of supply. I for one realize that the farmer has seen every other industry organized but his own. The farmer has for many years been forced to buy in the dearest market and to sell his goods in the cheapest market because of not having yet been able to combine or organize for the welfare of himself and his fellow farmers. In these days control is necessary. Farmers should not always leave it to others to market their goods, but every effort on the part of farmers to combine for the betterment of themselves and their class has been bitterly opposed by combines and interests concerned.

The present bill seems to me more of a regulating bill than a marketing bill. I am not altogether surprised at that, because we have recently learned that in Australia and New Zealand similar bills are being put into effect, due to the condition of affairs that has arisen in the old country in connection with agriculture. As the premier of Australia is reported to have stated, it is far better to have regulation of agricultural exports than to be told by Great Britain that she will have to discontinue or curtail the import of many agricultural products from the antipodes. So it may well be that the regulating feature in this bill has been embodied with that end in view.

If local boards are to be set up, however, I hope they will not be given the power to control production, because such power in relation to farm products might have disastrous results. I have in mind the condition in my own district and up through the Fraser valley, where to-day more milk is produced than can be sold on the fluid milk market in the larger cities. At one time we had a similar condition in regard to eggs. I should view with alarm any possibility of a local board putting a ring around those areas and telling others: "You cannot come in because to-day we are producing more than we can consume." I think a power like that would be far too drastic. I am sure hon. members from the province of British Columbia will agree on this, that British Columbia fruit and milk men believe that the producers to-day should regulate their own production. I would ask the house to note that in the province of British Columbia neither the fruit men nor the milk producers have so far asked any government to bear any of the expense of helping them to market their products.

Mr. SENN: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. When he speaks of control does he mean control of production or limitation of production?

Mr. REID: The two terms are practically the same; if you limit production you are controlling production, but when I made that statement I had in mind the possibility of a local board coming to the conclusion that there were enough growers in a particular area and that no more should be allowed into it, which might limit the further progress of that section of the country and, of course, limit the production of that commodity.

We in the province of British Columbia, in the Fraser valley at least, are not asking for any finacial help, nor have we asked for it from any government. What we ask is that we be given the right to pool all the proceeds in any organization we may set up, and to make levies. In order to make the position clear and to acquaint the house with the conditions existing in that part of the country I think I should take a few moments to give a résumé of the largest organization which exists in the Fraser valley, namely the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association. Before going on with that, however, just in passing I should like to refer to a statement that has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) both in and out of this house, to the effect that he was very glad to see this government adopting planned economy, shall I say, which has been advocated by members in the far corner. Let me tell the hon. gentleman and the members of this house that in British Columbia the farmers were some years ahead of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. Long before that organization was thought of we had this Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association, and we had the dairy products act put through in 1929, after being proposed in 1928. So we did not have to depend on that group for the suggestion of planned economy; our farmers were progressive enough, shall I say, to get that act put through.

This organization of which I speak was started in 1913, but there was some difficulty in regard to finances and operations were not commenced until 1917. There are three or four plants. One is in Vancouver, which is the headquarters with regard to wholesale milk and creamery products; cottage cheese is made there; there is a storage warehouse and general offices are maintained. Then in the city of Chilliwack, where the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) resides, they have a utility plant which takes care of butter, cheese, powdered milk, casein and semi-solid butter milk. Then at Abbotsford they have an evaporating milk plant with a capacity of 1,300 cases daily. In 1917 the membership was 848, but by 1932 it had increased to 3,567. The assets, when the company started, amounted to $166,000 in round figures, while to-day they are over $1,000,000. The capital invested at that time totalled $77,000; the present capital is well over $1,000,000. The butter fat handled in 1917 amounted to 1,709,528 pounds, while in 1932 the butter fat handled amounted to 5,724,269 pounds.

Might I point out, Mr. Speaker, that all the capital was subscribed by the individual farmers in $50 shares; deferred payments were permitted, at the rate of from one to four cents per pound of butter fat, and if necessary payments were made in stock instead of in cash. Six per cent interest was paid on all paid up capital, but this organization has never received any financial assistance from any government. During the peak of production each year they finance by means of loans from the bank, the loans being retired as the stocks are reduced. In these years the butter fat handled totals well over 58,000,000 pounds, and the total net value to the farmers concerned has amounted to more than $30,000,000. The average price per pound of butter fat, during the whole period, was 52½ cents. I ask hon. members to note particularly what I am about to say, because I think it is very striking indeed; it shows what cooperation can accomplish when farmers get together to market their own product. During the period from 1917 to 1929 the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association was able to reduce the spread allowed for fluid milk distribution from 29 cents to 20 cents per gallon; they were able also to raise the value of the fluid milk to the producer by approximately 23 cents per pound of butter fat, without raising the price to the consumer.

I ask the house to take note of that. Not only was the price of butter fat raised; the price of milk to the consumer was not increased during that period. The table I have before me shows the effect of increased prices with regard to increased production, indicating how the law of supply works out if it is not permitted to run wild. The pool value in 1917 was 45 cents per pound of butter fat; the pool value in 1928—I am taking the years before the act was declared to be ultra vires—was 60 cents per pound, an increase of 33 per cent. The butter fat production increased from 2,000,000 pounds, in round figures, to roughly 6,000,000 pounds, while the price for which butter was sold was 40 cents per pound in 1928, as it was in 1917. The price of fluid milk to the consumer was the same in both years also; it was 11 cents per quart. Not only was the price the same during those years; the quality of the milk was greatly improved, due to the introduction of more modern methods and greater cooperation among the farmers.

Some difficulty was encountered, however, because only fifty per cent of the milk produced in the valley is consumed as fluid milk, the other fifty per cent being manufactured into lower priced products such as ice cream, butter and so forth. With the pooling of the prices when the organization was standing together the average was raised so that it did not matter whether a farmer shipped his milk to the fluid market or to the factory; prices were pooled and there was an equal distribution among all the farmers. Some dissension started, however, and one or two farmers who did not belong to the association were offered higher prices in outside distributing centres. A rush was made, which placed too much fluid milk on the market at one time, and as a result the price fell very rapidly. Then the farmers went to the provincial government asking that legislation be enacted which would compel the farmers in any area to come into what was known as the pool. Just here let me say, Mr. Speaker, that we have heard a great deal about the marketing act in Great Britain. It might interest the house to know that the act passed in British Columbia in 1929, which later was declared ultra vires, was the act which guided the farmers in Great Britain. My information is that that act was copied in Great Britain. It would seem therefore that we in British Columbia can take a little credit in this instance for being leaders in an organized effort to control and help the dairy and farming industries.

That legislation was put into effect, and it contained provisions which I believe might well be included in the present measure. I hope that the bill before us, before becoming law, may include the provisions which were embodied in the legislation of the province of British Columbia—and I have referred to that legislation because I think it is as good as the British legislation. Under our scheme sixty-six per cent of the people in an area or attending the public meetings could petition the government so as to compel the other people to subscribe to the scheme. That took place in British Columbia, and there was no great difficulty in obtaining the support of the sixty-six per cent who wished to organize. However there were those who viewed with alarm the fact that farmers were being forced to cooperate. Those people did not want to cooperate, but wished to sell their products by themselves at any and at every time. The bill was attacked and ultimately declared ultra vires of the province because the farmers who were shipping outside the province could not be controlled by the provincial legislation. After the case had been considered at law—and it went to the old country for final consideration—the provincial act was declared ultra vires, because the provincial government could not levy on the farmer anything in the nature of indirect taxation. The act directed the committee to levy upon shippers who sold more than their quota an amount sufficient to compensate those who were obliged to take less than their quota in the fluid milk market. This was called the adjustment levy.

I would ask you to note, Mr. Speaker, that the operation of this plan had a wonderful effect on the maintenance of prices, because if the farmer sold his milk for less than 73 cents per pound butter fat he would have less than his neighbour who did not sell, for the simple reason that the commission assumed that he got at least 73 cents. The commission were also directed to deduct by levy on every pound of fat produced a sum sufficient to take care of administration costs. Both these levies were found by the privy council to be indirect taxes and declared beyond the competency of the legislature to enact. However, during the period between January 1, 1930, and April 30, 1931, when our markets were operating under that legislation, the parties concerned enjoyed the best market for their products they had ever had or have had since. When the influence of the act ceased to function everyone piled on to the higher priced market—the fluid milk market —which was bringing a rate of 73 cents a pound butter fat, with the result that the price was hammered down within six weeks to 33 cents per pound butter fat, and that low price was maintained for about a year. Then, in April, 1933, the price came up slightly, to 45 cents, and ever since has gradually crumbled away until to-day it is less than 40 cents per pound butter fat. The result has been that with the exception of a very small percentage all the people want to be placed in such a position that they shall be obliged to play the game and not be permitted to abuse the market. I understand that the price now prevailing in the valley is from 12 cents to 14 cents per gallon, away below cost of production.

The position of farmers is different from that of industrialists. When the industrialist has a plant which is not paying he immediately closes the doors, with the result that his deficits and operating expenses cease. But the farmer has his home and his stock; his land cannot be neglected, and he has to continue. In that respect the farmers are different from any other class and are forced to carry on even at a loss. During the past few years most of them have been going deeper and deeper into debt. As to just how long they can carry on at from 12 cents to 14 cents per gallon I should not care to hazard a guess.

After this short résumé of conditions we have experienced in the Fraser valley I shall direct my remarks to the bill now under consideration. May I say that I believe in some respects it goes too far, and in others not far enough. Some hon. members seem to think that the bill contains provisions enforcing pooling. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated the bill could deal only in generalities. I am of the opinion that pooling is not at present embodied in the bill. We know that this measure includes products of the forest, sea, lake and mine. Under it assistance might be given to many industries which are in no need of artificial aid. The minister may also set up and dissolve a board. I do not think he should have that right. In my view the industry should ask for the board. As stipulated in the Dairy Products Sales Adjustment Act of 1929 such boards should be established only on vote of the people. That procedure would be entirely democratic, and if it were adopted one could not suggest a dictatorship if a majority of people in a certain area voted to come within the provisions of this measure. Moreover, when we place the control of exports and imports of natural products in the hands of a board we are going a great distance. I am somewhat afraid of the words which appear in subsection (1) of section 5:

> . . . the production and marketing or the production or marketing . . .

I believe marketers alone should not be allowed to set up boards and have control. I do not at this time intend to set up straw men or to cite hypothetical cases, but if marketers alone are allowed to set up local boards I would view with alarm what might happen to the salmon fishing industry of British Columbia, in which instance the product is handled by cannerymen. If a board were set up to take care of the manufactured product it could and might result in measures to the detriment of the fishermen. The same might apply to fruit canning interests. Being apart from the producers it might well develop that the local industry would eventually control the producers.

The clauses in the bill are obscure, and I should like the Minister of Agriculture to take note of the demands made by people in the province of British Columbia who are asking that the provisions as to pooling be made very very clear and definite. Legal authorities in British Columbia have discussed the bill and have made it clear that in their opinion this measure does not at the present time contain pooling clauses. They believe that the federal government should embody in the bill such a provision because that is what the people in the lower Fraser valley are requesting, and also the power to make levies.

I have taken this opportunity to place myself on record, because in my view the bill is very important. I know some hon. members hold the view that marketing is not the principle behind the bill. I have endeavoured to indicate my belief that there is more regulating than marketing in the bill, but I am prepared to give it the benefit of the doubt and vote for its second reading in the hope that when it gets to committee the matters I have discussed will be taken into consideration and changes made adequately to take care of the representations and demands of the farmers of the Fraser Valley. If these things are not made abundantly clear I shall be forced to vote against the third reading of the bill, but, as I have stated, I am prepared to permit it to go to committee.

Mr. GEORGES P. LAURIN (Jacques Cartier): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill on marketing I am mindful of the fact that I am the representative of the constituency of Jacques Cartier which has a population of over 140,000 people. The population of one of the provinces, Prince Edward Island, is only 88,000 people, so I think it must be admitted that the constituency of Jacques Cartier has some right to consideration in this House of Commons. That constituency is made up of all the elements which go to make up our fair dominion. We have the humble labourer, the descendant of many Canadian generations. We have the farmer who has inherited his farm from his ancestral fathers. We have the immigrant who came from Great Britain or middle or southern Europe who has established himself and has accepted Canada as his only home. We have manufacturers, both large and small, and we have traders, bankers, capitalists and a railway leader. But in discussing this bill I must not forget that the majority of my constituents are consumers like those in the constituency of the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). My constituency is on the island of Montreal and my constituents are made up of French and English speaking Canadians. They are both consumers and producers, and contrary to the expressed opinion of the hon. member for North Timiskaming, I am in favour of the bill. I believe that it represents a step toward the fulfilment of the wishes of both the consumer and the producer.

I believe in due course of time the operations of this legislation will result in a fairer spread between the consumer and the producer. The profits derived from the marketing of our rich natural resources will be more equitable and there will be ensured to the manufacturer, to the trader and to the consumer that sound equilibrium which can come only from regulated markets. Agriculture will obtain a fair return for its investment and labour while the consumer will be able to purchase at a price commensurate with the wages he receives. The farmer producer and the labourer consumer will both receive fair treatment and there will be a continuous and steady market for the products of the manufacturer. The agricultural producer will be assured of a home market for his products while the wage earner will be able to give to the agricultural producer a fair return for his product. The returns received by both the producer and the consumer will be sufficient to ensure the manufacturer a steady market for his product. The profits which the manufacturer receives may be somewhat lower but his market will be steady. An equilibrium will be preserved among our principal industries, agriculture, manufacturing and labour. These industries will still be capable of acting for themselves for their own common good, but the fact remains that they must of necessity depend upon one another.

Because of our affinity with England and our proximity to the United States we had hopes that one day—this applies particularly to the province of Quebec—we might emulate the great industrial activities of England and the New England States. At one time England admittedly held the premier place in the manufacturing world. It developed its manufacturing, its commercial and trading activities to an immense degree but it crushed every effort brought forward to protect and secure a market for its agricultural industry. This was done in order that the salaries of the wage earners should be kept at a point where the profits of the manufacturer and the trader would be enhanced. But in time its outside manufacturing outlets became gradually decreased and it then realized the necessity of organizing its agricultural and labour consuming population. This necessity formed the basic reason for the establishing of the British marketing board. Here in Canada we have also allowed our agriculture to decline. This has happened in the west but more particularly in the province of Quebec.

If this were simply my own opinion, I would willingly allow hon. members opposite from Quebec to challenge my declaration, but this opinion has been advanced by one who played a very important part in the direction of our provincial affairs between 1920 and 1930. The Minister of Roads, one of the most important portfolios in the province of Quebec, had obtained for his department a vote of $17,500,000 for the construction of roads in that province. He had however the courage to resign that portfolio and to accept instead that of agriculture. A staunch Liberal, he did not shirk from denying the compliments which Mr. Taschereau had been continuously showering upon our farmers, on the eve of every election, and he disregarded the flowery speeches of his colleagues. In his first speech as Minister of Agriculture in 1926, at Sherbrooke, and I believe the hon. member for Sherbrooke will admit it, the Hon. L. Perron—for it is he of whom I speak—declared:

Notre agriculture est dans le marasme.

That is to say, our agriculture is in a state of atrophy. I would add, it appears to be in a bog, sinking at the slightest effort, and drastic means must be taken to save it. Unhappily Mr. Perron died. His successor is a most capable man, but his efforts, encouraged one day by Mr. Taschereau, are thwarted the day following. We saw Mr. Taschereau pass a bill to cooperate with the present government in its efforts to alleviate the state of agriculture. But on Tuesday, April 24, 1934, he comes forward with the assertion that this marketing board will infringe upon provincial rights as regards agriculture, and he declares his strict opposition to this bill. Mr. Taschereau is not only a past master in politics; he is also a noted lawyer. He should know better therefore than to try to incite the people of our province to mistakes—he has done it so often to their detriment. Had he read Hansard he would have received a legal lesson from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who, speaking on this bill, drew the attention of the house to section 95 of the British North America Act, which reads:

In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province, and to immigration into the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to agriculture in any or all of the provinces, and to immigration into any or all of the provinces;

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre directed attention particularly to the following provision in this section:

—and any law of the legislature of a province relative to agriculture or to immigration shall have effect in and for the province as long and as far only as it is not repugnant to any act of the parliament of Canada.

The hon. gentleman added:

So it would seem to a layman at least that we need not worry too much with regard to the difficulty of jurisdiction if this dominion parliament acts in the matter.

The hon. gentleman may rest assured that that learned lawyer, Mr. Taschereau, will not answer him; Mr. Taschereau will try to wiggle out of the question but will refuse to face the facts and will play politics as before.

I have said that the Liberal party, with its thirty-seven years of reign in our province, has made a muddle of our farming industry. The same applies to our fisheries, as the hon. members for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) know only too well. Having fought to obtain the return of the fisheries to the province, the provincial authorities, I am now informed, would like to return them to the federal government if they could do so without admitting that they had muddled the whole industry. If they could only return them without disclosing their errors and mismanagement of the industry they would do so immediately. I am sorry to say however that by his actions Mr. Taschereau is not paving the way to conciliation and cooperation.

I could go further and show his blunder in relation to our major national resources and colonization, but I have said enough. Our farmers, and those whose duty it is to deal with them, are now well aware of the insincerity of Mr. Taschereau towards them, and I feel that the hour has come when they will readily approve of the present measure as a first step towards the rehabilitation of their agriculture.

No doubt the bill as drafted is not perfect; it could not be in a country like ours, so vast and with so many different mentalities throughout the nine different provincial units which form its economic expanse. But I really feel that it is made sufficiently elastic to bring the present organizations, whether provincial or private, into cooperation with those which may be formed by the federal government in order that this new form of government in our industry, not only agriculture but, I would say also, manufacturing—and I am referring to the consumers as well—which may in time be established, may accord with the words of John Pym, indicating the best form of government, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has somewhere said, "actuating and disposing every part and member" of our three principal industries "towards the common good" of each and every individual in our dominion.

If I may paraphrase the words of the leader of the opposition, in another sphere of his activities, I would say that with time this bill, with the various changes which experience alone will show to be necessary, will realize the practical fundamentals of that cooperation required in the agricultural, manufacturing and labour-consuming industry, to ensure for each that purchasing power which, as the right hon. gentleman has stated elsewhere: "is not only a power limited to obtaining commodities but is a power which extends to controlling"—I use his own words —"conditions under which commodities are produced and services rendered."

I must congratulate our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) upon bringing down to this house a bill which embodies the principles laid down to a great extent by the leader of the opposition in his book Industry and Humanity. Yet the Liberal leader continues to attack the bill. He declared that it was autocratic and gave to the board to be formed powers which were excessive. Will my right hon. friend allow me, referring once more to his book at page 425, to quote his words as follows:

> Without permitting wide discretionary authority to the individuals chosen to administer and execute the laws, and without reserving to them ample power to give, and to compel obedience to orders, it would be impossible for the business of government in the state to be carried on.

These principles are embodied in the bill now before the house. Some laws are made for political purposes and, so far as the public are concerned, are a sham, presuming to give them something for which they have been asking; but when the hour arrives for putting the measure into force, those who are called upon to execute the law find that they are without power. The present measure is not a political sham law; it is one created to bring about action.

The leader of the opposition and his colleagues appear before the house and the public to be adverse to this legislation, yet is it not a law of coordination, of organization toward our economic recovery? The leader of the opposition in one breath said that his Liberal party concurred in the principles of the Liberal party in England, yet are not the principles of the Liberal party in England founded on the Manchester school of laissez-faire? But in the next breath he declared that his party was not in favour of a policy of laissez-faire as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has declared it to be. If the Liberal party is not in favour of the Bennett Conservative principles of peace and good order as laid down by the present government since 1930 and is not in favour of a policy of laissez-faire, may I ask then whether the leader of the opposition has not led his party to bolshevism and chaos, as was charged last November by one of our most eminent men in Quebec?

[Mr. Laurin.]

One last remark: The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) and the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) have declared that this bill does not protect the consumer, and the hon. member for Hants-Kings would have liked to have a consumers' committee formed. Were an exclusive consumers' committee formed, its mission would have tended solely toward the benefit of the consumer, disregarding the interests of the producer. That is not the purpose of the bill; its aim is to create, not class legislation but the cooperation of all members of the nation towards a common goal—purchasing power.

Before resuming my seat may I say that I shall always have a distinct remembrance of this occasion since to-night I have had the honour of making my maiden speech in English.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, this debate has covered a wide range of arguments both for and against the principle of the bill. I therefore do not intend to detain the house very long, because I doubt very much whether I could refer to anything particularly new in connection with the matter. The bill of course is drawn in somewhat general terms, and consequently lends itself to a wide scope of imagination on the part of hon. members. I have gone over quite a number of the speeches delivered, and the arguments advanced by some would remind one of the mythological story of Pandora's box which was supposed to contain all the ills that flesh is heir to, while others regard it as full of all the blessings that can come to humanity. The bill, however, is an experiment and necessarily so. We are actually trying something that is new and we must do so because we are living under new conditions. Therefore, if it is possible for critics to sit down and point to this, that and the other danger, I am not surprised, because, no matter how much care is exercised, we cannot get away from danger and the possibility of error. How much more, then, is it possible to say that dangers may arise when we are trying to do something that is new? Everything new in the world has been attacked by somebody—new proposals, new discoveries, the good and the bad, have been laughed at.

A good deal of time has been taken up in the house in arguing about just how much evil this board could do if it really wanted to do that. There is no question about it because if you give any individual or board power to do good you cannot separate from that the power to do evil. Every human being, every human agency has a potential devil as well as a potential angel and we cannot entirely avoid either in anything we try to do. So I am not at all surprised that certain dangers have been pointed out as possibilities arising from the setting up of this board.

There is need for something of this kind. Producers in various lines throughout the length and breadth of Canada have tried to build up their own cooperative organizations and have succeeded in doing some measure of good, but I do not believe there is in this country to-day a cooperative organization that believes it has or really can get control of the marketing situation without some government assistance. I do not know of any such organization. Cooperative organizations in the last ten years have had their ups and downs. I know hardly any cooperative organization that has been functioning with any measure of success, that intends to go back on cooperation and that is not asking for some further control of marketing conditions in the interest of the producers.

I intend to confine my argument and my illustrations to the subject of live stock, because I am more familiar with the conditions pertaining thereto than with those affecting any of the other commodities that may be handled by boards set up in accordance with the provisions of this legislation and working in cooperation with the provinces and cooperative organizations. In 1931 we had a peculiar situation in Canada; one of the cooperatives had a contract to ship cattle to a cooperative in the old land and was doing well, building up reserves until Britain abandoned the gold standard. Then the change in the value of British currency and the drop in prices relative to all prices in this country at once put the export cattle business of the dominion in jeopardy, because there was no way to protect shippers exporting to the old country from the loss arising out of the difference in exchange. I believe if we had had then a board somewhat along the lines of the board now proposed to be set up we might have adjusted that loss, on the small percentage of our cattle being exported, on the basis of the cattle industry itself carrying the burden, thus preventing the ruinous decline of prices that followed and has continued up to 1933.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that this measure was evidence of the fact that parliament is losing control over the executive. But parliament at any session can repeal the act founded upon this bill if it wants to; it can abolish the whole thing, so surely we have parliamentary control. But throughout the whole of his speech, extending over a period of two hours, he did not have a word to say about the plight in which the farmers find themselves due to the very low prices that prevail for their products. The right hon. gentleman said a great deal about liberty. What about liberty? A policeman on the street corner regulating traffic is interfering with liberty, but he is preserving more liberty than he is destroying. The leader of the opposition calls attention to the fact that certain rights were wrested from the crown years ago when the Magna Charta was secured. Then he goes on to say that he is not an advocate of laissez-faire, and points to certain bills passed by Liberals regulating and controlling industry and various groups within industry. The rest of his argument seems to be to the effect that bills passed to regulate industry by other parties should be thrown into the discard or killed. If it was a sound principle in the last century to regulate hours of labour and wages and working conditions, it is just as sound to tackle the problem confronting us to-day, which are creating just as great difficulties for the farmers as were experienced in connection with workers in factories in the centuries past.

The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) the ex-Minister of Agriculture, is supporting the principle of this bill, and I am not surprised that he should do so. He had the responsibility when in office of administering the legislation and organization for the control and elimination of bovine tuberculosis and the maintenance and improvement of the health of live stock generally. Every time you have a government organization coming into the picture there is the possibility of coercion of some individuals. Was there no coercion of individuals in connection with the enforcement of health regulations in regard to live stock? Certainly there was, and there were mistakes made. But I submit that because the government came into the picture we made progress in the matter of health of live stock and a healthful food supply for the people of Canada and the people to whom we export our products, and this could not have been accomplished had it been left to individual farmers throughout the length and breadth of the country. The same thing is true in connection with hogs and the control of hog cholera. I submit that individuals cannot do for themselves what governments can do for them. It is true that there are some things that can best be left to the individual, but it is also true that the best progress has been made through cooperation, between individuals organized in cooperative associations, and between these organizations and governments, provincial and federal. I believe that marketing conditions in Canada and throughout the world, especially in connection with live stock, make it necessary to-day that governments should assist in that problem. How can individual farmers in Saskatchewan or Manitoba or the Peace River country, handling a few head of live stock, keep abreast of the necessary knowledge concerning quota regulations, tariffs, shipping and market conditions in the various markets of Canada as well as of Great Britain? How can individuals and organizations, without some coordinating body, pick and choose and control the sending of the right type of product to Great Britain and decide upon the right type to keep in Canada and send to the various home markets? In order to do that it is necessary to be able to measure the demand. It requires statistical information that individuals have not the time or the facilities to obtain; other information is required as to health conditions and so on. I submit that with a board of the kind proposed there are possibilities of efficient handling and marketing of our live stock, with a guarantee of quality and consequent protection of the name of Canada in connection with its exports to the British market that would not be possible under any other arrangement.

Mr. MULLINS: A man who knows his business.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I would like to give a few illustrations that come to my mind as to what "rugged individualism" means in connection with marketing, showing why it is a good thing to limit the right of individuals to do what they like. Years ago there was a very good crop of potatoes in Scotland. The price was very low. But when spring came there was a demand for potatoes in New York; some shipments were going forward, and the price improved. Then a Glasgow dealer with more desire for profit than conscience sent over a load of bad potatoes and ruined the market. Would it have been a good thing for Scotland if there had been a board watching the kind of potatoes that went out, with the right to say to this man; "You cannot send these bad potatoes out of the country"? Yet that would be an interference with his liberty. A few years ago in northern Alberta we had some experience with marketing turkeys on the Pacific coast through a government organization. There was what we thought an orderly market, in turkeys going forward in a reasonable flow. Those in charge of the shipments had knowledge of what the market would take and were feeding it, providing enough to meet the demand at reasonable prices. A few others who were interested in shipping turkeys, without any attempt to keep in touch with the conditions, sent out a few extra loads, more than the market would absorb, and the result was they not only took a loss themselves but broke the price generally. It was not good for the producer; it was not good for the consumers, because it certainly interfered with the supply of turkeys from northern Alberta in future years.

I do not believe that this argument about the consumer is well taken. You cannot build a civilization on either producers or consumers alone; you have to consider both. When someone says: "Oh the producers are getting too much; we have got to look at this from the standpoint of the consumer," it seems to me like saying; Here is a man with only one good left leg; all we need is another man with a good right leg. Rather we should say; "We will have a man with two legs, both sound." And so we seek a civilization with two sound legs, represented by producers and consumers. What a body of this kind should aim at is not low prices to the consumers or high prices to the producers, but knowledge of what is a reasonable cost of efficient production, and then see to it that both parties to the bargain get fair treatment. Any other approach to the question of marketing is in my judgment entirely wrong.

It has been said that in this bill the minister is asking for very wide powers. But I would rather ask for powers a little wider than necessary than not wide enough. We shall have to trust someone to use ordinary common sense in connection with the application of this act to industry. It has been said that we should do exactly as they do in Britain. But Britain is a small country, about the size of my constituency, and there are 244 other constituencies. Britain is a country with stability in practically all lines of production, going on from year to year and from generation to generation, while we have tremendous fluctuations in our production, with changes as between district and district and province and province from year to year. It has been said that we should refer every scheme to parliament, but it has been pointed out also that the British parliament sits about twelve months of the year while we sit only part of the year, and we have ten parliaments instead of one. It is an entirely different thing, and I want to say that we have to try this measure on the basis of trial and error, if you like, using our best judgment as we proceed and learning by experience as we go along. I believe there are sections in the bill that may be amended in committee, but control through a body set up by the central government, cooperating with the provinces and the producers' organizations, is an absolute essential in practically every line of marketing of which I have knowledge.

The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) read into the record two letters which he received, and while in his argument he did not endorse the sentiments they contained they created the impression that the cooperatives of the old country were very much opposed to policies of this sort because we were trying to raise prices to the agriculturists. The hon. member referred to two letters that appeared in the Glasgow Herald, I believe. I think anyone who has sufficient knowledge of the subject to express an opinion must know that agricultural prices must come up; if they do not we had better get ready for wholesale bankruptcy and repudiation, because there can be no avoiding it. Agricultural prices have to come up at least to the point where they will pay the cost of efficient production, or we must face the alternative. But I do not think it is true to say that even the Scottish cooperative does not realize that prices of wheat are too low. The Scottish cooperative had some experience in connection with wheat in Saskatchewan, and they went out of business some years ago. I do not think people who have had an experience of that kind would be expected to think wheat prices should not be raised, as well as the prices of other agricultural products. I obtained from the library of the Department of Agricuture the People's Year Book, the 17th annual of the English and Scottish cooperative wholesale societies, 1934. Under the heading "Prices and Debtors" here is what I found:

> The farmers, and other producers of raw materials and what are called "primary" articles, have been ruined by the fall in their prices because they habitually work with borrowed money, borrowed on contracts made long ago. So the farmer found that in order to pay interest on his debts, he had to sell twice or three times as much wheat as would have met the charge, if the wheat could be sold at the price current when the debt was contracted. In other words, the fall in prices has undermined the solvency of debtors and made debt contracts inequitable, owing to the change in the value of money since they were first entered into. Unless prices can be restored to, and maintained at, a level that will enable debtors to meet their liabilities, a general bankruptcy and scaling down of debts was inevitable. This was especially so in America, where during the boom years debts had been contracted on an enormous scale; and so there was a good deal of justification for President Roosevelt, when he decided that the first and most important thing for him to do was to force prices up, and that the restoration of the gold standard might, as far as America was concerned, wait for a better opportunity.

There we have the clear statement that the Scottish cooperative believes the prices of primary products must be raised, so in setting up a board of this kind I do not think we need fear any danger from that source at all. I wish therefore, Mr. Speaker, to repeat that I support the principle of the bill and congratulate the minister on his attempt to bring something of this kind into effect.

Mr. CHARLES BOURGEOIS (Three Rivers-St. Maurice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as representative of the constituency of Three Rivers-St. Maurice, I cannot dissociate myself from the very important measure which the government requests this house to pass in order to create a dominion marketing board.

The constituency which I have the honour of representing, although comprising a relatively large number of industrial factories, particularly those which are engaged in paper manufacturing, is for the most part rural, and the St. Maurice valley includes a large number of parishes the prosperity of which depends especially on farming.

Our country should take pride in the fact that it is our present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who conceived, prepared and submitted to the consideration of the house, this bill intended to improve the methods and usages in practice in the marketing of our Canadian natural products and in our trade exports. No doubt the house delights in recognizing and admiring the high intellectual and moral merits of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and the pure patriotism which has always inspired him in the course of his public life. However, in considering the present bill, submitted for its approval, the house takes especially into account that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is—and he is entitled to be proud of the fact—a genuine and experienced farmer, possessing all the qualities of the man on the land, and, moreover, is the owner of a very prosperous farm where he puts into practice his knowledge.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURGEOIS (Translation): It is not my intention to enter into the minute details of this bill; others, possessing a wider experience, I frankly admit, have done so. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, numerous members on your right, sir, and some on the extreme left, have enumerated and set forth the benefits which we will derive from this measure.

It meets with opposition, much opposition, and our opponents not only have raised against its adoption all the objections that their imagination could bring to bear, but it also gave them the pretext to launch against the government an unrelenting attack which had its inception not so much because of the deficiencies in the bill as in the well known habit that our friends have developed of criticizing all measures emanating from this side of the house. However, this was to be expected and there is reason to note once more the inherent weakness of our parliamentary regime which causes certain minds to look upon and discuss questions from the strict viewpoint of their narrow political party interests rather than consider them on their merit and, in the present instance, with the idea of finding the most suitable remedy to the present situation which we all deplore.

Many economists have sought the causes of the present crisis; they have found that they are numerous: the world war, frantic overproduction and unrestrained stock speculations. However, it is not sufficient to limit ourselves to inquiry into the causes only and to confine ourselves simply to an academical discussion, what is of the utmost importance is to endeavour to accomplish something, apply the remedies. Heads of nations have recognized that this was an urgent duty. Hitler in Germany; Mussolini in Italy; Roosevelt in the neighbouring republic, have all maintained in their various respective experiments, that they had found the solution to the disheartening problem.

This is not the time to criticize the experiments tried out in other countries. What is important, however, to note—and I wish to draw the attention of the house on this particular point—is the tendency of governments to intervene in the free action of personal endeavours in order to regulate, concentrate them and thereby make them produce greater results, or what is better, results that they could not produce without such intervention.

But, the cry is raised: It is state monopoly, it is an encroachment on the rights of parliament, an attempt against our parliamentary regime and a step towards oligarchy which would suppress, in favour of a few, the authority that parliament must, by virtue of our constitution, possess over the affairs of our country!

[Mr. Bourgeois.]

The most bitter criticism is, especially directed against these so-called exorbitant powers granted to the governor in council, in the marketing board act. This criticism is, to my mind, most unreasonable. There is no cause for such fears, it is neither a question of state monopoly, such as Plato conceived it in his treatises "The Republic" and "The Laws," or of land nationalization advocated by Henry George. It is a bold measure, I admit, but necessary, the special character of which is justified by the exceptional grave circumstances in which we are situated at present.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURGEOIS (Translation): Since Louis Hébert established on the Canadian soil of New France the first farm, up to the settling of the Canadian west, numerous generations of farmers, in ploughing and seeding the land, succeeded in making a livelihood for themselves and their families. No one will truly contend that our soil has since become sterile. Whence comes this depression in farming? How does it happen that our farmers, toiling with the same steadfastness and energy, as in the past, on our lands, have, owing to the low prices of farm products, great difficulty in earning a livelihood, so much so that they can say with the "Chemineau" of Richepin:

Je songe aux blés coupés qui ne sont pas les nôtres
Et dont les épis mûrs font du pain pour les autres.

If closely examined we find that it is not, in this instance, so much a question of production as distribution. The establishing of co-operative societies in this country gave rise to great hopes which, unfortunately, were only partly realized. The reason is—as the hon. Minister of Agriculture pointed out—that these co-operative associations did not receive the help to which they were entitled, they were unable to organize on a stable financial basis, they had to meet a disloyal competition by certain corporations which were interested in seeing them disappear and they were also too busy marketing their products without giving a thought to quality and, I shall add, to labelling and packing. Darwin put forth the famous theory of "the survival of the fittest." I am not called upon to express an opinion on this theory from the view-point of natural sciences; however, it seems to me unquestionable that it is an undoubted maxim as regards natural products and their exportation.

Whether it is a question of local, national or world market, it is the best product which not only obtains the highest price, but has a better chance of finding a purchaser. That is the first object which is sought by the bill under consideration.

Secondly, it is important, that such a product be packed before being marketed, so as to make it as attractive as possible, regardless of its excellence, because, no matter what its quality may be, it will not find a purchaser, if, on the market, there is a foreign product superior to it in this respect. Moreover, it is necessary that it should be well labelled, the label should indicate the place where made and thus ensuring the best and most convincing advertisement.

If the present act which creates a marketing board, the subsidiary boards could bring about these three results, I think that there would be reason to be amply satisfied.

I do not contend that this bill—nor does the hon. Minister of Agriculture do so, as he plainly stated—is on all points perfect; however, to my mind, it is a loyal, sincere and excellent endeavour made to protect the farmer as much as the manufacturer.

Every farmer, in my constituency, that I consulted on the subject—and I had occasion to talk with a large number of them—look upon this measure favourably and they have expressed their faith in its efficiency. Mr. Albert Rioux, President of "L'Union catholique des cultivateurs" approved of it. Mr. J-S. Royer, President of the Canned Fruit and Vegetable Association, also approved of it.

While Mr. Oscar Gatineau in the "Bulletin des Agriculteurs" in its issue of April 5 last, expresses himself as follows:

No doubt, it is a real extraordinary scheme, a new departure. Some fear that the scheme may lead us too far while others think that the government assumes too much power.

We do not believe that any one can even imagine that the government intends to create a board detrimental to the farming class. Of all the governments we have had, at Ottawa, the Bennett government is the one which has shown the greatest readiness to help the farmers. Before contending that too much assistance has been given to farmers, there remains a long way to go. Let us not be anxious about others, they are somewhat there to champion their cause.

Mr. Bennett is not afraid to shoulder responsibilities, he has no hesitation in having the necessary powers turned over to him and he is not afraid to resort to whatever means are necessary to remedy the evils from which we suffer.

The farmers have therefore reason to rejoice in this bill which is being enacted for them and from which there is reason to expect much. What Mr. Bennett has done hitherto for the farming class warrants us to repose confidence in him for what he undertakes.

I do not wish to close my remarks without mentioning the fact that Mr. Robert Ryan, one of the most prominent liberals of Three Rivers and the leader of the Municipal Council of that city, has entirely approved of this bill. In a letter which he forwarded to the right hon. Prime Minister on April 13, 1934, Mr. Ryan enclosed a short essay dealing with the question under consideration and expresses himself as follows:

(Text). I believe the creation of the marketing board is a move in the right direction. On page 2, paragraph 4, in my brief, you will notice I made reference to a Co-operative Sales Corporation for the handling of farm products for exports. The marketing board is another, and perhaps a better method of accomplishing the same purpose.

In the above mentioned essay, he made the following judicial remarks.

I am a firm believer that the farmers of each province should produce all the farm products, for which there is a local demand, and for which the soil and climate are suitable. Products for export should be handled by a Co-operative Sales Corporation. These products, should be put up under a uniform trade mark with the name of the province stamped on each package or container. All produce should be graded and packed according to the instructions of the Sales Corporation.

The time has arrived for planned and not lopsided development, if we want Canada to be developed for the benefit of all its inhabitants, a more balanced rural population compared to the population of the cities and a proper balance between agricultural and industrial production and prices.

A success can only be made of farming when the farmer is decided and follows proper direction. A success can only be made of selling farm produce when the merchants and consumers are convinced that they should purchase such produce on account of quality, regular supply and good service. Therefore, the education of the farmer, merchant and consumer is absolutely necessary.

What is wanted is organization and leadership in centres that should be selected by the government, as points that should be developed for the collection, processing and distribution of farm products.

In this same essay Mr. Ryan, whose suggestions I entirely agree with, pointed out to the government the opportunity of subsidizing the growing of beets and this, especially, in the Three Rivers district.

In that locality and within a radius of 50 miles the soil is most favourable to the growth of this vegetable.

And he quoted in this respect a resolution adopted on April 1, 1922, by the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, the resolution contained the following recommendation:

Your committee further recommends that, if no successful attempt be made in the immediate future by the refineries to increase the facilities for the manufacture of beet sugar, the government should take into consideration steps to accomplish that end.

I hope—may I casually say so—that the government will find the means to put into practice these suggestions, for it would be an excellent means of increasing the wealth of this country and thereby reduce unemployment in that section.

I shall close my remarks by pointing out that the object of this bill is an excellent one; that if, in principle, the state must abstain to invade the personal activities of citizens, for fear of paralyzing them, there are situations—and the present is one of them—which necessitate the intervention of the state; that this bill owing to its provisions constitutes a sound measure necessitated by the critical circumstances in which we find ourselves and it behooves all members of this house to set aside all party lines and give it their entire approval.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, unable as I was, on account of illness, to follow the debate very closely, I have read most of the speeches which have been delivered in support of or in opposition to this measure. However, it was some time before I could arrive at a decision on the matter, because so many good arguments have been put forward on both sides. I should like to sum up as briefly as possible the decision at which I have arrived.

A clear distinction must be made between the object of the bill and parliamentary procedure. It may be because of my old habits as a British parliamentarian, but I think there is some reason for keeping close to parliamentary tradition. At the present stage, all that is before us is the object of the bill as expressed in the preamble and the title. This measure purports "to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith." I think I can safely say that, perhaps with the exception of a few ghosts haunting the ruins of Liberal economics, practically the whole house is committed to the principle of this bill. In fact, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), who was most effective in several parts of his speech, indicated that he was in favour of some measure to control the marketing of produce, both inside and outside of Canada. In the manner in which he made that statement he practically admitted the desirability of passing legislation to deal with marketing.

Therefore, it seems to me that the only logical position is that taken by the right hon. gentleman himself on the relief and central bank bills. In connection with both those measures he expressed strong views; he invoked the same arguments as he did against this measure, that they were against the spirit if not the letter of the constitution, that they meant the abdication of the rights of parliament to an irresponsible body or to the executive, as far as the spending of money under the relief act was concerned. However, he voted for the second reading of these bills, reserving to himself the right to oppose them in committee or on third reading if they were not amended according to his views. I followed his example in those two instances. When I spoke quite suddenly on the central bank bill it was to oppose the amendment proposed by my hon. friend to my left. I take the same ground now. Being in favour of some measure to deal with the marketing of produce, I am not opposed to the second reading of the bill.

As regards the measure itself I do not propose to follow the unparliamentary example given by most speakers and enter into a close analysis of all the clauses of the bill. That is the work of the committee after the bill has passed its present stage. But the preamble and title of the bill are not comprehensive enough to justify our voting for or against the second reading without entering into a consideration of at least the main features of the bill. In this connection my opinion comes closer to that of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) than to any other opinion expressed in the house. I read his speech very carefully and I am pleased to repeat now what I told him in private, that it is the best speech I have heard from him since I came back to this house.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That may not be saying very much.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, it is saying a great deal. His speech contained as much wit as any of his others, and perhaps was a little more serious.

The bill contains some provisions which are good or which may produce good. It contains other provisions which may produce good or bad results according to the manner in which the law may be administered, but that may be said of almost all legislation. It contains other provisions which in my humble opinion are decidedly bad.

I shall not deal at any length with the constitutional aspect, although there are two features of the bill which could be considered from that angle. First, there is the one raised by the leader of the opposition, a serious one, of the possible conflict of jurisdiction between this parliament and the provincial legislatures. We come up against that obstacle at every session, and I am afraid the more we have to do with economic and social problems, the more that conflict will be increased. The time will come when, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated so forcibly some weeks ago, the constitution shall have to be revised, in agreement with the provinces. But I shall not deal with that aspect now.

There is a further constitutional issue, the contempt with which the government—I am using the words of the leader of the opposition—treats parliament and parliamentary institutions. Of course, there is some truth in that, but no party in this house has the right to throw stones at their opponents. The Liberal government put this country into war in 1899 by an order in council. That was certainly a far deeper breach of the spirit of the constitution than anything I ever heard of until 1914, when the Conservative administration repeated the same crime with the unanimous approval of the Liberal party. Then again, in 1916, when both parties agreed to prolong parliament beyond its constitutional term, thereby preventing the people to pass judgment on their war policy. That action received unanimous approval with the exception of the hon. member for Nicolet, who resigned. That parliament is now defunct and I can repeat what was then said outside the house: through an infamous pact between the two parties, it prolonged its own life for one year, in utter disregard of the people, in order to plunge Canada more deeply into the abyss of war out of which we have not yet emerged. Surely, at that time, some of the tenets of Liberalism were violated far more deeply than they are by this bill. However, I shall not insist on that at the present time.

The only analysis which I wish to make of the bill is to attempt to foresee the possible operations of the central board and the local boards. As regards the central board to be created by the government, no doubt the leader of the opposition is right when he says that it is practically an abdication on the part of parliament, and even of the executive, a surrender of its powers into the hands of a body very distantly responsible to parliament. But this is only a further step in the direction which parliament has followed for many years, unavoidably in many instances, but perhaps avoidably in others. Some weeks ago, in reference to another matter, I reminded the house that when this parliament created the audit office it abdicated one of its essential functions. It handed over certain powers to a permanent official, nominated by the government and practically independent of the authority of the Commons, inasmuch as he must be impeached by both houses of parliament. In that instance parliament handed over to that official one of its essential functions, namely, the control of its own expenditures. Yet that was considered an extremely wise measure of reform; and on the whole, I think, it has worked for the good of Canada and of this parliament. When the house handed over to the tribunals of the country, to judges irresponsible to the people and to parliament, the power to decide whether in certain circumstances a member of parliament had been properly elected or not, that was again an abdication of an essential function of parliament, which is to control itself and the qualifications of its members. But let us come nearer to our own day. The creation of the railway commission, one of the best administrative acts of the Liberal government headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was the abdication of a parliamentary function into the hands of an outside body. The creation of the Canadian National corporation was a further abdication of the authority of parliament; so was the creation of the wheat board and of the tariff board as well.

In these days of complicated problems precipitating themselves upon the attention of parliament and of the various classes of our people, and upon the attention of the nation at large, in Canada as in all other countries, the action of parliament would be paralyzed if parliament pretended to deal with all such problems as the parliaments of old dealt with theirs. The world has become mechanized; it has become extremely complicated in matters of trade, finance and so forth; and it requires constant attention, study and the effective work of technicians to cope with all the problems that present themselves. Now, admittedly parliament is unable to do that work; governments are unable to do it; and regretful as it may be to old parliamentarians like the leader of the opposition and myself, attached as we are to those time honoured principles of political liberty, we must recognize that facts are stronger than theories and that we must abide by the necessities of our time. Nevertheless I think that the leader of the opposition and all those who have spoken against this legislation have done their duty and rendered a service to the country in pointing out the dangers in this bill. My friends on the opposite side condemn them for their lack of patriotism because they do not rise above the level of party spirit. Well, I have heard that story from government supporters for the last fifty years; and reading through my parliamentary history of Canada and of England, I find that ministerial supporters have always seen in opposition members a lack of principle, while opposition members have had the same opinion of government supporters. And I suppose that both are equally right and wrong.

It is the duty of an opposition, I will not say to oppose everything, but to criticize; and in order to awaken public opinion they must criticize strongly. It is not the business of the opposition to pass over the defects of ministerial measures. In that regard therefore I would go a little further than the hon. member for Melville. The hon. gentleman balances things. He indicated six good points in the bill, but he did not enumerate the evil points, though he expressed himself quite clearly with regard to some of them. I will not enter into details, but I will state my objections as briefly as possible.

The creation of the central board is I think a necessity in order to cope with such conditions as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has so ably pointed out, such conditions as exist now in every producing and consuming country, in every importing and exporting country with which we deal at present or with which we may deal in the future. To meet those conditions we must create an economic machinery capable of dealing with the means which those countries have at their disposal. All those countries, whether fascistic, communistic, liberal in the broad sense of the word, or conservative—even old England is moving fast in this direction—are creating machinery to control production, distribution, imports and exports. Even if we adopt the broader policy in trading, which is so ably advocated at each session by the opposition, a policy with which I sympathize much more than I do with the ultraprotective policy of the Conservatives—even if the Liberals came into power and succeeded in getting other countries to purchase more of our goods, selling more of their goods to us—the Liberals would need to have in their hands such legislation as would provide an economic machinery capable of dealing with other countries with their own weapons.

All the countries of Europe have some form of organization similar to that which is contemplated in the first part of this bill, and I think that we are bound to arm ourselves in the same manner. But where my objections are so strong that I will certainly vote against the third reading of the bill if it is not amended, is with respect to all that deals with the organization of local boards. Perhaps in this I am not expressing the views of many on this side of the house, but I must say that I dread much more the tyranny and abuses of power on the part of the local boards than of the central board. The central board will have to deal with the large issues. They will have to follow the trend of trade all the world over in order to find out, as was so well pointed out to-night by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), what the requirements of foreign countries will be, not next year or ten years hence but this year—what this country will purchase of our apples, what that country is prepared to purchase of our wheat, what the other country will purchase of live stock or meat products, and so on. No local board can do that, nor can any individual. That is a truism, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) knows. No individual, no small group of farmers anywhere can do that. Therefore that board must be on the alert and be prepared to inform all producers and exporters throughout the country of the conditions of the market, what produce they should prepare this year for export to this, that and the other country. So far as that is concerned, the creation of the federal board is essential and it must be created as soon as possible; it must set to work from morning to night every day of the week and every week of the month. I repeat: No committee of parliament and no executive power can do that.

But when we come to the question of local boards, I have read with much interest the speech of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) who, of course, knows of conditions in England and thus is enabled to enlighten the house as to the defects in this bill. The hon. member for Peace River attempted this evening to answer him by again pointing out something which is very true—the difference in conditions between England and Canada. Of course we admit that, but that does not answer two of the contentions of the hon. member for Last Mountain. There is, first, the danger of creating a small body of men in each locality, in each county, and numerous bodies in each province who, for their own individual or collective interest, may tyrannize over the other producers in the same locality or the same county or, if they arrive at an understanding with similar bodies in their region, may tyrannize over the whole region, the whole province and eventually the whole country. Therefore, precisely because of the difference in conditions between Canada and England and because of the difficulty a central board will have of knowing what is really going on in each locality, we may within a short time find ourselves faced with a situation that will be very detrimental to a large proportion of the producers; whether it be a majority or a minority, does not matter very much. In that respect I do not follow the hon. member for Last Mountain. I have no more faith in the infallibility of majorities than in that of minorities. Parties in the minority should not insist too much on the infallibility of majorities. As Montesquieu said once, it would be better in tribunals and parliaments generally to give the award or judgment according to the minority, because the minority is generally in the right and the majority generally in the wrong. That is the condition I dread; I dread it for a large proportion of the producers, farmers, small industrialists, who may directly or indirectly be affected by the operations of this legislation. I dread it most of all for the consumers. The hon. member for Peace River said very properly that producers and consumers are not essentially inimical to one another and that, in a body properly constituted, consumers and producers should act as the two legs under the same body. But I am afraid that this legislation has a tendency to set apart the two legs and to split the body in two. As a matter of fact, the consumer is not even mentioned in this bill; there is no proviso whatever to protect him. Let us not forget, if it is true that the body of the producers and the body of the consumers must not be raised in enmity against each other, consumers to a certain extent are producers and all producers are consumers of other goods which they do not produce. If this legislation is to work for the benefit of all, some great changes will have to be made in order to protect people—whether they be a minority or a majority, I repeat, does not matter—who will not agree to any scheme proposed by any five or ten individuals in any locality, against the tyranny or misrepresentation of the body framing the scheme and sending it to Ottawa to be approved.

The board or the minister will of necessity be subjected to all sorts of influences. We must take men and things as they are in our country as elsewhere, perhaps more so in ours than in many other countries. Political influences will be at work. In constituencies represented by members supporting the government, you will see that schemes will be accepted much more readily if they are recommended either directly by the member or through his friends on those local boards. That will be the case whether my friends to the right or my friends to the left are in power. I have had experience of parties for forty years: the party spirit is the same in every party. Suppose my hon. friends to the extreme left were to come to power and acquire the qualities and defects of the other parties, the same situation would arise. Human nature is always the same.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): That party would be worse than the others.

Mr. BOURASSA: No; do not pose as the Pharisee. It may be said: Then nothing should be done. No; we cannot remain paralysed because of the danger of party spirit or local tyranny. But I insist very strongly on the necessity of incorporating in this legislation proper safeguards, first, against that disposition of a few individuals to control the affairs of their locality, of their region, to their own interest, to the interest of those who would be associated with them, disregarding that of others; and, second, more especially to protect the consumers in all classes of the community and in all parts of the dominion. That is entirely apart from the necessity so ably pointed out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. His argument applies mainly to foreign trade, and, in that respect, the attitude of the government is in my opinion incontrovertible. Their position is not one of taste; it is one of necessity. They would be remiss in their duty if they did not now cope energetically with this aspect of the problem, dealing with it with a strong hand and creating as powerful a body as they can to handle the situation. But internally the matter is entirely different; internally the views of the leader of the opposition still have great force. Of course you cannot pass legislation controlling any activity without interfering in some degree with individual liberty. But if we want to live under such conditions as we have come to love and as for generations past we have benefited by, not only in this but in the various countries of our origin, we must not interfere with individual liberty beyond the absolutely essential point. This legislation opens the way to all sorts of interferences with the liberty of the farmer, the gardener, the fruit grower, the dairyman, etc., and the consumer.

There is one argument made by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) which I think has to be considered very seriously as regards internal business. He said the important thing was not so much the control of quantity as of quality. As regards foreign trade I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce has shown in a manner that cannot be disputed that we must control quantity as well as quality with regard to exports and imports. But as regards the exchange of goods between one county and another in the same province, or between different provinces, if you put in the hands of a few individuals in each locality the power to control all the local activities, the shipping of goods to this town and that and the other from east to west, from west to east, I am afraid you will complicate the economic machinery to a much greater extent than you will serve the interests of the various classes.

With these remarks I think I have made it quite clear that in voting for the second reading I am not committing myself to the support of the legislation, but simply following the example of the leader of the opposition as regards the central bank and the relief act, in fact following the traditions of parliament. I support the purport of this bill; I may oppose most of its provisions.

Before closing I would like to pass a remark for the benefit of my friends of the province of Quebec, especially my good Conservative friends from that province, and even some of my Liberal friends. For the last six months some of them have been very busy depicting the group to the left here as something akin to the bolshevists of Russia. The hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois) has quoted the opinion of the president of the Catholic Union of Farmers in the province of Quebec in favour of this bill, and of course he approves of it entirely because it is a government bill. But has he reflected that this bill is not only the most socialistic measure that to my knowledge has ever been presented in this parliament, but the one most imbued with the spirit of sovietism, especially that part which I have denounced? The creation of these local boards seems to have been borrowed from the legislation introduced in Russia for the creation of the sovietic local boards which control all local activities. They pretend that they leave each individual farmer to do what he pleases, but they make life impossible to him; the kulak has become a serf on his own land just as much as the member of the kolkhoz. Well, this bill is creating a replica of the kolkhoz under the komintern. Curiously enough that approval of the president of the Catholic Union of Farmers—the Catholic Union, mind you—appeared in the same paper which, the week previous, by the pen of an undoubtedly very honest and clever cleric, denounced the bolshevistic tendencies of Mr. Woodsworth and his party. I wonder if those same defenders of the faith and of social order, always on the alert to see cropping up the spirit of Lenin in the province of Quebec, will uphold the position taken by the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice and by the president of the Catholic Union of Farmers. If they do, if they remain silent in face of this legislation, then they will strengthen the opinion growing in the province of Quebec that these defenders of state, church and society, are much more concerned about the defence of the Tory party than of ordered society. It will be a new example of that display of zeal for religion which took place at the time an order in council was passed prohibiting the importation of Russian coal in order to enable Senator Webster and his associates to maintain their infernal monopoly in the city of Montreal, thereby reducing thousands of people to misery this last winter. And all that was done in the name of religion! But of course, when a large concern in the eastern part of the province wanted to import Russian oil, they were given a free hand. Religion was endangered by Russian coal coming to Montreal, but religion was in no danger from the importation of Russian oil to enable one of these mergers, so strongly and so properly denounced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to make a little more money at the expense of the good people of the province of Quebec. It may look a little out of place, but in face of the kind of propaganda which has been carried on in Quebec for some weeks past, I have thought it my duty to protest and to show—I will not say the hypocrisy; no, I do not like such words—but to show the levity of mind of some people and the danger of fixed ideas. Some people have an obsession concerning Jews and bolshevists; everything good that happens has been in spite of the Jews and the bolshevists, and everything bad is their fault. I have no admiration for the bolshevists; I love the good Jews, such as my hon. friend here. I do not like the bad Jews any more than I do the bad Christians; but I do say that if we educate the good people of Quebec in such disregard of facts, facts economic, facts political and facts social, they will before long cease to be the vanguard of social order to whom the Prime Minister rendered such well deserved testimony in an interview he gave a few days ago. Once more I say: Do not exploit religion and prejudice when you are dealing with economic questions. Treat them on their merits, and pass the kind of legislation you should pass, without beclouding the issue.

Mr. F. R. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): First, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the government and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) on the introduction of this bill. Having been interested practically all my life in the distribution of merchandise of all kinds, including the products of the farm, I sometimes wonder that the primary producer has got along as well as he has up to this time. If we look about us and then cast our minds back a few short years and see what has happened to the distributing system of this country I am sure we can come to no other conclusion than that the old distributing system has fallen down. The remarks I intend to make I think can be applied to the manner in which the primary producer has suffered in this country during the past number of years.

Let us consider for example what has happened to the wholesale drygoods trade, once a very great business. In Toronto when I was a young man, W. R. Brock & Company was a very big concern, and there were several others, John Macdonald & Company; Caldecott, Burton & Spence, Nisbett and Auld; Robert Darling; Greenshields of Montreal; Gault Brothers of Winnipeg and Montreal; Robinson Little & Company of London and Winnipeg; Stobart of Winnipeg, and R. J. Whitla & Company of Winnipeg. What has happened to all these firms? Every one of them was doing a distributing business of not less than a million dollars a year. But what has happened? They have all gone out of business. The same thing applies to the boot and shoe business and, to some extent, to the grocery business, and, Mr. Speaker, the same thing applies to the primary producer at this time. If the system under which he has been operating for many years past is permitted to continue, the primary producer will go out of business also. It is a marvellous thing, when we think of it, having regard to the distributing system that has been in operation in this country, that we have done as well as we have. The records of Bradstreet and Dun are strewn with the wrecks of these institutions throughout the country, involving hundred of millions of dollars, yet this system has been permitted to continue. I must say that it is my firm conviction, as one who has been in the retail business in a moderately large way for a number of years, as an independent in western Canada, that to some extent the manufacturers have been the architects of their own misfortune. They built up great institutions in this country and gave them secret rebates and concessions that an independent man could not get. The result has been that they have practically no independent men left; that is what it has come to to-day with the advent of the chain stores and branch department stores. That situation has been brought about to some extent by the system which has been employed by the manufacturers of this country, and more particularly by the manufacturers of eastern Canada.

The same thing applies to the manner in which the primary producer has been forced to market his products, and I say it is a good thing that to-day we have a bill going through this house that will give the primary producer some control over the way in which his products will be marketed to the ultimate consumer. I was amazed to hear the remarks of the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) the other day. The hon. gentleman said he was a retailer, yet he was concerned about what was going to happen to the ultimate consumer and as to what price the consumer would pay for the products he purchased if this bill came into effect. So far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the consumer in this country has always paid the price, but the primary producer has never received it. There are so many middle men who come in after the product leaves the farm and before it reaches the retail merchant and finally the ultimate consumer; there are so many profits all down the line that the consumer always pays the price.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, in the last few years and particularly up to 1930, we had mergers, amalgamations, maladministration of finances, financial racketeers and bucket shop gentlemen going through the country organizing this and that and merging this and that. To-day in the country there are scarcely any independent business men left, and as a result the primary producer finds himself forced to market a large percentage of his goods through these large institutions. So I think it is about time some sort of machinery should be set up by which the primary producer may have some control over the manner in which his goods are marketed, and I congratulate the minister upon having introduced this measure at this time.

I was also amazed the other day to listen to the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), who spoke for some forty minutes. During his whole speech he did not devote a word to anything other than wheat. I am afraid some of our rural members have a wheat complex.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask hon. members to keep better order, since those in the other parts of the house cannot hear what is being said.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, practically ninety-five per cent of our farm products are consumed within the confines of our own country. I contend, and I think my statement can be substantiated, that our own home market is the best market we have. For that reason I say we should protect that market and do everything we can to help the farmers get every cent possible out of the amount paid by the ultimate consumer. Let us consider for a moment the man who grows potatoes, we will say, in eastern Canada. Let me say that I have sold potatoes brought from New Brunswick to Saskatchewan for $3 a bushel, but the farmer in New Brunswick did not get a very large share of the $3 that was paid in the province of Saskatchewan; in fact he did not get what he should have received when there is a short crop of potatoes in this part of the country. On the other hand when there is a short crop in eastern Canada and we have potatoes in western Canada they are shipped by brokers, jobbers and others and the fruit and vegetable dealers and hucksters get the profit instead of the farmers. As I see it the creation of this board is an attempt to direct that traffic and that business where it will bring the greatest return to the grower, and that is all we can reasonably expect. I do not say the bill is perfect; there is no doubt that it will be changed as time goes on, but at least it is an attempt to do something and I think a very great step in the interests of the primary producer.

For many years I have been amazed at the fruit growing industry of western Canada. Men have come to me in past years at their wits' end because of the condition of that industry; many of these men retired from the prairie provinces and went to live in British Columbia because of the climate. They were under the thumb of one of the greatest combines in this country, the Nash Fruit Company, which was fined some $200,000 in 1926 for some of the things it did, but which is still going strong, though now it is merged with a concern known as Western Grocers.

Some years ago a gentleman by the name of Mr. W. P. Riley, then of Port Arthur but later of Winnipeg, bought out the old A. McDonald Company of Winnipeg. He floated a great issue of shares on the market, which were purchased by the public; then the shares dropped to the point where they could not be sold at all. The chain store then came into the picture, and this gentleman established a chain known as the Red and White stores. Now he has these grocery stores all through the country. I do not know what sort of deal he made with them, but it would be interesting to find out.

At any rate this gentleman merged the Western Grocers with this Nash-Symington fruit combine, and to-day they control thirty-five distributing houses in western Canada. I am told that the ordinary brokerage fee on a car of fruit is about $10. I am informed on very good authority—I should say rather competent authority—that this concern collects as much as $40 and $50 per car. They go further; they collect secret rebates from the manufacturers of eastern Canada, and I understand that last year they placed in a special reserve account an amount in the neighbourhood of $100,000. What chance has the primary producer or the fruit grower in the province of British Columbia when he is up against a combination of that kind? So again I say I congratulate the minister on bringing in this measure which will give the primary producers throughout the length and breadth of this country at least a chance to better marketing conditions in connection with the products they grow.

I have been interested in the committee on price spreads and mass buying which from time to time has been holding meetings. In the city of Saskatoon I happen to be a shareholder in a stockyard company. If there is one thing Mr. Speaker, more than another which affects the distribution of products of the primary producer it is in many instances the set up of distributing organizations. The committee would be well advised to go thoroughly into that branch of their investigations.

For a moment I should like to speak about the stockyard in my own city. May I say that I was somewhat instrumental in organizing or having organized the stockyard I have mentioned. Mr. H. P. Kennedy of Toronto, who is now president of the Union Stockyards of Saskatoon and president of the Edmonton Stockyards of Edmonton, and his manager, came to our city, and I hold in my hand an extract from a proposal which they laid before a number of business men of my city when in 1926 or 1927 they suggested to us, and we to them, that a stockyard should be organized in the city of Saskatoon. The extract is as follows:

It may be desirable however to have a few prominent men in the neighbourhood of the city of Saskatoon interested and a limited amount of stock will be available for them on the same basis as the other subscribers.

Then, I have before me the prospectus of the Union Stockyards of Saskatoon, Limited, in which I find the names of the following directors: H. P. Kennedy, live stock dealer, Toronto, president; Charles Bauckham, trust company manager, Toronto, vice-president; John L. Juhlin, stock yards manager, Edmonton; W. H. Adamson, insurance adjuster, Toronto, and J. H. S. Kerr, manager, Toronto. Norman Sommerville and Company of 67 Yonge Street, Toronto, are given as the solicitors, and the Dominion bank as the bankers. The point I am getting at is this, that the concern I have mentioned was organized and has done very excellent business from its inception. To-day it is beginning to pay and to pay handsomely. I am not so deeply interested in that particular feature, because those of us who put our money into the deal did not do so having in view any great dividends we might derive from it or any handsome returns which might come to us. We were more concerned with establishing a live stock industry in and about the city in which I live, and setting up facilities which would make possible the marketing of live stock on a little more profitable basis than in the past.

Then, as time goes on and the stockyard company begins to make money, what do we find? We must remember that this was one of those Simon pure companies, like many joint stock companies emanating from eastern Canada. Of course we were all to get a fair and even break—and in that statement I include the primary producer. But what do we find? Well, the president of the stockyard, the gentleman whose name I have given, drew a salary of $1,200—of course that is not a large salary; it does not amount to very much. The capital invested was about $58,000. But last year, unknown to the shareholders at Saskatoon, he increased his salary by $2,500, bringing his total salary up to $3,700—and that gentleman does nothing. He lives in the city of Toronto. The work is all done in Saskatoon because the yard is there, the cattle are there and the records are kept there. This man does nothing, or practically nothing, and receives $3,700 for his services. The shareholders receive little or nothing. The directors, Toronto men, I presume obtain a commensurate amount for their services.

We decided we would like to have some information about this company, but we could not get it from the sources from which one would expect to obtain it, namely from the president or secretary of the company. Meeting with this difficulty we deputized a lawyer in Toronto to go out to Mr. Kennedy's office, which, by the way, was at that time at the union stockyards in Toronto, I suppose the Saskatoon company is being charged rent, stenographic services and other charges made in connection with the Toronto office. What I am getting at is this, that in the final analysis all these charges are checked up against institutions in an endeavour to prove that certain businesses are not profitable, and that therefore the farmer should pay the rates that he does pay.

Not being able to obtain directly from the gentleman in question the information we sought, we asked the lawyer friend to interview Mr. Kennedy for the purpose of asking him certain questions. This is the lawyer's reply:

For about ten days before I left, I was in constant communication with Mr. Kennedy's office but could never get in touch with the man himself. Finally I made an appointment with him a few days ago. I attended at his office at the appointed time but he came outside of the office and said he was too busy to see me. I quickly asked him a few questions, and the storm started.

He was most unreasonable in his attitude, and shouted at the pitch of his voice. He told me he had consulted Mr. Norman Sommerville, K.C. as soon as he received a letter from you, as to the exact legal position. He had an interview with Mr. Sommerville, I believe, as he apparently knew who I was and seemed to resent my request to see the books. He said he was willing to allow me, as a representative of a shareholder, to inspect any books or documents of the company where there was any legal right to make such inspection. I told him that I was particularly anxious to find out from the books of the company the amounts which the directors had voted to themselves, and that I also wished to ascertain if the shareholders had ratified any such payments. He became livid when I made this request, and said that he would tell the shareholders from a public platform in Saskatoon about October of this year anything they were entitled to ask. He also stated that if he saw you personally in Saskatoon, he might be willing to give you more information personally than he was inclined to give me as your representative.

He remarked you had not attended the shareholders' meeting where you could have obtained all the information which you desired. I told him you could not attend a meeting in Toronto on account of the distance, and that he ought to give you all reasonable informaton by letter which you could have obtained if you had been able to attend. He entirely disagreed with this view, having in mind, no doubt, the Biblical quotation which you gave him in one of your letters. I asked him if he refused to give the information in regard to the directors' salaries, but he would not answer the question, stating that whatever my legal rights were, I would certainly receive my legal rights but nothing further. I could see no use in speaking to this man, so I left the office.

This letter is signed by Mr. Cowan.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this the Norman Sommerville, K.C., who is now acting as solicitor on the price spreads committee?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): The hon. member will have to make inquiries as to who that man is.

Mr. VALLANCE: We just wished to have the connection.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): This letter is signed by Mr. James Cowan of Toronto, a lawyer in that city.

In the statement of the company for the year ended December 31, 1932, an item of $6,186.18 appears. True, this is not a large item, but we have been anxious to ascertain just what it covered and of what it is made up. The fact is that we could never get that information. Several letters were written in regard to the matter. However, having written only a few days ago I received a reply from Mr. Kennedy. The strange point is that the reply should have come just at this time when the price spreads committee is investigating all these matters. I was interested in a remark made by that gentleman the other day in the committee. He was asked this question and made this answer:

Q. You made a suggestion?
A. Under present conditions. This is the time when something wants to be done for the farmers of Canada. This is the time, gentlemen, to make men in Canada, not make fortunes.

That is his statement. According to his own letter, the item of $6,000 odd in this statement is made up of the shares purchased in the Edmonton Stockyards, Limited. He said:

With reference to the investment of $6,186.18 which appears in the statement of 1932, this represents the exact cost to the Union Stockyards of Saskatoon, Limited, for certain shares purchased in the Edmonton Stockyards, Limited.

I understand that for some time the Edmonton Stockyards Limited have not been doing very well and yet this company has been loaded up with shares which are not at all profitable. That is the way they hide some of the profits of this institution. I have before me the auditor's statement for the year ended December 31, 1932, signed by the president Mr. H. P. Kennedy and one of the directors, Mr. J. H. C. Kerr. The profit and loss account shows an income of $49,375.75 and expenses of operation, management and depreciation, $30,156.09. In my judgment that last item should be looked into and broken up, because I do not know how they could spend $30,156.09 on that business. That leaves a net operating profit of $19,219.68 and after deducting miscellaneous charges of $1,700 it leaves a net income of $17,457. The provision for dominion and provincial taxes is $2,679.56, which leaves a net income of $14,777.52. The president does nothing, but for argument's sake we will add his salary of $3,700. Without breaking up this item of expenses of operation, management and depreciation, $30,156.09, there is left a total profit of $18,477.22 on a capitalization or money paid in of $58,225. Ths is about thirty three and a third per cent profit on a stockyard business. If that other item is broken up I have no doubt it will be found that the profits of this stockyard are indeed very handsome. All this has a great bearing upon the price the primary producer receives for live stock passing through the stockyards. This gentleman is very much concerned and he wants legislation enacted to pass all live stock through the stockyards. He claims that prices are depressed if live stock goes direct to the packer. He may be quite right in that; I am not competent to judge, but I do know that if all live stock goes through the stockyards that gentleman will certainly get what is coming to him. In my judgment, that is all he is concerned about.

When we are considering the evidence given by these men engaged in different distributing businesses, we should endeavour to find out just what amount of money they are making out of the business in which they are concerned. I congratulate the minister on bringing forward this measure. It will give somebody the authority to investigate matters of this kind. It is not going to be left to the tender mercies of the farmer alone, as it is pretty difficult for him to do that sort of business by himself.

I have endeavoured to give the house an illustration of some of the things which go on in connection with the marketing of farm products under the present system. I hold in my hand a list of prices obtained for meats in my own city. We have a relief store in that city and while I am not saying that that store is in the best interests of those on relief, the fact is that it is there.

According to this return, in March, 1934, the relief store sold sirloin beef for ten cents per pound while the departmental stores charged twenty cents; for T-bone steaks the relief store charged ten cents per pound while the departmental stores charged twenty-one cents; for prime ribs the relief store charged ten cents while the departmental stores charged sixteen cents and the prices for shoulders were nine and twelve cents respectively. Such a spread is too great and it shows that the primary producer is not getting all of that to which he is entitled.

Without discussing the bill in detail, which will be done in committee, as I see it this bill is a move in the right direction. I think every hon. member should lend it his support in an endeavour to see that the primary producer gets more than what he has received in the past.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this bill, as I expected we would vote to-night; but as it looks as though we shall not, I want to take just a moment or two to say that I intend to vote for the second reading of the bill.

There are several reasons why I intend to vote for the second reading. I do not think that the bill is a cure-all, but I do think it is the first step toward national planning. National planning is coming, although just how it will come may not be known to anyone. There must be some regulation in a world in which nation trades with nation rather than the individuals within a nation trading with each other. There must be some regulation in a world in which quotas exist. How can quotas be maintained unless there is some degree of control?

I have not been unduly disturbed by the black picture painted by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in regard to the loss of personal and constitutional liberty. Economic liberty is more important, and unless we have it, all other liberties fall into insignificance. I have been surprised at the attitude taken by the official opposition, as I feel it is a mistaken attitude. I think the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has expressed the attitude which should be adopted by all who represent agricultural constituencies. We should be willing to vote for the second reading of the bill, in the hope that those things which we do not like will be ironed out in committee of the whole.

I want to recommend to the official opposition an article by Sir Arthur Salter in the Atlantic Monthly of January of this year. I believe he is a Liberal. In the summary of this article Sir Arthur says:

> It is certain that, out of the stresses and strains of the present period, a system will ultimately emerge which will be substantially different from that to which we have been accustomed in the past. Economic activity will be planned and regulated, perhaps internationally, certainly nationally. The role of the state will be increasingly greater. It will have to transform its methods and equip itself for its new task. Its policy must be planned and not improvised.

That, in a couple of sentences, is how I feel about it. I think that economic activity will have to be planned and regulated, and this bill is an attempt to plan the marketing of natural products. It can be said, and I think fairly, that this bill may be used as an oppressive measure. That is true; it may be. We are taking a chance on the bill, because we cannot help doing so; but it is also true that the bill may provide the framework within which voluntary organizations may regulate the marketing of their own products. Whether some mistakes are made in the meantime or not remains to be seen, but I think that that will finally be done.

There are two other reasons why I shall support the second reading of the bill. In going over it I gather that the government is sympathetic to the cooperative enterprises of producers. I have been for a long time very much interested in cooperative enterprises as conducted by primary producers, and I think too that it may be, by following out the provisions of the bill, that the cooperative processing of natural products will be carried out with some government leadership and assistance. I have come to the conclusion, from having had something to do with cooperative processing, that until leadership is given by government, until there is real encouragement and assistance of one sort or another, it is impossible to carry on successfully cooperative processing establishments.

For all these reasons I am glad to support the second reading of the bill. It is not very often that I have the opportunity of supporting a measure brought down by the government, and therefore when the opportunity offers I seize it gladly. I have received, as I am sure all members have, a resolution from the Ontario Swine Breeders' Association asking for support to the bill. It is signed by people from six different counties in Ontario. And the Canadian Cooperative Live Stock Association have been for many months asking for a bill, if not like this one, at least something like it. I am of the opinion therefore that it is a more sensible attitude to vote the bill into committee and then seek to make changes, and if they are not made, vote against it on the third reading, than to oppose the bill on the second reading.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the house adjourns there is a matter which I feel it my duty to call to its attention. In my unavoidable absence from the house for a short time this afternoon, the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), in addressing the house on the second reading of Bill 51, made certain statements which I find unparliamentary. In that connection I would quote from May on Parliamentary Practice, 13th edition, page 316:

For preserving decency and order in debate, various rules have been laid down, which, in the Lords, are enforced by the house itself, and in the Commons by the Speaker in the first instance, and, if necessary, by the house. Any member may notice the violation of these rules, either by a cry of "order," or by rising in his place, and, in the Lords, addressing the house, and, in the Commons, the Speaker. When a member speaks to order, he must simply direct attention to the point complained of and submit it to the decision of the Speaker (see p. 338).

The rules for the conduct of debate divide themselves into two parts, viz.: such as are to be observed by members addressing the house; and those which have regard to the behaviour of members listening to the debate.

I would respectfully direct to the attention of hon. members these latter words of this authority on parliamentary precedure:

—and those which have regard to the behaviour of members listening to the debate.

I have examined the official report of the debates and I find that the hon. member for Témiscouata, referring to the hon. member for Compton's support of the said bill, used these words: "To enable his brother to sell more jam he is ready to swallow any bill presented by this government," referring to the fact that the hon. member's brother sells jam to the Canadian National Railways, thus imputing motives different from those acknowledged. This is a reflection on the independence of a member of parliament. In this regard I would cite the same parliamentary authority, May, at page 325:

The use of temperate and decorous language is never more desirable than when a member is canvassing the opinions and conduct of his opponents in debate. The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged; misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation; charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind;—all these are unparliamentary, and call for prompt interference.

Speaking of the High Commissioner for Canada in England, the member for Témiscouata says: "Mr. Ferguson is acting in bad faith with the English people." As to that, I would quote from Bourinot, page 358:

All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the speakers of the British and Canadian houses have always treated them as breaches of order. They have always insisted that, "Such expressions should be withdrawn."

The High Commissioner for Canada is in a high official position. He is appointed by authority of a special act of parliament, chapter 92, revised statutes of Canada. There are many precedents of such statements being held to be unparliamentary.

The hon. member for Témiscouata, applied to a member of the house, a word which is certainly not parliamentary. The dictionary gives the meaning of the word to be "a low term of abuse" and worse. The definition of this expression is so disgusting that I will not repeat it.

With the approval of the house I will instruct the editor of debates not to include the unparliamentary expressions used in the official report of to-day's debates.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, May 2, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege. In my absence, last evening, Mr. Speaker ordered that some of my statements be struck off from Hansard. I want simply to say that soon after a certain word was used, I informed Mr. Speaker that I thought it should be removed from the records. I said so because it has several altogether different meanings and there shall be no possible misinterpretation.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EDMOND DESMARAIS

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. Is Edmond Desmarais, of Richmond, in the employ of the dominion government?
2. If so, since when and what salary does he receive?
3. What position does he occupy?

Mr. CAHAN: I have inquired of each and every department of government at Ottawa and in each case I have received the reply that no person by the name of Edmond Desmarais is in the employ of that department. If the hon. gentleman could give me clearer indications of the department in which the person in question is presumed to be employed, I will make further inquiry.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE—QUEBEC

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. Does the government intend, at an early date, to make a permanent appointment to the vacant position of collector of customs and excise for the port of Quebec?
2. What are the names of the applicants?
3. Have examinations been held for the said position?
4. If so: (a) on what date; (b) where; (c) who acted as examiner; (d) who were the candidates at such examinations?

Mr. BENNETT: This question, I think, is one that should not be asked. It is covered by statutes of the country dealing with the civil service commission and appointments made thereby.

Question dropped.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

SEED GRAIN ADVANCES

Mr. GOULET:

1. What was the total amount expended by the dominion government for seed grain advances in western Canada in the years 1918, 1919, and 1920?
2. How much of the said amount remains unpaid?
3. Is it possible for the government to accept less than the full amount of principal and interest due on the said seed grain advances?
4. Will the government insist upon the payment of the said seed grain advances?

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort) for the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): When I previously spoke, in opening this debate, I expressed the hope that this bill would not be thrown into the realm of controversial partisan politics. I asked most sincerely for constructive suggestions with reference to the bill, suggestions that would improve it and make it more possible to effect the aim as set out in the title of the bill.

I should like to take this opportunity tc express most sincerely my appreciation of the conscientious and constructive suggestions that have been made by members on both sides of the house, which suggestions, in many instances, I believe will at least be of benefit to the measure. I left no doubt that there were great difficulties confronting the bill, and that the first year's experience with it would perhaps do more to perfect it than any further suggestions that might be made. I felt hon. members on both sides would agree that the fact that obstacles of various kinds stood in the way was not a sufficient reason why an honest attempt should not be made to solve some of these difficulties and overcome these obstacles, in order that the primary producer might reap a greater return for his efforts.

I think it is generally agreed, no matter on what points we may have differed in this debate, that there is a very great wastage in the present system of marketing primary products and that some effort should be made to avoid that wastage. I would say then, at the outset, especially because of misinterpretations that have occurred in connection with the bill, leading to the belief that established trade will be wiped out or interfered with, that this is the very opposite of the whole spirit that has led to the introduction of this bill. That means destruction, and destruction means further wastage; whereas the thing we are endeavouring to overcome is the wastage which we agree exists. Only those who have given a good deal of thought to the problems that I have mentioned and to a solution of them are really fitted to appreciate the great difficulties.

First let us consider this—and I shall not attempt to answer in each case the points made with which I disagree; I think it will save the time of the house if I do not traverse the ground I have already covered, but rather give my interpretation of the bill and at the same time, without dealing specifically with each objection taken, refer in a general way to the various types of objection taken by different members.

There are those who have stated that if our bill followed the pattern of the British marketing act they would support it. I do not think any hon. member who understands the British marketing act and who has an appreciation of the difficulties with which we are confronted and that we are endeavouring to solve would say that that act is adaptable to any great extent to meet our problems. In the first place the territory involved there is very small in comparison with ours; the distance limitations are quite different and their agriculture itself is not nearly so diverse as ours, so that their problems are entirely different. Further, the problem to be solved there is to assist the primary industry of a country that is chiefly an importing one, whereas our primary industry is concerned greatly with the problem of exports and of properly regulating the flow of products abroad as well as to our domestic markets.

Further, they have one parliament, not ten as we have. They are not confronted, as we are, with the question of provincial rights and other problems that have arisen by reason of the British North America Act. One of the chief principles in the British marketing act is price fixing. In this country there is a great body of opinion that is against price fixing including even some of those hon. members who spoke freely in favour of the British act. There is also in the British legislation provision for restricted production and I maintain that restricted production is not referred to in any particular in our bill. Therefore I say that for those reasons the British marketing act which is applied to meet different conditions and different problems arising out of those conditions does not adapt itself to any great extent to solve the problems confronting us. We have considered our problems and have endeavoured after study to produce a bill that, when passed, will enable us to set up machinery that we think will meet the peculiar needs and overcome the special difficulties with which we have to contend in Canada in the marketing of our primary products. In so far as certain principles that we have found it necessary to adopt are the same as those appearing in the British act, we have taken advantage of them because to a certain extent they have been tried out and been found successful.

The first difficulty that confronted us in attacking our problems was the limited jurisdiction of the federal government as a result of provincial rights as laid down in the British North America Act. I think hon. members who will earnestly study the bill with a desire to see the best in it will agree with me that in it there is nothing that will conflict in any way with the British North America Act. The whole bill is based on a spirit of cooperation to fill that need which I believe the great majority of the Canadian people feel, irrespective of the province in which they live, namely, to create a more economical system for marketing the products of our primary producers. In that connection, because of the flexibility that has been forced upon us in any bill we introduce, I believe we are sound in the first principle I have enunciated, I hope, more clearly than I evidently did when I last spoke,—namely, to put the power for the regulation of the marketing of the products of the primary producers into the hands of the primary producers themselves in so far as they give evidence that they are anxious to have that power to handle the regulation of the marketing of their own products as shown by the extent to which they are prepared to organize to do this. In this connection they may use their own cooperative organizations or established channels of trade. I believe there is in this country a great body of opinion in favour of cooperative marketing, while there are others who are in favour of marketing by what has become known as private enterprise. In this regard I am reminded of a statement made by a noted Anglican divine of Toronto whose church I used to attend regularly when I was at the university, He was discussing the question of church bazaars. My colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) says that I must be careful on this question. This Anglican divine said in reference to church bazaars that he did not believe the men of his congregation were any more anxious to be taken in in the name of the Lord than in any other way. I think many farmers and producers in this country are not particularly anxious who markets their products as long as they receive the greatest returns from them and the work is done efficiently. In connection with marketing I believe healthy competition is essential but there must be no monopoly.

The basis of this bill is that a representative body of producers will submit a scheme that they have carefully thought out and in which they are interested in a way that no one else is, for the marketing of their primary products. Some hon. members have suggested that if we had stated in the bill that there should be a poll and that if producers representing seventy-five per cent of the production voted in favour of a particular scheme and authority would be given for the other twenty-five per cent to be forced in, they would support the bill. Due to the different problems that we have in the marketing of primary products in Canada it is not possible to insert such a provision. For example, let us take one of the simplest of the primary products—apples. The problem of marketing apples in Nova Scotia is different from that in Ontario and also from that in British Columbia. In Nova Scotia for the crop year 1933-34 eighty-nine per cent of the apples were exported, so that their major problem is one of export. In Ontario only thirty-seven per cent of their apples were exported, so that their problem is chiefly a domestic one. In British Columbia some forty-seven per cent of their apples were exported; their problem therefore is pretty well divided between domestic and export marketing. That is one instance, but I could give a large number, showing why we do not consider that we should fix any limitation as to how this scheme shall be brought into effect, lest by such definition we should make it inadaptable to different conditions in regard to different products in different parts of the country. Further, it has been left open in order that bodies of producers may meet their provincial government, submit their scheme to them, and if the provincial government thinks well of the scheme and allows them to form a local board with the powers given in this bill, or perhaps with different powers, we can if necessary use that board as our agent under the Dominion Marketing Act. The basis of the bill is to put powers into the hands of the producers themselves, in so far as they indicate through their own organization that they wish it, and thus there will be no conflict with provincial rights. For these reasons I believe it is sound policy to leave the provisions as flexible as they are. Hon. members have suggested the possibility that the local board, to take the extreme case stated by one hon. member, might consist of a number of Chinese laundrymen. I do not know whether there is anything in our legislation setting up the railway commission to prevent Chinese laundrymen, if they were British subjects, from being appointed to it, and it is just as rational to expect that they would be appointed to it as to this board. The clause here is very clear; it has been referred to by so many members of the opposition that I think it well to read it. I quote section 5, subsection 5:

(5) Every scheme as approved shall state,

(g) the number of persons who shall comprise the local board and the basis of their selection.

That is, the group of producers in their scheme must state the nature of the board that is to handle the scheme that they propose. I know that in some branches of the industry they feel that the board should consist entirely of producers; others are very decided that there should be producer representation, and representation from the trade that is vitally interested in the marketing of that product, and also that consumers should be represented. But the primary object of this bill is to give power to the producers even to the extent of recommending and setting out the manner in which the board is to be appointed.

The second principle of the bill is that power shall be taken to investigate the spread, using the term in the general and popular definition. What we have in mind is this. Here is a product and here is the consumer, and the cost of getting the product from the producer to the consumer is the spread. Therefore power is taken to ensure if necessary that there shall be no unfair profit taken, no unfair manipulation in this process that takes place, to increase unduly the cost between the time the product leaves the producer and the time it reaches the consumer. To meet that situation, if a small group of producers wish to organize solely for the production of the best quality product in uniform supply, they will be assured of that protection and of efficient marketing of their product. I do not think any hon. member can object to either of those two principles, namely, first, giving into the hands of the producer the power to handle his own product, and second, assuring for the protection of both producer and consumer that there shall not be any artificial manipulation by people who made no contribution either towards the production or towards the rational, honest marketing of the product.

Then in the third place we have taken power under this act to limit, if necessary, imports and exports. I do not think that any one can take objection to that. We have had instances which I would like to cite to the house, but because they are connected with individuals closely associated with members of the house I shall not do so. I shall be glad, however, to show to any hon. member a description, for instance, of one shipment of cattle to the old country within the last few months that had a very damaging effect on the reputation of our cattle. It is almost unbelievable that such a shipment should have been made. I feel that it would have been in the interest of the producer himself had he been prohibited from exporting them, and it certainly would have been a benefit to all other live stock producers of Canada who wished to avail themselves of the market for our cattle in the United Kingdom to take the best advantage of that market by sending their best quality products.

Certain amendments have been prepared that will be submitted in connection with this bill—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —not to change the principle of the bill in any way but to clarify certain points such as that referred to by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and I believe the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). It was my understanding that these matters were taken care of in the bill as it stands—I think I would have no difficulty in proving to anyone that they are—but it is felt advisable that this clarification should be made. The amendments are ready and will be brought down when the bill is before the committee.

I have dealt in a general way with the criticisms that have been levelled against the bill; first the objection that the producers lose control, that control is taken out of their hands and put into the hands of whoever may be appointed to the boards; second, the objection to the type of board that may be set up. I think one hon. member mentioned that it might consist of about fifteen old decrepit politicians. I could not help but be struck with the thought, when he was speaking, that he had in his mind a very definite picture of the man he thought capable of being chairman of this board if it were in his power to set it up. But I feel that his opportunity in that direction will be very slight. I believe he is better qualified, if I may use the illustration, to use a little pick to scratch the mortar out of a standing building, hoping it will fall down and be destroyed, rather than to take any constructive step in the erection of a building. As I have said before, the purpose of this bill is construction, not destruction, and I am sure hon. members will agree that people of that type should not look for any position on the board.

I have dealt so far with criticisms repeated by various hon. members opposite. I should like for the few minutes remaining at my disposal to deal with some specific criticisms raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). In fifteen different places in his speech he referred to the principle of this bill as being restriction of production. In one place he is very emphatic that that is the chief principle of the bill. I would not for an instant suggest that the right hon. gentleman did not in his own mind understand that to be a fundamental principle. but I maintain that nowhere in this bill is restriction of production mentioned. It is simply for the purpose of regulating the products going on the market. The right hon. gentleman stated that producers had to be licensed. He spoke in favour of orderly marketing, and in his amendment put himself on record as favouring it. What orderly marketing could we have of any product in this country if we did not know the quantity of that product that was to be placed on the market in any given time? The only way in which that information can be obtained is for the producers to submit what they expect to produce, the acreage seeded, the number of head of live stock and so on. That work is done now by various branches of the agricultural industry that have approached us already with schemes they wish set up, under which they undertake to license producers of their own product for the very reason that it is impossible for this government to have any orderly marketing unless they have some knowledge of the volume of the product that is to come forward. That is their own suggestion.

In this connection I should like to say in passing that every branch of the industry that has approached us has asked only that it be allowed to stand on its own feet. But these are the branches already organized. They do not wish any money from the consolidated revenue fund, but there are other branches of the industry that are not so thoroughly organized, and we feel that it is necessary, in order to tide them over until they can organize for orderly marketing, to insert some provision in this bill so that such branches may be looked after in the meantime. That is the only reason for that provision in the bill to which a number of hon. members have objected. Many branches of the industry are so upset that they are not in a position to organize at once, perhaps because of the number of people involved or the area covered by that particular branch, and those branches are in the greatest need of assistance. We also feel that conditions may arise in the future, as they have arisen in the past, which will make it highly desirable for us to extend sufficient assistance, under the powers we have taken by this bill, in the marketing of that particular product in order to make such marketing profitable where otherwise it would be conducted at a loss. That is one of the chief reasons why some of the power taken under this bill may seem excessive though I do not consider that power excessive at all. We are simply applying what are recognized as sound principles in successful enterprise in this country.

The least that we as a government and as members of parliament, irrespective of party, can do is to use the resources of the country where necessary to assist the primary producers. In that connection I would say that if any persons attempted, by means of the machinery set up under this bill, to revolutionize the entire marketing system of the dominion in a month, in six months or in a year, undoubtedly they would do a great deal more harm than good, but we do feel that it is necessary to have this power, which will be used as any sane man would use it and as we, in our heart of hearts, all agree that it should be used, irrespective of the opposition that has been raised.

A further argument used by the right hon. leader of the opposition was that this bill took away the rights of parliament, that there was too much compulsion in it, and in his amendment he stated that he was unalterably opposed to compulsory legislation. I think perhaps the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has answered that argument in a better way than I could answer it, and in a way which must impress the right hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Melville cited the compulsion that was necessary to enforce the policy in regard to bovine tuberculosis and the testing of cattle. I think there was almost civil war in Nova Scotia when that policy was first enforced, but now there are no further complaints wherever it is applied. I believe it is one of the most constructive policies we have ever had in connection with our live stock industry. I believe the hon. member for Melville stated further that they had proceeded even without order in council to prevent cattle from being shipped out of this country.

Hon. members on this side of the house have spoken at length and have cited the legislation of a compulsory nature introduced by the right hon. gentleman when he was in power. One cannot but feel that this objection or criticism was raised not from the standpoint of merit but rather for effect. The right hon. gentleman referred to the Magna Charta and said that this bill affected the rights received by the people under the provisions of the Magna Charta. I am sure I was not the only hon. member in the house who wondered, when the right hon. gentleman made that statement, if he could have been transported, with the attitude of mind that he has exhibited towards this bill, back to Runnymede on that fine May day in 1215, whether he would have been on the side of the barons or on the side of the king. The barons were spreading authority; they were delegating it to a place where it never had been delegated before. Further in this connection I might ask the right hon. gentleman if there ever has been a session of parliament in Canada since confederation during which parliament did not delegate authority to bodies outside parliament.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I submit that while this bill is a long way from being perfect—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I greatly appreciate the fact that only two hon. gentlemen opposite applauded that remark; it is the highest compliment that could be paid to the intelligence exhibited across the way. This bill can be perfected only through experience and the overcoming of obstacles, which will indicate what changes should be made in the bill.

I close my remarks, Mr. Speaker, with a further appeal for constructive suggestion when the bill is in committee. I had thought, following the suggestion of hon. members of different parties, that it might be well to refer this bill to the agriculture committee or to a subcommittee of that committee, but as time is the chief essence, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has put himself on record as being unalterably opposed to it, and as it has been stated that the official opposition will fight this bill to the last ditch, I feel—and I regret it—that there would be little gain in wasting the time of any committee if the bill is to be fought out in the house clause by clause and phrase by phrase.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Weir, Melfort) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. WEIR (Melfort) moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with the bill may I say that I believe this would be the opportune time for me to express my great disappointment in the fact that the government seems to have denied parliament one-half of the facilities usually employed to improve, add to or take away from the provisions of a bill. As hon. members know, in addition to discussion in committee of the whole there are in all major agricultural bills standing committees on agriculture and in other cases special committees. If there ever was a bill which came before this house—I cannot hear myself talking.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If ever there was an agricultural bill which was entitled to all parliamentary facilities for careful examination, certainly it must be this bill. Yet at the very outset it would appear that the government has so little confidence in its own bill that it has refused parliament the use of one-half of the facilities provided to afford discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: Still the hon. member voted for it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Did I say one-half? If I did, I was away out, because I should have said that two-thirds of the facilities have been denied us. The committee on agriculture is supposed to know something about agriculture; yet the government refuses to refer the bill to that committee. Secondly I take the ground—and I believe it is well taken—that at least two-thirds of the facilities afforded by parliament, facilities which date back possibly as far as confederation, have been deliberately denied us. I was greatly disappointed in the speech of my good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), because it would appear as though he intended to put this legislation through in some hole-in-the-corner manner when witnesses cannot be called and heard. Everyone recognizes that day by day the House of Commons is becoming more and more the parliamentary and political cockpit of Canada. Is that not a fact? And yet my good friend the minister is inviting this cockpit amicably to amend this bill, detract from it or add to it. How can we hope for a miracle like that to happen? In my pristine simplicity I thought the Minister of Agriculture was inviting us to improve this bill and thanking all of us who had been fortunate enough to contribute something constructive to the debate, and then we were told that there would be only two major amendments made to this bill, giving effect to the suggestions made by my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Stirling) and by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I took that to be the meaning of the minister's remarks.

The Minister of Agriculture has now given us his refusal to refer this bill to the agriculture committee and I look now to the Prime Minister to show cause why this bill is being treated so outrageously different from all the other agricultural bills that have been presented to this house. You see, Mr. Chairman, I am getting fussed up myself. This is not the way to promote good fellowship or unanimity with regard to the bill. The bill is thrown into the cockpit, and the cocks are starting to fight. I find my own feathers getting up at the indignity that is being heaped on agriculture by denying the committee on agriculture which is supposed to know the most about agriculture, the opportunity of helping this bill along. To throw the bill into this cockpit makes the minister's invitation nothing but a hollow mockery. He hopes that there will be constructive suggestions and no controversy. How are we going to escape controversy where we have been having it all along? A committee of the whole is identical with the whole house. It comprises the whole house unless some special or select committee is sitting at the same time. I cannot understand how the hon. gentlemen comprising the government can take this action on a bill which they claim is most important, and deny to this bill those facilities which all the smaller agricultural bills which have been brought before parliament this session have been afforded. There have been four or five submitted, and all of them went to the committee on agriculture. I have the privilege of sitting on that committee, and there was not a voice in that committee raised as loudly as mine is now. I hope that mine is not raised harshly even yet, and I hope that it will not be before I am through.

I am confident that the work of the house would be facilitated by this bill being sent to the committee on agriculture. It is true that the bill could be debated in the house again after coming from the committee. The committee on agriculture has not the last word. The committee of the whole house has the last word on all bills that come before parliament. Yet we are denying our committee on agriculture the right of looking into this bill.

Why, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has a little wee bill, not as long as my finger, dealing with just one little controversial question and one non-controversial question, and while it is not in the Department of Agriculture at all—for as the house knows the department is a sort of dual-headed proposition, and the other head is the Minister of Trade and Commerce—he submitted his little wee bill to the committee on agriculture without any urging at all. While I opposed the bill I took the ground that we should let it go through on the second reading inasmuch as the minister was going to afford the best facilities for amending it before the committee on agriculture where we could have witnesses. I supported the second reading of that bill just as I supported the second reading of this bill, and yet this great bill which has been ballyhooed all across the country has been denied the facilities that were afforded to that other little wee bill and to all the other agricultural bills that were brought down this session.

I cannot reconcile the lip professions of the ministry with their actual practice in what they are doing now, and I should be delighted if the Prime Minister would give any logical reason why this bill is being denied the opportunity of being changed for the better in the committee on agriculture that would not apply to any of the other four bills that have been sent to the committee this session.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to back up what has just been said with regard to this bill going to the committee on agriculture or to some special committee. We in this corner asked for that when the matter was under discussion before the second reading. We felt it would be highly desirable that expert witnesses might be called who could give their assistance in elaborating and perhaps modifying some of the clauses of this bill. The Minister of Agriculture a few moments ago told us that the reason this bill did not go to the committee on agriculture was that it would be fought bitterly by the agriculture committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

An hon. MEMBER: By the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ERNST: Surely it is not an agricultural bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well then, the reason it did not go to the committee on agriculture, according to the minister, was that it would be fought by the leader of the opposition. There are members in this corner supporting this bill and prepared to support it, and I do not think it is fair to them to disregard entirely their earnest request that this bill should go to a committee where it can be thoroughly considered, with the assistance of experts. We cannot do it here.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I would point out to hon. gentlemen who have urged that this bill should not have been sent to committee of the whole house that the proper time to have made those objections was on the motion to submit the bill to committee of the whole.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And the discussion now is simply reflecting on the action of the house.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have never pretended yet to know much about the rules; the less you know about them I think the better. But I have been reading up May for another purpose, and I find there that if you want to raise a question of this kind you raise it immediately on going into committee.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly. This house without a single dissenting voice accepted the motion unanimously, a few moments ago, to go into committee of the whole house on this bill. Nobody raised his voice against it—not a single soul.

Mr. VALLANCE: Cannot the motion be rescinded?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not going to be rescinded because the house unanimously accepted the motion to go into committee of the whole, and that is where we are now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I submit that the Prime Minister is entirely incorrect. The motion was to submit the bill forthwith to committee of the whole house. Now either on the title of the bill or on the preamble we can have a general discussion in committee and move to rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again. Once the committee rises and reports progress, the Prime Minister or the minister can immediately move that this bill be referred to the committee on agriculture. So I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the procedure of my hon. friends on this side is absolutely correct.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Even if my right hon. friend was correct in his interpretation of the rule, when there is a strong feeling and a demand from all sections of the house, even from members who supported the second reading, that the bill should be sent to the committee on agriculture, surely my right hon. friend, even if he had to give his consent, should not refuse sending this bill to that committee instead of having it discussed here by committee of the whole house.

Mr. BENNETT: The only difficulty is that a majority of this house has decided that the bill should be submitted to committee of the whole house. That has been decided; it is not competent under our rules to question that decision, and that is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is doing.

What the hon. member for Vancouver Centre says is an entirely different thing. It is entirely competent, of course, to have a general discussion before a clause has been passed, but the discussion must be relevant to the subject matter of the bill, and not to the motion that has been adopted by the house to submit the bill to committee of the whole house. The discussion must not be with respect to the procedure which has already been adopted by unanimous action of the house. Inasmuch as the Minister of Agriculture made his statement before the vote was taken and the hon. member for Melville voted for the bill, I take it when he says that to submit the bill to committee of the whole house indicates a lack of confidence in the measure, that he was really voting want of confidence in himself—a wholly unusual practice in this parliament.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is his reward.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, on this side of the house we do not hold out rewards to those who support us. That is the difference between us and hon. gentlemen opposite. This is not one of those classical cases in which rewards are held out to those who desert their principles, of which we have had striking examples in times past. But we are not mercenaries on this side of the house. We are not mercenaries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the Winnipeg speech again.

Mr. BENNETT: No, we are not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Neither mercenaries nor judases.

Mr. BENNETT: I doubt not, from observations I have heard, that something of that sort was the opinion entertained of the hon. member for Melville by some of his associates, but I think it is wholly unwarranted. He did it on principle. The hon. gentleman from Vancouver Centre has, I think, correctly stated the position. But, not to enter into a discussion as to the soundness of the act which the house has just unanimously taken, if there is a desire to rescind that action there are, in our practice, appropriate measures provided to meet the situation. For the moment however the government is of the opinion that in view of the action taken by the official opposition, this is not a measure to be referred to any committee other than the committee of the whole house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has referred to the action of the official opposition—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was on my feet when someone interrupted with a point of order.

Mr. ERNST: Go ahead; you are leading the opposition anyway.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He is leader of your party.

An hon. MEMBER: He is leading the Socialist party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope the Prime Minister will not insist on a technicality. As a matter of fact, those of us in this corner find it extremely difficult to catch motions that are being put at the other end. It was not until the hon. member for Melville was half way through his speech that order was sufficiently restored to enable us to learn what it was all about. It may be true that, technically, a motion was passed with regard to referring the matter to a committee, but the hon. member for Melville took the opportunity of raising the larger question and I thought it well to state our position with regard to the whole question. If I am not altogether out of order, I should hope that the government would reconsider its decision and allow this matter to go either to the committee on agriculture or to a special committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Make a motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know that this is the place for me to move such a motion, if the Prime Minister insists on the technicality.

Mr. NEILL: Move that the committee rise.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister is not insisting on a technicality; he is merely pointing out that the rules that have been settled by the house for the conduct of debate must be observed.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Replying to what my right hon. friend has said, namely, that the action of the official opposition was responsible for the government's decision not to allow this measure to go before a select committee, may I remind the Prime Minister that when the bill was introduced the opposition sought very diligently to ascertain from the government whether they would not permit the bill to go to the select standing committee on agriculture, or some special committee, and it was only because the Prime Minister so strongly took the position that it would not go either to the select committee on agriculture or to any other committee that we on this side felt bound to take the firm stand which in the circumstances, we were of the opinion we ought to take to the principles underlying some of the provisions of the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen will look at what I said at the time the Minister of Finance introduced the bill with respect to the central bank, they will observe that I then stated that inasmuch as the minister had said that the question of the ownership of shares and control was an open question to be fully discussed in committee, we would not oppose the second reading of the measure. Could we have received from the government a similar assurance with respect to certain of the provisions of this measure, there would not have been the opposition to the second reading there necessarily was, because of certain principles which are embodied in the measure as it stands. It was because the government would give no such assurance that we were obliged to construe as final the principles of the bill as set forth in the clauses which I quoted when speaking on the second reading.

Apart from this, may I direct the attention of the committee to what has taken place thus far. A number of speeches have been made on the second reading. At a cursory glance, I find that of those who have spoken there have been nineteen Conservatives. There were quite a number of speakers from the Labour party, the C.C.F. and the Socialist group in the far corner, and they should be added to the Conservative number in accounting for the time consumed on the second reading also, because of the common attitude assumed towards the bill by the new Tory-Socialist alliance. From this side of the house there were only seventeen in all who spoke on the second reading of the measure. May I add this further word by way simply of refuting what the Minister of Agriculture has said as to the opposition seeking in any way to protract the proceedings. There is a great difference between standing for your principles, asserting and maintaining your position, and endeavouring to protract proceedings indefinitely. I stand within hearing of members of my own party when I say that a week ago to-day, at a party caucus, I expressed the view that there was nothing to be gained at all by protracting discussion on this, or indeed on any measure at present before the house, and I counselled expedition in the matter of getting through the legislation of the session. I said that I believed, because of pending provincial elections, there was a deliberate plan on the government's part to keep the House of Commons in session a very considerable length of time, and I did not think we should lend ourselves to anything of that kind. As regards, therefore, the Prime Minister's statement that the action of the opposition is in any way responsible for his not permitting the measure to go to a committee, he is entirely in the wrong in making any such statement. The proper procedure would have been at the outset for the government to have expressed its intention to send this bill to a select committee; and, I repeat, had it not been that the government expressed a diametrically opposite intention, and given us to understand that the bill would be discussed only in committee of the whole house, and not be referred to a select committee, where the principle underlying its general provisions might be fully discussed, our attitude in regard to the second reading would, as a matter of course, have been different.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the country will be delighted now to have heard what was said in caucus of the Liberal party for the purpose of determining what public action should be taken, for otherwise we should not have known what the attitude of the right hon. gentleman and his party was or is. It is pleasing now to know, in a secondhand way, that a week ago they desired to save the country from any knowledge of the great struggle between John and the Barons and of the difficulties which Alfred experienced in cooking the cakes, and things of that kind. But there is one thing that is very apparent, and that is that when the amendment was moved by the right hon. gentleman for his party it was an amendment that tried to be on both sides of the question. It reminded one of that Pilgrim who in his progress met Mr. Facing-Both-Ways. That is exactly what was done here: the amendment approved the principle of the bill and then denounced it. But in accordance with the rules of parliament it was ruled out of order, and instead of facing both ways we have had to face one way with the result that there has been a majority of sixty against the opposition, led by the former Minister of Agriculture in the administration of the right hon. gentleman. This bill, we know now, has been talked to for one solid week by the opposition because the government indicated that it was to go to committee of the whole house. The right hon. gentleman tells us that it is because we said at the beginning that it was to go to committee of the whole house that he has taken a week to discuss it. That being so, it is clear that it should no longer be considered as being open to go to a select committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Most of the week was taken up by the right hon. gentleman's own friends.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely—

Mr. CASGRAIN: The list is there.

An hon. MEMBER: Nineteen against thirty-five.

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman will measure the columns I think he will find that his statement is quite incorrect, for my memory is that he himself spoke about two hours, which represents the length of time allowed by the rules of the house for four average speeches. So that if you measure the columns you will see that his statement is hardly correct. But this is what I was going to point out. The leader of the opposition says to-day that had it not been for the statement made on the introduction of the bill, or early in its progress, that the bill was to go to committee of the whole house, all this long week might have been saved. Inasmuch as the week has been lost, and the discussions have taken place, it is obvious that the bill should not go to a select committee but should remain where it was said it would go. That is the logic of the position. It means that. Therefore, a week having now been taken and full opportunity having been had to discuss the whole matter, the penalty of course is that we shall proceed rapidly with the bill now that the week has already been exhausted in a discussion of it and the sending of it to a select or standing committee is wholly unnecessary. If the right hon. gentleman's observations do not mean that, they mean nothing. Therefore I think we have disposed of the matter by the statement made by the right hon. gentleman on behalf of his party. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said on behalf of his party that they would support the bill. They did not support it for any love of this government or this party; they did so because they thought it was sound policy for the benefit of their constituents. If they have any observations to make, it has been pointed out that they have the fullest opportunity to offer amendments in committee of the whole house. I am wholly against the bill going to a select or standing committee because it is not the class of bill that should go.

Mr. HANBURY: Is the right hon. member afraid of outside evidence?

Mr. BENNETT: The kind of evidence mentioned by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, outside or inside evidence, is the kind of evidence on which he is a standing authority.

Mr. HANBURY: That is your stock joke.

Mr BENNETT: We are neither building a hotel at Vancouver nor extending the construction of steamships on the Pacific slope. That is the inside side of it. The outside side of it is this: we are afraid neither of discussion nor of amendments nor of hopeful outlook on the part of hon. members opposite with respect to their opposition to this legislation. But there is one thing we do say: This is not the sort of bill that in England would be sent to a committee.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is obvious; this bill involves a principle that the house has accepted after a great struggle, just as the Home Rule bill was accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of Agriculture said that the situation n England was different from what it is here.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite different. There would not be such a long time lost on the second reading; the guillotine would have fallen on the second day. That being so, the question of principle having been voted upon, the official opposition having declared that they will fight this bill strenuously to the end, and the right hon. gentleman speaking for the major opposition in the house having said that last week's discussion took place solely because of the fact that the bill was to go to a committee of the whole house—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say anything of the kind. Last week's discussion was in large part by hon. members opposite and last week was taken up, as the right hon. gentleman knows, to a certain extent in discussing other matters.

Mr. BENNETT: I should have said: He told caucus that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very clever.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Not clever; it is a fact. But I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this is the kind of legislation that, the principle of it having been adopted by the house, the measure itself is really an effort to give effect to that principle. Any amendments or suggestions may be offered in committee of the whole. The minister himself has a large number of amendments to offer that, we believe, will expedite the passage of the bill in order that it may become available for use in this country as soon as possible.

The hon. member for Melville referred to four bills that went to the committee on agriculture. But they were all subjects of an entirely different character from this

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What?

Mr. BENNETT: Garnet wheat.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not through yet and there were four other bills in addition to that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a matter of an entirely different character, whether it is thought desirable to separate garnet from number two wheat and make it a different grade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was not one of the four; that was a supplementary one, by another minister.

Mr. BENNETT: There was another one that was even less important except from an administrative standpoint and questions of administration have usually gone to the committee on agriculture; questions of principle are settled here in the house. During the next few weeks there will be considered by the house a large number of bills that will be in exactly the same category. There is the bill regarding companies which will be considered by committee of the whole; there is a bill respecting elections which will also be considered by committee of the whole and there are other bills of the same character.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have already today made one record, that is of voting for a government measure on the second reading regardless of its Conservative origin. I am going to make another one now by speaking on a point of order, something I have never done before. If I may be permitted to wander away from it as much as other speakers have done, I may get anywhere. To begin with, I may say that no later than to-day, anticipating that the Prime Minister might act up in this way in regard to this matter, I sought the best authority of the house to find out what to do in case the Prime Minister refused me or anybody else the right to talk on the question of submitting the bill to the committee on agriculture instead of dealing with it here first. I was told that I could not raise the question on a motion that was not on the order paper; that the time to raise it was now when it was raised. That is all I know and it is the justification I have for introducing the matter when I did. Therefore neither the Prime Minister nor anybody else has shown me any overwhelming reason that we should not discuss the question now. Anything that one wants to say at the beginning of a new estimate, any general observation, is usually made on the first item called. The same with this bill. See how I am progressing in the matter of a point of order! If the government wants to take advantage of this quibble it may do so, but it is getting off on the wrong foot at the very beginning of the debate. I will ask the house: Have any hon. members ever asked themselves the question whether it was for love of party or for love of agriculture I gave my vote to-day? That is a fair question.

An hon. MEMBER: For love of agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If it was for love of agriculture, then that is what I am standing up for now—the right for the bill to be submitted not to a committee on banking or a committee on railways but to a committee on agriculture.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I am inclined to disagree with the hon. member for Melville. I doubt whether this is an agricultural bill. It involves principles that extend very far beyond agriculture and if it is to go to a committee I suggest that it go to a select committee of the house.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, have you decided what to do?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Yes, I have decided that this discussion is entirely out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is before the committee at present?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Section one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has it been read?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then the whole discussion is out of order.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have a few remarks to make on the title of this bill which reads:

This act may be cited as the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934.

This government says that it is. Is this really a natural products marketing bill? I say that it is not a marketing bill. I would like to join with those who have objected and I think I am right in making the statements I now make. When the Minister introduced the resolution on which this bill is based, I asked him whether it was the intention to send the bill to a select or a standing committee, the committee on agriculture. He refused to answer. The question was answered later on by the Prime Minister who said that it would not be and when the right hon. gentleman ranted this afternoon about the attitude of the leader of the opposition, the latter pointed out that if this bill had been left in the same position and had received from the government the same courteous treatment that the central bank bill did, it would not have been necessary to have a vote on it to-day. It was pointed out definitely at that time. I am one of those who object most strenuously. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), we have had four bills submitted to us. The Prime Minister said that there was no principle involved; he indicated, at least to me, that only unimportant bills are sent to the agriculture committee. There was a bill that he dealt with himself, concerning garnet wheat, it came before the agriculture committee. If the ramifications of this bill are what some people would lead us to believe, and if such a large percentage of the Canadian people are going to be affected, why was not opportunity afforded them to make representations before the committee as has been done on former occasions? Therefore, with the hon. member for Melville, I register my protest.

An hon. MEMBER: You both talk alike, it is all the same.

Mr. VENIOT: Before section 1, the title, is adopted. I wish to say that I agree with the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) that this bill affects not alone the farming industry of Canada. Dealing with natural products, it also affects the great fishing industry. While I do not desire at the present moment to discuss the merits of the bill I do wish to raise my voice on behalf of the fishing industry of the province in which I live. If this bill is to be dealt with only in committee of the whole, then I say the interests of the fishing industry in the maritime provinces, and especially in the province from which I come, will not be properly represented. There are perhaps only one or two hon. members in this house who are competent to lay before the committee of the whole house the effect this bill will have upon that industry. Had the Minister of Agriculture in introducing the bill stated that he was prepared to have it go before the agriculture committee I would have objected because my opinion was then and is now that a bill of this nature, having the title that it has, should not go before a committee on agriculture, composed for the most part of gentlemen who know nothing about the fishing industry of the dominion. It should go before a special committee consisting of representatives of the agricultural and other primary producers. It is for that reason that I voted against a second reading of the bill, because in going before the committee of the whole house justice cannot be done to an industry which I consider of scarcely less importance than agriculture. While I do know a good deal about the fishing industry I am not prepared as a member of this house to demonstrate the detrimental effects of the bill upon it, and discuss with the fulness of knowledge that is desirable certain sections of this bill which I claim will if adopted do great injustice to that industry. It may be said, move an amendment when you come to these sections. But, Mr. Chairman, while I do know a great deal about fishing, I am not competent to move an amendment to clauses which I consider will do great injustice and harm to my people, without having fuller opportunity of discussing it with them. This bill should be discussed before a special committee where these men could be heard as witnesses, and having had the bill explained to them they could then decide whether or not certain provisions would have a detrimental effect on their industry. I refer to section 4 in passing, I do not intend to discuss its merits, but just to give the reasons why I cannot accept clause 1 at the present time. The section refers to regulations and to registration. That provision alone, if made effective without this committee having had opportunity to benefit from the information that they could get from the fishing industry, would damn the industry in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Prime Minister recited the number of acts that had come to this house from the Minister of Agriculture this year, and I have recalled to my memory at least four. There was the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, the Dairy Industry Act, the Live Stock Products Act, and the Fruit Act; and in addition the Minister of Trade and Commerce submitted one amending the Grain Act. Now I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that you mean to gag this committee in discussing this question. We want to have a bill that will be satisfactory to those whom we all endeavour and desire to serve—not to conduct a ringside fight here. We have had enough of that. We cannot do our best legislatively by being treated the way this government is treating the opposition at this time and not only the opposition but the agricultural industry of all Canada. If you want to rub my fur the wrong way just be unfair to that great industry, to which I owe my very life and being and soul and everything. And that is what is being done. There are only a few of the ministers left here. I see that the Prime Minister has retired to his lair and the rest of them do not look quite so furious. There is the acting leader of the government looking as meek as Moses, and the Minister of Finance who is always at least half decent. I am quite sure that if he and the Minister of Agriculture had the decision of the question this bill would be over in the agriculture committee in five minutes. What sort of way is this for the Prime Minister to treat his Minister of Agriculture, after going through all the agonies and labour pains of producing this marketing baby, then to be refused permission even to refer it to the committee specially set up by parliament to deal with such matters? At the first session we were here in 1930 it is true the Prime Minister chaperoned all the estimates and all the bills and all of everything for all of his colleagues, but surely they are not still in leading strings so that the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. gentleman now leading this house cannot decide even now to refer it to the agriculture committee. If right now there were a vote of the members present, with whips off, no doubt two-thirds or three-quarters would vote for submitting it and doing the right thing at the right time in the way it has always been done. I have not had as long experience in parliament as some, but I shall soon have been here twelve years, and never before have I known a departure from the orthodox plan of submitting bills relating to agricultural matters to the agriculture committee, unless it were some little correction, dotting an i or changing a word or something of that nature. My good friend the Minister of Agriculture has not had one bill this year that he did not submit to the agriculture committee, and only one or two very unimportant ones since he took charge. I invite and if need be demand that one of the ministers in charge give some reason why all the facilities afforded by parliamentary procedure should be denied to this bill and not to the other four referred to. The Prime Minister referred to the bill regarding garnet wheat, as if that were evidence of any kind to establish anything that was now under discussion, and then he disappeared. I do not want to be unreasonable, because after all apparently we have to submit to the brute majority of this house and make the best of this committee, but you see now, Mr. Chairman, what that means, an hour and more of useless toil and talk already.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word merely on the question of procedure. We will leave aside for the moment the question of whether this bill ought properly to go to a special committee or to any committee of a special nature or whether it ought to go to the committee of the whole. We will deal purely with the question of procedure. May I point out that this committee of the whole is itself a creature of and is set up by the House of Commons—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: So is the other committee on agriculture.

Mr. RHODES: —and the House of Commons is the only place where it can be decided as to what matters should be referred to committees. It is not competent for a committee which is a creature of the house to tell the house itself what it shall do. Leaving aside any technical questions it seems to me the matter is obvious upon its face, so I submit that it is not competent for this committee to discuss whether or not the house was wise in submitting to it the measure now under consideration.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The house can do anything.

Mr. RHODES: That is exactly the point I am making, and the house has referred the bill to this committee. It seems to me that if at a later stage the question should be raised in the house that is something else, but certainly it is not competent for a committee to quarrel with the instructions it has received from the house. It would not be competent for this committee to determine that a bill before it should have been sent to a special committee of the house. It seems to me the question is not arguable and that we are only wasting time in a fruitless discussion on a question of procedure which cannot be determined.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Cannot the committee decline jurisdiction?

Mr. RHODES: No, the committee is a creature of the house and must obey the instructions of the house.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): What if the committee says the house was wrong in referring this bill to it?

Mr. RHODES: It is not competent for the committee to say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Surely my hon. friend will agree that once we have resolved ourselves into committee of the whole and have started to consider the title of any bill, as we are considering the title of this bill at the moment, any member of the committee may discuss the procedure that has led us to the consideration of the bill. Then, as a result of the attitude adopted by the members, and as a result of the feeling of the committee of the whole, a minister of the crown or any private member of this committee is perfectly within his or her rights in moving that this committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Then the house immediately becomes seized of this bill and the minister leading the government can resolve as to the future conduct in connection with it.

Mr. RHODES: May I point out to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that if the committee should rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, which is quite within its competence, the notation which would appear upon the journals of the house is this: "House again in committee" on such and such a bill. Then ipso facto, without debate and without discussion, Mr. Speaker must leave the chair when that order is called by the clerk at the table.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister can move that the order be deleted from the journals.

Mr. RHODES: So far as the procedure is concerned with regard to the reference of the bill to this committee, we are no further ahead. I come back to my original point, leaving aside the question of the merits of the suggestion that the bill should be considered by a special committee. At the moment I am not discussing whether or not this bill should go to another committee; I say it is not competent for this committee to make any determination in the matter and therefore the discussion, quite apart from being out of order, is fruitless and can serve no purpose in the end.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not catch any answer to my question. I asked what arguments could be advanced for denying this bill the privilege of being considered by the agriculture committee that could not be advanced with regard to the bills I mentioned. What arguments has the Minister of Finance as to why that should not be done? He did not answer that question.

Mr. RHODES: I did not overlook it; I did not pretend to discuss it. The Prime Minister gave his reasons and there is no need for me to repeat what he has said.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then I take that as an admission that the minister has no such arguments, and there are none except to refer to the absent Prime Minister. The acting leader of the government is an old statesman, not in years but in service. He is looking up authorities now. I wish he would not bother answering something else that I am not asking, but would advance any possible arguments there may be as to why this bill should be denied the right to go to the agriculture committee.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: All I can say is that I do not think this is the place to discuss that question. The Minister of Finance explained the matter very fully. If the hon. member wished to raise a question of that kind he should have done so in the house. Let us suppose this committee were unanimous in the idea that this bill should go to a special committee. We would have no power to commit the bill to any committee; that could not be done here at all. Therefore I submit to the hon. gentleman that he is raising the question at the wrong time. We are in committee of the whole, as the Minister of Finance explained so lucidly. He is a former Speaker of the house, one of the best we ever had; he understands the rules very well, and I submit that we should go on with this bill. It is perfectly competent for the opposition to raise this question in some other way, if they choose to do so, when we are in the house. I have forgotten the exact rule, but I suppose they can move to rescind the order if they wish. There may be ways in which they can take up the matter in the house, but they cannot do it here. Therefore I ask hon. gentlemen to go on with the bill in the meantime and discuss the different clauses as they come up, because we are only wasting our time when we talk here of whether or not this bill should go to a special committee. We could not decide it, even if we would.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thank my hon. friend; that was something in the nature of an answer, but is this not the committee of the whole house? If the question has to be submitted to the house are we not here now? That answer was not much better than the answer given by the Minister of Finance. Hon. gentlemen opposite have no arguments to advance; that is the whole trouble. They are just muffing it and bluffing it. I hold up both hands when my hon. friend says this is no place to discuss the bill; we know this is no place to discuss this involved and intricate question. We are making no progress here and won't.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to refer inaccurately to what I have said.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You know my infirmity as to hearing.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so. I did not say this committee was not the place to discuss the bill itself; this is the place where it should be discussed. I said this was not the place to discuss the question of whether the bill should be referred to a special committee or to the agriculture committee, because we are not competent to decide that matter even if we would.

My hon. friend from Gloucester also made some remarks to which I should like to refer while I am on my feet. He says he did not know enough about the fisheries question to discuss it in this house, and he wants the bill referred to a special committee. All the members of this house have a right to take part in the discussions of this committee, and a special one could only be set up from the members of this house; therefore the members of the committee would not know anything more about the fisheries question than the hon. member for Gloucester says he knows.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely witnesses could be called.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is another thing.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is what you are afraid of.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The chief whip of the opposition thinks we are afraid of something, but he makes a mistake; we are not afraid of anything, even of the hon. gentleman himself. We do not think this is a matter which should be discussed outside, but one which should be considered in committee of the whole. As the Prime Minister has said, we feel that this is a proper measure for the consideration of the whole house, and that is why we are here.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The acting Prime Minister has been very reasonable in the tenor of his remarks, anyway. As to whether or not he has been as reasonable in his logic, I have grave doubts. Let me assure him however, that if this bill is referred to the committee on agriculture, so far as I am concerned it will come away from that committee just the same as did another bill equally controversial and equally delicate, namely the Grain Act of 1929 and 1930. It then went through committee of the whole house in less than half an hour. After it had passed through the committee on agriculture, and the subcommittee, scarcely a word was found necessary in this chamber. I am as confident as I can be that if the government wishes to have unanimity in connection with this marketing bill, especially when it becomes operative, and does not wish to have one-half of the country on one side and the other half on the other—our friends to the left standing in this instance with us—it should take the best and logical course, the one which would bring about this desired end. The deliberation thus far in this committee is an example of what will happen between now and the time the bill passes through the entire committee stage. I am under no obligation to keep the peace, other than observe the Speaker's rulings, if we are not given access to the committee on agriculture. But if we are given that committee I shall use my best endeavours to have the bill passed without controversy, as was done on the one occasion referred to and can be done again. Have I played fair with the minister? I ask that question of the Minister of Agriculture, and if he were here I would ask it also of the Prime Minister. Up to this stage have I played fair? I think the minister will agree that I have, and I freely admit that he has also played fair with me thus far. To the other ministers I would say: Give the Minister of Agriculture the right to determine this matter. He has laboured strenuously to get the bill to the present stage; I know what he must have gone through. Imagine the combination which got together to prepare this bill—the Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance! Just imagine it. In their general Tory make-up and temperament they are about as much like the bill as night is like daylight. I compliment the Minister of Agriculture, and I say he deserves some recognition because of his heroic efforts thus far.

Apart from any little jest we may have there is a big principle involved. The first industry of Canada, agriculture, is being discriminated against by not referring this marketing bill to the committee on agriculture, that is the point. And do not make any mistake about it, I will ring those changes, and fight this rank injustice high and low throughout the country. Then, Mr. Chairman, if it were not for your good nature you would be putting the gag on us even now. Why cannot someone move that the committee rise and report progress and refer this bill to the agriculture committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You could do it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no use of us over here doing it. What good would it do if the hon. member for Vancouver Centre made the motion, or in fact any other hon. member on this side of the house? Will not some member of the ministry move that the committee rise and report progress, and that Bill No. 51 be referred to the committee on agriculture?

Mr. CASGRAIN: That would be better.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the Minister of Agriculture has a reasonably free hand, and I have taken a free hand I think the first step will be taken to ensure that a satisfactory bill will come back to this house, and go through it just like smoke. Of course we must secure the approval and assistance of all others to accomplish this.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think we are justified in assuming that this marketing bill deals with agriculture alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We said so.

Mr. MacLAREN: It does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Our amendment said so.

Mr. MacLAREN: This bill goes beyond matters relating to agriculture.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Just as the opposition amendment stated.

Mr. MacLAREN: Under this measure matters relating to fisheries may be considered, just the same as those affecting agriculture.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then, why not appoint a special committee?

Mr. MacLAREN: I agree that agriculture will be the major—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Victim.

Mr. MacLAREN: —industry considered. I must urge, however, that more than agriculture will be considered. No doubt fish and other natural products will come within the provisions of the bill. The committee on agriculture does not deal with fisheries.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let them sit in. We will make the hon. member an honorary member of the committee.

Mr. MacLAREN: The bill involves so many natural products that, to my mind, the committee of the whole seems to be the proper body to act.

Mr. MARCIL: No doubt once the bill has been referred to the committee of the whole house, the committee can only refer it back to the house. In the circumstances the house itself must decide whether the bill shall be discussed by committee of the whole, the committee on agriculture or any other body.

I believe there is a general feeling throughout the country that something should be done not only for agriculture but for other industries. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) moved to appoint a special committee to inquire into price spreads the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) suggested that fisheries should be inquired into, and I immediately supported his suggestion. I am sorry to say that up to the present time the price spreads committee have not considered fisheries. I should like to be informed as to what position that industry is in at the present time. I think the whole house would be in a better position to legislate thoroughly if it had before it the report of the price spreads committee. Evidently this bill merely follows in the footsteps of the other committee, a committee which has not yet made a final report. Why should we not have that report before us before taking action in this matter? Last week the chamber of commerce of Montreal sent out a circular suggesting about twenty-four amendments to the bill. The president of the board of trade, Mr. Magor, speaking on the radio only two or three days ago, condemned the bill in toto, as it now stands. In their amendment the official opposition have declared, in a word, that they would favour a marketing board, under certain conditions, but not under the conditions proposed at the present time. In the last paragraph of his speech the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that this was merely a project, and that he was willing and anxious to secure any suggestions or amendments which might be offered. The same statement was made this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture.

Of course, a majority has been recorded in favour of second reading of the bill. Evidently this was one of the largest majorities the government has had since taking office. They take the responsibility, and the people will hold them responsible. I believe, however, that in the interests of the industries they wish to protect they should deal properly with this bill, and we would be in a much better position to deal with it after receiving the report of the price spreads committee. Speaking for the great number of fishermen in my constituency I say that we have not all the information we should have for a full discussion. We are putting the cart before the horse; under ordinary circumstances the title is the last matter to be discussed. After a bill is given third reading a motion is made that the bill be passed and that the title be as on the order paper, or that the title be changed. As the point of order raised by the hon. member for Melville has been decided, I shall not discuss the ruling. I must say, however, that we have not the information we should have to deal properly with this matter, and I urge that the bill be referred to the committee on agriculture so as to give those who have an interest in the matter, those who are competent to speak, and leaders in trade and in all branches of industry, an opportunity to make certain suggestions which might be incorporated in the bill for the general benefit of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before we are asked further to consider this title I think we ought to hear from the Minister of Agriculture.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We are not on the title. We are on section 1.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are on the title. Section 1 is the short title—this act may be cited as the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934. That is the section that has been called by the chairman. I say we should hear from the Minister of Agriculture in virtue of which of its provisions this bill is entitled to be called a marketing bill. That raises the whole question we have been discussing on the second reading with relation to the principle of the bill. I say to the minister that I believe that those who have given study to this measure, and are really interested in a marketing measure, hold the view that this bill as drafted is not a marketing bill at all, in the sense in which that term is commonly understood, that it is a bill making provision for regulating boards, either local boards or a federal board, or the governor in council that will tell the present marketeers when and where they may buy and sell their products. But it does not go further than that. I would like the minister to point out to the committee wherein the expectations of those who believe the government are providing them with state marketing facilities are likely to be realized. The Prime Minister has endeavoured to have it appear that the principle of this bill was state marketing. We have taken precisely the opposite view, that within the provisions of this bill you cannot find a section that sets out any system of state marketing of products. You have a central board and make provision for a lot of local boards for the purpose of saying who may produce and how much they may produce, and who can sell or offer to sell, and who cannot produce or sell, and other provisions of the kind, but you have not within the four corners of this bill any provision for a board that is going to assist in marketing the natural products of this country as producers have been led to believe is the case. If the minister will just tell us where the provisions are that make this a marketing bill, as marketing is understood by those who are interested in having their natural products sold abroad through the assistance of the state, we may perhaps determine whether or not even its short title is justified.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The fundamental principle of the bill is the regulation of marketing, and that has to do with marketing; there is no doubt of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The regulation of production and sale.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not the regulation of production but the regulation of marketing. There is also in the bill a clause that states that the dominion marketing board has power to buy and sell and to name an agent to buy and sell, which is marketing.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just want to make this practical observation. I think we have wasted enough time in quibbling as to whether this bill should go to committee of the whole house or to a special committee. I voted for the second reading because I believe in the fundamental principle of the bill, but I would point out to the government that the keystone of the arch of this bill is whether you can get the various producers to cooperate with the policy, and I think they have a right to be heard. It is an old axiom and a true one that coercion sows the seeds of its own destruction. From that viewpoint alone I think it would be good policy on the part of the government to give the people who are most interested in this legislation an opportunity to be heard before a special committee of this house. I think that would be the sensible position to take notwithstanding that, perhaps through some misunderstanding of the procedure of this house, opportunity was not taken of the advantage when the motion to go into committee of the whole was moved, to make the objections which are now being made by the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to support what has just been said by my hon. friend from East Hamilton. When the resolution on which this bill was founded was first introduced I asked the minister this question:

> Is it the intention to send the bill to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization?
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): That still has to be decided.

I agree with what has been said before. Whether rightly or wrongly, earlier in the proceedings we moved an amendment believing conscientiously that the principle of this bill is not confined to marketing, and the amendment that was moved at that time plainly and explicitly so stated, that this bill not only affects agriculture—and this is where I have to differ with my hon. friend from Melville—but affects the products mentioned by my hon. friend from Gloucester, and affects mining, lumbering, the whole trade and commerce of the nation. It takes most sweeping powers over the trade and commerce of the nation. That is why I find myself wholeheartedly in support of the attitude adopted by my hon. friend from East Hamilton that this bill should go before a select standing committee of this house. The amendment that we moved set up what I am trying to convey to this committee now, that the principle of this bill goes far beyond the principle of agricultural marketing. Our belief that this bill should now go to a select standing committee of this house is quite consistent with the views we expressed in that amendment.

In speaking to a point of order the other day I stated that I would personally support marketing legislation such as I understood was being asked for by the producers of British Columbia, and I was referring particularly to the producers of fruit and of milk and dairy products in British Columbia. I still say that this is not the bill that has been asked for by those producers. I agree with my hon. friend from East Hamilton that these producers, whether they are from British Columbia or other parts of Canada, should be given the opportunity of appearing before some committee of this house to voice their approval or disapproval of the sections and clauses of this bill. Then I venture to say that when the bill comes back from the committee on agriculture we shall find a great measure of unanimity in our expressions of opinion in regard thereto.

Mr. TURNBULL: Mr. Chairman, it seems terribly hard to map in advance a plan that will suit hon. gentlemen opposite because no matter what plan is advanced there is always a reason for opposing it. It does not matter if their reason for opposing it is the same to-day as yesterday. In fact, if it is different all the better.

On the second of February, on a motion of the Prime Minister to establish a committee of this house to inquire into mass buying and price spreads, a committee which has been set up and has taken a great mass of evidence, the right hon. leader of the opposition made some remarks which I have here.

Mr. MARCIL: If that committee has not presented its report the hon. gentleman cannot discuss it.

Mr. TURNBULL: I am not going to discuss it.

Mr. MARCIL: Nor can the hon. gentleman cite any evidence given before the committee.

Mr. TURNBULL: I am not going to. If hon. gentlemen will possess their souls in patience they can raise their points of order when there is reason. I am reading from the remarks made by the right hon. leader of the opposition on the motion for that committee, as reported at page 190 of Hansard. He said:

The motion indicates that there is to be an inquiry—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. gentleman is out of order, Mr. Chairman, in referring to a previous debate of this session. I ask for your ruling.

Mr. TURNBULL: I will agree, Mr. Chairman, with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, that I may not read from a debate of this session, but there is no reason why I cannot refer to it. I will say this: The leader of the opposition at that time took the position that there was no necessity for a committee to inquire into these things, that we all knew what the conditions were.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend is purporting to repeat what I said, I tell him right now that I made no statement of the kind. I said that I thoroughly believed in an investigation, and I pointed out that there were facilities under the Combines Act for making many of these inquiries. There is no doubt in the world that the position I took was in favour of the fullest investigation on any matter of public interest.

Mr. TURNBULL: If the right hon. gentleman questions my statement I ask the permission of the committee, Mr. Chairman, to read what he said.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. gentleman cannot refer to a previous debate of this session.

Mr. TURNBULL: What he did say was that what the country was interested in was not so much further inquiry—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, section 293 of the rules says that no member can refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): That is perfectly right.

Mr. TURNBULL: I quite understand the very earnest desire of hon. gentlemen opposite—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To keep the rules.

Mr. TURNBULL: —to invoke the rules for the purpose of preventing their inconsistencies being shown to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is out of order in imputing motives to other members.

Mr. TURNBULL: But the fact is that on a previous occasion the opposition took the view, with respect to an important commission, that inquiry was not necessary at all but that what the country wanted was action in regard to a matter everyone knew about.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is ignoring your ruling in referring to a matter which you have decided shall not be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The rule is that no member must:

—refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion.

Mr. TURNBULL: With regard to the matter at present under discussion, the producers referred to by my hon. friend from East Hamilton will have every opportunity of having their interests considered when the boards are being set up and when there is a concrete plan to be presented. Moreover, the producers themselves will present that plan and they will be the ones who will initiate it. Their opportunities to be heard are there. This is only an enabling bill to make it possible for certain machinery to be set up, and to adopt recommendations that may be made by producer organizations with regard to the boards to handle the marketing of their products. I fail to see why it should be necessary to have a lot of witnesses come before parliament and dilate at length on the question whether or not we should pass enabling legislation to provide for the setting up of the boards. This bill does not set up the boards, though it empowers the minister under certain circumstances to do so. Why we should have witnesses to inquire as to whether the producers should be allowed to set up boards is another question, but there should be no question in committee as to what the nature of the boards should be.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I have already ruled that this discussion is entirely out of order. I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the clause under consideration.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Before proceeding to the examination of section 1 may I ask the minister whether he has information to furnish this committee as to the results of similar legislation throughout the world. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester. I think we should cooperate with the minister and the government in turning out a workmanlike act, but personally I feel that I am an incompetent workman. Now, this is not new legislation; there are other acts of the same sort throughout the world; they have existed for years. Is the minister in a position to provide us with information regarding the results of such legislation? It seems to me that we ought to have that information before us. If there ever was a good illustration of the evils of government intervention in business it is our position to-day, proceeding as we are to discuss a measure of this importance without having proper information before us. We are entitled to have that information. Perhaps it will be recalled that, speaking on the general principle of the bill, I urged that the government should have a mandate. That apparently they think they do not require. Now, however, I urge that the minister and the government, before we proceed to work out the details of the bill, should inform us as to what has happened under similar legislation throughout the world.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Perhaps the hon. gentleman will realize the magnitude of the question he has asked, because in his speech in the debate he referred I believe to a cotton monopoly, to coffee, sugar and a number of other marketing schemes of that sort. I suggest that it is not very complimentary to imply that we did not give any thought to the different marketing schemes that have been in vogue and to the question whether or not they have been satisfactory. A great deal of consideration has been given to different marketing schemes, but before we could attribute to any particular phase of any marketing act the failure of that act we should have to be in possession of complete information regarding all the conditions to which the working out of the act was subject. For example, suppose we had two cars, one black and one green, the black car with a velocity twice that of the green car: we could not say that the difference in velocity was due to the particular quality of blackness in one of the cars. That was the principle that appealed to me with regard to the hon. member's speech the other day, the precision with which he spoke and the evidence he gave that he had studied this question, as indicated by his ability to pick one thing out of each act and generalize on this particular, instead of coming to his conclusion after placing before us each part of any act and showing that it was that one factor on which he hitched the failure of the act.

With reference to this bill, we shall be glad to give throughout the discussion information with regard to the various acts that have been passed; but I think the hon. gentleman will agree that it is unfair to expect anyone to give a complete analysis of each of these acts and to indicate all the conditions under which it has operated. We cannot be expected to say to what particular element in any act failure, if there has been failure, is attributable. We have studied the conditions under which various acts have operated but they are so different from the obstacles which we are trying to overcome that we do not think any of these acts are altogether applicable.

The hon. member for East Hamilton thought it would be a gain to have witnesses brought forward to give their opinion regarding this bill. As the hon. member for Regina has pointed out however, the producers, whether of agricultural commodities or of the products of sea or lake or forest, will themselves put forward a scheme which they regard as satisfactory, and no other scheme will be forced upon them. I feel, with the hon. member for Gloucester and others who have spoken, that the field covered, so far as products are concerned, is so wide that it would be impossible for us to have expert information regarding each of these industries. But surely this committee, composed as it is of members chosen from their constituencies by a majority of the people, and living in those constituencies, must know better than anyone else the conditions of the industries, the work and the needs of the people. For example, I believe that the hon. member for New Westminster knows quite well the desires of the people in his constituency with reference to the marketing of their products. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre stated that he did not believe this bill was the one asked for by the fruit growers of the Okanagan and the milk producers of Fraser river valley. All I can say is this, that we have been in consultation with different representatives from those various organizations, and it is my understanding that this bill, properly and sanely applied, will meet what they are asking for, and it cannot be applied unless they ask for it.

Mr. NEILL: What about clause 9?

Mr. CASGRAIN: What about clause 9, the power of the minister?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Clause 9 does not mean that any board will be set up in opposition to the wishes of an industry; no person would be absurd enough to think it would.

Mr. HANBURY: Why not restrict it, then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When I was interrupted I was stating that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre can learn from the industries in British Columbia, whether the fruit growers of the Okanagan or the Fraser river valley milk producers, what their objections are to this bill. Copies have been sent out to those organizations; they have had ample time to discuss and investigate fully the provisions of the bill and they have made submissions to us with reference to it. I maintain that under the original draft of the bill they can do everything they have asked for to meet their needs, but because there is a difference of opinion as to the meaning of the wording I have, as I stated before, prepared amendments to clarify those clauses but in no way to make any radical changes in the principle of the bill itself. Therefore I repeat that because of the wide range covered in the bill and the impossibility of calling expert evidence from far afield, it would be better to have the bill considered in committee of the whole, especially when we should, I think, do ourselves the credit of admitting that any hon. member should be conversant with conditions in his own constituency. Speaking for myself I think I am conversant with the conditions and the needs of the people in the constituency of Melfort in the Carrot river valley. If not, I can easily make myself aware of what their desires are.

I will admit I gave serious consideration to the advisability of submitting the bill to the committee on agriculture, but the very discussion we have had here is, I think, one of the best reasons we could have for continuing the discussion in this committee where everyone will have an opportunity of expressing his opinion; he can bring forward any objections that the industry in his constituency raises and I am quite sure the hon. member for Vancouver Centre can put the objections of his constituents before this committee just as ably if not a good deal more so, than the growers or the members of the industry concerned themselves can do before the committee on agriculture.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister said, I think, he had some amendments he was going to submit. I would ask him whether he would not consider placing them on Hansard before the committee rises this afternoon so they would then be available to members for further consideration.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that the procedure is to read in the amendments as we come to them clause by clause. I have stated their general effect; it is clarification of the principle. For example, I have an amendment to make clearer—at least there are people who feel this is done by the amendment—the relation that exists between the local board and any power it may have to use funds from the consolidated revenue fund. We also make clearer the fact that pooling is covered in the bill. I had thought that was included under the scheme submitted because no limitation was put on that scheme, that is that representative growers may submit a plan in their scheme asking that a poll be held. That I naturally thought would have been one of the first things under certain conditions that the minister, whether provincial or federal, would be asked for, to decide whether it was sufficiently representative. Another matter that is cleared up is that the organized producers can market their products where they decide, when they decide, in what manner they decide, through what agency they decide and also the means by which the marketing of their products will be done, that is whether it will be on a pooling basis and whether there will be an initial payment or otherwise.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I am very sorry if the minister thought in what I said on this matter I had carefully selected instances of failure.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not mean to infer that.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I ask whether the minister would like me just to outline briefly some of the measures of this sort that have failed so that we may have the evidence before the committee and the committee or members of it may make inquiries if they care to do so? In Australia the minister knows there are two commodities referred to marketing boards that are federal. One is an export control board for dried vine fruit or raisins. Windett, in Producer and Trader, at page 123, writing of the results, said:

> From the various forms of assistance which it receives, it must be concluded that the dried fruit export trade cannot stand on its own feet, and is in a less sound competitive position than is the fresh fruit trade.

And fresh fruit is not marketed in the same way.

The other matter is canned fruits. On canned fruits the state government of Victoria has already guaranteed 750,000 Australian pounds and the commonwealth government has expended some 890,000 Australian pounds. During the eight years ending 1932, production of tinned peaches, pears and apricots has on the whole been satisfactory, but the increase in the export trade has taken place at the cost of decline in the domestic consumption.

The other day I referred to legislation of this sort in Queensland and I shall not refer to it again.

I should like to take New South Wales and the experience in that state. I might say that the original marketing act was introduced in 1927; that is some years ago. They have had experience. Originally a majority of two-thirds of the producers was required. Votes were taken and the majorities were not secured. Provision was then made for reduction of fifty per cent. They excepted wool and wheat and dried fruits. They included eggs, rice and honey. But in August, 1932, a plebiscite of the honey-producers was taken and by a majority of 527 to 147 they voted in favour of abolishing the honey marketing board. Ballots have been taken to include wheat, butter, millet and stone fruits, and have been rejected. Since 1928, four plebiscites of the wheat growers have been taken to bring wheat under a compulsory pool, and in each instance the producers voted against the compulsory pool.

I wonder if I may briefly and rapidly run over some European experiences. In Bulgaria a price fixing and tax relief scheme was brought in in 1931. Prices were fixed above world parity, with the consequence that you had an increase, naturally, I presume, in the production of grain in Bulgaria. The government found it awkward to pay the compensations that were required, and that are referred to in this bill, so it issued certificates instead of money. Then the certificates lost their value, and in July, 1932, the monopoly bureau was abolished. Now I have not the information to go into these matters thoroughly. I am honestly desirous of having the government furnish us with fuller information than any individual member can secure. I have already made reference to coffee. You will recall that Brazil since 1905 has been trying through state intervention to bring about a stabilization of prices. Action was taken in the first instance by the state of Sao Paolo. What was the result? Other states in Brazil began to grow coffee, because it was profitable. Then other countries throughout the world were attracted to the industry, by reason of the artificial price. Finally the federal government had to intervene to abolish the state monopoly, and then as we know they had revolution in Sao Paolo.

In Chile, an act very similar to this bill was brought in in 1930. Bounties were to be raised by taxes on wheat and oats processed there, and on malt used by brewers, and by import duties on sheep and cattle. Then deficiency payments were to be made to the producers. It is interesting to note that apples were included; when exported they were subsidized, to the extent of four pesos per box. Then Chile ran out of money and the producers could not be paid. There was dissatisfaction, and finally revolution.

Mr. Chairman, I was not in favour of referring this bill to the agriculture committee. I quite agree with the Prime Minister and the government that this bill should be considered by committee of the whole house, because it involves not merely a marketing measure, it involves principles that affect the stability and the political life of the country.

Then I wish to refer to sugar. The minister knows that since the year 1925 and even before that attempts were made in a very vigorous way, to set up market monopolies in sugar. He knows also that in 1931 at Brussels the brightest and best minds in the sugar industry of the world got together. I tell the minister there could have been no failure in the Brussels convention if the principle were right. They had had years and years of experience in trying to evade what the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day called the shibboleth of demand and supply. These countries, Cuba, Java, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary and Belgium were parties to the agreement, representing ninety per cent of the world's export trade in sugar, and before the end of the year Peru and Jugoslavia joined. The countries lived up to their agreement. There were grievous reductions in acreage, and vast armies of men thrown out of work, because that is a consequence of reduction in acreage. Then you had revolution in Cuba, a decline in the consumption of sugar, and no increase in price. I would have the minister remember that. There is an explanation, which I shall give in a short time. In June, 1932, the price of sugar declined to an all time low of 0·57 cent a pound duty free in New York. You had reduced acreage, reduced consumption and reduced price.

I shall not go extensively into the condition in Germany. There are many parallels. In connection with cheese the marketing board or the government provided that a fixed percentage of domestic cheese should be used in certain products, that butter should be mixed with margarine, that alcohol distilled from home grown vegetable and cereal products should be mixed with gasoline. They had a very rigorous marketing law and production law in regard to the growth of tobacco.

Then you have to face the working out of this measure. Only landowners who were given licences could market, and you had charges of favouritism in the issue of these licences. It was alleged that the bigger landowners got licences and the men with small holdings received no licences and were left with their crops on their hands. This is not a new measure, Mr. Chairman, it is a very old one. There is nothing new about it. Greece has been attempting to regulate the marketing of currants since the beginning of the century. She did it first through a currant bank; in 1904 the currant bank failed. Then they established a privileged company. That privileged company I take it was something of the sort that it is proposed to establish here, because it tried to be cooperative. And when the charter of the privileged company expired in 1925 the government refused to renew its monopoly, on the ground that the company had not improved the economic position of the domestic currant industry during the twenty years of its activity. I should like to have the minister bring us up to date with regard to that matter, because I want to do a workmanlike job in reference to this bill or none at all. I know this, that recently the government of Greece issued an order providing that every time a man buys two loaves of white bread he must buy one of currant bread.

May I ask the minister to give us information also with regard to a similar proposition in Latvia, in regard to the flax industry, in 1919. Provision was made for the licensing of flax growers and mills, for the collection of funds from domestic users and distribution on the export trade. At first it was very profitable; I understand that the government received a considerable revenue, but then the turn came; the government had to borrow funds from the bank, and later the government became somewhat embarrassed. I should like further information on that subject. Surely we are entitled to know something more than the wishes of our constituents in this matter; we are entitled to know how far measures of this sort have been tried and particularly to what extent they have succeeded or failed.

In the Netherlands—and I must say that I have a very great respect for legislation in the Netherlands, where they have, perhaps as clearly as any country in the world, respected what my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce apparently fails to respect, that is the law of supply and demand—they were driven in 1932, as apparently this government has been driven with the best intentions in the world, to devise marketing acts. Among others there was an act called the hog central control act, which contained the usual provision for stabilization and everything that was to be done to increase prices, but what happened? When that board took over the marketing of bacon the hog population of the Netherlands was 2,735,000. Within a few months they ordered a reduction to 2,000,000 and the last information I have is that the Dutch government has ordered a further reduction to 1,800,000, and there has been no increase in price.

We ought to study these matters, Mr. Chairman, for another reason. We can get some details as to how these things work out.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I make a suggestion? I have listened with great interest to what the hon. member has said—

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I have not finished.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the hon. gentleman continue his observations later and let the committee rise? I desire to make a short statement before six o'clock.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I shall be delighted to comply with the request of the Prime Minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is what I was about to say. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. NEILL: Might I suggest to the minister that the amendments be published in the votes and proceedings so that we may be able to consider them intelligently? When they are read by a chairman whom we cannot half hear it means a great deal of unnecessary debate, and members talk about something they do not understand. If we could see the amendments in print I am sure it would shorten the discussion.

Progress reported.

TAX ON GOLD

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AS TO CHANGE IN BUDGET PROPOSALS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to make a short statement before we adjourn. In view of the general misunderstanding that apparently has arisen regarding the tax imposed on gold by the budget delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) a few days ago I think it desirable to make a statement which will clarify the situation.

The minister indicated that it was essential for him to raise by taxation approximately the amount of revenue lost by reducing the tax on sugar to one cent per pound, and he stated that he proposed to obtain from the gold producing companies that sum, which would be imposed in the budget for the current year.

The government of the province of Ontario protested against the imposition of the tax; Hon. Charles McCrea, Minister of Mines, has been in Ottawa for several days. In some quarters it was asserted that such a tax was an infringement upon the taxing powers of the provinces. I think that view may be disregarded, inasmuch as clause 3 of section 91 of the British North America Act provides that the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation. The Ontario government further suggested that the tax imposed in the manner indicated was in the nature of a royalty, which it was submitted could be imposed only by the province. For the reasons stated this contention could not be accepted. Mr. McCrea, as the Minister of Mines for Ontario, arranged that representatives of the gold mining interests of that province and others should meet the Minister of Finance and myself. The representatives of the gold producing companies expressed their willingness to assist in any reasonable way the government of Canada in balancing its budget, but pointed out that they were already subjected to very heavy taxation. We then pointed out that the price of gold for the year 1932 had averaged over $23 per ounce while the statutory price was only $20.67 per ounce, the added price being attributable, mainly or wholly, during that year to the premium on American money in Canada. In 1933 the average price received by the gold producers was $28.72 per ounce, which represented an average of $8.05 per ounce more than the statutory price of $20.67 per ounce. During the early months of the year the price received was less than $28, but when the president of the United States announced that the republic would buy all new gold at a price of $35 per ounce the result was that since that date the price of gold has approximated $35 per ounce.

The present premium on the price of gold is an unearned increment arising out of economic conditions and the monetary action taken by the United States of America as well as by the Dominion of Canada. We therefore indicated that, rather than have any question of provincial rights or royalties at issue between the dominion and the provinces, or any foundation being afforded for the suggestion that the dominion was interfering in the field of provincial taxation, we would substitute for the proposals of the minister a tax on the unearned increment of 25 cents out of every dollar received from the sale of gold by dividend paying companies in excess of the statutory price of $20.67 per ounce until May 31, 1935, and, in view of the high tax thus imposed, permit the corporation income tax paid by the dividend producing companies in 1934 to be credited against the tax on the unearned increment and thus avoid the charge that the government was imposing double taxation on the gold industry. The second question alluded to the low grade ore found in large quantities throughout Canada and the development of which the present high price of gold had greatly stimulated, resulting in great activity in prospecting the employment of large numbers of people, and expenditures of large sums of money. With respect to low grade properties no special tax will be imposed until they become dividend producing properties, nor will the tax be imposed upon any company that was not paying dividends prior to the first of January, 1933, and which is now paying dividends. In no event is it proposed to tax unearned increment arising from the sale of gold when the price is $30 or less, as stated by the minister.

It will be a matter of satisfaction to the house and to the country to know that when we met the representatives of the gold producing mines and indicated to them clearly why the tax was imposed they expressed a most sympathetic appreciation of the financial situation, and although the large dividend paying mines, few in number, must pay the tax, they accepted the proposed method of paying twenty-five cents on the dollar of the premium payable on gold as not unfair. The tax does not in any event contemplate the taxation of the production of placer mines.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister a question which arises out of the statement he has just read? He has referred to the representations made by the Minister of Mines for Ontario. I observe in the press that representations were made to the government by the provinces of British Columbia, Nova Scotia and Quebec. Were those representations not considered? May I ask him further whether any representations were made by his own Minister of Mines?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the questions the right hon. gentleman has asked, may I say that the only formal presentation of the case for the provinces was made by the Hon. Charles McCrea. There were statements appearing in the press, but they were directed to the populace and not to the government, and it cannot be said therefore that we received any formal representations, except as indicated. The federal Minister of Mines expressed his opinion, as did all other members of the council, with respect to the matters affected. May I thank the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) for affording me the opportunity to make this statement before six o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister indicate how the revenue raised under the proposed tax would compare with that under the first arrangement?

Mr. BENNETT: The difference would be very small, depending entirely upon two factors. One would be the price at which gold was sold, as I have indicated, which would determine of course the extent of the unearned increment, and secondly the extent to which gold was produced. If the gold is produced to the extent it was last year, or thereabouts, it is only a matter of arithmetic to point out to the hon. member that if the price was $35 the difference between $20.67 and $35 is $14.33. One-fourth of that is about, as will be observed, $3.58, whereas ten per cent of $35 is $3.50, which is less. The difficulty is that with respect to the lower grade properties it might be the taxation of a deficit, and therefore they are eliminated, which may mean some loss to revenue, but to that extent only.

Mr. HANBURY: Before the Prime Minister takes his seat may I say that I did not understand thoroughly the statement he made. Is it possible that the taxation on unearned increment will be greater than the income tax in all cases, or whether the tax will be a larger amount, whichever it may be.

Mr. BENNETT: I need hardly say that that question cannot arise, but that in no event can the income tax—12½ per cent of 50 per cent of the profits, which is the income tax against gold companies—amount to anything of that sort. A computation by the manager of one of the largest mines indicates payments under this plan of about $1,600,000 as against a slightly lesser sum under the other plan. But it will be observed that as this applies only to dividend paying properties it is obvious there may be a diminution of the revenue because there is no tax to be taken unless and until they are dividend paying properties, and if the price of gold falls to $30 an ounce there will be no revenue at all.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, May 3, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the fourth report of the select standing committee on standing orders and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

R. R. NO. 3, ARMSTRONG, B.C., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What were the conditions laid down in regard to mail contract for R. R. No. 3, Armstrong, British Columbia?
2. Have any complaints been received against the recent holder of the contract and, if so, from whom?
3. Was the recent holder a disabled veteran?
4. Was the contract taken away from him?
5. To whom has the contract been now granted?
6. Was this person the lowest tenderer?
7. Is he an ex-service man?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Contract expired March 31, 1934, and tenders were invited for a new contract.
2. No.
3. Yes.
4. Contract expired.
5. Geo. W. Game.
6. Equally low with two others.
7. No information.

VANCOUVER TERMINAL ELEVATORS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. How many terminal grain elevators at Vancouver are operated as public terminals?
2. How many are operated as private elevators in which "mixing" may take place?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Two.
2. Two, which may mix except in first four grades of wheat.

YAMASKA COUNTY—UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. What amounts did the government contribute under the terms of the Unemployment Relief Act, to the county of Yamaska, in each of the following years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933?
2. What municipalities benefited thereby?
3. What amount was contributed yearly in respect of each such municipality?
4. What was the aggregate amount?

Mr. MANION (for the Minister of Labour): Under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, the following amounts were contributed by the dominion towards the cost of unemployment relief in the county of Yamaska:—

Notre Dame de Pierreville parish..	$ 749.58
St. Joachim de Courval parish....	875.00
Village of Pierreville.....	1,452.63
Parish of St. Gerard-Magella....	366.95
	$3,444.16

There have been no accounts received from the province under subsequent legislation for the county of Yamaska.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

VESSELS FOR CATTLE EXPORT

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. How many vessels were specially equipped for the export of cattle under the control of the Trade and Commerce department within the last two years?
2. What are the names of persons or companies to whom such vessels belonged?
3. How much money was spent in each case?
4. To whom was such money paid?

Mr. STEVENS: Return tabled herewith.

DEATH OF MR. THOMAS HERBERT LENNOX

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY BY MR. GUTHRIE, MR. MACKENZIE KING, MR. COOTE AND MR. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to announce in this chamber the sudden death of our esteemed colleague, Thomas Herbert Lennox which, I believe, occurred in the city of Toronto at an early hour this morning. The awful suddenness of the demise of our late colleague has cast a feeling of most profound sorrow throughout this chamber. It was but a few days ago that he sat in his place here and also but a few days ago when he was engaged in an important legal case before the Supreme Court of Canada. Little did we think at that time that he was so soon to be removed from this earthly scene. It brings before us very prominently the old admonition that in the midst of life we are in death.

Mr. Lennox had sat in this parliament for a number of years and I think I can say he had endeared himself to members in every corner of the house. His affable, genial disposition was manifest at all times and his friends throughout Ontario and in this chamber were legion. He was a native son of the province of Ontario, having been born sixty-five years ago in the county of Simcoe. He was the product of the public schools of Ontario and of the collegiate institute at Barrie. Afterwards he took his legal course and was called to the bar at Osgoode Hall in the city of Toronto. After having been called to the bar he immediately engaged in practice and from the very start of his career at the bar it may be said that he was wonderfully successful. He soon rose to a very prominent position at the bar; he was made one of His Majesty's counsel learned in the law; he was elected a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada, and at the time of his death he was one of the undoubted leaders of the bar of the province of Ontario and one of the really great lawyers of the Dominion of Canada. His death will be sincerely mourned by his many colleagues in the legal profession. The late T. H. Lennox was a man of varied attainment and of many activities. During the war it will be remembered that he was exceedingly active; at that time, he cast aside his profession and his public life, and through his efforts to a very large extent the battalion known as the 208th was raised, he himself became the officer commanding, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and took that battalion overseas. He returned to Canada with an excellent military record.

Early in life our late colleague resolved to devote at least some portion of his time to what we might term the public service of the country, though I think it will be recognized on all sides that his chief interest in secular matters was in his own chosen profession of law. He devoted a very large amount of his time to his profession, he was engaged in a great many varied and important cases, and was not permitted to devote as much time to his public life as we would all have liked. As early as the year 1902 he unsuccessfully contested a riding for the legislature of the province of Ontario, but subsequently in the year 1905 he was elected for the provincial constituency of North York at a general election, and at four subsequent general elections in the province of Ontario he carried the same riding. He continued as a member of the Ontario legislature until he was first returned to the House of Commons as representative for the riding of North York in the general election of 1925, again in the year 1926 he was elected for that riding, and also in the year 1930 at the last general election.

He has had an eminently successful career both in the legislature of Ontario and in the parliament of Canada, and had he been able to devote more time to his parliamentary duties he would certainly have risen to a very high place in the public life of Canada. He was a man whom everyone liked, everyone regarded as a friend. While he was a hard fighter when a contest was on, he was a man who carried no bitterness, no acrimonious feelings when the contest was over. I believe one can say that all who knew him were his friends; few, if any, were his enemies. The suddenness of his taking off has produced a tremendous impression in this house. We all mourn him most sincerely. All we can do now is to lament his loss and express our feelings of regret and sympathy to those members of his family and relatives who survive.

It is to be noted that the deceased himself received some hard knocks during his lifetime. Only a few months ago his only son was suddenly killed in an automobile accident in the city of Toronto. Indeed, many of his intimate friends consider that Thomas Herbert Lennox never really got over the shock caused by his son's death.

He is gone from us, and all we can do is to respect his memory and lament his early death.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): On behalf of honourable members of the official opposition, I desire to convey to the Prime Minister, to members of the government, and to other honourable gentlemen opposite the expression of our sympathy in the loss which they have sustained in the death of one of their fellow members of this House of Commons, one who for many years had been prominent as a member of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario.

In the appreciation which he has just expressed of the late member's career, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has reviewed in a fitting manner Mr. Lennox's attainments and services, alike to his profession and to the state. I join with him in recognition of the late member's talents and abilities, and in particular of his patriotic services at the time of the great war, to which the minister has made special reference.

As one who, for a short time, had the honour of representing the constituency of North York, I have knowledge of the considerable personal and political following which the late member enjoyed in that riding, and I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to express to Mr. Lennox's friends in the constituency my sympathy with them in the death of one to whom, over a period of so many years, they have given so large a measure of their confidence and support.

I also join, as all on this side will wish very sincerely to join, in the expression of sympathy for Mrs. Lennox who has been so suddenly and so greatly bereaved.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) is not here. In his absence I would like to take the opportunity of saying that I am sure every member in this corner of the house joins very heartily in the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) expressing our regret at the death of Colonel Lennox and our sympathy with his relatives and friends. May I say that I doubt if there is a member of the House of Commons who was more generally liked by his fellow members than was Colonel Lennox. I think that is one of the highest tributes that can be paid to any member.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, when I declared my pair yesterday with the hon. member for North York nothing was further from my mind than that the flag would fly at half mast over this building to-day as a tribute to his memory. For nearly ten years or sessions he was my pair, and I shall always have the most pleasant recollections of my dealings with the late hon. gentleman. We have been closely associated and I came to have the highest respect for his qualities. He had attained prominence at the bar of his province and at the bar of this country; he was a gallant soldier, he was a congenial member of this house, a very popular representative of the people, and a true friend. I join in the tributes which have been expressed to his memory, and wish to convey my most heartfelt and sincere sympathy to his family, to the members of the legal profession in the province of Ontario and in Canada at large, and also to my hon. friends on the other side of the house.

FRUIT AND HONEY ACT

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house disagrees with their 1st, 2nd and 5th amendments to the Bill No. 26, An Act respecting Fruit and Honey, for the following reasons:—

"Inasmuch as the clauses amended are identical with clauses in the following acts passed—

The Seed Act
The Root Vegetable Act

and it is essential that there be uniformity in such legislation."

And agrees to the 3rd, 4th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th and 15th of their amendments, without any amendment.

And that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: before the motion to send the bill back is carried I wish to draw the attention of the house to one clause in this bill and the suggestion that the Senate has made. It is that after the words:

The minister may, from time to time, make regulations:—

There is inserted the phrase:

subject to the approval of the governor in council.

I think the extra precaution which the Senate is there taking in the matter of making known in as public a way as possible the regulations that may be passed is distinctly of advantage. I had hoped that the government would have seen its way clear to accept that amendment. I think the other amendments have reference to interprovincial trade, and inasmuch as this house is the guardian of the trade and commerce of the dominion it seems to me the amendments proposed by the Senate are very much in order.

Motion agreed to.

OATHS OF ALLEGIANCE ACT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 57, to amend the Oaths of Allegiance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill really takes the place of a bill that was introduced by the former Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). After the hon. gentleman introduced his bill on March 13 last I conferred with him at the earliest opportunity, and it seemed expedient to suggest to him that the bill might take a slightly different form. After consultation with the hon. gentleman he withdrew his bill, with the result that the present bill was introduced on April 19 and fully explained to the house. In effect it is carrying out a resolution of the imperial conference of 1926 at which Canada was represented by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleague the then Minister of Justice. That resolution of the imperial conference was carried into effect by the parliament of the United Kingdom, which passed the Royal and Parliamentary Titles Act, 1927, and on May 13, 1927, a royal proclamation was issued setting out His Majesty's style and title.

The oath of allegiance, as it appears in the present bill, is identical with the oath of allegiance as administered in Great Britain, in Australia, in the Union of South Africa and I think generally throughout the British Empire; and it is deemed expedient that the same oath of allegiance should be prescribed in Canada. I think, as far as hon. members have expressed opinions to me privately, this bill meets with the almost unanimous support of the house, and as I fully explained it on the previous occasion it seems to me that no further explanation is required at the present time.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I desire to confirm what my hon. friend has said, and I am grateful to him for having asked me to confer with him as to this bill, which I support with great pleasure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION COMPANIES ACT

On the order for the second reading of Bill No. 64 respecting Dominion companies:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I had hoped to be able to move the second reading of this bill.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I have asked for a copy of this bill in the French language, but it has not been printed in French. It is so marked on the order paper, but I inquired yesterday and to-day and was informed that it is not printed in French. It is quite important that we have the French version, because many explanations will have to be given.

Mr. CAHAN: I was about to move the second reading, but last evening I was notified by one of my colleagues whose maternal language is French that he had not been able to procure a French copy at the distribution office. I understand that it is in print, but perhaps the final distribution has not been completed. Hon. gentlemen might allow the bill to receive second reading awaiting final distribution of the French copy, though under the rules my hon. friend is perfectly right, I cannot insist upon second reading if the French copies are not distributed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think we should be asked to consent to the second reading of this bill without having it printed in both languages.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 70, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I have some remarks to make in connection with this bill, but I should like to know if the minister intends to have this bill considered by the committee of the whole or by a special committee.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is entirely at the option of the house as to whether or not any discussion takes place at the present time. Perhaps I might explain the bill a little further than I did on the motion for first reading. The main objects of the amendments in the amending bill are to produce a conformity between the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and the Food and Drugs Act. Under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act there is a provision whereby in the case of certain diseases it is not permissible to sell certain drugs or remedies. That provision does not obtain in the Food and Drugs Act. It so happens that when on some occasions people find it is not permissible to sell remedies under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act they seek permission for the sale of such remedies under the Food and Drugs Act. As the object of the provision under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act with reference to the prevention of the sale of certain remedies for the treatment of certain diseases is for the protection of the public, and as time may be lost in the event of people acting on advertisements of those remedies, these changes are proposed to the Food and Drugs Act.

Another provision presents the adulteration of vinegar through the use of acetic acid. Then, there is a schedule of diseases for which remedies may not be sold. There is provision whereby in the light of subsequent knowledge, changes in the list of diseases and list of remedies may be made by order in council. From time to time therefore, if found desirable, certain changes may be effected by order in council.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister if there have been any requests for these changes, and especially those changes affecting drugs and proprietary articles. If so, from where did the requests come?

Mr. MacLAREN: There have been many requests for the changes. To begin with, departmental officials have felt that this action should be taken, and in addition, the amendments have been submitted to many of the medical men of the House of Commons, who have expressed their approval.

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: The house is not in committee. If any hon. member wishes to speak he is at liberty to do so, but the house is not in committee.

Mr. SANDERSON: Do you rule that I cannot ask another question of the minister?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Wait until we get into committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was just pointing out that the procedure followed in this instance is not in accordance with our rules or customs. It is not customary on second reading to engage in a general questioning. However, if the house chooses to do so, I have no objection.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Regulations by governor in council.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With the principle of the bill I have much sympathy, because I understand that it is directed against sales by people commonly known as quacks, and with a view to protection against such people. Although I have much sympathy with the measure there are some features in it with which I cannot agree in toto. For instance, as I understand the bill, any remedies which may be self-administered can no longer be imported, manufactured or offered for sale. I have in mind this case: I understand that for the treatment of arteriosclerosis there are certain standard drugs prescribed by the medical profession, but which the profession do not compound. One goes to his medical adviser who prescribes a certain medicine or solvent. These medicines are already made up; the patient goes to the drug store and presents the medical prescription. The druggist takes pills from a bottle and puts them into a box, and after the box is labelled we are allowed to take it home. From the drug store we may purchase some medicine which has been imported or manufactured. If the bill now before us became law I understand that I could not go to a drug store to buy some of these specific remedies declared to be valuable in the softening of arteries, or when used as a solvent.

Let us suppose that we are suffering from blood poisoning. What would be my position if, going to camp, I decided to take iodine, mercurochrome, listerine, peroxide, or some other medicines which could be used in the event of an accident? In a case of blood poisoning those remedies would be self-administered. We know that blood poisoning may be caused from an interior condition, or from a scratch. Supposing I happened to be in the woods, and while walking I tripped, thereby causing some part of my body to become infected, under this measure I could not have iodine or mercurochrome. I could not take one of those disinfectants to my camp, nor could I import, manufacture, offer for sale or advertise by any means whatever, nor sell any remedy recommended or suggested for use for self-administration. That would be my difficulty. I suppose if this bill passed the country storekeeper would not be at leisure to sell any more painkiller, because it might be used to combat blood poisoning, or some such ailment. To what extent should we be limited because it was a self-administered drug? For instance, when I go to camp I might want to take with me spirits of ammonia. It might be for a case of chronic heart disease or for a heart attack that might suddenly develop. As I interpret this clause I could not take up with me spirits of ammonia because it was going to be self-administered. Clause 2 reads:

No person shall import, manufacture, offer for sale—

any of these drugs that might be self-administered.

It is quite true that pills have been sold for a large number of diseases, and I fully agree that the public should be protected; but take obesity, for example. There is the glandular kind, and obesity that results from over-eating and under-exercising. As I understand the effect of this bill the remedy for obesity of the glandular kind would be barred. That might be all right. But to what extent would this prohibition apply to treatment by way of dieting, plus the use of some drug, probably laxatives, which are sometimes used. I have a lot of sympathy with the principle of the bill but I would suggest that it be referred to a mixed committee of medical men, who I suppose are the ones primarily interested, and practical men—I am not saying that offensively—so that the Food and Drugs Act might be considered both from the point of view of the medical men and of protecting the rights and privileges of the public. We do not want the ordinary rights of the people trampled upon.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think that the interpretation placed upon this amendment by my hon. friend from Ottawa is a correct one. The amendment does not propose to prohibit the manufacture of any remedy. It proposes to prohibit the sale or manufacture of any remedy for self-administration in the case of the diseases which are listed under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and which it is thought can be placed, with advantage to the public, under the Food and Drugs Act. That is a different thing altogether. It altogether depends on the objective. This amendment does not prohibit the manufacture of the remedy but it says that the remedy must not be manufactured or sold or advertised for certain diseases or conditions, which is a different thing altogether.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not satisfied with the explanation that has just been given by the minister. I have the greatest respect and the kindliest feelings for him, and he knows it, and I do not intend to quarrel with him at all. I stated at the outset that I agreed with the principle of the bill to protect people from themselves. But I ask the minister, will this bill prevent me taking iodine, for instance, to my camp? The bill says that you cannot sell or manufacture these remedies which are to be self-administered. Of course, if a doctor prescribes the use of that remedy it would be all right, but I am speaking of iodine that is going to be self-administered, and which, as I read clause 2, cannot be imported, manufactured or offered for sale. I should like the minister to make sub-clause 6A plain. I cannot get it. Under its provisions you cannot even offer for sale or advertise any of these antiseptics that may be used in the case of blood-poisoning. Of course, I agree that one would have to determine what blood-poisoning was. But suppose it was caused by a scratch; how, under this clause, am I going to use iodine or listerine or lysol or any of these other antiseptics. I am not here to advertise these products by mentioning their names. Take any antiseptic that might be used for that purpose.

Mr. MacLAREN: What the amendment seeks to correct is self-administration in the case of diseases where valuable time may be lost and recovery delayed by self-administration instead of medical treatment. I do not think it is a reasonable interpretation to say that one could not under this clause make an application of iodine to the skin. It is the advertising of remedies for self-administration in the treatment of these diseases and their sale to the public for that purpose that we are seeking to prevent. The public at the present time very often depend on these advertisements and believe that they are going to obtain benefit from these remedies, when such is not the case.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would ask the minister if the object of this legislation is to restrict the sale of proprietary articles, commonly called patent medicines, by druggists.

Mr. MacLAREN: This amendment does not affect what my hon. friend refers to in the slightest.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am only asking if it does.

Mr. MacLAREN: And I am simply answering my hon. friend's question. This has nothing to do with patent medicines. They come under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. This is the Food and Drugs Act, and this amendment does not touch the sale or prohibition of sale of patent medicines. It is limiting the sale of certain remedies for the treatment of certain diseases under the Food and Drugs Act. The question of patent medicines does not come directly under the amendment.

Mr. HOWDEN: I presume, Mr. Chairman, that we are discussing clause 6A of section 2. I did not know that we had dealt with section 1. But if we are discussing clause 6A I take it to mean, and I would ask the minister to correct me if I am wrong, that remedies such as might be prescribed for diseases listed in schedule A shall not be imported, manufactured, advertised or offered for sale by others than qualified medical men. I assume that is the meaning of the clause. If the clause is so sweeping as to mean that no pharmaceutical company, medical man or anyone else shall import a remedy which may be prescribed for the treatment of arteriosclerosis, let us say, or Bright's disease, in my opinion it is too broad. If, on the other hand, the bill is intended to prohibit other than medical men or qualified persons from importing and offering for sale medicines of a nature not safe for one not posted to take without directions, then I think the clause is entirely in order. I should like an explanation from the minister in that regard.

Mr. MacLAREN: The amendment states that it shall not be for selfadministration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Once a remedy is recommended by the label on the bottle it becomes a remedy recommended and you cannot sell it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Recommended for self-administration only.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You may have a pain-killer which could be self-administered in the bush to prevent a cold. The label might state that it is a preventative of colds, but you would not be able to sell it, to advertise it, to manufacture it or to import it because it is recommended and is to be self-administered.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Get the other fellow to give you a dose and then it would not be self-administered.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friends may know what it means but I do not. I am in favour of the spirit of the bill but I think we should be able to understand it.

Mr. COTNAM: If the hon. member will read section 6A a little more carefully he will see that it has nothing at all to do with common colds. It refers to the diseases mentioned in schedule A which are of such a nature that remedies prescribed or self-administered without the supervision of someone who understands the disease might be harmful to the individual and may even endanger or imperil his life if there was any delay. I think all medical members of the house will agree that remedies for the diseases mentioned in this schedule should be carefully prescribed and taken only on the instructions of a qualified medical practitioner.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Suppose a man has blood poisoning and he purchases one of these disinfectants which are recommended for the cure of blood poisoning, perhaps by superficial application. These remedies are recommended and suggested for that purpose and I want to know how they would be affected by this bill. I did not draft the bill and I am trying to get an interpretation of its meaning. This is the time to get that interpretation, not when we get into court. I ask the minister or someone in authority if, after this bill goes through, I will be able to purchase one of these disinfectants which are recommended or suggested for blood poisoning and which may be self-administered.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think that difficulty could be overcome by adding just a word or two to the clause. The hon. member is confusing external applications with internal medication. It looks to me as though the schedule contains one or two diseases which could be left out. I think influenza and probably alcoholism could be left out. The rest of the diseases are of such a serious nature that a medical man ought to be called in immediately. There are no known medicinal cures for some of the diseases mentioned, surgery is the only method by which a cure can be effected. The hon. member is referring to remedies such as lysol which are not taken internally. I do not think there is anything in this bill to prevent a man from using that remedy externally. If there is, I suggest that the words "for internal medication" be added. We must protect the public against themselves and against their own foolishness. We must protect them against deception. This is in the interests of their health and even of their lives. For instance, take cancer. Everyone knows that it runs a certain length of time before it breaks away from its original moorings or location. If that happens the patient is doomed. Time is important in this disease, as it is in tetanus, or what is commonly known as lockjaw. In nearly all these cases time is an essential factor and drugs are mostly useless. I think I would be safe in saying that there is not a disease in this category in which medicine would be worth anything as far as effecting a cure is concerned. There is great danger in the delay which may occur by the application of these quack remedies, and the patient may lose his life.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the discussion could be clarified a good deal if the minister would tell us what is meant by "recommended or suggested for use." Influenza is one of the diseases mentioned in schedule A and of those mentioned it is perhaps the one most frequently treated by home remedies or by remedies obtained from the drug store. After this bill becomes law, could a person having influenza go to the drug store and purchase a remedy which states on its label that it is good for influenza? Will that be permitted, or will he have no right to do that? I do not think he should have a right to go to a druggist and say, "I have influenza, what do you recommend for it?" I take it that the druggist must not suggest that a particular remedy is good for influenza. As I understand the meaning of this bill, after it becomes law no one will be able to go to a drug store and purchase a remedy for any of these diseases when the label on the bottle or the verbal representation of the druggist is to the effect that it is recommended as being good for any one of these diseases.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the interpretation given by my hon. friend is approximately correct; it is nearer the truth than that given by other hon. gentlemen. We have heard the old time honoured remedy referred to more than once to-day, and that is painkiller, but painkiller does not come under this amendment or under this act. There is some confusion on the part of some hon. gentlemen about this matter. Painkiller finds its resting place, I believe, under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and it is dealt with there; whether it may or may not be sold is determined under that act; it does not come under our proposed amendment.

With reference to influenza, that is no light matter. Does my hon. friend realize the last year in Canada, for which a report is available, there were 4,500 deaths from that disease, so it is a highly important subject. Let us take afflictions that are familiar to us, for instance, the case of lockjaw, which is another name for tetanus; if the sufferer, on the advice of some kind friend, resorts to some remedy that the latter has found good, it may be for something else, the time has gone by for the remedy that we know is practically the only one that is helpful and curative in tetanus or lockjaw, and that is by administering antitoxin.

These are striking examples and as we know we may come down to a boundary line; that is natural in all matters of legislation. As we are all aware it is of the first importance to act at once in the case of diphtheria, and how? By administering an antitoxin. Some friend or next door neighbour can hardly be a safe adviser in such cases. The whole measure is one designed to protect the public. One constantly hears about cancer to which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has referred. What do we all hear? If this had been dealt with earlier, the prospects of success would have been substantially good. In cancer there are probably two remedies that are of use: one is by surgical operation, removing, if possible, the cancer, and the other is by administering radium or X-ray. There are no successful remedies other than those I have mentioned, and if a neighbour or somebody else suggests some remedy, the opportunity for the man or woman who is trying to treat it in this way, is slipping fast, That is all.

Mr. HURTUBISE: I have no doubt that the aim of the bill is to protect the public from the misuse or abuse of medicines, but I think the whole trouble is that the wording of the bill is not very clear. The real trouble is about the word "remedy." Drugs are either crude or compound and crude may be open to the public as to its name and purpose while compound may also be open to the public with the prescription written on the bottle, or it may be patented with a secret prescription. The clause reads:

Nor sell any remedy—

What kind of remedy? Is it crude, open prescription or patent medicine? If the wording comprises patent medicine, it should read:

Nor sell any remedy recommended or suggested and labelled for use for self-administration.

I know for a fact that in the patent medicine branch there is a board of supervisors of patent medicines or patent prescriptions coming in and anything that is harmful is not accepted. This bill is to prohibit the importation, manufacture, offering for sale, advertising by any means whatever or selling of any remedy recommended or suggested in the case of certain diseases. It is to forbid a person or a company to put on the market a medicine recommended by advertisement or by pamphlet or in any other way such as by the label on the bottle, that it is to cure some of the diseases mentioned. Those diseases are considered by the supervisors of medicine serious enough that they should not be meddled with by anybody except those qualified. Therefore I think the clause should read:

Any remedy recommended or labelled for use for self-administration in the treatment of any of the diseases—

And so forth. I think that would cover the whole point.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think my hon. friend will find that what he is suggesting now is already covered in the act. All of those remedies that come under the Food and Drugs Act have the formula on the bottle or the case or whatever it may be. Let us say the bottle; the formula now has to appear on it That I understand is what my hon. friend has been suggesting and that now is operative under the act.

Mr. VENIOT: Under which act? The Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would like to ask the minister one last question. He has spoken about influenza. There is influenza and influenza. We know at one time an influenza epidemic caused us a great deal of harm, trouble and death. But we are in the habit of calling grippe and cold by the same name. My question is this: If I call that cold or grippe, influenza; if I go to a corner drugstore and buy quinine which is recommended and suggested by everybody and this is contained in a box labelled "quinine, infallibly recommended for influenza, grippe and colds," what happens to me and what will be the position of the man who sells it?

Mr. MacLAREN: My hon. friend is speaking outside the provisions of the act. I will say first that this has nothing to do with proprietary or patent medicines. They are dealt with in another act. The hon. gentleman mentions certain articles and asks whether under the conditions indicated they could or could not be sold. They could not be sold and have not been sold for years, under the Proprietary or Patent Medicines Act.

Now let us get down to what we really have before us. This amendment deals with such remedies as are not permitted to be sold under this act for certain purposes, and the question as to quinine does not arise, because as I say these remedies must have the formulae on the bottles.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Where do we get that? It is not in the bill.

Mr. MacLAREN: We find it in the Food and Drugs Act, chapter 76, revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

Mr. SANDERSON: A couple of minutes ago the minister replying to a question of mine said that this amendment would not restrict the sale of proprietary articles or patent medicines so-called, in drug stores. Yet in answer to a question by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) he said that if a customer went into a drug store and asked for some remedy for influenza and the druggist said, "Here is something that will help you," and sold it to him, and he went home and administered the medicine to himself he was acting contrary to the law. The minister admitted that this bill would restrict the sale of certain articles in drug stores. Am I right in that?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, you are not quite right.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then I shall await further explanation from the minister. There is another point. According to this amendment the breach of the act will consist in self-administration of the medicine. If a man buys at a drug store a bottle of something for influenza, takes it home and his wife gives it to him, or his neighbour, or a nurse, is he liable under the act? Who would be liable under such circumstances; would the man who bought it and the wife or nurse who gave it to him also be liable?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Husband and wife are one.

Mr. HANBURY: Not always.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well, say the neighbour's wife, what about that?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): That would be a scandal!

Mr. MacLAREN: I think there is no doubt there would only be one left if some of the suggestions of his friends or even the wife were followed. The person who sells is responsible.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then this legislation does restrict the sale of certain remedies in drug stores?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Before going further I think I ought to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are discussing section 2, whereas section 1 has not yet been dealt with.

Mr. SANDERSON: I put a question to the minister. He told me the bill does not restrict the sale of certain articles although he told the hon. member for West Middlesex that it does. Was his answer to me correct or incorrect?

Mr. MacLAREN: If my hon. friend would listen a little more carefully—

Mr. SANDERSON: I am listening very patiently.

Mr. MacLAREN: But not clearly. I think that is a correct choice of words. I do not conceal this fact, that it is difficult to frame that provision so clearly that those listening perhaps for the first time follow it exactly. One must remember that the articles dealt with are those registered and labelled under the Food and Drug Act. It does not contemplate the suppression of the manufacture of drugs of all kinds nor does it say that a remedy like, say, quinine cannot be sold. These remedies referred to are covered by the Food and Drugs Act and labelled with a formula and sold for a certain purpose.

Mr. VENIOT: Those are not affected under this bill?

Mr. MacLAREN: Those are the very ones that are affected. That is what I am trying to make clear. Now it may be that that clause is not as clear as it might be. I would like to have some hon. members suggest a better wording. I might be prepared to act on it. I am considering whether I will move that the committee rise and report progress with a view to redrafting that clause so that it will be clearer and more easily interpreted. That would be under subsection 6A and I presume section 1, that has not been discussed at all. I would like to say a word about that. Should there be at any time reason to change that list of diseases or should there be reason for change in certain remedies mentioned in schedule B, it should be provided that those changes could be effected by order in council. Otherwise it would mean coming back to the house for an amendment. Science advances from year to year, knowledge increases continuously. While the views expressed are the views held by my department and others, it is felt that there should be freedom to make changes by order in council in the light of future knowledge.

Progress reported.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, it was expected that we would go on with three bills standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), but he is engaged in the banking committee and will not be free until this evening, when he desires to proceed with those bills. In the meantime I would move that you leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply, and we will take up the Department of the Interior, Indian Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

INDIAN AFFAIRS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Indians: to provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian Affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, education, etc., and a grant of $100,000 approved by parliament in session of 1926-27, $3,939,500.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Would the minister tell the committee what agricultural activities are carried on under this vote?

Mr. MURPHY: In the different provinces, notably in Ontario and the western provinces, and to a lesser degree in British Columbia, Quebec and the maritimes, Indians carry on agricultural pursuits on reserves which are suitable for such a vocation. In Ontario there are certain reserves, such as the Six Nations reserve at Brantford, and the Tyendinaga reserve along the Bay of Quinte, as well as others throughout the province, where the Indians carry on farming operations in the same manner as they are carried on by their white neighbours, and the same condition applies in the west, where there are many reserves large in area and located in fertile regions.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the minister explain what advance the Indians are making in the way of agricultural development?

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the residential schools farms are operated, and the children are given instruction not only in reading, writing, arithmetic and the usual courses of study prescribed for public school but also practical instruction by the heads of the institutions in the different phases of agriculture, such as the care of cattle, swine and horses and the growing of crops. This practice has been in effect for a great many years, and I am happy to tell the committee that we in the department believe progress is being made to quite an extent. As the committee knows, in the past the Indians were not an agricultural people; they were rather a pastoral people or, shall we say, devoted to the chase. During the years that this policy has been in effect, however, the children of the second generation have made appreciable progress. Those who first attended these schools may not have made that progress which we could have wished, but we have found that it is the custom of the pupils of those various residential schools to intermarry, and on going to the schools their children are noticeably more intelligent and more interested in agriculture.

Mr. MARCIL: I have two Indian reserves in my constituency, Maria and Restigouche. A few days ago I sent the minister a letter I received from the superior of the Capuchin monastery at Restigouche, in which he directed attention to the condition of the roads in that reserve. It lies on the banks of the Restigouche river, opposite the town of Campbellton, and is surrounded by a splendid network of highways built by the province of Quebec. Ste. Anne de Restigouche is a pilgrimage centre to which thousands of people come from all parts of Quebec and the maritime provinces to visit the church, which is one of the oldest in the district. According to this reverend gentleman the roads within the reserve are in very bad shape, though the surrounding roads are in good condition. He complains that nothing has been done for some time and in the letter which I sent the minister he makes a number of suggestions which I think are very timely. These Indians are the survivors of the Micmacs of the old days, who reside on the Restigouche. They earn their living by doing a little cultivating and by acting as guides for fishermen on the salmon rivers in my county and the surrounding districts. Some of them work in the sawmills when they are in operation, but there is not very much of that work at present. This gentleman points out that the reserves are in a pretty neglected condition, not through any fault of the agent but because of lack of funds, and I should like to know what the minister intends doing this year.

Mr. MURPHY: Did I understand my hon. friend to say there were two reserves?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes, Restigouche and Maria. They are both in Bonaventure county.

Mr. MURPHY: There is the sum of $125 in the estimates for the maintenance of roads in the Restigouche reserve.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there anything for the Maria reserve?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister imagine he will go very far with $125 on a reserve about ten miles square? I think the amount is much too small, and I hope the inspector who goes down there periodically will look into the matter and see if the amount cannot be increased. Apart from the Indians themselves thousands of people visit that reserve to see the shrine of Ste. Anne de Restigouche, which dates back to the middle of the eighteenth century, and it is not to the credit of the Indian department to have the roads and sidewalks in the condition in which they are at present. I hope the minister will see his way clear to improve matters. Then, I should like to ask this question: Is the same system being followed whereby teachers are paid to educate the Indians in these two reserves, or have changes been made lately?

Mr. MURPHY: Practically the same system is in existence to-day as has been operating for some time, namely day schools are provided on the reserves, and the teachers are paid from parliamentary appropriations. I should like to know if the hon. member referred to roads on the reserves which might be considered provincial highways, and used by white people and Indians, or whether he had reference more particularly to roads maintained in the interest of the Indians themselves. I make this distinction because the committee will readily understand that in the Indian reserves there are different types of roads. Since a policy of provincial highways has been inaugurated throughout the length and breadth of Canada many such highways pass through Indian reserves. When speaking of roads we must keep those provincial highways in mind as contrasted with the roads built in the reserves purely for the use of the Indians themselves.

Mr. MARCIL: The Perron boulevard which encircles the whole Gaspe peninsula passes through the township of Mann in which this reserve is situated. That road is in first class condition, and this year, owing to the celebration, Gaspe will be visited by thousands of people from all parts of the continent. The roads to which I have referred, however are those local roads which run through the reserves, following the Restigouche river. From the letter which I received I would judge they are in very bad condition. Of course, any person going to church in that section of the country must pass along the roads on the reserves.

Mr. BOUCHARD: While I have no desire to criticize the manner in which the department has carried on its administration, may I say to the minister that the tendency to educate the Indians in an attempt to bring them to our standard of living seems to me rather far fetched. Three centuries of the history of Canada have proved it is useless to try to make white people from Indians. Of course, I am not criticizing the minister in this connection, because I understand the educational system is carried on in close co-operation with the different religious denominations. I think however that after three centuries of experience we must come to the conclusion that it is useless to try to bring these people to our standards of living, and I doubt very much whether in those efforts we are improving the conditions under which the Indians live. Instead of doing that I think we should try to develop their natural tendencies and dispositions. For instance, the Indian people are highly artistic and have given to Canada an example of artistic work which cannot be surpassed. While I admit that some kind of education is needed I should like to see some change introduced whereby the system of education among the Indians would follow more closely their needs, requirements and disposition. For instance, why should we not help them to foster the development of those handicrafts in which they are past masters. I do not think those Indians who have been educated to our standard of civilization are very happy.

In passing may I say that there seems to be a tendency for the city people to educate the farmers according to city standards. Certainly I do not wish to create any ill feeling between city and country people, but I believe that different standards of teaching and of education should be set for the different modes of living. I should like the minister to give some thought and consideration to these views. Perhaps with his long experience and with his influence he might try to experiment along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. MURPHY: In a word, the hon. gentleman is questioning the administration of the education system of the department, and I have no quarrel with his observations. As he and other hon. members are aware the system of education among the Indians is not the result of a day's growth. Rather, the system now in vogue has developed through a great many years. My reading has taught me that the educational system started through the efforts of the different church denominations to Christianize the Indians. In their zeal those people sent missionaries who, I believe, found themselves handicapped in their work. In order to help themselves they established schools, feeling that if they could gain the support of children when they were young, thereby getting them under their control, they would be in a position to Christianize those children and bring them to the white man's mode of living. Various churches put that system into effect. At a later point, finding the financial burden of education rather heavy, they applied to the dominion government for assistance. That assistance was given and throughout the years has been increasingly given.

The system education in effect to-day might be divided, broadly, into two classes, namely the residential and the day school systems. The churches prefer the residential school system. In those schools the child is taken in at a comparatively tender age, about six or seven years, and remains there until he or she has reached the age of sixteen or seventeen. During that time they are instructed in practically the same subjects as are the pupils in the white schools. The day school system is run very much on the same plan as the public school system of our provinces, and it is in existence on those reserves where such a plan can be put into effect. The committee will realize that on many reserves it is impracticable to have a day school system. The Indians in some cases occupy a large area of land and it would be impossible to get the children to school. On the other hand, the population of a residential school may be drawn, as it sometimes is from the whole provincial area. The hon. member has expressed the opinion that the system now in vogue is wrong in certain respects and that these people should be taught their native handicrafts. That is a debatable question. For instance, the handicrafts system is best known by the Indians themselves, and those best qualified to teach these handicrafts are the parents of these Indian children. In many reserves these handicrafts have been preserved and are to-day one of the main sources of income of the Indians. I need only mention the St. Regis Indians, who are proficient in basket weaving, and Indians on other reserves who are proficient in making snowshoes, Indian moccasins and so forth. I may say to the hon. member that I have given considerable thought to the question whether these handicrafts should be taught in our residential schools at the present time.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Fostered, not taught. I agree with the minister.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend says that he agrees that these handicrafts should be fostered rather than taught. I was merely going to point out that if these handicrafts were to be taught in the schools it would impose upon us a financial burden which we are not able to bear at the present time because we have all we can do to maintain the present system. But as a matter of fact we are encouraging handicrafts among these people, and I agree with my hon. friend that we should in certain cases foster these handicrafts. We must, however, be careful not to generalize because while certain Indians are proficient in basket-weaving or the making of snowshoes, not all Indians are. They have their different abilities the same as the white people, and because one Indian is a basket-weaver it does not follow that every Indian is a basket-weaver. But in order to encourage this work we are making grants of a total of $7,500 this year for prizes at exhibitions for Indian handicrafts and agricultural produce.

Mr. MARCIL: Do those grants cover all the reserves or apply only to a certain area?

Mr. MURPHY: The grants are made to certain fairs and institutions.

Mr. BROWN: I presume on this item we can discuss everything that relates to the Indians because it is the only item in the estimates that I find referring to them. I would recall to the minister that last year the minister brought in a bill that was very much debated and very much amended, and finally passed, with reference to the compulsory enfranchisement of Indians. I think this would be an opportune time, if a report has not already been made in some form that I have missed, for the minister to report what has been done under the authority of that act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not near enough to election time to give a report.

Mr. BROWN: We should know what was done under that bill. While I am on my feet I wish to refer to a newspaper report in regard to a matter on which the minister probably has some information. It was reported that certain Indian youths of eighteen or nineteen at a place called Shubenacadie were subjected to treatment that, judged by the standards of British justice, would seem to be monstrous. It was alleged that certain youths were soundly thrashed in order to extort confessions of the theft of a small sum of money. I would like to know if the minister has had any report on the matter and can inform the committee what action has been taken, because if the facts were as reported I have no hesitation in saying that those responsible should receive the utmost penalty the law provides. In dealing with the Indians we must not insist in treating them altogether according to our own standards. They must be treated with a good deal of consideration for the fact that their standards are not as high as we claim ours to be, and we should set them an example of humanity and justice rather than an example of extreme cruelty such as would seem to have been practised on these boys.

Mr. MURPHY: Answering the first question of the hon. member for Lisgar, in the fiscal year 1933-34 there were 44 enfranchisements of Indians under section 114, I think it is, of the act, but none were enfranchised under the section of the act that was amended last year.

With regard to the second portion of my hon. friend's remarks, the alleged flogging of Indians at Shubenacadie was brought to my attention both in newspaper reports and in reports which have been received in the department from the Indian agent for the district, and from the principal of the school. For the information of the hon. member and the committee I may say that a commission is being appointed under the Inquiries Act to make the fullest inquiry into and report upon all the circumstances surrounding the alleged flogging, and upon that report the action of the department and of the government will be based.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was very glad to hear the minister say what he has said with regard to no compulsory enfranchisements having taken place under the act passed last year.

Mr. MURPHY: Not under that amended section.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But there have been 44 enfranchisements—

Mr. MURPHY: Under section 114, I think it is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hope that from time to time as the estimates of the department come before the house those of us who are fortunate enough to be here will receive a similarly satisfactory report from the minister that no compulsory enfranchisements have taken place under the amendment which caused so much discussion in this house last year. At that time I expressed myself, as did some others, as being very strongly opposed to that class of legislation, particularly as applying to these people. I am glad that the minister and the department have not found it necessary to resort to what I looked upon as a very harsh, very drastic and very unnecessary piece of legislation.

I see that the estimates here include relief, agricultural activities, roads, bridges, dyking, education and so forth. I would like some information in regard to these matters, and perhaps it would make the discussion a little less disconnected if I indicated the information I should like to receive: First of all, as to the amount expended on relief last year for the Indians throughout the dominion, and how that compares with the amount spent on relief in the previous two years; also the manner in which that relief was expended. I happen to come from a section of the country in which a number of Indian reserves are located containing I think as good a type of Indian as can be found on this continent. I hope the minister's experience during the stress of the last few years has been that the Indians have not required more in the way of relief than has been required by white people in many municipalities. I should like to know the manner in which relief is expended, whether upon roads, upon bridges or in what way. The amount given to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) as the expenditure on roads throughout the whole dominion seems to me to be very small.

Mr. MARCIL: The amount expended in the Restigouche reserve was $150.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if the hon. member understood the minister correctly.

Mr. MURPHY: That is estimated for the present fiscal year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Could the minister give me the expenditures for the present fiscal year for the Muncey, Oneida and the Chippawa reserves? Could he also give us the amounts expended in previous years? The reserves to which I have referred contain many miles of roads and like most Indian reserves, they lie alongside rivers. Consequently the construction of highways and bridges is perhaps a little more difficult than on more level ground. Much industry has been expended by the Indians themselves in keeping up their own roads on the reserves and in some cases they have worked without pay. I think better results could be obtained from the money expended on relief by increasing the amounts for highway construction. A number of bridges are at present in such a condition as to be almost dangerous to the travelling public and I should like to know if there is to be a program of reconstruction of bridges on the reserves to which I have referred.

Mr. MURPHY: The aids to Indians are as follows:

1929-30	$711,523
1930-31	823,343
1931-32	988,340
1932-33	935,734
1933-34	854,935

I should explain that these aids to Indians do not mean relief only, they represent purchase of implements, purchase of seed grain, of garden seeds and potatoes and many other things. I am sorry I have not the items for relief by themselves but I may say that we have been able to keep our relief within reasonable bounds. Since I have had the honour of administering this department it has been my constant endeavour to inculcate in the minds of the Indians through the administration of the various officers that they should make every effort to make themselves self-supporting rather than to lean upon the state. I think we have been fairly successful in that connection. The hon. member desired to know the amounts in the estimates for certain reserves in Ontario. I find that the estimates for the Caradoc agency contain the sum of $500 for the improvement of main roads in the Muncey reserve, $250 for the improvement of main roads in the Oneida reserve and $250 for repairs to culverts over Turkey creek in the Oneida reserve. I might explain that in addition to parliamentary appropriations for the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges, this work is also carried on with expenditures from the band funds. For instance, on the Six Nations reserve we expect to make a considerable expenditure for the maintenance and improvement of the roads in that reserve and the money for this work will be obtained from the band funds, supplemented by a donation of forty per cent from the Ontario government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand $7,500 is being granted for gratuities by way of agricultural prizes.

Mr. MURPHY: Prizes for agricultural and handicraft exhibits.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would that include ploughing matches and that sort of thing?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the department carry on competitions open to Indians only?

Mr. MURPHY: Prizes are given for Indian work and these prizes would go to Indians only. Both systems are carried on in connection with the ploughing matches. There are some matches in which Indians only compete while in others they compete with whites.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think some of the best ploughing done in my part of the country is that done by Indians from the reserves to which I have referred. These Indians have been successful in taking a number of prizes in open competition with the white men in the community. In my opinion one of the best ways of encouraging proficiency in agriculture is to provide for a certain amount of money to be expended on prizes along the line of ploughing matches and that sort of thing where the competition is limited to those who are on the reserve.

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed of an item which may be of interest to the committee: at Vanderhoof in British Columbia the Indians carried off practically all the first prizes in open ploughing competitions, so I can readily understand the interest of the hon. member for West Middlesex in this matter. The Indian, if he sets his mind to it, can do in many lines of endeavour just as efficient work as can his white brother. I am well aware of that from my knowledge of Indians who inhabit a reserve in my constituency. I know in white settlements adjacent to that reserve, if the white people can employ Indian labour at harvest and haying times, they prefer them to any other class of labour they can get. That is of course a matter which gives us in the Indian department great encouragement, because we feel that these people are capable of being very proficient in different lines of endeavour.

Mr. MacLEAN: I should like to have some information from the minister regarding the Lennox Island reserve. As he is probably aware it is on a small island and a ferryboat has to be maintained there with a wharf on each side. I think the wharf on the mainland side is kept up by the federal Department of Public Works. I am not sure whether the minister's own department maintains the wharf on the island where the reserve is. I should like to know in what condition are the wharves, the ferry and the road?

Mr. MURPHY: We have in the estimates for this year the sum of $175 for repairs to roads, bridges, etcetera, generally for the reserves in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. RYERSON: Could the minister give to the committee the amount expended for relief on the Six Nations reserve during the past three years?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I have not that information at hand but I would be glad to get it and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. HOWDEN: There are one or two matters I would like to put before the minister with regard to the Indians around lake Winnipeg. These fellows have a habit of wandering in to see me occasionally, I do not know why. There was a complaint made to me some time ago by the Indians on the Fisher River reserve that leases were given by the government, probably the provincial government, to fish on the Fisher river. Those fishermen occupied all the ground in the mouth of the river and after taking out their nets full of fish including a great many small ones, the latter were discarded and thrown dead back into the river or discarded generally. The Indians said that the fish discarded by these fishermen would feed the Indian tribe who were themselves more or less without food. I do not know how much truth there is in that, but I thought it worth while putting before the minister. The Indians complain that these fishermen discard enough fish to feed the tribe over the winter and it is deprived of the possibility of fishing for itself. That is the first item.

The other one is this—and I have mentioned a portion of it to the minister privately—in the lowlying land around the delta of lake Winnipeg, the mouth of the Red river as it empties into the lake, there is a very wide stretch of hay land, and between the town of Selkirk and the mouth of the river there are many settlers of foreign extraction, Ukrainians. They are petty farmers; all of them have herds of milch cows and raise a little bit of grain. Those hay lands are leased as far as possible according to the requirements of the farmers in that district, but the complaint is made that a number of men from the same establishment will put in applications for licences and instead of the hay being liberally divided among the various farmers of the district, it has all got into the hands of a very few. I do not for a moment suppose that the minister would have any knowledge of these matters, but there is without doubt an abuse of administration and they are worth while looking into. For that reason I put them before the minister just for what they are worth.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member has brought up a question which has not previously been directed to my attention, namely, the matter of fishing in lake Winnipeg at the mouth of the Fisher river. There is, I know, an Indian fishing station at that point utilized by the members of the Fisher River band and those who live on the Peguis reserve. Whether since the transfer of the natural resources to the provinces, the regulations in regard to fishing come under the jurisdiction of the provincial or the dominion government, I am not in a position to state, but I am rather of opinion that the regulations in regard to this fishing rest with the provincial rather than with the dominion government although I speak subject to correction on that point.

Mr. HOWDEN: If I may interrupt the minister on that point: if by any chance through an abuse of the regulations the Indians are being deprived of their winter food which very largely consists of frozen fish, I think the matter ought to be looked into by his department.

Mr. MURPHY: I was about to remark when the hon. gentleman interrupted me—and I do not object to the interruption—that I would be pleased to inquire fully into the matter and find out under which jurisdiction it rests; if it rests with the province I shall be glad to bring it and the remarks made by the hon. member to-day to their attention and endeavour to secure a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. I know the Indians depend to a great extent in many cases on fishing for food particularly in the winter time, and I know what this means to the Indians of that particular reserve.

In regard to the licensing or the granting of permission to cut hay on what is known as the old St. Peter's reserve, as the hon. member has stated, he did take the matter up with me privately some time ago, and I issued to the department instructions which I think will solve the difficulty, if there has been any. Those licences can be granted earlier in the season than has been the practice hitherto, or at least I know of no reason why they should not be. Apparently the hon. member thinks, if that is done, the difficulty will be overcome.

Mr. HOWDEN: Another point that I wish to draw to the minister's attention is that a number of applications will come from one establishment, so that the hay on the old St. Peter's reserve instead of being fairly well distributed amongst the Ukrainian settlers of that district practically all falls into the hands of two or three.

Mr. MURPHY: Those who have first claim upon this hay are, I believe, the Indians who own lands in the vicinity. After that permits are given to the various white settlers. I am informed that the division has been fairly equal among the white people. However, I shall be glad to make inquiry and get a list of those who have received permits. The intention is that those hay lands would be used fairly amongst the white settlers in that district after the Indians have obtained their allotment.

Mr. McINTOSH: In item 176 there is provision for a grant of $100,000 approved by parliament in the session of 1926-27. Will the minister explain what that is and for what it is used?

Mr. MURPHY: This money is included in the estimates yearly, following an arrangement arrived at after the parliamentary committee had inquired into the matter in the session of 1926-27. I was not a member of the house at that time but I think I am correct in saying that this sum of money is paid to the Indians of British Columbia in lieu of treaty money. That is, certain Indians in other parts of Canada receive certain annuities, amounting to $234,000, which sum is provided by statute. In order to put the Indians of British Columbia on a fair footing with other Indians in Canada this special amount is provided by parliament from year to year. It is used for hospitalization, education and medical services.

Mr. McINTOSH: What consideration has been given, if any, to the building of roads or bridges in any of the Indian reserves in the constituency of North Battleford? There are quite a number of Indian reservations in that constituency, some very large, and I would like to know if anything is to be done in the way of giving the Indians on them better transportation facilities.

Mr. MURPHY: There is no amount provided in the estimates this year for roads or bridges on any of the reserves in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McINTOSH: I think the minister is acquainted with the fact that on many of the reserves in Saskatchewan, and I presume all reserves in western Canada, the fur catch is becoming less and less, and the money returns from this activity becoming smaller year by year. If the Indian is not making satisfactory progress in the cultivation of land and the rearing of cattle and such ways of making money, his standard of living must be going down. Can the minister throw any light on the results of education of the Indians on these reserves in that respect?

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member knows, the Indians in certain parts of Canada were granted certain rights in regard to hunting, fishing and trapping. In the western provinces prior to the transfer of the natural resources the dominion of course had complete control. When the natural resources were transferred to the western provinces a clause was inserted in the agreements providing that the Indians were to have the right to trap and hunt on unoccupied crown lands. The provinces, I believe, or some of them, claim that they have the right to grant leases to or licence individuals to run trap lines on these crown lands, and that having so leased or granted licences over these lands they are no longer unoccupied crown lands. That is a position with which we do not agree. But, as the hon. member will realize, it is a matter of considerable importance to the Indians. I am glad to tell the committee that the fur catch generally this last season has been very satisfactory, in fact better than for some years, and as the prices of fur were also higher, the Indians, or those at least who follow that mode of making a living, are in a better position than they have been for the preceding three or four years.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister for that answer. Even if the Indian is forbidden to go on crown lands to catch fur-bearing animals I believe that under the educational facilities on some reserves at any rate he is being trained and developed to be more capable of making his own living successfully. It may be that no matter what amount of education you give an Indian he still remains an Indian, but the idea is to develop the possibilities of manhood in him and make him able to adjust himself to his surroundings and thereby make him a better citizen and less dependent on the state. I think the education of our Indians on the reserves has that for its object, and I believe that as long as that object is kept in view we shall have at least fair success in educating the Indians.

But to proceed may I say that the Meadow Lake Indian reserve is located on the Meadow river over one hundred miles north of North Battleford. I think any one who knows that reserve will admit that the land there is as good land as there is outdoors in Canada. I understand that a few Indians occupy that reserve. On it now there is the town of Meadow Lake, with a population of about 1,500. The Canadian Pacific Railway has built from a point on the Prince Albert-Shellbrook line of the Canadian National into Meadow Lake. The Canadian Pacific now has connection from Prince Albert, and I might say North Battleford, into Meadow Lake. There was a move to see whether that Indian reserve can be bought from the Indians in order that there may be settlement on it, and not simply a few families as at the present time. The idea would be to pay a fair price to the Indians, distribute the money among them and have them relocate farther north or in any other direction, on suitable land. Some representations must have been made to the minister with regard to this matter, which has been hanging fire for years, and I think there should be a report in the department. I should like to ask the minister whether any action has been taken or if any action is contemplated with regard to this very important matter.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Would the hon. gentleman tell us roughly how many settlers might be expected to avail themselves of that opportunity?

Mr. McINTOSH: I could not say exactly but I should think there would be a considerable number of settlers. There are only a few Indians located on that land, and my idea was that the Indians could be fairly dealt with by having that land purchased and the money distributed among them. It would be a great help to the progressive Meadow Lake settlement, which has taken on new life in the last few years, since the railway went in and settlers from the south have gone north.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Approximately how large is the reserve?

Mr. McINTOSH: I do not know exactly but I should think the minister could give us that information.

Mr. MURPHY: I have not the exact figures before me, but the reserve is of considerable size, comprising several thousand acres. I may say that this matter was brought to my attention on the last occasion about two years ago, I think, when representations similar to those made by my hon. friend were submitted to me by correspondence. The position is very simple, in one sense of the word. The Indians own these lands; they belong not to the white people but to the Indians, and the department is unable either to lease or sell any Indian lands in the Dominion of Canada until a surrender is obtained from the Indians themselves stating the terms and conditions upon which the land may be leased or sold.

Mr. McINTOSH: Might I ask the minister if the whole proposal could be halted by one Indian who refused to sign?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not the Indian Act before me and I cannot quote the section, but I think I am correct in stating that the surrender is based upon the majority vote; that is, if a majority of the male members of the band over twenty-one years of age vote in favour of a surrender such surrender is made. Then, of course, the department is in a position to make whatever deal may be considered most advantageous under the circumstances. I may say that the Indians on this particular reserve to date have not been willing to surrender their lands, and in consequence nothing can be done in regard to the matter.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand the position of the minister and the department. I was under the impression, however, and the minister can correct me if I am wrong, that some few years ago practically every Indian was willing to sign, with I think only one exception. I do not know whether the matter actually came to a vote.

Mr. MURPHY: Of course I speak subject to correction, but to the best of my knowledge no vote was ever taken. There are certain very definite rules and regulations in regard to how the vote shall be taken, and to the best of my knowledge no vote was taken. Individuals may have expressed themselves as being favourable to the surrender of the lands for lease or sale, but when it came to the question of voting they might vote differently. I think we have all had a little experience along that line during our canvasses; certain individuals have told us they were for us, but when we saw the results at that poll later we found that they did not come up to our expectations. Perhaps the same thing might happen in this case.

I would point out further that in the course of his remarks the hon. member suggested that these Indians might be moved further north. There is no land further north in the province which is within the gift of the dominion government. Since the transfer of the natural resources all such land is under the control of the provincial government and we have nothing to do with it.

Mr. McINTOSH: Of course the government could buy land further north or in any other direction if they saw fit to do so.

Mr. NEILL: The minister is correct in stating that the majority prevails, and that brings to mind a grievance which has been brought to my attention from time to time and which I should like to discuss on behalf of the Indians. I am dealing with British Columbia only, because I am familiar with conditions in that province.

The department recognizes the Indians as their responsibility and takes care of them in the matter of relief. The Indian knows that no matter what happens, even though he may have nothing at all, if he becomes destitute or ill the department will take care of him. Here is the situation that arises at times, however. A railway wants to buy a piece of land from the Indians for a right of way, or perhaps the land is needed for a factory site or a sawmill site. In any case a body of white men want to buy a piece of the Indian reserve, and under the law the consent of the Indians must be obtained in the way indicated by the minister. I think of recent years, though it was not so when I was first an Indian agent, the rule has been that if the land is sold for a given sum half that sum can be distributed in cash to the band while the other half is put into a fund allotted to that particular band and no other, it being argued quite properly that they have alienated a piece of their communal holdings. So they get half the cash and the other half goes into a fund. That is explained to the Indian, and he is told also that there will be interest accruing on that amount. Too often the idea is held out to him that if he wants to use that money to put up a community hall or do fencing or something like that he may get the interest on the money or sometimes the capital itself. This is what happens very often, however; perhaps interest accumulates for a year or two and then a cash payment is made to the head of each family. Two or three years later they apply for another payment, but they are told there is no more interest money. They ask what has become of it, if the Indian agent has stolen it, because that is usually their first reaction. The agent tells them that he has taken that interest and used it to pay for the relief bills of the band.

From the point of view of the department there is some plausibility to that argument; they say this is the Indian fund and the interest should be used for the relief of the band. The Indian says—and this is very logical—the next time you go to him and ask him to consent to the alienation of a piece of his land, "What shall it profit me; why should I oblige the white man? I only received the small cash payment and did not get the rest of the money." The Indian decides that the department will take half the money and use the interest to pay the ordinary relief bills of the band, which the department would pay in any case, and the Indian has enough intelligence and understanding to see that point. The band on the next reserve, who do not sell their land, are cared for in exactly the same way as the band who alienate part of their land, but in the one case the department pays for the relief while in the other case the relief comes out of the funds of the Indians themselves. As a result the next time we want the Indians to part with their land they are extremely unwilling to do so, and very often it is very important from a public point of view that Indian land should be acquired.

I do think faith should be kept with the Indians. If the department say the money is to go into a fund for the band, that fund should be kept subject only to the control of the band. You would not think of selling a piece of the reserve in order to pay the storekeeper's relief bills, but this fund takes the place of the piece of land that has been sold, and it should be regarded not as a fund for relief but as a part of the reserves of the Indians. Any interest accruing on it should go to the Indians at the absolute discretion of the band. That has been a sore point with the Indians ever since I have had anything to do with them, which covers a period of more than thirty years, and as the encroachment—I do not mean that in an improper sense—of the white man upon their lands becomes greater it becomes more and more necessary to alienate parts of these reserves. You have that increasing trouble because the Indian thinks he is not getting a square deal. You have taken his money from him, and you do not give it back. I think the minister understands the point.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, I believe I have a fair knowledge of the matter about which the hon. member has spoken, and I may say there have been certain difficulties in connection with it. When the land or Indian property is surrendered for sale an amount—I think it is up to one-half—may be used for distribution pro rata among the members of the band. Sometimes half the amount will be given, and at other times the Indians themselves will, in the surrender, specify the amount to be distributed.

Mr. NEILL: Not exceeding one-half.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, not exceeding one-half. We will say that they do not think it would be in their interests to take one-half, when they surrender on the condition that a certain amount shall be distributed among different members of the band. The hon. member has said that the amount of money left is placed in a certain fund to the credit of that particular band. In that statement he is correct. The money is placed to the credit of the band, and on it the dominion government allows five per cent interest. The fund thereby accumulates, if the increment is not used for relief, for the building of council halls or for other Indian purposes. Sometimes, not very often, a distribution from that fund is made. The hon. member has said that that is not a fair treatment and that the funds and the interest should not be used for purposes of relief. That is an open question, and one in connection with which different opinions might be held. I would point out that the Indians in one reserve, namely the Blackfoot in southern Alberta, are practically self supporting, that is to say, no demands are made on the department for relief. Through their own efforts they are able to provide a living for themselves, and in addition they pay their own hospitalization services. The only money spent on that reserve from parliamentary appropriations is for the upkeep of the schools. The funds of the band are used for all other purposes.

Mr. NEILL: That is an exception.

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member has said, it is an exception. To some extent however it is true with other reserves and other bands in Canada where band funds are held. These interest funds are used for the benefit of the Indians. I have stated to the committee and to the house on many occasions my belief is that the Indian should be in a position to stand on his own feet and through his own efforts provide for himself. That is the policy which has guided me in the administration of the Indian Department. I do not believe that it is good either for the Indian or for the white man to have the feeling that whether he works or not, or whether he has funds or not, he may throw himself upon the state and that in any event the state is bound to look after him. I realize that a responsibility rests upon the Indian department to look after the Indians and, when they are unable to do it for themselves, to provide them with the necessities of life. At the same time I reiterate that not only should he be encouraged but he should be directed and led along the lines of self reliance. I am not certain whether the hon. member has argued that these funds should not be used for the purposes of building a council hall or for relief purposes. In some instances the bands hold funds running up to hundreds of thousands of dollars. The Blackfoot Indians of southern Alberta have a fund amounting to considerably more than a million dollars. It could hardly be argued that a band with such valuable assets should be kept on relief from parliamentary appropriations.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of my remarks I said I was referring to the province of British Columbia where band funds run to only a few hundreds, or at the outside perhaps a couple of thousand dollars. The minister has said that he believes the Indians should be taught to stand on their own feet. No one can possibly gainsay that statement; it is a truism. I suppose his statement applies to standing on their own feet financially and socially; I think it should also apply to standing on their own feet morally. And how can you teach them to do that when you break faith with them? There is no question at all that the bargain is made with these Indians that they shall have half the money in cash, if they wish it, and that the other half will be put into a fund under their control. You break faith in doing anything else. The minister has asked what I want, and he has asked whether or not I want relief to be paid out of their interest money. I do not care what they do with their interest money, provided the consent of the band is obtained. The money in the fund is the property of the Indians, just as the land was their property, and you should no more take away that money—because the land is represented by money—than you should take away the land.

The treaty made with the Indians has from time immemorial recognized that we must provide the Indian with relief when he needs it. We know that. We have two bands placed side by side, one of which has not sold any of its land or its reserve, and they get relief when they require it. We cannot get away from that fact; that is in the treaty. But the band a few miles away have been induced by the arguments of the Indian agent to part with their heritage, their land, and a substitution is made of so much cash in the bank. Then the department comes along and although they could not alienate the land without the consent of the band they alienate the interest money and use it to pay bills which otherwise they would have had to pay, anyway. Is that fair? Certainly, spend it on a community hall or for relief, if you like, but only if you can get the vote of the band to that procedure. But I say the money belongs to them, just as the land did. The money represents a piece of their land. Then the department comes along—they would not dare do it if a white man was concerned because in that event they would be taken before the courts—and they say, "We will take this money, which is yours, and we will alienate it, and pay our relief bills with it." That is not fair or reasonable. In years to come when, in a hurry, you want a release from an Indian band you will have trouble in getting it. That is the point. Get the consent of the Indians to alienate their money, if you can—I know you cannot—but do not take it from them simply, I was going to say, by force of arms, actually by departmental regulations.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there any difference in principle between the use of the interest on the money to the credit of the Indians and the use of the natural resources which the Indian has not alienated? I am going to ask the minister whether it is not a fact that timber on the lands of some of the unceded bands in northern Ontario is being used now by the Indians to provide themselves with relief. The timber standing on the land is the property of the Indian, and as I understand it it is being used by the Indians—and I am speaking subject to correction—and sold for the purpose of providing means for relief or living through these difficult periods. Am I right or wrong; I should like to be clear on the point?

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member is quite correct. In some instances Indians are surrendering their timber for sale, and from the proceeds they gain a livelihood. In other cases the Indians themselves cut their own timber and utilize the proceeds from the sales for their living.

Mr. HOWDEN: I think it is to be hoped that the department will not for some time, lightly undertake the release of any further Indian lands in this country. I have lived in western Canada for over fifty years, and if my information is correct the Indian has always got very decidedly the worst of the deal. Some considerable number of years ago the surrender of the St. Peters Indian reserve was obtained from the Indians for a certain consideration in cash—I do not know the exact terms of the contract—but the Indians were relieved of a fairly good piece of agricultural land and were moved away from lake Winnipeg to a place among the rocks and muskeg where there is no timber and very little land of value, and there to-day they are starving. They are the most scrofulous, the most tubercular people I have even seen in my life. They have very little means of making a living except by fishing in the summer, and when the water freezes in the winter they have a very blue look-out for a living. That St. Peters reserve got into the hands of a few speculators. The Indians were moved off and the speculators failed to make anything of the land, and a great deal of it is lying idle to this day. Since then the Indians have been seeking to come back to this land but they have never been permitted to do so, although there are very few settlers on it. So it is with some reason that I say it is to he hoped that the Department of the Interior will hesitate before they seek the release of any more Indian lands.

Mr. MURPHY: Not the Department of the Interior, the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWDEN: Well, the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. McINTOSH: Following the remarks of my hon. friend from St. Boniface, so far as the selling of any portion of the Meadow Lake Indian reserve is concerned, if through force of circumstances, the encroachment of population or the development of the district, something must be done, then I would say that the department should be the major factor in any change that is made with respect to this land. Surely the Indian department should be able to guarantee an absolutely fair deal for the Indians. If it could not, what department of the government could?

May I say that in any suggestion I have made with regard to moving Indians north, south, west or east, my underlying thought was always that the Indians would be paid every cent that was coming to them for their land, that the Indian Act would be abided by and a vote of the band taken, and that in every case, if anything were done, the Indians should be dealt with fairly and in their own interests. Might I ask the minister, if it is the case that a vote must be taken before any part of a reserve is given over for any other purpose than that of an Indian reserve, how did it happen that the Canadian Pacific Railway got control or purchased thirty or forty acres of the Meadow Lake Indian reserve and built a station upon that land and constructed a right of way through it, together with yard facilities upon a certain amount of it? Did they buy that land from the Indian department? Were the Indians satisfied to sell it, or does a deal of that kind come under what we might term, in railway language, the right of eminent domain?

Mr. MURPHY: My answer to the hon. gentleman some time ago in regard to the surrender of the lands in the Meadow Lake reserve, that the department was not in a position to deal with these lands until they had been surrendered by the Indians themselves, I should have qualified by saying that under certain conditions, when it is in the public interest, expropriation proceedings may be taken. Whether the Indians surrendered their land that it might be sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway, I do not know; but I rather think that those lands were expropriated, as can legally be done under the Railway Act.

Mr. MUNN: I understand that the Indians of the Squamish reserve, North Vancouver, during the fiscal year 1932-33 were allowed several thousand dollars from their fund for agricultural development. Would the minister explain how that was handled and if it has been a success?

Mr. MURPHY: The money has not all been expended as yet. We are carrying on certain agricultural experiments on that reserve, and we are moving slowly in the matter. I have read certain reports from the agent and the inspector that appreciable progress is being made on that reserve in agricultural pursuits.

Answering the hon. member for St. Boniface, I am in general agreement with the remarks which he made in regard to the alienation or sale of Indian reserves. We have in Canada now an Indian population of approximately 115,000, and in some of the provinces the Indians are being so cribbed, cabined and confined in very small areas that it is difficult indeed for them to make a living. I wish to assure the hon. member that before the department considers the sale of any Indian reserve or any portion thereof in the Dominion of Canada the question will be most minutely inquired into, as we are fully seized of the importance of retaining these reserves for the use of the Indians.

Mr. HOWDEN: As the charge has been directly made that the Indians have never been paid for the St. Peters reserve, that they have been paid only a minute fraction of the consideration involved in the undertaking—I have never inquired into the details—I think now is a good time for the minister to make a statement on the matter.

Mr. MURPHY: I have not the figures before me but I can say that the report which the hon. member has received is untrue. I shall be very glad to get, and to give to the hon. member, a full statement of the financial consideration and of the financial adjustments that have been made since the sale of that reserve.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I would like to say a word to the minister on a subject I raised last year when the Indian estimates were up. What progress, if any, is being made in the negotiations which I understand have been entered into by the Indian department, with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec particularly, in relation to setting apart that portion of Ontario and Quebec north of the height of land for the use of the Indians in the taking of fur-bearing animals and game birds for profit? These Indians are the natives of that area and they should have the exclusive use of the country, otherwise they will soon become wards of the government in the sense that they will have to be maintained all the time by the government. The quantity of furs which can be taken out of that area by the native Indians, who were there before we were, would enable them to make a living and preserve the game life of the country at the same time. If that part of the country is going to continue to be overrun by the class of white trapper now trapping that country, the game life will be soon extinguished and the Indians forced to depend upon the state entirely. There are no other means by which they can make a living.

Mr. MUNN: They could have farm lands.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There are no farm lands north of the height of land.

Mr. SPROULE: What amount is being set aside for roads in the Stony Point and Kettle reserves?

Mr. MURPHY: There is an amount of $695 for improvement of roads, $300 for repairs to bridges and culverts and $300 for maintenance of drainage systems in the Kettle and Stony Point reserves, Lambton county.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Immigration and colonization—immigration salaries and contingencies, $1,239,288.

Mr. VENIOT: There is some information I should like to get from the minister. The case is that of the son of a man who came to this country years ago and was naturalized, the son also being naturalized. The son went to France and married there. He has attempted to return to Canada and apparently some difficulty has arisen. If the minister cannot give an explanation in detail to-night, perhaps I might have an appointment with some official of the department who would give me the information. But, roughly, could the minister explain what steps have to be taken in order that that young man may return with his wife to his parents? The father is a large property holder in New Brunswick and is prepared to put up any bond to any extent that the department may require.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I think the case need present no difficulty whatever. If the hon. member cares to take it up with the deputy minister, I am sure there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. VENIOT: Thank you very much.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In this item how much is for salaries and how much for contingencies?

Mr. GORDON: The appropriation is divided between salaries, $191,484 and contingencies, $16,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am glad to see the minister back in the chamber in good health and able to give us the information. He has been ill for some time and I am sure all hon. members are pleased to see him back in good health and able to attend to his duties. In the city of Quebec what amount is spent each year for the administration of the immigration office and the staff there?

Mr. GORDON: I regret that I cannot give the figures for any one port of entry because they are not made up in a way that would give the information asked for, but I shall be glad to get it for the hon. member.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many immigration offices are there in the various ports of the dominion?

Mr. GORDON: Ports of entry are established on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts as well as along the United States-Canada boundary. The ports on the Atlantic coast are Halifax, Saint John and Quebec. Montreal is, of course, a port of entry but it is treated as an inland port.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are there any special officials and what are their functions at the various places?

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. GORDON: At each port of entry an inspector is in charge whose duty it is to examine the ships arriving and to check up those who seek legal landing under the act, to see that they comply with the regulations. Those are broadly and generally the duties of the officers at ocean ports, so far as incoming migrants are concerned. There are other duties with respect to those who are being returned to their country of origin. So far as the latter are concerned the matter is different because they have to be taken charge of and turned over to the transportation company that brought them to Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In Montreal there used to be at one time a Mr. Moquin and a Mr. Regimbal in charge of the immigration office. Have they been removed? Who has replaced them? When did this change take place? They used to sit as a board of inquiry.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Regimbal I am informed was superannuated some years ago; Mr. Moquin was also superannuated. The present inspector is Mr. Langlais.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is he the only official in charge or are there other officials connected with the department?

Mr. GORDON: He has a staff of officials.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the staff in Montreal?

Mr. GORDON: I may not have the names of the staff there, but I can supply the hon. member with the information later.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are these officials appointed by the civil service commission or by direction of the minister only?

Mr. GORDON: The civil service commission in all cases.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is in charge at Quebec city?

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Cormier is inspector in charge, but I have not the names of his staff.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister said he was not in a position to give details of the various costs for all these ports. He said the salaries amounted to $191,484 and the contingencies to $16,000. There is a diminution in this vote of $177,712, but the sum we are called upon to vote is $1,239,288. Is that amount all expended in Canada, and for what purposes besides salaries and contingencies? There seems to be a discrepancy somewhere.

Mr. GORDON: The figures I gave a moment ago were a division of the civil government vote. I shall have to give at considerable length perhaps the figures indicating the division of this vote.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am sorry, but I think the house and the country should have an explanation of the difference between the salaries and that large total.

Mr. GORDON: For the purposes of the department there are three divisions: the eastern, the western, and the Pacific division. The vote is distributed as follows:

	Eastern	Western	Pacific
Permanent salaries..	$466,604	$129,420	$80,610
Temporary salaries..	32,274	20,268	7,569
Part time salaries..	13,325	4,401	6,548

Then listed under other locations, some of which are in Canada and some outside, are: permanent, $99,178; temporary, $29,391. I have not a separation of the contingencies by divisions, but the total of contingencies is $349,700, thus making the grand total indicated in the vote.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are the temporary and part time employees also subject to the test of the civil service commission.

Mr. GORDON: The employees of the department are all subject to the civil service commission.

Mr. CASGRAIN: For contingencies $349,700 is a large sum. Can the minister tell what they are, and how much is spent outside of Canada?

Mr. GORDON: The amount is divided as follows:

Boundary inspection (between United States and Canada)	$ 73,000
Inland agencies	33,000
Seaport agencies	28,000
Chinese Immigration Act	9,000
Deportation	135,000
Women's division	1,000
British immigrant children	3,700
Head office	6,000
Publicity	7,000
Great Britain and Ireland (where we still maintain offices)	35,000
Continent (inspection offices)	19,000
	$ 349,700

The publicity is mainly in connection with colonization at home.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is meant by inland supervision? You have boundary inspection, and inland and seaport supervision.

Mr. GORDON: We have agencies at Winnipeg, Hamilton, Toronto, Calgary and various other inland cities where agents of the immigration department are resident.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But we were told a few moments ago that the services of the department are divided into three sections, east, west and Pacific coast, and we were given the figures in each case. In the east it cost $466,604 for permanent employees, $32,274 for temporary employees and $13,325 for part time employees. In the west the figures were $129,000, $20,268 and $4,401, while on the Pacific coast they were $80,610, $7,569 and $6,548. We pay large salaries to the employees in the various divisions mentioned by the minister, and I am surprised to learn that in addition the department has to provide such huge sums as $33,000 for the inland agencies, $28,000 for the seaport agencies and $73,000 for the work on the boundary, as well as the other items mentioned. I submit that the minister should give us more details as to how these contingencies are arrived at, and whether they could not be curtailed. We are told that the government has practically stopped immigration, that we do not want people from foreign lands to come to Canada, but there is a reduction of only $177,712 in this item; we are still called upon to vote the huge sum of $1,239,288. If we have stopped immigration, as the government say we have, why do we have to spend this large sum of the people's money? I should like the minister to answer that question.

Mr. GORDON: The decrease in the vote as compared with last year is $183,712. From the immigration figures of a few years ago it will be seen that in the last five years the total vote has been decreased by probably fifty per cent. It is quite true that immigration such as was invited and encouraged in the years prior to 1930-31 has diminished very materially. Whether or not it has been the part of wisdom to invoke those restrictions to the extent deemed necessary by the government is, of course, a matter of argument; everyone is entitled to his own opinion. But bear in mind that in the immigration department files containing the history of every landed migrant are kept for the purposes of determining his right to stay during his probationary period.

Mr. McINTOSH: How far do these files go back into history?

Mr. GORDON: They have been kept since the department was set up. I think that would be shortly after confederation, at which time it was a branch of the agriculture department. Following that it was a branch of the interior department and finally was set up by itself as the immigration department.

These files cover the migrants who have legally landed, and they are very necessary to-day, as hon. members of the chamber well know, because I doubt if there is a member who has not at some time or other seen me with respect to relatives of or those closely associated with people legally landed in Canada with a view either to returning them to the land of their nativity or allowing their near relatives to come to Canada—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not.

Mr. GORDON: There are some exceptions; the hon. member for Quebec East says he has not done so, but I think he is almost alone in that regard. It is necessary that we have these facts, because in Canada we have a very complex population and these files are of great assistance in determining whether or not and to what extent their relatives or friends in the old land or in other countries can be admitted. So it is very necessary that these files be preserved for use when investigations are made to determine whether or not the government or the department would be justified in following a course looking to the uniting of families or the admission of friends, and matters of that kind.

It may seem that since there is practically no immigration there is no work, but I would leave it to the judgment of the ex-Minister of Immigration, the hon. member for West Edmonton, whether or not the department does not provide ample opportunity for the activity of the minister and the officials who are taking care of this situation as best they can. The figures will disclose a great shrinkage in expenditure over the last few years, and each month there is a further decrease where decreases can be brought about and where departmental officials can be adjusted so that their activities will be put to good service. When vacancies occur it will be noted from the report that has been tabled that they are not filled except in very special cases.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I submit that the minister has not given satisfactory answers to the questions I asked. He has told the committee how the department is managed and operated, but his main topic was the way the files are kept, dating back almost to confederation. I submit that it costs the country a lot of money to keep those files. Especially is that the case since immigration has decreased so greatly in the last few years under the policies put into effect by this government. I do not think the minister has satisfactorily explained why, in addition to the salaries, we should spend $73,000 for contingencies on the boundary and $33,000, for contingencies of the inland agencies as well as the other items the minister mentioned. The minister says the files are well kept. I have no doubt that is so; there are very competent officials in that department. There is one official in front of the minister at the present time for whom I have only praise; he is one of the best officials in the department. But it seems to me that the salaries we are paying should be sufficient to cover the cost of looking after the immigrants who may want to come here, and I am surprised that we should be asked to vote $349,000 for contingencies when we have no immigrants. These contingencies are surely not to keep the files, because the files are in the departments of the various officers of the government. It does not require hundreds of thousands of dollars to keep files. Surely the committee is not satisfied with the explanation given by the minister. He cannot make the country believe that it costs so much to run the department when, in fact, every expenditure has been cut down to the bone; when we are curtailing agricultural credits and credits to various services of the government; when we are trying to make the people believe that in order to have a balanced budget we are economizing everywhere. At a time when we are not advocating immigration and are not urging people to come to this country surely these expenditures could be curtailed to a greater extent.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the vote include medical inspection of immigrants?

Mr. GORDON: I assume the hon. member has in mind the medical inspection overseas of intended migrants.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: And at ocean ports. That does not come under this vote, but is dealt with by the Department of National Health.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is not under the Department of Immigration at all?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. REID: There are two small matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister; the first being in regard to the employment of immigration officers during the busy season. At the moment I am not going into the question of salaries, but I must say a complaint has been made to me that in the last two years the services of seasonal men have been cut down, and that men who are employed the whole year through are getting considerable overtime, thereby cutting out seasonal employment. Looking through the records I find that in some instances the overtime runs as high as $450 or $500. In my view that is a considerable amount of money to be received for overtime, especially in these days when so many men are out of employment. I think consideration should be given to those men who are engaged during the busy season, and that if possible they should be given an opportunity to assist during the busy seasons at the ports of entry.

While I am on my feet I should like to voice another complaint which has been made, namely that the Canadian Pacific Railway have been bringing engineers from the old country to fill positions on their steamships on the Pacific coast. Last year they brought in six engineers from the old country and placed them on the ships on the Pacific. The complaint is made that in these times of unemployment no men should be brought from the old country; it is not fair to allow men to be brought in to fill these positions, when plenty of competent engineers are idle on the Pacific coast. I have affidavits under my hand from at least six competent engineers who were formerly employed on Canadian National ships, and who for the last one and a half or two years have been idle. They feel aggrieved, and rightly so, that a company like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should bring men from ships travelling between Great Britain and Atlantic ports and place them on the Pacific coast, at a time when employment is so scarce here.

I know that what is done in the United States can have little bearing on this country, but one superintendent who two years ago was in charge of the Canadian National docks in Vancouver who was ordered to go to the United States and take charge of Canadian National property in Seattle where we have property valued at at least $1,000,000. After being in that city for two weeks he was ordered out of the country because he had no permit and was told not to come back. I believe some explanation should be given as to why engineers were allowed into the country when there are plenty of engineers on the Pacific coast competent to fill the positions.

Mr. GORDON: The question raised by the hon. member has been given a good deal of consideration. The point arises as to whether or not persons working in international waters should be accorded privileges, if we may call them such, and whether or not the engineers on the coastal steamers are qualified to carry on under the laws which have relation to the operation of those steamers. I recall that at one time representations were made to the department with respect to some engineers on the Pacific coast. The information I was able to gather with respect to this group—whether it is the group the hon. member has in mind I am not prepared to say—was to the effect that they were unable to qualify for service on the steamers upon which they sought employment. If my recollection serves me correctly, opportunity was given to these men to take out the necessary certificates in order to qualify and some difficulty arose in connection with adopting that course. However the matter is still under consideration and investigation in the hope that any real grievance may be removed.

With respect to part time employees may I say I believe it will be found that across Canada there are very few employees receiving overtime pay. Unquestionably in some cases an employee will work a day or two longer than his usual hours of employment, and receive some remuneration for such overtime. But generally speaking, and in so far as humanly possible, overtime has been eliminated. I shall consider, however, the representations made by the hon. member in order that as many temporary employees may receive work as is consistent with efficiency.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am pleased to see the minister back in the house again, and may I express the hope that with renewed health and energy he may continue his work to the end of the term. I have a question or two I should like to ask. It is generally admitted that immigration into western Canada has been curtailed seriously during the last four years. Having that fact in mind may I ask the minister how many ports of entry there are from the United States into the three western provinces.

Mr. GORDON: There are about thirty ports.

Mr. McINTOSH: Does the minister mean that there are that many ports along the international boundary stretching from Ontario to British Columbia?

Mr. GORDON: In the western division, yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: How does that number compare with the number in 1930, for instance?

Mr. GORDON: No material change.

Mr. McINTOSH: There would be an inspector at each of these ports of entry, I presume, and just what other staff?

Mr. GORDON: It sometimes happens that the immigration and customs services can be combined at different ports, each department bearing a portion of the charge. Perhaps the following information will be sufficient for the hon. gentleman, although I can give the names of the officers as well if desired. We have in Manitoba an inspector at Bannerman; one at Winnipeg, with a considerable staff; a part time inspector at Cartwright, Crystal City, Goodlands, Haskett, Lena, Coulter, Piney, Snowflake, Windygates. Then in Saskatchewan we have a part time inspector at Northgate, Big Beaver, Big Muddy, Carievale and Climax. A number of others, such as North Portal, Coutts and Emerson, make up the total for the western ports that I have mentioned.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are these part time inspectors customs officers as well as immigration inspectors?

Mr. GORDON: I think in nearly every case those mentioned are customs officers as well.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do they get two salaries or only one?

Mr. GORDON: They have a very difficult time getting one salary.

Mr. McINTOSH: They have these two services to perform, and as I understand the minister's statement the customs work is the heavier. These staffs are required because of the dual duties they are performing. Do I understand that to be the real reason?

Mr. GORDON: That is a reason in a sense, but let me put it this way. Wherever by reason of the amount of work to be done and by reason of the customs work and immigration work dovetailing into each other it is possible to unite the two services in one official, we have tried to do that across Canada for the obvious reason of saving expenses.

Mr. McINTOSH: What has been the difference approximately in the expenditure at these ports in the last few years?

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps the picture can best be shown by giving the total expenditures for the last few years:

Fiscal year—	Total appropriation
1928-29	$2,943,391 66
1929-30	3,084,278 13
1930-31	2,578,251 90
1931-32	2,190,751 80
1932-33	1,681,153 71
1933-34	1,435,842 00

It will be seen that since the fiscal year 1928-29 the total appropriation has been reduced by more than fifty per cent.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are there any agencies still maintained in the United States and other parts of the world looking after immigration to Canada? If so, where are they located, who is in charge of the different offices, and what are the salaries paid

Mr. GORDON: In 1930 the government of the day had about fifteen agencies in the United States spread from coast to coast, and a number of agencies on the continent of Europe and in the British Isles. It was thought desirable to close the agencies in the United States, and they have all been closed. It was also thought desirable to close the offices on the continent of Europe, and they have all been closed with the exception of the offices maintained for the purpose of civil and medical inspection of those who have a legal right to enter Canada. We have three offices on the continent, at Paris, Antwerp and Hamburg. Certain curtailments have taken place with respect to the offices in the British Isles. We have offices at London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Bristol, Inverness, York and at Belfast, but the staffs in all these offices have been very materially reduced. It was not thought desirable that these offices should be closed because certain valuable contacts were made in the United Kingdom during the course of immigration activities. We get so many very highly desirable people from the British Isles that it was thought desirable to maintain these offices, although they are being maintained with greatly reduced staffs. There is also an office at Hong Kong through which are passed all people from the orient who have a right to come to Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Could the minister tell us who is in charge of the offices at Paris, Antwerp and Hamburg?

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Belanger at Paris, Mr. Mitchell at Antwerp and Mr. Chapdelaine at Hamburg.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are there any other officials?

Mr. GORDON: There may be a stenographer, but I do not know.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister any idea how much these offices cost at Hamburg, Antwerp, Paris, the British Isles and in the orient? The minister mentioned salaries paid in Canada as well as contingencies, but I do not think he gave particulars of the salaries or expenditures in connection with the offices outside of Canada.

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures before me showing the actual expenditure for each office.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like to have that information.

Mr. GORDON: I shall get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. McINTOSH: I think the department is quite right in maintaining a certain number of immigration agencies throughout the British Empire. We can maintain empire contacts through these agencies. The minister stated that nothing is being done in the way of immigration activities in the United States. I should like to know how many immigrants came into western Canada from the United States during the last year or so.

Mr. GORDON: It would be difficult for me or anyone to state exactly how many immigrants came into western Canada from the United States. It is within the realm of possibility that an immigrant might come into western Canada from the United States and then, not liking that part of the country, move to eastern Canada, or vice versa.

Mr. McINTOSH: I hardly think that would happen.

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps we will have to agree to disagree. On page 10 of the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization which has been tabled are figures which will furnish an answer to the hon. gentleman's question. Unless the committee desires it, I should like to be relieved from reading the figures on to Hansard.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thought that would be rather an easy question to answer. If we are doing no work to get people into western Canada from the United States I should like to know just how many did come in.

Mr. GORDON: During the year 1933, 13,196 people came into Canada from the United States. I think we can congratulate ourselves that the movement of desirable immigrants from the United States is very substantial.

Mr. McINTOSH: That was the idea back of my question.

Mr. GORDON: We have a splendid country.

Mr. MITCHELL: In January of this year the following resolution was passed by the British House of Commons:

That this house is of opinion that the time has now come when His Majesty's government should get in touch with the governments of the dominions with a view to putting forward a scheme for the voluntary redistribution of the white peoples of the empire and the stimulation of shipping and trade under the flag.

Could the minister state whether the British government has got in touch with the Canadian government in connection with that resolution?

Mr. GORDON: The answer is in the negative.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that this government has not been approached by the government in England with a view to promoting that scheme?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is all on paper.

Mr. MITCHELL: When the estimates were up before the minister gave the number of people who had been sent back to the British Isles. I asked a question at that time, out of which another question arose. I wanted to know the number who had requested to be sent back to their country of origin. The minister was able to give me the figures for the British Isles and he said he would look up the figures for the other countries in Europe. Has the minister any information to give the committee at this time?

Mr. GORDON: The answer to that question would involve a great deal of detail. It is all given in the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1933. Table number 54 on page 65 gives the countries to which people were returned and the reasons for their being returned.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In the amount mentioned for contingencies is included $9,000 for Chinese; what is that spent for?

Mr. GORDON: The Department of Immigration and Colonization is charged with the administration of the Chinese Immigration Act. For reasons which I am sure are well known to hon. members, this act is very difficult of administration. The item to which reference has been made has to do with the administration of that act.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that act administered by this government in conjunction with the United States or China, or is it under the control of this country alone?

Mr. GORDON: That act is a statute of the parliament of Canada. It was passed before I became a member of the house and I think before my hon. friend was a member.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think so, because I would remember.

Mr. GORDON: It was designed to control Chinese immigration into Canada. I shall not take up the time of the committee in going over its various sections as they are there for any hon. member to read.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That statute was passed several years ago and I do not know just what are its terms. I should like to know in what way that $9,000 is to be spent in connection with the administration of the act. Is it to be spent to keep Chinamen out of the country, or to send them back, or to prevent them from committing misdemeanors, or what?

Mr. GORDON: Sometimes it is to send Chinese back to their country; sometimes it has to do with legal proceedings in connection with their right to be in Canada; and there are of course travelling expenses in connection with these investigations and other small incidental matters such as stationery, ink, postage stamps and so forth.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is true, but in view of the minister's statement there are some other figures that need further explanation. He says that that amount is spent for stationery and also for sending Chinamen home. In the contingencies he has another item of $135,000 for deportations. Does he mean to say that besides the $135,000 under the heading of contingencies in connection with deportations, there is still some of that amount of $9,000 that goes to deport Chinamen? He speaks about stamps and stationery. There is under contingencies another item of $6,000 for the head office at Ottawa. I suppose the expenses in that connection are for stationery and such matters. Some further explanation should be given.

Mr. GORDON: Regarding the item of $135,000 for deportations, there may be an overlapping so far as the administration of the Chinese Immigration Act and deportations generally are concerned, but if so, it is to a very slight degree; the item of $135,000 is deportations generally without, in the main, including those under that act.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If the minister cannot give more detailed information I have to take what he gives me, but I must tell the committee that I am not very well satisfied with the explanation given. I hope next year, when these estimates come up, we shall receive more detailed information.

Mr. GORDON: I hope to be here at that time.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: There may be a change and then we shall have more information.

Regarding the item of $3,700 mentioned under contingencies, for immigration of British children, how is that sum accounted for? Have we a scheme for bringing young British immigrants here?

Mr. GORDON: That item is the result of an agreement entered into between the British government and the government of Canada that preceded this one, with respect to bringing British children here, under which certain obligations were assumed by the Canadian government with respect to the after-care of those children. If the estimates for past years are examined, they will be found to be rapidly decreasing. The British children who come in under the agreement have, generally speaking, done very well.

Mr. McINTOSH: How long will these agreements be operative?

Mr. GORDON: The agreements, so far as bringing in the children is concerned, have expired, but the obligation to take care of them, that is the after-care, has not expired. This vote, however, indicates by its reduced size that the work is pretty well finished. I hope it will not be long before we can not only take care of those in Canada but see many more of the British boys come here.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I understand that this sum of $3,700 is for looking after British immigrant children in Canada. How many of those young boys came here this year?

Mr. GORDON: None.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Last year?

Mr. GORDON: None.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There are some other items to which I would like to draw the attention of the minister. I said a moment ago that under the heading of contingencies the sum of $6,000 was mentioned. This is a big amount when we have also all the salaries of the officials; I am not complaining about their efficiency, but I should like to know what this item of $6,000 is for. The minister told us that under the item of $9,000 for deporting Chinese, stamps, stationery and other matters are included. Six thousand dollars is a very large amount and I would like to have some definite information as to how it was spent.

Mr. GORDON: This item would cover such matters as travelling expenses of executive officers of the department. There are some expenses of the head office at Ottawa that will be charged to this vote, the details of which I cannot supply because I do not have them at hand.

Mr. CASGRAIN: These people must be travelling a great deal. Under the heading of contingencies, as I have stated before, we had $73,000 for the people who look after the boundary immigration service, $33,000 for the inland service, and $28,000 for the seaboard service. Besides all these we have $4,000 or $5,000 or $6,000 for travelling expenses from the head office to the various parts of the country. The minister ought to be in a position to give us detailed information as to how this amount of $6,000 is arrived at. If the department has any motor cars at the head office, how many would there be? Who are the officials or special inspectors or other officers, if there are any, who travel, and if they were on special cases, what was the purpose of their travels here and there throughout the country?

Mr. GORDON: I confess I cannot give the details of the travelling expenses of the major officials of the department. Certainly the chief commissioner has been to each coast on a number of occasions; the deputy minister has made certain trips, as has also the assistant deputy. In fact, I think if the auditor general's report were examined, it would be found that I have made certain trips and probably, although I do not know at the moment, they were charged to the department; I have not the figures under my hand. But this, I take it, is an appropriation that is common to every department of government where one cannot go into the details; in every department an item of this kind is voted and has been since there were departments. It is a responsibility of the minister and those acting with him to see that a vote of this kind is properly spent and used for contingencies for the expenses of the major officials of the department during the course of their work. Surely the hon. member would not ask me to try to forecast for the next twelve months what a vote of this kind is likely to comprehend. I frankly confess I cannot do it.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: What are the conditions and regulations in regard to the entry of any immigrant into Canada? In other words what are the admissible classes?

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps I may answer in this way; there has been no amendment of the statute itself, and no amendment of the regulations with respect to intended migrants from the British Isles and from the United States. There have been amendments relating to the continent of Europe, limiting those who will be admitted to (1) the wives and children of migrants legally landed in Canada who upon investigation have been found willling and able to receive their relatives, and (2) migrants who desire to come to Canada, who upon investigation have been found to be provided with sufficient money to carry on agricultural activity in Canada, who have had an agricultural background in the land of their nativity and who in the opinion of our investigating officers are desirable people to be admitted. That is as briefly as I can state the act and regulations as they obtain at the present time.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: What about the case of the children of immigrants who have been allowed to enter this country? I feel personally that there should be some latitude in regard to allowing say a son or daughter of an immigrant now in Canada to come into the country. Certainly such a one is to be preferred to an immigrant who ostensibly comes to farm but soon drifts into the city to engage in some calling there.

Mr. GORDON: Cases such as the hon. member has outlined arise very frequently. Perhaps a son or a daughter not eligible under the present regulations desires to enter Canada, and the parents here desire the migrant to join them. When representations are made to the department concerning such cases an investigation is conducted, and if it is found that the family is a desirable one—of course I have to rely on the information I can get from the safest sources that I can resort to—and the case falls outside the regulations, a recommendation is made to council in order to procure the admission of the person in question.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has any bond to be given by the parents in a case of that kind?

Mr. GORDON: No bond is required unless it is a case, such as arises sometimes but not frequently, where the child is physically or perhaps mentally defective. Then a bond would be required in order to assure ourselves against the possibility of that child becoming a permanent public charge.

Mr. McINTOSH: I may say to the committee that I have had the privilege of making representations to the minister on one or two occasions with regard to cases of this kind. The minister received these representations in a splendid way, and if I remember correctly the children were admitted, of course to join their parents and engage in agricultural work in the dominion. May I ask the total number of deportations from the prairie provinces to the United States in the last year?

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many altogether?

Mr. GORDON: Hon. members will find a compilation of the figures in the last annual report at page 65, table 54, showing the deportations by provinces.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the figure for Saskatchewan there?

Mr. GORDON: The table gives the figures for the years from 1902 to 1933. The total number from Saskatchewan for the whole period was 16,796.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister give the total?

Mr. GORDON: The total during that period is 52,119.

Mr. MITCHELL: What are the total deportations to Poland, Germany and Russia?

Mr. GORDON: While those figures are being looked up I would like to answer a question asked a while ago relating to the number of people deported from Canada to the United States. The figures are:

1931	263
1932	367
1933	308

The numbers deported to Canada from the United States were:

1931	2,038
1933	1,803

Mr. SPENCER: While the minister is looking for the figures could he give us the meaning of the large number coming from the United States to Canada as against the small number going from Canada to the United States?

Mr. GORDON: The figures I have just given had to do with deportations, but I am afraid the hon. member's guess is as good as mine with regard to the reason; I do not know.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to ask a question based on an answer given by the minister a short time ago. I think he stated that the conditions under which immigrants might come to Canada from continental Europe were first that they intended to engage in agriculture and second that they had the requisite amount of money to give them some prospect of success. Can the minister tell the committee how large is the sum, generally speaking, which is looked upon as requisite for that purpose, or if there is any set figure?

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. GORDON: That is a very difficult question to answer; it must lie very much in the discretion of the officers who carry on the investigation. I am sure hon. members will readily realize that if they were at one of the ocean ports or on the continent looking over a possible immigrant, using their best discretion they might well turn down a man with $50,000 and let in a man with 50 cents. Perhaps the man with $50,000 would lose it in a very short time and become a charge on the community while the other chap would start to make his small capital grow. We have to use discretion, and we do not lay down any arbitrary rule. It is most difficult to determine just what should apply in each individual case.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Then there is no minimum sum required? I based my question on the minister's statement that one of the conditions, and perhaps the main condition, was that the immigrant should have that sum which, in the opinion of the department, was requisite in order to give him some prospect of success, and I wondered if any minimum was set. I understand that there is no minimum?

Mr. GORDON: I can perhaps answer that by saying that no agriculturist has been admitted with less than $1,000 in cash after he arrives here, and in almost every case it is a great deal more.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: This is a very large vote, amounting to practically $1,250,000, and according to the minister very few immigrants are being admitted, while the restrictions covering their admittance are very rigid. I have been wondering if it would be possible for this department to branch out on another line that might be considered an innovation. Before mentioning that, however, I should like to direct to the attention of the minister the matter of the British boys who have been brought to Canada. I believe he said they were quite satisfactory. I remember that a few years ago we were told that these boys were given some training in Great Britain prior to being brought out here. I believe they were put in schools or on farms under agricultural instructors and given at least the first principles of agricultural activities before being sent to this country, and I think perhaps they were put on farms out here for instruction as well. At any rate, in general I think the scheme was quite satisfactory.

For the past two or three years the minister also has been pursuing what he calls a land policy, which I endorse. While some take exception to it I do think that any person with an agricultural background placed on the land with not too heavy an indebtedness over him has at least a fair chance of making a living. The matter I was going to bring to the attention of the minister is this: there are a number of young boys in our own country who have not an agricultural background. Some of them are university graduates; some have graduated from our collegiate institutes. I have had young boys ask me how they can get a start so as to make their way in the agricultural industry. Some of them would not know which end of a horse to put forward or where to put the collar on a horse, perhaps, but the point I had in mind was this: would it be possible, out of this large sum of money, perhaps in conjunction with our experimental farm system, to establish training schools for such boys who have not an agricultural background, giving them a year or two of agricultural training and then starting them out on our farms as the British boys were started, in the hope of placing a number of them where they would have a chance to make good? I wonder if this thought has ever been brought to the attention of the minister and what he would think of such a scheme.

Mr. GORDON: The suggestion made by the hon. member is one that might very well be given serious thought by everyone interested in this country. In this rapidly changing world we have found that perhaps industry does not offer the same job security that we had hitherto expected. Previously activities along the line suggested by my hon. friend have been confined largely to private organizations within and without Canada. The activities of the department, with regard to trying an experiment, let us call it, along the line suggested, commenced in the fall of 1930, and the hope was that facilities could be provided to bring to the attention of Canadians just where lay their surest hope of security as far as the home unit was concerned. We saw our cities with many jobless persons, a large percentage of whom had come from the rural sections of Canada, as every hon. member knows. A casual review of the movement from the rural districts to urban centres during the past forty years disclosed a rather arresting picture, and unquestionably in this country there is a very large disequilibrium of population, particularly having regard to the advance and mechanization of industry. The suggestions made by the hon. member might very well merit the attention of every hon. member in the chamber, because, in my opinion, in very large measure his suggestion offers an outlet and security not only for the youth who is growing up, but for even middle aged persons who find themselves without any means of livelihood. In 1930 the department outlined what has now been termed the back to the land movement, but which at that time I called colonization at home. The purpose behind the movement was to try to induce those who were able, to take advantage of what Canada had to offer. It was an encouragement to people who had funds of their own, and who saw those funds gradually dwindling in rents paid in the cities. I believe that in that effort we met with measurable success. Then, as hon. members will recall, in the following year aid was given to those who understood what it was to make a living on the land —not a fortune, but a living—so that they might be taken off the unemployment shelves.

The suggestion made by the hon. member goes somewhat further. I can readily appreciate its implications, and I have a considerable appreciation of the benefits which would flow from a long range policy of the type which he has suggested. I have given careful consideration to it. As to whether or not this is the time to begin there may be differences of opinion. In my view one thing is sure, namely, that no sounder or saner policy could be advocated or invoked by any government in Canada than to equip young men who have a flair for farming with knowledge which will enable them to take advantage of such opportunities as our country affords. All of us cannot go into mining; we all cannot go into the professions. Our country is just as good as we make it—perhaps it is just a little too good for most of us, because there are too many who will not take advantage of the opportunities it affords, but would rather take the very comfortable attitude that the world owes them a living. I think the day is rapidly coming when people will have to turn to the advantages the country offers, go at it and work. A long range policy along the lines suggested by the hon. member cannot be developed in a moment. It would be most desirable to equip our young men who care to take up that vocation with a scientific background, if you like, or at least with a mechanical background, so that they may know how to do their work, and so that if they desire they may take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the farm lands in Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not intend to take part in the discussion to-night, because I have a great deal of sympathy for the position in which the minister finds himself, due to the fact that in previous governments I occupied that position on various occasions. But I do wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that when I hear professional men and some farmers talking about the advantage of training young men to go on the land I get a little bit fed up—yes, just a little bit fed up, because for some sixty odd years I happened to be a farmer. We farmers find it difficult to keep our boys, trained to farming, on the land. Why? Because they cannot make a living on the land—that is the difficulty. When I hear hon. members who have spent their lives in farming express approval of a scheme for training young men who have been prepared for other vocations in life, to do farm work, at a time when tens of thousands of boys are leaving the farms to go into the legal and medical professions, I am somewhat annoyed. Let me say to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, that until farming is put upon a different basis you had better quit advocating the sending of men to the farms.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Change your policy.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Such talk makes me tired. Only the other day I entertained a young man who had been brought out from England under a scheme of immigration. A bright young chap, he discovered very soon after arriving in Canada that in comparison with law, farming was a poor vocation. He is now training for law. This young man was in Ottawa only a few days ago with a group of young people from the university of Alberta who were taking part in the drama festival. I asked him why he did not stick to farming, in view of the fact that he had come to Canada with the avowed purpose of doing so. He said, "Mr. Stewart, it did not take me long to discover that farming was not a profitable vocation in Canada. I decided to enter the university of Alberta, and, backed by the financial assistance of my people, take a legal training."

Mr. GORDON: He has my sympathy.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can say this to the minister, who is also a member of the legal profession that when he gives advice to young men to choose agriculture, as it exists in Canada to-day, in preference to any other profession, he is not giving them very good advice. I make that statement despite the fact that we have a good many medical and other professional men on relief to-day. In my opinion agriculture has never had a fair deal; certainly it has never had a fair deal in all the years I have been engaged in it. Remuneration from agricultural activity in Canada, despite what professional gentlemen may say, is not and never has been at all comparable to that received from any professional vocation. When I hear hon. members advocate that young men should give up professions of various kinds and, backed by the government or by some other authority, go into agriculture, I say to myself "Well, for heaven's sake, if they knew what they were talking about they wouldn't advocate any such thing." As Minister of Immigration and Minister of the Interior I have sat on the government benches and have been bombarded by hon. gentlemen who then sat on this side of the house with requests to bring people to Canada to engage in farming. Because of the necessity of the occasion I was forced to spend money for that purpose, knowing in my heart that when I did so I was possibly lending my assistance to a scheme which was not required in Canada. Because of modern inventions and modern machinery we have enough agriculturists in Canada to-day to produce far more than we can consume, yet we are asked to spend money to take young men from the cities and the professions and place them in a vocation which in Canada is already overcrowded. Why have we 200,000,000 bushels of wheat which we cannot sell? I submit that if we could sell all the live stock owned by farmers to-day, over night they could increase their production to the point where we could not possibly dispose of it. I get a bit tired of hearing gentlemen advocate schemes under which they would put people on the land to earn a livelihood. Perhaps some people in the cities to-day who have been trained in agriculture could go on the land, on a small holding, and make a living, but that is all they will make. I know western Canada and I know eastern Canada. The statement used to be made that we westerners produced great quantities of wheat and then went to California to spend our profits, but in the most prosperous days not three per cent of the western farmers found themselves in a position to go to California. I know something about Ontario, the banner province of Canada, and I know that under present conditions very few farmers in this province are far removed from the sheriff, who may step in any day and sell them out. Let us face the facts squarely. We are all in difficulties. I do not say that the professional man is having an easy time, but when you tell me that the professional man, who may have a smattering of agriculture, can be trained to take his place and succeed amongst men who have followed agriculture all their lives, you are telling me something that is not true. My hon. friend may indeed know a great deal about agriculture. He has been trained in the profession of the law, but let him go out on the farm—I will give him one in Ontario, and I guarantee that in five years he will have starved to death. We might just as well be honest and plain about this thing. Ask any practical farmer in this house, no matter how much he has had in the way of financial support, and he will tell you that in a period of twenty-five years, unless he has been mighty careful, his remuneration at the end of that period will not in any way be comparable with that of the professional man—I am not speaking of the top-notcher, but the ordinary, everyday doctor or lawyer. And the reason we cannot keep our boys on the farm is that they know these things, and they want to enter one of the professions. I have three boys; only one of them is on the farm, and I have the greatest difficulty in keeping him there, because despite the fact that his brothers are in receipt of only meagre incomes he still thinks they are much better off than he is. Yet the government is asked, and when I was in the government I was asked, to train young men who have no knowledge of farming in order that they may go into agriculture and the professions may not be overcrowded. I repeat that I get just a little bit tired of that sort of thing, Mr. Chairman. I do not care what branch of agriculture you go into, the fact remains that agriculture has had to bear the burden and heat of the day ever since I knew anything about conditions in this country, and just now this government, apparently sensing the real situation, are presenting a marketing bill in order that they may help our distressed producers of natural products. Why are they doing it? Because they realize full well, just as the minister does, that the agriculturist to-day is in a very serious situation. The government are beginning to realize to-day more than they ever did before that unless they do something for the farmer his chance of earning a livelihood on the farm is very precarious indeed.

What is the remedy? What are you going to do about it? Put more of them on the farm? I have never believed in all the years I have been in this house that we could pay our debts and ease the burden of taxation that is upon our shoulders by further immigration, because every new citizen means a new burden. I think I am warranted in making that statement. The poor duffer who comes to this country or our own citizens who have been born and raised in urban localities have a mighty slim chance of succeeding on the farm. Better train these young men in mining or lumbering or something else, but for heaven's sake do not spend money to send them into agriculture under conditions as they exist to-day.

Mr. BAKER: I have no right, of course, Mr. Chairman, to speak on a question pertaining to farming, but the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) brought forward, as I think the minister admitted, a very good suggestion that was worthy of consideration. I did not hear anybody suggest that professional men should be taken from the cities and put on the farm. The suggestion was that young men of Canada, not men learned in the law or in some other profession, should have the means to go on the farm. I have never attempted to discuss farming except in 1926 when I did venture to express the opinion that if the farmers of the west would quit wheat mining and become real farmers they would not have hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat on their hands. I told them they would if they continued wheat mining, and they have got it now. I am not speaking as a lawyer, for I am not a lawyer. I was not brought up in the legal profession, which may or may not be good for me. I am only speaking as a five cent business man. But I do say to my hon. friend from West Edmonton that the trouble with the farmers of the west is that they were not farmers but wheat miners. The men in the west to-day who are real farmers are not in any great difficulty. If the information is of any value to my hon. friend, I may say that my father was a dry goods man. He had three sons and brought them up to the dry goods business, which we nicknamed the rag business. We have stuck to the dry goods business, and I think the great mistake in this country is that the man and the woman on the farm with three sons, instead of encouraging them to stay on the farm, have the idea that one must be a lawyer, another a doctor and the other a minister of the gospel. That is the key to a lot of the trouble. Keep them on the farm, and the affairs of this country will be in a better state. Do like my dear old dad did—bring your sons up to your own business.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I just want to correct my hon. friend in one thing. When he talks about wheat mining he is talking absolute rot. He is talking about something he knows nothing about. He knows no more about it than I do about the dry goods business, and that is nothing. It is all right for the easterner who has made his pile and can spend it in California to talk glibly about the wheat miners of the west. But that is a pure myth. There is just as much mixed farming in western Canada to-day as in eastern Canada. But fortunately in the west we happen to have a country in which we can produce considerable quantities of wheat. We find ourselves with a considerable surplus, or rather the government finds itself with it, unfortunately. But when my hon. friend makes a statement like that about wheat mining it is pure unadulterated rot.

Mr. SPOTTON: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I say that advisedly, Mr. Chairman. It is pure unadulterated rot.

Mr. SPOTTON: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I submit that it is unparliamentary for a member to say that another member is talking rot. I ask for your ruling.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice, Mr. Chairman, that you hesitate to express your opinion on the point of order. I would hate to offend my hon. friend, but his statement calls for strong language, and so far as I am concerned I propose to express my views in the strongest possible terms. I have no apologies to make. When I hear hon. gentlemen rising and talking in this house about matters which, as I have pointed out, they know nothing about, know no more about than I do about the dry goods business, then I am constrained to use strong language.

Mr. BAKER: I never assumed to know anything about farming.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say this to my hon. friend, and perhaps he will think this a strong statement. I was raised in Ontario before I left for the west. I operated a farm which my father had operated before me. My only background is farming; I have no other business except that I happen to be a member of parliament. The situation of the farmer in western Ontario may have been maligned and in some respects misrepresented, but with few exceptions the position of the farmer in the old province of Ontario is just the same as that of the farmer in the west.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend says, "oh, no," but I have made some very close and careful inquiries and I say that advisedly.

An hon. MEMBER: You are wrong.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I am not wrong. To put a man on a small piece of land with the handicap of even $600 is placing too much upon his back. The minister has followed me in the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act. Who were the soldier settlers? They were young trained farmers who had joined up, served their country and came back. The moment I took charge of that matter I claimed that no boy, no matter what his training or no matter how well he was equipped, could carry such a burden of indebtedness upon his shoulders. He has not been able to do it and that is the reason why there have been so many failures. It is an utter impossibility. What is going to happen with this back to the land movement? As long as conditions continue to be serious and difficult in the urban centres these people will stay on the land and eke out a living, but the moment the wage scales mount in urban localities, there will be a desertion from the farms to the cities.

Speaking for myself alone, I do not believe in encouraging people to go on the land, either through state aid or in any other way. If they want to go on the land of their own volition and know something about it, let them do it, but you will never make a success of putting people on the land under state aid. There has never been a more deplorable thing than the attempt to settle trained farmers on the land under the soldier settlement scheme. These men were not novices; they knew their business, yet they could not make it go. Under present conditions no farmer in Canada is going to make a success unless some relief is given, and I know whereof I speak. This applies not only to western Canada but to eastern Canada as well. Yet hon. members stand up and say that farming is a lucrative occupation, that a man can make at least a living out of it. You can if you are mighty careful, but I would hate to say the rest of it. I do not believe in any back to the land movement aided by the state, but I do believe in a back to the land movement by people who know something about farming, who know the difficulties they will have to face and the privations they will have to endure. At no time during the sixty years that I have lived has the farmer received a square deal. I say that advisedly. It is amusing to hear hon. gentlemen in the professions, in the trades and in industry telling people how to live upon the land. I have listened to such talk in the legislature and in this House of Commons until I have become tired of it.

There is no doubt we are passing through serious times but that is because fifty per cent of the people who are on the land are not able to make a livelihood. Until these conditions change neither the farmers nor the rest of the population will be in a very happy position. Unless something in a real way is done to assist our farmers and agriculture, the difficult times through which we are passing to-day will continue.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) as to whether an hon. member is in order in saying that another hon. member's utterances are unadulterated rot.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will it help my hon. friend if I cheerfully withdraw that remark?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cheerfully do so, because I have made my statement.

Mr. COOTE: More than ten years ago I remember saying in this house, when we were debating this very question of immigration, that the greatest danger facing the western farmer was that of overproduction. I did not get very much support—no more than a horse laugh from some hon. members. We have gone too far in the spending of money to bring in immigrants to produce more wheat and cattle. I have a certain amount of sympathy for the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) and I congratulate him on the case he has made out to-night. Eleven years he was being badgered in the house to spend more money to bring in more farmers. We were told we must bring in farmers only, we must keep out the professions, the dry goods merchants and all such; they did not need any competition, but we did need more farmers to produce more agricultural products. When we asked who would eat all this stuff we were told there was an unlimited market. We have now found out that that is not so. To suggest that we ought to train more men and encourage them to go on the land seems to me to be—well, I do not know any parliamentary language in which to express myself. It is absolute nonsense to talk about such a thing. We know what happened with the soldier settlement scheme, and yet it is proposed that we enter upon a scheme whereby a lot of men will be put through the same kind of misery. A few weeks ago I gave the house the average income in 1932 of all farms in Canada; according to the bureau of statistics it was only $600, and out of that amount had to come interest, taxes, insurance premiums, machinery repairs and all that. There is an average of six and one-half persons per farm, and these had to live out of the balance. To suggest that we should encourage people to engage in agriculture under conditions like that is pure nonsense, and I am sorry I cannot use language strong enough to express what I really think about it. This fall good beef cows were selling in my constituency at one cent per pound. Any hon. member ought to know that any man engaged in producing fat cows to sell at one cent a pound is going into bankruptcy more quickly than he could go any other way; he would probably be better off if he went and gambled on the stock market or bought a sweepstakes ticket. If the government want to do something to better conditions in Canada, let them regulate the packers and take them off the farmer's back. Let them see that the farmer gets a decent price for his products. To think of spending our good money—perhaps it will be raised by the sugar tax—to put people back on the land to produce more wheat or cattle or other agricultural products, I say again is nothing but pure nonsense. I am surprised at the minister encouraging such a move, let alone proposing it.

Mr. GORDON: It seems that we have had a fairly good round at immigration, and I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT—RESTORATION OF TEN PER CENT CUT TO EMPLOYEES RECEIVING $1,000 OR LESS

The house resumed, from Friday, April 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, to provide for the deduction from compensation in the public service.—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 3, subsection 1—Ten per cent deduction.

Mr. RHODES: When we were in committee on the last occasion, the hon. member for Rimouski raised a point with respect to a provision in clause 3 and the point was also raised by the hon. member for Gloucester. The provision will be found in line ten on page 2 of the bill, as follows:

> And there may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund such sums as are not otherwise provided for and are necessary to provide the full amount of compensation of those to whom this proviso applies.

The objection of the hon. member for Rimouski and also of the hon. member for Gloucester was that this gave unlimited powers of appropriation from the consolidated revenue fund and there ought to be a specific vote for the purpose. On that occasion I pointed out that a similar provision was contained in a number of bills. I instanced at the time, without having any record before me, that a similar provision was found in the Old Age Pension Act. But may I point out also that the same provision is found to-day in the following acts or statutory provisions:

Government Employees' Compensation Act.
Subsidy payments on Canadian coal.
Dominion Fuel Act.
Election expenses.
Gratuities in lieu of leave on retirement—National Revenue employees.
Cost of loan flotations.
Railway grade crossing fund.

Furthermore, may I point out that in the Salary Deduction Act of 1932 the same provision appeared, as will be found in subsection 2 of section 5 of that act which provides:

The superannuation of any contributor whose compensation does not exceed $1,200 per annum shall be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

Identically the same provision will be found in the Salary Deduction Act which we passed last year. Therefore it will be observed that there is nothing new in the principle of this provision. I do not, however, wish to say that because this has been done in previous acts and in previous years by governments of varying political complexions, therefore of necessity we must continue the practice, although I must say that there is a very sound reason for it. It is impossible in the nature of things to make an exact computation, and this is to provide an elastic sum to meet contingencies which cannot with accuracy be appraised in advance. The danger if you provide a fixed sum is that you may have too much or too little. If you have too little you do not provide sufficient to accomplish the purpose you have in mind, and if you provide too much you have an invitation to utilize a larger share of the appropriation than may be necessary. I do not wish to stand upon the order of procedure so far as the suggestion of the hon. member for Rimouski is concerned, and if he feels there is any more protection to the public treasury I am quite content that a limitation should be proposed. With that object in view, if the committee desires to put a limitation on the amount, I have had an amendment prepared accordingly.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

There is only one other point with respect to the wording of this subsection—and perhaps it is worthy of note—it is that the provision for payment of the amount in the terms in which it is provided in the bill limits it to the second proviso whereas the appropriation should be available for both provisos. Perhaps this feature ought to be provided for by amendment, but with respect to the limitation of expenditure I am quite prepared to abide by the wish of the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. member read the amendment?

Mr. RHODES: The amendment I am suggesting is of course in deference to the representations made by the hon. member for Rimouski and the hon. member for Gloucester. I am not sure that it is the best method of procedure, but I desire in so far as possible to meet their objections. The amendment as I have it drafted is as follows:

That the second proviso in subsection 1 of section 3 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Provided further that such deduction shall not apply to any member of the public service of Canada whose compensation during such fiscal year is not more than one thousand dollars—

That is the same phraseology, it will be observed, as at present exists.

—and there may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund such sums, not to exceed in the aggregate one million dollars, as are not otherwise provided for and are necessary to give effect to the provisions of this subsection.

Mr. HEENAN: The position I took, and I take it personally, irrespective of the Liberal party or any other party, is that if we are going to give the benefit of the ten per cent increase, those who are entitled to it ought to get it, whether it be one million dollars or ten million. Therefore I cannot subscribe to an amendment that would limit it to one million. I take the position that the several departments ought to be able to bring in an estimate of the number of employees that would be affected. If the Minister of Finance tells me that they cannot do that, why should we limit it? By limiting it to one million dollars—

Mr. RHODES: Yes, that is the amount I named. I pointed out the difficulty; if you make it too large there is no advantage, and if it is too small it does not serve the purpose.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, the million might be too small.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. HEENAN: Can I stand here, whether it be on the side of the Liberal party or any party, and say that those who are entitled to the ten per cent shall not get it beyond a million dollars? No, and I will not do it. If we are not going to have the several ministers bring in an estimate I would rather leave it in the hands of the government as provided by the bill. The principle of the old age pensions is entirely different, because no one can tell—

Mr. RHODES: That is the point in this case.

Mr. HEENAN: If that is the case then I agree to it.

Mr. RHODES: I have already cited a number of statutes containing this same provision, for the reasons I have indicated. I would prefer to see the provision stand as it is as far as appropriating moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund is concerned, for this reason: that it provides just the sum which is required, no more, no less; whereas the naming of a specific sum has the objectionable features to which I have referred. My hon. friend will appreciate that I have only proposed this method out of deference to representations made in the committee by the hon. member for Rimouski and the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. HEENAN: I may stand alone on this; whether I do or not is immaterial to me. I disagree entirely with the suggestion of the Minister of Finance that this is similar in principle to old age pensions. I know enough about old age pensions to know that no minister nor anyone in Canada can determine wether there will be two thousand or five thousand names added to-morrow.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, while in this matter there may be a nearer computation as to numbers, there cannot be as to amount, so that the principle is the same; it cannot be an ascertained sum.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, that carries out my point; I thank the minister for helping me. When I pointed out that the analogy did not hold I had in mind the fact that no one could determine the number of old age pensions that would be applied for. I did think and I still think that each department of the government could estimate the number of its employees that will be affected, and therefore could estimate the amount. But the Minister of Finance tells me they cannot, and I think there is something in the argument.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will agree that it is impossible for a department to know, for example, how many days its temporary employees may work in a given year. Take for example the House of Commons; we do not know how long the session is going to last. If it extends beyond a given number of days the daily pay of the staff of the house will amount to more than a thousand dollars, whereas if at the end of the year they have not worked a given number of days, their pay will fall below that amount. This elastic provision is intended to provide for such contingencies. I think my hon. friend will see that under these circumstances it is impossible to make an accurate computation. I have endeavoured to meet the objections which have been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite—and I find no fault with them, notwithstanding that they are objecting to a provision which has been in the statutes for years, a provision which my hon. friend has supported, and which he supports now. I do not complain of being subjected to criticism by my hon. friend, but we are in the hands of the committee. The best estimate that can be made by the officials whose advice I must seek in the matter is one million dollars. If the sum is enlarged it is still open to the very objection to which I gave utterance before and on which I need not enlarge.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister, I think, has made a fair statement. But here is the quandary in which I find myself. I do not agree yet that the several departments cannot estimate the number of employees that would be affected, but suppose we accept the statement of the minister that they cannot—

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will permit an interruption, I presume he wants to elucidate this difficulty. Suppose we have an estimate from every department of the government, including the House of Commons, embracing all this class of seasonal employees, and the amount estimated is not sufficient, what then? Some of these employees will have to go without their proper remuneration. That is why the provision is as it appears in the bill—in order that we may take from the consolidated revenue fund such sum as may be necessary for the purpose for which this legislation is passed.

Mr. HEENAN: The Minister of Finance does not appreciate when a member of the opposition is trying to help him out. This is the first time in my life that I have agreed with a Conservative minister.

Mr. RHODES: I hope I am not wrong.

Mr. HEENAN: You must be wrong, or I must. In the first place I do not agree that the several departments cannot estimate the amount that will be coming to their several staffs. But let us accept the statement of the minister—and we cannot take exception to that, because I know of no minister of this government who has ever estimated anything right; we have had this government now for four years with all its bluster and bunkum and blather, and it does not seem possible for any one of them to be right. We will admit their inability, so that the next best thing, in order to see that the civil servants get a fair deal, is to leave the matter in the hands of the ministry. If we put a limit of $1,000,000 beyond which they cannot go they may find that it will take a million and a quarter. I am not going to take the responsibility of saying that any civil servant who is entitled to the benefit of this ten per cent increase should be without it because I voted for the limitation of $1,000,000. When we were last in committee the minister gave an interpretation of the law which I appreciated and thought very good. I propounded a question as to whether any civil servant was going to benefit by this measure, having regard to the rumours in the corridors and even in the Ottawa press. Let us take the sessional stenographers as an example; they will not get any benefit because some of them are rated at $5 a day, though in the end they will earn only about $500.

I wonder if the hon. member whom I will call the minister from East Edmonton would give me about five minutes with the Minister of Finance; I would appreciate it, because I am going to speak for only about five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, but my hon. friend has the seat. In reply to my question the Minister of Finance put on record a very liberal interpretation, shall I say, of the bill with relation to part time and sessional employees. This is a delicate point, and I should like the minister to give me his attention. I think he said that no one could determine what the sessional or part time employees would earn in a year. I agreed entirely with him, but here is the position; if a sessional stenographer or any other part time or sessional employee works this session and then is away for a period of a few months, starting to work again next year, say in January, February and March, would the amount of money earned this session be taken together with the amount of money earned in the first three months of next year? I hope the government will not call a session next winter; I hope they will call an election instead, but if the session commences in January and the employee works during January, February and March, would the amount earned in those three months be taken into consideration when deciding whether or not that employee had earned $1,000? That is the only difficulty I have now. Having regard to the minister's statement that the government cannot estimate the amount of money that will be required I am not going to be a party to limiting the government no matter what amount there may be required in order to give the civil servants fair play.

Apart from that, I want to ask the minister if it is his understanding that in the case of a sessional employee the money that may be earned next January, February and March will be taken into consideration in deciding whether or not their salary is more or less than $1,000?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that I can add anything to the statement I made in that regard when we were last in committee. The bill provides that border line cases can be taken care of by regulation of the treasury board, and I have already stated that we will give as wide an interpretation as possible within the terms of the act, and that in cases of doubt we will give the benefit to the civil servant in every case.

Mr. HEENAN: But the minister referred to the amount earned in a year. Does that mean the fiscal year or does it mean this session?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly it would not have the effect of limiting the salary of the temporary employee even if we made it the calendar year. If there are any border line cases coming after the turn of the year my previous statement still holds good. I must say, however, that assuming there were cases where there were additional days of service on the part of certain employees at a later stage in the year which put them well beyond the $1,000 limit, I am sure they would much rather have the deduction than earn only the thousand dollars without the deduction. As I have said, Mr. Chairman, the treasury board will give the widest and most generous interpretation possible in these border line cases.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor. He has risen three or four times.

Mr. VENIOT: Go ahead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: Some hon. members opposite are thinking of something else than wages or salaries. With the exception of a few like the Minister of Finance I have never seen a tory who thought about wages; they generally think about dividends and clipping coupons. This is a practical question; it is not a theory or a supposition. We are asked to vote a bill that provides for the remuneration of civil servants. I will take the sessional stenographers as the best illustration of which I know. They are employed at the rate of about $5 a day, and they will not earn more than $500 or at most $600 this session. I am trying to put a practical question to the Minister of Finance. I speak about the sessional stenographers because their position is known to all of us. Although they receive $4.50 or $5 per day, in the aggregate they earn about $500, or not more than $600, during the session. I looked up the minister's words when he referred to this matter before. I did not think he was trying to put anything over, because I have a great deal of confidence in him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: I know that statement may be surprising to some hon. members sitting behind him, because they laugh at it. Why they laugh I do not know. I must repeat that I have confidence in the Minister of Finance, but when he mentioned a year I did not know what he meant.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): There is confidence for you.

Mr. HEENAN: Some hon. members behind the Minister of Finance may laugh, but loud laughter denotes an empty mind. I have never seen on a platform in Ontario any Conservative who had much more than an empty mind. That will be indicated at the next provincial election. At the moment however I am speaking to a gentleman who, I know, has some gray matter. When he mentioned a year he might have meant the calendar year or the fiscal year. Some hon. members may not understand that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): May I remind the hon. member that he is not speaking to the question at issue.

Mr. HEENAN: How do you know that? The chairman is taking a serious responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): I must ask the hon. member to keep to the clause under discussion.

Mr. HEENAN: The chairman is taking a serious responsibility when he states that I am not talking to the question, because he does not know what he is talking about.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): For the present I am in charge of the committee.

Mr. HEENAN: I shall come to the point, so that even the chairman will know what I am talking about. When the Minister of Finance mentioned a year he might have meant either the calendar or the fiscal year. I should be glad to have that point cleared up or explained. For instance, a sessional stenographer works during the session and then he, or she, as the case may be, is laid off until the next session. The stenographers, may work, January, February and March. Will their earnings for those months be included in the aggregate when the computation is made as to whether or not they earned $1,000?

Mr. RHODES: Of course I had in mind the fiscal year. The bill itself provides for the fiscal year which expires on March 31. That is why I referred to those border line cases which cannot be determined until about the end of the year.

Mr. HEENAN: The Minister of Finance will agree there is something in my question.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, certainly.

Mr. VENIOT: After all these questions, answers and explanations, may I be permitted to have a word? The other evening when this bill was under consideration I took the objection to which reference has been made by the Minister of Finance. I believe that before I had spoken the hon. member for Rimouski had taken a similar objection. Upon that occasion I suggested the draft of an amendment to the bill. My object in doing so was, notwithstanding what the practice in the past might have been, to attempt as far as possible to keep in parliament the control over the expenditure of public money. I did not agree with the bill, as it then stood, taking the amount to pay these various employees out of unappropriated funds. Recognizing the right of parliament to have direct control over expenditures, I wished to have stated in the bill a definite amount. The Minister of Finance has kindly considered the matter and this evening he submitted to me a copy of what he thought might meet my suggestion. I have gone into the matter carefully, have considered the form of amendment he submitted, and must say that it meets my views in every respect, and I should be only too glad if the Minister of Finance would have the clause so amended. Any attempt to limit the amount which should be paid to the civil servants was farthest from my mind. I know it is difficult for the minister to have every department submit a definite estimate to be brought into the supplementaries. Some departments could do so; I know of a fact that in the Post Office Department it could very easily be done. In other departments, however I realize that procedure would not be so easy, because of the variety of outside services connected with them. The minister has suggested that a million dollars might be within the mark, and if that definite amount could be stated I am willing to accept it. But in the event of the million dollars not being enough, what would be done to meet the balance I suggest that under the bill the treasury board has the power. One section states that the treasury board may make regulations for any other purposes deemed necessary to give effect to this act.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, but that would not permit the treasury board to go beyond a specific limitation which had been provided.

Mr. VENIOT: If parliament were not in session it could be done by governor general's warrant and then ratified by parliament.

Mr. RHODES: Of course, one may always resort to governor general's warrants, but it is a practice which should be avoided.

Mr. VENIOT: I suggest that in a case of this kind it is not a bad practice. I must say that I appreciate the spirit shown to-night by the Minister of Finance, but I suggest that if an emergency arose and the amount was found insufficient it would not be unreasonable to have a governor general's warrant to meet the deficiency, up to a certain point.

Mr. RHODES: The presumption is that the border line cases will arise at the latter part of the year, and be provided by supplementary estimates. May I point out, not by way of complaint, but to show how conditions of various kinds arise, that for about three weeks we debated the salary deduction bill of 1932; we were in committee for a very considerable time and this point was never raised.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: It was not noticed.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, it was. It is conforming to a precedent that has been in vogue for many years, and has been in bills which my hon. friend supported. I am not making that suggestion to indicate that because something was done previously it must be continued; that is not my idea. I make the statement merely to show that there were sound reasons for doing it as it was done at that time.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is there any possibility that in handing back the ten per cent to those who would be affected the million dollars might be reached?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. As I say it is extremely difficult for the officials to make an accurate computation. Their view is that it might be reached, but the figure given is as near as can be estimated.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Make it $2,000,000.

Mr. RHODES: I would have no objection to $2,000,000, but there again we are up against the difficulty about which I spoke earlier.

Mr. COOTE: I really do not think the objection that has been raised is vital. I think the paragraph as drafted ought to be all right. Although I do not agree with the principle of the bill, or at least to confining the restoration of the ten per cent only to those under $1,000—I think that amount is too small—the drafting of the section seems to be all right.

Mr. RHODES: If this amendment is not pressed, there is one amendment that should be made. If my hon. friend from Macleod will look at line 12 of section 3 he will see that the last two lines of that section read: "to provide the full amount of compensation of those to whom this proviso applies." That limits the payment of compensation to those referred to in that last proviso, whereas I am quite certain that it was intended, or should have been intended, by the draftsman to make the compensation applicable to those in both provisos. I therefore suggest that all the words after the word "necessary" in line 12 on page 2 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "to give effect to the provisions of this subsection." That widens and clarifies the section. It is carrying out the original intent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VENIOT: It does not meet the objection which I raised the other night. I do not want to delay the committee; I should like to see the minister get the bill through to-night, but I still hold to my opposition to the term "unappropriated moneys." If the minister would have the section read as he first proposed, and strike out the words he now proposes to put in, I should be satisfied.

Mr. RHODES: I have tried to give effect to my hon. friend's desire, but apparently the committee was not with him.

Mr. VENIOT: The committee was with me. There was only one objection.

Mr. RHODES: There was another as well.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, that is two.

Mr. HEENAN: As I understand the effect of this amendment it is more or less window dressing. It is just the same thing—a blank cheque.

Mr. RHODES: No, my hon. friend is in error. It widens the section. The wording of the clause as it stands restricts the compensation to those in the second proviso while the intention was to include both provisos, and the amendment is moved to make that clear.

Mr. HEENAN: I cannot object to it under the circumstances. The minister says it makes it wider. That simply means a wider blank cheque.

Mr. RHODES: It means more generous treatment of the employees of the government.

Mr. HEENAN: Then I will vote for it. But does the minister not think it unfair that employees who are working for a daily or weekly or monthly wage should have to wait until the end of the fiscal year before they know whether they are going to be engaged for a sufficient length of time to earn $1,000 or get the benefit of this legislation? I am satisfied that the Minister of Finance is practical enough to realize that men or women, boys or girls, who are working in the civil service from month to month have their bills to pay the same as the rest of us; they are thinking not of the end of the fiscal year but of the end of the month. When the 31st of December comes, the year has gone by; why should civil servants who are only temporarily employed, and who give very valuable service to this country, have to wait until the end of the fiscal year before they can tell whether or not they are going to get back the ten per cent? It would be a small amount in the aggregate for those civil servants who are usually employed as temporaries, I do not care in what capacity. There cannot be very many of them, and they are nearly all in Ottawa. They should be reimbursed the ten per cent at the end of the calendar year, not at the end of the fiscal year, and if the minister will amend the bill accordingly I will vote for it one hundred per cent.

Mr. RHODES: It would be to the advantage of the civil servant to wait until the end of the year. He is being paid in the meantime.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 2—apportionment of deduction.

Mr. VENIOT: I want to draw the attention of the minister to a situation that prevailed last year in connection with this deduction. In the case of postmasters the deduction is made from the total amount received on commission, that is, over the $100 allowed the postmaster as salary in the smalll rural offices. Where a postmaster is paid by commission the deduction is made on his total commission. For instance, the business done may be between $1,800 and $2,000 to give the postmaster $1,000 as his salary. The ten per cent is deducted from that $1,000—I am referring to the previous bill—irrespective of the expenses which he must incur to carry on the business of the government. In the larger revenue offices—these do not come under the present bill—the commission may be $2,000 but the postmaster has expenses to pay to carry on the work of the government. The deduction does not take those expenses into account and it should be made only after the postmaster has paid his help and his light and fuel. It is not fair to make a deduction from his total commission when he may have to pay $150, $110, $100 or $75 for expenses to run his office on behalf of the government. Perhaps it cannot be remedied under this bill, but I suggest to the minister that he take this point into consideration when dealing with future deductions—I think it can be regulated by the treasury board—and make the deductions from the minimum and not from the total commission received.

Mr. RHODES: When the treasury board is considering such regulations I will give my personal undertaking to look into the questions brought up by my hon. friend. If there is any injustice which can be properly remedied, I shall be very glad to see that the proper remedy is provided.

Mr. VENIOT: Before the board deals with such a matter perhaps the minister would call in some of these postmasters in order to obtain accurate information.

Mr. RHODES: I doubt if that will be necessary. I think all the information necessary can be gathered from the officials of the department.

Mr. HEENAN: I appreciate the very gracious way in which the minister has received suggestions from the opposition. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is in his place, but I regret that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) are not in their places. I remember sitting on the other side a few years ago—it may seem like a hundred years to some but in fact it is only three or four years ago—when the present Minister of Justice, the present Minister of Railways and the present Prime Minister sat on this side of the chamber. At that time they claimed with tears in their eyes that a civil servant should have at least $100 per month in order to bring up a family under Canadian standards. If that statement was right then, it is right to-night. In view of that statement I wonder if the Minister of Finance would not make the amount $1,200 instead of $1,000. Of course, he was not in the house at that time and was not responsible for the sins—I should not call them sins, because I agreed with them —or the gospel of his colleagues. I know the Minister of Finance will say that increasing this to $1,200 will mean quite an additional amount. The same thing was said in connection with the old age pensions. After that legislation was well on its way through the house hon. members of the Conservative party who were opposed to old age pensions advocated that the pension should be not $20 a month but $30. They also wanted the age limit lowered from seventy years to sixty-five years, and some wanted it brought down to sixty years. That would have cost about $179,000,000, but these suggestions were made in an effort to kill old age pensions. I know the Minister of Finance can advance the legitimate argument that increasing this limit to $1,200 will cost the federal treasury several millions of dollars, but the fact remains that some years ago $1,200 was the minimum set upon which a civil servant could live, and the same holds true to-day.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 4, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That standing order 63 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of select standing committees of the house be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the house for the present session a select standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government to which will be referred the accounts and the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the present session, for consideration and report to the house; provided however, that nothing in the resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply, and that said committee consist of: Messrs. Beaubien, Beaubier, Bell (St. Antoine), Bothwell, Cantley, Chaplin, Duff, Euler, Fiset, Fraser (Cariboo), Geary, Gray, Gobeil, Hanbury, Heaps, Kennedy (Peace River), McGibbon, MacMillan (Saskatoon), Manion, Power, Price, and Stewart (Lethbridge).

I beg to say that this is in the same form as the motions previously moved in this respect.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Before the motion is put to the house; in view of the guarantee of the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway given by the government, and particularly in view of the statement issued in connection with the request for similar guarantees by the government of British Columbia, I wish to move this amendment:

That the first paragraph of the motion before the house be amended to read as follows:

That standing order 63 of the House of Commons relating to the appointment of the select standing committees of the house be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the house for the present session, a select standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government, or whose borrowings have been guaranteed by the government, to which will be referred the accounts and the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the present session, together with the accounts and estimates of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and their subsidiary companies, for consideration and report to the house.

In speaking before the annual meeting of shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Montreal during the present week, Mr. Beatty, the president of that company, stressed the seriousness of the railway situation, we will assume with particular reference to his own company. He spoke of the necessity for a greater degree of unification of services and operation. He has indeed painted a very dark picture of the future outlook for the railways of Canada.

Therefore I believe that the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be investigated by this house, based on our guarantee of their securities. In support of that view I wish to quote what this government have said to the province of British Columbia—quite properly I think—that if the government of the province of British Columbia are to come to this government and ask for financial relief, this government should have the opportunity of reviewing their estimates. In order that the members of this house may get the full picture I consider it advisable to read the whole letter addressed by the Prime Minister of Canada to Mr. Pattullo, the premier of British Columbia, although perhaps it is not all germane to the point under discussion:

Ottawa, May 2, 1934.

Dear Mr. Pattullo,

Your request for financial assistance has been given the most careful consideration by council, and in reviewing your position we have had before us the letter of the Hon. John Hart, addressed to the Minister of Finance on February 26, which we have considered in the light of the letter addressed to Mr. Hart by the Minister of Finance on March 29, as well as the telegrams which have been exchanged between us on the same subject.

Notwithstanding our own financial problems, which are onerous and difficult, it is the desire of the government to assist you to the best of our ability, but we cannot in justice to the taxpayers of the dominion accept the statement of your requirements as outlined in Mr. Hart's letter of March 26 as representing a complete effort on your part to deal with your financial position.

We must, therefore, ask you to submit a revised program which will substantially reduce your contemplated deficit of $2,120,330.66 on ordinary account for the current year, which you anticipate notwithstanding your abandonment of sinking fund requirements which amounted to $2,421,620 last year.

As the preparation of this statement cannot be made until Mr. Hart returns to Victoria, and you appear to be in pressing need of immediate funds, we are prepared to advance such sums as may be necessary to meet your immediate and pressing requirements on the understanding that your revised program is to be submitted sometime within the next four or five weeks at the outside.

It would be desirable to ask you to submit a statement which would show something appoaching a balance on current account; however, realizing your difficulties and with the desire to be helpful, we will not go so far as to ask that this should be done, but we must expect the contemplated deficit to be reduced to something in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000 at the outside.

When we receive such a revised program, we will give it favourable consideration and you will be advised promptly as to whether we are prepared to make advances from time to time in conformity with your revised program up to the end of the current fiscal year.

Apart altogether from the justice of this request as affecting your province, may I point out that it has been our endeavour to deal with absolute fairness with the requests from each of the four western provinces and it would be most unfair if greater consideration should be shown to British Columbia than to any other province.

In all of these circumstances, I trust you will recognize the fairness of this proposal, and in accepting it recognize the fact that it is the best we can make.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that my object in referring to this communication is not to bring the problems of British Columbia before this house but to substantiate the statement I made that the Prime Minister and the government of Canada are requiring—and I think rightly so—from the government of British Columbia the right to review their accounts. We have guaranteed the borrowings of the Canadian Pacific Railway up to $60,000,000, and in the amendment which I am submitting to the house I say we have the right to that information from the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, let me raise the point of order in the first place. I submit that the amendment is out of order and is not properly an amendment to the motion at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to explain why, if hon. gentlemen will be patient. The motion deals exclusively with one subject, absolutely under the jurisdiction of this parliament, having regard to a railway undertaking owned and controlled by the government or the people of Canada. For the last three or four years it has been customary to introduce similar motions, dealing exclusively with the Canadian National Railways and its undertakings. The object of the amendment is to permit the house to go on with that inquiry into the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, but in addition it endeavours to bring in an entirely different enterprise that has nothing to do with the Canadian National Railways. I submit that if the motion is proper it is a substantive motion and should be brought before the house as such, with notice given in the ordinary way.

Therefore I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule that the amendment is out of order at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Could the house have the benefit of hearing the original motion read again?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is that standing order 63 of the House of Commons relating to the appointment of select standing committees of the house be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the house for the present session a select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government to which will be referred the accounts and estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the present session for consideration and report to the house provided, however, that nothing in the resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply, and that said committee consist of Messrs. Beaubien and so on.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although this amendment undoubtedly refers to the committee the accounts of another institution I submit that this is quite in line with the work that has been carried on by that committee in the past, and which it is proposed shall be done by the committee this year. Last year the Prime Minister told us very distinctly that the Canadian National was not owned by the people of Canada but by the bondholders and that it was being carried forward for the sake of the bondholders. Yet we feel ourselves quite competent to conduct an investigation into the affairs of this company, nominally owned by the people of Canada but in reality owned by the bondholders.

I take it that the Canadian Pacific is in a very different position this year than has been the case in the past. Though it is a privately owned road it has come to this government to have its bonds guaranteed, with no opportunity for this house to examine the books of the company in order to ascertain whether or not that guarantee is needed or whether or not in the future a similar guarantee may be applied for. Surely parliament has the right to investigate anything of this nature; I think no one will deny that, and there could be no more appropriate committee than that which is investigating the affairs of the other corporation. I hope this amendment will not be ruled out of order on a mere technicality. It seems to me that it would be very far fetched to say we could not include a second railway in this motion.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not speaking at all to the merits or demerits of the amendment but rather to the point of order which has been raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). As I interpret the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) it only adds to the motion of the Minister of Justice the words, "or whose borrowings have been guaranteed by the government." I do suggest very strongly indeed that it is a very proper amendment to the motion which has been moved. The minister moved the customary motion to set up this committee, and the amendment of the hon. member is to add the words, "or whose borrowings have been guaranteed by the government." Apart altogether from the merits of the matter surely that is a proper amendment, since it merely suggests an extension of the investigation to be carried on by the proposed committee. I submit that this is a very proper and timely amendment to the motion which has been moved by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the views expressed by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) should prevail it would be impossible to move an amendment to any motion of this nature. This amendment is not contrary to what is proposed by the motion of the Minister of Justice; it simply adds something to that motion and it is germane to the principle of the resolution, namely that this committee on railways and shipping shall investigate not only the railways owned, operated and controlled by the government but also those whose borrowings have been guaranteed by the government. Surely there is nothing out of order in this amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It names another incorporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway. If that matter can be dragged in by a motion of this kind we might just as well say that we can investigate the finances of the province of British Columbia under the same motion. I am not discussing the propriety of such an inquiry; the point of order I raised had reference only to the question of whether that could be done by an amendment to this motion. An inquiry may be quite proper, and there will be opportunity every day this house meets to bring in such a motion if it is desirable, but it cannot be launched as an amendment to a specific motion such as the one I moved. We have had no notice of it, either.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister has spoken twice on the point of order, so perhaps I may be allowed to reply.

This is a committee to deal peculiarly with the question of railways, and this guarantee of $60,000,000 was given specifically to one particular railway corporation. By this resolution we are not entitled to investigate all guarantees given by the government, but we are entitled to investigate the guarantee given to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of the opinion that the amendment is a substantive motion. An amendment to the motion before the house could be drawn, but not I take it, in this form. It does not strike out those portions of the motion before the house which are not included in the proposed amendment, which should be done if the intent of the amendment is to be carried out. I hold that this is a substantive motion, that it is not a proper amendment and is not in order.

Mr. HANBURY: I very much regret, Mr. Speaker, that I must ask the house to divide on your ruling. I must appeal from your decision.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the pairs are announced—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Before the pairs are announced I should like to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am addressing the house. Mr. MacLean asked that his vote be cancelled. I am afraid that cannot be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Inadvertently I did not notice the absence of the Prime Minister with whom I am paired. I should like to have my vote struck out.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house the votes of Mr. MacLean and the right hon. leader of the oppostion will be cancelled.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that some hon. members opposite came in when the vote was being counted. I do not know if they are paired, but I think their action was against the rules of the house. They should not come in when a vote is being taken. I am making these observations before the decision is announced, because on one occasion some people were told that if they had any observations to make they should have been made before the result of the vote was announced.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is correct.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): May I say that I was advised of the slip the right hon. leader of the opposition made, and in consequence I did not vote.

Mr. PERRAS: I wish to mention that the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) came in during the vote, and voted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to the fact that all this discussion is out of order, because parliament is not required to observe pairs, nor under the rules are they recognized in any way.

Mr. MANION: I was paired with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. GERSHAW: I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. YOUNG: I was paired with the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was paired with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy). Had I voted I would have voted against your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was paired with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin). Had I voted, with regret I would have voted against your ruling.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was paired with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was paired with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HANBURY: I was paired with the hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette). Had I voted I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling.

PROVINCIAL FINANCING IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance what is the policy in general of the federal government in regard to permitting any of the provincial governments to enter the British financial market for refunding purposes?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will realize, I am sure, that the question of what issues should be placed on the British market is one for the British authorities. As far as I am aware there have been no representations made on the subject to the Canadian government, but I shall be happy to direct the attention of my right hon. leader who is Minister of External Affairs to the question for any further answer, which may be given on Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last, you will recall that I was discussing a monopoly of food products in Holland. Perhaps some explanation is necessary again as to why I went so far afield.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) brought down the budget the other day, and I thought he made a very creditable showing under the circumstances. You will recall, sir, that he spoke of the increase in commodity prices. It is unnecessary to repeat what he then said as to the increase that had taken place in the price of wheat, in the price of cattle and in the price of bacon hogs. He also gave us some very interesting statistics as to the increase of our export trade. If I remember correctly he said that we had had an average increase of around twenty per cent, and I felt that the minister was an apostle of cheer. Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture assured us that we ought to follow the world's trend. The Minister of Trade and Commerce assured us that we were in a new era, that all the world had commenced to regulate marketing by compulsory pools such as are contemplated by this bill. This morning I received, as did most hon. members, a monthly summary of the League of Nations, and on page 45 I find this question asked:

Whether there are any signs of recovery in world trade?

To this the answer is:

The total value of world trade has not diminished as much in 1933 as in previous years. Nevertheless it has continued to diminish by comparison with the corresponding figures of 1932, with the exception of a single month in which an improvement was shown in 1933 as compared with the previous year.

The other day the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) rapped me somewhat gently by stating that I had said that certain failures had occurred in connection with certain acts of a similar nature which had been passed in other countries. That was not my intention. I intended to give a general survey or summary of the legislation of this nature which had been passed throughout the world. The minister has better facilities than I to obtain this information. I advise the minister quite frankly to state now that the illustrations I gave were not always comparable to this legislation. I admit that very frankly. The minister knows just as I do that it is very difficult to distinguish among all these schemes. As he has very properly said, there are different conditions in the different countries. It is also necessary to distinguish among the crops of the various countries, whether they be deficiency or surplus crops. When the committee rose I was speaking of conditions in Holland and I should like to continue where I left off.

I was referring to the compulsory reduction in the hog population of that country. It will be recalled that the compulsory pool began with a population of 2,735,000; it was reduced to 2,000,000 and then finally to 1,800,000. Just how that was done furnishes an interesting side light on how these marketing bills work out. When a litter of pigs is born in Holland it is necessary for the farmer to buy a litter of tags. That was the best way discovered by the Dutch government of regulating production and conducting a hog marketing compulsory pool. The minister has stated that one of the objects of this bill is the elimination of waste and the reduction of costs between production and consumption. These compulsory pools bring about an increase in waste and cost. In order to administer the act in Holland it has been found necessary to have inspectors in every district, men who will keep in touch with production and prices. I regret to say that it is also necessary to have an army of informers to report violations of the act.

The same condition applies to another pool in Holland known as the Dairy Crisis Central, which was established in June, 1932. I should like to have some information from the minister in connection with that pool. Its object was the usual one, that of raising prices to correspond with the cost of production. But what was the result? Naturally, the first result was an increase in prices and I assume the producers were very happy. But the next result was a decrease in the consumption of dairy products. The poor people had to live and probably without thinking they followed the law of necessity and turned to the consumption of other edible fats. What did the government do then? It taxed other edible fats. The government then insisted that milk fats should be mixed with oleomargarine. They had to provide for the consumption of milk. Thus it goes from one step to another. I should like the minister to tell me if I am right. I observe from the press, I think the London Economist, that they have recently passed a law prohibiting people from growing fruits and vegetables in their own gardens. From one step to another in order to make a monopoly successful.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to conditions in Roumania. An agricultural marketing act was passed in 1931 which gave a syndicate control over the whole grain marketing system. Those who are interested in this bill might obtain some very significant information from what happened in that country. That act was abolished within a month because a new government came into office. The new government decided upon an entirely different system but it was still a marketing monopoly. They made provision for a national agricultural trading company, a union of cereal exporters, a millers' central office and a millers' syndicate. The provisions worked out in the usual way. A tax was placed on bread but the bakers felt that they could not absorb that tax. The mayors of the municipalities, rather than have the people starve, passed laws that the price of bread should not be increased. There was then a strike of the bakers and the government finally was forced to have the military bake-shops take over the making of bread. There were abuses by the producers who were to secure these export benefits. Rye was mixed with wheat and other abuses occurred. The government finally ran out of money and the monopoly was abolished on April 22, 1932.

The minister could secure some very valuable information from Italy. That country has gone in for producers monopolies. I do not intend to run over the whole list but I would point out to the minister the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the rice monopoly. In that case there were the usual results, increased prices at first, then decreased consumption and finally the necessity of decreasing the acreage. The Italian government is faced with the problem of how to bring about that reduction, whether it shall be a flat reduction in acreage or the putting of the least fertile lands out of commission and preventing the least competent farmers from growing rice. That is a very live issue in Italy to-day. The same conditions exist in Spain. In November, 1927, the government formed a syndicate or cooperative group of producers of rice. That group had very much the same powers contemplated by this bill. At first the legislation applied only to the growers of rice within certain provinces. In 1929 it was found necessary to make it compulsory on all rice growers and on March 6, 1930 it was abolished. The minister will remember that I am simply trying to cover a vast territory as quickly as possible and therefore I can give very little detail. I would have him bear in mind the position of Switzerland. There was a wheat marketing monopoly in Switzerland, beginning in 1915—a long while ago, practically at the outset of the war. It ran along until 1929. There were objections from both producers and consumers alike. Now, the Minister of Justice knows that Switzerland is a very democratic country, in some respects the most democratic in the world. They had a system of referendum and they took one as to whether their marketing monopoly should continue or not, and on March 3, 1929 the people of Switzerland voted upon the subject and decided upon the repeal of that marketing monopoly.

Let me now take the minister to Hungary, where there is a cooperative society called the Futura. It is supposed to deal with all agricultural products, and it dealt particularly with wheat. It has had a chequered career, and, so far as I know, it is still in existence; but the last word that I can find of it is that the money collected for the purpose of being given to the producers had to be used to buy food for people who were starving.

It seems a long way from the wheat fields of the Saskatchewan to the cotton fields of the Nile, but in both places there are people who seem to think that there is magic. The Egyptians are noted for their magic. They tried to repeal the law of supply and demand some time ago—in 1921—because they believed it was a shibboleth. What happened? They began to sustain the cotton market, buying cotton, and the price went down and down so that in 1931 the condition became so bad that the international federation of cotton spinners and manufacturers went to the government. I should like to have the evidence of what took place at that interview. Presumably the buyers of cotton said, "The price is going down because of the supplies you are holding over the market; you have a market monopoly." But whatever took place, in 1931 the Egyptian government gave up the idea of destroying supply and demand by legislative magic and announced that it was out of the market. It had had enough of marketing legislation. There is still a problem, because in May, 1932, the government held 387,000 bales of cotton and was afraid to sell it.

In Jugoslavia there was partial control of wheat and rye from May, 1930, but that was not satisfactory. In June, 1931, provision was made for a monopoly. In March, 1932, after only a few months' experience, the idea of monopoly control was abandoned.

I wonder whether it is necessary to go on. It seems to me I have fairly well outlined the field which the minister ought to investigate before this legislation is passed, the field which he ought to investigate before we are asked to help to turn this bill into a workable act. If the principle is wrong then it seems to me idle for us to attempt to amend it in this respect or in that respect. I should like however to give just a little explanation, entirely gratuitous, of the vote so far as one section of this house is concerned. I have an idea that my friends, and some of them are my very good friends, who sit at my left, are quietly chuckling. They know that once the government has passed this legislation it must go on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I am glad they agree with the position I take.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is, if it is to succeed.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): In Uruguay they had marketing monopoly legislation, and that was succeeded in the cattle industry by nationalization of that industry. And that, of course, is the final step, complete socialization.

Let me say to the minister that there are certain fallacies that appear to me to be obvious, and I really expect my friends at my left to agree with me. One is that increasing the prices of food products will increase purchasing power. Now, anything that is spent for food is simply taking from one set of poor men and giving to another set of poor men; it does not increase purchasing power in the aggregate. I wish also to bring home to the minister very strongly this fact, that although the first result of legislation of this sort is to increase unit prices the final result is to decrease them. I think I shall be able to prove that; I am going to try.

Just at the present time we are all very pleased that there has been an increase in the price of hogs. Reading the market pages of the London Economist I find that Meadow Dairies last year dropped £86,000 net profit, and Home and Colonial Stores suffered a fall in profits of £150,000, directly attributable, according to the chairman of the latter company, to a shrinkage in consumption of bacon. Sir Joseph Martin says:

"If present restrictionist policy is continued it may cut out the use of bacon as an article of food in many households. 'The public,' Sir Joseph added, 'who are after all pretty shrewd in their judgment, do not hesitate to buy what in their judgment offers the best value, and have no hesitation in substituting one article for another in budgeting for their household requirements'."

I would also have the committee bear in mind that an increase in the unit price does not necessarily mean a benefit in the aggregate, because as you restrict production you naturaly increase the unit cost of production. I could give many an illustration, but the other day I saw a very neat one relating to the tin industry. It was given by Mr. Frisby of the Pahang Consolidated Company, reported in the London Economist of November 25, 1933. He said:

"We could easily produce monthly ten thousand tons of our Willinks ore, which would give us three hundred tons of tin-oxide per month and make a profit of £100,000—that is with tin at £100 and not £230 as it is now."

Mr. Frisby added: "Alluvial companies in the Malay States can supply the whole world with all the tin it wants, with tin at £100 and make a good profit."

I know of no better illustration, at least none more authentic as to the result of the economics of scarcity. I want to go further. I am afraid that the minister will not accept me as an authority, so I want to take some one that he probably will accept in this matter. I have here a publication of the Empire Economic Union. I doubted that I would find in it anything that was helpful. I was brought up in rather a sturdy school that believed in autonomy, and I have been a little afraid of empire federation and economic unions and things of that sort. Mr. Amery is the president of this organization, and he has written the preface; he says that there is no more important or urgent issue in the whole field of economic policy than the matter with which he is dealing. So I want the minister to listen to what he says. It bears directly upon price. It will show the minister that sometimes by attempting to increase prices, particularly if you do it by artificial methods, you have the unfortunate result of decreasing them. The union goes on to report:

[Mr. W. H. Moore.]

It is important to realise that both in respect of primary products and manufactured articles planning from above by the state may fail through changes in the public taste, and also through the fact that one class of article may be substituted for another when the price difference between them is unusually widened or narrowed.

Now may I just pause in the middle of that paragraph to make a remark, if my hon. friends to the left will allow me while they are having a quiet chuckle. In this bill you have provided for producers' monopolies, but you have not provided, as far as I can see, for any common centre of exchange of goods between the monopolies. You have fallen, I would say, into the old time error of the syndicalist school. If you go on you must follow the practice or recommendations of the guild socialists and provide for a centre of exchange. The report continues with examples:

For example the consumption of beef and mutton on the one hand, and bacon on the other, may be very largely influenced by the price differences between comparable qualities, and the same is even truer in the case of butter and margarine. At times when butter is very dear the output of margarine is likely to rise sharply; on the other hand when butter is very cheap the consumption of margarine may be reduced enormously. It is interesting to note that there is believed to be a close relationship between the price of cheese and the price of bacon. We have been informed that when bacon is dear in relation to cheese there is a considerable substitution of cheese for bacon. These considerations show that when the system of quantitative control is adopted for the purpose of raising the price of certain commodities it may fail partially because consumption will be directed towards other commodities.

The report continues:

In addition to the general inherent difficulties described above there are a variety of administrative and political difficulties which call for consideration.

I would have the committee remember that Mr. Amery and his colleagues have come to this conclusion after experience with the agricultural marketing act of Great Britain. It is probably too soon to say that it has failed. They say in this report that it has not succeeded. They are disappointed. The report continues:

The difficulties are serious even if the quantitative control of imports stands by itself and is not accompanied by an internal control of home production and consumption.

I would have the minister remember that nearly everything Mr. Amery and his colleagues say of imports is equally true of exports.

If the control is effected by voluntary arrangements, such as those made at the end of 1932 with certain importing firms, the government becomes involved in commercial negotiations of a kind that have a very direct influence on the prosperity of the firms concerned, with ultimate results affecting adversely the efficiency of those firms, and with the risk of an increase of corruption in public life.

The minister may not be prepared to take even Mr. Amery's word, so I am going to give one that he will be obliged to take. I am going to quote Mr. Stevens. Mr. Stevens is probably the most important publisher of economic literature in Canada. And I must say that as a publisher he is one of my favourites. I am going to ask the minister to turn to page 678 of Volume L-No. 1578 of the Commercial Intelligence Journal, the issue of April 28, 1934. This is a report written by Mr. Wilson, who is the animal products trade commissioner for the United Kingdom. Surely he is an authority. I cannot think of a better one. Mr. Wilson is writing now on butter, and he says:

To a great extent the weakness in the market was traceable to the absence of anxiety on the part of large buyers and distributors as to the likelihood of a shortage of supplies or of higher prices—a condition resulting from the policy of regular weekly consignments in great volume and fairly uniform from week to week.

In the circumstances, there was little, if any, necessity for United Kingdom buyers assuming the cost of carrying their own stocks; they preferred rather that the shipper should do that. The summary of the position was the limited percentage of forward purchasing or speculation, which have their place in maintaining the strength of the market.

Then listen to this:

It is a pronounced instance of the results that follow organized selling on an extensive scale by the producers.

Could anything be clearer?

—in that it promotes organized buying on a similar scale or what is equally effective in the buyers' interest, taking their supplies from spot stocks weekly, semi-weekly or even daily, and at the prevailing market price at the time, or if a low price opportunity offers, rapidly picking up a huge block of butter and subsequently remaining out of the buying market for a period. The price may rise temporarily as a result of purchases of this kind, but the inactivity of some of the big buyers over a period of a few weeks invariably results in a downward swing of prices.

Could anything be plainer? We have to look ahead. I know the minister has investigated this matter, but it seems to me he ought to have his investigations printed for us so that we might follow his arguments. With the information I have at present I must say the thing is incomprehensible.

While I have Mr. Stevens' publication before me I want to refer to another matter. We are rather well thought of in Great Britain because we have not had these marketing monopolies. I am going to prove that statement from Mr. Stevens' publication. The same writer, Mr. Wilson, in the same article but speaking of cheese, has this to say:

The freedom of trading that has obtained in connection with Canadian products, in contrast to that which has developed with most of the other exporting countries, is a factor that is appreciated in the United Kingdom, and assists very materially in maintaining and developing goodwill.

I mentioned that subject when I spoke on the principle of the bill, and I think it was the hon. member for Dauphin who said he could not follow me. I am sorry, because I like the hon. member for Dauphin and I would like to follow him in that matter, but surely both of us can follow the report of our own commissioner, who is a trained man on the ground and who reports on these matters, and when we follow him we ought to follow his advice.

Now I want to return to Mr. Amery and his publication, and this is something that has a wider bearing. He comes now to discuss the principles of socialism; the report says:

During the lifetime of the socialist government there was considerable discussion of bulk purchase by import boards. Though there was at no time any very clear definition of the manner in which the policy would be carried out, obviously it visualies that the whole supplies of certain commodities would be purchased either by a department of state or by some statutory corporation created for the purpose.

I presume the same argument that follows applies to selling as well as to buying. The report continues:

We see obvious objections to bulk purchase by the state or by some statutory body created for the purpose by the state. Under such a system every purchase might raise a diplomatic issue and, accordingly, give rise to controversy with foreign and even with empire governments. The subsequent distribution of the commodities bought in bulk might easily lead to serious internal political difficulties and there might be grave financial risks to the state arising out of the popular pressure for goods to be sold at a rate below the proper economic price.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to stop to remind the committee that this report is published by the Empire Economic Union; it is not a statement by the hon. member for Weyburn or by myself. The report continues:

In addition bulk purchase might have a serious effect on world prices.

Now see the implication, as far as it affects this bill. The report goes on:

The establishment of the federal farm board in the United States of America and the existence of the wheat pool in Canada both appear to have had this effect. The knowledge that these two bodies were holding great quantities of wheat made all dealers in wheat nervous, as they could never be certain when heavy unloading would take place. The view is widely held that when large stocks in the hands of a few are hanging over the market, there must inevitably be a depressing effect on prices.

I know these matters are controversial, but after all this should not be a time for speculation; we ought to know. We ought to have the evidence, and we should not go on until we do know. There is another feature with which the report of the union deals, and I am glad it does so. It has to do with a matter to which I have given very serious study, and that is what happens when a mistake is made in big business, when one man, be he the head of a marketing board or the head of a great industrial concern, makes a mistake. That is what you will have to consider when you have centralized marketing. The report goes on to deal with that very question:

There is a general objection to unified purchase of any commodity by the government or any publicly controlled body.

Again I repeat that the argument applies to sale as well as to purchase.

It demonstrated itself very clearly during the war, when this method was employed for wheat, sugar and many other commodities. The objection arises through the fallibility of human judgment. Members of purchasing boards have to make up their minds from time to time as to the market position of any commodity, and have to come to their conclusions; however ably they may be composed, their number is obviously limited, and their judgment, however intelligently informed, may be mistaken. For instance, if a board makes up its mind that wheat is going to rise in price and purchases the entire requirements of a country on this basis while events prove that world markets instead of rising, fall, the error of judgment is transferred on a huge scale and involves enormous sums. With the present practice, there are many individual buyers—

[Mr. W. H. Moore.]

Or sellers, I may add.

—some will take one view and some the opposite, and which ever is right or wrong some kind of average result which is not so far from the actual truth will be arrived at, and therefore the amount of error in either direction will never become of an extravagant nature.

Had I time I think I could show that this is one of the reasons why we have the depth of our agricultural depression to-day. We have had these monopoly boards, these producers' boards, with compulsory cooperation in marketing, so generally throughout the world that the world now lags behind us in recovery, because we better preserved our competitive spirit.

There is another fallacy to which I should like to refer. I have heard it said that now the producers are to have control of their own produce. Well, could there be any greater fallacy than that? The dominion marketing board will not produce; it is the farmer who produces, and he is to lose control and to be deprived of the right to exercise his business judgment. I am not saying this measure deprives him; as I am aware, this is an enabling measure, but it will enable some producers—the majority if you like—to deprive him of the exercise of his business judgment. He is to become the ward of the state. What is left to him? If he cannot sell the product of his toil? What has he left? Of course he may have his land and his debts, but he has lost his credit. By this measure you are taking his credit from him. That has followed legislation of this kind which has been enacted in Europe.

I see some hon. gentlemen—and I believe they are all sitting opposite—who I fancy have money to loan. Oh, I see one on this side, too. Would any one of you loan money to a man who could not dispose of his product? I have no desire to enter into a credit controversy. We have had several of them lately. But I must ask: Who would lend money over a period of time to a man who, you knew, might not be able to dispose of his product? He could not borrow on his business judgment, because that is taken out of his hands. He has his land, and he works.

The other day one of my friends to my left said that the wheat farmers in the west were becoming peasants. Well, I do not wish to exaggerate, but I must say that in this legislation I can see nothing but serfdom. We had it years ago, and we are going back not to the nineteenth century but back to the days of monopolies, to the days which men rightly or wrongly called the Dark Ages. This bill is not without support from the big interests. They have their monopolies, and we have on our statute books legislation against monopolies. I should like to ask the minister if he will keep that legislation on the statute books once we pass this bill. Can you put one set of men in prison because they are operating a monopoly and another set in prison because of competition? Surely we should do more than simply discuss the details of this bill clause by clause. We should consider all its implications. I can think of the support which this bill will receive from some of my friends who are engaged in monopolies, and I am reminded of the invitation the spider gave to the fly, particularly when in the bill we have a provision in regard to shutting out competition from foreign lands.

I have gone on longer than I had intended, but I wish to say simply this, that although I should have liked to help in framing this bill, I have no heart for the job. I am opposed to the principle. I have an idea that the bill cannot be properly framed either by Conservatives or by Liberals. It is a socialist bill, and I would turn it over to the socialists. I have no heart for lighting a crucible, moulding men, and destroying individuality. I have no heart for that sort of thing in an economic way any more than in a national way. I plead with the government to hesitate, to consider and to ask themselves in view of the fact that we are pulling out of the depression if it is necessary to sacrifice the economic and social life of this country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have all followed with keen interest the remarks of the hon. member for Ontario, and although he has spoken at such length the nature of his observations was so interesting that we did not feel he had spoken so long. He has taken us over a great territory, speaking geographically, and over a long time and many different conditions. He has given us clear evidence of the intensive study he has made of the many different marketing acts and marketing monopolies throughout the great proportion of the countries of the world, including Holland, Bulgaria, a side trip to Egypt, Queensland, Australia, Denmark, the United Kingdom and the cotton and wheat fields of the United States. My objection is however that although he has given so much study to the marketing legislation of those countries he has not paid us the compliment of giving the same study to this bill.

There is nothing in this legislation to indicate—certainly that is not its chief aim—that the producer shall have a monopoly of the production of any commodity. One point I have attempted to make clear on each occasion I have spoken, is my attitude towards cooperative marketing as distinguished from a monopoly. When speaking in Toronto in November last before a committee representative of all the great cooperatives throughout Canada, I made it clear that I thought there should be no monopoly, but that we required what have been called private interests. Of course many so-called private interests could almost be called public interests, because the identity of private individuals and enterprises has been merged with that of large combinations and monoplies. But taking the term private interests as it is used, may I say that I believe we will require the competition of private interests with the cooperative enterprise, the one to be the standard and measuring stick of the other.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I hesitate to interrupt the minister who was so kind to me, but I should like to have the matter straight. Does not this bill imply compulsory cooperation? I am opposed to its compulsory features. If you say that there is no compulsion, that it is purely voluntary, then naturally I withdraw my objections. I am for cooperation.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The fundamental principle of the bill is to enable producers to organize to any extent they see fit, for the regulation of the buying and selling and flow of their products going on the market. They are free to form a cooperative unit to market through any channel of trade, and in this bill we are taking power to make certain that that channel of trade will be free from any artificial interference or mechanical obstacle that depresses prices. For instance, as things now are, prices will be depressed until commodities flow on to the market in very large quantities, and then by artificial means there will be a rise in prices so that those who have made no contribution to the production will receive remuneration altogether out of proportion to what they should receive. That is one feature of the bill which I think has been entirely overlooked.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister did not answer the question of my hon. friend from Ontario.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends probably on the intelligence of the hon. member for Ontario rather than on the intelligence of the hon. member for Weyburn as to whether or not I gave a satisfactory answer.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): If it is a matter of intelligence, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that I did not understand the minister's answer. I must go into the box with the hon. member for Weyburn.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My statement, Mr. Chairman, was this, that if the hon. member for Ontario did not consider that I answered his question he is the only member in the house I think who could make that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We must all be dense, then.

Mr. YOUNG: Nobody understood it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Then I am afraid all the members are a little dense.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I put it plainly, Mr. Chairman? I asked the minister through you if this bill involves compulsory cooperative marketing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We will go back to where we were. My statement was this, that the only member of this committee who can tell whether or not I answered the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario is the hon. member for Ontario. I think that is a fair statement. If there are hon. members opposite like the hon. member for West Edmonton who by his interruption evidently feels that he is better qualified or just as well qualified to answer the question to which the hon. member for Ontario has received a satisfactory answer—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I resent that remark, Mr. Chairman. I never intended any such thing as the minister implies. I merely stated that I did not understand the answer which the minister gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was referring to the hon. member for Ontario's understanding of my answer. He has asked this question: Does not this bill imply compulsory cooperative marketing?

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Enable compulsory cooperative marketing.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understood my hon. friend to use the word imply.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Enable. If I used the word imply I will substitute the word enable, if I may—enable compulsory cooperative marketing.

Mr. POWER: It says so clearly.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In what respect does it say so clearly? Read the clause. I have no desire to evade answering any question that is asked, but surely I can answer only one question at a time.

Mr. YOUNG: We should be very glad if the minister would answer one at a time.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the hon. member would really be glad to have the questions answered one at a time he should not put other questions to prevent one being answered. My hon. friend from Weyburn seems to be very well versed in the matter. Will he state what was the question that was asked?

The fundamental principle of this bill, Mr. Chairman, is to give the producer assistance and the power, when his desire is expressed through an organization of producers, to control the rate of flow at which his products will go on the market, and the channel through which they shall go, and the manner in which they shall be marketed. It is entirely up to the producers themselves, so far as that part of the bill is concerned.

There is no use building up hypothetical schemes because we do not know what the suggestions of the producers will be, or what plans they may put forward. But what this bill does is to offer cooperation on the part of the government, either the provincial government if the scheme is submitted to the provincial government, or on the part of the federal government, in assisting a representative body of producers to carry out the scheme which they themselves submit believing that it is in the interests of the marketing of their products. I feel that there is no person who is better qualified to do that than the producers themselves. We advocate individualism for our producers, but they are not living in a world of individual competition. They are not living in the same world that existed when very many of the marketing acts to which my hon. friend from Ontario has referred were in operation, and they are not applicable to the present circumstances. For instance, the hon. member has stated that a system such as this will destroy the credit of the farmer, that it will make it more difficult for him to borrow. I take the other stand, that the bankers and the mortgage companies being business men, as we believe them to be, measure the credit that they can give to any producer according to the possibility of his being able to obtain a stable price over a period for the article that he produces. I have in mind a number of instances, but I shall give only one. It is that of a farmer who homesteaded his farm and whose bank statement four years ago was in the neighbourhood of ninety to a hundred thousand dollars. He had engaged in no business so far as I know but farming. He was an individual producing and marketing his own products, and I know that he could not borrow money enough from the bank to buy a carload of cattle in the fall to feed through the winter for marketing in the spring, although he had lived within a short distance of this bank for years, and was known by everyone as a successful farmer and a successful live stock man. I do not see how any system of cooperation among farmers for the regulating of the flow of their products to market could in any way make matters worse than that, but I believe that this same bank, if the farmers were organized to control the flow of their products to market so that there would be a more reasonable expectation of a stabilized price, would be prepared to advance money more freely than under present conditions. Therefore, I feel that there is no sound reason in that argument to apply the principle in general. Numerous examples could be given of similar conditions existing. The hon. member read at some length from the report of Mr. W. A. Wilson. I have not read that report but I gather from what he said that it was the organized marketing which had been undertaken in Great Britain which gave assurance to the speculators or purchasers that a steady flow of products would come on the market and thereby there was a tendency to depress prices because there was no worry on the part of purchasers that this flow of products would go forward.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I suggest that the minister read the report.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall do so. I am quite certain that the impression the hon. member wished to give was that it was because there was no worry on the part of these people that products would come forward as a result of the organized marketing system in the United Kingdom—

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): And elsewhere.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And elsewhere. They were not on the market to purchase the live stock coming on the market. That is the opinion of one gentleman, Mr. Wilson. On the other hand, we have the opinion of an eminent member of the British House, Major Elliott, Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries. That gentleman is perhaps the strongest advocate we have of organized producer control and marketing. I feel that I am within the bounds of fair estimate when I say that Major Elliott's opinion is worth as much as the opinion of Mr. Wilson.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I doubt it very much.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) doubts that very much. Hogs were referred to in the statement which was made. I doubt if there is a producer of hogs in the United Kingdom or anyone who has given much consideration to this particular problem who will not admit that the steps which were taken to have more orderly marketing and shut out over supply has increased the price of hogs, not only in the United Kingdom but in this country. This is not because there is freedom for all hogs to go on the market as there was in the past but because there is control of the number of hogs permitted to be sold. I know the hon. member for Ontario will admit that he believes that the final or ultimate result of this will be a still lower price for hogs than the price obtained before control.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): The minister says that I will probably admit the statement he has made just now but I ask him to recall that after the act was passed in Great Britain there was such an alternate condition of shortages and gluts in bacon hogs, that is between hog meat and bacon hogs, that the government had to go to the relief of the curers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There was some disturbance of trade in the United Kingdom immediately after the passing of the act. This was to be expected as it took some months after the quota system was in force before any results were obtained. One reason for this is the fact that the countries exporting into the United Kingdom anticipated that their goods would be shut out on a certain day and they threw more of their products on the market than they otherwise would have done. I have only a few minutes before I shall ask the committee to rise and I should like to put on record a statement as a reply to that made by the hon. member for Ontario. The hon. member made many references to the different marketing acts. He dealt at some length with the results of the application of this thing in Queensland. I think he will agree with me that conditions in Queensland are perhaps more similar to conditions in Canada than the conditions in any other country to which reference was made.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I referred to New South Wales. I made very scant reference to conditions in Queensland as they are quite different from conditions here. For instance, their wheat is under balance and under equilibrium; most of the things regulated in Queensland are consumed there, with the exception possibly of sugar.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Evidently that was the reason the hon. member omitted to deal with Queensland. As I stated before, he was attempting to build up his own argument.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I must object to that. I referred to Queensland when I spoke on the principle of the bill but the second time I spoke I said I would not refer to Queensland because I had taken it up on the first occasion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Queensland was perhaps the pioneer state in this system of co-operative marketing and I think it only fair that I should put on record the report of the director of marketing of Queensland for the year ended June 30, 1932. It reads:

> In accordance with the provisions of "The Primary Producers' Organization and Marketing Acts, 1926 to 1930," I have the honour to submit herewith a report of the operations of the pools that have been constituted in relation to the various commodities under the acts.

I am putting this on record because Queensland has had sufficient time in which to try out various methods of marketing and to discover some of the weaknesses which may arise. The report continues:

> The last annual report indicated fourteen products that had been declared commodities and had been brought under the system of controlled marketing. The pools constituted in respect to these commodities still continue to function, the pools now operating being as under:
> Arrowroot, constituted in 1922 without any opposition;
> Atherton maize, constituted in 1923 without any opposition;
> Barley, constituted in 1930 by an 81 per cent majority;
> Broom millet, constituted in 1926 without any opposition; renewed in 1929 without any opposition, and again without opposition in 1931;
> Butter, constituted in 1925 by a 75 per cent majority; renewed in 1928 without any opposition; renewed in 1931 without any opposition;
> Canary seed, constituted in 1926 by a 75 per cent majority; renewed in 1930 without any opposition;
> Cheese, constituted in 1923 by a 91 per cent majority; renewed in 1925 without any opposition; renewed in 1927 without any opposition; renewed in 1930 without any opposition;
> Cotton, constituted in 1926 without any opposition; renewed in 1931 without any opposition;
> Eggs, constituted in 1923 by a 87 per cent majority; renewed in 1925 by a 73 per cent majority; renewed in 1926 by a 66¾ per cent majority; renewed in 1929 by a 70 per cent majority;
> Fruit, committee of direction of fruit marketing, constituted under special legislation in 1923 for a period of three years. The act provided for a bollot being taken at the end of the three-year period in the event of 500 growers demanding such ballot, but until 1929 no such petition was received. The continuance of the committee of direction of fruit marketing for a further period of five years was affirmed by the growers in December, 1929, by an 87 per cent majority;
> Honey, constituted in 1929 without any opposition;
> Northern pigs, constituted in 1923 without any opposition; renewed in 1926 without any opposition; renewed in 1931 by a 56 per cent majority;
> Peanuts, constituted in 1924 without any opposition; renewed in 1925 without any opposition; renewed in 1926 by a 90 per cent majority; renewed in 1930 by an 85 per cent majority;
> Wheat (under the wheat pool acts), established in 1921 by a 97½ per cent majority; extended in 1924 by an 89 per cent majority; extended in 1928 without any opposition.

This is the pioneer district in cooperative marketing. There is no doubt that in regard to some of these commodities the position is pretty much the same as in Queensland, while in others that may not be the case. But the suggestion that these cooperative methods have failed and been discarded for new methods is certainly refuted by experience and by the evidence given here.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I dislike interrupting, but I dislike more being misrepresented. I did not say that any of them had been discontinued in Queensland.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not say that.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Everyone knows that they have been a success in Queensland to the thinking of the people there, because production there is in balance. Referring to New South Wales, I said they had not been entirely successful but had been rejected four times—the wheat pool. The minister takes up Queensland. I am grateful for that information, but I should like the minister to give us similar information—and it is readily procurable—in regard to New South Wales.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret that the hon. member understood me to say that he had said the pools in Queensland had been dispensed with. I did not intend to give that impression, but rather to point out that the marketing plans that had been set up and tried out—I had reference to Queensland—had not been discarded. And in this case, I feel that conditions are more like conditions in this country than are many that have been quoted by the hon. member. They have proved so successful to the intelligent producers in Queensland that the result is as indicated. I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MARCIL: Before the motion is put I wish to say a few words. The government having refused to refer the bill to a special committee, before whom the views of leading business men might be obtained, and inasmuch as quotations have been given from a large number of countries, perhaps we might hear something from a leading commercial body in Canada, the Montreal board of trade, who say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARCIL: Well, it is one of the leading commercial bodies in Canada. It represents large interests, and points out that there are two principles in this bill which should be carefully considered. The first is coercion and the second compulsion. I quote from a communication which has been received by hon. members:

> It seems to the council that there are two main principles applied in Bill No. 51. First, the granting to a "reasonable number" of those interested in a particular commodity in a special district, the right to coerce the remainder of those so interested. The rights of individuals to control and dispose of their own property and the rights of minorities, have always been jealously guarded under our political and legal systems. The Agricultural Marketing Act of Great Britain, which is said to have served as a model for Bill No. 51, recognizes and respects these two classes of rights. The British act requires not only that the minister of the department satisfy himself as to the reasonableness of any "development" scheme put forward by an interested group, but the whole scheme, together with the evidence upon which the minister has based his judgment, must be laid before both houses of parliament. The most complete publicity is also provided for with regard to these schemes, and in certain cases a system of arbitration is provided for those aggrieved by the acts of the development boards. It is respectfully urged by the council of the board of trade that the rights of minorities and of individuals be accorded the same protection under Bill No. 51 as they receive in the British Agricultural Marketing Act.
> The second principle underlying Bill No. 51 is the securing of compensation to those who suffer loss by any action of the proposed marketing boards. This compensation, in the opinion of the council, should be a charge upon all those engaged in the particular trade in which the compensation is awarded. Under no circumstances should the funds of the dominion be used to provide compensation to special interests, or to meet the expenses involved in the operation of the act other than those of administration and the necessary expenses of the dominion marketing board. Each trade, this council believes, should stand on its own feet in the matter of costs involved and in the assistance extended to it.

I will not read much more from this memorandum, addressed to the Prime Minister and to members of both houses, but there is another paragraph which I think is well worth noting:

> The council of the board of trade recognizes that the methods of grading and packing of natural products both for home and overseas and foreign markets, are legitimate subjects for legislation, but at the same time, the council wishes to point out that this field of legislative activity is already adequately covered in so far as many products are concerned, and the gaps could be filled in easily by supplementary legislation.

It seems to me that the opinion of that body is worth considering, and that is, that the chief error the government is committing is in not referring the bill to a committee where leading business men could give us the information which we lack at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether I am in order—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The motion has been carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the government do not want friendly suggestions, let them go ahead. I simply want this bill to get a show.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was a motion that the committee rise and report progress, and that is not debatable. It is made in this instance at the request of the minister who has an appointment which he must keep and therefore desires to leave.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A motion that the committtee rise defeats the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And report progress.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You have surely got enough in this committee; you should be glad to get it to the agriculture committee.

Progress reported.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT—RESTORATION OF TEN PER CENT CUT TO EMPLOYEES RECEIVING $1,000 OR LESS

The house resumed from Thursday, May 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, to provide for the deduction from compensation in the public service—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 3, subsection 2—Apportionment of deduction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did not the minister propose an amendment to this subsection?

Mr. RHODES: Not to subsection 2. Perhaps my right hon. friend has in mind an amendment which was dealt with last night. I have no objection to reopening the matter if that is his desire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought the suggestion was a very good one. The amendment he proposes meets what I think is desirable, that there should be some amount put in the bill which will control the expenditure at least as far as this parliament is concerned. If the minister is prepared to insert that amount I would like to see it done.

Mr. RHODES: If my right hon. friend will look at last night's proceedings—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have looked.

Mr. RHODES: A situation developed last night which made it perhaps not desirable to proceed at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt there is a different situation this afternoon. If the minister will move his amendment it will probably carry at once.

Mr. RHODES: If it is the desire of the committee I have no objection. My position is the same now as it was last night. I do not propose to take time to repeat the arguments I used on that occasion, but if it is the sense of the committee that subsection 1 be so amended, I am quite in agreement. I therefore move:

That subsection 1 of section 3 be now reconsidered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That the second proviso to subsection one of section three be struck out and the following substituted:—

Provided further that such deduction shall not apply to any member of the public service of Canada whose compensation during such fiscal year is not more than one thousand dollars, and there may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund such sums, not to exceed in the aggregate one million dollars, as are not otherwise provided for and are necessary to give effect to the provisions of this subsection.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Motion agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank the minister for his accommodation.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 54 to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister if there is any change in this bill from the bill of previous sessions other than what is necessary on account of the change of dates?

Mr. RHODES: No, Mr. Chairman, the bill is precisely the same except the changes in the dates.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 37, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 1—Non-juridical days.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister if there is anything new in this section other than the substitution of Remembrance day for Armistice day and the provision for the closing of banks on civic holidays?

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend is quite right; the only two alterations in the existing statute are first the substitution of Remembrance day for Armistice day in conformity with the statute which has been passed already, and second the provision that when by resolution any city, town, municipality or other organized district may appoint a local civic holiday, the banks remain closed in that area. I do not know that I can give any better explanation than is contained in the explanatory notes. I am sure there can be very little objection to these amendments if our experience to-day is the same as it has been on numerous occasions in times past.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that not more or less the present practice?

Mr. RHODES: No, otherwise the banks would have to remain open.

Mr. MARCIL: In addition to these the provinces have the right to establish other holidays?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, the act has not been changed in that respect; that can be done by proclamation.

Section agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—to compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received whilst in the performance of duty, $12,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was under the impression that this item was passed last March when the main item was under consideration, but my attention was called to the fact that in the records of the house it does not appear as having been passed. I think last year between $7,000 and $8,000 was paid out of this vote, which is the annual grant for injuries received by members of the force from time to time, but the amount has always stood at $12,000.

Item agreed to.

Legislation

Senate: salaries and contingent expenses, $150,622.50.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Could the minister tell us the reason for this very welcome reduction?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have pared the estimates to the bone; that is the way we have accomplished it.

Mr. YOUNG: Cutting down the indemnities?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Item agreed to.

House of Commons

Salaries, $206,100.
Expenses of committees, etc., $15,000.
Clerical assistance, etc., $107,203.50.
Contingencies, $45,499.
Publishing debates, including salaries of amanuenses, etc., $63,000.
Estimates of the sergeant-at-arms, $188,271.25—Total, $625,073.75.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I ask the minister if this amount covers the cost of publishing the debates?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, that is included.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I should like to direct the attention of the committee to a matter that has been brought up already by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). In the last few years it has been customary to supply the members with one copy of the debates. This copy is in either French or English but you will realize, Mr. Chairman, that the French speaking members need a copy for their private library, and, since in the main the debates are carried on in English, we also need a copy of the English edition in order to be able to follow the debates properly and in order to make quotations and so on. I do not think the added expense would be very great, and the debates of the house would be facilitated. Perhaps the minister would be kind enough to look into this matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a committee of the house known as the internal economy commission which deals with all matters of this kind, and I think any representations on the subject should be made to that commission. In the item now before this committee we are simply following the practice of years past. There may be some force in what my hon. firend says, and I think he should bring the matter to the attention of the internal economy commission during the present session.

Mr. YOUNG: Does this item of $63,000 cover all the expenses connected with publishing the debates?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It says, "publishing debates, including salaries," so I fancy it covers all the expense.

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—salaries, $166,644; contingencies, $25,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item includes salaries for the department?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Trent canal: construction and betterments, $39,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. MANION: This vote is for some construction work on the Trent canal. Because of age a weir is wearing out, and has to be replaced, so as to protect the department or the government from liability in the event of damage caused by such wearing away.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is the work done under contract?

Mr. MANION: Nothing will be done until the item passes the house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will it be done by tender?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the payment of salaries and expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations, including D. W. McLachlan, at $1,350 and G. W. Yates at $1,080, $20,599.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of the action of the United States government with respect to the St. Lawrence ship canal has the minister any statement to make on this item?

Mr. MANION: All I can say is that the item is provided because, irrespective of what the United States congress may have decided, a certain amount of investigations are found necessary from year to year. This work has been going on for many years; but in recent years we have reduced the amount. It is true that the United States congress has refused to ratify the treaty. At the same time a certain amount of survey and investigation work will have to be done, and I may say to the committee that any sums which we find need not necessarily be spent will be held up. I should not like to have the item delayed, due to that fact. At least some of the work will have to go on.

It will be noted by the committee that included in the item are two special votes, one of $1,350 for W. D. McLachlan and the other of $1,080 for G. W. Yates. These are men whose salaries were fixed a number of years ago. In fact, I believe in both cases the raises in salary were given by the government of my right hon. friend about the years 1924 or 1925. These are valuable men, and men doing a special type of work. Their salaries, really, should be in one complete figure, and for the information of the committee I should say that Mr. Yates, who is assistant deputy minister, about six or eight months ago took over the duties of secretary. Mr. Pugsley, who for many years was secretary, retired because of age, and we decided that Mr. Yates could carry on that work without any increase in salary, with the exception of the continuance of this vote. The suggestion was that the vote should be put into one item. The matter has been put up to the civil service commission, but so far we have not had their consent. They did take the attitude a short time ago—although I believe the matter has been referred back to them—that the position of secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals might be abolished. We considered that Mr. Yates, as assistant deputy minister and secretary could carry on this work due to the fact that because of railway conditions in recent years the work has not been so heavy. We decided to make a considerable saving by not making a reappointment. The matter is still under discussion between the civil service commission and ourselves and up to the present we have not received a definite reply from them. Unless we did get the consent of the civil service commission to put this man's salary under one item, which we would not be able to do in these estimates, we would have to carry him on as he is at the present time.

Mr. D. W. McLachlan was considered by the late government and ourselves to be a very valuable man in the Churchill work, the Welland ship canal work and the St. Lawrence work. I think he is the best informed man on the St. Lawrence matter in the dominion—that may be a fairly large order, but I believe I am not exaggerating. We feel that for this year at least his salary should be continued as it is. I can assure my right hon. friend and the committee that so far as this work is concerned I can say that any part which does not have to be done will not be done. It will be noticed that the vote has been cut almost to half of what it was last year. It is not the desire to spend money but certain parts of the work have still to be carried on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not take exception to the item, because I believe it is all right. I thought however that the minister might like to make a statement.

Mr. MANION: There is not much to say now, is there?

Mr. BRADETTE: This item includes St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations, and I would understand that those surveys would include the drainage system of Chicago. Would the minister tell us what has been done on that score.

Mr. MANION: Although in the past few months I have been looking up information in this connection, I am afraid I cannot give a definite statement at the present time as to the position of the Chicago drainage canal. I should not like to guess at it, but I can assure my hon. friend that if at some other time he would ask me a question or draw the matter to my personal attention I will outline the situation. However, I should not like to put on Hansard opinions or statements which may not be actually correct in connection with an international matter of that kind. The Chicago Sanitary District, whose officials are in charge of the work, have to a large extent consistently hesitated because of their financial position to carry out the work which they were instructed to do in regard to sewage disposal, but I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member exact information at the moment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should be glad if the minister would get that information because there have been various reports published in the press that the provisions of the court order have almost ceased to be carried out, and the court order is of great importance to Canada.

Mr. MANION: I suggest to my hon. friend that as this is really an international matter, and not dealing so much with the St. Lawrence waterway question, it might be brought up when the Prime Minister has his estimates for External Affairs before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are all through.

Mr. MANION: There will be some other opportunity. I will look into the matter and make a statement. I do not care to make a guess on it at the present time.

Mr. MUNN: Are the salaries mentioned in these votes retainers?

Mr. MANION: No, they are salaries for regular employees.

Mr. MUNN: Are there any engineers outside the department being paid a fee in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway? If so, how many, and what are they being paid?

Mr. MANION: There are no engineers outside the department. The work is being carried on under Mr. McLachlan and under the chief engineer, Colonel Dubuc, but at times outside men have been engaged upon certain investigation. No one is being paid any retainers of any kind.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—to provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for salaries, reclassification and increases, $50,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the minister explain the increase of $10,000 in this item?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not my book here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think these are the customary adjustments.

Mr. RHODES: Yes. I think they largely arise by reason of changes through the establishment of the office of comptroller of the treasury. I should like to have my book here if details are wanted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is the customary readjustment of salaries because of reclassification and promotions made during the course of the year.

Mr. RHODES: It is a regular item and has been in the estimates for years.

Mr. BRADETTE: When I draw my indemnity I have to take oath as to how many days I have been away from the house. I do not think any member should have to take an oath on a matter of that kind. Such a thing is not asked by any large corporation in this country, and I cannot see why it should be asked of a member of parliament. I have heard judges deploring that the oath is used so extensively in this country as to become almost farcical, that people hardly take it seriously. When I was elected I pointed out to my constituents that I would have to answer to them, not to the accountant's office of the House of Commons. I think this provision should be removed from our statutes if it is a statutory provision. I sincerely believe that it is not fair to members of parliament and to parliament as a whole that a member when he gets his indemnity cheque should have to take an oath. When I was elected I was receiving an indemnity of $4,000; it is $3,600 now. I seldom miss any sittings of the house, and yet I am sincere in my protest. I do not think that the full oath should be taken when members draw their indemnities to which they are absolutely entitled. No financial institution of any kind insists upon it, and if there is one office that should accept the word of members of the house it is the accountant's office of the House of Commons.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member must know that every month as he draws his indemnity cheque he takes an oath before he gets it. It is really a statutory declaration, not an oath, but under the law it has the same force and effect as an oath. If any change is to be made in the law it will have to be made by an amendment to the House of Commons Act which provides that this statutory declaration shall be taken. While my hon. friend says that when he was first elected he got an indemnity of $4,000, when I was elected I got an indemnity of $1,000 a year, but I distinctly remember that I had to make the statutory declaration just the same, and I think that has been the law since confederation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What circumstances would necessitate an increase of $10,000 in this item? I would assume that the amount required for reclassification and increases would be pretty much the same each year.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I cannot give the information at the moment as I have not my book here.

Item stands.

Grant to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, $16,200.

Mr. HANBURY: I do not want to delay the proceedings but I should like to ask that greater efforts be made to assist the blind people of Canada. This is something which we should all assist in every way we can.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As I said on a former occasion when we were discussing this matter, I regret the reduction which has been made in this vote. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury), that this is a very worthy cause. When the government is submitting supplementary estimates I think it would do well to consider some further assistance to the institution for the blind and for education of the blind.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Canadian Tuberculosis Association, $20,250.

Mr. BRADETTE: What is the reason for the decrease?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no decrease, it is ten per cent off.

Item agreed to.

Grant to assist the Canadian branch of the St. John Ambulance Association, $4,050.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does this vote cover the cost of the titles recently conferred upon this order?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: They have been earned by services.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: These are all the items we have to submit at the moment. We announced last evening that the estimates of the Department of Immigration would be taken up this evening but I am sorry to say that the minister of that department is confined to his home with illness. If the committee is agreeable we will take up Pensions and National Health after the hour for private bills, or confine it to National Health alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to be sure that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will be here when pensions are taken up.

Mr. RHODES: If he is not we will hold the item.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

European war—naval, militia and air forces after the war, $42,000,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am rather diffident about discussing again the question which I am going to bring to the attention of the minister, but I do so because I believe it to be my duty and on account of the justice of my cause. I refer to a very sad case which I have mentioned on several previous occasions —Mr. Joseph Hussin of Drinkwater Pit, Ontario. It should not be necessary for me to call the attention of the minister to this matter again, because if the department had been fully acquainted with all the circumstances I fancy that better treatment would have been meted out to this man. If the minister will give me an assurance that the case will be reopened I am ready to make the same promise I made last year, namely, that should the department find it impossible to defray the travelling expenses of this ex-soldier I shall gladly pay them myself in order to have his case reopened and have him heard.

Towards the close of last session the matter was referred to some of the officials of the pension commission and I was asked, on the eve of my departure for my own section of the country, whether I could take it up with them. Unfortunately I had to leave in rather a hurry for Cochrane but I received a letter to the effect that the case would not be reopened. Two years ago I quoted from some fairly strong editorials appearing in the newspapers, some of them of Conservative and independent tendencies, and I called attention particularly to an editorial in the Porcupine Advance, which had been fighting for this man for several years. In my riding there is a large body of returned soldiers and only three or four at most have failed to receive the attention they deserve.

The minister is always willing to listen to the returned man's plea, and I am sure that if he knew all the facts he would grant this man a new hearing immediately. Not only the House of Commons but the whole country welcomed the statement made by the Prime Minister almost at the beginning of the session with reference to certain cases brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Those cases I believe were dealt with immediately. I wish that I could present Mr. Hussin's case as forcefully as the hon. members I refer to presented the cases in which they were interested, because I believe that the matter would have received attention at once from the minister and the department.

If I understand the act rightly it gives sufficient leeway to allow this case to be reopened. It is my duty now, unless I get a promise from the minister that it will be reopened, to put once more on the record of parliament exactly what has taken place with regard to this man. This is one matter in connection with which there has been a good deal of criticism not only of the pension commission but indirectly of the minister. This gentleman has been suffering for a number of years from injustice and before I proceed I wish to put a direct question to the minister. If he answers in the affirmative I will go no further but will give him all the information I have. Will it be possible to have this case reopened and Mr. Hussin reexamined?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Extended reference to this case was made by the hon. gentleman last year and I then said that I would see that it was again thoroughly investigated. The man was brought from his home in the northern section of Ontario to Christie street hospital in Toronto and special arrangements were made so that his case should be fully looked into. He was examined by two nerve specialists, one belonging to the department and the other a specialist in nervous disorders who had no relation with the department. The case was completely reviewed and the man thoroughly examined, and the report of the two specialists was that it was a case of malingery. I can understand my hon. friend holding the view that the case has not been fairly dealt with. That frequently occurs in cases such as hysteria and malingery; there is always a doubt, especially on the part of those connected or associated with the man. As I say, the report of those two specialists was that it was a case of malingery. It is also stated that there was repeated evidence that he worked as a labourer between the years 1919 and 1931. The result was that it was not considered a genuine case and he was not awarded a pension. I made every effort to have this man examined in an impartial way and by men specially trained and qualified in diseases of the kind, and that was the result. I had hopes that my friend who has now again brought this case forward might feel that the examination was a fair one, and that the result was arrived at by men well qualified to reach a right conclusion.

There is no limit to reexaminations, even if it seems not very necessary,—because this man has been examined again and again. My friend asks whether I will arrange for a further examination. I say that notwithstanding all that has been done and the very special efforts made to arrive at a convincing finding, I shall be pleased to ask that this man have a further examination.

Mr. BRADETTE: I appreciate what the minister has said and has done, and that appreciation will be shared by the veterans generally. However, I am going to challenge one statement made by the minister, even if it is based on the report of a specialist; I say that man is incapable of malingering. I have made the statement outside of the house and I make it here. And I say it was impossible for him to work as a labourer from 1919 to 1932. The only way that statement could have come to be made was that the man was on a farm settlement in the Porcupine district. He is crippled, he has no use of one arm, and it does not take an expert to realize that. If I see a man with only one eye it is easy to know that he has the use of only one eye.

The Pension Act has been well administered throughout Canada and there are very few cases of this nature. In fact the opinion is almost unanimous that successive governments have kept faith with the returned men, and this is one of the very rare cases in my section that has not received the attention that it deserves.

There is only one other case that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister, that is the case of H. C. Joanisse of Cochrane, regimental number 1102199, of battalion 257 D, unit C.A.V.C. He is suffering from faulty eyesight. I think he made application once two years ago, but whether or not he was examined I do not know. He wrote to me a few days ago asking for another examination.

These are the two outstanding cases in our section of the country. I hope in relation to the one I have just cited that the minister will give me the same answer as he gave in the previous case, namely that he will allow the matter to be reopened.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am quite unable to identify the case. All I can say is that the man's number will appear on Hansard and I shall make inquiry and see what should be done. In reference to the other case, if possible I shall endeavour to have two nerve specialists deal with this man who have not previously examined him. Also I think it is fair to ask that the hon. member who is so much interested in this case should, in order to satisfy himself, read the files and the evidence; they will be at his disposal.

Mr. MacLEAN: In connection with veterans' allowances, I understand there is a ruling of the department that a Canadian soldier entitled to veteran's allowance, if taking treatment in a hospital in the United States or living in that or some other country, cannot draw such allowance. I should like to know if that is a correct statement, and if temporary absence of that kind disqualifies him. I have in mind a man suffering from tuberculosis. His home is in Nova Scotia—not in my riding—and he has taken treatment in a hospital in the United States. The doctors are of the opinion that it is an advanced case of tuberculosis, but although his case is before the pension board they have not yet come to a conclusion. As his wife and children are in need we are making an effort to get veteran's allowance for him.

Mr. MacLAREN: If my hon. friend has in mind the war veterans' allowance, the regulation is that such allowance is not payable outside of Canada. That is, no man receives war veterans' allowance unless among other conditions he is a resident of Canada. On the other hand the hon. member may be referring to pay and allowances; that is on a different basis. Pay and allowances to Canadian pensioners while undergoing treatment in the United States are allowed.

Mr. VENIOT: In a case where the dependents live in Canada and the husband lives in some other country would not the dependents receive their share of the veterans' allowances?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, in the case of a man in the United States whose family lived in Canada, the war veterans' allowances would not be payable.

Mr. VENIOT: Not even to the dependents?

Mr. MacLAREN: No.

Mr. MacLEAN: I wish to thank the minister for the information he has given me; I was speaking with regard to the veterans' allowances, but possibly something can be done in the other way to which the minister referred, and I shall be glad to take up the matter with the department. Then I should like to know from the minister if a ruling has been made recently in cases where pensions are granted which should be dated back to the date of the application on which the pension was eventually given.

Mr. MacLAREN: There are pensions payable back to a certain date; they are termed retroactive pensions, and they are frequently awarded.

Mr. MacLEAN: There has been no recent ruling in that regard?

Mr. MacLAREN: There has been no change made.

Mr. BRADETTE: Would it be possible under the pension act for a returned man to go back to the land and borrow money from the department for farming purposes?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, he cannot borrow money on his pension, and his pension cannot be interfered with by anyone.

I have some interesting facts, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the payment of pensions which I think I should make known, as the information is rather important. I wish to place it on Hansard so that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity of studying the figures with greater ease. The reason I do so is that frequently the criticism is heard that pensions are being reduced. I am not surprised that this view is held by many, and there may be a certain diminution in the amount of pension paid, but that diminution is not large. There are two principal reasons for this misapprehension, but before I make my statement I should like to describe how the representative of the treasury board keeps his record of pension payments, so that hon. gentlemen will be a little better able to follow the short explanation I have to make.

The representative of the treasury board, who is the bookkeeper and paymaster, as it were, has three columns in his records with regard to the payment of pensions. There are three classifications under which pensions are placed, and the three added together show the total payments. First is the column showing the regular monthly payments; this is an amount that is more or less the same subject to minor changes. As I say, this figure is fairly constant, though not necessarily so because pensions are subject to change. Many people say, "My pension was so much a year ago and now it is so much less." Pensions are subject to change in accordance with the amount of disability. Naturally if a man has lost an eye or both eyes that is a permanent disability and his pension does not change. If a man has an amputation that is a permanent disability and there is no change in his pension. There are innumerable other conditions, however, such as bronchitis, rheumatism, myalgia and all that sort of thing, which vary from time to time, and the pension varies with the amount of disability.

The second column refers to retroactive adjustments, which I mentioned to my hon. friend from Prince. This amount varies also. In one year it was almost $4,000,000; in another year it fell, and according to the last statement I have, pensions of this class totalled $1,145,000. In other words in one year a large number of cases concerning retroactive pensions may come before the pension commission while the following year there may be a much smaller number, so this amount varies also.

The third classification is the restored final payments, and in this classification we find the greatest variation of all, because it was only in 1930 that legislation was introduced concerning what are called the restored final payments. For the first two years a very large number of retroactive payments were made, and have been made as time has gone on. To give an example, in the year 1931 the item for restored final payments amounted to $3,941,991.56, nearly $4,000,000. Last year, 1933, it was down to $190,168.87.

Mr. POWER: Would the minister give the figure for 1932?

Mr. MacLAREN: The amount was $832,851.23. In order to get a fair idea as to whether pensions are diminishing or increasing one must view it over a fairly long period of time. I noticed during the present session a question on the order paper asking for the figures over a three year period. At that time the matter was carefully investigated and it was shown that a three year period was not a satisfactory basis on which to judge. I have before me a table showing the figures for six years, and with the permission of the committee I shall have it placed upon Hansard. I have an extra copy for the hon. member for Quebec South; perhaps he may wish to show it to other hon. members on that side of the house. The figures are as follows:

Amount of Pension Payments

Calendar year—	Regular monthly payments	Retroactive adjustments	Restored final payments	Total
1928	$36,088,974 47	$3,917,752 75	.....	$40,006,727 22
1929	37,143,239 72	2,081,342 46	.....	39,224,582 18
1930	37,856,525 20	2,822,580 50	$1,189,794 62	41,868,900 32
1931	40,199,310 74	3,318,176 65	3,941,991 56	47,459,478 95
1932	41,238,465 31	1,750,914 30	832,851 23	43,822,230 84
1933	40,633,738 04	1,145,489 04	190,168 87	41,969,395 95

Mr. BRADETTE: I do not think I made myself clear when I spoke earlier in the evening. Every week I receive letters from veterans in my constituency who would like to go on the land, and they want to know whether or not through the pensions legislation it would be possible for them to borrow money to start in this line of work.

Mr. MacLAREN: The matter to which the hon. member refers comes under another department over which I have no jurisdiction and about which I should not like to speak.

I believe it is the desire of the committee to know the exact conditions, and to be informed of the good as well as the bad points. A number of questions on the order paper have asked, "What was the total decrease in payment"—in this or that. But on no occasion has a question been submitted asking, "What have been the decreases and what have been the increases?" One who wishes to know the exact situation must realize that the information on one side is as important as that on the other. Because the increase in pensions is considerably greater than generally understood, I shall place on Hansard figures showing disability pension activities. Before giving the complete table may I indicate that in the year 1933-34 the decreases numbered 3,617, and the increases 2,631. The number of increases may be smaller, but is still a very substantial number. With the permission of the committee I shall put the following figures on Hansard:

Disability Pension Activities, by Fiscal Years 1929 to 1934

Fiscal year—	Decrease of pension	Discontinued no disability	Discontinued with gratuity	Total decreases	Increase of pension
1929-30	745	80	10	835	3,723
1930-31	449	90	47	586	4,277
1931-32	791	162	73	1,026	4,023
1932-33	2,129	271	156	2,556	2,865
1933-34	2,510	399	708	3,617	2,631

First Pension Awards

Fiscal year—	Pension	Gratuities
1929-30	1,774	319
1930-31	2,722	317
1931-32	3,091	457
1932-33	1,912	406
1933-34	1,058	246

Before taking my seat I should like to indicate one other point, namely that the average amount of pensions paid is considerably lower. The explanation is one which should be known to all hon. members. As I pointed out when speaking about the restoration of pensions, under the amendment to the act made in 1930 the small pensioners were restored—and by that I mean the pensioners between five per cent and fourteen per cent. As a result hundreds and hundreds have been restored, thereby increasing very substantially the total number of pensioners. But the increase in the number of pensioners is largely caused by the number who are drawing small pensions between five per cent and fourteen per cent, and for that reason—I give this information for what it is worth—the average amount of pension paid to-day is less than it was.

Mr. GERSHAW: I understand that a quorum of the pension commission travels around the country and holds hearings at certain points. My difficulty is that it is very hard to find out when the quorum will sit at a certain place. I should like to ask if the department has any regular schedule; or does the quorum sit when enough cases have accumulated? Is the soldiers' adviser notified when sittings are to be held?

Mr. MacLAREN: As a matter of fact the information can be obtained with great ease. A schedule is drawn up several weeks ahead and can always be obtained. If any hon. member of the committee wishes such information I shall see that he receives it at once. The regular procedure is to write the pension commission and inquire when they will sit at a certain place. The chief pensions adviser always has that information. There is a schedule somewhat like a time table, but perhaps a little more variable, which is always ready for weeks ahead. If the hon. member would write the pension commission he would get the information.

Mr. GERSHAW: I have not been able to get it by writing. The soldiers' adviser will say that there may be a session at such and such a place next spring, but he does not know. I had real difficulty in finding out when they would reach a certain point.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the hon. member will find that that information is known several weeks ahead.

Mr. HOWDEN: I understood the minister to say that the pensions were progressively becoming smaller. I would ask if it is the policy of the department progressively to diminish pensions, and if so, upon what authority they are making this change. I have in mind several types of cases that certainly occur from time to time, and just how it is possible for the department progressively to reduce pensions consistently with the act I do not understand.

Mr. MacLAREN: So far as I am aware there is no policy of reducing pensions, and further the department could not properly have any such policy because the amount of pension granted is according to the degree of disability. The disability is assessed, not by the department, but by the pension commission, which is practically an independent body. The department has nothing whatever to do with any reduction of pension, and so far as I am aware there has been no move in that direction.

Mr. VENIOT: What about the reduction in the pensions of dependents, which are not awarded according to the degree of disability? I know cases where dependents have had their pensions reduced, and I am not referring to cases, for instance, where there is a reduction because of a child coming of age. I have in mind a dependent's pension to a widow, and that pension was certainly reduced. How does that operate?

Mr. MacLAREN: If my hon. friend from Gloucester would give me specific cases I should be pleased to have them looked into and give him a proper answer. So far as I am aware these cases do not arise. Of course, there may be a case like this, where a widow who has been receiving a pension for some years remarries.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not that kind of a case at all.

Mr. MacLAREN: Outside of that the pensions that are awarded to dependent fathers and mothers depend upon their financial position, and if a dependent father or mother gets into better circumstances I can understand the pension being reduced. But I shall be glad to look into any case of which my hon. friend from Gloucester will give me the particulars.

Mr. VENIOT: Here is a case in point. A widowed mother was receiving a pension on account of her son who was killed at the front. After enjoying that pension for several years she was suddenly notified that the pension was being reduced from forty to twenty dollars a month, and her condition at the time she received that notice was just as bad as it was when she was receiving a pension of forty dollars a month. The pension board or the department must have some way of looking into the matter and making a report on such cases. I do not know who reported on this case, but whoever did make the report made a false report because I am personally acquainted with these people; I know their conditions and everything connected with them. I took the matter up and reported the case as I knew it, and as the clergyman of the district knew it, and as a result the pension board added to the reduced pension something like ten dollars. Now, I do not want any pension board to add to a reduced pension on my recommendation. I do not make recommendations. I want every case treated on its merits, and the reason I am bringing this question up to-night is for the guidance of the pension board in the future. In all cases the pension board should see that a proper investigation is held; they should not depend on their agents getting reports from Tom, Dick and Harry, without going to the spot and seeing the actual conditions for themselves.

To prove my contention I would remind the minister that some seven or eight years ago it was the practice to send lady inspectors around to see the condition of the pensioners and see if the pensions, especially of dependents, should be continued on the scale first granted. One of these lady inspectors called at my home on a Sunday afternoon, showed me a list of names of people she was to visit in my county, and asked me where they were located. I gave her all the addresses and told her how to reach these places. One of the cases was about a mile and a quarter from my home, and she asked me if I would give her the particulars in connection with that dependent family because she wanted to make her report and send it out the next day. She did not visit that family and make her own report. She made a report on the word of Tom, Dick and Harry, and that widowed pensioner had her pension reduced after losing a son in the flying corps at the front. That was the practice some years ago. Lately I have not heard much about it except in the one case I now mention.

The other day I received a letter from a pensioner in my county, sending me a notice that his pension had been cut from twenty-five dollars to ten dollars. He is a returned soldier trying to make a living on the farm. On whose report was his pension cut? I have made inquiries and I tried to find out as much as possible when I returned home at Easter. It was reported in the neighborhood that this man's pension had been reduced because it was found that he had a couple of horses and a cow. What right have they to reduce his pension as a returned soldier because he happens to have a couple of horses and a cow? If he was entitled to a pension of twenty-five dollars a month they had no right to cut it down because he was trying to make a living on his little farm where he has been able to raise two horses and a cow; but the pension was cut down from twenty-five to ten dollars a month, and he had to go on the relief list and get relief for himself and his cattle to keep them from starving. It was robbing Peter to pay Paul.

These are two cases. I do not wish to give the names before this committee, but I shall be glad to give them to the minister any time he wants them.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the hon. member for Gloucester will be good enough to give me the names in confidence I shall have the cases looked into.

Mr. VENIOT: I will do that.

Mr. MacLAREN: There is a little more to say about it. It is suggested that the man had his pension reduced because he had two horses and a cow. I know nothing about the case; I do not remember having heard of it, but I cannot believe that the pension was reduced for that reason. If he had a hundred cows and fifty horses his pension would be just the same. There must be some other reason, and I hope the hon. member for Gloucester will give me a chance to look into the matter. These cases are investigated, but it might be exacting a higher standard than is found in other positions in life to expect that those investigating always do their duty. I should like to be satisfied as to whether the case the hon. member mentioned has been actually investigated; the records will show. Both cases will be thoroughly looked into.

Mr. RALSTON: With all due deference to the minister I question whether his explanation as to the reduction in pensions gives us a true picture. Every hon. member knows from the correspondence he has received, as does everyone who is interested in returned soldier matters that outside of the reinstatement of pensions which had been settled by a final payment there has been quite a substantial cut in pensions. I am not saying that in some cases that cut has not been justified, but I do say that the minister is not correct when he says that the reason the average is reduced is the fact that some small pensioners who had received final payments have now been restored to monthly pensions. Letter after letter is received by hon. members of this house, by the legion and by others interested in ex-service men's problems, to the effect that pensions have been reduced. As I say, some reductions may be justified, but do not let us fool ourselves about it. I understand that for some reason the auditor general has gone down to the pension commissioners or to the minister's department and started an investigation as to the legality of the amounts awarded for pensions.

Mr. MacLAREN: With the pension commission.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister say that the auditor general did not institute an investigation?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is the routine examination he makes in all departments. He does not come into the department to investigate as to the propriety of awarding pensions.

Mr. RALSTON: He does not?

Mr. MacLAREN: So far as I know it is limited to the pension commission.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the minister and I understand each other perfectly well; the department does not award pensions, it is the board of pension commissioners. The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that the auditor general or his representative has gone over the files to find out whether or not he considers a pensioner entitled to a pension. Will the minister tell me whether that is right?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think that is correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit—I am speaking in the presence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie)—that that is an absolutely incorrect function of the auditor general. I submit that he has no more right to overrule a decision of the board of pension commissioners than he has to overrule the exchequer court if it decides that the crown is liable for the payment of a certain sum of money. The commission has the statutory authority, and it seems to me the auditor general has no jurisdiction whatever. This is one case of reduction of pensions which has been referred to. I understand that the auditor general has gone over the files and stated that such and such a man received his disability before service, and suggesting that his disability was only an aggravation of a pre-war disability and that, therefore, he was not entitled to the full amount, notwithstanding the fact that the statute awards such a man the full amount if he served overseas in a theatre of war. I submit that is one of the reasons why pensions have been cut.

I understand that some 70,000 files have been reviewed by the board of pension commissioners. The other night we had a statement to the effect that the records show that reductions had occurred in something like two or three thousand cases. In the face of that I do not see how the minister can say that pensions have not been reduced, even in view of the fact that there are more pensioners now through the restoration of a number of small pensioners.

Mr. MacLAREN: I did not say that.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the impression that was left on my mind. I am glad I spoke and have had that impression removed. There is no doubt that pensions have been reduced considerably in a great number of cases. I have had experiences similar to those of the hon. member for Gloucester. Just to-night I received a letter indicating that a parents' pension of two old people in my constituency had been reduced from $30 to $10. In another case two old people, not in my constituency, were receiving the munificent sum of $10 a month. The two boys of this father and mother are dead in France, so there is no question as to the connection between service and disability. They are now sleeping in Flanders fields, and these two old people are receiving $10 a month. I saw the file in this case. Someone had suggested that the award be $20 a month in respect of the death of the two sons, both of whom had assigned pay, but someone else had put a red ink line through the "twenty" and put down "ten." The case was finally re-examined the other day and they are now receiving $20. That is the kind of case the hon. member for Gloucester is complaining about, the case in regard to which it takes months to get recognition by the investigators. Many of these people are probably in a worse position and deserve more from the country than some men who are partially disabled. These particular two old people have lost their two sons and it seems to me that the country ought not to be ungrateful and should see that they and others similarly situated should be provided with sufficient for their maintenance. I think the minister should look into the administration of dependents' pensions. As I understand it there is no appeal in the case of a dependent's pension unless it is on the question as to whether or not death was due to service. The question of the financial position of the applicant cannot be considered by the court of appeal; the question whether or not the son or sons would have supported the parents had they lived cannot be referred to the court of appeal; the question whether these parents have sufficient income to provide the necessaries of life cannot be referred to the court. I submit that these cases should be within the jurisdiction of the court of appeal because many of them constitute the most distressing cases with which we have to deal.

There is another matter which the minister and I have discussed before, the matter of the married cases. He will remember the other night when we were discussing this matter I intimated along with other members that I thought many of these cases could not be dealt with simply by reference to the Department of Justice. I intimated that there are cases in connection with which legislation would have to be passed, and I should like to know the position of the minister in connection with this matter. I understand that generally one does not forecast legislation, but it seems to me that the committee is entitled to know what the minister has in mind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I should like to make a statement with reference to the cases referred to by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). Up to April 28 there had been submitted to the Department of Justice, 163 married cases. My understanding is that there are some 570 in all to be submitted. Yesterday my deputy minister received a letter from the chairman of the pension commission stating:

> The commission have forwarded to you quite a number of files with regard to the material status of pensioners. I am writing accordingly to let you know that the review of these cases will not be completed even by the end of the year. You may expect to receive each week about the same number you have been receiving in the past. It is quite probable that with regard to the out of Canada pensioners the review will not be completed until another year.

We have made a pretty careful review of the cases we have already received and they seem to resolve themselves into about four different categories, or perhaps five. After having examined them with some care, the question is, what are we going to do about them? Out of the 163 cases there are about thirty-three in which the parties have not shown good faith with respect to alleged marriages; that is the opinion of the law officers of the department. There are about sixteen that could be remedied for the future by the pensioner and his alleged wife going through a form of marriage, provided the Pension Act were amended to permit such marriage. There are about forty-three cases in which the onus of proof may lie with the pension commission, all parties having submitted evidence of a prima facie valid marriage; and in addition there are twenty-five cases which might possibly be considered in this class, making a total of sixty-eight.

Just what the ultimate action will be in regard to these cases I do not know. There are several suggestions, made by the law officers of the Department of Justice, which have not been fully considered and I have not had an opportunity of bringing them to the attention of the minister of the department and of my other colleagues in the government. I merely mention what I have to show the progress that has been made so far.

Mr. RALSTON: I added together the numbers the minister gave, and I took the report to include 117 cases out of 163.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not desire to go into the various groups because we may have to change the wording somewhat. In group 1 there are twenty-five definite cases.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the minister reversing the order? Twenty-five happened to be the last figure he mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In subclause 1 of group 1 there are twenty-five; in subclause 2 there are nineteen; in subclause 3 there are three. There is some distinction between them all. In group 2 they have placed definitely sixty-three; in group 3, eighteen; and in group 3 (a) there are nine cases. In group 4 there are nine cases which may be increased to thirty-two in all. I think they have dealt now with the whole 163 and divided them into four groups, some of which have had to be subdivided owing to particular circumstances that have arisen.

Mr. RALSTON: Accepting the minister's reservation, that the wording may be changed, it appears that there are sixteen out of 163 in which a new form of marriage, provided the statute were amended, would meet the situation. In forty-three the onus is on the commission, from which I take it at this stage that the marriages are presumed to be valid. There are twenty-five more that might be in that class. That makes, out of 163, eighty-four altogether in which it would appear that the parties have merits. I understood the minister to say that in thirty-three cases a want of good faith was shown.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are thirty-one in which the parties have not shown good faith with respect to the alleged marriages, in the opinion of the officers who examined the files.

Mr. RALSTON: I have taken the position, to which I adhere, that the cases I am particularly interested in, whether I know the persons or not, are cases in which the parties have lived together believing they were man and wife, and where the community recognized them as such; they have discharged the duties and responsibilities of married life, taking care of the children and the man supporting the woman; and the money which the country has paid has been devoted to the purpose for which it was intended. If there are cases in which good faith does not appear then I should say that at any rate they are the last cases to be looked after. I hope however that the Minister of Justice can go further—I quite understand the work involved—and give us some idea as to what might be proposed. I realize that he went some distance the other night in intimating his opinion, which he was careful to say was not the opinion of the government, that legislation would have to be provided and that these cases of good faith ought to be looked after. I want to urge not only upon the Minister of Justice but upon the Minister of Pensions and the government as well the opinion that it is absolutely necessary, in decency and propriety, for this country to look after these cases. I do not believe we can afford to have the board of pension commissioners bastardize children or call people adulterers who have lived together in circumstances in which the community is recognizing them as man and wife. It is an unfortunate situation that has arisen, and we in this house should do all we can to correct it as soon as possible. That is all I say at the moment.

There is something else however which I want to say to the Minister of Pensions with regard to the way in which the undertaking given by the Prime Minister has been carried out, at least in some instances. I brought this to the minister's attention and I do not think he will want me to put it on record. The Prime Minister made a statement in this house, and I have every reason to accept his words absolutely at their face value because I believe he meant them. He said that those pensions would be restored where they had been taken away without notice—in all cases. That will be found at page 538.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Did he say in all cases?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, he made no exceptions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understood that an arbitrary date was fixed—all cases arising since the 1st of February, 1933.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the Minister of Justice is quite right in saying that there was such an understanding. I do not think it is mentioned in the Prime Minister's statement, but everyone understood that that was what he was referring to. I have therefore no objection to that reservation being made. But we were dealing particularly with marriage cases in which there was alleged invalidity of marriage, and other cases were included in which the pension had been reduced in cases where there should have been a hearing.

Mr. VENIOT: I asked him if those were included and I understood they were.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the ex-Postmaster General asked the Prime Minister that and he received that answer. The other day I came across a case which made the hair stand up on the back of my neck a little. I found the board of pension commissioners writing back to a man who had had his pension cut off in order to repay alleged overpayments, and what they wrote him was that the Prime Minister's statement referred only to cases where there had been a marriage, "and in your case," they said, "there was not a marriage." I understood the Prime Minister's statement to refer to any case in which the cancellation or withholding of the pension was due to the question having been raised as to the validity of the marriage or as to the legality of the state in which husband and wife were living. Yet this officer of the board of pension commissioners writes back to say, "Well, the Prime Minister's statement referred only to marriages and did not have reference to your case, because there was no marriage." The point about the board of pension commissioners' objection to paying the pension was that the marriage was not valid; in other words, that there was no marriage. And they were saying, "In your case there was no ceremony and therefore the Prime Minister's statement does not apply." I brought the matter to the attention of the minister. I shall not give the name, but the minister has it. We found that he, an old man living in Toronto, had sent in to the board of pension commissioners in 1917 a form setting forth the name and date of birth of the child, and that that had been acknowledged under date of October 18, 1917, by the board. On June 27, 1918, the board sent him this letter:

> I have the honour, by direction, to return herewith your certificate of marriage, the same having been perused is no longer required by this commission.

They continued to pay him pension until 1932 or 1933, when they discovered that his wife had been married before. They asked for a statement as to the death of the previous husband, and, being unable to get it, cut off his pension and charged him with a lot of back pension. A reference to the file will show that what the man did was to send to them, in good faith and aboveboard, as he says, a statement of the facts: he told them he had not gone through a church marriage, but he had cuttings from a newspaper, "Answers to Correspondents" saying that under certain circumstances where parties constantly live together as husband and wife—called marriages of habit and repute—that is a good marriage. He had that from a newspaper, I think the Glasgow Herald. He also had a statement from the newspaper that promise of marriage followed by consummation on the faith of the promise was sufficient. He said that under these circumstances they considered themselves married. They had sent to Glasgow the report of the birth of their daughter in 1917, and enclosed a clipping showing the birth. He sent in the certificate he had previously forwarded to the board, which turned out to be the certificate which they had acknowledged in the letter I have just read and which apparently had been signed by the two of them, believing that that was sufficient to constitute a marriage. This was the paper acknowledged by the board as a certificate of marriage in 1918. They had accepted it; and if the Minister of National Defence were in his place I think he would appreciate this, because he brought up a case the other night of the board of pension commissioners having accepted proof of marriage for years and years and then repudiating it. They had accepted this, had gone on paying him, and then suddenly stopped his pension and claimed over payments. He wrote me a letter in which he said:

> You will note we were married by consent and licence only.

And he said that they had been entirely aboveboard in connection with the whole matter, and had advised the board of pension commissioners that they did not go through a clerical ceremony. The board of pension commissioners, notwithstanding the undertaking of the Prime Minister, deliberately wrote to that man and told him in effect that the Prime Minister's undertaking did not apply to him. This is the letter, dated April 10, 1934:

Reference is made to your communication of April 2, referring to a statement made by the hon. the Prime Minister to the effect that all additional pension should be restored in cases where the validity of a marriage is in question. This refers only to persons who have actually contracted marriage.

According to the records of this commission you have at no time contracted marriage with the person with whom you are now residing and under such circumstances the commissioners have no authority under the act to award additional pension.

And this notwithstanding the fact that the board in 1918 had seen and acknowledged the certificate of marriage that he sent in at that time, and had been paying him ever since. My information from those who know this man in Toronto is that the community regard these people as man and wife; there has never been a breath of suspicion as to that, yet the board of pension commissioners not only refuse to recognize the marriage but even refuse to recognize the undertaking of the Prime Minister. It is annoying and irritating, when the Prime Minister has attempted to give this country and the ex-service men the assurance which he was honestly giving and which I know he fully intends to carry out, to have the board of pension commissioners writing chiseling letters of that kind to detract from the undertaking.

Mr. GUTHRIE: While one cannot say definitely what was in the mind of the Prime Minister, from the language I heard him use my own judgment is that the case my hon. friend refers to is one of those which he intended should be included in the statement he made. But whether in his mind he would exclude a case of that kind I cannot say.

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister said on page 538 of Hansard:

Might I say to the hon. gentleman that the government has already determined, as I indicated in part this afternoon, that in all those cases where men's pensions were taken from them without notice, they should be restored. That has been decided. The method by which it is to be done, whether by legislation or otherwise, is a matter on which I ventured to ask the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) about to-day. I believe under the provisions of the Relief Act we may be able to accomplish it. It is proposed to be done if it can.

[Mr. Ralston.]

In most of the cases I know about, except these few, that has been done; the Prime Minister has found a way to do it. I need hardly say it is not the Prime Minister I am blaming. What I do complain of is this disposition to irritate people and be as niggardly as possible in connection with a matter as to which I think we should be fairly generous.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I clear up a few of these points? First there is a difference of opinion about the date, February 1, 1933.

Mr. RALSTON: Back to what date does the minister say the Prime Minister's undertaking applies?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am not submitting my view. I have said that these matters were referred to the Department of Justice. I have drawn attention to the statements made by the Prime Minister in the house, and the Minister of Justice, so that an interpretation and decision may be given on that point. I have views about it, but I am not making the decision.

As to what is to be done, I believe that these marriage cases will finally—it is evidently going to take some time—be disposed of in a fairly satisfactory way. I have not said by legislation or by what means, but my present view is that this matter will be satisfactorily dealt with.

Meanwhile it seems to me that we are overlooking the condition at the present time. With only one or two exceptions that I know of, these cases are now receiving their pay and allowances. They are not suffering during the interval because their pensions have been restored and the arrears restored. So that while it is desirable to have the matter settled as soon as possible, in the meantime their pensions are being paid the same as they ever were.

Mr. NEILL: If ultimately the decision is against them, would they not have to repay the money?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is an open question.

Mr. MacLAREN: I did not hear the question.

Mr. NEILL: Suppose when their cases are heard again the decision goes against them, will they be asked to repay the money they have received since their pensions were restored?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course they will.

Mr. MacLAREN: That will have to be determined later. I presume many of them would not be able to repay it in any case. But I am pointing out that the pensions are going on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In all cases?

Mr. MacLAREN: With the exception of, I think, one case, or two. Therefore do not let us overdo the grievance part, because the pensions are being continued until the matter is properly settled.

I want to refer to one or two other matters. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was under the impression that I said that the reduction of pensions was due to the small pensioners being readmitted. I wish to correct that, because I did not say it. What I said was that the average amount of pensions is reduced largely through the admission of those. I do not think the figures are of any great value, as I said before, but I am trying to meet the objections that are made by returned men and in the press. They frequently say the average is reduced, and I quite agree, but I say that in large measure, though not wholly, the explanation lies in the small pensions that have been granted in very large numbers, which naturally reduce the average amount. I believe if the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth will look into the figures he will agree with me.

There are many other factors, of course. The pensions may be reduced by the pension commission, though that is not a great factor in regard to the average. Another reason is that the very severe cases are dying off more rapidly, and some of the very large pensions are not being paid. The hon. member for Gloucester referred to the dependent whose pension was increased, and in whose behalf he had communicated with the board. I must be fair, and I must say that I do not think the pension commission are respecters of persons, so I do not believe the increase was due to the representations of the hon. member for Gloucester as such. He knew these people, as he said to-night, and I have no doubt he represented to the commission that he had personal knowledge. Is that not the sort of thing to which the commission should listen? I think it is.

There is only one other point, and that is in reference to assessments. There is no appeal in reference to assessments; they lie wholly with the pension commission. There are differences of opinion in that regard and I might as well tell you what my opinion is. I think it would be impossible for the administration of pensions to go on if there were appeals from assessments. There is enough difficulty now, and it would be increased I do not know how greatly if an appeal was permitted from each individual assessment.

Mr. RALSTON: I only spoke of dependents' cases, which would be only a small portion.

Mr. MacLAREN: While there is no appeal —and I hope the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth will listen to me on this point— from assessments, whether with regard to dependents or returned men, there is substantially an appeal that is constantly made. That is by means of making further representations to the pension commission, whether by way of new evidence or new material of any kind, and assessments are increased when good cases are made out.

Mr. POWER: In beginning his remarks the minister made some reference to clearing up this question of the marriage cases. Without wishing in any way to be disagreeable I should like to point out to the committee that the minister has not cleared up the issue in any way. He started by saying there was some disagreement as to the date at which we should begin to review these marriage cases, but surely the minister would not wish to pin down the Prime Minister to any definite date. I would imagine, as I think every hon. member knows who listened to the Prime Minister, that the right hon. gentleman wished to go into all these cases where there was some discussion as to the validity of a marriage. I cannot conceive it to have been the intention of the Prime Minister that because some such case arose on January 25, 1933, it could not be taken into consideration but that another case that arose on February 1 could be considered. To my mind the minister does not do himself justice when he tells the committee that there is some difference of opinion as to when we should begin. Surely there is no room for difference of opinion if it is the policy of the government to review these cases and to examine into the bona fides of each case. I think perhaps the minister did not give sufficient consideration to that point when he referred to that difference of opinion.

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, I said there was a difference of opinion.

Mr. POWER: And it was so serious that the minister in charge of the department, the man who is administering this department, would not express an opinion. I know his goodness of heart and I am quite sure that personally he would be of the opinion that all these cases should be looked into, whether they occurred on January 1 or February 1, as from the date this review started and the board of pension commissioners took it into their heads to examine into the civil status and the morals of those who were in receipt of pensions.

I wish to appeal to the minister, to the committee and to the government, because probably this is the last occasion this session when this matter can come up, to pass legislation dealing with these cases. In this attempt to clear up the matter the minister says these people have no complaint, that they are drawing their pensions. There is no security in the world that they will continue to draw their pensions. I do not know yet under what authority they are being paid now. It was suggested that they might be paid under the relief act, but I do not know under what authority they are being paid. In any case it is only a temporary expedient and cannot last beyond this session unless a special order in council is passed under the relief act. Even that will not give security to these pensioners; as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni has pointed out, they are only getting deeper in the hole. You are paying their pensions now, but one, two or three months hence it may be decided by someone —I do not know by whom, because apparently there is no legislation to cover the case—that they are not entitled to these pensions, and they will only have to give back the money. The minister points out that these cases may take a year to review, and that those in foreign countries may take two years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; the pension board say they may not be able to send them over for a year.

Mr. POWER: That is worse still. The pension board say they may not get the cases to the Department of Justice for a year, but as one of my hon. friends points out, they must know a great deal about those cases. The pensions were cut off, and I have not the slightest doubt that they must have received a very large number of letters protesting against this arbitrary treatment. It seems to me there must be a certain amount of deliberate delay on the part of the commission. Anyone who will endeavour to split hairs—as the pension commissioners did in the letter just read by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, in which they say that because these people did not enter into a contract of marriage their case does not come within the number mentioned by the Prime Minister—anyone who will take a step of that kind and write such an evasive letter will take a year or two years or five years, I have no doubt.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But they are being paid in the meantime.

Mr. POWER: Yes, but what security have these people that they are going to continue to be paid? How do they know that if there should be a change of government and someone less big hearted than the Prime Minister came into power, they would be paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are begging the question.

Mr. POWER: Another prime minister might say, "I am not bound by the decisions of a former prime minister"—because there are a great many of his decisions which I am sure would not bind hon. members on this side of the house. These pensioners have absolutely no security. They are not sure of getting the pension next month, the month after or the month after that. It seems to me that the only logical thing for us to do is to straighten out the whole matter by passing legislation at this session. I do not want legislation which will admit to pension people who are acting in bad faith. I have spent enough time on pensions in this House of Commons during the last sixteen or seventeen years, and so far as I know I have never endeavoured to bring within our pension legislation anyone who was not entitled to it.

Before taking my seat I should like to ask the minister whether or not any action was taken with respect to the Ouellette case. He will remember that last year the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and myself drew his attention to a category of cases—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Disputed cases.

Mr. POWER: Yes, seven disputed cases. One was that Skitch case, which has since been decided by the appeal court. Another was the Ouellette case, and I do not remember the others. I do know that we had a lengthy discussion in the house with regard to these cases, and the minister gave us the assurance that they would be taken up and something would be done about them. So far as I know the Skitch case was the only one which has been decided. I shall not take the time of the house to read the decision of the court of appeal, but in their observations and in their judgment their remarks respecting the board of pension commissioners were far from complimentary. They said that these were cases which should never have been allowed to drag so long. The Skitch case began in 1923, and from that time dragged on through the courts. It ran between the federal appeal board, the board of pension commissioners, the tribunal, and the appeal court, year after year. Finally the man who was entitled to pension died, and his widow obtained the pension. The Ouellette case is somewhat similar. It was a case in which the board of pension commissioners challenged the jurisdiction of the federal appeal board. When the federal appeal board was challenged these cases were left in the air. Some went to the exchequer court, and that court sent them back to the pension appeal court. So far as I know nothing has been done with them and for ten years they have been hanging fire. I would suggest that the minister should get some information to give the committee on that point.

I wish also to support the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth in his observations with respect to the proceedings of the auditor general. I find in a report of the special committee on pensions and returned soldiers problems which sat in 1930 that the members of the committee, of which the minister was one and the Minister of Railways and Canals was another, protested vigorously against any assumption by the auditor general that he could act as a kind of appeal court from the board of pension commissioners. At that time it was brought to the notice of the committee by the returned soldiers' organizations, by Lieutenant Colonel Lafleche and others that the auditor general had been going into the department and to all intents and purposes had been reviewing cases. The reference is to be found at page 179 of the report. At that time the intervention had not gone very far, but considerable indignation had been expressed by members of the committee. I regret to learn that the auditor general has taken it upon himself again to intervene in matters of pensions. It was pointed out before this committee, as has been pointed out to-night in committee of the whole house, that the auditor general does not interfere with decisions of the exchequer court or of the supreme court, and he has no more right to interfere with decisions made by the board of pension commissioners. The board of pension commissioners were appointed to act independently of parliament in rendering decisions. They were to act independently of the minister, and were supposed to have the widest possible powers to deal with matters of pensions. I protest against the auditor general trying to arrogate to himself the power to overrule decisions of what, after all, is the competent court to deal with such matters.

Mr. MacLAREN: I must confess that I am not familiar with the Ouellette case, but shall make inquiries.

Mr. POWER: There are six other cases in the same category.

Mr. MacLAREN: I know that the Skitch case has been disposed of.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has not yet been disposed of.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member for Quebec South has said that I should give an opinion. I do not think I should. I have been doing just what the hon. member for Quebec South would have done if he had been acting under similar circumstances. What is the position? All these marriage cases are being referred to the Department of Justice and to the minister of that department for the purpose of obtaining an opinion. From that department an opinion will come. But can one suppose that the minister of the Department of Pensions should give an opinion of his own, in the meantime?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, certainly.

Mr. POWER: Certainly.

Mr. MacLAREN: Not at all.

Mr. POWER: Absolutely.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is impossible. The matter has been referred to the Department of Justice, because the question as to legality or otherwise is one which should be decided by that department.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister said not.

Mr. MacLAREN: It has been referred for that purpose, and in the meantime it is clearly my duty to wait until we have heard from the Department of Justice.

Mr. POWER: I will just say one word in reply to the minister. He has asked me what I would have done. I would say to him that I would never have allowed this matter to come before the house. The very minute I heard that the board of pension commissioners were interpreting the Pensions Act in such way as to deprive people entitled to pensions of their just rights—people in situations such as have been described by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth—and when I found that the board of pension commissioners were bastardizing people throughout this country and stating that people who had been living together for years were living in adultery, I would have taken steps to meet the situation and to have legislation passed. That is what any other minister would have done; every time a case came before him and he found he had no authority to act, when clearly the interests of justice demanded that the case should be dealt with, he came before the committee of the house, explained the case to the members, and in every instance the thing was passed unanimously. It is not the business of the Department of Justice; it is the business of the Department of Pensions and National Health, and the business of the minister of that department. If this act is being badly administered by the board of pension commissioners; if the board find that they have not the power to do thus and so, or if the act does not permit them to do thus and so, when it is brought to the attention of the minister, if it is a clear case of injustice such as this, it is his duty to come to parliament and get remedial legislation.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me read what the Minister of Justice himself said:

> I fully realize the difficulty which has been so well stated by my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), and at the present time I cannot see what advantage is going to result from a reference to the Department of Justice in regard to these cases.

The Minister of Justice realizes fully what the situation is. Let me press on the minister what is the remedy and what should be done.

Mr. MacLAREN: Which minister?

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Pensions. He says that he is referring these cases to the Department of Justice. Let me suggest that he stop referring them to the Department of Justice and ask the Minister of Justice to do what he has done to-night, give him a cross-section of the cases already there. I think 160 cases will represent a fair sample of all the cases there are, and in those cases the Minister of Pensions will I think find type cases of every difficulty which has arisen. Then let the Minister of Pensions bring down legislation to cover the good faith cases, and he will not have to refer any more of these cases to the Department of Justice. He will get that legislation through parliament in a day or less than a day, for I know members on both sides will support it. That is the way, I submit to my hon. friend, to administer the department. I quite understand that he is not deciding for the board, but if the board say they want legislation, and if the minister feels he is helpless and is simply referring these cases to the Department of Justice, let him take the board at its word and say: You want legislation; here it is. And it will be passed unanimously by the house. I say that the minister has all the information now, or can get all the information he wants in regard to these cases from the Minister of Justice. The minister nods his head.

Mr. MacLAREN: Not all of them.

Mr. RALSTON: With deference I am not going to take that from the minister. He has thirty-one cases in which there is no good faith. He has sixteen cases in which a new marriage would cure the difficulty; forty-three cases in which the onus is on the commission, and twenty-five cases to practically the same effect. He has divided them into Group 1, Group 1A, Group 2 and Group 2A, with most meticulous care. He has an excellent cross-section now, samples of all the cases that can be submitted. Why not then have legislation? Why go through this pitiful procedure of filtering these cases through to the Department of Justice, and have the board make a laughing stock of us all by writing us letters to the effect: "We are sending you a few more cases to-day, and it will be the end of the year before we shall be finished, and after that we have to look after the cases which are outside the country." That is simply delaying the thing and making everybody look ridiculous. This is a case that demands attention. The Minister of Pensions and the Minister of Justice are right in saying that these men are receiving pensions at the present time except in the cases I have mentioned. The board can send out a notice to-morrow for these men to come up for review, and the minute they come up for review they can charge up to them the extra pension they have been paying them in the last few weeks since the Prime Minister's undertaking has been made good. The position in which these ex-service men are now is not the position in which the Prime Minister and the government want to place them. Why not deal with the situation manfashion, and get it cleaned up? That is the reason we are asking the minister to give us some assurance now in regard to legislation because, as has already been mentioned, this is probably the last opportunity that we shall have of discussing pension matters unless a special occasion is made for the purpose, and we all want to expedite a matter of this kind in every possible way.

Mr. STANLEY: I wish to refer to the matter of the auditor general insinuating himself into the question of entitlement. What is the relation of the auditor general to the board in connection with entitlement? Has he the power to inject himself as a judge, an intermediate judge, as it were, into these cases, or has the board of pension commissioners requested him to come into the picture? I have had several of these cases brought to my attention, and in not a single case could I see where the auditor general could have any capacity to determine whether the claimant was entitled to the pension he was receiving. One particular case which is in my mind very distinctly is that of a soldier who returned disabled from overseas in 1918. He was granted pension immediately upon his arrival and received pension continuously ever since till early in 1934, for sixteen years or thereabouts after his return, when he was cut off because the auditor general stepped in and said he did not consider the man was entitled. When I mention the nature of the disability the minister himself will understand the difficulty in determining entitlement under those conditions. It is a case of double hernia, one of the most difficult and embarrassing cases which come before workmen's compensation boards in the provinces for determination.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me? A disability of that kind is not in the table of disabilities, is it?

Mr. STANLEY: No.

Mr. RALSTON: And it has to be assessed by a doctor's opinion?

Mr. STANLEY: Yes, and it was so assessed, but the auditor general, according to the communcation which was passed on to me, injected himself or some of his officials into the case and replaced the medical man, setting himself up as an authority on questions of this kind. As I said, it is one of the most embarrassing and difficult questions which experts and referees for workmen's compensation boards have to determine. Yet the auditor general decided promptly to cut the man off and he has received no pension since. Personally I think it was a piece of arrogant insolence or insolent arrogance for the auditor general to inject himself into a case of that kind in that way, and I would like to hear the minister say that so far as he knows the department had nothing to do with it. Certainly the board of pension commissioners should make certain that in respect to the question of entitlement at least, the auditor general should not replace the medical experts of the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to emphasize one point, and that is that those of us on this side of the house would like to have the assurance from the minister to-night that the government will during the present session take definite action to ensure a permanent solution of this problem. Personally I appreciate, and I think everyone does, the action that was taken by the Prime Minister as indicated in his declaration of the thirteenth day of February, and I assure the minister that that action is appreciated by all the ex-service men throughout the dominion. But speaking for myself I do not so strongly appreciate the attitude taken by the Minister of Pensions. The Minister of Justice has been very candid in delineating the various cases coming before the Department of Justice, and I submit to the Minister of Pensions that he has now sufficient information in his possession upon which to base legislation for an immediate and permanent solution of this problem. I am not prepared now or at any other time to permit this item to go through until we have a declaration from the Minister of Pensions that it is the intention of the government to effect a solution of this problem by legislation, if necessary, during the present session. That is a fair statement of the situation. I think the minister can this evening get up and indicate to this committee that before this session is terminated the government will deal in a permanent way, by legislation if necessary, or otherwise with this very important problem.

Mr. MacLAREN: If a solution is not arrived at within a reasonable time, legislation will be introduced this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister give the committee an assurance that if a solution of a permanent nature is not reached during the present session, an opportunity will be afforded of discussing the matter even though this item is allowed to pass this evening? I do not wish to be deprived of the opportunity of raising the question and I want the assurance of the minister that we will have an opportunity some time before the session is terminated to discuss it in its entirety.

Mr. MacLAREN: I promise the committee that an opportunity will be given if it is found necessary again to raise the question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have reason to hope that a solution will be found in the very near future, but, as I intimated some weeks ago, it may be that we will have to resort to legislation. If that becomes necessary, we certainly shall do so.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am glad to hear the statements of the Minister of Pensions and National Health and the Minister of Justice. They obviate the necessity of my saying some things which I had intended to say. In common with other members of the committee, particularly with those who have worked on the pension committees from year to year during the last twelve to fourteen years, I have had many cases of this type drawn to my attention. As I read the statements of the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister made some weeks ago—unfortunately I was not present in the house—I realize the difficulties referred to by the Minister of Justice. It may be that if the law is strictly interpreted, and the Department of Justice must do that, in many cases the decision will be against the pensioner, that is, that the marriages were not actually legal. I agree with the Minister of Justice that there are many cases where the marriages were not valid when considered according to the strict letter of the law, but in common decency and in common equity these cases should be treated as though the marriages were valid. In many cases the parties thought they were married; they married in good faith. Sometimes a death was assumed or a divorce had been granted in another country which was not valid here. Legislation of some sort may be necessary in order to cover these points. I had intended bringing a few cases before the committee but I shall not do so in view of the promise made by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

While I am on my feet I should like to add my word to what has been said as to the jurisdiction assumed by the auditor general. As has been stated, the committee of 1930 understood that it was the duty and responsibility of the auditor general to examine pension payments to make certain that the amounts paid conformed to the decisions rendered. But we found that the auditor general had constituted himself as a sort of appeal court to decide questions of entitlement, of diagnosis, as to whether a pension should have been granted or as to whether a disability was attributable. The committee resented this very keenly and I think the pension commissioners did also. It was our understanding that in view of the strong expression of unanimous opinion, that practice would come to an end. I regret extremely that the practice still remains. As a matter of fact, I have had evidence that it still continues. I know of cases where pensions have been discontinued because such decisions have been made.

There is one other point with which I should like to deal, the policy of reductions in pensions. I wholly accept the minister's statement that it is not the policy of the government or of the department to reduce pensions. However, there is a firm conviction in the minds of a great many returned men, a conviction which I share after having perused many of the files and discussed many of the cases, that in many instances this is the policy of the pension commission. Two or three years ago whenever a pensioner appealed to me stating that his disability was increasing and his pension had become inadequate, I always made an effort to have a reboarding. I felt that as a result of a reboarding his pension would be increased, but during the past two or three years I have been very reluctant to advise a reboarding, no matter how obvious the case appeared to me. My experience and that of others has been that in many cases the reboarding ended in a reduction of pension no matter what was the condition of the man. Barring the weaknesses in relation to disputed marriages, I believe we have as good a pension act as there is in any country. I doubt whether it needs to be amended, but I do think a little more sympathetic consideration and wider interpretation should be given in many cases. As the result of the general feeling in parliament and the almost unanimous expression of opinion by the convention of returned men held here not very long ago, I hope some changes will be made along these lines.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me say just one more word in connection with the case I referred to previously. I want to emphasize the desirability of having dependents' pensions appealable. I realize the difficulty in having the amounts of pensions appealable in disability cases, but I refer particularly to the cases of fathers and mothers, where you have to decide the financial condition, whether the son would have supported them had he lived, whether the son was supporting them when he was alive and whether there would be what they call prospective dependency. It seems to me that these things should not be left entirely to an investigator. I have the file of the case to which I referred a little while ago, that of two old people who have two sons dead in France. I think their case points what I am trying to show. At the time these boys were last home on leave they persuaded their parents to purchase a little home and assured them they would assign $20 a month. The boys lasted just one year in France, both being killed. The result was that the parents had to borrow money in order to pay for their little place. They are now lamenting the fact that their future is mortgaged to the extent of $300—it is a pitiful case—and in addition they had to borrow $100 last winter in order to provide groceries and fuel. Yet these people are receiving from this country only $10 a month. As I said before, the award was originally $20 but according to the file that figure was struck out by some kind-hearted person and the figure "10" put in its place. If the board of pension commissioners cannot do any better than that, there should be an appeal. If the minister is considering legislation, I think appeals should be provided for in dependent cases.

Mr. MacLAREN: Before the discussion on this item concludes, and in order that there may be no misapprehension, I should like to say a word as to the auditor general. The auditor general was not invited to come to the department or to the pension commission and take part in arriving at decisions as regards disability and assessments. But it must be remembered that he has a duty in connection with the department and the commission, as he has with all departments. He goes beyond that, however; he is going beyond it, and personally I cannot concur in that action where I think he exceeds the functions we should consider sufficient and all that is justifiable. That is something I have recognized and I propose, so far as I am able, that the matter shall be taken up in responsible quarters to see what can be done.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Can the minister tell me how many public sittings have been held by a quorum of the new Canadian pension commission since the last amendment came into effect, and after the tribunal was dissolved? I ask that question because at the time that amendment was passed there was a difference of opinion as to the possibility of a commission of that size dealing adequately with public hearings. When the tribunals were in active service, four and five quorums were sitting at all times in different parts of the country, and it was doubted whether the commission would be able to deal with the situation. That is why I ask the minister whether he can give me the full number of public hearings held by quorums of the commission since the new act came into force.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have not the figures. I think that question was on the order paper not long ago and the figures can be found. If not I know that they are obtainable and will let the hon. member have them.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment relief, $2,100,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister leave one item open in his department?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am willing to leave any item open if the hon. member will indicate one.

Mr. POWER: I suggest that you leave unemployment relief, item 185, which is a large item.

Mr. MacLAREN: Very well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the understanding that we may discuss any item under it.

Item stands.

War veterans' allowances, $1,650,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): During this session we have been criticizing several items in the department administered by the minister. I wish now to say a word of personal commendation with regard to the administration of the war veterans' allowance committee. Personally I can say that in a number of cases which I have brought to their attention I have received nothing but the greatest courtesy and consideration on behalf of those who thought they were qualified for entitlement under its administration. I wish to commend the committee heartily and especially its chairman for the wonderful work being done.

Mr. POWER: I am not quite sure that the sum devoted to it should not be increased. As I remember the discussions that took place in committee with respect to war veterans' allowances—and I know the minister must recall it—we were given the impression that for a number of years at least the amount expended on war veterans' allowances would increase. I got the impression at the time that there would be a rather steady increase until about 1945, as the returned soldiers reached the age of sixty and came within the purview of the act, but apparently it has not worked out that way—

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, it has.

Mr. POWER: —and I should like to know what the explanation is.

Mr. MacLAREN: First of all may I say to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre how pleasant it is to hear words of commendation with regard to an organization which I know is doing its work very well. The vote for last year and the present year as well may not indicate an increased expenditure, but the fact is that the expenditure has increased, and I shall be pleased to send the hon. member a statement showing the amount actually spent. I think he will see that there has been an increase. But there is something more than that, because I expect that I shall have to come to the house again for a supplementary estimate. I am advised by the committee that they expect me to put in a supplementary this year.

Mr. POWER: May I join with my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre in paying tribute to the manner in which the War Veterans' Allowance Act has been administered. I do so with perhaps greater pleasure in that personally I was one of those who, when this act was first introduced, did not believe it would work. I am pleased to admit that I had not a proper appreciation of how well a government board could function. The War Veterans' Allowance Act was introduced in 1930 by Doctor King, then Minister of Pensions and National Health, and I do not think any bill introduced during that session met such a storm of abuse and opposition. But strange as it may seem, it is perhaps the only piece of soldier legislation which has ever been put before this house during the past fifteen years that has been an unqualified success. The opposition of the day, and a great many on the government side, did not believe that the act could possibly operate properly. A good many of us did not believe in the principle of it. Before the committee objections were made against it. But, largely owing I think to the tact and ability it has shown and to the fact that it has been let severely alone, the board has received praise from all sides; I think there has hardly been a convention of the war veterans' associations or of the legion at which resolutions complimentary to this board have not been passed. I think we should say these things and give some credit to Doctor King on whose initiative the legislation was placed on our statutes. Doctor King was often severely criticized the same as the minister who is at present carrying on the affairs of the department; the opposition to his estimates was always very energetic, but I think it must be some consolation to him that he did put on the statute books one piece of legislation which is generally recognized as being sound.

Mr. MacLAREN: Perhaps when my distinguished predecessor was criticized it was no more deserved than in the case of the present minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A home run.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am pleased to hear this said about my predecessor, because naturally I have seen a good many instances of the kindly and benevolent spirit in which he administered the department; it has been an example to me. Further let me say that this legislation I understand did not proceed from a committee. It is a valuable lesson to have that where one wants a great many things done well one should do them and not go to a committee. Then in reference to this allowance, there is a point which has not been mentioned but which comes under my observation: an advantage in connection with the war veterans' allowances is that it results in a decrease in the number of cases that go to hospital. It gives a comfort to them, and they prefer staying at home.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to say a word regarding this act. I am expecting, and I think probably the minister is expecting, that it will not be long before the provisions of this act will have to be somewhat widened. The War Veteranss Allowance Act was designed to take the place of all the schemes and plans which had been put forward along the lines of soldiers' homes and care of soldiers and burnt out veterans, that is those suffering from something other than war disability, old soldiers whom the country did not want to see on the street. The principal provisions are, first, that any old soldier in need gets old age pension ten years earlier than other citizens; second, that a soldier who is permanently unemployable gets an allowance, and third, that one who is getting a small pension will have it supplemented. It is the provision as to "permanently unemployable" that seems to me may have to be extended before long. Whether a man is permanently unemployable depends of course on the judgment of medical men. But as they get older it seems to me the country will have to give much more attention to these men who have served overseas, who may not be suffering from war disability but whom the country wants to see taken care of. I would ask the minister and his officers to give consideration to the possibility of extending that provision, perhaps making it less rigorous as far as unemployability is concerned, with the idea of taking care of a greater number of men. It would be good business economically to do it; he will not have as many applying for hospital care and meritorious or compassionate allowances if they are paid something from the treasury of the country and kept self-respecting.

I join with my hon. friends in what they have said in regard to the administration of the board. In my experience it has been uniformly good. That does not mean that all applications have been granted by any means, but that there has been sympathetic attitude and wisdom and soundness in the board's actions which has reflected credit on their administration and been most satisfactory to those interested in the problems of ex-service men.

Mr. MacLAREN: I may say to the committee that what the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has just referred to in regard to the care of men with chronic disabilities, old soldiers, is being developed, and has been in course of development for the last few years. It is getting on slowly, not in the way of building soldiers' homes just now, but the men are encouraged to come into hospitals and make their homes there on a certain financial arrangement. When that becomes a little more recognized and developed I think it will mean that in the future there will be soldiers' homes for many of the men.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Monday, May 7, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house the report of George A. Touche and Company, chartered accountants, on their audit of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways for the year ending December 31, 1933, which is required to be made annually to parliament under the provisions of the bill passed last year. This report is in English and in French and will be submitted to the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the order for motions:

Mr. SPEAKER: When the house adjourns to-night at eleven o'clock by mutual consent it will remain adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at four o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—CANADA'S MEMBERSHIP

Mr. DORION:

1. How long has Canada been a member of the League of Nations?
2. What has been the cost for each year, including the year ended March 31, 1934, of Canada's membership therein?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Canada has been a member of the League of Nations since 1919.
2. Cost of Canada's membership in League of Nations, including Canada's contribution to the League of Nations—maintenance of office of Canadian advisory officer—expenses delegates to assembly, international labour conference, and other league conferences—cost of publications and grant to Canadian League of Nations Society—

*JACQUES CARTIER COMPANY

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Is the government undertaking any inquiry into the Jacques Cartier Company?
2. If so, will the report resulting from such inquiry be tabled in the house?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to that question, so far as the present is concerned, is no.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RELIEF WORK—DORCHESTER

Mr. GAGNON:

For a copy of all the correspondence, letters, telegrams, schedules, accounts and any other documents exchanged between the federal government, the Minister of Labour, the deputy minister, and all employees of the said department, and the Quebec provincial government, especially with the Quebec Prime Minister, the Quebec Minister of Public Works, the Quebec Minister of Labour, the deputy minister of the said Quebec department, and other Quebec provincial employees, with respect to relief work carried on in the county of Dorchester, under the relief unemployment act of the years 1932-1933.

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. HANBURY (for Mr. Ahearn):

For a return showing:—

1. The total number of employees of the Department of the Interior retired since the 7th August, 1930.
2. The number of such employees who were on the permanent inside service at Ottawa.
3. The number of such employees who were permanent and employed outside of Ottawa.
4. The number of such employees who were temporary and employed at Ottawa.
5. The number of such employees who were temporary and employed outside of Ottawa.
6. The total amount of the superannuation allowances being paid to such employees who were employed at Ottawa.
7. The total amount of superannuation allowances being paid to such employees employed outside of Ottawa.
8. The total number of the retired permanent employees at Ottawa who have obtained permanent positions in other departments at same salaries.
9. The total amount of the annuities now being paid, under superannuation acts, to civil employees of the federal government, who were required, since 7th August, 1930, to accept superannuation, before they had reached the age of compulsory retirement which, under the present superannuation act, is 70 years.

TRADE WITH JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this morning the press gives emphasis to a dispatch from Great Britain to the effect that the British government has announced that in certain eventualities restrictions will be placed upon Japanese goods coming into all parts of the empire, and that this policy has been decided upon as the result of agreement with the colonies and of consultation with the dominions. Personally I assume that the report is not accurate, but I think it should be corrected immediately and therefore I would ask the Prime Minister if there has been any correspondence with the British government pertaining to the restriction of Japanese trade with Canada.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There has been none of which I am aware. I thank the right hon. gentleman for directing attention to the matter, because the words of the message would indicate that whoever wrote it had an entirely erroneous understanding of the situation as far as Canada is concerned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister again, with regard to the further legislation to be introduced, if any progress has been made with the elections act. There was one unmentionable act, or at least one that could not previously be referred to. I wonder if the Prime Minister is in a position to enlighten us to-day.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There is no untouchable legislation in this country as yet. I have gone over the draft of the proposed elections act with some care, and I think a proof will be ready tomorrow, in which event I will be able at least to afford the right hon. gentleman an opportunity of seeing it. The legislation to which reference was made is hardly properly described in the terms used by my right hon. friend, but I will make an announcement with respect to it one day this week. In the meantime I may say that in the last few days I have carefully read the proposed legislation.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, April 30, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the subamendment of Mr. Spencer.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a point of order concerning the amendment to the amendment moved on April 30, by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer). As Your Honour is aware an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) which appears at page 2445 of Hansard as follows:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.
> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

Then the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River is to be found at page 2676 of Hansard as follows:

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "that" and substituting therefore the following:

This house regrets that there is no indication in the budget that the government intends to take any action to put an end to the unnecessary suffering of our people arising out of the policy of financial deflation, unwise and inequitable tariff policies and economies which inevitably lead to restrictions on the production and distribution of wealth. Such policies are responsible for the present condition of poverty in the midst of plenty.

And further, that this house is of the opinion that the control of national credit, which by the constitution is vested in this parliament, should be exercised immediately by the government so as to:

Provide sufficient purchasing power to enable our people to "loosen their belts," and to take full advantage, as consumers, of their ability to produce;

Then follow four or five other paragraphs in the amendment to the amendment.

First of all I should like to draw the attention of the house to the votes and proceedings for January 31, 1934, when the following resolution was moved by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) and seconded by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer).

Whereas, the provision of an adequate medium of exchange through the issue and control of currency, is a fuction inherent in the state, and one which is wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and

Whereas, the transfer of this function to private interests to be used as a means of profit, rather than as a public service, has enabled those controlling finance to dominate every phase in the industrial and economic life of the nation, and

Whereas, the depressed and chaotic conditions which now prevail would indicate that this financial control, as at present exercised has proved itself detrimental to the best interests of the people of this country;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the reassumption of this responsibility, and the creation of a national system of credit and finance, to be controlled in the interests of all the people, and under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

I recall that upon that occasion the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) rose to a point of order, stating that the entire question had been referred in the present session to the standing committee on banking and commerce. He used the following words:

As we shall have to debate these matters later, why should we prolong this discussion in view of what has been said, when we know that when these bills reach this house they will be discussed, and when they reach the committee be discussed again at still greater length.

So, while I find myself to a very substantial degree in sympathy with the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River sitting to my left, I wish to raise this point of order: In the first place, in the amendment to the amendment I find these words: "suffering of our people arising out of the policy of financial deflation." That question has been specifically referred to the banking and commerce committee, as the result of a resolution by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

In the second place there is a reference to "unwise and inequitable tariff policies." That question is covered in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

The remaining part of the amendment to the amendment deals with the question of national credit, and I submit that question is at the present time being discussed by the standing committee on banking and commerce. Inasmuch as the substance of the amendment to the amendment is now before the committee on banking and commerce, the only other reference in regard to "inequitable tariff policies" I submit is embraced in the mention of "genuine nationalism" in the amendment itself.

For these reasons I therefore submit that as a result of the deliberations of the committee on banking and commerce ample opportunities will be afforded to the house to discuss in every detail the questions of national credit, because that question has been definitely submitted to the banking and commerce committee. For those reasons I submit with all respect that the present amendment to the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If no other hon. member wishes to speak to the point of order, I shall give my ruling. I am of the opinion that the objection to the subamendment is properly raised, as it seeks to deal with a matter already discussed at this session, and one which is at the present time referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce. I therefore find the subamendment to be out of order.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry, but I shall have to appeal against your ruling.

Mr. BENNETT: Did you decide it was out of order in whole or in part?

Mr. SPEAKER: A part being out of order I hold that the whole of it is out of order. That is my impression, on such short consideration. If the house would like me to reserve my decision, I shall do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: Otherwise I see no reason to alter it.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Séguin). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks I beg you to allow me to present to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in my name and that of the Liberal party in this house our most heartfelt sentiments of sympathy in his great bereavement. May the depth and sincerity of our feelings lighten to some extent, if possible, the sorrowfulness of his deep mourning.

When I adjourned the debate the other evening I was asking a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I was going to ask him about the statement which he made in speaking on the budget on April 23, 1934, as reported at page 2446 of Hansard:

> Personally I think that if gold is as necessary in the carrying on of our trade as everyone seems to imagine, the only permanent solution would be for the government to take over the gold mines. They could then keep the miners at work on a reasonable wage scale; they would then be able to collect this fortuitous gain instead of turning it over to private individuals.

The question I would ask my hon. friend is how is he going to proceed with the expropriation of our gold mines? I have studied very impartially the platform of the C.C.F. party and I observe that one of the main planks of their platform is the nationalization of our industries. But there are certain details of that policy of which it is only right that this house and the country should be seized, and especially when the leader of that party picks out a particular industry and says that he would nationalize it for certain reasons. What would be his procedure in nationalizing this particular industry? Would he nationalize only the mines that are on a dividend basis, or only those that are not paying their way at the present time or the whole of them.

He should also tell the house of the conflict that there might be between federal and provincial authorities if this question ever became an issue. The leader of the C.C.F. party must surely be aware of the fact that all the gold mines and for that matter all the mines of this country are primarily owned by the provinces, and that all the grants have been made and all the prospecting has been done or regulated by the provinces. What would be the attitude of the provinces on the nationalization of the gold mines of this country? It is a well-known fact that more good money has been spent in promoting gold mines than has ever been made out of them. What would be the procedure of the leader of the C.C.F. party then? Would he have this country embark upon an enterprise in which in a great many cases there would be failure before it ever got started. That is one of the things which this house and the country at large has a right to know.

The hon. gentleman must also be aware of the fact that even with the high price of gold to-day only fifteen or sixteen mines in this country are on a paying basis. If his party were in office and he were in power would he propound the expropriation of the gold mines and the nationalization of the gold mining industry? What would be his procedure? What attitude would he take to the mine owner, and on what basis would he award compensation to the owner and shareholders? These are things which the people have a right to know when such a statement is made in this house by an hon. member occupying such a high position in his party. As I stated a few moments ago, I have studied from an impartial standpoint the policies and planks of the platform of the C.C.F. party and I believe that the hon. member owes it to himself and to parliament to state definitely what mode of procedure he would take in expropriating the gold mines.

Did the hon. member ever visualize, so far as gold mining is concerned—I am speaking of only that one industry—that practically everything that has been done in connection with our gold mines has been done on the personal initiative of the Canadian people, by prospectors and promoters and people who have developed these mines? Does the hon. member wish to create the impression that the government is more capable of running these mines than those who have had charge of them in the past? I would ask the hon. member to answer these questions on the next occasion when he speaks of this matter because, Mr. Speaker, this house and the country have a right to know what procedure the hon. member would adopt in respect to our gold mines, and if he is going to single out one particular industry, one part of our national life for nationalization, why not widen the scope of his policy and nationalize every single industry?

When I adjourned the debate on the budget the other evening I was speaking on the gold tax. I had said that I was in harmony with previous speakers, even on the government side, who had pointed out that the ten per cent gold tax was an onerous one not only in the view of the gold-mining industry of this country but also of citizens who are familiar with the situation. Apparently in this matter, as in so many others, the government leapt before they looked and then found themselves in a very awkward position. We were told last week by the Prime Minister of the changes that had been made in the tax. The changes are good in themselves, but surely the government does not deserve any credit for stating nearly a week ago that they had withdrawn the tax on gold as originally brought down and were going to apply the tax only to those mines that were on a paying basis, because everyone knows that you cannot get blood out of a stone. The government should have known, if they had taken the trouble to give the least study to the gold-mining situation in this country, that a tax of ten per cent on all gold production was absolutely impossible of application for the very good reason that many mines are engaged in the treatment of low-grade bodies of ore and are not on a paying basis, and therefore it would have been impossible to get a single dollar of taxation out of them.

I have the greatest respect for the Minister of Mines (Mr. Gordon) and I do not think there is a member of the cabinet who is more familiar with mining. According to an interview reported in the press the minister stated that this form of tax was decided on because of the need for secrecy. It was secrecy with a vengeance because even the minister himself was not familiar with the tax. The government had a sad experience last year in connection with the sugar tax but this year they decided on secrecy, not only in connection with the people but in connection with the Minister of Mines. The minister was in a very unhappy position and if the newspaper reports are correct he was aware of this tax on gold only a few hours before it was put in the budget. That is what the minister said himself and now he says that for the sake of secrecy it was kept away from the people. Apparently it was also kept away from the minister, the man supposed to know the situation. If the government had desired information, surely the Department of Mines would have been able to furnish statistics to show that the majority of mines were not in a position to pay any taxation. If the government did not see fit to go to this real source of information, it would seem as though there was no necessity for this department. I repeat, I do not believe the country was treated fairly, and the minister certainly was not treated fairly.

I remember listening to the minister making a speech on Good Friday at the opening of a radio station at Kirkland Lake. This town is situated in one of the finest gold mining sections in this country. The minister stated that there would be no further load of taxation placed upon the mining industry. I believe the minister was sincere when he made that statement. These are questions which the people in my section and in other parts of Canada are asking. Speaking to the mining institute in Quebec a few days later he repeated the statement he had made at Kirkland Lake. Is the action of the government fair to the investing public? Is it fair to the gold mining industry and to the people of Canada? I am putting these questions to the government, more particularly to the Minister of Mines. I could read several editorial articles in weekly papers and periodicals published in northern Ontario, a section of the country vitally interested in the gold tax, but I shall not take up the time of the house. All these articles deplore the fact that the government did not find it possible to take the advice of the Minister of Mines, whom I am personally convinced is the best qualified man in the cabinet to advise the government on such a matter.

The government has realized that it cannot go any further with a certain aspect of that taxation. It has realized that it would be absolutely impossible to get money from the corporations which are not on a paying basis. This one industry has been singled out but in a few moments I shall give particulars of other industries which are paying enormous dividends but which have not been touched. The government realized that the tax on sugar imposed last year was very unpopular so they decided to cut that tax in two. In order to make up the loss in revenue they decided to tax only one industry. The gold mining industry is just as ready as any other industry to pay its share of taxation. It realizes that the government must raise money to run its affairs. There is one point in connection with the sugar tax to which I should like to refer. This tax made the Canadian people realize that no matter what a government might promise, no matter what an old or new party might promise, the ratepayer has to pay. Every time a citizen of this country took a cup of tea, generally three times a day, he was made aware of the fact that the money necessary to run the government and implement promises had to come out of the pockets of the people. The government realized the unpopularity of that tax. They decided to decrease it and tax just one other industry, leaving dozens of industries paying larger dividends than the gold mining industry free of taxation.

The government hopes to raise $9,000,000 with this tax. No matter what the government may say, grievous injury is being done to this industry. I believe the strongest argument on the part of the government in favour of this tax was the fact that the gold mining industry happens to be located in the newer centres of population. In its wisdom or rather unwisdom the government thought that this tax would be popular because the larger centres would not be directly affected. But it did not take the government very long to realize that every citizen of this country was connected with gold mining, either directly or indirectly. The country is like the human body, no one section can suffer without other sections being affected. If the government does anything to paralyze the development of gold mining, injury will be done to the whole of Canada. It may be interesting to hon. members to know that during the last two years nearly 10,000 people have been able to get useful occupation in a new area in Quebec of only 100 square miles. What are those people doing? They are developing new gold fields in the province. The same thing is true in the northern sections of Ontario, Manitoba and some of the other western provinces, as well as in British Columbia. But the government has singled out this industry and is attempting to paralyze it. A few days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) tried to build up a case against the gold mining industry. He quoted the words of the critic of the opposition, as follows:

> First, it is discrimination against a particular industry and, second, it is discrimination against particular sections of Canada.

That is true with a vengeance. I repeat the statement, the government thought it was doing a very fine thing and something which would be more popular than the sugar tax. That tax involved every citizen and the government thought that only a few people were interested in gold mining. But they found the situation to be absolutely different. The Minister of Trade and Commerce can go to the statistics of his own department and find that the Porcupine district each year purchases hundreds of carloads of British Columbia fir for mining purposes. Should anything happen to this industry in Ontario, the lumbering industry of British Columbia will be affected and the same thing applies to all the other industries of Canada. The minister went a little further and, on page 2652 of Hansard, stated.

> The people of this country have been doing their utmost to meet these obligations and now we find a sheltered industry—

When was any protection given to gold mining? Speaking in terms of premiums or subsidies, the government is not paying one dollar more to the gold mining industry than it is entitled to. It is stated that this industry has received millions of dollars through the increase in the price of gold but the government stopped the exportation of gold in order to maintain Canadian credit and the gold mining industry is not receiving a cent more for its product than is being paid on the world markets. The minister proceeded:

> —because I am bound to say quite candidly that it is a sheltered industry—which during this period of depression, owing to causes outside their own activities and capabilities entirely, have realized a tremendously increased income, while at the same time the costs of operation have not increased at all.

That strikes me as being very strange, and once more I would put this question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Since when has the gold mining industry of Canada asked for protection from any government? It has asked for none whatever. The minister however is fully aware of the enormous profits that have been made by other organizations; he knows what profits have been made by the Imperial Tobacco Company, for instance, the oil companies and the motor industry. The minister knows that they have been making tens of millions of dollars; yet the government has not found it possible to tax these enormous profits but instead taxes to the utmost a valuable primary industry. As was well pointed out by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt), speaking on the budget, it was owing to the existence of this industry in Canada that we were able to weather the depression. And in face of this the government apparently is endeavouring, if not to destroy, at any rate to jeopardize and stultify this one particular industry.

The Prime Minister gives a great deal of credit to the Minister of Mines of Ontario. Now, I have every respect for that gentleman as well as for the federal Minister of Mines, who I am sure is familiar with the situation. But when it is suggested that others have not brought to the attention of the government the critical position of the industry, I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to consider the views that have been put forward by members of parliament as well as by other people to show how absolutely unfair and onerous this tax is. The hon. member for Nelson pointed this out, and other members of parliament have urged the government to recognize the unfairness of this taxation on one industry.

The Prime Minister suggested that the agitation against this taxation was started by the populace. Well, the sentiment of the people in this regard has been voiced by the newspapers, and the popular sentiment has been unanimous against this tax, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In other words, no one could help being familiar with the situation, so that the government had to give way. I want to be fair to the government, but I want the government to be sincere. I am sure that had they given this whole question that careful analysis which it deserved, instead of trying to raise $10,000,000 from one industry alone, had they studied the question of taxation a little further, their attitude would have been different. Suppose they had remained adamant in the application of this tax, what would have happened? As we pointed out, it would have meant the destruction of at least 80 per cent of the gold mining activities of Canada.

In this regard I should like to quote briefly from an editorial which has appeared in a newspaper sympathetic to this government, a weekly paper published in the Timmins district, and fully conversant with the whole subject and also sympathetic to the federal Minister of Mines.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. BRADETTE: With the consent of the house, may I be allowed to quote the following from the Porcupine Advance of Timmins:

> Most people are aware of the fact that the dominion Minister of Mines, Hon. W. A. Gordon, and the Ontario Minister of Mines, Hon. Chas. McCrea, have been giving their best efforts to secure a fair deal for the mines and the people. They have helped materially in securing what has been achieved, but it has not been enough. There should be a continuation of the fight for a complete square deal for mining.
> Incidentally, it may be noted that the tax on gold production promises to be the most unpopular act of the Bennett administration. There is a report to the effect that this gold tax matter may eventually result in the withdrawal of Hon. W. A. Gordon from the government ranks. Hon. Mr. Gordon is recognized as one of the most capable and most admired members of the dominion cabinet. His retirement would be a serious loss to Canada and a veritable calamity for the Bennett government. Hon. W. A. Gordon, however, knows the details of his departments, and he also knows the general situation in Canada. It would appear to be the part of wisdom for the Bennett government to still further amend the proposed gold tax legislation so that the mining industry should be helped, not hindered, and the Bennett cabinet should retain one of its strongest and most popular members.

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York): It is with deep regret that I learned of the death of the wife of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), and as the first member on this side of the house to address you this afternoon, sir, I take this opportunity, on behalf of the members on this side as well as of myself, of extending our most sincere sympathy to him in his bereavement.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the official critic of the official opposition, in his address on this budget adopted an expedient which is not at all unfamiliar to lawyers, namely, the setting up of some straw men in order to knock them down. Hence, though it was no part of the budget at all, he endeavoured to set up the problem of bimetallism and a turnover tax because, I suggest, he lacked the ability to make a strong, sound and logical criticism of the proposals which were contained in that budget. He concluded that criticism by moving a resolution, and in that resolution he was indeed more definite than in his criticism, because we find in the resolution one condemnation of this government for what was alleged to be its policy. In amendment, he moved:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.

For a few moments I wish to consider the question whether the policy of this government is one of economic nationalism. When this government came into power in 1930 the world was already in the sweep of a vast depression and unemployment was rife not only in other countries but in Canada as well. In every country in the world there was a vast surplus of production of which it was desirous to dispose; and shortly before this government came into power Italy, the United States, France, Germany and other countries had increased their tariffs, so that Canada could not sell her exportable surplus in any of those markets. Each of these countries in turn had large exportable surpluses which they wished to sell in any market in the world, which they were willing to sell, not at prices representative of cost of production, but at any price which could be obtained. The result was that Canada at that time was a fair field in which they might dump their surplus products.

Faced with these conditions this government did immediately increase its tariff and it increased the tariff not, as our opponents would desire to lead the electorate to believe, for the purpose of developing trade but for the purpose of using that tariff as a defensive instrument in the protection of Canada. Now, having taken a defensive measure, this government set about negotiating trade treaties in order that our trade might be increased. Treaties were negotiated with the component parts of the British Empire, and also with Austria, France and, if my recollection serves me rightly, with Germany. As a result of those treaties Canada has increased her trade and also the amount of employment. It is all very well for the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) to compare Canada's trade in 1929 with her trade in 1933, but I suggest that a fairer comparison would be to compare Canada's trade in 1929 with world trade in 1929 and to compare Canada's trade in 1933 with world trade in 1933. If we make the comparison on that basis, this is what we find: World trade in 1929 amounted to $68,641,000,000 while in 1933 the world trade estimated, as the figures for all countries are not quite complete, is $22,000,000,000. In other words, world trade dropped 68 per cent between 1929 and 1933. If we turn to our great neighbour to the south we find that their total trade in 1929 was around $9,500,000,000 while in 1933 it was $3,381,000,000, or a drop of 65 per cent. If we take Canada's trade for the year 1929 we find that it was about $2,481,000,000 while in 1933 it amounted to $932,963,000, or a drop of only 62 per cent.

If during a period when world trade dropped 68 per cent and when the trade of our neighbour dropped 65 per cent, Canada's trade dropped only 62 per cent and if economic nationalism, so-called, is the cause of that favourable position for Canada, then I am in favour of that policy of economic nationalism. If when you add to that the fact that since 1933 Canada under the policies of this government has advanced from the position of a nation with an adverse balance of trade in excess of $100,000,000 to that of a nation with a favourable balance of trade in excess of $100,000,000, I say again that if that be economic nationalism, then I favour economic nationalism.

The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette), who preceded me, spoke of the gold tax. His utterances in many instances were extreme. He reminded me of some of the hysteria that was published in some Canadian papers in connection with the gold tax. I only trust that in the next election all Liberal members on the opposite side of the house will invite the hon. member for North Timiskaming into their constituencies to tell the people that he and the party which he supports favoured the tax on sugar—

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, no.

Mr. LAWSON: —as one which makes all people realize the necessity for taxation more than a tax on gold would do.

Mr. BRADETTE: Do not be too smart. Be your own self.

Mr. LAWSON: Any effort on my part to appear smart after following the hon. gentleman will seem very futile. Many wild statements have been made concerning the effect of the gold tax. The Northern Miner, probably admitted to be the mouthpiece of the gold mining industry, was certainly guilty of wild outbursts in the issue following the proposal contained in the budget, I do not think the hon. member for North Timiskaming would suggest that the criticism contained in that journal was either fair or in the interests of the gold mining industry.

Mr. BRADETTE: In the interests of the people.

Mr. LAWSON: Such an outburst only stimulates any tendency there might have been on the part of shareholders to liquidate their stock with losses to the selling shareholders. It is indeed with strange inconsistency that while the Northern Miner was roundly condemning this government for the great injury it was doing to the gold mining industry of this country, that same paper was carrying the most glowing advertisements for the sale of shares in gold mining companies, one of them in particular advising the public that gold shares had indeed "very attractive possibilities." One caption especially caught my eye; it said:

"How shareholders will be hit." "Dividend cuts coming."

If you then read the article you would find that it went on to tell how Hollinger, one of the gold mines, would lose an amount equal to seven of its periodical five-cent dividends and so would its shareholders. Let us examine the situation in respect to that very mine. Hollinger has been in the habit for years of paying a dividend of five cents a month per share with a bonus of five cents a share in the twelfth month, or alternatively a dividend equal to five cents per share every four weeks. The public were led to believe that by the imposition of this tax seven of those dividends in succession would be cut off. What are the facts? In 1933 the Hollinger mine produced 481,279 ounces of gold and they sold that gold at an average price of $28.60 an ounce. Let me assume that in the year 1934 the number of ounces produced is the same. The price for gold having now advanced to $35 an ounce, they would sell every ounce of it, even after deducting the tax as originally proposed, at $31.50 an ounce, or after deducting the tax as now amended, at $31.42 an ounce. In view of prices this year, the same production would return to the Hollinger mine, after deduction of the tax, an extra $1,395,000. This would increase the earning of that mine from $1.16 to $1.45 a share or, in other words, a difference of twenty-nine cents a share. Therefore, instead of this tax having the effect of cutting off seven consecutive dividends from the shareholders of the Hollinger mines the truth is that with the same production that mine will be able to pay six more consecutive dividends of five cents per share in the year 1934. If you make a similar calculation in respect to the production of the Lake Shore mine, at the end of 1934, even after paying its tax, that mine should have an additional amount of seventy-two cents per share to distribute among its shareholders.

Under the amendment some exemption is made for low grade producers. Some of the wildest and most extravagant statements have been made with respect to the effect on low grade producers; a circular I have before me, issued by one brokerage house, says one hundred thousand men will be put out of work. If I understood the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) correctly, I think he put the figure at eighty thousand.

Mr. BRADETTE: I never mentioned eighty thousand.

Mr. LAWSON: Then I withdraw the statement; I thought I understood the hon. gentleman to say that this measure would cause unemployment in the mines affecting about eighty thousand men. I say this, sir: I challenge anyone to give concrete evidence proving that, even had the tax remained on low grade producers, it would have put one-half of one hundred thousand or one-quarter of one hundred thousand men out of work in this country.

Mr. BRADETTE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. LAWSON: No, if you please; I did not interrupt you. I have an argument I wish to make. I am not so sure, Mr. Speaker, that it is economically sound to help these low grade producers, so called, to continue to endeavour to get into production unless they have a reasonable expectancy of ore that will enable them to operate profitably at $25 an ounce for gold at least, if not at $20.67. What was the reason for the advance in the price of gold? If I understand it correctly it was because certain nations of the world accepted, temporarily at least, an economic theory,—that theory being that if you increased the price of gold you deflated or devalued your currency based on gold, and that in turn if you devalued your currency you increased the prices of commodities.

The acceptance of that economic theory,—plus another theory so far as the United States was concerned,—caused that country and some other nations of the world to increase the price of gold. If that economic theory is sound obviously when we get back to the days of prosperity the price of gold should be reduced by every country of the world, presumably by Canada as well. At that rate, sir, as soon as we get back to prosperity, down will go the price of gold and then, I ask, what will become of the shareholders who have been induced, by promoters desirous of selling stocks, to invest their money in low grade producers that cannot possibly exist except upon a very much enhanced value for gold? In view of that situation, sir, I am not at all convinced that it is economically sound to encourage these low grade producers to greater production, but out of consideration for the shareholders who have been induced to invest their money in them I support the amendment suggested by the Prime Minister in connection with the low grade producers.

Now, sir, I wish to deal with another aspect of this amendment. After declaring this government guilty of economic nationalism the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) proceeds:

> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit—

I must confess, sir, that I am a little at a loss to know just what the other policies respecting credit may be, unless the utterance of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) to-day, in which he informed our friends in the far corner that he was in sympathy with the provisions of their amendment to the amendment, indicates that the old Liberal party is trying now somehow to crawl on the bandwaggon of inflation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are on it now; $35,000,000 last year.

Mr. LAWSON: It is quite apparent from the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that his idea of inflation and mine vary widely, but I will come to that in a moment. In considering the progress Canada has made under this government I think sometimes it is well to ascertain what is being said by people not resident in Canada, who cannot be accused of having a biased mind. A short time ago I noticed an article in the Saturday Evening Post by Mr. Isaac F. Marcosson. In comparing Canada's progress with that of our great neighbour to the south Mr. Marcosson said:

> —the index of the physical volume of Canadian business—the economic pulse of the nation—advanced by thirty-two per cent between February and November, 1933 that industrial production increased forty-three per cent in the same period—that purchasing power is up twelve per cent—

If this resolution, so far as it relates to some new credit system, involved what I anticipate it does, having regard to some of the speeches that have been made in this house, I should like to offer some views with respect thereto. Inflation, as I understand it, means the issuing of new money beyond the metal coverage now required by the Canadian statute or formerly required by international practice, and the use and distribution of that money by payment for public services. If we embark upon any vast scheme of the distribution of currency in excess of that which is available, of necessity we must print money without reference to metal coverage as a controlling factor or base, and if you do that I say you have uncontrolled inflation. Can inflation be controlled? In my opinion it can be controlled only in one of two ways. It can never be controlled by the agency of government so long as it may be affected by the whim of government. In my opinion it can be controlled only by a metal coverage or base internationally recognized or by the setting up of a sinking fund into which annually an amount of money raised by taxation is poured for the purpose of meeting the issued currency upon demand and at likely maturity. Inflation, Mr. Speaker, has been the last desperate effort of nearly all countries in distress; they have seized it as a drowning man grasps at a straw, but it has never saved any nation that has tried it. It has ruined commercially and economically every nation in the world that has been seduced by its charm.

I am one of those who admit that the present monetary unit, which is expressed in dollars, varies in purchasing power in relation to the value of commodities. I will admit, further, that in my opinion any monetary unit that varies in its relative value to prices of other commodities imposes in times of depression a burden upon debtors. An ideal monetary system would be one in which the monetary unit always held comparatively the same relative value to commodities. But the wit of man has not as yet devised such a monetary unit, and in this House of Commons I have not heard one suggested which in my opinion has those qualifications. I will further admit that I would be in favour of a reflationary policy if you could reflate and still have your reflation under control. But as I previously outlined I do not believe it can be controlled, except by the two methods I indicated. And the moment, sir, that you endeavour to put into effect any policy of inflation or reflation which is not automatically controlled, then I suggest you are getting away from the principle of sound money.

I have deliberately used the term "sound" in reference to money. I have used it because so much has been said about "sound" money. Some hon. member in this house has said that sound money is wholly unsound. What is sound money? Money is not like flowers, plants or animals of which one may have several species. There are only two kinds of money, sound and unsound. There is safe money and there is unsafe money. In my opinion sound money is safe money. One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) stated in this House of Commons that sound money has been sweet sounding for the receivers of interest, but that it has meant fury to the masses of Canadians. Mr. Speaker, with that statement I absolutely disagree. If sound money is safe money, then in my opinion it is sweet sounding to every man and woman in Canada who is in receipt of a fixed income, irrespective of whether that income be by way of wages, by way of dividends, by way of interest or by way of profits. Sound money to my mind should be sweet sounding to every wage earner in Canada. Sound money should be sweet sounding to every man in this country in receipt of a pension.

Sound money should be sweet sounding to every woman in Canada who is in receipt of a mother's allowance to help maintain herself and her children. Sound money should be sweet sounding to every aged person unable longer to work, and who is in receipt of an old age pension. Sound money, sir should be sweet sounding to every person in Canada who is in receipt of a fixed income, because that person knows that when he is in receipt of one of those sound dollars he can exchange it for a very reasonable quantity of other commodities, and that he will not have to have a thousand of those dollars to exchange for a loaf of bread.

Considerable has been said about the policy adopted by our great neighbour to the south. It has been stated that they have done very well through a policy of inflation, and that the steps they have taken constitute an inflation policy. That I cannot see. If I have appreciated it correctly, the Roosevelt policy in the United States has introduced into the monetary system two new principles. The first is the nationalization of gold and the second is the revaluation of gold. Neither of those steps amounts to inflation. The United States has about seven billion dollars in gold. On the presently accepted international standard of metal coverage of 25 per cent they could have currency in circulation up to twenty-eight billions of dollars. The fact is that the United States has not one-half of twenty-eight billions of dollars in currency circulation. I ask hon. members this question: How can you have a green back with a gold backing? In resolutions which have been discussed we have heard a great deal about the policy of this government being deflationary, about the value of the dollars being increased and thereby pressing down the prices of commodities. But surely, sir, the record of the relative value of our currency to those of other countries is a complete answer to that allegation. Let me point out that when the United States was on a gold dollar basis, the basis which formerly was internationally recognized, the highest average premium at which their currency ever stood was of 17 per cent. For a few days it did touch 21 per cent, but the average stood at 17 per cent. To-day we have had the government of that country tell us that the American dollar is worth only 59·4 per cent of what it was when it was the so-called gold dollar. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the difference in its value should be about 40 per cent. If their money was at a premium of 17 per cent over ours at a time when they had a gold dollar, and it is now worth 40 per cent or 40 cents less, then today the Canadian dollar should be at a premium of 23 per cent, if this government in turn had not been alive to the movements of the times, and if this government had been carrying out a policy of deflation of our dollar.

Then the suggestion is made in this house that arbitrarily we should cut interest rates. One hon. member has suggested that we should pass a statute whereby the interest rates on all our bonds should be cut by one-third, that the rates on bonds of corporations in Canada should be cut by the same amount, and that at the tail end of that statute we should have a provision whereby such changes would not come into effect until the government passed an order in council. Then, armed with this blunt instrument of a statute of repudiation to be propelled by the force of an order in council the Canadian people would go forth into foreign lands to wage economic war. Well, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what success we would have under such a system. Repudiation—and I say this in all kindness to the gentleman who advocated it —is to my mind nothing but a stupid remedy for a primitive nation. Gullible indeed would be the man who would lend money to this country unless he believed that the bargain for repayment would be carried out. Yet it is suggested that we should go to our bondholders outside this country and say to them, "If you do not accept bonds from us with your interest rate cut one-third, then we will pass this order in council." What chance do you think we would ever have to borrow money again from those people? Do you think they would accept our story, at a time when we might go back into a foreign market to get more money which is so necessary for the development of this country, if we said, "Well, we were bad little boys. True, we repudiated once, but if you will just lend us some money again we will be good little boys and never repudiate again." What a nice position for Canada.

Let me consider it from the standpoint of our domestic situation. Most of the advocacy of repudiation of our interest rates is espoused by those who go throughout this country and endeavour to paint a picture of vast corporations that have made enormous profits by grinding down the ordinary man, commonly called the poor; but let us see what we would do to these vast corporations if we should pass this statute of repudiation. The private corporations of this country have payable in this year 1934, $132,563,994, of which $115,278,081 is interest. So if we pass this statute of repudiation the first people on whom we will confer a benefit will be these vast corporations, and to the extent of one-third of their interest of $115,000,000 odd, or something like a benefit of $41,000,000. That would hardly put much benefit into the hands of the individual holders who have invested their money in the bonds of these corporations. I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that if I were to be governed solely by the emotions of my heart, and not by the thoughts of my head, I might at times be inclined to favour a measure of repudiation especially when I go about the riding I represent and see the deprivation and want among many of the people. I am reminded that a great divine, I think it was Henry Ward Beecher, once wrote, "Where you find religion of the heart you have a fanatic. Where you find religion of the head you have a heretic. Where you find religion which is a combination of heart and head you have a Christian." I believe, sir, that if we are going to solve the problems of this country we must use our heads, as well as our hearts, and the solution in my opinion never will lie in repudiation.

May I ask one question: What man has ever improved his standing in his own community, even among his fellow-debtors, by repudiation? Not one. Now this nation is nothing but an aggregate of the individuals in this country, and just as no man can improve his standing in his own community by repudiation, neither can this nation, by repudiation, improve its standing among the nations of the world.

Something has been said as to why Canada has not adopted the policies in economic matters which have been adopted by the United States. Well, in the first place, sir, it must be realized that in international affairs Canada is not a pivotal nation. Unlike the United States, we are a debtor, not a creditor, nation. Unlike the United States, we have very little more gold than is required under the former international standard to back our currency. If, instead of shipping out of this country vast quantities of gold as was done by the Minister of Finance in the former Liberal government in 1927, 1928 and 1929, to meet our unfavourable trade balances of those years, we had been able to hold that gold in this country, I am sure that we could have gratified the desires even of our friends in the extreme corner by the additional amount of currency that could have been issued as safe and sound money. But Canada not being a pivotal nation in international affairs, being as we are affected to a large extent by conditions in the United States, being also affected as we are by conditions in the United Kingdom, we must at all times maintain our dollar within reasonable limits of the American dollar and the British pound sterling. Consequently, we have been very much in the position of a boy who sits in the middle of a teeter-totter. We have not had the pleasure, by enacting new monetary measures, of bobbing up and down on either end and obtaining that thrill, but nevertheless we have had a much more stable position, and when the game is over we are much more likely to have a settled stomach. Now in view of the fact that we must maintain the value of our currency relative to that of the United States and the United Kingdom it cannot be fixed by this government until some relative value is attained between the American dollar and the pound sterling.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that those who are shrewd observers will agree that in the first few years after confederation a great Conservative leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, made Canada, and history I think will record, that in the last few years of depression a masterful leader of the Conservative party, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, saved Canada.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the budget I would first of all like to join with others in expressing my regrets at the sudden loss sustained by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). I believe most members will agree with me that he is one of the best liked ministers in the house.

Within the limited time at my disposal it will not be possible for me to deal with all the matters brought down in the budget, and dealt with in the budget speech of the Finance minister, but before proceeding to deal with some of the points may I refer to a statement that was made in the debate by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) who a few days ago twitted me with advocating that white Canadian seamen be employed on the ships subsidized by this country, and also advocating a reduction in freight rates, while not agreeing with the policies advocated by this government. I have not the time at my disposal to go into that, Mr. Speaker, except to say that I can see no relation whatever between the proposals that I put before the house in regard to white seamen being employed, the question of freight rates, and not supporting the policies of this government under which the textile companies in this country have received greater protection in the last four years than they ever had before. I was very pleased, however, to note that the hon. member stated he was in agreement with me that white Canadian seamen should be employed on our Canadian ships, and before the present session is over I hope to give my hon. friend an opportunity of showing his sincerity in that regard.

I think everyone in the house will agree that one of the great problems, if not the greatest problem confronting this country today is the railway problem. With a loss in trade amounting to over a billion dollars since 1930 it cannot be otherwise than a great problem. In fact, if the trade of the country had kept going down, it might have come to pass that we would not have required any railways at all.

The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) is quite fond, both in and out of the house, of blaming the Liberal party for the great railway expenditures that have been made. Only a few days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) blamed someone else for these great expenditures. Speaking before a meeting of the board of trade in Montreal, he is reported as having said:

> The minister accused the business men themselves of being responsible for the heavy governmental expenditures of the past fifteen years. "Who opposed the Canadian government merchant marine project?" he asked. He wondered if the heavy machinery manufacturers, the business men engaged in the paint, varnish and lumber industries, had opposed the scheme. "On the contrary, the greatest pressure was brought to bear on the government of the day by those same business men to proceed with that program," he declared.

We have had the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) also making somewhat similar statements outside of the house. He has stated that the people themselves were to blame for the great expenditures to which we have been committed for our railway systems. I was rather amused a short time ago when I read of what had transpired in another honourable house not fifty miles from here. The question had been raised as to the usefulness of that house and one of the hon. members pointed out that many millions of dollars had been saved the country by that house not passing certain railway charters. If we are to go by those statements, it would appear that that honourable house is to blame for the great expenditures which have been made on our railways. According to those statements, that honourable house should have opposed the granting of most of our railway charters. The Prime Minister has had a great deal to say about competition ever, amalgamation never. I should like to point out that there is no such thing now as competition between the two railway systems of Canada. There is compulsory cooperation but there is generally no competition where there is cooperation, compulsory or otherwise. I am rather afraid that if the government keeps on lending or guaranteeing money to the Canadian Pacific Railway, our financial obligations will be so heavy that amalgamation will be automatic. It is interesting to note from a return brought down to the house that the total guarantees to the provinces of this country amounted to only $6,520,761, while the guarantee to the Canadian Pacific Railway amounted to $60,000,000; to the Beauharnois Power Corporation, $15,500,000 and to the steel corporations, $1,100,000. When Great Britain was making a guarantee to one of her shipbuilding companies to provide for the construction of what will be the largest steamship afloat, the loan of £4,500,000 was granted in order that employment would be given to the citizens of the country. But it is interesting to note that a first mortgage was taken by the government on the steamship itself. No such procedure occurs in this country; the Prime Minister simply guarantees without making any such proviso.

I suggest to the Minister of Railways that he cease blaming any particular party for the great debt of our railways. Such accusations will not solve our problem. In my opinion we should wipe off the books of the Canadian National Railways the large over-hanging debt which now appears. The government will have to pay this anyway and every year parliament is passing money to take care of expenditures and interest on the bonds of our railways. Refunding at a much lower rate of interest should take place immediately. The Prime Minister has stated that the bondholders are practically the owners of our railway system. I am sorry that I have not been able to obtain authentic information in this connection but I have been told that the majority of the bonds of the Canadian National Railways are held by American railroad corporations. If that is correct, it would appear that the American railroads are the owners of our railway system.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of information, would my hon. friend mind telling me where he got that information?

Mr. REID: I got it from a gentleman whose name I do not care to disclose. He gave me that information and that is why I placed a question on the order paper as to who held the bonds. I think we should have this information and if my statement is not correct, it should be corrected.

Mr. MANION: The bonds of the Canadian National Railways; like other bonds of the Dominion of Canada, are held to a large extent by various investors in the United States. About three-quarters of the bonds are held in the United States by insurance companies, banks and individuals.

Mr. REID: My information was that the railroad companies had purchased large blocks of bonds.

Mr. MANION: Most of the railroad companies in the United States have not been able to pay the interest on their own bonds.

Mr. REID: But like our own railways, they have certain investments. Our own railways have investments in United States railroads, and, likewise, United States railroads have placed their funds in other investments.

I should like to refer for a few moments to another serious matter confronting the country, that of unemployment which has been steadily increasing since 1930. According to the official figures brought down in the house not long ago, in January, 1931, the total unemployed amounted to 132,000; this figure had increased to 355,806 in 1932; to 1,244,536 in 1933. The figures showed a slight decrease in 1934, there being 1,228,246 individuals receiving relief. I am not one of those who believe that unemployment as we know it to-day is something which will not be with us always. Machinery has displaced men to such a degree during the past twenty-five years that the great masses of our people can never hope to be engaged in industry. Until our government recognizes that unemployment is permanent I do not believe we will arrive at any solution of the matter. One of the most serious aspects of this matter is the question of our youth. I was surprised to learn that there are some 600,000 youths in Canada between the ages of nineteen and twenty-five. The greater proportion of these young people have no great outlook in life and I believe that most of them are to-day in idleness. To my mind that is one of the most serious aspects of the matter. We sometimes say that this is a war on unemployment. We spent in the last war many millions of dollars destroying life and surely it is not too much to expect that we could spend a great deal more to save life, in this one I think that is something well worth considering, especially from the point of view of saving the youth of the country.

I wish now to speak for a few moments regarding the debts of Canada. Every hon. member must be aware of the great burden of debt which is hanging over this country. When one realizes that the total value of our agricultural wealth for the last year was not sufficient to pay the interest charges in Canada, it is very striking indeed; and when we have reached the point where we are borrowing many millions to pay interest charges —not principal but interest charges—one must ask oneself—When will the end of this be? Personally I believe our debts will never be paid, and the sooner we realize that the better. I listened a few moments ago to the hon. member for West York who spoke about repudiation. It is no repudiation to call in those to whom you owe money and make a plain statement of the state of affairs in the country. I am not unmindful of what transpired in a country like Great Britain. After telling the people to tighten their belts she did not stop there altogether, but in good fashion went after the bondholders. In 1931 Viscount Snowden warned the country of the grave danger facing it, and after he had warned the people from his place in the House of Lords, the nation took stock and set to work to retrieve its position. Among other things it is interesting to know that Great Britain converted $10,000,000,000, more than the total debt of Canada, from a 5 per cent issue down to a 3½ per cent; yet we have hon. members in this house talking about repudiation if anyone gets up and suggests cutting the interest rate.

In my opinion the people are tired of being told to tighten their belts until such time as the bondholders and others are gone after. It surely is not repudiation if you call in the people who own the bonds and notify them that you can no longer pay because it is sapping the life blood of the country, and say to them, "We are either willing to give you your money back or give you 3½ per cent." If something of that kind is not done I am afraid the whole thing will be wiped out and they will be in danger of losing all.

I have not the time to go as far as I should like with regard to the debt situation because in most of my remarks I wish to deal with trade. But I believe that we should adopt the policies that have been adopted in at least eight or ten countries which, in setting their houses in order, have practically told bondholders that they will have to accept less. If we are to follow the example of any country, surely it is not amiss to suggest that we should emulate a country like Great Britain where, it is well to note, the bondholders, in good spirit, agreed to accept 3½ per cent. So that I cannot agree with my hon. friend when he talks about repudiation. Repudiation means wiping the whole slate clean and calling the debt off, and I am one of those who does not accept that suggestion. I do maintain however that the common citizens of the country are tired of being told to tighten their belts, because if some of them tighten their belts much more, both parts of the belt might meet. Many have been tightening their belts for the last three or four years and are now of the opinion that others who have not borne the brunt should come forward and show their true citizenship by agreeing at this time to accept a much lower rate of interest.

Mr. MacLAREN: Was there not a very distinct difference between calling in the British war loan of 5 per cent and issuing it subsequently at 3½ per cent and a reduction of interest on the bonds of the Canadian National Railways or of government bonds? The British war loan, I think my hon. friend will agree, was callable any year. It was issued on a certain basis, a certain interest for a certain number of years, and after the lapse of that time it was then callable any year. That was one of the conditions.

Mr. REID: Objections are always raised by some when anyone advocates the cutting of interest on bonds. We were told by the Prime Minister that tax free bonds could not be taxed until 1937. Well, since coming to this house I have seen many changes. I have listened to speeches by the Prime Minister against inflation and against unsound money. We have inflation now whether we like it or not, and we have gone entirely off the gold standard. I therefore lay little stress on the objection that we cannot do anything with bondholders. Let us go on as we are at the present time, and the bondholders stand a good chance of losing the whole thing. Of the dominion bonds, seventy-three per cent are payable in Canada, ten per cent in the United States and thirteen per cent in Great Britain, so that I cannot accept the Prime Minister's statement that the various bondholders throughout the world cannot be got in touch with.

The four western provinces are to-day carrying a load which is gradually crushing them and which might force some of them at least to repudiate their debts. It is said that we on this side of the house never make suggestions. Let me offer this suggestion. Allow the four western provinces to refund, the dominion guaranteeing that refunding; and as a guarantee from the western provinces the dominion could possibly retain the subsidies payable. That would be something in lieu of a guarantee put up by the dominion. At any rate, some such step will have to be taken. Take Saskatchewan, with $22,000,000 owing to this dominion; when can they pay it ? British Columbia has a debt of nearly $170,000,000, and out of an estimated income this year of $19,000,000 some $11,000,000 has to be paid in interest. How can these provinces carry on, with a great mass of unemployed and with such low prices prevailing for agricultural products? I repeat, instead of telling the ordinary people to tighten their belts we should go after those who have not borne any of the suffering which the great majority of the people have been putting up with since 1930.

I wish to speak now for a moment with regard to the gold tax. I was one of those who would have supported the speech made by the Minister of Finance with regard to this tax; I differ from some members on both sides of the house in this. But the strange thing is that, having heard two excellent speeches, one from the minister himself and one from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Prime Minister walked in one day and it was all changed. If anyone had spoken against it before the Prime Minister made the change, probably a dozen more members would have got up and upheld the ten per cent tax on gold as originally brought down in the budget. I am not, however, so optimistic as is the Prime Minister that the tax as amended will bring in the estimated amount of $10,000,000. It will be very interesting to know just what this country will have to pay for the political gesture because the Prime Minister specifically mentioned the Minister of Mines of Ontario and I am not unmindful that an election in that province is not very far off. It will be interesting to see at the end of the year how much money the dominion has lost through the change in that tax.

In the remainder of the time at my disposal I want to deal with the trade of Canada, especially with empire countries and in particular Great Britain since the Ottawa conference agreements were passed by this house in 1932. I should like to examine the trade figures in connection with those agreements and what has taken place since they were passed, because I am not unmindful of the rather boastful language of the Prime Minister in 1932 when he introduced the legislation covering those agreements and how he pointed to each hon. member on this side and endeavoured to put the fear of political death in him by daring him to rise and vote against the Ottawa trade agreements. This is going to make a very interesting story, and I am just wondering whether all the things that are taking place now are just so much of a smoke screen to cover up what has occurred, particularly in Great Britain, since the conference agreements went into effect.

I am not again going to place on record the drop in trade figures since 1930 because that has already been gone into by some previous speakers. In passing, however, it is just as well to mention that our trade is still down by over $1,000,000,000, and to get as low a trade figure as we have in Canada at the present time we would have to go back to about 1914. The Prime Minister in 1932, in discussing the trade agreements with the empire and in particular Great Britain, emphasized the products of agriculture, the forest and the sea. He left or endeavoured to leave the impression both in and out of the house that those agreements entered into with empire countries would lead Canada out of the hole and that greater trade in these products would result after the agreements were ratified by parliament. Let us see what has happened in connection with our trade with empire countries. Like the Minister of Trade and Commerce I have gone over these figures myself and have taken them from the official Year Book published under the auspices of his department. Exports to empire countries in the fiscal year ending March, 1934, amounted to $278,044,000. It is true that this is an increase over the 1933 figure, which was $222,119,000. Let me say at this point that while in the budget address percentages are mentioned, I think they are misleading and do not always present a true picture of the situation. In that connection I shall try to give the actual figures. Of the exports amounting to $278,044,000 to empire countries, Great Britain took $227,619,000 while the balance of about $50,000,000 went to the other empire countries. In the fiscal year 1933-34 foreign countries took our exports amounting to $301,323,000 while in the previous fiscal year they took $251,681,000. Out of the total exports of $531,474,000, empire countries, of which there are thirty, took about one-half while foreign countries numbering seventy-six took the other half.

Our imports in the fiscal year ending March, 1934, amounted to $452,614,000 as against $401,254,000 in the fiscal year ending March, 1933. Of our imports in the fiscal year 1933-34 only $132,766,000 were from empire countries and $268,488,000 from foreign countries, $97,960,000 being the amount of our imports from Great Britain. In other words, while we exported to Great Britain goods to the value of $227,619,000 we imported from her only $97,960,000 worth. In fact, during those years, instead of endeavouring to build up her trade with Great Britain, Canada by her dumping duties and her valuation of the pound during the period when the pound in Great Britain was low, hindered, if I may say so, trade from that country. I am wondering how long it will take the Canadian people to realize that you cannot sell without buying.

As I have only a few minutes left, I must summarize the figures I wish to place upon Hansard. The truth of the matter is that our exports of all wood products dropped in 1933 to $120,886,796 of which only $11,301,796 went to Great Britain. I ask the house: Can Great Britain take the rest of our wood products which of course include all the timber, squared timber, et cetera, shipped from this country? Of our exports of paper only five per cent went to Great Britain, or about $4,000,000 worth out of over $77,000,000. We had practically no butter export market; our exports of cheese were greatly decreased. Last year there was an increase in the export of eggs, but there had been a considerable decrease in 1932.

The Prime Minister in his speech pointed out that we would have an unlimited market for frozen eggs, but none was shipped from Canada. While the other day there were comments in the press about exports of patent leather having increased, the total leather trade in Canada dropped from $10,000,000 in 1929 to just over $2,500,000 in 1933. Practically no fresh fish goes to the old country, our market being across the line. Our exports of canned salmon to Great Britain have dropped considerably and the French trade in canned salmon has been lost entirely. The decrease in exports of fishery products during the years the present government has been in power has been about $19,000,000 or a decline greater than our total exports of 1933. Out of our exports of about $17,185,351 in 1933 Great Britain took only about $3,500,000 worth, which is equal to only about twenty per cent.

As regards wheat there has been a great drop, from 239,373,255 bushels in 1932-33 to 175,534,255 in 1933-34. So far as total grains are concerned, barley, oats, rye and wheat from a value of over $476,000,000 in 1929 total grains had dropped last year to $143,695,931, of which Great Britain took only $85,326,533, the balance of our grains going abroad. If it is any comfort to the farmers of this country, I notice in the trade report that we sold to Great Britain 872,000 pounds of rice, which if percentages are used is an increase of 800 per cent over 1930 in our trade in rice with Great Britain. That is very interesting, as we do not grow any.

But let me come to what is more important. I refer to what has taken place regarding agriculture in Great Britain and the effect it is having and will have there. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) practically denied that Great Britain was our greatest market for dairy products; at least, when speaking in the house not very long ago, he would not admit it. These are his exact words:

Mr. Weir (Melfort): Did the hon. member say I stated this afternoon that the United Kingdom was the best market for our dairy products?

Mr. Parent: I understood the minister to say that.

Mr. Weir (Melfort): I did not say that.

It may be admitted then that Great Britain is not the best market for our dairy products. Some hon. members have stated, both in and out of this house, that the right hon. Prime Minister has changed the fiscal policy of Great Britain. He certainly has done so, and the marked changes that are being made in Great Britain may well prove a terrible tragedy to the agriculturists of this country. When the Ottawa agreements were under consideration the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was the member in the house who tried to point out that the gates would close against our agricultural products, and they are closing in Great Britain. Our eggs and apples have been mentioned, and we are being told that Great Britain will not allow us to dump our apples there as we have done in other years. And, Mr. Speaker—I would like to place this on record because I think it is of vital interest—the agriculturists of Canada should be told what the change in policy in Britain will mean to Canada. Major Elliot, the British Minister of Agriculture, is out to make Great Britain self-sustaining so far as agricultural products are concerned, if that be possible; he has stated that Great Britain will reduce her imports of agricultural products by a billion dollars, and what will that mean to this country? Will we be put on quotas with regard to eggs, apples, wheat and everything we grow? The effect of such a reduction in imports will be terrible so far as the agriculturist is concerned.

[Mr. Reid.]

If I had time I should like to develop this further, because I think the country should be made cognizant of the actual conditions which face us in regard to agriculture. Lord De la Warre, when asked with regard to the marketing schemes in Great Britain, intimated to the House of Lords that Great Britain was endeavouring to make herself self-sustaining with regard to all agricultural products, and, what is important, he said that agricultural policy started at the Ottawa conference. Perhaps the Prime Minister thought he put it over the old country people when he practically forced them to sign on the dotted line two days before they left Canada, but the old country has now instituted a policy that is going to be very detrimental to the agricultural interests of this country. Our markets there will be greatly curtailed.

A great deal has been said with regard to bacon and hogs in this country; the Prime Minister stated that we could ship up to 2,500,000 hundredweights per year. We might do that, if we had that amount, but just until the agreements come up for review, for Great Britain has recently created establishments in the old country to take care of 4,000,000 hundredweights of hams and bacon annually, and the British dealers have guaranteed 2,000,000 hogs this year, or the equivalent of 2,000,000 hundredweights. The total imports of hams and bacon into Great Britain last year amounted to about 10,000,000 hundredweights, and now Great Britain is prepared to produce and take care of almost half her requirements. Great Britain has gone further likewise with regard to wheat; this year the acreage has been greatly increased and a surplus of 30,000,000 bushels is expected. They want also to put a quota on butter and cream products entering that country, as well as on almost every other agricultural product. So we find that the British agriculturist is now coming into his own, and before long Great Britain will not be the great market outlined by the Prime Minister in 1932. I should not be at all surprised if the election came on before the agreements expire in 1935, because in my opinion the longer they go on the worse the condition will become.

I would not have taken up the time of the house with these statements, Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the boastful statements that were made and the finger of scorn that was pointed at some of us on this side when we ventured to disagree with the government. Something has been started in Great Britain, however, and I suppose we can give the Prime Minister full credit for it. It is no wonder that we hear rumours that the right hon. gentleman is to be mentioned in the King's birthday honours. I hope he does not leave this country before the next election; it would be too bad if he did not wait to hear what the Canadian people will say when they have a chance to speak. Personally I hope the election will come this year, but if the Prime Minister is so honoured by Great Britain he can leave Canada and say to the British agriculturists, "I did it; I changed your fiscal policy," but what about the poor agriculturists in this land? The Prime Minister will not use the boastful language with which he concluded that previous speech, when he said, "Wider still and wider shall thy bounds be set." Perhaps he intends going to Great Britain to set the bounds for British trade.

I believe the situation is very serious, so much so that only last week both Australia and New Zealand intimated to Great Britain that if she would remove the quota restrictions from their agricultural products they would allow British goods free entry. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would follow the lead of those two countries and make a similar offer. With regard to our wheat I think Canada should have a greater quota than was given either Australia or New Zealand, because those countries have a market in Great Britain for both mutton and wool to the extent of some $300,000,000. I believe the Prime Minister has failed because, instead of keeping agriculture to the fore as our primary industry, he has endeavoured to make industry first. We are a great agricultural nation, and our whole policy should be built with that idea in mind. We cannot be a leading industrial nation and at the same time a leading agricultural nation.

Mr. D'ARCY B. PLUNKETT (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it was rather amusing to listen to the last speaker (Mr. Reid). The hon. gentleman is not very consistent as between his speeches and his votes. He condemns the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) because he has ruined the agriculturists of this country, yet we find the hon. gentleman voting for the marketing bill, which is designed to assist agriculture in Canada. I wonder if he will dare deny that bill on third reading; certainly he did not have the courage to vote against it on second reading.

With reference to the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), I think the discussion has been so full that I need make very little comment at this time. I have but one statement to make in that regard. The Minister of Finance has met existing conditions in this country with courage; he has given a complete statement of our financial position and he has exhibited the same resourceful strength that he showed last year when he delivered the previous budget.

There are many policies that are being enunciated by this government; perhaps there never has been a government in the history of Canada which has brought in so many policies designed to benefit the people. In all the criticism that has been offered we do not find much said as to the courage of the government; we do not find any reasonable suggestions to replace any of the measures they have offered, but we do find the usual criticism offered by the Liberal party. I sometimes wonder if they have joined the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. They usually criticize; they are like those who appear before the banking and commerce committee and present theories, talks and readings from professors and economists. The Liberal party is following along that line. Should they join, this House of Commons will be delighted to hear those theories of economy, not one of which has been tried out, and not one of which they are sure about.

May I congratulate the government in its intention to bring down some provision for public buildings throughout Canada. I believe they should attend to government buildings first, and then direct their attention to any road work which might help Canada as a nation to take care of tourist traffic. It was estimated that in 1933 the tourist traffic brought Canada $117,000,000. We must endeavour to continue to secure that trade, and with the improved conditions throughout the world there is no reason why this country, with its great physical resources and scenic attractions, should not be able to command a great part of tourist travel.

The government is to be congratulated upon the tremendous saving in controllable expenditures made in the last three years, amounting, we are informed, to $83,000,000. This figure would seem to give positive evidence of the government's intention to relieve the taxpayers of Canada of their heavy burdens. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) who has just taken his seat, made the surprising statement that there had been no reduction in unemployment in Canada. In this connection I should like to read into the record a statement which appears in the Victoria Daily Times, that Liberal pillar of goodness. It is as follows:

Relief Lists 14,000 Lower

Reduction of more than ten per cent in province since February, 1933.

Reduction of 14,000 in the number of people receiving relief in British Columbia in February as compared with the same month last year is shown in figures released to-day by the provincial relief department.

I might suggest that does not include the present premier of British Columbia and his relief activities. The hon. member made another statement to the effect that in Great Britain the gates had been closed against the agricultural products of this country. I quote again from the Victoria Daily Times:

Lumber Trade With Empire Headed for High Record Figure

Shipments to United Kingdom in first quarter exceed any full year's business prior to 1933; total water-borne trade of province more than doubles.

British Columbia's empire lumber trade is definitely headed for a record year, according to statistics on exports for the first quarter just released by P. Z. Caverhill, chief forester of the British Columbia government forestry branch.

Significant figures of the trade are: In the first three months the province did more lumber business with the United Kingdom than in the full twelve months of any previous year except 1933, and has already reached nearly half the 1933 total.

Shipments to Great Britain jumped by close to 100,000,000 feet, or nearly 400 per cent over the same period last year. Exports to Australia advanced almost 30 per cent over 1933.

At the same time the province more than doubled its foreign export business and multiplied shipments to eastern Canada fourfold in the same period as compared with last year.

I believe these two statements should refute the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster. When Canada is leading other nations in recovery it is not fair that hon. members in this House of Commons should endeavour to belittle the efforts of our government.

May I speak further upon the building construction program? Before I became a member of this house I was interested in construction, and I believe I understand some of the difficulties and troubles with which those interested in building construction activities have had to contend during the last four years. Building construction was the first to feel the business depression, and has been the last to respond to conditions which are more favourable or which more nearly approach those of normal times. Building permits issued by sixty-one cities in December, 1933, represented construction work valued at $1,957,855, as compared with $1,609,874 in November, 1933, and $1,569,255 in December, 1932. There was, therefore, an increase of $365,981, or 22·7 per cent in December as compared with the preceding month, and of $406,600, or 25·9 per cent, as compared with the same month of 1932. The December, 1933 figure was the lowest for the month in any year since 1920, except 1932.

When we consider the amount of money that has been paid all over the country by the dominion government in rentals for office and other space in buildings which they do not own, I can see no reason why a campaign looking to the erection of government buildings in cities and towns where they are required should be opposed. The time has passed when the government should be held up by people who ask high rentals and exorbitant prices. I do not wish to go into details in this connection, but hon. members well know that many of the rentals charged the dominion government are not fair. In the larger cities we find that the dominion government offices are scattered; the city of Ottawa is a good example. Hon. members wishing to do business with a government department sometimes have to visit six or eight buildings. These offices should be under one roof. In many instances the government is paying excessive rates. The buildings should be centralized, not scattered all across the city. The experience hon. members had in the past winter was surely enough to antagonize hon. members against the present system.

We continually hear about, and our sympathetic attention is drawn to the farmers, railway employees, automobile industry workers and others, but we seldom hear anything said on behalf of the great mass of artisans and mechanics who by their work in creating new buildings and homes have done so much to build up our cities, and who have for the most part invested in homes for themselves, thereby ensuring their continued residence and citizenship in their respective cities.

Very little depreciation has to be written off public buildings built under the modern system, therefore they are a much more valuable contribution to the public welfare than is money spent upon good roads and beautification schemes which involve a big outlay of money and entail a large expense for upkeep. Building construction takes in a more varied line of endeavour and more separate branches of industry than any other commercial or industrial activity. Its ramifications run into and involve the steel industry, lumber and woodworking plants, cement and brick industries, metal work, interior furnishings and the work of all craftsmen necessary to complete first class modern buildings.

Many of the mechanics and artisans employed in the erection and completion of such buildings have, through taxation and unemployment, lost their homes. Yet I believe that particularly in the cities organized labour, during the last three years of depression, has contributed more than any other section of our people to sound citizenship. They have done this through sacrifice and by their endeavour to distribute equally among their association members all labour which was offered. And so, by the creation of a community spirit, they have been a help and benefit one to another. In the city of Victoria, British Columbia, the typographical union has divided hours of employment so that by each man taking one or two days off from his labour a division is made whereby all may have a fair and just opportunity to work. The money spent in construction work reaches every class of our citizenship and is distributed throughout the whole community for the benefit of all. It affects all lines of skilled as well as unskilled labour. The great majority of mechanics spend their money freely, with a resulting favourable effect upon the city and municipal life of our country.

In presenting these facts I would ask the government earnestly to consider adopting this plan in many cities and towns throughout Canada. I am sure the money would be well spent and would bring splendid results.

It has been intimated that in the near future there may be changes made in the British North America Act. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that in this suggestion we are starting at the right place. I think that in this dominion we have too much government, and conditions are such that some restrictions should be put upon our provinces. I see no reason why the three western provinces, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, should not have a change made in their system of government. Their interests are one and the same, and unless some effort is made to eliminate the cost of government in these western provinces we shall continually have them coming to Ottawa and knocking at the doors of parliament for more money. I do not see, Mr. Speaker, how the western provinces can be relieved from their present financial condition unless some such assertive action as I indicate be taken.

It might be suggested that British Columbia join with the three prairie provinces, but from its geographical position its interests are not identical with those of the three prairie provinces. But why not start at the foothills? Let British Columbia manage its own affairs, and let the three prairie provinces join together and eliminate some of this cost of government which is so ruinous. The interests of British Columbia are considerably different from theirs. British Columbia has its big lumbering industry and its great fishing interests, whch are not of the same interests as those of the prairie provinces.

I would not for a moment venture to suggest anything along that line in regard to the maritime provinces. Their representatives in this house are so assertive that it would be very difficult to suggest that Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island should join together, but geographically, looking at the map, it would not seem out of place, and I rather fancy it could be done if its representatives would only consider it.

In regard to the financial condition of British Columbia, before the recent election there we heard nothing but "work and wages." Well, the legislature was called together, and the premier congratulated its members upon being the finest looking body, both mentally and physically, that he had ever seen. They got through the session and as soon as the session was over it was no longer work and wages; it was "On to Ottawa." But while these legislators were performing their duties as legislators for the province the cost of education in British Columbia was increased by $50,000 being voted to the university of British Columbia. Provision was also made for higher salaries for school teachers—high school teachers I think. They even created one additional member for the legislature; this legislature was composed of such a fine body of men that they had to have one more to complete the circle. Is it fair for any provincial government to come to this parliament or to the Prime Minister and ask for a loan of $8,000,000 when they have not put their own house in order, when they have not shown the least sign of curtailment of extravagance, and then expect this government to keep the civil servants on a lower rate of pay while lending money to British Columbia to spend? These are questions which I would ask this government to consider. Let there be no misunderstanding; I want this government to help British Columbia if it is at all possible. This government will have to help British Columbia, but I think they should ask British Columbia to say what they are going to do with the money, and to what extent they are going to curtail the extra expenditures which they are imposing on the taxpayers of that province. Have they any right to shift the burden of taxation from the provincial to the dominion taxpayers?—for that is what it amounts to. The money has to be got, and it is simply a question of shifting the burden of taxation from one set of shoulders to another. But so long as the province shows no evidence of retrenchment I think it is better that the money should not be loaned.

Out in British Columbia they have created an economic council, a brain trust; they have an industrial relations board, and special private advisers. Does that help at all in creating throughout that province the feeling that it is going to pull out of its difficulties? Why should this legislative assembly of men and women, which was so good looking a body, have to create an economic council and an industrial relations board to help them out in their legislative work?

I wish I could persuade some of the members from the maritime provinces to come out to British Columbia and live. I am sure that if we had their spirit we would get many of the things that we are asking for. One thing I am sure will not be denied by any person who has listened to the representatives of the maritime provinces in this house making known the wants of their constituencies, and that is that if they should ever travel extensively and visit Jerusalem, they will surely qualify for a position at the wailing wall. May I suggest that their representations have not been without result? In looking at the estimates for 1935 I find that the following items are to be applied specifically to the maritime provinces.

Besides the benefits to be derived from the Washington treaty there are the advantages gained through the Duncan report—all, I suppose, part of maritime rights, which I sometimes consider more or less as special rights or favours. On April 11 last the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) at page 2058 of Hansard made a very direct appeal for the sum of $15,000 to be expended for the relief of the fishermen of the town of Canso. I must compliment him for his ample representations on behalf of the fishermen of the town of Canso, even if I cannot commend his modesty.

Then there is vote No. 169, to provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council, for a grant to maritime fishermen of $4,050. There is also an amount of $160,000 authorized by statute, payable as fishing bounty. Then there is vote No. 154, for fisheries, to assist in the conservation and development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $85,000. Of this amount some $46,000 is to be spent in the maritime provinces, and even the town of Canso receives a percentage of the votes I have mentioned.

That brings me to another question which I think has never been fairly dealt with, and which is of great importance to the city I represent. I refer to the Pelagic Sealing treaty. Daily during the session and at the end of every session when I go home to Victoria I have from one to a dozen requests made to me by private individuals, committees and deputations, to bring before this government the Pelagic Sealing treaty with a view to having some better arrangements made. This is perhaps one of the most unfortunate things that former Canadian governments have done. They took away from the working man his means of making a living; they did the same thing with those involved in the business but no satisfactory reimbursement has been made. It is said that these men have been reimbursed, but I intend to show just how they have been reimbursed and leave it to hon. members from the maritimes to say whether they think what was done is satisfactory.

When the pelagic sealing on the Pacific was stopped by treaty, the number of claims for payment were 1,605 involving an aggregate amount of slightly over $9,200,000. The number of claims allowed was 142, the number disallowed being 1,463. I do not intend to criticize the legal judgments of the commissioner, who was a very capable gentleman, but I should like to present the human side of this matter. Unless it is cleared up by the appointment of another commission, there will always be regret and disappointment and a feeling of failure on the part of all the sealers who were in the business. In 1912 the approximate number of seals in the herd was 215,940. In 1932 the approximate number was 1,219,961. The total cost of the judicial inquiry by Mr. Justice Audette was $35,546.93 and the total sum paid to claimants was $60,663.75. Under the terms of this treaty Canada has received from the United States, $1,074,030.58; from Japan, $11,805.17 and from Russia, $5,308.97. Although this huge total has been placed in the consolidated revenue fund, only the miserable total of $60,663 has been paid out to the sealers.

When the learned commissioner delivered his findings and awards, compensation was allowed only to those who were actively engaged in the sealing industry during the year 1911. All those who were not so engaged during that year were totally excluded from any compensation. Is it fair or just to exclude all those who were not sealing during 1911? They might have been active during all the previous years and might have been prevented from operating during 1911 by sickness or other causes. I should like to quote a statement made by Lord Herschell as reported in Hansard debates of the House of Lords on June 24, 1912. He made this statement:

> Compensation is to be paid to the Canadian sealers who lose their occupation owing to the provisions of the treaty.

Can it be said that that has been carried out when to-day distress exists and many families have been broken up? This is something like the famous case in Dickens of Jarndyce versus Jarndyce; they are still hoping something will be done. Successive governments have come and gone; the Liberal government was in for nine years while the present government was in power before, yet nothing has been done. The people of Victoria will never be satisfied until some further restitution is made. The whole civic life of Victoria was affected by this industry. Boats were provisioned and supplies purchased there, and people who were not directly engaged in the industry have suffered. Compensation has been paid to some boat owners but in many cases nothing has been done for those who carried on this dangerous vocation of going down to the sea in order to earn a livelihood by sealing. I should like to quote the judgment of Baron Alderson in Moon versus Burden, (1848) volume 2, Exchequer Report, 22, page 40. He stated:

> It is contrary to the first principles of justice to punish those who have offended against no law, and surely to take away existing rights without compensation is in the nature of punishment.

Surely that is the law of this country. I submit that these sealers have not been properly compensated. Their rights have been taken away; they have not erred or offended any law, yet they have been punished by not receiving just and adequate compensation.

This treaty remains in force until twelve months after written notice has been given by one or more of the parties to all the others of the desire to terminate it. It is also provided that following such notice, on the request of any one of the high contracting parties a conference shall be held to consider and, if possible, to agree upon a further extension of the convention with such additions or modifications, if any, as may be found desirable. We have on the Pacific coast a herd of over one million seals which is preying upon the halibut and salmon fisheries. The government has endeavoured to make treaties with the United States for the conservation of our fisheries, but could there be any greater menace to the fishing interests of the Pacific coast than the allowing of this herd to exist? Is this to be done and the fishermen receive no further remuneration? This herd has been allowed to increase and yet the government is attempting to make a treaty to help the halibut and salmon fisheries. What should be done is to curtail the number of these seals and pay proper compensation to these fishermen on the Pacific coast. Business firms throughout Canada are advertising the sale of seal skins. They are stamped with a maple leaf, but I wonder if the purchasers know the price paid by some families in my city? I wonder if they know of the efforts made to place before the different governments the need of some redress? I think their claim is a just one. All they ask is that another commission be appointed. I suggest that this commission should consist of a member of the exchequer court, an admiralty judge from British Columbia and a layman who understands fishing and sea life. If another hearing is held and only one person is found to be deserving, the government will have done its duty and the people will be satisfied. There are those who feel they have been discriminated against and not treated fairly. To show just how Victoria has been affected, I should like to read a letter addressed to me by the clerk of the municipal council of Victoria. This is dated April 22, 1933, and reads:

> Re ex-sealers now inmates of Aged Men's Home, Victoria
> Dear Sir:
>
> I beg to inform you that the Victoria city council, at its meeting held yesterday afternoon, passed the following resolution, namely:
>
> "Whereas three Victoria men, namely, James McGill, William Dawson and George Louis Chapman, formerly engaged as pelagic sealers on the Pacific coast are now being maintained by and at the expense of the city of Victoria in its home for the aged and infirm;
>
> "And whereas by international agreement the dominion government is in possession of accumulated annual payments over a long period of years in trust for the distinct purpose of compensating Canadian sealers for the loss of their industry and their property;
> "Therefore be it resolved by the Victoria city council that the dominion government be asked to take immediate steps to provide for compensation to the sealers and their families out of the said fund accumulated for that purpose; and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Canada and Mr. D. B. Plunkett, M.P., for Victoria."

This was the resolution passed asking that justice be done in this matter.

Let me quote from Hansard, 1912-13, at page 12046, a statement made by Mr. Hazen:

My hon. friend knows that in 1910 a treaty was entered into between Great Britain, Japan, the United States and Russia, under which all pelagic sealing on the part of these countries was abolished, and under which it was agreed that Canada should be paid fifteen per cent of the catch of the United States at the Pribiloff islands, fifteen per cent of the catch at the Japanese islands, and ten per cent of the catch at the Russian islands, and that an advance payment of $200,000 should be made to Canada on account.

Just think of that, Mr. Speaker. Here was a government that did not create this business, a business that would not have been created had it not been for the hardihood and the spirit of adventure of these men who went to sea; yet that government demands $200,000 and gets it—the United States pays it.

That $200,000 has been paid, and claims have been made on the part of those who, in consequence of this treaty, and of the regulations in the Treaty of Paris have had to cease making a living by pelagic sealing. It has been determined to appoint a commission to inquire into the validity of those claims,—

Obviously they took a wrong point of view. They were not sure that the sealers had a valid claim. They did not say that they would look the whole thing over and see what could be done, but they decided to inquire whether the claim was valid or not.

—and an order in council has been passed appointing Judge Audette, assistant judge of the exchequer court, as commissioner. Judge Audette will give notice to all interested, and will hold his first court in Victoria on the 15th of July. It may also be necessary—

And this is where the maritime members come in. I did not know that they engaged in sealing down there.

—to hold a court in Nova Scotia, as several claims have been put in by people at Halifax who contend that they were engaged in the sealing business and that they are entitled to compensation. This vote is to cover the expenses of that commission.

The vote was:

To provide for costs of proceedings before the International Joint Commission, $10,000.

According to a later Hansard it appears that they had to get more money. The government of that day seemed to think that this was a little affair, something of no account; but under the terms of the treaty there has been paid into the dominion treasury the sum of $1,091,144.72. In Hansard of 1914, at page 2372, Mr. Hazen is reported as follows:

[Mr. Plunkett.]

My hon. friend is aware that under the treaty entered into with the United States, with Russia and Japan, pelagic sealing is done away with. Canada is paid fifteen per cent of the sealskins thrown up on the shore by the United States, fifteen per cent by Russia, and ten per cent by Japan. The United States has paid us $200,000 as an advance payment. Pelagic sealing is now abolished.

That has been received. Claims were made by those who were engaged in the sealing business and in order to arrive at the amount which would be paid to those whose living and occupation have been interfered with, Judge Audette of the exchequer court was appointed a commissioner to investigate. Some 1,500 claims have been submitted. We had a sum placed in the estimates for the year ended March 31, of $10,000. Judge Audette has been proceeding with the work and it was found that the $10,000 was insufficient. Only a comparatively small amount will have to be voted in the supplementary estimates for the year commencing April 1, in order to finish the work which is now well under way and which will be finished during the summer. It is to make provision for this work that this amount is required.

It is unfortunate that east is east and west is west, but the fact is that we are so divided and there is such a vast distance across the country. If hon. members from eastern Canada could visit the west they would have a different conception of that country and would appreciate the glorious part in which the people there have played in building up that section. I appreciate the advice and the wisdom we get from the east and I earnestly hope that I shall be able to prevail on this government to do something to relieve the situation of the sealers, who feel that they have not had just compensation.

Mr. OSCAR-L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, like hon. members who have preceded me in this debate, I also deem it my duty to extend to the hon. Minister of Finance, on behalf of my constituents and myself, our sincerest and deepest sympathy in his bereavement.

At the same time, as the Canadian press informed us this morning of the decease of Mrs. Rhodes, it published the sad news of the death of a former member of parliament, Colonel O. E. Talbot. For about fifteen years he represented, in this house, the county which I have the honour to represent now. Some who are, at present, members of this house, were acquainted with him and will recall his qualities both of heart and soul which had won him the esteem and respect of his colleagues. May I, sir, as representative of the county of Bellechasse extend to Mrs. Talbot and family the expression of my deepest sympathy.

I do not intend, sir, to review the entire budget statement of the hon. Minister of Finance. I will restrict myself to the analysis of one or two statements from the viewpoint which interests the group which I have the privilege of representing in the house. In his budget speech, after having referred to the violent and universal drop in the prices of farm products and the spread between the prices of raw materials and manufactured goods, at page 2269 of Hansard, the hon. Minister of Finance adds:

For this reason the government has consistently pursued a policy designed to stimulate a rise in prices by every sound means.

I wish to examine, sir, in the few minutes at my disposal, the question as to whether the general raising of prices is really the remedy which must be sought under the present circumstances.

I have very great doubts as to the efficiency of the remedy proposed and I do not think that a general enhancing of prices will cure the ills from which agriculture is dying, at present. What has caused the ruin of agriculture is not so much the drop in prices of farm products as the exaggerated spread between the prices at which farmers have to sell and purchase. That is an undeniable truth. Likewise a general rise in prices will in no way affect the situation. In raising the whole structure of prices all the various price levels are proportionally raised, the upper levels as well as the lower, and the same interval is maintained. In other words, the tune is not changed by raising the tone.

It is more a question of restoring the purchasing power of the farmer than promoting artificially a general raise in prices. In fact, agriculture would be prosperous if farm products could be bartered for an equivalent quantity of manufactured goods.

The reasons for the drop in the income, and purchasing power of the farmer are numerous. During the war when European nations were under arms and unable to produce food and other articles of prime necessity, the farmers of America as well as industries considerably increased their production. Once the war was over, European nations resumed their farming activities and reopened their factories, with the result that they ceased relying on America. Production should have then been reduced so as to adjust itself to the demand. The remedy was applied with fairly good results in connection with industries; however it is not such an easy matter to adjust farm products to market demand. That is why the prices of farm products dropped so considerably as to be out of proportion with the prices of manufactured goods which the farmer is obliged to purchase.

The farmers endeavoured to reduce their expenditure in operating costs, hand labour, buildings, implements, material etc., however, they were unable to reduce their fixed charges, such as liabilities, interest and taxes, which have not decreased but rather increased in the post war period. As their returns decreased and their purchasing power dropped, they ceased being the clients of industries and dealers, and that brought about industrial unemployment in cities. Industry and commerce will not be prosperous so long as the purchasing power of farmers is not restored. This may be done by reducing the spread between the prices of farm products and those of industry.

A few figures taken from official publications of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics will prove that the drop in prices of farm products, during the crisis, was out of proportion with the drop of those of manufactured goods and that the unreasonable spread which resulted is the cause of the depression in agriculture. Incidentally, these figures will perhaps explain how it happens that, while the farmers receive from the sale of the their milk, tobacco, and their animals less than the cost of production, the magnates of the dairy industry, cigarette manufacturers and packers accumulate enormous profits and vote themselves salaries that railway presidents enjoyed before the crisis, as certain investigations have shown.

The figures which I desire to submit establish a comparison between the years 1926 and 1933, the ratio figure 100 refers to 1926. One may see that, from 1926 to 1933, the price of farm products has dropped from 100 to 51, while the price of building materials has dropped from 100 to 78·3; the price of manufactured goods from 100 to 70·3 and the wholesale price, generally, from 100 to 67·2.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): When the house rose, sir, I was quoting figures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics showing that from 1926 to 1933, the prices of farm products dropped, 49 per cent while in the same period, the price of manufactured goods only dropped 30 per cent, and building material 21·7 per cent.

If we now compare the prices of last year with those of 1926, but especially with the prices of 1913, the year preceding the war, one will note,—and this will astonish many—that the prices of farm products are lower than they were in 1913, and, moreover, that the prices of all other products are higher in 1933 —the year which is considered as the worst of the crisis—than they were before the declaration of war. For instance, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the index price of all products being 100 in 1913, was in 1933, quoted at 105. The household equipment and supplies, which were at 100, in 1913, rose to 124·6 in 1933. The building material which was at 100, in 1913, rose to 119·5, in 1933. Textiles which were at 100, in 1913, increased to 119·9, in 1933. Food, beverage and tobacco rated at 100 in 1913, increased to 103·5, in 1933. Farm products passed from the index figure of 100, in 1913, to 80, in 1933, after having been as low as 75·1, in 1932 and at 86·1, in 1931. Apart from farm products, there is but one exception—it may amaze many in the house—it is gasoline which, according to these statistics sold cheaper in 1933 than in 1913. The index price for gasoline being then 100 dropped to 71·6 in 1933.

I shall now continue the comparison which I established before six o'clock, between the prices of 1926 and those of 1933. The price of steers on the hoof, from 1926 to 1933, on the Winnipeg market, fell from 100 to 60·8 while the price of beefsteak cuts from the same steer only fell to 76·4. The same situation exists for sheep: from 1926 to 1933, the price paid to farmers, on the Toronto market, dropped 60 per cent; however the retail price paid by the consumer, only dropped 39·4 per cent. The price paid for milk to the farmer, in Toronto, passes from the index number 100 to 65·5, while the price paid by the consumer did not go below 78·8 from 1926 to 1933. The price paid, in Toronto, to farmers for hogs dropped from 100 to 42·5, in 1926 to 1933, but the price of fresh pork only dropped to 50·6. The price of wool in Montreal, dropped from 100, in 1926, to 46·4, in 1933, however, the price of cloth and textiles only dropped to 63·3, within the same period. Wheat, at Port Arthur, from 1926 to 1933, dropped to 40·8, but the price of bread, in Toronto, only dropped to 91·8 during the same period.

These are sufficient examples to show that as long as such a spread exists between the prices of natural products and those of manufactured goods, and between the prices paid to producers and those paid by the consumer, the economic situation of our nation will not materially improve. It is this unbalanced state which must be adjusted and I repeat that this will not be accomplished by a general raising of prices which will maintain the same disparity and spread between prices; this result will only be obtained by the decrease of this spread between the prices of natural products and those of manufactured goods, between the prices paid to producers and those paid by the consumers.

I have been informed by my constituents that the average earnings of the eastern farmer of Canada is not over $400 per year. In most cases it is far from reaching this amount. Therefore, no one can afford to be ill among farmers, because he has not the means to pay for the doctor's services. Still less can he quarrel because he would be unable to pay a lawyer's fees. He cannot afford to give his children a higher education than the one received in the primary rural school. He can neither improve his buildings, nor replace his farm implements which fall to pieces, nor can he improve his land or live stock. As you may judge the farmer cannot make any outlay, thus trade and industry suffer from it.

What is the remedy? I hear hon. members opposite state: the Natural Products Marketing Board.

I admit that I have not much faith in this intricate and impracticable measure. I have neither faith in an army of budgetivorous officials saddled on our finances in order to tell farmers what to do, force them to take out government licences, make out reports on the work performed on the farm and dispose of their products. I think the farmers are able to look after their own business better than the government can and with much less waste, disturbance and injustice. If this measure is such an excellent one, if the salvation of agriculture depends on this bill introduced with the flurry of drums and trumpets why did not the government introduce it three years ago?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Why does the government introduce it only after being in office three years, and just on the eve of an appeal to the people?

When speaking, just now, on the raising of prices on articles which the farmers must purchase, I forgot to quote the prices showing the increase on farm machines. I have just found on my desk a schedule establishing a comparison between the prices of certain farming machines in 1913 and in 1933. I think it would be useful to place these price comparison on Hansard.

An ordinary plough sold $14.75, in January, 1913, and $20.35 in January, 1933; a machine known among our people as a "cultivator" a kind of harrow but more complicated than the ordinary disc harrow, sold in January, 1913, $81.50, and in January, 1933, $140; an ordinary rake sold $31, in 1913, and in 1933, $49.25; a 6 ft. harrow sold at $148, in 1913, and $217.75 in February, 1933; a mowing-machine 4½ ft. by 6 ft. $53, in January, 1913, and $86.50 in February, 1933; an ordinary harrow, $16, in 1913 and $25.38 in February, 1933; the disc-harrow sold at $26, in 1913 and $49.75 in February, 1933; wagons $76.25, in 1913, and $144.25 in 1933. The prices which I have just quoted are the current prices in Ontario, however, these prices apply to all provinces and show that while the price of farm products dropped 20 per cent in 1913 to 1933, that of farm machinery during the same period, increased twofold.

I shall now refer to the marketing or state monopoly, if you prefer this term, of farm products. We are informed that the measure is similar to the one enacted a few years ago in Great Britain, and also somewhat similar to the new scheme of President Roosevelt, in the United States. The examples of leading nations are not always good to follow, in Canada. Conditions in Great Britain and the United States are not similar to ours. Great Britain imports natural products and exports manufactured goods in large quantities. We do the opposite; for instance 80 per cent of our wheat is exported. The United States with an enormous population of 125,000,000 souls, and whose production, climate and requirements are most diversified, can practically support themselves. Conditions are different in Canada with a population of 10 to 11 million people, spread along a narrow strip of land from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. Therefore instead of concentrating agriculture under a board, instead of the state monopolizing our markets of farm products and organizing the dumping of our natural products, we should endeavour to increase our markets abroad, lower the tariff barriers, improve foreign trade relations and conclude reciprocal agreements and trade treaties with countries which wish to trade with us.

A Quebec newspaper "l'Evenement" quoted on the subject Mr. Cordell Hull, secretary of commerce in the United States:

As minister of commerce in the United States, Mr. Hull sees but one way to restore the general activities of the American nation: reconquer foreign markets, partly lost through an exaggerated policy of high protection. All authors who deal with this subject agree that as soon as tariff protection has fulfilled its object—the establishment and growth of national industries—wisdom requires that tariff duties be reduced, so as to prevent the fleecing of consumers and retaliation by foreign countries.

This feeling has become so wide spread in the United States that, recently, Mr. Ogden Mills, secretary of the treasury, in the ultra-protectionist administration of Mr. Hoover, stated practically the same thing:

We shall have to abandon our present policy of isolation and of intense nationalism, and, to a certain degree, amend our recent tariff policy. This opinion coming from an orthodox republican, may seem strange. However, I have never understood that, intelligently applied, a policy of sound protection, based on the spread existing between the cost of production here and abroad, should necessitate the erection of impassable tariff barriers, the annihilation of our trade with the rest of the world and the sacrifice of the efficient farmer to industrial inefficiency.

These are the views of this gentleman whom I might designate as a converted republican who thinks that the United States have had enough of this exaggerated high protection policy.

Instead of assuming the part of farmer, dealer, industrialist and undertaking to regulate the markets and openings for our natural products, the government should endeavour to find markets abroad for the exportable surplus of our products and thus decrease the cost of articles farmers have to purchase. That is the greatest service which the government could render to the farming class.

It is not a matter of increasing all prices, as a whole, but one of reducing the spread between prices. It is also a question of establishing a more equitable proportion between the prices of necessaries bought by farmers and the prices at which they sell their products. To attain that purpose the government must use good common sense as regards their tariff policy, it is unnecessary to monopolize production and the marketing of our natural products.

In the national field of activities, the government could equally help agriculture without having recourse to red tape and annoying paternalism with which we have been entertained in the house for the last two weeks. Why does not the government endeavour to establish better relations between the farmers and those who handle their products, dealers and distributors of national products, in order that, according to the expression in use, a greater proportion of the consumer's dollar finds its way into the pocket of the producer? After all, those who produce and distribute the natural products are bound by common interests and it is to their advantage to agree among themselves; and such an agreement would be possible if it were promoted and helped by the higher authorities, the State. The government, instead of substituting itself for them, could endeavour to promote a better co-operation among them and bring back to their social sense of justice and the realization of the higher interests of the nation those who might be inclined to fleece the people.

In other words, sir, before substituting itself to the farmer, the industrialist and the dealer, the government should enable these various groups of society to devise for themselves remedies for the ills from which they suffer. I found this idea in a work by Sir Alfred Salter, often quoted in the house as an economist of high standing. Sir Alfred Salter precisely states that governments should allow the initiative to the various groups stated above and substitute itself in the least possible measure to individuals in the various fields of activity. The following is what Sir Alfred Salter states. I regret that I have not the French translation, I therefore will quote the English text:

> If we are to have a planned and directed system which is compatible with both political and economic freedom, the planning and control cannot be left to government alone. . . . It is inside the system itself that we must find those who will, in the main, plan and control—and they must do so through their own institutions. Those who occupy directing positions in every sphere must regard themselves as having not a single but a double responsibility. First, they must conduct their own business efficiently. Second they must construct, in cooperation with others engaged in similar activities, a framework of general policy and regulation which will prevent the action of the individual in business from reacting destructively upon others or upon the general public interest.

The government should play the part of moderator, arbitrator and regulator instead of seeking to monopolize the commerce of natural products. The government could give us with that end in view a commercial code for instance, which does not yet exist in Canada as it exists in a great number of countries. If a commercial code is necessary to other nations, it should be useful and advantageous to Canada. With a commercial code regulating the trade relations between the various groups of society, we could have courts of commerce, as in other countries, to enforce this code and settle the difficulties which might arise between people who are engaged in commerce and industry.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Why would the government not foster first the development of private enterprise and collective action among farmers, instead of telling them what to sow, obliging them to forward annual reports, restricting them in their production and undertaking to remunerate certain people for destroying part of their products?

Purchasing and marketing co-operative societies would no doubt help farmers to obtain cheaper what they require and receive better prices for the marketing of their products. Loan co-operative societies by uniting the borrowing power of classes or groups of producers, would promote the establishing of an intermediate credit which is lacking and yet necessary so as to help the farmers to bring their crops to maturity and to raise and fatten their live stock.

I have been informed that a too narrow and shabby interpretation of section 88 of the Bank Act prevented the banks granting to farmers this intermediate credit, namely, the credit which is intermediate between the ordinary commercial one and the long term credit. Heretofore banks have always refused farmers this intermediate credit.

I stated just now that it is not always wise to follow the example of the United States; however, I think that the government would be well advised to study the intermediate credit system inaugurated by the Roosevelt administration.

The system is based on the co-operation of debtors and also on the institution of land banks. The system is an excellent one and is worth looking into. The government might establish an institution, perhaps, not exactly the same but on similar lines, which would permit farmers, by pooling their borrowing power and resorting to cooperation, to obtain this intermediate credit which has hitherto been lacking to Canada.

As to long term credit, the government could also be of some service to the farmer by reducing the rate of interest on loans granted by the Canadian farm loan commission. At present the rate of interest charged to farmers is 6½ per cent. It is true that the Quebec provincial government contributes one per cent of this rate of interest, so that in Quebec the farmer only actually pays, thanks to the cooperation of the provincial government, 5½ per cent interest. It is, however, a fact that the dominion government or rather the Canadian farm loan commission receives 6½ per cent interest on loans granted to farmers. The Minister of Finance takes pride, and deservingly, in having succeeded in raising his last loan at 4½ per cent interest. If the Canadian government can borrow this money at 4½ per cent, it should grant loans to farmers at the same rate of interest and bear, as a service to the public, the cost and risks which fall upon the farm loan commission, instead of passing it on to the borrowers. I read in the Journal this morning that Nova Scotia, one of the smallest provinces of Canada, but probably one of the best administered, especially since the change of government, succeeded in negotiating a loan, these last days, at 3½ per cent interest.

If I have time, sir, I shall refer briefly to another part of the budget, the statement relating to the decrease of the burden of liabilities and interest which fall upon the farmers. At page 2270, the Minister of Finance states:

I have referred to the steps which have been taken to promote a lowering of interest rates. Interest is one of the rigid factors in our price structure and the burden of fixed charges caused by the extravagant borrowing of the war and post-war years, aggravated enormously as it has been by the fall in prices, and for public bodies also by the necessarily large expenditures for unemployment relief during the depression, has been too far frequently discussed in this house to need elaboration here. For certain individual debtors the burden has become unbearable and the government proposes to bring down at an early stage legislation designed to provide machinery whereby farmers who find themselves unable to pay the fixed charges on their outstanding debts will be able by an expeditious and inexpensive process to work out compromises with their creditors and to obtain new working capital. The guiding principle of this legislation will be to secure for the farmer a simplified debt structure reduced in size to a point where the carrying charges will be within the capacity of the farm enterprise to pay.

A little further at page 2271 the Minister adds:

I have already discussed the question of raising the price level which automatically serves to reduce the real burden of debt. A second factor which works both directly and indirectly is the gradual lowering of interest rates.

The minister does not state how this lowering in the interest rates will take place and how the debtors will transact with the creditors. He simply states that a bill will be introduced this session. Will the government purchase, discount or guarantee the mortgages of farmers? Will they extend the maturity of notes and take over the interests at the reduced rates? Will they encourage the transfer of these mortgages to the farm loan commission and allow the latter to grant to farmers a wider margin of credit and on easier terms? We do not know and there can only be conjectures.

However, I trust that, although favouring the reduction of the liabilities of farmers—on which we all agree—the government will not attempt to force the creditors to bear a loss either of capital or interest. This procedure would not remedy the evil. In fact it would only mean robbing Peter to pay Paul, despoiling one class of people for the benefit of another and would not be of a nature to increase much the general welfare of the nation. We have heard the Prime Minister referring to the sacredness of contracts in connection with the country's debts; the mortgage contract which the farmer signs with his neighbours is as sacred as the contract the government signs in connection with loans. I wish to point out to the Minister of Finance another angle of the question. In my province, it often happens, when farmers become old they transfer their property to one of their sons in consideration of a life annuity or they sell it to a neighbour who pays him the interest on the sale price, payable at fixed periods. Often our retired farmer has nothing else but this annuity or interest to live upon for the remainder of his days. The Minister of Finance would cause much harm to these people were he to reduce this annuity. However, I am certain that he does not intend to do so, and I equally feel sure he will reduce the burden of liabilities which weigh upon farmers, it is an urgent and necessary step, but in no way must it affect the rights of anyone.

In closing my remarks, sir, may I suggest to the hon. Minister of Finance that, before making too radical a change in our economic and financial system, he should take the advice of those who, in the house or cabinet, represent the views of the older settlers among Canadians, namely, the descendants of pioneers who founded this country and who have fought for the liberties we enjoy to-day. One, perhaps, too readily listens to radical suggestion—coming from persons recently settled, who know nothing of our history and traditions.

I therefore trust, sir, that before listening to the requests, suggestions and unreasonable demands of Canadians who have more recently settled here, the hon. Minister of Finance will inquire as to the feelings and views of those who, in the house represent the older Canadians.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is impossible at this time for one to rise to say a word about the budget without feeling the shadow of the great tragedy which came into the home and the private life of the hon. gentleman (Mr.

Rhodes) who but a few days ago stood in his place in this House of Commons and delivered the budget speech. It is one of those situations which cause a man to feel how utterly impotent he is to say any word which might carry consolation to the heart and soul of the man who suffers. We can with confidence say only this, that he himself knows as well as any other hon. member in this house the source from which genuine consolation can come. We may however extend to him our very deepest sympathy, and speaking for myself and for hon. members around me I should like so to do.

In the manner of its presentation and in the material it furnished to hon. members and to the country the budget has given splendid evidence of the tasks this government has undertaken and the problems it has been meeting during the last four years. It gives equally splendid evidence of the care with which the tasks have been undertaken. Having all the circumstances in mind, the country and the house have reason to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and the government upon the presentation they were able to make.

I wish very briefly to refer to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), to whom for the time being the responsibility has been given of acting in the capacity of official opposition critic. The amendment moved by the hon. member is quoted at page 2445 of Hansard as follows:—

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.
> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

As one reads and ponders these words I am sure he must reach the conclusion that the hon. member missed his calling. As a matter of fact he has lived too late; he should have been engaged in European diplomacy during the middle and last parts of the nineteenth century, a time when to clothe one's thoughts in words which could not be understood was to reach the highest attainment in that exalted profession. It would be interesting to have the hon. member analyze and show just what is meant by the last paragraph of that resolution. For my part I do not intend to attempt to do it, but I wish to refer to the first paragraph in which he intimates that a policy of economic nationalism is being followed by this government.

I shall not quote my hon. friend verbatim, because my time is not unlimited like his was; but he indicated that the policies of this government since 1930 had brought about conditions throughout the world that made it difficult for nations to sell goods to other nations—a policy of economic nationalism as illustrated by national tariffs. I cannot help wondering what the hon. gentleman and his friends were doing from 1921 to 1930, because if ever there was a period in this world's history when economic nationalism was emphasized, that was the period. The countries to which we sold goods had every one of them raised tariff barriers from fifty to five hundred per cent against Canadian goods, and in my search of the records I cannot find a single instance in which anything was done by the government of which my hon. friend was a member to alleviate the conditions or break down those barriers, particularly against the natural products of this country.

My hon. friend also referred to the trade agreements between Canada and other parts of the British Empire, and particularly between Canada and the United Kingdom. As my hon. friend did in relation to this budget, on October 20, 1932, he moved a sweeping resolution condemning every phase of the trade agreement entered into between Canada and the United Kingdom, and specifically mentioned two products, apples and lumber, to which I shall refer a little later. The apple growers in the Annapolis valley in Nova Scotia, from which province my hon. friend comes, were not going to profit in the slightest degree from this trade agreement, nor were the lumbermen in the maritime provinces going to profit in the slightest degree; as a matter of fact, no lumber producer anywhere in Canada was going to profit from it, according to my hon. friend, who levelled his criticism particularly against article 21 of the trade agreement, by which the government of the United Kingdom undertook to implement the preferences entered into in the agreement in the event of any other country attempting by government action to create what might be called illegitimate competition, or state-aid dumping, if you will. That part of the agreement came in for very special denunciation by my hon. friend. Speaking on the budget again this year he referred particularly to one or two of these commodities, especially lumber.

Let me point out what has happened as the direct result of the trade agreements in the case of three products only. The list is too long and the range too wide for me to attempt in the time at my disposal to cover all the articles, and I think these three will suffice, two of them being commodities to which my hon. friend particularly referred.

I take first apples. For the year ended March 31, 1932, we exported to the United Kingdom 1,422,603 barrels of apples valued at $5,577,339, and for the year ending March 31, 1934, 3,057,897 barrels valued at $11,368,385. That represented an increase of more than one hundred per cent in both volume and value. Yet that was one of the products which my hon. friend said could not profit in the slightest degree under the trade agreements.

I take another product of particular importance to Ontario, Quebec and the middle west—bacon and ham. For the year ended March 31, 1932, we exported to the United Kingdom 150,276 hundredweight valued at $1,751,231, and for the year ending March 31, 1934, 945,597 hundredweight valued at $12,366,426, representing an increase in volume of about six hundred per cent, and an increase in value of over seven hundred per cent. Yet my hon. friend and those around him stand up in this house and condemn the trade agreements between Canada and the United Kingdom and other parts of the empire, day in and day out, both in this house and out of it.

I come now to lumber. I have some personal knowledge of the lumber industry. I took some humble part in the efforts to bring about the arrangements by which the door into the United Kingdom market was opened to Canadian lumber products. My hon. friend stated and restated that the lumberman in the maritime provinces could not benefit from the agreements in relation to lumber. I do not know whether he is acquainted with what is going on in the maritime provinces, but I say to him that if he would consult the present premier of Nova Scotia, the premier of New Brunswick or the minister of lands and forests of either province, he would then be in a position to tell me that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are not able to fill the demands for lumber for export to the United Kingdom. Practically every available board and plank of sawn lumber in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the eastern part of Quebec was shipped out during the season of 1933. Firm contracts were entered into by exporters in Canada and importers in the United Kingdom to such an extent that it is extremely doubtful if these provinces will be able to meet the demand in 1934.

In the year ended March 31, 1932, Canada exported to the United Kingdom 117,051,000 feet of sawn lumber, valued at $3,252,621. By March 31, 1934, the first full year after the agreements had been in effect, the exports of sawn lumber amounted to 595,647,000 feet valued at $10,302,495. There was an increase of just five hundred per cent during the first year the trade agreements were in operation, and yet my hon. friend stands up in this house in April, 1934, and says that these trade agreements are of no value to the Canadian lumberman, the man who works in the lumbering industry, the farmer who produces bacon hogs or the man in Nova Scotia, Ontario or British Columbia who cultivates an apple crop.

I should like to direct the attention of the house to the manner in which increased exports of lumber affect the economic life of this country. In the brief presented by the Canadian lumber industry, in connection with which the lumber producers in every province in Canada were concerned, this statement is made—

Mr. MUNN: Would the hon. member state whether the figures he gave were those for the whole of Canada, or just for Quebec?

Mr. NICHOLSON: They were for the whole dominion. Let me repeat that during the first year the trade agreements were in operation, our exports of lumber to the United Kingdom increased to 595,000,000 feet. The following statement was made in the brief:

> The production of 1,000 million board feet of lumber furnishes direct employment to between 30,000 and 35,000 men per annum, and in addition the industry purchases, on a general average, supplies, equipment, et cetera, as set out in section 5 of the attached memoranda, to an amount equal to the total of its payrolls or the equivalent of the wage bill for an additional 30,000 to 35,000 men.
> The marketing of 1,000 million feet of lumber furnishes traffic to Canadian railroads amounting to between 55,000 and 60,000 carloads, meaning a substantial increase in the employment provided for railroad men.
> To summarize: the direct effect of the maintenance of an employed population in Canada for each 1,000 million board feet of lumber produced means wages to not less than 60,000 to 65,000 men.

There is no industry in Canada which means so much to the employment of labour and the circulation of money as the forest products industry. If any hon. member desires them, additional figures are available in this brief, but I shall not tire the house by reading them. However, I should like to give the figures in connection with our foreign trade. In 1931 the forest products industry had the second largest volume of export trade in money value, it being $184,641,000 as against $209,000,000 for agriculture and vegetable products combined. In 1931 the favourable balance of trade in the forest products industry was $163,261,000. I think this is important in the light of the efforts being made to misrepresent, belittle, and if possible destroy the effect and influence which these trade agreements have had upon the forest products industry, particularly the sawn lumber industry.

The aim and effort of the economic committees of the governments of the lumber and timber producing provinces—in their discussions with the British representatives they made it quite clear—was to have the exports of sawn lumber from Canada to the United Kingdom brought up to a thousand million feet. There have been times in the history of Canada when these exports amounted to fifteen hundred million feet, but it was felt that if our exports could be brought up to a thousand million feet, the industry would be so stimulated that it would be again in a position to play a very important part in the industrial life of this country. Certain hon. gentlemen and certain sections of the press consistently belittle these trade agreements and by means of insidious propaganda endeavour to create a feeling which would lead the British importers to believe that we are not playing fair with the British people. In a moment I shall refer to another aspect of this inter-empire trade which I think deserves some attention. In the meantime, I will point out certain indications of the influence which these trade agreements have. I ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), who is constantly berating the government for neglecting the part of the province from which he comes, northern Ontario, to note this. As a result of these trade agreements there is to-day a vessel finding her way up the St. Lawrence river, through the St. Lawrence canals, and into the great lakes to load lumber for Liverpool at the port of Little Current. This means the opening up of northern Ontario and the northwestern part of Quebec and provides an opportunity for stimulation of the lumber trade which it is impossible to exaggerate. This is not the only one, as others will follow during the season. This is something which has never happened before and which could not have happened but for these trade agreements.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, speaking on this matter, says: You must buy if you want to sell. That is perhaps true, but on the other hand, you must sell if you are going to buy and keep at it very long. The first thing we have to think of is selling something. The Canadian lumberman, the Canadian pulp and paper manufacturer and the Canadian wheat farmer cannot buy very much if they cannot sell their products.

Turning for a moment to the things which we might purchase from the United Kingdom: I have heard it stated so many times that I have become sick of listening to it—I have seen it stated in sections of the Canadian press which is distinctly anti-British Empire—that we in Canada are putting it over on the British Empire in that we are not purchasing the goods we should and that we made no efforts to open up avenues of trade during the conference at Ottawa by which the exporters of the United Kingdom could get their quid pro quo, as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth stated. Well, in this document which was designed, whether it did or not, to play some small part in the working out of these trade agreements there are five and a half closely typewritten pages setting out goods which the Canadian lumber industry as an industry buys, and specifically listing hundreds of articles purchased by the Canadian lumber trade in the woods and saw milling operations and in the pulp mills as well, goods which are imported into this country and which the British manufacturers themselves produce. There is something to be said for the necessity of the British manufacturer selling his goods to the Canadian purchaser. The Canadian lumbermen have to sell their goods to British importers and it is necessary that the goods be manufactured to suit the particular requirements of the British trade, a different standard of manufacture entirely from that prevailing in Canada or in the United States, our alternative market to some degree.

Now the question I ask is this. Why should it not be the business of the British trade commission right here in Canada to ascertain what these goods are and why it is that the British manufacturers are not selling them in this country? Why should the British steel manufacturers, in Sheffield or in any other part of England, not sell to the Canadian saw manufacturers steel plates out of which the Canadian saw manufacturers make saws? That is one item that comes to my mind, but there are hundreds of them, and more particularly in the type of logging carried on in the lumber industry in British Columbia. I grant at once that I am not so familiar with the industry in British Columbia as I am with it in eastern Canada, but I do know from a consultation we had during the working up of the brief that there is a vast variety of mechanical appliances imported by British Columbia lumbermen, not manufactured in Canada but in the United Kingdom, though, strange to say, imported from foreign countries. I submit that first for the consideration of the Department of Trade and Commerce in this country and secondly for the British trade commission itself.

I do not want to take up too much time with regard to an industry with which I am personally connected, although I will repeat that there is no industry, certainly none in Ontario or Quebec, that can play so important a part in bringing this country back to normal conditions and providing profitable employment for Canadian workmen, and to some extent markets for the produce of the farm, as the lumber industry.

I wish now to refer for a few minutes to the devastating attacks made upon the government in relation to the tax on gold mines, and in order that I may make myself perfectly clear in this regard I may say that I come from a section of Canada which has as vital an interest and concern in gold mining as any other part of the dominion, although I submit without question that every part of Canada should be interested in the subject. During this period of depression gold mining has been of the greatest value to the country and will continue to be as time goes on, because in reality we have just begun to scratch the surface.

The policy which this country should follow with regard to gold mines—and I refer particularly to the position taken by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—is this, that there should not be left in the ground in any mine a single ton of rock, which can be taken out and from which gold can be extracted and sold at the world price of gold. We cannot as a nation afford the economic waste involved in any policy that will force any mine to leave so called low grade ore in the ground. But it does not follow from that that mines producing enormous wealth, mines that have been successful, should not be taxed. The people operating the mines do not expect it. I have received many letters since the discussion took place with regard to this tax, and I am of the opinion that the matter would have been worked out sooner than it has been if it had not been for the unwise and prejudicial statements that appeared in certain sections of the press with regard to what the government was trying to do. The Minister of Finance has been criticized because he did not bring down a perfect scheme of taxation of gold mines. I challenge any member to point to a single new tax that any minister of finance has ever brought down that did not meet with criticism and was not subject to subsequent revision. It is necessary; it is natural. I submit that it was impossible for the Minister of Finance to disclose his plans to experts in the mining industry, and all that sort of thing, and as it finally works out it is the profits of the mines that are able to pay these taxes that are being imposed. Presidents of mining companies, and people interested in large mining companies, are ready to say to-day and have said that the provisions now made by the Minister of Finance are for the time being absolutely fair.

I am inclined to think that this subject having been brought to light in the manner in which it has is probably a good thing for the country and for the mining industry because it makes it possible for those who are interested in it and who perhaps know something about it to put before the public what the actual situation is. When you speak to men who are looking only at the returns from a few large mines they always refer to Lake Shore and Harry Oakes and Hollinger and Noah Timmins and these men. They lose sight altogether of the weeks and months and years that these men tramped the trails of northern Ontario in the effort to find these mines. And what they lose sight of to a greater degree is the fact that, as my hon. friend from North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) said to-day, for every dollar that has so far been taken out of the claims in this country a dollar and a half or two dollars has gone into the ground in the effort to find gold. I cannot give a better illustration than to read something that appeared in day before yesterday's issue of Saturday Night, in reference to one gold mine in northern Ontario:

> Kirkland Lake has never paid a dividend, although having carried work to 5,500 feet in depth. This is pointed to in mining circles as evidence of the great courage displayed by those who finance mining enterprises, and as an illustration of why the shareholders of mining companies should not be taxed unduly at such times as they have the good fortune to back a winner. It is twenty years since the representative of Saturday Night first went over the McKane claims, then the nucleus of the Kirkland Lake mine—two decades of patient waiting by a courageous band of shareholders.

And yet those men under competent engineers, backed by the advice of the best geologists we have in this country—and we have some of the best in the world—are going down, down and down, spending their own money, supported by their conviction that ultimately they will get gold in substantial, paying values.

Just one further illustration, because my time is limited. I have watched for four consecutive years the development of a gold area or what it is hoped will be a gold area. In 1928 a group of men, ready to venture all the money they themselves had in the world and their own time as well, started out on a prospecting campaign; they staked many claims and spent a tremendous amount of money, but in 1930 their prospectors came across a field that looked so promising that they staked some claims and began to work. For four long years not only that group but another group of men, with very substantial sums of money put into the enterprise by Canadian investors who were willing to stake claims, first, in the hope of getting some gold for themselves and, second, in their anxiety to develop this country, worked first on the surface, then by diamond drilling and later by sinking shafts. One of those properties is to-day so far developed that if you go down five hundred feet in shaft number one, travel through all the underground workings walking as rapidly as you can, and come out at shaft number two, 1,850 feet away, on the surface, it will take you four hours to do the walking. Yet, if you asked them to-day they would say that they do not know so far whether they have a mine, but to back up their efforts they have the conviction that something worth while will ultimately be found. That is just a single illustration of what is taking place over all this great country.

May I repeat that this gold tax as ultimately placed is fair and equitable and is felt so to be by those in the best position to know; yet the general policy of this country should be to do everything possible to encourage and not to discourage new ventures in gold mining, because it will ultimately become the greatest asset this country has.

Just a word in conclusion. Beginning with the middle of last year, a consistent, constant, gradual improvement in business has been, generally speaking, going on across Canada. More men are being employed; more goods are moving; railway traffic is increasing and everything indicates a general rise, the best kind of rise that we can have. I am not for a moment going to suggest that we are by any means out of the woods; we have ahead of us difficulties, external and internal. My opinion is that the greatest shadow that overhangs the continued improvement of business in this country comes from outside the dominion altogether, from what may happen in other countries. But we still have internal problems, the first and greatest of which is perhaps our debts, debts of every character, personal, corporate, municipal, provincial and federal, debts created first during the war period and then in the inflationary period following the war. By care, by sound thinking, we can get out of these debt difficulties. We cannot get out of them by the application of any patent formula. I am in the timber business; I have been taking out pulpwood this very year to manufacture paper, but you cannot get out of the difficulty by setting paper mills at work making paper and printing presses to print money on that paper; that is utterly impossible. It can be done only by hard work and the application of sound business principles. Regardless of what anybody else may say, that is my conviction. You might as well expect that a man could take his whole life's savings, whatever they might be, his house, clothes and everything else he has and make a bonfire of them and then feel he was going to be as materially well off as before, as to expect that this world can get away from the destruction of the period from 1914 to 1918 and the inflationary gambling period from 1921 to 1930 without having to work hard in order to climb the hill. What we require in Canada is patience, cooperation, in order to do that, and if we exercise those traits, we shall do it.

Another important problem and one that must give serious minded men everywhere food for thought is that of our great central west. The three prairie provinces—I am speaking as an outsider looking in but as one who has traversed them more than once—built up their material and social life principally around one great product, wheat. In the last five years the aspect of the wheat marketing possibilities has completely changed. Wheat is being grown in almost every country in the temperate zone, and European countries, where our great market formerly was, have in many cases practically closed their doors against us and are growing their own wheat. We cannot overcome that situation until they are ready to open these doors. Following that, perhaps the greatest difficulty is the menace of drought and insects in large parts of western Canada. For four years in succession a large section of that great area has been overtaken by drought. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth will blame the government for that, and maybe it is responsible; perhaps through the omnipotence with which it is credited, it could have overcome that but did not. This year, if reports are correct, there is just as great a menace in the insect pests. My final word is this, that the condition of the central western provinces is a challenge to every right thinking man in this country. Some solution for these problems must be worked out, and they must be worked out not by factious quarrelling as to methods and particular aspects of the matter but by cooperative effort on the part of all the Canadian people. If we apply ourselves in that way we shall ultimately succeed, overcome our difficulties and make Canada what we hope and always have hoped its destiny should be.

Mr. J. R. HURTUBISE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to join the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) in offering my heartfelt sympathy to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in his great bereavement.

It is not my intention to deal at length with the financial situation at present under discussion. Others have already brought forth many arguments which are of a constructive nature but which will be considered by some to be of a destructive nature. I believe in frank discussion where everyone can express his opinion, because something good and practical always comes out of it. It is from this point of view that I appreciate the privilege of saying a few words with regard to some matters that I have particularly at heart.

First, I want to join the hon. member who preceded me in congratulating the Minister of Finance on the noble effort he has made to frame a balanced budget and to convince the Canadian people that the depression is a thing of the past. I have a great deal of sympathy for the Minister of Finance; I know he has been working under great difficulties, but in my humble opinion he never will be able to balance his budget by only reducing his expenditures and imposing new taxes. Our national debt, including federal, provincial and municipal debts, has reached such a height that we cannot expect to meet our obligations and reduce our debts unless we adopt some radical means. The figures in regard to our national debt are as follows:

1931	2,261,611,937
1932	2,375,346,172
1933	2,599,089,000
1934	2,789,152,000

In four years, therefore, we had an increase in our national debt of $596,000,000, and the debts of the provincial governments have increased in proportion. The gross debenture debt of municipalities of over 4,200, by provinces, as of December 31, 1931, was as follows:

Alberta	$ 78,679,570
British Columbia	129,913,890
Manitoba	116,864,937
Ontario	499,002,074
Nova Scotia	31,386,025
New Brunswick	21,477,521
Prince Edward Island	1,863,211
Quebec	362,132,334
Saskatchewan	47,488,595
	$ 1,288,808,157

Other liabilities, consisting of temporary loans, overdrafts on banks, accounts payable and so on, amount to $295,223,318. Interest payments on municipal bonded debts total about $63,000,000. While the figures for public debt can be obtained with approximate completeness, those having to do with private indebtedness can cover the field only partially. Out of a total of 654,297 owned and partly owned farms in the dominion, 244,201 were mortgaged to the extent of $677,564,100, and it should be pointed out that this figure refers only to the debt secured by mortgage or an equivalent legal instrument, on lands and buildings, and these figures include owned farms. It is estimated that the urban mortgages held by corporate lenders amount to about $765,000,000. Some estimate the general national debt at ten billion dollars, while others place it at twelve billion dollars.

This is a very discouraging situation, and I regret to be obliged to present such a dismal picture of conditions, but are we to sit content and listen to optimistic speeches while we refuse to heed the alarms that are being sounded to show that we are heading for disaster? In the last few years we have been advised by great authorities in economics that unless some radical change is made our social and economic system is doomed. We are crushed by debts, and just here I should like to quote a humorous article published two years ago which expresses very well the situation in which the people find themselves to-day. A man was asked to make a payment on his note, and here is his reply:

> In reply to your recent requests to send you a cheque, I wish to inform you that the present shattered condition of my bank account makes it impossible for me to take your requests seriously.
> My present financial condition is due to the effect of dominion laws, provincial laws, municipal laws, country laws, corporation laws, liquor laws, traffic laws, by-laws, brother-in-laws, sister-in-laws, mother-in-laws and outlaws, all of which have been foisted upon an unsuspecting public.

Through these laws I am compelled to pay a business tax, sales tax, amusement tax, gas tax, school tax, water tax, excess tax, auto tax, hydro tax and syn-tax.

In addition to these irritating taxes I am forced by the strong arm of the law to get a permit for this thing and a permit for that thing. I am required to get a business licence, a city licence, a provincial licence, a sign licence, a dog licence, a motor licence, a radio licence, a liquor licence—not to mention my marriage licence.

I am also requested and required to contribute to every society and organization which the inventive genius of man is capable of bringing into life.

For my own safety, I am required to carry life insurance, liability insurance, fire insurance, compensation insurance, accident insurance, collision insurance, rain insurance, hail insurance and business insurance.

The government has now so governed my business that it is no easy matter for me to find out who owns it. I am inspected, expected, introspected, suspected, disrespected, examined, reexamined, informed, required, summoned, fined, commanded and compelled, and simply because I refused to donate to each and all, and to go out and beg or borrow or steal money to give away, I am cussed, discussed, boycotted, talked to, talked about, lied to, lied about, held up, held down and robbed until I am nearly ruined.

This is a picture of the Canadian taxpayer to-day, and I do not know how long he will last. I have listened to three budget speeches; each time I was led to expect that at least we would balance our budget, but at the end of each fiscal year we had to face increasing deficits. I do not believe we will ever succeed in paying our debts so long as we have to borrow money to pay interest. We are in a queer situation; we all want prosperity, yet we have nothing but poverty; we want peace, but we have unrest. Since 1930 all kinds of palliatives have been tried in an attempt to cure the situation. All conceivable powers were given the government to cope with the difficulties confronting the country, but what did the people get under the unemployment relief acts in comparison with what they were promised so emphatically in 1930? They were given temporary relief and palliatives which to date have cost this country $112,000,000. We were all in favour of some kind of relief, and if at any session we opposed the relief act it was because the blank cheque was contrary to the principle of responsible government and to the control of parliament over legislation and expenditures. For the same reason we have opposed other legislations. In 1931 a program of public works was begun, but in 1932 and 1933 that program was replaced by a system of direct relief or dole which has been the curse of the country, even to the Tory party. Then, in 1934, on the eve of an election, we are advised that a great construction program is to be started. We are told to carry on in the expectation that general conditions will improve and that matters will in time adjust themselves. In the meantime, however, the great mass of unemployed, the small town proprietors and the farmers are in a sad predicament. Many of them are being dispossessed. All have been waiting for the solution promised by the government and a great many are now so utterly discouraged that they do not care what the outcome may be. The panaceas advocated and adopted have proved to be altogether inadequate. Protection and high tariff are now repudiated by all economists, bankers and even by prominent Tory politicians. The intra-empire trade is far from bringing the results which were expected. On the eve of an election the government has instituted a committee to investigate price spreads and mass buying. I would not be surprised if it were followed by the same effects which have followed other investigations. The Canadian people are anxiously watching these dilly-dallying operations and they are asking themselves if a remedy is going to be offered for the situation which is dragging us down to disaster. We must realize we are passing through a period of evolution. There are signs everywhere that the structure of national and international finance has permanently broken down and cannot be reconstructed along old lines. The government is doing little or nothing to cope with that situation.

Science and mechanization have made such progress that the whole economic system has been thrown out of balance. Agriculture, which has always been the basic fabric of our economic welfare, which has kept our capital active and has provided employment for the greater part of our population, has given place to science and to machinery. The use of machinery has displaced human labour and brought about the centralization of capital followed by unemployment and the freezing up of capital. On the other hand our assets have not diminished; they are the same as they were. Our means of production have increased and, as has been said, we are starving in the midst of plenty.

I believe the time has come when the government should consider drastic legislation for the reduction of our capital obligations and for the alleviation of the mortgage burden carried by the farmers and labourers who are making every effort to save their homes. Under the policies followed by the present government we will have some day to face one of three things: First, a substantial reduction in or total suspension of all interest and compound interest on our capital debt, whether we like it or not; second,—and this is the course which most of us fear—the reduction or cancellation of part of certain capital debts, or, third, liquidation in the near future. I may be considered a pessimist, but when I make these statements I merely repeat what has been said by many national and international authorities in economics.

Following these general considerations I wish to refer to the budget speech. First may I direct my observations to the ten per cent tax which originally was imposed on the gross gold production. Some short time ago a change in that proposal, which will be much more acceptable to the country generally, was communicated to the house. The ten per cent tax on gross production would have been quite unjustifiable; it would have meant the closing down of many mines, and a death blow to prospectors who have made discoveries which have been the pride of the different provinces, and chiefly the province of Ontario. It would have meant unemployment for thousands of people either directly connected with or indirectly affected by mining.

Very shortly after the budget was published I received telegrams and letters from boards of trade in different cities and towns. I refer particularly to Sudbury and North Bay where there was a keen realization of the far- reaching effects of such a tax. The day following the delivery of the budget I received the following communication from the Sudbury board of trade:

> Sudbury board of trade strongly protests the tax budget speech proposes placing upon gold production which will mean extinction of many small and low grade producers now under development with consequent serious loss of employment in mines and in industrial and mercantile establishments catering to the industry.

Then, the board of trade of North Bay sent the following letter:

> The North Bay board of trade strongly express the hope that the federal government in reconsidering the proposed tax upon gold production, will see that every consideration is given to the many small and low grade producers of gold in northern Ontario. Industrial and mercantile interests as well as the great body of men engaged in the industry of mining should be given consideration in such a manner that will tend to keep the wheels of progress in motion in this great area of mineral possibilities.

Representations have been made from all parts of the country, and I am pleased to note that the government reconsidered its blunder and has taken a wiser step. Even people far away from the mining industry have made protests. Here is one:

> The Minister of Mines in the Bennett government comes from Haileybury and his constituency embraces the rich Kirkland lake area, which mines about half of Ontario's annual gold production of $70,000,000.
> If anyone in the government should know anything about the mining situation in Ontario, Mr. Gordon ought to be the one. But Mr. Gordon knew nothing whatever of the plan to put a ten per cent tax on gold until the day before Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Minister of Finance brought down the budget on Wednesday. Mr. Gordon was not even consulted and he happened to find out because the cabinet ministers were allowed a peek at the budget a few hours before it was delivered. In fact at Easter Mr. Gordon assured mining men there would be no tax levied on gold.
> The question crops up: Why have a Minister of Mines, and why have a member from the mining district as minister? Mr. Gordon may have been proud of the post, but the present situation makes his portfolio look like an empty title and puts him in a foolish light.

I think the government realized its blunder when it received protests from all parts of the country interested, and as a result the Prime Minister last Thursday gave notice of the amendment to the gold tax proposal. The position of the Minister of Mines was so ridiculous that it would have been only logical that he should have resigned his portfolio as Minister of Mines had there been no amendment to the gold tax proposal. But while the tax has been amended to the satisfaction of the Canadian people, I believe a discrimination still exists. Why discriminate against the mining industry when other industries make as big if not bigger profits? As has been well said this afternoon, there are big monopolies in this country in tobacco, in gasoline and other commodities, the profits of which are as big as those in the mining industry, if not bigger. The gold tax does discriminate against one particular industry, and the people of Canada I believe see the injustice of it on that ground.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said that he would like to go a little further than placing a ten per cent tax on the gross production of gold; he wanted to nationalize the whole mining industry. Does he really want to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs? What we want is to regulate her diet, not to starve or kill her.

As to the other taxes proposed in this budget, they are of very little importance. The sugar tax has been reduced from two cents to one cent a pound, and there is a reduction on beer, ale, porter, champagne and postal notes, from three cents to one cent, but these are of very little importance.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that a time has come for a change in the fiscal policy of this country. I agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that we are passing through a period of great evolution, but it is not with the shibboleths, as he calls them, with which we have been supplied for the last four years, that we shall be able to cope with the situation. Let us be frank and honest. Let us rid ourselves of this narrow national and imperial protectionist policy. Let us have economic policies which will decentralize and thaw frozen capital, and bring about a better distribution of our production, that will relieve unemployment and bring back, if not prosperity, at least peace and contentment to the great mass of the people.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members in this part of the house may I first be permitted to offer our sincere and deepest sympathy in the very sudden and great bereavement sustained by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes).

The budget, Mr. Speaker, as presented by the hon. Minister of Finance on April 18 last sets forth in very clear detail a financial picture of Canada. When one realizes the ever growing debt structure and increasing interest payments, not only is the picture not a pleasant one, but one wonders how long a population of ten million people can struggle along under such a burden.

The budget follows along the well beaten track of all budgets since confederation, and offers little hope to the struggling masses of any great measure of relief. As an orthodox budget there is very little to criticize, for the changes in taxation, while few and small in extent, are at least downwards, and likewise the tariff changes.

The reduction in the sugar tax to one cent a pound will no doubt be welcomed by the Canadian people and the substitution of a tax on gold to make up for the loss of revenue occasioned by the reduction in the sugar tax will on the whole be well received. The recent announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that adjustments are to be made in the gold tax as originally brought down so as to exempt the low grade mines from the operation of the tax should stop any controversy so far as they are concerned. The others in my opinion can well afford to pay, and I trust that the revenue to be derived from the industry will in no way be diminished by the change. It is the one industry that has prospered throughout the whole of this depression, first because of the fixed value of gold by law, and again by its revaluation upwards by approximately seventy-five per cent. Also in my opinion the industry has paid less taxation in proportion to its means than any other industry, because it is allowed fifty per cent for depletion, and shareholders are allowed an exemption of fifty per cent on dividends for income tax purposes. But now that the government proposes to put a tax of ten per cent on the industry, its cry goes up to high heaven. Well, Mr. Speaker, my sympathies are all with those people who can ill afford to pay the sugar tax, and if the government had decided to wipe out the sugar tax entirely and make up that loss in revenue by an added tax on gold it would have received my support.

The Prime Minister a few days ago made the statement that generally speaking in the search for and mining of gold there was more money put into the ground than was taken out. If that is true, and I believe it is, we might have saved ourselves a great deal of energy and the hardship entailed in digging for this gold, and been just as well off in the end. In fact, we might have found ourselves in a much happier condition if we could have rid our minds of this gold superstition, and allowed our people to consume according to their ability to produce rather than have their consumption curtailed according to their ability to find gold, which is now no longer used in the everyday business of the country. It is generally recognized that superstition is the sign of ignorance, and that as education advances, superstition tends to disappear. Like the medicine men of Indian tribes who held their privileged position by cant and the fear which they instilled into the minds of the innocent members of their tribe, so the money changers of to-day hold their privileged position and power by the superstition and fear instilled into the minds of the people that unless their medium of exchange is based on gold they would all surely starve. It is an encouraging sign to note that there is a growing number of people throughout the world who at last are ridding their minds of such nonsense. Here might I be permitted to quote from a letter to the editor of the London Times by a body of business men in England asking for a parliamentary investigation into the workings of our money system:

> The modern paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty was the subject of a challenging passage in the speech of His Majesty the King at the opening of the world economic conference last year. His Majesty said:—
> It cannot be beyond the power of man so to use the vast resources of the world as to ensure the material progress of civilization. No diminution in these resources has taken place. On the contrary, discovery, invention, and organization have multiplied their possibilities to such an extent that abundance of production has itself created new problems.

Under modern scientifiic conditions the capacity of industry to produce is unlimited, and the continued existence of destitution, poverty, and unemployment throughout a large portion of the population demonstrates the fact that the present monetary system, the proper function of which is to facilitate the production of goods and their distribution to consumers as required, has broken down, both in its national and international aspects. The system is obsolete and has become a hindrance to the effective distribution of goods.

The object of production is consumption, and with approximately 90,000,000 people destitute or on the verge of destitution in the advanced nations which keep statistics, it cannot be suggested that the desire to consume is not present. Both these primary functions of the economic body—production and consumption—are frustrated, and what should be a healthy and vigorous organism is paralyzed in peacetime by the failure of the monetary system of distribution.

The monetary system is man-made and can be altered; there is nothing sacrosanct about it.

We, the undersigned, in common with a large and rapidly growing body of citizens who are genuinely concerned at existing conditions, have come to the conclusion that gold is not essential as the basis for the issue of national money, and that nations should not be under obligation to make payments internationally with gold. A system must, in our view, be established under which the issue and recall of currency and credit will be regulated on a rational, national, and scientific basis, so that the correct number of money-tokens shall be available to consumers to enable them to enjoy the output of production.

We appeal, through your columns, for an immediate investigation by parliament of the fundamental principles which should govern our monetary system with a view to its reform in the interests of both producers and consumers.

There is, in our opinion, no need to wait for international agreement, since if Great Britain gives the lead, other countries will, we believe, find it in their own interests to follow.

If any hon. member will take the trouble to look up the standing of those gentlemen he will find that they are all outstanding in the business life of Great Britain. I believe one of them was a former governor of the Bank of England.

The statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) at page 2270 of Hansard to the effect that the government proposes to bring down legislation to deal with farm debts will be well received by a great many people throughout the country. He stated:

For certain individual debtors the burden has become unbearable and the government proposes to bring down at an early stage legislation designed to provide machinery whereby farmers who find themselves unable to pay the fixed charges on their outstanding debts will be able by an expeditious and inexpensive process to work out compromises with their creditors and to obtain new working capital. The guiding principle of this legislation will be to secure for the farmer a simplified debt structure reduced in size to a point where the carrying charges will be within the capacity of the farm enterprise to pay.

That is all that is necessary to quote for my purpose. It sounds very good and I congratulate the government on their intention to introduce legislation along this much-needed line. I trust it will be as far-reaching in its powers as the marketing legislation now before the house. It is generally recognized that the farmers cannot pay their debt in full. If we are going to keep them on the land and give them hope, some measure must be introduced to meet their conditions.

In his lengthy criticism of the budget, the financial critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) certainly offered no hope to the people of Canada, should his party come into office, that they would leave the beaten track. I wish to congratulate him on the able manner in which he handled the subject, yet in my opinion his criticism was well described by an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen as negative criticism. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth ridiculed the Minister of Finance for not having left the beaten track, and he then quoted from a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) in a previous debate, as follows:

In this country, as in other countries, people have been staggering along under conditions that have been difficult, and have been clamouring for something out of the ordinary. Peoples all over the world have been very restive with governments because governments have been slow to depart from the beaten track.

May I pause here to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for having made that statement. It would appear that he at least has a grasp of present day conditions. Let me quote again the last part of this statement:

Peoples all over the world have been very restive with governments because governments have been slow to depart from the beatn track.

What has been the result of governments being slow to depart from the beaten track?

Look over the world to-day and what will you find? Democratic institutions which have been built up through the centuries are falling like tenpins, and why? In my opinion the Minister of Trade and Commerce placed his finger upon the very crux of the situation. People all over the world are not destroying democratic institutions just for the sake of setting up another form of government; they are doing it because these institutions have refused to leave the old beaten track and keep pace with the forward march pointed out by science and education. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth took about fifteen minutes of his two hour speech to criticize the budget because there were no signs that it was leaving the beaten track. I agree with him in that criticism, but he harped so long upon that point that I think the house was led to believe that the Liberal party was going to offer something which would show that they were leaving the beaten track which has brought us to poverty and hardship and were going to blaze a new trail into the promised land. That would not have required much effort. The road would not need to be very long, because plenty is at our doorstep. However, apparently the wraiths and mists of Liberal principles beclouded the vision of the hon. member, because after labouring for over two hours he found that the beaten track was worn so deep that he was not only unable to get out of it but apparently was unable to see over the sides what was going on about him; and we heard him shout from the depths the usual historic Liberal amendment. We in this corner of the house were disappointed in that amendment. Another hope was shattered. It was again the old story of the mountain labouring and bringing forth a mouse. The people of Canada now know what the Liberal party has to offer. Here is their amendment:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.

Not very much in that. Just regrets. It continues:

> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment resigned to effect this end.

The first part of the amendment is a criticism of government policy which is not unexpected from the opposition. The second part refers to some mysterious policies which are not disclosed. What are those policies? Time and again I have heard hon. members of the Liberal party state that what was needed to get back to normal was the Liberal policies of 1930. If my memory serves me aright, part of those policies referred to countervailing duties; in other words, a brick for brick policy—you put your tariff up and we will put ours up just as high; and every hon. member of the Liberal party voted for that policy. The Liberal tariff policy was in effect for nine years prior to 1930, but what happened? We lost completely our cattle market in the United States, and if any hon. member will look up Hansard of February 15, starting at page 542, he will see what the rest of the world was doing during those years. The rules of the house prevent me from quoting from any previous debate of this session but I would advise hon. gentlemen to look up Hansard and study those facts, which cannot very well be disputed. It will be found that while most of our exports enjoyed almost free entry into world markets in 1922, by 1929 and the first part of 1930 almost prohibitive tariffs were imposed against us. I do not blame the Liberal party or its policies for what happened in the rest of the world, but I would point out what took place elsewhere when that party was in office. And I would ask them, if that happened under the old Liberal policy, what new policies do they propose to put into effect in order to induce the rest of the world to change its course? If they have any new policies, the people of the country should know what they are. During those years when they were in power Great Britain was still on a free trade basis, but free trade did not save Great Britain from the effects of the terrible depression. In fact, I think I am right in saying that unemployment was never so widespread there as during that period. Here in cold print is what we may expect, as set out in the last part of the amendment:

> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

What does it mean? It means that until the Liberal party can change world tariffs and thus promote world trade it will be impossible to have improvement in Canada, or to apply successfully other policies respecting credit and employment. Is not that a rather hopeless picture? Unless the rest of the world trades with us we are all to sit here and starve. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to subscribe to any such doctrine. Of course, it would be an ideal situation if we had a world brotherhood, but unfortunately we have not and so we must govern ourselves accordingly. In my opinion the quickest way to bring about world brotherhood is for Canada, for example, to assume national sovereignity over our medium of exchange and to detach herself from the control and domination of a world financial dictatorship, thus giving a lead to the rest of the world, showing them how to free themselves from the most insidious form of slavery that has ever existed in the history of the human race.

I wish to quote a few lines from a sermon delivered by the Very Rev. C. E. Riley, B.A., D.D., of Hamilton, Dean of Niagara. Speaking at the annual service of St. George's Society this year he said in part:

"I'm no economist, and God forbid that I should propose nonsense from this pulpit in the way of theories. Remember that you are but applying the palliative, but the cure is far more important. As members of an intelligent society, it is your duty to investigate the causes, to find something rotten in the state of Denmark. To find the dragon.

Why is there this poverty in the midst of plenty? Find the solution and solve it with your ballot.

Tell me why in a country, in a world of plenty, there is any need of starvation.

Is it honest to destroy goods? Is it right? Why?"

"It's a damned blasphemy and I use these words advisedly," stated Very Rev. C. E. Riley, B.A., D.D., Dean of Niagara, in a trenchant attack on the present system of distribution before a large congregation at the 92nd annual service of St. George's Society of Hamilton, at Christ Church Cathedral last night. The dean electrified a large congregation by his address and warned that if constitutional reforms were not put into effect, other means would be used.

Such a statement, coming from a high dignitary of the Anglican church, cannot be brushed aside with contempt, and therefore I appeal to hon. gentlemen to realize that we are sitting on a volcano that may erupt at any moment. We have already seen democratic institutions going down in many countries, and I make this prediction, that unless those that remain show by their action that they are capable of accommodating themselves to the new conditions, then it is only a matter of time until they all disappear. In other words, they must find the dragon and conquer him, and in my humble opinion that dragon is money power.

Let me say with all the emphasis at my command that I am opposed to high tariffs; but just as emphatically I say that in my opinion these barriers cannot be removed until we first remove the cause. Listen to what Lloyd George, a staunch old Liberal, a real Liberal, has to say. Lloyd George is a Liberal who is living to-day, dealing with things as they are and not with conditions that existed in the dim and distant past. Speaking in a radio broadcast in Great Britain he said in part:

I do not propose to enter into the respective merits of free trade and protection. I am bound to accept the fact that we have become a highly protected country and that there is no prospect in the immediate future of persuading the nation to revert to free trade. I base my survey and suggestions on that assumption. These barriers undoubtedly aggravate some of the worst evils from which we are now suffering, but the causes of our economic troubles lie deeper. Whether under tariffs or under free trade plenty has produced universal poverty. The essential paradox of the world's economic trouble, including our own, is that under our existing economic system the exuberance of the earth's gifts has resulted in creating a famine in millions of households. The economic system under which we work has been shown up by the world crisis to be a pretentious fraud which has robbed humanity of its fair share of the good things which science has produced in abundance for the benefit of mankind.

I appeal to the Liberal party to wake up and realize that old shibboleths and party slogans will no longer satisfy a hungry and suffering humanity. The hopelessness of securing a world agreement was well exemplified at the world conference held in London last year. Repeated efforts were made to reach agreement, but without avail, and finally the representatives of the various nations were firmly convinced that the only thing left to do was to go home and put their own houses in order. Let us face the facts. If we cannot agree any better among ourselves than we exemplify in this house alone, how can we expect a conglomeration of peoples of the world, of different races and speaking various tongues, many of them filled with hatred and jealousies engendered through centuries of time, to meet and work out a satisfactory agreement?

The United Farmers of Alberta have been advocating for some time a system of planned economy. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) on two occasions introduced in this house resolutions proposing that a council of social and economic research be set up to study such a plan. His resolution was finally adopted by the house. The very first plank of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation platform deals with planning and reads:

The establishment of a planned, socialized, economic order to make possible the most efficient development of the national resources and the most equitable distribution of the national income.

If that plank of the platform is put into effect it means that a plan will be evolved for the development of the national resources and the equitable distribution of the national income. When such a plan is set up, will the nations of the world be allowed to dump their goods into this country and upset the plan? There would be little use in setting up a plan if it were to be knocked down so easily. As a matter of fact it is proposed, by even more effective methods than tariffs, namely, import and export boards and licences to regulate trade, and so we have a form of economic nationalism.

Let me quote from A. R. Orage, editor of the New English Weekly, his definition of economic nationalism. He said in part:

> My own conception of economic nationalism can be defined as the coordination of the economic activities of a politically sovereign territory by a money system valid throughout the defined area, and designed for one purpose alone; that purpose being the increase of the prosperity of every member of the community, up to the point of utilizing, if required, the entire collective ability of the community to deliver goods and services.

That does not sound so terrible. Economic nationalism, as I understand it, will not prevent world trade but it first recognizes that the most important market is the home one and that our exports should consist only of the overspill after the home market has been fully supplied. Think what a market that would be if the people could only satisfy their wants from the abundance which surrounds them! What we want to do away with is the type of economic internationalism which we have to-day, which means the control of domestic economies by international money changers. This is the dragon we must destroy, and we must substitute for it an economic nationalism whereby the very lifeblood of the nation, finance, will be under the control of the nation for the welfare of the people. The mad rush for export markets is one of the greatest causes leading to war. Each country is short of home purchasing power, and so each one tries its best to get some from the other one. In reality, if the people of one country cannot buy their own goods which they have in abundance, how can they hope to buy from anyone else? If we had a proper money system which would enable the peoples of the world to make use of the abundance which surrounds them, world trade would then consist largely of countries exchanging fairly with one another their surpluses of domestic production for the surpluses of other countries which produce those things which the former lack. We see the folly of present world trade, in Japan shipping textiles right into the British Isles, the mother of the textile trade. It is this fierce competition among the nations of the world to secure the others' purchasing power, without which to-day people cannot live, that sooner or later leads to war.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce in his very able speech pointed out the great changes which have been taking place in the past fifteen years. I would say that those changes have been in a developing process over many years, but they have become more noticeable in the past fifteen. Most of us can remember when a man learned a trade and then by his individual initiative produced something by his own efforts, thus making a living. That, as we all know, has largely changed; to-day a man makes little by his own efforts but produces mostly by association with his fellow man. A good example of this is the motor car industry. If you will take a trip through one of our large motor car factories you will see there thousands of men at work, each doing a special bit of work toward making a car as it passes along a continuously moving platform. While each one contributes his bit in making the car, not one of them is competent to make a car by himself, and so it is with most of our production to-day. The same thing is taking place on the farm. Under our power machine age man has become simply a cog in the wheel and every cog has to play its part to turn out the finished article. But science is developing that wheel to such an extent that it is getting along with fewer and fewer cogs and so we have more and more unemployment. By this cooperative effort between man and the power machine we have tremendously increased our productive capacity and have created an enormous pool of wealth but the trouble is that all are not able to draw from that pool equal to the amount they have contributed.

The pool is now so full it is running over and wasting. An example of this is the destruction of various commodities, and instead of using our brains and allowing this wealth to be used for what it was created, we are now planning every known device, for instance, by curtailment of production, to prevent goods from going into the pool. When amidst so much suffering of the people we see on the one hand destruction of commodities and the steps which are being taken to curtail production, and when on the other we are told that our only salvation is to work harder, which means greater production, and then to tighten our belts and be more thrifty, which means less consumption, can one very much blame the people if they are losing faith in democratic institutions?

The amendment which was moved from this corner of the house is well worthy of consideration. It offers a way out; it is a departure from the beaten track, and I regret very much that it was declared out of order. But even that does not prevent it from expressing our viewpoint and I am convinced that the suggestions contained in that amendment will be widely endorsed by the thinking people of Canada.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, if we are to save civilization we must face the future with an entirely new outlook. Just as we discarded the ox cart for the motor car, so we must discard an outworn, privately owned money system, based on a condition of scarcity, for a national control of credit based on our ability to produce and the needs of the people. Major Douglas and Mr. McGeer gave members of the banking committee somthing to think about by the evidence they gave before it recently and also by their public utterances, and while these two men differ somewhat in detail they are agreed on many points. Mr. McGeer showed commendable breadth of mind, when asked whether he understood Major Douglas' proposals, in saying that he understood them but that he saw difficulty in putting them into statutory form. He finished by saying:

> Mind you, I do not want it to be taken from that, that I conclude that it cannot be done, because I have learned a long time ago that merely because I do not see a thing, that is not proof that it is not there.

Such an attitude is at least encouraging, but I am sorry to say that it appears to be in direct conflict with that evidenced by many members of this house. A lesson might well be taken from Japan, which has shown what may be accomplished when a people are prepared to face issues and to break with old traditions. When Japan decided to move forward not many years ago—that is, not many in the life of a nation—she sent her experts on a tour of the world to learn what was being done. These experts found that Great Britain had the best navy, and so they decided to copy that, they found that France had the best and most efficient land army and so they decided to copy that, and so forth. Hon. members will agree that the advance made by the Japanese nation within a very short period from the inferior position which they occupied at that time to the rank of one of the first nations, is reckoned as one of the marvels of the world. Later on, when the Japanese heard about the Douglas proposals they sent their experts to London to study them. They then invited Major Douglas to Japan, and instead of trying to belittle and to discredit his proposals, they sought to obtain all the information they could get, with the result that they have adopted at least part of his plan in using the national credit to subsidize the export of goods. And they have done this to such good purpose that last year they increased their export trade by fifty-three per cent.

While Major Douglas and Mr. McGeer both agree on national control and issue of credit, Mr. McGeer would have it distributed to the people as it is at present, that is through the old channels of production. Major Douglas differs; he points out that the amount of money so distributed through salaries, wages and dividends in a given period is never sufficient to purchase the total production, the result being our present situation. I was pleased to note that the Ottawa Journal, which always speaks with such assurance, endorses what Major Douglas has to say on this point. I quote in part from an editorial of April 2, 1934, entitled The Upturn in Wages, as follows:

> The old cure for deflation was more deflation. People strangely had the notion that the way to cure a condition under which people weren't buying goods—a depression—was to make it harder for them to buy goods. To cut their wages.
> Now there are conditions and cases where wage cuts are inescapable. Normally, however, as a general rule, wage cuts retard recovery, cannot do anything else. It is hard enough to work out a scheme of economics under which wages and salaries will always permit people to buy the whole of industrial and agricultural production; because the total of wages and salaries can never equal the total value of production. But what must be thought of the notion—all too common—that there can be anything like consumption of the total of production under low wages? The thing doesn't make sense.

So it is not only a question of raising wages, as the Journal points out. In my opinion President Roosevelt apparently has not yet grasped this point. He is issuing almost unlimited quantities of credit, but is using the old channels, overlooking the fact that until purchasing power is placed in the hands of the people no real prosperity is possible. In a speech recently made over the radio President Roosevelt stated that eighty-five per cent of the business of the United States is done by people receiving salaries of $2,000 a year or less. I think it is safe to say that one of our greatest difficulties to-day is due to the fact that a great majority of the people, who by their cooperative efforts have created such a vast pool of wealth that it is now running over, never have received sufficient purchasing power to enable them to buy back the goods they have produced. Major Douglas would remedy this by the issuance of social credit from the national pool direct to the people in order to make up this difference, and the evils of inflation would be overcome by the operation of the just price. Of course this would be a departure from the beaten track, but so is the marketing bill now before the house. Surely with the evils of the present system so painfully apparent it is not asking too much to say that we should give serious consideration to such proposals. At least that would show that we were doing our best to find a much needed solution of our problems.

Mr. F. W. PERRAS (Wright): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to extend my sympathy to hon. gentlemen opposite on the death of Mr. Lennox, whose sudden demise was very lamentable, as well as to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the sudden death of his wife.

The budget that was presented to this house on April 18, Mr. Speaker, is the fourth and perhaps the last of the present administration. Like those which preceded it, this budget contains a story of sadness, and seems to say, "He did the best he could with a bad job." The election of 1930 is not so distant that we cannot remember the attitude of the then opposition with respect to the administration then in power. The oncoming crisis was not at that time a world crisis, according to hon. gentlemen opposite; crises were not possible under good government, they said. "Put us into power and there will be no crisis," they said. Well, those who followed their advice and voted in that way have deeply regretted their action in the last four years. The crisis hit Canada hard and is still hitting it. The old Canadian ship of state is riding a rough sea; its crew are none too confident of weathering the storm and the captain is none too sure of reaching a certain port.

I listened with great interest to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance; I have read and re-read that speech, and it seems like going over the inventory of a bankrupt concern which, under good management, once was a thriving industry. The administration of to-day, in common with other Conservative administrations, has not been very fortunate in the way of raising revenues but has proved very successful in raising taxes. So, as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) pointed out, this year all taxes have been maintained with the exception of the sugar tax, which has been cut in half. We need not be grateful for the fact that no new taxes have been imposed, because it is not due to generosity. If we have no new taxes it is because we are no longer taxable, or rather because we could be taxed but the tax could not be collected, since we are unable to pay it. During the last fiscal year we collected less taxes than were collected in the previous year, but let no one be led into error by that fact. In 1929-30 we collected in taxes $378,551,000; in 1930-31 that dropped to $296,276,000, and in 1932-33 it dropped still further to $275,054,000. In connection with customs and excise duties and war tax revenues it is interesting to note the fluctuations of the sales tax, which in 1929-30 produced roughly $44,000,000. In 1930-31 we reduced that to $20,000,000, but when the present administration came into office the sales tax was increased to six per cent, so that in 1931-32 it produced about $41,000,000 and in 1932-33 about $56,000,000. Under the Liberal regime we reduced the sales tax and produced surpluses, because our international and external trade was flourishing for the reason that our fiscal policies were directed towards free and expanding trade.

I should like to quote some figures to indicate how our debt has continually increased since this government came into office. In round figures our debt has increased as follows:

1928	$2,677,000,000
1929	2,647,000,000
1930	2,544,000,000
1931	2,610,000,000
1932	2,831,000,000
1933	2,966,000,000

When the present administration took office they scrambled their fiscal policy and for that reason had to pile on the sales tax. For the same reason our revenues have gone down. Of course when we say that, immediately the objection is thrown out that the country is facing a general crisis. Let us admit that. But we were told that no crisis can exist under good government. We said there was a coming crisis in 1929 and 1930. We were preparing for it; we were trying to enlarge our markets, we were endeavouring to expand trade, but we were told it was foolish.

Well, in 1933, Great Britain imported 1,300,000 hundredweight less wheat from Canada than in 1932, but got 2,500,000 hundredweight more from Russia than she did the year before, 4,000,000 hundredweight more from the Argentine, and 5,000,000 hundredweight more from Australia. In 1933 Great Britain bought 1,200,000 hundredweight more barley from Russia than in 1932; 3,000,000 hundredweight more from Roumania; 2,500,000 hundredweight more from the United States, but she bought 2,000,000 hundredweight less from Canada. In 1933 Great Britain bought 600,000 hundredweight more oats from Russia than she did in the year before, 220,000 hundredweight more from Germany, but a million hundredweight less from Canada. She bought 324,000 hundredweight more of bacon from Canada than she did in the year before. So that taken all in all, our trade may be said to be on the hog.

Let me now place on Hansard some figures showing our revenue. The following table will serve to illustrate the situation:

1929-30	$446,000,000
1930-31	356,000,000
1931-32	333,000,000
1932-33	311,000,000

These figures indicate a steady decrease year by year instead of the benefits which have been so loudly proclaimed, and which it was said we would derive from blasting our way into the markets of the world.

I can readily imagine the feelings of the Minister of Finance when at page 2283 of Hansard he had to admit that the debt had increased, as I have already said, by some $135,000,000. And I can quite readily understand his situation when he had to admit, as it is reported on the same page of Hansard, that the deficit on ordinary account would be $24,000,000. Again I can imagine his state of mind when, as appears at page 2275 of Hansard, he stated that the failure to reach the estimated revenue by some $33,000,000 has naturally been disappointing. Indeed, it is sad, but we have been accustomed to very little else. The British budget is being called the sunshine budget. We have had Robb and Dunning budgets which indicated prosperity. Then, we have had Rhodes budgets, but none of these roads has yet led us out of misery.

The situation becomes more distressing, and we find that we are still voting in blank millions upon millions for relief purposes. We had been told that unemployment would be stopped at once. It is still rampant, and the sums we spend are appalling. I do not think that the Canadian people really know the amounts being spent for relief, and they do not realize that those sums must all come from them. We are sort of robbing Peter to pay Paul, but this cannot be carried on much longer. Some proportionate return should result from the money spent on relief. We cannot continue spending at that rate. We are heaping millions upon millions of dollars upon the large industrial centres and other portions of western Canada, but what has been done to help agriculturists in other parts of Canada out of their troubles? The minister said that the expenditures made since 1930 by the dominion for unemployment relief have reached a total of $115,500,000, to which may be added the cost of the wheat bonus in 1931, amounting to $12,700,000, and $2,400,000 advanced for employment in railway shops, making a total of $130,600,000, The expenditure for relief in the year 1933-34 is estimated at $36,000,000. These figures are staggering when we realize the very little that is being done for the eastern farmers.

It is my privilege to represent in this honourable house a constituency which is largely rural. In the few urban sections of that county relief has been given out, but in other sections of it conditions are deplorable. Farm products have been at bottom prices for the last two years, and there are no immediate signs of betterment. Many farms have been let go. The index price of farm products in 1930 averaged 82·3. In December of this year it was 53·3, indicating a fall of 46 per cent.

Let us now consider the pulp industry. In 1932 we produced $57,943,419 worth less pulp and $71,751,802 worth less paper products than we produced in 1930. In my constituency that was a fearful blow to a large percentage of the population. As I have said, there are some centres in which the whole population is engaged in farming, but there are many villages and rural communities in my constituency where people are working either as daily manual labourers or as jobbers. These people, and they are quite numerous, depended for their existence for years upon the wood and pulp industry, and for the last three years most of them have been on the verge of starvation.

These trade agreements, and the new market openings which were promised, did not help us much. In 1933 we exported of paper and manufactures of paper $66,134,111 worth less than in 1930, and $15,705,342 less of pulp; $5,130,401 less of cheese, $416,369 less of butter, $18,523,737 less of wheat flour, $63,373,340 less of wheat, $5,504,758 less of potatoes, $672,534 less of dressed beef; and I could quote many other similar figures.

Let me point out that the price of bacon and hams in 1930 was $24 per hundredweight, and only $11 in 1933. The price of butter was 30 cents per pound in 1930 and only 17 cents in 1933.

Now I will summarize our total trade:

Year—	Total imports and exports
1929	$2,654,575,166
1930	2,600,000,000
1933	887,000,000

That shows a decrease in 1933 as compared with 1930 of $1,800,000,000 odd.

Here are some figures of our trade with the United Kingdom:

Year—	Total imports and exports
1929	$631,000,000
1933	271,000,000

That shows a decrease in 1933 as compared with 1929 of $360,000,000. Here are the figures for our trade with the United States:

Year—	Total imports and exports
1929	$1,389,000,000
1930	1,384,000,000
1933	381,000,000

Our total trade with Australia was as follows:

Year—	Total trade
1929	$22,000,000
1930	20,000,000
1933	13,000,000

That shows a decrease in 1933 as compared with 1930 of $7,000,000. Here are the figures of our trade with Africa:

Year—	Total trade
1930	$17,000,000
1933	10,000,000

That shows a decrease of $7,000,000 in 1933 as compared with 1930. So after all, Mr. Speaker, the picture painted by the Minister of Finance of Canada's present financial position is none too engaging and none too consoling after nearly four years of the present regime. Those who have been responsible for the placing of Canada's destinies in such hands must surely by this time realize the error of their ways and await with keen anticipation the time for a readjustment of these matters. We all recognize the very special conditions of the times, but we cannot forgive the manner in which power was obtained and the manner in which it was used. The government is to be blamed not so much for what is in the budget as for what is not in it. It is to be blamed for the results brought about by the working out of its policies. It is to be blamed for the bad news the budget contains, but it is equally to be blamed, and indeed much more seriously, for the lack of policies which it exposes. The government now knows the evils from which Canada suffers. It has had time properly to diagnose its ills, and it has surely had time by now to formulate policies and remedies to cure those ills. We have been eager to co-operate fairly in matters of relief and in other measures. It is the privilege of the government to accept or refuse such cooperation, but they did not accept it. The results are not to their advantage. Indeed the Canadian farmer will need much courage and fortitude if he is to survive these times under present conditions. Prosperity may be just around the corner, but I rather believe in the saying that it is a long road that has no turning.

TRADE WITH JAPAN

STATEMENT MADE BY RIGHT HON. WALTER RUNCIMAN IN BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I desire to make a short statement arising out of a question asked yesterday by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). At that time he directed attention to certain statements appearing in the press that had been attributed to British public men, and I was then able to assure him that there was no foundation for those statements, so far as the government of Canada was concerned. Yesterday the Right Hon. Walter Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, made a statement in the British House of Commons, and in view of the importance of the matter and the desirability of there being no misunderstanding in such a matter I think it desirable at this time to read to the house his statement. Mr. Runciman said:

The house will remember when I last made a statement on this subject on 15th March, I informed them, on the failure of representatives of the textile industries of Japan and of this country to come to an agreement, the whole position was under review between the two governments.

When I saw the Japanese ambassador on the 16th March, I handed him a memorandum inquiring whether, in the circumstances, the Japanese government had any proposals to put forward for dealing with the problem. On the 31st March, I received a reply in which the Japanese government expressed their willingness to consider any further proposals which His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom might make, but made no proposals of their own. The government have considered the whole problem again, very carefully in the light of this reply. It is already a year since His Majesty's government drew the attention of the Japanese government to the serious position arising from Japanese competition. It is of course, of the utmost importance that every effort should be made to deal with a problem of this magnitude in the most appropriate way. Unfortunately there appeared to be nothing in the Japanese government's note of 31st March, to suggest that an early agreement on this subject was to be expected and, therefore, the government still holds the view that the problem which faces us is one which can only be settled satisfactorily by cooperation in some form between Japan and ourselves. His Majesty's government cannot allow a situation to develop in which negotiations are protracted indefinitely without any immediate prospect of success and during this time the Japanese—quite naturally from their point of view—are continuously expanding their exports in our markets to the detriment of Lancashire while our hands are tied. Accordingly His Majesty's government have come to the conclusion that they would not be justified any longer in postponing, in the hope of an agreement, such action as is open to them with a view to safeguarding the trade of this country.

I therefore informed the Japanese ambassador on Thursday last that in the circumstances His Majesty's government were obliged to resume their liberty to take such action as they deemed necessary to safeguard our commercial interests. I assured him—and I am confident that the house will join me in this—that such steps as it was proposed to take would be taken in no unfriendly spirit.

As regards the Anglo-Japanese treaty, I am satisfied that His Majesty's government can, without denouncing it, take proper and sufficient measures to protect commercial interests of this country, and in these circumstances I see no reason to terminate a treaty which has regulated the commercial relations between the two countries for over twenty years.

As far as the United Kingdom market is concerned the government do not feel they can any longer suspend the review of silk duties by the import duties advisory committee, and my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked the committee to complete its report on these duties as quickly as possible.

In the case of the colonial markets my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies has been in consultation with the colonial governors. The governments of the colonies and the protectorates for which such action would be appropriate will be asked to introduce import quotas which, except in the case of West Africa, would apply to all foreign imports of cotton and rayon goods. With a view to reinstating this country in the position in those markets which she held before the present abnormal period, it is intended that the basis for apportioning these quotas as between foreign countries shall be as far as possible the average of their imports in the years 1927-1931. It is further proposed that necessary legislation in colonial territories should be enacted with the least possible delay, and it should be so framed that the actual quota regulations will be reckoned as commencing retrospectively from to-day, 7th May, so that no attempt at forestalling will be allowed to frustrate the policies and intentions of measures under contemplation.

In the most important of West African colonies, as the house is aware, there are treaty obligations which preclude differentiation in favour of our own goods. It was for this reason that on the 16th May of last year notice was given to release West African colonies from their obligations under the Anglo-Japanese treaty, and action there will be limited to Japanese goods.

I have not attempted to deal in this statement with the position of any goods except cotton and rayon textiles. The government are aware that Japanese competition is not limited to these goods, and are considering in the case of each of the other industries involved what tariff action in the colonial market is called for. As regards the home market I have no reason to suppose that the matter cannot be dealt with by means of ordinary procedure of Import Duties Act.

While His Majesty's government cannot any longer refrain from taking steps to safeguard our trade interests, we shall, of course, be ready at any time to give most careful consideration to any proposal which the Japanese government may desire to put forward towards a solution by mutual agreement of this difficult problem. A solution of this kind ought to be possible where governments of the two countries are anxious to agree.

That is the conclusion of the statement of the President of the Board of Trade, and I avail myself of this opportunity to thank the right hon. leader of the opposition for bringing the matter to the attention of the chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the Prime Minister has acted very wisely in giving to the house the statement that he has in order that this matter may be put in its true position. I say that for the further reason that this morning's paper contains other dispatches that are misleading. I have before me, the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, May 8, and I will quote from an article headed "Likely to urge dominions take similar action:"

(Canadian and Associated Press Cables)

London, May 7.—The British government moved to-day to restrict Japanese trade in those parts of the empire over which it has direct control and to promote "intensification" of commerce within the British commonwealth.

There is nothing in the statement made in the British house, I must say, to justify this particular dispatch, and I think it is only creating embarrassment for governments of different parts of the empire that misleading dispatches of this kind should be sent abroad.

RADIO COMMISSION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister just how the house may get information with respect to the expenses of the radio broadcasting commission. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) asked a question about the expenses of the commission on Monday, April 9, and the Prime Minister replied that as the radio committee was sitting, it afforded every possible opportunity to secure the information. I am advised that the member has tried through the agency of the committee to get the information, and has been told that he can not obtain it from that source. Surely the house is entitled to some statement of the expenses of the commission under main headings. I do not mean anything in the nature of an inquisition, as the Prime Minister suggested might be possible, but rather a statement of expenses under general headings. I think we ought to be able to obtain that in short order.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the radio commission occupies a somewhat analogous position to that of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. Parliament makes a grant to the railway commission, and also makes a grant to the radio commission, but in the case of the latter it is, of course, money which has been collected for the purposes for which the commission was to use it. I certainly believed that it was not desirable in this house to discuss at length the question as to whether or not ten dollars had been properly used here, or whether the same ten dollars could not have been better used somewhere else. I think that would not be fair to the commission. But I quite agree with what the right hon. gentleman has said that parliament has a right to know of these expenses, and when I answered the hon. member for Skeena as I did the other day I believed that he would be able to secure that information without question from the commission. I shall make it my business to speak to the chairman to-day, and if the hon. member for Skeena will suggest to one of the members of his own party the desirability of asking his question when the committee next meets or if he give notice in advance, I shall certainly use such machinery as I can make available, with my limited powers over the commission, for the purpose of securing the information which the hon. gentleman seeks, namely, the expenses grouped under main headings, such as the right hon. gentleman has mentioned. If, of course, that method fails, I shall have recourse to peace, order and good government.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Friday, May 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: If one looks at the figures which were put on Hansard of March 26, 1934, at pages 1811 and 1812, one sees that the home consumption of pork meat in the year 1932-33 showed an increase over 1930-31 of 1,967,747 hundredweight. Multiplying that number by 13, as the price of pork meat was $13 less in 1933 as compared with 1930, we find that the farmer has suffered a loss in the sale of that commodity of $25,580,712. But to be fair one must deduct from that figure the sum of $4,788,666 representing the surplus of exports in 1933 over 1930, making the net loss suffered by the farmer in the sale of that commodity $20,792,046.

With regard to butter, home consumption in the year 1932-33 showed an increase over 1930-31 of 25,698,173 pounds, or expressing it in hundredweights, 256,981 hundredweight. The average price of butter per pound in 1930 was 30 cents as compared with 17 cents in 1933. Multiplying the difference in the price by the increase in the number of pounds consumed, we find that the farmer suffered a loss in the sale of that butter of $3,340,762, less $416,369, representing the surplus of exports in 1933 over 1930. But as the amount of exports represents a surplus it should be deducted from the $3,340,762, and thus we arrive at a net loss of $2,924,393 in the sale of that butter making allowance for the difference in price between 1933 and 1930.

A very interesting speech was delivered in Montreal last week by the brilliant gentleman who is Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). I quote from a report in the Montreal Gazette as follows:

> One aspect of the problem was the difficulty of regulating production and prices, particularly in view of the present situation, which had been described as "plenty amid poverty." Canada consumed 99 per cent of its own butter, 98 per cent of its beef, 90 per cent of its hog products, and 100 per cent of its eggs. By control of prices he was not suggesting government control—he would rather see the government leave prices alone.
> "But," he declared, "things can't go on in this country with 50 per cent of the population on the farms and pay them 2½ cents a pound for beef, 6 cents a dozen for eggs, 10 or 12 cents a pound for butter. Merchandizers in Canada control these prices, and it is up to them to do it in a way that 50 per cent of the population will not continue in present conditions—or some other factor may have to be introduced."

One thing which strikes us is the large decrease which has taken place in home consumption. Since the beginning of this session and since the beginning of this parliament the speeches of nearly all hon. members have been in connection with external trade. This is almost wholly true with the exception of the few statistics which have been put on record by the member for Temiscouata. These concern internal trade and show to what extent there has been a decrease in the home consumption of farm products. I have before me official statistics which I obtained from the bureau of statistics year book as well as some contained in a letter I received from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). These figures show to what extent there has been a decrease in the home consumption of farm products. This decrease has taken place in the face of an increase in the population when normally there should be an increase in the consumption of farm products. The quantities of decreases appear on pages 1811 and 1812 of Hansard of March 26, and the comparisons are between 1932-33 and 1930-31. I should like to give some figures showing the decrease in the home consumption of twelve farm products. I shall give first the quantity of decrease and then the figured value based on prices prevailing in 1933 as compared with those in 1930. These figures concern not external trade, international trade or Ottawa agreements, they deal with the most vital matter of our home trade, our interprovincial trade, our strictly Canadian trade within the boundaries of the country. The figures are:

	Quantity of decrease	Figured value 1930	Figured value 1933
Apples (bbls.)	1,209,934	$ 3,920,186	$ 2,601,358
Honey (lbs.)	9,535,689	858,212	953,568
Eggs (doz.)	45,959,763	12,409,136	5,974,769
Dressed beef (cwt.)	891,619	13,978,438	5,198,138
Concentrated milk (cwt.)	489,908	5,731,923	3,674,310
Cheese (cwt.)	75,483	1,243,959	822,009
Potatoes (cwt.)	2,284,769	1,290,893	964,172
Peas (bushels)	973,616	817,837	473,177
Oats (bushels)	4,116,422	2,058,211	1,543,658
Barley (bushels)	30,140,741	10,699,963	11,604,185
Wheat (bushels)	55,146,394	24,760,730	15,165,258
Wheat flour (bbls.)	1,689,000	8,428,110	5,759,490
		$86,197,598	$34,333,884
		34,333,884
		$51,863,714

The total 1932-33 decrease in home consumption is $86,197,598, representing the amount of the loss which the farmers have sustained, if we take into consideration the price that prevailed in 1930. If we take the price that prevailed in 1933 we have a loss of $34,333,884, and the difference between the prices of 1930 and 1933 is $51,863,714.

I will not insist on that point but I would call the attention of the minister to the serious fact that there has been a fabulous decrease in the home consumption of apples, honey, eggs, dressed beef, concentrated milk, cheese, potatoes, peas, oats, barley, wheat and wheat flour, and I urge that something be done to find out the reason for this decrease and to see what is the best way of remedying the situation. I have two or three other questions which I am going to ask the minister afterwards, but for the moment there are two which I should like him to answer. This bill is intended "to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith." The products I have mentioned are natural products and a decrease in consumption has taken place in Canada. In view of this I would ask the minister these two questions. First, can we still say that we have our local market so far as those commodities are concerned in view of the enormous decrease in their consumption? Secondly, for what reason was there such a decrease, in one year, 1932-33, and what is the proper remedy to be applied to such a situation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I wish first to put on record some information asked for by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) at the conclusion of the discussion last week when I was compelled to move that the committee rise and report progress. The hon. member dwelt at great length on the various plans that had been tried for controlled marketing and for the marketing of agricultural products generally. I endeavoured to point out on that occasion that the examples he was citing did not relate to conditions similar to those in Canada, nor were the problems which we were attempting to solve similar to the problems presented in the examples he mentioned. I pointed out that the methods set out in the different plans he mentioned were not similar to the chief methods that underlie the legislation embodied in the bill now before this committee. The hon. gentleman continued his recital in this connection however. I am sure that hon. members of this committee will agree with me as to the impossibility of discussing each one of the acts referred to in detail if we wish to make any progress, and therefore I have had prepared a synopsis of the different policies to which my hon. friend referred. If I understood him rightly, he emphasized in the first place the danger of government monopoly, price fixing and controlled production, together with compulsory cooperation, which he referred to more especially at the close of his remarks. The countries and states which he indicated in his address in connection with a marketing policy were Queensland, New South Wales, Bulgaria, Brazil, Chili, Cuba, Germany, Greece, Latvia, the Netherlands, Roumania, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, Hungary, Egypt, Jugoslavia and Uruguay, sixteen countries and two states. Of these, twelve provided in their policies for government monopoly of purchase and sale. That is not one of the chief principles of the bill which is before us. The object of the bill before the committee is to enable producers, in so far as they indicate a desire to this end, to regulate marketing by organization and in some instances, if it is felt desirable, through appointment by the dominion board as its agency in the marketing of their own produce. I contend therefore that the statement put on Hansard by the hon. member was far afield if it was intended to apply to the bill before the committee. In the second place, of the different marketing plans which he discussed at considerable length, fifteen embodied the principle of price fixing; that principle appeared in fifteen out of the sixteen countries and two states he mentioned. The bill before this committee makes no provision for price fixing, and therefore I contend again that the hon. member was very far afield indeed when he compared the eighteen different policies of those sixteen countries and two states to the bill which is now under consideration. As I say, one of the chief principles in the plans he discussed was price fixing, which is not provided for or is not one of the aims of the bill before the committee. Further, of the eighteen policies which he outlined, in which reference was made to production control, four made provision for such control. In the bill which is before the committee no power is given to reduce or control production. I feel therefore that it is not necessary to dwell at any greater length on the statement made by the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but does he say that in the bill there is no provision which will admit of limiting or controlling production?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the bill no power is given to the local or to the dominion board to control or restrict production.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the bill not give power to the local board to draw up any scheme it wishes and might such a scheme not include control of production?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme that they would submit might include controlled production, but no power is given to the board to control production and therefore no consideration would be given to a policy of controlled production since no power could be given to enforce it. In the bill there is no provision set out to give a board authority to enforce controlled production.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Supposing we assume that the government as part of its policy desired to control production, would not the provisions of the bill be ample to enable the government to control production? I admit the government might not in every instance do that, but do not the provisions of the bill enable it to do so if it wishes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that there is no such provision in the bill. The deduction that the hon. member for Ontario made from his survey of the whole situation as he saw it and the dangers inherent in provisions set out in this bill in regard to marketing, which provisions were altogether different from those he dealt with in the other policies outlined by him, led him to conclude with a very definite statement as to the dangers of compulsory cooperation. He stated that it would sap from the individual his personal initiative; that it would make him a serf, reduce him to serfdom, to slavery, to becoming a ward of the state; also that it would lessen his credit, that he would not be able to get the same credit from banks, mortgage companies, and so forth that, I take it from what my hon. friend said, the individual would if he retained his individuality without becoming a party to this compulsory cooperation that the hon. gentleman decried so strenuously.

That sounds all very well in theory or in words, but let us rather examine compulsory cooperation as it is in practice. Have we in Canada any one hundred per cent compulsory cooperation?

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Lisgar says no. I think he will agree with me that the people in the school district in which he did live or lives are compelled to cooperate through the payment of taxes which is certainly not left to their voluntary donation.

Mr. HANBURY: Pretty far-fetched.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think we could find, for one example, a better one than that, that the members in a school district are compelled to cooperate to build and support a school and their contribution is certainly not voluntary.

Mr. BROWN: If that is the minister's style of reasoning he had better get somebody else to promote this bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate the fact that the hon. member may not agree, but he will certainly agree with me that that is compulsory cooperation; it is the identical principle of it. If we follow the reasoning of the hon. member for Ontario, what he would advocate is that each man in a certain district would build his own school and hire his own teacher and that in doing so he would have greater credit from the banks and the mortgage companies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the minister has answered the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario. It was: Does this bill contain provisions which imply compulsory cooperation, not have we compulsion elsewhere?

Mr. NEILL: The word used was "enable."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am answering the statement which the hon. member for Ontario made decrying very strenuously the principle of compulsory cooperation. I could give numerous similar examples throughout the dominion where members of a community bind themselves together because the majority feel that it would be of advantage to have compulsory cooperation. For instance, I might cite the building of roads. They are forced to pay taxes because the majority feel that it would be to the interest of the community that this should be done for the purpose of building roads for them. If we follow the argument advanced by the hon. member for Ontario, I suppose he would advocate that each farmer in a community should make his own trail and build his own road to town so that he might thereby retain his own individuality and initiative. I think the whole principle of our democratic institutions is that the majority be given power to effect what they think is in the best interest of the community. If the principle works out in practice as it does, I feel that compulsory cooperation in that form has been acknowledged as a very valuable and necessary instrument for the furtherance of our present day civilization.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the minister by citing those instances defending the principle of compulsory cooperation as it is to be found in this bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the right hon. gentleman was listening when I answered him before, he will recall that I said I was dealing with statements made by the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. HANBURY: The minister has not yet answered his question.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot answer his question and every other one at the same time. The hon. member for Ontario asked whether compulsory cooperation was implied—

Mr. HANBURY: Enabled.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He changed that to "enabled"—in this bill. But the whole statement leading up to that was that it was government control, government restriction, government sending out of inspectors and so forth. The principle of this bill —and hon. members can judge as well as I can by reading it because I think it is couched in quite clear English—is that if a sufficiently representative body of producers wish to formulate a plan for the more orderly, less wasteful and better regulated marketing of their agricultural products, they are free to submit their scheme to the provincial minister if it has to do with provincial marketing, or to the federal minister if it has to do with federal marketing, or if organized provincially, with interprovincial and export trade. If a certain percentage of the producers and of the production—in England, I believe, it is sixty-six and two-thirds per cent—ask for this or show by a poll that they are in favour of it, it is then placed before the provincial minister or the federal minister to decide whether, after submitting it to the lieutenant governor or to the governor in council, a scheme such as that would be approved.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the minister meant after submitting it to the board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, after submitting it to the consideration of the board it will then be submitted to the governor in council. In so far as they ask for power such as that, it would force all within an area to conform to the scheme for regulating the marketing of their product. I would think that there is provision for that in this bill.

Mr. HANBURY: That is, for compulsion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Compulsory co-operation, of which hon. members opposite are so frightened. We sit in this house by compulsory cooperation. The reason there is nothing in this bill as to the percentage of the producers and of production that could be required for such a scheme to be accepted is because my understanding is that that comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces. They might decide on different percentages, if they accepted such a scheme, depending not only on the judgment of the lieutenant-governor in council but also on the product to be regulated in marketing.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister to be kind enough to answer the two questions I have asked him, with regard to the decrease in home consumption.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not the consumption figures at hand. I shall be glad to look up the hon. member's statement that he put on Hansard and endeavour to have an answer for him.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman, and I shall send him a copy right away. Those figures are prepared and compiled on the basis of official information, as I said before.

Now there is another aspect of the matter. I shall send that other tabulation to the hon. gentleman with a third one, in order that he may have opportunity to peruse those figures. Let us come to the net losses suffered by the Canadian farmers in the sale of those twelve farm products. The exports must be taken also. This summary includes the amount of decrease in home consumption according to the prices of 1933; also the 1933 exports compared with the exports for 1930, and in the third column the total loss to the producer or farmer:

Losses suffered by the Canadian farmers in the sale of twelve commodities or farm products

	Value of decrease in home consumption 1933 prices	1933 exports compared with 1930	Total loss
Apples	$ 2,601,358	+ $ 2,050,494	$ 550,864
Honey	953,568	+ 111,363	842,305
Eggs	5,974,769	+ 352,507	5,622,262
Dressed beef	5,198,138	— 672,534	5,870,672
Concentrated milk	3,674,310	— 851,093	4,525,403
Cheese	822,009	— 5,130,401	5,952,410
Potatoes	964,172	— 5,504,758	6,468,930
Peas	473,177	— 3,819	476,996
Oats	1,543,658	+ 635,552	908,106
Barley	11,604,185	+ 225,488	11,378,697
Wheat	15,165,258	— 63,373,340	78,538,598
Wheat flour	5,759,490	— 18,523,737	24,283,227
	$34,333,884		$145,418,470

Then, to sum up the whole matter we find that in 1933 the loss sustained in external and internal trade on twelve farm products amounted to $145,418,470. The difference between the 1933 prices on these twelve farm products as compared with the prices in 1930 amounted to $51,863,714. Giving the same comparison in regard to butter we have the figure of $2,924,393 and in regard to pork meat $20,792,046. The loss to the farmer in the year 1933 on the fourteen commodities, namely apples sold by the barrel, honey by the pound, eggs by the dozen, dressed beef, concentrated milk, cheese, potatoes, peas, oats, barley, wheat, wheat flour, butter and pork meat, amounted to $220,998,623. This loss is one which has been sustained by the farmers, and when we are considering a decrease in home consumption we are not dealing with tariffs, but are dealing with trade within Canada.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: By how much was our external trade in apples increased? The hon. member did not mention that.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall read it again to the hon. member. Of course, he will see it to-morrow in Hansard. The value of the 1932-33 decrease in home consumption of apples sold by the barrel at the prices prevailing in 1933 amounted to $2,601,358. From that we have deducted the surplus of the exports of 1933 over those of 1930, amounting to $2,050,494, leaving a total loss to the apple producer of $550,864.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The hon. member's figures are absolutely incorrect.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the hon. member to give the minister a chance to answer. When he is minister he will have an opportunity to give information to the house. Meantime I should be delighted to have my answers from the minister. I shall send him those statistics. I am sure he realizes fully that it is a great anomaly in a country such as ours to have a decrease in the home consumption of, for instance, eggs, of 45,959,763 dozen. That is incredible. The decrease in the consumption of wheat has been over 55,000,000 bushels. The decrease in the consumption of wheat flour is 1,689,000 barrels. These figures are almost incredible. Presumably there are some people who cannot even eat bread. Despite the fact that our population is now greater, the people must be eating less, because they cannot buy food—farm products. The condition is all the more incredible because prices of farm products are today much lower; in fact they are one-half and, in some instances, one-third what they were in 1930. Prices have fallen; yet the Canadian people are suffering such hardships that despite the decreases in prices they cannot buy food. What is the reason? What remedy would be applied by the minister? May I say to him that these changes in home consumption developed gradually; the decrease did not come upon us like an earthquake. It developed from year to year, and if the minister would peruse the statistics he would learn that in all those fourteen products, with the exception of two, namely, butter and pork meat, in each year there was a decline in home consumption. The trend was downward. At this time I shall ask the minister what the government has done in the past four years to stop that decline and to see that the home consumption in farm products shall not decrease any more. I believe I am acting fairly with the minister, because I am not asking him for information about fish, which is mentioned in the bill; neither do I ask him for information with regard to timber. I have not questioned him about the leather industry, or about those industries mentioned by the Prime Minister in his speech of October 12, 1932. Although I have the figures before me in regard to fish products and the lumber industry, I shall not ask the minister questions about it. He is in charge of the department which serves agriculture. As an able farmer he must know more about his department than any other hon. member, because not only has he all the information sent in from all parts of the country, but as boss of his department his officers must work in accordance with his instructions. He receives weekly or monthly reports about the situation of agriculture in all parts of the country. If his information is not complete he has that great privilege which other hon. members envy at times, namely that of ordering his officers to get him the information he desires. Then, he has the valuable services of his deputy, and those of another gentleman who at the present time is sitting in front of him.

To-day I am asking the minister to answer my questions which, I believe, are fair and reasonable. I do not wish to cause trouble, but I want information so that when I go home and my people ask me the same very reasonable and sensible questions I may be in the position to tell them, "I asked this question of the Minister of Agriculture in the House of Commons when I was speaking in your name, and he gave me the illuminating answer which I shall now give to you." I am sure the minister will give me the information at once.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: Just a moment; I am just concluding my remarks. I am sure the minister will answer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding was that with these statistics on record in Hansard an answer would be submitted to the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, Bill No. 51, under consideration seems to me—pardon the expression—a deceitful bill. I shall not dwell on the title:

> An act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

It is futile to discuss the title of this bill, it is but necessary to examine the provisions to have an immediate and comprehensive idea of the powers which the government was unable to obtain by the signature in blank act, it insists that such powers be granted to it by this bill. The government stated: Pursuant to the unemployment act, grant us full power to relief those in want.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Through this bill, introduced by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who is an excellent man, the government intends to help agriculture. How? I ask the minister. How can he help agriculture, at present, by this bill? Price levels will be raised. How? I shall briefly express my views: It is simply intended by this bill to favour the large interests to the detriment of the small wage earner—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): —although giving the impression that the bill is favouring the latter.

After examining this bill, sir, I wonder what it embodies that might be helpful to the farming class. Will it be by preventing too great a spread between the prices paid to producers and those exacted from the consumers by the distributors? How? It is the old saw: We shall endeavour to help you; however our friends are wealthy, they will make money at your expense and nothing will be left for you. It is the same old saw we have been listening to for the last four years and it will continue so after the bill is enacted.

The reason always given is that the opposition has no suggestion to make. This bill affords me, as a humble rural member, an opportunity to offer one. If the hon. minister would include my suggestion in this bill, I readily would support the measure, because the bill then would be helpful to the farmer. Previous to selling his products, the government should see that he grows them. To grow them he must be given the necessary means. I therefore would offer the committee the following suggestion: In each of our parishes, throughout every county there are, at present, at least ten abandoned farms. This is perhaps underestimating the truth, however, I am not exaggerating when I state that, in each parish of Quebec, Ontario and other provinces, at least ten farms, at present, have been abandoned. By whom? By farmers. This bill aims at improving the land where our farmers live. Ten farms by parish and as there are 1,500 municipalities in Quebec, it makes a very large number of farms abandoned. These figures are equally true for other provinces proportionately to their popplation. The endeavours made by the government—and there are some that are very landable which I approve—to help the settlers and unemployed should also be extended to our farmers. It so happens that, in our rural districts, there are excellent farmers and workers, who, having a large family, wish to purchase adjacent farms which have been abandoned, they cannot do so, however, owing to lack of money. Instead of endeavouring to market the farmers' products, the government should provide them with the means to purchase land. A provision should be embodied in this bill by which the farmer could be granted an amount sufficient to purchase a land that has been cleared, where there is a house and out buildings and where he could settle one of his sons, who the following autumn could, by the sale of his crops, have sufficient to live upon and even get married, make a home for himself and thus be in a position to make use of the services of the blacksmith, the merchant, the doctor and other professional men. That would really be doing good work, and would help the back to the farm movement and would be an inducement to keep on the farm those who like farm life.

In our parishes, at present—I have had some experience—farms can be purchased for $1,500 and even $1,200, by paying $200 cash and $50 per year. These farmers would live on the land and would no further depend on the state. The government would have thus provided them with a home and the whole of Canada would reap the benefit. Such a provision would be far more beneficial than numerous provisions in this bill, which is very obscure. Include such a section and thus afford me an opportunity to vote for this bill. After all, it is preferable to keep in our midst 3,000 sons of our province and 4,000 of Ontario as well as many others from other provinces, instead of their being forced to seek another country. It is better to settle these young men on the land than to endeavour to force upon them profits on products that do not exist and even when they were grown by their fathers, the latter could not dispose of them because the markets had been lost by this government.

That is my suggestion.

Hon. members opposite contend that no suggestion comes from this side; well, this is one. Accept it and include it in the bill. I am expressing my own views; however, a number of members on this side would support such a measure because it would be an efficient remedy. Instead of pretending to help the farming class, the government would really be accomplishing something; even if such a provision has been put forth by a member on this side, the government could take all the credit—while the public would be grateful to us.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): The government cannot expect the farmers to benefit from the fact it takes up farming. This bill like others introduced by this government aims at enriching a small group. On behalf of the people, on behalf of my fellow-citizens, I request hon. members opposite to cease making laws to favour the wealthy. Be honest and endeavour to help the farmers, those who produce butter, eggs, pork and beef. Do not attempt after four years to introduce a bill to create markets. Such is not the case. It is simply an attempt to deceive the people who, however, can no longer be fooled.

Be honest! The government have promised that butter would sell at 70 cents per pound, and it sold, on an average, 19 cents for the last four years; they promised that eggs would sell 60 cents a dozen and they sold at 15 cents for the last four years.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Election promises.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): The government promised to raise the price of hay. It is true that in Quebec and Ontario it has increased somewhat, but only when farmers had none. The government and members opposite are responsible for such a state of things. That was not to be laid at the door of Providence, for Providence seemed somewhat surprised. Let the government, but especially the hon. Minister of Agriculture, show their good will by including in this bill the practical suggestion which I have just made. Let them find some remedy to relieve the ills from which our farmers suffer, they who have been left penniless; thus the bill introduced in the house will prove to be of some practical benefit.

I shall support this measure inasmuch as the government agrees to accept my suggestion, otherwise, I shall oppose it for the simple reason that the government is powerless to dispose of the products which have been accumulating on the markets for the last four years. Those that should be helped, at present, are the farmers, especially, those who wish to settle their sons on farms adjacent to theirs and on very reasonable terms.

Some loaners are willing to sacrifice a mortgage of $1,200 for $500. There are people who willingly would make sacrifices, but the government, themselves, will not do any. Let the government bestir themselves to help the people.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Let them do something!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I shall quote a typical case. Recently, a farmer called at my office, the father of eleven children—it appears that a certain U. S. judge finds it criminal to raise such a large family—a good Canadian, a devoted father and devout catholic and, moreover, one of my constituents. He has led a good life and will continue to do so. He purchased a settler's lot and had already cleared 15 acres and had intended to settle his son on it but had not sufficient money, because it would have taken $200 or $300 or even $500 to put the land into shape. He inquired of me whether he could be assisted, I was obliged to inform him that neither the dominion Minister of Agriculture nor the provincial Minister of Agriculture granted any assistance. He was therefore obliged to sacrifice his lot and keep his son at home.

The government have an opportunity to help the farmer by this bill. Let them do so, I beg of them!

I have just quoted an example such as exists not only in Quebec or Ontario but throughout the dominion. If the object of the bill is to save agriculture and help the farming class, let the government begin by assisting heads of families who wish to settle their sons and own lots close to their farm but who have not the necessary funds to do so.

Those are my suggestions and I beg of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to include them in his bill. Before even regulating the marketing of products, the opportunity must be afforded to farmers and their sons to produce them.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss the principle of the bill on this section, which deals with the title, because I think that would only be prolonging the debate that has already taken place on the principle when the second reading of the bill was before the house. But I wish to ask the minister a question, possibly two, and I do not want to see them meet the fate of the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario which caused at least delay and a good deal of mysticism. I will hedge it around so far as possible to make it perfectly plain, and so that there can be the least opportunity of receiving other than a distinct reply.

The minister in various speeches at different stages of this bill has stressed quite particularly his desire for cooperation from all sides of the house, and when I heard him express that wish my heart warmed to him. I thought that here was a man who was going to rise superior to party allegiance and was willing at least to consider the views of others in the house than members of his own party, which certainly was a spirit well calculated in a bill of this kind to produce a serviceable bill and one that would go through expeditiously. But, sir, while the minister gave that lip service to the idea of cooperation I failed to find in his actions any evidence that he would be glad to receive or that he would even allow cooperation. Anyone taking the stand and expressing the desire for cooperation might have refrained from indulging in personalities, as the minister did in his last speech in closing the debate on second reading. That was a course entirely unprovoked unless we must regard it as a crime even to comment on the bill or criticize its very obvious deficiencies.

The minister got a large amount of support, solid support I think, from this corner of the house, supplemented by the two Independents and by two Liberals, and nearly every one of these men who spoke in support of the bill, including the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), the leader of the farmer group in this house, and I am not sure if not some of the members behind the minister—who voted for the second reading—said they did so with the desire that the bill would go to the agriculture committee where its manifest weaknesses, discrepancies and contradictions might be threshed out at greater ease than could possibly be done here. When the minister was pressed to yield that point, the customary thing which has been done before, he would not give way. I do not think there was much spirit of cooperation there.

Then later on we find the minister saying that he had a number of amendments to make to the bill, and the Prime Minister went further than that and said there was a large number of amendments. I have Hansard here, if anyone doubts it. Then the right hon. leader of the opposition, commenting on that fact, suggested, also I think in a spirit of cooperation, that the minister should put these amendments upon Hansard, should read them at the time, so that they would appear in Hansard and be available to us all. But the minister bluntly refused to do so, and while he referred to two amendments that he proposed to introduce he did so vaguely, without reference to any particular section merely saying that they were to clarify the bill, giving us no precise indication of the nature of the amendment or where it would come in, in which case we would have had an opportunity of seeing whether it was calculated to carry out the intent behind it.

Later on in the debate before the committee rose I brought the matter up again, and suggested that the minister might well, indeed I begged him to put his amendments in the votes and proceedings, which would not destroy the continuity of the record in Hansard, but would make the amendments available to us all. But the minister was not willing, or at any rate did not take that action. There is ample precedent for such conduct. In the British House of Commons there is a very distinct rule, a rule hedged around with penalties, that no one, no matter what his position may be in parliament, shall introduce an amendment to a bill without giving notice. That means that the amendment appears on their votes and proceedings, or whatever corresponds to our votes and proceedings. Take the position here. When the Senate sends back a bill with amendments they are not considered in this house until notice has been given of the details of each and every amendment. Those amendments appear in our votes and proceedings and we are therefore able to form an opinion on the actual amendments. We go further than that. There is standing order 113 to be found at page 279 of Beauchesne's rules which provides that in the case of private bills, no important amendment can be moved in committee unless notice has been given. That means, unless it appears in votes and proceedings. The Prime Minister of Canada could not introduce an amendment of any consequence to any private bill, even though it be some tuppeny-ha-penny bill dealing with a bridge or the incorporation of a company to make hair nets or grindstones, unless notice has been given in the ordinary way. I admit that this is not compulsory in connection with government bills but this practice has the sanction of custom. Why does not the minister ask his colleagues what has been the custom in this house in years gone by? Let him ask the Minister of Finance what is the custom in connection with the budget. I recall very clearly, if he does not, that when the Prime Minister was Minister of Finance he introduced a budget containing a great many amendments to the tariff. Partly because of a suggestion of the leader of the opposition and partly through his own initiative he caused to be prepared elaborate documents showing the relation and consequence of the amendments proposed to the tariff. He did not need to do that as it was not legally necessary in the presentation of his budget. He could have let us struggle through trying to find out this information the best way we could by asking questions as each item came up but he had the courtesy and good sense to do it in that way. He facilitated the passage of the bill because we had the whole thing in front of us and did not need to ask any questions. I think we all appreciated his courtesy. The cost of printing a few lines in the votes and proceedings would be nothing while the benefit might be the saving of two or three days of debate. I am quite certain that what I have said meets with the agreement of every hon. member of the house, with the possible exception of the minister himself. He proposes to read out each amendment as we go along. He will stand up and say, "Strike out all the third line after the word 'and' and insert these words." There may be considerable noise in the chamber and we may not be able to catch the amendment or not sufficiently appreciate its meaning. Questions will have to be asked and there will be more delay. We will either let it pass in ignorance—I hope that is not his idea—or we will insist on further explanations. Can any hon. member imagine a lawyer pleading a case in court and a judge telling him that the section of the act with which he is dealing has been amended and then reading out the amendment rapidly and expecting the lawyer to base his defence or line of argument upon that? I am certain that if the minister will agree with my suggestion he will greatly facilitate the passage of this bill. I ask him as plainly as I possibly can: Will you not give way to the suggestion I have made and, if not, why not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that there is a good deal of force in what he has said. When this question was raised before I stated that consideration would be given but I regret that I have not brought the matter before my colleagues. I shall be glad to do so at the meeting to-morrow of the council and I will then give the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) a reply to his question.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, I find it necessary to make some reply to the remarks made this afternoon by the minister. When the committee rose at the last sitting the hon. member for Ontario had asked if this bill implied compulsion in the matter of marketing. A very simple answer could have been given to that question but the minister has done nothing but skate around it. The minister knows that if this bill goes into effect it will be possible to have, let us say, a compulsory wheat pool. This is a question of outstanding importance in Saskatchewan. It is important also in Alberta; I do not think to the same extent in Manitoba. Should this bill pass it would be possible to establish a compulsory wheat pool under certain conditions. The minister knows just as well as the rest of us that that is what is intended and that that is what is sought by many of those who seek the passing of this legislation. Instead of stating that there was no such implication in the bill he proceeded to define compulsion and asked: Have we compulsion provided for in Canada? Those may not be his exact words but that is their meaning. I answered, "No," thinking, as any other hon. member in the house would have thought, that the compulsion referred to applied to the marketing of our products. The minister then proceeded to give what he considered to be a parallel case and he outlined the way in which our schools are carried on and our roads built. We all know that these matters of public interest are carried on by community effort. I hesitate to say what I think of that kind of argument. I do not think it would be worthy of a debate carried on in one of our country schools.

Apparently the minister does not realize the full implication of the proposals contained in this bill. They are much more far-reaching than he realizes. I should like to quote a few statements which appear already in Hansard and to which reference has already been made. I think these are important enough to be again brought to notice. Speaking on the second reading of this bill I expressed the fear that friction might arise between the provinces in the administration of the legislation. I said:

> I see there the possibility of great friction, the possibility of difference arising between the provinces that may strain the bonds of confederation. Let us suppose for a moment that the apple growers of British Columbia view a certain course of action as being in their interest, the apple growers of Ontario take another view, and the apple growers of Nova Scotia still another. Let us suppose that they all want to get into the prairie market. As a consumer of fruit on the prairies I want to see that we can get the kind of apples we want. Yet this board which is to be brought into existence is to have the power to say that British Columbia apples can go to such and such a place, Ontario apples to another place and Nova Scotia apples to another place. It may be just a prejudice but it is an idea that is strongly held on the prairies, especially among those who came from old Ontario, that Ontario apples are just a little better than British Columbia apples.

Mr. NEILL: Order, order!

Mr. BROWN (reading):

Mr. Bennett: What about Nova Scotia apples?

Mr. Brown: I have not had the privilege of eating many Nova Scotia apples. There was one year in which they came west, and we would be very glad to have the privilege of buying Nova Scotia apples if we find them better than other apples.

I expressed the fear that friction might arise. The Minister of Trade and Commerce sees, as the minister does not see, the far-reaching implications of this bill; for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as quoted by the hon. member for Ontario, made this statement:

For instance our friends in Nova Scotia, who are only five or six days distant from the British market can pour their apples in while British Columbia and Ontario might be handicapped in that regard. Or British Columbia might have say 10,000 cases going through by way of the Panama canal in cold storage; the market is in danger of being flooded, and someone from eastern Canada pours his apples in and destroys it. No one, I am sure, desires that.

The hon. member for Ontario, having quoted that statement, made this comment:

Well, may I tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce if I were a Nova Scotia apple grower I would desire it. I would like to take advantage of my geographical situation, and I believe the apple growers of Nova Scotia, generally, will take the same position.

Evidently the Minister of Trade and Commerce appreciates the far-reaching effects of this bill, as the Minister of Agriculture does not; for in advancing reasons for the bill he pointed out that the countries of Europe were setting up quotas applicable to us and that we should need to have this central board in existence to meet the terms of those quotas. Then he proceeds to give what to my mind ought to be the death blow to the bill, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, when he thinks that the people of Nova Scotia will forego the advantages of their geographical situation. I can imagine that a similar situation might occur again and again. We might wish, as we certainly do wish, that human nature were so unselfish and self-sacrificing that the people of Nova Scotia would be willing to forego that advantage, but it is rather unsafe for us to frame legislation on that supposition. I think we have pointed out a case where friction may very well arise. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has admitted that it is proposed to do certain things. The hon. member for Ontario, speaking I believe what everyone in this house would endorse, said that there would be an objection if any particular community were to be deprived of its geographical advantage. These are some of the things in regard to which there is provision in the bill and we hope that when the minister brings forward his amendments these very grave defects will be corrected.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was rather surprised at an answer which the minister gave the leader of the opposition. When the leader of the opposition suggested to him that it was possible for this board to control production, the minister said that such power was not given the board. I have read the bill many times and I want to give the minister an opportunity of interpreting for us subsection (f) of section 4, which provides that the board shall, subject to the provisions of the act, have power:

To require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder.

If this board is to have the power indicated in that subsection, either to grant or to withhold a licence from a producer or anyone marketing products, how can the minister argue that it cannot control production? The producer must make application for a licence. I am a producer, let us say: automatically in the first instance, I presume, I get a licence. For some reason, after the first year, the board decides that I shall not have the licence renewed. Can it not by this power control production in regard to all commodities which this bill proposes to market? Will the minister give us his opinion on that point?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It does not state in section 4 that the producers are registered or licensed for production but for the regulating of the marketing of their product; and the reason the producer is registered or licensed is that the board shall have information as to the quantity of product that is to come forward to be sold. If the scheme required, for example, that in the event of 75 per cent of the producers of any product desiring to do so, they could force the other 25 per cent in, and the provincial government agreed to such a scheme, and if one of the producers in that area insisted on breaking the regulations, his licence could be cancelled, but it would be restored as soon as he conformed to the regulations; otherwise there would be no control.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does it say so in the bill —that the licence will be restored?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The only reason the licence would be cancelled would be for a violation of the regulations, and if the producer conformed to the regulations the reason for cancelling the licence would disappear.

Mr. VALLANCE: I suggest, in view of what is taking place now, that if the minister would take the advice that has again been given this afternoon and would place on Hansard the proposed amendments which he is going to bring in it would save a great deal of unnecessary discussion. There may be some amendments to the very clause I am objecting to, and probably the minister has them at the back of his head when he says that the board has not the power to control production. Possibly there is an amendment that makes it clear that the board has not that power, but I argue that subsection (f) of section 4 does provide for control of production by the withholding of the licence, because it says that the licence shall be subject to cancellation. But it does not say anywhere that after certain things have been done the board will renew the licence. I suggest to the minister that as soon as it is possible he should place the amendments at the disposal of the committee so that we could intelligently discuss the subject. If he did that I think the bill would go through much more quickly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Ontario does not happen to be in the house this afternoon, and therefore I wish to revert to what he said to the minister the other day. I would ask the minister if he would not give us a brief, concise and clear answer to the question put to him. The question put by the hon. member for Ontario will be found at page 2813 of Hansard.

> Does not this bill imply compulsory cooperation? I am opposed to its compulsory features. If you say that there is no compulsion, that it is purely voluntary, then naturally I withdraw my objections. I am for cooperation.

That brings out the significance of a direct reply. The hon. member for Ontario said—and I think all on this side agree with him—that if this measure, as respects cooperation in marketing, is a purely voluntary one, and does not contain elements of compulsion, then we shall have little or no difference with hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to its main features and we can make rapid headway in the discussion of its provisions. On the other hand, if it is a measure that implies compulsory cooperation, it is of importance that that fact should be definitely and clearly stated. On the following page the minister himself began to reply to the hon. member for Ontario in these words:

> He has asked this question: Does not this bill imply compulsory cooperative marketing?
> Mr. Moore (Ontario): Enable compulsory cooperative marketing.
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): I understood my hon. friend to use the word imply.
> Mr. Moore (Ontario): Enable. If I used the word imply I will substitute the word enable, if I may—enable compulsory cooperative marketing.

That is the question just in four words. Does the bill enable compulsory marketing or compulsory cooperative marketing? The answer which I think the house is entitled to receive from the minister is that it either does or does not. The minister is in a somewhat different position from that of most hon. members; he is the minister of the government in charge of the bill and the house has a right to expect from him very specific, definite and clear answers. In what he has said this afternoon—and I hope he will tell me if I am wrong—he has defended compulsion. He is quite within his rights in so doing; that I would expect he would wish to do if the bill embodies features of compulsion. It may be that compulsion is justified; that is for him to say. We are not taking objection to the minister defending any clause in the bill; all we want to know is whether it contains features which enable compulsory marketing. Would the minister advise the house as to that in a direct manner, and without circumlocution?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sure the right hon. gentleman speaks with authority on the question of circumlocution. This afternoon I answered as clearly as it is possible to do, to what extent this bill would involve compulsion. I think hon. members will agree that no controlled marketing can be effected without control or without compulsion in a degree.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I am right in assuming that the bill does enable compulsory marketing?—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I stated before in some detail somewhat earlier this afternoon, under those conditions it enables compulsory marketing with qualification; it does not say that compulsory marketing is always resorted to but the bill enables it in certain directions.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose sixty or seventy-five per cent of the growers of any natural product desire to form themselves into a co-operative marketing organization and through their local or provincial boards come to the minister here with a scheme for the marketing of that product: can the marketing board under this bill compel the other forty or twenty-five per cent that are growing the same commodity to go into this marketing scheme, or can it not? I would like to have a direct answer to that question.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is a possibility under certain conditions.

Mr. MARCIL: The conditions, I understand, must be the consent of the provincial governments, so this bill is subject to provincial approval or else it becomes a dead letter in that respect.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I stated this afternoon that in so far as certain schemes are concerned, they would be submitted to the provincial government because it has jurisdiction to deal with questions of property and civil rights.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister said: "that is a possibility under certain conditions." Are the conditions under which it might happen mentioned anywhere in the bill? What are the conditions?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are in so far as they can be set out in detail.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will the minister tell me what clause in the bill takes care of that? I cannot find it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I thought I gave a clear answer this afternoon as to the relationship between compulsion and this bill. If hon. members wish, I will repeat it, but I am quite certain that if the hon. member for Provencher will read Hansard to-morrow he will have the answer to his question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister one other question in order to get the exact information? On the second of May I said to him that I thought many persons believed this bill was not a marketing bill as they understood the use of the word "marketing." That is to say, they agreed that the bill provided for regulation of production and sale, but that it had in it no provision enabling a board to market the product of producers. They could not find any such provisions within the four corners of the bill. My words to the minister were these:

> You have not within the four corners of this bill any provision for a board that is going to assist in marketing the natural products of this country as producers have been led to believe is the case. If the minister will just tell us where are the provisions that make this a marketing bill as marketing is understood by those who are interested in having their natural products sold abroad through the assistance of the state we may perhaps determine whether or not even this short title is justified.

That is what I said as it appears in Hansard of May 2, 1934, at page 2753. The minister replied as follows:

> Mr. Weir (Melfort): The fundamental principle of the bill is the regulation of marketing, and that has to do with marketing; there is no doubt of that.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: The regulation of production and sale.
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): Not the regulation of production but the regulation of marketing. There is also in the bill a clause that states that the dominion marketing board has power to buy and sell and to name an agent to buy and sell, which is marketing.

I have looked through the bill since the minister made that statement and I cannot find the clause giving the dominion marketing board power to buy and sell. Would the minister kindly read that clause to us, and indicate wherein it is sufficiently broad to enable the bill to be described as a marketing bill in the sense in which I have referred to the word "marketing"?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place, as I stated before when the right hon. gentleman asked the question, regulation of marketing or the direction as to through what channels products will be bought and sold, in itself directly bears on marketing, but clause 9 on page 6 states:

> Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in the said product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board to regulate such product, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of such product.

And the word "marketing" is defined to include buying and selling.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 73, for the relief of Aziz Koudsy, otherwise known as Eddie Coudsy.—Mr. Gray.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Thomas Herbert Lennox, Esquire, member for the electoral district of North York.

I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On the twenty-fifth of January last this bill No. 51 was forecast in the speech from the throne. Since then winter has gone, spring is upon us, and summer is not far away, yet we have not passed even the first clause of the bill. I wonder whose fault it is.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Ask those boys behind you.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am beginning to have a hunch that the government would not mind dropping this bill at the feet of the opposition.

Mr. YOUNG: We don't want it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I do not want that to happen. If the government want to get the bill through in reasonable time they should expedite it by sending it to the right committee, the committee that every bill went to except one during the administration that preceded this, and the same with this present government so far as I can find from the records in the library. Every bill introduced by the Minister of Agriculture in this administration has gone to the agriculture committee except the first one, the root vegetables bill. And my good friend had a little trouble with it. Every one who has had to do with a bill amended two or three times knows it is very difficult to get it through. My good friend did not experiment with any more in that way; he afterwards sent them all to the agriculture committee, as far as I can find out. No member of the government has yet given a satisfying alibi for not sending this bill to the same committee and affording it the same facilities for improvement or amendment as were given to all these other agricultural bills. Just for curiosity, what was the one exception mentioned? The Prime Minister gave the only alibi, and it was a mighty poor one. I am sorry he is not here; I hope he will read what I have to say about it, because I think he spoke without knowledge on the matter. That was a bill to amend the Fruit Act, chapter 3 of 1924. There was a mistake of one word in the French version, it said eighty where it should have been eighty-five. It was very important to have that corrected, sufficiently important to introduce a bill. That was the only bill that came to this committee of the whole, and it is about the size for this committee to deal with, if we are to judge it by what is going on now. All the others, that were important, went to the agriculture committee. The Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced certain grain bills, and they were sent to the agriculture committee also. The Grain Act was sent there, both by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and by his predecessor. Why did they send it there? Because they thought it was the committee that the house had set up for that purpose. Why should they send it to the banking and commerce committee? That is a committee specially picked for the purpose indicated by its name. Then there was another bill, concerning immigration and colonization, I think it was in 1929, under the late Hon. Mr. Forke, but that is not material. The investigation was wide and the matter was important. I have a book here containing the record of it, at least two and a half inches thick. The hearing lasted for weeks and certain conclusions were arrived at. It was dealt with by the committee on agriculture and colonization because questions of immigration come under its auspices. And that name, agriculture and colonization, has continued since before the beginning of this century, with the result that anything concerning colonization and immigration that required investigation was brought before that committee. So I do not think there is another standing committee of the House of Commons that is so comprehensive in its scope. Yet after ballyhooing this marketing act all over creation as the most important that has ever been brought down—and it is important—the government will not submit it to this important committee on agriculture. They have no precedent for not doing so except this little one-word bill already referred to, brought down in regard to grading apples with just one word to change in the French version. That is about the size of the ministry over there, outside of the Minister of Agriculture—a one act government. I except the Minister of Agriculture from that stricture, although I must say he has not done much credit to himself in his very meagre explanation of this bill. Why? Because he is held back by his colleagues; that is the only reason I know of. The minister has two officers sitting in front of him who could tell us more about this bill in five minutes than we have been told up to date, yet we cannot get access to them. Did you ever hear of such a strange, distorted view of things?—and yet people will tell us there is no difference between the Tory and Liberal parties. Here is an instance of all the difference in the world. I see the Minister of Justice sitting over there, and I suppose a finer hon. gentleman does not stand in shoe leather. If he had his way I know this bill would go through the regular route, namely the committee on agriculture. Although the Prime Minister is not in the house, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is in his seat, will do for my purposes. In this house I have spoken more than once about the hydra-headed character of the Department of Agriculture. I do not know of any other department of agriculture in the world which has two heads, but we know that in this country the Minister of Trade and Commerce heads the cereal end and the Minister of Agriculture heads the rest of the department. So we have a double-headed, or hydra-headed proposition, and because of that we have been running up against difficulties all the time. In this particular connection I am not discussing the respective merits of these two gentlemen. I am trying to bring to the attention of the committee the folly of having two heads to any concern while some of the other departments have no head at all, not even a nominal one.

Mr. SPENCE: That was when you were there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is not a laughing matter. I do not wish to be sitting here all summer simply to get a little bill through the House of Commons, but I want to get it through in some sort of decent shape, or at least in better shape than it is now. We cannot do that by vainly endeavouring to pass it through this large committee.

There may have been some excuse for adding fisheries to the bill, because in the old country a precedent has been established there by combining agriculture and fisheries. When we include fisheries we find that we have a triple-headed proposition. I wonder how many fishermen asked to be included in this bill. But when you add forestry and thereby include the Department of the Interior you have a quadra-headed monstrosity the like of which we have not seen in the world. Yet the government seem to think that they have a little NRA puppy of their own off the big Rooseveltian mastiff. They all want to climb into this life-boat so that they may be pulled ashore in political safety. It is a wonder that the whole of the cabinet are not in it, because they will all need a place of refuge before the electoral storm subsides.

Let us read what was said in the speech from the throne so far as the forecast of this bill is concerned, and let us consider whether or not the present bill resembles that which was forecast. At the instance of the Prime Minister His Excellency said:

> You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

That is the forecast—"live stock and agricultural products." So much for the forecast; let us see what the hindcast is. Here it is: "This act may be cited as the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934." That includes pretty nearly everything outside. It means that under this bill one could make and sell whisky. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni was quite right when he said that one could set up a still and sell all the booze he wanted. I believe water power could be interpreted as coming under it. And what is water power or hydro power but turbined water—processed water, if you like? I do not think my right hon. leader was a bit too extravagant in his interpretation of the interpretation clause of the bill. He may have included too much, but he left out far more than he included. Consequently it is quite as wide as he suggested and, I believe, a little bit wider. I say to my hon. friends opposite that if they have any idea of dropping this bill in our lap over here they had better amend it first or they will be flayed alive for it in the country. No man on two legs could defend it in its present shape. What is more, it is so interlocked, interwoven and everything else of an "inter" nature that you could not get it started. That has occurred with many similar bills in other countries. Much of it is entirely new legislation. I suppose the men in other countries are no more supermen than the men in this country. Even in Great Britain the bill would not start itself. In its first year, namely 1929, it would not operate under its own steam. That is the reason such an extraordinary and unfair showing can be made against this type of legislation.

I should like to see the minister bring to the committee all those decrepit, derelict bills, European and other marketing bills, which have fallen by the wayside, and make an effort to avoid the difficulties which confronted them. But he has accentuated his difficulties in the present bill by trying to gobble up everything else, to bring it under the present legislation thereby making his position more difficult and creating more opposition all along the line. So, you see, the government seems to have got off on the wrong foot, from the very beginning. I think everybody knows the history of this legislation. Out in British Columbia the growers have been like harts panting for the water brooks in their anxiety for this legislation when amended. They have been wanting this legislation for years. We are told by the representative grower from Chilliwack that if this bill is passed the seven years legal war will be over. Nearly everybody out there is behind it, because they feel they cannot get along without their previous marketing activities being made constitutional by the present legislation. That, in itself, would be a great advance over conditions which prevailed before, because in the past every commodity had to be dealt with by separate authorization.

I have quoted from the speech from the throne delivered on January 25 words showing that this should be an agricultural marketing act. On March 26, a little more than two months afterwards, members of the government change their minds and say, "It will be a conglomerate bill taking in nearly every natural product under the sun." Of course, the government have a right to change their minds; as a matter of fact if they like they have a right to bring down no bill at all. Quite frequently legislation which is forecast in the speech from the throne never comes before the house. All hon. members know that. If the government can do that, certainly they can change a bill. However, before I go further I should like to ask the minister if the bill forecast in the speech from the throne, an extract from which I have just read, is the same bill as the one now before the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, it does not look much like the original design, and it will look less like it by the time it is passed. It would need to be changed, if it is to be of any use. Let the minister take the committee into his confidence and tell it why the change was made. Did the fishermen come from the east and from the west and do like the British Columbia milk producers and the associated growers of the Okanagan and Fraser valleys, respectively? Did they rush down on the ministry after the big meeting in Regina which was held in July or about the first of August, at the time of the international wheat congress, which was to be followed by a big meeting in Toronto? We are told that they even rough drafted the bill, and pretty nearly put a gun at the head of the government demanding that their draft become law. That is as far as they could go. What I want to know is this: When the proposals left the hands of those gentlemen, did they expect a bill like this? I am sure there are many features in this bill about which they never dreamed. Of course I do not suppose they care very much about the supplementary features, so long as they, personally, are not affected. I will say, however, that some features they did want do not appear in the bill. Could we have even a hint from the minister as to whether or not certain pooling amendments were to be made it would be encouraging. Perhaps he has given a hint, but at times his hints are so terribly wide and capable of so many interpretations that we do not know what to make of them. Then, I am to believe this is the same bill which was forecast. Will the minister tell us why a marketing bill was forecast in the speech from the throne and then a bill brought down which is just about as much unlike a proper marketing bill as anything could be? Did the lumbermen also, the men who are getting out saw logs and fence posts and telephone poles come down here like they did from Chilliwack and the Fraser river demanding that the natural products—dairy and fruit—in which they are interested be inserted in this bill? The only reason this bill, this uncanny freak marketing bill is brought down is to get through the next election. That is what it looks like. Why not let it go to the agriculture committee and let us get out of here with a much better bill. I told this house some time ago that there was going to be a little political jamboree in Saskatchewan about next month and I do not want to be fooling around here at that time, but it looks as if I will be if further delay continues. I know, Mr. Chairman, that that is not a valid reason in itself, but I think it will appeal to every member present, especially those from Ontario, who are in the same fix. The only difference is that they have not so far to go as I have. The minister should take the committee into his confidence, and tell us why this change. Or, if he says he cannot, I shall not bother him further.

I think the Minister of Pensions, whom I see looking pleasantly at me, spoke on behalf of this bill and reminded the house that it was not strictly an agricultural baby and therefore we had no right to claim that it should go exclusively to the agriculture committee, although he was fair enough to admit that it was predominantly an agricultural bill. I think he was wanting to go back to the maritimes with this bill as a life saver, and they need a life saver badly down there. I do not know why the Minister of the Interior would want this bill particularly, unless it is that he did not get any federal assistance for his Turtle mountain park, but maybe there will be something for that before the session is over. Anyway I ask the Minister of Agriculture to tell the committee why this extraordinary change was made, and if he shows signs of getting up I will sit down; if he does not, I will continue.

Natural products! Why, Mr. Chairman, it is an orphan, this bill. It is nobody's in particular; it is everybody's in general, and it is no wonder it is having the experience it is having right now. What did I call it just now? A quadra-headed monstrosity. Is it any wonder the government has difficulty in presenting this baby to the world? The best veterinary doctor in the world will be required about the time parturition takes place. There will have to be a surgical operation that may endanger the marketing baby, but it will have to be done to save the mother. That is exactly what this bill is for, to save the mother, or the father, or whatever you like to call the government. It is difficult to give birth to anything with four heads, and we want an explanation why three of them cannot be decapitated, and leave the fourth to be dealt with properly in the bill. I will retire now in favour of the minister and maybe have something more to say afterwards.

Mr. GRAY: This afternoon, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hold on a minute. I think the minister should answer my questions.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): First, as to why this bill has not been submitted to the agriculture committee, I think that has been made clear on more than one occasion.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Clear as mud.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The second question was whether this bill was based on the statement made in the speech from the throne. It is, and in addition to agricultural products the bill includes the products of the sea, the lakes and the forests. I think those are the questions that were raised, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The minister didn't say anything about the surgical operation on the three heads too many, or trying to give birth to a freak with four heads. He didn't say why three should not be decapitated and leave the bill something like what it should be. What will the farmers in this house say regarding this many headed monster when they go back home? Go over the bill and you will at least see that we have something to instal in the museum. I think the government should be properly and heartily ashamed of themselves, for they had the advantage of a precedent—about twenty-five other marketing bills all over the world, including the British act, and I invite them now to quote one act that in the least resembles this critter here. It is not to be found in the heavens above, the waters below nor indeed anywhere else. If the government does not want to follow or avoid precedent, let them at least present something that is reasonable, workable, and sensible.

Where is the Minister of Marine? I wonder that he is not up on his hind legs telling us why he wants this bill. Or the Minister of Mines. Somebody should move an amendment to this thing that minerals be included. Then what would the government say? They have just as much right to put minerals in as some of the things we find in this bill. Possibly it was thought that one life saver was enough, and since the Minister of the Interior was brought into this bill, there was no need for them both.

But look how illogical this bill is. Of all the harebrained, rattle brained bills in creation, I never saw the like of it—and yet I supported it on the second reading. You see, Mr. Chairman, the position I am in. I have got to rake the blooming thing over again with the aid of the minister, to make something decent and effective out of the bill because I voted for the second reading. Let the government take the breeching straps off the Minister of Agriculture and give him freedom to do what he likes with this bill, and we will make a real worth while bill out of it before it leaves this house at prorogation. That is my belief or I would not have voted for the second reading. If I had thought that the bill was going to go through in the shape it was when introduced, I would have nailed it right there. But because I believed that there was a small modicum of horse sense in this government and that we could cooperate in making this a real bill—and we have had no cooperation from the minister yet—or his colleagues either. I have to partially appear as joint father to this abnormal bill, and that is why I am interested in making something out of it; but the government wont let me. They are only the adopted father anyhow. It is the fruit growers and the milk producers of British Columbia who are the real father of it. The government are only the foster father. I do not know exactly what I am unless it is the nurse for the occasion or something like that and whose services seem unacceptable. But putting all joking aside, believing as I do that there was sufficient good in the bill, a nucleus around which something worth while might be built, I voted for the second reading in the hope that we could turn out a bill that the government might be proud of and one that the producers of Canada would express their pleasure at. But if you wait and wait until you are crowded and then put it through the way it is, the government will be the laughing stock of the country. If I were looking at it from the political standpoint pure and simple, I would let them hop to it, put it through the way it is. Then if the bill would not do the producers much good, it certainly would not do the government any good. Look at the government's glaring incapacity to handle this bill after they have produced it. It is so unnatural for a Tory government to bring forth such a bill that having begotten it they know not how to care for it. They do not know the best committee to send it to. Will the Minister of Justice get up like the splendid gentleman he is and tell us why this bill has not been sent to the agriculture committee? Why should this whole house be worried about it? I am sure the professional members would be glad to get rid of it.

Mr. SPENCE: Why do you worry the committee so long?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I heard a voice. I think it was the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman, is there any order in the committee? Is the hon. gentleman to be allowed to repeat his speech over and over again? I think he should be called to order. He has his conglomeration together—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the hon. gentleman is blathering at me I will remind him that the records will show that I did not raise my voice the last day this bill was before the house except for about five words as an interjection. I did not say one word this afternoon.

Mr. SPENCE: Why did you support the first reading of the bill and then block it night after night?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Have I spoken forty minutes?

Mr. SPENCE: You have spoken forty minutes ten times over and you did not say anything any time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. gentleman is ballyhooing about nothing. If he wants to get up perhaps I had better sit down and give him a chance. Oh, I see as usual he has nothing to say except interrupt.

Mr. SPENCE: The fellow behind you will take up another half hour.

Mr. GRAY: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we were able to wring from the minister the admission that there were certain compulsory features in this bill. He was asked a direct question by my right hon. leader some days ago, which question was repeated on Friday by the hon. member for Ontario and again this afternoon. While admitting that there were compulsory features in the bill, the minister tried to qualify that admission. Hon. members opposite have tried to create the impression throughout Canada that this is a co-operative measure but we on this side are beginning to get used to measures of this kind. Last year we had a bill introduced by the Minister of Railways for the compulsory co-operation of the two railroads and now we have this bill. While the cooperation features have been emphasized by hon. gentlemen opposite, by the minister in particular, as were the cooperative features of the railway bill, I have taken the trouble to look over the bill—I did this rather hurriedly and I may have missed something—to find out what compulsory features there are and what powers are to be given to the boards to be created. I am against the compulsory features to be found in the bill. Like my right hon. leader I am quite prepared to support any cooperative measures but in looking over the bill I find there are but very few. On the other hand, I think I shall be able to prove to the satisfaction of the minister and the committee that there are twenty-three separate clauses entailing compulsion and giving the boards the power to compel persons engaged in the production or marketing of natural products to do certain things. This bill is far from being the cooperative measure which the minister would lead us to believe it is; in reality it is a compulsory measure from beginning to end. I shall list the compulsory features, and as I do not want to be unfair, the minister may correct me if I am wrong in my interpretations of the sections. The compulsory features are as follows:

1. To compel the time of marketing of the regulated product.

2. To compel the place of marketing of the regulated product.

3. To compel the manner of distribution of the regulated product.

4. To compel the quality of the regulated product that is to be sold.

5. To compel the quantity of the regulated product that shall be marketed.

6. To prohibit, if necessary, the marketing of the regulated product.

7. To compel any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names with the board.

8. To compel any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their addresses with the board.

9. To compel any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their occupations with the board. For years we have boasted in this country of our freedom but have we reached the stage where we shall have to go around with a number on our back?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe the hon. member stated that he is in favour of orderly marketing. Would he state how he expects to have orderly or controlled marketing without control or compulsion?

Mr. GRAY: I did not suggest that I was in favour of orderly marketing; I said I was in favour of cooperative marketing. I repeat, are we Canadians who have boasted of our freedom to go around with numbers on our backs?

10. To compel any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to obtain licences from the board.

11. To compel full information relating to the production and marketing of the natural products from the persons engaged therein.

12. To compel periodic returns to be made by persons engaged in the production and marketing of the regulated product.

[Mr. Gray.]

13. To compel the production and inspection of the books of the persons engaged in the production and marketing of the regulated product.

14. To compel the persons engaged in the production and marketing of the regulated product to be subjected to the inspection of their premises by persons to be appointed by the board. The Minister of Justice will bear me out when I say that under certain acts power is given to make inspections but that power is never granted without certain preliminaries. An information must be laid before a magistrate or whoever is empowered to issue a warrant; certain officers are issued writs of assistance, but we recognize that these are extraordinary powers. This bill will give not only the power to inspect the books of a person producing or marketing the regulated product, but the power to persons to be appointed by this board to go upon premises to inspect as they see fit.

15. To compel those engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to pay for services rendered in respect to all or any portion of the regulated product.

16. To compel those engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to pay any necessary expenditure authorized under the act.

17. To compel those engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to pay after legal action, on the evidence of the chief executive officer alone, the amount found due for necessary expenditure.

18. To compel those engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to be subjected to the powers of a local board created under the act.

19. To compel restriction of any product imported into Canada as defined by this act.

20. To compel restriction of the exporting of any product as defined by this act.

21. To compel the licensing of importers of the regulated product as defined by this act.

22. To compel those engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to be confronted with the possibility of expropriation of their real property—and I expressly say that this is not a power that should be given under this act.

23. To compel by the force of law, as an indictable offence, anyone engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to appear before a magistrate or a judge, such magistrate or judge being clothed with the authority under this act to fine up to $5,000, or to imprison for a term of two years, anyone considered to be acting to the detriment or against the interests of the public.

I ask the minister, as I ask this house: Is this a cooperative or is it a compulsory measure? And I ask the minister, further, whether he has been quite fair to the committee. After having been asked several times he finally admitted that there were certain compulsory features and he even qualified that as Hansard to-morrow will show. I have outlined, perhaps not all but certainly a large number of the compulsory features contained in this bill, and I ask him whether he will now qualify as he did this afternoon the compulsory features of Bill 51.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member (Mr. Gray) has stated in the first place that the committee was able to wring from me the admission that there was compulsion in this bill, and he also says that my statement was made with qualifications. It was made with qualifications, because I believe it is possible to have set up under this bill schemes that will not call for compulsion in any such way as the hon. member has suggested. My hon. friend gets back again to this old cry: Are we to be compelled to do this? Are we to lose our liberty? He says that he agrees entirely with his leader. If he does, his leader, if I remember correctly, moved an amendment and stated in his address that hon. gentlemen opposite would be in favour of orderly marketing. Well, I ask the hon. member this very simple question: How can we have orderly marketing without control or some degree of compulsion? Therein I believe lies the secret of the basis of opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite. They wish to give the impression that in orderly marketing, as they advocate it, there would be no control, which would be typical of their attitude towards this bill and their attitude towards agriculture during the last three years and prior to that time, that is to say, something innocuous, something which they could talk about but which really did not mean very much.

The right hon. gentleman opposite dwelt at length on Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights and then registered strong objection against anything compulsory. Surely we all agree that the very basis of our civilization, of our constitution and of our national life is compulsory cooperation, because we believe that in that compulsory cooperation we have our fullest freedom. Cooperation means working together, forced to work together.

Mr. YOUNG: Forced—the chain gang.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Weyburn interrupts. The hon. member for Ontario invited us to take a world tour, visiting all the countries in the world. I presume that, as is usual in world tours, we should see some superficial things in each country, but we should miss the real picture. I would invite the hon. member for Weyburn and the hon. member for Ontario to visit some of our own local districts and give them, as they have given here, an orderly marketing bill accompanied by a copy of Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights. Here may I say in passing that I take second place to no one in my respect for what is meant by Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, but I do object to hon. gentlemen on any side of the house twisting Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights and freedom and liberty into all conceivable contorted shapes and forms to meet a political argument which they think will result in gain for them in garnering a few votes throughout the country. May I say to the hon. member who took his seat a moment ago (Mr. Gray), and who resents complusion so much, that I think he will admit that someone on his behalf was compelled to register his birth, that he was compelled to take out a licence when he got married, and that someone will have to obtain a death certificate after he dies.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not intend to speak on the bill at all; I felt it was a measure that affected farmers more particularly. However, I will try to give an unbiassed slant on it. I do not believe that any political party has all the virtues, and if those responsible for the passing of the bill are wrong in their judgment they will suffer for it.

I think the principle of the bill is in conformity with world forces and world opinion. In my opinion it is an attempt to change anarchy into orderliness in the marketing of the products of the country. I was very much amused when one of the previous speakers this evening, a member of the legal profession, discussed the question of compulsion. I do not know of any group in the community that has benefited more by compulsion than the lawyers. They have complete control of the situation. They insist that their own managers or business agents sitting on the bench shall judge the actions of their fellow men. I am not objecting to that, but if they find this system of organization so beneficial, why not give the farmers the same right and opportunities to enjoy it themselves? There are in the house many men of the medical profession, and I think we will all agree that the compulsory cooperation which governs the medical and surgical callings is necessary and in line with a developing civilization; I do not think there is any argument against it. Anyone who has had experience with the medical profession—and I have had some so far as health and hospital boards in the city from which I come are concerned—knows the value of that cooperation.

I appreciate the position of the Liberal party and I believe the attitude they are taking is one of sound Liberalism. I thought there was only one Liberal on this side and that was the hon. member for Ontario. They are somewhat in the same position as King Canute who thought he could tell the ocean to roll back, but the ocean told him to roll back. I realize the implications of what we are confronted with at the moment. It is all right to talk about economic nationalism, but we see its implications as exemplified only yesterday in the attitudes of the Japanese and British governments. We are confronted with the problem of science as expressed in mass production in agriculture and in industry. What kind of compulsory cooperation does the Liberal party want? Do they want the kind of compulsory cooperation from the viewpoint of the farmer as expressed in the attitude of the Imperial Tobacco Company? That is rugged individualism; that is free competition where a private concern can overnight cut the rates to the producer almost in half, and he has not a word to say about the matter.

I believe the state has some responsibility in this regard; it has some responsibility in protecting the weaker against the stronger, and that is why I believe this legislation is sound. Some people have spoken of education. At one time education was in a state of anarchy; we had an individual educational system run on the basis of rugged individualism, and the state in developing civilization insisted that every boy and girl in the community should have an education so that they could take their place in the agricultural, commercial and intellectual life of the nation. I am a comparatively young man and I know something of the opposition which came from the class to which I belong, the working class, to compulsory education. It is only at this late date that they take it more or less as we take the water coming from the tap, just the same as I think the people of this country will take legislation of this kind twenty-five years from now.

I am frank to admit that the keystone of the arch in connection with this matter is the ability of the farmer himself to catch the vision of legislation of this description. If he is willing to go along and cooperate; if he is willing to take a leaf out of the book, may I say, of the lawyers, the doctors and the trade unionists, he can receive the benefit which, in my judgment, is his due. That is why I feel that I must support the principle of this bill. I did not expect to speak so long but I could go on almost indefinitely and show the committee where cooperation has raised the whole level of our national life and civilization.

Take the question of diphtheria in the city from which I come, where we have practically wiped out that disease; where we have the lowest death rate from tuberculosis in the British Empire with the exception of New Zealand. Take workmen's compensation, minimum wage laws, old age pensions, the contemplated compulsory unemployment insurance that has the sympathetic consideration of every party in this house. I want to challenge any government to go back to the old days and to tell the people that such legislation should be wiped out; they know that notwithstanding the fact it took years of agitation and education to prove their soundness, once they were established we would never do away with them. I think in regard to this legislation we shall not go back either. I believe it is absolutely sound.

While I do not agree with all the clauses in the bill I think we should get down to business and get this legislation out of the way. It is votes that count and it will be on the statute books of the country whether we like it or not. I hope sincerely the farmers will react in the proper spirit to the bill; I hope they will change their attitude and cooperate the same as the trade unionists and the lawyers have done. I believe I said this the other night when I suggested that the bill should go to the agriculture committee: it is a fundamental in the life of the Anglo-Saxon people that coercion in its very essence breeds its own destruction, and I should like to see a cooperative approach to the implications of this legislation because frankly, I am sure, ten years from now we shall be very glad that we passed it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. member who has just spoken has, by his reference to the subject of education, indicated perhaps more clearly than anyone else has done thus far, wherein the difference exists between the point of view of hon. gentlemen on this side and that of himself and hon. gentlemen opposite. The liberal party in this or any other country has never opposed government action with respect to education.

As a matter of fact, most of the educational laws in the old land and in this owe their origin very largely to Liberal governments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a matter of history. Hon. members may laugh, but it is true.

The point, however, I wish to make is this: It is one thing to have laws respecting education enacted at the instance of duly constituted legislative bodies, and quite another thing to allow education to be regulated by self interested groups wherever they may happen to be located, apart altogether from representative institutions. If my hon. friend has read this bill with care, he will see that the essence of it is not legislation by this parliament to regulate or promote orderly marketing but to give authority to self interested groups themselves quite apart from any legislative body, to make regulations which are to be regarded as and have the force of laws and which are to apply to the community as a whole. It is to give to a self interested group power to create offences, not to leave that power in the hands of parliament which exists for the purpose of protecting the rights and liberties of the people, but to take it away from parliament and to put it into the hands of self interested groups. Parliament is to make the penalties in advance, the self interested groups are to designate the offences to which the penalties are to apply. When hon. members on this side speak of voluntary cooperation, they mean that they are ready to further any legislation that will enable voluntary groups to come together in order to carry out in an orderly way the business of marketing or any other business that is in the public interest; that they would be prepared to go whatever lengths this parliament itself may think wise with respect to the regulations that are to govern generally, but that those regulations must be made a part of the law of the land and so enacted as to be known to everyone.

Hon. members opposite keep alluding to my reference to the Magna Charta. I made it designedly; I expected to hear them repeat over and over again: We are being asked to go back to the days of the Magna Charta. But I hope hon. gentlemen will come to realize that in the Magna Charta there is one clause that is the basis of all our rights and freedom, and that is that a man shall not be dispossessed of his rights or property or have his life put in jeopardy except by the judgment of his peers, and by the law of the land. Under this legislation, hon. members opposite propose to make men liable to have their persons imprisoned and their property taken from them, not by the law of the land as hitherto understood, law made by this parliament, but by regulations of self constituted self interested groups that may be successful in drawing up a scheme and having it approved by the governor in council. That is the objection which we are taking to this measure, and I am sure the hon. member for East Hamilton, if he will study this legislation and realize its implications, will discover that it is of a very different order from enactments with respect to education and that far from there being any differences in the point of view of hon. gentlemen on this side and himself with respect to regulations such as are set forth in educational acts, there is no difference whatever.

I agree with the hon. minister when he says that you cannot have regulation at the instance of the state without some element of compulsion. All law implies compulsion. Regulation that is made by this parliament applicable to the country as a whole, which fixes penalties known in advance, penalties determined by this parliament, which is representative of all classes and groups—that kind of regulation I for one am prepared to support if it can be shown to be in the interest of the country generally, and with respect to marketing I believe much of it can be shown to be in the public interest, and to be necessary. But I cannot support a measure that takes away from this parliament altogether and gives to local boards or even to a central board the power to create offences, and which simply permits this parliament to name in advance the penalty that may be attached to offences as so created, to say for example that a man shall be subject to imprisonment for two years and to a fine running up to $5,000, without knowing to what offence that particular penalty is to be made applicable. Equally I cannot support a measure which takes away from this parliament all control over the expenditure necessary in connection with the administration of a law of this kind, and leaves it to bodies not yet formed or to the governor in council to take out of the consolidated revenue of the country whatever amounts they may think necessary therefor. These things undermine the power of parliament and individual liberty. That is the reason why we on this side are opposing the compulsory aspects I have referred to. It is not opposition to regulation for the purpose of orderly marketing; let me make that very clear. Any measure looking towards that end which the ministry may bring in that will set forth reasonable regulations, define offences, and that will be in the nature of a law known to all parts of the country will receive from us cordial approval. It is, however, a very different thing to ask this house to give to one group in British Columbia and to another group in Quebec and to another group in Nova Scotia the right to frame any scheme they please and attach to violations of these several schemes penalties which subject persons to fine and imprisonment. When it comes to creating offences, fixing penalties and generally to the making of laws, then it seems to me it is necessary to have regard for those safeguards that have been made applicable to all representative institutions. The reason we have a franchise act, the reason we have an elections act, the reason we have a secret ballot, and numerous other provisions and safeguards with respect to the election of members of parliament, is to ensure that when legislation is enacted all interested parties will be represented, and that the voice which creates offences and penalties shall be the voice of the people as a whole, not merely the determination of an interested group in a given section or locality. Such legislation as this is subversive entirely of all that parliamentary institutions stand for, and it is to that subversion that we take such strong objection.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, the other day when this bill was before the house the hon. member for Ontario asked the minister if the bill did not provide for compulsory cooperation. It was a simple, direct question, that could have been answered in a single sentence. The minister in his reply talked all around the matter but did not answer the question. Again this evening the hon. member for West Lambton pointed out numerous instances in the bill where compulsion is provided for, and again the minister in his reply did not touch the point.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I interrupt? Twice at least this afternoon I stated very explicity my interpretation of compulsion as embodied in this bill. I resent very much the attempt of the hon. member to leave the impression that I did not.

Mr. YOUNG: I was not in the house this afternoon and do not know what the minister said then. My reference was to what he said Friday afternoon and again this evening. My hon. friend from East Hamilton says that the Liberal party in opposing this bill are in the position of King Canute who thought he could turn back the tide. We do not think we can turn back the tide, but we do not think it necessary to plunge headlong into the tide. And we know that one of the most industrious nations on the face of this earth when they found the tide submerging their land built dykes to hold it back. It is this rising tide—

Mr. MITCHELL: They have a marketing bill too.

Mr. YOUNG: And they are sorry for it. That same nation, I say, built dykes to hold back the tide, and in this country, seeing this movement all over the world and in our own country to invade the rights of our people, to undermine our liberties, it is necessary to join together and, if possible, hold back that tide. I have before me Lord Hewart's book on The New Despotism.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Prime Minister's favourite.

Mr. YOUNG: The Prime Minister's favourite when he was leader of the opposition. I have no doubt that after the next election he will be quoting from it again.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He will not be here then.

Mr. YOUNG: The book is a protest, written with the idea of pointing out to the people how their liberties are being steadily invaded by a numerous and powerful bureaucracy who seek to make of themselves the one power in the land. Lord Hewart points out that in the old days when a man wished to become a tyrant and deprive the people of their freedom he defied parliament, but later it was discovered that that system did not work, so the would-be usurper adopted the more astute method of using parliament. As Lord Hewart says:

> To this end let him, under parliamentary forms, clothe himself with despotic power, and then, because the forms are parliamentary, defy the law courts.
> This course will prove tolerably simple if he can (a) get legislation passed in skeleton form; (b) fill up the gaps with his own rules, orders, and regulations; (c) make it difficult or impossible for parliament to check the said rules, orders and regulations; (d) secure for them the force of statute; (e) make his own decision final; (f) arrange that the fact of his decision shall be conclusive proof of its legality; (g) take power to modify the provisions of statutes; and (h) prevent and avoid any sort of appeal to a court of law.

In reading over that paragraph, Mr. Speaker, and reading this bill I could not but be struck with the idea that whoever drafted that bill had those rules distinctly in his mind, for all of them except one is embodied in this bill, and that one is provided for in another way.

Let us look at them: "(a) get legislation passed in skeleton form." This bill is a skeleton bill. It does not tell how our goods are to be marketed; it provides for the setting up of boards which will devise schemes of their own, those schemes, without submission to the people, will be declared law, and the gaps will be filled in as provided in (b), These are to be the laws, the rules, orders and regulations of these various boards of schemers who are going to have control of our marketing. Then, "(c) make it difficult or impossible for parliament to check the said rules, orders and regulations." Once this legislation is in effect; once these various groups of schemers come together with their schemes and have them made into law, neither this parliament nor any provincial legislature nor the producers nor the consumers of this country will have any effective control over the actions of these boards or schemers. Then, "(d) secure for them the force of statute." That is provided in section 6, which says:

(1) When a scheme has been approved by the governor in council, the minister shall give public notice thereof in the Canada Gazette.

(2) The provisions of the scheme as approved shall have the force of law, and the local board shall, from the date of the publication of the said notice of approval, be a body politic and corporate.

Yes, their decisions have the force of law. Then, "(e) make his own decision final." We have that in section 7:

(1) Every local board established hereunder shall continue to have authority to exercise its powers until such time as the governor in council withdraws such authority.

Then, "(f) arrange that the fact of his decision shall be conclusive proof of its legality." Turning to section 4, subsection 4, we find:

Any charge made by the board pursuant to a scheme shall be a debt due to the board and shall be recoverable as such by legal action, and a certificate under the hand of a chief executive officer shall be prima facie evidence that the amount stated therein is due.

All that is necessary for these boards to do, if they wish to make a charge or levy on anybody, is to say, "You owe us so much money"—and that is evidence that they owe it. Then, "(g) take power to modify the provisions of statutes." Yes—look at section 12. It may have the power to modify the Customs Act to forbid the entrance of goods into Canada and to forbid the export of goods from Canada. This power, one which properly belongs to parliament, is to be transferred to these boards over which we will have no control. Then, the last one, "(h) prevent and avoid any sort of appeal to a court of law." I do not see anything in this bill making provision for that, but in the legislation submitted to the various provincial legislatures and which is to work in conjunction with this legislation such a provision was made. I believe some of the provinces have refused to pass that clause.

The other day in his speech to the house the minister used these words—and he used them twice on the same day—"I maintain that nowhere in this bill is restriction of production mentioned." No, it is not mentioned but it is involved just the same. As the hon. member for Ontario said the other day, when the spider invited the fly into his parlour he did not mention the web, but the web was there. When these various schemes are in effect and the schemers are in control, the minister knows perfectly well that many of the schemes submitted to him will involve restriction of production. I ask him now if he will stand up in his place and promise to put into this bill a clause providing that under no condition shall a scheme involving restriction of production be approved. Will the minister promise that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is nothing in the powers given to the board which states that they can control production or restrict production. That should be sufficient.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister will not answer the question. The spider will say to the fly, "I never said there was a web here to catch you in."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I interrupt the hon. member? I am afraid that if I am to accept the interpretations of hon. members opposite I must admit I do not understand the English language as well as some of them. What I did say was that no power was given to the board to restrict production. I do not see how anything could be more definite than that. If they have no power to restrict production, how can they restrict it?

Mr. YOUNG: They can refuse a licence to any man, and there are some groups—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not for production.

Mr. VALLANCE: The bill says "production."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It does not say that there is any licensing of production.

Mr. VALLANCE: The bill refers to production or marketing.

Mr. YOUNG: Subsection (f) of section 4 states that the board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power:

(f) to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, and to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder.

If the minister is sincere in what he says, namely that he does not intend that in any way production shall be under restraint, then will he be willing to put a clause in the bill to that effect?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The bill as it reads does not give power to any person to restrict production. How can they restrict it, if there is no power to do it?

Mr. YOUNG: It gives power to the various boards to have schemes, and it gives power to the minister to approve of those schemes. And many of those schemes will involve restriction of production.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): How does the hon. member know that? Why would any group of people ask for a restriction in their scheme when there is no power given them to restrict?

Mr. YOUNG: If the minister states there is no power to be given to restrict, why not put that in the bill? Why not say so? I know of certain groups in this country who are supporting the bill because they think it does give them power to restrict production. If the minister will say it does not give them power they will not support it.

Mr. SPENCE: Name the groups.

Mr. YOUNG: There are lots of them.

An hon. MEMBER: Name them.

Mr. YOUNG: The tobacco growers of Ontario, for one. The principal criticism which has been levelled against this bill by hon. members on this side of the house has been that it invades our personal liberty, the right of the citizen to manage his own business and to dispose of his own product in his own way. The other night the hon. member for Labelle made reference to this point. At page 2727 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> This legislation opens the way to all sorts of interference with the liberty of the farmer, the gardener, the fruit grower, the dairyman, and the consumer.

But the hon. member for Labelle, strange to say, seemed to be willing to support the bill, because at page 2725 he said:

> Now, admittedly, parliament is unable to do that work; governments are unable to do it.

And therefore he thinks it is all right to turn it over to these boards. But what right has parliament, any more than these boards, to interfere with the private affairs of an individual? Surely there are some limits to the powers of parliament. Parliaments were never set up to manage our private affairs; they were never established to interfere with our personal liberties. Parliaments were set up to preserve our liberties. It would be well if some one would state clearly just how far parliament should be allowed to go in invading the rights of the people. There is a limit to what parliament can do or should be permitted to do. To a much greater extent should there be a limit to what these irresponsible boards may be permitted to do.

It has been stated by hon. members opposite and also hon. members to my left that people might prefer economic freedom to political freedom. I ask those members this question: Is it economic freedom to own a farm and not be allowed to cultivate it in your own way? Is it economic freedom to raise a crop and not be allowed to market it without the consent of somebody else? Is it economic freedom, when you have raised a crop or produced an article and have found a market for it, to have some meddlesome board come along and say to you, "You cannot sell it in the market"? Is that economic freedom? Is that the kind of freedom contemplated in this bill. The most casual reading of history seems to reveal that those nations which have preferred economic freedom to political freedom and which have been willing to sacrifice political freedom for a little more personal comfort or ease for the time being have not enjoyed economic freedom. They have not enjoyed the prosperity which they hoped to get, and for which they were willing to sell their liberties. The most prosperous nations are those which have been most insistent upon maintaining their political liberties—always and everywhere. Esau sold his birthright for a mess of pottage, but Esau collected the pottage in advance. Those who would sacrifice their liberty, their freedom and the right to manage their own business for what is promised in this bill are not likely to collect their pottage at all. But since hon. gentlemen opposite say the people are willing to sell their freedom and liberty for what they hope to gain out of this legislation, let us examine it and see if they are likely to get an extra five cents per bushel or one cent per pound for their produce.

Look at the cooperatives we have had in Canada. In one of his speeches on this bill the minister stated that the reason a great many cooperatives failed was that they had an unfortunate way of choosing their managers; that managers had been frequently chosen because of their ability to sell the idea to the people, their ability to put over the propaganada to get themselves elected to office, but that they were not qualified to market the product. I wish to ask if the method provided in this bill for choosing the leaders in the scheme, or the schemers who are to control marketing, is more likely to succeed, and if by that method we are more likely to get good managers than under the old method. How are they to be chosen? If we turn to clauses (g) and (h) of subsection 5, section 5, we find that every scheme as approved shall state,—

(g) the number of persons who shall comprise the local board and the basis of their selection;

(h) the name and number of the local board; the place and address of the head office; the chief executive officers; the quorum required to approve any order or resolution; and how vacancies are to be filled;

(i) any other information required by regulation or by the minister.

These schemers are to have it in their own hands to say who shall be the executive officers, where they shall be located, how they shall be elected, and how they shall be replaced. I ask you, as sensible men, is that a system of choosing executives that is any more likely to succeed than the system in the old cooperative of choosing the most popular man to manage its affairs? I think you will agree with me that it is not. Some of our cooperatives have succeeded; some have not. Speaking broadly, not only in Canada but throughout the world I think that this holds true, that wherever a cooperative has centred its energies and attention on narrowing the spread between the price the consumer pays and the price the producer receives, it has met with a measure of success, and has rendered a service both to its own members and to the public at large. But wherever it has centred its attention on trying to regulate supply to demand, on trying to influence the market, it has met with failure, not only in this country but everywhere. That has been the experience of the world in the matter of wheat, coffee, rubber, copper, hogs and sugar. Wherever it has tried to have this thing that you call regulating the flow to the market, trying to feed the market as it will take it, trying to regulate supply to demand, it has failed. But that is the principle involved in this bill.

The hon. member for Peace River the other day stated I think in very clear and honest language the reason why many members are supporting this bill. He said: "There is not a cooperative organization in Canada that can get control of the market without government assistance." That is the idea. They want to get control of the market, and they are coming here and asking the government through this bill to give them some means of getting that control. But the whole history of cooperation is that wherever cooperatives have launched out on that principle they have failed, and here they are likely to do so again.

I close by quoting just one sentence from Emerson's Essay on Wealth:

The basis of political economy is non- interference. The only safe rule is found in the self-adjusting meter of demand and supply. Do not legislate. Meddle, and you snap the sinews with your sumptuary laws. Give no bounties, make equal laws, secure life and property, and yon need not give alms.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not think there is any person in this house who would pay a greater tribute to liberty and the desire for liberty than I would. We are all agreed that liberty is a desirable quality and an essential of our lives, but I think perhaps we disagree to some extent on the definition of liberty. The cave man with his club had individualism and liberty carried to the extreme. The savage living alone on an island with no person to interrupt him can have perfect liberty, but it has been part of the essence of British civilization that all Britishers, and others outside of Britishers, retain for themselves the liberty to subordinate their individual desires or liberty to the common welfare of the nation, and through the common welfare to secure their own individual welfare as well. That is the history of civilization. Civilization in the large is the uniting of sensible people to achieve a purpose for the good of all, and so it is that the individual must at times subordinate his liberty and his own particular views. You would never get common action if each fellow wanted to go his own way. You would not be able to construct these buildings if each workman wanted to build them his own way.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Or you would not be able to get this bill through.

Mr. TURNBULL: We shall not be able to get this bill through if my hon. friend continues to spend the time on it that he did this afternoon and this evening. If we will agree that liberty is a desirable thing, and that when our individual liberty encroaches upon the rights and privileges of others it ceases to be liberty and becomes licence, then I think it will be agreed that this bill does not at all encroach on liberty as civilized man defines it although it may encroach on liberty as the savage defines it. I am quite sure that the producers in the province of Saskatchewan and elsewhere will be quite pleased to hear of the reference my hon. friend from Weyburn made to them as schemers.

Mr. YOUNG: The schemes of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill itself uses that term.

Mr. TURNBULL: My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has need to worry too. He represents a Saskatchewan constituency. The bill talks about schemes, but not about schemers in the way my hon. friend referred to them. There are no "schemers," with a sneer in it, in this bill, but there are schemers, with a sneer in it, in the language of my hon. friend from Weyburn and that of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I know producers in Saskatchewan who would have been very glad if this government had been able to prohibit imports last winter. I know that when a cargo of butter left New Zealand for Halifax or Vancouver a number of wires came to Ottawa to see if there was not some way to prevent that cargo from landing and undercutting the prices of Saskatchewan butter and Ontario and Alberta butter. There were producers in our province who would have been very glad indeed had there been some provision in our laws that would have prevented such an import at some particular time, and there may be other occasions of the same kind.

It is true it is a principle of Magna Charta that no man can be dispossessed of his property or imprisoned without due process of law; nor can he be under this bill. No man can be dispossessed of his property under this bill by anybody, and no man can be imprisoned under this bill without due process of law. But parliament is making laws.

The leader of the opposition is very much worried about boards making regulations the breach of which will make a man guilty of an offence and liable to punishment. When did he get the idea that that was wrong? Let him read the wheat board act, to which I referred when the debate on the second reading was in progress, and see if he did not by that act give power to an unnamed board to make regulations which nobody would know about any more than they know about these, and to have power conferred upon them by provincial governments as well as by the federal government to make regulations, the breach of which was an offence and made the offenders liable to punishment. Nobody thought anything very serious the matter with that because regulations are necessary. They have to be provided if you are to have a marketing bill at all. My right hon. friend agrees that regulations are necessary, and he says parliament must make them; but when he was providing for the marketing of only one commodity, wheat, he did not get his regulations through parliament. Now when we are trying to pass a bill to provide for the marketing of all natural products he wants all the regulations brought down and submitted to parliament and approved before the plans are laid at all. That seems to be carrying opposition and the Magna Charta and things of that kind to an absurdity. Any good thing can be carried to an absurdity. Take this idea of compulsion. There is not a single step that any member of this house takes from the time he gets up till the time he goes to bed when he is not subject to compulsion and regulation, and nobody worries about it. We are compelled and regulated and we allow our individual freedom to be restricted for the common good of all. When my hon. friend is out on the road with his car he drives on the right hand side of the road. Why? So that he will not do any injury to anybody else. And under this bill when my hon. friends go out to market their products they are liable to a certain amount of regulation and control so as not to injure the products of anybody else. That is all. There is not a shadow of difference between the two.

This bill does not put it into the hands of anybody to put anybody else in gaol. This bill does not provide for action being taken against any person without due process of law. It does provide that regulations are to be made and I assume that those regulations have been made known to those who are concerned. If they have not, provision can be made by way of amendment that they shall be made known. As far as I am concerned, if there is any danger of people not knowing what the regulations are, that should be fixed up. All this bill says is that boards may meet and may lay plans and regulations before a minister responsible to parliament. If the minister approves of those regulations and they are approved by the governor in council, which is responsible to government, then they have the force of law. There is nothing in this bill that is new or startling and it contains no feature different from those contained in our legislation for the past fifty years. Why should there be all this opposition? When these regulations have the force of law there is the provision that if anyone breaks a regulation he can be summoned before a competent court. If he is found guilty of a breach of a regulation he may be convicted and put in prison. But that is not done by a board or a group of schemers, as the hon. member for Weyburn calls them; it is done by the court before which the man is tried. His offence is that he has broken a regulation which is the law of the land and these regulations have been made the law of the land by this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have not been drawn up yet.

Mr. TURNBULL: That does not make any difference. The regulations with respect to the wheat board were not drawn up; the regulations with respect to fifty other acts which appear on our statute books were not drawn up until after the bills were passed and enacted into law. This bill provides for regulations but they will not be drawn up until after it is passed. Acts have been passed by every parliament and by the provincial legislatures containing regulations which were not drawn up and put into force until the bills were passed. The same is to be done in this case, and if there are violations, people will be prosecuted and if found guilty, fined. That is all there is; it is no different from other legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member who has just taken his seat has been distinguishing liberty from license, and he says the way in which he distinguishes between the two is that true liberty consists in subordinating the particular interest to the common welfare. I think I am reporting my hon. friend correctly when I say that. I agree with that as a means of securing liberty, namely that liberty is attained by subordinating particular interests to the general. But it is because I believe in that definition of liberty and wish to preserve liberty that I oppose this legislation. It seeks to subordinate the general interest to the particular, instead of subordinating the particular interest to the general. The general interest is kept uppermost through the institution of parliament, and the enactment of laws by parliament, laws which are known and applicable to all as a consequence of parliaments' action. What this bill proposes to do is to have the laws made not by parliament but by self interested, occupational groups in different localities throughout the country.

Mr. TURNBULL: No.

Mr. MACKENZE KING: By these local boards wherever they may be constituted.

Mr. TURNBULL: Approved by governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend comes back to "approved by governor in council." Once this House of Commons ceases to function or once this parliament is prorogued, no one will be the wiser as to what is or is to be the law of the land, if it is to be left in the hands of the governor in council.

Mr. TURNBULL: Can my right hon. friend distinguish between the method by which these regulations are to be made law with the approval of the governor in council and the regulations in connection with the Canada wheat board? In that case the regulations were drawn up by somebody outside of parliament but they were approved by the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There may be other cases which violate the principle for which I am contending at the moment, but two wrongs do not make a right. We are not going to get any farther ahead with our legislation in this country by taking as precedents those things which are wrong and which are departures from the correct method. I think we should follow what is generally accepted as the method of parliament.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is the right hon. gentleman stating that he believes the power given to the wheat board was wrong?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not discussing the wheat board, I am discussing this legislation. I think the chairman could very properly call me to order if I began to discuss the wheat board. I am discussing the bill before the committee at the present time. I repeat that my objection lies in the very statement which the hon. member for Regina, sitting at present beside the minister, asserted a moment ago, namely, that you can preserve liberty only as you subject particular interests to the general interest, and you begin to destroy liberty the moment you subject the general interest to the particular interest.

My hon. friend from Regina, who has sought to ridicule me for my reference to the Magna Charta, did not quote correctly the clause in that document which he purported to be quoting. The Magna Charta, in the clause to which I referred, does not speak of due process of law, it speaks of the law of the land, an entirely different thing. With all due deference, I would inform my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, that the law of the land is something which is supposed to be generally known and generally applicable. It is not something which must be discovered; it is something which is in existence in the statute books and which he who runs may read. It is not vague and indistinct, it is clear as day.

There is one point I should like to make very clear. Where power to make regulations is given to the governor in council by a statute passed by this parliament those regulations apply to the country as a whole. You do not have the governor in council making one set of regulations which govern in Saint John one day, a different set of regulations to govern in Quebec another day, another set for Winnipeg the next day, and a further set for Kamloops the following day. But that is exactly the kind of thing to be done under this legislation. It is not to be the law of the land, made by the representatives of the people as a whole and to stand till repealed by parliament; it is to be the law as made by particular self interested groups in any locality, at any time. It is not, as respects law making, representation by population, but representation by occupation. That is indefensible legislation. I repeat that by this legislation we are not enacting what is to be the law of the land; all we are doing is as respects certain offences to fix penalties which may go as far as a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for a term of two years, and leaving it to unknown bodies to determine what is to be the nature of the offence. To what offence is that penalty to attach? Not a single hon. member in the House of Commons can say; the minister himself cannot say, and the governor in council cannot say. The board which is to be called a marketing board will not be able to say. A self interested group of producers in a given community are to say what is to constitute the offence under the scheme which they draw up and submit to the government. That is the offence to which this House of Commons is to attach a penalty before the offence itself is known.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite who say "no" cannot have read the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: Certainly they have read the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Read the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: Where do you find that?

Mr. ERNST: What section, if you please?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends will find them if they read the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot find them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will take them up when we come to that stage in committee.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): I would remind the committee that we are on the title of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Section 12 reads:

(1) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette, restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product, and the governor in council shall have power to make regulations to provide for the licensing by the minister of importers, or otherwise to enforce any order made hereunder.

(2) The governor in council may, by order or regulation published in the Canada Gazette—

(a) provide that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without a licence;

(b) prescribe the forms of such licences, the terms and conditions thereof and the persons who shall have authority to issue the same;

(c) impose penalties for breach of any such order or regulation or of any licence issued thereunder, and, generally, make such provision or authorize the doing of such acts or things as may in his discretion be deemed necessary or expedient for giving full effect to any orders, regulations or licences made or issued hereunder.

That broad section gives to the governor in council the power to impose any penalties they please with respect to offences which they create. That is going very far. Incidentally those powers are taken away from parliament. But let me take hon. members to two clauses further on, to No. 14:

Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than $25 and not more than $500, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Then go a step further and look at that part of the act which deals with investigations conducted under its provisions and which gives power to the investigating boards to determine offences; one finds that:

Every person who, to the detriment or against the interest of the public, charges, receives or attempts to receive any spread which is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the regulated product, shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000 or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding $10,000.

Yet there is not set forth in this bill what is to be considered detrimental to the public interests, or an excessive spread etc. It is the committee, which has to do with the investigating and which is appointed by the minister that it is to be the body to determine what is to constitute this particular offence which is against the public interest.

Mr. TURNBULL: The offence is set out in the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The general statement is made that there must not be an enhancement of prices, and so on. But if my hon. friend will read the previous provisions he will see that section 19 provides for determination by the committee:

A committee may after investigation as hereinbefore provided determine, in connection with any operation occurring in the course of marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of the regulated product, what spread is detrimental to or against the interest of the public in that it is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the regulated product.

In other words, one committee may be investigating in British Columbia and find a spread of ten per cent to be a violation of the act, while another committee in some other province may find a spread of seven per cent and another committee somewhere else a spread of three per cent. The committee in each instance is to determine what percentage is to constitute the offence; but we as a legislative body, representing the general wellbeing of society, the community as a whole, the general interest, are to have no say as to that; we are supposed to fix the penalty and then to leave it to yet unknown bodies to determine the offence to which the penalty is to be attached.

Mr. ERNST: Who tries the offender?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The courts try the offender, certainly; but I do not believe that my hon. friend or any other member of this house can cite an instance where the courts may be called upon to try a man, say, next week, for some offence which even the courts themselves at the present time are unable to find set forth in any statute or regulation made by a legislative body.

Mr. ERNST: What about the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Combines Investigation Act specifically designates what are offences and contains many safeguards, not to be found in this measure, with respect to the protection of innocent parties.

Mr. TURNBULL: The court will not try the offender until after the passing of the regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But a regulation to be made by a local board in some locality, with respect to the production, purchase, sale or offering for sale of a particular class of commodities, is very different from a known condition constituting an offence that forms part of the law of the land, and I submit that no man should be obliged to have both his life and his property placed in jeopardy except by the law of the land and the judgment of his peers.

Hon. members are elected to parliament not by any single self interested group but by the people as a whole. That is the only way in which the rights of the community as a whole can be safeguarded. Are we to establish the precedent of giving to self interested groups, which happen in this instance to be producers, the right to determine what is to be an offence, simply on the basis that a majority in that particular group wish to have such and such a thing made an offence? Yet that is what we are doing if we enact this legislation. No regard is to be had for the consumers in the district, for the professional classes, those in other industries or for the business classes. I do not think that my hon. friend from East Hamilton could have appreciated the significance of the legislation, because after all probably no class is more in need of protection of its rights by parliament than the working classes; if we are to allow self interested producing groups to determine how much of any product is to be produced, how much is to be sold, at what price it is to be sold, and the like, I hesitate to say to what extent the position of the working classes as consumers may come to be affected.

One has to look at this legislation as it stands. It is not an answer for the minister to say, "We do not intend these things". In the first place, the bill does not say who the minister is, or who he is to be; and if it did say that would not be a guarantee that any minister would continue indefinitely in the position. When we pass legislation we must pass it with regard to any condition which may arise. As the Prime Minister has frequently said, it is not the intention in the mind of the person who may be seeking to put through an enactment that is of importance, but what the law is, as expressed. And that is the exception which we take to this legislation; the law makes possible all kinds of restriction of production and trade, and infringement of personal rights and rights of property. The hon. member from Regina is right when he says that the particular interest must be made subject to the general; otherwise you destroy individual liberty. I say that this bill by its provisions asserts the supremacy of particular interests over the general interest, and it is the business of this parliament, and particularly of this House of Commons, to protect the general interest whenever it is brought into conflict with particular interests.

Mr. PICKEL: No one doubts the necessity for the passage of a measure of this kind. The producer to-day is up against it, it matters not what he produces. The market is controlled by monopolies and it is absolutely impossible for the farmer or the primary producer to get his just share of the proceeds of what he produces. We hear a good deal from across the floor about compulsion. One hon. member opposite cited twenty-two or twenty-three instances of compulsion in the bill. Well, I defy any member of this house to point his finger to one single clause in which there is compulsion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PICKEL: Don't laugh so suddenly—until it is asked for. It is the regulated product—

Mr. YOUNG: Asked for by whom?

Mr. PICKEL: By the producer.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister may.

Mr. PICKEL: The producers apply to the minister or the board, asking that such and such a product shall be regulated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Read section 9.

Mr. PICKEL: You have to use compulsion. Use your common sense if you have any. You cannot frame a bill without compulsion; the middlemen and packers are so strongly entrenched in their position that you have to use force. The minister distinctly stated when he introduced the bill, and has said several times since, that he did not think this was a perfect bill. I do not think so myself. Perhaps in a year or two you may not know the bill by reason of the amendments that may be found necessary. But let us make a beginning and try to help the primary producer; he is entitled to it. You talk about compulsion. Now, I have been interested in two milk strikes in my section. In both instances forty per cent of the producers continued to ship. We lost our point. After the strike was over the milk men in Montreal cut off a number of those who refused to ship. The producers have in their own hands the control of the whole marketing of the primary products of this country, and the object of this bill is to aid the primary producers who cannot bring about orderly marketing except by compulsion.

Mr. SANDERSON: My hon. friend said that there was no compulsion in the bill.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. TURNBULL: No, he did not.

Mr. PICKEL: I did not say anything of the kind; I said that there was no compulsion until it was asked for. It is simply a measure of cooperation. A representative number of producers ask that the board do so and so, and then there is compulsion, as there should be.

Mr. VENIOT: Coercion.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The arguments advanced to-night seem to centre around three main points: first, the question of compulsion; second, the attack upon individual liberty, and, third, the subversive doctrine, according to my hon. friends to my right, of subordinating the general weal to that of individual self interested groups. I believe I am quoting the leader of the opposition fairly correctly.

So far as compulsion is concerned the discussion reminds me of what was said about this bill by an outstanding representative of agriculture. I asked him what he thought of the bill and he said: "Your opinion of the bill will depend entirely upon your appreciation of the conditions which led up to the bill. If you believe that the producers are at the present time receiving a fair deal and a fair price; that they as individuals in this organized country and organized world are able to maintain a decent standard of living and maintain their rights upon a level equal to that of others, then you with some others will believe that this bill is unnecessary. But if you understand the situation and if you realize, as many of us do, that the producer at present and for years past has been selling under compulsion, not compulsion brought into force by his own will or that of other producers, but compulsion imposed upon him by those who now control his marketing, you will approve the bill." I think I am familiar with the situation, and to my mind the choice does not lie between freedom of marketing and compulsion. The choice is as to who shall exert compulsion upon that particular industry, and the producers as a whole, so far as I know them, would regard it as far more beneficial if they by their own cooperative action, by their own majority choice, could supply the degree of compulsion necessary to be exercised, not upon the general public but upon the members of their own particular class of producers—because that is as far as the compulsion goes. They would prefer that to selling as they do to-day, to accepting under compulsion any price offered without the slightest voice as to what they shall receive and, as during past years, to selling at a price that does not meet the cost of production, let alone permit them to maintain a decent standard of living. There is the choice.

This is not a free world, nor is there much individual liberty left. Individual liberty! It reminds me of an illustration given in the house a little while ago. Drive on any highway and you may have your choice—or rather, you have not your choice because the majority has ruled. But putting a hypothetical proposition, you might have your choice between majority rule and individual liberty which would disregard all stop and go signs, disregard the rules of the road, disregard all by-laws and claim individual liberty to drive exactly as you like. How long would the liberty of anyone last, and how long could the highways be used? It is only under a certain degree of regulation, of control, of subordination of a recalcitrant minority to a majority, that we can live, do business in this world, carry on civilization at all. This bill proposes that.

As to the subordination of the common weal to self interested groups, it is my profound conviction that the groups referred to in this bill have been subordinated long enough to the general weal and that it is time they took their place on an equality with other organized bodies in this country.

Miss MACPHAIL: For the general weal.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes. It is for the general weal that no one class in this country, producers or others, should, through the individual liberty which they are supposed to possess, through their unfettered right of self competition and self destruction, be on a plane far below that occupied by the rest of the people in the dominion. Look where you will and what do you find? You find that this individual liberty is to-day confined, practically speaking, to the one class of producer; that they go out into a business world in which almost every other element is organized; they meet in their daily marketing operations a completely organized trade which deals in their product. Liberty? Liberty to starve! Liberty to cut each others' throats! That sort of liberty should, I believe, be taken away, not by the choice of other people but by the common agreement of the majority of those who are suffering under such conditions. In that way I believe, all being put on an equality, the common weal will be best assured, not by the subordinating of one class of a community to the others as is the case to-day.

Then we are told of the danger of leaving to those self interested groups the right of imposing regulations. I have touched partly on that, but in what degree do those regulations apply? On whom are they imposed? As I read the bill, the regulations are, by the producers themselves in that class of goods, self imposed upon the members of their own society, their own profession or calling, and not upon the general public. Who has the better right? It has been accepted throughout every civlized country that where a minority is recalcitrant, where it disagrees with the majority, where it determines to go its own way no matter at what cost, where it is destroying the prosperity of the majority, that majority has and exercises the right in almost every calling to impose restrictions and control and to force the minority to bow to the will of the majority.

Mention has been made of the cooperatives, and reasons for their failures have been advanced. It has been suggested that they have failed largely because of lack of leadership. I have had some association with cooperatives' and to my mind, while that is a weakness, the main rock upon which they have split has been the recalcitrant minority in their own ranks, willing to take advantage of the organization without incurring any responsibility. To my mind any bill which does not give the producers the power and right through majority action to control their own minority, to impose upon them restrictions, to force them to comply with the regulations passed for the good of that class, is not worth the paper it is written on. That is why the cooperatives are asking for the bill; were they not insisting on some form of compulsion it would not be applied.

Mr. YOUNG: What about section 9 of the bill?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Were this a perfect country and were all classes of producers in a position to organize intelligently and well, in my opinion this measure would not be necessary. But when you look over this country and see in many communities the helpless despairing producers who have ceased to be able to come together and act intelligently for themselves, then the necessity of such a measure at this time is apparent. This clause may have to deal with conditions beyond the control of any group of producers. It may have to deal with interprovincial matters, or with export trade.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is the majority provided for in section 9?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is no majority. That is what I say, that there are parts of the producing class so disorganized, so scattered and helpless, as to be unable at the present time to organize and manage their own affairs. To those the state owes the responsibility of doing it for them until they are set upon their feet.

Mr. NEILL: Could the hon. member suggest one of these industries?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think those classes are well known to every hon. member of this house who is acquainted with the problem of the producers. I am not speaking at length to-night; I am simply stating these principles on the first clause, and I think the truth of what I say will be acknowledged by those familiar with the situation. I may say at once that this bill does not fully satisfy me—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why do you vote for it? What do you want?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am going to say what I believe are the three points that require further clarification and strengthening. First, I am not certain, although I believe it is implied in it, that under the bill as at present drafted the members of any body of producers will have the right to gather together in cooperative pools, pooling profits, proceeds and products, and acting as a cooperative pool has always wished and attempted to act. Second, I believe that these pools when fully organized should have the right and power to set up their selling agency to deal with their own product.

Mr. YOUNG: Regardless of the marketing board?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Under the direction of the marketing board—"the selling agency authorized by the marketing board shall be that appointed by the producers," if you want exact language. Third, I would like to see section 9 or some other section clarified to make it certain that the board itself can establish or itself act as the agency to dispose of the exportable surplus. All these conditions may be involved in the amendments to be brought down, but as I do not know what the amendments are I strongly support and ask the minister to give sympathetic consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), that these amendments be placed on Hansard or in the votes and proceedings as soon as possible in order that all of us who are vitally interested may be able to study, understand and apply them to the conditions and the particular clause that is sought to be amended. I could say more but I think it better to say it as each section of the bill is being considered.

[Mr. Speakman.]

The desire to protect the consumer is not confined to hon. gentlemen on my right, but to my mind there is nothing in this bill which will jeopardize the consumer. The consumer, if I may say so, has exploited the farmer for a long time, in the sense of having been able to buy things for less than they are worth. But it is not the consumer against whom this bill is aimed; it is aimed largely against those who stand between the producer and the consumer. It was stated by some economist in the United States something like a year ago when some provision was suggested for assisting agriculture in that country that anything which would double the price of farm products would benefit some twenty million people there and penalize to an equal degree some eighty to one hundred million people. To my mind that economist betrayed his ignorance of conditions as they affect farm products, because this must be remembered: that no matter whether the price of an article to the producer be high or low, the cost of transportation, of handling, of processing, all the multitudinous costs which come between the producer and the consumer, remain practically the same. You could double the average price received by the average farmer for most of his products and it would not add twenty per cent to the cost to the consumer, and in any case that twenty per cent would be far more than offset by the stimulation given to business by the added purchasing power in the hands of the producers. These are merely arbitrary figures; I do not know that this measure can double prices to farmers, but the suggestion that any increase in price to the farmers is passed on in the same degree and ratio to the consumer is one which will not and cannot stand up under any study of the situation.

Mr. RINFRET: There is a point about this bill that gives it a particular character. It has been voted for by a large majority on second reading, but practically every member who spoke in favour of it made it clear that he would not approve the bill on the third reading unless it were considerably improved in committee. Although we have now been in committee on the bill for a couple of days, I notice that no improvement has been suggested from the government side, but on the contrary a determined conviction is manifested to support the bill as it stands both as to principle and as to details.

Mr. ERNST: We are still only on the title.

Mr. RINFRET: If it is to go on as at present I am very much disquieted. Every hon. member who has stood up on the other side has made it clear that in his opinion the bill is all right, and has made no suggestion of any change. I have been in the house for some years, but have never seen a bill receive so large a majority and yet be so hedged about with reservations during the discussion on second reading.

At first sight there is something attractive about the bill, but when one begins to study it he finds himself very much in doubt as to how it will work out in practice. I am afraid that some, like the hon. member for Melville, who voted for the bill on second reading, were unduly optimistic as to its possible effect. I strongly support the stand taken to-night by the hon. member for Melville, that instead of the bill being dealt with in committee of the whole house it should have been sent to the agriculture committee, where it could have been discussed more intimately as to detail, and where witnesses could be brought and experts heard. I am very much afraid that if we keep at it in committee of the whole we are not going to get very far. In fact to be frank I am not too sure that the government are anxious to have this bill adopted at all. I think if they could leave with the country the impression that they had tried to do something wonderful for the farmers and could at the same time save the farmer from the very doubtful advantage of the bill as it is drafted now, the government would have achieved their aim. If instead of protecting the farmer we merely wanted to play politics with this measure, I would advise my friends on this side to let it pass and let the people learn for themselves what is involved in it. I am sure if innumerable small local boards were to be set up in this country to decide what quantity and quality of a product should be marketed and at what price, and if farmers who did not follow the ruling of that board were to be fined or gaoled, the days of this government would be numbered.

The peculiarity about this measure is that at first sight it is very attractive, a fact which I believe explains the large number of votes it received on second reading. But the more you read it and the more you read about it the more you are convinced that it is a pure delusion, and that the putting into operation of an act founded upon this bill as at present drafted would indeed be nefarious for the very people it is supposed to help. As has been properly said, there is no doubt that the whole discussion to-day has centered upon the question whether or not this bill constitutes compulsion or free cooperation.

I think everything can be improved, even a very bad bill brought down by this government; but at the same time the principle of compulsion is so closely linked with practically every section of the bill that we cannot get away from it. We might improve upon it by saying that the poor farmer might be gaoled for two months instead of three, or be subjected to a fine of $100 instead of $200. But we cannot get away from the main principle of the bill as detailed section after section. We cannot forget that this is a bill to institute not only a central board but a large number of small boards throughout the country, and that those boards may force the farmer to market his products in a certain way, whether he likes it or not. If he does not do what he is told he will suffer the penalty.

We heard the argument a moment ago that there is a certain degree of compulsion in everything we do in life. Perhaps there is, but it is a very poor argument to say that because in everything we do we have to be subject to compulsion in certain respects, every compulsory measure must be adopted at once. On the contrary, if in the ordinary acts of life we cannot escape from compulsion, by all means let us try to prevent it where it can be prevented.

Of course I expected, as my right hon. leader expected, that his reference to Magna Charta would not be well received in all quarters. I do not see why it should not have been. The Magna Charta is the well known basis of justice in British countries. But what we do say is that the people who have objected to any reference to Magna Charta have tried to connect this bill either with King Canute or with the cave men of the early days in our history. I submit in all frankness that the Magna Charta, that document which has stretched over many years of history, is more closely connected with this bill than is good old King Canute of legendary days.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It was a reference to the opposition and not to the bill.

Mr. RINFRET: That only shows that every speaker has a way of expressing himself which should be respected by listeners who are to become speakers a little later. I submit that unless the government does not wish the bill to pass, which is possible, it is a great mistake to try to put it through the committee of the whole house. My own opinion about the bill is that the only improvement of which it is capable is that it be dropped altogether. But if the government wishes the house to adopt the bill it should do as my optimistic friend from Melville has suggested, namely, send it to the committee on agriculture. There it could be discussed in a more intimate way, and possibly experts in the matter could be heard. Some improvements might be made there, but my impression is becoming stronger every moment that this legislation is framed to impress the farmers with the idea that the government is contemplating something wonderful for them, and that the very bad Liberal party does not want them to do it. That is my impression. But once the bill is studied very strong objection can be taken to it by many sections of the country.

I have in my hand a letter addressed to the Prime Minister from the Montreal board of trade. Possibly this document has been read before in the house.

An hon. MEMBER: It was read.

Mr. RINFRET: Surely the Montreal board of trade is not a body inimical to the present government. Neither is it a body which would be inimical to any legislation of this type if it had the good qualities the government pretends it has. Yet the board of trade of Montreal has objected to the bill. I must say that the arguments presented in this letter are strong, and the government would do well to heed them and give them much attention. The letter has been read and I shall not read it again to-night. I refer to it only to show that the opposition we are offering to this measure is not restricted to the Liberal party, and that in fact this is a very contentious measure. I could name many other instances of opposition to it.

The minister has taken a strange stand in connection with this bill. As I said before—and I insist upon this point—the bill was passed on second reading on the very very precise agreement that it would be modified and improved upon in committee. It is now in committee, and yet no hon. member opposite, whether he be a private member or a government member, has suggested the least change; on the contrary the government has given the impression that it wants the bill to pass in its present form. Even the mandate from the house given on the second reading is contrary to the attitude taken by the minister. He is being asked for information. I do not wish to be discourteous to him, and I will agree that he is an able man and an able minister, but I must say that his replies have been very terse and concise. He says either, "Well, I gave it yesterday" or "You will have it tomorrow." The result is that no information is forthcoming at the moment. Frankly I voted against the measure because I do not believe in any board trying to impose its decisions upon the population, but I am quite willing in a most open minded fashion to discuss the measure. May I ask the minister this question: Is it the intention of the government to change or materially to improve the bill? The minister might as well inform the committee, because the mandate from the house given on second reading was not that the bill had been approved as drafted. Practically every speaker who approved of it said that it needed considerable changing. Some changes have been suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and no doubt others will be forthcoming. So far, however, we have not heard from the government. As my genial friend has said, we have reached only the short title, but, the government would help the progress of the bill if it would indicate that it contemplates making changes as we proceed in committee. Every hon. member opposite who has spoken on the measure has tried to defend it in its present form, and has not indicated the least inclination to listen to amendments or changes. Personally I believe the government could deal best with the bill by accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Melville, namely to have the committee rise and refer the measure to the committee on agriculture. However, if it is going to be before the whole house we are entitled to know to what extent the government is disposed to amend and to improve upon the bill—if it is capable of improvement, which I very much doubt.

Mr. TURNBULL: If the hon. member for St. James would let us make some progress we might reach some of the amendments when the particular clauses are under discussion. I am not making this statement because I know anything in particular about the matter but because the other evening the minister said he had amendments to propose which he would offer as the clauses were reached. For that reason I say that as soon as we reach the clauses in question we shall no doubt hear the amendments.

I was encouraged to speak again because I have had the privilege of having the right hon. gentleman opposite at least in partial agreement with me, and I hope before we have finished we shall reach full agreement. I quite agree that liberty does not consist in the subordination of the general to the particular, but I disagree with him if he thinks this bill is a subordination of the general to the particular because it is the majority, or at least a representative body of producers, who ask for a scheme; consequently when we ask the minority to subordinate themselves to the majority we are asking the particular to be subordinated to the general.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend? He is still confining his remarks solely to the producers. These regulations are going to affect all classes in the community. He leaves out of account altogether those who do not happen to belong to the particular group of producers who are making the regulations that are to be the law.

Mr. TURNBULL: I think I shall be able to convince my right hon. friend that the other part of the population is not forgotten, but before I deal with that let me refer to my right hon. friend's statement that there might be one set of regulations for Nova Scotia, another for Kamloops, another for Winnipeg, and that it would not be generally known all over the country what the regulations were with regard to each particular place. I do not know any particular reason why they should be known all over the country. But the boundaries of the area in which the regulations are in force are known, because the boundaries of the area in which the local board operates are known, and all the people of that area will require to know will be the regulations that affect them in that particular area. The regulations might be different in different parts of the country.

The board itself does not make the regulations; it is finally the governor in council that makes them. The board suggests a plan and may suggest regulations; the deputy minister and any officer of the department may suggest regulations, but they are finally arrived at because they are approved by the minister and by the governor in council just the same as the regulations in connection with a hundred other acts on the statute books become law when they are prepared and have been approved by the governor in council. Only then do they become law. That is where the general interests of the people are taken care of. The government is responsible to parliament; parliament represents the whole body of the people, and since the government approves these regulations, the general interests of the people are taken care of.

If it were possible it might be advisable to have all the regulations approved by parliament, but we are not living under the same conditions in this country as they are in England. In the first place the boards are apparently going to exercise powers conferred upon them by provincial legislation. If the regulations are to be approved by parliament before they are put in force, not only by the dominion parliament, which is not in session all the time, but by provincial assemblies in order to comply with the provisions of the British North America Act as to legislative jurisdiction, it would be impracticable, no matter how desirable it might be, to have parliamentary approval. We are dealing not with theories but with conditions, and in this parliament we are trying to make theories meet the practical conditions that prevail from day to day.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Do I understand the hon. member to say that a majority of the producers had requested this bill and were behind it?

Mr. TURNBULL: No. I said the producers would propose a plan or scheme.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I put my question in another way? Is it the assumption of the government that a majority of the producers approve of this bill or want it?

Mr. TURNBULL: My own personal belief is that they do, but when it comes to putting the bill into operation with regard to any regulated product the proposal for the regulation comes from the producers, and unless it comes from a representative body of producers there is no scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Except under section 9.

Mr. TURNBULL: Except under section 9, which is for an emergency.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I say to the hon. member on behalf of the apple growers of Ontario, particularly of my riding, that they do not approve of this bill?

Mr. TURNBULL: If the apple growers of Canada do not approve of the bill and do not want to come under its operation they will not ask that a plan be put into effect; consequently they will not come under its operation, except under section 9, as my hon. friend from Vancouver points out, which is there for emergency purposes.

Mr. GRAY: Where is there any mention of emergency in section 9?

Mr. TURNBULL: It was stated by the Minister of Agriculture when discussing the bill that that was its purpose.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is he going to administer this?

Mr. TURNBULL: I say that the minister speaking for the government and sponsoring the bill made the statement that section 9 was intended to cover an emergency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under the interpretation clause, minister means "the minister designated by the governor in council to administer this act."

Mr. TURNBULL: I am speaking of the minister whose name appears as sponsoring the bill, and who is sponsoring the bill at the present moment.

Through the necessity of the approval of these regulations by the governor in council, the governor in council representing the whole people of this dominion, the general interest is safeguarded. The individual group asks for the plan, but it is the governor in council who has to approve of the plan on behalf of the whole population of the country, and in that way the general interest is looked after. I represent a city constituency where the people are what I might call consumers, but I do not know of any consumers in this country who are not also producers, nor of any producers who are not also consumers. I do not see how you can divide them arbitrarily into two separate bodies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that under section 14 the offence consists of failure to comply not only with any order or determination of the board or of a local board, but with any regulation of the governor in council.

Mr. ERNST: The regulations of the local board must be confirmed by the governor in council.

Mr. TURNBULL: All these orders of the local board, as I have stated already five times, must be approved by the governor in council, and the local board does not make orders except to approve of them.

So far as the producers and consumers are concerned I think it is agreed among us all that in times of depression the price of primary products falls away further than does the price of secondary products, that there is in times of depression a greater spread between the prices of primary and secondary products, and the extent of that spread contributes very largely to the depression. Now, in order to get rid of depression I think governments should apply themselves to narrowing as much as possible the spread between the low price of primary products and the relatively higher prices of secondary products, although the prices of both are low. As you narrow the spread you restore the balance between secondary and primary products, and as you restore that balance you help to bring about a normal use of purchasing power and the resumption of normal operations. Things are out of gear at the moment because the price of the primary product is lower in comparison with the price of the secondary product than it is in normal times.

Mr. YOUNG: But this bill will not help that.

Mr. TURNBULL: I am not so sure of that. If this bill does raise the price of primary products it helps to narrow that spread. But if as the hon. member for Weyburn suggests this bill will not raise the price of primary products, why the holler about the consumer?

Mr. YOUNG: I said it would not narrow the spread.

Mr. TURNBULL: I hope that the leader of the opposition is now in agreement with me that the general interest is taken care of by the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very far from being in agreement with my hon. friend on that particular phase. May I say to him that I think it is important that the house should realize that this measure goes very much farther than simply dealing with agricultural products. I for one believe that the design back of the measure relates quite as much to the application of its provisions later on to commodities other than agricultural products as it does to the position of the agricultural producer at the present time.

Mr. ERNST: May I say, I hope so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that this committee should consider every possible use that could be made of this measure. If I may, I would like to illustrate one of the many ways in which this measure may react so far as producers themselves are concerned. As the Minister of Agriculture pointed out this evening, the term "natural product" has not been given the wide interpretation which it has in this bill without some reason on the part of the ministry. If the ministry had in mind only the interests of the farmers, they would have brought in a bill confined to the agricultural industry and to the producers in the agricultural industry. Here is the definition of natural product:

> "Natural product" means any product of agriculture or of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product;

The other day I cited a number of articles which might be manufactured from these primary products. In fact all manufactures are nothing more than primary products processed on a few stages. The scope of this measure is broad enough to take in practically most of the necessaries that are manufactured in the country as well as those that are produced. I see my hon. friend shaking his head, but there is in the interpretation clause of the bill the definition of a natural product.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Articles of food or drink.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Anything in that line; that covers most everything that people eat or drink.

Mr. ERNST: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It covers articles of food or drink; it includes everything that can be eaten or drunk. That is apart altogether from the primary products of agriculture. Also our attention has been directed almost exclusively to these local boards but the bill states that the governor in council—I think this is probably the main feature of the measure—may restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product. The governor in council may say that any natural product shall not be exported from Canada without licence. Has the committee stopped to consider the effect of that? Apart from all these other powers we have been discussing, it means that the governor in council may by order in council restrict the importation or exportation of different classes of commodities into or out of the country. For the last day or two I have been directing attention to dispatches which have appeared in the press to the effect that so far as the British parliament and the dominions are concerned there is to be an effort made to restrict trade within the British empire. We have a good many instances in this parliament of legislation already enacted whereby it is made clear that as far as this government in Ottawa is concerned it intends to see that the channels of trade are kept as exclusively as possible within the British empire. In other words, it is not so much trade in general in which the present administration is interested, as it is trade within the British empire. Under this legislation, if the government wished to force the channels of trade more or less exclusively within the British empire, they could pass an order in council the provisions of which would have that effect. First of all, they could restrict the exportation of agricultural or other products to any country other than countries of the British empire. I wonder if the agriculturists of this country realize that under this legislation an order in council could be passed any day making it impossible for them to ship their products to countries other than those the government itself wished; that they would have to ship their products only to the countries named by the governor in council. They may allege that may not be the intention, but the power is there. Similarly with respect to the importation of goods other than agricultural products, the farmers of this country may find that many of these may be permitted to come in only from countries of the British empire; that they cannot be brought in from other countries with which we may wish to trade in order to sell our agricultural products abroad. The very life and existence of agriculture may depend upon trade with those very countries. That to my mind is the most serious part of this measure, and as yet it has scarcely been alluded to. I submit that there is not an hon. member of the house who would not wish to see legislation enacted which was certain to help the farming industry. But if an act is to be placed upon the statutes of this country which gives to the governor in council the power to prevent the export of any natural product to any country other than that which the governor in council determines, and to prevent the bringing into this country of any commodities which may come under the provisions of this bill, then I think the farming communities of this country may find if this bill goes through in its present form they have been hamstrung, to use a well understood expression.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): What position are they in to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is no answer. Why make their position worse? That is the objection I take to the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite are legislating.

Mr. BURY: On a point of order; the right hon. gentleman is discussing section 12 of the bill. Much of the discussion this afternoon might be held to be out of order but it might come within the wide terms of section 4. The things being discussed by the right hon. gentleman come expressly within section 12.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I say to my hon. friend that I am discussing section 1. Does he realize that the committee is on section 1, which reads:

This act may be cited as The Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934.

Mr. BURY: I thought we were on section 4.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are on section 1.

Mr. ERNST: Does the right hon. gentleman object to the title?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do object to the title as I think it is a misnomer altogether. I do not think it is an act to assist marketing; I think it is an act to restrict trade; I think it is an act to prohibit trade; I think it is an act to limit production, and an act to create monopolies in certain natural products; I think it is an act to restrict sales; I think it is an act which serves to bring about restrictions in several other ways. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be going on the theory that because the farmers and producers have been having a hard time they are going to be satisfied with any legislation brought down regardless altogether of its character or provisions. They talk about this bill as though it was one the farmers wished for. May I say that there is a great difference between a marketing bill which will do something effective in the interests of the farming communities and a measure under which the governor in council can do almost anything it pleases with respect to the limiting of production and the restriction of trade. That is a phase of this measure which I think should be considered very carefully by the committee before they proceed further with the enactment of these provisions.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Notwithstanding everything that has been said with regard to the curtailment of liberty and constitutionalism by the provisions of this bill, I have come to the conclusion that the protagonists of liberty and constitutionalism have laboured very hard to produce an argument only to give birth to a squeaky constitutional mouse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend referring to himself?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The leader of the opposition asks me if I am referring to myself when I speak of liberty—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not liberty.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Well, then by the assumption of his parentage to myself the leader of the opposition is neither logical nor natural. When I spoke of the squeaky constitutional mouse I was referring to the squeaky constitutional mouse which he produced when he spoke for two hours the other day. On more than one occasion the leader of the opposition has said that base money drives out good money. If the wheat pool was not one hundred per cent successful I think the reason was the forty-five or fifty per cent who refused to join. If the farmers had joined the wheat pool one hundred per cent I do not think there would have been any argument as to its success. The hon. member for West Lambton was asked by the Minister of Agriculture how we could have orderly marketing without some degree of compulsion. He said that he did not say he was in favour of orderly marketing, that he was in favour of cooperative marketing. How in the world can you have cooperative marketing without orderly marketing? The hon. member is absolutely inconsistent in that position. I am not averse to some form of compulsion. It is not possible to have a marketing bill, whether that bill be introduced by the member for Melfort or by the member for Melville, without embodying in it a measure of compulsion. In my opinion the only liberty that is being interfered with here is the liberty of small minorities to oppress and enslave the community as a whole; there is no question in my mind about that. Liberty is really the greatest good of the greatest number.

Reference has been made to-day to the system of education in this country, and it has been said that we have a good system owing to the past policies of the Liberal government. Well, I have been educated in schools directed by ministers of education who were both Democratic and Republican, Conservative and Liberal, and I think that the courses in education which have been carried on in this country have been fairly well conducted whether under one government or the other. But there is a phase of the system of education which I would bring to the attention of the house and that is compulsion—compulsory education. I was a teacher once, and I know that in the Education Act there is a section which makes it compulsory for all children between the ages of seven and fifteen to attend school. Parents by the dozen have often come and asked me to allow their children to stay at home during the harvest or at other times for five or six weeks, and some have stayed at home in spite of the fact that I wanted them to attend. The result was that the Department of Education had them up before a justice of the peace and they were obliged to pay a fine. And this is done whether the Minister of Education is Liberal or Conservative or United Farmer. I do not think that these arguments in regard to liberty have anything at all to do with this bill. When hon. members bring up this question of liberty and constitutionalism they remind me of a man sweating very hard to drive an ordinary carpet tack with a sledge hammer or, to use a biblical metaphor, straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. Undoubtedly the principle involved in this bill is a worthy one and I am quite sure that the farmers of the west, if not all of them at any rate the great majority, are absolutely in favour of that principle, namely, orderly marketing.

Mr. MacINNIS: I listened with much interest to the remarks of the hon. member for St. James, who is not now in his place. The hon. gentleman must have had his ear to the ground; apparently he has realized that the opposition is making a grave mistake in opposing the bill. He very adroitly suggested that they ought to withdraw their opposition and allow the bill to pass. It was exceedingly clever and I compliment him. He even went so far as to intimate, if I understood him, that he would support the bill himself.

I do not know what the attitude of farmers in other parts of Canada may be towards compulsory marketing, but I am satisfied that so far as British Columbia is concerned the dairy farmers and the fruit growers are heartily in favour of a compulsory marketing organization. I think it was in 1926 that the milk producers of the Fraser valley first approached the government of British Columbia for a dairy produce marketing act. Their bill was turned down on that occasion, and again in 1927 they approached the government with a similar measure. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre was a member of the legislature at the time. They did not pass the bill on that occasion but appointed a commission to investigate the milk producer situation in that province, and that committee reported unanimously in favour of a bill for compulsory marketing and pooling of profits, with the result that the following year, in 1928 or 1929, the legislation was given effect to. However, like all our marketing legislation in Canada—that is, all provincial legislation—it was taken to the courts by a minority who did not wish to come under the bill and that legislation was declared ultra vires. The same happened with the efforts of the fruit growers in regard to their affairs. Last year in the Okanagan the fruit growers, without any legislation at all, took matters in their own hands and by sheer force compelled cooperative marketing.

So far as British Columbia is concerned, some form of compulsory marketing legislation is essential and they must have it. Whether this bill goes far enough or too far I do not know, but I think it would be much better for us to take up the various sections and either allow the government to amend them as we come to them or propose amendments ourselves, as private members, with regard to provisions that are obnoxious to us.

When I hear hon. members talking about individual liberty—well, I was going to say that it gives me a pain in the neck, but that might not be parliamentary. The member for Weyburn says that the farmer should be allowed to cultivate his land in whatever way he likes and to sell his products wherever he likes. But suppose he wished to cultivate it so that it grew nothing but weeds; would the hon. member agree that this was right in relation to the farmer's neighbour? If the state has a right to say that the farmer must not grow weeds on his land, then it has a right to say that he must grow other things and that he must not do certain things that are detrimental to his neighbours. And he may be doing something just as detrimental to other farmers through his marketing policies as in his methods of cultivation. And when I hear Liberals from Quebec talking about liberty, I would ask them—did they ever hear about Bill 28, which compels every organization which proposes to call a public meeting, and issues notice, to obtain the approval of the police before the notice is posted? Of course, that is aimed at people with whose opinions we do not agree, and for that reason I suppose it is all right.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I ask the hon. member whether he knows the difference between liberty and licence?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, I know it quite well. Liberty is allowing people to do anything they wish to do in so far as it does not interfere with the welfare of others, in so far as it does not prejudice the interests of the community. I am quite clear with regard to the difference. But my hon. friend will not say that it was licence to call a public meeting, and issue notices with regard to that meeting, without having to hand that notice to the police to see whether they would allow the meeting to be held or not.

Last year Dean Clement of the University of British Columbia was asked to make a report on the fruit marketing situation in that province and this is part of his report. He said:

> Dean Clement claims that ten times too many men are making a living between the growers and the consumers and says several large wealthy jobbing firms are trying to drive wedges into the fruit industry in an effort to gain or retain control. Growers are urged to stick together and it is stated that the only solution to the present difficulties is one hundred per cent grower control.

You cannot have one hundred per cent fruit growers' control without some compulsion. Our Liberal friends are great on liberty. I am reminded of an item I read in a book by H. N. Brailsford that came out a few years ago, and I am going to quote it in conclusion. This is what he says:

A network of parties, trading associations and newspapers is engaged in propagating this belief in the efficacy of competition. It is instilled into us with such persistency that it avails with the majority to counteract the evidence of daily experience. There are still millions who listen with acquiescence to the defence of the competitive system by the Liberal press and the Liberal party. Yet they must know that this press is mainly, and this party largely, financed by captains of industry who long ago discarded unrestricted competition. In the making of thread and soap, cocoa and chemicals, the great Liberal industrialists have found a more excellent way. In their own business they practice combination, but they still maintain an expensive organization to sustain our belief in the virtues of competition. It is an intelligible form of insurance.

Yes, it is an intelligible form of insurance. For the good of the farmers of the dominion we had better get down to this bill, deal with it clause by clause, bring forward our amendments and then, after it is amended, if it is what we would like it to be, let us vote for it when it comes up for third reading.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ASCENSION DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In 1912 the house was in recess on Ascension Day. In 1913 and 1914 it did not sit on that day. In 1915 and 1916 it was in recess. My information is that on Ascension Day there was no sitting in 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925 or 1926. In 1927 the house was in recess. In 1928 and 1929 there was no sitting. In 1930 the house sat on May 29. In 1931 the house sat on Ascension Day, and it will be recalled that there was some protest against its sitting. In 1932 it did not sit, and last year we sat in order that the business might be concluded so that I might attend the conference in London. Under these circumstances my intention is to move to-morrow that when the house adjourns to-morrow, it stand adjourned until Friday at three o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.56 p.m.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Wednesday, May 9, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Seventh report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

ASCENSION DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns this day it stand adjourned until Friday, May the eleventh, 1934.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RADIO STATION CKLW

Mr. EULER:

1. Has the radio commission leased station CKLW at Windsor, Ontario?
2. If so, what are the terms of the lease as to time and rental payable?
3. How much time daily will be allotted to the radio commission on this station?
4. Has the radio commission issued, or does it intend to issue, an additional licence in the Border Cities to the owners of CKLW?
5. If so, why is such additional licence issued?
6. Will Columbia chain programs be broadcast over this new station, and does the commission receive any fee for the privilege, and for what amount?
7. Who are the owners of CKLW, and of the new station which is to be established, and what is the proportion of stock owned by each, including the Columbia Broadcasting chain's share, if any?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the sixth question I submit to the house that it is not desirable that that question should be answered if the commission is to maintain its efficiency. I think the house will at once see the purpose and reason of my making that observation because in all these matters where the commission makes arrangements with broadcasting stations of either the Columbia or National chain or others for the exchange of programs a statement of the payments made becomes a matter of interest at once to competitors and injures the broadcasting company's opportunities for doing business. I notice that the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is not present. I thought he was. I shall say nothing further until he is here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the question had better stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Question stands.

MR. EUGENE LAUZON

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. Is Eugene Lauzon employed in the Department of National Revenue?
2. If so, did the department receive a complaint from J. D. Gagne, mayor and manufacturer, of Victoriaville, respecting the impoliteness and rudeness of such employee in the discharge of his duties?
3. What is the salary of such employee?
4. What do his expenses amount to?
5. Since what date has he been employed by the Department of National Revenue?
6. Upon whose recommendation was he appointed auditor?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. $2,640 per annum less ten per cent.
4. Fiscal year 1933-34, $980.81.
5. March 3, 1928.
6. He was appointed by the civil service commission.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ABENAKIS RESERVATION—EXPENDITURES

Mr. BOUCHER:

What amounts were expended in the Abenakis reservation, county of Yamaska, in each of the following years, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, in respect of: (a) medical care; (b) hospital costs; (c) relief; (d) for other purposes?

Mr. MURPHY: Return tabled herewith.

LETTER CARRIERS—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Did the civil service commission advertise competitive examinations for the position of letter carrier in the Post Office Department, from June 1, 1931, to May 1, 1934?
2. If examinations were held in respect of such position, on what date were the examinations for the district of Montreal held?

Mr. SAUVE: Return tabled herewith.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

FIRST NARROWS BRIDGE, VANCOUVER

Mr. MUNN:

For a copy of all correspondence between any member of the government, and any other person or persons or corporation, with reference to the application made under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for the construction of the First Narrows bridge at Vancouver, British Columbia.

FINANCIAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With respect to the amendments that are to be made to the Dominion Notes Act, the Finance Act, and the Currency Act, may I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention to refer them to the committee on banking and commerce.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have not discussed the matter with my colleagues but in view of the discussion that has taken place in the committee with respect to the provisions of the Bank Act and also with respect to the Bank of Canada Act I would have thought with respect to the amendments to which my hon. friend refers, following as they do as a matter of course from the enactment of that legislation, that it would not be necessary to refer them to the committee. That was my view.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Marine when we may expect the Canada Shipping Act to arrive in this house?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The Canada Shipping Act has been before a subcommittee of the Senate and is now being reprinted. It will go before the banking and commerce committee probably next week.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of this house?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of the Senate.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Referring to the program of legislation given earlier in the week I notice that no reference was made to the public works construction program. Can the Prime Minister now indicate when the program is likely to be brought down? I mean the program he described as being like Jonah's gourd.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Jonah's gourd grew up in the night and afforded shelter from the sun.

Mr. NEILL: And perished in the night.

Mr. BENNETT: The gourd did, but not Jonah. He suffered a different fate. I should think that between now and Saturday we shall be able to settle the schedule. It is only a question of settling the schedule. The plans and specifications with respect to many of the works have been completed, and everything is ready to call for tenders when the enactment receives the approval of this house. All that remains is the question of what is to be included in the schedule, and what not. That has not been definitely settled, and I am sure that the experience of the right hon. gentleman on more than one occasion will indicate to him just how difficult that task has been.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the right hon. gentleman is able to settle upon the schedules by the end of the week, would it be possible to have them brought into the house early next week? I ask this because we are still looking for the amendment to the elections act which I understand has been settled for some time but which has not been brought down as yet.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I should not like the right hon. gentleman to understand that; I did not say it was settled. I said it had been revised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And was being printed.

Mr. BENNETT: And had been printed, yes. I hope it will be in the house some day next week. I hope to have a copy in the hands of the right hon. gentleman by next week at any rate. So far as the schedules are concerned, I cannot promise when they will be submitted to the house. They will have to be preceded by a resolution which will be put on the order paper next week.

ONTARIO ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). On May 3, the minister addressed a large audience in the city of Toronto and it was reported in both the Ottawa and Toronto papers that he had said that the federal government of which he is a member would throw all their weight and influence towards the re-election of the Henry government. I should like to know if the minister was speaking as a minister of the crown or as a citizen of Ontario.

[Mr. Neill.]

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND: I do not think that statement requires any answer particularly.

LEGISLATION TO BE ANNOUNCED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if he is in a position to give the details of the legislation or the bill yet to be brought down which he was not able to give last week. He said he would give this information at a later date.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I said I would state whether or not it would be introduced. This depends upon the completion of certain information which I am obtaining; part of this information I have since obtained, part I have not. I hope to be able to make a statement next week.

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if any consideration has been given to having the house sit on Wednesday nights. A number of us who come from the far parts of this country do not know what to do after six o'clock on Wednesday. Most of us get into mischief and I think it would be in the interests of the country if the Prime Minister would move a resolution that this house sit on Wednesday evenings.

An hon. MEMBER: And on Saturdays.

Mr. DUFF: I won't go that far at the moment. Wednesday evenings first, one step at a time. As the session has advanced to May 9, I think it would be in the interests of the country and of hon. members to sit Wednesday nights starting next week.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The observations of the hon. gentleman are always listened to with interest. If he finds it difficult to shape his course, I suggest that perhaps his ship be brought up three sheets in the wind.

Mr. DUFF: That is the difficulty now.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps if his ship were close hauled a little and the course changed a point or two it might be possible for the hon. member to reach a haven of refuge much more readily than he now seems able to do.

It seems to me that the time which expires between six o'clock on Wednesday and three o'clock on Thursday should enable the hon. gentleman to add knowledge to his vast store of wisdom and perhaps shape a course which would be of great use to us.

Mr. DUFF: I could associate myself with the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: One of the difficulties of sitting on Wednesday evening is that we have so much to do, for reasons which need not be mentioned. I have no difficulty in filling in the night in an endeavour to prepare for the day. However, I shall give every consideration to what the hon. gentleman has said. In the meantime, perhaps if he reefs down to the second reefing point and close hauls his ship, he will have no difficulty in getting past Wednesday nights.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith—Mr. Weir (Melfort)—Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. CASGRAIN: As has been pointed out by the leader of the opposition, the government has intimated that in all likelihood certain amendments will be proposed as we proceed with this bill. I think matters would be expedited if those amendments were submitted to the committee. We would then be in a position to examine them and find out if they meet with the suggestions made by hon. members in all sections of the committee. I think the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition and referred to by hon. members in the far corner merits consideration. I think these amendments should be produced so that we may know what they are.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture would permit me to say a word in reply to my hon. friend, as I am under some obligation in regard to these suggested amendments. There is no doubt that the protracted discussion which has taken place in connection with this bill has given rise to certain suggestions from various parts of the committee which are worthy of consideration. I have been engaged with certain law officers of my staff practically all morning in the preparation and revision of certain suggested amendments to various clauses of the bill. It was impossible to have them ready for to-day, but after a conference with the Minister of Agriculture shortly before the house met this afternoon I think we can say that they will be printed in the votes and proceedings for use on Friday. I do not think this need delay the discussion of the majority of the proposals contained in the bill, but some of the amendments are rather important and will probably require some discussion. I do not think it will be possible to have them in proper form before Friday afternoon's sitting.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the Minister of Justice indicate the general nature of the amendments and the sections to which they refer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The nature of the amendments has been explained before. They do not change the principle of the bill to any extent as they are framed for the purpose of clarifying what we feel is already in the bill but in connection with which there appear to be certain misunderstandings. There is an amendment with reference to the definitions; there is a change dealing more explicity with the provisions for pools or the manner in which products are to be marketed or regulated, and there is one which concerns the power of the local boards to raise funds. But in effect there is no material change in principle in the amendments. The only purpose is that of clarification.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister in mind any amendments to section 9?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: What is their effect?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not in final form to move as an amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: But could the minister give the general effect of them?

Mr. POULIOT: Is the minister ready to answer my question of yesterday?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The principle under consideration in the wording of clause 9 is to confine the application of power to the creation of interprovincial and export trade.

Mr. RALSTON: That is a limitation of the section as it stands now.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We think not.

Mr. RALSTON: When the minister says that there is no change in principle, he will remember, as the committee remembers, that there are a number of principles in this bill, and I take it that there is some change in principle even in what he has indicated to us.

Mr. MacLEAN: I have one or two questions to ask the minister before we leave this clause. So far I have taken no part in this discussion and it appears that a certain section of the press in my own province is sitting up nights and worrying because I have not taken a stand on the bill. As far as this marketing bill is concerned, if it will improve the position of the primary producer in helping him to market his products profitably, then I am for the bill. But I feel sure that some of our farmers and fishermen too will have to be prepared to make some concessions and perhaps some sacrifices if the bill is put into effect in that province in the way it stands at the present time. I am glad however that the minister has declared today that the government is prepared to bring in some amendments to the bill. This I think will justify the criticism that has been offered not only from this side of the house but in the press of the country in connection with this matter. If we get a bill that is workable, it seems to me that this criticism should be gratefully accepted by the government; the country should be thankful for what has been said on this side of the house in having the bill amended to make it as satisfactory as possible.

As I say, if the bill is put into effect as it stands there is no doubt that some of our potato growers in Prince Edward Island will have to be prepared to make sacrifices. They must make sacrifices if the bill as it stands is adopted by a majority of the growers or even by a minority and the rest are forced to comply with the regulations, because they will have to give up some privileges which they enjoy at the present time. There is however one thing I can say for our farmers in this respect and that is that they have always been prepared to make sacrifices personally whenever they have been convinced that cooperative selling was in the interests of all, and I feel sure in this connection that they will be prepared to give the same cooperation as they have given in the past. But there is one difficulty which I see. Under present conditions in that province, very often we have United States buyers coming in the summer months. They look over the growing crop and if they see some exceptionally good fields of certified seed potatoes which they would like to buy they endeavour to buy these direct from the grower. In other words, they take an option on the crop. Possibly the price is set at 75 cents per bushel and they pay 25 cents per bushel down, the balance to be paid when the crop is delivered in the fall. Whether the grower who has been in the habit of doing this will be prevented from continuing the practice is more than I can say, but it would seem that if the whole province came under the operation of this marketing bill then all the potatoes would have to be sold through the one marketing organization.

There is a similar situation in connection with the fisheries. We have some small cooperative fishery unions which handle to a small extent the product of some of the factories. Whether the big dealer who has been backing the fishermen for a great many years and building up an individual trade will be injured in any degree should the fishermen adopt the scheme I cannot say; I do not know whether he would be willing to come under the act.

I may point out that in addition to the potato growers' association, which is a very large organization in that province, we have another quite considerable organization, the associated shippers, and there are also large private firms which advance the potato grower his fertilizer and possibly seed for putting in his crop. Under local legislation there has been evolved a plan whereby these men can be protected through what is known as the first mortgage plan with respect to crop. That mortgage on the crop is intended to protect the man who advances fertilizer and seed to the grower, and it provides that the crop must go to the person making such advances. Personally I should not like to see anything done that would interfere with the rights of these men, because our farmers cannot carry on very well without their assistance. If there are no compulsory features in the bill, as the minister said yesterday, I think it is all to the good.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I interrupt? I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken when he says that I gave the impression that there were no compulsory features in the bill.

Mr. MacLEAN: I am sorry that the minister has not been more definite in all these things, because yesterday when the question was put to him on different occasions he skated all round it; he would not say yes or no in answer to the question.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I must object to the statement the hon. gentleman is making; I think he is doing the skating all round the question. I stated definitely that there was a possibility, as the bill stands, for producers to submit a scheme under which there would be compulsion on those under it.

Mr. MacLEAN: I am glad the minister has cleared up that point because it is a very important one, and one in regard to which we have been endeavouring to get information ever since the bill was introduced. We on this side understood that there were compulsory features in the bill to which I am opposed, and I am glad that the minister admits now that it is so. However, all I can say is that as far as the potato growers of Prince Edward Island are concerned, their produce is largely exported either to the United States or to the different provinces of the dominion. Under this cooperative plan of shipping through the potato growers' association, the work has been proceeding fairly satisfactorily, although there are always some who pull out from their association and are not satisfied. Perhaps the result will be the same under this plan if it is put into operation. But I would like to ask the minister whether in his opinion, if the bill is put into effect and if, say, forty or fifty per cent of the producers in the province ask for the scheme, it is the hope of the government that the board then will control the total output of the province and that those who do not come under the scheme willingly will be forced to come under it and market their products through the organization.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am rather more hopeful to-day than I was yesterday because after four explanations and answers to questions asked with reference to what compulsion there was in the bill, at least some hon. members admit that they now understand that part of it.

With reference to the question asked by the hon. member in connection with compulsion, whether it is my opinion that if forty or sixty per cent of the producers voted in favour of a scheme they would have control over the remainder, I have stated over and over again that the basis of this bill is the scheme that the producers themselves submit and they themselves in their scheme will state the action that they feel should be taken in that connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the intention to have uniformity in regard to the practice among the various boards as to the percentage that will be required for compulsion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is in many cases entirely up to the provincial government. So far as interprovincial and export trade is concerned there will be uniformity with reference to the workings of the board, but schemes may be submitted within a province and a provincial marketing board based on those schemes, set up. The dominion board may name or use that provincial board as their local board or agency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So that for purposes of operation the majority percentage might be quite different in British Columbia from what it was in Nova Scotia?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yesterday I asked this question:

> Mr. Beaubien: Suppose sixty or seventy-five per cent of the growers of any natural product desire to form themselves into a cooperative marketing organization and through their local or provincial boards come to the minister here with a scheme for the marketing of that product: can the marketing board under this bill compel the other forty or twenty-five per cent that are growing the same commodity to go into this marketing scheme, or can it not? I would like to have a direct answer to that question.
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): That is a possibility under certain conditions.

And further on:

> Mr. Beaubien: The minister said: "that is a possibility under certain conditions." Are the conditions under which it might happen mentioned anywhere in the bill? What are the conditions?
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): They are in so far as they can be set out in detail.

May I ask the minister this question: I think he is firmly convinced that the only way that any marketing scheme in respect of any product can be brought about is through compulsion—compulsory cooperation; and the percentage that do not wish to go in will have to be compelled to go in. Suppose we assume that sixty per cent of the producers of a commodity get together and come to the minister with a scheme for cooperative marketing: can he by legislation put the scheme into effect without the sanction of the province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The question raised by the hon. member for Provencher is dependent upon so many different conditions that I am sure he would not ask me to give one specific answer to it. I think, as we proceed with this bill, he will realize that every effort has been made to prevent any conflict between provincial and federal jurisdiction in this matter. A province may use a board set up by the federal government or we may use one of the provincial boards, as the case may be. One of the big tasks in framing this legislation has been to try to get over the difficulty that is confronting the hon. member.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would like to get this clear in my mind. If the minister approves a scheme submitted to him by a majority, can he, without provincial legislation, compel the minority which does not wish the scheme, to go into it? If he cannot answer the question, I shall not insist on it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that the matter would be a provincial one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the minister in receipt of copies of the various legislative acts passed by the provinces with respect to this legislation, and could those copies be tabled by Friday? I understand the various provinces have passed different pieces of legislation to enable them to implement or to proceed under this measure.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is correct. My understanding is that we have copies of the legislation passed by the various provinces, and I shall be glad to table all we have.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose a majority of the growers of a particular commodity ask for a scheme, and the minority, who have not endorsed it, are compelled to go into it: Are there any provisions in this bill or will provisions have to be made by the provincial legislature to give this minority, let us say of forty or twenty-five per cent, some board or representation of some kind? The reason I ask the question is this: If you are going to have cooperation and if a certain percentage of the growers of the particular commodity formulate a scheme and force the minority into it, unless you give the latter some leeway I do not see how you are going to have any harmony in connection with the scheme.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the question my hon. friend has just asked involves only trade within the province in which the board is set up, then the provincial authorities would have to grant any protection such as he thinks should be granted. But if the trade in the commodity produced in the province is to be carried on interprovincially or internationally, the jurisdiction is with the federal government. I understood from his question that he referred to trade within a particular province by producers in that province. If he did, that trade would be under provincial authority; if it is interprovincial or international trade, it would be under federal authority.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Practically every natural product which is grown to-day is traded in interprovincially as well as internationally. There is no question about that. There is no commodity produced in any province the consumption of which is restricted to that province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then if it is interprovincial it is a federal matter and not provincial. But it is not right to say that every article produced is traded in interprovincially. There are cases in the courts deciding that very point; where the trade is provincial it has been held that the federal government has nothing to do with it. The fruit case from British Columbia is one; that was a decision of the supreme court of Canada, not of the judicial committee of the privy council, and I do not know that the case will ever go further than the supreme court of Canada. This bill is drafted on the basis of the decision in the fruit case that interprovincial trade in Canada is under the authority of the federal government.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then from the remarks of the Minister of Justice I take it that the claim that provincial legislation will control the compulsory features, on account of the provinces having jurisdiction over civil rights, is only drawing a herring across the trail. If trade in any commodity which comes under this scheme is interprovincial or international, the provincial jurisdiction will be nil if the dominion government have full power.

Mr. GUTHRIE: With regard to such part as goes beyond the confines of the province, that is right.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think the minister will admit that very few commodities that will come under this measure are not traded in interprovincially. I do not know of any.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Take the fruit crop in Ontario; the greater part by far is sold in Ontario.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: We consume some of it in Manitoba.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That part is federal. But the trade in the province of Ontario will be under the control of the provincial government.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But may I ask—I do this for information, not to obstruct the bill—with regard to a commodity such as apples, grown in Ontario and consumed all over the dominion—

Mr. POULIOT: And outside.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And outside, but limiting it to the Dominion of Canada for the sake of argument. If the fruit growers of Ontario organize themselves into a body and come to the minister with a scheme, will that compel all the growers to go into the scheme? The minister made the statement in answer to a question of the hon. member for Bonaventure that provincial jurisdiction would take care of the compulsory feature—he did not say that in so many words, but that was the effect. Suppose a certain percentage of the growers ask for a scheme and compel those who are not in favour to go into it, will the province have any jurisdiction, or will the whole jurisdiction be in the federal government to compel the growers who are opposed to come into the scheme?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The whole jurisdiction will be in the federal government in regard to all portions of the scheme which apply to interprovincial or international trade; but as far as the marketing in the province of Ontario is concerned, that part will still remain under provincial control. But there is power given in this bill for cooperation between the provincial and federal governments.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: In such a case this bill will not be operative; there would have to be another provincial bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, for anything pertaining to provincial trade.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Take for example the producers of wheat trying to get a one hundred per cent pool, as they did some years ago; they come to the minister and say that sixty per cent are in favour of a compulsory wheat pool. They form a body and present their scheme to the minister, and he puts it under this legislation. He will be able to compel the other forty per cent to go into the scheme, will he?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that the question has been already answered. We can for interprovincial or export trade.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then I would like to get this clear; I have been aked by a large number of my electors to find out about it. If the wheat growers of Canada decide to form themselves into a cooperative marketing organization and come to the minister with the scheme, and forty per cent of the growers do not want to go into the scheme, can the minister compel that forty per cent to go into it? Because wheat is international in scope and also interprovincial.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think he can.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then is there any provision in the bill that will give this minority representation of some kind?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is a compulsory bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme as submitted must set out the manner in which the board is to be selected. It may be by election, or it may be otherwise, but the whole scheme must first be approved by the dominion board, the minister and the governor in council, and will be dealt with on its merits. In a case like that I would say it would be as the hon. member suggests, because it is the only rational thing that everyone should have representation as far as possible. I believe that certain schemes will be brought forward, not only asking that the minority be represented on the board, but also that the trade may be represented, and consumers represented. But all that depends on the particular problems that are at issue.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would not the minister think it advisable to put something in the bill to that effect? The minister knows as well as I do that some years ago there was propaganda throughout western Canada for a one hundred per cent pool. I think my record stands as having done a great deal of work in attempting to bring about wheat pools amongst the French speaking people of western Canada. I am in favour of cooperative marketing; I have always been in favour of it, but I have always been against compulsion, and am to-day. The minister knows that the scheme for the hundred per cent pool was not well received, especially in Manitoba. In view of the explanation given by the Minister of Justice there ought to be some provision in this bill by which the minority, which might be twenty-five, thirty or forty per cent, should be given representation. I do not ask the minister to give it right now but I suggest that before we finish with this bill an amendment should be introduced to give that minority some rights.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member will agree that the discussion so far has disclosed a great number of problems that must be dealt with. We have discarded many clauses which seemed to fit one commodity because, by inserting such clauses, we seemed to make it less possible to get a bill that would meet the requirements of other commodities. I appreciate that what the hon. member says is worthy of consideration. It has been given consideration, but I think the hon. gentleman will agree also that no reasonable person would feel but that if a percentage were forced into any scheme they should be given full representation in that scheme. I do not think the producers of this country are so unreasonable that they would submit any other scheme for approval. I will give further consideration to what the hon. gentleman has said. My only objection to inserting such a clause would be that it might interfere in some way with the desires of the producers in regard to the different problems they must meet.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: You have compulsion under this bill; you give these boards the right to do almost anything.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only the rights for which they ask to handle their own business.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I know that, but the minister can appoint a board without anyone asking for a scheme. We are giving this central marketing board all the powers that possibly can be given any board. They can restrict imports or exports; they can license the growers; they can hold a portion of a commodity off the market, and so on. If you are going to give this board the powers set out in section 4 of this bill, under which they may compel people to come under these schemes, I think some provision such as I have suggested should be included. I know the mind of my electors and I think I speak it when I say that if the minister is going to insert these compulsory clauses—and he cannot deny that they are here—and if the explanation given by the Minister of Justice is correct, as I believe it is, then something ought to be done to give the minorities some rights. I urge that very strongly, and I do not think I can repeat it too often. It may be very well for sixty per cent of the growers of a commodity to say, "We want this scheme; it must be given us," and force the other forty per cent to accept it. Surely the forty per cent ought to have some protection in a free country. We give protection to the minorities in this country in practically everything we do.

Mr. MARCIL: Not in this parliament.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Perhaps we do not recognize them as much as we should, but when we are going to change the whole economic life of the growers of a commodity I think the minorities should have some rights under this bill. I do not think the bill should go through without giving some protection of this kind, and I do not think the minister dreams for a moment that he will ever put this bill into force without using compulsion, coercion or whatever he calls it. If you are going to have this compulsion you should give the minorities some rights.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BURY: Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to catch your eye six or seven times.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has the floor.

Mr. HEENAN: The more we discuss this legislation the more angles we see or, as the hon. member for East Hamilton said last night, the more slants we discover. Since this is a measure to compel the organization of those who produce our natural products in order to regulate marketing, prices and so on, I was wondering if the minister would give consideration to the fact that the labour men of this country are producers as well. They have labour organizations, but they are voluntary organizations; no man joins an organization unless he does so of his own free will.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if the hon. gentleman believes in the closed shop?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do you?

Mr. HEENAN: Because of that fact only about seven per cent of the labour men of Canada are organized and the producers, or the men who employ these workmen, take advantage of the fact that the men are not organized properly. If they were organized properly they would not be working for the wages they are receiving to-day; if they were organized properly there would be no need for minimum wage laws in this country. I am sure the minister and the government will admit that the labour men of Canada are producers, and I am going to ask the minister now if the labour men of Canada hold a meeting and request to be included under this bill, will they come under the bill? If the majority of the men in any craft organize will the minister and the government force the remainder into that organization so that they may regulate their production and their prices, which would be in the nature of wages?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think that question was well answered by the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hesitation of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who did not reply. I can say also that I believe the producers of this country would be reasonably well satisfied if they had the same amount of organization and the same control of their products that the labour unions in Canada have with regard to wages. As to whether or not such a scheme would be considered in regard to the workingmen of Canada, I may say that it would be considered under the provisions of this act and in accordance with what is set out in the act.

Mr. HEENAN: Did I understand the minister to say that if the labour men requested that they be allowed to come under this bill the government would accept that request?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As far as the provisions of the bill go. This bill is for the regulation of the marketing of natural products.

Mr. HEENAN: But the minister must recognize the fact that the labour men of Canada are consumers as well. I want to point out that the labour men are producers; they produce natural products too. They work in the forests, in the mines, in the fisheries, and so on, but I spoke generally of organized labour. I want to point out that the minister was wrong when he said the farmers would be satisfied if they had the protection the labour men have, because the labour men of this country have very little protection, with the exception of a very few unions. There are only about seven per cent of them organized, and because of the fact that they have very little organization in Canada advantage is taken of them with respect to their employment, wages and working conditions. The principle is just the same. If we are going to organize a body of men to regulate their products and say how much shall be produced and what the price shall be, which corresponds, of course, to the wages of the working man, then we should take in all our citizens; we should not neglect any of them.

I have not any authority to ask this question; I have not been asked to ask it, but the reason why I ask it of the minister is to secure information. If the working men of this country get together and ask the minister to give them the same kind of treatment as is being accorded to other producers under this bill, will the minister consider including them in this bill or bringing down another bill to include them and to provide that where a certain percentage of men join an organization of labour men the minority will be forced to do likewise, and the law protect them in the wages they demand for their work, and so forth? For the information of the minister I may say we have a law on the statute books with respect to labour unions, but the law only gives the men the right to join labour unions. It simply says that it is not illegal for them to join unions. The Prime Minister of Canada signed the treaty of Versailles under which working men, as well as employers, are given the right to organize, but the treaty does not compel anyone to recognize those organizations. If the minister will say that he will include working men, the labour men, as producers either in this bill or in a supplementary bill that he will bring down, I think I could support this bill.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friend will read section five of the bill he will see that it provides:

> A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme.

If the labouring men are engaged in the production of a natural product, as my hon. friend says, or in the marketing of a natural product, they can produce a scheme, and if they get the support of all others engaged there will be a board.

Mr. HEENAN: Is that answer from the minister?

Mr. TURNBULL: It is from the bill itself.

Mr. HEENAN: Will the Minister of Agriculture put that same interpretation on section five?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the interpretation I have already given the hon. member in connection with it, namely, that this bill provides that a representative number of producers can submit a plan for the marketing of the product they produce, and so far as the people to whom the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River refers, if they come under the provisions of this bill, they will be included in it as producers of their own products.

Mr. HEENAN: That is not the interpretation the hon. member for Regina placed on that section. If they are working in the lumber mills, for instance, they are not producing their own product; they are working for some other man.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They could not sell a product if it was not theirs.

Mr. HEENAN: Surely they can regulate the price of their work; that is, regulate their wages. The man who employs them is going to be allowed to regulate the sale of his product. Then why not the men who are employed by him? I would like the minister to see if he cannot put the same interpretation on section five as was given by the hon. member for Regina.

Mr. BURY: Mr. Chairman, the point I wish to deal with is the one which was raised by the hon. member for Provencher. I do not know whether it is yet clear in the minds of some of us, but as I see it, the real term that we should emphasize in considering this bill is the regulated product. The scheme as it is now embodied in the bill, and perhaps the minister will correct me if I am wrong, is that the producer of wheat, we will say, will come under the federal law in so far as his product becomes a regulated product within the terms of that law; that is to say, in so far as his product goes into international or into interprovincial trade. But that portion of his product that does not go into interprovincial or international trade is not a regulated product within the meaning of the federal bill. Therefore, a producer of that product in a province who sells it inside the province and who, if he had sold it outside the province, either in another province or abroad, would be committing a breach of the regulations passed under the bill, would not be committing a breach by reason of the product not being a regulated product, and going purely into intra-provincial trade. In other words, I do not think that the distinction we have to make—

Mr. VENIOT: Might I ask the hon. member a question for information? As I understand him, he says that the product sold within the province is to be dealt with within the province by provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. BURY: The product that is traded or sold within the province.

Mr. VENIOT: Therefore the dominion has no right to interfere?

Mr. BURY: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Will my hon. friend look at section ten of the bill? I will read it to him and then ask his explanation of it as a lawyer:

> Whenever a scheme relates to an area of production which is confined within the limits of one province, the governor in council may authorize any marketing board or agency under the law of the said province to be, and to exercise the functions of, a local board with reference to the said scheme, and such provincial board or agency may be authorized to collect charges for services rendered in respect of all or any of the products subject to its regulation by reason of the aforesaid scheme.

[Mr. Heenan.]

What right has the governor in council to interfere if the interpretation of the hon. member is right?

Mr. BURY: My hon. friend has overlooked the one important point in that clause which is "production." The word at the very commencement of the clause shows that the clause is confined to an area of production within a province not an area of trade.

Mr. VENIOT: Then you would require two schemes?

Mr. BURY: Will my hon. friend allow me to finish? Every area of production in Canada must be either inside one province or partly inside one and partly inside another. Therefore every part of the area of production must be in some one province. The provision of the bill, as I understand it, is that where an area of production comes inside a province the terms of the clause which my hon. friend has just read apply. But I am not talking of the area of production; I am talking of the area of sale. Where the trading in or sale of that article produced within a province, as it has got to be, is in another province or outside of Canada in a foreign country, then if there is a scheme especially in relation to it, that product becomes a regulated product, and it is only in respect of regulated products that offences can be committed under the act to be founded on this bill. The products raised within a province and sold within the same province will not come within the purview of this bill and cannot be considered as regulated products. There could be no offence committed under this bill. Even when a man is in a scheme he may produce regulated and unregulated products unless there is provincial legislation to affect the marketing of his products inside the province in which they are raised. The important distinction is not as between the particular products which a man may raise; it is the question whether or not the product he raises is a regulated product. If it is a regulated product under the bill it must be a product sold outside the province, whether it is sold in another province or abroad.

Mr. DUFF: Suppose half a man's crop is sold within the province, a quarter sold interprovincially and a quarter sold on foreign markets; will there be three boards, one board or no board?

Mr. BURY: My hon. friend ought to know.

Mr. DUFF: I do know.

Mr. BURY: I do not know whether he means half an apple or half a crop of apples. If he means half a crop of apples and there is a scheme in connection with the marketing in that district, the apples sold outside the province will be a regulated product. The half crop that is sold in another province or in another country will come under the description of a regulated product.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure I appreciate my hon. friend's explanation. He has taken it upon himself to show me that he is much smarter but he did not seem to know whether a product meant half an apple or ten apples. I appreciate my hon. friend's lecture. I thought that a product meant the product of a certain industry or of a certain individual within the industry, whether it was one apple or 10,000 barrels of apples.

Mr. BURY: Did I not answer the hon. gentleman?

Mr. DUFF: You did, but not in a very courteous manner.

Mr. BURY: If my hon. friend objects to the first part of my answer, I will gladly withdraw it.

Mr. DUFF: Thank you very much, that is better.

Mr. BURY: While I am on my feet I should like to refer to this question of compulsion in connection with which we had a good deal of discussion yesterday. I submit that we are accustomed to compulsion as a perfectly proper principle wherever it is necessary for the protection of a market. We are accustomed to the principle of compulsion to prevent diseased cattle, diseased stock of all kinds, diseased fruits or vegetables, or any other products coming on to a market. The other day the hon. member for Weyburn argued that as his farm was his own he should not be interfered with, even by parliament, and should be allowed to operate his farm exactly as he chooses. Unfortunately he is not allowed to do that. If he operates his farm in such a way that weeds grow up and spread to any extent he will very soon find a weed inspector down on his back. Whether or not he likes it, he will be forced to clean his farm of weeds. Why? The inspector will not be so much concerned with the injury done by the weeds to the property of my hon. friend who has permitted them to grow; he will be concerned with the injury being done to his neighbours' farms. We have the same principle of compulsion in this bill. The purpose of the bill is to prevent a producer from introducing into a market, whether it be the home market, a market outside of the province of production or a foreign market, any product which will injure the market for his fellow producers or fellow exporters. That is a perfectly sane and sound principle and one which is quite common and recognized by all. It is one which we have had to recognize, whether we like it or not. I do not see anything in this bill which goes beyond the principles which have been well established in connection with the operation of our agriculture and other industries for years.

I give one illustration. There was a time when under our criminal law a co-owner could not be charged with theft from from a fellow co-owner in respect to joint property. This could not be done because of the relationship which existed between them and between each of them and the subject matter of their ownership. But in our criminal code the law has been changed and a co-owner may now be charged with theft in connection with the subject matter of the co-ownership. He is not protected from being convicted and fined or imprisoned. We have the same principle in this bill. The markets on the other side of the channel in the old country, in Europe, in the United States or in the other provinces do not belong to any one exporter. He should not be permitted to ship an unregulated product to those markets which will have the inevitable result of destroying the property of his fellow exporters. It is a sound and logical principle of law that the law should step in and prevent that man from stealing—that is what it is—from his fellow exporters some of the benefits which belong to that common market. I cannot see why there should have been all this trouble and controversy about this principle of compulsion with which we have been familiar for years and which is in keeping with the ordinary principles of law.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apparently the hon. member has a comprehensive view of this matter, and I should like to ask him if a provincial scheme were applied to some crop which is consumed in part within a province, consumed in part within other provinces and exported in part, would not the effect of any provincial scheme which limited production or restricted sales within a province be to affect as well interprovincial and export trade?

Mr. BURY: I am not speaking for the minister. I stated expressly that I was giving my own opinion of the purpose of the bill and I asked to be corrected if I was wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am simply asking my hon. friend for his expert opinion.

Mr. BURY: I thank the right hon. gentleman for the compliment, but perhaps it is not deserved. If the provincial scheme was such as to restrict production, I assume that it would restrict not only the production of the product within the province but also the production outside the province. I have no doubt personally that that would be the effect of a provincial scheme.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: As the provincial aspect of this matter has been raised I should like to ask the minister if he has conferred with the various premiers in connection with the principle of this marketing bill. I understand that at least one premier has put himself on record as being in favour of the principle of the bill. I refer to Premier Brownlee of Alberta. Has any enabling legislation been passed in the various legislatures, or have those legislatures passed any skeleton legislation?

My second question refers to the position of minorities. Does the minister feel that a vicious or recalcitrant minority could impose upon or jeopardize the welfare of the majority of producers of the country? Last night I said that the leader of the opposition had made the statement that bad money drives out good money, and it is possible that a small minority might drive out of business a large section of the producers. The question was raised by the hon. member for Provencher that some provision should be made in this legislation to enable minorities to have some say. May I ask the hon. member for Provencher this question. If the Liberal party is successful at the next election will it include in the cabinet one or two Conservatives and a Labour and Farmer member, say, in order to allow the minority in this house to have a say?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have been in consultation for a considerable time with the different provinces—the ministers of agriculture, the cooperative organizations and others. I understand that at least six out of the nine legislatures have passed legislation along the lines indicated by the hon. member.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Which provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not received copies of legislation passed, nor have we any definite information from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Manitoba.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I frankly admit that I am no lawyer, that my legal knowledge is limited; however, in studying the British North America Act, I learned that the provinces comprised in the confederation, enjoyed a certain commercial liberty and had the right not only to organize their interior trade but also their interprovincial and international trade. Ever since the outset of this debate on the bill to improve the methods and practices of marketing natural products, the impression I gathered, by listening to the speeches of members opposite, was that the government intended to restrict the commercial liberty of the provinces which was guaranteed by the British North America Act. According to this bill the provinces will only have the right to regulate their own interior commerce, but when it is a matter of trading between provinces or countries, they will be obliged to submit to the National Products Marketing Board. This bill is another step towards the crippling of the provinces in connection with their commercial organization, it restricts the liberty of the provinces, and I wish to warn the government that should it persist, by means of this bill, in decreasing, restricting and paralyzing the liberty of the provinces in commercial matters, we shall be forced to take the means necessary to throw off the bondage of this government which encroaches on the prerogatives and the liberty of provinces. It is high time to throw off the government's yoke and seek the means to organize differently so as to safeguard the liberty to which the provinces have a right.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member, I understand, asks in what way this bill will interfere with provincial rights or interprovincial trade. There is of course nothing in the bill that could in any way affect the British North America Act with respect to trade and the jurisdiction of the federal and provincial authorities. As I have said on a number of occasions, the basis is cooperation between the provinces and the federal department. But nothing in this bill can in any way interfere with the present law with respect to provincial and interprovincial trade.

Mr. SANDERSON: What effect will this bill have on the flour milling industry? Most of the flour mills now carry on a local provincial trade and an export trade. Will they have to come under the provisions of this bill? That is one question. Another is this: What effect will this legislation have on the cold storage industry? There are many cold storage plants that are privately owned. The owner buys up a quantity of butter, cheese, eggs, celery and so on and that is his own property. He keeps it in cold storage and sells it when he thinks the market is right. What will be the effect on his business? Will he have to come under this bill and be compelled to sell his product whenever the local board sees fit to tell him he can?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In so far as the flour milling industry represents producers coming under the provisions of this act, if they wish to be organized and to submit a scheme in accordance with the provisions of the legislation, that will be given every consideration—

Mr. SANDERSON: Pardon me. The milling industry, as I understand, would have to come in in a local way to sell their product, and they would have to come in also in order to sell it provincially and nationally in the other provinces, as well as in export. Will provision be made with respect to them?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They would be in no different position from that of any other producer.

Mr. SANDERSON: With all due respect to the minister, it is no answer to say that they are in no different position from that of any other producer. I am asking in regard to one of the chief industries of the country—the flour milling industry. Surely the minister has some answer other than that to give me. I am not being critical. I want to tell the minister in all seriousness that among the flour millers there is a feeling that this legislation is going to work havoc with their business. Surely he can give the committee some information as to how they will be treated, what they will have to do and how this bill will affect them.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I have stated before, if they come under its provisions, it will affect them in exactly the same way as it would any other producer or body of producers coming under the provisions of this legislation. As I have stated on a number of occasions, the purpose is not to disrupt trade but rather to assist in bringing about a more economical system of trading.

As regards the hon. member's further question with reference to storage plants, this legislation will in no way interfere with private storage plants as they now exist, except as they are service organizations of a local board under this measure; they will be utilized as they are being now.

Mr. SANDERSON: Am I to understand from the answer of the minister in regard to the milling industry that it will be treated just the same as any other producer? Am I right in that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the minister be good enough to tell me how the producer will be treated? I am trying to follow the discussion but I must confess that so far I have no enlightenment.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret the hon. member has not been able to follow this because it has been discussed and repeated over and over again. I will, however, present it once more as I see it. If a number of producers, considered sufficiently representative, submit to the board in accordance with the provisions of this legislation a scheme that they think will be to their benefit as producers, setting out the details of the scheme, and if it meets with the approval of the board, it will be submitted to the minister and approved by order in council. The scheme came from the producers themselves. It might be necessary to have a poll or some other means might be decided upon as necessary to ensure that the body of producers would be sufficiently representative. It is the producers' own plan that they submit as being what they think will be in their best interests in regulating the marketing of their product.

Mr. SANDERSON: Getting back to the flour milling industry again, am I to understnd that it will not be affected at all by this bill unless a request is made by a certain number of the millers to come in under its provisions? Am I right in that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be my understanding.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then, supposing sixty per cent of the flour milling industry, let us say of Ontario, came under it and forty per cent did not: what would happen to the forty per cent in regard to export trade, local trade and trade with other provinces? Can the forty per cent who hold out in the first instance and do not come in under the scheme, be compelled to come in?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No definite answer could be given unless the details of the scheme were submitted. It would be on the basis of that that a decision would be made.

Mr. SANDERSON: The details of the scheme submitted to whom?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To the marketing board.

Mr. SANDERSON: To the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, there would be no local board until after the scheme had been approved and a board set up. It might be submitted to the provincial government.

Mr. SANDERSON: In regard to the milling industry, if sixty per cent requested permission to come in and the other forty per cent saw fit to remain out, if the board says so, can the forty per cent be compelled to come in?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that if such a scheme were submitted to a provincial government—

Mr. VENIOT: Provincial board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —provincial board or provincial government, they would have the authority to force in the others. They would have that now.

Mr. SANDERSON: In regard to the enabling legislation that has been passed by some of the provinces, has the minister copies of the acts that have been passed? I understand one has been passed in Toronto.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have already answered that and we have agreed to table on Friday any copies of legislation we have received. I believe we have copies of acts passed by six provinces.

Mr. SANDERSON: I did not understand that; I am glad to get the information.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister has informed the committee that some amendments to this bill are pending but we do not yet know the contents of them. Might I draw his attention to paragraph (f) of clause 4? In doing so, I wish to take up the battle on behalf of the fishermen. If not for all the maritime provinces, I believe I am entitled to speak for my own constituency which is one that I believe ranks second in the maritime provinces in the number of its fishing fleet, it having 250 to 300 vessels. I find in this measure definitions for many things, but I do not find any definition relating to the primary producer. Let me put this case to the minister: In the constituency of Gloucester we have men who hire aboard fishing vessels. Paragraph (f) of clause 4 reads:

> To require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board—

And so forth. Who is the primary producer there who must register? Must each member of the crew register or is it only necessary that the captain or owner of the vessel do so? I take it that the crew constitute the primary producers and if that be the case, the crew should not have to register.

Let me give the minister another case. We have been talking about agriculture ever since this bill has been under discussion. I am now going to talk about fishing. It is an industry which, so far as the maritime provinces are concerned, is just as important as agriculture and, indeed, more important in some sections. You cannot deal with fish as a primary product in the same way as you can deal with agricultural primary products; you must have a different way of coming at the matter. There are too many complicated conditions arising in the fishing industry in the way of catching, curing and marketing that are not common to the system involved in the production or marketing of agricultural products. For instance we are fishing cod from early in the spring until August 15 when what is known as the weighing season comes in. Cod is fished in our section by fishermen under wages, with the captain in charge. But after the weighing season begins, August 15, men go on half-line until the fall. Now where does the primary producer come in? Is the man who is engaged by the month the primary producer, or is it the owner or captain of the vessel, who is responsible for the fishing? When they are on half-line the sailor would be the primary producer. He is no longer engaged by the month; he is engaged on half-line—that is to get one-half the product. He is really as much a primary producer as the captain who owns the vessel; there is no distinction. Will you require the sailor, the man fishing under wages, to register under this act? I say it is an injustice, and you will never succeed in having it done.

Then take in our inshore fishermen, or those who fish for lobsters. The traps are provided by the owner of the cannery. The owner of the traps says to these men: You fish and I will pay you so much a pound for the lobsters; you have to give me all the product because I furnish the traps. That is the agreement they sign. Who is the primary producer there?

Mr. CAHAN: Who has the disposal of the fish in each case?

Mr. VENIOT: The proprietor of the cannery. But he is not a primary producer.

Mr. CAHAN: I think he is as much a primary producer as the farmer who engages people to work his farm.

Mr. VENIOT: Then under this bill the man who engages farm help must have his farm help registered?

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, no.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, that is the information that I am looking for. Then take the smelt fishing in the winter, which is a very important industry, bringing in hundreds of thousands of dollars to the north shore of New Brunswick. In that fishing there is scarcely a man that can be called a primary producer by himself. The man who really does the fishing is provided with nets belonging to some wholesale merchant who ships the product to the market in Boston, Montreal, Toronto and elsewhere. Under this bill, section 4, subparagraph (f), are these men compelled to register? Are they compelled to keep books? Are they compelled to give their addresses?

Mr. NEILL: Certainly they are.

Mr. VENIOT: Are they compelled to do all that subparagraph (f) says shall be done in the case of the primary producer, or the producer of primary products? It is in regard to points such as this that had the bill gone before a special committee we could have had representatives of the fishing industry show where the bill would be good for this industry or where it would be injurious. I say in all seriousness that this bill cannot be complied with by the fishermen of the county of Gloucester which I have the honour to represent. The terms of the bill cannot be carried out; I know whereof I speak.

Mr. TURNBULL: In that case there would not be much chance of their applying for a scheme, would there?

Mr. VENIOT: That is just where the trouble will come. If the lone fisherman does not apply for a scheme the man who holds him by the throat by means of advances, who will call himself the primary producer, the wholesaler who is acting as intermediary for the sale of the product to markets outside the province, will have a greater hold on that fisherman than he ever had.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: That is where the trouble will come in. The wholesaler will organize himself. In northern New Brunswick there are three or four companies who say to the fishermen: You fish for us; we will provide the wherewithal for you to fish, but all your fish must be sold to us and to no one else. Those men can combine, form a scheme, come before the provincial board and have it approved, and the moment it is approved they have a stranglehold on the men who, after all, are the primary producers, the men who risk their lives on the deep seas to bring this product to land. Under that scheme these wholesalers will have the upper hand of those whom I call the primary producers in the fish business, and that is why I am opposing this measure.

Mr. GAGNON: Do I understand that the lobster fishermen of Gloucester and neighbouring counties are ill treated by wholesalers?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not saying anything of the kind; I am stating the facts, and you can form your own judgment. I say that where the lobster fishermen are provided with the traps by the owners of the canneries, who are the wholesalers of this product outside of New Brunswick, either to Montreal, Toronto or other markets or for export, the canners have complete control of the industry and can do as they like with those who are the primary producers, the men who do the actual work of taking the lobsters from the sea.

Mr. BURY: What property or right has the actual fisherman in his boat? Is he simply working the boat for the canner?

Mr. VENIOT: He does not own the boat.

Mr. BURY: Has he not even a lease?

Mr. VENIOT: In some cases he may lease it.

Mr. BURY: If he has it on lease he owns it during the term of his lease.

Mr. VENIOT: There are not five per cent of them who have.

Mr. BURY: Any man working a boat if he has any sense has control of the boat as his own for the time being. I would not think there would be any trouble in holding that he is the producer.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think the hon. gentleman would put it as he does if he had any sense, and I think the fishermen have as much sense as the hon. member as far as their calling is concerned. Having made that reply let me go a step further and say that twenty-five or thirty years ago there was in the county of Gloucester hardly a fisherman fishing the deep sea that owned the vessel in which he did his fishing. Those vessels were all owned by the wholesale merchants. But these people have progressed, and in the last fifteen years, so far as deep sea fishing is concerned, have become the owners of their craft. That does not apply to the inshore fishing that I referred to a little while ago, the lobster fishing and so on. And they in turn engage men as sailors, hire them by the month to run their vessels and fish for them, the proprietors being the captains of the vessels. They have been able to get clear of the drudgery, the slavery that they were subjected to some twenty-five years ago. But when they come to sell their product the sale is regulated by the men who buy wholesale, it cannot be otherwise under this bill. I claim that these wholesalers can organize a scheme as primary producers under this bill and take advantage of the real fishermen, and in that way the real fishermen, who to my mind should be called the primary producers, will be once more subjected to the trials and tribulations that they suffered in years gone by.

While I am on my feet let me say that I am in favour of cooperative marketing. I am not going to talk about the compulsion clauses of this bill, but this is compulsory cooperation, to which I am opposed. In my county we started a cooperative society by which our people were instructed each year in the curing of fish and the securing of markets. In 1928 and 1929 the dominion government, favouring voluntary cooperative marketing, voted a sum of money which was expended by appointed officials who went through the maritime provinces getting the fishermen together to form cooperative societies, and these fishermen were given instruction in the curing of fish. At the same time the government had expert fishermen working in the county of Gaspe, along the Gaspe coast and in the counties of northern New Brunswick as well as the Magdalen islands, teaching our fishermen how to cure fish so that they would be of uniform quality. To-day what is known as the Gaspe cure or the Gaspe cut of codfish has enhanced the value of the codfish industry of the maritime provinces. At that time the Liberal government encouraged cooperation, not compulsory but voluntary cooperation, and wherever such cooperation was established we have had good results. We can have good results to-day if the government of this country will carry on the work that was started in 1928.

Mr. NEILL: I entirely agree with what the hon. member for Gloucester has said with regard to the fishing industry, and if he looks up Hansard he will see that I visualized the situation when I first spoke on the bill some two weeks ago. I do not believe the bill fits in with the fishing industry so that it could be applied; I doubt very much whether the fishing industry was in the mind of the minister when the bill was framed. The hon. member for Gloucester has said that he does not believe the act can be made workable with regard to the fishing industry, and I do not know that this is not the best thing about the bill so far as the fishing industry is concerned, because I believe it will only work against the interests of what I would call the common, ordinary fishermen. It lends itself to manipulation by those interested only in marketing; it almost invites it. I need not go into details—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When the hon. member refers to fishermen does he mean men fishing on their own, small fishermen on their own?

Mr. NEILL: I refer to the men who actually catch the fish.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As labourers or on their own?

Mr. NEILL: Sometimes they are entirely on their own; sometimes they have cannery gear on shares but not leased, as the hon. member for East Edmonton said. They do not lease the boat; the cannery lends the boat to them on shares. They are the men to whom I refer, the men who catch fish individually, whether they own their own boats or whether they use cannery gear. Those are the men who are not going to enter into this picture. There is every opportunity for a board to be formed having regard to the interests of the marketing end only, and I will give an illustration that has come to my notice.

Mr. BURY: May I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? Surely he agrees that even though a boat is loaned to a fisherman, if the catch belongs either wholly or in part to the fisherman so that he can sell it and get the money for it, then he is a producer; the fish are the product of his work, and he comes within the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly he is a producer; I do not deny that, but I say he will not get a look in. That is the point. The scheme will be over his head; he will not be invited,—he will be told. That is what will happen to him. I was about to give an illustration; I need not name the province, though I suppose there is no reason why I should not do so. Here is a provincial marketing board that has been set up already, and how is it constituted? One member is the deputy minister of agriculture; naturally he is associated with farming rather than with fishing. Of the other two members one is the president of a big fish canning company—a very worthy man, no doubt, but still the president of a fish canning company—and the other is a commission merchant. Considering the place from which that gentleman comes I think the chances are that his commission business is connected with the sale of fish. So on this board we have a man ignorant of the fishing business and two men whose interests lie in the marketing of the product rather than in the industry itself. That is only an illustration I happen to pick up, but that is how it is going to work out right along.

To go back to what I wanted to say, Mr Chairman, we now have it stated by the opposition and admitted by the government that this act contains compulsory features. I do not know why on earth there was so much delay in admitting that fact, because to anyone reading the bill it was quite obvious that compulsion was there or it would not be worth the paper on which it was written. Personally I am not nearly so much afraid of the compulsory features as my hon. friends to the right are. I have seen cases where it might be necessary for the majority to exercise some compulsion over the minority. I am not so much afraid of that feature, but I am very much afraid of the way in which these men will be appointed who will exercise these very extensive powers. That is the danger of the situation. The hon. member for Provencher spoke of sixty per cent and forty per cent of the producers. The British act says there must be two-thirds in favour, which would be 66⅔ per cent. Considering the different conditions in this country I would go further and make it seventy-five per cent here, but there is nothing in the act that guarantees that even any percentage will be required.

Now that the minister has somewhat come down from what he wrongly believed was the proper attitude of ministerial reserve and told us something of what he thinks of the bill and of his intentions and motives, I understand and grasp his troubles more than I did previously. He is up against this question of dual control, which hampers him at every turn. Then take the dominion board. What is the use of talking about sixty per cent or forty per cent in that case? They will be all appointed by the dominion government, and we are not even told whether the board will consist of three or of thirty members; we are not even told what they will be paid or who they will be, though we might hazard a shrewd guess. In the New Zealand and British acts that is all laid down to the very last degree. As the hon. member for Last Mountain pointed out, there are eight or nine different procedures, safeguards and channels in Great Britain which had to be gone through before the scheme is finally passed, but the dominion board will be nominated entirely by the government. The same thing may be said with regard to the provincial board. The minister says that he feels that he cannot exercise many of these powers because of the British North America Act, they will have to originate in what he calls the local board, and the local boards will have to do with the schemes. In the meantime we have no control over them, and in the end I always run up against this vicious section 9, where the bill after setting out this elaborate yet vague—and perhaps necessarily so—system of constituting these boards, wipes it all out of the picture by saying in section 9 that the minister can do the whole thing himself.

I believe the trouble is largely one of dual jurisdiction. The minister says there are these two boards, and he will not be able to dictate to any great extent to the local or provincial board because under the British North America Act it comes under provincial jurisdiction. The Minister of Justice, replying to the hon. member for Provencher, went very fully into the question, and finally he said that there may well be a scheme, not two schemes but one scheme, one part of which—and I think this would often happen—would be administered under provincial regulations and provincial authority and perhaps under provincial law, under provincial control, at any rate, and the other part of which would be administered under this act and by dominion authority. Just follow that out and think of two jurisdictions, one in British Columbia and the other in Ottawa, different jurisdictions more or less antagonistic, at least with each uninformed of the troubles of the other, and attempting to deal with the same product. Who is going to sit by and say, with the voice of omniscience: at this particular moment and on this particular point of a railway the jurisdiction of the province ceases and that of the dominion begins? There is going to be one grand, enormous muddle.

I would suggest to the minister that he could have proceeded along the line followed in the Old Age Pensions Act. There we had dual jurisdiction and much of the trouble that has been suggested here. But that was got around by the dominion government saying: We will put out a skeleton agreement or a skeleton act applying to all the provinces and this skeleton act must be the basis, and if you care to come in, all right, we will make a deal. Of course, the situation was easier there because the dominion government was making a grant of money and made acceptance of the skeleton act a condition for receiving the money. They had no trouble at all with the provinces. The provinces had to agree to it, and they said: We will accept those terms. It was the easiest way a thing of that kind could be handled. I suggest to the Minister of Justice that we might have proceeded along similar lines in this case, and that if we had put forward a skeleton act we could have covered many of the objections I have already named. We could stipulate for a local board composed of so many members, elected in a specified way, and could have said: If you do thus and so, we the dominion government will do our share in cooperating along these prescribed lines. That would have been the price of dominion cooperation. But as it is now, we may have a board in British Columbia composed of three men, and one in Nova Scotia composed of ten men. We may have the British Columbia board elected by the producers, and the Nova Scotia board appointed by the government.

As I said before, I do not want to be a pessimist. There is some good principle in this bill, but unless some enormous changes are made in the bill I do not know if it is possible, on account of the dual jurisdiction, to accomplish anything. In fact, I think it is going to be a complete fizzle, and impossible to work out, and that it will only make us a laughing stock from almost every point of view.

What I suggest is this. I go a long way with the minister when he says that there is need for some of the features of this bill. He could not have made a better argument when he said some days ago: We must have some act to deal with the need for restricted quotas. The British government and other governments have decided that we must cut down on our export of certain articles, beef, for instance. In that case there was some form of negotiations I believe, involving some trouble for the minister. Those troubles will increase. The British government will from time to time simply notify us: You must cut down on your quota of this or that article. But as the minister said, how can we cut down on a quota when we have no means of regulating that particular product? I admit that there is need for an act of this kind so far as that is concerned, but I suggest that it should be limited to our export trade. Let us walk before we run. It is very like seeing a man walking along the road. We want to help him, and instead of giving him a team or a truck or a motor car, or even an aeroplane, we suggest that he proceed by way of a rocket. That method of transportation is very much in the clouds at present. We do not know much about it. It has not met with any success. Would it not be much better to start by giving the man a team or a truck to help him along, and then as we learn by experience we could impose more and more restrictions? We have precedents for that, and we could regulate not only the quantity but the quality exported. We have, for instance, the New Zealand precedent. They have two acts, one dealing with frozen mutton and the other with dairy products. One has been in force since 1913, and the other since 1921, and both have been an unqualified success. New Zealand went slowly and moderately at it. They said: No mutton and no dairy products unless it is of a standard grade shall leave New Zealand, and none shall leave without permission, so as to prevent the flooding of the market in Great Britain at the wrong time. Their acts have worked well. New Zealand, of course, is one corporate body. It has not the divisions that we have, with our nine provinces and conflicting jurisdictions. We could avoid all that by following New Zealand's example and dealing only with the export trade to start with until we see how the thing works, and then we could develop it in the future if necessary.

People are asking: Where does the producer come in? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out the other day that in the British act the individual producer is protected. After going through no end of formalities and procedure, if the minority producer does not think he has a fair deal, he can go before a board of arbiters and they will deal with the situation. There are also no less than two boards dealing with the rights of consumers.

How does New Zealand handle it? Instead of having a board appointed by the government, political appointments with all that that suggests even if it is not carried out, they have a board composed in the one case of twelve members, and I forget how many in the other. The board of twelve is appointed in this way. Two are appointed by the government, but must be approved by the producers. Probably they would be government officials and no one could object to that. Then nine, I think, are appointed by the producers, and mark this, please, Mr.

Minister; they are appointed by and from the producers, not from the marketing end. They must be producers and elected by them, and the government appoints them on the recommendation of the producers. Having eleven so appointed, a twelfth can be appointed by the government as a representative of the marketing end. That is fair enough surely. Their interests are looked after.

But it is not possible under the New Zealand act to have a board such as my hon. friend from Gloucester suggests. A board composed entirely of the marketing end could simply deliver the producer, in the case of the fishermen, into the hands of the marketing end, which has happened in the past, as we know, and can be a source of abuse, if you want to put it plainly.

I do suggest that the minister might consider, after all the trouble he has seen develop both in this house and outside, for I know that he is having representations made to him, whether it would not be wise to confine this act for the present to dealing with our export trade only, and then once the scheme has got started and we see how it is going to work, and the early troubles have been smoothed out, we should be in a much better position to go on with a scheme of this kind. That suggestion would do away with all these troubles that are likely to arise from dual jurisdiction. I think double jurisdiction is the thing that is going to wreck this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks of the hon. member for South Perth with regard to a combination of the milling industry, it seemed to me that the minister sidestepped a little in his reply by saying that if a scheme were presented to a provincial government a provincial government might authorize it, that they had that power anyway at the present time. But he did not make any reference to what would be the effect of the scheme if presented to the board that is contemplated being established under this act.

I would like to ask the minister this question: If a majority of the milling industry in a province were to apply to the board for a scheme to be put into operation—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Federal or provincial board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Federal board, and the federal board approved the scheme, and the minister and the governor in council approved it, would the remaining members of the milling interest be obliged to come under the regulations that would be laid down under the scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would depend what the scheme was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would depend what the scheme was, but I say assuming that the scheme is approved by the federal board, by the minister and by the governor in council. I do not imagine they would approve it unless they were satisfied it should be approved. But if it were approved and say sixty per cent had put forward the proposed scheme, would not the remaining forty per cent be obliged to enter the organization and come under the regulations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that if that was one of the conditions of the scheme, the remainder could be forced to come in. Hon. members opposite have been repeating themselves with their references to sixty and forty per cent. I hope those references were made only by way of illustration. I think we are all agreed that the success of any scheme under which compulsion would be necessary would be more likely if there was the highest possible percentage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am obliged to the minister for his direct answer. It brings out an all-important feature to which sufficient attention has not been given as yet. As the minister says, the government may require a majority of seventy-five or eighty per cent, or it may require a majority of only fifty-one per cent, but the effect will be that if a majority in any industry having to do with natural products present a scheme to the minister and that scheme is approved by the board, by the minister and by the governor in council, it then becomes so far as the locality to which it applies is concerned the law of the land, and others engaged in the same pursuits will be obliged to obey whatever regulations may be thus laid down. That will be true of the milling industry. It will be true also of the canning industry, whether it relates to the canning of vegetables, the canning of fruits, the preserving of the products of the orchards or the gardens. It will apply also to dairy products. It will apply also to the canning of fish. It will apply also to lumber mills and like concerns. But it goes even further; it will apply to the storing of any or all of the things mentioned under "natural products." A majority of those engaged in the storing of any natural product may present a scheme to the government.

Once it is accepted in the way I have indicated it becomes law and the remaining concerns will be obliged to come into this scheme or be subject to penalties of both fine and imprisonment. But it goes beyond storing; it takes in cold storage and those who are in the warehousing business in connection with any of these natural products or derivative products. It goes beyond that; it takes in shipping. The definition of a natural product is:

"Natural product" means any product of agriculture or of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product.

The definition of marketing is:

"Marketing" includes buying and selling, shipping for sale or storage and offering for sale.

We know now that the act may be used in the way I have indicated. Surely it is going pretty far to ask this house to enact legislation of that kind. It must be remembered that this action may be taken when parliament is not in session and without any power on the part of parliament, until it repeals the act, to alter the effect of a scheme put into force in that way. This is an aspect of the matter which I think may surprise some hon. gentlemen opposite and should of itself be sufficient reason for altering very materially many of the provisions of this bill. The power is specifically given for the creation of monopolies in large numbers of industries, and such power should never be given in this country. The act might well be termed an act to create combines and monopolies. After listening to the remarks the other day of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reference to the importance of large organizations, I begin to wonder whether it is not the intention of this legislation to bring about consolidations in some of these industries I have mentioned, or others which might be included, and to prevent competition not only between primary producers but between many of the manufacturing concerns engaged in the manufacturing of natural products. It is important that we should understand that this bill goes that far, that it enables that kind of thing to be done.

Mr. RALSTON: I desire to join with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in what he said as to the application of this bill to the fishing industry. If this bill means what it appears to mean, I think it would be far better if it were not applied to that industry. Applying it to my own constituency, it would mean that the men engaged in the lobster industry who own their own boats and carry on their own operations will be subject to possibly three different authorities in connection with the marketing of lobsters and lobster products.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only if they request it.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought perhaps the minister might make that answer. I should like him to point out anything in this bill which states expressly that the dominion marketing board, constituted and empowered by section 4, has not the full authority without any request being made by anyone to exercise the powers contained in section 4. Perhaps I have missed it altogether, but I should like the minister to tell me if there is anything in the act which restricts the board.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is nothing.

Mr. NEILL: There is only the hope.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I have stated on a number of occasions, where an industry desires to organize in order to assist in the regular marketing of its products, the dominion marketing board may in certain emergencies take steps which it sees fit to assist the marketing of those products.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, under section 9 the minister himself may devise a scheme and authorize the dominion marketing board to carry it into effect. But in addition to that section 4 gives unlimited powers to the board. Under that section, three, five, seven or nine people appointed by this government are to be given the power to do the things mentioned in the section. I come back to my fishermen again. So far as the dominion marketing board is concerned, it may say to John Jones who is fishing lobsters, "You cannot ship your lobsters to-day; you must hold them." It can say, "You must ship them in such and such a manner; you must ship them by well smack or by the Boston boat." It may prescribe the quantity which can be shipped as well as decide upon the quality. I assume that would include the measurement of the lobster. These things may be done. One fisherman may be allowed to ship his product subject to certain regulations, which another may not be required to comply with. As I understand it, the bill in the first place gives these extraordinary powers, and I want the minister to be definite when giving me an answer, to the dominion marketing board constituted by the governor in council under section 4.

Mr. DUFF: The local board.

Mr. RALSTON: No, that is the dominion marketing board. Secondly, a group of men who are considered by somebody as being properly representative—

Mr. NEILL: So considered by themselves.

Mr. RALSTON: No; they are to be passed on by the governor in council as representative of the industry; and they may themselves promote a scheme and submit it for approval, in which event the dominion marketing board may delegate to the local board the powers which the dominion marketing board have. That is the second body which may regulate. The third is that the minister under section 9 may himself devise a scheme and then instruct the dominion board to carry it into effect. But I do not see in this act anything which requires any body to propose a scheme before the dominion board can exercise these almost unheard of powers. It seems to me that the dominion board has full power to operate with or without a scheme as it sees fit, and the result is that all sorts of discrimination can take place as between various lobster shippers.

Now what is going to happen? The men are there, individuals operating lobster boats. There are companies who are operating in a large way, somewhat in the same manner as the hon. member for Gloucester indicated. They possibly may get the preference, with the result that the small man is forced to come in and accept regulations which are perhaps more beneficial to the man shipping on a large scale.

I submit that the element of arbitrary compulsion appears all through the act, and the suggestion of this being done at the request of someone does not quite paint the true picture of the effect of this legislation. Let me give another example. I know that at the present time certain people in Nova Scotia are negotiating with regard to the shipment of fish to Brazil. They hear that Newfoundland is under royal commission, and it is possible there may be regulation of export from there. Nova Scotia at the moment is free of export restrictions; there is no regulation of any kind in that province relating to the export of fish. This firm is being asked now whether or not they can handle shipments of fish to Brazil in view of the fact that shipments from Newfoundland are likely to be restricted. They are faced however with the possibility that one of these three authorities may exercise power over them and say to them, "You cannot ship fish to Brazil or you can only ship a certain quantity or at a certain time," with the result that they lose that market. The other day I saw a letter, written by a Nova Scotian fish firm after the introduction of this bill, indicating to the Brazilian importer that there was no use attempting to give any guarantee about delivery with this bill hanging over the producers. Perhaps I misapprehend the bill entirely, but it seems to me that there are three different authorities, and the dominion marketing board has absolute authority without any request from the producers and whether they want it or not.

Mr. MARCIL: I agree with the criticism made by the leader of the opposition, by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth with regard to fishing. It must be evident to the government, at this stage of the proceedings, that when a member who voted for the second reading of the bill, a man of the competency in fishing matters which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni possesses, takes exception to the bill in committee, the house is not in a position to deal with the matter properly, especially in view of the fact that the announcement has been made several times that the bill will be amended in some very material respects. I submit that it is not fair to those who voted for the second reading of the bill—such members as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, who threatens now, if certain amendments are not made, to oppose the bill altogether—to ask us now to pronounce upon it before the whole measure is submitted to the house. I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Justice would be wise to report progress until we have the full measure before us so that we may be in a position to know just where we are. Some hon. members have said over and over again that if the bill is amended in certain respects they will support it; other members who voted for the second reading threaten now to vote against the bill if those amendments are not made.

An allusion has been made to the Gaspe peninsula. There are two classes of men connected with fishing in that part of the country—the fisherman proper, who is of course the producer, and the dealer in fish. Is the local marketing board going to be composed of fish dealers or of fishermen or will it be a combination of both? The fisheries in the province of Quebec are under the control of the provincial government. Now, the province has commercial agents throughout the world, in London, Paris and elsewhere, and lately it has sent a commercial agent to Italy to find a market for dried Quebec codfish. So that once we deal with interprovincial or international trade the question becomes one of federal concern, and is not in accordance with the situation that exists at the present time, because for years, as I say, Quebec has had commercial agents in London and Paris and in Brussels as well, and still has. I repeat, it has sent a man lately to Italy to have them deal directly with the Quebec fisheries.

The Minister of Fisheries, pro tem, declared the other day in response to a hundred or more petitions from the province of Quebec, asking that this dual control over the fisheries of that province be cleared up, that he could do nothing unless the government of Quebec abdicated its control over those fisheries. The Quebec government does not seem disposed to do this. It is trying to find markets at the present time for fish produced in the province. I should like the government, in view of the situation as I have outlined it, to deal fairly by these fishermen.

When the hon. member for Lunenburg suggested that fishing be investigated by the price spreads committee, I supported the application, but no evidence has been heard yet before that committee with respect to the fisheries. This bill I submit should have been sent to a special committee before whom men competent to speak for the various industries could have been heard. We all want to build up trade; that is important and we need it badly. The condition of trade in this country at the present time is without parallel in Canadian history, and therefore we wish to cooperate with the government. But, I submit, we want first of all to know what they propose to do. Furthermore, I am of the opinion that we should have before us in its entirety the bill as they intend to amend it so that we can understand it and discuss it intelligently.

The Minister of Agriculture need not be surprised if those who voted against the second reading of the bill persist in their criticism of it when those who voted for the second reading are now lining up against it and threatening to vote against the third reading unless the bill is materially altered.

This bill deals with two things, production and marketing. The producers in my constituency are the fishermen who take the fish out of the water; the marketing is done by the fish dealers. Who will constitute the local board in that constituency? Will it be the fishermen or the fish dealers or the province of Quebec, or will it be partisans appointed by the government? We find ourselves in this position. That province is itself marketing abroad. Will you pass legislation here to prevent the province from finding a market for the product of fisheries which are entirely under their control? If you do this you run up immediately against divided jurisdiction. There will be an appeal to the courts and the constitutionality of the act will be attacked. No act of parliament is worth the paper it is written on unless it is backed up by public opinion, and where there is substantial opposition to a measure in parliament the government of the day is warned that it cannot in fairness ask the house to pronounce finally upon the bill unless the whole bill is before us. Once more I suggest to the minister that if he is properly advised he will report progress and in the meantime bring down the amendments.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Section 5 deals with the submission of petitions. The petition must be made by "a representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing" and so on. Can the minister tell us what is meant by a representative number of persons asking that a board be set up to regulate the marketing of a certain product? What would be the number considered necessary to constitute "a representative number of persons" in accordance with the terms of the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would depend upon the scheme submitted, and the conditions with which it was dealing, and the extent of the representative number of persons would be finally decided by the governor in council on the recommendation of the board through the minister.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister has not answered my question. No doubt when this bill originated in the minds of the minister and the other members of the government they must have had explanations and information submitted to them either by the trade or by the local people or by a certain class of persons connected with some commodity. They must now have in mind some idea of how many are to constitute this representative number of persons. At this stage of the proceedings, after we have discussed the bill in the full house and have debated it in committee of the whole for a few days, the minister says: "I do not know exactly; that will depend upon the scheme submitted, upon the circumstances, and the government will pass an order in council." I cannot believe that the minister is not in a position to tell us: When a scheme will be presented to us in connection with a certain commodity, for instance, for the sale of potatoes or fish or wheat or lumber, we will require that say fifty-five or sixty per cent of the persons connected therewith is necessary to constitute a representative number in order that we may consider their proposal. It is not an answer for the minister to say: "I do not know just now; that will depend upon circumstances."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If we did not have the difficulty of trying to frame a bill that would fit into the provincial as well as the federal picture, such a question would be easily answered. But suppose we were to place in this bill, as we did at the beginning, the percentage that it was thought would be desirable to give effect to a scheme, that is, so that there would not be too great opposition from those who would be forced in, that would have meant this: in Quebec if a certain number of producers applied to the provincial government with a scheme for the formation of a board, we would then be forcing our opinions on what might not be the judgment of the government of Quebec. That is one reason we did not set out in the measure any definite percentage. There is freedom within any province for the formation of a provincial marketing board with conditions imposed as the provincial government in its wisdom sees fit and it is in a better position to deal with matters in its own province. We in turn cooperate with them and use, not two or three boards as some speakers have suggested, but the one board with a dual power. For that reason the percentage might vary in the different provinces. We have at present dual jurisdiction with reference to grading, for instance the fruit and vegetables act, the different live stock acts. Our purpose in not stating any definite percentage was just to overcome any difficulty as between the two jurisdictions and so far as possible to leave to the producers and those entrusted with the administration of the provincial legislation, their own judgment in the matter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not convinced and I do not think the members of the committee are convinced that the minister has answered my question in saying that the provinces have to be consulted and considered as to the number of persons who are to come in and present a certain scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not that we would consult the provinces as to who would constitute a representative number of persons. The producers in a province wait on the provincial minister, or the provincial marketing board if one is established in the province; they submit their scheme; in that scheme they may state what percentage would be considered a representative number, but the responsibility for the decision would be on the provincial government and, I think, rightly so, because they are closer to the problem.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not understand the minister's last statement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I ask the hon. member a question? Had he decided he would not understand before or after I answered?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think it is right for the minister to say that, because ever since he has been in the house I have always treated him well. I might have been harder on him but I have acted like a gentleman towards him.

Clause 5 states:

A representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or the production or marketing of a natural product may petition the governor in council to approve a scheme—

And so forth—not the provincial government. It does not say that they have to submit their scheme to the provincial government. This representative number of persons has to deal only with the minister who is in charge of the bill and who will be in charge of the administration of the act. He submits the scheme to the governor in council; then an order in council is passed, and finally the scheme goes to the board to be administered.

The clause provides that the petition must be filed at the office of the minister and if he decides that the persons connected with the production or marketing of this natural product are sufficiently represented by the petitioners, then the project is sent to the council with a request that it be approved. There is not a word in that clause providing for consultation with the provincial government in connection with the matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member is not referring to the whole bill. If he reads the whole bill, he will find that reference is made to a provincial board—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Or local board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —local board set up within the province. This reciprocal arrangement is made between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister says that the bill when first drafted contained a provision as to the proportion which would be required for the establishment of a board and that because of possible difficulties with the provinces concerning jurisdiction the provision was dropped and the words "a representative number of persons" was inserted. Would the minister have any objection to telling us what was the proportion that he or the government had in mind?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not see that any purpose would be served by my giving my personal opinion, any more than any other hon. member. But I would say seventy-five to eighty per cent. The greater the number that could be brought in voluntarily the easier the plan would be to operate. I know that in one instance at least the producers themselves in our discussions suggested eighty per cent, and some I believe, would go even higher than that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In certain parts of the province of Quebec, I would not say unorganized districts but territories that are very large, such for instance as the district I have the honour to represent, extending for four or five hundred miles, will there be any local board constituted? In these districts the people live in small communities, in some places thirty or forty or fifty fishermen. I think the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough will bear me out because he has dealt with these people, more especially from Havre St. Pierre and down below. How will these people be enabled to take advantage of this legislation? Will there be any board set up for instance in such a district as that below Quebec, or will there be only one in Quebec which will have supervision all over the province, or will there be one connected with farming products and another for the marketing of fish that will embrace Gaspe and the north shore, or will there be one division for my county and one for the Gaspe coast? I would like to have this information because it has a certain bearing, on account of the fact that this district is very remote and sparsely settled, and distances are very great. I see the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauve) who was in this district last summer; he told me he had a great reception there, but he saw that the country is very extensive and sparsely populated.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the producers in the district to which the hon. member refers, no matter how distant or how isolated it is, wish to get together and submit a scheme that will assist them in the more effective marketing of their product they may do so, submitting it either to the provincial or the federal government. They may define the area. There might be another area that also asked for or submitted a similar scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it possible for some local board to apply to the provincial government and reapply to the dominion marketing board under this legislation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, that is the intention.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think what the minister has said is good; if these people want to organize they can set up their scheme and the board might be constituted. But I am saying that in certain places the people live in small and widely scattered communities, where communication is difficult. There is no point of contact, no board of trade, no cooperative organization. I think the bill would have a certain merit in connection with the sale of products for export, because in that case some dealer like my hon. friend the member for Antigonish-Guysborough might come in and give good prices to my people. But many dealers are not as good as he is, thus the fishermen have lost a lot of money because they had to take whatever prices were offered. I see a difficulty for these poor people who are not in a position to organize a board as the minister has mentioned. He has told us that there should be a representative number of persons, in accordance with the size of the enterprise or the district concerned. I am pleading the case of the poorest fishermen of the province of Quebec, those who I dare say, have suffered the greatest hardship for the last four or five years. I am asking the minister if he can tell me the means whereby these people can get the help of this bill. He says it could be done by grouping themselves together, but I do not see how they could do it, because they are isolated, fishing in the sea, and they have no point of contact. I would like to be enlightened as to how these people could proceed to get the benefit of this bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The initiation of the scheme might start at a different place, where settlement was closer, and in the wisdom of the provincial board or the federal board these isolated communities could be included.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no such term as "provincial board" in this bill.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister means local boards, does he not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The province can set up a provincial board, and it is provided later in the bill I think that we may use such a local board set up by the province. A local board, if the hon. member wishes to call it that.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask if beside the provincial board you may have a local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Right.

Mr. McINTOSH: Confusion arises by the use of these two terms. The terms should be differentiated.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To finish my reply, it was just to meet a situation similar to that to which the hon. member referred that section 9 was introduced.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do you think section 9 would apply?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It could be made to apply.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then the same objection might be made, that those people might be forced to come in and submit to some regulation that would not be convenient to them. I do not know which minister will be in charge of this bill. If it were the Minister of Fisheries he would have knowledge of the matter, but if it were the Minister of Agriculture, although I have great respect and admiration for him, I do not think he would be a proper person because he would not know the situation of the fishermen.

We have not yet asked this question; I am going to ask it now. Who is to be the minister who will have charge of the conduct, the administration, the putting into effect of the orders in council and the administration of this whole act? For a minister to exercise the powers vested in him in section 9 he would have to know the conditions that pertain in such districts. If it is to be the Minister of Agriculture, what will he know of conditions in the fishing industry? If it be the Minister of Trade and Commerce he would not know it at all. The only man who would be in a position to know the conditions concerning the fishing industry in Quebec and Gaspe and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence or in the maritime provinces would be the Minister of Fisheries. I would like to know what minister will have charge of the administration of this bill when it is passed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The bill states that the minister to administer this act will be the one designated by the governor in council, I believe.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister any idea what minister is going to be designated? It is all very well to say that, but we have a right to know. We are called upon to vote for a bill, to enact legislation, and we do not know who is to have the administration of it. As I have explained, it has a great bearing on the matter from the point of view of the district I represent. It is necessary to have a man fully conversant with the situation of a given industry. All the ministers are not qualified, although each separately is well qualified for his work, but he has not studied this special question. The Solicitor General is between the curtains, perhaps he will be the one that will be in charge of this bill.

Mr. DUPRE: I am sorry, I did not catch what my hon. friend said before I came in.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not saying anything disparaging; on the contrary I was only asking who would have charge of this bill. The minister said that would be decided by order in council, and I was pointing out that it should be some person conversant with conditions obtaining in certain territories. I was talking of the fisheries, more especially with reference to the province of Quebec, and I was saying that while my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is well qualified in matters of agriculture he might not be so well qualified in regard to fisheries. Perhaps some other minister would be better qualified than either the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Fisheries, but we should like to know who will have charge.

Mr. McINTOSH: What about the Postmaster General?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Postmaster General may have developed a taste for that, because he went down the lower St. Lawrence for the first time last summer. He was well received, and he liked it down there, but of course the fishing industry is a rough trade.

Mr. DUPRE: Are all these compliments given because you want to gain time?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Not at all; my hon. friend knows we do not need to do that. Time is with us in the discussion of the affairs of this country to-day. Your days are numbered; you are dead, but you are not buried yet.

Mr. MANION: You boasted just as much in 1930.

Mr. CASGRAIN: My hon. friend only has to look at the results of the last few by-elections to see how we are standing with the people of this country. That has been shown by the majorities given the members elected to this side of the house. The government did not elect one member and they cannot elect one. The government cannot elect anyone in any part of the country to-day; the people do not want them.

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend still has six minutes left.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I was just saying that we want to know who will be in charge of this bill, and it was stated that this will be decided by the governor in council. I see the right hon. Prime Minister in his seat now.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I was wondering why we could not work Wednesday nights.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We have been working all afternoon, and if more ministers had been in the house we might have had some further explanations. Now we have a majority of council here, so perhaps we can find out what minister will be appointed by order in council to administer this bill. I have asked several of the ministers, but they could not give me any answer. Now I am going to ask the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: He will answer you at once, as soon as you sit down.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Very well.

Mr. BENNETT: It is never the practice, under British constitutional government, to anticipate the action of the governor in council. The hon. gentleman is a student of the constitution, and he should know that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The practice is to state in the statute which minister will administer it.

Mr. BENNETT: No. That was not followed by the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That has not been the practice of the right hon. gentleman, but there is a difference between his practice and the British constitution.

Mr. BENNETT: May I point out why it is done in this way? Death does sometimes destroy people, and in order that it may be possible to assign to any particular minister the administration of the act this procedure is followed. This is the modern practice with respect to the administration of a bill or a statute. It is administered in the first instance by the minister who takes charge of it, but conditions may change; life is not certain. We simply provide here that action may be taken in this way.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is better than the British constitution.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. BENNETT: As to the governor in council, I think my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice will admit that it is not customary in any parliamentary institution to anticipate by a statement what action might be taken by the governor in council, because possibly the speaker at the moment might not be a member of that council.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my right hon. friend remember the eloquence he displayed when he was attacking that procedure? He referred to it as the new despotism referred to by Lord Hewart, the doing by regulation or order in council of things which ought to be done by parliament? My right hon. friend was correct at the time, and I hope he will endeavour to make his actions conform to his views and expressions of opinion at that time. I think my right hon. friend was much better when he was leader of the opposition, even so far as the British constitution is concerned, than he is to-day. Power is spoiling my right hon. friend; really I think he ought to go to purgatory for a short time to purify his constitutional soul.

Mr. BENNETT: You know, Mr. Chairman, it is so delightful to hear the hon. gentleman speak in these terms, for his genial good humour so much more becomes him than the other attitude he sometimes assumes. When he indicated a moment ago that he thought I was right in the observations which I directed to the house some years ago I only regretted that it took him so long to discover it. I feel perfectly confident that after the same length of time that has elapsed since those observations were made and to-day, he will realize that I am right now. I have no doubt as to that.

I am sure my hon. friend does not desire to confuse this matter with that with which Lord Hewart was dealing. He was dealing with a statute which conferred upon the governor in council the power to legislate, and he said that was going too far. Chief Justice Mulock, of Ontario, took up the matter the other day in an address at a banquet, in which he dealt with it in much the same way. Some of the members of the British government replied to Lord Hewart, pointing out that it is perfectly clear that in these modern days you must have large authority vested in the executive to meet conditions which change every day. We must be able to meet those conditions and that is why regulations having the force of law are passed by the executive. I am sure if the hon. gentleman will just carry his mind back to the administration of law in his time he will realize that without this power it would be practically impossible to conduct the government. Supposing you set out your regulations and make them part of the statute; supposing we had done that two years ago—

Mr. RALSTON: Naming the minister is what we are talking about.

Mr. BENNETT: I am dealing with what the hon. gentleman was saying. I think it would be impossible to name the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: Designate him.

Mr. BENNETT: Designating the minister is not, it seems to me, imperative by any stretch of the imagination. It might be desirable, but I have explained why it has not been done. With man's uncertain tenure of life, or for other reasons, it may be desirable to transfer the administration of a statute from one minister to another. That happens frequently in Great Britain; it happened here, for instance, in connection with the mounted police. When I first came to this house in 1911 the Prime Minister administered the mounted police, but they were transferred to the Minister of Justice for reasons that are quite obvious. I could name other statutes the administration of which has been changed from time to time by executive action.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there not a general statute which empowers the governor in council to make such changes? Did not Sir Robert Borden put through such a statute?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, to enable that to be done, and in order that there might be no question it is so stated in this statute as a matter of abundant precaution. I do not think any complaint should be made because this practice has been followed. It is not important; there is no great principle involved. It is a question as to which minister shall administer the statute, and the minister who will administer it will be that minister who, from the condition of his own department, might have the best training to carry on that administration with the least expense to the country. That is all. There is no sinister motive behind it, or anything like that; there is no sinister design, but merely a desire.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The trouble is that parliament is unable to secure any information as to what is going to be done. I do not imply that there are sinister motives of any kind, but surely we have the right to some information before giving our assent to legislation of this kind.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

Second report of the special committee on the Civil Service Act—Mr. Bowman (for Mr. Lawson).

PRIVILEGE—MR. LUCHKOVICH

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct an erroneous report which appeared in the May 10 issue of the Ottawa Citizen. This is in connection with some remarks I made as to the stand of the Hon. J. E. Brownlee, premier of Alberta, in connection with the marketing bill now before the house. The Ottawa Citizen reports me as follows:

> Six provinces have passed companion legislation, announced the agricultural minister, surmounting the constitutional problems arising out of divided authority over trade. Three provinces, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Alberta have not made known their positions. It was stated by Michael Luchkovich, United Farmer member for Vegreville, that at least one premier, J. E. Brownlee, of Alberta, was opposed to the bill.

This report is wrong in two instances. In the first place, the Minister of Agriculture did not include Alberta in the list of provinces that had not passed enabling legislation. He is reported on page 2940 of Hansard of May 9 as follows:

> We have not received copies of legislation passed, nor have we any definite information from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Manitoba.

In the second place, I never said that Mr. Brownlee was opposed to the bill. I am reported on page 2940 of Hansard of May 9 as follows:

> I understand that at least one premier has put himself on record as being in favour of the principle of the bill. I refer to Premier Brownlee of Alberta.

I based my remarks on an interview which Mr. Brownlee had had with the Toronto Farmers' Sun, wherein he is reported as having said:

> The principles of the Weir bill are directly in line with the objectives of the U.F.A.; the measure has the full support of my government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I should like to know how a newspaper which so often hits the nail on the head could have strayed so far away from the truth in this case.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. What is the question the hon. member is purporting to raise?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: This is an incorrect report in a newspaper.

Mr. SPEAKER: The matter is entirely out of order.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Take it out of Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Expunge.

MARKETING ACT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house copies of the proposed amendments to Bill No. 51, and also copies of provincial bills and acts passed in 1933 and 1934 relating to the marketing of natural products.

PROVINCIAL FINANCING IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to a question which I asked the other day of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). This question which appears on page 2807 of Hansard is as follows:

> I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance what is the policy in general of the federal government in regard to permitting any of the provincial governments to enter the British financial market for refunding purposes.

The reply of the Minister of Finance in part was as follows:

> I shall be happy to direct the attention of my right hon. leader who is Minister of External Affairs to the question for any further answer which may be given on Monday.

I direct the attention of the Prime Minister to this matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The question raised by the hon. gentleman is obviously one over which this government has no control. So far as I could ascertain at the time we made the last loan in London the tendency was not to permit provincial governments to make issues on the London market. The hon. gentleman knows quite well that that is not an open market and no issues can be made there unless the treasury has given its consent. The treasury at once accorded the Dominion of Canada consent to make the loan of last fall. While I have no definite information, my conclusion, from what was said and has since been communicated to me by representatives of the provinces, is that it would be very difficult to secure consent for any provincial government to place a loan upon the British market. That is my information at the moment. The hon. gentleman understands, of course, that there is no finality about matters of this kind; they are subject to change, having regard to the conditions that exist at the time that application may be made. And of course—I want to make this perfectly clear—as my colleague suggests to me, the consent is not ours; it is the British Treasury's.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question arising out of his reply? In the event of the British Treasury authorizing a provincial government to float a loan in England, is that government, in his opinion, required to obtain the permission of the federal government before approaching the British authorities?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I recall, the constitution of this country authorizes and permits the provinces to make loans anywhere they may desire, and on their own security. We have not endeavoured to exercise any authority over the provinces in connection with loans they may have made or may desire to make, but I think that what the hon. gentleman has in mind is that those who have money to lend have been very anxious that in some way, if money were lent to a province, they should tie the dominion up with it. Thus far they have not succeeded.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): My right hon. friend will remember that during the war period provincial governments could not negotiate loans except by consent of the federal government, and I am curious to know whether the same condition holds to-day with respect to the London market.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware of the fact that the War Measures Act, passed by the parliament of Canada in the emergency of war, dispossessed the provinces of much of the jurisdiction which otherwise would have been solely theirs, and we have the authority of the highest court in the land that the dominion, because of the war emergency, had certain authorities which they no longer possess. This is an instance that very clearly illustrates the different conditions that prevail. The Defence of the Realm Act in England gave to the executive powers to make laws with respect to almost any matter about which they felt they should make laws, and the War Measures Act in this country conferred upon this parliament, and this parliament in turn upon the executive, powers much larger than could possibly be possessed except in case of national emergency, as was pointed out in the Board of Commerce case, by Lord Haldane. I do not think there is the slightest likelihood—at least I hope there is no likelihood—of any such condition again prevailing. At the moment, with the repeal of the War Measures Act, that power disappears as far as the provinces are affected.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): The press for the past few days has been giving importance to news from England that the Argentine government has been making representations to the other wheat quota countries asking for a modification of the agreement, looking to an increase in their quota and naturally a decrease on the part of the other countries. Could the Prime Minister give us some official information on the question, and as to who is negotiating for the Canadian government.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): At the conference that met at Rome a short time ago the Dominion of Canada was represented by Colonel Vanier, secretary of the High Commissioner's office, from London, England, and Mr. McFarland of Canada. The meeting was adjourned to London, Mr. McFarland in the meantime returning to Canada. Discussions have continued between the various governments at London but no final conclusion has been arrived at. Any concessions that might be made to the Argentine by reason of the extraordinarily large crop they had would not involve Canada in the loss of any shipments that we might be able to make, for the quota we had for the year was a quota that was greater than we should be able to fill under existing probabilities. In any event it would be merely a loan of a part of our quota until next year, so that we would not lose anything if we made an adjustment with the Argentine. When the matter is concluded I shall be very glad to make a statement, but at the present moment the negotiations have not reached absolute finality.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, May 7, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): In the few moments I have I purpose this afternoon discussing some problems which at the present time are uppermost in the minds of those whom I have the honour to represent in this house—debt, interest, credit, cost of farm implements and price spreads. In discussing the matter of debt I purpose dealing particularly with federal debt and individual debt, individual debt in so far as it affects the agriculturist.

It is with some diffidence that I enter upon the discussion of so important a question as federal debt. According to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, our federal debt is represented by three items. First there is the direct debt, which amounts to $2,850,000,000; then there is our indirect debt, which is largely a railway debt, with some subsidies to harbour commissions, amounting to $990,000,000 odd; and the further railway debt, not guaranteed, amounting to $290,000,000 or in all something over $4,130,000,000

First I desire to turn my attention to the indirect debt. In a recapitulation of the indirect debt, I find that this debt is payable, part of it in Canada, part in London, part in New York, part in Canada and London, Canada and New York, and a third part, about half of it, payable at the option of the holder in Canada, New York and London. The debt, one might say, is pretty well scattered all over the lot. I find, in examining that indirect debt, the interesting fact that at the present time about 33 per cent of it bears interest at 4 per cent and under and that, according to those in authority, only about 20 to 25 per cent is held in Canada, the rest being held mostly in England and in the United States. In looking at our direct debt I find that a little over 72 per cent is payable in Canada, a little more than three per cent in Canada and New York a little more than 10 per cent in New York and the balance of about 13½ per cent in London. But what I find more interesting is that in so far as a calculation can be made about the same proportion of our direct debt as I have indicated is held in Canada, New York and London. About 70 to 75 per cent of our direct debt is held in Canada, about 10 to 15 per cent in the United States and about 15 per cent in London. With respect to that portion of our direct debt that is payable in London an interesting fact is that all of it bears interest at rates of four per cent and under. For the time being my purpose is to direct the attention of the house only to a consideration of that portion of our direct debt which is held in Canada, bearing in mind as I have just stated that approximately three-quarters or 70–75 per cent is so held.

I also note this other interesting fact that within the next five months we have maturing of our direct and indirect debt no less than approximately $441,000,000. A large payment falls due on June 1 next and further payments up to November and in that period of five months, we have falling due the immense sum of $441,000,000 of which $424,000,000 is direct debt. In view of the fact that these large sums of money must be refunded during the next five or six months and also that 70 to 75 per cent out of 85 to 90 per cent is held in Canada, we must put on a huge conversion loan during the summer. In stating that I am saying what seems to me to be quite obvious. When I suggest that this conversion loan will be a success I have in mind the fact that in 1931 when conditions were much worse than they are at present we asked for $250,000,000 and we actually had converted something over $634,000,000, reducing interest charges at that time from five and a half per cent to four and one half per cent. The next loan we made resulted in a further reduction of interest to four per cent and during last March we were successful in placing short-term loans at 2·41 and 2·71 per cent. This indicates that from 1931 to the present time moneys have actually been loaned to the government at much lower interest rates than prevailed some three or four years ago. The loan that was placed last October has been selling recently to net the lender 3·77 per cent.

I would also point to the fact, which I think is unquestioned, that in this country the sentiment is very strongly in favour of lower rates of interest and consequently of a conversion on as large a scale as possible. I believe holders of bonds bearing interest at five or five and a half per cent realize that the rate should be lowered during these times. It seems to me that during the perilous period through which we have passed those who have been receiving five and five and a half per cent should consider it a privilege to be able to serve Canada at this time by converting those loans into bonds that would bear a much lower rate of interest, say three and a half to four per cent. I would say further that any loss that might be sustained by a conversion of this kind would be more than counterbalanced by the speeding up of business, by the creation of better feeling in Canada, and the economic life of the country would be given an impetus that would enable those who were fortunate enough to hold bonds at a higher rate to be compensated for any loss they might suffer by reason of converting them to a lower rate. I am not unmindful of the fact that many bonds that have been issued have bearer coupons attached and there is a possibility, if a huge conversion loan were put on, that some holders—and I believe they would constitute a very small percentage—might be so unpatriotic as to send those coupons abroad in order that they might be collected in New York or London at the higher rate of interest. I am also not unmindful of the fact that this government has issued certain tax-free bonds.

Mr. BENNETT: Not this government—this country.

Mr. BOWMAN: Quite so. A previous government has issued tax-free bonds. In looking over the record I find one issue of about $89,000,000 at five per cent which falls due on March 1, 1937, a second issue of some $236,000,000 at five and a half per cent which falls due on December 1, 1937. May I call the attention of the house to the fact that as regards the five per cent bonds, on March 1 next eighteen out of twenty payments at five per cent will have been made, and if the holders of those bonds convert them to, say, three and a half per cent, and if we presume that they held the bonds from the start, they would have realized during the whole of the twenty years an average of 4·85 per cent, which after all, is not a bad rate of interest on government-guaranteed bonds.

May I also point out with respect to the five and a half per cent issue to which I have referred, amounting to some $236,000,000, that on December 1 next seventeen full payments of interest at five and a half per cent will have been made. If the holders of those bonds found that it was to their advantage and to the advantage of Canada that they be converted into bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent, and they were so converted, the average rate for the twenty years would be 5·20 per cent; not a bad rate of interest after all for federal bonds.

It had been suggested to me in discussing this matter that if we asked for only a conversion of those bonds held by Canadians we would be showing some discrimination against our own people. Possibly so. But after all, who should come to the rescue of this country if not the Canadian himself? Moreover, might I point out that if by this conversion benefit results to Canada through the saving, through lower taxation, through speeding up the business life of the country, who would reap that benefit but the Canadian, who had converted? It is not necessary for me to point out what the benefit of successful refunding would be. We would have a saving of course, the amount of which would depend on the rate of interest at which the government of the day felt the conversion should be floated and the amount converted. If the conversion loan were successful, and I have already pointed out that in times much worse than the present we succeeded in the conversion of $634,000,000, if a conversion were made of even $1,000,000,000 or $1,500,000,000 of these bonds, the saving would be very substantial. It would result in a better feeling all round. It could not then be said that the producer, the wage earner and the business man alone had taken the loss, but it would then be made clear that the bondholders had been prepared to take their share. I am satisfied in my own mind, if I am any judge at all of the feeling of the people, that such a conversion loan could be made a remarkable success. The people are for it. We have at the present time as leader of the government in this country a man who has safely piloted the ship of state through the storm of the last four years. No man in our time is more familiar with financial transactions of the magnitude such as I am discussing. With his resourcefulness, his courage, his determination, the putting through of a huge patriotic conversion loan would be I am satisfied a tremendous success.

I have not said anything about compulsion whatsoever. Let us attempt to put this across, and after we have done so, look at the resulting picture and see what then is necessary to be done. If compulsion is then necessary let us have it, although that would be the last thing I would advocate. But after all the welfare of the state comes before that of the individual.

I have said nothing with respect to those bonds which are held abroad. I would not advocate anything with respect to them. Our credit is high in New York and London; we should keep it so. Refunding from time to time will be necessary in order to take up our obligations there. Money will be needed in Canada for development if we are to maintain the high standard of living to which we have been accustomed in the past. So I make no suggestion whatever as to the conversion of those bonds which are held abroad. It does seem to me that at the present time our credit as a nation stands very high both in the United States and London. I am reminded of the $73,000,000 loan which went across so successfully in London. I am reminded of the fact, to which I have already drawn the attention of the house, that not one dollar of the $384,000,000 which is payable in London bears interest at a rate higher than 4 per cent. Money is plentiful over there, the rate of exchange is favourable and sentiment is strong for Canada. The prestige of this government, largely because of the prestige of its leader is high, not only in London but throughout Europe. So it seems to me not unreasonable to suppose that in the very near future money from London should be made available to Canada for current requirements at an interest rate approximating 3½ to 4 per cent.

I turn to say a passing word with respect to interest on bank deposits. I understand that it is the firm opinion of the government that interest on bank deposits should be further reduced from 2½ to 2 per cent; but that some difficulty lies in the way because of the fact that trust companies, which accept deposits, are under provincial jurisdiction. It does seem to me that the provinces should be prepared to cooperate with the federal government in making a further reduction in interest charges. Everything possible should be done to get more money into circulation. I shall probably refer to that again in a moment in another connection.

Then may I say a passing word with respect to individual indebtedness. I refer particularly to the indebtedness of the agriculturist, as I represent a rural community. Speaking of debts and interest I am reminded of the presentation made by the Prime Minister at the imperial conference held in Ottawa in 1932. It might be well to bear in mind that at that time the Prime Minister of Canada stressed debts, interest, credit and prices. Speaking of interest he stated on that occasion:

> Interest charges represent the most important of the fixed or semi-rigid elements in our cost structure. If prices remain on their present level, such charges will constitute an intolerable or almost intolerable burden in many cases. Even if it can be borne, the fortuitous gain to the creditor of 40 to 48 per cent in general purchasing power above what he contracted for appears to be a grave injustice.

That was in 1932. Those same conditions exist to a considerable extent to-day, although there has been an improvement in the prices of farm products. As most members representing rural constituencies are aware, at the time when high prices of grain were prevalent in 1920, 1921 and thereabouts, farmers became indebted for very large sums of money by purchasing lands at prices above their real value and by mortgaging on a basis for which there was really little excuse, except that we are all human and we were looking to the future in the light of the prosperity then existing. Those mortgages and debts still exist in many quarters, except where readjustments have taken place or where there have been foreclosures by the mortgage companies. Some of these companies have been fair, but many have not; the latter have insisted on the strict performance of the contract and upon payment of principal and interest in full no matter how impossible of performance that might be. As a result we have had in many cases an impossible burden of debt and interest piled upon the backs of many of the farmers who borrowed money or purchased land during the period to which I have referred. The government have indicated that they propose to bring in a measure of relief. In view of what has been said in this regard it is not for me to suggest what should be done, but may I say that those who bear this burden should be given some opportunity to compromise with their creditors so that they may make a fresh start and continue to be useful citizens adding new wealth to the country.

Now I should like to refer for a moment to the matter of credit. I represent a constituency in which, fortunately, we have had very good crops; in fact there have been no crop failures during the last twenty or twenty-five years. Last year we had the best crop we have had since 1915, so in some quarters things are not so had as they are in other parts of the west. There is one matter, however, in connection with which I think the farmer has real cause for complaint; I refer to the fact that he has not been able to obtain money to finance his operations. The bankers have practically ceased to loan money to the farmers in Manitoba, and it has become absolutely impossible to secure money from private sources. Not many years ago most lawyers practising in the smaller country towns had a certain amount of private funds to loan, but that day has passed. The mortgage companies have ceased to operate; no money can be borrowed from them. The banks have absolutely refused in, I should say, seventy-five to ninety per cent of the cases to loan money to farmers who really should get loans. I particularly drew the attention of one or two of the bankers who appeared before the banking and commerce committee to the fact that the banks would not make advances for the purchase of binder twine, without which it is impossible for the farmer to harvest his crop. We were told in that committee that if the farmer was one to whom credit should be extended he would get it, but I am sorry to say that this has not been my experience in the northern part of Manitoba. The farmer has not been able to get money for his binder twine; he has not been able to get money to buy seed or to purchase other things needed to carry him through the season until his crop is harvested,—and that condition exists to-day. Surely there should be some means at hand whereby the farmer—I do not mean the farmer who cannot pay his debts, because there are such—who is entitled to and deserves reasonable credit should be able to obtain that credit in order to carry on his season's operations. I am quite ready to admit that I would not be prepared to suggest that the government should start a banking institution; we have had rather a weird experience in Manitoba in regard to rural credit and farm loans, but pressure should be brought to bear upon the banks and they should be told plainly that in a district such as the one I represent, which of course I think is the best constituency in Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOWMAN: There may be those who differ, but I believe the banks should be told that in a farming constituency of that kind they should loan the farmers a reasonable amount of money in order to meet their urgent needs and to enable them to carry on until their crops are harvested.

There is another matter of tremendous importance to the agriculturists of the west; that is the cost of farm implements and machinery. Almost every member representing a rural constituency in the west will agree, I am sure, that the old binders, plows, waggons, mowers, and so on are on their last legs, because money has not been available for the purchase of new machinery, and even if it has been available the prices have been so high that it has been practically impossible for the farmer to accumulate enough money to buy the machinery he needs. I can well remember following a binder in my youth—and I could follow one then—when that machine sold for about $125. Then the price went up to $135, and I remember that when it reached $150 to $175 the farmers thought they were paying a terrible price,—to-day, they pay about $275.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is the tariff.

Mr. BOWMAN: The tariff has absolutely nothing to do with it. In the United States you will find that farm implements and machinery are at practically the same level, and I would remind those who just interrupted that under the previous administration the prices of farm implements and machinery were from fifteen to twenty per cent higher than they are at the present time. I submit that the manufacturer of farm implements and machinery in this country should be told that if he cannot sell machinery at lower prices we will have another price spreads inquiry and find out why he cannot do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Come over here.

Mr. BOWMAN: There is no need to go over there; I have noticed that all the inquiries that have been held have been started by this government.

The next question which I should like to discuss for a moment is the question of prices. In practically every rural community there is the idea that the prices the agriculturist has to pay are out of all reason when compared with the prices which he receives for his products, and when we consider what has taken place in the Stevens committee in the last few days it would seem that the primary producer is pretty well justified for some of the views he has held. May I once more refer to the presentation, bearing on the question of prices, made by the Prime Minister of Canada at the Ottawa conference of 1932:

> Prices of raw materials here as elsewhere, have fallen much more rapidly than wholesale prices generally. Thus, prices of raw and partly manufactured materials have fallen 47·3 per cent since August 1929, whereas prices of fully and chiefly manufactured articles have declined only 26·0 per cent. Farm products have been particularly hard hit, the decline averaging 56·4 per cent. Wheat, the staple of the western farmer, has fallen from an average price of $1.50 per bushel in 1926 to 55 cents in June, 1932, a drop of 63·3 per cent, giving an index of 36·7 as compared with one of 70 for manufactured goods at wholesale.

Then, farther on the Prime Minister said:

> I have said enough to indicate the importance which Canada is bound to place upon the solution of the problems of price instability and of unstable exchanges. In particular we believe that it is imperatively necessary to put a stop to the persistent decline in commodity prices which is paralyzing private enterprise, choking off international trade, multiplying unemployment and social distress, and menacing the stability of our present social and economic order. We also believe it urgently desirable to encourage in every way that can be accepted as sound and practicable, a rise in prices to a height more in keeping with the fixed or highly rigid cost elements in the existing economic structures of most countries.

I say that this government has done something in the matter of price spreads and the increase of prices of primary products. Of course, the basis for the increase during the past two years in the prices of many raw products in Canada is the Ottawa agreements. I sometimes wonder where Canada would be to-day if the Ottawa agreements had not been entered into.

Perhaps it might not be amiss if we were to review one or two of the provisions in these agreements relating to hogs, cattle, lumber, copper and so on. In preparing these remarks I was interested in some statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the time the agreements were under discussion, and to compare what he then stated with what has since happened. First of all I should like to refer to hogs and hog products. At page 276 of Hansard for the year 1932-33 the leader of the opposition is reported as follows:

> I come now to article 6, and I ask hon. members to see what they can make out of it in the way of definiteness. One of the faults of this whole agreement is the obscurity of the language in which it is couched, the uncertainty as to the meaning of the words and as to what their interpretation and application will be.

We find the words "obscurity" "uncertainty" and "application." Well, there is certainly no uncertainty about the agreements now. We know what the application has since been. We were told about that in the Stevens committee. Mr. McLean of the Canada Packers Limited, giving evidence before that committee stated that the increase in the price of hogs, which he attributed wholly to the Ottawa agreements, meant during the past year an additional $36,000,000 in the pockets of the farmers of Canada. Is there any obscurity or uncertainty about that? While we in Canada were receiving in the neighbourhood of eight, nine or ten cents for our hogs they were selling on the Chicago market, the place where we used to sell before the right hon. gentleman opposite was in power, for from four cents to four and a half cents per pound.

Mr. VALLANCE: What did they sell at last December?

Mr. BOWMAN: Yes, what was the price last December?—but the situation has improved substantially since then, and so long as the agreements remain in force it will continue to improve. If these agreements are cancelled, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has promised should he attain office, we will see what will happen. I venture to say that the leader of the opposition will not go to the west and state that if he and his party are returned to power they will cancel the agreements made in 1932. I challenge him or any western member to do so.

Mr. VALLANCE: Bring on the election.

Mr. BOWMAN: The election may come on plenty soon enough for the hon. member who has just spoken. I notice that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has been laughing at my remarks about the agreements. Does he remember how hon. members from British Columbia stood in this house and said that the ten per cent preference on lumber would not help the lumber men of that province? Will they go back to their constituencies to-morrow and make the same statement? I challenge them to do so.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I cannot find a more appropriate expression to describe the four last years of this government's administration than that used by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), in the course of his budget statement. After a review of the present situation, and seeking encouragement in statistics—which a great British statesman, Disraeli, looked upon as one of the three gradations of lying—the minister praised the fortitude which the Canadian people had displayed "throughout their vicissitudes and sacrifices of these last years."

Years of sacrifices! Is truly what describes our existence under the present regime. Yet, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had promised happiness to all, in 1930.

If we had only to deal with these inconsiderate pledges, but, since then, how many optimistic statements have been made in parliament and elsewhere? Each year the speech from the throne informed us that business was improving and prosperity was around the corner and, each year, the budget statement revealed a fearful increase in our national debt, a deficit which has become chronic in our current transactions, new liabilities incurred and additional charges; in brief, a bankrupt balance sheet.

At a period, sir, when the people have more need to repose confidence in their administrators, they require more than broken promises or words of hope without any foundation. They require acts to restore public confidence and safety, and this government has proved incapable of accomplishing them.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and others who followed him in this debate, have made an analysis and detailed criticism of the budget. I simply wish to make a few observations and point out to the house the danger and disastrous results of the policy inaugurated and followed for the last four years, which consists in spending, and pledging Canada's credit, disproportionately to her means, without first obtaining the sanction of parliament, but simply through orders in council and, at times, under the sole signature of the Prime Minister; moreover, the danger and the consequences of a policy which favours large financial interests both local and foreign, neglects or refuses to protect the working class against every kind of exploitation, or to help the farmers and which, after, unjustly throws the burden of taxes of a ruinous administration on those who are least capable of supporting them. I intend to submit a few facts and draw from them certain conclusions which I deem of general interest.

From the very outset of his administration, the Prime Minister showed special solicitude for an old friend of his, the Canadian Pacific Railway, a solicitude which manifested itself in gifts, loans without interest and finally a guarantee on a $60,000,000 loan.

In October, 1930, shortly after the election —it was perhaps the right time to show gratitude—the government, on the authority of the Relief Act, made a present to the Canadian Pacific Railway of $863,550 and, the following year, of an additional sum of $209,196, making a total of $1,072,746, as recorded in the statement furnished by the hon. Minister of Labour, dated March 22, 1934. Yet this company was neither in difficulties or hard pressed, since in 1930, according to its balance sheet, it realized, all current and fixed charges paid, a net profit of $38,381,000, and distributed among its stockholders dividends amounting to about $38,000,000, of which $32,000,000 went to foreign holders, the preference stock being held in a proportion of about 86 per cent by foreigners.

We had no funds to carry out urgent public works, as for instance, repairs to wharves, or to continue the work begun on the Canadian National, in Montreal, which would have afforded jobs to thousands of workmen and created a national wealth, but we had funds to make gifts to a friend, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and thus increase its wealth.

Yet the dividends distributed abroad by this company did not increase by one cent the purchasing power in Canada. So much for gifts.

Let us examine loans without interest. In 1932 and 1933, the government, always under the authority of the Relief Act, the blank cheque, and acting by simple order in council, loaned to the poor friend, the Canadian Pacific Railway—the distributor of magnificent dividends to foreign holders—a total amount of $2,447,222, without interest, and for an almost indefinite period. All this time, the poor Canadian Pacific Railway was accumulating, as an investment, shares of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, an enterprise foreign to all public services.

How many industries, more humble it is true, which had never paid out large dividends, but which contributed to the livelihood of the entire population of a district where their factories were located, had to close their doors, at that time, with the results which are known. A small loan without interest, reimbursable almost at will, would have steadied and permitted them to carry on their beneficial work. How many farmers would have been saved from ruin with a similar loan. These small industries, these farmers set again on their legs would have proved a purchasing power, kept up our commerce and maintained the operations of our railways, without any other assistance. Why have railways and subsidize them if we have no freight to carry?

Let us now examine the magnificent gift of $60,000,000 made, in 1933, to this same friend, the Canadian Pacific Railway under the form of a guarantee. The Canadian Pacific Railway had borrowed $20,000,000 from the Bank of Montreal, in 1931, and $10,000,000 from the Chase National Bank Loan, in 1932, making a total of $30,000,000, maturing in 1933. Moreover, the company had notes falling due in April, May, June and November, 1934, for a total amount of $17,519,000. It was to reimburse, among others, these amounts that the government guaranteed a loan of $60,000,000 made by the banks to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Let us investigate to what purpose served these loans, since the Prime Minister thought it too delicate a matter to inquire.

In 1931, the company borrowed $20,000,000 from the Bank of Montreal. According to its financial statement for the same year, this company paid in dividends, on both preferred and common stocks, held, in a ratio of 85.64 per cent by foreigners, $26,190,030, while its net available returns for dividends were but $13,834,471; namely: the company was short about $13,000,000 to cover the dividend paid. Moreover, it acquired 15,858 new shares of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. Note to what purpose had served the $20,000,000 borrowed in 1931 and reimbursed to the Bank of Montreal in 1933, thanks to the government guarantee.

The loan of $10,000,000 from the Chase National Bank Loan, in 1932, served the same purpose. During 1932, although its net returns applicable to dividends amounted to only $257,880, the company paid on its stock held by foreigners in a ratio of about 86 per cent, dividends amounting to $9,677,776, and it again acquired 14,553 new shares of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of a market value of about $1,500,000. Thus the $10,000,000 borrowed in 1932 and reimbursed in 1933 to the Chase National Bank Loan, thanks to the government's guarantee, had again served the same purpose, namely: to pay dividends to foreigners and facilitate the acquiring of stock in the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

We now come to May 30, 1933, three days after the prorogation of parliament, when following a short interview between Mr. Beatty, Sir Charles Gordon and the Prime Minister, the latter, a few hours later, under his sole signature, pledged the country's credit to the extent of $60,000,000, so as to reimburse these two loans amounting to $30,000,000, of which the bank was not then requesting payment—note well—as well as another amount of $17,519,000 maturing only in one year—again note—and this, under the plea of urgency and by virtue of "the Peace, Order and Good Government Act."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Shame!

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Note that during all that time the company was accumulating stock of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company—30,913 shares, in 1933—bringing its investment from 305,587 to 336,500 shares representing at the market price, in May, 1933, an amount of about $40,000,000.

To summarize, the loan of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, of which the guarantee by the government was neither urgent nor necessary, has served to reimburse a total amount of $30,000,000 which had been used to pay dividends to foreign shareholders and speculate with the stock of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

These favours to a private company constitutes one of the most shocking abuses of the arbitrary and discretionary power which the government had parliament grant to it. This is the kind of abuse of power which tends to rouse the people who toil and patiently bear up with the sacrifices imposed on them for the last four years, and which have the effect of discouraging and engendering distrust.

Think of the farmer's plight who, during that time, not being able to meet his liabilities, was forced to abandon his land, which he had always farmed and which afforded a livelihood to his family. There are thousands of such persons who might have been rescued from ruin, if the government had simply pledged the credit of Canada for an even less amount than $60,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): The government boasts of borrowing at a reduced rate of interest. Why does it not reduce the rate of interest and improve the conditions of loans to farmers by virtue of the Canadian Farm Loan Act? Millions of dollars are expended to provide for those who have deserted the land, thus increasing the number of unemployed in large cities and becoming a heavy drag on the financial resources of municipalities, dominion and provincial governments. It is high time to think of applying some funds to retain on the farms those who are still there, and who instead of being a passive asset would continue to be an active one for the state. Agriculture supplies 75 per cent of our requirements. The countryside supplies water free, a home, wood as a fuel, food and even some of the clothes which are derived from the transformed agricultural products. Those are the main necessaries in life. It also contributes to increase the purchasing power and helps all the branches of economic activities which owe to agriculture the reason itself of their existence.

All agree that what is lacking to activate business is the purchasing power and that it must first come from the farming class. The farmer creates the demand. The farmer does not depend on the merchant for a livelihood but it is the latter who depends on the farmer. Cultivate the soil and factories will open their doors, workmen will find work and railways will be kept busy. Even if railways build new lines or cars, they will serve no purpose, as long as traffic is lacking. Although agriculture should receive our first consideration, it is the most neglected of occupations.

Money or credit seems scarce to help our own people, but the government finds some for foreign shareholders of the Canadian Pacific railway or for the government of Newfoundland.

Again this guarantee of $625,000 in favour of a foreign government is an abuse of power. We thus decrease, for the benefit of others, our borrowing power which is not unlimited, and the day will come when our borrowing power will become restricted and less advantageous.

I wish to point out another example of abuse of power which will react considerably on the farming class. It is the tax exemption enjoyed by the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power, ever since it has been under the control of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power. The Beauharnois canal was, up to September 1932, the property of the company which had built it, and it was utilized to develop electric power. The government, on the other hand, had the right to use it for navigation purposes. As proprietor, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power had to pay the various municipalities its quota of taxes, because of the lands which it had purchased and other properties it owned. Since the control has passed into the hands of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power, the government has become very obliging. It had the property of the canal transferred to it gratuitously, including bridges and certain adjacent lands, the company having the same rights to utilize them in the operation of its water power plant, exactly as before—that is all it requires. The difference, however, is that government properties being exempt of taxes by virtue of the Municipalities Act, the company, while having practically the same rights, is now dispensed from paying taxes to the various municipalities.

The bridges are valued at more than $5,000,000, and there are about 10,000 acres which have become exempt of taxes, and the local farmers will have to portion out among themselves the taxes which the company should have paid. In one parish alone, St. Cecile, taking into account the valuation of one bridge, the five-sixths of the municipality valuation is thus exempt of taxes, so that the burden of all charges and liabilities will fall on the other one-sixth. This is another instance of the solicitude of the government for the large corporations to the detriment of the rural class.

Favoritism does not stop there but goes so far as to allow the workman to be fleeced. Is there a more odious exploitation that the one by which the worker becomes the victim of coal importers? The government has prohibited Russian coal imports and it levies a duty on American coal. Thanks to such measures, the importers of English coal have formed a monopoly which affords them the opportunity of selling this article of necessity at an excessive price and thus make exorbitant profits. It was admitted that the profits in one year were about $400,000! Think of the profits for 1934, owing to the excessive cold we experienced; there was 25 per cent more coal consumed and prices were raised in February and again a few days ago. If there is a dealer, sir, who, because of the nature of the product he sells, should be restricted to a minimum profit for the welfare of the majority, it is certainly the importer of coal, owing to our rigorous climate which makes it an article of prime necessity. A profit of $400,000 did not seem large enough to these importers, and prices were raised this year; there was one among them who had the impudence of posing as a philantropist! Since when does Mr. Webster sell his coal simply to keep his fellow-citizens warm and prevent them from freezing to death? When shall he cease to speculate on human misery? In January and February last, there were on an average 1,275,000 people receiving the dole, so as to keep them from starvation and freezing to death; what amount did the government contribute to purchase coal for these people and thus increase the profits of the importers? How long will the government tolerate such a flagrant abuse?

The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) ordered an investigation, by virtue of the Combines Act, which cost the country $40,451. It was held behind closed doors and the minister refused to divulge the contents of the report under the plea that it was detrimental to public interest. One helps a friend. Yet, another investigation was held in connection with the tobacco industry. The same plea was at first invoked. Finally, thanks to a by-election in South Oxford, the plea of public interest was discarded and the report was tabled in the house. However, in the case of coal, public interests seem to depend on Mr. Webster.

Surely it is not with expensive investigations, held behind closed doors, and a refusal to publish the findings, that the government will appease the public which knows that it is being fleeced. Efficient measures must be taken. If the existing laws do not contain any appropriate remedy, let new ones be enacted. Our statutes embody very severe laws against slight offences. Thus, according to the excise act, a person found in possession of the least quantity of alcohol, on which an excise tax has not been paid—what a crime!—is guilty of an offence punishable by a fine and imprisonment, with or without hard labour for a period of one to twelve months and the government never fails to see that it is enforced. I once knew a good citizen who, during Yuletide, had purchased a quart of whisky, on which no duty had been paid. He was thrown in gaol; such cases were not left to the discretion of the magistrate.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): He is not the only one.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): The government provides imprisonment so as to protect the treasury, but when it is a question of protecting human life—because one dies of cold—it becomes unconcerned, in spite of the most arbitrary and extraordinary powers it possesses.

Workers are no better protected against manufacturers who on the one hand take advantage of tariff increases, enacted by the government, to maintain high prices and thus permit large dividends to be paid, while on the other hand they take advantage of unemployment to further fleece the workers by not paying them sufficient wages to provide a livelihood.

I already have had occasion to point out specific facts to the house; I shall quote others in support of them. In Valleyfield, at the Montreal Cotton Mills, a company which still pays a 7 per cent dividend to its stockholders, there are heads of families who work from six o'clock in the evening to seven o'clock in the morning, at a rate of 9 cents per hour. Twelve hours of night work, to earn $1.08. Among them, I know of one who has no choice in the matter and must provide for his wife and four children on such wages.

The government is very willing to protect manufactured goods, but it refuses to protect labour. Why did it not stipulate, when providing for tariff increases on manufactured products, that manufacturers would have to pay rational wages to the workers? The latter are entitled to wages which will provide them with a livelihood and not let them starve. It is not with such petty wages that a man can feed and clothe his family and, when winter comes, pay to Mr. Webster's company, thanks to the government's protection, an excessive price for his coal.

There is a provincial statute which fixes the minimum wages for women. What happens? The Montreal Cotton Co. obliges young girls to sign a petition addressed to the minimum salary commission requesting that the company be exempted from such provision of the act, and those who refuse to sign are dismissed.

The workman is no better dealt with in the distribution of taxes and his situation is becoming worse. Certainly, taxes are needed to fill the treasury, but the least burdensome way from an economic and social angle, must be sought, and they must serve a truly useful purpose. Whence comes the greatest revenue? A perusal of the returns from taxes shows that during the fiscal year 1933-34, all taxes amounted to $271,000,000. From this amount, $61,000,000 was levied on the income tax; the balance for the most part, came from customs duties, excise taxes and that on consumption—the latter alone amounts to $63,000,000. Of all these imposts, the largest, the most burdensome and unjust is the tax on consumption because it reaches everybody equally, without taking into account one's capacity of paying and one's circumstance. One who is in utter want is placed on the same footing as the millionaire. One who is at the head of a large family is placed on the same footing as the bachelor. It is absolutely unjust! The most equitable taxation is the one which is portioned out according to the capacity of paying. However, the latter depends on the income of the one who pays and his circumstances. The head of a family, the only bread-winner, who must provide for the livelihood of his wife and four children and who is paid by the Montreal Cotton Mills wages at the rate of $1.08 for twelve hours' night work, has certainly not the means to pay a consumption tax on articles of prime necessity.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): It is a provincial question.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): It becomes an impost on distress. In some cases, such as sugar, there is even an additional charge, which brought in about $10,000,000 in less than a year, it was levied mostly on the poor people. Let the articles of luxury be taxed but not necessities of life.

And what purpose do these revenues levied partly on the distress of workers serve? One million dollars is expended on radio—that does not feed a person—it also serves to pay the travelling expenses of ministers who, meanwhile, neither pay the consumer's tax nor a tribute to Mr. Webster.

[Mr Raymond.]

Most of the taxes are at present, borne by the working classes and this is a flagrant injustice.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Did you make these remonstrances to the provincial government?

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): I regret that I cannot reply to your question as I have but forty minutes at my disposal.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Are wages fixed by Quebec or Ottawa?

Mr. CARDIN (Translation): Ottawa fixes the tariff from which are derived the profits.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): I shall have later on an opportunity of discussing this subject, if my hon. friend will permit me to continue.

I have set forth, sir, a few phases of the present administration's policy. Let us draw the conclusions. The people are tired—

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): They are tired of Taschereau.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): —of this dictatorship exercised with arrogance, favoritism, and in an abusive way for the benefit of large corporations; it can only give rise to a feeling of distrust among the working classes. Confidence is something which is not enforced on the public through decrees, it must be won by meritorious deeds.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): That was evident in Montreal.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): It is the university man who speaks!

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Will the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) allow me to follow up my arguments? I am not in the habit of interrupting him and I would ask him to do likewise.

When we examine what the government has done since 1930, we soon realize that no relief has been applied to the difficulties in which the country is struggling.

What have become of our resources—referred to by the Prime Minister—capable of creating work and prosperity for all? They have not melted away! Instead of work, he substituted official unemployment with all its consequences and excesses.

He spoke of the respect due to parliamentary rules, no one more than him despises them. In times of crisis, one must not close his eyes or stuff his ears, but it is befitting that measures taken or enacted be in accord with public feeling and the way to make sure of it, is to keep in touch with it through the representatives of the people. Here, it is all jostling, one must vote on the run his measures which have hardly been introduced, otherwise it is looked upon as obstruction; parliament embarrasses him. Yet, the control exercised by parliament is the only guarantee against arbitrary rule.

There exists an atmosphere of unrest, discontent and anxiety which reaches all classes of society.

The anxiety of the farmer who depends largely on his land for livelihood since it produces most of the necessary food products, but who nevertheless feels himself crushed by various taxes, such as customs, excise, municipal imposts and other charges, when it is not the expropriation through the sheriff's sale which awaits him.

Anxiety of the workman owing to the distress which prevails and awaits him if it has not already done so. Think of the unfortunate situation of the large number of people who would like to be producers, but who are condemned to involuntary or compulsory idleness, often victims of technical progress. Where production increases, more unemployment prevails. In the United States from 1919 to 1929, production increased 32 per cent while the number of workers decreased 13 per cent. At present, there are thousands who are utterly in want, with no prospect of finding work in the future; they pitifully wander through life depending entirely on public or private charity. For them, the foremost question is that of the right to work and live. Think of the situation of workmen whose only wealth are their hands and, who, victims of over ambitious manufacturers, receive insufficient or petty wages. Their home is the house of need. They are looked upon as part of a machine which serves to enrich the manufacturer.

Anxiety of the consumer with a salary hardly sufficient to live upon. Conditions of life were already hard, but they are made worse by taxing articles of prime necessity. The victims are the large families of workers who receive petty and insufficient wages. There is, at present, among the working classes, a serious unrest caused by unfair taxation. The anxiety increases at the approach of winter, when a tribute must be paid to the magnate of coal which our laws do not reach.

Among all the anxieties prevailing, there is one which should draw particularly our attention, it is the anxiety of youth, whose future, according to the expression used by His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve, constitutes a national problem. There are, at present, in Canada 942,000 young men between the ages of 15 and 24 in a ratio of 54 per cent in cities and 46 per cent in the countryside. What will become of them? Idleness can only have a bad effect on them. It is, however, the lot which has been assigned to most of them for the last four years. They have before their eyes thousands of unemployed and naturally wonder with uneasiness whether they will ever earn a livelihood. They need to be reassured. Does the government realize this fact? What paradox presents itself to their mind? Famine and distress side by side with abundance. If they go to the mills to obtain employment, they are told that there is no work, or that machines are doing the work, or that all places are filled. If they graduate from school, loaded with degrees and great knowledge on various subjects, whatever way they turn, the avenues are closed, all careers are filled. Yet, one must live. That is one of the sad aspects of the social problem of to-day; youth finds no employment.

Faced with all these anxieties, sir, I take the liberty to tell the government: Enough favours to friends, large corporations and foreigners; give some consideration to the farmer, worker, consumer and youth. It is not in the relief of unemployment or in the too burdensome imposts that are to be found the proper remedy to calm the anxiety of the various classes of society and inspire hope to our discouraged people.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): I doubt whether there was ever a time in Canada when Canadians took so much interest in economic and political problems as they do at the present time. Perhaps there has never been a time in the history of Canada when it was so necessary that they should do so. I know that in my own province, in every little community, in every city and town there are numbers of student economic classes held almost every day in the week.

It is my intention before I sit down to touch on what I believe to be the fundamental basis of a great part of our difficulties if not of all. However, before I come to that I wish to discuss a few other matters that are relevant to the budget.

There is nothing much in the budget this year which one need get excited about. There is nothing in it that one need strenuously oppose, and there is certainly nothing in it that can give the slightest hope to thousands of our people who have been living in misery during the last four or five years. It is a budget which is intended to maintain the status quo. No attempt is made through it to equalize the distribution of the wealth of this country, although that is a step which in my opinion is most urgently needed at the moment.

Perhaps no other world statesman has been so much in the public eye during the last year as the President of the United States. Certainly no other government has been so energetic in its efforts to increase the purchasing power of the masses as has the government of the United States. I am not concerned now as to whether or not the steps they have taken will ultimately meet the desired end, but they surely indicate that President Roosevelt realizes the importance of a better distribution of wealth. Speaking on March 5, 1934, the first anniversary of his coming into office, he said:

> Every examination I make and all the information I receive lead me to the inescapable conclusion that we must now consider immediate cooperation to secure increases of wages and shortening of hours.

That is a very different attitude from that taken by this government. No steps have been taken by this government towards that end, that is, towards the shortening of hours and the increasing of wages. It may be brought forward as an excuse that wages and hours of work come under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, which is quite true. But it does not follow that there is nothing that this government could do if it wished. But does it wish, or does it realize the importance of increasing purchasing power? It would seem to me it does not.

When the Prime Minister spoke at Montreal after his return from the world economic conference he said that it was not the intention of the government to follow the lead of the United States in shortening hours and increasing wages because Canada, an exporting country, could not afford to do so. I notice that just about that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that before President Roosevelt introduced the N.R.A. Canada had been doing the same thing for three years. I observe, however, that the minister a few days ago in Montreal made the statement that unless the manufacturers and owners of industry in this country took steps for a better distribution of wealth an N.R.A. would have to be put into effect in Canada.

In 1930 the Prime Minister was going to bring prosperity to this country by preserving the Canadian market for Canadian manufacturers. It now transpires, from the statement he made in Montreal, to which I have referred, that the Canadian manufacturer is not satisfied with the Canadian market. He must have a share in the foreign market as well and Canadian workers must toil and sweat in Canadian factories for long hours at miserable wages in order that he may get that share.

I have stated in the house on a number of occasions that the home market is not sufficient for the disposal of capitalistic production; that a foreign market is also necessary. The position which the Prime Minister now takes goes some distance toward proving my contention. I maintain that the government could use the taxing power which it has to equalize the distribution of wealth in this country; it has not made full use of its power to that end. Anyone who has followed the evidence adduced before the price spreads and mass buying committee during the last few days will realize that a few Canadians are receiving out of the wealth of the country a far greater share than that to which they are entitled, and that some means should be taken to ensure that that wealth is better distributed. The dominion government has the power through taxation to distribute that wealth but the government seems to be quite satisfied if it is able to meet the principal and interest on the financial obligations of the dominion. That is not what it was elected to do. The previous government was doing that well enough. The Prime Minister speaking for the Conservative party during the election campaign of 1930 made certain promises to the Canadian people. As those promises have been quoted in the house on numerous occasions I am not going to repeat them now but it must be kept before the people that those promises have not been fulfilled and we are not going to allow them to be forgotten by government speakers drawing attention to other things that have been done.

The Prime Minister, speaking in Ottawa as reported in the press of November 9, 1933, said:

> It must be a source of great pride to every Canadian that this young country has met every obligation in the terms of the contract, at home and abroad.

During the last four years I have met a large number of Canadians and I cannot recall any whose chests swelled with pride because the government has met its financial obligations but I have met many who have bowed their heads in shame that the government has done nothing to ease the misery and want in a country so richly endowed with the good things of life as is this one. I maintain further that the government did not meet every obligation in the terms of the contract. The contract made with the people of Canada by this government in 1930 was that it would put an end to unemployment. That contract has not been fulfilled. As I said before, the government was not elected to pay the interest on the national debt. The former Liberal government was doing that to the satisfaction of the creditors and also of the people of Canada, but it was not meeting the unemployment situation to the satisfaction of the Canadian people and that is why the present government is in office to-day. Before the election of 1930 and for a short time thereafter, the government had two remedies for dealing with the economic crisis facing the dominion, first, national expenditure on public works of various kinds in collaboration with the provinces and municipalities. This remedy of course was considered as being a palliative and it was soon discarded as it was found that like most palliative measures it did not palliate; that the improvement of the moment was followed by an unfavourable reaction. The real cure that the government had for the depression was increasing the tariff; tariff increases were the magic which was to drive out the demon of depression. It has always been a mystery to me why a person with the intelligence of the Prime Minister could not see the fallacy of the high tariff remedy. All that was necessary to do to realize its uselessness was to look to the great country to the south of us, a high tariff country, one with possibly the highest tariff of any in the world, where even in 1930 its relative unemployment problem was worse than ours in Canada. There were plenty of other examples besides that of the United States.

It is quite true that the United States prospered under a high tariff policy; she did up to a certain point. It is equally true that Great Britain prospered under a free trade policy, again up to a certain point. They prospered under policies which were diametrically opposed, because the conditions of the two countries were different. Great Britain prospered under free trade because she was the first in the field as a manufacturing country; she had the important essentials of a trading nation: a highly skilled working class, the most highly developed machinery of the time and plenty of coal for motive power and iron for steel and machinery. Last, but not least, as I said, before, she had an advantage over other countries by being the first in the field. The United States prospered for very different reasons; she prospered under a high tariff because she had a large undeveloped territory, diversified natural resources and the development of the country absorbed all but a small fraction of her production until the end of the war when the country was not only developed but over-developed from a production point of view. But be it noted that neither free trade nor protection will bring back prosperity to either of those countries to-day.

In the budget there are indications, faint ones of course, that the government is losing faith in the tariff as a means of bringing back prosperity. No doubt we should be thankful for small mercies and should welcome the reductions in the tariff which are announced in the budget. The Canadian people will no doubt be grateful to the government for the reduction in the excise taxes on champagne and sparkling wines. The Minister of Finance did not tell the house whether champagne and sparkling wines would now be on the menu in the unemployment camps and included in the budgets of families on relief. Of course it may make their lot much easier to know that some people in Canada can afford to drink champagne and sparkling wines even if they themselves cannot. I noticed in speaking throughout the country that many people are worried as to who will drink the champagne and smoke the expensive cigars under socialism. I have never been able to tell them that, but I can tell them who are doing it now.

As usual in the minister's budget speeches, he ended on a hopeful note; in his position that is no doubt an appropriate thing to do, but as intelligent people we should demand some foundation for that hope. I would like to know from the minister or the government what is the cause of the depression. It is not enough to say that it is worldwide; we know that. We also know that what little improvement has taken place is also worldwide and consequently the government cannot take any credit for that. We would like to know what is responsible for the improvement, how long we may expect it to continue, what are the probabilities of the upturn in business being followed by another depression, and, more important than all, what steps the government is taking to prevent another economic collapse. Or does the government believe with the Prime Minister that we are in the grasp of a fate over which we have no control? The hope for better things is very good as far as it goes, but after all it is only a pious wish.

I maintain that before there is any permanent improvement there must be some understanding of the factors which are essential to the functioning of the system under which we live. I maintain that we shall have to acquire an understanding of how and why our economic system functions or fails to function, and that we shall have to assume control over it; that we cannot, as we are doing to-day, leave the ordering of our economic and social life to the whims of individual interest, that if we do there will be ups and downs in our economic activities, with the consequent unnecessary suffering, as sure as day follows night.

Undoubtedly there is some reason for the slight improvement that has taken place in the economic life of the world during the last year. The present slight improvement in my opinion is due to three factors: (1) the increase in armaments and the universal preparation for war; (2) the depletion of supplies in hand of consumers' goods and the need for replacements in producers' goods, that is, new capital; and, (3) the policies of the Roosevelt administration in the United States. It will be remembered that when President Roosevelt came into office in March, 1933, the whole economic life of that country was almost paralyzed. By April there was a perceptible if small improvement, and that improvement has continued since but shows some indications now of slowing down. Certainly there is nothing fundamental on which we can base any measure of hope for permanent improvement. I think it has begun to be realized by many people to-day that there are certain flaws in the capitalist system itself, certain inherent faults which make it impossible of stabilization, that there are certain reasons why it must either expand or contract. In my opinion there are quite obvious reasons why the era of expansion is over and the era of contraction is now with us. Consequently there will be no permanent improvement under the present system. It is not a question of the capacity of government or even of the good intentions of government; the question is, Can the system function under the changed circumstances which now confront us?

In every organism and machine there are vital parts or factors which are essential to the efficient functioning of that organism or machine. The same is true of a system of society. Our present system of society is breaking down because certain factors which were and are essential to its operation have become impaired. Now what are those factors? The first that I need mention is the foreign market, that is foreign trade. The subject of foreign trade and our foreign trade policy has been mentioned in this house on a number of occasions during the last four years. In fact a certain section of the house believes that all our difficulties are due to wrong trade policies. I do not hold to that. I believe, as I said before, that in the capitalist system itself can be found the defects which are responsible for the conditions which we find about us to-day.

I am going to try to explain this to the best of my ability from my point of view in the short time at my disposal. Capitalism is different from all other systems of production that we know anything about. It is concerned not with the production of use values but with the production of exchange values; in other words with producing goods to sell rather than to use. A country producing in this way must have a foreign market, because the producers of wealth never receive enough purchasing power in return for their labour to enable them to consume what they have produced. The owners of the means of production cannot consume the surplus because of its magnitude. It is therefore necessary in order to dispose of this surplus to find a foreign market outside of the country of production. If that were the position only as far as Canada is concerned there would be possibly no great difficulty, but every other country in the world finds itself in the same difficult position. They also have surpluses which their own people cannot consume because they have not adequate means to buy. If they cannot buy the goods produced in their own country they certainly cannot buy what we have to sell. Here we find one of the curious contradictions of capitalism, it has many but perhaps this is the outstanding one; that is that a foreign market is absolutely essential to its existence, but it no sooner finds that market than it proceeds to destroy it.

To illustrate my point I will take two industries established in Great Britain at the beginning of the industrial revolution, cotton-manufacturing and engineering or machine-manufacturing. Great Britain was the first country to manufacture cotton with power driven machinery, and consequently the first to manufacture cotton manufacturing machinery, engines and spinning and weaving machines. Soon after Britain began to manufacture cotton with power driven machinery she had to find a market outside her borders for a considerable portion of it, not because British consumers had all the cotton they could use, because millions of the population of Great Britain to this day have never had all the cotton cloth they have needed. But they had all the cotton goods which their wages could buy. However, the world was then the market for the products of Great Britain's cotton factories and for the labour of British workmen, because Great Britain was the only country in the world at that time engaged in machine production. But unfortunately for the British cotton manufacturer, and perhaps even more so for the British cotton operator, the British manufacturer of looms and engines also had to find an outside market for his surplus commodities, that is the looms and engines that could not be absorbed in the British market. So engines and looms were sold to other nations, who thus were not only enabled to manufacture cotton for their own needs but began to compete with Great Britain for the world market. Let me give an illustration which appeared in the press quite recently. It is headed:

British Brains and Machinery for Chinese Factories

It relates that:

Messrs. Platt Brothers, Oldham, had received large orders for textile machinery for cotton mills to be erected in South China, and a Midland firm has got the order for the electrical equipment. Mr. Harold Briggs of Oldham has been appointed technical adviser by the Canton government, and sails for China this month. Mr. Briggs said the first mill was in course of erection and the machinery would be sent out early this year.

This export of cotton manufacturing machinery and of British capital for the development of the cotton industry in other countries has been going on for years. The result is that one-half or more of the cotton workers in Great Britain are and have been unemployed since 1920, and as far as their employment depends on the export of cotton goods they are doomed to unemployment for all time.

I was reading recently a book entitled Lancashire and the Far East. It is an history of the development of the cotton trade in India, China and Japan. It shows the effect of this development on the cotton market, over which Great Britain held a virtual monopoly for over one hundred years. I will give a few figures from this book, and I may say that all the statistics are verified as to their source. In 1913 the total export of cotton goods by Great Britain was 7,075,000,000 yards; in 1929, sixteen years later, this had shrunk to 3,765,000,000, a decrease of 47 per cent. Now let us see if we can find why this shrinkage came about. It is not necessary to tell this house that Japan is Britain's most dangerous competitor in cotton goods as well as in many other commodities. In 1913, of the total exports of cotton goods to China, according to quantity, Great Britain supplied 68 per cent and Japan 23 per cent, the remainder being supplied largely by Russia and the United States. By 1925 the position was reversed, Great Britain supplying only 26 per cent and Japan 74 per cent, with Russia and the United States out of the market altogether.

I think that is sufficient to show how Great Britain, through the investment of capital in these countries, has helped to destroy the market which she needs so badly. From 1913 to 1929 Japan imported 2,000,000 yens worth of spinning and weaving machinery from England and Germany, principally spinning machinery. From 1923 on Japan did not import any weaving machinery, since she was able to supply her own requirements, and in the near future, if it is not the case already, she will be able to supply her own spinning machinery as well. Then not only will the cotton market be gone; the market for cotton manufacturing machinery will be gone as well.

Now let us come closer home. Canada is also an exporting country and is vitally interested in finding a market for wheat and other agricultural products. But Canada is interested as well in finding a market for agricultural machinery. It is held by many of our people that upon our ability to find a market for our agricultural products depends the prosperity of this country. Yet we supply the countries which we have considered as markets for our agricultural products with the machinery that will enable them to become self sufficient in regard to agriculture. Thus we destroy the markets we require so urgently. I should like to give a few figures as to our exports of agricultural machinery for 1930, which will illustrate the point I wish to make. These figures are from the Trade of Canada, 1933, issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. During 1930 we sold harvesters or binders to thirty countries, some of whom, such as Russia, Argentine and Australia, were our competitors in the markets of the world. Others, such as France, Italy, Germany and the United Kingdom, constituted our markets for agricultural products. Here are the figures as to the sale of harvesters or binders in 1930:

France	2,045
Germany	2,535
Russia	2,838
United Kingdom	396
Italy	349
Australia	804
Argentine	50

In the same year we sold ploughs and parts to sixty-two countries, to the value of $5,000,000. I think these figures are sufficient to show what is happening in every line of production. What has happened in regard to cotton has happened in regard to agriculture and almost every other industry. Is it any wonder that our exports of wheat and other agricultural products have declined? Our Liberal friends keep asserting that the only way to prosperity is through the resumption of world trade, and the other day I heard the Prime Minister make the same statement in the house. I wonder if they ever analyzed the circumstances necessary to trade or, what I would consider a better word, to exchange. The basic factor underlying exchange is the desire of one individual to get something he has not in exchange for something he has. We buy only those things we cannot produce for ourselves, or the machinery with which to produce such things. Let me illustrate this point by taking three individuals, one producing grain, the second producing fruit and the third producing dairy products. It is clear that each individual would be better off by exchanging some of the surplus of his product with each of the others for some of their surplus, but it must be obvious that if each individual, in addition to the commodity he produced at first, produced also the commodities which the others produce, there would be no incentive to and no possibility of exchange. Heretofore world trade has been largely the exchange of commodities such as I have indicated or the export and import of the machinery which would enable each country to produce a larger variety of commodities. What I have pointed out in regard to cotton and agricultural products has occurred in regard to a great many other commodities. The nations of the world are becoming more and more self-sustaining, because of the development of science and invention. In future trade will become more and more restricted to such commodities as, because of climatic conditions or the lack of natural resources, a country is unable to produce for itself.

I think the sooner we realize that fact the better it will be for us. We may rave as we please about economic nationalism, but it will not get us anywhere unless we try to understand the reasons underlying the condition we are pleased to call by that name. Capitalism expanded and became international in its outlook by reaching out and developing new countries and new areas. Now we have come to the point where there are no further new countries or new areas to be developed—or possibly exploited would be a better word—and the capitalists of the world are forced, as a matter of self preservation, to try and secure to themselves the home market. Right Hon. Walter E. Elliot, British Minister of Agriculture, put the case very neatly in a speech he made some little time ago, in which he referred to the three stages in our development during the last one hundred and fifty years or so. He said:

> But these factors, the power of science to make anything anywhere, the determination of men to try everything everywhere, and a growing doubt as to whether foreign loans in many parts of the world are not simply free gifts which we should do as well to keep for ourselves, have produced and are producing a change so fundamental in our outlook that it might almost be described as the third stage of the industrial revolution. The first stage was, so to speak, the drilling of a borehole and the tapping of a great subterranean source of power by the people who made this venture. The second, which we have just lived through, was the piping off of that power to undeveloped nations as capital development, financed by unrepaid loans.

That is, the sending of capital into new areas.

> The third stage is the check and flood-back as the boreholes in other countries strike oil in their turn, and the pipes begin to fill up from the far end also.

I think that is a very clear picture of what has happened in the world markets during the last few years. In my opinion there is no doubt that the foreign market is fast disappearing, never to return as we once knew it. As the British Minister of Agriculture points out, this is the inevitable effect of the development made possible by science and invention.

And that is not all. The capitalists, in their endeavour to hold the dwindling foreign market, are destroying the home market as well. This is being done by reducing wages, increasing the hours of work, increasing the intensity of labour, and by the greater use of labour-displacing machinery. They call it reducing the cost of production, and it is done to increase profits, of course. But it is also done in order to enable them to compete for a share in the fast dwindling world market. Let us see how it works. If the manufacturer of cotton goods reduces his production costs in the way I have mentioned he may be enabled better to meet competition in the world market, but it further reduces the home market because the employees affected have lost buying power and consequently are less able to buy the other goods such as food, furniture and clothing which are produced at home.

It also reduces the world market, as Canada's home market is the foreign market, or at least part of the foreign market for all other countries. This is an inevitable and inescapable consequence of the system of production under which we operate.

The next factor necessary to the efficient working of a capitalistic system is the ever-extending field for development and the investment of new capital. I say "the ever extending field" because in the ordinary capitalistic state the capital investment increases yearly by the reinvestment of part of the profits of the preceding year. In fact, the purpose of capitalist production, as I have said before, is the production of new capital which is invested for the purpose of producing more capital values.

I have some figures before me taken from the Canada Year Book, concerning manufacturing in Canada, showing that invested capital increased from $78,000,000 in 1871 to $5,093,000,000 in 1929. If hon. members would compare the increase in wages with the increase in capital they would find that salaries and wages did not keep pace with capital invested. In the same period wages increased from $40,000,000 in 1871 to $813,000,000 in 1929. These figures are the total amounts paid in wages and salaries. Outside of the market for government bonds and debentures there is no great opening to-day for the investment of new capital. In 1930 corporation bonds to the value of $146,303,000 were sold in Canada.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. MacINNIS: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall finish with one other observation. In 1933 we find that these investments had shrunk to $4,200,000. I say that unless we consider this question from the standpoint of changed conditions and try to meet it by increasing the purchasing power of our people at home it is useless to talk about increasing the world market.

Mr CHARLES BELEC (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I extend my congratulations to the Minister of Finance for the exceedingly able manner in which he presented the budget to the house. It is a matter of great satisfaction to learn that in the twelve months period ending March 31 last, exports of Canadian produce increased by $105,500,000, or 22 per cent over the same period last year. Imports, advancing less rapidly at first but showing greater gains in recent months, increased by $27,300,000 or 7 per cent. The improvement in the aggregate trade was $132,000,000 over the same period last year, or 15 per cent. The total trade exceeded one billion dollars.

The beneficial effects of the empire trade agreements are shown in the expansion of intra-empire trade. In the eleven months period ending February 28 of the present year exports from Canada to the United Kingdom, our largest market, increased by 20 per cent, accounting for more than half of the increase of sales abroad. Exports to Australia increased by 54 per cent, to British India by 45 per cent, to British South Africa by 72 per cent and to New Zealand by 6 per cent. Statistics of the United Kingdom show that whereas in 1931 imports from Canada represented 3·8 per cent of the total purchases from abroad, in 1933, Canadian products represented 6·9 per cent of the total. Prominent among the commodities showing increased exports to the United Kingdom were planks and boards, apples, meats, copper and other metals, and cattle.

It is a matter of pride to all Canadians to remember that Canada, with a population slightly over ten millions of people, is the fifth trading nation of the world. At this time, when world recovery is slow, our country has increased its exports and is slowly but surely emerging from depression to prosperity. I am sure that the next year will continue to show a marked improvement in conditions.

In the budget it will be noticed that the dominion treasury has stood the brunt of depressed conditions in all parts of the country, and especially in the western provinces. A total of $36,000,000 was expended in the last fiscal year for relief measures. The budget discloses that the expenditures made since 1930 by the dominion on unemployment relief have reached $115,500,000, to which may be added the cost of the wheat bonus in 1931, amounting to $12,700,000 and $2,400,000 advanced for employment in railway shops, a total of $136,600,000

It is these relief expenditures and public works expenditures that I want to discuss, especially in their relation to the county of Pontiac The Department of Labour has kindly sent me a statement showing dominion contributions to relief expenditures in Pontiac —in Temiskaming, Abitibi, and old Pontiac These were as follows:

	Dominion payments
	Public works	Direct relief
1930 act	$ 89,207 29	$ 5,452 46
1931 act	143,614 05	29,281 49
1932 act	.....	27,426 24
1933 act	4,927 16	5,308 79
(Dominion commitments, $84,134.50).
Total dominion payments under all acts	$237,748 50	$67,468 98

Thus it will be seen that since 1930 a total of $305,217.48 has been expended in Pontiac county for relief alone.

I regret, however, to point out that relief works expenditures were curtailed because I could not secure the cooperation of the Quebec government. Last year I advocated the construction of the Sheenboro highway and could have secured an appropriation from the dominion government, but the authorities at Quebec would not join with us in building the road which would be a new means of communication with the north country. Besides it would have provided much needed work. I should like to quote a statement made on March 22 by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) in reply to the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). This appears on page 1724 of Hansard and is as follows:

Might I interrupt a moment? As far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned I do not think the hon. member wants to be understood as saying that in his judgment the trans-Canada highway should go up to Senneterre and out to Manitoba in that direction. And I do not think he means that the road from Sheenboro to connect with Kipawa in Quebec is not being built because of any neglect on the part of the dominion government, because the fact is we have received no schedule and no request for any contribution to that road which would connect with the Ontario roads passing through Rouyn down to Ottawa and Montreal. The Sheenboro-Kipawa-Ville Marie road is the one break which has necessitated the people in the north end of Pontiac and the Rouyn mining country coming down to Montreal and Toronto by the Ferguson highway in Ontario. I do not think the hon. member wants to be understood as meaning that the province of Quebec has given the lead to Ontario as far as opening up that part of northern Quebec is concerned, as compared with the efforts of the provincial government of Ontario in opening up roads in Ontario, which has been going on steadily and to an increasing extent each year. The Ferguson highway has been the outlet to the front, both Toronto and Montreal, for all of that north part of Pontiac to the present time, and still is as far as vehicular and motor traffic is concerned.

I want to give the house some idea of the amount of work done in the county of Pontiac by the Department of Public Works. I should like to set out these facts in detail in order that the people of Pontiac will know once and for all that the Bennett government has been more generous with them in four years than was the late administration in eight years. What are the facts? Under the late administration the Department of Public Works expended in Pontiac county from 1922 to 1930 a total of $534,090.51. The present government in a little more than three years has expended a total of $632,771.95. In addition, the contribution to relief works and the cost of direct relief in the county has amounted to $305,217.48. The total expenditures in Pontiac county by the Bennett government since it came into office in July, 1930, are $937,989.43, while the Liberal administration spent only $534,090.51 in eight years. In order that I may be frank and honest I should like to put the facts on the record. According to the official figures of the Department of Public Works, the following amounts have been expended in Pontiac county by that department from July 28, 1930, to date:

Place—	Work—	Expenditure
Amos	Wharf	$ 2,755 78

I take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Finance upon cutting in half the tax on sugar. This tax, which was two cents per pound has been cut to one cent, and I hope the state of the treasury will permit the minister to abolish the tax next year. All taxes are unpopular, but this levy has aroused the ire of the housewife who uses a great deal of sugar at preserving time.

It gives me the greatest pleasure and satisfaction to declare that I am proud to support a government which has introduced such measures as the marketing bill, the Bank of Canada bill and the proposed works program. All of these things will prove to be advantageous to our country. The marketing bill will be of great advantage to agriculture because it is designed to increase the prices of farm products by facilitating the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and all other produce of the farm.

I have not sufficient time, Mr. Speaker, to go into the back to the land movement thoroughly. I will say that I have visited every part of my riding every summer and particularly the back to the land settlements. There are 398 families who have gone back to the land in the Abitibi district and 351 families in the Timiskaming district. They are happy because they are industrious and hard-working. Both, I am glad to say, will be fine settlements. Those people have gone in with the determination to make good and what they have accomplished in such a short time would surprise you. Recently I visited the new settlement at Laferte and there I found that a fine sturdy lot of settlers had located and were busy finding new homes in Pontiac county. Of course, there are criticisms I could make as to the way in which the Quebec government has administered these settlements, but I hope that the authorities at Quebec will deal with these complaints as this is entirely a provincial matter, and out of my hands. I might say that too much money has been spent on transporting these new settlers, but as the administration of the settlements rests squarely upon the Quebec government I can do nothing but voice these complaints, hoping that the authorities at Quebec will step in and correct them.

I want also, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his words in the budget in which he indicates there is to be a lowering of interest rates. Interest rates have proven to be a heavy burden to the farmer. Now I am glad to say that the government proposes to bring down legislation designed to provide machinery whereby farmers who find themselves unable to pay the fixed charges on their outstanding debts will be able by an expeditious and inexpensive process to work out compromises with their creditors and to obtain new working capital. The guiding principle of this legislation will be to secure for the farmer a simplified debt structure reduced in size to a point where the carrying charges will be within the capacity of farm enterprise to pay. This will involve some concessions on the part of creditors, as outlined by the Minister of Finance, but these will be more than outweighed by the advantages which will follow as a result of retaining the farmer as a willing and effective producer. As the Minister of Finance points out, the release of economic energy so produced and the substitution of hope and goodwill for despondency and discontent which are now prevalent in certain parts of our country should result in a real gain to our whole domestic economy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell something of the riches of the county which I have the honour to represent. Pontiac county is the largest gold-producing county in the province of Quebec. In 1924, 1925, and 1926 the molybdenite mines produced a total of $30,855.

The next year, 1927, the production increased to $40,000. Then in the northwest section of the county, Rouyn and other parts, there were great gold and copper discoveries. To illustrate the mineral riches of the county I will simply give the production figures:

1928	$ 5,528,160
1929	10,215,791
1930	11,339,902

The reason 1930 has such a high figure is the increased price of copper.

1931	$9,388,200
1932	9,509,199
1933	9,646,281

[Mr. Belec.]

Thus, Mr. Speaker, you will see that since 1924 Pontiac county produced $55,667,533 in new mineral wealth. Great mines like Noranda, Siscoe, Treadwell, Big Ben, Beattie, Cadillac, which I visited last summer, were working three shifts. Men were at work; men were happy. There was no depression in that area. Further, these mines were stabilizing conditions in the depression. They were stimulating other branches of industry by their purchases of materials and were a boon to the agriculturist. I am glad that the government has modified the tax on gold, and I am sure that the industry is appreciative of the fact.

On the whole I am proud to represent such a fine county as Pontiac with its great people and richly diversified resources. I have been in the House of Commons just over three years and believe that I have done my duty. I am proud to support such a strong leader as the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett whose policies saved Canada in the depression.

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Mégantic) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the budget brought down this year by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is not in keeping with the promises of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) at the 1930 election.

The Prime Minister had made so many promises in order to win that election that he knew full well that he would never be able to fulfil them. Had we had at the helm of affairs, during this crisis, a business man acquainted with the various phases of the life of a worker or farmer or a poor man, he could have helped them, but unfortunately for Canada, the country has been governed, since 1930, by a man who became a millionaire, being favoured by chance, and forgot, therefore, that all could not pay their taxes as readily as he could. The Prime Minister should have known that, during a crisis, the poor man should not be called upon to supply the funds to administer the affairs of the country, but that they should come from the pockets of those who are making or have made money.

If the government has always been in great difficulty, it is because it always endeavoured to tax those who have experienced the greatest hardships throughout this crisis. It first began by taxing the unemployed, even on articles essential to life, while the workman, since this administration is in office, earns petty wages and is over-taxed by a government which had promised him, in 1930, that prosperity would return. It then taxed the farmers who, since this government is in power, sell their products for fifty per cent less than under the Liberal regime, while, on the other hand, they pay much more taxes.

The Prime Minister, instead of increasing the taxes of the workman and farmer, could have easily decreased them. Had the Prime Minister accepted the suggestions of the opposition, he could have balanced his budget and even shown a surplus by levying taxes on those who can afford it—I intend to prove this. The government could levy, according to the reply I received to a question I put in 1933, the nice amount of $78,266,145.74 by increasing two fold, during the crisis, the tax on incomes ranging from $10,000 to $1,000,000.

On April 20, 1933, I put the following question to the minister:

Mr. Roberge: What amount did the government receive in 1932 by way of income tax from individuals, companies, corporations or others, who paid tax on an income ranging from $10,000 to $5,000,000?

Hon. Mr. Ryckman: Individuals, $21,753,463.37; corporations, $35,749,230.32.

Furthermore, on May 2 last I put the following question:

Mr. Roberge: What amount did the government receive in 1932 by way of income tax from individuals, companies, corporations or others who paid tax on an income ranging from $500,000 to $1,000,000?

Hon. Mr. Ryckman: $20,764,572.05.

So that the government has received from individuals, companies and corporations having an income ranging from $10,000 to $1,000,000, a total amount of $78,267,265.74.

Those whose income ranges between $10,000 and $1,000,000 should be the ones to help the state in a time of crisis. By levying this double income tax the government could afford to suppress the tax on sugar and food which are essential to life and which had always been exempt from the sales tax before 1932. If such a system of increasing the revenues has proved beneficial to our neighbours to the south, it should also prove beneficial to us.

The following is what we read in newspapers on the subject:

Mr. Roosevelt does not desire stabilization. The readjustment of the income tax.

Washington.—The treasury board suggested to the congress committee on ways and means a readjustment of the extra tax on large income, so as to lighten the burden of the income tax which falls on the rate-payers who earn their wages by working.

A representative of the treasury board stated that the revenue from the income tax would thus be increased by about $270,000,000.

Without any difficulty the government could levy $50,000,000 on the gasoline trade, according to a statement made in this house by my colleague, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), one of the foremost business men of Canada. He suggested that gasoline from foreign countries should be on our free list. According to the hon. member's statement, gasoline can be delivered at Quebec or Montreal or any other seaport for 5 or 6 cents per gallon.

The government by levying a sales tax of 10 cents per gallon would receive at least $50,000,000. To protect the consumer against unscrupulous dealers, the government could stipulate that the gasoline could not be sold at more than 25 per cent profit on the original price paid in Montreal, Quebec or any other port, besides the sales tax. That is one way the government could raise a revenue of $50,000,000 yearly, while protecting the consumer and allowing a margin of reasonable profit to the trusts.

Let us examine what would be the cost price of gasoline, according to the scheme I suggest: Price paid, 6 cents per gallon, special sales tax 10 cents, the fixed profit of companies 25 per cent, namely 4 cents. The local dealer would be allowed 2 or 3 cents profit per gallon, the total would amount to 23 cents. Therefore, the consumer would be paying 6 or 7 cents less for his gasoline, the government would receive a handsome profit and the companies would still be making more profits, with a margin of 25 per cent, than the three-quarters of the dealers in this country.

This government does not wish to interfere because it favours trusts.

The same situation exists for coal, according to the investigation held by the Quebec provincial government. The evidence showed that in 1932, coal cost, delivered in Canada, at any seaport, $5.91 per ton. By adding a special sales tax of $5 and allowing the dealer a commission of 25 per cent, coal should sell at $13.65, while the consumer pays at least $15. Therefore the government in no way benefits.

According to the investigation held in Quebec, 3,148,902 tons of coal were imported into Canada in 1932. The government could have received the handsome profit of $15,720,000, had it levied a sales tax of $5 per ton and controlled the transaction of the trusts. But as the principal stock holders of these trusts are friends of this government and that the latter protect trusts, the consumer has to suffer.

The government could also levy $25,000,000 from those who can afford to speculate on stocks, by placing a 2 cents tax on every share sold on the exchange. But this does not meet their wishes, because they prefer taxing sugar and foodstuffs. They therefore place the burden of taxation on the working classes instead of on the wealthy class, which they protect.

To summarize, the government could levy $78,000,000 more on the income tax; $50,000,000 on gasoline; $15,000,000 on coal; $25,000,000 on stocks sold on the exchange, which would make a grand total of $168,000,000; while those who would pay that amount would in no way be the poorer, because they have the means to do so. This amount could have helped the government to suppress all the taxes levied on the farming and working classes, ever since they are in office.

There are many other trusts in this country from which the government could levy taxes in order to relieve the worker and farmer. All suggestions, sir, coming from the opposition which might improve our financial situation and relieve the people from overtaxation, does not meet the wishes of this government which has its own way of drawing the last penny of poor people and protecting a small group of millionaires who control the trusts on gasoline, coal, water powers and tobacco and many others, to the detriment of the people.

The Canadian people had a right to expect that the budget of 1934 would show some improvement, they had a right to expect that the prime minister would reduce taxation which so heavily burdens the poor, the workmen and farmers. The Prime Minister should have read what his predecessors have written or stated and the views of great financiers on high protection. The following are a few excerpts:

Toronto, January 24, 1933.

Sir Robert Borden, speaking in Toronto, last evening, insisted on the necessity of a greater freedom in trade relations throughout the world.

And to obtain a greater freedom in our trade relations, we must lower our tariff barriers.

Toronto, March 25, 1934.

The Hon. Mr. Meighen, former Prime Minister, speaking in Toronto:

The country's salvation demands a remedy for unemployment. People who set aside their savings in order to speculate should be made to bear the taxes.

This former prime minister would no doubt approve of the tax which I suggested. Those who speculate in stocks should be made to pay instead of the workman.

Saskatoon

Sir Henry Drayton, Chairman of the Financial Committee of the Board of Trade, suggested in his speech to reduce expenditure and taxes so as to accelerate the movement of economic restoration.

April 11, 1934.

The following is what Mr. S. H. Logan, Director of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, stated:

The high tariffs of importing countries were responsible for the crisis in this country.

February 21, 1934.

Sir Arthur Balfour of Sheffield, London:

That protection barriers constitute a greater threat to the peace of the world than the building of war ships.

This should make the protectionists of this country pause.

As you may judge, sir, by all these statements, high protection is a thing of the past and the government must, to relieve the crisis, entirely change its policy.

What remedy does this year's budget propose so as to relieve unemployment and reduce the cost of living? The government reduced by one cent the tax on sugar and cigarette tubes, a tax which had been in force for one year only, and the most unjust one that ever was levied by a government. If the government tax on sugar has been reduced it is not because its finances have improved—the national debt has increased by $135,000,000—but because of the protests of the Liberal party and the public.

Let us examine the tax on hops and beer. The government has made some changes in connection with the 3 cents tax on hops. After suppressing the 12½ cents tax per gallon on beer, they increased the tax on hops to 7½ cents. They contend that the returns will be as large while the work of officials of the department will be greatly lessened. I have been informed that the government intend to levy a further tax on the people by increasing the tax on hops. Most of our families that bake their own bread use hops and a number of our workmen and farmers who have not the means to purchase beer brewed by trusts, make their own beer and use hops. If the government expect to levy as large a revenue, by this new tax on hops they will be protecting the beer trust to the detriment of the working and farming classes.

Since this government has been in office, it has yearly increased the customs tariff. Our prime minister should realize that high protection has not been a success, because, since he is at the helm of affairs, the country's debt has increased over $500,000,000, namely, an increase of $2 per capita, yearly. Such is the result of the Bennett high protection.

The government could have ended the crisis by accepting the solution which my colleague, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) suggested to the house in 1933 and in 1934.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 59, for the relief of Archibald Bruce Elliott Smart.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 60, for the relief of Lilac Violet Grumbell Reid.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 61, for the relief of Lily Archer Watson.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 62, for the relief of Annie Isabel Tinning Meldrum.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 63, for the relief of Lois Theresa Malcolm.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 65, for the relief of Lucy Doris Cannon.—Mr. Pettit.

Bill No. 66, for the relief of Helen Isabelle Smith Maybee.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 67, for the relief of Sybil Eileen Dyson Richardson.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 68, for the relief of Bertha Alice Maude Maher Burke.—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 69, for the relief of William James Thistle.—Mr. Heaps.

On division.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 74, for the relief of Marjorie Seymour Hammond Zavitz.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 75, for the relief of Lucille Margaret Turbin Kelly.—Mr. Vallance.

Bill No. 76, for the relief of Esther Liverman Kazenel.—Mr. Lawson.

On division.

THOUSAND ISLANDS BRIDGE

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. M. J. MALONEY (South Renfrew) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to bill No. 27, to incorporate the Thousand Islands Bridge Company.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

NATURALIZATION ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS RESPECTING NATIONALITY OF WOMEN

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 31, to amend the Naturalization Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill to which I am now asking that second reading be given has been on the order paper since early in the session, and I may say that it was brought forward at the request of some of the women's organizations in Canada. Since it appeared on the order paper I have received many communications from women in all parts of the dominion expressing their sympathy with the purpose of this amendment. In late years we have done a great deal towards giving women equality of status with men in almost all walks of life. They can sit in the House of Commons; it has been decided that under the law they are persons who can sit in the Senate, and in many other ways we have given them the privileges and rights that have been given the men. Many of the women still feel that in this matter of naturalization, however, they are not occupying the status they would like to occupy. It is true that much has been done, and many of the actions that have been taken have met with hearty approval. I might refer to the fact that in 1931 the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) brought in a bill, which passed this house, giving women the privilege of retaining their British nationality after marriage unless at that time they took the nationality of their husbands, and I should like to express on behalf of the women and the people of Canada generally an appreciation of the fact that the regulations concerning the naturalization of women have been somewhat modified, particularly in the matter of expense. At the same time, however, there is a feeling on the part of many that our laws have not gone as far as they might in recognizing the rights of women to naturalization in their own right.

It is not my intention to occupy a great deal of time in speaking on this bill to-night, since I know the mind of the minister and would like to give him full opportunity to express his attitude. I intend to make my remarks very brief, but I should like to bring to the notice of the house the fact that under existing laws cases still arise which entail a good deal of hardship and confusion. Just a few days ago I received a letter from a firm of solicitors in Toronto which I think I should read, without giving the names:

> We note that you introduced Bill No. 31, an act to amend the Naturalization Act, upon March 12th, 1934, and have been awaiting news of the passage of this bill through parliament.
> A young Dane applied through us for naturalization papers last October, subsequently married on December 16th last and expects to receive his certificate of naturalization within the next few weeks. Upon receiving his certificate he proposes to take his wife to Denmark for a short visit.
> Should your bill be passed and become effective before the 16th of June, 1934, we feel that the young woman may safely consider herself to have retained her British nationality, despite her marriage to a man who was, at the time of such marriage, an alien. Otherwise, the determination as to her status of nationality involves several complicated problems in private international law.

Accordingly, we should be pleased if you could inform us whether your measure is likely to become effective by June 16th, as we must advise our client in what steps she will need to take to enable her to pass through Europe unhampered.

That is just one illustration, and I believe there are numerous cases in which a great deal of confusion and perhaps actual hardship is experienced because of the present law.

Another matter has been brought to my attention, and the papers in reference to it were just placed in my hands as this bill was called. I have not had an opportunity of reading them, but as I understand it this is the situation: If I am correctly informed our department has refused to grant naturalization certificates to people from Switzerland because the Swiss government is not willing to release them from their allegiance to their own country. Perhaps I am not stating the case correctly but, as I have said, these documents were placed in my hands just a few moments ago by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson), who was talking with me some little time ago about the matter.

Mr. CAHAN: We require the consent of the Swiss government, as we do in all cases where our naturalization certificates are not recognized.

Mr. BROWN: The minister can make his statement during the course of his reply. It does seem only fair and reasonable, however, that we should grant naturalization to all applicants who conform to our laws, and it is open to question as to just how far we should allow our laws to be governed by the laws of other countries. It may be that in some cases it would mean dual nationality, which may be objectionable from some points of view, but at the same time I think this is a matter that should be considered.

I have here another extract which I should like to read to show that the women of the empire as well as those of Canada are taking a very active interest in this question and are asking that Canada give a lead to the empire in matters of this kind:

> Dominion women who want Canada to take the initiative in legislation providing that a married woman should have her own nationality and not be required to adopt the nationality of the man whose wife she has become, waited on the High Commissioner at Canada House the other day.
> They urged that one of the dominions—Canada for preference—should take the first step towards producing agreement between all parts of the empire, since opposition to the reform seemed now to consist of stressing the difficulty of securing such unanimity.
>
> British women, it was alleged, had lost the right to keep their own nationality after marriage by legislation in 1870. Before that date British women who married foreigners remained British.
>
> As a result of recent legislation in Canada and the United Kingdom there was now no longer uniformity in the empire, a married woman in some cases being regarded as British in one place but not in another. The deputation also urged that the Hague Nationality Convention, which accepted the principle of the dependence of the nationality of the wife on that of the husband, should not be ratified.
> Mr. G. Howard Ferguson thanked the deputation for putting their views before him and undertook to transmit them to Ottawa.

I am perfectly aware of many of the difficulties which may confront us before we could reach a final solution of this matter. Some progress has been made, but that it has not been made fast enough to satisfy the desires of our people is I believe hardly open to question. The women who asked me to bring this matter before the house were very insistent with regard to it, and I should like to have the matter considered by the house.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has observed, this matter is surrounded with many difficulties, one or two of which in his short statement he has emphasized. For more than a century in Canada we have from time to time had difficulties with regard to the naturalization of aliens in this country. Under the laws of Upper Canada, of Lower Canada, and again under the laws of United Canada after 1840 down to 1867, and again from 1867 to 1914, this matter from time to time has been under the consideration of successive legislatures. But until 1914 in none of the provinces of Canada, old or new, had the parliaments or legislatures the legislative authority to grant a certificate of naturalization to an alien which would be in force beyond the confines of Canada, whether the old provinces of Canada or the more recent Dominion of Canada as we have known it since 1867. To grant to an alien a certificate of naturalization that is not recognized by other British dominions or by the United Kingdom on one hand or by any foreign power on the other has served under the laws which have heretofore existed to place such naturalized Canadian under insurmountable difficulties the moment he passes the three mile limit of Canada. In fact the condition reached a crisis in Canada at about the time of the Franco-German war. Many aliens had received naturalization certificates in Canada making them British subjects in Canada, but the moment they passed outside Canadian borders they were not recognized as British subjects in any part of the British Empire or in any other part of the world. So that in 1873 the parliament of Canada, after reciting the grievances which resulted from other parts of the empire not recognizing certificates of naturalization made in any other part of the empire, and which resulted from foreign countries refusing to recognize those certificates of naturalization, passed a resolution. The text of the resolution was as follows:

Resolved that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty setting forth the aforesaid grievance and praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take such steps as may be necessary for the redress of the same, by the negotiation of naturalization treaties between Great Britain and the German and other foreign states, so that legally naturalized foreigners in Canada may not hereafter be subjected to the disabilities of a divided allegiance, but be entitled to all the rights, privileges and protection of British subjects in every part of the world, and in as full a measure as if they had been subjects of Great Britain by birth.

This address was engrossed and dispatched to Her Majesty. I have not the time to enter into the subsequent political discussion or the decisions of the British courts with respect to colonial naturalization. But it was clearly decided in the British courts time and again up to and including the time of the recent great war that no force or effect beyond the territorial limits of a dominion or of a colony or a possession of Great Britain could be given to its naturalization act, so long as section 16 of the imperial act of 1870 remained in force. And at the present time when those citizens or subjects of foreign states who, prior to 1915, received naturalization certificates in Canada pass beyond the confines of Canada and enter any other part of the British dominions, they are not regarded as British subjects. If they enter any European state, and particularly the state or states of which they were subjects or citizens prior to their naturalization here, their Canadian certificate of naturalization is not recognized, and from time to time we are met with cases of such citizens going abroad possessing the old form of certificate of naturalization, being arrested, compelled to do military duty and subject to pains and penalties because they have not returned to their native country to perform military services and other civic duties. Under our law, however, there is a provision whereby they may obtain a new naturalization certificate from the Secretary of State of Canada giving them all the rights of British subjects in every part of the British dominions. But it is impossible—although I urge it from week to week and from year to year—to impress upon them the necessity of applying for such certificates, known as imperial certificates.

This matter of our naturalized citizens or subjects having no rights as British subjects beyond the confines of Canada was a subject very dear to the heart of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The matter was discussed at the colonial conference of 1902, again at the imperial conference of 1907 and again at the imperial conference of 1911, at which the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the then Prime Minister, represented Canada. At the conference in 1911 Sir Wilfrid urged that an imperial act should be so framed and enacted so as to enable each self governing dominion to adopt it, and thus bring the naturalization laws of the United Kingdom and of the several dominions into complete conformity He insisted that imperial nationality should be world wide and uniform, each dominion being left free to grant local nationalities as heretofore on such terms as its legislature should think fit. It is unnecessary for me to enter into a full consideration of what took place at the conference of 1911, but the result was that in 1914 the parliament of the United Kingdom passed what is known as the Naturalization and Status of Aliens Act, and in the same year that act was adopted by the parliament of Canada. It has been adopted also by Australia, South Africa and New Zealand. So that so far as the empire is concerned, any British subject receiving a certificate of naturalization in Canada under that act is a British subject throughout the whole of the British Empire. Those who received certificates under the acts prior to 1914 were not British subjects once they had passed beyond the confines of the dominion in which they had received their certificate.

A number of cases arose during the late war which those lawyers who desire to study the question will find exceedingly interesting. One was the case of a German who went to Australia early in life and received a certificate of naturalization in that country prior to 1914. After the outbreak of the war he went to England and was arrested as a German subject who had not reported to the police under the laws then in force in the United Kingdom. The courts of England decided that having been naturalized under the old acts prior to 1914 he was not a British subject once he went beyond the confines of Australia. He was imprisoned and visited with severe penalties for not reporting. This case is reported in Regina vs. Francis, ex parte Markwald, 1918, 1 King's Bench, 617. It again came before the courts and is reported in Markwald vs. Attorney General, 1920, Court of Appeal, 1 Chancery, 349. Another case arose in British Honduras, to which a man, I think a German, had come with his father at an early age. His father became naturalized and he himself became a naturalized British subject. Later on he rose quite high in the legislative council of that colony and subsequently became acting governor. For some reason or other one of the central American states had some criticism to make of his official acts as governor and when he left the confines of the colony he was arrested. The British government refused to intervene on the ground that he was a British subject only when within the confines of that colony.

It has become very important in our efforts to solve these various difficulties that we should conform to the agreements made at the conference of 1911 and reaffirmed at every imperial conference since that date. It was then agreed that changes in naturalization laws should not be made by any dominion or by the parliament of the United Kingdom without the general consent of the other self governing dominions, so that a British subjest in one dominion might thereafter be a British subject in the other dominions. That convention has been carefully adhered to. The matter was brought up at subsequent imperial conferences and at the last imperial conference held in 1930 it was again affirmed. I quote from the report:

> That, if any changes are desired in the existing requirements for the common status, provision should be made for the maintenance of the common status, and the changes should only be introduced (in accordance with present practice) after consultation and agreement among the several members of the commonwealth.

It was in accord with the agreement reached at that conference that I had the honour in 1931 of introducing an amendment to the Naturalization Act of Canada. This amendment conferred much larger privileges upon married women in Canada who had married foreigners, in certain cases, and to others who were aliens but who had married British subjects in Canada or who had been naturalized by certificates of naturalization issued in this country. That bill of 1931 subsequently became law and was adopted verbatim by the parliament of Great Britain at a recent session and is now the law of the United Kingdom as well. We have proceeded in conformity with that understanding because it appears to be useless and vain to make an alien a British subject in Canada when he will not be recognized as a British subject in the other dominions.

There is another phase to the question. Under the act of 1914 we could grant certificates of naturalization to alien men or women, but such a certificate granted to a Swiss subject or a subject of Czechoslovakia or of nearly all the other European states without their consent is not of great value. Such a certificate may lead that naturalized British subject into great trouble if he proceeds beyond the confines of this country and visits the state of which he was a former citizen or subject. Therefore to this day when we grant certificates of naturalization to the citizens or subjects of certain states we ask those states to release the particular applicant from his allegiance to the state of which he was a former citizen or subject Otherwise, we have to bring to his notice and impress upon him that when he goes beyond the confines of this country his status as a British subject will not be recognized by the state of which he was a former citizen or subject and may not be recognized by many other European states.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister pardon me a moment? He says, "going beyond the confines of Canada;" does he not mean outside the confines of the British Empire?

Mr. CAHAN: I should have said, going ouside the confines of Canada into a country other than a British country.

This matter has now again come up for careful consideration. We recognize that a statute passed by the parliament of Canada under which a citizen or subject of a foreign country becomes a British subject in Canada is really ineffective when it comes into opposition with the statutory law of Switzerland, of Czechoslovakia or of a number of other states which I could mention, which declare that unless released from his original nationality, the certificate of naturalization as a British subject will not be recognized in that country. An effort was made by the late administration to avoid the difficulties which arose out of this dual or divided allegiance, by seeking to secure the acquiescence or recognition by foreign states of the granting of certificates of naturalization as British subjects in any part of the British Empire.

This question came before the imperial conference of 1926 and was then referred to an expert committee on interimperial relations. That committee met in October, 1929, and the Minister of Justice in the late administration, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), represented Canada on the committee. That committee, after a thorough investigation of all the interrelations of this question, deferred definite action in view of the necessity of obtaining international cooperation and consent, and also in view of the fact that a conference had been called at the Hague for the codification of international law and the knowledge that this subject would then be considered by the representatives of all the nations at that conference at the Hague. That conference met in March and April, 1930, under the auspices of the League of Nations, and Canada, which was represented by a delegate appointed by the late government, became one of the signatories to that convention, which is known as the Hague Convention.

That convention was subject to ratification by the signatory states and it was provided that ratifications should be deposited with the secretariat of the League of Nations. With regard to the nationality of married women this Hague convention provided as follows:

Article 8

If the national law of the wife causes her to lose her nationality on marriage with a foreigner, this consequence shall be conditional on her acquiring the nationality of the husband.

Article 9

If the national law of the wife causes her to lose her nationality upon a change in the nationality of her husband occurring during marriage, this consequence shall be conditional on her acquiring her husband's new nationality.

Article 10

Naturalization of the husband during marriage shall not involve a change in the nationality of the wife except with her consent.

Article 11

The wife who, under the law of her country, lost her nationality on marriage shall not recover it after the dissolution of the marriage except on her own application and in accordance with the law of that country. If she does recover it, she shall lose the nationality which she acquired by reason of the marriage.

At that session at the Hague, during two long months, very definite differences of opinion were expressed by the representatives of the several nations. In fact, the conference was almost equally divided for and against permitting married women to acquire a separate and distinct nationality from the nationality of the husband, and the articles which I have read were tentatively adopted, subject to ratification, as the largest measure of agreement that could be reached by the nations there represented. Although that convention was signed by a representative of the late government, events ensued in 1930 which prevented the government of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) from ratifying it. It was therefore brought again to the attention of the imperial conference of 1930, and by common consent of the British dominions there represented in that conference it was agreed that legislation should be introduced by the several dominions to carry that convention into effect. The bill of 1931 which I had the honour of introducing has carried the Hague convention into effect to the full extent at which an agreement was reached at that convention, and Great Britain, as I have said, has enacted a similar measure, with the result that both Great Britain and Canada, together on the same day, have deposited ratifications of these several sections of the Hague convention which I have read.

Now that Hague convention is likely to sit again within a short time. There is provision whereby it may be convened again in January, 1936, as provided in article 27 of that convention, at the request of nine states, members of the League of Nations, who have ratified the convention; and it is certainly to be hoped that when that Hague convention resumes its session in 1936, if there are nine states who have ratified it, there will be further consideration of the entire subject. And in so far as the British dominions agree, and foreign states acquiesce, we shall feel that it is competent for us to extend the rights and privileges which are desired by many women throughout the country.

My hon. friend's bill has been drawn under one or two misapprehensions, because an unmarried woman has exactly the same right as a man, whether married or not, with respect to the obtaining of naturalization. But the government feel that in view of the attitude taken by their predecessors, in view of the long line of consistent policy which has developed during the last century, now, when for the first time we have reached agreement to a certain extent with the British dominions as to the rights and privileges of British subjects throughout the empire, now when we have reached with certain states in Europe a consensus of opinion with regard to the rights and privileges which should be granted by European states as well as our own to women, it is inadvisable for this parliament to disrupt that continuity of progress and policy and to revert again to the state of embarrassment and difficulty with which this country had been confronted for nearly a century.

There are very few states indeed which recognizes that a Canadian woman, a British subject, who marries an alien of a foreign state can retain her British nationality after such marriage, because by the law of most states she thereby becomes a citizen or subject of the foreign state—Czechoslovakian, the Swiss, and a number of others. And until we can reach an agreement whereby naturalization in this country is recognized by those foreign states, in the case of our naturalization of their citizens, we should, we think, proceed very warily and very cautiously. Therefore I feel that this government has consistently followed the policy laid down by its predecessors running back to the decision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the conference of 1911.

The subject is a very complicated and difficult one. Throughout the year several hundreds of letters a week reach my office dealing with the complicated conditions to which the hon. member who has moved the second reading of this bill has referred. We endeavour to solve those difficulties as best we can, but there is no solution which we can devise in respect of an alien who has become naturalized in this country going abroad unless he is recognized as a British subject by the state of which he was formerly a citizen. I think this matter will be settled perhaps within a few years; I hope it will be settled at the next assembly at the Hague. I did my best when the matter was brought up at the assembly of the League of Nations at which I had the honour of representing this country, but it was then impossible to obtain the consent of any large number of foreign states to our going further than we have gone in following out the decision of the imperial conference of 1930 and the Hague convention of the same year.

I trust the hon. gentleman, after he has elicited the views of the house, will feel disposed to withdraw the bill on its second reading and leave to this government or successive governments ample elbow room in working out these difficulties which are very grievous and embarrassing.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of the observations of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) I do not propose to say anything in support of the bill, but I want to take this opportunity of thanking him for the very favourable reception he gave to the representations made by myself and, I believe, by others with respect to the fee payable by the wife of a newly naturalized alien on making a declaration of desire to obtain British citizenship. It will be within your memory, Mr. Speaker, that prior to August, 1931, the wife of a newly naturalized alien, merely by virtue of the naturalization of her husband, became also a British subject, but in August of that year the law was changed in that respect and it became necessary for the wife of a newly naturalized alien, who wished to acquire British nationality herself, to make a declaration to that effect. The fee on making such aplication was $5 and it was felt by many that such a fee was excessive. On behalf of many who are interested in the subject I and no doubt others made representations to the Secretary of State and he was kind enough to take the matter up with council with the result that the fee was reduced. I find that by order in council P.C. 646, dated March 29, 1934, the fee for filing a declaration of acquisition of British nationality was reduced to the sum of one dollar. On behalf of those who are interested in the matter I desire to thank the Secretary of State for his action.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I am in order, but the matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) is one which directly affects women of foreign nationality who make application for naturalization.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Unless the hon. member wishes to speak to this bill I do not think he would be in order in bringing up now the subject to which he refers. It should come before the orders of the day are called.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member will present the case in question to me by note or personally, I will see that he has a satisfactory answer if it is possible to give him one.

Mr. BRADETTE: I thank the minister.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the matter past the hour. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is to be congratulated, not perhaps on introducing this bill which may at this time be inopportune, but in eliciting from the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) such an excellent resume of the law governing naturalization. This is really valuable to keep for ready reference.

I want to see the record complete—and I should like the minister to correct me if I am wrong—on this one point: The British act which enacted British wide nationality requires the residence to be five years. Prior to that the residence in Canada had to be only three years. This is the point I want to make clear. I believe in that act provision was made that if anyone living in Canada was naturalized under the three year provision he could by some simple process, provided he then fulfilled the five year residence, apply and come under the empire-wide naturalization.

Mr. CAHAN: That is so.

Mr. NEILL: The minister did not mention that, and if he does so, the record would be complete.

Mr. CAHAN: That is true. We are anxious that those who received naturalization certificates under the old act should qualify under the act of 1914 and thus avoid all sorts of difficulties in going abroad.

Mr. BOWMAN: Is there any additional fee?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not recall. If any, it is very small.

Mr. BROWN: In view of the very full statement made by the Secretary of State I have no desire to press this matter to a vote and with the consent of the house I shall withdraw the bill.

Bill withdrawn.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at 6 o'clock, I was discussing a resolution that my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough introduced in the house in 1933 and which, had it been adopted, would have greatly helped the farming class. This resolution was again introduced this year, and is as follows:

Trade With The United States

Proposed reciprocal arrangement for exchange of natural products.

That in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States, whereby the natural products of Canada, that is the products of the sea, the farm, the mines and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc. should have free entry into the United States, in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

The following is the Prime Minister's reply to the resolution, on February 19, 1934.

Right Hon. Mr. Bennett: I move seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes):

That all the words after the word "that" in the said resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"on the 1st day of May, 1933, the Prime Minister informed this house that the governments of Canada and the United States of America had agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between the two countries and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent but also the general improvement of world conditions, and while no trade agreement between the two countries has yet been arrived at, this house approves of the government continuing their efforts to that end."

It would have been preferable for the Prime Minister to state immediately that he did not desire to sign any treaty with the United States and that he intended to allow our representative, at Washington to idle away his time. The latter costs the country nearly $100,000. Had he had any intention to sign a treaty with the United States, he certainly had time to do so since he opened negotiations with them. Our farmers would have benefited this year by such a trade agreement, especially as to maple sugar, which sold in Canada. in 1934, 6 cents per pound less than in the United States. In fact all farm products mentioned in the resolution of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough would have benefited.

However, it is contrary to the Prime Minister's policy to lower the tariff. All for Great Britain, whether it suits us or not makes very little difference to him. That is why I state that he is responsible for the communist ideas which have taken root in this country; he only protects the wealthy and the trusts to the detriment of the poor people. The country only awaits an opportunity to tell him what it thinks of his high protection and his policy which is contrary to the interests of the people. The last by-elections have proved it and the general election will but confirm my statement.

On April 26, 1934, we had the pleasure of listening to an eloquent speech by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) in support of bill No. 51, which was being discussed by the house. As representative of a Quebec constituency, I was amazed at his attitude towards the hon. Prime Minister of Quebec in connection with a statement made by the latter and published by the newspapers, some time ago. The statement referred to bill No. 51, an act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of national products in Canada. I think that the hon. member for Dorchester should have rather approved the statement of Mr. Taschereau, because he has no right to ignore that the people of the province of Quebec are a minority in this Dominion and must take the necessary steps to see that our rights and privileges granted by the Fathers of Confederation are respected.

I further contend that it was the duty of the Quebec Premier to protest against this new measure which threatens the rights of provinces. The hon. member for Dorchester endeavoured to convince the house that Mr. Taschereau was inconsistent by making this statement, published by the press of the province, and in which he openly opposed this new measure. He had a bill enacted by the legislative assembly so as to permit his government to cooperate with the Dominion government so as to enforce the act, if thought beneficial. I think the hon. member for Dorchester, before criticizing Mr. Taschereau for being inconsistent, should have read the statement the Quebec Premier made when introducing bill No. 243, which permits the provincial government to cooperate with Ottawa, not only as regards Bill No. 51, but with any measure which might be enacted by this house at this session or by order in council, subject to being ratified by the Quebec legislature, at their next session. The hon. Mr. Taschereau stated on that occasion that bill No. 51 had just been introduced in the House of Commons, but that he was unable to say whether the bill would be adopted in its present form or amended so as to protect the rights of our province. The object which the Quebec government had in view when introducing bill No. 243, was simply to be in a position to take advantage of whatever might improve the situation in Quebec, and reject anything which might be detrimental to the interests, as a whole of the province, and it was his right and duty to take such steps.

To follow up what I stated in connection with Bill No. 51, why did the government, if this bill favours so much the interests of the farmers, delay the measure so long, why did it wait until the eve of an election to introduce it? Had the government adopted the following resolution moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), on October 6, 1932, it might have helped the farming class.

Session 1932-1933, vol. II, page 1544.

Whereas parliament has been in session since October 6, of the present year and is shortly to adjourn until January 30, 1933;

And whereas, since parliament assembled the government has not made any statement of policy with respect to the relief of existing agricultural conditions;

And whereas, the position of agriculture in Canada has become increasingly deplorable and, unless relieved, will bring about a condition of distress hitherto unparalleled.

This house is of opinion that the government should immediately announce what policy if any, it has with respect to the relief of agricultural distress, and permit full consideration of the same before parliament adjourns over the months of December and January.

By adopting this resolution of the leader of the opposition, the government would have assisted the farming class. It did not then appeal to them, but on the eve of an election they begin to take some interest in the farming class.

The following is the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition on April 19, 1934:

That all the words after the first word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation, and which confers upon a minister of the crown and upon the governor in council unprecedented authority and unusual powers to restrict production, and interprovincial, inter-Imperial and foreign trade as regards both exports and imports, as well as other autocratic powers.

According to the official figures which I desire to place on Hansard, the public will have an opportunity of judging for themselves in what way the government takes an interest in the farming class which, in a crisis, should have been helped by the government.

In the estimates which are voted, each year, on March 31, $7,247,500 were appropriated to agriculture in 1929; in 1930, $8,483,326; in 1931, $8,751,795.24; in 1932, $9,929,908.08; in 1933, $6,671,100; in 1934, $7,365,912; in 1935, $6,510,620. We note a steady decrease, sir, in the appropriations for agriculture, since 1932. Between 1932 and 1935 ,there has been a reduction of more than $3,000,000, while in the appropriations for the Royal Mounted Police—I do not know whether the government fears that the country may be kidnapped—there is a steady increase. In 1929, this service received $2,465,375.38; in 1930, $3,040,725.25; in 1931, $3,126,565; in 1932 $3,176,341.34; in 1933, $3,839,595.75; in 1934, $5,615,595.75; in 1935, $5,615,595.75. In looking over the official figures, sir, one may note the little interest which this government displays towards the farming class, since it increases the appropriations for the national defence and reduces those for agriculture, in a time of crisis.

May I, sir, place on Hansard a few of the promises which the right hon. Prime Minister made in 1930, so as to show his great sympathy for the farming class, in the course of the election campaign. How did he keep them?

The following is from the Calgary Herald on June 13, 1930:

> We pledge ourselves to foster and develop agriculture and live stock and dairy industries now so sadly neglected.

The Morning Citizen of June 30, 1930, published a speech delivered at Ormstown by the present Prime Minister:

> We of the Conservative party maintain that the dominion having control of all systems of taxation must assist agriculture, understand, by scientific study the problems under which we work and get the best returns. And we Conservatives are pledged to see that agriculture receives the same benefits as in the days gone by.

What resulted from these promises? We could quote many others, but these are sufficient to prove to the farming class in what way the right hon. Prime Minister intends to help them, namely, by reducing since 1932, the appropriations for agriculture by $3,419,288.08 and increasing those of the Royal Mounted Police by $2,439,254.41 for 1934-35.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): In every budget debate that I have listened to since I became a member of this house hon. gentlemen opposite have apparently enjoyed themselves from time to time in charging that the fiscal policy of the Conservative party is one of tariff barriers, restricted trade, trade obstruction, subserviency to big interests, robber tariffs, exploitation, and so forth. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) added one further expression when he stigmatized the fiscal policy of this government as one of tariff embargoes. At the same time he questioned the efficiency of tariff bargaining as a means to increase the trade of this or any other country. For my part I am in favour of adequate tariffs, and I oppose the stigmatizing of the fiscal policy of this government as a policy of barriers, restrictions, obstructions, embargoes and so forth.

The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee), when he spoke on the budget, asked: Where is the relief in connection with binder twine? I presume he must have had some thought that the question of binder twine had something to do with the budget now before the house. Ever since the government of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier made binder twine free on January 1, 1898, binder twine has come into Canada free; this government has made no change in that regard, and as far as I know there is no intention whatever of changing the tariff as to binder twine. So why the question was asked I do not know. On the other hand I do know that on the thousand and one items imported into this country, all that are imported from outside the British empire pay an excise tax of three per cent, and those imported from within the British empire pay an excise tax of one and a half per cent. Knowing that the binder twine manufacturers of Canada pay a three per cent excise tax on all the fibre they import to manufacture into binder twine, and knowing that the British manufacturer, who is their second greatest competitor in that commodity, pays only one and a half per cent to ship his finished product into Canada, perhaps the hon. member for Yorkton thought that the Canadian manufacturer was not getting a square deal and had in his mind the idea of giving him some relief.

Since the question of binder twine has been mentioned, I recall having read that when the tariff was taken off binder twine on January 1, 1898, there were some twenty-five plants in Canada making binder twine. To-day there are three. At the time the tariff was taken off binder twine that article sold in Canada at six cents per pound. From the date of the removal of the tariff—I do not mean that free trade was the only cause that brought about this condition—the price of binder twine advanced until in 1918 it was thirty cents a pound. So I say free trade is not a cure-all so far as prices are concerned, but it certainly did put out of commission a goodly number of binder twine companies.

I have spent many years in industry and in association with employment. The principal reason that I am in the house to-day is in order to do what I can for both employment and industry, because I know they go hand in hand. I know that the tariff does provide jobs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) may laugh at that, but he has a number of new industries in his own riding as a result of the tariff, and I do not believe the employees in those industries would care to hear him laugh about their employment. I say the tariff has produced and does produce jobs. I am quite well aware that there is exploitation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: —but not necessarily as a result of the tariff. I will give a few instances of exploitation that had nothing whatever to do with any fiscal policy. I have on my desk before me a magazine that records a number of instances of exploitation. I am opposed to price exploitation; I will support any government measure that will prevent it and will see to the punishment of those proven to be exploiters and profiteers. This article, it would appear, refers to instances in the United States. I do not know whether we have had similar instances in Canada, though I do not believe so; I do not think Canadians would do that sort of thing, and I do not cast any reflections on our neighbours to the south. But when a company advertises that a container holds a quart when it really holds only a pint and a half, that is wrong; when containers which are said to contain a pound weigh only fifteen ounces, that is wrong. We all know of the case of the five dollar razor that was protected by patents. When the patents expired German razors were sold in the United States, duplicates of the five dollar razors, for twenty-five cents. Something may be wrong with the patent laws not only across the line but in Canada as well, if such conditions exist; but at any rate I call that exploitation. Then we have the case of a person going to buy an automobile. He is offered $400 for his old car if he purchases one make of automobile or $800 if he wishes to purchase a higher priced car. I think something is wrong there, because the old car could not in these circumstances increase in value by $400. But the tariff has nothing to do with exploitation of that kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: If there is exploitation, however, the government can regulate it or prevent it by passing laws, and such laws are not new. In the reign of Edward III the great fishmongers of Billingsgate market threatened to exploit the small fishmongers, and the government of that day, some six hundred years ago, enacted legislation which prevented the great fishmongers from making more than one penny on a shilling's worth of fish. Again, in the reign of Queen Anne, similar laws were enacted to protect the consumers against exploitation. In 1930 the consumers' council bill was introduced in the British house, the fifth clause of which provided that where it was reported to the board of trade that an excessive price was being or was likely to be charged for any commodity, the board of trade might take action. Later that bill was incorporated in the British agriculture bill, and I believe some of the clauses of our marketing act are patterned after the clauses of the British agriculture bill.

The point I make, Mr. Speaker, is that exploitation can and should be prevented by law, but that the true principle of the tariff is not to blame for many cases of exploitation that have occurred. Every hon. member knows that to-day most every nation in the world, great or small, has a tariff. Even the dependencies of the nations have tariffs. Some of these tariffs may be higher and some may be lower than the Canadian tariff; it is not necessary to go into detail. In the face of that situation, however, what is Canada to do? Should she let down her tariff walls, as hon. gentlemen opposite did in 1922, 1923 and 1924? I was in business during those years and I remember the delegations from boards of trade, chambers of commerce and manufacturers from all over Canada that came to Ottawa to protest against the freer trade policy of the late government. I remember it was reported that forty-six per cent of the total capacity of the woollen mills of Canada closed their doors up to 1924, and I know that on September 4 of that year a great delegation attended what was then called an employment conference but what would be called to-day an unemployment conference, held in this city. Facts and figures were submitted to the conference showing that 1,351 industries of one kind and another, large and small, had closed their doors as a result of the freer trade policy of the late government. Every hon. member knows that up to 1923 and 1924 approximately 350,000 Canadians were thrown out of work in Canada and compelled to migrate to the great republic to the south.

Hon. members opposite also know very well that we could not maintain the Canadian standard of living against competition brought about by freer trade, that the standard of living in Canada would have to go down to the standard of living of lower wage countries. In this connection I should like to read from the speech made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on April 29, 1931, as it appears on page 1115 of Hansard for that year. The right hon. gentleman was making an address in connection with unemployment insurance, and just here I may say that I am in favour of a system of contributory, compulsory unemployment insurance. I should like to read this statement, because it is a good exposition of the views held by the right hon. gentleman in that connection. He said:

> But there is a law which applies in industrial relations as it does in other fields, whereby if competing standards differ, the lower standard in the course of time, tends to drive out the higher. That law was first enunciated by Gresham with respect to the precious metals. Gresham pointed out that where two metals were in circulation, the one base and the other pure, the baser metal tended to drive the purer metal out of circulation. That same law, I believe, is applicable to competing standards in industry. Where you have high standards of industry in one province, with lower standards in another province, the lower standards, if permitted to compete with the higher standards, will drive the higher standards out of existence and in time bring industrial standards to the level of the lower.
> For that reason it becomes necessary in a country such as ours to devise some means whereby the standards of industry as between the different provinces may be brought to and kept at the same level. I doubt if that is possible in any other way than by some system of federal cooperation or control. But the problem is more far reaching than that. What I have said with regard to industries in the different provinces is equally true of industry as between different countries.

I ask hon. members opposite how they would maintain the standard of living in Canada against the standard of living of, we will say, Russia, Japan, or some other competing nation, other than by an adequate tariff policy. In my opinion there is no other way to do it than by the adoption of a tariff policy. This government has given Canada an adequate tariff policy. If hon. members think it worth while, I would ask them to compare the remarks I am making with the last sentence of the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition which I have just quoted. Then I would ask them to review the latest figures indicating the wages paid in some of the leading nations of the world. These figures, based on the eight hour day and given in the equivalent of Canadian money, show that in Japan they are paying 76 cents per day; that in Italy they have reduced the wages only recently from 95 cents to 85½ cents per day. In the Netherlands, where large quantities of binder twine are made and offered as the chief competition for our binder twine, they pay $1.18 a day. Last year the Netherlands sold to this country several hundred thousand dollars worth of binder twine. In France the rate is $1.36 per day; in Prussia or Germany $1.46; in England $2.28—all these against the average in Canada of $3.42. How can we compete? How can Canadian labour compete—and it is on behalf of Canadian labour that I raise my voice, and which I will defend on every opportunity which presents itself. How can the Canadian worker drawing wages averaging $3.42 compete with the twine worker in the Netherlands drawing $1.18? Apart altogether from binder twine, can the Canadian worker compete in any other way without protection—and I am not by any means in accord with placing a duty on binder twine. On the other hand I am in sympathy with giving the agriculturist every possible opportunity to produce his product at the cheapest possible price, and to sell it in the dearest market he can find. Statistics show that Russian wages to-day approximate 25 cents per day. The Canadian worker cannot compete against that kind of competition, and I know of no other means by which he may be allowed to operate unless through the use of tariffs.

As the time at my disposal is passing rapidly I shall not take time to submit data and figures to show that business in Canada is getting better. That fact has been admitted from every corner of the house. During the recess I visited twenty-five or thirty towns and cities in Ontario, in addition to travelling extensively in the United States, looking into industrial and labour problems. I visited some sixty to seventy Canadian factories in Canada, talked to managers, foremen and workmen. I know from personal observation that business in Canada is improving. I was glad to find that out. I am pleased to know that every day more and more men are being employed in industry, and I only hope that the improvement continues.

Among other branches of industry I visited were those associated with construction. I must admit frankly that factories engaged in the manufacture of metals, glass, hardware and the allied lines of the construction industry have not improved as rapidly as have many other industries. But they are coming around, which means that construction in Canada is increasing. A person could have a fair understanding of the amount of construction going on in Canada in comparison with what is in progress in the great republic to the south if he were to visit Philadelphia, which has a population of about 3,000,000. If he were to visit the suburbs of that great city, as I have done, and look into the amount of building going on over there and then return to the great city, one riding of which I have the honour to represent, he would see, as I have seen, that in the suburbs of Toronto there is more construction going on than there appears to be in Philadelphia, a city five times as large. It would do anyone good to visit the northerly limits of the city of Toronto, where there is really a considerable amount of building in progress.

If the government are going to adopt a building program I would say that the sooner they commence the better. I certainly am not in accord with the erection of buildings having no commercial value and which do not effect a saving to the government. With this point in mind, during the recess I visited many Canadian towns and cities and made exhaustive inquiries into matters affecting building construction. For example may I instance the city of Hamilton? I say that Hamilton is entitled to a federal building because at the present time the government has to rent considerable space. In my view a federal building in Hamilton could be erected economically, because it would yield a return in rent saved. All hon. members who have visited Toronto know that on Front street a customs house has been built, but not completed. If the government were to finish the customs house in Toronto the rent saved would in time pay for the work. That kind of construction work is eminently sound, and I am in accord with it. So I would say to the government that at the earliest possible moment they should back up the efforts of the private constructors. So far as I can ascertain there is at the present time building contemplated to the value of $100,000,000. A building program to that extent would mean the employment of 125,000 men working in the quarries, the lumber woods, in the other primary industries connected with building, and would furnish work to the finishers, the artisans who are very anxious to have employment. I endorse heartily the proposal of the government to speed up construction of buildings and particularly those which in due time would pay for themselves.

As I said a moment ago I visited about sixty to seventy factories during the recess. I made a survey of the men engaged in those industries, men who in many instances were turning out new materials which had never before been manufactured in Canada, materials demanded by Canadians. Capital was invested in those industries because the tariffs of Canada had kept competing materials out of the country. My compilation showed that 10,000 men and women workers are to-day engaged in making brand new material which has never before been manufactured in this country. These workers are in addition to the 400,000 or 500,000 men and women engaged either full or part time in Canadian factories. Some people will say that 10,000 workers do not indicate a great deal of industry, but if one takes the census returns of 1931 he will find that Brockville, Kingston, Belleville, Peterborough, Woodstock, Paris, St. Thomas and Owen Sound combined have only 10,000 industrial workers in their factories, and I will say that any community or province in Canada would be more than pleased to have in their midst a new city with 10,000 workers and with a purchasing power equivalent to that of all the industrial workers in the cities I have just mentioned. And that means more consumers for our agricultural producers in the province of Ontario.

Following the war most countries sought means whereby they could increase their industrial activities. Most of them followed the plan adopted by Germany in 1881. At that time Germany established an industrial council and other European nations followed suit. To-day twenty-two nations have departments of industry, either separate or associated with other departments of government. I would have moved a motion recommending that this government consider the question of organizing a department of industry in this country but I was afraid that industry itself would think there might be government interference. Up to the present I have refrained from recommending anything of that nature, but I am convinced that the time has come when the government could the greater assist the industry of this country without busybody interference. What were the objectives of the German industrial advisory board, the department of industry of France and the departments of industry of Norway, Belgium, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Ireland and China? First, they were organized to provide more jobs; second, to make all jobs more permanent; third, to provide a safer investment for capital; fourth, to provide minimum wage laws for those engaged in industry and compensatory measures where injuries occurred; fifth, to introduce compulsory and contributory unemployment insurance and, lastly, to create a national buying spirit.

Last summer I made a tour of the mines in northern Ontario. I associated with the managers and foremen of mines. One of the things which struck me was the large number of steel drills piled up in the yards of various mines. Upon inquiry I ascertained that up to the advent of this government the mines of northern Ontario imported from New York state seventy-five carloads of steel drills per year. The manager of one of the large mines was impressed with the buy in Canada spirit—in my humble opinion it is patriotic to prefer goods made by Canadians—and he conceived the idea of holding a meeting of mine managers. It was ascertained that not only did the mines of northern Ontario use seventy-five carloads of steel drills but the rest of the mines in Canada used an additional seventy-five carloads, a total of one hundred and fifty carloads per year. I was told that representatives of the steel industry were invited to confer and the result was that to-day a steel plant in an Ontario city is shipping throughout Canada each year one hundred and fifty carloads of steel drills. This industry gives employment to 150 men. That is a real patriotic spirit. If architects, builders and buyers throughout Canada were imbued with the patriotic spirit to buy Canada made goods, I am satisfied that within a reasonable number of years a quarter of a million more men would be placed at work in this country.

Prior to the imperial conference a deputation of British industrialists came to Canada to confer with Canadian manufacturers. They bargained on what could be manufactured economically in Canada and what British industry could ship to this country. They bargained together, which is not a new thing. Some time ago I read a speech of the Right Honourable Benjamin Disraeli quoted in the Edinburgh Blackwood's Magazine of 1866, at page 369. It appears that in 1844 and 1845 the then Tory Prime Minister of Great Britain was inaugurating a policy of free trade between Great Britain and other countries. His Tory followers were surprised and the common statement at that time was, whither will he lead us. Lord Beaconsfield, then Mr. Benjamin Disraeli, made a speech in which he said in effect:

> Not that they were opposed to free trade, so long as it should rest upon sound principle. What they did object to was that, without any attempt to arrange with foreign countries a system of reciprocal intercourse, duties on imports and exports were lessened or repealed which had hitherto supplied the state with an adequate revenue, while at the same time they protected native industry. The party argued thus: Make, by commercial treaties, any arrangements which you consider to be advantageous to the common weal. We will go with you in opening British ports to French silks and French wines, provided France will act in the same liberal spirit towards British cotton goods. We will admit into the home market, at reduced rates, the corn, hemp and tallow of the northern powers, provided they will reduce, in equal proportion, the duties which they now levy on our cutlery and hardware; but don't let us throw away what we possess without getting anything back in exchange, which we shall certainly do if we allow all the nations of the earth to glut our market with their products while they shut our products out of their market by taxing them heavily.

We had an experience similar to that in 1922 and 1923 under the administration of the late government. Our markets were opened to the manufacturers of the world, through low tariffs, while markets of the world were closed to ours. After twenty-five years spent in industry I am satisfied that the state of industry in Canada when the depression came upon us was due to our trade being depressed by the products of labour in foreign countries. The industry of Canada was unable to meet the depression as it otherwise would have done. This government has been eminently wise in taking the course it has in connection with its tariff policy and ensuring the buying by Canadians of goods manufactured in Canada by Canadian workmen.

I should like to say a word about government costs, because the Minister of Finance pointed out that these costs were being cut down. In my humble opinion industry is afflicted to an abnormal extent with one kind of tax or another. This government has made a splendid start in cutting down the cost of government, but we can go much further when we consider that we have in this country nine legislatures, a legislative council, a House of Commons and a Senate; approximately one thousand legislators and seventy-five ministers. There is no doubt that the people of Canada are overgoverned, and that the cost of government can be cut down. From 1904 to 1931 the costs of government in this country increased 666 per cent while the population increased only 78 per cent. I congratulate the government on what it has done, but I hope it will go further. Every hon. member has heard of the government costs of the state of South Dakota. In 1932 a new governor was elected and I have before me his inaugural address. I am happy to be able to say that he accomplished much of what he set out to do. He set out to wipe out state banking, state insurance, state bonding, the state railway commission, state operation of mines, state ownership of farms taken over on foreclosures, state duplication of municipal duties, state duplication of federal duties and state operation of cement and other plants. Governor Tom Berry deserves the support of his state for the attempt he has made to cut down government costs. As one who has been associated with industry for many years, I say emphatically that industry in Canada is crying aloud to this government and every government in the country to cut down the costs which to-day are being inflicted upon it, thus retarding employment to a certain extent. We can do something more along that line.

Many hon. members have no doubt read of the great metallurgical and chemical plant which the Russians are erecting at Magnetogorsk, on the Ural river, occupying about twenty square miles and with a capacity, when it is finally in operation, of four million tons of steel a year. Picture what will happen to the steel trade of the world when that plant goes into full operation. Why, in our palmiest days Canada imported only 150 thousand tons of steel a year. Canada as well as other countries must plan and make every effort to protect themselves against having their markets flooded by goods produced by cheaper labour in other countries. I have no criticism to offer with respect to the wages paid in Russia and the standard of living that prevails there. That is the business of the Russian people, and if they are satisfied with their conditions nothing that we could do, in any event, would alter that. And the same applies to Japan; I do not criticize what they do. Their standard of living and their wages suit them. But I do say that we can protect ourselves against the products of their factories, and we can do so in no way that I know of other than by an adequate tariff. We cannot afford to leave Canadian workmen and factories unprotected against the products of other countries where there is cheap labour. We must have an adequate tariff.

I made an extensive inquiry into labour conditions and industry in Europe and Great Britain, and while there I looked into plant areas and studied the question of plant concentration. I found great industrial areas in Sheffield and Birmingham, but the greatest industrial area in the world in my opinion is Trafford park in Manchester. I made an investigation of plant areas at Halifax, Saint John, Quebec City, Three Rivers and Montreal. All of them have magnificent areas; and along the St. Lawrence river, when the St. Lawrence waterway is completed, we shall have one of the greatest waterways in the world, developing illimitable power. There we shall have one hundred miles of plant sites equal to the best plant areas anywhere. We have great areas at Vancouver. We have great areas at Winnipeg, at Port Arthur, at Fort William, at Windsor and along the Welland canal. I was happy to learn, while making an investigation of the steel industry in the United States last summer, after this house had risen, the opinion held by one important manufacturer there. He said to me, "Mr. MacNicol, had it not been for the depression this company might have erected along the Welland canal a great steel plant." We have also that magnificent plant area in Toronto which is being exceedingly well developed by the Toronto Industrial Commission. Even during these times of depression, since 1929, under the efficient management of Mr. Keenleyside the Toronto Industrial Commission has brought into that area 115 plants large and small, giving employment to 2,500 men, with an investment of $5,000,000, and occupying 1,250,000 feet of floor space.

I am convinced that if the governments of Canada, federal and provincial, having control over industrial expansion, could organize a department which would work as efficiently—and I see no reason why they should not—as the two great railway industrial departments and other industrial departments have, it would have a very beneficial effect on bringing industry to this country, and such new industry in Canada would provide a good deal of employment for Canadians.

I congratulate the government on what they have done, considering the world depression through which we have been passing, and I say this not only as a former industrialist but for labour as well; for I take second place to no man in this country in my feeling for labour. I say to the government: You have done wonderfully well and you deserve credit, for the employment which you have provided for Canadians, many thousands of men in various industries in this country, as a result of making it possible for much new manufacturing to take place in Canada. I say to them, "Keep on going straight down the road you have been travelling. Be not deterred from your objective, let the chips fall where they may, and in spite of any criticism that may be hurled at you either in this house or outside." I have not the slightest fear regarding the attitude of the people of Canada. They recognize in this government, in the leader and his cabinet, a group of earnest men who have done their best for this country in the severest depression that has ever been experienced not only in Canada but in the world. They have toiled for this country at the sacrifice of their health and I am satisfied that when the bell rings for the general election the people of Canada will rise up and return the Prime Minister at the head of his government to continue as he has been doing.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): We are always delighted to hear our good friend from Toronto (Mr. MacNicol) he is always interesting and lucid in his exposition of the tariff policy of this government. But tonight I must congratulate him on his great faith, a faith which is beyond my comprehension, when he suggests that the policy which this government has followed for the past four years will carry hon. gentlemen opposite into the treasury benches after the next election. Time will show how accurate my hon. friend is in that prophecy. I can well understand why he always makes such a plea for the manufacturer and the worker. He comes from an industrial city; his constituency is made up of industrial workers, and it is not to be wondered at that he does his best to put up a plea for them. I am sorry however that the hon. gentleman can see only one side of the question. We on this side of the house see the industrial side, but there is another great class in Canada who must receive some consideration, and that is the consumers and the public at large.

My hon. friend, when I came in, was telling this house that what Canada needed was an adequate tariff. It seems to me that what this government has given the country is a little more than an adequate tariff, for we have the highest tariff that we have ever had. He has also told us what the government has done for industry. Well, the best years that industry in Canada has ever experienced was during the regime of the last government, from 1921 to 1930, when the manufacturers sold more manufactured goods, when our export trade in manufactures was much larger, than at any time in the history of the dominion. And it was not a high tariff that did it but a moderate tariff which provided the country with a revenue so that we were able to pay our way and have a surplus on the right side of the ledger.

I regret the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) from the house tonight and also the very sad reason therefor. The annual budget is always looked forward to with a great deal of interest. It is supposed to give not only a review of the financial situation of the past year but a glimpse into the future, an outline of the policies which the government intends to follow and also some lead as to our export and import trade. But in this budget speech and in the speeches of hon. members opposite who have spoken in large numbers we have heard nothing regarding our export trade and how they intend to extend it. In the budget there is not one word which suggests that any effort has been made in the past year to secure any new treaties with foreign countries or even to try to put through a reciprocal trade agreement with our friends to the south. Recently we saw that our United States friends were quite willing to introduce legislation looking toward reciprocal trade, and I believe the present is the most opportune time in the history of Canada to make a move in that direction.

We might look for a few moments at the records of the two governments. My hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. MacNicol) has been a stout defender of his party, and I want to be just as stout a defender of the policies in which Liberal members on this side believe. All we have to do is to review the records of the two parties. No one will deny that under the King administration we had seven years of progress, splendid surpluses and increased trade, but under the regime of our hon. friends opposite, notwithstanding all their promises in 1930, we have had four years of almost famine. It has not yet reached the seven year period, but if our hon. friends remain in office I am afraid that it will run that long. Did the Conservative party give the former Liberal government any credit for the splendid showing they made during their term of office? Not on your life. I remember when sitting on the other side of the house hearing hon. members, then on this side, day in and day out, condemn the former government from every angle—we were spending too much money; we were not showing sufficient surpluses; we were not reducing the public debt fast enough; we were not reducing interest charges sufficiently. Talk about prejudicing the minds of the people! If any persons worked harder than did our hon. friends opposite to prejudice the minds of the people during the Liberal term of office, I would be glad to know it. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) used to tell the house how he would handle the finances of the country. He would provide a sinking fund that would eventually wipe out the national debt; he would reduce interest charges. The right hon. gentleman has had his opportunity; he was elected prime minister in 1930; he was not only prime minister but, for two years of that period, minister of finance, and he had every opportunity to put into operation the great ideas he had when he was on this side of the house.

But what do we find? The right hon. gentleman, far from moving along the lines he suggested in the house, has never made any effort at all to take care of the financial situation; no sinking fund has been established; deficits have been shown every year. Under the Liberal regime we had seven surpluses amounting in all to $276,000,000, while our hon. friends opposite in four years have added to the funded public debt no less than $594,000,000.

Someone may ask: What about the railway debt? Well, what about it? In the seven year period of the Liberal regime the national railways had a deficit of $93,000,000, and even if you take that from the $276,000,000, you have still $183,000,000 of a surplus to go towards reducing the public debt. But even if you disregard that altogether you will find that the public debt has been reduced by a much larger amount than that. When the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) was speaking the other day he pointed out that during the Liberal regime current deficits on the national railways were paid out of current revenues and not charged to the public debt. Our hon. friends opposite should take note of this because it is a fact worthy of a great deal of consideration. Under the Conservative government from 1919 to 1921, the average deficit on the Canadian National was $22,000,000 per annum. From 1922 to 1930 the average surplus for interest payment due to the public was $24,000,000 per annum. The deficits began again when our hon. friends opposite came into power. As I pointed out, one has only to look at page 3 of the public accounts to find that the debt increase from 1930 to 1934 totalled, as I said before, $594,000,000, while increases in interest charges on the public debt, including this year's deficit, have reached $25,000,000. If you include the deficit this year of $135,200,000. you find that the total interest charge we have to pay in this country is around $145,000,000. When one considers that in 1875 the total debt of the dominion was only $150,000,000, one can see in a minute whither we are drifting.

Coming to the question of interest charges we find that in 1930 the interest charge was around $121,000,000, but in 1933 it had increased to over $139,000,000, an increase of more than $18,000,000 in those three years, while under the Liberal regime interest charges were reduced $4,694,000. As I said before, if we include this year's deficit of $135,200,000 we have now an interest charge of around $145,000,000 per annum.

[Mr. MacLean.]

I noticed that some newspapers commenting on the speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth stated that the average deficit of the Canadian National Railways for the last eleven years was $25,000,000. Why do they take the eleven year period? I think it is only fair for each government to stand on its own feet and each one to account for its own deficits or surpluses. If you take the eleven year period you will find from page 19 of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways that the average Canadian National deficit from 1923 to 1929, after deducting the one surplus, was $9,500,000 annually. But the average deficit for the past four years under this government was not $9,500,000 but $58,000,000 annually. That shows the difference in the management under the two parties. Our hon. friends opposite will say: "Oh, that was due to the depression." I think if we want to go into the matter we shall find that the great cause of the falling off of the earning powers of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific was the fact that this government put on a high tariff that stopped imports. The minute they stopped imports, the transportation systems had nothing to move, the result being that falling off continued right along the line and not only the transportation systems but everything else suffered in proportion.

The Minister of Finance in presenting the budget said that he would have a surplus next year of $8,000,000. I hardly think that is a fair statement to make to the house, because there are a great many things that have not been taken into account. We are told that a bill will be introduced this year providing for the spending of perhaps $50,000,000 on public works. Will these be chargeable to next year's account? If so, what becomes of the estimated surplus of $8,000,000? But it is not only that; there are a great many other items that have not been taken into account. The marketing bill that is now before the house is going to cost quite a few millions to operate if it is operated in the way our friends think it will be. Then there is the cost of restoring the civil service salaries—another large amount. I venture to say that when these items I have mentioned are taken into account instead of having a surplus of eight millions, the balance will be fifty to seventy-five millions on the other side of the ledger. So I say it is unfair to the public for the minister to say: "We are going to balance our budget and have $8,000,000 on the right side," when they knowingly leave out such large items.

The same thing happened when the estimates were brought down this year. Headlines appeared in the press all across the continent: "Seventeen millions saved in the estimates." I venture to say that before this house rises supplementary estimates will be brought down that will more than wipe out this seventeen millions. I say again that it is absolutely unfair to treat the public in this way. Our friends opposite should give them the real facts.

When hon. gentlemen opposite were on this side they were continuously telling the house and the public that we were spending too much, that the government was extravagant; that we were proceeding with extensive public works, building railways, erecting buildings, expanding in every way. I remember a small vote I wanted for my county, and the present Minister of Justice was good enough to move that the vote of $11,000 be reduced to $1. That was their idea of economy at that time—they were going to show us how to economize if they got on the treasury benches. Well, here are their expenditures since they have been in power. There was only one year in the ten that the Liberals were in power in which the expenditure exceeded $400,000,000. It ran along from $370,000,000, to $381,000,000, $351,000,000, $355,000,000, $358,000,000, $378,000,000, $388,000,000 and $398,000,000. But look at what happened after our friends got into power. In 1931, according to the budget speech delivered the other day, the expenditure was not $398,000,000 as under the Liberals, but $440,000,000 for the first year that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. The next near, 1932, it was $448,000,000. In 1933 it was $531,000,000 and in 1934 $459,000,000. There is the difference in the expenditure under the two administrations. I do not know how it is in other parts of Canada, but I can say positively that there have been practically no new public works built in the maritime provinces since this government came into power; and the old works have not been maintained as they should be and some are falling into decay. Still our hon. friends have a record of spending from fifty to seventy-five millions yearly more than we spent, and they have nothing to show for it.

Mr. MANION: What about the millions spent at Saint John, for example?

Mr. MacLEAN: Our friends talk about the tariff situation. Through the kindness of the Prime Minister we had the pleasure recently of hearing the Postmaster General of Australia speak in the restaurant. He said:

> It is insensate nationalism, abnormally high tariffs and disorderly marketing methods which, more than anything else, are responsible for delay in the rehabilitation of all nations.

That is not merely the personal opinion of Hon. Mr. Parkhill. Take the reports of the bank presidents at the annual meetings of the banks, until a few years ago nearly every one of them was a high tariff man. I do not think that back in 1928 or 1929 you could find a bank president who was not a high tariff man; at any rate there were very few of them. To-day you cannot find one who will say that an abnormally high tariff such as we have had under this administration has been beneficial to this country. Our total trade dropped from $2,393,000,000 in 1930 to $886,000,000, a decline of no less than $1,507,000,000 since this government came into power.

Then our friends were going to find us new markets, but they have not made much progress in that direction. We have a committee sitting in this house looking into this question from every angle but the right one. What Canada needs is world trade. As was shown by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) a few days ago, no less than twenty-nine countries have put up their tariffs against Canada since this government came into power. Our hon. friends say, "Oh, the King government was in power for so many years and they did nothing to prevent other countries from raising their tariffs." I heard an hon. gentleman on the other side make that statement the other day. Well, I will tell you one thing the King government did not do; they did not make pilgrimages around the world endeavouring to get other countries to adopt a high tariff policy. We had free entry to Great Britain for our foodstuffs and for everything, from the beginning. My hon. friend who just spoke (Mr. MacNicol) told us about the industries of Manchester, England. What made Great Britain the greatest manufacturing country in the world? Was it her high tariff policy? Not on your life; it was the free trade policy which she followed. Her ships went out on the seven seas and brought in the raw material which was manufactured by her workmen, and she built up the greatest trade and became the greatest nation in the world through that policy. But the Prime Minister of this country made a pilgrimage to Great Britain and endeavoured to persuade that country to put up a tariff against the rest of the world in order that we might obtain a preference there. If the Prime Minister was the means of getting Great Britain to adopt that policy, did he do this country a service or a disservice? I claim that if he was responsible for it he did this country a disservice, because we find that Great Britain has practically served notice on us now that some changes will be made in those preferences, even with the agreements we hear so much about from our friends opposite. We had splendid trade facilities with Great Britain, and I do not think there is any doubt that they would have been continued. We never had a written agreement with the mother country until this government compelled Great Britain to put down in writing what we could and what we could not ship there, and when those agreements run out I think Canada had better watch out or she will find herself shut out from the British market in respect of some of her products.

One of the measures on which hon. gentlemen opposite are staking their reputation is the marketing bill. I think the fact that to-day there were tabled no less than eighteen or twenty amendments to that bill proves that the opposition offered from this side of the house and throughout the country was well founded, because, as I said the other day, if we get a bill that is half workable it will be because the weaknesses of the present bill have been shown up. When you consider that there are only twenty-one clauses in the whole bill and that eighteen or nineteen of those clauses have to be amended I think you will realize in what shape that bill was when it was brought into the house.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have not much to say about the butter question, but I have a great deal of information here with regard to the leakage of butter brought into the maritime provinces. That butter is said to have been released and to have done a great deal of harm to the dairy industry in that part of the country. This is the last thing in the world you would expect under this government, because we all remember what they were going to do for the dairy farmers, how they were going to put them on easy street when they got into power, by shutting out New Zealand butter. Butter to-day is 19 cents. New Zealand butter has been coming in under this government; it is still coming in, and I am afraid that these complaints of leakages are only too well founded.

Hon. gentlemen opposite promised a great many things; very few of those promises have been fulfilled but they took many steps that were not promised at all. When we take the tariff increases into account we find that the government have brought about the largest tax increases that have been put on by any government. We had the sales tax increased from one per cent to six per cent; the excise tax increased from one per cent to three per cent, and increases in the income tax, the corporation tax and so on, with new taxes imposed on telegrams, long distance calls, pullman car tickets and sugar, and the gold tax imposed just the other day. That does not take into account the tremendous tariff increases put into force by hon. gentlemen opposite, which I see they now admit constitute a direct tax. No, they did not promise these things, but they brought them about. I think if they had fulfilled some of the promises they made in 1930 and left undone some of the things they have done, this country would be in much better condition to-day. The situation is very well summed up in a small quotation from the New Era of Sydney, Australia, which says:

> When someone stops buying, someone stops selling. When someone stops selling, someone stops making. When some one stops making, someone stops working. When someone stops working, someone stops earning. When someone stops earning, someone stops buying.

That is just what this government have done. They have stopped buying from abroad, and when they stopped that we stopped selling. When we stopped selling our factories stopped making, and when they stopped making their employees stopped earning. Then, when the employees stopped earning, everyone stopped buying. That is the situation in a nutshell, and that has been brought about by the policies of this government. I claim that the policy of protection has stagnated trade, crippled business, increased unemployment, ruined our transportation systems, handicapped agriculture, reduced our revenue and brought our country to the verge of bankruptcy. It has increased taxation to an extent hitherto unknown, and all this in the face of promises to reduce taxation, cure unemployment, build up agriculture, find markets, pay old age pensions one hundred per cent and reduce the national debt. Those are some of the promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite which they have not been able to carry out.

The budget speech would lead one to believe that many tariff reductions have been brought about, but I am sorry that these reductions are so few in number. I notice that there is a reduction in the tax on beer, wine and champagne. So far as our province is concerned that does not interest us, because ours is a prohibition province. We do not use liquor, and even if we did want to use it we would not have the money with which to buy it.

One matter to which I should like to refer is the tax on sugar. On February 13, 1934, there was a meeting of bakers and candy manufacturers in the city of Toronto, and some startling information was brought out at that meeting. I believe I should put this on record in order to show the increase in duty on this one commodity. These organizations whose names all appear in this statement, state that at the time the meeting was held they could buy one hundred pounds of refined sugar in Cuba for $1.50. The duty amounted to $1.89; the duty on the bag was 4 cents, and there was a dumping duty of 75 cents, bringing the total up to $4.18. Then there was a three per cent special excise tax, which amounted to twelve cents, and the tax of two cents per pound, which make a total of $6.30, including 30 cents freight. So we find that of the total of $6.30 paid for one hundred pounds of sugar, the government took $4.80 in taxes. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is something seriously wrong with any system that allows any government, whether it be Conservative, Liberal or Progressive, to take $4.80 in taxes out of a total of $6.30, in connection with an article of food that is used every day by both rich and poor. I think that situation should be brought to the attention of the public. I am glad the government reduced the tax by one cent, but in the circumstances I think the tax should have been entirely wiped out. There are other ways of raising revenue without resorting to the taxation of articles of food which are necessities of life.

The other night the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers) whose pleasing countenance I see across the chamber, told us that the duty on fertilizer did not affect the farmers of this country, and that in fact no fertilizer was brought in on which a duty was paid. I took the trouble of obtaining from the bureau of statistics figures showing the importations of fertilizer, and I find that in the last three years over 16,000 hundredweight of fertilizer were imported. On that amount a duty of $65,880 was paid. That is a snug little sum. And I believe that is not all, because in a circular I have found that since that time a large amount of fertilizer which was not included in the statement I have mentioned, and on which a rate of ten per cent was paid, was brought in. So when hon. members opposite state that the duty does not increase the cost of the article to the consumer, despite the fact that $65,000 is paid in duty, I think we have good indication that duty is being paid and that thereby the cost of the article is increased.

I notice press dispatches indicate that a permanent highway is to be built through the province of Prince Edward Island. That is a very commendable project, and if the government gives assistance to Prince Edward Island we will welcome it. I understand that if the highway is built it will be built out of the unemployment grant, and undoubtedly the province will have to pay its fifty per cent.

There is just one other point to which I should like to draw attention, and that is that in the past four years we in the province of Prince Edward Island have been left out of the picture. In Ontario no less than $25,000,000 have been expended on the trans-Canada highway, to say nothing of the expenditures in the other provinces. Large expenditures were made in the last two years in Nova Scotia, and it would seem that Prince Edward Island has been left out of consideration when the moneys were being handed around. Someone will say that it is because we had no unemployment down there. Well, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that we did have considerable unemployment. There is this to be said about our people, however, that they will put up with a great deal, and that they are mostly able to get three meals a day in some kind of way. We did have unemployment, and could very well have used a considerable amount of the unemployment money in the building of a highway which by this time could have been completed. I believe the press behind the Prime Minister stated during the last election campaign—and I am glad to see him coming into the chamber, because he can correct me if I am wrong—that it was the policy of the Conservative party to establish a national highway system, which would mean that all the roads in Prince Edward Island would be taken over and maintained by the federal government, thereby reducing taxation in the province. Then, prior to the provincial election the late premier, Mr. Stewart, visited Ottawa and upon his return stated to the press that the Prime Minister of Canada would carry out his policy of federal assistance to the highways in Prince Edward Island. All I wish to say is that for the past three years no work has been started. As I have pointed out, the other provinces have benefited to a great extent in the expenditure of relief money, and I am pleased to know that a start is to be made in Prince Edward Island. I hope it will be a good start, and that a good road will be built.

In conclusion may I say that we have been asked to depend on the resourcefulness of our people, and have been told that if we do that, undoubtedly we will pull through the depression. Well, in 1930 hon. members opposite did not want even the resourcefulness of the people; they felt that they themselves were sufficient to put policies into effect which to a great extent would improve conditions. I regret that these improvements have not taken place, and that the reverse is true. I believe that the country is ready for a chance to vote, and the people are asking the government to give them that opportunity. When that time arrives I am convinced that the people will record their vote in favour of the party which during the last ten years they were in power gave to Canada an era of prosperity unequalled in its history.

On motion of Mr. Fraser (Cariboo) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

EVIDENCE OF MR. WALTER M. STEWART

REQUEST BY PRIME MINISTER THAT WITNESS BE RECALLED BY COMMITTEE ON PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I avail myself of the very first opportunity to speak to this chamber about a matter that affects the privileges of this house.

On Saturday last I had an opportunity of reading with a little care the evidence given by one Walter M. Stewart before the special committee on price spreads and mass buying on the 10th instant, whereupon I wrote a letter to my colleague, the chairman of the committee, in the following terms:

Ottawa, May 12, 1934.

Honourable H. H. Stevens, M.P.,
Chairman,
Special Committee on Price Spreads and Mass Buying,
Ottawa.

My Dear Colleague:

I have had an opportunity to look through the evidence given by Mr. Walter D. Stewart before the special committee on price spreads and mass buying on the 10th instant.

[Mr. MacLean.]

It appears to me that, while at the end his evidence is somewhat uncertain, nevertheless it is quite clear that he insinuated that the government, or some members thereof, have given advance information to his competitors regarding pending changes in the excise taxes on tobacco and cigarettes. May I ask you to be good enough to have him recalled for the purpose of naming the cabinet ministers whom he desired to examine and giving all information in his possession with respect to his allegations that ministers of the crown have been unfaithful to their trust.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. Bennett.

This afternoon my colleague, the chairman of the committee, who had been engaged with the committee during the morning, handed me a letter which had been received by Mr. Norman Sommerville, K.C., counsel for the committee, dated at Montreal and reading as follows:

P.O. Box 1929, Montreal, Que.,
May 11, 1934.

Norman Sommerville, Esq., K.C.,
Price Spreads and Mass Buying Committee,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

I told you after my examination yesterday that I was sorry for some of the things I had said. I would have liked to have asked the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Excise and the Montreal minister, Mr. Cahan, if they could tell why other manufacturers had advance information of the changes in excise duty.

I should not have said what I did about buying governments and commissions. I wish to retract it. I was exasperated by what seemed an unwarranted intrusion into my own affairs and somewhat bewildered by unusual surroundings. I ask you to convey my apologies to the committee. I do not wish to impugn the motives or the conduct of any member of the government.

You may read this letter to the committee and make it public if you choose.

The two statements which I said would be sent to the committee are being prepared; they will be finished to-morrow when I shall enclose them.

I am interested in the growers receiving as high prices as possible but the draft agreement you submitted to me is not sufficiently definite to insure fair treatment to all. I have therefore hesitated to sign.

Yours truly,

Walter M. Stewart.

This letter bears date Montreal, Quebec, May 11, 1934. I received it only during the last hour but, notwithstanding the contents of the letter, in view of the reflections upon members of this chamber my request to the chairman of the committee still stands.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—OPERATIONS IN QUEBEC

Mr MARCIL:

1. Has the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways received a resolution adopted by the county council of the county of Bonaventure, concluding as follows:—"That we, the members of this county council for the county of Bonaventure, in regular session at New Carlisle, and representing divers interests in every municipality throughout the county, place ourselves on record as being opposed to the removal from this county and province, of the railway shops at New Carlisle and terminal operations at Matapedia, or anywhere else, the removal of which would be detrimental to our communities, county and province, and do hereby urge the railway management the necessity of reestablishing as soon as possible all works and terminal operations that have been removed?

2. If so, what answer has been given to this request, if any?

Mr MANION:

1. Resolution in question received by Minister of Railways and Canals.

2. County council of Bonaventure was advised in reply that matter referred to was one coming entirely under the control of the railway management, and that representations were, in consequence, being brought to the attention of the management.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. Has the National Gallery of Canada acquired paintings of one Ward C. Pitfield, of Montreal?

2. If so, through whom was this deal negotiated?

3. How much was paid for the said paintings?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR FOR RETURNS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES

Mr. ROBERGE:

What amount did the federal government contribute during the years 1933, 1934 in the form of direct relief to the following provinces, without the provinces or municipalities being required to contribute: (a) Ontario; (b) Manitoba; (c) Saskatchewan; (d) Alberta; (e) Yukon territory; (f) New Brunswick; (g) Nova Scotia; (h) Prince Edward Island; (i) Quebec?

NICKEL EXPORT STATISTICS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What are the figures of the volume of export of nickel for March, 1934?

2. Why are these omitted from the monthly returns (E.T.P.B. No. 129, March, 1934) of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for March?

Mr. STEVENS: Return tabled herewith.

ILOTS NEWPORT RIVER, GASPE, PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BRASSET:

1. What is the name of each person who supplied stone and lumber in connection with works carried out at Ilots Newport river, county of Gaspe, in 1933, under the direction of Alphonse Boucher, foreman?

2. What quantity of such building materials was supplied by each person, and what amount was paid to each person?

3. What is the name of each person who worked as a day labourer in 1933, at Ilots Newport river, and what is the name of each person who supplied lumber and stone for the said works carried out under the direction of Baptiste Grenier, foreman?

4. What amount was paid to each such person?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

EX-JUDGE STUBBS

Mr. BROWN:

For a copy of all letters passing between ex-Judge Stubbs, or anyone writing on his behalf, and the Minister of Justice, or any of the officials of his department, with reference to a pension for the said ex-Judge Stubbs, either before or since his dismissal from the bench.

LA MALBAIE—GRAND FONDS, QUE., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and documents exchanged between the Post Office Department at Ottawa, the post office inspector at Quebec and any other persons, with respect to the contract for carrying the mail from La Malbaie to Grand Fonds, in the county of Charlevoix, from January 1, 1934, to date.

VAL D'AMOUR, N.B., POSTMASTER

Mr. MICHAUD:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and orders in council, relating to postmaster at Val d'Amour, Restigouche-Madawaswa county, New Brunswick, between January 1, 1933, and May 1, 1934.

NACMINE, ALTA., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents from September, 1933, to date, in connection with the dismissal of postmaster T. B. Lett, Nacmine, Alberta, and the appointment of Mrs. Molyneux to the position.

TIMBER CUTTING ON INDIAN RESERVES

Mr. IRVINE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, or other documents exchanged between the dominion government, the Minister of the Interior, or any other minister, or any officer or employee of his department and Mr. C. W. Cox, or C. W. Cox, Limited, regarding timber cut on Indian reserves.

Mr. IRVINE:

For a copy of all timber licences issued authorizing the cutting of timber of all kinds on the following Indian reserves, all of which are in the province of Ontario: Long Lac, Chapleau, and Lac Seul; also the names of all the licensees granted authority to cut timber on the said reservations. Also for returns showing:—

1. The estimates of the total amount of timber made by government cruisers on all reserves, and names of the cruisers and dates of cruises.
2. The amounts bid for all kinds of timber by those who made offers.
3. The amount of timber of all kinds, cut by the authority of present licensees from the date of the issuing of their licences up to the end of April, 1934.
4. The amounts which may be due the government from licensees and the names of such licensees.
5. Lists of other reservations in the dominion on which C. W. Cox, or C. W. Cox, Limited, holds licences to cut timber.
6. Also a copy of contracts, if any, between Mr. C. W. Cox, or C. W. Cox, Limited, and the Canadian National Railway, for railway ties for delivery in Orient Bay, Hudson and Lac Seul districts, with returns showing the prices paid and quantities delivered under such contracts.

Mr. MANION: In regard to No. 6, I merely wish to say that the government has not any copies of these contracts. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the motion passing subject to our being able to obtain them from the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion carried subject to the reservation of the Minister of Railways.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

LES EBOULEMENTS, QUE., LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all documents, letters, correspondence, and telegrams, exchanged between the Department of Marine at Ottawa and any persons, respecting the resignation of Mr. Charles Tremblay (Georges), as lighthouse keeper at the wharf at Les Eboulements, and the appointment of Mr. Hector Tremblay as his successor, from January 1, 1934, to date.

L'ANSE AUX CANARDS, GASPE, RANGE LIGHT

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all correspondence addressed to the Department of Marine, respecting the range light located at L'Anse aux Canards, county of Gaspe, and the position of such range light keeper, from August 1, 1930, to date.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—LAKE ST. JOHN-ROBERVAL

Mr. DUGUAY:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, letters, work plans, accounts and other documents exchanged between the federal government, the Minister of Labour, the deputy minister, and all employees of the said department, and the provincial government of Quebec, the Prime Minister of Quebec, the Minister of Public Works of Quebec, the Minister of Labour of Quebec, the deputy minister of such provincial department, and all other employees of the Quebec government, respecting relief works carried out in the county of Lake St. John-Roberval, under the terms of the acts of 1932 and 1933, relating to unemployment relief.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INSURANCE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are two insurance bills before the house. Is it the intention to refer them to the standing committee on banking and commerce or to the committee of the whole?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is not intended to refer them to the banking and commerce committee.

LEGISLATION PENDING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask the Prime Minister again about the legislation for the remainder of the session, in particular the elections act, the program for construction of public works and one particular bill to which he has referred but the nature of which he has not as yet disclosed to the house? I would like to say to my right hon. friend that my purpose in pressing again for this information is that I believe if we had all the legislation before us, and an assurance that it was all, some arrangement might be come to between the different parts of the house with a view to expediting the work of the session. That I think would be in the interests of all concerned.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Resolutions have been sent to the clerk of the house with respect to, first, the public works bill, second, the elections bill, third, the bill providing for arrangements between farmers and their creditors, fourth, the bill amending the Farm Loans Act. There are possibly three others that arise out of the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act that I cannot deal with until after they have been disposed of. There are amending sections to the criminal code which we usually bring down as late as possible because, as the right hon. gentleman knows, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is receiving all the time letters making suggestions. My thought is to try to get on the order paper by the end of the week an intimation of the legislation that we propose during this session. But there is a long bill, as perhaps this chamber knows, that has been disposed of by the Senate but not yet sent to this chamber. They have given a tremendous amount of time to it. I should say "another place," one of my colleagues suggests. It has been considered by the other house, it will reach here I think this week, perhaps to-morrow or the next day.

Then there is a bill consolidating the Excise Act, about which I spoke some weeks ago, but which is not being submitted to the house until such time as the resolutions being adopted under the budget are passed, so that the Consolidated Excise Act will not be brought down to-day. I do not think it will be disputatious, because the changes are very few. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman knows that a great many regulations have been issued under the provisions of the Excise Act and it is desirable to adopt the suggestion made the other day—perhaps not for that reason—to embody in that legislation what were regulations, so that the public may be able as far as possible to see them. I may say that the present views of the right hon. gentleman in that regard were not his views at the time the consolidation of the Excise Act last took place, but we all change our views as occasion necessitates, and I think in the case of the Excise Act it is desirable that there should be every intimation to the public.

Beyond that I do not think there will be any legislation, but I shall give the house the fullest information with respect to that by the end of this week.

I am obliged to the right hon. gentleman, and those on this side of the house appreciate to the full his courtesy in suggesting that if the program of legislation is made known it might expedite the business of the house, but I think he will not regard it as unfair if I say that I think some legislation at least might have been hastened a little during the last ten days.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that the amendments to the Finance Act, the Dominion Notes Act and the Currency Act will not be introduced to the house until the Bank Act is disposed of?

Mr. BENNETT: I should not have said "disposed of." I did not mean that, I meant finally dealt with by this chamber, for the bill has to proceed to the other house and possibly it might be amended there in a manner that might affect these bills to which the hon. gentleman refers. Otherwise the three bills would have been introduced some time ago, but on looking into it it seems apparent that it is undesirable to waste the time of the chamber until the other bills are before the house and disposed of, I should have said, by this house.

RADIO STATION AT WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Some days ago in my absence the Prime Minister made some objection to answering a portion of a question which I have on the order paper with regard to the issuing of a radio licence in the city of Windsor. I wonder whether the Prime Minister can say now whether I may have a reply to the rest of the question.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There is no reason why every question asked by the hon. gentleman should not be answered except such as would mean the disclosure of the business of the commission in a way that a private enterprise would not do, in a way in which the hon. gentleman would not want his business exposed to his competitors or the public. The same principle will be applied in this case, and if the hon. gentleman thinks the answer inadequate we shall see what can be done about his wishes.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister was kind enough to say he would send me a draft of the election act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I sent it over Saturday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was communication with my office, but no document was received.

Mr. BENNETT: My secretary told me it was sent Saturday morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall have another search made, but I have made further inquiry this afternoon and am told nothing has as yet been received.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall at once inquire.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): With the consent of the house I move that the house go into committee of supply merely for the purpose of considering some interim supply of which I hope the house will approve. If this motion is carried then I shall make a short statement regarding it.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have a resolution here asking for interim supply. The main reasons why we have come to the house at this time are two: the House of Commons estimates, and the seasonal requirements of the various departments. Only one-sixth of the House of Commons estimates have been voted, and that money has been spent on account of the activities of the committees, and further money is required for that purpose, as hon. gentlemen will no doubt readily understand.

Then there are some items of public works which the department is anxious to get on with because this is the time of year when they are able to make the best progress. If there are any items which hon. gentlemen wish to discuss I shall try to give any explanations I can. But they are all brought up owing to the season of the year and the desirability of making as much progress as possible in the spring. Further, I may say that out of these various items there are only six which refer to estimates which have not already been considered and passed by this house in their entirety. Of course the house will retain as usual the right to discuss these items as much as hon. gentlemen wish when they are brought before the house.

There is also schedule B to this resolution which refers to the Canadian National Steamships and the Maritime Freight Rates Act. That was not in the original estimate as printed, and no part of it has yet been voted. All I am asking for to-day is three-twelfths, the same as for the other estimates.

I have taken advantage of this opportunity to include in this resolution another one-twelfth of the main estimates. The reason for that is that the provision already made will expire at the end of this month, and so it seemed desirable to put in this bill another one-twelfth of the main estimates, which would carry us to the end of June, in the hope that before then the house will have prorogued.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. gentleman was kind enough to confer with the ex-Minister of Defence and with myself in regard to this interim supply. I think the house will find that the items are satisfactory, and it is appropriate that they should be passed at this time. There are one or two questions that we shall wish to ask in regard to some of the items, and perhaps they can be taken up as the items are called.

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $15,036,735.93, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted by parliament as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1935, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1935.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just one-twelfth covering all the estimates?

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $2,237,789.69, being one-quarter of the amount for each of the several following items to be voted by parliament, set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1935, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1935, namely:

Vote No. 36, for the House of Commons.
Vote No. 44, experimental farms.
Vote No. 67, pensions.
Vote No. 76, non-permanent active militia.
Vote No. 95, Saint John quarantine station.
Vote No. 97, Westmount armoury.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask a question—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): There are more items.

Mr MACKENZIE KING: If they are called separately, we might pass them one at a time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): Very well; the first item is Vote No 36, for the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This includes an amount for the expenses of committees and clerical assistance. I surmise that this item is largely necessary owing to the activities of the committee on price spreads and mass buying. Could the minister give us the details as to the amount that committee has spent, and what amount will probably be required to complete its work?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The amounts paid out in connection with the expenses of committees are as follows:

Price spreads and mass buying	$ 6,126 94
Banking and commerce	2,349 10
Radio	403 10
	$ 8,879 14

The accounts outstanding are as follows:

Mass buying and price spreads—
Accountants	$14,887 96
Counsel	3,150 00
Witnesses	486 50
Investigators	1,618 59
Banking and Commerce—
Reporters	174 70
	$ 20,317 75

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are the amounts that have been expended up to date and the accounts outstanding. Could the minister give us an estimate of what the government expect will be further required in connection with the expenses of these committees before the conclusion of the session?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry, but I do not consider myself competent to give any such estimate. It depends altogether on how long the committees sit and how many witnesses from outside have to come here, whose expenses have to be paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend expect that the activities of the committees will increase or lessen? The amount either spent or already owing in connection with the price spreads committee totals over $25,000, as I have it here, and I assume that an equal amount, if not more, will be required before the session is concluded.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should think it very unlikely; I hope we are not going to have the committee sitting as many more weeks as they have sat already. If that is the case the house will be sitting for a long time.

Mr. MARCIL: We could not very well hear what was said. Did I understand the minister to say that $25,000 has been expended already by the price spreads committee and that he does not know how much more will be required?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is correct. I have given the figures, and they will appear in Hansard.

Mr. MARCIL: Will any legislation result from this work, or is this money being expended to no purpose?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sure the hon. gentleman will not think the money has been expended to no purpose, but whether or not legislation will result this session is another question which, so far as I know, has not been considered.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us how many investigators are working throughout the country in connection with price spreads?

Mr. STEVENS: I could not answer that question offhand. Certain individuals have been retained to carry on investigations into details and report to the committee, in order to save the time of the committee and to avoid bringing more witnesses than is absolutely necessary. I may say that the amount of business and the demands made upon the committee have been so enormous that there is no possible hope of covering all the ground. I think that is clear to everyone, whether or not they are members of the committee, but the committee is doing its best to carry out its very heavy task as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister if he anticipates that the deliberations of the committee will be concluded before the end of the present session of parliament?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, and a substantial report can be made as to the ground that has been covered, but it is easily seen that many phases of mercantile activity cannot possibly be covered by this committee or by any other body except over a very lengthy period.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the intention of the administration to refer any questions to a royal commission or any other investigating body?

Mr. STEVENS: That question could not be answered by myself without consultation, of course, but I imagine that the report of the committee will contain some recommendation as to what disposition should be made of unfinished business,—shall I call it?

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he has investigators at work with regard to the fisheries question, which was to be referred to this special committee. No witnesses have been heard in that regard, so far as I know, and I should like to ask whether this question is being looked into in the maritime provinces and especially in the province of Quebec.

Mr. STEVENS: A preliminary investigation is now being made in the maritime provinces. I may say that to cover the whole field would be quite impossible, but I hope we will be able to touch a few of the most essential points with regard to that industry.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister say he is going to omit Quebec entirely?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is not so much that. Of course I am not within the rules of the house in discussing the details of the activities of a committee other than to give hon. gentlemen the information they require as fully as I can. To cover the whole ground in connection with fisheries during this session would be physically impossible, but I think we will touch a few of the most essential points.

Mr. VENIOT: A start will be made, at any rate?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us what the counsel fee is?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot say at the moment, but it is the same as the fee paid in connection with a similar committee previously.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister whether part 2 of the marketing bill, which deals with investigations, is intended to relate to the work of this committee, to serve the purpose of carrying on the kind of investigations the committee may wish to have made, or whether that part of the marketing bill is wholly apart from the work of the price spreads committee?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: The provisions of any legislation now before the house did not emanate from any committee; that is clear. It is quite obvious, however, to any student of the situation that there is much in the marketing act, for example, that with intelligent anticipation might be declared to be useful in dealing with problems which may be dealt with by the committee. To what extent, of course, I cannot hazard any expression of opinion at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seemed to me on reading the bill that part 2 was the kind of measure which possibly the minister would have brought in after the report of the committee had been made, in other words, that he was anticipating the report to-day and giving us legislation in advance.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman will note that the marketing bill deals largely with agricultural and natural products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, natural products as defined and investigation into a wide field of operations.

Mr. STEVENS: The price spreads and mass buying committee deals with that, of course, but deals with mercantile business generally, which is much wider in its scope.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister if any private investigations have been conducted in the city of Vancouver, and if so whether or not the minister intends calling witnesses from that city.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it will be unnecessary to call witnesses from Vancouver, other than those who have already appeared. The Retail Merchants Association sent witnesses from British Columbia and such investigations as were deemed necessary have been secured through the examination of statements by the auditors.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In other words, they have a clean sheet.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Will any witnesses be called from the fishing industry of British Columbia?

Mr. STEVENS: That has not yet been decided.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the minister received representations asking him to investigate the textile industry, or has he arrived at a decision in that matter?

Mr. STEVENS: What is known as the needle workers trade is now being fully investigated. The question as to investigation of the textile industry has not as yet been decided by the committee.

Mr. SANDERSON: Some weeks ago I had some correspondence with the minister and at that time sent him a petition in regard to fertilizer. If my memory serves me correctly the minister said on that occasion that so many requests had been made he did not know at that time whether there would be time to take up the question of fertilizer. I should like to know now from him if there is any chance of a consideration of this matter later.

Mr. STEVENS: So far, representations which have been made have been substantially those which could be dealt with by an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act. I do not think it is possible to say that we will investigate the fertilizer industry fully, but apart from that I think sufficient information will be obtained to answer the purposes of those agriculturists affected. I cannot promise, however, a full investigation.

Mr. SANDERSON: Probably the minister will recollect that the communication I forwarded to him was a request to have the matter come before the price spreads committee.

Mr. STEVENS: If we can possibly get time I should be very glad to do so, but I am not able to make any definite promise.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have the department stores of British Columbia, and particularly those of the city of Vancouver made representations with regard to being heard before the committee?

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking from memory —and my hon. friend will realize that we have so many communications I cannot be sure—I cannot recall it.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask the minister whether the committee purposes investigating the selling price of agricultural machinery. I have had several letters dealing with this matter, and I take it for granted the committee will give the matter some consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: It is one of the subjects we hope to touch. It is before us, but again the question of time is, shall I say, the essence of the matter.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms, including investigations concerning plant diseases, $1,815,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is a large item, and although I like to see a vote for agriculture I should like to know what it is for. What does this mean? To what particular plant diseases does it refer?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I explain to the hon. member that this is simply a vote to enable spring activity on experimental farms. This item has not yet been before the house. In due course it will come before the house, and upon that occasion the Minister of Agriculture will, I am sure, be able to answer all questions.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much money is there in it?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As a matter of fact, the proposal put before the house is this: two-twelfths have already been voted and we are asking for another twelfth to which the committee has already agreed, making a quarter. We are asking, in this particular item, for a further quarter which, altogether, gives a half of the whole estimate, such sum to be used as required. This item, which I believe has not been before the house, will be thoroughly discussed when the estimates for the Department of Agriculture are reached.

Item agreed to.

Pensions payable to men on active service, Northwest Rebellion 1885, and general pensions, and civil flying $22,000.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent active militia, $1,994,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the Minister of National Defence state whether or not there is an item here for the Seaforth armoury at Vancouver?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not in the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

Westmount — instalment on purchase of armoury and insurance, $13,600.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and Rivers

Nova Scotia

Blandford—breakwater wharf replacement, $4,500.

Black Point—harbour protection, $3,600.

Port Dufferin (John Vogler's shore) breakwater, $4,900.

Trout Cove — (Centreville) — breakwater extension, $4,200.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $225,000.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island

Victoria — additional warehouse accomodation, $2,700.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $50,000—Total, $52,700.

Mr. POWER: Why is it necessary in the appropriation bill to enumerate these particular items? A large number of them have already been voted in the estimates.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have already explained, or endeavoured to explain, that nearly all of these items have been passed in their entirety by the house. In the old days it used to be the custom that when there was an interim supply bill all the items which had already been passed by the house should be put in—the whole of them. But of late years that has not been the custom. Therefore we are asking for an extra quarter in these particular items in order that the work may be proceeded with at this time of the year, a time most propitious for that purpose.

Mr. POWER: Why enumerate them specifically? If I remember correctly it has always been the custom to come before the house and ask for one-twelfth or one-quarter, without going to the trouble of enumerating the particular works affected.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The only reason for the items appearing is that we wish to proceed with the work and spend right away more than one-quarter of the money. Therefore all the items have not been put in, but I asked that in this interim supply bill a further quarter should be requested on all the items upon which work will be done before the end of June, so that money may be available.

Mr. POWER: Is it just in order to be able to let contracts for these specific works? I see here a vote of $1,400 to complete wharf improvements at Anse aux Griffons. In the main estimates we have the same vote, and it has passed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is the same $1,400.

Mr. POWER: And then I see a vote for widening a wharf in Bonaventure, $4,600. That also has been passed. Then there is a further amount of $300,000 for "Harbours and rivers generally, for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken." That has passed. I should like to know why we have not had the item, "for public works, one-quarter" and lump the whole of them. Why specifically point out that the money is to be expended at Anse aux Griffons and at Bonaventure, and not on any of the other items?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It seems to me that all the items which have already passed the house might very well have been put in this supply bill—the whole amount. As I say, years ago that used to be done, but of late years that has not been the custom. I asked that this list be made as reasonable as possible in the hope that it would meet with the approval of the house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Are there any items of public works here which have not been already passed?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Only one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the minister has said I believe all the items on the first two pages with the exception of one item headed "miscellaneous," have passed. I refer to item 120. If that were agreed to, along with the others which have already been passed in committee of supply we might take up the four or five remaining items which as yet have not been discussed. There are five items altogether that have not been discussed as yet in committee of supply. We are prepared to agree to everything going through except those items which have not already been discussed.

Item agreed to.

Bonaventure—widening wharf, $4,600.

Mr. MARCIL: What does the minister intend to do this year with the $4,600 for Bonaventure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This item was before the house when I had all the information with me, and all the details were given. I am sorry I have not the information with me now, but what the house approved of then we propose to carry out.

Mr. MARCIL: If the minister gave the information, all right, but no information so far as I have been able to see was given as regards this expenditure at Bonaventure. I fail to find any information in Hansard about it. I would like to know what the minister intends doing at Bonaventure.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): When I said the details had been given I meant to convey to the committee the fact that the item had been before committee of the whole and any information that was asked was furnished at the time. I cannot say now just what that item covers, but it was approved by the house.

Mr. MARCIL: If the particulars have not been furnished, will the minister send me a note saying what he intends doing at Bonaventure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can assure my hon. friend that following the practice of the past any communication that he chooses to address to me will be answered and he will be given all the information that is available.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask when we may expect the supplementary estimates?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: They have not been prepared yet.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall all the items pass down to No. 117?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Items agreed to.

National Revenue—salaries and travelling expenses of officers of the inspection, investigation, audit, and the preventive service undervaluation services, $916,698.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item has not been discussed previously. Is there any special reason for including it at this time? It is an item of nearly one million dollars. It would look as if the department were getting ready for something extensive in the way of further restrictions.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This only provides for another twenty-five per cent. For some good reason they consider that they want to use more than the one-quarter which has already been voted. A full explanation will be given when the estimate comes before the committee.

Item agreed to.

Battlefields memorials, $90,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this work not now more or less completed? Does the government intend to have any celebration during the present year in connection with the unveiling of the Vimy memorial?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Vimy memorial will not be finished till next year. No definite decision has yet been made as to the unveiling.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The third resolution reads:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $888,000 being one-fourth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted set forth in estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1935, for Canadian National Steamships and Maritime Freight Rates Act, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1935.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I might explain that this item was not in the main estimates. All we are asking for now is one-quarter of the total amount to cover the months of April, May and June.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, there is an item on the order paper for moving the house into committee of ways and means, with the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston. Notwithstanding that, I would like the unanimous consent of the house to go into committee of ways and means now merely for the purpose of considering these resolutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This will enable us to return later in committee of ways and means to the motion as amended by Mr. Ralston as it stands on the order paper.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1935, the sum of $18,162,525.62 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Sir George Perley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1935.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION COMPANIES ACT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 64, respecting Dominion Companies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: This bill is a revision of the acts relating to dominion companies and has been prepared with very considerable care. It is a bill which, I think, will not provoke any party or partisan discussion because it is an expression of a desire to provide such a consolidation and such amendments and modifications of the provisions of the Companies Act, now existing, as may be required to satisfy changes which inevitably take place from time to time in public opinion with regard to public companies.

I have had some forty years' experience in dealing with company legislation, and I can only assure the house that, after consideration of all the representations made to the Department of the Secretary of State during the past two years, this bill embodies what appears to me to be a just and comprehensive revision of that act.

So far as the policy and principle of the bill is concerned, that simply assumes, on voting for the second reading, that the house is in favour of a prospective consolidation and a prospective revision, and when the bill comes before the committee of the whole house, to which I shall move that it be referred, it will be open to full and detailed discussion.

My own experience is that it is very difficult indeed, in committee of the whole house, to prepare amendments during the discussion of a bill, because one has then in view a particular section or particular sections which are under discussion, without regard to the import and application of other sections of a complex measure. I remember that not long ago, in absolute good faith, I assured the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in discussion in the committee of the house, that an amendment which he suggested and which I then drew would fulfil all the requirements which he had indicated. I so stated in the utmost good faith. It has become necessary to grant a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision on that very issue, and I confess that when I was giving the right hon. gentleman that assurance there was one aspect of one section of an existing act to which my attention had not been directed and which, if my attention had been so directed, might have resulted in my making the proposed amendment more comprehensive and detailed than was the amendment which I then suggested and which carried.

If therefore I may now state my view, it is this. I should like this bill to be read the second time and the house to go into committee and perhaps pass the first and second sections—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why pass any?

Mr. CAHAN: Well, possibly not. Then I would invite from every member of the house suggestions as to any amendment or modification in this bill which he thinks ought to be made in order to carry out his own particular views, and I should like to consider such suggestions with any member or with a number of members who may participate in the same view, before the matter is submitted to the committee of the whole house, so that if possible I may meet the views of every member of the house. That, I suppose, is impossible but I should like to meet the serious views of the majority of the members of the house with regard to the modifications that should be made in the Companies Act.

With that in view, and with an assurance to the house of our desire to place this bill on such a basis that party or partisan discussion will not be necessary, but rather that we may seek to elicit a coordination of the views of the whole house with regard to the complex provisions of the bill, so far as possible, I now move the second reading.

Mr. BUTCHER: If the bill is given second reading now, shall we be permitted to discuss on section 1 not only the principle of the bill but any suggested improvements?

Mr. CAHAN: Let me make it clear that so far as the government is concerned, when the bill is in committee, not only particular amendments or modifications may be discussed, but also general principles or policies relating to the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the title.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BUTCHER: Will the minister allow section 1 to stand?

Section stands.

Section 2 agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: In accordance with the understanding we reached, I move that the committee rise and report progress. A number of suggested amendments have been made dealing in a few cases with typographical errors and in two or three other cases with what appear to the members suggesting the changes to provide in certain sections clearer statements of their purpose. Those amendments, in order to expedite consideration by the committee of the whole house, I shall have printed in the proceedings in order that each member may consider what is proposed. If hon. gentlemen on either side have other amendments which they would suggest as proper, I am quite willing to consider them and possibly we might include them in the list of proposed amendments which I will submit in the votes and proceedings.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. gentleman had better take charge of the marketing bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not been able to discover in this bill the provision that I have been seeking for eight or ten years to have put into the Dominion Companies Act, namely, some control over the capital stock of the company. If there is such a provision I have not been able to find it. There is provision merely for the issue of the charter to the company at the capitalization suggested by themselves and from time to time they are given authority to increase that capitalization up to the maximum. It seems to me that some supervision of some sort should be taken in this connection. I just mention the matter to the minister. It is not provided for in the bill and I think it should be.

Mr. CAHAN: With regard to the issue of capital stock and the provision of the capital that is required this bill provides for the most complete disclosure of any act now in existence in, I think, any English speaking country excepting, possibly, the proposed amendments to the Securities Act now before the United States congress. In the administration of the act there is left to the Secretary of State considerable discretion. I say to the hon. gentleman that for four years the Companies Act has been administered with the greatest care and, without reflecting upon my predecessors in office, I think, in view of the exceptional circumstances of the time, it has been more carefully administered recently than it had been in previous years. But if the hon. member has any suggested amendment I will be very glad to consider it because I would like so far as possible to reach a consensus of opinion among members as to the provisions of the bill in order that when it is finally placed upon the statute books of the country it may represent the matured opinion of the majority of the house irrespective of party or other affiliations.

Progress reported.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, May 11, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I desire before the discussion is proceeded with, to rise to a point of order concerning the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) which appears at page 2445 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.
> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

I desire to take objection to the latter part of the amendment and to show that it is out of order inasmuch as it deals with matters which have already been dealt with by the house. The particular words to which I invite Your Honour's attention are these:

> And to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

The end being presumably the increasing of export trade. It is difficult to determine to what extent export trade will be affected by credit unless we discuss credit as well as export trade. The other day the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) took objection on similar grounds to a subamendment; he called attention, as I do now, to a resolution which was moved by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas), and in which the following words appear:

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the creation of a national system of credit and finance.

And the subamendment was ruled out of order because in it these words appear:

And further, that this house is of the opinion that the control of national credit, which by the constitution is vested in this parliament, should be exercised immediately by the government.

The hon. member argued that on those grounds, namely, that credit was mentioned in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Camrose and that it was again mentioned in the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), the said subamendment was therefore out of order. I draw your attention, sir, to the ruling which you gave sustaining that particular contention and I quote your words in giving your ruling.

I am of the opinion that the objection to the subamendment is properly raised, as it seeks to deal with a matter already discussed at this session, and one which is at the present time referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce. I therefore find the subamendment to be out of order.

If the question of credit as mentioned in our amendment was before the banking and commerce committee and therefore rendered our subamendment out of order, surely the fact that credit is also included in the main amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth causes it to be out of order. Further I would suggest that Your Honour should consider the amendment of the hon. member to whom I have referred, in the light of paragraph 397 appearing on page 127 of Beauchesne's Rules and Forms, as follows:

An amendment must not raise any question which by the rules of the house, can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice.

In other words the question of credit mentioned in the amendment is a substantive motion and does not refer to any particular part of the matter with which the budget deals. Therefore I would suggest that on both these grounds the matter cannot be discussed again in the amendment: first, that the question of credit is being dealt with by the banking and commerce committee under two measures, one the ordinary revision of the Bank Act and the other dealing with the question of a central bank; secondly, that it is a substantive motion of which notice should have been given, and that it is not germane to the main matters with which we have to deal. I would also say that the whole question of unemployment, which is mentioned in the amendment I have just quoted, has been dealt with by this house on a motion of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) on February 7, 1934, namely:

That, in the opinion of this house, in view of the large number of unemployed, and with the necessity of increasing the purchasing power of the people, it is expedient that the government give immediate consideration to the inauguration of a large scale program of public works to be financed by a direct issue of non-interest bearing dominion notes.

That includes not only the question of credit but also unemployment, both of which are mentioned in the amendment. The hon. member for Macleod discussed that resolution, which is at the present time on the order paper. Therefore, sir, I submit that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) is out of order for precisely the same reasons that our subamendment was ruled out of order the other day by yourself.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order raised by the hon. member, if I understood him aright he raised three specific issues. The first was that the question of credit referred to in the amendment is before the committee on banking and commerce, and the hon. member quoted marginal notation No. 397 to standing order 48:

An amendment must not raise any question which by the rules of the house, can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice.

At once, sir, I wish to submit that the citation of marginal notation No. 397 has nothing to do with the point of order. I think the hon. member knows that there are certain resolutions that require notice, and the mere fact of an amendment suggesting any of these questions which might come up on a substantive motion has nothing to do with the point of order.

Then the hon. member suggested that the question of economic nationalism was referred to in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), and that the question was previously disposed of in the debate on the address in reply. I suggest that after careful perusal of the motion for an address in reply and the amendment thereto moved by the official opposition you will find that there is no reference to the words "economic nationalism." We moved an amendment adding certain words—that His Excellency's present advisers have lost the confidence of the country. Therefore that point is not germane to the present issue.

Two points remain: first, that the question of credit is now before the committee on banking and commerce, and second, that the question of unemployment was disposed of in two previous debates, on the motion of Mr. Heaps, and on that of Mr. Coote, during the present session. I submit that the other day when I raised a point of order the question of national finance or national credit was concretely before this house in the form of a specific resolution moved by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) and was disposed of on a point of order raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). The general question of credit is always before this house and the banking and commerce committee, and therefore the reference to the word "credit" makes absolutely no difference. The question before the committee was a survey of what is known as national or social credit. I therefore submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Then in regard to the general reference to unemployment: two resolutions were mentioned, one proposed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), which dealt with a specific phase of the unemployment situation and offered specific remedies according to his ideas in the way of curtailing hours of labour, the redistribution of wealth, and the increase of purchasing power.

Mr. BENNETT: If I might interrupt, if the hon. member will look at page 73 of the votes and proceedings he will find the resolution is not quite that. The resolution of Mr. Woodsworth was:

> We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will insure to the farmer a decent standard of living.

Upon that the house divided. So it was frankly a question of unemployment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My right hon. friend is dealing with a point not raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine).

Mr. BENNETT: I could not hear very well what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He referred to an amendment moved by the official opposition which was by way of adding certain words, not substituting or deleting. Therefore I submit that the point of order in that regard is not well taken. Further I want to suggest this rule, that any resolution of the session referring to a particular phase of a general question, a general problem, does not bar an amendment or resolution dealing in general with the whole question. That is a well known rule of parliament. The resolution moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg dealt with the question of purchasing power and reduction of hours of labour. The resolution dealt with by Mr. Coote dealt with the issue of non-interest bearing dominion notes. I suggest that these motions therefore dealt with specific phases of the unemployment situation. It is all very well to resort to quibbles, but it would reduce parliamentary discussion to an absurdity if we were not allowed to refer to credit or unemployment in a general amendment to the budget. The specific question of national credit was dealt with on the motion of the hon. member for Camrose and is now before the banking and commerce committee. The general question of credit is not before that committee; it is before this house, as is the question of unemployment. I suggest that we certainly are entitled to move an amendment dealing broadly and generally with the two great questions of credit and unemployment.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I quite agree with a great part of what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). But some of us took precisely that ground when the question was up the other day with regard to the subamendment moved by two members of this group. I believe that the amendment of the official opposition is in order. I believe that our amendment was in order. I cannot see why it should be said that national credit belongs to one particular category and credit belongs to another; that one particular kind of unemployment belongs to one category and another kind of unemployment to another. It seems to me that by ruling out the subamendment the other day we in reality reduced the proceedings of this house to an absurdity. That is the only reason why I feel that I should support a position such as that taken by the hon. member for Wetaski-win (Mr. Irvine). If the house has definitely decided that this kind of motion is out of order, it is right that we should deal in the same way with other motions of the same kind. That is my position. Personally I submit that this amendment is in order, as I considered our amendment in order. But justice is more important than technicalities; if the one was ruled out of order the other should be ruled out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one distinction between the amendment that has been moved by the official opposition and the one referred to by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, which I think should be drawn to your honour's attention. The amendment of the official opposition says nothing at all with respect to the particular policies on credit or unemployment which are referred to in the amendment. The amendment is solely to the application of any policies, whether they be the policies of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) or the policies of the official opposition. The amendment distinctly reads:

> It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect that end.

There is no controversy in the mind of any of us as to the policies recommended by hon. gentlemen in the far corner being designed, from their point of view, to effect the end of improving conditions. We are in agreement as to that; they may be different policies from these which we are proposing, but this amendment says that it would not matter whether the policies of the members of the C.C.F. group or those of the official opposition were to be the policies of the day, that they could not be effectively applied unless in some way the policies with respect to export trade were of such a character as to improve trade as such. I submit therefore that there is a distinction between the two amendments that is vital, and altogether apart from discussing the previous ruling of Your Honour the amendment which is now being called in question seems to be perfectly regular inasmuch as it relates to the application of policies in general, and not to the question of specific policies with respect either to credit or to employment.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): When the other day this matter was being discussed, on the point of order then raised I asked the Speaker whether or not that applied to the whole of the subamendment, because it contained certain words about which I had the gravest doubt. I still have that doubt. The question, however, is this: Can the house twice debate and arrive at a conclusion with regard to the same matter during the same session? If the amendment proposes to review the decision already arrived at, then I think the amendment is out of order. I think we have held that too frequently to have it further discussed. The amendment of the official opposition first of all alleges what are the policies of the government and then states that the opposition favours the substitution therefor of certain other policies which are named. With respect to one of these there might be a very debatable question as to whether it has been discussed this session in the sense of a conclusion having been arrived at. When the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) was making his observations I remembered that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), following the general amendment moved by hon. gentleman opposite to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, moved an amendment which I have just read, and which I hesitate to read a second time. However, his words were:

> We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will insure to the farmer a decent standard of living.

Rightly or wrongly the house divided on that question and by a vote of 54 to 89 determined for this session that the government of the day had not failed to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt or to put the agricultural industry on a basis that would ensure to the farmer a decent standard of living. Whatever in the amendment to the motion to go into supply is at variance with that in my judgment should be stricken out, following the course of reasoning that always has been adopted in parliament, namely that you never would cease to debate if you continued, sitting after sitting, to discuss a matter already disposed of. It is quite clear that when this house voted upon the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), for this session it did dispose of those matters; I think we all agree with respect to that. Instead of limiting the amendment to a specific matter they dealt with three broad, general policies, unemployment, agriculture and the public debt, and in connection with all three they asked that the attitude of the government be challenged. That has been done; the vote has been taken, and I do submit that this phase of the matter is disposed of.

It will be recalled that it was decided by your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, that with respect to matters that were already on the order paper an amendment could not be offered to the motion later submitted to the house. That was in connection with the natural resources debate. An effort was being made by the late hon. member for Frontenac-Addington to move an amendment on going into supply, and the resolution upon the order paper precluded him from doing so because it was held that you could not anticipate, by a motion on going into supply, a matter that was to be the subject of debate. As a matter of fact the marketing bill had been submitted to this house and had received first reading before the amendment was moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). That bill does deal with the export trade; the very title states that it is desirable to encourage export trade. Whether or not you should place a more limited construction upon those words than their broad and general meaning would indicate I am not going to argue, because last session I did indicate what I should like to repeat now: When an opposition, whether it be the official or the unofficial opposition, see fit to move amendments to the address challenging the specific policies of the government, and a vote is taken which is adverse to them, they cannot again during that session move the same amendment. That is one of the risks that must be taken. Whether or not they sufficiently amplified their position when they first moved the amendment is not for me to say, but it is obvious that they cannot move the amendment a second time on going into supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There can be a general discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: I submit that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will not say that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does not deal with three specific policies of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But this is general.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and so are they; most general. The amendment of the official opposition now deals with export trade, the permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment, and so on. Certainly with respect to employment there is no doubt that this matter has been canvassed and argued for this session, and the vote has been taken. With respect to credit it might be said—I am not going to labour the point—that it has been disposed of also because of the votes that were taken on the general motion that the government had lost the confidence of the house. In addition, however, we had the discussions on the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act, and the motion of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) with respect to the issue of non-interest bearing securities. In all those matters the house dealt with that subject. I do not know that there has been a careful decision given by the chair as to how far the discussion of these matters on the address, when a vote is taken, precludes the possibility of raising them again in somewhat different words on going into supply. I have pointed out, as I do again, that when on the address in reply to the speech from the throne you see fit to challenge the policies of the government and specify the general policies to which objection is taken, you cannot again challenge them on going into supply, and that is just what this amendment does in at least three points.

The other day I raised the question, which is still uncertain in my own mind, as to whether or not the subamendment moved by the unofficial opposition, in terms negativing the motion to go into supply by substituting for that motion a portion of the amendment moved by the official opposition, to which was added the view of the unofficial opposition as to what the policy should be, was in order. The Speaker, with the approval of the house subsequently given, ruled that this was out of order. I may say that I am wholly in accord with that view except with regard to one item; it is true that it is a small item, but in my judgment the house has not yet dealt with it.

With respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, every one, but two, of the matters contained therein has already been dealt with by this house on recorded votes, or, what is more important, those questions are now upon the order paper and open for discussion. Such procedure is precluded by a rule about which, at the time it was given by your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, I had some doubt, but which upon subsequent investigations I satisfied myself was absolutely sound, namely, that if in good faith there is placed upon the order paper—and I say in good faith, because I fancy the house would be quick to deal with a question which was merely intended for purposes of embarrassment—if a resolution had been placed upon the order paper for discussion, and then it was sought, upon amendment going into supply, to deal with it, it is out of order because you anticipate a discussion which must take place. On the two grounds the amendment—not in its entirety, in my judgment—must fall, first, because it endeavours again to revive for discussion in this house questions of which this house has disposed by recorded votes and, secondly, because in its terms it anticipates matters which are already upon the order paper, and with which this house has partially dealt and is about to continue to deal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before he concludes his argument may I ask the Prime Minister a question? As I take it, the point in my right hon. friend's contention revolves around the exact meaning to be attached to the expression "matter disposed of." I would submit to my right hon. friend that if he construes the expression "matter disposed of" as applying to general conditions or to matter or matters, used in a general sense, rather than to a specific matter, there would be no opportunity for debate, discussion or amendments of any kind. It surely must relate only to specific acts or policies which have been discussed and disposed of. As an instance I would mention a motion by the opposition to the effect that the government does not any longer enjoy the confidence of the house. My right hon. friend's contention is that if that motion is moved once in a session it cannot be moved a second time whereas, as my right hon. friend knows, it may as a matter of fact be moved fifty times, if we follow the rules which have heretofore been followed. The rules must be considered in a broad and liberal way so as to permit discussion, and it is important that the Prime Minister should not place upon the words the limited and restricted interpretation which he has just given.

Mr. BENNETT: Although I have exhausted my right to speak, I should like to answer the question asked by the right hon. gentleman. I think that when the resolution is moved stating that the government has lost the confidence of the house it must necessarily, under our representative institutions, always be in order, because the British North America Act itself provides that a government must command the support of a majority in the house. One of the methods by which that point can instantly be raised is that any hon. member any time, subject to the general rules and decorum, may make the motion that a government has lost the confidence of the house. Then a vote may be taken accordingly. That is a motion, which, of course, having regard to the British North America Act must always be in order. But the general rule of procedure in all deliberative assemblies is that once, during a session, a matter has been disposed of—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A specific matter.

Mr. BENNETT: —it cannot be raised again. Could you have anything more specific than the motion made on the speech from the throne by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He challenged the government on three general policies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth deals with the application of policies with respect to credit and employment, designed to meet that end. That might mean new policies which have not been discussed in this house at all. It is the application of policies with respect to credit and employment. It might mean new policies, or policies not discussed previously in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Unfortunately it does not say that; that is the difficulty. Exactly the same point arose with respect to anticipation. When we had a motion on the order paper, and a motion going into supply, we were assured that members were not going to discuss a matter from the same point of view at all. But because the motion covered the same matter the Speaker ruled it could not be done. Here we have the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth stating that government policies with respect to three matters are inimical to the best interests of the country. And in this motion we have a declaration to the same effect with respect to at least two of them. As a matter of fact I am very anxious that whatever is done in a matter of this kind should be done properly. We should not hasten in the matter, because it is very serious. Always, when an amendment to go into supply is dealt with one feels that the widest latitude should be enjoyed by those hon. gentlemen sitting opposite in making any motion which in their wisdom they think it desirable to make, any motion indicating their disapproval of the conduct of the government in the affairs of the country. But, as I pointed out last year and again point out, if they see fit to anticipate that they must take the risk of having a double debate with respect to some matters, a practice which I believe the rules are intended to prevent. No hon. member looking up Hansard will deny that very many of the speeches were almost identical in terms with the language used here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why not?

Mr. BENNETT: I am simply answering that the "why not" is the reason that this is out of order. That is why not, exactly. It is not intended that at the same session the same speeches should be made on the same matter. One is on the ground of economy, and the other is that a conclusion already arrived at should not be challenged.

I am not expressing any opinion about the matter other than to indicate that as I read the rules—and I made this statement last session as I had made it before—if an opposition challenges a government's policy as reflected in the speech from the throne to the extent of moving an amendment and taking a vote, it then is precluded from challenging those same policies on a motion to go into supply, and taking a vote on the same matter. The right hon. gentleman is entirely right when he states my point is that the question is whether or not the amendment now before the house challenges the policy of the government on the same grounds or with respect to matters dealt with previously in the amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This is a matter of considerable importance, and one which I think should be very carefully considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the Prime Minister's reasoning not make it possible for the government to preclude a debate on any question during a session by just having an amendment introduced of an omnibus nature which would offer criticism of all government policies? That is what it comes to.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say that my view of the rules is that they are intended to prevent a second discussion on any matter which has been either affirmatively or negatively determined by a vote of the house. If a resolution has been moved, seconded and passed by the House of Commons that resolution cannot again become a subject matter in a session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not a specific matter,—but a general matter, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no distinction between specific and general; otherwise the rule would have no value. Speeches on general matters are amplified and illustrated from specific instances, and it seems to me somewhat anomalous that a man can condemn a policy of government with respect to a general program it is endeavouring to carry out, and then say, "Now, I am going to move a vote of want of confidence with respect to the same matter by taking one part from it and making it the subject matter of an amendment to go into supply." It might be made the subject matter of a motion of no confidence in another way, but that is not the matter we now have under consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the importance of the point raised I should prefer to reserve my decision until the discussion comes on again. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth who moved the amendment is not here, and the effect of his amendment in relation to Bill No. 51 has been raised I think for the first time. I should not like to see the hon. member who moved that amendment taken by surprise and therefore, if it meets with the approval of the house, I shall reserve my decision for the time being.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations on the question before the house I should like first of all to extend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) my congratulations on the excellent manner in which he delivered the budget speech and also on the excellent matter which the speech contained, and particularly the full review which he made of conditions throughout the country for the benefit of the people.

We have just had a discussion on a point of order raised in regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and therefore I think it will not be necessary for me to put on record again the wording of that amendment, but I should like to refer to some of the remarks which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth made in support of his amendment and with reference to the budget as a whole. Early in his speech he said:

> This budget is born of policies which are diametrically opposed to those which we endorse and which we believe to be for the benefit of Canada.

That brings up for review just what the policies of the government are so far as Canada is concerned, and also just what the policies of the opposition are for this country. I should like to refer for a few minutes to the policies of this government as laid down during the last election campaign. I think the house will agree with me that the most outstanding feature of the policies laid down by this government during the last campaign was a different system of taxation, one that is generally known as the protective policy. The Conservative party—this is my interpretation, at all events—claimed that the policies of the Liberal government had not had due regard to the protection of the different industries of the country and the welfare of the people.

I think it will be taken for granted that the result of the election was a demand that the policies as laid down by the Conservative party were the ones which should be put into operation in this country. We promised the people that we would increase the tariff taxation so as to improve conditions throughout this country, and I do not think there is anyone who will argue that we have not implemented that promise. Indeed, I think the consensus of opinion on the other side of the house is that we have increased those tariff duties to too great an extent. That being so, and taking it for granted that the opposition are going to do what they say, namely, reduce those tariff duties should they come into power, I think it is just as well for us to see what has been the result of the imposition of those tariff duties.

In the first place I do not think it is open to argument that tariffs throughout the world have been raised very materially during the last six or seven years, and that the raising of those tariffs was not coincident with the coming into power of the Conservative party in this country. Long before we came into power the different countries of the world had been continually raising their tariffs, and our complaint was that the Liberal government then in power was not following the example of other countries in raising our tariffs, and that consequently the people of this country of all classes and all occupations were suffering hardship. In other words, Canada was being exposed to the dumping of all the surplus products of the world on account of the low tariffs prevailing in this country. The result was that people were thrown out of employment in this country, and many of our producers were put in a position where they were unable to earn a livelihood, their market was ruined, and unemployment was gradually growing worse.

Now I want to bring to the attention of the house a few factors in relation to that general subject. I want to refer to the province of British Columbia in the first place, and I give this statement to the house, that before the advent of the Conservative party to power in this country the dairy men of the province of British Columbia were very much dissatisfied with conditions in their industry. It was pointed out to them that on account of the low tariff maintained by the Liberal government they were not receiving a reasonable return for their products, that their neighbours immediately across the international boundary were protected by a higher tariff and were enjoying higher prices, and were able to dump some of their surplus into this country to the disadvantage of our own producers.

When the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth says in his amendment that the policies of the Liberal party are diametrically opposed to the policies which are in effect under this government, I suppose he means that if the Liberal party were to come into power they would do away with the protection which the dairy man is enjoying. Will my hon. friends from British Columbia on the other side of the house go back to British Columbia and endorse a program of that kind in the next campaign? I think not. And the same thing applies to the fruit growers in British Columbia. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that during the regime of our Liberal friends the fruit growers in British Columbia were suffering severe handicaps. They were subjected to very unfair competition from the other side of the line. They asked for redress from the Liberal government and they were unable to get satisfactory redress. But since this government has come into power the fruit growers of British Columbia have been enjoying the benefit of their own market, and I fail to see how the fruit growers of that province or of any other part of Canada will take very kindly to the statement made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth when he suggests that should the Liberal party come into power they are going to put into effect policies which are diametrically opposed to the policies now in force under the Conservative party.

I wish to say a few words in regard to lumber. My hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth makes some interesting remarks in his speech on the budget at page 2437 of Hansard, in the second column:

> Let me give my hon. friend an example of how the duties they have put on have hurt our exports. This government put on sharp increases of tariff against the United States.

Note that statement: "This government put on sharp increases of tariff against the United States." Well, probably that is so, but which country was the first to impose the duties? Did Canada impose duties against United States lumber before the United States imposed duties against our lumber? I think not. But this statement would lead one to believe that.

> The United States put on an import tax of $3 and a duty of $1 against our lumber.

That is a fair statement.

> The result was an imposition of $4 against us.

Quite right.

> We then to find a market for our lumber included it in our treaty with Great Britain.

Quite correct.

> What has occurred in connection with our timber exports to the United States due to the high duties which were put on against that country?

Was it because we put on high duties against that country, that we could not export lumber to the United States? I do not think that is a fair statement at all. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth knows perfectly that we were enjoying a very nice trade in lumber with the United States until they themselves put on duties which very largely prohibited that trade; and so far as British Columbia was concerned we lost a very large and valuable market for our lumber. What did this government have to do? They could not do anything to lower the duties on goods going into the United States, because we have no control over the duties which the United States imposes. But we did have to turn round and see whether we could not find alternative markets, and in our search for such markets lumber was included in the Ottawa agreements. Since that time we have had very large and increasing exports of our lumber from British Columbia, until at the present time the industry in that province is in a very flourishing condition, or was until there was some labour trouble last winter. Those troubles however are being overcome I believe. But the point is that the market to the south of us having been taken away from us, not by any action on the part of this government, not by the imposition of high duties by this government but solely by the action of the American government in imposing duties on our products into that country, this government had to find and succeeded in finding an alternative market, for which I think they should be given some credit.

Will my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth say that if the Liberal party is returned to power it proposes to do away with the Ottawa agreements, with the tariff on lumber coming into Canada, and go to the United States Congress and ask them to remove their duties on lumber so that we may be allowed to ship our lumber into the American market? Well, I do not know. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

> In 1930 we exported to the United States $26,000,000 worth of planks and boards; in 1933 we exported only $6,000,000 worth of planks and boards, a drop of $20,000,000.

Well, that was not our fault.

> My hon. friends think we got a market in the United Kingdom. In 1930 we exported to the United Kingdom $5,500,000 worth; in 1933 we exported $7,600,000 worth. We had a gain of $2,000,000 to the United Kingdom but we lost $20,000,000 in exports of lumber to the United States.

I submit that the two question have no relation at all to each other. It was not the action of this government that deprived us of the opportunity of disposing of our goods in the United States, but it certainly was to the credit of this government that that market to the south of us having been shut off, we were able to find an alternative market in Britain. And I think that if the Liberal party does come into power it will hesitate a long time before it destroys the effects of that market for our product.

Then there is the cattle business, which is exactly on the same basis. Canada did not raise the tariff against United States cattle; it was the United States that raised their tariff against Canadian cattle and therefore shut our cattle out of that market entirely, and we had to do exactly the same thing as far as our cattle were concerned. Our cattle trade became depressed. We were in the habit of sending 100,000 head of cattle to the United States market every year, and that market was deliberately taken from us by action of the United States Senate itself, carrying on its own business in its own way, but to the detriment of the people of Canada, and this government has had to find an alternative market for the cattle trade of the dominion. The government had to exercise a great deal of energy, to spend some money and to take an interest in the cattle market in order to build up an export market for our surplus cattle. They have not only spent a good deal of time in organizing the trade, in finding markets, in assisting shippers and breeders and sellers and everyone else to find a suitable market, but as well they have had to spend a sum of money in the rigging up of ships for instance. When there developed a shortage in shipping space this government did not hesitate to spend a few thousand dollars to rig up ships so that they might be available to transport our cattle to the other side of the water. Not only that, but they took in hand also, with the shipping companies, the question of reducing rates, so that we find that a substantial reduction has been made in the freight rates on cattle between this country and the old land since the advent of this government.

According to the statement made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, all that will be done away with when the Liberal party comes into power. I want the people of this country, and especially the people of my own district, to note the fact that all these benefits which have accrued from the operations of the Conservative government, who have intelligently run the affairs of the country, will be lost; and I ask, where will that land us. It will subject the people again to the same sort of unfair competition from all parts of the world, in all kinds of surplus merchandise, to which they were subject when we came into power in 1930.

The hon. gentleman then goes on to compare the surplus in the British budget with the deficit in the Canadian budget. He points out that they have a surplus of £30,000,000 whereas we have a deficit of $23,000,000, or something like that, and he said that this result has been obtained when the customs duties were not gallows high. He did not go further, but he might have gone a little further and reminded the people that it might be as a result of the imposition of customs duties that they had a surplus in the old land. It might be as a result of the fact that they have reversed their policy of a hundred years from free trade to a policy of customs duties. That may have some bearing on the fact that they have an actual surplus there; I do not know whether it has or to what extent it exists. At any rate our friend did not mention the fact that the surplus in the old country came about shortly after there was a reversal of the free trade policy of Great Britain.

He then criticizes this government for increasing the sales tax from one to six per cent. That is nothing new so far as the dominion government is concerned. The Liberal party themselves have a record of increasing the sales tax; I do not know where it stood when they started increasing it, but I think it was two per cent and they increased it to six per cent. The hon. member criticizes us because we imposed a three per cent excise tax. The excise tax is nothing new although the actual incidence of it may be a little heavier; we did not engineer any new tax.

The reduction in the income exemptions, the reduction in the sales tax exemptions—all these constitute increases in taxation which he very much decries and which he points out to the people as something for which this government should be held strictly responsible, for which it should be censured, if you like, perhaps voted against and maybe kicked out of office at the first opportunity. I do not know about that, but we have plenty of precedents for imposing taxes of that kind.

Let me say this to hon. gentlemen opposite: Had it not been for the unwise and extravagant policies of the preceding Liberal administration we would not have had so many bills to pay and we would not have had to impose so many taxes as we have at present. Their extravagant policies all over the country are responsible as much as anything else for the conditions we find throughout the dominion and they constitute one of the reasons this government has found it absolutely necessary to impose new taxes and also to increase existing ones.

Let us look at some of the things for which we have been paying. For instance, the government did not create the Canadian National Railway deficits; we are paying $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year of the money of the Canadian taxpayers in order to keep that railway going. Who built it up to its present proportions? Who created that deficit? Who was it that continued those extravagant expenditures in providing all kinds of unnecessary equipment and other facilities for carrying on that railway? The former Liberal government, while they were in office from 1923 to 1930, increased the annual interest charge of the Canadian National Railways to the people of the dominion by $20,000,000. That is a very serious amount to have to raise in addition to the ordinary revenue. This government did not create the unemployment situation which it found when it came into office. No one will for a minute contend that unemployment was brought into effect after the Conservative government came into power. It was one of the main issues in the election campaign and it has cost us quite a substantial sum of money.

What about the conditions that we find with regard to production throughout Canada, particularly in the west where we have had what one might term a national disaster, especially in that part of Saskatchewan and some parts of Manitoba and Alberta where crops have been very bad? In fact, in some parts they have not had crops for three or four years. That has had a depressing effect upon conditions generally and this government has had to provide the means to take care of the people in those districts. We have also had to face world contraction not only of trade but of prices and everything else. This government did not make those conditions throughout the world but it has tried to do the best it could in order to meet conditions as it found them. The hon. member has found fault with us because in an effort to meet that situation we have increased the national debt by $594,000,000. The member for Shelburne-Yarmouth says that we have increased the debt by that amount, so it must be so and we shall have to face the situation, but are all these matters to be charged to the Conservative government? In the first place I wonder whether our hon. friends remember what commitments or unfulfilled obligations they handed on to this government when in 1930 they were asked by the people to retire? I have not yet heard anyone say anything about those obligations, but I want to remind my hon. friends now that when they went out of office they left behind them unfulfilled obligations amounting to $254,000,000. This government did the best it could; it compromised or settled them in some shape or form. I do not for one minute mean to say that the government has paid $254,000,000, but that is the amount of unfulfilled obligations that it found on its doorstep and that takes a big slice out of the $594,000,000. For my part I do not propose to sit in the house and listen to the opposition decrying the addition that has been made to the debt of this country without protesting that we have some reason for adding to that debt in the fact that our hon. friends opposite left this $254,000,000 of unfulfilled obligations on our doorstep when they went out of office. In addition to that we have paid $130,000,000 for unemployment relief; we have lent the provinces $50,000,000 and we have paid $200,000,000 in the way of deficits on account of the Canadian National Railways. When one considers these amounts in their relation to the increase in the public debt, I do not think anyone in Canada can find so very much fault with the present government. As a matter of fact, hon. gentlemen opposite will have a great deal of trouble in trying to convince the Canadian people that all the blame for these conditions is to be laid at the doorstep of the Conservative government at present in power.

When the Conservatives came into power, the country had an unfavourable trade balance amounting to some $90,000,000; that has been transformed into a favourable trade balance of $152,000,000. There are two ways of looking at trade balances. Someone may say that they do not make any difference, but I look at the matter in this way; a favourable trade balance should be aimed at because it assists in paying our bills abroad. It is just like a man with a certain income; if he has sufficient money coming in to look after his requirements, he is on happy ground; if his liabilities are a little greater than his resources to meet them, he is in trouble all round. The situation is just about the same with a country as it is with an individual except that it is on a larger scale.

We also hear the opposition continually endeavouring to create among the people the impression that we are in some way doing nothing towards building up our foreign trade. Now I do not find anything in that. We hear hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house from day to day and week to week telling us that we should expand our foreign market, that we are losing our foreign market, are not taking care of our foreign trade. On reviewing the situation I do not see that we are doing very differently from what the Liberal government did, except that we are paying more attention to it and putting more intelligent effort into the expansion of our foreign trade. The figures are available to every hon. member. Here are some statistics relating to our trade with the United Kingdom and the United States and other countries:

	1929	1933	Increase	Decrease
United Kingdom—
Percentage of exports	31.5	38.9	7.4	....
Percentage of imports	15.3	21.2	5.9	....
United States—
Percentage of exports	36.7	30.2	...	6.5
Percentage of imports	68.6	57.2	...	11.4
Other countries—
Percentage of exports	22.8	30.9	7.1	....
Percentage of imports	16.1	21.6	5.5	....

So that neither in the exports to nor the imports from the United Kingdom have we had any decrease, but on the contrary an increase in both. With the United States our exports as well as our imports have shown a decrease. I think hon. gentlemen will remember that one of the things with which the Conservative opposition charged the Liberal government was that there was too large an adverse balance of trade with the United States, and it should be brought more nearly into balance. We have brought it more nearly into balance. The other night the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Golding) made the statement that we had promised that we were going to eliminate entirely the adverse trade balance with the United States but we still have an adverse trade balance with them of $138,000,000. True we still have that adverse balance with the United States and probably will have it for a long time to come, but our effort has been to cut it down as much as possible. Let me point out what we have accomplished in that respect. In 1929 our adverse trade balance with the United States was $350,000,000. I think we have done very well to bring it down to $138,000,000 in the time this government has been in office and under the conditions that have prevailed. I think that is a matter for congratulation instead of criticism. At any rate we have decreased our imports from the United States in proportion to our total imports by 11·4 per cent, reducing the actual adverse balance from something like $350,000,000 to $138,000,000.

Then hon. gentlemen say we must expand our foreign trade. But in both exports and imports we have increased our foreign trade. We are putting intelligent efforts behind it, and the result shows in the returns which are tabled in the house, to which every hon. member has access. So there is nothing in this eternal and constant reiteration of the statement that this government does not realize the necessity for foreign trade. My observations lead me to believe that constant and intelligent effort is being made to develop foreign trade, so that we may balance up and live happily ever afterwards. The general impression one would gather from discussions in this house is that this is an all-round no-good government, that it does not do anything, any time, anywhere.

Mr. NEILL: Don't mention it.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Is that the lumberman from Vancouver? I am sorry he was not in the house to listen to my dissertation on the lumber business, because he is one who did not think the Ottawa agreements were going to do us any good. But ask him to-day and see what he thinks. To-day they are prospering instead of being down in the dumps; he is laughing every day.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: More promises!

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Let us see some things that this government has done since it came into power. In the first place we did one grand big job in revising the tariff, we revised it upward. They blame us for being high tariff people, say that our tariffs are as high as Haman's gallows and all that. Now the question whether the tariff is high or low is not an interesting one to the Conservative party; the important question is: Is it high enough to be effective? Is it high enough to do the work it is intended to do, that is take care of unemployment and of general conditions in this country, to give this country a fair deal?

Mr. DENIS: With what success?

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I am a little dull of hearing, I did not get it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is a good fault.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): This government promised that they would raise the tariff. They went right at it in the proper way. When they revised the tariff they made a real revision, and it has been very effective. Since that tariff went into operation we see things getting back to normal; we see the benefit. You cannot pick up a newspaper without seeing encouraging reports of reviving industry throughout this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The gold tax!

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Of course I do not expect to make the Liberal opposition see this, but as far as I am concerned I have no hesitation in saying that ninety-nine per cent of it is due to the policies of this government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Including the gold tax.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I shall talk about the gold tax in a minute. I notice you do not say much about the gold tax yourself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not like it.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Then we have had to handle this unemployment problem every year since this government came into office. We have spent $130,000,000 but what did this opposition tell us in 1930? I wonder if there are any here who heard that "five cent" speech—"not a five cent piece," and that kind of nonsense. This government having promised that they would take care of unemployment as well as they could have up to date spent $130,000,000. I wonder if the public want to go back and be left to their own resources. What would have happened to a lot of people had this government not come to their assistance, for instance the people of southern Saskatchewan where they had four or five successive crop failures?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Then in addition to taking care of unemployment, which has occasioned a great deal of discussion, we also gave the wheat farmers of the prairies a bonus on their production one year.

Mr. DENIS: Only for the west.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Yes, but they are the people who are hard up; they need it most. Everyone wants more money, and there is always plenty more back in the east; at least that is the opinion of the people in the west. We not only bonused the wheat growers; in addition to that we financed the whole operation of purchasing that wheat crop. I thought I heard my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) laugh at that.

Mr. VALLANCE: Oh, no.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): As a matter of fact the wheat growers would have been very badly off if this government had not undertaken the financing of that wheat crop; they would have tried to deliver their wheat but no one would have been there to receive it or pay for it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why?

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Because they would not have put their money into it; they would not have given twenty-five cents a bushel for the wheat if this government had not stood behind them and said, "Here, these men must have a certain amount of money."

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I hardly got started.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) on his interesting speech, though I shall not attempt to follow him. The hon. gentleman must be in the inner councils of the government; after listening to his purely political speech one would think there must be an election just around the corner. I am not going to answer his speech but I should like to discuss the lumber situation for a few moments.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was in Vancouver in January he attended a meeting held under the auspices of the board of trade, and made a very good speech before a very large gathering. Just here let me say that I am not going to touch on very many subjects. I have been in the lumber business all my life, however, and a good deal has been said in this house in regard to lumber both by those who do know and those who do not know about it. During the course of his remarks the Prime Minister complimented the lumber industry of British Columbia for setting up an all time record of lumber exports during 1933. I do not accuse the Prime Minister of having made a misstatement; I believe he misunderstood the statement that was handed to him by someone, but I want to give the correct figures. In 1929 our exports of lumber from the dominion totalled 1,696,110,000 feet, valued at $47,663,849, or about $28 per thousand. In 1933 the total exports of lumber from Canada amounted to 619,675,000 feet, valued at about $11,098,675, or roughly $18 per thousand feet. That is the picture; in 1929 we expected about three times as much as we expected in 1933. No doubt some of the Prime Minister's friends told him we had made an all time record in that year.

Here is another feature of the situation. In 1933 we exported something over 313,000,000 feet to Great Britain and 306,000,000 feet to other countries. For the 313,000,000 feet we received $5,341,000; for the smaller amount of 306,000,000 feet we received a larger return, $5,757,000. Those are the actual figures; there is nothing political about that.

My hon. friend from Cariboo has left the chamber; I am sorry, because I am just coming to something that might be of interest to him. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) gave this house some interesting figures on April 23, appearing at page 2437 of Hansard, which proved beyond a doubt that while our lumber exports to Great Britain have increased we have lost a great deal of business in the way of exports to the United States. Let me give the house the lumber shipments from British Columbia to the United States for the years 1929 to 1933 inclusive:

	Feet
1929	654,701,000
1930	579,390,000
1931	308,422,000
1932	101,484,000
1933	35,000,000

Later I will attempt to show why, in my opinion, our exports to the United States have fallen off. Now let me give the house the total shipments of timber from British Columbia to the United Kingdom for the same period:

	Feet
1929	69,903,655
1930	98,037,621
1931	81,356,058
1932	108,314,682
1933	270,208,051

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite true that our exports to Great Britain have increased, but in proportion our exports to the United States have decreased very much more. To-day we are still over 300,000,000 feet short of taking up the slack of the loss of the United States market alone, to say nothing of the terrific shrinkage in the Canadian market. During 1933 our total production was fifty-two per cent of the production of 1929. They tell us that in British Columbia the lumber business is booming, but that was how the production of 1933 compared with 1929, and the average sale price in 1929 was $21.50 per thousand feet, while in 1933 it was $13.50. I do not know why, but they say that in British Columbia the lumber business is prospering. No one in Canada would be better pleased than I if that were the case, because I am financially interested, but since I have come to Ottawa in 1930 we have done very little business in lumber. An analysis shows that the Canadian market absorbed 690,831,000 less feet of our lumber in 1933 than in 1929, and that the United States took 551,500,000 less feet in 1933 than in 1929. I notice that the hon. member for Cariboo has left the chamber; he might be interested.

Speaking in this chamber on October 26, 1932, I made the statement that in my opinion the lumber business in Canada would not get back to anything like normal conditions until we got back into the United States market. For years the Pacific coast states have been asking for a higher rate of duty or tax on Canadian lumber going into the United States, but until 1932 they could not get Washington to act. During 1931 and 1932 a very strong lobby movement was engineered by the Pacific coast states to raise the tariff or put a tax on Canadian lumber imports into that country, and finally the argument was advanced that through her imperial conference treaties Canada was raising her tariffs against the United States, through preferences granted to other countries. Let me quote some of the statements which were made in Washington in support of the proposed increase in the tariff or tax on Canadian lumber. The Pacific coast lobbyists made a very strong move for the imposition of extra tax, or duty, whichever you choose to call it. As evidence of the points I have made I shall read from the proceedings before the Senate finance committee on the Revenue Act of 1932. I quote from the evidence of Mr. W. B. Greeley, Secretary and Manager of the West Coast Lumber Association. At page 636 of the evidence I find the following:

Mr. Greeley: What has happened, Senator Couzens, is that with the tariff and shrinkage in our home consumption, as I mentioned, with a corresponding shrinkage in our export business because of depreciated currency difficulties, and the preferential tariffs that have to-day practically shut us out of the British empire and all its dominions, and because of the foreign regulations and quotas that have shut us completely out of France, our industry is prostrated.

Senator Couzens: So those are the real reasons that you are asking this to-day?

Mr. Greeley: Those are reasons, Senator, and the real primary reason is that seventy-five per cent of our men are unemployed. Now, when you consider the communities in which these men lived, it is a very critical situation.

Senator Gore: You have no way of telling why these preferential rates were granted and the quotas cut to keep out our stuff?

In other words, lumber.

Mr. Greeley: Oh, I know the common reason that is given, or the reason that is commonly cited is that it was in retaliation against us in this country. I am no expert on those subjects, but I do know, so far as our tariff is concerned, there are no tariffs that keep a single pound of foreign wood pulp production out of the United States.

On the other hand, we are in a position where their preferential tariffs benefit them and they shut us out. And while our friends in British Columbia are steadily increasing their exporting business, and are running their mills at capacity, we are shut off from the export business and have a shrinkage in our home market which has just reached a point where the industry is going to pieces.

Senator Thomas (Idaho): Mr. Greeley, is Russia a competitor here?

Mr. Greeley: In a mild way, Senator. They range from a maximum of 70,000,000 feet to about 14,000,000 feet in 1931, which is not, of course, an important quantity. The Russian imports of pulpwood, however, have been a very substantial factor at one time or another, and a very serious threat to our pulpwood industry.

Senator Gore: Does Canada get preferential rates in England under this new tariff?

Mr. Greeley: Yes, ten per cent.

Senator Gore: When did that go into effect?

Mr. Greeley: It went into effect on the 1st of March. The trade agreement between Canada and Australia levied a preferential tariff against America of twenty shillings per thousand feet. This is on rough lumber. That has been operating almost a year, and has kept the American lumber out of the Australian market. And the same thing is happening in Great Britain and in Africa. In other words, we have had this double burden: This shrinkage in our home market, and this competition in our home market from British Columbia. We have had a very rapid loss in our domestic market.

Then, at page 642 of the proceedings under the Revenue Act of 1932 Senator Greeley made this statement:

The preferential tariffs within the British empire, are rapidly closing many important former markets to American lumber. The trade agreement between Australia and Canada made effective nearly a year ago, gives the Canadian lumber exporter a preference of twenty shillings per thousand board feet on the usual Douglas fir items, and has largely shut out American lumber from this market. South Africa gives Canadian lumber a preferential tariff of three per cent; Great Britain a preferential tariff of ten per cent, with every indication that it will be materially increased in pursuance of the British empire trade policy. American lumber exports to Great Britain have already shrunk materially; and that market will hereafter be practically closed to our saw mills.

At page 665 of the same proceedings, Mr. R. M. Ingram, secretary and sales manager of the E. C. Miller Cedar Lumber Company, of Aberdeen, Washington, stated:

On Grays harbour we market exports, intercoastal and rail. Our export markets are practically gone because of British empire preferentials in Australia, New Zealand, England and import tariffs into Canada. Japan has been lost because of the difference in exchange, France because of quotas and embargos. Our intercoastal business is fast being superceded, what little there is left, by Canadian lumber and shingles.

The following statement made by Mr. C. C. Sheppard, of the Southern Pine Association, is taken from page 11202 of the Congressional Record:

Whereas the lumber industry of the United States is now operating at approximately 20 per cent of capacity, and with the many communities in the south dependent entirely upon the saw mills, thousands of families are undergoing extreme hardship and privation because of the forced curtailment of lumber production; and

Whereas Canadian trade agreements with Australia, South Africa, England, Ireland and Scotland, preferential duties of other countries and the general depreciation of foreign currency have practically eliminated the exportation of lumber by the United States to countries which heretofore have consumed tremendous quantities; and

Whereas, with only the domestic markets remaining, and these being on an extremely subnormal basis of consumption, the lumber manufacturers are forced with the dumpage of surplusage by Canadian producers, who are protected by higher prices in British-controlled territories, and with the importations of lumber produced in Russia from confiscated timber with convict or forced labour.

Page 11278 of the Congressional Record contains the following statement by Senator Jones from Washington:

The lumber industry of the United States is now operating at approximately 20 per cent of its capacity. The object of this amendment is to provide an equalization of competitive conditions for the American forest industry. It has been stated, and I assume that it is true, that Canadian trade agreements with Australia, South Africa, England, Ireland and Scotland provide for preferential duties over other countries, and the general depreciation of foreign currencies has practically eliminated the exportation of lumber by the United States to countries which heretofore have consumed tremendous quantities.

At page 11287 Senator Nye said:

One of the arguments advanced as a reason for a tariff on Canadian lumber is the preferential tariff agreements between Canada and Australia and the United Kingdom, which it is alleged shut the domestic exporter out of the Australia and English markets.

Those arguments, Mr. Speaker, were used in Washington at the time of the lobbying for an additional tax on Canadian lumber, and at a time when the lobbyists knew that the conference agreements had not been finally completed. The preference on lumber had been agreed upon in March but was to be confirmed later by treaty. I made the statement in 1932, and I make it again now, that while we of course received some benefits in the British market from those agreements, in my judgment we lost very much more in other markets which we had been enjoying for practically a lifetime.

My hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), speaking in the house on May 7, attempted to justify the lumber agreement as arrived at in Ottawa at the time of the conference in 1932. My candid opinion is, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend and his associates have up to date suffered more financial loss in connection with these same treaties than any other lumber firm in Canada, through having the American market closed to their business. However, one cannot help but admire the wonderful loyalty displayed by my hon. friend to his political party in supporting these agreements, when he and others who happen to be familiar with the situation know that he is talking against his own financial interest just to keep in line with and support his own party; and when giving figures in connection with lumber shipments, he does not give the whole story. My hon. friend who is considered the expert on lumber from the government side may be a good lumberman or may not, but we all agree that he is loyal to his party.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MUNN: Before the house rose at six o'clock I had discussed the lumber situation at some length, and there are just a few more words I wish to say in connection with it.

For many years the lumber operators in Washington, Oregon and California had lobbied for a duty on lumber from Canada. That was prior to 1932, when they were finally successful in having $3 excise imposed. The farmers in the middle west objected; they said, "No; if you put a tax on British Columbia lumber it means that we in the middle west and consumers in the east will have to pay more for it". In my arguments before six o'clock I gave conclusively the reason why the United States government finally consented to impose an excise tax of $3 per thousand on lumber from this country, and that was a blow to the Canadian lumber industry from which in my opinion we shall not recover until we get back that market.

I am one of those who take up little of the time of this house. I believe that if a man has anything to say he should say it and get through as quickly as possible. Now, I have not much more to say and I am going to say it quickly. As a business man, I say that some of the legislation that has been passed in this house by this government is half baked. Last session the sugar tax was half baked legislation. In the first place, if the government wanted to put a tax on sugar, one cent a pound would have been reasonable; that would have been common sense. Instead they put on a tax of two cents and for some reason or other—I do not blame the Minister of Finance at all—there must have been a leak somewhere and that leak cost the taxpayers of this country four or five million dollars. That did not accrue to the benefit of consumer or producer but to the benefit of the profiteer, and that is what I call half baked legislation. I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance has decided this year to reduce the duty to one cent a pound. I would urge however that instead of having that reduction come into effect on the first of July it should take effect on the first of June. Our people in British Columbia are pretty well through with the canning business before the first of July, and if the reduction were put into effect on the earlier date I suggest it would help not only my friends but the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite and everybody else as well. In my riding in North Vancouver there is a small jam factory at Gibson's Landing. Let me show what happened last year. Their total turnover for the year 1933 was $17,437. That was in a community of settlers who grow fruit to good advantage, but having no market they conceived the idea of a cooperative cannery for the production of jam. The farmers' wives and girls pick the berries and help to make them into jam. On that total turnover of $17,437 they paid this half baked tax of two cents a pound on sugar, or $2,320, and a sales tax of $1,046, representing a total tax of $3,366. Now that is out of all proportion; there is no rhyme or reason why a tax to that extent should be levied on such a small operation. The result was that after allowing the growers 4¾ cents per pound for their berries delivered at the cannery, the factory sustained a total loss for the year of $314.

Then take the proposed gold tax. I do not want to be personal, but that also is a half baked tax, and anyone who stopped to think would know that had it been carried into effect as proposed many thousands would have been added to the ranks of the unemployed. As regards mines in which there are high grade ores, they should pay an ample profits tax; but, I say, hands off the others, or you put them out of business. I am glad to know that the Minister of Finance has changed the original proposal which was absolutely unfair; it could not have been considered by people who are practical in that line.

Just a word now about the railway situation. I am one of those who have faith in the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway has done a good deal for Canada but it has been well paid for it. I am not going to say who is to blame for the situation as it is at the present time, but in my opinion, to-day, we have in the Canadian National Railways a wonderful property, and all it requires is a square deal as compared with the Canadian Pacific. There is no reason in the world why this government or anybody else should get behind the Canadian Pacific Railway and guarantee its bonds, any more than they should for some private company that I might be interested in. As I say, the Canadian Pacific has done a good deal for Canada but it has been well paid for it. The shareholders of that company deserve no more sympathy for losing their money than I deserve if I lose money in my own business, or if any other hon. member interested in some business loses his money. I do not know why it is, but there seems to be in this house an air of friendship towards the Canadian Pacific Railway. It may be that a good many hon. members have stock in the Canadian Pacific, but they should forget that in the interests of Canada. The country has its money in the Canadian National Railways, and those railways should get a square deal as compared with the Canadian Pacific and vice versa.

I have on the order paper a resolution which I should like to read. I do not know whether it will be in order for me to mention it, but it is so far down on the order paper that it will not come up for discussion later in the session. In that resolution there is something which in my opinion is worthy of consideration, and to conclude my remarks, with your consent, Mr. Speaker, I will read the resolution, which relates to the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. It reads:

> Whereas, the attention of this house has been drawn by the royal commission to inquire into railways and transportation in Canada to the urgent necessity which exists for an early consideration of the capital structure of the Canadian railways (vide section 84-87 of that report), and
> Whereas, that commission recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National system must be regarded as lost and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down although the said royal commission did not deem the time opportune when making the said royal report to deal with this important matter but suggested that the same receive early consideration by the board of trustees, and
> Whereas, a board of trustees has been appointed by the government:
> Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, it is of vital importance that the attention of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways be directed to this matter and that this house deems it highly desirable that the said board of trustees shall consider this question and report thereon with the least possible delay as being of vital and primary importance in the intersts of all concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the resolution he has just read is not now under discussion. It is on the order paper for discussion at some future time.

Mr. MUNN: I just want to say this, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may want to say it, but whether under the rules he has the right to do so is a different thing. He is not in order in discussing that resolution now.

Mr. MUNN: I am not going to discuss the resolution, but I want to say this: I am not one of those who believe that when you write off a liability you are getting rid of it; you still have it. If I were taking charge of a business and it were capitalized for more than it was worth, as manager of that business before taking charge I would want to have the capital assets written down.

I sympathize with this or any other government that is carrying on at a time like this. We are passing through very difficult times and have many serious problems ahead of us. The cost of government in Canada, municipal, provincial and federal, is entirely too high; we are spending too much money for government in all lines of activity. Further, we are paying interest at too high a rate.

Other countries have converted their loans to a lower rate of interest and we in Canada should do the same thing. I do not believe in repudiation, but the situation is similar to that where a man in business makes up his mind that he can pay his creditors only so much on the dollar; it is better to take that than to lose all.

Then we have the unemployment situation, and many other problems, but one that worries me is that of the position of the young people who are growing up. I have not heard anything from government speakers which would indicate that any encouragement is to be given to these boys and girls in the way of work. There are many thousands of Canadian young people fourteen, sixteen, and eighteen years old and up and there is nothing for them to do. That is one problem in connection with which the government might do something. In British Columbia and other parts of Canada reforestation plans might be carried out; this is being done in the United States, and we might follow their example.

I had not intended speaking on the budget but I heard so much about the lumber situation that I thought I would give the house my angle of it. I have given positive figures aside from politics. If there are any lumbermen in Canada who have suffered, I am one of them.

Mr. DUFF: Under a Tory government.

Mr. MUNN: Yes. The hon. member for Cariboo stated that since this government came into power the fruit growers and the dairy people in British Columbia have prospered. If there can be found a prosperous fruit grower or dairy farmer in British Columbia I should like to shake hands with him.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my remarks on the budget I wish with my first words to convey to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) my sincere sympathy in his recent sad bereavement.

A short time ago we had delivered to us a budget speech, and in my view, after listening to the debate arising thereon, there seemed to be just two lines of thought in the minds and utterances of the different speakers. The government speakers carry us up into a new dawn of commercial progress, while those of the opposition, with the very same text, desire to drag us down into the valley of humiliation. The vitally important thought, however, as expressed in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, was the fact that the country is now well advanced on the high road of economic recovery, and I am happy to say that this is borne out by facts, figures and present day conditions as they exist throughout Canada. The official opposition, on the negative side of the budget, seem to think nothing has improved, and take objection to the budget in all its different phases. It is, of course, the duty of the opposition to criticize; criticism when it is constructive and reasonable in parliamentary debate is part of our democratic form of government; but if we are to judge from the form of criticism displayed by the authorized critic of the Liberal opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), it is nothing more than a partisan, fault finding preamble such as has been delivered on more than one occasion in this chamber; in fact, it might be termed the sequel to the obstructionist tactics displayed in the house in order that the relief measure might not pass. The kind of criticism thus far directed against the budget is of no help to Canada's financial standing; neither can I see how it can be much of a political ballyhoo for the Liberal party.

It would be a long task to review the different speeches that have been made by opposition speakers on the budget, but the line of criticism was definitely set out by the authorized critic, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. They have outraged every phase of the budget, but what they are opposing is a budget speech that was remarkable not only for the manner of its presentation but for what it contained for this country. It is of such vast extent and vital importance to the dominion, and comprises so many topics that seem to create consternation among the opposition, that one even hesitates to enter the debate at this time.

Following the introduction of the budget speech the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth in a lengthy speech, made a very strong and bitter condemnation of the government. As I have said, it would be difficult to follow that speech throughout, but having listened to it and read it again I wish to make just one criticism of it: his speech might be well sized up as a political, partisan, dramatic extravaganza on an immensely stirring, thought-provoking subject like the budget. He presented his terrific broadside in the form of an ironic last act speech with the idea of making the house and Hansard readers believe this country was going to pieces—and you can believe it or not. The hon. gentleman's remarks and criticisms throughout did not add anything to the reputation for intelligence and vision of a political party over which it is his supreme desire to preside. Time will not permit me to follow in detail the remarks of the hon. member, but there are some points in his criticism to which I desire to call attention.

For instance there were some things that the hon. member shied clear of, whether consciously or unconsciously. At page 2427 of Hansard he twits the Minister of Finance with regard to his budget speech, especially his estimate last year of a surplus, which turned out to be a deficit. From that he branches off and criticizes the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) with regard to previous budgets. But I should like to point out to the hon. member that especially in times like these it is difficult to estimate exactly for a budget, as trade conditions are by no means normal. I might remind him that there have been other occasions on which estimates did not work out exactly. I would draw to his attention an estimate of his own government of the expenditure for the Montreal bridge—the hon. member was a minister of the crown at that time. They budgeted for an expenditure of eight or nine millions, but as a matter of fact the cost was nineteen millions and more. But there is this difference between the two deficits; the present government knows how the deficit last year occurred, but in the case of the Montreal bridge nobody knows where the extra ten or eleven million dollars went, unless the opposition themselves know. The public would certainly like to know.

Mr. DUFF: Page Mr. Pitfield.

Mr. McLURE: He may be in Newfoundland eating kippers. Again at page 2427 the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, dealing with debt and interest, gives a statement concerning the public debt, and then states that the increase in the interest payable by the people of this country amounts to $2.50 per head, and that the interest load which has been put upon the people since this government took office is practically $25,000,000 per year. He states that under the Liberal regime they had surpluses, and repeats the statement from the famous Dunning budget speech that Canada had a surplus of $257,000,000 between the years 1925 and 1930. I am reminded that in appealing to the electors during the campaign of 1930 that was one of their stock arguments. Let us see the story of this $257,000,000 reduction of debt which they claim. The Liberal government received during that time $45,000,000 from repayment of loans and $102,000,000 interest on bank deposits and investments, making a total of $147,000,000 which came due and which certainly applied on debt—what else was there to do with it? Then there was a further $110,000,000 that they also claim they paid in reduction of debt. This came out of taxes. Why should it not have gone to reduction of debt? I might ask why they did not reduce it considerably more, in view of the large amounts of taxes they took from the people at that time. During the six years from 1925 to 1930 inclusive I find that the taxes collected by the Liberal government were in round figures as follows:

1925	$293,000,000
1926	328,000,000
1927	347,000,000
1928	365,000,000
1929	394,000,000
1930	375,000,000

Making a total of over $2,100,000,000 in those six years. If we compute this on the systems the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth used, instead of being $2.50 per head it amounts to $210 per head of taxes collected from the people to pay for the Liberal government's program of extravagance during those years.

Then the opposition critic veers away from the budget to preelection promises, and goes back to the campaign of 1930. When he refers to those campaign speeches and promises I should like to remind him that the government in which he was a minister came into power in 1921 pledged to reduce taxation. But what do we find? Instead of a reduction in taxation they increased taxes; they took from the people of this country more than $100,000,000 additional in taxes annually. Yet the opposition critic was a minister in that government; so I think he has no reason to talk about election promises.

The hon. gentleman attempted to show by a long parade of figures that debt and interest were increased by the Conservative party, and on page 2428 made what apparently he considered a conclusive argument. Referring to the Minister of Finance he said: "My hon. friend may say that this government's position is due to railway deficits." Then he proceeds:

> Let me remind him that during the Liberal administration current deficits on railways were paid out of revenue, and were not added to the public debt.

This is new, and worth looking into. I am rather glad the hon. member mentioned these railway deficits, because as I indicated at the beginning I did not intend to correct all his misstatements but only to add a few facts which the hon. member had omitted from his remarks. From time to time the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth as well as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and many other hon. members of the opposition have criticized this government and the Minister of Railways with regard to the railway problem, always blaming it on this party. It would have been just as well to leave out of this budget debate that supposedly telling argument. We know that the railway extravagance authorized by the Liberal government from 1922 to 1930 was tremendous. The railways were run purely as a political machine for the Liberal party, and railway construction and various other schemes cost the country over half a billion dollars, so that to-day we are saddled with heavy interest payments. These have been met and are being met by this government, and the credit of our country has been maintained at a high level.

Then from time to time the opposition criticize us with regard to the increase in taxation. The answer is that this is the result of the extravagance of the late government, and is necessary to pay their bills and the interest on the debts they created. We are taxed perhaps more than we should be to meet these requirements. But we might refer to some of their expenditures in connection with railways just to show that the opposition critic might have left this question out of the debate. Perhaps the most extravagant year of all was 1929; that might be termed their pork barrel year for election expenditures. Perhaps we shall be better able to appreciate the Canadian National railway problem if we look at the expenditures made by the Liberal government and consider a few of the things the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth omitted to mention, to show that the administration of which he was a member had no idea of how to finance. You might say that they had no more idea of the finances of this country or of the proper way to protect the public treasury than you would expect from a bunch of drunken sailors. I might quote the words of the Vancouver Sun of October 3, 1932, which, speaking of a Liberal ex-minister, had this to say:

> He is an accessory before the fact in the economic ruination of this country.

Yes, my hon. friend the opposition critic neglected to say that the government of which he was a member placed an annual interest burden on the taxpayers of Canada amounting to many millions of dollars, and that the greater part of the $57,000,000 that we must pay annually in interest on railway bonds is the result of the mismanagement of the present Liberal opposition. Let me contrast for a moment the political interference of the two governments in regard to railway matters. There has been absolutely no interference by the present government in the administration of the Canadian National Railways, but I do not think we could say the same thing with regard to the Liberal government. In support of that statement I would refer to paragraphs 61, 142, 143 and 154 of the Duff report. There you will read of the political interference under the Liberal government, when legitimate expenditures were ignored and the officials were forced to squander the money of the people in order to keep the political Liberal machine going in high gear. Let me read a part of section 154 of the Duff report, which says:

> It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the directors and management of the Canadian National were amenable to public influences and pressure which it would have been in the public interests to have withstood.

This portion of section 154 is well written; it is in good English, but translated into the vernacular of the day it simply means, "The Canadian National was run as a political machine for the Liberal party," and my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth was a minister of the crown in the government of that day.

Let us go a little further with regard to this railway extravagance. In 1929 they bought at tremendous cost fourteen million railway ties which, if laid end to end, would extend several times across Canada. I wish I had time to say more about these railway ties, but this was only one of the many reckless expenditures that were made. Sections 149 and 154 of the Duff report contain a severe indictment of the political expenditures made by hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1929 their committals cost the taxpayers of this country $270,000,000; in addition, the ordinary annual supplies for 1929 cost $132,000,000, and in that year they also purchased branch lines costing over $40,000,000. These branch lines were bankrupt; they never had paid and never would pay, and I doubt if their operating income would be sufficient to pay the interest charges. Then we had the Montreal terminals committal, to say nothing of the hotel and steamship undertakings.

I have heard Liberals, both on public platforms and in this house, endeavour to blame the railway management for this waste of public money, but the fact stands out like a sore thumb that the contract of the general manager expired on April 4, 1928, and was not renewed until September, 1929. The clear inference is that a club was held over his head and that if he wanted his contract renewed these extravagant expenditures had to be made in order to assist the progress of the Liberal political machine.

Now for a moment I should like to deal with salaries and wages. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that under this government labourers have not been receiving fair wages. Let us see whether the labourer was protected under the Liberal regime, or whether they looked after the high salaried man. We had one man drawing a salary of $157,000 annually, with another man in the railway receiving $62,000. He was the director of expenditures; he had to see that the money went to the proper channels. Then another agent of the same bunch who was employed in London received $25,000 annually, and there were many other salaries ranging from $20,000 to $30,000. These are the people who, after paying these terrible salaries, say that at present the labourer is not receiving his just desserts.

The government made other wild expenditures. I would like to remind the financial critic that they paid $110,000 annually for club dues and fees. It would seem that the whole government were playing golf or that they belonged to all the clubs throughout the country. Under the present government all these extravagances have been cut out; no one can point to any expenditures of the kind that went on for several years under the Liberal government. Then there are one or two other salaries I should like to mention, one being that of a stenographer or private secretary who received $22,000. Do hon. members suppose that the Liberal party and the hon. member who acts as the financial critic for the opposition did not know anything about that? We will admit that $22,000 was a very good salary. Again, a policeman who strutted his stuff all over the country and was accommodated with a private car received a salary of $15,000. The cost of the private car in which he travelled, including attendants, amounted to an additional $35,000 annually. Under those conditions who would object to being a policeman in the employ of the Canadian National Railways when that system operated under the Liberal government? To indicate that the late government did not look after the interests of ordinary labouring men may I say that in those days ninety-six people were receiving salaries of over $10,000, and many more were receiving salaries of over $5,000. This condition, I am happy to say, has been corrected by the present administration.

In those days they had all kinds of inspectors. For instance, in my own city of Charlottetown the railways had six or seven inspectors visit the city in one week. There was an inspector of spikes and bolts, another of oils and greases, another of safety-first devices, and several other inspectors attending to other minor details. All this work could have been done by one man. They had a good time, putting up at the best hotels and playing golf from morning till night at the expense of the Canadian National Railways. I believe that if the official financial critic of the opposition had looked into these details he would not have made the statements he did with regard to the Canadian National Railways; certainly he would not have said that they paid their deficits out of earnings. In fact it ill behooves the hon. gentleman, as an ex-minister of the crown, to jumble or to juggle figures with regard to these matters when, as a matter of fact, the government of which he formed a part were responsible for the greater part of the debt and interest of the Canadian National Railways.

Directing his remarks to the Minister of Finance, and speaking about trade conditions, the hon. member is quoted at page 2432 of Hansard as follows:

> He does not seem to realize that perhaps the most important thing in this country is trade.

He stated further that trade had developed through its own natural channels. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must have had a twinge of conscience when he made that remark, because it is not so very long ago that he was one of those hon. members who voted against the conference trade agreements with the British Empire. Dame Rumour has it that he has been severely censured by people in the maritimes for his action in this connection. Again, at page 2432 of Hansard he takes another wallop at the trade agreements when he uses the following language:

> The fact of the matter is that any increase in trade between Canada and the Mother Country has been due to natural and economic causes.

I wonder if the hon. member will deny that the Ottawa trade agreements have developed a substantial expansion in Canada's empire trade. Liberal members will have to take back a good deal of what they said regarding the trade agreements. Their success has been a great disappointment to the Liberal opposition, and they will have to take a back flop in regard to many of their utterances in that regard. They wanted to destroy the Ottawa conference; they did not want it to be held. They have said that if elected they would destroy these trade agreements. I doubt it; I do not believe they will ever have the chance, but if they do, I suggest they would not dare destroy what has now built up in Great Britain a great market for our agricultural products.

It might be well to remind hon. members of the Liberal attitude towards the empire trade agreements. They dubbed the spirit of the Ottawa conference "economic imperialism" and "enlarged economic isolation," and declared that from the Liberal point of view economic imperialism and economic nationalism are both wrong. They further declared that Canada, as a great exporting country, must organize its trade relations on a world wide scale, and that anything less than this would be a denial of our birthright. I wonder how the Liberal party, its leaders and some if its partisan press will explain these astonishing utterances in face of the trade developments of the last year which have resulted from imperial conference agreements.

I could go on and quote from many speeches made by Liberal members outlining their objections to the empire treaties. The only conclusion at which we can arrive is, inevitably, that if the Liberal party had been in power the agreements would never have materialized. The advantages and benefits of the Ottawa trade agreements have been set forth and are known to all hon. members. In these days, when we are advancing along the highway to recovery, the empire agreements are of vital importance. Let me at this point mention some of the results.

I shall not go into details in regard to the lumber trade, because that phase of the matter has been covered. I will state briefly, however, that lumber movement has been stimulated by the United Kingdom-Canada trade pact, and last year's trade was the heaviest which had been known for several decades. The export trade through the port of Halifax has increased by over fifty per cent since the treaties came into effect. A revival in trade is very much in evidence in connection with apples, farm products and steel products. Let me mention, further, the possibilities in the bacon industry brought about by the advantages given in the treaties. The sure demand for Canadian bacon is bound to react more and more favourably on the domestic market. There never were more favourable prospects in the history of the bacon industry from the days of confederation down to the present time.

Again, the opposition critic severely criticizes the tariff policy of this government; but let us see what this government have done. They found when they came into office that during the Liberal regime Canada for a considerable period had been buying more than she had been selling; that Canada, in other words, had been a dumping ground for the surplus products of other countries, and the policy of the present government was to overcome that state of affairs. That they did by passing what is known as the dumping duty legislation. Instead of closing all our Canadian industries by its policies, as the Liberal government had done, this government protected our Canadian people and Canadian labour and Canadian industries.

The government has also been criticized by the opposition because it would not support the Russian soviet government plan. The Canadian government placed an embargo on the importation of Russian coal, Russian pulpwood, Russian asbestos and Russian manufactured furs. Will any hon. member of the opposition dare say that these embargoes against Russian products were not in the best interests of the Canadian people?

I cannot understand how the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and the opposition generally can continue to endeavour to mislead the public on the Ottawa conference treaty agreements, put perhaps it is only natural in their case because as they squint at the present and future, blinded by their own past record, they will always have a very poor idea of the present and of the future progress of this country.

Again, on page 2428 of Hansard, the opposition critic puts in what he again thinks is a stop argument when he says, "Someone else may say that the debt is due to relief." He had this question of relief very much on his mind. He goes back again to the election campaign, refers to unemployment in 1930, rehashes many of the campaign speeches about relief, talks about unemployment, quotes figures, and then proceeds to blame this government for the unemployment conditions which he charges have been brought about by government policy.

But let us look for a moment at the policy of the hon. gentleman and his government with respect to unemployment, and then contrast it with the policy of this government.

If you look over the conditions for the past ten years or more, or if you go back even further, you will find that from 1914 to 1920 prices and wages advanced very rapidly, with the prices of commodities perhaps holding the lead. There is no doubt that the peak of both prices and wages was reached in 1920. The decline of employment began in 1921, when the number of unemployed began steadily to increase. By the end of June 1921 there were, according to the statistics, over 100,000 unemployed in Canada, 2,000,000 in Great Britain and 6,000,000 in the United States. In the year 1921 there was available for the relief of unemployment in Canada $6,000,000, and the federal government aided the provinces and municipalities in all cases. That sum of money was spent by the federal government to feed, clothe and comfort the unemployed of Canada. Then in 1922 the Liberal government came into power and what was their policy with regard to unemployment?

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in their opposition to the Farmer-Labour subamendment the opposition have made another faux pas, but of that more anon. It appears that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) was so convincing in debating the point of order raised by the subamendment that he may even persuade the Speaker to give the opposition's amendment a similar ride.

It was apparent, from the discernible apathy manifested by this house when the budget was brought down on April 18, that there would be no radical departure from the beaten path or from the course the government has followed for the past three years. Nobody expected anything else but a deflation budget, and a deflation budget it turned out to be. Outside of a few reductions here and there the traditional government policy of retrenchment and rigid economy has been strictly adhered to, while any desire to sail into uncharted seas, to seek new remedies, to live dangerously in order to live, has been frowned upon by the Conservative party which would preserve the present system simply by lopping off its mouldering branches.

The depression, sir, we still have with us, and the government's policies remain the same. The government still continues to try to borrow itself out of debt and to cure unemployment and falling prices and afford relief by the flotation of new loans. In other words, it still continues to try to pull itself up by its bootstraps, which as everybody knows simply cannot be done. When one looks to the other side of the house for a solution all one gets is a lot of heat instead of light. As an example I shall refer to the rather unaccountable opposition of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to the Farmer-Labour subamendment.

Paradoxically enough the Liberals this session have out-conservatived the Conservatives and out-reactionaried the reactionaries. I shall leave the psychological analysis of this phenomenon to more scientific minds than my own. For the time being suffice it to say that the events of the past few months have more than borne out my contention. Pick up any magazine or newspaper in Canada to-day and you will read about it, or ask reporters and they will tell you about it, and it will not be long before Ripley will caricature this anomalous state of affairs in his "Believe it or Not" column. Indeed before very long I am afraid that both parties would be called the new Canadian Siamese twins, were it not for the legislation which the government has brought down in regard to marketing. If you do not believe that, sir, look at the columns of the Liberal wet nurse, the Ottawa Citizen. She ought to know, and after the way she has slapped the wrists of her nurslings I should have thought they would get wise to this, but as the poet says, where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise. If they still persist in running around in short pants and diapers instead of long pants, that is their business. If they have not yet learned that Queen Victoria is dead this debate will prove futile and will avail us absolutely nothing. And if Daddy King still persists in feeding his political children on the sour milk of liberty, how can you, sir, expect them to grow into healthy minded Canadians, with a healthy minded aspect of things and of life? I should prefer the raw meat which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) feeds the brood on the other side of the house, even if it is not according to Hoyle. But the "Hush ye, hush ye, don't ye fret ye or the Black Bennett will get ye" attitude of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is the only type of food which the laissez-faire weaklings on this side of the house are getting from their well meaning but very unwise political foster father. It is no wonder this lack of proper food has produced such barren results in this and other debates.

Take their amendment. It was moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth

(Mr. Ralston) and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) that:

This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade.

It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end.

Listening to the debates on the relief and the marketing bills I could not help feeling, as I said the other day, that the constitutional mountain had laboured very hard to produce an argument only to give birth to a squeaking little constitutional mouse. But in this motion I hardly know what the object has turned out to be. The opposition wants something, but what that something is has not been made very clear in the amendment. Of course, they will not prescribe until they are called in; but the party that expects to run this country after the next general election must give the country some definite intimation as to what its policy is going to be. It is like the advice which the young man gave his friend in respect of the fair sex, "Tell them nothing and treat them rough"; and the government is being subjected to the full letter of this prescription, but the country is made no happier or wiser thereby.

They demand that protective barriers be taken down; but have they practised when in power what they have preached when out of power? They want credit facilities to be extended; but have they done this when in power or are they willing to do it when they get back into power? Listen to the Liberal nursemaid in its issue of May 1, 1934:

There should be a general election in Canada this year, but it is hard to discover any reason for turning out one conservative party to put in another. At the present time, as Colonel J. L. Ralston's speech on the budget disclosed, there is no genuine political difference between the parties. The government side is in the position of being the more enterprising. Even Mr. Woodsworth is describing the government's measure for the control of marketing as "one of the most advanced pieces of legislation ever drawn in Canada."

In this amendment the opposition have hitched their political waggon to the free trade star; but what has the Liberal nursemaid to say in this regard?

Dissertations on the iniquities of the Canadian tariff seem, as of old, intended to lead the electorate in agricultural constituencies to believe that the Liberals are next time really going to march boldly forward to freer trade. No statements of policy by Liberal authorities in the house, however, would warrant any such pretence on the part of tariff doctrinaires at national headquarters. It is nothing but the old, old story.

With the abandonment of free trade in Great Britain, the national recovery experiment in the United States and various degrees of economic nationalism in every other country, the prospects of anything like free trade in Canada are more remote than ever. Nor do the Liberal expounders of tariff politics show how lowering the Canadian tariff would lead Canada out of recurring periods of trade depression and unemployment.

As Lloyd George says, "whether under tariffs on under free trade, plenty has produced universal poverty." The economic system under which Great Britain worked before returning to tariffs, as well as the economic system of high protection has been shown up by the world crisis to be a pretentious fraud which has robbed humanity of its fair share of the good things which science has produced in abundance for the benefit of mankind.

The fraud in Canada is to pretend that there is any fundamental difference in the tariff of the parties. Premier Bennett's visit to Washington a year ago, as well as statements in the house, have indicated that the Conservatives are ready to explore the possibilities of reciprocity with the United States as well as the Liberals. Something more is due from party leaders in the next election campaign than again to go over the barren ground of tariff politics, but it is difficult to discover signs of any effective challenge coming from the opposition side.

The article then goes on to show how much alike both parties are in this house, and how similar their attitude is on reciprocity, internationalism, the League of Nations, peace, good will and the beatitudes, high finance, deflation, drastic economy, balanced budgets, increased production—before the war—favourable balance of trade, the gold standard and sound money. It then concludes:

A real issue between political parties would be to set up national sovereignty over the nation's money by throwing over even the pretence of gold. It is probable that this issue will eventually divide parties, separating the Conservatives and Liberals in both parties. The possibility of any such real division in Canadian politics may seem remote, but leadership is coming in other countries away from the gold mentality—nowhere more significantly than in the United Kingdom. There may be many battles to be fought before the golden rule has taken the place of the rule of gold, but there are signs that gold's fraudulent front is crumbling.

It should be the opportunity of Liberalism to lead political democracy through the breach into better living conditions, from artificial scarcity into the enjoyment of an age of abundance. Fascism has come in other countries only because of Liberalism's failure.

When people vote Conservative, they have no right to expect anything else but conservative administration. When they vote Liberal they are surely entitled to forward leadership away from the Conservative position. It will behoove the Canadian people to examine the record of the Liberals before the next election to decide whether they can expect any such leadership, either from Mackenzie King or anyone else in the party. Without placing the onus entirely on the present Liberal leader—he is as advanced as other Liberals—without making invidious comparisons, there is no sign of an adventurous Liberal crusading spirit in Canada.

With expenditures in this country greater than revenue and a net debt on all accounts of $135,200,000, we are far from being out of the economic woods, and there is no prospect of our ever getting out unless parliament takes control of the national credit as suggested by the Farmer-Labour sub-amendment so as to:

Provide sufficient purchasing power to enable our people to "loosen their belts," and to take full advantage, as consumers, of their ability to produce;

Raise the price of agricultural products and other primary commodities to an equitable level in relation to the cost of production, the price of manufactured goods, and the settlement of outstanding liabilities, public and private;

Provide employment of a character that will add to the national wealth, and under conditions that will assure an adequate standard of living;

Create an increased volume of business which will permit the collection of sufficient revenue by our various governments, municipal, provincial and federal, to meet their necessary expenditures.

Hon. members will gather from this sub-amendment, which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was instrumental in having ruled out of order, that it stresses purchasing power and also price levels. So far as the primary producer is concerned, the farmer's troubles are threefold: his is a buying, a selling and a credit problem and so the success of his enterprise depends upon these three elements, the failure of any one of which would destroy his whole cooperative effort.

What is the greatest problem of the farmer to-day? He must exchange his goods for other goods and services and receive enough to enable him to buy other goods and services to cover the cost of production and other expenses incidental to farming, and also to maintain a fair standard of living. There is no way in which this standard can be determined unless it be by his ability to exchange his products for goods that he might use and enjoy. We have solved our selling problem and we are now beginning to explore the buying problem. Notwithstanding what has been said about our selling pools, I think they have attained a fair amount of efficiency. We are asking for a credit system that will function on behalf of producers and not exclusively for a few financiers and shareholders. Therefore, not only must the farmer buy and sell cooperatively but parliament must have sovereignty over national credit. The greatest problem of the farmer to-day, as I see it, is not a high price for wheat; it is what he can buy with his dollar when he gets it. For paradoxically enough, two dollars may be a low price while fifty cents might be a high one; it all depends on how much in the way of other goods and services he can purchase for the money. With manufactured goods still at a very high level, fifty cents is too low a price, but if they were to drop to the pre-war level, two dollars would certainly be an exorbitant price. All the farmer wants is a fair return for his labour. But this he will never get under a system which allows one industry to charge high prices and another one to charge low prices. There must be some balance between the industries in this country; otherwise the economic structure is bound to topple over.

In this regard nothing could be more timely than the revision of our financial system, an investigation into price spreads and the present marketing bill before the house. I am in agreement with those members who have already said that there must be a general scaling down of the monetary obligations of the farmers, for anything less than this will mean the ruination of the farming industry in Canada. I am therefore very much surprised to see how lightly the matter of interest rates has been taken by the house. Allow me to give hon. members some concrete examples. Not so long ago three financial bills, which I might as well call three little wolves in sheeps' clothing, sneaked into this house in the shape of proposed corporations, their names being the Discount and Loan Corporation of Canada, the Small Loan Company of Canada, and the Personal Finance Corporation. Instead of their being thrown out, the milk of parliamentary human kindness has been extended to them and they almost found a permanent kennel in the statutes of Canada had it not been for the action of the Prime Minister in holding them in leash for further consideration. All these bills are similar in principle; they would nullify the three great financial bulwarks of Canada—the Interest Act, which permits a limit of five per cent; the Moneylenders' Act, which permits a limit of twelve per cent, and the Loan Companies Act, which forbids loans on certain securities; and this in order to allow these companies to carry on loan shark business in this country.

All of these bills, as I have said, are similar in principle and therefore my remarks on one alone, that is Bill No. 15, the Small Loan Company bill, may be considered as applying to the other two. It seems that Bill No. 15 has had more lives than a cat. I thought it was dead, as it certainly should have been, and duly interred with a proper parliamentary monumental epitaph to mark the passing of what otherwise might have been an actual statute of Canada, and a very notorious one at that. It reminds me of the story of the man they could not hang, only in that case the man was innocent while this bill certainly deserves to be killed. It is like a weed; no matter how you try to dispose of it, the thing keeps popping up all over the place. The only saving grace about it is its stubbornness, a certain persistence that would do credit to a nobler cause. In view of the fact that this is supposed to be a year of great activity in parliament in regard to financial matters, and also that we have before the house certain legislation respecting the Bank Act and monetary reform, I cannot for the life of me understand how this bill was ever allowed by the committee on banking and commerce to pass the committee stage. If the committee allowed this rotten bill, as I might call it, to pass, then heaven help the bank revision and heaven help the central bank bill as well as any other pending legislation that was supposed to assist the Canadian people in getting out of the depression in which they now find themselves. Might I ask: Whom is this piratical bill supposed to benefit, and what good is it going to do in lessening the suffering of the Canadian people in this terrible time of stress?

I understand that someone in the committee twitted my colleague about not being able to legislate people into heaven and that he very pointedly retorted: "Not into heaven, but nothing will legislate them into hell quicker than this bill." Upon an analysis of the various clauses in the bill I do not see how the average mortal is ever going to escape from the various tentacles that most certainly will envelop him once he is foolish enough to get caught in this bill, which I consider to be a trap to catch the unwary. It may be said that the prospective debtor knows what he is up against when he negotiates a loan under the provisions of the bill, but that certainly does not excuse this house from allowing him either wittingly or unwittingly to get into the clutches of the money sharks who are behind this proposed legislation. I therefore think parliament would make a very good start along the line of reformative and clean-up, constructive legislation by throwing the thing into the parliamentary debris and other rotten refuse instead of giving it a place of honour among decent pieces of legislation. The sponsors of these bills would have us believe that there is a bright side to the proposed legislation in that it would render a certain service. But this shining brightness in my opinion is superficial and illusory serving only to hide the dross underneath. I cannot help recalling an incident in my boyhood days that left an indelible impression on my mind. We were bathing on a sandy beach near Atlantic city when we saw a fish thrown out on the shore by a great wave. Try as it would to flop back into the water it could not, so it slowly died on the unaccustomed terrestrial domain. Some children playing nearby picked it up and threw it back into the ocean. Next evening we all went bathing again, when to our surprise there was this very same dead fish lying on the sand. It was one of those beautiful, rare, calm and warm evenings in June:

> Then, if ever, come perfect days;
> Then heaven tries earth if it be in tune,
> And over it softly her warm ear lays;
> Whether we look, or whether we listen,
> We hear earth murmur, or see it glisten.

Well, we heard life murmur, but as far as this fish was concerned all it did was to glisten. A full moon shone on a cloudless and windless night. As its beams fell directly upon this dead creature of the sea they were reflected from its scales in multicoloured brilliance. The sight momentarily rooted us to the spot; then as we gradually drew nearer to the object from which it emanated and finally got near enough to pick it up, the offensive odour arising therefrom proved equal in intensity to its exterior brilliance. This happened about fourteen years ago. In my last years of high school I ran across a passage in which the orator berated a brilliant but corrupt man for something that he had done, in castigation of whom the remark was made that while the person in question was a man of brilliant parts he nevertheless was utterly corrupt; his whole action was likened to a dead mackerel cast ashore in the moonlight, shiny but smelly, brilliant but rotten. The name of the orator has escaped my memory but the picture has never been forgotten. Comparing that incident with the proposal made by the bill to which I have referred, I might point out that while outwardly the bill may appear all right, a thorough examination of its contents will show how really rotten it is. With all its brilliant exterior but offensive odour it has once more turned up in this house to worry hon. members and haunt their peace of mind. Frankly speaking, to me the whole thing is so offensive that it would only pollute our statute books to give it a place therein. Indeed, sir, were this legislation to pass I am afraid that turning to the page where this bill might be found in the 1934 statute book might be detrimental to the health of the prospective investigator.

An attempt has been made to throw a halo around this bill by referring to the illustrious names of the directors of the company. However, it seems to me that if they are as illustrious as they are described they would think twice before putting their money into a company of this kind. Why do they not invest it in government bonds, for instance? It would not matter whether the president were St. Peter, the secretary St. John and the general manager St. Paul, and all the rest of the evangelists, the board of directors, the obnoxious nature of the various provisions of this bill, the usurious practices that certainly would prevail if the company ever got a charter to do business in Canada, would still be reason enough to sound its deathknell. Oh for another saviour to chase the moneylenders out of the temple again! Let us hope in this regard that the Prime Minister turns out to be another messiah. It is beyond my intelligence sir, to understand why this fishy bill has been trotted out again to nauseate the house, when its only virtue in my estimation is a certain outward appearance that lends it a false respectability—the bright surface to hide a rotten interior; an honest face to camouflage a deceitful nature. I suppose the Dr. Jekyll brilliance has so overhelmed the sponsors of this and other bills and the protagonists thereof that they failed to notice the Hyde hideousness lurking among the provisions of the proposed legislation. But they might have taken some warning from the vigorous opposition of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson); for when a man so conservative turns his forceful eloquence against the dubious provisions of this bill I think it is high time for the house to wake up to the seriousness of what is involved therein.

Let us pause for a moment and see what this bill asks us to do—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask the hon. member what bill he is referring to?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am referring to a bill introduced in this house not long ago, the Small Loan Company bill, and two others, which are still before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: They have nothing to do with the motion now under consideration.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am mentioning these bills in order to show that the matter of interest rates is very important in this country. We are dealing with it in the committee on the Bank Act, the central bank bill and other legislation that is supposed to get us out of this depression. There is a great demand throughout the whole country for a reduction in interest rates. Not so long ago three bills almost passed through this house which would have enabled these companies to charge ten or fifteen or twenty, yes, even thirty per cent, without a word of dissent from either side of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: At the present time these bills are not before the house, and it is not open to the hon. member to discuss them. The motion before the house is that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. That has nothing whatever to do with the bills the hon. member is discussing, which have already been dealt with by the house. The hon. member should have said what he had to say with regard to these bills when they were before the house for consideration. I would also call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he must not read his speech.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Only the quotations, sir. I should like to deal with the debt question, but as my time is limited I shall postpone my comments in that regard until the Bank Act and other financial legislation is before the house.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): It is my intention on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, not to traverse the budget in detail, but to confine my remarks largely to one matter in the hope that thereby I may more emphatically direct the attention of the house and the country thereto, a matter of outstanding national importance to Canada both now and in the years that lie before us.

I refer, sir, to Canada's future in the air. Before developing that subject, however, I wish to refer briefly to certain features of the budget speech so ably presented in this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes).

That Canada is definitely emerging from the depression is strikingly indicated by many indices. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the records placed on Hansard, notably by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). To repeat them would serve no useful purpose to-night, but I wish to add the record of registrations throughout Canada of new passenger cars and particularly new commercial trucks during the first three months of this year. The registrations throughout Canada for the months of January, February and March of this year of new passenger cars as compared with the same three months of last year were as follows:

	1934	1933	Per cent Increase	Per cent Decrease
British Columbia	808	329	145.5	....
Alberta	609	332	83.4	....
Saskatchewan	215	115	87	....
Manitoba	337	196	71.9	....
Ontario	6,097	4,145	47.1	....
Quebec	929	996	....	6.7
New Brunswick	47	60	....	21.7
Nova Scotia	179	218	....	17.9

It should be explained, I think, that the decrease in the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is due to heavy snow conditions this spring, bad weather and bad roads. The net result, however, is that over the whole dominion, for the first three months of this year, the registration of new passenger cars, as an index of returning better times, shows that this year 9,221 cars were registered as against 6,391 last year, a net increase of 44·3 per cent.

Even a better index is the registration of commercial trucks. For the same provinces and for the same three months the figures are as follows:

	1934	1933	Per cent Increase	Per cent Decrease
British Columbia	273	105	160	....
Alberta	162	38	326.3	....
Saskatchewan	23	6	283.3	....
Manitoba	63	21	200	....
Ontario	913	485	88.2	....
Quebec	98	123	....	20.3
New Brunswick	9	14	....	35.7
Nova Scotia	69	32	115.6	....

For the whole dominion the registrations of new commercial trucks totalled 1,610 as against 824 last year, or a net increase of 95·4 per cent. There is one other index I should like to register. The registrations for the month of April, which has just closed, are available for the cities of Toronto and Montreal, and they show these remarkable results: This year in Toronto, in the month of April, there were registered 1,628 new passenger cars as against 755 last year, an increase of 215·8 per cent. This year there were 163 new trucks registered as against 43 last year, an increase of 379 per cent. In the city of Montreal in April of this year 1,089 new passenger cars were registered as against 713 last year, an increase of 128·1 per cent. Trucks were about the same this year as last.

Now I should like to give one example in regard to employment; I refer to the General Motors plant at Oshawa. At the end of April of this year three thousand employees were working in that plant; at the end of April of last year there were 1,900 employed. On January 1 of this year there were 2,100 employed.

In the face of such facts, Mr. Speaker, who will say that better days have not already dawned? In many respects the crisis of the past four years is comparable to the crisis of 1914-18. It has lasted for four years. We have been fighting with our backs to the wall. The resources of the whole country have been mobilized to meet the situation, and it has been met with the same high courage by all classes of our people, particularly by the rank and file on whom the chief burden always falls whether in time of peace or in time of war.

Another point worthy of comment, sir, is the fact that Canada's credit both at home and abroad still ranks high; in fact there is none higher. This standing is not the result of mere chance; it is founded on two essentials, first the sterling character of our citizenry and second the nature of the leadership they have had. When the Bank of England ceased paying in gold, world financial institutions were rocked to their foundations, but drawing upon the traditions of the past and upon the strength which is intermingled in our blood, Canada stood firm. Again, when the United States issued an order closing all banks, in Canada the order of the day was "business as usual." Not a bank was closed. Canada's credit and the strength of her institutions stood out in those days like a beacon set upon a hill. Again this was not mere chance. All sorts of panaceas were offered, among them the suggestion that in view of exchange rates and certain general world conditions Canada should default upon her international obligations. That she did not do so is due in no small degree to the type of leadership she has had; I refer particularly to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett) and his associates in the government. Theirs has been a leadership inspired by the character of our people. The stand was taken that default on international obligations was unthinkable, and to such vision, such action and such wisdom, Canada owes much. Already that is being recognized, but the wisdom of that action will become increasingly apparent in the years that are to come.

More important than bank balances is the matter of credit, either individually, nationally or internationally. What has this meant to Canada, sir; what will it mean? To-day Canada is regarded as the safest field for investment. We are a young country, sparse in population but rich in tradition and confident as to our future. The adjustment of domestic obligations, whether as to principal or interest or both, well may be made and in fact should be made, but in our international relations there has been no default and there should be no default. If honourable adjustments can be made in regard to international obligations then let us make them, but if not let Canada meet her obligations according to the letter of the contract.

The impelling reasons are practical as well as moral. To repudiate would destroy our international credit; to fulfil our obligations will set Canada's credit high. Any temporary benefit that might come from repudiation would be fleeting, but to fulfil our contracts will pay dividends throughout the years to come. This is not fantasy but fact.

Coming from Montreal the other evening en route to Ottawa I held conversation with a resident of the city of New York who has prominent business connections in that city. He volunteered this statement, "The United States has been watching Canada. We recognize, to an extent we have never recognized before, the standing of her credit, the strength and virility of her people and her institutions. When our banks tottered yours stood firm. When burdened with almost insuperable difficulties the words of your Prime Minister to the world were: 'Canada will keep her contracts.' The result is that prosperity will be forced upon you. I mean that the benefits which will flow to you from your stand will follow as naturally as day follows night. Our investments will come to Canada for her development because with all our experiments, the people of the United States are panicky. They look to Canada as the best and surest bet."

These days of depression experienced in the last four years are surely not without avail. There has been a reorientation of thought. Ideas heretofore considered too radical are now considered normal, when humanity is placed before money. It is now recognized that in our national set-up for the future provision must be made through planned insurance to take care of the sick, the helpless and the unemployed.

During these times what has been the contribution of the official opposition? Is it not opportune to ask what the contribution of the official opposition has been towards the solution of our difficulties? Any point of view put forward by myself as a supporter of the government is naturally subject to the discount of partyism. But let us examine the facts. Has the attitude of the official opposition been one of helpfulness? Has it been constructive or subversive? Let me refer to an indictment which recently appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, a newspaper which supports hon. members opposite. This article appeared in the editorial column in the issue of April 25, 1934, under the caption Negative Opposition, and is as follows:

> There is nothing easier in Canadian politics than to sit on the opposition side in judgment of the government. The greatest opportunity for criticism is provided by the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. It is an opportunity also, however, for the leading financial critic to show where the opposition has any more hopeful policy to put forward. Never before in any Canadian parliament have there been such opportunities as in the years since 1930, but this official opposition has been more conservative than the government. It is simply a negative factor in parliament, offering neither light nor leadership in Canada's most critical period of economic readjustment.

It is, of course, possible to put forward excuses for the negation of Liberalism in this parliament. In the emergency session before Premier Bennett went to London in 1930, the Liberals could take the position that they would refrain from doing anything to retard the government's effort to deal with the unemployment situation. In the following session, they had the excuse of allowing Premier Bennett to demonstrate the futility of high tariff barriers in Canada. In the session of 1932, the opposition could continue to put forward nothing, by saying that the government would be allowed to go into the imperial economic conference with a free hand.

Last year, similarly, while the government looked to the world economic conference in London to provide the way out, the opposition had nothing better to offer. This session there is no such excuse, but Colonel J. L. Ralston's speech on the budget last Monday afternoon made it clear that the opposition sterility is due to something more than tactics; it is a state of political barrenness. The light of Liberalism is flickering so feebly on the opposition side, it is quite liable to go out altogether when the Liberals come back into office.

But, sir, we are rising above our difficulties. Surely it is time to move forward. Having held the line against all assaults, having withstood the impact of dire need and discouragement and having maintained an unbroken front, the time is opportune to move forward. Let me suggest to the government the importance of leading the way by immediate action by carrying out its tentative program of work, thereby giving employment to those who have held the line with such courage and high resolve, and replace this utter weariness and sickness of heart with hope and optimism.

I come now to Canada's future in the air. With what prophetic vision did Tennyson forecast the development which is upon us and to which I now refer:

> For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
> Saw the vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;
>
> Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
> Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;
>
> Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rain'd a ghastly dew
> From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue.

It is all there, commerce and the emergency of war. Canada's future is inexorably bound up with the development of air routes.

At once, let me set up a background of fact, the reality of which can readily be demonstrated, against which to cast the shadows of things to come.

Flying is as yet a relatively new arm of our transportation system. Our people have not yet become air minded.

Mr. SANDERSON: I rise to a point of order. Your Honour has already ruled tonight that hon. members are not permitted to read their speeches. I think the hon. member now speaking should not do so.

Mr. QUINN: How often do you read your speeches?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I am quoting considerably, and I admit that I am keeping rather closely to my notes, but only to save time and for the sake of accuracy.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point is well taken by the hon. member. When the Speaker's attention is called to the fact that an hon. member is reading his speech it should come to an end. I may say the practice of reading speeches has been followed too often in this house, although the Speaker's attention has not frequently been called to it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I have some figures to which I should like to refer.

Mr. COOTE: As the Minister of Finance reads his speech, I do not see that there could be any objection.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): It is but a little over thirty years since the first aeroplane flight was accomplished when Orville Wright made history by his flight in North Carolina in December, 1903. Little progress was made until after the commencement of the war in 1914, so that we might reasonably say that the aeroplane has been in use little more than twenty years.

While on the subject of early flights we should not forget to do honour to two Canadians who figure in these records, namely Mr. F. W. "Casey" Baldwin, now a member of the Nova Scotia legislative assembly, and Mr. J. A. D. McCurdy, now a resident of Montreal. Baldwin made a flight at Hammondsfort, New York, on March 12, 1908. McCurdy made a flight over Baddeck Bay in the famous "Silver Dart" on February 23, 1909, Sir Elliott V. Roe made the first flight in the British empire in England on January 8, 1908, it being an Englishman who made the first flight in the British Empire; a Canadian Baldwin, was the second in the British Empire and the first Canadian to fly. McCurdy was the first Canadian to fly in Canada.

It is a happy coincidence that on February 23 last, exactly twenty-five years after the first aeroplane flight in Canada, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) presented publicly at Toronto the first comprehensive outline of a national aviation policy expressed by any minister of the crown in Canada.

It gives me pleasure to congratulate the minister upon his definition of government policy. In paying tribute to the Minister of National Defence as the one charged under the Aeronautics Act with the development of flying from the standpoint of federal government control, I am not unmindful that his predecessor, the present sitting member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) then Minister of National Defence, was also seized with the importance of air service to this dominion and worked hard for its establishment. I am happy therefore on this occasion to extend my congratulations to the member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and "to render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's."

On August 4, 1914, there were 272 aeroplanes available to the British army; at the time of the armistice, after thousands had been destroyed, worn out or become obsolete there were 22,171. In August, 1914, there had been less than 250 officers in this new service; in November, 1918, there were more than 30,000. In this almost incredible story of British achievement, Canadians played a tremendous part; by the end of the war one-third of the officers in the Royal Air Force were Canadians. Canada's share, individually and collectively, was out of all proportion to her population. May we not ask:

> Does still the breed run true?
> Does still upflame the ancient fire?

Echoing back there comes the answer of Canada's war pilots. A comparison of the number of aeroplanes destroyed by the four leading pilots of various nations forcibly demonstrates the high rank attained by Canadians. The four leading Canadian pilots destroyed 230 enemy planes; other British pilots, 192; French, 214; German, 246. Next to the number of enemy planes destroyed by the four leading German pilots came the Canadian pilots, and I think it is only fitting that I should put on record their names: Bishop, Collishaw, Barker and MacLaren; Bishop, with his 72; Fonck, the leading French pilot, with 75; McCudden, the British pilot, with 54; Richthofen, with 80. And remember, sir, that these were boys whose faces still bore the soft and tender curves of youth which the stress of later years eradicates, but the memory of which mothers carry always in their hearts.

It was not chance that wrote these results into history. The innate initiative of our Canadian youth, their environment backed by tradition, made such results possible.

Let us now consider Canada's position in commercial air routes. To realize Canada's unique position in that regard, certain misconceptions as to distances must be at once corrected—misconceptions arising from our use of Mercator's projection in the matter of map making, which distorts areas in ratio according to their distances from the equator, Greenland, for instance, appearing almost as large as Africa. To get a correct conception of air route distances you must measure them on a globe.

In considering this matter it is fundamental that we should bear in mind that time has always been and always will be a prime factor in commercial development—in gaining trade and in holding it.

The shortest international air route from the chief centres of Europe to the Orient lies across Canada, passing over Newfoundland, north of the St. Lawrence, over Cochrane, Ontario, over Winnipeg, the Yukon, Alaska, and down the east coast of Asia to China and Japan. Now mails go from Europe to the orient by the eastern route, but when our airways are developed and we have a north Atlantic system the air mail of Europe going to the orient will travel over Canada.

It is in the northern hemisphere that the great trade routes running from east to west find the long overland stages. At the latitude of Montreal, about three-quarters of the distance around the world is overland. The desirability of land for landings, forced or otherwise is obvious.

So we realize—or do we realize—that if we take Chicago, for instance, as the industrial centre of North America, the startling fact is disclosed that the shortest routes from the centres of industrial Europe and Asia, to the centre of industrial North America, lie through, or over, Canadian territory? In other words, starting say at the Rhine valley, a great circle route would continue on through France, Belgium, England, Northern Ireland, the straits of Belle Isle, the St. Lawrence river valley, through Montreal and on to Chicago—the important fact being that this route lies actually north of the St. Lawrence.

Again, let us not forget that history emphatically tells us that the flow of trade and commerce has always followed the shortest feasible routes. In this great circle route, Newfoundland occupies an important strategic position. Recognizing that fact, a determined effort was made by American interests through Pan American Airways to acquire vested and exclusive landing rights in Newfoundland for a period of fifty years, in consideration of substantial money payments. The agreement had been negotiated and was ready for signatures when the present government of Canada and the British Government, watchful of the situation, intervened, the results of which intervention were to safeguard for Canada and for the British Empire this important trade route that might otherwise have passed into foreign hands. This action was taken at the Airway Conference in Newfoundland in July of last year. The signifiance of that conference will, I think, in due time be better understood.

Turn now to the orient. The shortest route from Chicago to Tokyo passes through Winnipeg, northern Alberta, down the Mackenzie river, through the Yukon and Alaska and on by the northeast coast of Asia to Japan. Planes from the Pacific seaports of the United States to either China or Japan will find that their shortest feasible route will be over Canadian territory, passing through British Columbia, through the Yukon, at White Horse, over Alaska and on to Tokyo and Pekin. Again recognizing these facts, American interests have endeavoured to secure landing rights on Canadian soil along these routes, but again these routes have been preserved to Canada.

Whether, therefore, of our own volition or otherwise, we in Canada are going to find ourselves participating in important intercontinental air routes of the future. The significance of these facts will not be lost on this House of Commons. Canada must zealously maintain her sovereignty over all air routes which lie through or across Canada.

What would be Canada's position in the event of war? Aircraft must be regarded primarily as servants of commerce; yet our air transport system, while conceived for and serving commerce first, must take due cognizance of the possibilities of national emergencies. The only adequate defence against aircraft is aircraft. Without an adequate aircraft industry we would find ourselves in a hopeless position in the event of a national emergency.

To-night it is not my purpose to develop further the importance to Canada of the development of her air routes in the eventuality of war, other than to state that no good purpose can be served either in the interests of national development or in the interests of world peace by emulating the ostrich and burying our heads in the sand, or by crying "peace, peace" when there is no peace.

It is important to look, sir, to what the other nations are doing. At this juncture we might well refresh our minds on the progress being made by other countries in the establishment and maintenance of regular air services:

In Great Britain, external as well as internal interests are being served by airways. Imperial Airways Limited operates two main empire trunk lines; one is from Croydon to Capetown, a distance of 7,945 miles, and the other is from Croydon to Singapore, 8,646 miles. This route will shortly be extended to Australia. The company is now operating a fleet of forty air liners and is doing a steadily increasing business, showing gains in every year but one, in total traffic ton miles. Figures for the past fiscal year show 2,100,000 ton miles as compared with 600,000 in 1928.

Under direction of M. Pierre Cot, the French Air Minister, the government of France has supported the amalgamation of five of the largest companies into one organization known as L'Air France, with a capital of 120,000,000 francs. In addition to a network of lines over Europe, a weekly service is maintained between Paris and Saigon, in French Indo-China. A service across the south Atlantic is projected.

The Deutsche Luft Hansa, which is Germany's national air line, also maintains a network of airways over Europe, resembling on a map a great cobweb, Germany itself being more extensively covered than any other country.

From Amsterdam, the K.L.M. Royal Dutch Air Lines operates the world's longest airway to Batavia in the Dutch East Indies, as well as other air lines in Europe.

Italy has six important air line companies at work, and their routes cover not only Italy but stretch out to Berlin in the north, to Barcelona in the west, to Constantinople in the east, and to Tripoli in the south.

Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark, are all relatively well to the front with air lines. Russia, of whom we have little authentic information, is known to have important trunk lines in operation, employing a fleet of large air liners.

Probably the greatest advance in commercial flying has taken place in the United States, and being a near neighbour we have more than passing interest in this progress. Internal interests are served mainly by three transcontinental lines. There are 19,500 miles of fully lighted airways in operation.

Externally, United States interests are being served extensively by Pan American Airways System, whose principal routes lie over the South Americas, the total distance covered being 26,650 miles, and 139 air liners are in use by this one company alone. Their service, based at Miami, follows the east coast of South America down to Buenos Aires, then to Santiago on the west coast, and up along the coastline to a terminus at Brownsville, Texas. Having a large trade with the South Americas, the United States has found the fast mail, express and passenger services of Pan American Airways of great value.

In this regard Britain has found the air routes of the United States into South America of significance in the diminution of her trade.

Looking at the matter in the round, the big outstanding problem in civil aviation is unquestionably the institution of a regular air service across the North Atlantic by heavier-than-air aircraft. We must give credit to Germany for the remarkable demonstrations that they have given with the Graf Zeppelin to show that a service by means of lighter-than-air aircraft is possible. We must also acknowledge the work of both the French and Germans in spanning the south Atlantic by heavier-than-air aircraft.

The end in view, however, is to join the two important areas in the northern hemisphere—Europe and North America. A great deal of attention has already been concentrated on the problem, and five methods or routes have been proposed:

1. The Arctic route via Greenland and Iceland, which is just over 5,000 miles from London to Ottawa. This route gives reasonably short stages and, therefore, would permit the carriage of a reasonable load, but it presents the very serious problem of fog and ice formation. It is an inhospitable route with very uncertain meteorological conditions, and durng the winter much of the route is a land of almost perpetual night.

2. The direct route, flying from New York or Montreal to Newfoundland, and from there to Ireland, carrying on to London, whence air services radiate to all parts of the continent. This route is 3,500 miles, including a non-stop stage from Newfoundland to Ireland of about 1,900 miles.

At present there are no aircraft in the world that can fly this stage as a regular commercial venture carrying any pay load whatever, and the object of a North Atlantic service is, of course, not merely to fly it, but to carry load by it. This route also has to face the problem of fog around Newfoundland, and possibly ice formation in that region during winter.

3. The Bermuda-Azores route, which is again about 5,000 miles, but which traverses an area of better weather and of less fog. The longest stage without the possibility of refuelling is from Bermuda to the Azores, a matter of over 2,000 miles. There again, there are no aircraft yet available that can fly this stage regularly and carry useful paying load.

4. Floating islands are proposed as intermediate refuelling points.

If a satisfactory method can be found for anchoring these islands in the Atlantic, and if they are, in fact, able to stand against the Atlantic gales, there seems no difficulty in operating a North Atlantic service with their aid, if sufficient money is forthcoming to construct and man the number of islands required. The capital expenditure that would be required for the islands seems, however, to put this method out of court, at any rate at the present time.

5. The last alternative is the employment of ships in place of the floating islands; to employ, in fact, the method adopted by the Germans for the South Atlantic service.

One would expect that it would be impossible to land a flying boat in the North Atlantic as a regular thing, even making the best possible use of the refuelling ship to form a lee. The method does not lend itself to passenger transport, however, even though the difficulty of landing in the sea close to the refuelling ship could be overcome. As you doubtless know, the method is for the flying boat to land on the sea, to taxi on to a trailing apron towed behind the steamer, and then to be lifted by a crane on to the deck of the steamer, and after being refuelled, to be catapulted for its next stage. The use of the catapult, involves, however, very rapid acceleration which would probably be entirely unsuitable for ordinary passenger transport.

It would appear, therefore, that we are faced with very considerable difficulties in the establishment of an all-air service across the North Atlantic. Nevertheless, with the progress of aeronautical science, the various obstacles to the establishment of such a service by one or another of the methods or routes outlined will in the course of time be removed. How soon progress will enable us to overcome these difficulties is a matter of opinion.

It is not enough that the distance shall be flown;—it must show a saving of time over the normal sea route, and it must do so at a cost that the traffic will bear, or at any rate will bear within a reasonable time. In the initial stages of any venture of this description, it may be necessary to foster the development by the grant of a subsidy.

Now, sir, what is Canada doing? What has Canada done? What should Canada do? At the present rate of progress on the trans-Canada system, there will be from coast to coast by next fall an airway on which safe landing places may be found at intervals averaging twenty-five miles. It only remains to equip this airway with lighting, radio and meteorological services, for it to be comparable in efficiency with any airway in the world. I quote from a speech of the Minister of National Defence, delivered in Toronto on February 23 last.

This work is being carried out by the Department of National Defence as an unemployment relief measure under the able and immediate direction of Major General McNaughton, chief of staff of the defence council.

Its importance is of the first rank. By this fall therefore the government will be in a position to call for tenders for better than a twenty-four hour transcontinental air mail service.

Time will not permit me to go into the present air mail services already established; they are considerable. The service from Montreal to Rimouski, put on during the period of navigation and inaugurated originally in 1928, is of threefold significance:

1. Foreign mail via New York to Montreal without air service beats the St. Lawrence route one day.

2. The Montreal-Rimouski air mail service wipes out this differential and ties the New York route. That means something to Canada.

3. With the development of a ship-to-shore service, picking up the mail at Belle Isle and flying it to Montreal, we can beat the route via New York from one to one and a half days.

Then there is the Montreal-Albany service and the Winnipeg to Pembina service, connecting with all United States lines. There are also domestic contacts to all outlying points in Canada's hinterland and to the mining areas; down the Mackenzie river to Aklavik. There are two services from Prince Albert, one to Lac la Ronge and one to Isle à la Crosse. Coming eastward we have these services: Lac du Bonnet to Wadhope and Bissett, mining areas; Sioux Lookout to Red Lake and Narrow Lake, mining area; and the Amos-Siscoe route, which is also mining.

Then there is the bush flying of our trappers, miners and prospectors out into the hinterland of Canada. In this respect these pilots to-day are doing a national service to Canada and are performing feats in flying which are second to those of the pilots of no other country. There is a winter service from Quebec to Natashquan and to Anticosti island, and a winter service from Leamington to Pelee island.

We did have an interurban air mail service in eastern Canada as well as a prairie service from Winnipeg to points in Alberta, which was discontinued owing to economic distress in 1932.

The cost of the prairie service came particularly under criticism. Certain extravagant statements were given wide publicity and should be dispelled. For example, statements were made to the effect that air mail had been costing the country $30 per letter. I find that the average cost of air mail was 47 cents per pound, a vastly different thing from $30 per letter. Even the somewhat experimental prairie run, which was cancelled, was doing better than fifty per cent of its cost. In that connection, too, one should bear in mind that the former service had no continuity. The prairie run was left up in the air at both ends with contacts only through the United States. So, too, of the eastern section.

Of outstanding significance was the experimental ship-to-shore mail services operated under the direction of the Department of National Defence and the Post Office Department during the Ottawa imperial conference of 1932. Mail was delivered from London at Ottawa in less than four days, and vice versa. A three and a half day service between Montreal and London is an immediate possibility and should be put into effect with the least possible delay.

Is not this a most logical step to take particularly following consummation of the recent trade agreements with Great Britain? Let us more firmly knit the empire with another all red route. With the inauguration of a Canadian transcontinental mail service, the ship-cum-air service across the North Atlantic would give the fastest route from Europe not only to Canada but to many parts of the United States and to the far east—and, remember, through Canada.

In commerce, speed has ever been the mandate. The air mail is the answer to this demand for speed. Weighing fully the cost against the service performed, the air mail presents economic advantages of incalculable value to the nation. As one of the leading trading nations of the world, can we afford to ignore these facts?

Shall our transcontinental air mail service be undertaken by a private company under contract with the government, subject to essential governmental regulations and control to safeguard the public interest; or shall it be undertaken by a semi-national corporation on which the government shall have adequate representation, or shall it be undertaken as one more national enterprise? I merely point to the alternatives. But whatever the way, let it be one of planned progress, with adequate safeguards for the public weal.

We should now think of Canada as not 3,500 miles but as eighteen to twenty-four hours in width. Let us reach out and take our destined place among the nations. Opportunity is on tiptoe waiting to take off: let us give her wings.

I cannot conclude without acknowledging my debt for assistance rendered through the Department of National Defence by the minister and his able chief of staff, Major General Andrew G. McNaughton; through the Department of the Postmaster General by the minister and the officials of the air mail service branch. Particularly am I indebted for information to Mr. George M. Ross, executive secretary of the Canadian Flying Clubs' Association, who has done and is doing such splendid work in awakening and making our Canadian people air-conscious.

Out of all this welter of words, Mr. Speaker, this supreme fact overtops them all: Canada is on the Main street of the heavens. Would that I could splash it in letters of flame across the firmament! Would that it might stand out as a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, to lead Canada into her promised land!

Let Canada, led by her government, put her back into this development and make it possible to realize in truth and in fact the destiny envisaged in those lines:

> Wider still and wider
> Shall thy bounds be set;
> God who made thee mighty
> Make thee mightier yet.

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, for the few moments at my disposal I desire to bring to the attention of the house many matters which are of particular interest and concern to those whom I have the honour to represent. At the outset I wish to say that within the area from which I come, being the southwestern corner of Manitoba, there are very distressful conditions due to the fact that for the last four years there has been an almost entire lack of rain. No blame can be attached to lack of fertility of the soil in that area; no blame can be attached to the people who live there, about ninety-seven per cent of whom are Anglo-Saxons from Ontario, but when for four years there is no rain, there can be no crop. At one time last year it seemed as though it were going to be possible to have crops in that area, but when the crops had grown to a height of some six inches there came from the republic directly to the south of us that tremendous pest, the grasshopper. Where perhaps on one day there stood a crop luxuriant in growth, the following day there were found only thousands of spikes, being the straw which the grasshoppers had left.

When people under such conditions face distress for four years, their reserves completely vanish and they find themselves requiring relief. Similarly the municipalities within that area have been able to borrow only that which the banks would permit them to borrow; they have then gone to the province, the province has come to the dominion and through these agencies help has been given. The physical hardships of the people in that area are of course tremendous, but I should say that they are nothing compared with their mental hardships. They are a people completely unaccustomed to accepting relief; they have lived many years without having to face such situations. They are entirely worthy; they desire to be self sufficient, self supporting and self respecting. They are, however, faced with conditions which are not of their own making.

It is strange that that territory in which during the years 1924 to 1928 perhaps the best crops in Manitoba were produced, has become rainless. I believe a survey should be made to determine whether that area is facing drought merely on account of a cycle which we believe prevails in some places, or whether there are within its confines many farms which are submarginal, by which I mean lands that will not under ordinary favourable conditions produce such crops as would allow the farmer to operate at a profit. Various suggestions have been put forward, for instance that a huge corporation might be set up which would take out of cultivation some lands within drought stricken areas, whether in Manitoba or Saskatchewan, with the result of course, first, that there would not be so much grain grown and, second, that a tremendous amount of hardship would be obviated in the way of people attempting to cultivate land on which it is not possible to grow paying crops. With regard to what is known as the drought area of Manitoba I think a survey would show that practically all those lands are capable of being farmed at a profit, because until the end of 1928 they were farmed at a good profit.

Due to conditions within that area the questions of interest and of debt are of major importance, and I am glad to note that further federal legislation is forecast under which there will be some system of debt adjustment. I should like to refer particularly to the good work being done by the present government in regard to the reduction of rates of interest on money which they borrow, with a consequent reduction in interest rates throughout the country. It is pleasing to see that treasury bills to the amount of $15,000,000 were sold by the government during March, 1934, at rates of 2·85 and 3·12 per cent, and also that in April another issue amounting to $15,000,000 was sold at rates of 2·41 and 2·71 per cent. Last year, in August, for instance, the normal rate of interest was 3·75 per cent. Through what has been done in this connection there has been created in this country a short term money market, something which we did not know existed before. The old practice of governments was to call in the banks and the various loan organizations and to give them perhaps a percentage in order to sell treasury bills. Prior to 1933 the rate varied from four and a half to five per cent where the banks made the arrangements on behalf of the Canadian people. This year, however, the method was changed and the government sold treasury bills in units of $100,000. They sent out questionnaires to all parties who they thought might be interested in buying those treasury bills. This has two effects: it will reduce the rate of interest and reduce taxation, and in addition it indicates the value which will come from the organization which we know as the central bank. It is interesting perhaps to indicate what the effect would be if we could place all our debt on the same basis. The funded debt of Canada on March 31 last was $2,858,000,000. The interest on that was $131,890,000, which indicates a rate of 4·62 per cent. If we could strike a new rate of 2·62 per cent there would be a saving of $57,000,000. There is due this year about $424,000,000 of debt. The rate thereon is 4·8 per cent, or a total interest bill of $20,484,000. If we could strike a rate there of 2·8 per cent there would be a saving of $8,484,000. That is to say, if we could borrow at the same rate at which we have borrowed now, if we could carry that rate right across, there would be a saving to Canada of many millions of dollars.

In connection with the question of conversion loans there seems to be much misapprehension with regard to the British conversion. We are often asked why Canada does not do what Great Britain did. It should be remembered that in the case of the British loan there was a clause in the contract providing that the loan should be redeemable at 100 after January 1, 1929. The issue was to run until 1947, at 5 per cent. The government refunded the loan as of December 1, 1932, at the same time offering to subscribers the right to continue their investment at 3½ per cent, which proposal was accepted by 92 per cent of the holders. There is no such clause in regard to our loans, therefore we are not able to put through a conversion on the same basis as the British people.

I wish to turn for a moment to the general question of trade. It is important to note that we have no longer an adverse balance of trade. We now have a favourable balance of $152,000,000 whereas when the previous administration went out of office there was an annual adverse balance of $127,000,000. This change is a tremendous achievement in itself. Another interesting comparison is Canada's situation in world trade in 1929 as compared with 1933. We find that during that time world trade as a whole was reduced by 68 per cent, the trade of the United States by 65 per cent and that of Canada only 62 per cent. These figures show that so far as world trade is concerned Canada has done better on the average than the world generally, and has done better than the United States, in spite of its N.R.A. and Roosevelt and all his great legislation.

Then I should like to draw attention to a question which was of particular interest to me and those whom I represent. Since this government came into power a duty of twenty-five cents a bushel was placed on corn imported into this country. I must admit that I had something to do with that duty being imposed; therefore I should like to indicate some of its effects. On March 1, 1931, when I made an address in this house in regard to the matter, we had on hand 100,000,000 bushels of barley. On March 1, 1934, according to the bureau of statistics we had on hand only 22,500,000 bushels, or less than twenty-five per cent of what we had in 1931. I do not think the question of price is a good indication, but I wish to give the prices. On March 1, 1931, the price of 3 C. W. barley in Toronto was 38 cents a bushel, on the same date in 1934 it was 54¾ cents. But I think the most important feature in that regard is in connection with the importation of corn. Whereas for the twelve months ending March 1, 1931, we imported into this country 8,000,000 bushels to be fed to our cattle and poultry, during the year ending March 1, 1934, we imported only 3,000,000 bushels. That is to say, due to the imposition of that duty we have been importing into this country annually 5,000,000 bushels less, with the result that that market has been available to those who produce barley in this country, to the great benefit of the producer.

In connection with the duties placed by this government and the benefits of the Ottawa agreements, I should like to indicate the valuable increase we have had in exports of agricultural products in 1933 as compared with 1931. The products for which I have obtained figures are wheat, flour, oats, barley, cattle, beef, pork, bacon, ham, canned meat, poultry, eggs and butter. I have chosen these articles because they are items of importance to western Canada. In round figures the exports of these products to the United Kingdom in 1931 amounted to $81,000,000, whereas in 1933 they amounted to $99,000,000, an increase of $18,000,000 in those particular products alone. That is of some importance to the people I happen to represent.

It is often said by those who oppose us that this government is collecting too much in duties. In that connection I wish to give four different figures which I think of importance. For the fiscal year 1923, when the previous government was in power, they collected in duties $133,803,370. In 1929 they collected $200,479,505, and in 1930, $199,011,628. This year this government collected only $65,900,000, in round figures.

Then it is often said that the policy pursued by this government of keeping the home market for Canadians had the effect of increasing prices. I do not wish to quote many items, but I obtained some figures from a store in my own town selling men's and boys' wear. I got the prices of twenty-two items as of June 1, 1930, and the present time, and on every item of ordinary apparel that a working man would buy there is a decrease in the price to the consumer. I give a few items:

	Price
	June, 1930	To-day
Cotton merino work socks..	$0 35	$0 25
Medium heavy wool work socks..	0 40	0 29
Split horsehide work gloves.	0 75	0 50
Heavy plain blue bib overalls..	2 25	1 85
Black box kip boots, medium weight..	4 50	3 40
Medium heavy jumbo knit sweaters..	3 50	2 75
Medium weight tweed caps.	1 40	1 00

The items all tell the same story. We are also told that this government has strangled trade by the tariffs which have been imposed. I desire merely to summarize statements which I might make at great length, by saying this: In regard to our trade position so far as the world is concerned, aside from the figures I have already quoted, we occupy fifth position among exporting nations where formerly we were sixth. Of course the previous government lost most of our export markets, particularly the United States where our annual agricultural exports totalled $159,000,000 when the previous government came into power, though in 1929 they had diminished to ten per cent of that amount.

I have indicated that there has been no strangulation of trade due to the Ottawa agreements but rather there has been an increase, and that the increase in agricultural exports alone has amounted to some $18,000,000. I think it is well recognized by all those who care to read the statistics of the country that the previous administration, known as the Mackenzie King administration, increased tariffs. I have indicated also that in evidence of the fact that there has been no strangulation of trade we have a favourable trade balance amounting to $152,000,000 where previously we had an adverse balance of $127,000,000. In connection with trade it is well to recall that the previous administration was represented at Imperial conferences in 1921 and 1926 at which no agreements were reached and no progress made. It is also of passing interest to note that in connection with the Ottawa agreements, out of 228 items affected the tariff was lowered on 136.

From time to time we hear a good deal in regard to unemployment and the promises made in connection therewith. The promises made by the previous administration might very well become the subject of a forty minute address, so many were there of them, particularly if one cares to take the old platform of 1919. There one will find literally dozens of promises which were never carried out by the previous administration. In regard to unemployment, however, I should like particularly to refer to the fact that during the last fiscal year 250,000 more people found employment in comparison with the previous year. One could quote various summaries to indicate that trade has been increased and is increasing all the time. In one of the famous Southam papers of May 12 I happened to notice a list of improvements in trade, as follows:

Toronto—The Ontario Paper Company this week announced a wage increase of 6½ per cent for its nearly 1,000 workers.

Fort William—Great Lakes Paper Company, Ltd., is arranging to take on about 60 more workers and to operate three shifts.

Three Rivers, Que.—Employees of three mills of Consolidated Pulp and Paper Company in this district are receiving a ten per cent wage increase, effective from May 1.

Meaford, Ont.—The Meaford Manufacturing Company, Ltd., the town's largest furniture plant, is again operating on part time after a shut-down.

Hamilton—The Canadian Keystone Products, Ltd., is moving to this city and will manufacture cleasers and water softeners.

Marysville, N.B.—Canadian Cottons, Ltd., announce a five per cent wage increase for mill hands here. Plant is operating almost full time.

St. Catharines, Ont.—The McKinnon Company here, a subsidiary of General Motors, now has 1,290 on its payroll compared with 590 last year.

Ottawa—Lumber mill of J. R. Booth Company here, is again operating after a shut-down of 3 years' duration. The company will also operate a mill at Arnprior.

East Windsor, Ont.—This town's relief roll has dropped 2,300 to 5,776 in the last year, and reductions are being made daily as employment improves.

North Bay, Ont.—About 270 men will be given employment temporarily by the T. & N.O. railway, on track maintenance work.

Toronto—Canadian Frigidaire factory here has been placed on a 24-hour production schedule.

Montreal—Six thousand persons have been taken off relief lists since February and the number of families obtaining assistance is now decreasing about 200 weekly.

These indicate, in any event, that there is a recovery going on, particularly in eastern Canada. But when we speak of unemployment it is well to remember that the question of immigration still has some bearing on the matter. I should like to quote two figures in regard to the people who were brought to this country by the previous administration. We find that in the year 1928 there were 151,597 people brought to this country; in 1929 there were 167,722 people brought here, but in 1933 we allowed only 19,872 people to enter Canada. That is quite important to remember when discussing unemployment.

Then for a moment I should like to refer to the question which Conservatives have to face every time they address an audience in this country, due to the influence of Liberal speakers and some sections of the press; I refer to the suggestion that the Conservative party stands for the big interests. I should like to point out that the financial centre of Canada is Montreal and that the financial province is Quebec. Montreal votes Liberal, and in the past the province of Quebec has been solidly Liberal. Lately it has been slightly less Liberal; we now get a small block of Conservative votes from that province. The present government has increased the corporation tax, which affects all those in this country who have money; it has increased the income tax on the higher incomes; it has increased the taxes on banks. It is bringing into existence the central bank, which is the greatest menace to the chartered banks that this country has ever seen. It has increased the taxes in regard to the carrying of newspapers, again affecting a big interest. It is said that the present government, through the measure providing for cooperation between the railways, has placed the Canadian Pacific in harness, or at least has had an influence upon it which no other government ever had. In addition this government refused to give the control of radio to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or other private interests. Of course there is protection, even as there was under the previous government; that is for the purpose of employing labour. It seems very strange indeed, if this government is linked with the big interests, that this party got nothing out of Beauharnois while the Liberal party received $700,000.

Mr. DUPUIS: How much from the Macdonald Tobacco Company?

Mr. WILLIS: Not a cent. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, the clauses concerning the taking over of gold by the government and the issuing of currency, contained in the Bank of Canada Act, are the greatest blows ever struck against the banks, and the very investigation to which my hon. friend just referred, the Stevens inquiry, is the most courageous step ever taken in Canada with regard to whatever hold the big interests may have upon the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite were very critical of the government in regard to the gold tax, because the government preferred to tax those who had plenty in order that they might reduce the sugar tax which is paid by those who have very little.

The people are having great difficulty in deciding where the good old Liberal party now stands. Liberalism in this country is now a stranger mixture than ever it was in the past. If you consider the government of the province of Quebec you find the most reactionary government that ever existed in Canada; and that is the criticism usually voiced by those who try to tear down the Conservative party. In addition you have Liberalism as we know it on the Pacific
